LIVERPOOL, Charles Jenkinson, earl of, the eldest son of Colonel Jenkinson, was born in 1727, and was educated at the Charter House, and at University College, Oxford. In 1761 he became a member of parliament, and under secretary of state; in 1766, a lord of the admiralty; in 1772, vice-treasurer of Ireland; in 1778, secretary at war; in 1784, president of the board of trade; in 1786, he was created Baron Hawkesbury; in 1796, earl of Liverpool; and he died in 1808. The earl of Liverpool was often accused of being one of the secret and irresponsible, and therefore unconstitutional, advisers of George III. He wrote a Treatise on the Coins of the Realm; and some other works; and made a Collection of Treaties.

LIVERPOOL, Robert Banks Jenkinson, earl of, the son of the foregoing, was born in 1770, and was educated at the same seminaries as his father. In 1791 he took his seat as member for Rye. A speech against abolishing the slave trade was one of his earliest efforts in parliament. In 1793 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the India Board; in 1801, he was introduced into the cabinet, as secretary of state for the foreign department; he was placed in the home department, on the return of Mr. Pitt to power; he returned to that office after the dismissal of the whig administration; and was removed to the war department under Mr. Perceval. By the death of Mr. Perceval, in 1812, Lord Liverpool was raised to the premiership, and he held that elevated station till February, 1827, when an apoplectic and paralytic stroke rendered him incapable of taking any further part in public affairs. He died December 4, 1823.

LIVIA, wife of Tiberius Claudius Nero, afterwards married Augustus, and prevailed upon him to adopt her children. Some authors assert that she poisoned Augustus, to make room for her son Tiberius, who treated her with the highest disrespect. She died A.D. 29.

LIVINGSTON, Robert, first possessor of the manor of Livingston in the state of New-York, and founder of one of the most distinguished families in this country, was the son of John Livingston, who received the degree of A.M. at Glasgow in 1621, and was the minister of Anerum, but refusing to take the oath of allegiance in 1663, was banished, and removed to Rotterdam, where he was a minister of the Scot's chapel, and died Aug. 9, 1672, aged 69. Robert L. was born at Anerum in 1654, and came to America with his nephew about 1672. He was a member of the council in 1698. His wife was of the family of Schuyler, and the widow of Mr. Van Rensselaer. He left three sons, Philip, Robert and Gilbert. A Mr. Livingston, perhaps Mr. R. L. who was many years speaker of the assembly of N. York, died at Boston Oct. 1, 1728.

LIVINGSTON, Philip, a patriot of the American revolution, and a signer of the declaration of independence, graduated at Yale College 1737. He became a merchant in New York, and as there were but few well educated merchants in Wall street, at that time, he was soon at their head. In 1754 he was an alderman of the city of New York, and after serving in this capacity four years was sent to Albany as a representative of the city. In this body he soon became a leader, and directed its attention to the great interests of commerce; New York being then behind Boston and Philadelphia in her exports and imports. He was one of the committee of correspondence, with the agent for the colony in England, the celebrated Edmund Burke; and his letters abound in information and critical remarks. Mr. Livingston was in congress in 1776, and not only signed, but was a strenuous advocate for the declaration of independence. He was a member of the senate of New York, on the adoption of the state constitution; after which, under the provisions of that constitution, he was elected a member of congress. He was not long permitted to devote himself to the service of his country, for he died June 12, 1778, aged 62. He laid the foundation of the professorship of divinity at Yale college by a donation of money in 1746.

LIVINGSTON, William, LL.D. governor of New Jersey, a descendant of the family, which emigrated from Scotland, was born about the year 1741. He was a lawyer, and early embraced the cause of civil and religious liberty. When Great Britain advanced her arbitrary claims, he employed his pen in opposing them, and in vindicating the rights of his countrymen. After sustaining some important offices in New York, he removed to New Jersey, and as a representative of this state, was one of the principal members of the first congress in 1774. After the inhabitants of New Jersey had sent their governor, William Franklin, under a strong guard to Connecticut, and had formed a new constitution in July 1776, Mr. Livingston was elected the first chief magistrate; and such was his integrity, and republican virtue, that he was annually reelected till his death. During the war he bent his exertions to support the independence of his country. By the keenness and severity of his political writings he exasperated the British, who distinguished him as an object of their peculiar hatred. His pen had no inconsiderable influence in exciting that indignation and zeal, which rendered the militia of New Jersey, so remarkable, for the alacrity, with which, on any alarm, they arrayed themselves against the common enemy. He was in 1787 a delegate to the grand convention which formed the constitution of the United States. After having sustained the office of governor for fourteen years with great honor to himself and usefulness to the state, he died July 25, 1790, aged 67.

LIVINGSTON, Robert R., chancellor of the state of New York, graduated at King's college New York 1765. Having studied law with William Smith, he was appointed by gov. Tryon recorder of the city; an office, which he resigned, at the beginning of the revolution. In April 1775 he was elected from Dutchess county to the assembly. In 1776 he was a member of congress, and was placed on the committee with Jefferson, Adams, Franklin and Sherman, for drawing up the declaration of independence, and on other important committees. In Aug. 1781 he was appointed secretary for foreign affairs; and he commenced his duties Oct. 20th. The foreign concerns of congress had been previously conducted by the committee of secret correspondence. He was diligent, prompt, and energetic. Domestic affairs were also in part intrusted to him. His valuable correspondence is published in the Diplomatic correspondence edited by Jared Sparks. On his resignation in 1783 he received the thanks of congress. Under the new constitution of New York, which he assisted in forming, as chairman of the committee, he was appointed chancellor, and continued in that place till 1801. In 1788 he was chairman of the state convention, which adopted the federal constitution, uniting his efforts, at that time, with those of Jay and Hamilton. In 1794 he declined the appointment of minister to France offered him by Washington. In 1801 he accepted the office of minister plenipotentiary to France, and proceeded to Paris. By the first consul he was received with respect, and after his mission had closed, Napoleon presented him a splendid snuff box, with a miniature of himself by Isabey. Assisted by Mr. Munroe he made the very important purchase of Louisiana for 15 millions of dollars. In Paris he formed an intimacy with Robert Fulton, whom he assisted by his counsels and money. After his resignation and the arrival of general Armstrong, his successor, he travelled in Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, and returned to America in June 1805. He died 1813, aged 66. He caused the introduction of steam navigation into the United States. He introduced the merino sheep, and the use of gypsum in New York. He was president of an agricultural society; and of the academy of the fine arts. He published an oration before the Cincinnati 1787; an address to the society for promoting the arts, 1808; essays on agriculture; a work on the merino sheep.

LIVINGSTON, John H., D.D. president of Queen's college New Jersey, graduated at Yale college 1762. In May 1766 he went to Holland to prosecute his theological studies in the university of Utrecht, where he resided four years, obtaining the degree of doctor in theology in 1770, in which year he returned to America, and became the pastor of the Dutch reformed church in the city of New York. At this period the Dutch churches in America were divided into the Conferentie, and the Cœtus parties; by the efforts of Dr. Livingston a happy union was effected in 1772, and the Dutch church became independent of the classis in Amsterdam. For this independence he had negotiated while in Holland. In 1784 he was appointed theological professor in the Dutch church. The duties of minister and professor he performed till 1810, when he was appointed president of Queen's college; in which place he remained till his death in 1825, aged 78. He published two sermons on growth in grace in Amer. preacher, vol. I.; sanctuary blessings, vol. III, before N. Y. missionary society, 1799; address at the commencement at Queen's college, 1810.

LIVINGSTON, Brockholst, LL.D., judge of the supreme court of the United States, graduated at Princeton college 1774. In 1776 he entered the family of gen. Schuyler, commander of the northern army, and afterwards was attached to the suite of Arnold, at the time of the capture of Burgoyne. In 1779, when Mr. Jay, who had married his sister, repaired to the court of Spain, he accompanied him as his private secretary. After an absence of three years he returned and studied law. He was admitted to the bar in April 1783; was appointed judge of the supreme court in New York 1802; and in 1806 judge of the supreme court of the United States. He died 1823, aged 65.

LIVINIUS, or LIVINEUS, John, Latin translator of some of the works of Gregory Nazianzen, of Chrysostom, and other fathers, and editor of Panegyrici Veteres, 8vo. 1599, was a native of Dendermonde. He studied at Cologne, and distinguished himself as a Grecian. He was canon of Antwerp, and he died there, 1599.

LIVIUS, Titus, a celebrated Latin historian, born at Padua, and patronized by the emperor Augustus, who intrusted to him the education of his grandson Claudius. He died at Padua, A.D. 17, aged 67. The best edition of his valuable history, which has not descended whole to modern times, is by Crevier, 1735, 6 vols. 4to. It has been translated into English by Mr. Baker, in 6 vols. 8vo.

LLOYD, William, an English prelate, born 1627, at Tilehurst, Berks, where his father was rector. He was educated under his father, and in 1633 entered at Oriel college, Oxford, and the next year removed to a scholarship at Jesus, where he became fellow, 1646. In 1666 he was made king's chaplain, and successively promoted to a prebend of Salisbury, the vicarage of St. Mary's, Reading, the archdeaconry of Merioneth, deanery of Bangor, prebend of St. Paul's, and the vicarage of St. Martin in the fields. In 1680 he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower in 1683, for refusing to permit the publication of the royal declaration for liberty of conscience. He was a zealous promoter of the revolution, and in 1692 was translated to Lichfield and Coventry, and 1699 to Worcester. He died at Hartlebury castle, Aug. 30th, 1717, aged 91. His publications were numerous, they consist of Tracts against Popery—Sermons—the History of the Government of the Church of Great Britain—a Dissertation on Daniel's 70 Weeks—a System of Chronology—a Harmony of the Gospel—a Chronological Account of the Life of Pythagoras, and other theological works.

LLOYD, Robert, an English poet educated at Westminster school, where his father, Dr. Pierson

Lloyd, was second master, and from thence elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was for some time usher of Westminster school, and during that time published "the Actor" 1760, a poem of great merit. His irregularities, however, obliged him to resign his situation in the school, and he now depended for subsistence on the exertions of his pen. At last his imprudence and his debts lodged him in the Fleet prison, where he lived supported chiefly by the bounty of his steadfast friend the poet Churchill. The death of this liberal benefactor overwhelmed him with sorrow, and in less than a month he followed him to the grave. He died 15th Dec. 1764. He was the author of the "Capricious Lover" a comic opera, 8vo. and four other dramatic works. A partial collection of his works by Dr. Kenrick, appeared, 2 vols. 8vo., 1774. His imitation of Theocritus has been much admired.

LOYD, Thomas, succeeded Penn as deputy governor of Pennsylvania, on his return to England in 1684. He resigned in 1688. In 1689 the administration again devolved on him as president of the council. He was of an ancient family of Wales, and educated at Oxford, but embracing the principles of the Quakers he lost all hopes of preferment in England, and accompanied William Penn to America. He was one of the most intimate and confidential friends of the proprietor, and a valuable acquisition to the province. He died July 10th, 1694, aged 54.

LOYD, Henry, an eminent military officer and writer on tactics, was born in Wales, in 1729. He served with great reputation in the French, Austrian, Prussian, and Russian armies, and rose to the rank of general. He died, in the Netherlands, in 1783. Lloyd wrote A Political and Military Rhapsody on the Invasion and Defence of Great Britain and Ireland; A History of the War in Germany; and a work on the composition of various ancient and modern armies.

LOYD, James, a physician. Having studied medicine for a time in Boston, he proceeded to England, where he attended the London hospitals two years. In 1752 he returned to Boston and soon obtained extensive practice. He introduced improvements in surgery, such as ligatures for cauterizing, and amputation by double incision. During the occupation of Boston by the British he remained in the town. He thought the revolutionary movements were premature. Yet he was devoted to his profession, and not a zealous politician. In 1789 he went to England to seek compensation, for property belonging to him, destroyed by the British, but without success, as he would not consent to become a British subject, nor even express an intention of becoming such. His fine health which continued to old age was first interrupted by a fall from his horse. In 1809 he was confined to his house. He died 1810, aged 82.

LOYD, Nicholas, an English divine, author of an Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary, printed Oxford, 1670, folio, and in 4to. 1695, a work to which Hoffman, Moreri, and other succeeding lexicographers, are much indebted. This active and indefatigable scholar died 1680, aged 49, and was buried at St. Mary's, Newington, Surrey, where he was rector.

LLWELYN AP GRUFYDD, a Welsh prince who heroically resisted the invasion of Edward I., of England, but at last fell under the power of his superior antagonist, 1282, after a reign of 28 years. The independence of his country perished with him.

LLYWELYN AP SITSYLT, a Welsh prince, sovereign of South Wales and Powys, 999. He fell bravely fighting in battle 1021, after defeating Aulaff the Scotch invader, supported by the treacherous assistance of Hywill and Meredydd, sons of Edwin ap Einion.

LLYWELYN, or LANGEWYDD, or LLYWELYN SION, a Welsh bard of Glamorgan, who died 1616. His collections of the System of Bardism are valuable, as he was not only eminent himself, but frequently presided at the meetings of the bards.

LLYWELYN, Thomas, author of an History of the different editions of the Welsh Bible, in which he evinced great learning as a divine, and much judgment as a critic, died 1796.

LOBEIRA, Vasco, the author of the far famed romance of Amadis de Gaul, was a Portuguese, born at Porto, in the fifteenth century. Joam I. knighted him on the field of battle at Aljubarotta. He died, at Elvas, in 1403. Southey has translated Lobeira's work, and has satisfactorily proved him, and not a native of France, to be the real author of it.

LOBEL, Matthias, a native of Lisle, who studied at Montpellier, and devoted himself attentively to botany. After travelling through Switzerland, Germany and Italy, he went to England about 1570, and afterwards was nominated physician and botanist to James I. In the cultivation of his art he superintended lord Zouch's botanical garden at Hackney, and he wrote Stirpium Adversaria, London, 1570.—Observationes, seu Stirpium Historiæ, fol. 1576—Dilucide Simplicium Medicamentum. Explicationes, &c. He died 1616, aged 78.

LOBINEAU, Guy Alexis, a French Benedictine monk, born at Rennes 1667. He is eminently known by his works, the History of Britany, 2 vols. folio—of the Conquest of Spain by the Moors, 12mo.—a History of Paris, 5 vols. folio—the Saints of Britany, folio—a translation of Polybius. He died 1727. He also translated some of the plays of Aristophanes.

LOBO, Jerome, a jesuit of Lisbon, who went as a missionary to the east. He wrote a very interesting account of his travels into Abyssinia, in Portuguese, translated into French by Le Grand, and from French into English by Dr. Johnson. Lobo at his return was made rector of the college of Coimbra, Portugal, and died 1678, aged 85.

LOCKART, Alexander, a lawyer born at Carnwath, near Edinburgh. He was a member of the Scotch parliament, and violently opposed the union, and also the Hanoverian succession, after which he retired to his country house and wrote his Memoirs of Scotland, published 1714, London. He fell in a duel 1732, aged 57.

LOCKE, John, an illustrious philosopher, born 1632 at Wrington, near Bristol, of a respectable family. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1651 was elected to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took regularly his degrees in arts. Already distinguished by his great proficiency in polite literature, he now applied himself to physic, but though he obtained some reputation at Oxford, he soon found his constitution inadequate to the fatigues of the profession and gladly accepted the office of secretary to sir William Swan, sent envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, 1664. Two years after he became acquainted with lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, and not only by curing him of a dangerous abscess in the breast, but by the intelligence of his conversation, and the great powers of his mind, he deserved and obtained his lasting friendship. At the recommendation of this noble patron he relinquished medicine for the study of politics, and of civil and ecclesiastical history, and soon after employed himself in drawing up constitutions for the government of Carolina, of which his friend, now chancellor of the exchequer, and other lords, had obtained a grant from the crown. About the year 1674 he went to Montpellier, for the benefit of his health, as he was apprehensive of a consumptive attack, and here he devoted himself partly to medical pursuits, and to the composition of his Essay on Human Understanding, till in 1679 his patron raised to be president of the council recalled him home. His prospects of preferment were transitory, the earl in six months was disgraced and imprisoned, and in 1682 escaped for fear of being prosecuted for high treason, to Holland, where Locke, equally faithful to him in adversity as in prosperity, followed him. There, by his intercourse with some suspected person after the death of his patron, the exiled philosopher drew upon himself the resentment of the government; he was not only removed from his studentship at Christ-church, which he had hitherto kept as an honorable literary retreat, but he was accused by the English envoy before the States General, and his person claimed as guilty of treasonable correspondence in favor of Monmouth's invasion. Thus persecuted, Locke concealed himself for 12 months, devoting his time to literary labors, and two years after, when he returned to England in consequence of the revolution, he published his celebrated essay which had engaged him nine years in the composition. As he was considered a sufferer for political opinions he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals, worth 200*l.* a-year, and he was offered the honorable office of envoy to some foreign courts, but this he declined, ambitious only after that tranquillity and retirement, which he found in the friendly invitations of sir Francis and lady Masham at Oates. In 1695 he was prevailed upon to accept the place of commissioner of trade and plantations, for which he was so well qualified by information and knowledge, but this he resigned five years after, on account of the delicate state of his health, which did not permit him with safety to breathe the air of the capital. The latter part of life was usefully employed in the exertion of his talents on political subjects, and also in reading and commenting with all the zeal and humility of a true christian on the holy scriptures. He expired 28th Oct. 1704, in his 73d year. His works are, besides the Essay in 2 vols. 8vo., Letters on Toleration, 4to.—treatise on Civil Government, 8vo.—Thoughts concerning Education, 12mo.—Considerations on lowering the interest, and raising the Value of Money—Reasonableness of Christianity, 8vo.—Posthumous works,—Paraphrase on St. Paul's Epistles, 4to.—Letters, all which have been edited together, 3 vols. folio and 9 vols. 8vo.

LOCKE, Samuel, D.D. president of Harvard college, Massachusetts, was graduated at that institution in 1755, and two years after settled in the ministry at Sherburne, where he continued till advanced to the presidency of the college in March, 1770. He resigned the station in December, 1773. He possessed uncommon powers of mind, and was an accomplished preacher.

LOCKER, John, an English gentlemen of a respectable family in Middlesex. He was educated at Merchant Taylors', and Merton college, Oxford, and then entered at Gray's Inn, where he occupied the same chambers which lord Bacon once had. When called to the bar he became a commissioner of bankrupts, and held other offices. He devoted much of his time to the cultivation of literature, and he was a perfect master of the Greek, and also of the modern Greek, which he acquired by the conversation of a poor native of the Morea, whom he found by accident destitute and begging in the streets of London, and whom he and Dr. Mead liberally patronized. He was an enthusiastic admirer of lord Bacon, some of whose papers he carefully collected for publication, which he communicated to Dr. Birch, and Mr. Mallet. He wrote a preface to Voltaire's Charles XII. and translated the two first books, and Dr. Jebb the rest. He died much regretted, May 1760.

LOCKYER, Nicholas, a native of Somersetshire, chaplain to Cromwell, and provost of Eton under his usurpation. As he was a nonjuror he was ejected at the restoration from this provostship, and the livings of St. Benet's Sheerhog, and St. Pancras, Soperlane. He wrote some theological tracts, and died 1684.

LODGE, Thomas, a learned physician, educated at Oxford, according to Wood. He afterwards studied medicine at Avignon, where he took his doctor's degree, and at his return was incorporated at Cambridge. He settled in London, where he acquired an extensive practice, especially among the Roman catholics, of whose persuasion he was. He died 1625, much respected. He wrote Wounds of Civil War, a tragedy 1594, 4to.—Looking Glass for London and for England, a tragi-comedy 1593, in which and in other pieces attributed to him, he is said have been assisted by Robert Green.

LOEWENDAL, Ulric Frederic Woldemar, count de, a native of Hamburg, distinguished as an officer in the service of Poland, and afterwards of Denmark against Sweden. He next entered into the imperial army, and displayed his bravery at the battle of Peterwaradin, the sieges of Temeswar, and Belgrade, and in the other exploits of that celebrated war. Augustus king of Poland, sensible of his merits, made him field marshal and inspector general of the Saxon infantry, and he afterwards obtained the chief command of the Russian forces. From Russia he passed into the French service, and was particularly distinguished at the battle of Fontenoy 1745, and at the taking of Bergen-op-Zoom, 16th Sept. 1747, hitherto regarded as impregnable. The French king acknowledged his meritorious services by raising him to the rank of field marshal. He died 1755, aged 55.

LOGAN, John, a native of Mid-Lothian, in Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, and made minister of South Leith 1770. He distinguished himself as a writer and as a poet, and died in London 1783, aged about 40. His works are the Philosophy of History from his lectures delivered at Edinburgh 1781—Runnameda, a tragedy, refused at Covent-garden, on account of some political allusions to the times, but acted with great applause at Edinburgh—Poems, of which the second edition appeared in 1782—and Review of the Principal Charges against Mr. Hastings, for which his publisher in London, Stockdale, was tried and acquitted.

LOGAN, James, distinguished for his learning. He came to America in company with William Penn in 1699. Under the patronage of Penn he was much employed in public affairs. In 1701 he was appointed secretary of the province of Pennsylvania, and clerk of the council. He afterwards held the offices of commissioner of property, chief justice, and president of the council. He attached himself rather to the interest of the proprietary, and his governor than to that of the assembly, and was in consequence in the earlier periods of his life very unpopular; but he soon gave general satisfaction in the discharge of the duties of his several offices.

Upon the death of governor Gordon in Oct. 1736 the government of course devolved upon him as president of the council; and during his administration of two years, the utmost harmony prevailed throughout the province. Several years previously to his death, he retired from public affairs, and spent the latter part of his life among his books, and in corresponding with learned men in different parts of Europe. He died 1751, aged 77. He was well versed in both ancient and modern learning; he had made considerable proficiency in oriental literature; he was master of the Greek, Latin, French and German languages; and he was well acquainted with mathematics, natural and moral philosophy, and natural history. In his religious sentiments he was a quaker. He had collected with great care a library of more than three thousand volumes, which, at that time, was by far the largest in Pennsylvania, and particularly rich in works in the Latin and Greek languages, and in the most curious, rare, and excellent scientific publications. This valuable collection of books, usually called the Loganian library, was bequeathed by its possessor to the citizens of Philadelphia, and has since been deposited in one of the apartments belonging to the library company of that city. Mr. Logan published in the philosophical transactions for 1735 an account of his experiments on maize. The work was afterwards published in Latin, Leyden 1739; and in London by Dr. Fothergill, Latin and English 1747. In 1739 he published another Latin tract at Leyden; a translation of Cicero's treatise de senectute 1744.

LOGAN, Martha, a great florist, was the daughter of Robert Daniel of S. Carolina. In her 15th year she married Geo. Logan, and died in 1779, aged 77. At the age of seventy she wrote a treatise on gardening.

LOGAN, an eloquent chief, was the second son of Shik Memus a celebrated chief of the Cayuga nation, whose residence was at Shamakin. Logan was the friend of the white people, he admired their ingenuity, and wished to be a neighbor to them. In April or May 1774, when Logan's residence was on the Ohio, his family was murdered by a party of whites, under the command of captain Michael Cresap. The occasion of this outrage was a report, that the Indians had killed a number of white persons, who were looking out for new settlements. A war immediately commenced, and during the summer great numbers of innocent men, women and children fell victims to the tomahawk, and scalping knife of the Indians. In the autumn of the same year a decisive battle was fought at the mouth of the great Karhaway between the collected forces of the Shawanese, Mingoes and Delawares, and a detachment of the Virginia militia: The Indians were defeated and sued for peace. Logan however disdained to be seen among the suppliants. But lest the sincerity of a treaty, from which so distinguished a chief absented himself, should be mistrusted, he sent by a messenger the following speech to be delivered to lord Dunmore, governor of Virginia. "I appeal to any white man to say, if ever he entered Logan's cabin hungry, and he gave him not meat; if ever he came cold and naked, and he clothed him not. During the course of the last long and bloody war Logan remained idle in his cabin, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites, that my countrymen pointed, as they passed, and said, Logan is the friend of white men. I had even thought to have lived with you, but for the injuries of one man, Colonel Cresap, the last spring, in cold blood and unprovoked, murdered all the relations of Logan, not even sparing my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge. I have sought it; I have killed many; I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbor a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? Not one." After this peace Logan sunk into a deep melancholy, and declared that life was a torment to him. He became in some measure delirious. He went to Detroit, where he yielded himself up to intoxication. On his return between that place and Miami he was murdered. In Oct. 1781 Mr. Heckewelder was shown the spot by some Indians, where this event was said to have occurred.

LOGAN, George, M.D. was a native of Pennsylvania. After being three years at the medical school of Edinburgh, he travelled on the continent, and returned to America in 1779. He applied himself for some years to agriculture, and also served in the legislature. In June 1798 he embarked for Europe for the purpose of preventing a war between America and France. He made his way from Hamburg to Paris; and there was introduced to Mervin, the chief director. At this period Mr. Gerry, the American minister, had departed, an embargo had been laid on American shipping, and many seamen had been imprisoned. Dr. Logan persuaded the French government to raise the embargo, and prepared the way for a negotiation, which terminated in peace. He was a senator from Pennsylvania from 1801 to 1807. He went to England in 1810, a self-constituted agent, to attempt a reconciliation of the difficulties between Great Britain and the United States, but he might as well have staid at home. He died in 1821, aged 66. M. Duponceau said of him.—"And art thou too gone? friend of man! friend of peace! friend of science! Thou whose persuasive accents could still the angry passions of the rulers of men, and dispose their minds to listen to the voice of reason and justice." He was an active member of the board of agriculture, and of the philosophical society. He published experiments on gypsum, and on the rotation of crops, 1797.

LOKMAN, an Abyssinian prophet, said to have been sold as a slave among the Israelites in the reign of David and Solomon. His wisdom, and the good sense and striking morality of his fables are so like those of Æsop, that he is considered by some authors as the same personage. He has been esteemed by the ancients as an extraordinary character, so that Mahomet has inserted a chapter in the Koran, with his name, where he introduces God, saying, we heretofore bestowed wisdom on Lokman. He is said to have lived 800 years, and to have been buried near Jerusalem. A translation of his fables was published by Galland, at Paris, 1724.

LOLLARD, Walter, the founder of the sect of the Lollards, was according to some, an Englishman. His opinions were first disseminated in Germany, 1315, and afterwards were preached by him in Piedmont and in England. He was burnt as a heretic at Cologne, 1322. The followers of Lollard believed that mass, baptism, and extreme unction were superfluous, they renounced obedience to civil and ecclesiastical magistrates, and persuaded themselves that God did not punish faults committed on the earth.

LOM, Jossu Van, a physician born at Buren, Guelderland 1500. He practised at Tournay and Bruges, and died 1562. His works written in elegant and polished Latin, all on medical subjects, were published at Amsterdam, 3 vols. 12mo. 1745.

LOMBARD, Peter, called Master of the Sentences, was born at Novara, in Lombardy, and educated at Paris. He was for some time tutor to Philip, son of Lewis le Gros, king of France, and so universally respected, that upon the death of the archbishop of Paris he was placed in his room. He died four years after 1164. His work of the Sentences is divided into four books, and has been ably commented upon by succeeding divines. He wrote also Commentaries on the Psalms, and on St. Paul's epistles.

LOMBARD, John Lewis, a native of Strasburg, bred up to the law but by nature formed for military affairs. He became in 1748 professor of artillery, at the military school of Metz, and afterwards in 1759, at Auxonne, and died 1st April 1794, aged 71. He wrote Table du Tir des Cannons & des Obusiers, 8vo.—Memoire a l'Usage des Officiers d'Artillerie de France, 2 vols. 8vo.—Traité du Mouvement des Projectiles, 8vo.—Instruction sur la Manœuvre & le Tir du Cannon de Bataille, 8vo.—besides Robins' Principles of Gunnery translated into French.

LOMENIE, Henry Augustus, count de Brienne, son of Anthony Lomenie, for some time French ambassador to England, and secretary of state, who died 1638, succeeded to the honors of his father in the service of Louis XIV. He died 1666, aged 71, and his memoirs were published at Amsterdam, 1719, 3 vols. 12mo.

LÓMENIE DE BRIENNE, Stephen Charles de, a French prelate of the same family, born at Paris 1727. He was in 1760 made bishop of Condom, archbishop of Toulouse 1764, and then removed to Sens. Respected as a prelate, hostile to abuses, and friendly to reform, he became by the intrigues of Vermont, whom he had recommended as confessor to the queen, a cardinal, and the prime minister of Louis XVI. but the expectations formed of his abilities were unhappily disappointed. He caused the disgrace of Calonne, but followed his steps of government, and politics, and his weakness, and his impotent disputes with the parliament of Paris, rapidly contributed to the French revolution. He quitted at last a station to which he was unequal, and by sending back his cardinal's hat to the pope, at the beginning of the revolution, he acquired a little popularity. He died at Sens, 16th Feb. 1798.

LOMONOZOF, a Russian poet of merit, born 1711. He was son of a fishmonger at Kolmogori, but despising this humble occupation, and inflamed with the love of literature by reading the Song of Solomon in the translation of Pototski, he fled from the protection of his father to a monastery of Moscow, where he studied the learned languages. He so distinguished himself, that he was in 1736 sent at the expense of the imperial academy of sciences, to Marburgh, in Hesse Cassel, where for four years he applied himself to grammar, rhetoric and philosophy, under Wolf, and afterwards studied chemistry under Henckel, at Freyberg. In 1741, he returned to Russia, and became professor of chemistry in the imperial academy. In 1744 he was raised by the empress to the rank of counsellor of state, but unfortunately died that year, April 4th, aged 54. As a writer, Lomonozof is deservedly esteemed by his countrymen as the polisher of their language. His poetical compositions are particularly valuable for their originality, sublimity of sentiment, and their animated diction. As the respectable imitator of Pindar, he ranks very high, and the appellation of father of Russian poetry is becomingly bestowed upon him. His works have been published in 3 vols. containing 10 sacred, and 19 panegyric odes and other poetical pieces, idyls, tragedies, besides passages translated from Cicero, Lucian, Erasinus, Ælian, Homer, Ovid, Virgil, and others, besides treatises on philosophical subjects. He published also, "Annals of the Russian Sovereigns," and Ancient History of Russia, from the origin of the nation to 1504.

LONDON, John Campbell, earl and baron of London, succeeded his father Hugh Campbell in 1732. He arrived in Virginia in 1756, with a commission as commander-in-chief of the British forces in America, in which office he succeeded general Abercrombie, who again assumed it on the return of London to England the following year. He was appointed major-general in 1756, and lieutenant-general in 1758, and commanded in the campaigns against the French in Canada, in 1756 and 1757. He had also the appointment of governor of Virginia as the successor of the earl of Albemarle in 1756. Mr. Dinwiddie, however continued to discharge the duties of the office, and lord London had little concern with the civil administration. He gained little reputation in America, but was charged with arrogance and indiscretion in his general department, and with indecision and delay as a military commander.

LONDONDERRY, Robert Stewart, marquis of, long known as Lord Castlereagh, was born, in Ireland, in 1769, and completed his education at St. John's College, Cambridge. In his twenty-first year he was returned to the Irish parliament as member for the county of Down. He commenced his political career as a parliamentary reformer, but no long period elapsed before he joined the ranks of the opposite party. In 1797 he was appointed chief secretary to the viceroy of Ireland, and he took a very active part in accomplishing the Union. In 1805 he was appointed minister of war; and this office he resumed in 1807, after the dismissal of the whigs; but his disagreement with Mr. Canning, which produced a duel between them, led to his resignation in 1809. In 1811 he was placed at the head of the foreign department, and he continued in it till his decease. In 1814, he was plenipotentiary extraordinary to the allied powers, and, towards the close of the same year, to the congress of Vienna. He succeeded to the title of Londonderry on the decease of his father, in 1821, but he did not long enjoy it, for in a fit of insanity, brought on by excessive mental and personal exertion, he put an end to his existence on the 12th of August, 1822.

LONG, James le, a priest of the oratory, born at Paris 1665. He was professor in several colleges, and was elected librarian of St. Honoré at Paris, where he died 1721. He was well skilled in ancient and modern languages, and in mathematics and philosophy. His chief works are Bibliotheca Saera, 2 vols. folio, 1723—Bibliothèque Historique de la France, folio—a Historical Discourse on the Polyglott Bibles, 8vo.

LONG, Roger, D.D., master of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, Lowndes' professor of astronomy and rector of Cherry Hinton, Huntingdonshire, and Bradwell, Essex, was a native of Norfolk. He is celebrated as an able astronomer, as his "Treatise on Astronomy," 2 vols. 4to. fully proves. He wrote besides, an answer to Dr. Gally's pamphlet on Greek Accents, and some sermons. He also invented a curious machine, which represented the zodiac, the meridians, and other circles, and all the constellations and stars visible at Cambridge, on plates of iron. The machine is in the form of a globe, 18 feet in diameter, in which 30 persons may conveniently sit, and is easily turned by means of a winch. Dr. Long, equally known as a pleasant and factions companion, died Dec. 16th, 1770, aged 91. He was vice-chancellor of Cambridge, 1737.

LONG, Thomas, B.D. an able divine, born at Exeter, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He was author of an history of Donatists, 8vo.—Examination of Hale's Treatise on Schism, 8vo.—History of Popish and Fanatical Plots and Conspiracies, 8vo.—Life of Julian, 8vo.—Vindication of Charles's claim to be the author of the Eikon Basilicæ. He obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, but lost it at the revolution, for refusing to take the oaths to king William. He died 1700, aged about 79.

LONG, Edward, was born, in 1734, at St. Blaize, in Cornwall; was brought up to the law, and became judge of the vice-admiralty court in Jamaica, and died in 1818. He wrote a History of Jamaica, in three quarto volumes; The Prater, a collection of Essays; The Antigallican, a novel; Letters on the Colonies; and several smaller miscellaneous pieces.

LONGBEARD, William, a priest of great abilities, which he employed against the government. By his eloquence he assembled a large mob in the reign of Richard I. and by calling himself the saviour of the poor, he threatened the royal authority with destruction. After for some time heading a lawless populace, he fled for refuge into St. Mary-le-bonne church, where he was at last overpowered, and then, with nine of his associates, torn to pieces by horses and hung on a gallows, 1196.

LONGEPIERE, Hilary Bernard de, a learned Frenchman, born at Dijon, 1658. He translated into verse, Anacreon, Theocritus, Sappho, Bion and Moschus, and was author of some idyls, and of tragedies after the Greek model, such as Medea, Electra & Sesostris, the two first of which appeared on the stage. He died 1727.

LONGINUS, Dionysius Cassius, an eminent Greek critic and philosopher, who was "blessed with a poet's fire," was born in the third century; but whether at Athens or in Syria is undecided. He was a disciple of Ammonias Saccas, and a friend of Plotinus. After having travelled, he settled at Athens, taught philosophy there, and published his noble Treatise on the Sublime. His knowledge was so extensive that he was called the living library. Zenobia invited him to her court, intrusted to him the education of her sons, and made him her principal minister after the death of Odenatus. Aurelian basely put him to death, after the surrender of Palmyra, in revenge for Longinus having dictated the dignified letter which was addressed by Zenobia to the Roman monarch.

LONGLAND, John, a native of Henley, Oxfordshire, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He was in 1505 appointed principal of Magdalen hall, in 1514 made dean of Salisbury, and seven years after bishop of Lincoln. It is said that he recommended and enforced the necessity of a divorce between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Aragon. He died 1547. His works appeared in fol. 1532.

LONGOMONTANUS, Christian, the son of a poor laborer, who became an eminent astronomer, and was born at Longomontanum, in Denmark, 1562. His genius was seen and fostered by the minister of his parish, and after spending his time in deep study, and in following the plough, he went without the knowledge of his friends, to Wiburgh, at the age of 15, and there maintained himself by his labor, that he might enjoy more independently the opportunity of study. He was afterwards at Copenhagen, and then became the companion, and the friend of Tycho Brahe for eight years. In 1600 he left this beloved master, and after visiting the spots where Copernicus had made his observations on the stars, he came to Copenhagen, and was in 1605 nominated professor of mathematics in the university, where he died, 1647. He published "Astronomia Danica," folio—Systema Mathematicum, 8vo.—Problemata Geometrica, 4to.—Disputatio Ethica, de Animæ Humanæ Morbis, 4to.

LONGUEIL, Gilbert de, a physician of Utrecht. He wrote Remarks on Plautus, Ovid, Nepos, Cicero, Valla, 4 vols. 8vo.—a Greek and Latin Lexicon—a Dialogue on Birds, with their Greek, Latin, and German Names—besides translations of some of Plutarch's lesser works. He died 1543, aged 86.

LONGUERUE, Lewis, Dufour de, a French abbé, born at Charleville, 1652. He was so early distinguished for application, that at the age of four he was seen and admired by Louis XIV. as he passed through Charleville. This very learned and amiable man died 1732, aged 80. He wrote a Latin Dissertation on Tatian, 8vo. 1700—an Historical Description of France, folio, 1719—Annales Arsacidarum, 4to. 1732—Remarks on Wolsey's Life, and a dissertation on Transubstantiation.

LONGICERUS, John, a learned German, born at Orthern, Germany. He was professor of languages at Marburg, where he died 1569, aged 70. He compiled a Greek and Latin Lexicon, begun by Melancthon and Camerarius, and published Dioscorides, and other Greek writers.

LOPE DE VEGA CARPIO, Felix, a celebrated Spanish poet and dramatist, was born, in 1562, at Madrid, and began to compose plays when he was only fourteen. His first successful poem, the Arcadia, was composed while he was in the service of the duke of Alba. From Madrid, however, he was obliged to fly, in consequence of a duel, and he resided for some years at Valencia. After having served in the Arinada, during which period he wrote his Hermosura de Angelica, he returned to Madrid, and became the most popular of the Spanish writers. He entered into the order of St. Francis, but still continued to pour forth his unpremeditated verse, and to write for the stage. Almost idolatrous honors were paid to his genius, and he acquired wealth, yet he incessantly complained of the malice of fortune and of his enemies. He died in 1635. His fertility was wonderful. Besides innumerable poems, he is said to have composed eighteen hundred theatrical pieces in verse. Only a fourth of his productions has been printed; but that portion occupies forty-six quarto volumes.

LORD, Benjamin, D.D. minister of Norwich Connecticut, was graduated at Yale college in 1714, and was afterwards a tutor in that seminary two years. He was ordained in Oct. 1717, and continued his labors sixty-seven years till his death 1784, aged 90. He published a discourse on the parable of the merchantman seeking goodly pearls, 1722; true Christianity explained and enforced, 1727; on the character, birth and privileges of God's children, 1742; an account of the extraordinary recovery of Mercy Wheeler, 1743; at the election, 1752; on the death of the Rev. Henry Willes, 1759; of Rev. Hezekiah Lord, 1763; of Hezekiah Huntington, 1773; of Mrs. Willes, 1774; at the instalment of Nathaniel Whitaker, 1761; at the ordination of Levi Hart, 1762; a half century discourse, Nov. 29, 1767, being fifty years from his ordination.

LORENZINI, Lawrence, a native of Florence, eminent as a mathematician. He was the pupil of the Viviani, and was recommended for his abilities to the service of Ferdinand, son of the grand duke Cosmo III. but some unfortunate circumstance in his conduct, procured his imprisonment in the tower of Volterra. During his confinement of 20 years, he devoted himself to his mathematical studies, and wrote his 12 books on conical and cylindrical sections, in Latin. He died 1721, aged 69.

LORING, Israel, minister of Sudbury, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1701. He was ordained 1706, and died 1772, aged 90. He preached on the first day of March, and died on the ninth. He published the nature and necessity of the new birth, 1728, with a preface by Mr. Prince; on the death of Robert Breek, 1731; on the torments of hell, 1732; election sermon, 1737; justification not by works, but by faith in Jesus Christ, 1749; at the ordination of G. Richardson, 1754.

LORIT, Henry, or GLAREANUS, from Glaris in Switzerland, where he was born, studied at Cologne, Basil, and Paris. He was the friend of Erasmus, and labored much for the advancement of literature. He died 1563, aged 75. He wrote various dissertations and notes, on classical subjects, and on ancient authors.

LORME, Philibert de, master of the works to the French king, was born at Lyons. He is the architect of the palaces of the Thuilleries and Le Louvres, and other public buildings, which he adorned with great taste and judgment. Though exposed to the satire of the poet Ronsard, he long enjoyed the patronage of the French court, and died 1557.

LORME, John de, a French physician, born at Moulins, 1544. He studied at Montpellier, where he took his degrees, and practised at Forez, and afterwards became physician to Louisa of Lorraine, wife of Henry III. and to Mary de Medicis, and other branches of the royal family. He was universally esteemed, and in his old age, retired to his native place, where he died, 1634, aged 90.

LORME, Charles de, son of the above, was born 1587, and became physician to Louis XIII. He was fond of literature, which he cultivated with success, and he spared no expense to discover the truth in his experiments and researches. He acquired great celebrity and equal opulence, and died much respected, 1678, aged 91. He was the promoter of a particular pisan, called "red broth" which proved of great service to thousands. He published "Laureæ Apollinaris," 8vo.

LORRAINE, Charles of, cardinal and archbishop of Rheims, son of the first duke of Guise, was born 1525. His great abilities were meanly prostituted to the worst purposes of ambition, the love of power and of money. His influence in the reigns of Henry II. and of Francis II. was almost unlimited, and to his intrigues the war of Italy is totally attributed. He was a man of great eloquence, which he displayed at the council of Trent, and at the conference at Poissy. He died 1574.

LORRY, Anne Charles, a French physician, born at Crosne, near Paris. He is well known for his Latin Treatises on Melancholy, and its Affections, 2 vols. 8vo. and on the Use of Aliments. He wrote besides a Treatise on Cutaneous Diseases, 4to. and edited Doctor Mead's works, &c. He died 1783, aged 53.

LOSA, Isabella, a native of Cordova, so illustrious for her knowledge of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, that she was honored with the degree of D.D. When she became a widow she took the habit of St. Clair, and went to Italy, and founded there the hospital of Loretto, where she ended her days in the bosom of devotion and benevolence, 5th March 1546, aged 73.

LOTHAIRE I., son of Lewis the Debonnaire, was partner on the throne of Germany with his father, 817, and made king of Lombardy three years after. Ungrateful for the confidence and kindness of his father, he revolted against him, and seizing his person, confined him in a monastery at Soissons. This cruel conduct roused against him his brothers, Charles and Lewis, but though a reconciliation took place after the death of the old emperor, the three brothers appeared in arms against each other. The bloody battle of Fontenai, 841, in which 100,000 men are said to have perished, seemed indecisive, but at last a truce was effected between the unnatural brothers, and the treaty of Verdun, in 843, settled their respective rights. Lothaire obtained the empire, Italy, and the provinces between the Rhine, the Rhone, the Saone, the Meuse, and the Scheldt, whilst the rest of the French dominions was partitioned between Lewis and Charles. Ten years after this settlement, Lothaire, dissatisfied with the cares of government, abdicated the crown to retire to a monastery in Ardennes, where he died, six days after his assumption of the monkish habit, 28th September, 885. He left three sons, Lewis, Charles, and Lothaire, among whom he divided his possessions.

LOTHAIRE II., duke of Saxony, son of Gerhard, count of Supplemberg, was elected king of Germany, 1125, after the death of Henry IV. and crowned emperor at Rome, 1135. As he kissed the feet of Innocent II. who crowned him, the popes assumed in consequence, a sovereign right over the German empire. He died 4th Dec. 1167, at Bretten, near Trent, leaving no issue.

LOTHAIRE, king of France, son of Louis IV. succeeded his father 954. He made war against the emperor Otho II. and permitted him to hold Lorraine as a fief of the French crown. He died at Compiègne, 2d March 956, in consequence of poison, said to be administered by his wife Emma, daughter of Lothaire, king of Italy.

LOTHAIRE, king of Lorraine, son of the emperor Lothaire I. abandoned his wife Thietberga, to marry his mistress, Valdrade. Though this measure was countenanced and approved by the councils of Metz and of Aix la Chapelle, yet the pope Nicholas I. had the spirit to interfere in favor of the injured queen, and compelled, by the influence of his spiritual power, the obedient Lothaire to quit his favorite mistress, for his lawful wife. Lothaire afterwards assisted his brother Louis I. and pope Adrian II. against the Saracens in Italy, in hopes of obtaining a divorce from his wife, but he was unsuccessful. He died at Placentia, of a violent fever, 7th Aug. 869.

LOUIS I. surnamed the Debonnaire or Feeble, son of Charlemagne and Hildegard, was born 778, and proclaimed king of France and emperor of the West 814. Instead of strengthening his power by union, he weakened it by division, and by making his eldest son Lothaire his associate in the empire, and the two others, Pepin and Louis, kings of Aquitaine and Bavaria, he permitted different interests to prevail in his dominions. Bernard king of Italy, the illegitimate son of Pepin, eldest son of Charlemagne, displeased with the elevation of Lothaire to the throne, took up arms in 818, and was immediately met in the field by Louis, but instead of fighting, the Italian troops fled, and their unfortunate leader threw himself at the feet of his conqueror. Louis refused to spare his suppliant, and he caused his eyes to be put out, an operation which proved fatal. This cruel punishment, inflicted also on some of the partisans of the unhappy Bernard, so offended the clergy and the people, that Louis was restored to the good opinion of his subjects only by doing public penance. His sons afterwards, too sensible of his weakness, rebelled against him and succeeded in withdrawing all his troops from his standard, so that the deserted monarch threw himself into the power of his unnatural children in the plains of Rotleub. Here, instead of compassion, he met with indignity; he was not only imprisoned in a monastery, but obliged to perform public penance at Soissons as a most atrocious delinquent. In sharing the spoils, however, the new kings quarrelled, and Louis by another revolution was drawn from his confinement again to fill the throne, but he died soon after in an island of the Rhine, above Mentz, 20th June, 840, aged 62.

LOUIS II., the Young, eldest son of Lothaire I. was made king of Italy 844, and in 855 succeeded to the imperial throne. He was a virtuous and benevolent monarch, brave, yet not fond of war, and only anxious to maintain the dignity of the throne, the public prosperity, and the due execution of the laws. He died without male issue, 13th Aug. 875.

LOUIS III., surnamed the Blind, was son of Boson, king of Provence, by Ermengarde daughter of Louis the Younger, and he succeeded to the throne of his father 890, at the age of 10. He twice defeated Berenger, who disputed with him the succession to the empire, and was crowned at Rome by Benedict IV. but soon after he suffered himself to be surprised by his rival at Verona, who cruelly put out his eyes, and sent him to Provence, where he died 934.

LOUIS IV. called the Child, succeeded his father the emperor Arnold in 900, though only seven years old. His reign was a scene of desolation and civil war. His dominions were invaded by the Hungarians, whose violence, though repeatedly repressed by large sums of money, at last obliged the timid monarch to fly. He died at Ratisbon, 21st Jan. 911. He was the last emperor of Germany, of the Carolingian race, and though the laws had settled the succession in the descendants of Charlemagne, such is the effect of revolutions, the imperial crown afterwards became elective.

LOUIS V. called the Fourth by those who exclude the short reign of the infant Louis, from the list of Emperors, was son of Louis the Severe, duke of Bavaria, by Matilda daughter of Rodolphus I. and he was elected emperor at Frankfort 1314. His elevation was disputed by some of the electors, who declared Frederic the Fair, son of Albert I. emperor, and consecrated him at Cologne, and this unhappy division produced a civil war. After various skirmishes, however, Louis proved victorious, and Frederic, after an imprisonment of three years renounced his claims to the throne, to recover his liberty. This decision displeased the pope, John XXII. who declared the empire vacant, but Louis no way intimidated, appealed from the pontiff to a general council, and at last retorting injury for injury, he caused Peter de Corbiere to be elected pope in the room of his enemy. These divisions were still fomented by the conduct of five of the electors, who at the instigation of Clement VI. the new pope, chose Charles of Luxemburg, marquis of Moravia, to fill the throne; but when a new civil war threatened the happiness of Germany, Louis was killed by a fall from his horse in hunting, 11th Oct. 1347.

LOUIS II., the Stammerer, king of France, was son of Charles the Bald, and succeeded as king of Aquitaine in 967, and to his father as king of France 977. He was a weak prince, and to ensure tranquillity he yielded up Provence to Boson, who created himself king. He died at Compiègne, 10th April, 979, aged 35, leaving three sons, Louis and Carloman who divided his kingdom among themselves, and Charles a posthumous son, called afterwards Charles the Simple.

LOUIS III, son of Louis II. shared the kingdom with his brother Carloman, with whom he lived in perfect union, and ably defended himself against the attacks of his enemies. Hugh the Bastard, son of Lothaire, was defeated, Boson was checked in his plans of aggrandizement, and the Normans were routed in the famous battle of Vimeu. Louis died 4th August 932, without children, and Carloman became sole monarch.

LOUIS IV. surnamed Transmarine because he resided 13 years in England, was son of Charles the Simple, and succeeded Raoul as king of France 936. He was engaged in war with Richard duke of Normandy, and was taken prisoner, but the year after restored to liberty on condition of leaving his antagonist in peaceful possession of Normandy, and of yielding Laon to Hugh le Blanc. In a subsequent war Laon was recovered, but the king soon after was killed by a fall from his horse while hunting. He died 10th Sep. 954, aged 38, and was succeeded by his son Lothaire.

LOUIS V. surnamed the Lazy, succeeded his father Lothaire, 936. He seized upon Rheims, and was vigorously preparing to march against the Saracens, to the relief of the count of Barcelona, when he was perfidiously poisoned by his queen Blanche, 21st May, 937. He was the last of the second race of the Carolingian kings, and though the crown at his decease belonged to his uncle Charles duke of Lower Lorraine, he was on account of his unpopularity among the French, rudely dispossessed, and Hugh Capet the most powerful of the French dukes was elected king.

LOUIS VI. called the Big, son of Philip I. and Bertha, succeeded to the throne 1103. His reign was disturbed by war, and not only foreign enemies invaded his dominions, but he had much to dread from the ambition and the factious spirit of his nobles who each wished to establish themselves into independent princes. His quarrels with Henry I. of England were numerous and frequent, about the possession of Normandy, but these differences did not prevent his attention to the interests of his kingdom. He died at Paris, 1st Aug. 1137, aged 57. He was a wise and popular monarch, benevolent as a man, and impartial as a public magistrate. His judicious and humane regulations in the government of the people were suggested and improved by the advice of his faithful minister Suger.

LOUIS VII. the Young, son and successor of the preceding, was early engaged in a quarrel with the pope, about the investiture to French bishoprics, for which he was excommunicated by the incensed pontiff Innocent II. and his kingdom laid under an interdict. Regardless of the papal thunders, Louis turned his arms against Theobald III. count of Champagne, who favored the cause of the pope, and in 1141, he laid one of his towns, Vitri, in ashes. This violence was represented by St. Bernard in such odious colors before the eyes of the superstitious monarch, that he was persuaded to take up the cross, and with an army of 80,000 men, he, accompanied by his wife Eleanor, marched into Palestine. He was defeated by the Saracens, and in 1147, obliged to raise the siege of Damascus, and on his return to Europe he had the misfortune to be seized by the Greeks and delivered into the hands of Roger, king of Sicily. Restored to liberty he found his domestic happiness destroyed, by the conduct of his queen who had disgraced herself by an illicit amonr with her uncle Raymond, of Antioch, and with Saladin a young Turk, and to wipe away the dishonor he obtained a divorce, and married Alice the daughter of Theobald his ancient enemy. Eleanor six weeks after took for her husband Henry II. of England, and as she was the heiress of Poitou and Guienne, her dominions became the property of her new lord, and created great dissensions and long wars between the English and the French. Louis died at Paris 18th Sept. 1180, aged 60.

LOUIS VIII. surnamed the Lion, son of Philip Augustus and of Isabella, succeeded his father 1223. He was distinguished by his valor in his father's life time, and when he ascended the throne he waged successful war against the English from whom he conquered Limousin, Perigord, and Auunis, and afterwards he turned his arms against the Albigenes, and laid siege to Avignon. Though successful he lost the greatest part of his army by disease, and he himself was attacked by the contagious complaint, and died soon after at Montpensier in Auvergne, 8th Nov. 1226, aged 39.

LOUIS IX. called Saint, was son of Louis VIII. and succeeded in 1226. His minority was protected by his mother, with wisdom and vigor, and when he attained the age of manhood he pursued the same course of prudent government, eager to maintain the dignity of the crown and ensure the happiness of the subject. He made war against Henry III. of England who supported his revolted nobles, and he twice defeated their confederated forces, and at last made an honorable and advantageous peace. During an illness with which he was attacked in 1244, Louis made a vow that if he recovered he would undertake a crusade, and after a vigorous preparation of four years, he set out on this romantic expedition, leaving the reins of government in the hands of his mother. He landed in Egypt, took Damietta, and crossed the Nile in sight of the Saracens, but though victorious, disease and famine came to thin his ranks. As he attempted to retreat to Damietta in hopes of supplies, he was defeated in a terrible battle, and fell into the hands of the enemy. In his prison he agreed to ransom his army with a large sum of money, and to give up Damietta in exchange for his person, after which he passed into Palestine, and remained there four years. On his return to France he devoted himself to the happiness of his people, justice was administered with impartiality, profaneness and immorality were repressed, and honest industry encouraged. The rights of the church were confirmed in 1269 by a pragmatic sanction, and religion supported by the wisest decrees. After thus promoting the public good, Louis again embarked in 1270, for another crusade, and laid siege to Tunis, in Africa, but the contagious disorder which was so fatal to his troops proved equally fatal to himself. This great and good man died in his camp, 25th Aug. 1270. His remains were conveyed to Paris, and he was canonized by Boniface VIII. 1297.

LOUIS X. called Hutin, was king of Navarre, in right of his mother Jane, and he succeeded his father Philip the Fair, 1314, as king of France. He recalled the Jews into his kingdom, and made war against the count of Flanders, but was unsuccessful. He died at Vincennes, 8th June, 1316, aged 26. He was twice married; by his first wife he left one daughter who succeeded to the throne of Navarre, and his posthumous son by the second wife died soon after his birth. He was succeeded in France by Philip the Long.

LOUIS XI. son of Charles VII. and Mary of Anjou, was born at Bourges 1423. In his youth he displayed his valor against the English, whom he obliged to retire from the siege of Dieppe 1443, but his conduct towards his father tarnished all his glory. He not only rebelled against him, but showed such animosity, that the aged monarch, afraid of being poisoned by his son, starved himself, and Louis on his death ascended the throne in 1461. So ungrateful a child did not promise a virtuous monarch. Louis regarded his subjects as conquered slaves, and provided he could command their obedience, he little regarded their hatred. His oppressions therefore excited the people against his government, and a league was formed against him, supported by the dukes of Berry, Britany, Calabria, and other dissatisfied nobles, and an indecisive battle was fought at Montlheri 1465. Louis purchased peace by granting to the insurgents all their demands, by the treaty of Conflans, but with the intention of not executing his part. Another war now threatened the country, but Louis by artifice averted the blow, and he caused his own brother, the duke of Berry, whom he had lately made duke of Guienne, to be poisoned. The unsuspecting prince, while courting the daughter of the duke of Burgundy, was presented with a beautiful peach, by his almoner, and in sharing the fruit with his intended bride he prepared his own destruction. The princess died almost immediately, and the duke survived six months. The duke of Burgundy, who some time before had compelled Louis to make a very disadvantageous treaty, now determined to avenge the death of his daughter, and he ravaged by fire and sword the provinces of Picardy and Normandy. Though for a few months the treaty of Bouvines stopped the carnage, a new alliance between the dukes of Burgundy and Britany, and Edward IV. of England, threatened to increase the miseries of France. Louis, however, had the art to intrigue with his formidable enemies; he gained the king of England by bribing his ministers, and promising him a pension; the duke of Britany was reconciled by similar means, and the duke of Burgundy, left without protectors, joined in the general peace, at Amiens and Vervins. The death of the duke at the siege of Nancy, 1477, might have stopped all further differences, but Louis imprudently refused to marry his own son to the heiress, whose subsequent union with Maximilian of Austria, son of Frederic III. laid the foundation of war between the French and the Austrians. This new dispute, after some battles, was settled by the peace of Arras, 1492, and cemented by the marriage of the Dauphin with Margaret, daughter of Mary of Burgundy. Soon after, the ambitious monarch was seized with a deep melancholy, and afraid of death he retired to the castle of Plessis-les-tours, where none was permitted access to him. Death at last delivered him from the horrors of his terrified imagination, 30th Aug. 1483, in his 60th year. Louis has been deservedly called the Tiberius of France, as in cruelty, malice, and perfidy, he equalled the Roman tyrant.

LOUIS XII. surnamed the Just, was son of Charles, duke of Orleans, and Mary of Cleves, and he succeeded Charles VIII. on the throne of France. He took up arms during the weak reign of Charles VIII. supported by other dissatisfied nobles; but the battle of St. Aubin, in 1488, proved fatal to his hopes, and he was made prisoner, and confined with tyrannical severity. The tears and entreaties of his wife Jane, at last procured his deliverance, and in 1493, he obtained the crown, and with heroic magnanimity forgave all the persecutors and enemies of his former privacy. After wise regulations at home, he directed his arms to foreign conquests, and rapidly subdued the Milanese, Genoa, and Naples, and made the king of Naples, prisoner; but the successes of Gonsalvo of Corduba turned the tide of affairs and effected the expulsion of the French from Italy, 1503. He afterwards rallied his forces, and again defeated the Genoese and the Venetians, and took possession of Cremona, Padua, and other towns; yet victory again declared against him, and in three months his conquests vanished, and the battle of Novaro, 1513, ruined the French influence in Italy. Instead now of conquering abroad, Louis had to defend his own dominions, as Maximilian the emperor, Henry VIII. and the Swiss, confederated together against him, and in various encounters obliged him to sue for disadvantageous terms of peace. This amiable monarch who, though unfortunate in his foreign expeditions, was beloved by his subjects, and revered as a father, died 1st Jan. 1515, aged 53.

LOUIS XIII. surnamed the Just, son of Henry IV. and Mary de Medicis, ascended the throne 1610, in the ninth year of his age, under the guardianship of his mother. The kingdom weakened by the imprudent measures of the queen regent, saw little prospect of better times when the young king took the reins in his own hands. He was governed by the counsels of Maréchal d'Ancre, a proud and ambitious favorite; but after his death, which happened 1617, he showed more vigilance, and was reconciled to his mother who had been banished. This was, however, but a momentary calm, the queen took up arms against her son, while on the other hand the Huguenots were leagued on pretence of religion against the throne. Guided now by the advice of the bishop of Luçon, the celebrated Richelieu, Louis evinced vigor in his measures, and Rochelle, though relieved by the English and defended by the heroic conduct of the brave mother of the duke of Rohan, at last yielded and ruined the hopes of the protestant insurgents. From Rochelle Louis marched to the assistance of the duke of Mantua, and by a successful campaign, and the treaty of Susa, 1631, he established him in the possession of his dominions. On his return to France, Louis found himself exposed to the intrigues of his brother Gaston of Orleans, who was jealous of the influence of Richelieu, but the projects of this powerful subject were defeated at Castelnaudary, and Montmorency the governor of Languedoc, who had supported him, was tried and beheaded at Toulouse. A new war soon after broke out against Spain, and the emperor, and for many years desolated the kingdom without enriching the monarch, or enlarging his dominions. But while Richelieu excited discontent and discord in Europe more for views of ambition than to serve his master, a sudden attack hurried him and Louis to their grave. The cardinal died on the 4th Dec. 1642, and Louis, 4th May following, aged 42.

LOUIS XIV. surnamed the Great, was son of Louis XIII. and was born 5th Sept. 1638. He was only four years old when he succeeded his father. The war was continued against the emperor, and the Spaniards, and Louis saw his arms victorious at Rocroy, under the duke of Enghein, and in Catalonia under la Mothe. The campaign of 1644 added Thionville, Barlemont, Philipsburg, Mayence, Worms, Manheim, and other towns to the French dominions, and in 1645, fresh conquests awaited Louis in Flanders, Artois, Lorraine and Catalonia. The Swedish general Torstenson in alliance with France defeated the Imperialists in Bohemia, Turenne took Treves, and d'Enghein after the battle of Nortlingen made himself master of Furnes, Dunkirk, and Ypres, and defeated the archduke in 1648, in the plains of Lens. Though victorious abroad, however, Louis was unpopular at home. The Spaniards in the mean time profiting by this dissension invaded Champagne, Lorraine and Catalonia, though repulsed by the arms of the French. In 1651, Louis declared himself of age. In the midst of civil broils the archduke Leopold took Gravelines and Dunkirk, John of Austria seized Barcelona, and the duke of Mantua Casal, but the restoration of internal tranquillity soon tended to the recovery of these places, and in 1654, Turenne defeated the Spaniards at Quesnoy, and raised the siege of Arras. Success continued to attend the French arms, and Bourbourg, Mardick, Dixmude, and other towns were conquered, till at last in 1659, the treaty of the Pyrenees restored peace to the two nations, and as one of the articles of the reconciliation made the infant Maria Theresa queen of France. The death of Mazarin in 1661, now changed the face of affairs; and Louis, who had hitherto paid little attention to business, took the reins into his own hands. Commerce now began to flourish, the arts were patronized, industry every where was encouraged, and the academies of painting, of sculpture, and of the sciences, were erected to improve the taste of the nation. Colonies were planted in Madagascar and at Cayenne; and while discipline was restored to the armies, and subordination in the marine, the extremities of the world were visited by men of talents in search of science; and the learned of foreign nations found in Louis and in his virtuous minister a patron and a friend. Louis, however, did not lay aside the plans of his ambitious heart. In 1672 he attacked Holland, and after taking above 40 places on the Rhine he crossed that river, and seized upon Gueldres and Utrecht, but his conquests were stopped by the inundation with which the terrified Dutch overwhelmed their country. The states of Europe too were indignant at his gigantic schemes, and the empire, Prussia, and Spain, united to arrest his progress; but the treaty of Nimeguen checked the victories of the great Turenne, and restored peace to the continent. Proud of his triumphs, and flattered by the title of Great, which his subjects bestowed on him in 1680, Louis again directed his attention to the improvement of his kingdom; the canal of Languedoc was completed, the ports of Toulon, Brest, Dunkirk, Havre-de-Grace, and Rochefort, were enlarged and beautified; and by the establishment of cadets, the foundations of future military glory were laid. Algiers, whose corsairs had insulted the French commerce, was bombarded in 1684, by du Quesne, and reduced to submission; and the Genoese, who had sold powder to the pirates and supported them, claimed forgiveness by sending their doge and four senators to Versailles. But these glorious measures were tarnished by the imprudence and cruelty of the monarch, who in a thoughtless hour revoked the edict of Nantes, by which Henry IV. had granted toleration to protestants; and thus by one stroke of the pen he banished 50,000 families from his kingdom into foreign countries, and with them the arts, the manufactures, and the treasures of France. The league of Augsburg in 1687 was formed between the duke of Savoy, the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg, and the prince of Orange, to which the emperor and the king of Spain were soon united. Though Louis opposed this formidable confederacy by a powerful army under the dauphin, his son, who took Philipsburg, and reduced every place between Basil and Coblenz, yet the enemy soon poured superior numbers into the field, and made the French retreat. The campaign of 1690 was more successful for Louis. Marshal Luxembourg defeated the prince of Waldeck at Fleurus, Catinat conquered Nice, Susa, and Villefranche, and routed the troops of Savoy, and the following year Mons, Valencia, Carnagnole, and Montmelian were added to the French conquests. In 1692 the defeat of the French fleet under Tourville, off Cape la Hogue, by admiral Russel, was counterbalanced on land by the fall of Namur, which Louis took in person. Luxembourg afterwards gained the battle of Steinkerque, and the next year that of Nerwinde. In 1695 Casal fell, and the next year the duke of Savoy, tired of the war, and terrified at the approach of Catinat, who was only six miles from Turin, made peace with France; and the following year hostilities ceased among all the confederates, by the treaty of Ryswick. The death of Charles II. of Spain without children, unhappily renewed again hostilities; and when the duke of Anjou, grandson of the French monarch, assumed the title of king, agreeable to the will of the Spanish prince, under the name of Philip V. the powers of Europe rose up to defend the claims of the archduke Charles to the vacant throne. Eugene, at the head of the imperial forces in Italy in 1702, conquered the country between the Adige and the Adla; and in the North, Marlborough in 1704 gained the great battle of Hochstet, and totally cut in pieces the French army under Tallard and Marchin. In 1705 France conquered Nice and Villefranche, and defeated Eugene at Cassano, while on the other hand Barcelona and Gironne submitted to the allies. Villeroy lost the battle of Ramillies against Marlborough, and Ghent, Ostend, Antwerp, and other towns were snatched from the French dominions. Success continued to attend the allies; Alcantara and Madrid fell into their hands, and the Milanese and Modena were subdued; but in 1707 the battle of Almanza was gained by the French, and the squadrons of Forbin and Duguay Trouin were successful at sea. The campaigns of 1708 and 1709 were disastrous to the French arms; the victory of Oudenarde was followed by the fall of Tournay, and the battle of Malplaquet; and Louis, disheartened by his misfortunes, sued for peace, and even offered money to the allies to enable them to dethrone his grandson. The pride of the allies continued the war, and the success of Villiers, who forced the camp of Denain, and the taking of Douay, Quesnoy, and Bouchain, re-animated the French monarch, whose spirits domestic calamities, as well as public disasters, had broken down. The treaty of Utrecht was at last signed 1713 with the allies, and proved more favorable to France than she expected; and the following year peace was concluded with the empire at Rastadt. Louis died soon after, 1st Sept. 1715, aged 77, in the 73d year of his reign.

LOUIS XV. son of the duke of Burgundy, was born 15th Feb. 1710, and in 1715 succeeded his great grandfather, Louis XIV. as king of France. Philip, duke of Orleans, was appointed his guardian, and he labored earnestly to restore the impaired finances of the kingdom, but the schemes of Law, and the Mississippi projects brought desolation and ruin upon above 100,000 families in France. In 1723 the king was declared of age, and the affairs of the kingdom, after passing into the hands of Dubois, were intrusted, after Orleans' death, to the care of the duke of Bourbon, as prime minister. In 1725 the king married Mary, the daughter of Stanislaus, nominal king of Poland, and cardinal Fleury succeeded to the disgraced and unpopular Bourbon in the management of public affairs. The death of Augustus, king of Poland, in 1733, was fatal to the peace of Europe; Louis supported the pretensions of his father-in-law, and was opposed by the emperor of Germany, who upheld the claims of the elector of Saxony. The French troops were successful in Italy, but in 1738 a treaty restored tranquillity; and while Stanislaus renounced the throne of Poland, he was permitted to retain the title of king, and to become duke of Lorraine and Bar, which, after his death, were to descend to France. On the death of the emperor Charles VI. in 1740, new dissensions arose, and Louis, who had guaranteed the pragmatic sanction, and the succession of Maria Theresa, very dishonorably united with Prussia and Poland to place the duke of Bavaria, Charles Albert, on the imperial throne. Thus protected, the new monarch quickly seized Passau and Prague, and caused himself to be crowned king of Bohemia, and emperor; but his triumph was of short duration; the conquered towns were recaptured, and the battle of Dettingen in 1743, gained by the allies, shattered all his hopes. Though Louis appeared at the head of his armies in 1744, and took Courtray, Menin, Ypres, and Friburg, and witnessed the defeats of Fontenoy and Lawfeld, and the conquests of Ghent, Ostend, Brussels, Brabant, Bergen-op-Zoom, and other places, yet he found reverses in Italy and Provence. His commerce was ruined by the English, and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748 was welcomed by all the powers of Europe. In 1755 a new war was kindled between England and France about their possessions in Canada, and while Prussia supported the English, the emperor declared himself in favor of Louis. At the first the French were very successful; Portmahon surrendered to their arms, Galissonniere obtained some advantage over the English fleet, the duke of Cumberland was defeated at Hastenback, and the English army submitted to a disgraceful capitulation at Closter-seven. The conquest of Hanover, however was followed by the defeat of the French forces at Roshach, by the king of Prussia, in 1757, and they experienced another loss at the battle of Crevelt in 1758. The next year Broglio defeated the allies at Bergen, near Frankfort; but after various disasters on both sides, the rival powers grew tired of the war; and though the famous family compact joining in one bond of union all the branches of the house of Bourbon, seemed to promise much, it contributed little to the glory of France; and Spain lost Havanna, Cuba, and the Philippines. At last a treaty of peace was signed in 1763, by which England acquired great additions to her colonies; and the succeeding years presented little interesting in the history of France, except the conquest of Corsica, and the final banishment of the jesuits from the country. In May 1774 Louis was attacked a second time by the small-pox, which proved fatal on the 10th of that month. He was then 65 years old, and had reigned upwards of 59. Louis was a weak character, and though possessed of some good qualities of heart, he suffered himself too patiently to be governed by his favorites and his mistresses. He wrote a book on the Course of the principal Rivers of Europe, 8vo. He had two sons and eight daughters by his wife.

LOUIS XVI. son of the dauphin, and of Mary Josephine, of Saxony, the daughter of Frederic Augustus, king of Poland, was born 23d August 1754, and in consequence of the death of his father 1765, he exchanged the title of duke of Berry for that of dauphin, and ascended the throne of France on the death of his grandfather, 1774. His union with Marie Antoinette, of Austria, in 1770, was attended by the unfortunate death of above 4000 persons, who had assembled to behold the public rejoicings at Paris. On the day of his elevation to the crown, the young monarch, as if foreboding the miseries which awaited him, exclaimed, O my God, how unfortunate for me! Nevertheless, to repair the misconduct of his predecessors, and to meet the exigencies of an exhausted treasury, a ruined commerce, a shattered marine, and the discontents of a nation loaded with taxes, the new king called around him ministers of credit and ability. Vergennes took the charge of foreign affairs, Turgot presided over the finances, Malesherbes became counsellor of state, Sartine directed the affairs of the marine, and Maurepas was made prime minister. The first act of his reign endeared Louis to his people, and he nobly remitted the tribute which was expected on the accession of a new monarch. Already abuses began to be redressed, the exiled parliament was recalled, and commerce and industry began to recover their usual activity, but unfortunately the American war broke out. Eager to humble England by assisting her revolted colonies, the ministers of Louis pursued a course which was to prove fatal to their master, and disastrous to Europe. By supporting the Americans they kindled a dreadful war against England, which, while it separated the colonies from the mother country, increased, in a more intolerable degree the debts of France, and the miseries of her subjects. To repair the ruined finances proved too mighty a labor for the abilities of Calonne, and the cardinal de Brienne, wishing to gain by violence what his predecessor sought by persuasion, laid severe imposts, which the poverty of the people and the dissatisfaction of the great, could not discharge. The parliament of Paris was exiled to Troyes, for refusing to register these unpopular taxes; and when recalled by the fatal moderation of the monarch, they, instead of complying, called for the meeting of the states general of the kingdom, to assist in the difficulties of the government. Obedient to the general voice of the people, Louis convoked the states general, which met at Versailles, 5th May 1789. But while the three orders, the nobles, the clergy, and the commons, disputed which should be exempted from contributing to the burdens of the state, dissension arose between them, and instead of laboring earnestly all for the public good, each sought the aggrandizement of his own order, and listened to the voice of the factious and the intriguing. The troops which surrounded Paris gave offence to the deputies; and at the voice of the hypocritical democrat, Mirabeau, the people of Paris arose, and on the 14th July, 1789, they seized the Bastille, and after the most atrocious barbarities, bid defiance to the government. Though the mild character of the monarch, and the hesitating measures of his ministers, seemed to promise every concession, the factious leaders of the populace determined to attempt new crimes. On the 5th of October following, an armed multitude, with women of the most abandoned and ferocious character, set out from Paris for Versailles. The guards of the palace were murdered, the doors of the apartments were broken open, and the bed, from which the unhappy queen scarce could escape, was pierced through with a thousand stabs. The monarch, surrounded by his terrified family, was with difficulty spared, but it was to suffer new indignities. He was immediately hurried to Paris, preceded by the insulting cavalcade; while around his carriage were presented on pikes, with the grossest exclamations, the heads of his faithful servants who had been murdered in defence of his person. Placed as a prisoner in the palace of the Thuilleries, he made every sacrifice which could restore tranquillity; and on the 14th Feb. 1790, he gave his assent to the new constitution, which reduced his power to a mere shadow. Notwithstanding these humiliating concessions, he was still insulted; murder and insurrection still continued, or rather were encouraged; and at the last, tired of a situation which left him no prospect of liberty, the monarch escaped privately from Paris, 21st June, 1791, and nearly reached the frontiers of France. His person, however, was recognised at Varennes, and he was brought back to Paris to endure fresh indignities. Though treated with seeming respect by the national assembly, the insults of the populace were not checked, and on the 20th June, 1792, a ferocious mob forced its way to the palace, and threatened the destruction of the royal family. Louis, undismayed, presented himself to these barbarians, and for two hours, disarmed them of their murderous fury, till Petion, with hypocritical marks of respect, came to liberate the monarch from this perilous situation. The events of this day warned Louis of his approaching fate, and it is said, that now he began to write his will, and to prepare himself for death. The declaration of war by the emperor and Prussia against France, and the threats of the duke of Brunswick, and his invasion of Champagne, roused more powerfully the resentment of the mob, as they were taught, by their flagitious leaders, that these measures were dictated by their imprisoned monarch. In the midst of these events, with a victorious enemy approaching the capital, and an ungovernable multitude, thirsting for blood, the 10th of August, still more terrible than all others, came; the tocsin was sounded, the Thuilleries attacked, and the faithful Swiss guards murdered in every avenue of the palace. Already the cannon was pointed against the apartments of the monarch, when he was persuaded to fly for safety to the hall of the assembly, and though often interrupted by the sight of heaps of slain, by the shrieks of the dying, and by the outrageous insults of the mob, he reached this spot, where he heard his name treated with studied indignity, his power suspended, and his sentence of imprisonment pronounced. Confined in one of the towers of the Temple, he for some time was permitted to enjoy the soothing company of his family; but as his tyrants increased in power, they decreased in compassion and humanity. The convention succeeded the assembly, and they not only decreed the abolition of royalty in France, but they proclaimed the necessity of trying their fallen monarch. Depicted, in the speeches of this vile assembly, as a tyrant and a traitor, Louis had no mercy to expect from such perjured judges. Though deprived of pen and paper, and of every means by which he might have prepared himself, he appeared with his usual serenity before this murderous tribunal, and in his answers to interrogatories, he maintained the dignity of the monarch, and the firmness of the Christian. Though thus insulted, yet an apparent show of candor in the convention, permitted his faithful ministers, Malesherbes, Trouchet, and Deszeze, to appear at their bar as his defenders; but neither the tears nor the venerable appearance of these aged and illustrious men, nor the present misfortunes, the past greatness, and the well-known innocence of Louis, could avail. On the 17th Jan. 1793, he was condemned to death, but only by a majority of five voices. On the 21st he was conveyed to the scaffold, and as he placed himself on the machine, his confessor fervently exclaimed, O son of St Louis ascend to heaven, and that moment his head was severed from his body.

LOUIS, XVIII., Stanislaus Xavier de France, second son of the dauphin, the son of Louis XV. and brother of Louis XVI. was born at Versailles, Nov. 15, 1755. On the breaking out of the Revolution, the count de Provence, as he was then styled, fled from Paris to Coblenz, on the 20th June 1791, and then took an active part in the organization of the system of emigration. The progress of the republican arms afterwards compelled him to abandon this asylum for Turin, where he was received by his father-in-law, the king of Sardinia; but subsequently again removed to Verona, under the name of the count de Lille, a title which he retained till his accession to the French throne. In 1796 he joined the army of the prince de Condé, then at Reizal, and two years afterwards was formally acknowledged king of France by the emperor Paul of Russia, at whose invitation he took his residence for a while, in the ducal castle of Mittau in Courland. The versatility of his new ally, however, soon put an end to his continuance in this abode. He received peremptory orders to quit the Russian territories in a week, and took refuge at Warsaw, whence the king of Prussia, on his refusing to renounce his throne in favor of Bonaparte, compelled him to retire, as a last resource, to England. There he was hospitably received; and there he remained, till the downfall of Napoleon in 1814, drew him from his retreat to reascend the throne of his ancestors. From this he was again driven by the return of Bonaparte from Elba, and he retired into the Netherlands, till the battle of Waterloo, by completely breaking the power of his opponent, restored him to his crown. He survived this second elevation nine years, dying in his sixty-ninth year, on the 16th of September, 1824. For a considerable time previously to his decease, a dry erysipelas in his legs had deprived him of the power of walking, while his attachment to the pleasures of the table, assisted a natural tendency to corpulency, and aided materially to produce the disease which terminated in his dissolution. As the restored monarch of France, Louis XVIII. acted with great temper and policy; at least on his second return to his capital, after the battle of Waterloo, when it required no mean degree of skill to render the intrusion of the foreign armies, which made him King of France, palatable to the people over whom he was called to reign.

LOUIS, Antony, secretary of the academy of surgeons at Paris, and member of that of sciences, became one of the most intelligent anatomists of Europe. He was born at Metz, and died of a dropsy, 20th May, 1792, aged 69. He was a man of great integrity, as well as of extensive knowledge in the medical profession. He wrote a Course of Practical Surgery on Gunshot Wounds, 4to.—Essay on the Nature of the Soul and its Union with the Body, 12mo.—Observations on Electricity, and its Effects on the Animal Economy, 12mo.—Observations on the Effects of the Cancerous Virus, 12mo.—Refutations of Combalusier—Positiones Anatomico-chirurgiæ de Capite, 4to.—de Partium Externarum Generatione in Mulieribus, 4to.—Eloges de Bassuel, Molaval, & Verdier—Dissertatio de Apoplexia curanda, and other medical works.

LOUTHERBOURG, Philip James, a painter, was born, in 1740, at Strasburgh, and was a pupil of Tischbein, Casa Nova, and Carlo Vanloo. He came to England in 1771, and was first employed by Garrick as a scene painter. In 1782 he produced a pictorial exhibition, called the Eidophusikon, or representation of nature. He subsequently acquired great reputation, especially in landscape, and became one of the council of the Royal Academy. He died in 1812.

LOUVET, Peter, a native of Reinville, near Beauvais, was master of requests to queen Margaret, and died 1646. He wrote the History and Antiquities of Beauvais, 2 vols. 8vo.—Nomenclatura & Chronologia Rerum Ecclesiast. Dioec. Bellovæ, 8vo.—Remarques sur la Noblesse Beauvoisine & plusieurs Familles de la France, 8vo. in a style not very elegant.—A physician of Beauvais bore also that name, and was professor at Montpellier, 1680. He wrote various works on the history of Provence and Languedoc, possessing little merit.

LOUVET DE COUVRAY, John Baptist, a native of Poitou, author of a licentious work, the Amors of Faublas. During the revolution he was an active member of the convention, and though proscribed in 1793, he had the art to escape the guillotine. As the editor of the Sentinelle, he acquired popularity with the vulgar; and he soon had the boldness to accuse Robespierre, surrounded with his satellites, and by his firmness to overturn the tyrant. He is praised for the steadiness of his principles; and Madame Roland says of him, that he was courageous as a lion, and simple as a child. He died at Paris, 25th Aug. 1797, of an asthmatic disorder, as he was going consul to Palermo. Besides his Faublas, and his Sentinelle, he wrote, Paris justifié, 8vo. 1789—Emilie de Varinont, ou le Divorce necessaire, 3 vols. 12mo, 1794—Notice pour le Recit de mes Dangers, 1795, 8vo.

LOUVILLE, Eugene d' Allonville, Chevalier de, a native of Beauce, of a noble family, who served, as colonel of dragoons, Philip V. of Spain. At the peace of Utrecht he devoted himself to mathematics and astronomy, and after making observations at Marseilles, he went to London, 1715, to see with greater effect, the total eclipse of the sun. While in England he was made member of the royal society of London, as he had before been of the academy of sciences, at Paris. He afterwards fixed his residence near Orleans, and devoted himself to astronomical pursuits. He died there, of a fever, at the end of 1732, aged 61. He wrote various curious dissertations, inserted in the memoirs of the academy.

LOUVOIS, Francis Michael Letellier, marquis of, a French statesman, was born, in 1641, at Paris, and in 1666 became war minister to Louis XIV.; the reversion of which office had been granted to him several years before. He died in 1691. Louvois was a great minister, but not a good man. He was indefatigable in performing the duties of his office, and his plans were characterized by genius; but he was imperious and envious, and his cruelties to the protestants, and the atrocious devastation of the Palatinate twice executed under his positive orders, have branded his name with infamy.

LOVE, James, an actor whose real name was Dance, the son of Mr. Dance, the city surveyor, and the ungraceful architect of the London mansion-house. He was educated at Westminster school, and Cambridge, but took no degree. He expected patronage from Walpole, in consequence of his answering an attack against the minister, but was disappointed, and at last turned his thoughts to the stage. He was on the Dublin and Edinburgh theatres, and appeared at Drury-lane, 1762. His Falstaff was much admired, till eclipsed by the better acting of Henderson. He died 1774. He wrote Pamela, a comedy, 1742, and some other dramatic pieces.

LOVE, Christopher, rector of St. Anne's, Al

dersgate, and St. Laurence, Jewry, and author of 3 vols. of sermons, was accused of correspondence with the king against Cromwell's government. He was condemned, and lost his head, July, 1651, though several parishes, and 54 ministers interested themselves in his behalf.

LOVELACE, Richard, an English poet, born at Woolridge, in Kent, 1613, and educated at the Charter-house, and Gloucester hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1636. He embraced the cause of the king during the civil wars, and was a great sufferer for his loyalty. The persecutions which he endured, and the poverty to which he was reduced, at last brought on melancholy, and produced a consumption. He died in a very poor lodging, Gunpowder alley, Shoe lane, 1658, and was buried in St. Bride's church. His poetry was very spirited and elegant. He wrote, besides poems, two plays, the Scholar, a comedy—and the Soldier, a tragedy.

LOVELACE, Francis, governor of New York, under the duke of York, succeeded Richard Nicholls in May, 1667. He continued in office until the surrender of the colony to the Dutch in 1673, when he was ordered to depart from the province, and return to England. He was a man of great moderation, and his administration was quiet and happy, but was distinguished by no transaction of great importance. The most memorable act which took place under it was the purchase of Staten Island from the natives.

LOVELL, John, a schoolmaster in Boston, was a descendant of one of the first settlers of Massachusetts, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1728, and after succeeding Jeremy Gridley as assistant, for some years, in the south grammar and Latin school, was placed at the head of the school in 1733. He was "the master" nearly 40 years. Many of the principal men of the American revolution had been under his tuition. But unhappily he was himself a loyalist, and in 1777 accompanied the British troops to Halifax, where he died in 1778, aged about 70.—He was a good scholar, of solid judgment, rigid in discipline, yet humorous and an agreeable companion. He published a funeral oration on P. Faneuil 1743, and several political and theological pamphlets. In the pietas printed at Cambridge he wrote No. 2, 25, 26, and 27.

LOVELL, James, a schoolmaster in Boston, son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1756, and was for many years a distinguished teacher of the Latin school, associated with his father. In the revolution he was a firm whig, devoted to the cause of liberty. For his patriotic zeal general Gage shut him up in prison; and he was carried as a prisoner by the British troops to Halifax, where he was for a long time kept in close confinement. The father was a tory refugee; the son a whig prisoner. On his return to Boston, he was elected a member of congress, in which station his services were of great advantage to his country. On the committee of foreign correspondence he was laborious and faithful. Before the establishment of the constitution of Massachusetts 1786, he was the collector of the customs for Boston, and afterwards was naval officer for Boston and Charlestown, in which station he continued till his death. He died 1814, aged 76. He published, oratio in funero Thyntii, 1760.

LOVEWELL, John, captain, the hero of Pigwawket, was a native of New Hampshire. In the Indian wars a large bounty being offered for scalps, captain Lovewell at the head of a volunteer company of 30 men, marched to the north of Winipisiogee lake, and killed an Indian, and took a boy prisoner Dec. 19, 1724. Having obtained his reward at Boston, he augmented his company to 70, and marched to the same place. There dismissing 30 men for the want of provisions, he proceeded with 40 men to a pond in Wakefield, now called Lovewell's pond, where he discovered ten Indians asleep by a fire; they were on their march from Canada to the frontiers. He killed them all, Feb. 20, 1725, and with savage triumph entered Dover with their scalps, hooped and elevated on poles, for each of which one hundred pounds was paid out of the public treasury at Boston. He marched a third time with 46 men. Leaving a few men at a fort, which he built at Ossagee pond, he proceeded with 34 men to the north end of a pond in Pigwawket, now Fryeburg in Maine, and there a severe action, was fought with a party of 42 Indians, commanded by Paugus and Wahwa, May 8, 1725. At the first fire Lovewell and eight of his men were killed; the remainder retreated a short distance to a favorable position and defended themselves. With the pond in their rear, the mouth of an unfordable brook on their right, a rocky point on their left, and having also the shelter of some large pine trees, they fought bravely from 10 o'clock till evening, when the Indians, who had lost their leader, Paugus, killed by Mr. Chamberlain,—retired and fled from Pigwawket. Ensign Robbins and two others were mortally wounded; these were necessarily left behind to die. Eleven wounded but able to march, and nine unhurt, at the rising of the moon quitted the fatal spot. Jonathan Frye, the chaplain, lieut. Farwell, and another man died in the woods in consequence of their wounds. The others with the widows and children of the slain, received a grant of Lovewell's town, or Suncook, now Pembroke, N. H. in 1728, in recompense of their sufferings. The bodies of 12 were afterwards found by col. Tyng and buried.

LOW, James, M.D. a physician, was born at Albany Dec. 9, 1731, and was educated at Schenectady college. He studied his profession 4 years at Edinburgh, and returning in 1808, commenced the practice at Albany in connexion with his former teacher, Dr. Win. McClelland, and was extensively employed. He died Feb. 3, 1822, aged 40. For some years he delivered lectures on chemistry. He was a scholar, an enthusiast in poetry, and a promoter of learning. He published an inaugural dissertation, de tetano, 1807; account of the epidemic pneumonia in med. reg. iv.; observations on the moth destructive to bees; notes to Hooper's Vade Mecum, and to Bell on the venereal.

LOWELL, John, L.L.D. judge, graduated at Harvard college 1760. Having settled in Boston as a lawyer, he was chosen a member of congress in 1731. Of the convention which formed the constitution of Massachusetts he was a distinguished member. In 1789 Washington appointed him judge of the district court for the Massachusetts district; and on the new organization of the courts of the United States, in Feb. 1801, he was appointed chief justice of the first circuit. He died 1802 aged 58. For 18 years he was a member of the corporation of Harvard college, and one of the founders of the American academy. He wrote an English poem, No. 3 in the "Pietas" printed at Cambridge. He pronounced before the American academy of arts and sciences in Jan. 1791 an elegant eulogy on their late president James Bowdoin, which is prefixed to the second volume of the memoirs of that society.

LOWER, sir William, a loyalist, under Charles

I. born at Tremare, in Cornwall. When his master's affairs were ruined, he retired to Holland, and applied himself to literature. He formed the plan of the four of the six plays which he has written in the manner of Corneille and Quinault, his favorite authors. He died 1662.

✓ LOWER, Richard, son to the above, was a physician, educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, and instructed in medical and anatomical knowledge, by Dr. Willis. He settled in London, and practised with great reputation. His books, "De Corle," "Et de Motu & Colore Sanguinis, & Chyli in Eum Transitu" are much admired. He practised the transfusion of blood from one animal to another. He died 1691. Some of his papers appear in the philosophical transactions.

LOWMAN, Moses, for upwards of 40 years dissenting minister of a congregation at Clapham, Surrey, was well skilled in Jewish history and antiquities. He died 1752, aged 72. He wrote a valuable book on Revelations—a tract, now scarce, proving mathematically the Unity and Perfection of God à priori—and after his death appeared his three treatises on the Shechinah and Logos.

LOWNDES, William, L.L.D., a statesman, was a native of South Carolina, and was a distinguished member of congress for a period of ten years from about 1812 to 1822, when from ill health he resigned. In 1813 he was the chairman of the committee of ways and means. While on a voyage from Philadelphia to London in the ship Moss he died at sea Oct. 27, 1822 aged 42. His family was with him. A writer in the National Register describes him as tall, slender, emaciated, of a rueful countenance; a man of wealth and probity; modest, retiring and unambitious; with a mind of the first order, vigorous, comprehensive and logical, and a memory of uncommon power, and standing in the first ranks of American statesmen. There must have been some most extraordinary excellences in his character, for he was respected and beloved even by his political adversaries. He had a heart of kindness, purity of morals, frankness and candor, a sound judgment, wisdom pre-eminent, and patriotism most ardent. His feeble voice, and awkward gesticulation were of little advantage to his oratory. But his strong comprehensive mind, and his love of country, together with his virtues, gave him a persuasive power. On hearing of the victory of lake Erie, he rose and electrified the house with his eloquence. Had he lived he might have been the president of the United States. It was said of him in congress by Mr. Taylor of N. York,—“the highest and best hopes of the country looked to Wm. Lowndes for their fulfilment. The most honorable office in the civilized world, the chief magistracy of this free people, would have been illustrated by his virtues and talents.” Concerning that office, of seeking which by any intrigue, or artifice, or effort of his own whatever, Mr. Lowndes was totally incapable, he remarked, “the office of president of the United States is one neither to be solicited nor declined.” It were happy for our country, if the same modest spirit exerted a controlling influence over our great statesmen, and if the honors of high office were merited by public services, and private virtues, and not sought.

LOWRY, Wilson, a celebrated engraver, was born, in 1762, at Whitehaven, and died June 23, 1824, a member of the Royal Society. He was employed on many scientific works, particularly Rees's Cyclopædia, and the Encyclopædia Metropolitana. He invented two machines for drawing lines, introduced the use of diamond points in etching, and was the first who succeeded in “biting in” well upon steel. With anatomy, geology, and other sciences he was well acquainted.

LOWTH, William, B.D. a learned divine, born in St. Martin's parish, Ludgate, London, 11th Sept. 1661. He was first educated under his grandfather, the rector of Tilehurst, Berks, and then sent to Merchant Taylors' school, where he so distinguished himself, that at 14 he was elected to St. John's, Oxford. His great merit recommended him to bishop Mew, of Winchester, who made him his chaplain, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral, and the rectory of Buriton, with the chapel of Petersfield, Hants. This worthy and exemplary clergyman died 1732. He is the author of Commentaries on all the Prophets, first published 4to. afterwards folio—a Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments, 12mo. in answer to Le Clerc—Directions for the profitable reading of the Scriptures—sermons, and the character of an Apostolical Church, which engaged him in a controversy with a dissenting minister of Portsmouth, called Norman.

LOWTH, Robert, D.D. a learned prelate, son of the above, born in the Close, Winchester, 8th Dec. 1710. He was educated at Winchester school, and passed to New college, Oxford, where he soon began to display the native powers of his ardent mind. In 1741 he was elected Hebrew professor of poetry, and in that character delivered his admirable lectures, “De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum,” published 4to. afterwards in 8vo. and edited with additions, by Michaelis, in Germany. His great reputation recommended him to the duke of Devonshire, who appointed him tutor to his son, marquis Hartington, and with him he made the tour of Europe. In 1750 he was appointed archdeacon of Winchester, by bishop Hoadly. In 1755 he went as chaplain to his pupil, now lord lieutenant of Ireland, and there soon obtained the bishopric of Limerick, which he afterwards exchanged for a prebend of Durham. His “Life of William of Wykeham,” appeared in 1753. In 1766 he was made bishop of St. David's, two months after translated to Oxford, and in 1777 to London. On the death of Cornwallis the primate, 1783, he was offered the archiepiscopal chair, which his infirmities obliged him to decline. His domestic peace had been deeply wounded by the death of his eldest daughter, in 1763, on whose grave at Cuddesdon, he inscribed those beautiful and pathetic verses, beginning with “Cara, vale,” and his other daughter died suddenly, 1783, while presiding at his tea table, and in conversation with bishop Newton. This truly venerable prelate, and most amiable man, died 3d Nov. 1787, aged nearly 77. He published besides “Isaiah,” translated from the Hebrew, a most masterly performance—an English Grammar, universally esteemed—a Poem on the Genealogy of Christ—some Controversial Papers with Warburton—and Occasional Sermons.—His father's life, for the Biogr. Britan.

LUBIENIETSKI, Stanislaus Lubiecius, a Socinian divine, born at Cracow, in Poland, of a noble family, 1623. He studied at Thorn, and afterwards visited France and Holland, as a travelling tutor, and in 1649, on the death of his father, returned to Poland. He was highly favored by the king of Sweden, while he was in Poland, but he exerted his influence in vain with that monarch, that the Unitarians might be included in the general amnesty granted to all those who dissented from popery. In consequence of this disappointment he went to Copenhagen, 1660, and was there honorably received by the Danish king, who granted him a pension. The Lutheran divines, however, saw with jealousy, the influence he had acquired, and the new favorite yielding to the general odium, retired to Hanburg, 1662, where he held a conference with queen Christina. In 1667, he again returned to Copenhagen, and from thence to Fredericksburg, but persecution followed him every where, and another time he attempted to find an asylum at Hamburg. Here he did not long enjoy tranquillity, he was ordered by the magistrates to leave the city, but before he removed, the unfortunate man was poisoned by his maid servant, May 18th, 1675. His two daughters had fallen victims, two days before, to the same diabolical measures, and his wife with difficulty recovered from the effects of the poison. His death prevented his completion of the History of the Reformation in Poland. Of the many books which he wrote, a few have been printed. He is regarded by the Socinians, as a martyr to their tenets. The best known of his works is "Theatrum Cometicum," 1667, folio, which contains an account of comets, from the flood to 1665.

LUBIN, Eilhard, a learned protestant, born at Westersted, in Oldenburg, 24th March, 1556. He studied at Leipsic and Cologne, and other universities, and in 1595 was made professor of poetry at Rostock, and ten years after raised to the divinity chair. He died of a tertian ague, June, 1621. To his extensive knowledge of Greek and Latin, he added the graces of poetry and oratory, and was also a good mathematician and divine. His publications are 13, containing notes on Anacreon, Juvenal, and Persius—a Translation of the Anthologia—Clavis Græcæ Lingvæ, besides a curious Treatise, called "Phosphorus," in which he maintained two co-eternal principles, God and Nothing, of which he considered God as the good principle, and Nothing, as the evil principle. He supposed that sin was only a tendency towards nothing, and that sin was necessary to make known the nature of good. By his first wife he had no children, by his second, nine.

LUBIN, Augustin, an Augustine friar, geographer to the French king, was born at Paris, 29th Jan. 1624. He applied himself to ecclesiastical history and wrote the Geographical Mercury—Present State of Abbeys in France, and in Italy—a Description of Lapland,—Notes on Plutarch's Lives, and other works. He died at Paris, 17th March, 1695.

LUCA, John Baptist, a native of Venosa, in the Neapolitan territory. He quitted the profession of the law for the church, and became a cardinal. He died 1633, aged 66. The best known of his numerous works is an Analysis of the Civil Law, 4 vols. 4to.—a composition of great merit, and properly called the Philosophy of Jurisprudence.

LUCAN, Marcus Annæus, a Latin poet born at Cordova, A. D. 39. He was the favorite of Nero, but afterwards offended and joined Piso's conspiracy against the tyrant. He was obliged to destroy himself and was suffocated in a bath, 65.

LUCAS, Tudensis, bishop of Tudæ or Tuy in Galicia, in the 13th century, was author of an History of Spain, from Adam to the year 1236—the Life of Isidorus of Seville—a work against the Albigenses, 1612.

LUCAS, Richard, D.D. a learned divine born at Presteign, Radnorshire, 1643. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford. He was for some time master of Abergavenny free school, but afterwards obtained the vicarage of St. Stephen's, Coleman street, and the lectureship of St. Olave, Southwark, and in 1696 became prebendary of Westminster. He died June 1715, after having been afflicted for some years with blindness, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He was author of some valuable compositions—Practical Christianity—an Enquiry after Happiness, 2 vols. 8vo.—5 vols. of sermons, 8vo.—and the Morality of the Gospel.

LUCAS, Paul, a French traveller, born at Rouen 1664. He several times visited the Levant, Egypt, Turkey, and other countries, where he made a valuable collection of curiosities, which he presented to the French king, who in 1714, appointed him his antiquary. He extended his travels to Spain, and died, after an illness of eight months, at Madrid, 1737. His travels, though not very accurate, are yet interesting. They have appeared in 7 vols. 12mo.

LUCAS, Charles, an Irishman who from an apothecary became a physician, and afterwards obtained a seat in the House of Commons, where he displayed his zeal in his opposition to the measures of government. He died 1771, aged 58, and his remains were honored by the attendance of the Dublin corporation who liberally conferred a pension on his widow.

LUCCHESINI, John Vincent, an historian born of a noble family at Lucca. He was educated at Sienna and at Pisa universities, and became secretary to the pope, and canon of St. Peter's at Rome. He died 1744, aged 84. Besides a Latin translation of Demosthenes, 1712, much and deservedly commended by Rollin, he wrote Historia sui Temporis, published 1733, 3 vols. 4to. a work of merit.

LUCIAN, a celebrated Greek writer, a native of Samosata, the capital of Comagene, is believed to have been born between the years 118 and 124. He abandoned the profession of a sculptor to become a pleader, and then quitted the bar to profess philosophy and rhetoric. After having travelled in Ionia, Greece, Gaul, and Italy, he settled at Athens. Marcus Aurelius appointed him procurator of Egypt. Lucian is supposed to have lived to the age of ninety. In humor and the power of ridicule, he stands unrivalled among the ancients, and his style is excellent. His works have been translated into English, by Carr, Franklin, and Tooke.

LUCIFER, bishop Cagliari, in Sardinia, refused to admit the apostate Arian bishops to communion, according to the decree of the council of Alexandria, 362. Rather than to yield in opinion he resigned his see, and became the author of a new schism whose supporters were called Luciferians. He died 370. His works appeared at Venice 1779.

LUCRETIA, a celebrated Roman lady, wife of Collatinus. Violence was offered to her person by Sextus the son of Tarquin, and in consequence of this she stabbed herself after she had related the horrid indignity to her father and husband. Her death was avenged by the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, and the establishment of the consular government, A. U. C. 244.

LUCRETIVS CARUS, Titus, one of the greatest of the Latin poets, was born, B. C. 95, at Rome; studied at Athens, under Zeno; and is said to have put an end to his own existence, at the age of forty-four. He was the friend of Atticus, Catullus, and Cicero. The story that he was rendered insane by an amatory philtre being administered to him, and that he wrote his magnificent work, On the Nature of Things, in his lucid intervals, is probably a fable. In energy and sublimity Lucretius is hardly equalled even by Virgil himself. Creech, Good, and Busby have translated his poem into English.

LUCULLUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman general, celebrated for his conquests over Mithridates in Bithynia, and Armenia. After the honors of a triumph he retired to privacy, and patronised learned men. He died aged 69.

LUDLOW, Edmund, a republican chief in the civil wars of England, born at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, 1620. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his first degree in 1636, and then removed to the Temple to study the law, but on the breaking out of the civil war, by the advice of his father who was representative in the long parliament, for Wiltshire, he became a volunteer in lord Essex's life guards. He distinguished himself at the battle of Edge hill, and in the siege of Wardour castle, of which he was made governor, and afterwards he was made by the parliament high sheriff of his native county. He was at the second battle of Newbury, and in 1643, succeeded, on his father's death, as representative for Wiltshire, but while he opposed on the one hand the dark designs of Cromwell, he on the other voted for the abolition of royalty, and for the establishment of a pure commonwealth. With these principles it is not to be wondered at that he was one of the unfortunate king's judges, and that he concurred in voting the house of peers not only useless but dangerous. He was employed by Cromwell as lieutenant general of horse in Ireland, and on Ireton's death he succeeded him in the chief command of the Island. The elevation of Cromwell to the protectorate was particularly displeasing to him, but his attempts to oppose it rendered him suspected to the tyrant, who at last insured his tranquillity, by seizing his person, and then obliging him to give a security not to act against the government. Thus bound to inactivity he lived in Essex till the death of the usurper, and then under Richard appeared in parliament, and was violent in the disturbed state of affairs for the restoration of the rump parliament. By the influence of the Wallingford house party he was prevailed upon to resume the chief command in Ireland, but here he met with some opposition, and on his return to England soon after he found himself accused of various misdemeanors. Sensible that the nation, and the army headed by Monk, had determined to restore the king, he left the kingdom, by the advice of his friends, and retired to Dieppe. A reward of 300*l.* was offered by proclamation for his apprehension, but he escaped his pursuers, and flying to Geneva, he at last settled at Vevay in Switzerland. At the revolution he ventured to return to London, but though he was regarded as a proper person to reduce Ireland from the power of the papists, some of the commons moved an address to William to seize him, in consequence of which he retired again to Vevay, where he died 1693, aged 73. After his death appeared his "Memoirs," in 2 vols. 8vo. 1698, to which another was added on the following year. This work is curious and valuable, and in communicating important particulars concerning the civil wars, exhibits the author as a stern unshaken republican, not like Cromwell turning every accident to his own views and interest, but regarding the democratical government, pure and uncorrupted, as the most perfect system of political union.

LUDLOW, Roger, deputy governor of Massachusetts, and of Connecticut, came to America with Maverick and Warham, and was one of the first settlers of Dorchester in 1630. He was an assistant four years, being chosen such in England. In May 1632, when gov. Winthrop told him that the people intended to ask of the next general court, that the assistants might be chosen annually, he grew into passion, and said that then we should have no government. In 1634, he was deputy governor; but failing to be chosen governor, he complains of the election, as agreed upon by the deputies in private. For this he was left out of the magistracy. In consequence he removed in 1635, with the first settlers to Windsor; and in Connecticut, he was, for nineteen years, one of the most useful and distinguished men. He was every year a magistrate or deputy governor; he was also one of the commissioners of the united colonies. Removing in 1639, to Fairfield, his situation made him particularly interested in the protection of the western frontier against the Dutch and Indians. The commissioners in consequence of an alleged plot of the Dutch, voted in 1653, to make war against them, but Massachusetts refused to concur, much to the dissatisfaction of N. Haven, and in disregard, it was asserted, of the power stipulated to belong to the commissioners. At this period the inhabitants of Fairfield determined to make war with Manhadoes, and chose Mr. Ludlow commander-in-chief. He accepted the appointment. But the general court of N. Haven discountenanced the project and punished his officers, Basset and Chapinan, for attempting to make an insurrection, and for raising volunteers. Probably, in consequence of this affair, he embarked in April 1654 for Virginia, with his family, and carried away the records of Fairfield with him. The time and place of his death are not known. He compiled the first Connecticut code of laws, which was printed in 1672.

LUDOLPH, Job, the well known Ethiopic historian, was born at Erfurt in Thuringia, 15th June, 1624. Though his countrymen were unfortunately engaged in military affairs, he devoted himself to studious pursuits, and at the age of 20 was a perfect master of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and then employed himself assiduously in the study of the Ethiopic language, of which he wrote a grammar. He studied also the law under the famous professor Muller, and after spending about six years in travelling, and visiting France, Holland, Rome, and the residence of Christina the celebrated patroness of learning in Sweden, he returned to Erfurt, and gained applause in the office of counsellor of state. After 18 years devoted to the public service he returned to Frankfort with the intention of cultivating literature, but the elector palatine placed him at the head of his administration, and twice employed his abilities as negotiator in France. The last years, however, of his life were spent in the perfecting of his works. He died universally lamented 8th April, 1704, nearly 80 years old. It is said that he was well versed in 25 languages. His character in private life was as respectable as his public fame as a scholar and a politician. He wrote Historia Ethiopica, fol. 1691—Commentaries in Hist. Ethiopic. folio.—Dissertatio de Locustis, folio.—Grammatica Amharicæ Linguae, fol.—Grammatica Linguae Ethiopic. folio. and other learned publications.

LUDOLPH, Henry William, nephew to the preceding, was born at Erfurt 1655. He was secretary to the Danish envoy in London, and afterwards filled the same office near the person of George of Denmark, who married queen Anne. He visited Russia, and was presented to the Czar who expressed astonishment at his great knowledge of music and of various languages, and in gratitude for the civilities which he had received, he wrote a grammar of the Russian language, which was printed at Oxford 1696. In 1698, he determined to travel into the East to see the state of the christian church in those remote regions. He visited Smyrna, Jaffa, Jerusalem, Cairo, Alexandria, and returned well acquainted with the laws, manners, and religion of those countries. He wished the establishment of a christian college at Jerusalem, and to disseminate the knowledge of pure christianity, he zealously undertook the impression of the New Testament into modern Greek, which was happily completed by the assistance of the bishop of Worcester, and other learned and charitable persons. This benevolent man died 25th Jan. 1710, aged 54.

LUDWELL, Philip, governor of the Carolinas, succeeded Sothel in South Carolina in 1692, but incurring the displeasure of the proprietors, Thomas Smith, succeeded him in 1693, when Ludwell returned to Virginia, where he continued to reside during most of his administration in Carolina. In North Carolina he was four years governor, although he continued but a short time in the colony. He was succeeded by Thomas Harvey, as deputy governor.

LUDWIG, John Peter, professor of law, chancellor of Magdeburg, and privy counsellor to the king of Prussia, died 1743, aged 73. He wrote Scriptor. Rerum Germanicarum, 2 vols.—Manuscripta Omnis Ævi, Diplomata & Monumenta inedita, 12 vols. 8vo.—Lives of Justinian and Tribonian, and Miscellaneous Works, 2 vols.

LUGO, John, a Spanish jesuit, born at Madrid 28th Nov. 1533. He studied at Pampeluna, Salamanca and Seville, and taught divinity at Valladolid. He afterwards went to Rome, where he filled the theological chair for 20 years with great popularity, and was in 1643, made a cardinal by pope Urban VIII. This honor he was willing to decline; he regarded the coach sent for him as his coffin, and consented at last in submission to the pope's commands. In this new dignity he did not display the pomp or pride of a cardinal, he was meek in his conduct, and charitable in the highest degree. He died at Rome 20th Aug. 1660, and was buried at the feet of Loyola the founder of his order. He was the first who introduced bark into general use in France, in 1650. He was not only an able divine, but an expert philosopher and mathematician. His works are on theological subjects, and fill up 7 vols. folio.

LUGO, Francis, elder brother to the preceding, was born at Madrid 1580, and became a jesuit at Salamanca 1600. He went as missionary to the Indies, and was promoted to the divinity chair at Mexico, and Santa Fe. He returned to Spain, and was afterwards employed on ecclesiastical affairs at Rome. He was made rector of two colleges in Spain, and died 1652. He wrote commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, 2 vols. folio.

LUISINO, or LUISINI, Francis, an eminent scholar of Udino in the Venetian states. He taught Greek and Latin at Reggio, and was afterwards secretary to the duke of Parma, and died 1563, aged 45. He wrote Illustrations of Obscure Passages in Ancient Authors, found also in Gruter's Fax Artium—a Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry—a treatise de Componendis Animi Affectibus, 8vo.

LUITPRANDUS, a Lombard historian, born at Pavia. He was bred up at the court of the Italian kings, and was in 948 sent by Berengarius II. as ambassador to Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He was afterwards disgraced by his master, and fled to the emperor Otho, who avenged his cause by dethroning Berengarius, and making him bishop of Cremona. In 963, he went again as ambassador to Constantinople from Otho, but he was rudely treated by Nicophorus Phocas the emperor of the East, and thrown into prison because he defended the right of his master to the title of emperor of the West. The time of his death is unknown. He wrote, in a harsh but vehement style, the History of his own Times, in six books, printed, Antwerp, folio, 1640, a valuable work, found among Muratori's Rerum Italicarum Scriptores.

LULLE, Raymond, a learned native of Majorca, called on account of his great abilities, Doctor Illuminatus. After excelling as a divine he applied himself to physic and chemistry that he might be enabled to cure the cancer of a young woman, of whom he was enamored. He afterwards went as a missionary to Mauritania where the barbarian natives stoned him to death, March, 1315, at the age of 80. His remains were brought back to Majorca, where he was regarded as a martyr. His works on theology, history, medicine, law, philosophy, were collected together, and lately published at Mentz, but they are very obscure, and in a barbarous style.

LULLI, John Baptist, an eminent musician, born at Florence 1634. His fondness for music, however, soon distinguished him, he received instructions from a master, and was soon so great a proficient on the violin that the king noticed him and made him superintendent of music in the royal chamber. He became now eminent as a composer, and was employed, on the recovery of Louis, from his indisposition, to compose a Te Deum, which in the performance proved fatal to him, as he struck the end of his foot, and thus produced a gangrene, of which he died 22d March, 1697. He is deservedly esteemed as the master who brought French music to perfection. His great operas, in 5 acts, such as Cadmus, Alceste, Theseus, Psyche, are highly admired, as well as his pastorals, and ballets. He composed also the music for Moliere's plays, and was in his private character a witty and facetious companion.

LUMLEY, Joanna lady, eldest daughter of Henry Fitz-Allan, earl Arundel, married John lord Lumley. She was very learned, and translated into Latin, from the Greek, three of the orations of Isocrates, of which the MS. is still preserved in Westminster library. She also translated into English Euripides' Iphigenia, and died 1620, about 11 years after her husband.

LUNEAU DE BOISJERMAIN, Peter Joseph Francis, a voluminous French writer, who died suddenly at the end of 1802. He wrote a course of History and Geography, 2 vols. 12mo.—True Principles of Reading and Orthography, 4 vols. 8vo.—Course of the Italian Language—Course of the English Language, 2 vols. 8vo.—Racine's Works, edited 7 vols. 8vo.—Musical Almanac.

LUSSAN, Margaret de, a female writer, born 1692. Her father was coachman to cardinal Fleury. Her abilities were early seen and improved by bishop Huet, and she in consequence excelled as a writer of history and of romances. She wrote for her support, and therefore wrote much, yet though often in want, her character was charitable, virtuous and benevolent. She died 1753, aged 75. Her works are very numerous. The best known are Anecdotes of the Court of Philip Augustus, 6 vols. 12mo.—les Veillées de la Thésalie, 4 vols.

LUTHER, Martin, D.D. the celebrated reformer, was born at Isleben in Saxony, 10th Nov. 1483. His parents wished him to devote himself to the labors of the bar, but an extraordinary accident diverted his purpose. As he walked one day in the fields with a fellow student he was struck down by lightning, and his companion killed by his side, and this had such effect upon his mind that without consulting his friends he retired from the world, into the order of the Augustines. In this seclusion he found by accident a Latin bible, which he never before had seen, and in perusing it he was astonished at the little knowledge of scripture and of christianity which the clergy then imparted to the people. From the convent of Erfurt he was removed to Wittenberg university, and here he read lectures on philosophy for three years to numerous and applauding audiences. The completion of St. Peter's church at Rome at this time required extraordinary sums, and the pope, Leo X. to fill his coffers with greater facility, published general indulgences for the forgiveness of sins to such as would contribute to the pious work. The dominicans were intrusted with the selling of these indulgences in Germany, and in paying their money the good friar Tetzel informed the superstitious people that they might release themselves not only from past, but also future sins. This pious imposition did not escape the discerning eye of Luther, he published in 1517 a thesis, containing 95 propositions on indulgences, and challenged opposition. Tetzel was not silent on the occasion, but while he with the voice of authority called his opponent a damnable heretic, and whilst he burnt the thesis with all possible ignominy, Luther asserted boldly the inefficacy of indulgences, and regarded penitence and works of mercy and charity alone capable of forming a reconciliation with heaven. Though attacked by numbers, Luther had the satisfaction to see his sentiments embraced with eagerness by the body of the people; and when summoned by the pope to appear at Rome to answer for his conduct, he had the firmness to refuse, though he at the same time in the most submissive manner exculpated himself, and deprecated the resentment of the supreme pontiff. Maximilian the emperor was anxious to support the cause of Rome, but Luther happily found a protector and friend in the elector of Saxony, and upon an assurance of personal safety he did not refuse to appear at Augsburg before the papal legate Cajetan. The conference ended by the refusal of Luther to submit implicitly to the pleasure of the papal see. The pope, however, finding that violence could not destroy the obstinacy of Luther, had recourse to milder means, and his agent Miltitius was employed to visit the reformer, to argue with him, and to offer terms of reconciliation. Luther was struck with the civilities and the temper of the papal missionary, but instead of making submission he was roused to greater opposition by the exhortations of the Bohemians, and the able support of Melancthon, Carolostadius, and other learned men. In 1519 he was engaged in a personal controversy at Leipsic with Ecclus, divinity professor at Ingolstadt, but it tended only to sow greater enmity and deeper variance between the disputants. The same year his book against indulgences was censured by the divines of Louvaine and Cologne, but Luther disregarded their opinions, and appealed for protection to the new emperor Charles V. Though he had written, at the suggestion of Miltitius a letter to the pope, not indeed of submission, but rather of exculpation, in language bold and energetic, he was in 1520 formally condemned by a bull from Rome, which after enumerating 41 of his heretical opinions, denounces against him the vengeance of the church, and excommunication, if within sixty days he did not make a due submission. This violent conduct Luther answered by "the captivity of Babylon," a book in which he inveighed bitterly against the abuses of Rome, and then calling the students of Wittenberg together he flung into the fire the offensive decree which he called the execrable bull of antichrist. In 1521 he was summoned to appear before the emperor at the diet of Worms, with a promise of protection, and though his friends dissuaded him and told him that as his opponents had burned his writings, so they would treat him, after the manner of Huss, he declared with fearless voice, If I knew there were as many devils at Worms, as tiles on the houses, I would go. At Worms he was required by Ecclus to retract his opinions, but he declared that except what he advanced could be proved contrary to scripture he neither could nor would recant. His obstinacy proved offensive to the Emperor, but as he had promised him his protection he permitted him to depart. Charles nevertheless published his edict against him and his adherents, and placed him under the ban of the empire. Luther, however, remained secure under the protection of the elector, who had thus effected his deliverance, and in the castle of Wittenberg which he denominated his hermitage and his Patmos, he held a secret correspondence with his friends, or composed books in defence of his opinions. At the end of ten months, when the emperor was departed for Flanders he again appeared publicly at Wittenberg, and had the satisfaction to find that instead of being checked, his doctrines had gained ground, and were universally embraced through Germany. In 1522 he published in conjunction with Melancthon, a Latin translation of the New Testament, and the work was read with avidity by the German nation. In 1524 he had to contend with Erasmus, a man who had apparently adopted his sentiments, though he had not the manliness to acknowledge them, and he now found in him an able antagonist enlisted in defence of the pope. In 1524 Luther threw aside the monastic habit, and the next year he married Catherine de Bore, a nun who had escaped from a convent; and though he was ridiculed by his enemies, and censured as incontinent for taking a young wife of 26, when he himself had reached his 42d year, he defended his conduct by scriptural texts, and again set at nought the authority of Rome and the cavils of her advocates. In 1525 the emperor called a diet at Spire, in consequence of the war with the Turks, as well as the troubled state of Germany in consequence of religious disputes, and in the sitting of the next year he proposed that the edict of Worms should be duly enforced, the catholic religion supported, and heretics punished. The new doctrines though thus openly attacked by the head of the empire were ably defended by the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, the prince of Anhalt, and others; and in another diet held again at Spire, these dissentient princes protested against the measures of the empire, and were consequently called protestants. In the midst of the confusion of Germany, a confession of faith was drawn up by Melancthon, the mildest and most moderate of Luther's followers, and as it was presented to the emperor at Augsburg, it has been called the Augsburg confession. Thus the opposition raised against the mighty empire of spiritual Rome by an obscure monk, was supported by intelligent princes and powerful nations, and Luther, now regarded as the champion of the faith through Germany, had nothing to apprehend from his persecutors, but had only to labor earnestly to confirm what had been so happily established. His German translation of the bible appeared in 1535, and was received with grateful raptures by the Germans. He died at Isleben, 18th Feb. 1546, aged 63. This illustrious man, engaged, as Atterbury has observed, against the united forces of the papal world, stood the shock with bravery and success. He was a man of high endowments of mind, and great virtues, he had a vast understanding, which raised him to a pitch of learning unknown in the age in which he lived. His works collected after his death appeared at Wittenberg, in 7 vols. fol.

LUTTI, Benedetto, an Italian painter, born at Florence 1666. He studied at Rome, and acquired such celebrity that the emperor knighted him, and the elector of Mentz sent him a cross set with diamonds. He was slow in his work, but his touch was tender and delicate, and his pieces exhibited harmony and correctness in the highest degree. The best of his paintings is his miracle of St. Pio, in the Albani palace at Rome. His Magdalen, at Naples, his Isaiah, and his Anthony of Padua, at Rome, are also much admired. He died at Rome 1724, aged 58, of chagrin, in consequence of a dispute about finishing a picture of Eusebius bishop of Vercelli, for the people of Turin.

LUXEMBOURG, Francis Henry de Montmorency, duke of, a famous general and marshal of France, the posthumous son of Montmorency count of Bouteville, who was beheaded for fighting a duel, under Louis XIII. He was, though but 15, at the battle of Rocroi, 1643, under the famous Condé, whose fortunes he followed, and whose genius, abilities, coolness and ardor he seemed to possess. He distinguished himself at the conquest of Franche Comté, 1668, and in the Dutch campaigns of 1672, and completed the expedition by a bold and unprecedented retreat with 20,000 men, in face of an army of 70,000. In 1675 he was raised to the dignity of marshal, and in the war against the allied powers, again rendered his name illustrious by the battle of Fleurus, over prince Waldeck, 1690. In 1691 he gained the battles of Leusen, Steinkirk, and Nerwinde, and continued to distinguish himself in the field, though opposed by William III. He performed another famous retreat to Tournay, 1694, and died the next year, aged 67.

LUZERNE, chevalier Cesar Anne De La, minister from France to the United States, succeeded M. Gerard, having been previously employed in a diplomatic capacity in Bavaria. He arrived at Philadelphia Sept. 21, 1779, from which time till the end of the war, he continued in his office, having the esteem and confidence of the American people. After five years he was succeeded by M. Barbe Marbois the secretary of legation, as Chargé d'affaires. From Jan. 1788 Luzerne was ambassador at London till his death Sept. 14, 1791, at the age of 50. His correspondence in regard to America is published in the 10th and 11th vols. of Diplomatic corr. edited by Jared Sparks.

LUYTS, John, a native of North Holland, professor of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht, where he died 1721, aged 66. His works are Astronomica Institutio, 4to. in which he refused to admit the Copernican System—Introductio ad Geographiam Novam & Veterem, 4to.

LYCOPHRON, son of Periander of Corinth, B. C. 628, resented the fate of his mother Melissa, who had been cruelly put to death by his father, and he refused to speak to him. The father afterwards wished to be reconciled to his son, whom he had banished into Coryra, and offered to resign his crown to him; but the Coryreans afraid of changing masters murdered the young prince.

LYCURGUS, a celebrated lawgiver of Sparta. He refused to take possession of the kingdom, at the invitation of his sister-in-law, and preferred the character of a faithful guardian to his nephew the young king. During the popular tumults which agitated his country where the monarchs and the people each aspired to unlimited power, he was called upon by the general voice to establish a system of laws to restrain the violence of each order of the state. After the institution of his salutary but severe laws, Lycurgus retired from Sparta, and is supposed to have died in Crete in a good old age, B.C. 570.

LYDGATE, John, an Augustine monk of St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, in the reign of Henry VI. He was the disciple of Chaucer, whom he excelled, according to some, in the graces of versification. He travelled abroad, and died 1440, aged 60, and was buried in his convent, Bury. He was also a philosopher and divine; but he is chiefly known as a poet, and his eclogues, odes, satires, &c. are said to possess merit, and to have been written in such smooth style that his wit as his contemporaries observed, was fashioned by the muses.

LYDIAT, Thomas, an English chronologer, born at Okerton, Oxfordshire, 1572, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1591. He devoted himself early to literature, and was cosmographer and chronologer to Henry, son of James I. and in 1609, went to Ireland, and was two years at the college of Dublin, under the patronage of Usher. On his return to England, he accepted, in 1612, the rectory of Okerton, which some years before he had refused in consequence of his difficulty of utterance. His engagement to pay the debts of a near relation brought him afterwards into great difficulties, and he was for some time imprisoned at Oxford, and in the king's bench, till liberated by the contributions of his friends. He petitioned the king to be permitted to travel into Turkey, Ethiopia, and Abyssinia, in search of MSS. but was unsuccessful; and in the civil wars which desolated the country, he was a severe sufferer for his loyalty. He died very poor, 3d April 1646. He was an able scholar and deservedly esteemed by the learned of the times. He wrote de Variis Annorum Formis, 1605, 8vo. which he afterwards defended against Scaliger and Clavius—On the Origin of Fountains, 8vo. and Various treatises on philosophical and astronomical subjects.

LYE, Edward, a learned linguist, born at Totness, Devonshire, 1704, and educated under his father, and afterwards at Hart-hall, Oxford. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, and published the Etymologicum Anglicanum of Francis Junius from the MS. in the Bodleian. He afterwards employed himself in the compilation of his great work, the Anglo Saxon and Gothic Dictionary, which received the finishing hand of its author before his death; but was published in 1772, by the Rev. Owen Manning, 2 vols. folio, with a grammar of the two languages. Lye was in 1750, persecuted by lord Northampton, to the living of Yardley Hastings, where he died 1767.

LYMAN, Phineas, major-general, was a native of Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college 1738. He was a tutor in the college three years, and afterwards settled in Suffield as a lawyer. He sustained various public offices. In 1755 he was appointed major general, and commander in chief of the Connecticut forces. When sir W. Johnson was wounded in the battle of lake George, the command devolved on him, and he animated his men to a successful combat. For five hours, in front of the breast work he issued his orders with the utmost coolness. Yet Johnson, who was in every respect his inferior, in his mean jealousy, gave him no praise; he wished to bear away the honor himself; he was in fact made a baronet for this battle, and received 5,000*l.* In 1758 Lyman served with Abercrombie, and was with lord Howe, when he was killed. He was also at the capture of Crown Point by Amherst, and at the surrender of Montreal. In 1762 he commanded the provincial troops in the expedition against Havana. His services were important, and he acquired a high reputation. In 1763 he went to England as the agent of a company, called the "Military Adventurers." The company had purchased of the six nations of Indians, under the authority of Connecticut, a tract of land on the Susquehanna river. The proprietors of Pennsylvania claimed the same tract, the government of Connecticut recommended to the company to obtain a confirmation from the king. This was the object of Lyman's mission. He accomplished nothing, and in 1774 his wife sent her second son to England, to request him to come home. He returned to America, and in 1775 embarked with his eldest son for the Mississippi, and soon after died in Florida.

LYMAN, Joseph, D.D., minister of Hatfield Massachusetts, graduated at Yale college 1769, where he was a tutor the two following years. Soon afterwards he was ordained at Hatfield; and died in consequence of a cancerous humor, which afflicted him nearly two years, March 27, 1829, aged 78. He was an original member of the American foreign mission society, and in 1823, and several subsequent years, was its president. He published election sermon, 1787; two occasional sermons, 1804; at the ordination of H. Lord, 1804; at the convention, 1806; at the opening of the bridge, 1807; at Charlestown, 1811; on the death of S. Hopkins, 1811; two sermons on the overthrow of the French army in Russia, 1813; the foreign mission sermon, 1819.

LYMAN, William, brig. general, consul of the United States at London, was a native of Northampton, Mass. and graduated at Yale college in 1776. For some years he was a member of congress from Hampshire county, then residing at Northampton. He went in 1805 as consul to London, where he died, 1811, aged 53.

LYNDE, sir Humphrey, an English writer, born in Dorsetshire 1579. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford. In 1613 he was knighted by James I. and was member of the house of commons in several parliaments. He died 14th June, 1636, and was buried in Cobham church, Surrey. He wrote various books against popery, the best known of which is "Via Tuta," often reprinted, and translated into Dutch, French, and Latin.

LYNDE, Benjamin, chief justice of Massachusetts, was born at Boston in 1666, graduated at Harvard college in 1686; and studied law at the Temple. He was appointed a judge in 1712, and chief justice in 1729. From 1723 to 1737 he was a member of the council. He died March 28, 1745, aged 79.

LYNDE, Benjamin, chief justice of Massachusetts, son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1718; from 1737 he was for many years a member of the council. At the trial of capt. Preston in 1770 he presided in court. He resigned the office of chief justice in 1772.

LYNDON, Josias, governor of Rhode Island in 1768, died in 1778, aged 74. He was a member of the baptist society in Providence, to which he bequeathed his house and other property.

LYNCH, Thomas, a patriot of the American revolution, was a native of South-Carolina. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, England; and afterwards studied law in the Temple. In 1772 he returned to America. In 1775 he commanded a company in the first S. Carolina regiment. Being chosen to succeed his father, then in ill health, as a member of congress, he signed in 1776 the declaration of independence. He set out on his return, with his father, who died at Annapolis. His own ill health constrained him, at the close of 1779, to embark with his wife in a ship, commanded by Captain Morgan; but nothing was ever afterwards known concerning the vessel.

LYON, Richard, a poet, came early to America. In 1649 he was a private tutor to a young English student at Cambridge, and lived with president Dunster; he was a preacher. After Eliot's "Bay Psalms" were published, when it was deemed necessary to revise them, Mr. Lyon was appointed to this service with president Dunster. Many passages from other parts of the Bible, called the spiritual songs of the Old and New Testament are inserted. The 20th edition was published in 1722.

LYONNET, Peter, a native of Maestricht, born 22d July, 1707. He possessed great abilities, and was not only acquainted with nine languages, but well skilled in music, in painting, in sculpture and engraving. He quitted the study of divinity for the law, and was appointed secretary to the States of Holland, and also interpreter for the French and Latin languages. He afterwards turned his attention to natural history, and examined the insects in the neighborhood of the Hague, and made a collection of curious shells. His abilities and reputation procured him admission to the learned academies of London, Rouen, Berlin, Vienna and Petersburg. After a life devoted to science, this learned man, equally respectable in private life, died at the Hague 10th Jan. 1789, aged 81. He wrote Observations on Insects, and Theologie des Insectes.

LYONS, Israel, son of a polish Jew, who was a silversmith, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge, was born at Cambridge 1739. He early displayed great abilities, and distinguished himself as a mathematician and botanist. In 1753 he published a treatise on Fluxions, inscribed to his friend and patron, Dr. Smith, master of Trinity college, and in 1763, appeared his Fasciculus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam Nascentium, 8vo. About 1762 he read lectures on botany, at Oxford, at the request of Mr. Banks, and afterwards received a salary of 100*l.* per ann. for calculating the Nautical almanack. In 1773 he was sent by the board of longitude with captain Phipps, now lord Mulgrave, to the north pole, and after his return he married, but died about 1775, of the measles. His father was the author of a Hebrew Grammar—and of observations and Enquiries on Various parts of Scripture History, 1761.

LYSANDER, a famous Spartan general, who made an alliance with Cyrus the younger, and defeated the Athenian fleet at the battle of Ægospotamos, which put an end to the Peloponnesian war, after a duration of 27 years. He aimed at the sovereignty at home and became unpopular. He fell in battle at Haliartus, B. C. 396.

LYSONS, Daniel, gentleman commoner of Magdalen college, Oxford, became fellow of All-Souls, and took his degree of L.L.B. 1755, and that of doctor four years after. He afterwards studied medicine and took his doctor's degree 1764. He settled at Gloucester, and afterwards went to Bath, where he acquired considerable eminence, and where he died 1800. He was author of an Essay on the Effects of Camphor and Calomel in Fevers, 8vo.—Practical Essays on Intermitting Fevers, Dropsies, Diseases of the Liver, Epilepsies, Cholice, Dysenteric Fluxes, and the operation of Calomel, Svo.—Further Considerations on Camphor and Calomel, 8vo.

LYSONS, Samuel, an antiquary, was the son of a clergyman, and born at Rodnarton, in Gloucestershire, in 1763. He was educated at Bath, and afterwards entered as a student of the Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar. On the death of Mr. Astle, he was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower. He died April 10th, 1819. His works are—1. The Antiquities of Gloucestershire, fol. 2. The Roman Remains discovered by him at Woodchester. 3. Collection of Roman Remains. 4. Magna Brittanua; in conjunction with his brother.

LYTE, Henry, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford. He travelled abroad to improve his knowledge of botany, and at his return he settled on his estate and established one of the most valuable and best arranged gardens of botany in England. He was author of a translation of Dodoen's Herbage, Antwerp, 4to. 1578, with additions and figures, afterwards reprinted in England, but without plates. He died 1607, aged 78. His son formed a genealogy for James I. with which the king was so pleased that he presented him his picture set with diamonds.

LYTTELTON, George lord, an able writer, eldest son of sir Thomas Lyttelton, of Hagley, Worcestershire, was born 1609. He was educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a polite scholar and a good poet. In 1723 he began his travels, and visited Italy and France. On his return home he obtained a seat in Parliament, and became a popular opponent of sir Robert Walpole. In 1737 he was made secretary to the prince of Wales, who now extended his patronage to opposition, and by his means the heir apparent acquired popularity in his protection of Pope, Mallet, Thomson, and other learned men. In 1744, on the fall of Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the treasury, in 1754 was appointed cofferer and privy counsellor, and the next year chancellor of the exchequer, a responsible situation for which his abilities were not fully calculated. In 1757, when his friends were turned out of power, he was raised to the peerage, and thus retired from political turbulence. In his honorable retirement his time was usefully employed. In 1764, he published his elaborate History of Henry II. which had engaged his attention for 20 years. The work was begun 1755; 3 vols. appeared 1764, a second edition 1767, a third next year, and the conclusion 1771. Lyttelton in the former part of life had been a skeptic, but his mature age viewed with concern the levities and dangerous tenets of dissolute companions, and after a studious application, he produced in 1747, Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul, a valuable book, which infidelity will never be able to answer. His father whom he succeeded in 1751, read the book, and in the overflowings of a pious heart called down for blessings on his head, and thanking God that he had given him so good a son, prayed that he might but be found worthy to be eye witness of that happiness no doubt reserved for so able an advocate for christianity. His lordship died Aug. 22d, 1773, aged 64. On his death bed he displayed all the calmness and resignation of a great mind. He again reminded his physician, Dr. Johnson, that he died a sincere christian, and with composure giving his blessings to those around him, he told lord Valentia, who with his lady was at his bedside, with a voice of solemn affection, "be good, be virtuous, my lord, you must come to this." This great and worthy peer wrote besides, "Dialogues of the dead," and Persian Letters—poems.

LYTTELTON, Thomas, lord, son of the preceding, was remarkable for his dissipated conduct, which unhappily obscured his great powers of mind. His death, which happened in 1779, when he was 25 years old, is said to have been very extraordinary. He supposed that he saw in a dream a vision of a young woman dressed in white, who told him that his dissolution would take place in three days. The third day arrived, and his lordship engaged in a convivial party of friends, observed jocularly that he thought he should jockey the ghost, a few minutes after which he was seized with a sudden faintness, and being removed to his bed, never rose again.

LYTTELTON, Charles, L.L.D. an English prelate, third son of sir Thomas, and brother to George lord Lyttelton. He was educated at Eton and University college, and afterwards went to the Inner Temple, where he became a barrister. He soon, however, relinquished law for divinity, and was collated to Alvechurch rectory, Worcestershire, by bishop Hough. In 1747 became king's chaplain, the next dean of Exeter, and in 1762 he was raised to the see of Carlisle. In 1765 he succeeded lord Willoughby of Parham as president of the Antiquarian society, to whose learned memoirs he made some valuable contributions, and whose useful labors in historical research he in some degree rewarded by the bequest of choice printed books and of MSS. This good man, much respected in private life, and deservedly praised by his learned successor dean Miles, died 22d Dec. 1768.

M.

MABILLON, John, a learned Frenchman, born 23d Nov. 1632, at Pierre-mont on the frontiers of Champagne. He was educated at Rheims, and took the Benedictine habit at St. Remi, 1653. He was for one year employed in showing to the public the treasures and the monuments of the king of France at St. Dennis, and afterwards assisted father d' Acheri, in the completion of his "Spicilegium." He next was engaged by the congregation of St. Maur in publishing the works of St. Bernard which appeared in 1667, 2 vols. fol. and nine 8vo. and afterwards he undertook an edition of the "Acta Sanctorum" of the Benedictine order, 9 vols. fol. a work which displayed great merit in learned notes and valuable disquisitions. In 1682 he went, by the direction of Colbert, into Burgundy, and the year following to Germany, to make researches about the history of the church, and of the French monarchy. Of this employment he published an interesting account. In 1685 he visited Italy in the same historical research, and enriched the king's library with above 3000 valuable and rare books, printed and in MS. This truly learned but very modest man, to whom, says Du Pin, it would be difficult to give all the praises he deserves, died 1707, of a suppression of urine. His other works were Analecta, 4 vols. 8vo.—de Re Diplomaticâ, 2 vols. folio, a most valuable work—Musæum Italicum, 2 vols. 4to.

MABLY, Bonnot de, a French ecclesiastic, born

1709 at Grenoble. He lived chiefly at Paris, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He died 1785 much respected. He wrote a Parallel between the Romans and the French, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Public Rights of Europe, 2 vols.—Entertainments of Phocion, 2 vols. a work which obtained a prize at Berne—Observations on the Greeks—on the Romans—on the History of France.—Discourses on History, translated into English.

MABOUL, James, a native of Paris, who distinguished himself as an eloquent preacher, and on account of his merit was raised to the see of Aeth, where he died 21st May, 1723. His Oraisons Funebres have been published in 12mo. and display his powers of oratory to great advantage.

MACARTNEY, George, earl, only son of George Macartney, of Auchinleck, in Scotland, was born in Ireland, 1737. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. He went in 1764 as envoy extraordinary to the empress of Russia, and three years after he was named ambassador extraordinary, and in 1766 he was made knight of the white eagle, by the king of Poland. In 1769 he was secretary to lord Townshend, in Ireland, in 1772, he was made knight of the bath, and three years after appointed governor of Grenada, Tobago, and their dependencies. On the capture of those islands by the French, in 1779, he was taken prisoner, and conveyed to France; but the next year he was nominated governor of fort St. George, and in 1785, declared governor general of Bengal, a high office, which he modestly declined, though he accepted from the company a pension of 1500*l.* per annum, in reward for his meritorious services. In 1792 he was selected as the ambassador extraordinary of Great-Britain to the emperor of China, and this mission, which engaged much of the attention of the world, was completed in about three years, but brought little advantage to the commercial interests of the country. Sir George sat in the English parliament in 1767, for Cokermonth, and in the Irish for Armagh, and again in the English for Ayr, 1774, and in 1776 he was created an Irish baron, and in 1792 advanced to the dignity of an earl. An interesting account of his embassy was published in 1797, in 3 vols. 4to. with plates, by sir George Staunton. For the distinction which he held in the world, lord Macartney was principally indebted to his connection with the family of lord Holland, though it must be acknowledged that he possessed virtues which qualified him for the most eminent situation in the service of his country.

MACAULAY, Catherine, a female historian, and political writer, daughter of John Sawbridge, esq. of Ollantigh, in Kent. In 1760 she married Dr. George Macaulay, a physician of some reputation, and after his death she took for her second husband, 1778, the Rev. Mr. Graham, brother to the celebrated empiric of that name. Her conduct was often romantic, so that in 1785 she passed over to America to become acquainted with the great Washington, who continued one of her regular correspondents. She died 23d June, 1791. She published the History of England from James I. to the Brunswick line, 3 vols. 8vo. once a popular work, but now acknowledged a virulent attack on the Stuarts, and sinking fast into oblivion—Remarks on Hobbes' Rudiments of Government, 8vo.—Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discounts, 1770—a Modest Plea for the Property of Copy Right, 8vo. 1774—History of England from the Revolution to the present Time, in a series of letters to Dr. Wilson, prebendary of Westminster, 8vo.—Address to the People of England—Letters on Education, 8vo.—Observations on Mr. Burke's Pamphlet on the French Revolution—a Treatise on the Immutability of Moral Truth, 8vo.

MACBETH, a tyrannical usurper of Scotland in the 11th century, who obtained the kingdom by the murder of his relation Duncan at Inverness. Banquo and Mac Gill shared the fate of their sovereign, and Mac Duff, another powerful baron, escaped only by flying into England: but his wife and children suffered all the vengeance of the tyrant, and were murdered. Macbeth afterwards retired into the Highlands upon the invasion of the English, headed by Malcolm, son of the murdered Duncan, and at last fell in battle by the hand of Mac Duff. His history is become very familiar and interesting to Englishmen, by the sublime delineations of Shakspeare's tragic muse.

MACBRIDE, David, a native of Ballymony, in Ireland, descended from an ancient Scotch family. He studied medicine at Glasgow, and for some years was employed as a surgeon in the navy. He settled in 1749, in Dublin, and acquired celebrity as a practitioner, and as a man of letters, and of general information. He turned his thoughts also to chemical and philosophical subjects, and regardless of private emolument, he nobly communicated to the public the result of his important discoveries. He published a valuable Treatise on the Sea Scurvy; and a Methodical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine, a work of singular merit; and he made some ingenious improvements in the mode of tanning leather. This respectable man, amiable in his private character, and deservedly beloved by his relatives and friends, fell a prey to a nervous fever, which proved fatal, Dec. 1788, in his 62d year.

MACCABEES, seven brothers, Jews, who were cruelly put to death one after the other, with their mother and the aged Eleazer, at Antioch, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, B. C. 168. There were chief men among the Jews of the same name who bravely supported the honor of their country. Their names were Judas, Simon, Matthias Maccabeus.

MACCLINTOCK, Samuel, D.D., minister of Greenland N. Hampshire, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at the college in New Jersey 1751. Being invited to become an assistant to William Allen of Greenland, he was ordained about the year 1757, and after a ministry of 47 years he died April 27, 1804, aged 71. He was an eminent divine. Though he had no predilection for the field of controversy; yet when forced into, he evinced himself a master of argument. An enemy to all civil and religious impositions, during the war he was repeatedly in the army in the character of a chaplain. His exhortations animated the soldiers to the conflict. As he was averse to parade, he directed his funeral to be attended in a simple manner. He published a sermon on the justice of God in the mortality of man, 1759; a sermon against the baptists, entitled, the artifices of deceivers detected, and Christians warned against them, 1770; Herodias, or cruelty and revenge the effects of unlawful pleasure, 1772; a sermon at the commencement of the new constitution, 1784; an epistolary correspondence between himself and J. C. Ogden, 1791; at the ordination of Jesse Appleton, 1797; a sermon, entitled the choice, occasioned by the drought, the fever, and the prospect of war, 1798; an oration commemorative of Washington 1800.

MACDIARMID, John, an ingenious writer, was born in 1779, at Weem, in the county of Perth, of which parish his father was minister. He was educated for the church, but relinquished that pursuit; and, on coming to London, became editor of the St. James' Chronicle. In 1803 he published "An Inquiry into the System of Military Defence," 2 vols. 8vo.; which was followed by "An Inquiry into the Nature of Civil and Military Subordination." His last work was entitled "Lives of British Statesmen," 4to. He died in 1808.

MACE, Francis, a writer of the Sorbonne, who died at Paris 1721. His best works are Chronological Abridgment of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. 4to.—a Moral History, called Melania—the History of the four Ciceros, 12mo. a curious work—an analysis of St. Augustine's works.

MACEDO, Francis, a jesuit born at Coimbra, in Portugal, 1596. He quitted his order for that of the Cordeliers, and went in the employment of his patron, the duke of Braganza, to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Alexander VII. After being promoted to offices of trust and importance he fell out with the pope and retired to Venice, and afterwards became professor of moral philosophy at Padua. By his interference in the state affairs of Venice, he offended the magistrates, and was thrown into prison, where he died 1681, aged 85. It is said in the "Bibliothèque Portugaise" that he published 109 different works, most of which are now forgotten. He possessed abilities and a very great memory, as he boasts somewhere that he had written or pronounced 150,000 verses extemporaneously. His brother Anthony was also a jesuit, in the confidence of Christina queen of Sweden, as to him were intrusted her intentions of renouncing the protestant faith. Among other things he wrote Lusitania Insulata & Purpurata, 4to.

MACEDONIUS, Arian, bishop of Constantino-ple in 341, in opposition to Paul. He was deposed by a council 359, after causing great troubles in his diocese by his ambition as well as his opinions. In consequence of his disgrace he became the founder of a new sect which supported that the Holy Ghost was a mere creature, only a little superior to the angels.

MACFARLANE, Henry, a Scotch writer, educated at Edinburgh. He came to London early in life, and acquired some celebrity as an accurate reporter of the parliamentary speeches. He was afterwards engaged in the care of a school at Walthamstow, and died 1804. He wrote a History of the Reign of George III. in 4 vols. 8vo. and also published a Translation of Ossian's Poems into Latin.

MACHAM, Robert, an Englishman, in the age of Edward III. It is said that he eloped for France with his mistress Anne Dorset, a lady of quality, against the consent of her parents, and that the ship in which they were, long driven out by unfavorable winds, stopped at an island, which was called Madeira. The crew escaped to the coast of Morocco, where in a state of slavery they related their adventures to Morales, a Spaniard, and after his return to Europe, ships were sent to the newly discovered island, where the remains of the unfortunate Macham and his mistress were found buried at the foot of a tree.

MACHAULT, John de, a jesuit, rector of the jesuits' college, at Rouen, and afterwards of that of Clermont at Paris. He died 1619, aged 58. He wrote Latin notes on the History of Thuanus, which were pronounced seditious, and burned by the hands of the hangman. Two other jesuits bore his name, and were able writers, John Baptist, who died 1640, and James, who died 1680, and was author of de Missionibus Paraguaviæ & Americæ—de Rebus Japonicis—de Provinciis Goannæ—de Regno Cochinchinæ—de Missione Religiosorum.

MACHET, Gerard, a native of Blois, distinguished as an ecclesiastic. He became principal of the college of Navarre, confessor to Charles VII. and bishop of Castres. He died at Tours 1448, aged 68. He was one of those who revised the trial of the maid of Orleans, and declared in favor of that unfortunate heroine.

MACHIAVEL, Nicholas, a celebrated writer, born of a noble family at Florence 1469. His first efforts were a comedy called Nicias, which proved so popular on account of its satire at Florence, that Leo X. sent for the actors to exhibit it to a Roman audience. Machiavel acquired, however, greater fame by his political writings. By the influence of the Medicis, and to recompense the sufferings which he endured on the rack on suspicion of conspiracy with the Soderini, against Julius, afterwards Clement VII. he was made secretary and historiographer to the republic of Florence. He died in 1530, of a medicine which he had taken by way of prevention. The latter part of his life, it is said was spent in poverty in the character of a profane scoffer and atheist. He declared, it is said, that he would rather be sent into hell after death, than to paradise, because he should find nothing in heaven but beggars, poor monks, hermits, and apostles; but in hell he should live with popes, cardinals, kings, and princes. Besides Nicias, he wrote Mandragola and Clitia, two plays—the Golden Ass, in imitation of Apuleius and Lucian—a History of Florence, 4to.—a Discourse on the first Decate of Livy—a Treatise on the Military Art—the Life of Castruccio Castracani—a Treatise on the Emigration of the Northern Nations,—but of all his works his treatise called "the Prince" is the most famous. This book, which describes the arts of government, as usually exercised by wicked governors and by tyrants, is still a cause of dispute, and while some suppose that he merely exposed the arts of politicians to excite abhorrence of tyranny, and a love for genuine liberty, others imagine that he prescribed rules for governing, and the only method by which mankind could be managed, so that Machiavelism and tyranny are synonymous expressions. It is remarkable, however, that among those who commend him, he has Bacon, Clarendon, and Harrington, who consider him as an able and ingenious writer, and an enemy to tyranny and injustice, and as frankly warning us against what men do, that we may be the better able to guard against their insidious conduct. The book, first published 1515, and long patronised by popes and great men, to whom it was dedicated, was at last censured under the pontificate of Clement VIII. by the insinuations of the jesuit Possevin, and of Bozius.

MACKENZIE, sir George, a Scotch advocate of eminence, born at Dundee, 1636, and educated at the universities of St. Andrew's and Aberdeen. He travelled abroad, and studied at Bourges; and in 1656, was called to the bar, where he soon acquired celebrity. In 1661, he was reprimanded by the court for dropping some unwary expressions while defending the cause of the marquis of Argyll, impeached for high treason, upon which he quickly and smartly replied that, "it was impossible to plead for a traitor without speaking treason." He was afterwards made a judge in the criminal court, king's advocate in 1674, and one of the lords of the privy council for Scotland. On the abrogation of the penal laws by James II. sir George resigned his office, but was soon after reinstated by the king. At the revolution, however, he again quitted his situation, and unable to approve public measures, he retired to Oxford, 1689, where he proposed to end his days in literary ease and tranquillity. He died in London, May 2d, 1691, and was carried to Edinburgh, where he was buried with great pomp and solemnity. As a writer sir George was very respectable. He wrote, Aretino, a serious romance—Religio Stoici—Moral Essays,—a Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Race of Scotland—Cælia's Country House and Closet, a poem—some pieces on the Laws of Scotland. Though censured by Burnet as a superficial man, and though blamed by some as a severe judge, sir George is represented by Wood, as a man of great abilities, of unshaken integrity, the friend of his country, and of religion, and virtue. He founded the advocates' library in Edinburgh.

MACKENZIE, Henry, an elegant miscellaneous writer, who has been called the Addison of the North, was born, in 1745 or 1746, in Scotland; received a liberal education; and, in 1766, became an attorney in the Scottish Court of Exchequer. He was, subsequently, made controller general of taxes for Scotland. Mackenzie's first production was the Man of Feeling, which was published in 1771, and soon acquired unbounded popularity. It was succeeded by The Man of The World, and Julia de Roubigné. In dramatic writing he was less happy. His tragedies of The Prince of Tunis, and The Shipwreck, and his comedies of The Force of Fashion, and The White Hypocrite, though containing many beauties, were only brought upon the stage to die. To the Mirror, the Lounger, and the Transactions of the Edinburgh Royal Society, he contributed several valuable papers. He died, at Edinburgh, January 14, 1831. The style of Mackenzie is polished and melodious, and his power of exciting the feelings, by scenes of pathos, is of the very highest order.

MACKINTOSH, Sir James, was born October 24, 1765, at Alldowrie in the county of Inverness, Scotland, and was educated at King's college, Aberdeen, where he had for a fellow student the celebrated Robert Hall, with whom he formed an intimate friendship, which continued through life. After leaving Aberdeen, he repaired to Edinburgh as a medical student, and took his doctor's degree in 1787. His attention, however, was diverted from his professional studies to the science of politics; and in 1791, he suddenly acquired celebrity as the antagonist of Burke, in "Vindiciae Gallicæ," or a Defence of the French Revolution, and its English Admirers, against the Accusations of the Rt. Hon. Edmund Burke; including some Strictures on the late Production of Monsieur de Calonne," an octavo volume of 379 pages, an able and eloquent production, which passed through three editions within a few months, and procured him the acquaintance of some of the leaders of the whig party. He afterwards applied himself to the profession of law. In 1803, he was appointed Recorder of Bombay; resided in India till November, 1811; and first became a member of parliament in 1813. He was a distinguished contributor to the Edinburgh and Monthly Reviews, possessed great merit as a speaker and writer, and was highly esteemed for his private and social virtues. He died May 30, 1832.

MACKLIN, Charles, a dramatic writer, and comedian, born in the north of Ireland, May, 1690. He altered his name of Mac Laughlin to the more agreeable sound of Macklin; and after various adventures in Ireland, appeared on the Lincoln's inn theatre 1725, as Alcander in Edipus. Nature, it seems, had been unfriendly to the actor, as Quin, with his usual humor, observed at the sight of his harsh forbidding features, "if God writes a legible hand, that fellow is a villain." He was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with a fellow comedian, whom he killed in the heat of passion, for which he was tried, and found guilty of manslaughter. He became by degrees a popular actor; but his chief character was Shylock. Macklin long a favorite with the public, at last retired from the stage; but to improve a little more his narrow income, and to take a last farewell of the public, he was prevailed upon to appear once more, for his benefit, 10th January, 1790, at Covent-Garden. The character was his favorite Shylock, but the efforts required were too great for the powers of an exhausted old man. He found his memory fail him, and unable to support his part, he retired amid the plaudits of a commiserating audience. He died in a very great age, 11th July, 1797. He is author of two comedies, Love-a-la-Mode, and the Man of the World, which are still favorites with the town, but which reflect with severity upon the conduct of courtiers, and particularly of Scotch sycophants. In his best days he was a tender husband, a good father a steady friend; and, while his memory remained, a most interesting companion.

MACKNIGHT, James, D.D., a Scotch divine, was born, in 1721, at Irvine, in Argyleshire; studied at Glasgow and Leyden; and, after having held the livings of Maybole and Jedburgh, was, for thirty years, one of the ministers of Edinburgh. He died in 1800. He published A Harmony of the Four Gospels; The Truth of the Gospel History; and a Translation, with Commentaries and Notes, of all the Apostolical Epistles.

MACLAINE, Archibald, an able divine, born at Monaghan, where his father was a dissenting minister. He was intended for his father's profession, and was therefore sent to Glasgow university, after which he went to Holland, as assistant Minister to his uncle Milling, the pastor of the English church at the Hague. He continued the zealous and active pastor of his church, till the troubles of 1796, when he came over to England, and retired to Bath, where he died, 1804. He is known not only as an exemplary and pious minister, but as the intelligent author of Letters to Soame Jenyns, on his View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity. He also published some sermons, and gave to the public a valuable translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History.

MACLAURIN, Colin, an able mathematician and philosopher, born at Kilmoddan, in Scotland, Feb. 1693. He was educated at Glasgow, where he early distinguished himself by his genius, and by his great application; and in 1717, he honorably obtained the professorship of mathematics in the Mareschal college of Aberdeen. In 1719, he went to London, where he became acquainted with the great literary characters of the age, bishop Hoadly, Newton, Clarke, and sir Martin Folkes; and in 1722, he went abroad, as tutor to the eldest son of lord Polwarth. On the death of his pupil at Montpellier, he returned to his professorship at Aberdeen, and was soon after, by the interest of his friends, and the recommendation of sir Isaac Newton, elected assistant professor of mathematics in Edinburgh, to James Gregory, whose infirmities rendered him incapable of lecturing. In 1745, he was very active in fortifying Edinburgh against the rebels, and this rendered him, for some time, unpopular, so that he fled to England, and found an honorable asylum with Herring, archbishop of York. The fatigues, the troubles, and uneasiness which he had endured, however, proved too strong for his delicate constitution, and laid the foundation of a dropsy in the abdomen, of which he died 14th June 1746, aged 48. The best known of his works are, System of Fluxions, 2 vols. 4to. 1742—Geometria Organica, or the Percussion of Bodies, which obtained the prize of the Royal academy of sciences, 1724—a treatise of Algebra—an Account of sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries, 4to. and 8vo.—and various valuable communications, published in the philosophical transactions. His abilities were very great and universal, and in the perfecting of machines, the working of mines, the improving of manufactures, and in hydraulic experiments, and in all public works of utility and science, he was ever willing to lend his ingenious and powerful assistance.

MACNAB, Henry Grey, physician in ordinary to the duke of Kent, was born about 1762. He became professor of rhetoric at the University of Glasgow. On the sudden occurrence of hostilities after the peace of Amiens, happening to be in France he was detained as a hostage, and he remained there till the Restoration. Being habituated to the manners of the country, he returned and fixed his residence at Paris, where he died in 1823. He was the author of a "Synopsis of a course of Lectures on Elocution," 1787, 8vo.; "An Impartial Examination of the New Views of Mr. Robert Owen," which was translated into French; and various political tracts.

MACPHERSON, James, a Scotch writer, born in 1738. He first claimed general notice 1762, by the publication of some poems, attributed to Ossian, the son of Fingal, which, though beautiful and deservedly admired, soon excited a violent controversy about their authenticity. Dr. Johnson, with forcible arguments, attacked them, and when censured in an angry and menacing letter by Macpherson, he returned that celebrated reply preserved by Boswell. The poems, however, were ably defended by Dr. Hugh Blair, and though for some time it appeared rather a national question, in favor of Scotland, Mr. Whitaker, among the English writers, has warmly espoused the cause of their authenticity. In 1773 Macpherson published a translation of the Iliad, in heroic prose, which is no longer held in esteem. His introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, appeared in 1771, and his History of Great Britain, from the Restoration to the Accession of the house of Hanover, was published 1773, in 2 vols. 4to. In 1775 he supported the measures of lord North, by his "Rights of Great Britain over her Colonies asserted," and was rewarded by the minister with a seat in the House of Commons in 1780, and the lucrative office of agent to the nabob of Arcot. He died in Scotland, 17th Feb. 1796, and was buried in Westminster-abbey.

MACPHERSON, sir John, bart. governor general of India, was born in the Isle of Sky, about the year 1767, and was educated at Aberdeen. He embarked in the service of the East India company, and signalized himself at the capture of Mongalon. In 1781, he was appointed a member of the supreme council of Bengal, and in 1785, the charge of the office of governor-general of India was devolved on him as the senior member of that body, and he discharged its duties two years. He spent the latter part of his life in England, and died Jan. 12, 1821.

MACQUER, Philip, a French lawyer, descended from a Scotch family, who followed the fortunes of the house of Stuart. He wrote an abridgment of Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. 8vo.—Roman Annals, 8vo.—Abridgment of the History of Spain and Portugal, 2 vols. 8vo. all after the manner of Henault. He died at Paris, 27th Jan. 1770, aged 50.

MACQUER, Peter Joseph, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, 9th Oct. 1718, and was made professor of physic in the royal gardens, and member of the academy of sciences. He published, Elements of Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical, 3 vols.—a Dictionary of Chemistry, 2 vols.—Formulae Medicament Magistral—and other works, and died at Paris, 16th Feb. 1784.

MACRIANUS, Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian, who, from a private soldier, became a general; and on the captivity of Valerian, declared himself emperor, 258. He was defeated and put to death by Callienus, 262.

MACRINUS, Marcus Opilius Severus, an African, who rose from the obscurest situation to the dignity of emperor on the death of Caracalla, 217. He was put to death by his soldiers, 218.

MACRINUS, John, a Latin poet, whose real name was Salmon. He died 1557, at an advanced age, at Loudon, his native place. His Hymns, Nænia, and other pieces, were much admired; so that he was called the French Horace. His son Charles, was equally eminent as a poet. After assisting in the education of Catherine of Navarre, sister to Henry IV. he was sacrificed at the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

MACWHORTER, Alexander, D.D. presbyterian minister of Newark, New-Jersey, was a native of Delaware, and born in 1734. He received his collegiate education at Princeton, where he was graduated in 1757; and having studied theology with the reverend William Tennent, was settled in the ministry at Newark, in 1759. He left his people in 1778, and became chaplain to general Knox's brigade, and in the following year removed to North Carolina, and settled at Charlotte, but in 1781 returned to Newark, where he continued till his death in 1807. He was highly respectable for the vigor and soundness of his mind, and the extent of his learning, and was very successful in his ministry.

MADAN, Martin, an eminent preacher, born about 1726. He was brought up to the bar, but through the conversation of Jones and Romaine, two ministers of influence among the Methodists, he took orders. He had the care of the patients of the Lock hospital, and by his strenuous exertions, a chapel was built for the institution, and opened in 1761, with a sermon from him. He was, in his opinions a strong Calvinist, and published some occasional sermons—a Comment on the 39 Articles—Letters to Dr. Priestley—a translation of Juvenal and Persius, 2 vols. 8vo.—Thoughts on Executive Justice. His work, however, in 3 vols. 8vo. 1781, called Thelyphthora, excited universal attention, and drew upon him some severe animadversions. In this book the author, by some acute argumentation, supports polygamy; and considering the first cohabitation with a woman a virtual marriage, he thus wishes to remove or lessen the causes of seduction. He died after a short illness, May 1790, aged 64.

MADDEN, Samuel, D.D., a name which, according to Dr. Johnson, "Ireland ought to honor," was of French extraction, and was educated at Dublin. In 1731 he appeared as a benefactor to Dublin college, by offering premiums for the promotion of learning; and in 1740 he appropriated the yearly sum of 100*l.* as a proffered premium to such natives of Ireland as improved arts and manufactures, or excelled in painting and in sculpture; a noble example, which was copied by the English nation in the establishment of the society for the encouragement of arts and sciences in London. This truly worthy, benevolent, and virtuous man, after thus proving himself the benefactor of Ireland, died there 30th

Dec. 1765. He had some valuable church preferment, and was a man of property. He wrote 1732, Memoirs of the twentieth century, being original letters of state under George VI. 6 vols. 8vo. which it appears was printed with great despatch by three printers, and four days after the publication, of the 1000 copies issued out, 890 were recalled and suppressed by the author. He published also in 1743 or 4. a long poem, called Boulter's Monument.

MADDOX, Isaac, D.D. an English prelate, born in London, 27th July, 1697. His parents were very humble, and he lost them both early, upon which he was placed by an aunt with a pastry-cook, who refused to keep him because he paid more attention to his books than his business. He afterwards was sent to a Scotch university, but disliking their tenets he entered Queen's college, Cambridge, under the patronage of bishop Gibson. In 1733 he published a Vindication of the Church of England, against Neal's history of the puritans; and published besides, 14 single sermons, preached on various occasions. He was a great benefactor to several hospitals. He died 27th Sept. 1759.

MADISON, James, bishop of Virginia. He was educated at William and Mary college, and was distinguished for classical learning. Under Mr. Wythe he studied law, and was admitted to the bar; but he soon resolved to devote himself to theology. In 1773 he was chosen professor of mathematics in William and Mary college, and in 1777 was appointed the president, and visited England for his improvement in science. Until 1784 he was not only president, but professor of mathematics, and afterwards was professor of natural, moral, and political philosophy, until his death. He was in the lecture room from 4 to 6 hours every day through the week. He first introduced lectures on political economy. In 1788 he was chosen bishop. He died 1812, aged 62. He published a thanksgiving sermon 1731; a letter to J. Morse, 1795; address to the episcopal church, 1799; discourse on the death of Washington; a large map of Virginia; and several pieces in Barton's journal.

MADISON, George, governor of Kentucky, son of the preceding, at the age of 17 went out as a soldier in defence of the western frontier, and was engaged in several battles with the Indians. In St. Clair's defeat he was wounded. In the war of 1812 he was an officer at the battle of Raisin. After having been twenty years auditor of the public accounts, he was chosen governor for the term of four years in 1816, but in a few weeks after his election he died at Paris.

MADOC, son of Owen Gwynedd, a Welsh prince, who is said to have sailed with 10 ships and 300 men, about the year 1170, and never to have returned. Some authors imagine that he went to the American continent, as they report that a tribe of White Indians, speaking the Welsh language, now inhabit the country about the northern branches of the Mississippi.

MADOX, Thomas, a famous antiquarian, and historiographer-royal. He was most indefatigable in the study of the laws and constitutions of the country, and in 1702 distinguished himself under the patronage of lord Somers, by the publication of his "Collection of Antique Charters and Instruments of divers kinds, taken from the originals, from the Norman conquest, to the end of the reign of Henry VIII." In 1711 he published the History and Antiquities of the Exchequer, from the Norman conquest to the end of the reign of Edward II. folio, dedicated to queen Anne, and reprinted 1769, 4to. His last work was, Firma Burgi, or Historical Essay concerning the cities, towns, and boroughs of Eng- land, inscribed to George I. This most active and laborious historian was prevented by death from completing other valuable works. His Collection of Transcripts in 94 folio and quarto volumes, the labor of 30 years, was presented by his widow, to the British Museum.

MÆCENAS, Caius Cilnius, the friend of Augustus, is particularly known as the patron of Virgil and Horace, and of the other learned men of his age. From this liberal protection afforded to learning, all patrons of literature have deservedly received the name of Mæcenas. This illustrious Roman was distinguished at the battles of Mutina and Philippi, and in the civil government of Rome; but his chief pleasure was literary retirement, in the company of his learned friends. He died eight years B. C.

MÆSTLINUS, Michael, a German astronomer, born in the duchy of Wirtemberg, and educated in Italy. He became professor of mathematics at Tübingen, and had among his pupils the great Kepler. He published several very valuable works in astronomy and mathematics, and deserved for his learning and genius, the unreserved commendations of Tycho Brahe and Kepler. He died 1590, aged 48.

MAFFEI, Vegio, a Latin poet, born at Lodi, in Lombardy, 1407. He studied jurisprudence, and was professor of law at Pavia, after which he went to Rome, where he was made chancellor under Martin V. where he died 1459. His prose works are, Dialogus de Miseria & Felicitate—de Educatione Liberorum, 4to.—Disputatio inter Solem, Terram,—de Perseverantia Religionis—besides many admired poetical pieces, and epigrams, and the 13th book, or continuation of the Æneid, translated into English burlesque by Mr. John Ellis. Jnl. Scaliger and Ger. Vossius highly commend him.

MAFFEI, Francis Scipio, marquis, an Italian nobleman, born at Verona, 1675. He distinguished himself at Verona, on a thesis on love, where the umpires were ladies, and afterwards displayed great valor in the army at the battle of Donawert, 1704. He returned, however, to literature; wrote an able treatise on "Duelling," and then produced "Merope," a tragedy, and "Ceremonia," a comedy, which were represented with applause, and by their delicacy, and purified language, seemed to correct and reform the licentious extravagance of the stage. In 1732 he travelled through France, and after visiting England, Holland, and Germany, and receiving every where the respect and attentions due to his rank, his merits, and his virtues, he returned to Italy, to the cultivation of his favorite studies. He died 1755, and carried with him the regret and the affections of the Veronese, who honored his remains with the most solemn obsequies, and pronounced an oration over him in their cathedral. This amiable writer published besides, History of the Diplomatic Science—Museum Veronense, folio—Verona Illustrata, folio—a translation of the first book of the Iliad—a selection of Italian tragedies, 3 vols. 8vo. and other works.

MAGALOTTI, Lorenzo, count, a native of Florence, member of the academies of Crusca and Cimento. He was an elegant poet, and possessed merit as a curious naturalist. He died 1712, aged 75. The best known of his works is, Canzonette Anacreontiche, 8vo. published under his Arcadian name of Lindoro Elateo.

MAGELHAENS, John Hyacinth de, a Portuguese ecclesiastic, member of the royal London society, and other learned bodies. He was author of some valuable works in natural and experimental philosophy, and died 1790, in London, where he had been settled for many years.

MAGELLAN, Ferdinand, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who served with distinction under Albuquerque, in the conquest of the Indies. On his return home, his services were neglected, and his active mind therefore sought protection and employment at the court of Charles V. who sent him in 1519, with a fleet, on a voyage of discovery. Magellan passed, in his expedition, through those straits at the southern extremity of America which still bear his name, and advanced through the south seas to the Ladrone islands, of which he took possession in the name of the Spanish monarch. Here he was slain in 1520, either by the natives, or, as some accounts say, by his own rebellious crew. One of his ships only, with 18 men, escaped, and after sailing round the world, reached Seville, 8th Sept. 1521.

MAGGI, Charles Maria, an Italian poet, born at Milan 1630. He was secretary to the senate of his native town, and died there 1699. He may be styled one of the most active restorers of elegant taste in Italy, after the frivolities and barbarisms of the school of Marinini. His works have been published, with an account of his life, by Muratori, 4 vols. 12mo. Milan, 1700.

MAGINUS, John Anthony, a native of Padua, mathematical professor at Bologna, and author of Astronomical tables—Ephemerides—and other works. He died 1617, and it is reported that he ascertained the time of his death by the accuracy of his astrological calculations.

MAGISTRIS, Simon de, a native of Serra, who died at Rome, 6th Oct. 1302, aged 75. He was well known for his deep acquaintance with the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and his services to literature were liberally rewarded by Pius VI. who made him bishop of Cyrene. He published a Greek edition of Daniel, folio, 1772—and also edited Acta Martyrum,—and Dionysii Alexandr. quæ supersunt.

MAGIUS, or MAGGI, Jerome, a learned Italian, born at Anghiari, in Tuscany. He was eminent in the circle of the sciences, and was sent by the Venetians as judge-martial to the isle of Cyprus, where he distinguished himself as an active engineer, in the defence of the town of Famagusta against the Turks. When at last his efforts failed, he was in 1571 thrown ignominiously into prison, where, however, his mental resources soothed his sufferings, and enabled him to write two treatises, upon bells, and upon the wooden horse, which he dedicated to the ambassadors of the emperor, and of the French king. These learned labors, however, hastened his end; for no sooner did the ambassadors interfere for his release, than the bashaw Mahomet, ordered him to be strangled in prison, 1572 or 3. Magius wrote besides, de Mundi Exitio per Exustionem, Libri quinque, 1562, folio—Vitæ Illustrium Virorum, Æmilio Auctore, cum Commentariis—Commentarii in quatuor Institutionem Civium Libros, 8vo.—Miscellanea.

MAGLIABECCHI, Antony, a learned Italian, born at Florence, 1636. He was bound apprentice to a goldsmith at Florence, but his fondness for books prevailed over the attentions of manual labor, and at the death of his mother, he, as his own master, devoted himself totally to learning. He soon distinguished himself amongst the learned, by a strong, and incredibly astonishing memory; and became known to Cosmo III. duke of Florence, who appointed him his librarian. Simple in his manners of life, he disregarded the luxuries and conveniences provided for him by his patron, and remained satisfied with an humble habitation, containing a straw chair for his table, and another for his bed, while an old cloak served him for a gown by day, and for a covering by night. The liberal offers of preferment made by the pope, and by the emperor, were rejected with similar indifference, and he showed that the company of his books to him was greater gratification than the most elevated situation. Though leading a sedentary life, he lived to the great age of 81, and at his death left the valuable library which he had collected, for the public use, with a decent fund for its maintenance. Though he published no work himself, he encouraged the publication of others, and to him we are indebted for the Latin poems of Settimello—the dialogue of Benedict Arctin, and other works.

MAGNENTIUS, a German, who from a private soldier, became emperor of Rome, after the murder of his benefactor Constans, 350. He was defeated by Constantius, the brother of the murdered Constans, and was put to death at Lyons 353.

MAGNI, Valerian, a native of Milan, employed in the service of Urban VIII. as a missionary in the north of Europe. The jesuits, with whom he was engaged in controversial disputes, prevented his obtaining a cardinal's hat. He died at Saltzburg, 1661, aged 75. He wrote some controversial works, and was a zealous defender of Des Cartes' philosophy.

MAGNUS, John, archbishop of Upsal, was born at Lincoping, 1498. He warmly opposed the reformation in Sweden, and when he found himself exposed to persecution in consequence, he retired to Rome, where he died 1544. He wrote a History of Sweden in 24 books, folio—a History of the Archbishops of Upsal to 1544, folio.

MAGNUS, Olaus, brother of the preceding, and his successor as archbishop. He was at the council of Trent, and distinguished himself also by his opposition to the protestants. He died at Rome 1560. He is author of a History of the Manners, Customs, and Wars of the People of the North, folio, 1555.

MAGRUDER, Allen B. a senator of the United States from Louisiana in 1812, had been previously a lawyer in Kentucky. He died at Opelousas in April 1822. He had collected materials for a general history of the Indians. He published a character of Mr. Jefferson, and reflections on the cession of Louisiana to the U. S. 1805.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED, the celebrated impostor, was born 571 A.D. at Mecca, in Arabia, and was of the tribe of the Korashites, the noblest and the most powerful of the country. He lost his father before he was two years old, and his mother before he was eight; but their affectionate attention was supplied by the care of his uncle, Abu Taleb, a merchant. In the family of this friendly protector, he was employed to travel with his camels between Mecca and Syria, till his twenty-fifth year, when he entered into the service of Cadiga, a rich widow, whom, though 12 years older than himself, he married three years after. Thus suddenly raised to affluence and consequence above his countrymen, he formed the secret plan of obtaining for himself the sovereign power. In his frequent journeys through the deserts of Arabia, he had observed the various sects which divided the opinions of the Eastern christians; and in the ardent pursuits of ambition, he considered, that nothing could so firmly secure to him the respect and the attachment of the world as laying the foundation of a new religion. The plan was bold, but it was pursued with vigor, and executed with slow and cautious steps. Withdrawing himself, therefore, from the society of the dissipated and licentious, he assumed the imposing character of superior sanctity, and every morning retiring to a solitary cave near Mecca, he devoted the day to prayer, abstinence, and holy meditation. Though his doctrines were embraced at first only by his wife Cadiga, and eight other dependants, yet in the fifth year of his assumed mission, he found his followers increased to the number of 39, among whom were men of rank and of consequence. Enemies, however, were not wanting to oppose the self-delegated prophet of God; and while some heaped on him the odious appellations of an impostor, others suspected his designs, and foresaw his bold and rapid strides to the sovereign power. Mahomet, notwithstanding, overcame all opposition: in proclaiming himself the favorite prophet appointed by God, to propagate a new religion, he flattered the passions and prejudices of his nation; and among a people whose climate is exposed to the dry heats of a scorching sun, he allured the imagination by painting rivers of cooling waters, shaded retreats, luxurious fruits, and all the sensual delights of the immaculate hours, for the happy proselytes of his doctrine; while he denounced against his enemies, not only temporal punishments, and dreadful visitations in the present life, and exclusion from paradise, but the most excruciating torments, a habitation in a continual fire, surrounded with a black hot salt smoke, without the ability of breathing any but the most noxious heated air, and of drinking the most foul and nauseous water. These promises and threatenings were not announced as the figurative language of an impostor, but the prophet delivered them as the command of God, and produced occasionally various chapters, which had been copied from the archives of heaven, and were brought down to him by the angel Gabriel. Whatever difficulties arose, either from the doubts or the suspicion of the new converts, were quickly removed by the condescension of the obedient angel, and a fresh revelation was sent down from heaven on every trying occasion, to support the character and maintain the sanctity of Mahomet. When the wavering proselytes seemed to demand miracles from a prophet who called himself superior to Moses and to Christ, the impostor, with an air of authority, declared, that God had sent Moses and Jesus with miracles, and yet that men would not be obedient to their word, and that therefore he had sent Mahomet in the last place, without miracles, to force them by the power of the sword to do his will. Thus commissioned by heaven to enforce his religion by the sword, he refused longer to answer questions, and to indulge disputes, and when he found himself exposed to danger at Mecca, he left the city, and retired to Medina, where his doctrines had found a more friendly reception. This event, which happened about the 16th July, 622, forms the celebrated era of the Mahometans, called the Hegira, or flight from Mecca. At Medina, the prophet erected his standard; and as for the preceding 13 years he had endeavored to spread his doctrines by persuasion, he now determined to propagate them by the sword. The two first years after his flight were employed in predatory excursions against the travelling caravans, and those of his neighbors who refused to embrace his tenets; but after subduing and exterminating several of the tribes of Arabia, he at last marched against Mecca, and after fighting a battle, granted a truce to his enemies, by which he not only confirmed his power as a prophet, but established his authority in assuming the title of independent sovereign over his nation. Thus formidable by his conquests, and dreaded for his cruelty, he next turned his arms against Caibar, a city inhabited by Jewish Arabs; and after he had taken it by storm, he fixed his abode in the house of one of the principal men of the place, whose daughter placed before him a poisoned shoulder of mutton, which she had prepared for his supper. The poison was so powerful, that Basher, one of the attendants of the prophet, died immediately; but the impostor himself, though he only tasted the meat, never fully recovered his strength, and perished three years after in consequence of the fatal food. The accident might have shaken the faith of his followers, as the woman declared, that if he were a prophet, he would have known that the meat was poisoned; but Mahomet enforced the tenets of predestination in his favor, and converted even his misfortunes into an engine of punishment against his enemies. His next expedition was against Mecca, which, as he pretended, had broken the truce, and though defeated in one battle, he had the good fortune to secure the victory; and at last, so to exert his power over the neighboring tribes, that in the 10th year of the Hegira, his empire and his religion had enslaved the whole of Arabia. As he had recommended to his followers a pilgrimage to Mecca, he himself performed it, whilst his lieutenants and officers were employed around in the destruction of heathen temples, and the abolition of idolatry; and after instructing the various devotees which flocked to him from all parts of Arabia, he returned to Medina. It was his last journey; he soon after fell sick, the poison which three years before he had taken, began to operate more powerfully, and after a confinement of 13 days, the prophet died, A.D. 632, aged 62. The success of Mahomet's imposture during his life time, is not more astonishing than the permanent establishment which his doctrines have maintained over one of the fairest portions of the globe, during near 1200 years. The Koran, in which are contained the tenets of his religion, is a compound of sublime truths, of incredible tales, and ludicrous events, but the whole is delivered in a pleasing, elegant, and nervous style. That Mahomet, who was rude and illiterate, should compose a book, deservedly esteemed the standard of elegance among the Arabians, without divine assistance, was considered as impossible among his followers, and therefore they believed the sublime composition to be the work of God, as the prophet informed them. Those, however, who were acquainted with the retreat of Mahomet before he assumed his prophetic character, know that he was assisted in the framing of his work by a Persian Jew, who was well versed in the learning of his country, and the laws of Moses; and by a Christian monk of the Nestorian sect. To the labors of these two men the prophet was indebted for the composition of the Koran, and hence we trace the frequent allusions to the Mosaic institutions, and the history of Christ. The Koran has been elegantly translated into English, by Sale, in 2 vols. 4to. and 2 vols. 8vo. There are also French translations by Du Ruyter, and by Savary. The best edition of the original in Arabic and Latin, is by Maracci, at Padua, 2 vols. folio, 1698.

MAHOMET I., emperor of the Turks, was son of Bajazet I. and succeeded his brother Moses, whom he put to death, 1413. He was a brave, just, and politic monarch. He restored to its ancient glory, the power of the Ottomans, which civil war, and the ravages of Tamerlane, had enfeebled and disgraced, and he conquered Cappadocia, Servia, Wallachia, and other provinces, and fixed his residence at Adrianople. He was at peace with the emperor Manuel Paleologus, to whom he restored some of his provinces. He died at Adrianople, of a bloody flux, 1421, aged 47.

MAHOMET II., emperor of the Turks, was born at Adrianople, 24th March, 1430, and succeeded his father Amurath, 1451. His reign was begun with the most active preparations for war, Constantinople was besieged, and the indefatigable Turk, not satisfied to insult the walls with his numerous soldiery, conveyed at great expense and labor, over the land, some of his gallees into the harbor, which the Greeks had shut up by strong iron chains against the attacks of their invaders. Constantinople yielded to the conqueror, 1453, and in her fall poured forth her fugitive philosophers and learned men to propagate and to revive literature in the western world. Afterwards Mahomet extended his arms against the neighboring nations, and by his victories, deserved the name of great, and the appellation of grand signior, which he assumed, and which has descended to his less worthy successors. Greece and Asia had already submitted to the conqueror, who after subduing two empires, 12 tributary kingdoms, and 200 towns, was preparing the subjugation of Italy, and the destruction of the papal throne, when a colic proved fatal to this formidable hero, 3d May, 1481, after a reign of 31 years. His death was the cause of universal rejoicing over the christian world, whose religion he had sworn to exterminate, to enforce the tenets of Mahomet. Though a great warrior, Mahomet was cruel and tyrannical, and that he might glut his rage, his lust, and his ambition, neither rank, nor sex, nor age were spared. Though by habit and religion hostile to the christians, he yet admired the arts and the languages of polished Europe, and read with great rapture, the history of her heroes. Some of his letters were collected by a knight of Rhodes, and translated into Latin, from the Syriac, Greek, and Turkish originals.

MAHOMET III., succeeded his father Amurath III. 1595. He began his reign by ordering 19 of his brothers to be strangled, and 10 of his father's wives to be drowned. He made war against Rodolphus II. and invaded Hungary with an army of 200,000 men, and after taking Agria, he basely murdered the garrison which he had pledged himself to spare. His progress was checked by the opposition of Maximilian, the emperor's brother, who would have obtained a most decisive victory, had not his troops abandoned themselves to pillage, and thus given the Turks the opportunity to rally, and to overwhelm their whole army. Other battles proved less favorable to Mahomet, who was obliged to retire from Hungary, Moldavia, and the neighboring provinces, and after suing in vain for peace from the christian princes, he buried himself in the indolence, and the licentiousness of his seraglio, regardless of the murmurs of his people, and the threats of his enemies. He died of the plague, 20th Dec. 1603, aged 39.

MAHOMET IV., succeeded to the throne at the age of seven, 1649, on the death of his father Ibrahim I. who had been strangled by his janissaries. He pursued with vigor the war with the Venetians, and after reducing Candia, with the loss of 200,000 men, he invaded Poland. His arms proved here victorious, he not only subdued the provinces, 1672, but imposed on the kingdom an annual tribute of 20,000 crowns. This disgrace, however, was wiped off by the valor of Sobieski, who the next year pursued his enemies, and totally routed them at the fatal battle of Choczim. Though peace was re-established in 1676, the restless ambition of the Turks again invaded the Austrian dominions, and Vienna would have fallen, 1683, if the great Sobieski had not hastened to its relief, and destroyed the numerous army of Mustapha, the Turkish general. The decisive blow was followed by the union of the emperor, the king of Poland, and the Venetians, and Mahomet every where defeated, found his people dissatisfied, and his soldiers rebellious. The calamities of the state were attributed to him by his janissaries, who deposed him 8th Oct. 1687, and sent him to the prison, from which they drew his brother Solyman III. to place him on the throne. He died in his confinement, 22d June, 1691.

MAHOMET V., son of Mustapha II. succeeded in 1730, on the deposition of his uncle, Achmet III. His janissaries expected from his exertions, the recovery of the provinces conquered by the imperialists, but the insurrections in the east, and the war with Persia, prevented his success against the European powers. He lost Georgia and Armenia, which were conquered by the arms of Kouli Khan. Mahomet was more respectable for his pacific disposition, than his military exploits. He died after a mild reign, in 1754.

MAIGNAN, Emanuel, a philosopher and ecclesiastic, born at Toulouse, 1601. He was educated among the jesuits, and from his early youth showed great fondness for learning, and at the age of 18 he took the habit of a minium. He warmly opposed the doctrines of Aristotle, and his reputation as a philosopher and mathematician was so widely extended, that he was called, in 1636, to fill a professor's chair at Rome. In 1650, he returned to Toulouse, from Rome, and was honorably received by his countrymen; but when the French king and his minister Mazarine, admiring his learning, and the various machines and curiosities contained in his cell, expressed a desire to draw him out of his obscurity, and patronize him in Paris, he modestly, but firmly declined their offer. This worthy man, so much above the temptations of the world, whose sole employment was to be useful to mankind, died at Toulouse, much respected, 1676. Father Sagueni published, in 1697, an account of his life and writings. He published "De Perspectivâ Hororariâ," 1648—a Course of Philosophy, 4 vols. 8vo. 1652, republished in folio, 1678.

MAIGROT, Charles, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, bishop of Conon, and vicar apostolic. He went as missionary to China, where he opposed the jesuits, who permitted the Chinese converts to pay homage, and adoration before the sepulchres of their forefathers. He wrote an Examination of the Chinese worship, and died at Rome, 1720, universally respected.

MAILLA, Joseph Anne Maria de Moyrice de, a jesuit, born in the province of Bugey, on the borders of Savoy, 1670. He applied himself so assiduously to the Chinese, that his great knowledge of the language recommended him as a missionary to China, in 1703. The emperor Kam-Hi esteemed him so much, that he employed his abilities in the construction of a map of China, and of Chinese Tartary, which was engraved in France, 1732. He also translated the Great Annals of China, which he transmitted to Europe, and which were to comprehend 12 vols. 4to. the first of which was published in 1777, under the care of Grosier. This amiable man died at Peking, 1748, after a residence of 45 years there.

MAILLARD, Oliver, a French cordelier, and doctor in divinity, eminent as a preacher. He was in the service of Innocent VIII. Charles VIII. and Ferdinand of Arragon. He died at Toulouse, June 13th, 1502.

MAILLE DE BREZE, Simon de, bishop of Viviers, and archbishop of Tours, was at the council of Trent, and distinguished himself by his learning and devotion. He translated some of Basil's homilies into Latin, and died 1597, aged 82.

MAILLE, Urban de, marquis de Brezé, was known as a warrior. He gained the battle of Avein, 1635, and was afterwards ambassador of France, to Sweden, and Holland. He died 1650, aged 53. His son Armand was duke of Fronsac and Caumont, and distinguished himself as a naval officer in the service of France. He defeated the Spanish fleet near Cadiz, 1640, but after some other important advantages at sea, in the following years, he suffered a defeat before Tarragona. He was killed by a cannon shot, 14th June 1646, at the siege of Orbitello, aged 27.

MAILLEBOIS, John Baptist Desmarests, marquis of, son of Nicholas Desmarests, the comptroller general, first distinguished himself in the wars of the Spanish succession, and in Italy, and by the conquest of Corsica, for which he was made marshal of France. In the war of 1741 he again signalized himself, but was defeated by count Brown, at the battle of Placentia, 1746. He died Feb. 1762, aged 80. His Campaigns in Italy, were published, 3 vols. 4to. 1775, by marquis de Pezay.

MAILLET, Benedict de, a learned Frenchman, born in Lorraine, 1659. He was sixteen years consul general in Egypt, and was removed to the same honorable appointment at Leghorn. He retired on a pension in 1716, and died at Marseilles, 1733, aged 79. From his papers were afterwards published, a Description of Egypt, in 4to. 1743, and also in 2 vols. 12mo. and a work on the Origin of the Globe, in the form of a Dialogue, 1 vol. 8vo. by Telliamed, the name of De Maillet reversed.

MAIMBOURG, Lewis, a learned native of Nancy, in Lorraine, born 1610. He became a jesuit, 1626, but was expelled from the society by Innocent XI. for his bold opposition to Rome in favor of the Gallican church. The French king comforted him in his disgrace by an honorable pension, and he retired to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died 1686. He was eminent as a preacher, but more as a writer. He published Histories of Arianism, of the Iconoclasts, of the Crusades, of the Schism of the West, of the Schism of the Greeks, of the Decay of the Empire, of the League, of Lutheranism, of Calvinism, of the Pontificate of St. Leo. He had many enemies as a writer, but Bayle commends him as a candid, learned, and well informed historian.

MAIMONIDES, Moses, or Moses son of Maimon, commonly called Moses Egyptianus, because physician to the sultan of Egypt, was a Jewish rabbi, born at Cordova, in Spain, 1131. He opened a school in Egypt, and as his skill, not only in languages, but in all branches of science and of philosophy was very great, his instructions were attended by numerous and respectable pupils. Thus eminently distinguished as a scholar, as a physician, and also as a divine, so as to be called inferior only to the legislator Moses; he beheld with indifference, and even contempt, the fables and traditions of his countrymen, and applied all the powers of learning, and the vast resources of his mind, in the cause of truth, virtue, and philosophy. Some of his works were written in Arabic, but are extant now in Hebrew only. The most famous of these are his Commentaries on the Mishna—Jad, a complete pandect of the Jewish law—More Nechochim, a valuable work, explaining the difficult passages, phrases, parables and allegories in scripture, and several other works. This great and learned man died in Egypt at the age of 70, and was buried with his nation in the land of Upper Galilee. His death was mourned for three whole days by Jews and Egyptians, and the year in which he died, in respect of his great virtues and learning, was called Lamentum Lamentabile.

MAINFROY, prince of Tarento, was natural son of the emperor Frederic II. After the death of Conrad IV. of Sicily, in 1254, he was made guardian of the minority of his son Conradin; but his ambition soon prompted him to ascend the throne, and he was crowned king of Sicily, at Palermo. A quarrel with Innocent IV. kindled a war, in which the papal troops were defeated, and Rome besieged; but the next successor, Urban IV. undismayed, excommunicated his enemy, and bestowed his crown of Naples and Sicily, on Charles of Anjou, the brother of Lewis of France. The new king attacked the usurper, and in a battle at Benevento, 26th Feb. 1266, Mainfroy was defeated and slain, and his body was cast indignantly into a ditch, as he was excommunicated. Though an usurper, Mainfroy possessed many virtues, he patronised literature and the arts, and was an able warrior. His "Chasse aux Oiseaux," appeared 1696.

MAINTENON, Frances d' Aubigné, Madame de, a famous French lady, was born November 27th, 1635, in the prison of Niort, where her father was confined for some ill conduct against Richelieu. The father, after his enlargement took all his family, 1639, to America, and settled at Martinique. On his death, in 1646, the widow returned to France, leaving her daughter as a pledge in the hands of her creditors, but the child was soon after sent after the mother, and taken under the hospitable protection of her aunt, Madame Villette, at Poitou. As, however, she was brought up in the principles of the protestants, an order from the court was obtained to remove her, and by artifice and persuasion, she was converted to the Roman catholic religion, by her bigoted relation, Madame de Neuillant. In 1651 she preferred, to this irksome confinement, an union with the abbé Scarron, who was old and deformed, but witty, and the favorite of the court. On the death of her husband, in 1660, her distresses returned, and though for a while supported at the Hospitaler's convent at Paris, she solicited in vain for a small pension from the court. In 1671 however, she had the good fortune to be appointed over the education of the young duke De Maine, the king's son, by his mistress, Madame de Montespan, and from this situation arose her greatness. The king saw her, and was captivated with her manners and person, and in 1679 he purchased for her the estate of Maintenon, ten leagues from Versailles, from which she derived her new title. In this dangerous elevation, Madame Maintenon conducted herself with great propriety; she never interfered with the politics or intrigues of the court, her sole wish was to please and amuse the king, and in this she so happily succeeded, that though she was two years older than himself, he married her privately, 1685. Now raised from a mistress to the honorable rank of a wife, a secret, however, which was never revealed, she applied herself more frequently to acts of religion and of piety, and she founded an abbey for women of quality, afterwards called St. Cyr, of which she called herself the superior, and for the government of which, she, together with Desmarests, bishop of Chartres, formed good and strict regulations. She also prevailed upon Racine, who was now become a courtier, to write a tragedy upon some striking subject from the bible, and in consequence of this he produced his Esther, and also his Athaliah, which were originally acted by the religious devotees of St. Cyr. Upon the king's death, in 1715, she retired to privacy at St. Cyr, and long fatigued with the splendor of intolerable greatness, she acknowledged the emptiness of human distinction, and ended her days in penitence and devotion. She died 15th April, 1719. She was generally the friend of virtue and merit, and she treated with particular attention and favor, Madame de Guyon, and also the great Fenelon, though afterwards she was weak enough to join his persecutors.

MAJOR, John, a divine, born 1469, at Gleg-horn, near North Berwick, and not at Haddington. He studied at Oxford, and Cambridge, and also at Paris, under Boulae and Standouk, and on his return to Scotland, became divinity professor at St. Andrews, and afterwards provost of the university. He died about 1550. He was a very learned man, and wrote in a barbarous style, "De Historia Genitiscotorum," 4to.—Commentarius in Physica Aristotelis, & Litalis in Mathæum Expositio.

MAJOR, John Daniel, a native of Breslaw, was medical professor at Kiel, where he founded a botanical garden. He wrote Lithologia Curiosa, sive de Animal. et Plantis in Lapidem conversis, 4to.—De Caneris et Serpent. Petrifact. 4to.—Historia Anatomix, fol. &c. and died at Stockholm, 1693, aged 59.

MAIRAN, John James d' Ortons de, a French philosopher, born at Beziers, 1678. He succeeded, in 1741, Fontenelle, as secretary to the academy of sciences, and displayed in that situation, great abilities. He died at Paris, 20th Feb. 1771. He wrote Dissertation on the cause of Phosphoric Light—on the Aurora Borealis—on Ice—Letters concerning China, and other things, published in the memoirs of the academy, &c.

MAIRE, James le, a Dutch navigator. With two vessels he sailed 14th June, in 1615, from the Texel, and discovered in 1616, the straits to which he gave his name, in South America, and after touching at New Guinea, he reached Batavia. Here, though among his countrymen, he was seized as a spy, as violating the rights of the Dutch East India company, and his ship was confiscated. He died in his return to Europe, 22d January 1617. His voyage is published in a Latin collection, Amsterdam, 1622, folio.

MAIRET, John, a French poet, born at Besançon, 1604. He was page to the duke of Montmorency, and distinguished himself against the Huguenots, and as a negotiator. He received a pension from the duke, and was patronized by cardinals Richelieu, and La Valette, and the count of Soissons. He died 1636. He wrote some poems and miscellanies, besides twelve tragedies of no great merit.

MAISTRE, Lewis Isaac le, better known by the name of Sacy, was born at Paris, 1613. He took orders, but on suspicion of Jansenism, he was in 1666, thrown into the Bastille. During his confinement of two years, he composed several works, and translated the bible, with annotations, in 32 vols. 8vo. He translated besides, some of Chrysostom's Homilies, three of Terence's Plays—Kempis, on the Imitation of Christ—an Attack on the Jesuits—Letters of Piety, 2 vols. He died at Pompona, 1684, aged 71.

MAITLAND, John, lord of Thyrllestane, was born 1545. He was educated in Scotland, and studied the law afterwards in France, and practised with such success that James VI. made him his secretary of state, 1584, and the next year lord chancellor of the kingdom. He attended his master in Denmark in 1589, where the princess his bride was detained by contrary winds. He died much regretted, 1595. He wrote Epigrammata Latina, published in the Deliciae Scotorum Poetarum, Amst. 1637.

MAITLAND, William, a Scotch antiquarian, born at Brechin, Forfarshire, 1693. From a hair merchant, he became a man of letters, and settled in London, where he published his History of London, folio, 1739. In 1753, appeared his History of Edinburgh, folio, and in 1757, his History and Antiquities of Scotland, 3 vols. fol. He died at Montrose, aged 64, and left behind him a fortune, it is said of 10,000*l*.

MAITTAIRE, Michael, a learned writer, born in London, 1668. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, where he was made student, by the friendship of Dr. South, the canon. He was appointed second master of Westminster school, 1695, and continued four years in that office. He distinguished himself as a writer by two pamphlets against Whiston, in 1711, and by his Stephanorum Historia, &c.—Annales Typographici, 5 vols. 1719—1741—Opera Veterum Poetarum, 2 vols. folio—the Greek Testament, edited, 2 vols. 1714—Editions of Justin, Lucrætius, Paterculus, Catullus, Terence, Virgil, Ovid, Martial, and other Latin classics—Græcæ Linguæ Dialecti, 8vo.—Anacreon—Miscellanea Græcorum. He was patronized by the first and second lords Oxford, and was Latin tutor to lord Chesterfield's favorite son. He died greatly respected, 7th Aug. 1747. His valuable library, the collection of 50 years, was sold after his death, during 44 nights by auction, by Cock and Langford.

MAIUS, John Henry, or MAY, a Lutheran divine, born 1653, at Pförtzheim, in Baden-Dourlach. He was professor of oriental languages in several universities, and lastly at Giessen where he died 1719. He wrote Historia Animalium Scripture Sacre, 8vo.—Vita Johannis Reuchlini, 8vo.—Synopsis Theologiæ Symbolicæ, 4to.—Historia Reformationis Lutheri, 4to.

MAKIN, Thomas, a poet, was one of the early settlers of Pennsylvania, and died in 1735. In the year 1639 he was usher to George Keith in the Friends' public grammar school, and in the following year succeeded him as master. He was for some time clerk of the provincial assembly, which was held in the Friends' meeting house. He published two Latin poems in 1723 and 1729, inscribed to James Logan, and entitled, encomium Pennsylvaniae, and in laudes Pennsylvaniae poem; extracts from which are preserved in Prond's history of that province.

MALACHY, St. a native of Armagh, successively abbot of Benetor, bishop of Conner, and archbishop of Armagh, which he resigned 1135. He died at Clairvaux in the arms of his friend St. Bernard, 1143. He was a very learned man, and introduced some wise regulations in his diocese. The predictions attributed to him are properly considered as impositions.

MALAGRIDA, Gabriel, an Italian jesuit, sent by his superiors into Portugal as a missionary. His zeal and his eloquence soon rendered him popular, and he became so ambitious that, it is said, he, with Alexander and Mathos, joined the duke d'Aveir in his conspiracy against the king of Portugal. When the jesuits were banished, he and his two companions were permitted to continue to reside in the kingdom, and there he became soon known as a violent enthusiast; he declared himself the ambassador and immediate prophet of God, and even pretended to work miracles. His extravagant conduct and his writings were at last noticed by the inquisition, and when he declared that the king's death had been revealed to him, he was condemned by the arbitrary tribunal, and was burnt alive, 21st Sep. 1761, aged 75, as a false prophet.

MALAVAL, John, a native of Pezan near Nismes, who came early to Paris and gained eminence as a surgeon. He contributed some valuable observations to the memoirs of the academy of surgery, and died 1758, aged 89, after surviving for some years the sound use of his faculties.

MALBONE, Edward G. a valuable portrait painter was a native of Newport R. Island. At an early period of life he discovered a propensity for painting, which became at length so predominant, that he neglected every other amusement for its indulgence. When a school boy he delighted in drawing rude sketches of the objects of nature. As he obtained the necessary assistance to improvement his talents were developed. He frequented the theatre to contemplate the illusions of scenery; and by the regularity of his attentions, behind the scenes, in the forenoons, he attracted the notice of the painter, who discovered unusual genius in his young acquaintance, and accepted his assistance with the brush. He was at length permitted to paint an entire new scene, and as a reward received a general ticket of admission. His intervals of leisure were now employed in drawing heads, and afterwards in attempting portraits. His rapid progress in the latter occupation convinced him, that he had talents for it, and gave alacrity to his exertions; and he was soon induced to devote to it, his whole attention. As he now began to be known and patronized as a miniature painter, his natural propensity was nourished by the prospect of reputation and wealth. He visited the principal cities and resided successively in New-York, Philadelphia, and Boston. In the winter of 1800, he went to Charleston, where his talents, and the peculiar amenity of his manners enhanced the attentions, which he received from the hospitality of its inhabitants. In May 1801 he sailed from Charleston to London, where he resided some months absorbed in admiration of the paintings of celebrated masters. With a mind improved by study and observation, and animated by the enthusiasm of genius, he visited the different galleries of living painters, enlarging his ideas, and profiting by the contemplation of their works. He was introduced to the acquaintance of the president of the royal academy, who gave him free access to his study, and showed him those friendly attentions, which were more flattering than empty praises to the mind of his young countryman. He even encouraged him to remain in England, assuring him, that he had nothing to fear, from professional competition. But he preferred his own country, and returned to Charleston in the winter of 1801. He afterwards continued his pursuits, in different parts of the continent, always finding employment. By his sedentary habits, and intense application to his professional labors, his health was so much impaired, that in the summer of 1806, he was compelled to relinquish his pencil, and indulge in exercise; but his frame had become too weak, to be again invigorated. As he felt the symptoms of an approaching consumption, his physicians advised him to try the effect of a change of climate. In the beginning of winter he therefore took a passage in a vessel for Jamaica; but, the change not producing much benefit, he returned to Savannah, where he languished till his death, May 7th 1807.

MALCOLM, James Peller, an artist and antiquary, was a native of America, from whence he went when young to study painting at the Royal Academy. But failing in that line, he had recourse to engraving, and executed a number of topographical plates, chiefly for the works of Mr. Gough and Mr. Nichols. He also became a member of the Society of Antiquaries, and published—1. "Londinum Redivivum; or an ancient and modern description of London," 4 vols. 4to.—2. Letters between the Rev. James Granger and many eminent men, 8vo.—3. First Impressions, or Sketches from Art and Nature, 8vo.—4. Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London, 4to.—5. Miscellaneous Anecdotes, 8vo.—6. A historical Sketch of the Art of Caricaturing, 4to. He died in indigent circumstances in 1815.

MALDONAT, John, a Spanish jesuit, born at Fuente del Maestro, in Estramadura, 1534. He was an able scholar and distinguished himself at the universities of Salamanca and Rome, and became a popular professor in 1563 at Paris, and afterwards in 1570 at Poitiers. He was also in the Jesuits' college, at Bourges, and then went to Rome, by order of Gregory XIII. to superintend the publication of the Septuagint. He there finished his Commentary on the Gospels, and died 1588. He wrote besides Commentaries on Jeremiah, Baruch, Ezekiel and Daniel—Various treatises on Grace—on Justice and Original Sin. He is deservedly respected as an acute critic, an excellent theologian, well skilled in the learned languages, and he possessed moreover, says Thuanus, singular piety, and purity of manners.

MALEBRANCHE, Nicolas, a French philosopher, born at Paris 6th Aug. 1638. He studied at the colleges of la Marche, and Sorbonne, and in 1660, was admitted into the congregation of the oratory. He applied himself at first to ecclesiastical history, and afterwards to rabbinical learning, but found these pursuits not congenial to his mind, till in the perusal of Descartes' treatise upon Man, he discovered that philosophy was the science in which he was destined to be illustrious. He now devoted himself to serious meditation, and even closed his windows not to be interrupted by the light. His first and greatest work is "de la Recherche de la Verité," or Search after Truth, printed at Paris 1674. In this celebrated work the author proves that our senses and passions lead us to error, and that truth can be discovered only by thinking in God. Of human knowledge he speaks with contempt, but pays adoration to that sublime light which proceeds from the ideal world. In this, and in his other works he shows himself, says Locke, an acute and ingenious author, abounding in fine thoughts, judicious reasonings, and uncommon reflections. His other works are all on the same metaphysical subjects, and are nothing but explanations of the principles laid down in his "search," with much depth of reasoning, and force of genius. He died 1715, aged 55.

MALESHERBES, Christian William Lamoignon, a celebrated Frenchman, son of the chancellor of France. He was born at Paris 16th Dec. 1721, and brought up to the bar. He gradually rose to the office of first president of the court of Aides, 1750, and for 25 years was thus zealously engaged in the service of his country, in supporting and invigorating the industry of her inhabitants. After he had retired from this laborious duty to his estate, he was recalled in 1775, by Louis XVI. to become the minister of the interior, and in this high situation he conducted himself with the humanity and attention of a great and good man. The prisons were visited, and no longer contained any but criminals who had violated the law; various employments were introduced to recommend habits of industry, and the apartments were rendered more commodious for the unfortunate captives. The retirement of Turgot from office was attended by that of his friend Malesherbes, who now employed himself in travelling under an assumed name and in a plain dress over France, Switzerland and Holland, and in examining the various manufactures, curiosities, and arts of each province. He hailed the revolution as the forerunner of blessings to France, but soon saw his hopes vanish; yet while others fled from the field of danger, he boldly appeared before the convention; and actuated by gratitude and humanity, he no sooner saw his sovereign dragged as a criminal before his subjects, than he demanded the privilege and the honor of being his defender. The heroic conduct of this venerable man, while it drew admiration from all, had no effect on the bloody convention. His appeals in favor of Louis and of virtue were of no avail, and he was the first to announce to the unfortunate monarch the ill success of his defence. So much goodness it might have been expected ought to have met respect among a civilized nation, but it proved otherwise. No sooner was his daughter, the wife of the president Rosambo, accused of treason and hurried to prison, than the aged father requested he might accompany his beloved child. The request was granted, and in a few days, alas, he appeared with her and her child before the revolutionary tribunal, and with her and her innocent child he ascended the scaffold. These illustrious victims suffered 22d April, 1793. He was author of a treatise on Rural Economy—'Thoughts and Maxims—Two Memoirs on the Civil State of the Protestants.

MALFILLASTRE, James Charles Lewis, a French poet, born 8th Oct. 1732, at St. John de Caen. He died at Paris 6th March, 1767. He was patronised by count Lauraguais, and his poem on Narcissus in the isle of Venus, acquired him celebrity. He wrote besides, odes, and sonnets, and in the midst of that retirement which he preferred to public life, he rendered himself amiable and respected by the benevolence of his heart, and the innocence and simplicity of his manners.

MALHERBE, Francis de, a French poet, who according to Bayle, Balzac, and Boileau formed the taste and judgment of his countrymen in matters of polite literature, and introduced, with purity of language, harmonious numbers and a just cadence. He was born at Caen about 1555, and died at Paris 1623. He was patronised by Henry the Great, and Mary de Medicis, and the particulars of his life were written by his friend and companion Racan. Though an elegant writer, he composed verses with great labor. His poetical works, divided into six books, consist of paraphrases on the psalms, odes, sonnets, and epigrams, published 1666, with the notes of Menage, and 1757, 8vo. He also translated some of Seneca's works, and some of Livy's decades.

MALLEMANS, Claude, a native of Beaune, member of the congregation of the oratory, and professor of philosophy at Paris, where he died 1723, aged 77. He is author of a New Philosophical System of the World, 12mo.—the Fannous Problem of the Quadrature of the Circle, 12mo.

MALLET, David, or MALLOCH, an English poet, born in Scotland about 1700, and educated at Edinburgh. He was recommended by his college to become tutor to the sons of the duke of Montrose, and after travelling with his pupils, he settled in London, where he was the companion of the great, the learned, and the witty. In 1724, he commenced author, and in 1733, paid his court to Pope in his "Verbal Criticism," a work of little merit. In 1740, appeared his life of lord Bacon, displaying more knowledge of history than of sciences, and soon after he undertook the life of the duke of Marlborough, at the request of the duchess; but, says his biographer, many were apprehensive that as he had forgotten Bacon was a philosopher, he might not recollect that Marlborough was a general. The work never appeared. Mallet afterwards became secretary to the prince of Wales with a salary of 200*l.* a year, and assisted Thompson in the composition of his Masque of Alfred, which was repeatedly acted before the prince at Cliefden, 1740, and also at Drury lane, 1751. The poet died 1765. His works have been collected in 3 vols. 12mo. but possess little poetical merit. He published lord Bolingbroke's works, 5 vols. 4to. as his lordship had left the care of them to him as his property.

MALLET, Edmund, a French divine, born at Melun, 1713. He was in 1751, made professor of divinity in the college of Navarre, at Paris, where he died 1755. He was one of the writers of the Encyclopedia, on the articles of divinity and belles lettres, and composed besides several works on the principles of poetry and eloquence—Essay on the best Orators—a History of the Civil Wars under Francis II. and Charles IX. from the Italian of vila.

MALLET DU PAN, James, a native of Geneva, educated under the patronage of Voltaire, at Cassel, where he became professor of belles lettres. Afterwards as the continuator of the annals of Linguet, and the conductor of the Mercure de France, he acquired celebrity, but when the French revolution broke out, his attachment to the royal cause exposed him to the severest persecutions of the republicans. After being 115 times denounced as a dangerous man, and finding no safe asylum either in France, or in Switzerland, or at Geneva, he came to London, where he conducted the Mercure Britannique. In this periodical work, by wishing to please every party he offended all: the jacobins were disgusted with the details which recalled to mind their cruel excesses, and the emigrants were displeased that opinions were entertained which discouraged the introduction of the ancient government of France. Notwithstanding these jarring opinions it was evident that he possessed great powers of mind, independence of sentiment, and integrity of character. This learned but persecuted man died at Richmond, 15th May, 1800, in the house of his friend Lalli-Tollendal, leaving a wife and five children, for whose maintenance a handsome subscription was raised. He wrote besides the Influence of Philosophy on Literature, 8vo.—Discourse on Eloquence and Political Systems, 12mo.—Considerations on the French Revolution, 8vo.—Correspondence for an History of French Republicanism, 8vo.

MALLET, Paul Henry, an historian, was born at Geneva, in 1730. He became professor of the belles lettres, at Copenhagen, and was a member of several learned societies. He died in 1807. His works are—1. Histoire de Danemarck. 2. Histoire de Hesse, 3 vols. 8vo. 3. Histoire de la Maison de Brunswick, 3 vols. 4. Histoire des Suisses, 4 vols. 5. Histoire de la Ligue Anseatique, 2 vols. 8vo. Bishop Percy translated Mallet's Introduction to his History of Denmark, with the title of "Northern Antiquities;" 2 vols.

MALLINKROTT, Bernard, dean of the cathedral of Munster, was very learned but very turbulent. He was nominated to two bishoprics, but his ambition was to be bishop of Munster; yet he was defeated in his intrigues, and 1630, in consequence of his seditious conduct he was degraded, and afterwards imprisoned by his rival in the castle of Ottinzheim, where he died 1664. He wrote de Natura et Usu Literarum, 4to.—de Orto & Progressu Artis Typographicæ, 4to.—Paralipomenon de Historicis Græcis, 4to. and other works.

MALONE, Edmund, the son of an Irish judge, was born at Dublin, in 1741. He was educated at the university of his native city, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and in 1767, was called to the bar; but being possessed of an independent fortune, he retired from the profession, and devoted himself to literature. In 1730, he published two supplementary volumes to Steevens' Shakspeare, and a detection of Chatterton's forgeries. In 1790, appeared his edition of Shakspeare, and in 1795, he exposed the imposture of the Irelands. In 1797, he published the life of Sir Joshua Reynolds; in 1800 that of Dryden, prefixed to an edition of his prose works; and in 1803, he printed the life and Tracts of William Gerard Hamilton; and in 1811, a biographical Sketch of the right Hon. William Windham. Mr. Malone died May 25, 1812.

MALOUIN, Paul James, a native of Caen, professor of medicine in the royal college at Paris, and physician to the queen. He wrote a treatise on Chemistry—on Medical Chemistry—and the Chemical Articles in the Encyclopédie. He died at Paris 1777, aged 76. Another of the same name and family was author of a treatise on Solid and Fluid bodies, and practised as a physician. He died 1718.

MALPIGHI, Marcello, an Italian physician, born 10th March, 1623, at Crevalcuore, near Bologna. He studied anatomy and physic at Bologna, under Massari and Mariano, and took there his doctor's degree 1653. In 1656, he was appointed professor, by the senate of Bologna, but soon left it by the invitation of the grand duke of Tuscany to settle at Pisa, where his curious experiments were assisted by his friend Borelli. In 1659, as the air of Pisa did not agree with him, he returned to Bologna, where he practised with great popularity. In 1662, he was prevailed upon to go to Messina as professor, and in 1691, the new pope Innocent XII. sent for him to Rome, and made him his physician. He died 29th Nov. 1694, in consequence of a paralytic stroke. His discoveries in anatomy were curious and important. By his delicate dissections he found out the lobules of the liver, and the nature of the formation and mechanism of the kidneys, and of the reins, and of the heart. His works were printed together, London, 1697, folio, and reprinted more correctly Amst. 1698, in 4to.

MALTBY, Isaac, general, lived in Hatfield Massachusetts, and was sent a representative to the legislature. He died 1819. He published elements of war 12mo. 1812; a treatise on courts martial and military law, 1813.

MALTE-BRUN, Conrad, a poet, political and philosophical writer, and geographer, was born, in 1775, at Thye, in Jutland, and was obliged to quit his native country in 1796, in consequence of the persecution he sustained for having written in favor of the liberty of the press, and the enfranchisement of the peasants. After having resided for some time at Stockholm, he settled at Paris, and, from 1806, till his decease, December 16, 1826, edited the foreign political department of the Journal de Debates. He also, in conjunction with M. Eyrries, edited the Annals of Voyages. Among his works are, his excellent System of Geography, A Picture of Poland; Poems and Miscellanies.

MALUS, Stephen Louis, a mathematician, was born at Paris in 1775. He became a professor in the military school at Metz; after which he served as an engineer in the army, and went to Egypt, where he discovered a new branch of the Nile. He also drew a map of the country, on which he wrote a memoir, inserted in the "Decade Egyptienne." After distinguishing himself in several actions, he returned to Europe, and in 1811, obtained the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society, for his discoveries and experiments on double refraction. He was director of the Polytechnic school, a major of engineers, and superintendent of the fortifications. He died in 1812.

MALVEZZI, Virgilio, marquis of, an Italian writer, born at Bologna 1599. He studied the law and took his doctor's degree 1616, but afterwards he applied himself to arms, and was employed by Philip IV. of Spain, and admitted into his council of war. He died at Bologna 11th Aug. 1654. He wrote various works in Spanish and Italian, and was author of a discourse on Tacitus' first book of Annals translated into English.

MANCO CAPAC, the founder of the Peruvian empire, and the first of its Incas, is said to have lived about four hundred years before the invasion of the country by the Spaniards; to have first appeared, with his sister and wife Mama Oella, in an island of the lake Titicaca; to have declared that he and his partner were children of the sun, sent to civilize the natives; to have founded Cusco; and to have reigned long and prosperously over a grateful people.

MANDEVILLE, Bernard de, M. D. a Dutch physician, born at Dort, 1670. After studying in Holland, he went over to England in the beginning of the eighteenth century, where he wrote several books. His "Virgin Unmasked," a most licentious performance, was published 1709, and in 1711, his "Treatise of the Hypochondria and Hysterical Passions," a work of some merit. In 1723, he published his poem with notes, called "the Fables of the Bees, or Private Vices made Public Benefits," a work which was reprehended by the grand jury of Middlesex, and attacked from various quarters. The author took no notice of his opponents till 1728, when he published another volume called the second part of the Fables of the Bees. It has been observed that he improperly confounds superfluities and faults, and by representing human nature as low and vicious, and men as knaves and libertines, he destroys all the noble incentives to virtue. In 1720, he published "Free Thoughts on Religion," and in 1732, an Inquiry into the Origin of Honor. He died Jan. 1733.

MANDRILLON, I, a native of Bourg-en-Bresse, who embraced the mercantile profession, and travelled in America and Holland. He settled in Holland, but his opposition to the Stadtholder made him unpopular, and he returned to France, where the independence of his character rendered him suspected to Robespierre, who ordered him to the guillotine, 1793. He wrote the American Spectator, 8vo. a work of merit, and other things.

MANES, the founder of a sect of the Manichees. He began to propagate about the year 277, his doctrines which indeed he had derived from others, especially one Scythianus, whose works had fallen into his hands. Mingling the pure doctrines of christianity with the fables of paganism, he taught that there were two principles of all things, coeternal and coeval, that is God and the devil, that from the former all good, and from the latter all evil, proceeded. The good being he called the author of the New Testament, the bad of the Old. God, he adled, created the soul, the devil the body. The followers of these superstitious and incongruous notions were at one time very numerous. Manes pretended also to work miracles, and he was therefore sent for by Sapor king of Persia to cure his son, but his pretended power failed him, the child died in his arms, and the disappointed father ordered the prophet to be flayed alive, and his skin stuffed with chaff, to be hung up at the gates of the capital, where Epiphanius, who refuted his doctrines and exposed his follies, saw it.

MANETTI, Gianozzo, a native of Florence, illustrious as one of those active men to whom the revival of literature may be attributed. He studied under Chrysoloras, and read lectures at Florence, on the philosophy of Aristotle, and assisted in the affairs of the government. He afterwards retired to Rome, where he became secretary to pope Nicholas V. and next went into the service of Alphonso king of Naples, where he died 1459, aged 63. Besides a Latin translation of the Greek testament, he wrote the lives of Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Nicholas V.—a treatise against the Jews—on the Dignity of Man and on the Works of Aristotle.

MANETTI, Xavier, professor of botany and medicine at Florence, was keeper of the imperial garden, and author of Catalogus Horti Academicæ Florent—Viridarium Florent, 8vo.—Ornithologie Tonus Quintus & Ultimus, fol. 1775. He died 1735 at Florence.

MANFREDI, Enstachio, L.L.D. an Italian mathematician, born 1674, at Bologna, where he became mathematical professor. He was member of several learned societies, and died 1739. He wrote Ephemerides, 4 vols. 4to.—de Transitu Mercurii per Solem, 1723—de Annuis Stellarum Aberrationibus, 4to. and also sonnets and canzonets, edited 1713.

MANGEART, Thomas, a learned Benedictine, greatly honored by the duke of Lorraine, to whom he was antiquary, librarian and counsellor. He died 1763. His great work is "Introduction to the Science of Medals," folio, besides sermons.

MANGET, John James, an eminent physician, born at Geneva 1652. He was physician to the elector of Brandenburg, and died at Geneva 1742, aged 90. He published Bibliotheca Anatomica-Pharmaceutica-Medica—Chirurgica—Scriptorium Medicorum—Chemica et Pharmacopœia, works of more labor than genius, and comprehended in 14 folio vols.

MANGEY, Thomas, D.D. fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, became rector of St. Mildred's Bread-street, vicar of Yealring, and prebendary of London. He published an edition of Philo-Judæus, 2 vols. folio—Remarks upon Nazarenus, against Toland, 8vo.—and Practical Discourses on the Lord's Prayer, preached at Lincoln's Inn, of which the third edition appeared 1721. He died 11th March, 1755.

MANLEY, Mary, an English writer, born at Guernsey, where her father sir Roger was governor. She lost, when very young, her mother, and her father some time after, and in this distressing situation she was enticed into a marriage with a relation of the same name, to whose care her unprotected innocence had been intrusted by her dying parents. The new husband, who had already another wife, took his bride to London, and soon after cruelly deserted her. She afterwards became acquainted with the duchess of Cleveland, one of the king's mistresses, but upon being dismissed by her, she determined to spend the rest of her life in retirement and obscurity. This might have succeeded, but her "Royal Mischief," a tragedy, when represented at Lincoln's Inn-fields theatre, proved so popular that she was now courted and flattered by men of wit and gallantry, and she in an evil hour yielded her virtue to the lure of temptation. But though engaged in intrigues, she still continued to be an author, and her "Memoirs of the New Atalantis," a romance in 4 vols. in which she described in wanton language the amors of some distinguished characters, but in feigned names, drew upon her a prosecution. Her printer and publisher were apprehended, but she nobly appeared before the king's bench to take the blame upon herself, and after answering with spirit, various interrogatories before the privy council, and being held in strict confinement, she was at last admitted to bail, and finally liberated. She afterwards wrote in favor of queen Anne's ministry, and died the mistress of alderman Barber of London, 11th June, 1724. She was author of Lucius king of Britain, a tragedy, acted 1717—Lost Lover, or the Jealous Husband, acted 1696, besides letters.

MANIGAULT, Gabriel, a merchant of Charleston South Carolina, and a patriot of the American revolution. By his commercial pursuits he acquired a fortune of half a million of dollars. In the beginning of the revolutionary war he loaned the state 220,000 dollars. In May 1779, at the age of 75, when the British general Prevost appeared before Charleston, he equipped himself as a soldier, and equipping also his grandson of 15 years, he led him to the lines, to repel an expected assault. He died 1781, aged 77. He bequeathed to a charitable society 5,000*l.*

MANLIUS, a famous Roman, who derived the name of Torquatus from his conquest, in single combat, of a gigantic Gaul whose collar, torquis, he carried away in triumph. When dictator he cruelly put his son to death for fighting without his orders, a circumstance which rendered him odious to his countrymen, B. C. 340.

MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, Marcus, a Roman consul, who being suddenly awakened by the cackling of geese, preserved the capitol when besieged by the Gauls. He afterwards aspired to the sovereignty of Rome, and was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, 384 B. C.

MANLY, John, a captain in the navy of the United States, received a naval commission from Washington, Oct. 24, 1775. Invested with the command of the Schooner Lee, he kept the hazardous station of Massachusetts bay, during a most tempestuous season, and the captures which he made, were of immense value at the moment. An ordinance brig, which fell into his hands, supplied the continental army with heavy pieces, mortars, and working tools, of which it was very destitute, and in the event led to the evacuation of Boston. His services were the theme of universal eulogy. Being raised to the command of the frigate Hancock of 32 guns, his capture of the Fox increased his high reputation for bravery and skill. But he was taken prisoner by the Rainbow of 40 guns July 8, 1777, and suffered a long and rigorous confinement on board that ship at Halifax, and in Mill prison, precluded from further actual service till near the close of the war. In Sept. 1782 the Hague frigate was intrusted to his care. The cruise was peculiarly unhappy. A few days after leaving Martinique he was driven by a British seventy-four on a sand bank at the back of Guadeloupe. Three ships of the line, having joined this ship, came to within point blank shot, and with springs on their cables opened a most tremendous fire. Having supported the heavy cannonade for three days, on the fourth day the frigate was got off, and hoisting the continental standard at the main-top gallant mast, 13 guns were fired in farewell defiance. On his return to Boston a few months afterwards, he was arrested to answer a variety of charges exhibited against him by one of his officers. The proceedings of the court were not altogether in approbation of his conduct. Memoirs of his life, which should vindicate his character, were promised, but they have never appeared. He died in Boston Feb. 12, 1793, aged 59, and was buried with distinction.

MANNERS, John, marquis of Granby, son of the duke of Rutland, was born, Jan. 1721. He distinguished himself as a soldier, and went to the German wars, under Ferdinand of Brunswick, as general of the British forces; and during the campaigns on the continent, obtained great and deserved popularity by his conduct in the battles of Minden, Warburg, Kirk-Denkern, Græbstein, and Hounburgh. He died 1770, highly respected by the nation and by the government.

MANNING, James, D.D. first president of the college in Rhode Island, was a native of New Jersey, and graduated at Nassau hall in 1762. When he began to preach, several of his baptist brethren in New Jersey and Pennsylvania proposed the establishment of a college in Rhode Island, on account of the religious freedom, which was there enjoyed, and directed their attention towards him as its president. The charter was obtained in Feb. 1764, and in 1765 he removed to Warren to make preparations for carrying the design into execution. In Sept. the seminary was opened, and it was soon replenished with students. In 1770 the institution was removed to Providence, where a spacious building had been erected. He was soon chosen pastor of the baptist church in that town, and he continued in the discharge of the duties of these two offices, except in an interval of about six months, in 1786, when he was a member of congress, till his death, 1791, aged 52.

MANNINGHAM, Thomas, D.D. a learned prelate, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He became rector of East Tystead, Hants, preacher of the Rolls, 1694, rector of St. Andrew's Holborn, 1691, the next year canon, and afterwards dean of Windsor, and 1709, bishop of Chichester. He published some occasional sermons, and died 25th Aug. 1722, and was buried in St. Andrew's church.

MANNORI, Lewis, author of Memoirs and Pleadings, in 18 vols. 12mo. a work curious and interesting, was an advocate of the parliament of Paris, and died in that city, 1778, aged 82. He exposed himself to the satire of Voltaire, for being engaged in a cause against him.

MANSARD, Francis, a French architect, born 1593. His genius was displayed in the erection of the gate of the church of the Feuillans, of the church of les Fillers Ste. Marie, the hotels de Bouillon, Toulouse, and Jars, and other edifices in Paris, and in the provinces. He was first architect to the king, and superintendent of the royal buildings, in which he was succeeded by his nephew, of the same name, also an ingenious man, who was honored with the order of St. Michael. He died 1666, and his nephew 1708, aged 69.

MANSFELD, Peter Ernest, count de, an able statesman in the service of the emperor of Germany. He was made prisoner at Ivoy, 1552, and when restored to liberty, he obtained the government of Luxembourg, where his administration was conducted with prudence and ability, to the maintenance of tranquillity, in the midst of the troubles of Brabant. His services were considered as so meritorious, that he was appointed governor of the whole country. He died 1604, aged 87.

MANSFELD, Ernest de, natural son of count Mansfeld, distinguished himself so much that he was legitimated by the emperor Rodolphus II. He was refused the succession of his father's honors and possessions, in consequence of which he joined the protestants in 1610, and showed himself a vigorous enemy of the house of Austria. He died at a village in the territory of Venice, Nov. 1626, aged 46.

MANSFIELD, Jared, colonel, L.L.D., professor of natural philosophy in the military academy at West Point, was born in New Haven, and graduated at Yale college 1777. He was surveyor general of the United States. A few years before his death he retired from West Point to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he resided while surveyor. He died 1830, aged 71. He published Essays mathematical and physical, 1802.

MANSTEIN, Christopher Herman de, a Russian writer, born at Petersburg, 1711. He was a brave officer, and distinguished in the service of the Russian and Prussian monarchs. He was shot in the war of 1757, while serving as major-general at the head of a Prussian regiment, leaving two sons and four daughters. He wrote a valuable work, Memoirs of Russia, 2 vols. 8vo. printed at Lyons, 1772, and Leipsic, 1781, and published in English, in 2 vols. 4to. under the care of Mr. Hume.

MANTEGNA, Andrea, an Italian painter, born at a village near Padua, 1451. He was originally a shepherd, but the rough drawings which he made for his amusement, were seen and admired: he was placed under a master, and improved so much, that at the age of 17 he painted the altar piece of the church of St. Sophia, in Padua. He painted also another celebrated piece for the duke of Mantua, the triumphs of Julius Cæsar, which have been placed in the collection of Hampton-court. He died at Mantua, 1517.

MANTICA, Francis, a native of Udina, professor of law at Padua. He afterwards went to Rome under the patronage of Sixtus VI. and of Clement VIII. who made him a cardinal. He wrote, de Coniuncturis Ultimarum Voluntatum, folio—Lucubrationes Vaticanæ—Decisiones Rotæ Rom. and died 1614, aged 80.

MANTINUS, James, author of a book on the Republic of Plato, and translator of the works of Avicenna and Averroes into Latin, was a Spanish physician in the 16th century, who practised with great reputation at Venice.

MANTON, Thomas, D.D. a native of Lawrence Lydiard, Somersetshire, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. He was ordained by bishop Hall, and had first the cure of Colyton, Devonshire, after which he settled at Stoke Newington, and became a popular preacher in London, and before the parliament. He was, at the restoration, chaplain to the king, but lost his preferment in 1662, for non-conformity, and in 1671 was imprisoned for officiating in a conventicle. He died 1677, aged 57, and was buried in Stoke Newington church. His works, consisting of Sermons, and other Calvinic tracts, were edited in 5 vols. folio.

MANTUAN, Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Mantua, 1443, the natural son of Peter Spagnolo, a man of distinction. He was affectionately educated by his father, and afterwards entered among the Carmelites, of whose order he became general. He, however, quitted them in disgust, 1515, and devoted himself to literature. He died the next year. His works, which possess not much animation, were printed at Paris, 1513, 3 vols. folio. A more perfect edition appeared at Antwerp, 1576, in 4 vols. 8vo.

MANUEL, Commenus, emperor of the east, after his father John, 1143, and to the prejudice of his elder brother Isaac, whom his father had disinherited. After repelling the invasion of Roger, king of Sicily, he made war against Dalmatia, Hungary, and Egypt, which he might have conquered, if not perfidiously abandoned by Amoury, king of Jerusalem, on whose assistance he too strongly relied. He died 1180.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, a celebrated printer, born at Bassano. He was the first who printed Greek with correctness and elegance; and he introduced that form of letters still in use, called Italics. His editions of the classics were held in high estimation. He died at Venice, where he had long exercised his profession with much success, 1516. One copy of his capital works was always printed on vellum.

MANUTIUS, Paul, son of Aldus, was of the same profession. He was librarian to Pius IV. and seconded his attempts to print all the Fathers in a new and elegant manner. He was far more learned than his father, and acquired, by the frequent reading of Cicero, such facility of elegant composition, that Scaliger says, a Roman could not have written better. He wrote epistles, very laborious—and Commentaries on Cicero, 4 vols. folio. He wrote besides, other works, the best of which is perhaps, his book de Legibus Romanorum. He died 1574; and it is said his days were shortened in consequence of youthful follies, and of domestic calamities.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, the younger son of Paul, was also a printer. He promised in his youth to obtain greater celebrity than his father and grandfather; but he proved unfortunate. Negligence produced distress, and he at last became so indigent, that he sold the excellent library of 30,000 volumes, collected by his ancestors, to maintain himself. Pope Clement VIII. made him director of the Vatican press. He died very poor 1597, at Rome. He wrote Commentaries on Cicero—a treatise on Orthography—Notes on Ancient Writers—three books of Epistles—the Lives of Cosimo de Medicis, and of Castruccio Castruciani.

MANZO, John Baptist, marquis de Villa, an Italian, who after serving with credit in the Spanish army, devoted himself to literature at Naples, where he assisted in the foundation of the Degli Otiosi academy. He wrote a Life of Tasso, 12mo.—Del Amore Dialogi, 8vo.—Rime, 12mo. and died at Naples, 1645, aged 84.

MAPLETOFT, John, D.D. an English divine, born June, 1631, at Margate-Inge, in Huntingdonshire, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He travelled with the sons of the earl of Northumberland, and at his return he took his degrees in medicine, and settled as a practitioner in London. Here he was distinguished as the friend of Willis, Sydenham, and Locke, of Tillotson, Patrick, Sherlock, and other learned men, and in 1670, he went with lord Essex, the ambassador to the court of Denmark. In 1675 he was chosen professor of physic of Gresham college, and 1676 attended the ambassador Montague, to France. He married in 1679, and then abandoning medicine, applied himself to divinity; took orders, 1682, and obtained the rectory of Braybrook, Northamptonshire, and some other preferment. He continued to preach in his church of St. Lawrence, Jewry, till he was turned of 80, and died 1721, at Westminster, aged 91. He translated Sydenham's Medical Observations into Latin, and wrote besides the Principles and duties of the Christian Religion, 8vo.—and other things.

MARAI, Marin, a celebrated musician, born at Paris, 1656. He composed some admired pieces for the theatres, especially Alcides—Ariadne and Bacchus—Semele and Aleyone, the last of which is his best performance. He died 15th Aug. 1728, aged 72, leaving nine children, some of whom inherited part of his great musical talents.

MARALDI, James Philip, a mathematician, born at Perinaldo, near Nice, 1665. He studied in France, and was engaged with Cassini, in constructing the great meridian line through France. He died 1729, aged 64, leaving behind him a catalogue of the fixed stars, and curious observations, printed in the memoirs of the academy of sciences, and pieces on bees, and petrefactions.

MARANA, John Paul, author of the Turkish Spy, a work once read with great avidity, and considered as authentic, but now regarded as half fictitious, was born at Genoa. He resided for some time at Paris, and again returned to his own country, where he died 1693, aged 51. The Turkish Spy was first published in 6 vols. 12mo. and in 1742, when the last edition appeared, another volume was added.

MARAT, John Paul, one of the atrocious leaders of the French revolution, was born at Beaudry, near Neuchâtel, in Switzerland, 1744. He studied medicine, but with little knowledge of it, he acquired public notice by passing as an empiric, and by selling at a high price, a water which he pretended could cure all diseases. After visiting England, he returned to Paris at the time that the revolution broke out, and with all the ardor of a man who wishes to profit by the miseries of the public, he began to attack the character of the ministers, especially Necker, in his Publiciste Parisien. To this vile, but popular publication, succeeded L'Ami du Peuple, in which he recommended in seditious language, revolt, pillage, and murder; he excited the soldiers to assassinate their generals, the poor to seize the property of the rich, and the profligate to cut off their enemies. Though the assembly viewed his conduct with detestation, and seized his papers, he continued his periodical labors, under the patronage of the jacobins, and when elected deputy to the convention, he appeared in the hall, armed with pistols. Delighting in blood, he promoted the murders of September, and never satisfied with carnage, he, by repeated accusations, carried the most virtuous of the citizens, and the bravest of the generals, to the guillotine, and declared with exultation, that the happiness of France required for its consolidation, the sacrifice of 300,000 more lives. This execrable wretch might still have added to the number of his victims, but a heroine arose to rid the world of the blood-thirsty tyrant. Charlotte Corday obtained access to him while he was in his bath, and with a blow of a dagger she laid the monster dead at her feet, 14th July, 1793. His remains were honored by his sanguinary accomplices, with all the distinction due only to a hero, and were deposited in great pomp, in the pantheon. But though prejudice or fear exalted this monster to the rank of a god, and dedicated busts, pyramids, and temples to his honor, the public opinion soon changed, his memory was insulted, and his very body dug up, and thrown into a common sink. He wrote Man, or the Principles of the Influence of the Soul on the Body, and of the Body on the Soul, 1775, 2 vols. 12mo. a work severely criticised by Voltaire—Discoveries on Fire, Electricity, and Light, 8vo. 1779—Discovery on Light, 8vo. in which he attacks Newton's System—and Memoirs on Electricity.

MARATTI, Carlo, an Italian painter, born 1625, at Camerino, in the march of Ancona. His fondness for painting was early discovered, and he was sent to Rome, where he became pupil to Andrea Sacchi, and soon acquired celebrity by the grace and beauty of his figures. He was knighted, and received a pension from Clement XI. and was appointed painter in ordinary to Louis XIV. He studied the pieces of Raphael, the Caraccis, and Guido, with astonishing success, and chiefly excelled as the painter of female saints, and madonnas. He died at Rome, loaded with honors and opulence, 1713, aged 88.

MARCA, Peter de, an eminent French writer and prelate, born 1594, at Gart, in Bearn. He studied the law, and in 1621 was made president of the parliament of Bearn, and in 1639, counsellor of state at Paris. He published in 1640, "the History of Bearn" which widely established his reputation as an elegant writer, and a good politician, and was then engaged to defend and explain the liberties of the Gallican church, which some enemies of cardinal Richelieu represented as desirous of separating in an independent patriarehate from the see of Rome. His book, "De Concordiâ Sacerdotii & Imperii," 1641, though written with moderation, and at the command of the French king, gave some offence to the pope, and when the author in consequence of his services, was nominated to the see of Conserans, his consecration was delayed till he had made his peace with his ecclesiastical master, by the publication of another treatise, De Singulâri Primatu Petri, in which he asserted the supremacy of the pope. He was sent in 1644, as visitor general to Catalonia, and executed his office with such popularity, that when ill the public prayers of the province were offered for his recovery. He took possession of his bishopric in 1648, and soon after was raised to the see of Toulouse, where he was admitted in 1655. He afterwards distinguished himself in the general assembly of the clergy, in opposition to the jansenists, and in 1658, was made minister of state. In 1660, he was engaged at Rossillon, on determining the boundaries of the French and Spanish territories in the Pyrenees, in which he was greatly assisted by his classical knowledge. He obtained in 1662, the high dignity of archbishop of Paris, but died there in June, on the same day that the bulls arrived from Rome to confirm his elevation. De Marca was a man of extraordinary talents, which he had assiduously cultivated at Toulouse.

MARCEAU, Francis Severin Desgraviers, an eminent French general, was born, in 1769, at Chartres; distinguished himself in Vendee, at Fleurus, and on the Rhine, in 1795 and 1796; and was killed at Hochsteinbach, in the latter year. To great military talents Marceau united great virtues. So much was he respected, that when he was buried in the entrenched camp of Coblenz, the Austrian and French armies joined in honoring the ceremony by volleys of artillery. Lord Byron has paid a lasting tribute to his worth in the third canto of Childe Harold.

MARCEL, William, author of a History of the Origin of the French monarchy, 4 vols. 12mo.—Chronological Tables of Ancient History, sacred and profane, was a French advocate, and died commissary at Arles, 1708, aged 61.

MARCELLI, Benedict, the prince of music, according to the flattery of the Italians, was a noble Venetian, who excelled not only in music, but also in philosophy, and in poetry. His "Fashionable Stage," in Italian, in which he ridicules modern operas, is his best prose composition, and his chief poetical work is the comedy Toseanismo. He died 1739, aged 58.

MARCELLUS, a physician of Side, in Pamphylia, whence he is surnamed Sidetes. He flourished under Adrian and the Antonines, and wrote a poem on medicine, now lost.—A physician of Bordeaux, author of some medical works, lived about 381 A.D.

MARCET, Alexander, an eminent physician, chemist, and natural philosopher, who was born at Geneva in 1770. He went to Scotland in 1793, and studied at Edinburgh, where he took his degrees. He then settled in Loudon, and obtained great reputation as a medical practitioner and public lecturer, as well as by his various important scientific discoveries. He was naturalized in England in 1802, but in 1814 he returned to his native country. The reception which he experienced from his fellow citizens, who nominated him a member of the supreme council of Geneva, determined him to fix his future residence in that city; but having made a visit to London, where he had remained a year, he was about to take his departure, when he died Oct. 19, 1822. He published many valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and in various scientific journals, besides "An Essay on the Chemical History of Calculi."

MARCH, Ausias, a poet of Valentia in the 15th century. He wrote amatory verses in praise of his fair countrywoman, Theresa Bon, as Petrarch celebrated his Laura, and in consequence of the similarity of their poetry they have been accused of stealing one from the other, though it is probable that they both borrowed from some earlier poet.

MARCHAND, Prosper, a French writer, who quitted France to profess the protestant religion in Holland. He published there, "the Literary Journal," and died at a great age, 1756. He published besides, "the History of Printing,"—Dictionnaire Historique, two small folio vols. and a new edition of the dictionary and letters of Bayle.

MARCHE, Oliver de la, a French writer, gentleman to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, and afterwards in the service of Charles the Rash, who was slain at the battle of Nancy, 1477, and next in the employment of Maximilian of Austria, and of the archduke Philip. He died at Brussels, 1501. His works are "Memoirs or Chronicle," 4to. 1610—a Treatise on Duels, 8vo.—the Triumph of Virtuous Women, 8vo. 1529.

MARCHETTI, Alexander, a physician and poet, born at Pontorno, near Pisa, 1633. He succeeded his friend Borelli, as professor of mathematics at Pisa, and in his lectures preferred reason and experiment to authority, and to Aristotle. He died 1714. He wrote poems in 4to.—treatises on philosophical subjects—a translation of Lucretius, in Italian verse, 4to.—a translation of Anacreon.

MARCHIN, Ferdinand count, a native of Liege, who signalized himself in the French armies at the battles of Flurus and Nerwinde, and at the siege of Charleroi. He was sent in 1701, as ambassador from Louis XV. to the king of Spain, and behaved with great disinterestedness in refusing the rank of nobility from the Spanish court. He was afterwards in the army in Germany, and commanded the retreat at the fatal battle of Hockstet. He was wounded at the battle of Turin, which had been fought against his advice, 7th Sept. 1706, and he died soon after the amputation of his thigh.

MARCIANUS, an obscure Thracian, raised to imperial dignity on the death of Theodosius II

His virtues were many, and the expectations of Rome were great, but he unfortunately died while preparing to repel the barbarians, who had invaded Africa, 457, aged 69.

MARCILIUS, Theodore, a learned German critic, born at Arnheim, in Gueldres, 1543. He was educated under his father, a man of learning, and afterwards at Deventer, and Louvain. He visited Paris, and taught belles lettres there, and in 1602 was made royal professor of the Latin tongue. He died 1617. Though abused by Scaliger, he was a learned man, and published Pythagoras' Golden Verses, with annotations, besides Historia Stenarum, 8vo.—some poems and orations.

MARDUEL, John, a native of Lyons, who studied for the ecclesiastical profession at Villefranche, Beaujolois, and Paris. He became minister of St. Roch, where his conduct as a pastor, as a peace maker, and as a man, was most exemplary. He died universally respected, 1787, aged 88.

MARE, William de la, or MARA, a Latin poet, of noble birth in the Cotentin. Disgusted with the court, where he was secretary to the chancellor, he retired to Caen, where he became rector of the university, and in 1510 treasurer and canon of Coutances. He wrote two poems, Chimæra, 1514, 4to.—De tribus fugiendis, Venere, Ventre & Pluma, 1512, 4to.

MARE, Nicholas de la, principal magistrate of the Chatelet, under Louis XIV. with whom he was in great favor, died 1723, aged 82. He was author of a valuable Treatise on the Police, 3 vols. folio, to which a fourth was added after his death.

MARECHAL, George, a native of Calais, son of a poor officer. His skill in surgical operations was very great, especially in lithotomy, and his attention to Louis XIV. when attacked by an abscess in the neck, 1696, was rewarded with the appointment of surgeon to the royal household, in 1703 he was made maître d'hôtel, and received a patent of nobility. He died at his seat at Bievre, 1736, aged 78. The memoirs of the academy of surgery at Paris were enriched by some of his papers.

MARECHAL, Peter Sylvan, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and afterwards became a periodical writer at the revolution. He wrote nineteen different things, some of which were very profane and indecent, among which were, a book escaped from the Deluge—the Pantheon—Dictionary of Atheists—Voyage of Pythagoras, 6 vols. 8vo. a weak imitation of Barthelemy's Anarcharsis, &c. He died at Paris, 18th Jan. 1803.

MARETS, Samuel des, a protestant divine, born at Oismond, in Picardy, 1599. He studied belles lettres at Paris, and divinity at Saumur and Geneva. He took orders in 1620, though he was of small stature, and went by the name of the little preacher; but he grew up to his 25th year, and attained nearly the full size. He was minister successively at Laon, Falaise, Sedan, and in 1642, became professor at Groningen, where his abilities were displayed to the great advantage and celebrity of that university. He was afterwards invited to Lausanne, and in 1663 to Leyden, but as he prepared to remove to this place, he died at Groningen, May 18th, the same year. In his literary labors he was engaged in controversies for 18 years, with Boetius, and for a little time with Daille. He also attacked Grotius, for his explanations about Antichrist, and also waged a paper war with Comenius and Labadie and Peter Serrarius, among those enthusiasts who in favor of their reveries consider the striking events of human governments as influenced by the position or motion of the stars. His works were very numerous, and on various subjects, and showed astonishing marks of knowledge and erudition. He had formed a plan for their republication, and had collected materials for four folio volumes, when he died. He left two sons, Henry, who published a French edition of the bible, with notes, 3 vols. folio—Latin Catechism on Grace—and Daniel.

MARGARET, sister of Edgar Atheling, fled to Scotland on the invasion of William the Conqueror, and married Malcolm, king of the country. She was a very amiable and benevolent princess. Her three sons, Edgar, Alexander, and David, successively filled the throne of Scotland, and her daughter Matilda married Henry I. of England. She died 16th Nov. 1093, aged 47.

MARGARET, daughter of Waldemar III. king of Denmark, and wife of Haquin, king of Norway, ascended in 1387, the throne of Denmark, and that of Norway, on the death of her son, Olaus. When the Swedes, dissatisfied with the conduct of Albert, their king, offered her the crown of the country, she accepted the conditions, and after a bloody war of seven years, she placed it on her own head, 1394, and by her valor and heroic deeds deserved and obtained the surname of the Semiramis of the north. Thus mistress of three kingdoms, she took measures to render their connection indissoluble by the celebrated law called the union of Calmar, but unfortunately for herself and her successors, she regarded little the solemnity of agreements, and by violating the laws which she had enacted, and by oppressing her subjects she rendered herself unpopular, and her government odious. She died little lamented, 1412, aged 59, after a reign of 26 years. She was succeeded by her nephew, Eric, duke of Pomerania.

MARGARET, daughter of the emperor Maximilian I. was betrothed to the dauphin of France, afterwards Charles VIII. but did not marry him. She was afterwards married to the infant of Spain, and after his death she took for her next husband, Philibert, duke of Savoy. She was governess of the Netherlands, and displayed her religious zeal against the Lutherans. She died 1st Dec. 1530, aged 50.

MARGARET of Valois, sister of Francis I. married, 1509, the duke of Alençon, and afterwards, in 1526, Henry d'Albert, king of Navarre, by whom she had Jane, mother of the celebrated Henry IV. She was a great princess, and paid particular attention to the encouragement of commerce, of agriculture, and of the arts, among her subjects. Her partiality for the protestants was so great, that she wrote the Mirror of a Sinful Soul, which was censured and condemned by the Sorbonne. She died at the castle of Orlés, 2d Dec. 1549, aged 57, of a catarrh, which it is said she caught in making observations on a comet. She was not only the patroness of learning, but herself learned. She wrote Heptameron, after the manner of Boccaccio, a work which, however, though in a pleasing style, is dangerous, from the licentious sentiments and indelicate expressions with which it occasionally abounds. She wrote besides, poetical pieces, called Les Marguerite de la Marguerite des Princesses, published 1547, and the Triumph of the Lamb.

MARGARET of Anjou, daughter of René, king of Sicily, married Henry VI. of England. She was a woman of masculine character, but her heroism was unhappily tainted with cruelty, as she inhumanly caused to be strangled, the duke of Gloucester, who had opposed her marriage. More calculated to govern than to obey, she guided the counsels of her weak and pusillanimous husband during the wars of York and Lancaster, and when he fell a captive into the hands of the duke of York, in 1455, she levied an army to rescue him, and after defeating her enemies, entered triumphantly into the submissive capital. In 1460 she had the mortification to see her troops routed by Warwick, at Northampton, and her husband again a captive; but undismayed, she traversed the kingdom, and every where collecting her adherents, gave battle to her opponents at Wakefield, and left the duke of York dead in the field. Warwick was next defeated near St. Albans, but another battle at Santon, in Yorkshire, proved fatal to her cause, and she fled from the kingdom to implore the assistance of her brother, Louis XI. Though unsuccessful in her request, she returned to England again, to lose the battle of Hexham. Other encounters proved equally unfortunate, and at last Margaret was taken prisoner in the field of battle, 1471, but recovered her liberty four years after, by paying a ransom of 50,000 crowns. After thus defending the cause of her husband in 12 battles, she retired to France, where she died 25th Aug. 1482, aged 59.

MARGARET, countess of Richmond and Derby, was born at Bletsoe, Bedfordshire, 1441. She married Edmund, earl of Richmond, half brother to Henry VI. and by him had Henry VII. After her husband's death she married sir Henry Stafford, and for her third husband, in 1482, took Thomas Stanley, created earl of Derby, who died 1504. To all the virtues of private and domestic life, she united great intelligence, and a deep regard for learning. She not only founded two colleges at Cambridge, St. John's and Christ's, but also established there, and at Oxford, a theological professorship. She also endowed a school at Torrington, and at Wymborn. She died at Westminster, 29th June, 1509, surviving only three months, her son, the king. She is described by bishop Fisher, who preached her funeral sermon, as allied to 30 kings and queens. Her will, which is very curious, is preserved in the collection of noble works, 1780, 4to. She translated from the French, the Mirror of Gold for the sinful Soul, besides the fourth book of Gerson's or Kempis' Treatise on imitating the Life of Christ, printed 1504.

MARGON, William Plantavit de la Pause de, a French author and journalist, born at Languedoc. He published at Paris, such severe reflections in favor of the jesuits, against the jansenists, that the court banished him to the isle of Lerins, but restored him to liberty, 1740, provided he removed to the monastery of the Bernardines, where he died 1760. He wrote memoirs of Marshal Villars, 3 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs of the duke of Berwick, 2 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs of Tourville, 3 vols.—Letters of Fitz Moritz, and other tracts.

MARGRAAF, Andrew Sigismund, a native of Berlin, who studied chemistry under Newinan, Juncker, and Henckel, and acquired celebrity by his many ingenious experiments. In his mineralogical researches he discovered that semi-metal, called manganese, and by his assiduity and labors, he rendered more easy and plain, the various operations of the chemical system. This able and indefatigable man died in his native city of Berlin, director of the academy, 1782, aged 73.

MARGUNIO, Massineo, son of a marshal of Candia, established in 1747, a printing office at Venice, and devoted himself to the printing of Greek books. When his house and property were destroyed by the villany of an incendiary, he returned to Candia, and became an ecclesiastic and bishop of Cerigo. He died 1602, aged 80. He wrote Greek Anacreontic odes, Augsburg, 1592, Svo.—poems preserved in the Corpus Pœtarum Græcorum, Geneva, 2 vols. fol. 1606.

MARIA THERESA, empress, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, daughter of the emperor Charles VI. and Elizabeth Christina of Brunswick Wolfenbittel, was born 13th of May, 1717. On the death of her brother she was destined by her father to succeed to all his honors, as the famous pragmatic sanction in 1713 had declared that in failure of issue male the eldest of his daughters was to ascend the throne. In 1736 Maria Theresa married Francis Stephen of Lorraine, and on her father's death in 1740 she was raised to the throne. Her elevation was attended with the most disastrous effects of war, the king of Prussia immediately seized Silesia, and subdued Moravia, and on the other side Charles Albert, duke of Bavaria, supported by France made rapid conquests in the imperial dominions, and was crowned king of Bohemia at Prague, and emperor by the title of Charles VII. at Frankfort 1742. Maria in the midst of these disasters quitted Vienna, and throwing herself with her infant son in her arms in the midst of the assembled states of the Hungarian nation, she addressed them in these pathetic words in Latin: "Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, attacked by my nearest relations, I have no resource left but in your fidelity, courage, and constancy: I intrust into your hands the children of your kings, they depend on you for life and safety." The appeal was received with shouts of applause. Let us die for our queen Maria Theresa was the general reply, and soon after, Maria, who had lately scarce a town where to give birth in security to her child, saw her faithful Hungarians headed by the brave Kevenhuller advance to her aid. Lintz, Passau, Munich, opened their gates to the conqueror, and by a treaty with England, Maria obtained succors in money and in troops, and was enabled to defeat the king of Sardinia, and to detach the king of Prussia from the general alliance, by ceding to him the provinces of Silesia, and of Glatz. Flushed with success, Maria was crowned queen of Bohemia, at Prague, on 11th May 1743, and the following 11th of June she had the happiness to see the king of England in person obtain in her cause the famous victory of Dettingen over the allied forces. But though she gained to her side the king of Sardinia, she had the mortification to see the king of Prussia again in arms, and, while she cemented an alliance with the king of Poland, she was informed that Bohemia, and the Low Countries, were invaded by her powerful enemies. The battles of Fontenoy, Rocoux, and la Feldt, were fought; but though victory might seem doubtful she had the satisfaction to place the imperial crown on the head of her husband at Frankfort, 4th Oct. 1745, and she again detached from the number of her enemies the king of Prussia by the treaty of Dresden. At last after a war of eight years the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 18th Oct. 1748, settled the dissensions of the continent, and Maria Theresa, now delivered from enemies who had once meditated her destruction, devoted herself to repair the ravages of war among her oppressed subjects. But while the ports of the Mediterranean and of the North were open to commerce, and while arts were every where munificently encouraged, the empress did not forget that power is best protected by vigilance, and therefore her armies continued to be well disciplined, and military institutions encouraged with particular attention. Not only fortifications were built in the most impregnable places, but observatories for the encouragement of science and astronomy were erected at Vienna, Gratz, and Tyrnau. Hospitals were opened for the friendly reception of those brave men who had fought and bled for their country, and the relations of the infirm and meritorious soldier were rewarded with all the munificence which became a great, a patriotic and humane princess. These days of happiness were unfortunately clouded by the irruption of the king of Prussia into Saxony 1756. Brown checked his career by the undecided battle of Lowositz; but the following year Frederic renewed his attack, and under the walls of Prague obtained some advantage over Brown, who was wounded in the fight. Daun succeeded to the command, and by the successful battle of Chotzenitz, obliged the Prussians to retreat, and delivered Bohemia from her invaders in so masterly a manner, that Maria Theresa, to commemorate the heroic exploit, established the military order of her name 1757. The battles of Hock-kirchen, Kunersdorf, Maxen, Landshut, and Siplitz, were favorable to the cause of the empress, and though her forces were defeated at Lissa, and Breslaw, she maintained her superiority, and at the peace of Hubertsburg in 1763, she kept possession of the same territories which she held before the war. In 1764, she caused her son Joseph to be crowned king of the Romans; but the death of her husband the next year plunged her into the deepest sorrow. In 1772, she joined Prussia and Russia in the dismemberment of Poland, and made Lemberg the capital of these new dominions. The death of Maximilian Joseph, elector of Bavaria, rekindled war between her and Prussia; but the peace of Teschen two years after restored tranquillity to the empire, and gave her a small portion of the Bavarian dominions. After a long reign, checked by prosperity and adversity, Maria Theresa met the approach of death with the same fortitude with which she had viewed the accidents of life. She died at Vienna, 29th Nov. 1780, aged 63. Of her daughters, Antoinette was queen of France; Charlotte queen of Naples; Mary Amelia allied to the duke of Parma; Joseph her son was king of the Romans, and of Hungary; Leopold was grand duke of Tuscany; Ferdinand was governor of Lombardy; Maximilian grand-master of the Teutonic order, and coadjutor of Cologne and Munster; and Maria Christina, the wife of the duke of Saxe Teschen, was governor of the Low Countries.

MARIA ANTOINETTE, queen of France, arch-duchess of Austria, daughter of the emperor Francis I, and of Maria Theresa, was born at Vienna 21 Nov. 1755. On the 16th May 1770, she married the dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XVI. and her arrival in France was celebrated with every demonstration of public joy. Antoinette, unfortunately surrounded by flatterers who fanned her pleasures, and gratified her inclinations, was represented as voluptuous and criminal, and the celebrated trial concerning the necklace, served in some degree to raise the indignation of the public against her conduct. The poverty of the treasury was invidiously attributed to her extravagance; but though she was too liberal in her expenses, nothing criminal could be proved against her. As if foreseeing the calamities of the state, she opposed with all her influence the convocation of the states which were to lead her and her husband to the scaffold; but though calumniated and insulted, she maintained her dignity, and made the happiness of her husband the first wish of her heart. The ferocious events of the revolution, brought on the 6th of October, when the sanguinary cannibals of Paris, appeared at Versailles, threatening aloud that they would tear her to pieces. The doors of her apartment were battered down, and the bed from which she had just escaped was pierced through with a thousand stabs; yet in the midst of this dreadful attack Antoinette exhibited her usual serenity, and presenting herself alone on the balcony, she changed, by her noble demeanor, the fury of the populace into admiration and shouts of applause. Forced to accompany the king to Paris, in a journey of six hours, while the heads of two of her murdered body guards were raised on pikes by the side of her carriage, and while insults, threats and blasphemies every moment rent the air, she preserved the same undaunted courage. After the flight to Varennes her magnanimity did not desert her, and when questioned by the insidious duputes, she replied with becoming dignity. On the 20th June, and the 10th August, 1792, those days of horror and anarchy, she again saw herself insulted, and with difficulty saved from the hands of assassins, and in the assembly she heard unmoved the decrees which robbed the monarch of his throne, and which called on the most worthless of his subjects to try him as a criminal. She no sooner heard of the condemnation of her husband than she congratulated him on the termination of his sufferings, and after parting from him in an agony of grief, her only request to his murderers was to give her a suit of mourning, which she wore till her own fate was decided. That she might not feel the comforts of the afflicted in sharing her sorrows with her family, she was torn from her son 4th July, 1793, and a month after, an armed force entered her cell in the middle of the night, and forced her from her bed of straw to a low and damp dungeon. On the 3d of October she was carried before the revolutionary tribunal, and accused of squandering the public money, and of exhausting the treasury to enrich her brother the emperor, and of holding a traitorous correspondence with the enemies of her country; but the crimination could not be proved, and her sufferings failed not to excite interest in her favor even among her prejudiced judges. It was then that the miscreants charged the unhappy queen with attempts to corrupt the morals of her own son; a scandalous imputation which roused all her feelings; I appeal, exclaimed she, in a burst of noble indignation, I appeal to all mothers, whether an action so odious is possible. Nothing, however, could avail, she retired fatigued to her dungeon, after being detained 18 hours before her cruel judges, and the following morning at 11 she was summoned to ascend the cart which was to conduct her to the scaffold. She obeyed with dignity, and in profound silence, and after viewing with unusual attention as she passed the palace of the Thuilleries, the former scene of her greatness and of her pleasures, she mounted the scaffold with precipitation, and falling on her knees prayed for forgiveness on her murderers, and bidding adieu to her absent children, to whose father she was again to be united, she laid down her head on the fatal machine, and lifting up her eyes to heaven, closed them in death 16th Oct. 1793. She was then near 38, but it is remarkable that her misfortunes had changed the color of her hair to a silvery white, and her countenance which with every feature of beauty once beamed benignity and love, had assumed an aspect of dejection and settled melancholy, and she had nearly lost the use of one of her eyes from the damp and unwholesome air to which she was exposed. Her body was thrown into the Magdalen churchyard and immediately consumed with quick lime. In the powers of her mind Antoinette had been carefully cultivated, she spoke French with purity, and the Italian as her native tongue, and she was so well acquainted with the Latin, that when twice addressed in that language, she made an immediate extemporaneous reply in the same language and with elegance. She was well versed in geography, and had bestowed also much time on the reading of history. She had four children, Maria Theresa Charlotte, born 1773, who married her cousin the duke of Angoulême, Louis born 1781, who died 1799, Charles Louis born 1785, who died 1793, and a daughter who died an infant. Her life has been published by various authors, but that of Mad. Guenard, 3 vols. 12mo. is recommended by the French biographers.

MARIANA, John, a Spanish historian, born at Talavera, in Castille, 1537. He entered into the society of the jesuits, and was a most able divine; he was professor of divinity four years at Rome, two in Sicily, and five at Paris, after which he returned to Spain, and spent the remainder of his life at Toledo. He made himself particularly known by his tract, "de Rege & de Regis Institutione," in which he defended the assassination of Henry III. of France, and supported, that the authority of the people was superior to that of the prince. This work, which, it is said, inspired Ravallac with the diabolical scheme of murdering Henry IV. was burnt at Paris by order of the parliament, and drew upon the author and the jesuites, very severe censures. His greatest performance is, the History of Spain, in 30 books, originally written by him in Latin, but also published in Spanish. In this work, he brought the history to the end of Ferdinand's reign, as he dreaded to treat about more modern times. He, however, afterwards wrote a supplement, and came down to the year 1621, when Philip IV. succeeded to the crown; and the work was, after his death, continued by Salcedo, and after him, by Voren de Soto, to the year 1669. This excellent history, commended by Rapin, and by others, for the greatness of the design, and the nobleness of the style, every where sublime and interesting, has, like all other works of genius, met with cavillers. Mariana died at Toledo, 1624, aged 87. He wrote also a treatise on Weights and Measures—Notes on the Old Testament, a very valuable work, and after his death appeared in Latin, French, and Italian—a treatise on the Faults of the Government of the society of the Jesuits. The best edition of his "History" in Spanish, is that of Ibarra, Madrid, 1780, 2 vols. folio; and in Latin, that of the Hague 1722, 4 vols. folio.

MARIETTE, Peter John, son of a Paris bookseller and engraver, was secretary to the French king, and chancery comptroller, and died 1774. He wrote, Traité des Pierres Gravées, 2 vols. folio—Lettres sur la Fontaine de la Rue Grenelle—Lettres à Caylus—besides a catalogue of M. Banson's Plates, 8vo—and an Account of the Engravings from M. Crozat's pictures, 2 vols. folio. His collection of engravings was said to be very valuable.

MARIGNAN, John James Melichino, marquis de, a native of Milan, who by his valor was recommended to the favor of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan. Sforza prevailed upon him, and upon another of his officers, to become the murderers of Visconti, a Milanese noble, and after this horrid deed, took measures to destroy both of them, that the suspicion might never attach to him. One fell, but Marignan escaped, and was made governor of Musso, on the lake Como, which he in 1523, exchanged for the service of the emperor, and the command of Marignan, of which he assumed the title. He was successful in 1554, against the French troops under Strozzi, whom he defeated in Tuscany, and he took Sienna, where he permitted his troops to commit horrid cruelties. He died at Milan, 1555, aged 60.

MARIGNY, James Carpentier de, an ecclesiastic, born at Marigny, near Nevers. He became the friend of cardinal de Retz, and severely satirical against Mazarine. He died of an apoplexy, 1670, distinguished more for his wit, than the purity of his morals. His letters appeared at the Hague, 1678. He wrote also, some poems, and according to some, he is author of "Alleyn's book," in which the killing of a tyrant, after the example of Moses, is defended as lawful. The author of the History of the 12th Century—and of the History of the Arabs, and their Revolutions, in 8 vols. was an ecclesiastic, who bore this name, and died at Paris 1762.

MARIKOWSKY, Martin, a native of Rosenau in Hungary, eminent as a physician. He was actively employed in examining the causes and the progress of the epidemic diseases which proved so fatal to the Hungarian and Turkish armies; in consequence of which he published his Observations in the Ephemerides Sirmienses, 1763. He translated Tissot's Advice on Health, into the Hungarian language; and died at Sirmich in Slavonia, 1772, aged 44.

MARILLAC, Louis de, a French officer, patronised by Henry IV. and raised under Louis XIII. to the rank of marshal of France. Though he owed much of his good fortune to the favor of Richelieu, it is said, that he conspired with his brother Michael, against that powerful minister. The cardinal was informed of the machinations of his enemies, and the two brothers were brought to a severe trial, and on pretence of being guilty of various acts of extortion and peculation, they were condemned. Louis was beheaded at Paris, 10th May, 1632, and the other died in a dungeon soon after.

MARIN, Michael Angelo, a novel writer, born at Marseilles. He became an ecclesiastic, and obtained the confidence and patronage of pope Clement XIII. by whose advice he began to publish the Acts of Martyrs, which, however, he did not finish. His romances are esteemed, and they greatly promote the cause of virtue and religion. This amiable character died of a dropsy in the heart, April, 1767, in his 70th year.

MARINI, John Ambrose, a native of Genoa, author of il Caloandre Fidelle, 1641, 8vo. a romance, translated by Scuderi and Caylus into French—Nuova Gare de Disperati, ten times edited, also translated into French. These romances were popular, and were the first to describe the manners, dangers, and heroic deeds of ancient chivalry.

MARINO, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Naples, 1569. His father, who was a lawyer, intended him for his own profession, but the youth had imbibed such fondness for literature, that he sold his law books to purchase poetry. This so exasperated his father, that he turned him away from his protection, but he found, by the brilliancy of his genius, patronage with the duke of Bovino, the prince of Conca and Crescentio, and at last with cardinal Aldobrandini, nephew to the pope. With this patron he visited Turin, and gained there the friendship of the duke, Charles Emmanuel; but in the midst of his prosperity, he excited the jealousy of Murtola, the duke's secretary, who, as a poet, viewed with envy the honors heaped on him. From abusive language, and satirical sonnets, little mischief could be expected, but Murtola at last discharged a pistol at his rival, and nearly killed him. After this Marino went to Paris, at the invitation of queen Margaret, and found after her death, a liberal patroness in Mary de Medicis. He returned to Rome 1622, and went afterwards to Naples, where he died of a retention of urine, 1625. His works are numerous. He wrote, Strage degli Innocenti, a poem, 1533—Rime, in three parts—la Murtoleide, 4to.—Letters—but the best of his works is, "Adone," a heroic poem, which ranks with the Aminto of Tasso, and the Pastor Fido of Guarini. The best edition is the Elzevir, 4 vols. 16no. 1673.

MARION, Francis, a distinguished American officer in the revolutionary war, was a native of South Carolina. He was engaged in agricultural pursuits until the year 1759, when he became a soldier, and served with credit against the Cherokee Indians. As soon as the war between the mother country and the colonies broke out, he was called to the command of a company in his native state. In 1776, he co-operated bravely in the defence of fort Moultrie, and soon reached the rank of lieutenant colonel commandant of a regiment, in which capacity he acted during the siege of Charleston. He became, subsequently, brigadier general in the militia of South Carolina, and as such was an indefatigable, and most useful partisan. The country from Camden to the sea coast, between the Pedee, and Santee rivers, was the scene of his operations. Many very striking and characteristic anecdotes of his prowess, and habits, are related in the life of him, written by colonel Hovey, and in Garden's Anecdotes of the revolutionary war. It is stated that in addition to his distinction in partisan warfare, general Marion acquired much reputation by the assistance which he bestowed in conducting the sieges of the captured posts held by the enemy. At Georgetown, fort Watson, fort Mose, Granby, Parker's ferry, and at Eutaw, he highly distinguished himself. He died in Feb. 1795, leaving an excellent personal, as well as high military character.

MARIOTTE, Edme, a native of Dijon, member of the Paris academy of sciences, and known as an able mathematician, and a learned ecclesiastic. He wrote a treatise on the Motion of Waters—on the movement of Pendulums—on Philosophy—on Levels—Experiments on Colors, &c. published together at Leyden, 1717, 2 vols. 4to. His experiments on hydraulics were very ingenious. He died 1684.

MARIVAUX, Peter Carlet de Chamblain de, a learned dramatic writer, born at Paris, 1633. He was very successful in his theatrical pieces, as well as his romances; and as he conveyed an useful moral under the veil of wit and sentiment, he wished, as he said, to make men more just and more humane. He joined de la Motte in the well-known dispute about the superiority of the ancients over the moderns. This amiable author, so strenuously the advocate of religion and virtue, died at Paris 11th of Feb. 1763, aged 75. His works are, Pieces de Theatre, 5 vols. 12mo.—Homere Travesti, an indifferent performance—the French Spectator, 2 vols. 12mo.—Vie de Marianne, 4 vols. 12mo. left unfinished, but one of the best French romances—le Paysan Parvenu, 12mo. a much admired composition—New Don Quixote—the Poor Philosopher, 2 vols. 12mo.

MARIUS CAIUS, a celebrated Roman, seven times consul. He first distinguished himself in Africa against Jugurtha, and by a series of heroic exploits against the Cimbri and Teutones, and the other enemies of his country, he became the most popular commander of Rome. His disputes with Sylla proved fatal to the Roman people. He died 86 B. C. His son inherited his ferocious character, and at last slew himself when defeated at Præneste, 82 B. C.

MARKHAM, Gervase, an English author, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. born at Gotham, Nottinghamshire. He was captain under Charles in the civil wars, and distinguished himself for his valor as well as learning. He wrote, "Herod and Antipater," a tragedy—some books on Husbandry—on Horsemanship—on Military Discipline—on the Art of Fowling, and was well skilled in French, Italian, and Spanish.

MARKLAND, Jeremiah, a learned critic, born 29th Oct. 1693, one of the 12 children of the Rev. Ralph M. the author of the Art of shooting flying. He was educated at Christ's hospital, London, and Peterhouse, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was first distinguished by his Epistola Critica, 1723, addressed to bishop Hare; and his literary fame was afterwards supported by the publication of Statius' Sylvæ—and of Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero—and a Dissertation on the four Orations ascribed to Cicero. In 1761, he published his excellent little treatise de Græcorum quintâ Declinatione Invari Syllabicâ & Inde Formatâ Latinorum Tertiâ, Quæstio Grammatica, of which only 40 copies were printed; but it appeared at the end of Euripides' Supplices Mulieres, 1763. After being an active tutor at Cambridge, Markland retired to Twyford; but though his finances were scanty, he refused to take orders, and thus lost the preferment which his friend, bishop Hare, was ready to bestow upon him. From the year 1744, to 52, he resided at Uckfield, Sussex, and afterwards boarded in a farm-house, at Milton, near Dorking, in Surrey, where he died of a severe attack of the gout, attended with fever, 7th July, 1776, in his 83d year. Some of his learned notes on the two Iphigenie were printed by Dr. Heberden, his friend, 1771. He wrote some other things, and was very liberal of his assistance to his literary friends, especially Dr. Taylor, in his Lysias and Demosthenes, Dr. Musgrave in Hippolytus, Bowyer in Sophocles, and Arnold in the Commentary on the book of Wisdom.

MARKOV, Peter, a poet, died at Philadelphia in 1792. He published miscellaneous poems, 1787; the times, a poem, 1783; the patriot chief, a tragedy; reconciliation, an opera; and was supposed to be the author of the Algerine spy.

MARLORAT, Augustin, an Augustine monk of Lorraine. He embraced the tenets of the protestants, and distinguished himself at the conference of Poissy, 1561. He was murdered at Rouen, when the place was taken by the king, 1562. His works, which possess great merit, are, Thesaurus Locorum Commun. S. Scripture, 1574, London, folio, Geneva, 1624—Commentaries on the Bible.

MARMION, Shakerley, a dramatic writer, born at Aynhoe, Northamptonshire, Jan. 1602. He was educated at Thame school, and Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He squandered his property, which amounted, says Wood, to 700*l.* a year; and afterwards served in the army in the Netherlands, and against Scotland under Charles I. He died in London, 1639. He wrote four comedies, much esteemed in his time; Holland's Leaguer—a Fine Companion—the Antiquary—the Crafty Merchant, or the Soldiered Citizen—besides Cupid and Psyche, an epic poem.

MARMONTEL, John Francis, an eminent French writer, born at Bort, in Linoisin, in 1719.

Though but the son of a tailor, he was well educated at the college of Toulouse, where he obtained some poetical prizes, and afterwards in 1745, he came to Paris in the habit of an abbe. The friendship of Voltaire, and his own merits, soon procured him the favor of the great; he was rewarded with a small pension, and obtained the place of historiographer to the king's buildings, and was for two years conductor of the periodical journal, called Mercury. A severe parody from one of Ciina's scenes, in which he satirized a courtier of influence, drew upon him the displeasure of the government, and he was sent to the Bastille. His literary fame was established by his tragedies and his operas, but his Contes Moraux procured him greater celebrity, and more advantage. He was honored for his meritorious labors, with the place of perpetual secretary to the French academy; but the revolution, which proved fatal to so many men of character and of merit, spared his life. He retired into obscurity from the observations of the world; and though reduced by the national bankruptcy to indigence, he bore his misfortunes with great composure, and in the enjoyment of undisturbed domestic tranquillity. He was in 1797, elected to be a member of the council of ancients, and as a politician he showed himself firm, correct in his opinions, and the friend of virtue and religion. He died of an apoplexy, 1798, at Abbeville, near Gaillon, where he had retired, when his colleagues in the assembly had disputed the regularity of his election. His other works are, Belisarius, a romance—the Charms of Study—the Literary Observer—Lucan's Pharsalia translated—the Incas, or Destruction of Peru, 2 vols.—Poctique Francoise, 3 vols. 8vo.—Essay on the Revolutions of Music, 8vo.—Elements of Literature, 6 vols.—besides some articles in the French Encyclopedie. His literary character chiefly depends on his Contes Moraux, 3 vols. 12mo. which have been translated into every European language, and are known to every reader as full of agreeable and pleasing delineations of character, but too often artfully fascinating and immoral in their tendency. His works have been published altogether, in 17 vols. 8vo.

MARNEZIA, N. de Lezia, a native of Besaunçon, who from a soldier became a statesman during the revolution. As a member of the national assembly, he reprobated the violent measures of his colleagues, and retired in disgust to America. On his return in 1793, he fell under the displeasure of the ruling tyrants, and was sent to prison; but though he had the good fortune to survive the fall of Robespierre, he never recovered his health. He died 1797. He wrote, le Bonheur dans les Campagnes—la Nature Champêtre, a poem—Plan of Education for a young Lady—Essay on the Mineralogy of Orgelet in Franche Compté—the Virtuous Family, a romance.

MAROLLES, Michael de, a French writer, born 1600. He employed his learning chiefly in translations from the classics; and Terence, Plautus, Lucretius, Horace, Virgil, Juvenal, and Persius, appeared in a French dress under his hands, but not always with success. He also collected prints, one hundred thousand of which afterwards adorned the king's cabinet. He wrote also, Memoirs of his own Life, edited by Goujet, 1775, 3 vols. 12mo. besides some indifferent poetry. He died 1681.

MAROT, Clement, son of John M., was born at Cahors, in Querci, 1496, and became valet-de-chambre to Francis I. He was wounded at the battle of Pavia, where his master was taken prisoner; and as he had embraced the opinions of the protestants, he found his residence at the court of Francis not very safe. He therefore retired to Geneva, where it is said by Cayet, that his licentious conduct exposed him to much danger, and even drew upon him the punishment of public whipping in all the crossways of the city. From Geneva Marot went to Piedmont, and died at Turin, 1544, aged 49, very poor. His poetical powers were so highly esteemed, that he was called in France the poet of princes, and the prince of poets. To his fertile invention the French poets are indebted for the rondeau, and also for the modern form of the sonnet, and the madrigal. Though licentious in his character and opinions, Marot undertook to translate the Psalms of David into French verse, dedicated to Francis I. The version, though elegantly and faithfully completed, met with much censure and abuse, as the work of a libertine poet; but it was recommended by a preface written by Calvin himself, at Geneva, 1543. His works, consisting of epigrams, sonnets, elegies, and ballads, were published with those of his father, and those of his son Michael, who was also a poet, but of inferior merit, at the Hague, 1731, 6 vols. 12mo.

MARQUARD-FREHER, a native of Augsburg, who studied law and belles lettres under Cujas, at Bourges, and became counsellor of state to the elector palatine, and professor of civil law at Heidelberg. He died at Heidelberg, universally respected, 13th May, 1614, aged 49. He wrote, Origines Palatinæ, folio—de Inquisitionis Processus—de Re Monetariâ Romanâ—Rerum Bohemiæ Scriptores—Rerum German. Scriptores, 3 vols. folio.

MARQUET, Francis Nicholas, a native of Nancy, eminent as a physician and a botanist. He wrote an Account of Plants in Lorraine, 10 vols. 8vo.—Observations on the Cure of several Diseases, 2 vols. 12mo.—Method to learn the state of the Pulse by the Musical Notes, 12mo. He died 1759, aged 72.

MARRACCI, Luigi, a learned Italian, born at Lucca, 1612. He was professor of rhetoric, and applied himself to the study of ancient and eastern languages. He was confessor to pope Innocent XI. and died at Rome, 1700. He became known as the editor of the Koran, printed at Padua, in Latin and Arabic, 2 vols. folio, 1693, with learned notes. He also assisted in the publication of the Arabic bible, 3 vols. folio, Rome, 1671.

MARSAIS, Cesar Chesneau du, a French grammarian, born at Marseilles, 1676. He was of the congregation of the oratory, which he quitted and went to Paris, where he practised as an advocate. He afterwards maintained himself by being tutor in noble families, and by keeping a school, till, after many adverse accidents, he received from the count de Lauragais, an annuity of 1000 livres. He was engaged in the Encyclopedie, and his Articles on Grammar, are drawn up with great precision, correctness, and judgment. He was at first a sceptic, but in the latter part of life became strictly religious. He died 1756, aged 80. He wrote an Explanation of the Doctrines of the Gallican Church, with respect to the Pretences of the Court of Rome, 12mo—a Rational Method of learning the Latin Language, 12mo.—a treatise on Tropes, 8vo.—the True Principles of Grammar, 4to.—Logic, or Reflections on the Operations of the Mind, 12mo.—Abridgment of Jouvenci's Mythology, 12mo.

MARSH, Narcissus, D. D. an Irish prelate, born at Hannington, Wiltshire, 1638. He was admitted at Magdalen hall, Oxford, 1654, was elected fellow of Exeter, 1658, and in 1673 was made principal of St. Alban's hall. His patron the duke of Ormond, in 1678, appointed him provost of Dublin college, and in 1682 he was made bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, in 1690 translated to Cashel, to Dublin 1699, and in 1703 to Armagh. In the midst of these high promotions, the bishop was very charitable. He built a noble library at Dublin, which he enriched with valuable books; he repaired several churches and alms-houses in his dioceses, and erected and endowed an alms-house for 12 clergymen's widows, at Drogheda. He died 2d Nov. 1713, aged 75. He was an able scholar, a good orientalist, and a well-informed philosopher. He published Institutiones Logicæ in Usum Juventutis Academicæ, Dublin, 1681—an Introduction to the Doctrine of Sounds, with Proposals for the Improvement of Acoustics—Manuductio ad Logicam.

MARSH, Ebenezer Grant, professor of languages and ecclesiastical history in Yale college, where he graduated in 1795. In 1798 he was elected an instructor in the Hebrew language, and in 1799 one of the tutors. In 1802 he was elected professor, and died in 1803, aged 26. He published an oration on the truths of the mosaic history of the creation, 1798; a catalogue of the historical writers of this country, entitled, a series of American historians from the first discovery of the country to the present time 1801; and an elaborate oration delivered before the American academy of arts and sciences in 1802, designed to confirm the truth of scripture history by the testimony of the eastern writers. This it is believed, with improvements, was a posthumous publication.

MARSHAL, Walter, an English divine, educated at Winchester and New college, of which he was made fellow, and also of Winchester. He was ejected from his living at Hursley, Hants, for non-conformity, 1662, and afterwards took the care of a dissenting congregation at Gosport, where he died 1690. He wrote, the Gospel Mystery of Sanctification, 1692, 8vo. reprinted by Hervey, the author of Meditations, in 12mo.

MARSHALL, Thomas, D.D. an English divine, born at Barkly, Leicestershire, 1621. He was admitted of Lincoln college, Oxford, and bore arms in the defence of king Charles, but afterwards he left the university, and went to Rotterdam, where he became minister to the merchants there and at Dort. He returned to England in 1661, and in 1663 was chosen fellow, and in 1672, rector of his college. In 1681 he was made dean of Gloucester, and died at Lincoln college, 1685. He was a learned man, well skilled in the Saxon and in the Oriental languages. He published Observationes in Evangeliorum Versiones per Antiquas duas, scilicet Gothicas & Anglo-Saxonicas—an Explanation of the Catechism—Epistle prefixed to Dr. Hyde's translation into the Malayan language, of the four Gospels and the Acts—besides which he completed Archbishop Usher's Life, published by Dr. Parr.

MARSHALL, Nathaniel, D.D., an English divine, appointed chaplain to George II. at the recommendation of the princess of Wales. He held some preferment in London, and was canon of Windsor. He published the works of St. Cyprian, folio, 1717—a Defence of the Constitution in Church and State, 8vo. 1717—Sermons on several occasions, 3 vols. 8vo. 1730. These were posthumous, and inscribed to queen Caroline, by his widow, who was left with eight children.

MARSHALL, Humphrey, a botanist, and industrious horticulturist, died about 1805. He published Arbustum Americanum, the American grove, or alphabetical catalogue of forest trees and shrubs. Philadelphia, 8vo. 1785, and 1786.

MARSHAM, Sir John, a learned author, born 1602, in London, and educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Oxford. In 1625, he went to France, and afterwards again visited that kingdom, Italy, and Germany, and was in 1629, at the siege of Boisleduc. He studied the law at the Middle Temple, and in 1638, was one of the six clerks in chancery. During the civil wars he followed the king to Oxford, and was a great sufferer by the plunder of the republicans; but in 1660, after leading a life of retirement and solitude under the usurpation, he was elected member for the city of Rochester, and was knighted, and made a baronet by Charles II. He died at Bushy-hall, Herts, May, 1685. He is celebrated in literature for his excellent work, called Diatriba Chronologica, or a Chronological Dissertation, wherein he examines the principal difficulties which occur in the chronology of the Old Testament, 4to. 1649. The work was afterwards altered in his Canon Chronicus Ægyptiacus, Ebraicus, Græcus, & Disquisitiones, London, 1652, folio, reprinted Leipsic, 1676, and at Franeker, 1696, 4to. Sir John left two sons, John, his successor in the title, who collected materials for an History of England, never published, and wrote an History of English Boroughs; and Robert, created a baronet by queen Anne, also a learned man, whose son was made lord Romney, 1716.

MARSIGLI, Lewis Ferdinand, an Italian author, born of a noble family at Bologna, 1658. He was carefully educated, and then visited Constantinople, 1679, with the eyes of a philosopher and of a military man, and at his return, offered his services to the emperor of Germany against the Turks. He distinguished himself greatly in the field, but in 1683 he was taken by the Tartars, who sold him to the Turks. The next year he obtained his ransom, and immediately repaired to Vienna, where the emperor made him a colonel, and afterwards advanced him to the rank of marshal. In the war about the Spanish succession, he was, however, unfortunate. Brisac surrendered in 1703, after a siege of 13 days, when a longer and more effectual resistance was expected, and the count D'Arco, the governor, was condemned to lose his head, and Marsigli, the next in command, was stripped of his honors, and had his sword broke over him. He attempted in vain to justify his conduct before the emperor, and even published a memorial to defend himself; but finding the tide of unpopularity against him, he returned to privacy. He went to Paris and Marseilles, and then retired to Bologna, where he founded 1712, with the consent of the senate, as patrons, an academy of arts and sciences, with a museum for the advancement of knowledge, and of the arts. He also erected a printing house, where the memoirs and writings of the academy were to be published, which he intrusted to the care of the Dominicans. He died 1st Nov. 1750. His learning recommended him to the academies of Paris, Montpellier and London, of which he was elected a member. He wrote a Philosophical Essay on the Sea, translated into French by Le Clerc, published folio, Amst. 1725—a Description of the Danube, 6 vols. fol.—a Latin Treatise on Coffee, 12mo.—on Mushrooms, folio,—on the Bosphorus, 4to.—on the Ottoman Forces, fol.

MARSOLLIER, James, a French historian, born at Paris, 1647. He was archdeacon of Usez, and died there, 1724. His works, though occasionally incorrect, are still read with applause. He is author of a History of Cardinal Ximenes, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of Henry VII. of England, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of the Inquisition, 12mo.—Life of Sir Francis de Sales, 2 vols. 12mo.—Life of Madame de Chantal, 2 vols.—Life of Dom Rancé of La Trappe, 2 vols.—Dialogues on the Duties of Civil Life—History of Henry de la Tours D'Auvergne—an Apology for Erasmus, to prove that he was a good Catholic—a History of the Tenth and Goals of the Church.

MARSY, Francis Marie de, distinguished among the jesuits, from whose society he was expelled, was born at Paris. His "Analysis of Bayle," 4 vols. 12mo. was proscribed by the Parliament of Paris, and produced his confinement in the Bastille. He died suddenly, December, 1763. He is author of the History of Mary Stuart, 3 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs de Melville, from the English, 3 vols. 12mo.—Abridged Dictionary of Painting and Architecture, 2 vols. 12mo.—The Rabelais Moderne, 8 vols. 12mo.—the Prince, from Father Paul—Pictura, an elegant poem—Modern History, as a continuation of Rollin, 26 vols. 12mo.

MARTEL, Francis, surgeon in the service of Henry IV. of France, was author of an apology for Surgeons—of Paradoxes on the Practice of Surgery, and other works, printed at Paris, together, 1635, 12mo.

MARTELLI, Lewis, an Italian, whose poems, serious and grotesque, and dramatic pieces, were published at Florence. He was born at Florence, and died at Salerno, 1527, aged 23. His brother Vincent was also a poet, whose pieces appeared at Florence, 1607, 8vo.

MARTELLI, Peter James, author of seven volumes of prose and verse, was secretary to the senate of Bologna, and professor of belles lettres there. He died 1729. His poems, according to Maffei, possessed great merit.

MARTENNE, Edmund, a Benedictine monk of St. Maur, born 1654, at St. Jean de Laune, Langres. He was author of a Commentary on the Rules of St. Benedict—de Antiquis Monachorum Ritibus, 2 vols. 4to.—Thesaurus Anecdotorum Novus, and other works. He died of an apoplexy, 1739.

MARTIAL, D'Auvergne, a French poet, author of Arrets de L'Amour—an Historical Poem on Charles VII.—L'Amant Rendu Cordelier—Voyes Louanges à la Vierge Marie, &c. reprinted at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. 1724. He was procurator of the parliament, and notary of the chatelet at Paris, and died there, 1503, much beloved.

MARTIANAY, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, who ably edited the works of Jerome, 5 vols. folio, with a life of that father, 4to. 1706, and published also other works. He was born at St. Sever, in Gascony, and read lectures at Arles, Avignon, and Bourdeaux. He died of an apoplexy, 1717, aged 70.

MARTIGNAC, Stephen Algai, lord of, a French writer, who published the Lives of the Bishops of Paris, in the 17th century, 4to. and translated besides into prose, Horace, Terence, Juvenal, Persius, Ovid, Virgil, in 9 vols. 12mo. He died 1693, aged 70.

MARTIN V., Otho Colonna, an illustrious Roman, made pope after the abdication of Gregory XII. 1417. The emperor and the elector palatine, with the deference of subjects, attended upon him at his inauguration, and he knew well how to improve the submissive conduct of catholic potentates. He persecuted the adherents of Huss in Bohemia, and presided in person at the council of Constance, 1418. He died of an apoplexy, 20th Feb. 1431, aged 63.

MARTIN, David, a protestant divine, born at Revel, in Languedoc, 1639. He left his country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled at Utrecht, where he gave lectures, and acted as pastor. On the second edition of the dictionary of the French academy he communicated to the publishers, some valuable remarks, and died at Utrecht, of a violent fever, 1721. He was a most amiable character. He published a History of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. folio, with 424 plates—Eight Sermons, 8vo.—a treatise on Natural Religion—Two Dissertations, which have been translated into English, one on the disputed passage of St. John 1, c. 5. v. 7, and the other on the testimony of Josephus to the character of Christ—a Treatise on Revealed Religion, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Bible, with notes.

MARTIN, Dom James, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Tanjaux, Upper Languedoc. After teaching the languages in his native province, he removed to Paris, where he died a martyr to agonizing sufferings from the gout and gravel 1751, in his 70th year. He wrote a treatise on the Religion of the Antient Gauls, 2 vols.—a History of the Gauls, 2 vols.—Explication of difficult Texts of Scripture, 2 vols. 4to. Explanation of Ancient Monuments—a project for an Alphabetical Library.

MARTIN, Thomas, an antiquarian, born at Thetford, 8th March, 1697, the seventh of nine children. He was for some time with his brother, as an attorney, but disliked the employment, and wished for a Cambridge education, in which, however, he was not gratified, as he in 1722 married at Thetford. He died 7th March, 1771, and was buried in Palgrave church, where many of his family were interred before him. He wrote Monumenta Anglicana—the History of his Native Town, 4to.—and contributed much to the Fasti of Le Neve.

MARTIN, Benjamin, an optician and globe maker of Fleet-street, and the publisher of a Scientific Magazine, was originally a schoolmaster of Chichester, and was born in 1704. He acquired afterwards some reputation as a travelling lecturer in experimental philosophy, and then settled in London, where he made some improvements in philosophical and mathematical experiments. In his old age he was afflicted with domestic losses in consequence of trusting too much to false friends, and though he had more than sufficient to discharge his debts, he became a bankrupt. In a fit of delirious despair he attempted his life; the wound, though not mortal, hastened his death. He died 9th Feb. 1732. His fossils and curiosities were sold for little after his death. He published a Philosophical Grammar—Young Gentleman and Lady's Philosophy, 2 vols. 8vo.—Philosophia Britannica, 3 vols. 8vo.—treatises on Decimal Arithmetic, 8vo.—on Optics, 8vo.—on Trigonometry, 2 vols. 8vo. Mathematical Institutes, 2 vols.—Natural History of England, 2 vols.—Biographia Philosophica, 8vo. and other miscellanies all useful and ingenious.

MARTIN, Claude, a native of Lyons, of mean parentage. He had happily the advantage of a good mathematical education, and at the age of 20 he embraced the profession of arms, and embarked for India with his brother under general Lally. In the war of 1756, he conducted himself with great valor, but ill treatment disgusted him with the service, and he at the siege of Pondicherry deserted to the English, in whose forces he obtained the rank of colonel. Assiduous and intelligent, he was now employed to make a map of the territories of the Nabob of Oude, and under his patronage he introduced the arts and commer cial institutions of Europe, and opened a bank, which proved highly productive. He afterwards settled at Lucknow, where he built a magnificent edifice for his residence, and another also on the banks of the Ganges, and then devoting his time to the natural productions of the country, he formed in his museum a very curious and valuable collection. His garden was also enriched with all the beautiful productions and varieties of the climate; his observatory was provided with the most useful and the best instruments for making observations on the heavens, and he exhibited the first balloon that ever floated in the atmosphere of Asia. This remarkable character died in 1799, and with the most benevolent intentions divided his immense property among his children, and for charitable purposes in the towns of Lyons, of Calcutta and of Lucknow.

MARTIN, Alexander, L.L.D. governor of N. Carolina from 1782, to 1785, was previously speaker of the senate of the state, and afterwards a delegate to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. He was a second time governor on the appointment of Mr. Johnson to the senate in 1789. In 1792, Mr. Martin was elected a senator from North Carolina. He died November 1807.

MARTINDALE, Adam, a mathematician and divine, master of a mathematical school at Warrington, and then at Dunham, was ejected from the living of Rosthorn, Cheshire, for non-conformity 1662. He afterwards lived as chaplain in the family of lord Delaware, and died 1700. He is author of the Land Meter's Vade Mecum, 12mo.—two County Almanacs—12 Problems about Interest—Divinity Knots unloosed, 1649, 8vo.—Truth and Peace promoted, 12mo. 1682.

MARTINI, Raymond, a Dominican friar, born at Sobirat in Catalonia. He was one of those who were laboriously engaged in the study of Arabic and Hebrew to confute the Jews and Mahometans in their own language on religious subjects, and he was sent by the king of Arragon as a missionary to Tunis in 1268. He died 1296. His excellent treatise against the Jews, called Pugio Fidei Christianæ was brought to light by Bosquet bishop of Montpellier, and published 1651, at Paris, and the best edition at Leipsic, 1687.

MARTINI, Martin, a jesuit, long resident in China, where he wrote some valuable books. He returned to Europe in 1651, and again, as some suppose, revisited China, where he died, aged 74. He published "Sinicæ Historiæ Deas prima a gentis Origine ad Christum Natum, 4to.—China Illustrata, folio.—a Latin History of the Wars of the Tartars against China, 8vo.—a Relation of the Number and Quality of the Chinese Christians.

MARTINIUS, Matthias, a native of Waldeck, the disciple of Piscator, became a respectable divinity professor at Paderbora and Bremen, and distinguished himself at the synod of Dordt. He wrote Lexicon Philologicum, 2 vols. fol. and died 1630, aged 53.

MARTINUSIUS, George, or VITISINOVISCH, a native of Croatia, who from a lighter of stoves became a learned ecclesiastic, bishop of Great Waradin, and at last the minister and friend of John Zapol king of Hungary. At his death, 1540, the king left him guardian of his son John Sigismund, but a quarrel with Isabella the queen mother obliged him to leave the kingdom, and he retired to the court of the emperor Ferdinand I. who obtained for him a cardinal's hat from pope Julius III. He was afterwards suspected of plotting with the Turks against his benefactor, and in consequence of this probably false accusation he was meanly assassinated in his castle of Vints 1551.

MARTYN, John, an English botanist, born in London 1699. He early showed a fondness for botanical pursuits, and by the friendship of Dr. Sherard, his attention was directed to literary and not to mercantile concerns. By publishing in 1720, Tournefort's History of the Plants in the neighborhood of Paris, he formed the plan of composing a catalogue of those near London. The society of botanists in London, which continued in its original form till 1726, was established by him and Dillenius; but afterwards he left the metropolis, where he had given some lectures, to succeed Bradley as botanical professor of Cambridge. He acquired some reputation as a physician in London and Chelsea, but retiring to Streatham in 1752, he abandoned the more laborious parts of his profession. He resigned in 1761, his Cambridge professorship. Dr. Martyn had been elected member of the royal society in 1727, and was so useful in the regulations made to complete the library and the museum, that his bond for annual payment was honorably cancelled by the council of that learned body. His works are Tabulæ Synoptiæ Plantarum Official. ad method. Ray. fol.—Methodus Plantarum circa Cantabrig. Nascens. 12mo.—Historia Plantarum Rariorum, Decad. 5 fol.—first Lecture of a Course of Botany, Introductory 8vo.—Virgil's Bucolics and Georgics translated with notes, 2 vols. 8vo. and 4to. a valuable and entertaining work—Dissertations on the Æneid, 12mo.—Abridgment of Philosophical Transactions—translation of Harris on the Diseases of Infants—do. of Boerhaave's treatise on the powers of Medicine—Philosophical Papers of the Memoirs of the Paris Academy of Sciences, abridged, 5 vols. 8vo.—Various Curious Papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and some Articles in the General Dictionary.

MARTYR, Peter, a native of Anghierra in the Milanese, employed as an able negotiator by Ferdinand V. of Castille and Arragon, and also engaged in the education of the princes his children. In consequence of his services he obtained some ecclesiastical honors, and died in 1525, aged 70. He was author of an History of the Discovery of America, under the name of de Navigatione et Terris de Novo Repertis, 1587—Letters respecting the History of Spain, Amsterdam, 1670, fol.—an interesting Relation of his Embassy to Egypt, 1500, in fol.

MARTYR, Peter, a most eminent divine, born at Florence 1500. His family name was Hermilinus, but he received from his parents that of Martyr from Peter, a martyr, whose church was near the house in which he was born. He became an Augustine monk at Fiesoli, and afterwards studied at Padua, and at the age of 26 was admitted public preacher. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the pulpit, and as a professor of philosophy and divinity, at Brixia, Ronie, Venice, Mantua, and other cities; but the writings of Zuinglius and of Bucer, and the conversation of Valdes shook his faith in the papal infallibility, and after preaching the doctrines of the protestants in secret, he found it dangerous to continue south of the Alps, and therefore removed to Zurich. He next visited Basil, and then Strasburg, where he married a nun, who like himself had escaped from the superstitions of a convent. From Strasburg, Martyr was invited by Cranmer to England, and honorably appointed divinity professor at Oxford by Edward VI. in 1549. At the accession of Mary, however, the learned professor found it unsafe to remain at Oxford, and he therefore privately retired to Strasburg, and to Zurich, where for seven years he became a popular divinity professor. He had liberal offers afterwards to settle at Geneva, and his friend Jewel solicited him with zealous affection to return to England after Mary's death, but he declined those honorable testimonies of respect, and continued at Zurich, where he died 1562, aged 63. On his return to Zurich, Martyr took a second wife, by whom he had three children, the youngest of which only survived him. Martyr as a writer was learned and well informed, as a disputant he was acute, sensible, and penetrating, as much admired by the protestants as he was dreaded by the papists. He was zealous as a reformer, but sincere, and in his greatest triumphs over superstition and error, wisely moderate and humble. He wrote several books against the papists, or in explanation of the Scriptures, but his "Defence of the Orthodox Doctrine of the Lord's Supper," against Gardiner, is particularly famous. He is, however, accused by father Simon of making a vain and unnecessary display of his learning in his commentaries, though it must be confessed in the words of bishop Jewel, that he is a man never to be named without the highest respect and honor.

MARVELL, Andrew, an ingenious English writer, born 1620. The strong powers of his mind were so early displayed, that at 13 he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, but here unexperienced and thoughtless he fell into the hands of the jesuits, till his father interfered and restored him to the wholesome tenets of the university. He took his bachelor's degree 1638. Marvell was enabled to travel and improve himself in visiting foreign countries. He passed through France, visited Rome, and extended his travels to Constantinople. About 1663, he returned home, and was made assistant to Milton, the Latin secretary of Cromwell. He was chosen member of parliament for his native town in 1660, and continued to represent it, and with the honorable grant of a pension from his approving electors, till his death, and though he seldom spoke in the house, his opinion was respected out of doors, and often influenced prince Rupert, and other independent members. He claimed the public attention as a writer, by a severe anonymous attack on Dr. Parker, who was virulent in favor of arbitrary government, and by another pamphlet against bishop Croft's "Naked Truth," but his most violent composition was "an Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England," for the discovery of the author of which the offended ministry offered a reward. These tracts were written not only with severity, but in a strain of humor and sarcasm, which rendered them very popular and exposed to derision those against whom the satire was directed. Though an enemy to the ministry, Marvell was courted and admired, and even the king himself was pleased with his conversation and conduct, and endeavored by all means in his power to gain him to espouse the measures of the court. After enjoying the company of this facetious subject, Charles the next morning sent to him his minister Danby, who with difficulty found his obscure lodging, up two pair of stairs in one of the courts of the Strand. Marvell supposed his visitor had lost his way, but when informed that Danby came from the king who wished to know what he could do to serve him, he answered that it was not in his majesty's power to serve him. When pressed farther to accept any office the court could give, Marvell answered, that he could not with honor accept the offer, since if he did, he must prove either ungrateful to the king in voting against him, or false to his country in giving into the measures of the court. To conquer this obstinate integrity Danby declared that he was the bearer to him of 1000*l.* from the king as a mark of his respect, but this the unshaken patriot rejected, though after the courtier was gone he was obliged to borrow a guinea of a friend. This great man died 1678, aged 58, not without strong suspicions of being poisoned, and he was buried in St. Giles's church, in the fields. His poems and letters were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols. 12mo. with an account of his life by Mr. Cooke, and since a handsome edition has appeared by Captain Thomson, 3 vols. 4to. Some of his commendatory verses generally appear before the real work of his friend Milton.

MARULLUS, Tacitus, a poet of the fifth century, who wrote a panegyric on Attila king of the Huns, and waited upon him at Padua in expectation of a liberal reward. The fierce barbarian rewarded his flattery by throwing the poem and the writer into the flames.

MARY, queen of England, eldest daughter of Henry VIII. by Catherine of Arragon, was born at Greenwich 18th Feb. 1517. She was educated under the care of the celebrated Linacer and Vives, and she acquired so perfect a knowledge of Latin, that she undertook to translate Erasmus's Paraphrase of St. John's Gospel, which was finished by her chaplain Mallet. The treatment of her mother by her father totally alienated her heart from filial duties, and so exasperated was the monarch at her violent and obstinate conduct, that he would have publicly put her to death had not the virtuous Cranmer interfered. Bred up in the bigoted principles of the Romish church, she refused to join the protestant communion, as well under her brother as under her father, and in consequence of this obstinacy the young king, at the persuasion of the duke of Northumberland set her aside in the succession, and appointed the lady Jane Gray for his successor. Though Jane was proclaimed on Edward's death, yet Mary's interest prevailed, and in a few days she entered London in triumph. The partialities which she had shown for the popish tenets in a private station, now displayed themselves on the throne, and, guided by the councils of the sanguinary Gardiner, she assented to those horrible excesses which have so deservedly fixed upon her the appellation of the bloody Mary. The fagot and the stake were the instruments used to make converts to the church of Rome, and not only the innocent lady Jane and her husband were sacrificed to the mean jealousy of the queen, but the great Cranmer who had saved her from destruction was condemned to the flames. In 1554, she married Philip of Spain, son of Charles V. but the happiness which she expected from this union was destroyed by the coldness of her phlegmatic husband, and her disappointment in child-bearing added to the studied absence of Philip, and the disgraceful loss of Calais, so preyed upon her spirits, that she fell a sacrifice to the attacks of a fever, 7th Nov. 1558. In her character Mary was violent, superstitious and bigoted, she thought it her duty to sacrifice the calls of humanity to her zeal for what she considered the interest of true religion, and from the influence of her popish advisers she was often prevailed to commit what was dishonorable, flagitious, and oppressive. Three books of devotion are mentioned by Strype as written by her.

MARY, queen of England, wife of William III. was daughter of the second James, by the daughter of lord Clarendon. She married at the age of 15, William prince of Orange, and at the revolution, when her father had abdicated the throne, she ac-compainted her husband, and was crowned queen. Mary is represented as of a meek inoffensive character, little inclined to meddle with public affairs except when party influenced her, or the absence of her husband rendered it necessary. She died 23th Dec. in 1694, at the age of 32, of the small-pox, leaving no issue. She was in her character benevolent and humane, exhibiting in her conduct great gravity and little attachment to the feminine trifles and levities which fashion or caprice too often recommended.

MARY, daughter of Henry III. duke of Brabant, married Philip the Bold of France 1274. She was accused of poisoning the eldest of her husband's sons by a former marriage, but her innocence was proved by a knight sent by her brother, in those days of chivalry, to challenge her accusers. She died 1321, 36 years after the death of her husband.

MARY, of Anjou, daughter of Lewis II. and wife of Charles VII. of France. She was a woman of a very heroic character, and though insulted and despised by her husband, she applied all the powers of her great mind to secure the crown to him. She died 1463, aged 59.

MARY, daughter of Henry VII. of England, married Lewis XII. of France. After his death she took for her second husband, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, by whom she had a daughter, who was the mother of the unfortunate lady Jane Gray. She died 1534, aged 37.

MARY DE MEDICIS, daughter of Francis II. duke of Tuscany, was born 1573, and married in 1600, Henry IV. of France. After her husband's death she was declared regent of the kingdom, but weakness marked her administration, and her partiality for the worthless marshal D'Ancre, excited against her the indignation of the people, and the opposition of her son Louis XIII. Though a reconciliation was effected between her and her son, by the means of cardinal Richelieu, she afterwards conceived so great a hatred against this her former favorite, that all her powers and influence were directed to seek revenge. Louis at last supported the cardinal as the best means of consolidating his government, and Mary was banished, and her attendants and favorites, and even her physician, were sent out of the kingdom, or confined in the bastille. From Compiegne, where she was exiled, she retired to Brussels, and died in poverty at Cologne, 3d July, 1642, aged 69. Though obstinate and revengeful, Mary was on some occasions very humane and benevolent, she patronised the arts, and by her munificence Paris was adorned by the splendid palace of Luxemburgh, and some religious establishments.

MARY of Cleves, married Henry I. prince of Condé. She was loved with such ardor by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. that when called to the throne of Poland, he wrote to her with all the warmth of affection, and signed his name with his blood. When raised to the French throne, he formed the design of annulling Mary's marriage with his rival, but Catherine de Medicis opposed it, and the sudden death of Mary, 30th Oct. 1574, at the age of 18, as is supposed by poison, left him disconsolate and wretched.

MARY, of Austria, daughter of Philip, king of Spain, married 1521 Lewis king of Hungary, who was slain five years after, at the battle of Mohats. She was made governess of the Netherlands, by her brother Charles V. where she behaved with great courage, and opposed with success the arms of Henry II. of France. She was the friend of the protestants, and a great patroness of literature. Her fondness for the sports of the field procured her the name of Diana, and from her military prowess she was called by the Spaniards, the mother of the camp. She left her government in 1555, and died three years after in Spain.

MARY STUART, queen of Scots, daughter of James V. of Scotland and Mary of Lorraine, was born 1552, and eight days after her birth inherited the throne by the death of her father. Henry VIII. of England solicited her hand for his son Edward, and when refused he invaded Scotland and plundered Edinburgh. Uninfluenced by the momentary successes of the English, the Scotch regency betrothed their young queen in 1553 to Francis the dauphin of France, and she was educated there, and imbibed those principles of bigotry and foolish levity which afterwards embittered her life. The marriage was celebrated in 1558, but two years after the youthful widowed queen left with tears of regret, that country where some of the happiest of her days had been passed. Returned to Scotland, she found her subjects agitated by party zeal and civil dissention, and she discovered a powerful rival and secret enemy in her neighbor Elizabeth of England, whom she had seriously offended by assuming in France the empty title of queen of England, on an ill-founded pretence of Elizabeth's illegitimacy. To distracted councils was added religious animosity, and by publicly celebrating the mass in her chapel, Mary offended the feelings of her subjects, who were stern and rigid presbyterians, and who in their zeal in favor of the reformation, had spared neither cathedrals, nor abbeys, nor monuments which bore the marks of popish superstition. Thus exposed to fanatical violence, and even insulted by the followers of Knox, the celebrated reformer, Mary could pursue no better step than to call to share her throne, a man of sagacity, firmness, and virtue. In this she was unfortunate; in marrying Henry lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lennox, a youth of engaging appearance, but of weak intellects, and impetuous passions. Fondness and rapture soon gave way to indifference and disgust. Darnley became disagreeable in the eyes of the queen, and their mutual discontents were kindled and increased by the insidious arts of their respective flatterers. Darnley despised at court, retired to his country house near Edinburgh, where his life was terminated by a most fatal catastrophe. The house was blown up in the night by gunpowder, and the unfortunate monarch's body was found in the garden adjoining, but without any marks of violence upon it. This foul deed was fixed, with some degree of truth, upon James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, who had succeeded Rizzio in the favor of the queen, and Mary herself escaped not the imputation of accessory guilt. Bothwell was tried and acquitted, but as if rejoicing in the iniquity of his conduct, he seized the person of the queen, 24th April, 1567, and prevailed upon her at the castle of Dunbar, to marry him. This violent proceeding, which some historians assert, but with little probability of truth, to have been with the consent of Mary, roused the indignation of the Scotch nobles, and Bothwell, unable to stem the torrent of popular fury, left the kingdom, and fled to Denmark, where he died wretched and destitute. Mary in the meantime had fallen into the hands of her enemies, and was compelled by Murray, the regent, her greatest enemy, to resign the crown in favor of her infant son, James VI. who was crowned king at Dunbar. To render these measures agreeable to the nation, and to make the unfortunate Mary odious, she was now publicly accused of being the murderer of her husband, and letters were produced, which if true would have proved most fully her guilt.

Time, however, has shown these to be gross forgeries, in the hands of those who had suffered the real murderer Bothwell to escape, and had punished with death some inferior characters, who were arraigned as accessories. Mary, a prisoner in Lochleven island, under the care of Murray's mother, who had been the concubine of James V. found means to escape to Hamilton, where she declared the acts extorted from her to be illegal. Though here joined by above 6000 men, she found herself unable to cope with the regent who dispersed her raw troops, and obliged her to fly. Unknowing where to retire, she came towards England, and landed at Workington in Cumberland, 17th May, 1563, and implored the friendship and protection of Elizabeth of England. Elizabeth with hypocritical condolence welcomed her on her escape, but after drawing her to Carlisle for greater security, she refused to see her till she had cleared herself of the imputations cast upon her character. Mary, who expected to be respected as a sovereign, found unfortunately too late she was to be treated as a criminal; but after she had submitted to a trial which was to investigate her innocence, and had heard Elizabeth declare that nothing had appeared which could impeach the good character of her sister, she still felt that she was a prisoner in England. Her innocence and misfortunes roused the general feelings of the nation towards her, but while she hoped for deliverance from the offers of the duke of Norfolk to marry her, she had the mortification to know that Elizabeth not only wantonly opposed the union, but imprisoned her suitor, and afterwards on some trifling accusation put him to death. Not satisfied with the degradation of her rival, Elizabeth assumed now the part of a tyrant, and had her arraigned on pretence of conspiring against her life. Forty-two members of parliament and five judges were sent to Fotheringay castle, Northamptonshire, where the unhappy princess was immured, and though she refused to acknowledge the authority of her judges, and asserted her innocence, the matter was removed to Westminster, where she was declared guilty. Mary, who had lingered more than eighteen years in confinement, heard of the sentence with pleasure, and rejoiced at an event which was to terminate her sufferings and her misfortunes. Mary in her last moments behaved with great dignity and becoming composure, and though her persecutors wished to insult her attachment to the popish faith, she asserted her devotion to the church in whose tenets she had been educated. She suffered in Fotheringay castle, 8th February 1537, imploring forgiveness on her murderers. Mary, distinguished by all those superior charms of person which command and secure admiration, possessed high qualities of mind. She was well acquainted with Latin, French, and Italian, and besides her letters, many of which are still extant, she wrote some poems not devoid of merit.

MASCARDI, Augustine, a learned Italian, born at Sarzane, in the city of Genoa, 1591. He was early connected with the jesuits, and became chamberlain to Urban VIII. who founded a professorship of rhetoric in the college of Sapienza, for the exercise of his great talents. He was author of the History of the Conspiracy of de Fiesque—and of an able work, called "Dell' Arte Historica," besides some poems. He was so fond of studious pursuits, and so negligent of his affairs, that he was always poor and in debt. He died in his native town 1640.

MASCARON, Julius, a French bishop, born at Marseilles, 1634. He was member of the oratory, and in his ecclesiastical duties as preacher, displayed so much eloquence, that the court, in admiration of his abilities, gave him the bishopric of Tulle, 1671, from which he was translated to Agen. He died in his diocese, of a dropsy in the chest, 16th December 1703. His eloquence was so powerful, that, it is said, he converted 23,000 out of 30 thousand, of the Huguenots whom he found in his diocese. His funeral orations on the queen mother—on Turenne and Seguier, were published, and are admired.

MASCHERONI, Laurent, a native of Bergamo, eminent as a mathematician, and the well-known author of Geometria del Compasso, or Compass Geometry. He assisted in the various experiments made by the academy of Bologna, to ascertain the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. He published also, some notes on the Calculus Integer of Euler, and died at Paris 1800, aged 50.

MASCLEF, Francis, a French theologian, made canon of Amiens by bishop de Bron. He was removed from this office by the next bishop, who accused him of being a jansenist. He died Nov. 1728, aged 66. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar, improved by de la Bletterie, 1730, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Catechism of Amiens and Conferences of the Diocese of the Amiens.

MASENIUS, James, a jesuit, born at Dalen, duchy of Juliers, 1606. He was professor of eloquence and poetry at Cologne, and wrote good poetry. He was author of Sarcothea, a Latin poem, on the Fall of Man, from which Lauder supposed that Milton had drawn the subject of his celebrated poem—Palaestra Eloquentiæ Ligatæ, 4 vols. 12mo.—Palaestra Styli Romani—Anima Historiæ, seu Vita Caroli V. & Ferdinandi, 4to.—Notes, on the Annales Trevirensium, folio—and Epitome Annal. Trevirensium, 8vo. He died 1681.

MASHAM, lady Damaris, daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, and second wife of sir Francis Masham, of Oates, bart. was a most learned lady, born at Cambridge, 18th Jan. 1658. Her knowledge of history, geography, and philosophy, was greatly enlarged by the attention of Mr. Locke, who lived several years in her family, and died in her house at Oates. She wrote a Discourse concerning the Love of God, 8vo.—Occasional Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous and Christian Life, 8vo. and was deservedly respected not only for learning, but for every virtue. Much of her time and attention was employed in the education of her only son. She died at Bath 20th April, 1703, and was buried in the abbey church, where a monument records her virtues.

MASIUS, Andrew, counsellor to the duke of Cleves, was born at Linnich, near Brussels, and died, April, 1753, aged 57. He wrote, a collection of various pieces, translated from the Syriac—a Syriac Lexicon—Grammatica Lingue Syriæ, folio—a Commentary on the Book of Joshua, and on some Chapters of Deuteronomy—Disputatio de Cœnâ Domini. He was a most learned orientalist.

MASKELYNE, Nevil, D.D., was born in London, 1732, and educated at Westminster school, whence he removed to Catharine Hall, and next to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1761, he was appointed by the Royal Society to proceed to St. Helena to observe the transit of Venus; in which voyage he determined the method of finding, by lunar observations, the longitude at sea. In 1763, he undertook another voyage to Barbadoes, to ascertain the longitude of that island, and to prove the accuracy of Harrison's time-keeper. On his return home, he succeeded Mr. Bliss as royal astronomer; and in 1767, first published the Nautical Almanac, and a volume of Explanatory Tables. In 1774 Dr. Maskelyne was employed in making observations on the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites at Greenwich; and went the same year to Scotland, to ascertain the gravitative attraction of the mountain Schellien, in Perthshire. His death took place February 9th, 1811. He was the author of the British Mariner's Guide; containing complete and easy instructions for the discovery of the longitude at sea and land, 1763, 4to.; and astronomical observations made at the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, 1784—88, 3 vols. folio; besides numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

MASON, Francis, a native of Durham, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Merton. In 1599, he obtained the living of Orford, Suffolk, and was afterwards made chaplain to James I. and arch-deacon of Norwich. He died on his living, 1621, aged 55. His Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, a work of great merit and authenticity, has been translated by Lindsay, with valuable notes.

MASON, sir John, a statesman of eminence, in the reign of Henry VIII. and of his successors. Though but of obscure origin at Abingdon, in Berkshire, he received a good education under his uncle, who was one of the monks of the Abingdon abbey; and after being at All Soul's, Oxford, he rose in the service of the king, who employed him in several embassies abroad, and made him a privy counsellor. He maintained his influence at court under Edward and Mary, and Elizabeth appointed him treasurer of her chamber. He was also made chancellor of the university of Oxford, and died 1566. His favorite maxim was, do, and say nothing. In gratitude for the blessings of the education which he had received at Abingdon, he was a munificent benefactor to this his native town, and left a handsome estate for the endowment of an hospital, which still shelters under its roof, the infirm, the aged, and the indigent.

MASON, John, an English author of some works of merit. He was honored with the degree of M.A. from a Scotch university, and died 1763. He wrote Self Knowledge, a valuable ethical work—Essay on Elocution, 8vo.—Fifty-two Practical Discourses for the Use of Families, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Power of Poetical and Prosaic Numbers, 8vo.—Plain and Modest Plea for Christianity, 8vo.—Student and Pastor, or directions to attain to eminence in those characters, 12mo.

MASON, William, an English poet of eminence. He was son of a Yorkshire clergyman, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1749, by the interest of his friend Gray he was elected fellow of Pembroke hall. He was admitted into orders in 1754, and became chaplain to the king, and obtained the valuable living of Aston, in Yorkshire, and afterwards the precentorship of York cathedral. During the American war, he showed himself a zealous advocate for the liberties of the subject, and his conduct was so offensive to the government, that his name was erased from the list of king's chaplains. The censure was too severe; Mason was the friend of political freedom and rational government; but that he was the enemy of fanciful and violent innovations, is abundantly proved by the abhorrence which he expressed against the wild theories of the supporters of the French revolution. He died in 1797, in consequence of a wound which he had accidentally received in getting out of his carriage, and which, from being neglected, became gangrenous and fatal. The abilities of Mason as a poet, are highly respectable. He first attracted the public attention in 1748, by his Isis, a poem, which the Oxonians considered as an attack on their Alma Mater, and which therefore was answered in a very spirited and beautiful poem, by Thomas Warton, called the Triumphs of Isis. His Elfrida, and Caractacus, on the model of the Greeks, possess great merit, for boldness of conception, nervous language, and sublime description. He wrote besides the English Garden, a poem—Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, translated into English verse, with learned notes from sir Joshua Reynolds—a Book on Psalmody. As the friend of Gray, Mason was one of his executors, and he evinced his respect for the departed bard, by publishing his letters, with his life, and by writing the epitaph which records his virtues in Westminster Abbey.

MASON, George, an English writer, known as the author of an essay on Designs in Gardening, 1796, with appendix—Answer to T. Paine—Supplement to Johnson's English Dictionary, 4to.—Life of lord Howe, 1803. He made a valuable collection of English and foreign literature, and died at Aldenham lodge, Herts, of a fit of apoplexy, 4th Nov. 1806, aged 71.

MASON, John, D.D. was a native of Scotland, and born in 1734. He was connected with that branch of the secession from the established church of North Britain, known by the name of Antiburghers. By a presbytery in that connexion he was licensed, and not long afterwards ordained, with a view to his taking the pastoral charge of a congregation in the city of New-York, where he arrived in 1761, and resided greatly respected and eminently useful until his death in 1792. Doctor Mason was a man of a sound strong mind, extensive learning and fervent piety; and his scholarship was uncommonly accurate and mature. At the age of twenty he spoke the Latin language, on all the higher subjects of discourse, with equal ease, and greater elegance than his mother tongue. In Greek his proficiency was but little inferior; and he was familiar with the Hebrew. At the age of twenty-four he taught logic and moral philosophy, with reputation in the theological seminary of the Antiburghers at Abernethy. His lectures were in Latin. As a preacher he was uncommonly judicious and instructive; as a pastor, faithful and diligent; and as a friend and companion amiable, benevolent, and generous.

MASON, John, captain, proprietor of New Hampshire, was a merchant of London, and afterwards governor of Newfoundland. On his return he met with sir William Alexander, who was induced to engage in the project of settling the new world, and obtained a patent of Acadia or Nova Scotia in 1621. In the same year Mason obtained of the Plymouth company, of which he was a member, a grant of land from Salem river to the Merrimac, and up to the heads thereof called Mariana; in 1622 he and Gorges obtained a grant of the lands between the Merrimac and Sagadahoc, extending back to the lakes, called Laconia; he obtained Nov. 7, 1629 a new patent of New Hampshire. He died 1635.

MASON, John, a brave soldier, and author of the history of the Pequot war, was a native of England. He was bred to arms in the Netherlands under sir Thomas Fairfax, whose good opinion he so much conciliated, that after his arrival in America, when the struggle arose in England between king Charles I. and the parliament, sir Thomas addressed a letter to Mason requesting him to join his standard, and give his assistance to those, who were contending for the liberties of the people. The invitation however was declined. Mason was one of the first settlers of Dorchester, but removed to Windsor in 1634, and assisted in laying the foundation of a new colony. A court was summoned at Hartford on the first of May, 1637. Besides the six magistrates, there were also committees, from the few towns in the colony, to compose the court. As the Pequots had killed about thirty, and were endeavoring to effect a union of all the Indians in a place for the extirpation of the English, it was determined, that an offensive war should be carried on against them, and that ninety men should immediately be raised, 42 from Hartford, 30 from Windsor, and 18 from Wethersfield. The little army under the command of Mason arrived at Saybrook on the 17th of May. At Saybrook, Mason and his officers were entirely divided in opinion respecting the manner of prosecuting their enterprise. The court had directed the landing of the men at Pequot harbor, from whence they were to advance on the enemy; Mason was of opinion that they should sail past the Pequot country to Narragansett, and then return and take the enemy by surprise. This opinion was a proof of his discernment and military skill. The Pequots were expecting them at the harbor; where they kept a watch day and night; and the place was encompassed by rocks and thickets, affording the Indians, who were the more numerous, every advantage. It would be difficult to land, and if a landing was effected, it would be difficult, to approach the enemy's forts, without being much harassed, and giving an opportunity for all of them to escape, if they were unwilling to fight. Besides, by going first to Narragansett, the hope was indulged, that some accession to their force might be procured. These reasons weighed much with Mason, but not with the other officers, who were afraid to exceed their commission. In this perplexity the chaplain, Mr. Stone, was desired to seek wisdom from above. Having spent most of Thursday night in prayer on board the Pink, in the morning he went on shore, and told Mason, he was entirely satisfied with his plan. The council was again called and the plan was adopted. Mason of course sailed past the Pequot country to Narragansett, disclosed his object to the sachem of that tribe, and obtained from him about two hundred Indians, and he then set out by land on his expedition against the Pequots. He first however placed a strong guard around the fort of an unfriendly sachem of the Narragansett's, that none of the Indians should come out and alarm the Pequots. In the evening of the second day they reached the neighborhood of one of the Pequot forts at Mystic, having in their train about five hundred Indians. The army encamped, being exceedingly fatigued in consequence of heat of the weather, and the want of necessaries. The guards who were advanced considerably in front, heard the enemy singing until midnight. It was a time of rejoicing with them, as they had seen the vessels pass a few days before, and concluded that the English had no courage to attack them. About two hours before day on the morning of Friday, May 26th, the captain assembled his men, and prepared himself for determining the fate of Connecticut. The blessing of God was briefly and devoutly implored. With less than eighty brave men he marched forward, the Indians, who were much afraid, having fallen in the rear. He told them to stay behind at what distance they pleased, and to see whether Englishmen would not fight. As Mason approached within a rod of the fort, a dog barked, and an Indian roared out, Owassux! Owassux! (Englishmen! Englishmen!) The troops pressed on, and having fired upon the Indians, through the palisades, entered the fort at the principal entrance and sword in hand. After a severe conflict, in which a number of the enemy were killed, victory was still doubtful, for the Indians concealed themselves in and about their wigwams, and from their retreats made good use of their arrows. At this crisis the captain cried out to his men, "we must burn them," and seizing a fire-brand in one of the wigwams set fire to the mats, with which they were covered. In a short time all the wigwams were wrapped in flames. Mason drew his men without the fort, encompassing it completely: and the sachem, Uncas, with his Indians and such of the Narragansetts as remained took courage, and formed another circle in the rear. The enemy were now thrown into the utmost terror. Some climbed the palisades and were brought down by the fire of the muskets; others were so bewildered that they rushed into the very flames. A number collected to the windward and endeavored to defend themselves with their arrows, and about forty of the boldest issued forth and were cut down by the swords of the English. In a little more than an hour the whole work of destruction was completed. Seventy wigwams were burned and six hundred Indians perished. Seven escaped, and seven were taken prisoners. Two only of the English were killed and sixteen wounded. The victory was complete, but the army was in great danger and distress. So many were wounded and worn down by fatigue, that only about forty could be spared to contend with the remaining enemy. In about an hour three hundred Indians came on from another fort; but Mason led out a chosen party and checked their onset. It was determined to march immediately for Pequot harbor, into which a few minutes before, to their unutterable joy, they had seen their vessel enter. When the march commenced, the Indians advanced to the hill, on which the fort had stood. The desolation which here presented itself to their view, filled them with rage; they stamped and tore their hair in the transports of passion; and rushing down the hill with great fury seemed determined to avenge themselves on the destroyers of their brethren. But the superiority of fire arms to their bows and arrows kept them at a distance. Mason reached the harbor in safety; and putting his wounded on board, the next day marched by land to Saybrook, with about twenty men. His safe return, and the success which attended the expedition filled the whole colony with joy and thanksgiving. So completely was the object of the expedition effected, that the remaining Pequots were filled with such terror, that they burned their wigwams and fled from their abode. The greatest part of them went towards New-York. Mason was sent out to pursue them, and he took one hundred prisoners of the old men, women and children. The rest, about two hundred in number, soon submitted themselves, engaging never to live in their country again, and becoming subject to the sachems of Mohegan and Narragansett, with the disgraceful necessity of never again being called Pequots. Soon after this war Mason was appointed by the government of Connecticut, major-general of all their forces, and continued in this office till his death. He remained a magistrate, to which station he was first chosen in 1642 till May 1660, when he was elected deputy governor. In this office he continued ten years till May 1670, when his infirmities induced him to retire from public life. After the Pequot war, at the request of the inhabitants of Saybrook, and for the defence of the colony, he removed from Windsor to that place in 1647. Thence in 1659 he removed to Norwich, where he died in 1672 or 1673, aged 72. At the request of the general court he drew up and published a brief history of the Pequot war.

MASON, John Mitchell, D.D., minister in New York, graduated at Columbia college 1789. Having studied theology with his father, he completed his education at Edinburgh. In 1792 he succeeded his father in the church in Cedar street. By his letters on frequent communion, written in 1793, the associate reformed churches were induced to change the old custom, of communing but twice a year, for a more frequent commemoration of the death of the Redeemer. Appointed professor of theology in 1801, he performed the duties until his health declined. In 1810 his connexion with Cedar street church was dissolved, and in 1812 he became the pastor of a new church in Murray-street. From 1811 to 1816 he was the provost of Columbia college. In 1816 he travelled in Europe for the benefit of his health; in 1819 he suffered from two paralytic attacks. From 1821 he presided over Dickinson college in Pennsylvania until 1824, when he returned to New York, and lingered the rest of his days the shadow of what he once was. He died Dec. 27, 1829 aged 59. Four volumes of his sermons were published in 1832. He also published a number of occasional sermons during his life time.

MASON, George, of Virginia, a statesman of distinction, was a member of the general convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, and refused his signature to that instrument. The next year, in union with Henry, he opposed its adoption by the Virginia convention, on the ground that the government of the States would be consolidated, instead of federal, and be liable to conversion into a monarchy. He also opposed with great zeal the section allowing a continuance of the slave trade. He held a high rank among the great men of that state with whom he was cotemporary, in intellectual energy, delicacy of wit, extent of political knowledge, and eloquence. He died at his seat at Gunston Hall, in the autumn of 1792, aged sixty-seven years.

MASQUE DE FER, or IRON MASK, a person confined in the castle of Pignerol, and afterwards in the isles of St. Margaret, and always disguised in a mask with steel springs, which concealed his features, without incommoding him in receiving his nourishment. He died in the Bastille, 1703, and was privately buried under the name of Marchiali. Though no person ever could discover who he was, it is certain that he was a man of high birth, as he was treated with singular respect by his keepers, and as infinite pains were taken to prevent his holding communication with any other person.

MASSENA, Andrew, prince of Essling, and duke of Rivoli, one of the most celebrated of Napoleon's marshals, was born, in 1758, at Nice; entered the army in 1775; and retired from it after having served for fourteen years. The revolution, however, again roused his military ardor. His rise was rapid, for he attained the rank of general of division in 1794. In the Italian campaigns from 1794 to 1799 he on every occasion so distinguished himself that he was called the darling child of victory, and in 1799 he saved France from invasion by routing the Austrians and Russians in Switzerland. His memorable defence of Genoa in 1800 gave time to Bonaparte to cross the Alps, and crush the Austrian army at Marengo. In the campaigns of 1805, 1807, and 1809, in Italy, Poland, and Germany, he was among the most conspicuously successful of the French leaders. His conduct in the last of these campaigns was rewarded with the title of prince of Essling. In 1810 he was appointed to command the army which invaded Portugal, but he was foiled by the genius of Wellington, and was compelled to abandon the Portuguese territory. After this period Massena did not again appear in the field; and he died April 4, 1817.

MASSIEU, William, a French writer, born at Caen, and educated by the jesuits, whose society he left to apply himself more intensely to belles lettres. He became tutor to M. de Sacy's children, and afterwards was made pensionary of the academy of inscriptions, professor royal of the Greek language, and member of the French academy. He was afflicted in the latter part of life, with two cataracts, which deprived him of his sight, and he died of a paralytic stroke, Sept. 26th, 1722. He published, an edition of the Greek Testament—History of French Poetry—a translation of Pindar—a Latin poem on Coffee—Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy. His Lectures on Pindar, Homer, Theocritus, and Demosthenes, were much admired.

MASSILLON, John Baptiste, a famous French preacher, born at Hieres, in Provence, 1663. He was admitted into the congregation of the oratory in 1681, and distinguished himself so much at Vienne, by his funeral oration on Villars, the archbishop of that city, that he was called to Paris, where his eloquence charmed and astonished crowded audiences. His mode of preaching was peculiarly his own; interesting, natural, and simple, his appeals were directed to the heart, and succeeded far above the efforts of all other competitors. The court heard him with applause, and Louis XIV. paid him this sincere compliment, "Father," said the king, "when I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them, but whenever I hear you, I go away much displeased with myself." On one occasion, when discoursing on the small number of the elect, his eloquence was so awfully striking, that an involuntary murmur of applause arose in the congregation, and assisted the preacher more forcibly to convey his pathetic appeal. Uninfluenced by popularity, he followed his duty with modesty, but conscious dignity, and in 1717 was appointed by the regent, bishop of Clermont. In 1719 he was admitted member of the French academy; and after pronouncing his last oration in Paris, on the duchess of Orleans, in 1723, he retired to his diocese, where he presided with mildness, piety, and benevolence. He died Sept. 1742, aged 79, and his name is almost become proverbial as a powerful master of eloquence. His works were published by his nephew, 1745, 14 vols. 12mo.

MASSINGER, Philip, a dramatic poet, born at Salisbury, 1585. He entered at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and then came to London, where he wrote for the stage. He was courted by the wits and the learned men of the times, and was assisted in some of his plays by Fletcher, Middleton, Rowley, Field, and Decker. He died suddenly at his house, Bankside, Southwark, and was buried March, 1639, at St. Mary Overy, or St. Saviour's church, Southwark, in the same grave which also received the remains of his friend Fletcher. He wrote 14 plays of his own, besides those in which he was assisted by his friends. His works appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. by Henry Dell, 1761, and by Mason and T. Davies in 1779.

MASSINISSA, king of part of Africa, from the enemy, became the most faithful ally, of Rome, when Scipio had sent him back, without ransom, his nephew, taken prisoner in battle. At his death, he left Scipio Æmilianus the guardian of his kingdom, B. C. 149.

MASSON DES GRANGES, Daniel, author of the Modern Philosopher, or the unbeliever condemned at the Tribunal of Reason, 1755, 12mo. was a French ecclesiastic, who died 1760, aged 60.

MASSON, Papirius, a French writer, born at Forez, May, 1544. He was educated by the jesuits, and entered into their society, but after some time left it, and applied himself to the law. He became librarian to the duke of Anjou's chancellor, and in 1576, was made advocate of parliament, though he never pleaded but one cause, and that successfully. He died 9th June, 1611. He wrote, four books of French Annals, from Pharamond, to Henry II. 1598, 4to.—and Elegia Virorum Clarissimorum, much admired, and other works.

MASSON, John, a reformed minister, who quitted France to enjoy liberty of opinion in England, and died in Holland about 1750. He wrote, in French, a Critical History of the Republic of Letters, 15 vols. 12mo.—Vitæ Horatii, Ovidii, & Plinii, jun. 3 vols. 8vo.—History of Bayle, and of his Works, 12mo.

MASSUET, Rene, a learned benedictine of St. Maur, born at St. Ouen de Macelles, 1665. He is known by his edition of Irenæus, 1710, folio, with learned dissertations—a fifth volume of the Acts of the Saints of St. Benedict—and other works. He died 19th Jan. 1716, aged 50.

MATANI, Anthony, a physician born at Pistoia, in Italy, 27th July, 1730. He became professor of medicine at Pisa, where he took his degrees, and died universally respected at Pistoia, June 1769. He published de Aneurismaticis Præcordiorum Morbis Animadversiones—Heliiodori Larissæi Capita Opticorum e Græco Latine conversa—Account of the Natural Productions of Pistoia—de Nosocomiorum Regimine—de Reinediis Tractatus, and left some MSS. besides.

MATERNUS DE CILANO, George Christian, a native of Presburgh who died at Altena in Lower Saxony, 1773. He was author of treatises de Terræ Concussionibus—de Causis Lucis Boreal.—de Motu Humorum progress. Veteribus non Ignoti.—de Saturnalium Origine & celebrandi Ritu apud Romanos.

MATHER, Richard, minister of Dorchester, Massachusetts, was a native of England, and came to America in 1635, to escape from persecution in his own country. He arrived at Boston, in August. In a few months after, he was invited to Dorchester, and constituted the teacher of the church there in 1636. He assisted Mr. Eliot and Mr. Welde, in 1640, in making the New England version of the Psalms. The model of Church Discipline, which he presented to the Synod of 1643, was the one which was chiefly adopted, in preference to the models prepared by Mr. Cotton, and Mr. Patridge. He died in 1669, aged 73. He wrote the discourse about the church covenant, and the answer to thirty-two questions published in 1639, which passed under the name of the Elders of New England. He wrote also a modest and brotherly answer to Charles Herle's book against the independency of churches, 1644; a reply to Rutherford, or a defence of the answer to Herle's book, 1646; an heart-melting exhortation, in a letter to his countrymen of Lancashire, 1650; a catechism; a treatise of justification; a letter to Mr. Hooker, to prove that it was lawful for a minister to administer the sacrament to a congregation not particularly under his care; election sermon, 1660; an answer to Mr. Davenport's work against the propositions of the Synod of 1662; he also prepared for the press, sermons on the second epistle of Peter, and an elaborate defence of the churches of New England.

MATHER, Samuel, minister of Dublin, Ireland, the son of the preceding, was born in Lancashire, May 13, 1626. Accompanying his father to this country, he was graduated at Harvard college, in 1643. He was appointed the first fellow of the college, and he was held in such estimation by the students whom he instructed, that when he left them, they put on badges of mourning. When he began to preach, he spent some time in Rowley, as an assistant to Mr. Rogers. A church having been gathered in the north part of Boston, he was invited to take charge of it; but after preaching there one winter, he was induced to go to England, in 1650. In England, he was appointed chaplain of Magdalen college, Oxford. He then preached in Scotland and Ireland. In Dublin, he was senior fellow of Trinity college, and was settled the minister of the church of St. Nicholas. Though he refused several benefices that were offered him, by the lord deputy, because he did not wish to have the episcopalian ministers displaced; yet soon after the restoration he was suspended, on a charge of sedition. Returning to England, he was minister at Burtonwood, till ejected by the Bartholomew act, in 1662. He afterwards gathered a church at his own house in Dublin, where he died in peace, Oct. 29, 1671, aged 45. He published a wholesome caveat for a time of liberty, 1652; a defence of the protestant religion against popery, 1671; an ivenicum, or an essay for union among the presbyterians, independents, and anabaptists; a treatise against stunted liturgies; a piece against Valentine Greatrick, who pretended to cure diseases by stroking; a course of sermons on the types of the Old Testament, with some discourses against popish superstitions.

MATHER, Nathaniel, minister in London, the son of Richard Mather, was born in Lancaster, March 20, 1630. After his arrival in this country with his father, he was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated, in 1647. He afterwards went to England, and was presented to the living at Barnstable, by Oliver Cromwell, in 1656. Upon his ejection in 1662, he went into Holland, and was minister at Rotterdam. About the year 1671 or 1672, he succeeded his brother, Samuel Mather, at Dublin. Thence he removed to London, where he was pastor of a congregational church, and one of the lecturers at Pinner's hall. He died July 26, 1697, aged 67. He published the Righteousness of God by Faith upon all who believe, 1694; a discussion of the Lawfulness of a Pastor's Officiating in another's Church; twenty-three sermons, preached at Pinner's Hall, and Lime street, taken in shorthand as they were delivered, 1701; a Fast Sermon.

MATHER, Increase, D.D. president of Harvard College, the son of Richard Mather, was born at Dorchester, June 21, 1639. He was graduated in 1656. Beginning to preach in the next year, and being invited by his brother to Dublin, he embarked for England, July 3, 1657, and after an absence of four years, returned in August, 1661. In the next month, he was invited to preach at the North Church in Boston, though he was not ordained there till May 27, 1664. He was a member of the Synod of 1679, and drew up the result, which was then agreed on. When king Charles II. expressed his wish that the charter of Mass. might be resigned into his hands in 1683, Dr. Mather zealously opposed a compliance with his Majesty's pleasure. In 1688, he sailed for England as agent of the Province, to procure redress of grievances. After several years of important services, he returned with a new charter, and arrived at Boston, May 14, 1692.

He had the sole nomination of the first governor. After his arrival, the general court appointed a day of public thanksgiving for his safe return, and for the settlement of the government. During the witchcraft delusion, he opposed the violent measures which were adopted. He wrote a book to prove, that the devil might appear in the shape of an innocent man, by means of which a number of persons, convicted of witchcraft, escaped the execution of the sentence. After the death of Mr. Oakes in 1681, the care of Harvard college devolved upon him. But as his church refused to relinquish him, he only made weekly visits to Cambridge, until the appointment of president Rogers, in the following year. After the death of Mr. Rogers, he was again called to the presidency of the college, June 11, 1685, and he continued in this station till Sept. 6, 1701, when he resigned, in consequence of an act of the general court, requiring the president to reside at Cambridge. He was unwilling to leave his church, though his son, Cotton Mather, had been settled as his colleague for a number of years. He died 1723 aged 84. His publications mostly, if not altogether, sermons, were very numerous, and if collected, would make several volumes.

MATHER, Cotton, D.D. F.R.S. minister in Boston, was the son of the preceding, and grandson of John Cotton. He was born in Boston Feb. 12, 1663, and graduated at Harvard college 1678. He was ordained minister of the north church in Boston as colleague with his father May 13, 1684. He died Feb. 13, 1723 aged 65. No person in America had so large a library, or had read so many books, or retained so much of what he read. So precious did he consider time, that to prevent visits of unnecessary length, he wrote over his study door in capital letters, "be short." His publications amounted to 392. Many of them indeed were small, such as single sermons; but others were of considerable magnitude. His essays to do good, 12mo. 1710, is a volume peculiarly excellent. It has lately been reprinted. Dr. Franklin ascribed all his usefulness in the world to his reading it in early life. His Christian Philosopher 8vo. 1721, was admired in England. His directions for candidates of the ministry 12 mo. 1725, gained him a vast number of letters of thanks. Others of his larger works are, the life of his father, and ratio discipline fratrum Nov. Anglorum, or an account of the discipline professed and practised in the churches of New England. But his largest and most celebrated work is his Magnatia Christi Americana, or the ecclesiastical history of New England from its first planting in 1625 to the year 1693, in seven books, folio, 1702. His style abounds with puerilities, puns, and strange conceits, and he makes a great display of learning; but no man was so thoroughly acquainted with the history of New-England, and he has saved numerous important facts from oblivion. In the work are contained biographical accounts of many of the first settlers, both governors, and ministers. It appears that he gave full credit to the stories of witchcraft; but he was not singular in his credulity. Even Dr. Watts wrote to him, "I am persuaded, that there was much immediate agency of the devil in those affairs, and perhaps there were some real witches too." The catalogue of his publications, in his life, written by his son, occupies eighteen pages.

MATHER, Samuel, D.D. minister in Boston, the son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1723. He was ordained in the same church, in which his father was settled, as colleague with Mr. Gee, June 21, 1732. In about ten years a separation occurred, in consequence, it is believed of a difference of views in regard to the revival of religion at that period. A church was built for him in Bennett street by persons, who withdrew with him from the old north church. He was their pastor till his death June 27, 1785, aged 79. He was buried by his own direction without any ceremony. In addition to the life of his father, 8vo. 1729 he published numerous sermons, and religious tracts.

MATHIAS, son of Maximilian II., was emperor of Germany after his brother Rodolphus II. 1612. He made peace with the Turks 1615, but a new war arose which continued for 30 years till the peace of Westphalia. Mathias died at Vienna 10th March, 1616, aged 63.

MATHIAS Corvinus, king of Hungary and Bohemia, was the second son of John Huniades, and obtained the kingdom 1458, after escaping from the confinement where his enemies detained him. He broke the conspiracy of Hungarian lords who invited Frederic III. to take possession of the crown, in opposition to him, and he bravely defeated the Turks, who, invited by the dissensions of the country, had invaded the kingdom. He obliged also his rival to resign the consecrated crown of Stephen which he had seized, and in a new war he attacked the Austrian dominions and penetrated to Vienna, which he took, and also Neustadt. The emperor, terrified and subdued, made peace agreeable to the terms dictated by the conqueror 1497. After establishing wise regulations, reforming abuses, and checking duels and litigious quarrels, this great man was seized with an apoplexy which carried him off 16th April, 1490, at Vienna, as he was preparing to make war against the Turks.

MATHON DE LA COUR, James, a mathematician born at Lyons, 23th Oct. 1712, and died there 1770. He was an active member of the academy of Lyons, and wrote a memoir on the best method of supplying the Action of Wind on large vessels—Elements of Dynamics and Mechanics, 3 vols. 12mo.—Essay on Calculating the Movements of Machines by the Reaction of Water.

MATHON DE LA COUR, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding, was born at Lyons 1738. He came early to Paris, and there distinguished himself by his literary labors, and the prizes which he obtained in various learned academies, and on his return to his native city he gained universal esteem by the benevolence, hospitality, and the amiable virtues of his character. The revolution at last came to embitter his days; after the siege of Lyons, in 1793, he was condemned to death by the bloody tribunal, and shared with several others the fatal blow which hurried so many unhappy victims to an untimely grave. Among his elegant and ingenious pieces these rank high, Dissertation on the Causes which altered the Laws of Lyncurgus, at Lacedæmon, a prize essay, 1771—Discourse on the Danger of reading Books hostile to Religion, a prize composition—Testament de Fortuné Ricard, 1781, long ascribed to Franklin—Idylles in prose—Eloges—Letters on the Public Pictures exhibited in 1763, 5, and 7.

MATIGNON, James de, prince of Montagne, count of Thorigni, was born at Lonray in Normandy, 1526, and early became eminent as a soldier. He was distinguished at the battles of Jarnac, Roche-a-beille, and Moncontour, and was commander in chief in Normandy, 1572, and made a marshal by Henry III. 1579. He assisted at the coronation of Henry IV. as constable, and died July 1597, aged 73.

MATIGNON, Francis Anthony, D.D. a Roman catholic priest, for many years resident in Boston, was born at Paris; Nov. 10, 1753. Previous to the revolution which compelled him to leave France, he held a professorship in the college of Navarre. When in this situation, he became independent in his circumstances, by the reception of a valuable annuity from the king. On coming to America he settled in Boston, where he was esteemed as a faithful pastor. In his manners he was mild and conciliating; and, as a preacher he was learned and eloquent. He died Sept. 19, 1818.

MATILDA, or MAUD, daughter of Henry I. king of England, married Henry IV. emperor of Germany, and was in 1135 publicly announced as her father's heir and successor on the English throne, after the death of his favorite son Henry. On her father's decease, Stephen, who was on the spot, seized the kingdom, and Matilda came at last with an army to conquer her father's inheritance. Stephen was defeated, and Matilda was in 1141 acknowledged queen, but her pride offended the nobles, and Stephen who had conciliated the affection of all parties by his courteous behavior, and by the arts which an usurper can occasionally employ, was taken from his dungeon to be restored to the throne, and the queen fled from the kingdom. After Stephen's death, Henry II. the son of Matilda by Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, whom she had married after her first husband's death, was appointed king of England. Matilda died 1167, aged 67.

MATSYS, Quintin, a native of Antwerp, who from a blacksmith became an eminent painter. His works were chiefly portraits and historical pieces, and in a very masterly style. The best of his pieces is a Descent from the Cross preserved in Antwerp cathedral. He died 1529, aged 69. His son John was also a good artist, though inferior to his father.

MATTHEW CANTACUZENUS, son of John emperor of Constantinople, was partner on the throne with him 1354. On the father's abdication Matthew took for his associate John Palæologus, but the divided power produced quarrels; a battle was fought in Thrace, and Matthew being defeated, resigned the crown to his opponent and retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he composed some commentaries on Solomon's Song.

MATTHEW, of Westminster, a Benedictine of the abbey of Westminster, known as an historian. His work called "Flores Historiarum," treats of English affairs from the beginning of the world to the year 1307, and was published in London 1567, and at Frankfort 1601, folio. The work is divided into three books, the first extends from the creation to the christian æra, the second to the Norman conquest, the third to the beginning of the second Edward's reign, afterwards continued to the death of Edward III. 1377. The author, though occasionally credulous, is universally respected as a faithful, accurate, regular, and candid historian.

MATTHEWS, Tobias, an able and eloquent Oxford divine in the reign of James I. made bishop of Durham, and in 1606 translated to York, where he died 1628, aged 82. A Latin sermon of his against Campian has been published. His son Tobias, after receiving his education at Christ church, Oxford, became a catholic, and entered among the jesuits. He disgraced his name, and abused his talents by being the intriguer and spy of the court of Rome in England. He died 1655.

MATTHEWS, Thomas, a native of Glamorganshire, eminent as a naval commander. He fought in the Mediterranean in 1744, a most obstinate battle off Toulon, but as he was unfortunately not ably supported by his second in command, Les-tock, instead of obtaining a glorious victory as he expected, he had only an indecisive action. Though he had done his duty, he was dismissed from the service by a court martial, and Lestock was acquitted. He died on his estates in Glamorganshire, 1751.

MATTHEWS, John, governor of South Carolina, was a patriot of the American revolution. He was appointed in 1780 a delegate to congress, in which body his services were important. He succeeded Mr. Rutledge in 1782 as governor for one year, and in 1784 was appointed a judge in the court of equity. He died 1802 aged 58.

MATTHEWS, Samuel, governor of Virginia, was one of the counsellors of that colony, appointed in 1624. He was elected governor in 1656, but soon after went to England as agent of the province, and died there. He was succeeded by Berkley.

MATTHIEU, Peter, a French historian, principal of the college of Vercil. He favored the league and the Guises, and afterwards became historiographer to Henry IV. and attended Louis XIII. at the siege of Montauban. He died at Toulouse 12th Oct. 1621, aged 58. He wrote a History of Memorable Events in the Reign of Henry the Great, 8vo.—the History of Henry's Death, folio—the History of St. Lewis, 8vo.—the History of France from Francis I. to Louis XIII. 2 vols. folio.—la Guisiade, a tragedy.

MATTHIOLUS, Peter Andrew, an able physician, born at Sienna. He published some valuable commentaries in Italian on Dioscorides, Lyons 1548, 4to. translated into Latin by Desmoulins, 1572, folio. His works were collected and appeared at Basil, 1598, folio, enriched with the notes of Gaspard Bartholin. He died of the plague at Trent, 1577, aged about 77. There was another physician of the same name, professor of medicine at Padua where he died 1493. He wrote Ars Memorativa, 4to. a curious book.

MATTI, Don Emanuel, a Spanish poet of eminence, born at Oropesa, New Castille, 1663. He was member of the Arcadia at Rome, and Innocent XII. pleased with his poetry, made him dean of Alicant, where he died 18th Dec. 1737. His letters and poetry were published at Madrid, 2 vols. 12mo. 1735.

MATURIN, Charles Robert, a divine, dramatist, and poet, was born, in 1782, in Ireland, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. Though he was popular for his eloquence as a preacher, his only church preferment was the curacy of St. Peter's, in the Irish metropolis. His pen was fertile, but the remuneration which he received could not save him from frequent embarrassments. His first three novels—The Fatal Revenge, The Wild Irish Boy, and The Milesian Chief—were published under the assumed name of Dennis Jasper Murphy. He died in 1825. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote Sermons; The Universe, a poem; the novels of Melmoth, and Woman; and the tragedies of Bertram, Manuel, and Fredolpho. The genius of Maturin was great, but it was not always under the control of a pure taste.

MATY, Matthew, an eminent physician, born in Holland 1718. He took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and in 1740, went to settle in England. He introduced himself to public notice 1759, by his "Journal Britannique," a periodical paper printed at the Hague, and giving an account of English publications. In 1758, he was chosen fellow, and 1765, secretary of the Royal society, and in 1772, he became chief librarian of the British museum. He unfortunately fell a victim to a languishing disorder 1776, after a life devoted to the offices of humanity, and the labors of science. He was a great advocate for the inoculation of the small pox, when it was considered as dangerous. His memoirs of the earl of Chesterfield, nearly finished before his death, were prefixed by his son-in-law Justamond to the works of that nobleman, 1777, 2 vols. 4to.

MATY, Paul Henry, son of the above, was born 1745, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He obtained there a travelling fellowship, which enabled him to go abroad, and in 1774, he went as chaplain to lord Stormont, ambassador to the court of France. His rise in the church might have now been enforced by the influence of his powerful friends, but he expressed some conscientious scruples about those articles of faith, to which before he had subscribed, and in 1776, he totally withdrew himself from the duties of a minister of the church of England. The rest of his life was devoted to literary pursuits. He became assistant librarian to the British museum, and in 1778, succeeded Dr. Horsley as secretary to the Royal society. He began Jan. 1782, a monthly review of new publications, which from ill health he discontinued in 1786. In the disputes which unfortunately prevailed in the Royal society in 1784, about the re-admission of Dr. Hutton, he took a warm part, and resigned his office in disgust, when good sense would have dictated a more moderate and prudent conduct. A sedentary life had weakened his constitution, and he fell a martyr to an asthmatic complaint, 16th Jan. 1787, aged 42. He translated Riesbach's travels through Germany, and after his death a volume of his sermons appeared, in which were those of Secker and other authors, which his editors suspected not to have been transcribed by him.

MAUCHARD, Burchard David, a native of Marbach, professor of physic and anatomy in Tübingen university, and physician to the duke of Wirtemberg. He wrote various tracts on his profession, and died at Tübingen 1751, aged 55.

MAUCROIX, Francis de, a French translator, born at Noyon 1619. He died canon of Rheims, 1708. He translated the Philippics of Demosthenes—the Euthydemus, and the greater Hippias of Plato—some Orations of Cicero—the Rationarium Temporum of Petau, 3 vols. He was intimate with Boileau and Racine, and published, in conjunction with la Fontaine, miscellaneous and poetical works, 2 vols. 12mo.

MAUDUIT, Michael, an eminent divine, born at Vire in Normandy 1634. He died at Paris 1709. He wrote some useful works—a treatise on Religion against Atheists, Deists, 1698—a Translation of the Psalms into French Verse, not very respectable—Analyses of some of the Books of the New Testament, 8 vols. 12mo.—Dissertations on the Gout.

MAUDUIT, Israel, a political writer, born at Exeter, England, 1708. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, but soon after quitted his clerical employment, and became partner with his brother Jasper, a London merchant. In 1760, he excited the public attention by his "Considerations on the German War;" and he was afterwards appointed agent for the province of Massachusetts, and consequently became a warm partisan in the disputes with the mother country. In 1769, he wrote his Short View of the History of the New England Colonies, and in 1774, he espoused the cause of the dissenters by his pamphlet "on the Case of the Dissenting Ministers." He published various other pamphlets which are now deservedly forgotten, and died 14th June, 1787, aged 79.

MAUPERTUIS, Peter Lewis Moreau de, an able philosopher, born of a good family at St. Malo's 1693. He was for three years engaged in a military life, but quitted it for the labor of science. He was admitted member of the French academy 1723, and some years after, when visiting London, he was honored with the title of fellow of the Royal society. In 1736, he was at the head of the French academicians, sent by the king of France, to the North, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He was afterwards invited by the prince of Prussia to Berlin, to become president of the learned society there, and with a spirit of adventure he accompanied his royal friend to the war against the Germans. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Molwitz, and conveyed to Vienna, but soon honorably set at liberty by the emperor, and permitted to return to Berlin. He returned to Paris, but instead of quietly settling in his country, in the pursuit of science and philosophy, he went back to Berlin, and was soon after unfortunately engaged in some literary quarrels with Koenig, professor of philosophy at Franeker, and with Voltaire. The roving and unsettled disposition of Maupertuis was not indeed calculated to conciliate esteem and affection; but Voltaire was so severely satirical on him whom he had long called his friend and mathematical instructor, that even the king of Prussia thought it his duty to interfere and arrest the malevolent poet at Frankfort. Maupertuis went afterwards on a visit to his philosophical friends the Bernouillis at Basil, and died at their house, July 1759. His works are very valuable and display every where a great, well-informed, and penetrating mind. They have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo. 1756, consisting of the Figure of the Earth determined—the Measurement of a Degree of the Meridian—Discourse on the Figure of the Stars—Elements of Geography—Nautical Astronomy—Elements of Astronomy—Physical Dissertation on a White Negro—Essay on Cosmography—Reflections on the Origin of Languages—Essays on Moral Philosophy, and various other dissertations, inserted in the Berlin Memoirs.

MAUPERTUY, John Baptist Drouet de, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and afterwards held a place under government, and then entered into orders and obtained a canonry. He wrote the History of the Holy Church at Vienna—a Christian's Sentiments on the True Love of God—the Dangerous Commerce between the two Sexes—Veneration due to Relics. He died 1736, aged 86.

MAUR, Don Charles de, an eminent mathematician and engineer, whose abilities were employed not only in the Spanish army, but in the construction of canals, of public roads, and other great national works. He wrote a treatise on Dynamics, and Elements of Mathematics, and died 25th Nov. 1785.

MAURAN, Peter, a leading man among the Albigenes in Languedoc in the 13th century, who, because he denied transubstantiation, was stripped of his property, and condemned, after severe trials, to make a pilgrimage to the holy land, and there to administer to the relief of the indigent.

MAUREPAS, John Frederic Philippeaux, count of, a French statesman, born 1701. In 1715, he was made secretary at court, and was afterwards appointed superintendent of the king's household, and of the marine, 1723, and minister of state, 1738. Though he evinced sagacity and genius in his master's service, he was exiled to Bourges by the intrigues of Madame Pampadour, and continued in disgrace till Louis XVI. in 1774, recalled him to enjoy his confidence, and to direct public affairs. He died Nov. 1781, aged 80. His correspondence, which was very precise and correct, together with his memoirs, which are very negligently written, appeared at Paris 1792, 2 vols. 8vo.

MAURICE, of Nassau, prince of Orange, succeeded though only 18 on his father's murder, 1584, to the government of the Low Countries. Treading in the glorious steps of his father, he as captain general of the United States strengthened and confirmed the newly established republic, supported its liberties and privileges, and enlarged its provinces by the conquests of Breda, in 1590, and of Zutphen, Deventer, Hulst, Nimeguen, and Gertruydenburg. His successes were rapidly continued, the archduke Albert was defeated in 1597, and the Spaniards were forced to evacuate Holland, and though obliged to raise the siege of Dunkirk in 1600, Maurice avenged this trifling disaster by the total defeat of Albert, near Nieuport. The conquest of Rhinberg, Grave, and other places followed these glorious labors; but while Maurice, respected by the soldiery for his valor and services, aimed at the sovereignty of his country, his views were vigorously opposed by the unyielding integrity of Barneveldt, who, unhappily for the memory of his rival, was sacrificed in an unguarded moment. The Dutch mourned the loss of their virtuous pensionary, and Maurice, sensible of his cruelty, and still more displeased by the loss of Breda, which after a siege of six months fell into the hands of the Spaniards, became the prey of sudden grief, and died of a broken heart 1625, aged 55, leaving behind him the character of being the ablest general of the age.

MAURICE, Rev. Thomas, an English clergyman, was born in 1754. At the age of nineteen he went to St. John's College, Oxford, and about a year afterwards removed to University college. Having taken his bachelor's degree, he was ordained to the curacy of Woodford, Essex, when he married, and continued to reside here till 1785, when he removed to Epping. About this time he devoted his attention to the history and antiquities of India; and in 1790 published a letter to the Directors, containing proposals for a History of Hindostan. In the year following he printed the two first volumes of his Indian Antiquities; succeeded, at intervals, by five more. In 1795, appeared the first volume of the History of Hindostan, which was completed in a third volume in 1790. In 1802, he published the first volume of the Modern History of Hindostan; and, in 1804, the second. In this last year he was presented, by the chancellor, to the vicarage of Cudham, in Kent. He also obtained the pension that had been bestowed upon Cowper; and was likewise appointed one of the librarians of the British Museum. Besides the works already mentioned, Mr. Maurice was the author of various poems, sermons, tracts on various subjects, and latterly of his own Memoirs. He died March 30, 1824.

MAURICEAU, Francis, a French surgeon, chiefly eminent in midwifery, and in an extensive knowledge of female diseases. He wrote a treatise on the disorders of Pregnant Women—on Midwifery—Diseases of Mothers and New Born Infants, 4to. 1694, a very useful work, translated into several languages. He died at Paris 1709.

MAURITIUS TIBERIUS, a Cappadocian, who distinguished himself at the head of the Roman armies, and received in marriage the daughter of the emperor Tiberius Constantine. He was made emperor 592, but though valiant and successful against the Persians and Arabs, he was unfortunately defeated by Phocas his general, who had proclaimed himself emperor, and he was put to death with his five sons, A.D. 602, aged 63.

MAUROLICO, Francis, abbé of Santa Maria del Porto, in Sicily, and professor of mathematics, was born, at Messina 1494, and died 1575. He is author of an edition of the Spherics of Theodosius—Emendatio & Restitutio Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi—Archimedis Momenta Omnia—Euclidis Phenomena and Martyrologium.

MAURY, Jean Siffrein, a French cardinal, was born in 1746 at Vabees, in the ancient comté at Venaission. He studied at Lyons, and, on entering into orders, became a celebrated preacher at Paris, where he obtained a place in the academy, and obtained an abbey. When the revolution broke out, he became one of the representatives of the clergy in the States-general, where he distinguished himself, by his eloquence in behalf of his order, as he afterwards did in defence of royalty. On the dissolution of the constituent assembly, he went to Italy, where he was nominated bishop of Nicæa, and a cardinal. In 1807 he made his submission to Buonaparte, who in 1810 appointed him archbishop of Paris, but when the usurper fell, the cardinal was obliged to leave France. He died at Rome, in 1817. He published several works, the best of which is, "An Essay on Eloquence."

MAUSSAC, Philip James, a counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse, president of the court of aids at Montpellier, and a most elegant Greek scholar, died 1650, aged 70. He published notes on Harpocraton, Paris, 1614, 4to.—Remarks on Plutarch's treatise on Mountains and Rivers.

MAUTOUR, Philibert Bernard Moreau de, auditor of the Paris chamber of accounts, and member of the academy of inscriptions, was born at Beaune, 1654, and died 1737. He published a translation of Petau's Rationarium Temporum, 4 vols. 12mo. and wrote some poems and some dissertations, inserted in the memoirs of the belles lettres' academy.

MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, son of Maximianus Hercules, declared himself emperor, 306. Though opposed by Galerius he established his power, but becoming odious by his cruelty, he was at last attacked and defeated by Constantine, and was drowned as he crossed the Tiber in his flight, 312.

MAXEY, Jonathan, D.D., president of three colleges, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at the college in Providence 1787. He was ordained the pastor of the baptist church in Providence Sept. 8, 1791. He was also professor of divinity in the college, and eleven years the president from Sept. 6, 1792. In 1801 he became the president of Union college at Schenectady, and held the office till 1804. In 1804 he was chosen first president of the college of South Carolina, in Columbia, to which place he removed, and where he died June 4, 1820 aged 52. He published a discourse on the death of president Manning; a discourse on the atonement, 1796; address to a class 1797; a funeral sermon before the legislature, 1818.

MAXIMIANUS, Marcus Aurel. Valer. Hercul. a Roman emperor, who rose to that dignity from the rank of a common soldier. He possessed valor and prudence, but as the associate of Diocletian he was induced to lay down the ensigns of his office, 304, though afterwards he had the ambition to resume his power. His troops, however, rebelled against him, and he was put to death at last by order of Constantine, his son-in-law, 310, aged 60.

MAXIMIANUS, Galer. Valer. a shepherd of Dacia, distinguished by his valor, and at last raised to the throne by Diocletian, who gave him his daughter in marriage. After conquering the Goths, Dalmatians, and Persians, it is supposed that he obliged his father-in-law Diocletian to abdicate the crown. He died 311, in a miserable manner, calling upon the God of the christians, whose religion he had hitherto persecuted.

MAXIMILIAN I. archduke of Austria, son of Frederic IV. was born 1459. By his marriage with Mary daughter of Charles, last duke of Burgundy, he rose to consequence as an independent prince, and in 1486, he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1493, emperor. He was successful in his war against France, but his forces were defeated in Italy and Switzerland. In his eagerness to enlarge his dominions he expressed a wish to be the coadjutor of Julius II. on the papal throne, and like some of the Roman emperors, he assumed the title of pontifex maximus. He afterwards made an alliance with Henry VIII. against France, and even served as a private individual in the English army on the continent. He was unsteady in his attachments, and though possessed of good sense and great qualities, little to be depended on in political affairs. He died at Inspruck, 15th Jan. 1519. He was author of some poems, and of memoirs of his own life.

MAXIMILIAN II. son of Ferdinand I. was elected king of the Romans, 1562, and succeeded his father two years after as king of Hungary and Bohemia, and emperor of Germany. He was of a peaceful disposition, and therefore suffered from the inroads of the Turks upon his dominions. He died at Ratisbon, 12th Oct. 1576, aged 50. By his wife, Mary of Austria, sister of Philip II. of Spain, he had several children.

MAXIMILIAN, duke of Bavaria, deserved by his courage the title of defender of Germany, and by his wisdom that of Solomon. He gained the battle of Prague, 1620, and for his services as a warrior and as the supporter of the Catholic faith, he was raised to the dignity of an elector of the German empire. He died 1651, aged 70.

MAXIMILIAN, Emmanuel, elector of Bavaria, distinguished himself by his many services in the cause of the emperor Leopold. He was at the siege of Neuhensel, in 1685, when the Turkish forces were defeated, and the next year he was at the siege of Buda, and the year after at the battle of Mohatz. His merits placed him at the head of the Hungarian army, and in 1689 he took from the Turks the city of Belgrade, and afterwards commanded the imperial troops at the siege of Mentz, and on the banks of the Rhine. In 1692 he was made governor of the Low Countries by the king of Spain; but during the war of the Spanish succession he sided with France, and exposed himself to the resentment of the emperor, who deprived him of his electoral honors, to which he was restored at the general peace. He died at Munich, 26th Feb. 1726.

MAXIMILIAN, Leopold, elector of Bavaria, son of the emperor Charles VII., succeeded to the electorate of Bavaria, 1746. He died 30th Dec. 1777, and as he left no issue, the succession to his dominions occasioned a war between the empire and Prussia, which was terminated by the peace of Teschen, 1779.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Jul. Verus, son of a Thracian peasant, rose by his valor in the Roman armies, and on the death of Alexander Severus, was proclaimed emperor, 235. He was of gigantic size and proportionable strength, but a great tyrant. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, near Aquileia, 256.

MAXIMUS, Magnus, a Spaniard, proclaimed emperor of Rome, by his troops in Britain, 383. Though opposed by Gratian, he proved victorious, and at last marching into Italy, he was besieged in Aquileia, and defeated by Theodosius, who caused his head to be cut off, 388.

MAXIMUS, Marcus Clodius Puppienus, a Roman emperor, was of humble birth, but rose by his merits to the most eminent posts in the state, and was at length, in conjunction with Balbinus, raised to the imperial dignity by the senate, on the death of the Gordians. He was murdered by the soldiery, after a reign of fifteen months, during which he had made good laws, and labored to reform abuses.

MAY, Thomas, an English writer, born at May field, in Sussex, 1594. He was of Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took, 1612, his bachelor's degree, and afterwards entered at Gray's Inn. His genius recommended him to the notice of the great of those times. He was the friend of sir Kenelm Digby, sir R. Fanshaw, Thomas Carew, Ben Jonson, sir John Suckling, and others, and became the favorite of Charles I. and of his queen. Under the sunshine of royal patronage he wrote "The Heir," a comedy, acted 1620—Cleopatra, a tragedy, acted 1626—Antigone, a tragedy—Agrippina, a tragedy—the Old Couple, a comedy, &c. and also by the king's command, "the Reign of Henry II." a poem in 7 books, and "the Reign of Edward III." a poem in 7 books. As a translator, May acquired some reputation. Virgil's Georgics appeared 1622, with notes, and his Lucan's Pharsalia, 1627. This last work is a very respectable performance, and the poet greatly increased his literary fame by a continuation of the poem to the death of Julius Cæsar, in verses which were much admired, and which Dr. Johnson preferred to the Latin of Cowley or of Milton. May, respected as the friend of the monarch, to whom he dedicated the best part of his publications, became despicable in the civil wars. He embraced the party of the parliament, was made their secretary and historiographer, and as such published the "History of the Parliament of England," which began Nov. 3d, 1640, to the first battle of Newbury, 1643. He wrote also a "Bre viary of the History of the Parliament of England," a few months after the publication of which he died suddenly, 19th Nov. 1650, aged 55. He was buried in Westminster abbey, but at the restoration his body was dug up, and deposited in a pit in St. Margaret's church yard.

MAY, Lewis du, a protestant French historian, who spent the best part of his life in Germany. He died 1681. His works are "State of the Empire, or Abridgment of the Public Law of Germany"—Science des Princes, 8vo.—the Prudent Voyager, 12mo.

MAYENNE, Charles of Lorraine, duke of, son of Francis, duke of Guise, was born 26th March, 1554. He distinguished himself as a heroic soldier at the sieges of Poitiers and Rochelle, and at the battle of Moncontour, and defeated the protestants in Guienne, Dauphiné, and Saintonge. When his brothers were assassinated at the council of Blois, he proclaimed himself chief of the league, declared Cardinal Bourbon king, under the name of Charles X. and prepared to support his power by the force of arms. He opposed, with an army of 30,000 men, Henry IV. but was defeated at the battle of Arques, and again at Ivry, and after many losses he was at last reconciled to his victorious enemy, who in the goodness of his heart made him his friend, and added the government of the Isle of France. He died at Soissons, 3d Oct. 1611.

MAYER, John Frederic, D.D., a Lutheran divine, born at Leipsic 1650. He was successively professor at Witttemberg, Hamburg, and Stettin, and became superintendent of the churches of Pomerania. He died 1712. He wrote a treatise on the method of studying Holy Scripture—Dissertations on Particular Parts of the Bible—Tractatus de Osculo Pedum Pontificis Romani, 4to. but his great work is Bibliotheca Biblica, 4to. 1713, in which he examines the character of the various commentators on the bible.

MAYER, Tobias, an eminent astronomer, born at Maspach, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, 1723. He was self-instructed, and in the formation of machines and instruments, displayed wonderful ingenuity. He also applied himself to the Latin language and belles lettres, and in 1750 was appointed professor of mathematics in Gottingen university. He died 1762, exhausted by his uncommon application. He studied the nature of the moon, and its influence upon the earth with such ability, and approached so nearly the problem of longitude, that his widow obtained an honorable reward of 3000*l.* from the British parliament. His discoveries in astronomy and geometry were very great and important. He published Tables of Refractions—Theory of the Moon—Astronomical Tables, and a Mathematical Atlas. There was also a jesuit of the same name in Moravia, professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, for whom an observatory was built at Mannheim by the elector Palatine. He wrote Basis Palatinae—De Transitu Veneris—De Novis in Cælo Phenomenis, and died 1783.

MAYERNE, sir Theodore, an eminent physician, born of most respectable parents, at Geneva, 23th Sept. 1573. He studied at Heidelberg, and afterwards went to Montpellier, where he took his degree of M.D. 1597. He went to Paris, where he recommended himself to notice by his lectures, and became physician to Henry IV. who promised him his patronage, and endeavored by the means of cardinal Porron and other priests, to convert him to the catholic faith. He came over in 1616 to settle in England, and was in the service of James I. and of his queen. He died at Chelsea, 15th March, 1655, leaving to inherit his large fortune only one daughter, who married the marquis De Montpouillan. His works were printed at London, 1700, in one folio volume.

MAYHEW, Thomas, governor of Martha's Vineyard and the neighboring islands, resided at Watertown, Mass. in 1636. In Oct. 1641 he obtained of the agent of lord Stirling a grant of the above lands. In the following year he began a settlement at Edgartown. In about 30 years these islands were attached to New-York, and in 1692 they were annexed to Massachusetts. He gave his son much assistance in the benevolent work of converting the heathen. The Indian sachems were afraid, that the reception of the Christian religion would deprive them of their power; but governor Mayhew convinced them that religion and government were distinct, and by his prudent conduct removed their prejudices against the truth. Having persuaded them to adopt the English administration of justice, and having proved himself their father and friend, they became exceedingly attached to him, and at length submitted themselves to the crown of England. After the death of his son, as he was acquainted with the language of the Indians, and as he saw no prospect of procuring a stated minister for them, he began himself at the age of 70 to preach to the natives as well as the English. Notwithstanding his advanced age, and his office of governor, he sometimes travelled on foot near 20 miles, through the woods, in order to impart the knowledge of the gospel to those that sat in darkness. He persuaded the natives at Gayhead to receive the gospel, which they had before opposed. When Philip's war commenced in 1675, the Indians of Martha's Vineyard could count twenty times the number of the English, and the latter would probably have been extirpated, had not the Christian religion been introduced; but now all was peace, and Mr. Mayhew employed some of his converts as a guard. He died 1681, aged 92.

MAYHEW, Thomas, the first minister of Martha's Vineyard, the only son of the preceding, in 1642 accompanied his father to that island, where he became the minister of the English. He beheld with Christian compassion the miserable Indians, who were ignorant of the true God; he studied their language, he conciliated their affections; and he taught them the truths of the gospel. The first convert was Hiacoomes in 1643. Mr. Mayhew commenced his public instructions to the Indians in 1646, the same year in which Mr. Eliot began his missionary exertions in a different part of the country. Many obstacles were thrown in his way; but he persevered in his benevolent labors, visiting the natives in their different abodes, lodging in their smoky wigwams, and usually spending a part of the night in relating to them portions of the scripture history. Before the close of the year 1650 a hundred Indians entered into a solemn covenant to obey the Most High God, imploring his mercy through the blood of Christ. In 1662 there were 282 of the heathens, who had embraced Christianity, and among these were eight pawaws, or priests, who were so much interested to support the credit of their craft. He sailed for England in Nov. 1667, to communicate intelligence respecting these Indians to the society for propagating the gospel, and to procure the means of more extensive usefulness, but the vessel was lost at sea, and he perished in her, at the age of 36.

MAYHEW, Jonathan, D.D. minister in Boston, was born at Martha's Vineyard Oct. 8, 1720 and graduated at Harvard college 1744. He was ordained the minister of the west church in Boston June 16, 1747, where he continued, till his death July 9, 1766, aged 45. He possessed superior powers of mind, and in classical learning held an eminent rank. His writings evince a mind, capable of making the nicest moral distinctions, and of grasping the most abstruse metaphysical truths. Among the correspondents which his literary character, or his attachment to liberty, gained him abroad, were Lardner, Benson, Kippis, Blackburne and Hollis. From the latter he procured many rich donations for the college at Cambridge. He was an unshaken friend of civil and religious liberty, and the spirit which breathed in his writings, transfused itself into the minds of many of his fellow citizens, and had no little influence in producing the great events of the American revolution. He was the associate of Otis and other patriots in resisting the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. He believed it to be his duty to promote the happiness of his brethren in every possible way, and he therefore took a deep interest in political concerns. He possessed singular fortitude and elevation of mind. Unshackled by education, he thought for himself, and what he believed, he was not afraid to avow. In his natural temper he was warm, and he had not always a full command of himself. His want of meekness, and his pride are peculiarly displayed in his letter to John Cleaveland. He was however amiable in the several relations of life, endeared to his friends, ready to perform the offices of kindness, liberal and charitable. His discourses were practical and persuasive, calculated to inform the mind, and to reach the heart. He published seven sermons, 8vo. 1749, which for perspicuous and forcible reasoning have seldom been equalled; a discourse concerning unlimited submission, and non-resistance to the higher powers, preached Jan. 30, 1750, in which he did not speak of the royal martyr in the strain of the episcopalians; on the death of the prince of Wales, 1751; election sermon 1754; on the earthquakes; sermons on justification, 1755; two thanksgiving sermons for the success of his majesty's arms, 1758; and two on the reduction of Quebec, 1759; a thanksgiving sermon on the entire reduction of Canada; on the death of Stephen Sewall; on the great fire in Boston 1760; on the death of George II; striving to enter in at the straight gate explained and inculcated, 1761; Christian sobriety in eight sermons to young men, with two thanksgiving sermons; observations on the charter and conduct of the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts, 1763; defence of the preceding, 1764; second defence, 1765; letter of reproof to John Cleaveland; Duddleian lecture, 1765; thanksgiving sermon for the repeal of the stamp act, 1766.

MAYNARD, sir John, an able English lawyer, celebrated for his eloquence, his integrity, and his public spirit. He waited upon William with an address of congratulation after the abdication of James, and when the new king, observing his age, told him he must have outlived many of the judges, and of the lawyers of the state, of his own standing, yes, replied sir John, and I should have outlived the law too, if your majesty had not come to the throne of this country. He died 1690, aged eighty-eight.

MAYNARD, Francis, a poet, one of the 40 of the French academy, born at Toulouse, 1582. He was secretary to queen Margaret, and by his wit and gaiety was the delight of the court, who flattered him with compliments, but settled no favor on him. He retired in disgust, and died in his province, 1646. His odes, songs, and epigrams, were much admired.

MAYNE, Jasper, D.D. an English poet and divine, born at Hatherleigh, Devonshire, 1604, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, of which he became student. He was presented to the livings of Cassington, and of Pyrton, near Watlington, Oxfordshire. He distinguished himself as the author of the "City Match," a comedy, and the "Amorous Work" a tragi-comedy, and drew upon himself some severe reflections from Cheynell, in consequence of his sermon against false prophets at Oxford. In 1648 he was deprived of his studentship and of his livings; but at the restoration he was reinstated, and made canon of Christ-church, archdeacon of Chichester, and chaplain to the king. He died Dec. 6th, 1672. In his character he was cheerful, and in those times of fanatical melancholy very facetious. He wrote, besides, a poem on the naval victory obtained by the duke of York over the Dutch—sermons—Lucian's Dialogues translated.

MAYNWARING, Arthur, a learned Englishman, born at Ightfield, Shropshire, 1668. He was educated at Shrewsbury school, and Christ-church, Oxford, and afterwards studied the law in London. An acquaintance with the earls of Dorset and Burlington, and the duke of Somerset, banished his strong prejudices against the revolution, and afterwards he became a commissioner of the customs, and in the beginning of Anne's reign, auditor of the impost, an office worth 2000l. per annum. He sat in the parliament of 1705, for Preston, in Lancashire, and died at St. Alban's, 13th Nov. 1712. He wrote various pieces in prose and verse, especially epilogues, which were delivered with peculiar effect by his favorite actress.

MAYO, Richard, an English divine, ejected from his living of Kingston, Surrey, for non-conformity, 1662. He wrote a Life of Dr. Staunton—Two Conferences between a Jew and a Papist, and between a Protestant and a Jew—Comment on the Epistle to the Romans, in Pool's Annotations and sermons. He died 1695.

MAYOW, John, a learned physician, born in Cornwall, 1645. He was of Wadhani college, Oxford, and became fellow of All-Souls, where he took his degrees in civil law, after which he practised physic chiefly at Bath. He died in York street, Covent garden, Sept. 1679, and was buried in the parish church there. His works were collected and published at Oxford, 1674. He was a man of extensive powers, and well skilled in chemistry, according to the opinion of Dr. Beddoes, who in a well written pamphlet in 1790, proved that the best part of modern discoveries with respect to air, was known to this active experimentalist.

MAZARINE, Julius, cardinal, and chief minister of France, was born at Piscina, in the province of Abruzzo, Italy, July 14th, 1602. His abilities were conspicuous even in early life, and under Jerome of Colonna he made great and important progress in literature. He recommended himself to the notice of the pope, and by his negotiations and intrigues, was happily successful in preventing a battle between the French and Spaniards before Cassel, and he effected a reconciliation between them. This gained for him the good opinion of Richelieu, and of Louis XIII. and from keeper of the seals, and vice legate to Avignon, he was in 1641, raised to the dignity of cardinal. On the death of Richelieu, Mazarine became the prime minister of Louis XIII. and continued in that high office during the minority of Louis XIV. and the regency of Anne of Austria. Though at first popular, the jealousy of the nobles, and the distressed state of the poor, raised a clamor against him, and he at last yielded to the public voice, and retired from the kingdom. But though a price was set upon his head, the general hatred subsided, his abilities were acknowledged and regretted, and by degrees his return to power became the popular wish. Mazarine restored to greatness, applied himself to consolidate the happiness of France; he effected a peace between his country and Spain, and cemented the union of the two monarchies by the marriage of his master with the infanta of Spain. Excessive application at last produced disorders which proved fatal. He died at Vincennes, 9th March, 1661, aged 59, highly respected by the king and nation. His letters, 103 in number, were published 1694, and again by Chatelan, Amsterdam, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo.

MAZEAS, John Mathurin, a native of Landerneau, in Brittany, who died at Paris, 1802, aged 88. He wrote Elements of Arithmetic, Algebra, Geometry, with an Introduction to Conic Sections—Institutiones Philosophicæ, 3 vols. 12mo. He was professor in the college of Navarre, and canon of Notre Dame, at Paris; but when the revolution robbed him of his offices, and of his income, he retired into the country, where the kindness of a faithful servant administered to all his wants and infirmities.

MAZEPPA, John, hetman or prince of the Cossacks, was born about the middle of the seventeenth century, in the palatinate of Podolia, and in his youth was page to John Casimir, king of Poland. Being detected in an intrigue with a married lady, the husband ordered him to be tied naked to the back of a wild horse, which was then let loose. The animal had been bred in the Ukraine, and thither it carried him. Nearly expiring with fatigue, Mazeppa was found by some peasants, who took care of him till his recovery. He remained in the Ukraine, and finally rose to be hetman. But, though a prince, he was a vassal of Russia; and the hope of becoming independent, induced him to form an alliance with Charles XII. After the fatal battle of Pultowa, which was fought by his advice, he sought refuge at Bender, and he died there in 1709.

MAZOCHI, Alexius Symmachus, an Italian antiquary, born at Santa Maria, near Capua. He died at Naples, where he was divinity professor, 1771, aged 87. His works on ancient medals and inscriptions were valuable. His last and perhaps best publication was the Antiquities of the Campagna di Roma.

MAZUIER, Claude Lewis, a native of Bellevue, who became judge of Louhans, and during the French revolution was elected to the convention. His conduct in this violent assembly was firm and moderate, and he not only voted for the banishment of the king, but defended the measure as the most salutary for the honor and the happiness of the nation. His boldness in accusing the public plunderers of the state marked him for destruction, and he was dragged to the guillotine, Feb. 1794, aged thirty-four.

MAZZEI, Philip, a native of Tuscany, after engaging in commercial business in London, removed to Virginia. By that state he was sent on a secret mission to Europe, from which he returned in 1785. He afterwards lived in Poland in the service of the king. He died at Pisa March 19, 1816, aged 86. A notorious letter of Mr. Jefferson was addressed to him. He published Recherches historiques et politiques sur les Etats. Unis. 4 vols. 8vo. 1788.

MAZZUOLI, Francesco, better known by the name of Parmeggiano, or Parmesan, was an eminent painter, born at Parma, 1604. His application to his art was so great that when Rome was sacked by Charles V. he remained engaged with his pencil, like another Protogenes, unconscious of surrounding dangers. He excelled also in etching, of which he has, by some, been called the inventor. He died of a violent fever at the early age of 36, 1640. For sweetness of manner, elegance, and grace, he has been regarded by several judges as the rival of Correggio, and in genius and invention, he had few equals. There was another artist of the 16th century, of the same name, and related to him, who excelled chiefly in historical painting.

MPCALL, Hugh, major in the army of the U. S. died at Savannah, Georgia, July 9th 1824, aged 57. He published a history of Georgia, 2 vols. 8vo. 1816.

MPCALLA, Daniel, D.D., minister at Wappetaw, South Carolina was a native of Pennsylvania, and graduated at Princeton college 1766. In 1774, he was ordained pastor of the churches of New Providence and Charleston, Penn. In the war he went as chaplain to Canada and was made a prisoner. For some months he was confined in a prison-ship. He returned on parole at the close of 1776. For twenty-one years he was the minister of the congregational church at Wappetaw. He died April 6, 1809, aged 60. He was an eminently learned, good and useful man. His eloquence was almost unrivalled. He preferred the congregational form of government as most consonant to the apostolical practice. He published a sermon at the ordination of James Adams. His sermons and essays, with an account of his life, by Hollingshead, were published in two vols. 1810.

M'CLURE, David, D.D., minister of East Windsor, Connecticut, was a native of Mass. and graduated at Yale college 1769. From 1776 to 1785, he was the minister of North Hampton, N. H., and in 1786, was installed at East Windsor, where he died June 25, 1820 aged 71. Dr. M'Clure was a respected and useful minister, and a trustee of Dartmouth college. He published a sermon on the death of Dr. Pomeroy, 1784; on the death of Erastus Wolcott; with Dr. Parish, Memoirs of E. Wheelock, founder of Dartmouth college 8vo. 1810; sermons on the moral law, 8vo. 1818; an account of Windsor in Hist. col.

M'DONOUGH, Thomas, commodore, was a native of Delaware. He served as a midshipman in the American fleet sent to the Mediterranean. In the war of 1812, at the age of 28, he commanded the American forces on lake Champlain. His own ship the Sarotaga mounted 26 guns: the Confidence, the ship of the British, captain Downie, mounted 36. In the battle of Sept. 11, 1814, after an action of two hours and 20 minutes, he obtained a complete victory, which he announced as follows, "the Almighty has been pleased to grant us a signal victory, on lake Champlain, in the capture of one frigate, one brig, and two sloops of war of the enemy." The state of New York gave him 1000 acres of land on the bay, in which the battle was fought. He died 1825, aged 39.

M'DOUGAL, Alexander, major-general, was the son of a Scotchman, who sold milk in the city of New York, nor was he ashamed to acknowledge, that when a boy he assisted his father. He proved himself a zealous whig before the beginning of the American revolutionary war; in Aug. 1776, he was appointed brigadier, and major general in Oct. 1777. He commanded in the action at White Plains, and was engaged in the battle of Germantown. In 1781, he was elected a delegate to congress; he was afterwards of the senate of New York. He died in June, 1786.

M'GREGORE, David, minister of Londonderry, N. H., died 1777, aged 66, in the 42d year of his ministry. With eminent abilities, he was an excellent evangelical preacher. He was also a zealous and intrepid asserter of the rights and liberties of America, and died in the full persuasion, that the cause of his country would triumph, and that here the church of God would flourish in its purity. He published professors warned of their danger, 1741; on the trial of the spirits, in answer to Caldwell, 1742; the believers all secured, 1747; on the death of J. Moorhead, 1774.

M'INTOSH, Lachlan, general, an officer of the American revolutionary war, was one of the early settlers of Georgia, and the principal military of the province. Sept. 16, 1776, he was appointed brigadier general. Having served to the end of the war, he was a member of congress in 1784. In 1785, he was one of the commissioners to treat with the southern Indians. He died at Savannah Feb. 20, 1806, aged 80.

M'INTOSH, John, general, was an officer of the Georgia line in 1775, and served during the war with unblemished honor. In 1814, he commanded the Georgia division which went to Pensacola. He died 1826, aged about 70.

M'INTOSH, Duncan, a noble philanthropist, a native of Scotland, and an American citizen, died at Aux Cayes, in Nov. 1820. At the revolution of St. Domingo, he was living there; a merchant of immense wealth acquired by trade; he might have withdrawn and secured his property; but he remained and sacrificed his estate, and risked his life in the sacred cause of humanity. When 400,000 ignorant slaves had broken their chains and were devastating the island, and thirsting for the blood of the whole French population, and when all were flying for safety, there was found one man, who remained as the preserver and benefactor of the miserable. With his gold he bought the victims out of the hands of the executioners; others he rescued by force. In defiance of the decree of death against those who should conceal the French, he maintained them three months in the places where they were concealed. More than once was he thrown into a dungeon; but on recovering his freedom, he engaged with new ardor in the work of benevolence. During the revolutionary storm of 7 or 8 months continuance, he was able, by his indefatigable exertions, to save in vessels, which he freighted for that purpose, more than 900 men and 1500 women and children. While the heart is susceptible of the emotions of gratitude and admiration towards men of great virtue, and heroic benevolence, the name of M^tIntosh, will not be forgotten.

M^tKEAN, Thomas, LL. D., governor of Pennsylvania, a patriot of the American revolution. He was educated in the excellent school of Dr. Allison at New London. Having studied law in Newcastle, he settled in that county. He was a member of the legislature, in 1762; of the congress of 1765; and that of 1774, having his residence at this period at Philadelphia. He remained in congress as a delegate from Delaware from 1774, to 1783; yet was he at the same time, chief justice of Pennsylvania, from 1777, being claimed by both states. He was present in congress July 4, 1776, and voted for the declaration of independence, and signed it as engrossed Aug. 2d, yet in the printed journal his name was omitted. As a member of the convention of Pennsylvania, he urged the adoption of the constitution. In 1799, he succeeded Mr. Mifflin as governor, and remained in office till 1808. He died June 24, 1817, aged 83.

M^tKEAN, Joseph, D.D. LL.D., professor of rhetoric and oratory at Harvard college, where he graduated in 1794. In 1797, he was ordained minister of Milton; his infirm health induced him to ask a dismissal in 1804. He was inaugurated as professor of oratory at Cambridge 1809, in which office he was industrious and punctual. It was with him a maxim that what was worth doing at all, was worth doing well. He died at Havana, whither he went for his health, in consequence of a pulmonary complaint, March 17, 1818, aged 41. He published a valedictory sermon, 1814; two fast sermons on friendship and patriotism, 1814; at the ordination of J. B. Wight, 1815; of N. L. Frothingham, 1815; on the death of John Warren, 1815; at the installation of Dr. Richmond, 1817; memoir of John Eliot in historical collections, additions to Wood's continuation of Goldsmith's England.

M^tKEEN, Joseph, D.D., first president of Bowdoin college, was a native of New Hampshire, and graduated at Dartmouth college, 1774. He was ordained the pastor of the church in Beverly, Mass. 1785. Here he continued with reputation and usefulness 17 years. He was chosen president of Bowdoin college, and inducted into office, 1802. He died 1807, aged 49. He possessed a strong and discriminating mind, his manners were conciliating, though dignified, and his spirit mild, though firm and decided. He was indefatigable in his exertions to promote the interests of science and religion. He published a sermon at the fast, 1793; at the ordination of Rufus Anderson, 1794; of A. Moor, 1796; two discourses on the fast, 1798; at the election, 1800; at the fast, 1801; and some papers in the transactions of the American academy; his inaugural address, with Mr. Jenks's eulogy, 1802.

M^tKNIGHT, Charles, M.D., a physician, was a native of New Jersey, and graduated at Princeton college, 1771. He studied medicine with Dr. Shippen. In the revolutionary war he was the senior surgeon of the flying hospital in the middle department. After the war he settled in New York, where he delivered lectures on anatomy and surgery. He died 1790, aged 40.

M^tLEAN, John, a merchant of Boston, died in Oct. 1823, aged 64. He once failed for a large sum, and was reduced to the necessity of resorting to the bankrupt act. Afterwards, while he was in Italy for his health, he engaged in such commercial pursuits as enabled him to acquire a large fortune. Having thus the ability, he honorably paid all his old creditors, although they had no legal claims upon him. In his last will, he bequeathed the large sum of 100,000 dollars to the Massachusetts general hospital in Boston; also 50,000 dollars to the hospital, and to Harvard university on the death of an individual.

M^tMAHON, Bernard, a gardener and florist, founded in 1809, a botanic garden near Philadelphia, and died in Sept. 1816. He published the American gardener's calendar, 1806.

M^tLEAN, John, M.D., was the son of an eminent surgeon of the same name, in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, where he was born in March, 1771. After pursuing his literary, philosophical, and medical studies successively at Glasgow, Edinburgh, London and Paris, he commenced the practice of surgery at Glasgow, in 1791. In 1795, he came to America; and in the same year was appointed professor of chemistry and natural history in the college of New Jersey, at Princeton. Two years afterwards, he was chosen professor of natural philosophy and mathematics in the same institution, the duties of which office he continued to discharge with great reputation to himself, and advantage to the college until the year 1812, when he resigned his office at Princeton, in consequence of being appointed professor of natural philosophy and chemistry in the college of William and Mary in Virginia. Here, however, he remained but a few months. His health declining, he returned to Princeton, where he died in February, 1814, in the forty-third year of his age. As a physician, a surgeon, a natural philosopher, a mathematician, and above all, as a chemist, Dr. M^tLean was very eminent. As a college officer he was uncommonly popular and useful. He received the degree of M.D. from the university of Aberdeen, in 1797. His principal publication bore the title of "Lectures on Combustion," intended to support the Lavoisierian system of chemistry, in opposition to Dr. Priestley. Besides this he wrote several other papers in controversy, with Dr. Priestley, which were published in the New York Medical Repository.

MEAD, Matthew, an English divine, rector of Great Brickhill, Bucks, and afterwards of Stepney, near London, from which he was ejected in 1662, for non-conformity. His principles rendered him suspected during the Rye-house plot, but after appearing before the council, he was honorably dismissed. He died 1699, at Stepney, where he had continued to preach to a congregation of dissenters. He was author of the Almost Christian tried and cast, 8vo. a work of some merit—Scr mons on Ezekiel's Wheels—the Good of Early Obedience, 8vo.

MEAD, Richard, a distinguished physician, son of the preceding, was born at Stepney, 11th Aug. 1673. From a private school, he went in 1689 to Utrecht, where he studied under Grævius, and three years after he removed to Leyden, where he attended the medical lectures of Pitcairn, and Herman, and contracted a strong intimacy with the celebrated Boerhaave. From Holland, he visited Italy, and took his degree of M.D. at Padua, 1695, and then returned to England. The next year he settled in his native place, where he practised with increasing reputation for seven years. His "Mechanical Account of Poisons," 1702, was received by the public with avidity; and he, in 1704, was admitted into the Royal society, in 1707, chosen one of the council, and in 1717, appointed vice-president. From Stepney he removed to Crutched Friars, and seven years after, to Austin Friars. He was made fellow of the college of physicians in the year 1716, and in 1719 he was consulted by government upon the best means of preventing the importation of the plague, which raged with such fatality at Marsilles, and he published in consequence, his Discourse on Pestilential Contagion, which in one year, passed through seven editions. In 1727, he was appointed physician to George II. and had the satisfaction of seeing placed in the same situation, his two sons-in-law, Drs. Wilnot and Nicholls. He died 16th Feb. 1754. Dr. Mead attained high honors and celebrity in his profession, so that in one year he made more than 7000*l.* by his practice. As a man of letters, he was highly respectable, and as the friend and the patron of the learned, universally admired; so that no foreigner of eminence ever came to London without soliciting, as an honor, an introduction to him. His collection of books and prints was very valuable, and sold after his death, for more than it had cost him. With the most pleasing manners, Dr. Mead united the greatest liberality and most extensive benevolence; he gave his advice to the poor with pleasure and gratis, and it is remarkable that he never would receive a fee from any clergyman, except one, who disputed with him on the propriety of his prescriptions. His works were, a treatise de Imperio Solis & Lune—de Morbis Bilibicis—Monita Medica. All his medical works were published together in 1762, 1 vol. 4to.

MEADOWCROFT, Richard, an English divine, born at Staffordshire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1733 he was made canon of Worcester, where he died 1769. He published in 1732, Notes on Milton's Paradise Regained, edited again in 1743, and mentioned with commendation by bishop Newton. He wrote also other small tracts, besides eleven sermons.

MECHAIN, M. a native of Lyons, whose Observations on the eclipse seen at Versailles, 1774, procured him the applauses of the French academy. His work on the great comet of 1661, whose appearance was again expected in 1790, procured him the prize of the academy in 1732; and in consequence of his great astronomical talents, he was employed by the nation in 1792, to measure a degree of the meridian between Dunkirk and Barcelona. He finished the work in 1798, and then proposed to extend it to the Balears, but he died before the completion of his useful labors, of a fever on the coast of Valencia, 1805. He edited and improved the Connoissance des Temps, and was much respected for the general information which he possessed, and the abilities which he displayed in difficult and intricate calculations for the marine, and other public purposes.

MEDE, Joseph, B.D. a native of Berden, Essex, educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He devoted himself to the study of divinity, and refused the preferment which the kindness of his friends offered him, especially Usher, the primate, who wished him to accept the provostship of Trinity college, Dublin. His works, in 1 vol. fol. are chiefly on divinity; and in his Commentary on the Apocalypse, he has been followed by bishop Newton, and other learned divines. He died 1638, aged 52.

MEDICIS, Cosmo, surnamed the Elder, was the founder of his illustrious family. He was so successful in commerce, that his riches were superior to those of the potentates of his times, and he indulged the noble sentiments of applying the resources of his ample fortune to the patronage of the sciences and of learned men. He collected a most valuable library, which he enriched with rare and curious manuscripts; but while he expected respect and gratitude from his countrymen, he found that his conduct was viewed with jealousy by the arts of his enemies. Yielding to the prevailing ingratitude of his countrymen, he retired in honorable exile to Venice, where he received the homage due to a sovereign prince; but the Florentines at last became sensible of their cruelty; Cosmo was recalled, and made for 34 years the arbiter of the destinies of his country. He died Aug. 1464, aged 75, and the gratitude of his fellow-citizens engraved on his tomb these glorious words, "the father of his people, the deliverer of his country."

MEDICIS, Lorenzo de, surnamed the Great, and the father of letters, was born 1448. He was son of Peter, and the grandson of Cosmo, and he was brother to Julian de Medicis. The great influence which he and his brother exercised in Florence, was viewed with jealousy by Ferdinand IV. of Naples, and by pope Sixtus IV. and a dreadful conspiracy was formed against them by the Piazzi, at the base instigation of these two foreign potentates. Julian fell by the dagger of an assassin, while celebrating mass 1478, but Lorenzo, who was then with him, had the good fortune to escape, though wounded, with his life; and such was his popularity, that he was conducted back to his palace by the multitude, in the general acclamations of condolence and of joy. Inheriting the beneficent and honorable qualities of his grandfather, he devoted himself to the patronage of literature, and was regarded as the Mæcenas of the age. The Florentines saw with pride their opulent countryman selling in one hand the products of the East, and with the other supporting and guiding the public concerns of the state; at one time giving audience to ambassadors, at another splendidly entertaining merchants, and now relieving the necessities of the poor, exhibiting public shows to the multitude, or adorning his native city with the most splendid buildings, for the purposes both of magnificence and hospitality. These high and meritorious services were not lost in the gratitude of the Florentines; Lorenzo was named chief of their republic, and so mild and equitable was his government, and so respectable his character, that foreign princes often submitted their disputes to his final and impartial decision. Ardent in the cause of science, Lorenzo was surrounded by the learned, the brave, and the ingenious; and to render Florence the emporium of whatever was rare in literature, John Lascaris, a man of classical taste, was sent in the most honorable manner, into the East, to collect the choicest manuscripts to enrich the library.

Lorenzo was himself a man of learning. He wrote poetry with success, and his sonnets and songs, in Italian, have often been printed, and are deservedly admired. This illustrious character died 9th April 1492, aged 44; but though so universally respected and admired, his glory was obscured by his passion for the female sex, and by his great indifference in religious duties. His history has become particularly interesting in the luminous pages of Mr. Roscoe.

MEDICIS, Lorenzo de, descended from the brother of the great Cosmo, aspired to the name of popular. He caused to be assassinated, in 1537, Alexander de Medicis, whom Charles V. had appointed duke of Florence, and he courted popularity by his patronage of literature. He died without posterity.

MEDICIS, Hippolyto de, natural son of Julian, was raised to the rank of cardinal by his cousin, Clement VII. in 1529, and sent as legate to Germany. He possessed great abilities as a negotiator, and also as a military man; so that when the pirate Barbarossa threatened the coast of Italy with devastation, Hippolyto was usefully employed against him, and obliged him to retire without even meeting him in the field. He contributed to the elevation of Paul III. to the papal chair, and afterwards formed a plan for the assassination of Alexander de Medicis, the governor of Florence, which failed. He died suddenly at Itri, as some imagine, in consequence of poison, 13th Aug. 1535, aged 64.

MEDICIS, Peter de, a painter, born at Florence, 1536, of the same illustrious family. He studied under Cigoli; and as an historical painter, possessed celebrity from the strong expression, as well as the grace of his characters, and the correctness of his style, and his judicious coloring.

MEDINA, John Baptiste, a painter of Brussels, who studied the works of Rubens with such effect, that his own pieces possessed all the beauties and correctness of that illustrious master. He was for some years settled in England, and was the last knight created in Scotland by the high commissioner of that kingdom. He died 1711, aged 51.

MEEN, Henry, a learned divine, who was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of bachelor of divinity in 1776. He afterwards became minor canon, and lecturer of St. Paul's cathedral, which chapter presented him to the rectory of St. Nicholas Cole-abbey and the prebend of Twyford. He died Jan. 3, 1817, aged 72. Mr. Meen completed Favkes' translation of the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius; and published "Remarks on the Cassandra of Lycophoron." He was also the author of "Successive Opera; or Selections from ancient Authors, sacred and profane," 8vo.; and a poetical piece entitled "Happiness."

MEERMAN, John, LL.D. a Belgic writer, was born in 1753, and early distinguished himself for learning. He studied at Leipsic under Ernesti; and completed his education at Leyden, where, in 1774, he took the degree of doctor of laws. He then visited France, Italy, Germany, Great Britain, and Ireland; and on his return home, he was elected burgomaster a situation which he soon resigned. Under Louis Buonaparte he was director of the fine arts and of public instruction in Holland; and on the union of that country with France, he was made a count of the empire. He died August 19th, 1815, leaving to the city of the Hague the rich library of his father, which he had largely increased. His best known published works, including a supplementary volume to his father's Thesaurus, are the History of William, earl of Holland, and king of the Romans, 5 vols. 8vo.; The Relations of Great Britain and Ireland, of Austria, of Prussia, and of Sicily, 1787—94, 5 vols. 8vo.; The Relations of the North and North-west of Europe, 1805,—6 vols. 8vo.; containing observations made by the author in his travels.

MEHEGAN, William Alexander, a French historian, of Irish extraction, born at Salle, in the Cevennes, 1721. He was an elegant writer, though perhaps too affected in the attempt of rendering his style graceful and brilliant. He wrote, the Origin of the Guebres—Considerations on the Revolutions of Art—the Origin and Progress of Idolatry—a Picture of Modern History, the best of his works, translated into English. He died 23d Jan. 1766.

MEHUL, Stephen Henry, an eminent French composer, was born, in 1763, at Givet; was an admirable organist when only ten years old; settled at Paris in 1779, and was so fortunate as to obtain the friendship and advice of Gluck; became inspector at the Conservatory of Music, professor of Composition at the Royal School, a member of the Institute, and Academy of Fine Arts, and a knight of the legion of honor; and died in 1817. Of his opera the principal are, Euphrosyne and Coradin; Stratonice; and Joseph.

MEIBOMIUS, John Henry, a learned professor of physic at Helmstadt, his native place, was afterwards first physician at Lubeck. He wrote, a Latin Life of Mæcenas—de Cerevisiis, 4to.—Tractatus de Usu Flagrorum in Re Medica and Venerea, 4to. and 8vo. edited by Th. Bartholin. He died 1655, aged 65.

MEIBOMIUS, Henry, son of John Henry, was born at Lubeck, and studied at Groningen, Franeker, and Leyden. He died professor of medicine, history, and poetry, at Helmstadt, 1700, aged 62. His publications are, Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, 3 vols. folio.—ad Saxonie Inferioris Historiam Introductio, 4to.—Valent. Hen. Vogleri Introductio Univ. in Notitiam Bonorum Scriptorum, 4to.—Chronicon Bergense—De Vasis Palpebrarum Novis, 4to.

MEIBOMIUS, Marcus, a learned critic, of the same family as the preceding. He published a translation of Greek authors who had written on Music—an edition of the Greek Mythologists—de Fabrica Trirremium, 4to.—Corrections for an edition of a Hebrew Bible. He was for some time at the court of Christina, queen of Sweden, but left it in disgust. He died 1711.

MEIBOMIUS, Henry, a native of Helmstadt, celebrated for his knowledge of medicine, as well as for his great learning, and his critical powers. His works, which are valuable, are preserved in the Germanicarum Rerum Scriptores, 4to. He died 1625.

MEIGS, Return Jonathan, colonel, an officer in the American revolutionary war. Living in Connecticut in 1775, immediately after the battle of Lexington he marched a company of light infantry to the neighborhood of Boston. With the rank of major he accompanied Arnold in his march through the wilderness of Maine, in order to attack Quebec. His printed journal gives the best account of this expedition. In the assault in Quebec by Montgomery and Arnold at the close of the year, he was made a prisoner with captains Morgan and Dearborn. In 1776 he was exchanged and returned home, and the next year was appointed colonel. His expedition to Long Island, in May 1777, was one of the most brilliant enterprises of the war, for which he received, Aug. 3, the thanks of congress and a sword. At the head of a few companies he attacked the British troops at Sagharbor with fixed bayonets, made 90 prisoners, and destroyed 12 vessels, and much forage, without the loss of a man. In 1779 he commanded a regiment under Wayne, at the capture of Stony point, and was honorably mentioned by Washington. After the war, about 1788 or 1789, he was one of the first settlers of the wilderness of Ohio. For the first emigrants, he drew up a system of regulations, which were posted on a large oak near the confluence of the Ohio and Muskingum rivers, the bark of the tree being cut away for the space of the sheet. Often was the venerable oak consulted. He was the agent for Indian affairs as early as 1816. He died at the Cherokee Agency 1823 at an advanced age. His journal of the expedition to Quebec from Sept. 9, 1775 to Jan. 1, 1776 is published in American Remembrancer for 1776; in Historical Collections 11, 227—247, and a summary of it in Maine Historical Collections 1.

MEIGS, Return Jonathan, governor of Ohio from 1810 to 1814, when he was appointed postmaster general of the United States. He resigned the office in 1823 and died in 1825.

MEIR, George Frederic, a German philosophical writer, born at Annemondorf, in Saxony, 1718. His best works are, a Representation of a Critic—Instructions how any one may become a Modern Philosopher—Introduction to the Elegant Arts and Sciences. He died 1777.

MEISNER, Balthasar, a Lutheran divine, theological professor at Wittemberg, was author of, Anthropologia, 2 vols. 4to.—Moderate Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to.—and died 1623, aged 41.

MEISSNER, Augustus Theophilus, a German romance writer and dramatist, was born in 1757, at Bautzen, in Lusatia; studied at Leipsic and Wittemberg; and was, successively, keeper of the archives at Dresden, professor of belles lettres at Prague, and director of the superior schools at Fulda. He died in 1807. His principal works are, Sketches; Alcibiades; Bianco Capello; the History of the Frink Family; and Fragments towards the Life of Chapel-Master Naumann.

MELA, Pomponius, a Latin geographer, was born in Spain, in the first century, and is supposed by some to have been related to Seneca and Lucan. He is the author of a work, in three books, on the Geography of the World, as far as it was then known.

MELANCHTHON, Philip, a celebrated reformer, born 16th Feb. 1497, at Bretten, in the palatinate of the Rhine. His father's name was Schwartzert, which signifies black earth; but the word was changed, according to the affectation of the times, by his friend Reuchlin, into Melanchthon, which in Greek, expresses the same meaning. He studied at Bretten, Pfurtsheim, and Heidelberg, and with such success, that at 13, he wrote a comedy of some merit. He left Heidelberg in 1512, because he was refused a degree on account of his youth, and then passed to Tubingen, where he resided for six years, and gave public lectures on Virgil, Terence, and other classics. In 1513, by the recommendation of his friend Reuchlin, he was appointed by the elector of Saxony, Greek professor at Wittemberg; and here began that intimacy with Luther, which contributed so much to the progress of the reformation. He was in 1527 appointed by his patron, the duke, to visit the churches of the electorate, and afterwards he was employed in the arduous labors of preparing those articles of faith which have received the name of the Augsburg confession, because presented to the emperor at the diet of that city. In the disputes which he maintained in those days of controversial enmity, he displayed great candor and mildness, which his friend Luther attributed more to a spirit of timidity, than to the meekness of the Christian character. His moderation as well as his learning, were so universally acknowledged, that he received a liberal invitation from Francis I. to come to France, to settle the disputes of the protestants; but through the interference of the duke of Saxony, the offer was declined; as likewise a similar invitation from the king of England. He was engaged in the various conferences which took place on religious subjects at Frankfort, Reinspurg, Worms, Spires, and Ratisbon; and every where evinced the deepest learning, the most peaceable temper, and the strongest moderation. The character of the times, and not inclination, rendered him a controversialist, and his answer to his mother, displayed the great and the good man. When asked by the aged woman, who repeated before him her prayers in a simple but pious manner, what she must believe in this great confusion of creeds, he replied, "go on mother to believe and pray as you have done, and never trouble yourself about controversies." He died at Wittemberg, 19th April, 1560, and was buried by the side of his friend Luther, in the church of the castle. Among the reasons which, on his death-bed, he assigned for considering dissolution as happiness, he said that it delivered him from theological persecutions. His works were very numerous, and as they were written in the midst of controversy, and ecclesiastical avocations, they were not always so correct in language, as they proved useful in advancing the reformation. A chronological catalogue of these was published in 1582, and they appeared altogether in 4 vols. folio, at Wittemberg, 1601.

MELCTHAL, Arnold de, one of the founders of Swiss liberty. His father was cruelly deprived of his eyes by the order of Grislser, the Austrian governor; and the son, irritated at the sufferings of his parent, united in 1307, with Stouffacker, Furst, and Tell, to break the chains of their servitude, and after defeating an army of 20,000 men at the pass of Morgarten, with only 500 men, the liberty of Switzerland was established.

MELLENDEZ VALDEZ, John Anthony, an eminent Spanish poet, was born in 1754, at Ribera; and, after having filled various important offices in the law department, was obliged to quit his country in consequence of his having accepted a place under Joseph Buonaparte. He died in 1807. His poems, which form three volumes, possess merit of a superior order, especially his epistles.

MELETIUS, Bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt, was deposed by an Alexandrian Synod, and became the founder of a new sect, which supported the Arians against Athanasius. He died about 346.

MELLAN, Claude, a French engraver and designer, born at Abbeville, 1601. He died at Paris, 1688. Charles II. wished in vain to invite him to settle in England. His mode of engraving was peculiar to himself. His most admired piece is a head of our Saviour, formed of one spiral line, beginning at the top of the nose.

MELLISH, John, a geographer, was a native of Scotland; came to America in 1809, and died at Philadelphia, 1822, aged 52. He published Travels in the United States and in Great Britain and Canada, 2 vols. 8vo. 1812; a Description of the Roads, 1814; Traveller's Directory, 1815; Description of the United States, 1816; Universal School Geography and Atlas; the Necessity of Protecting Manufactures, 1818; maps of Pennsylvania and of the United States; Information to Emigrants.

MELLEN, John, minister of Sterling, Mass., graduated at Harvard college, 1741. He was ordained pastor of the church in Lancaster, near Sterling, 1744. His connection with his society was dissolved in consequence of disputes, occasioned principally by his endeavors to maintain what he considered the order of the churches. In 1784, he became the minister of Hanover, where he continued to discharge the duties of the sacred office until February 1805, when his infirmities induced him to relinquish it. He died 1807, aged 85. He published a sermon at the ordination of J. Palmer, 1753; at a general muster, 1756; on the mortal sickness among his people, 1756; on the conquest of Canada, 1760; Religion productive of Music, at the ordination of Levi Whitman, 1785: before a lodge of free masons, 1793; on the Thanksgiving, 1795; on the Duty of Making a Profession of Christianity; 15 discourses on Doctrinal Subjects, with practical improvements, 8vo., 1795.

MELLEN, John, minister of Barnstable, graduated at Harvard college, 1770, was ordained Nov. 12, 1783; and died at Cambridge, Sept. 19, 1823, aged 76. He published a sermon on the death of I. Dunster, 1791; masonic discourse, 1793; at a dedication, 1795; at the election, 1797; Dudleian lecture, 1795.

MELMOTH, William, a learned man, born 1666. He was bencher of Lincoln's inn, and joined Peere Williams, to publish Vernon's Reports. He is deservedly celebrated for his treatise of "the great Importance of a Religious Life," a work of infinite merit, and of the most benevolent tendency, of which, besides large editions, not less than 42,000 copies were published in the 18 years preceding 1784. Melmoth died 6th April, 1743, and was buried in the cloister of Lincoln's inn chapel.

MELMOTH, William, son of the preceding, was born 1710. He distinguished himself as the translator of Pliny's and Cicero's epistles, in a very neat and elegant style, and published besides, Memoirs of his Father—some poems in Dodsley's collection—and letters under the name of Sir Thomas Fitzosborne. This worthy and amiable character died 1799.

MELON, John Francis, a native of Tulle, who settled at Bourdeaux, as secretary to the learned academy which, by his influence with the duke of la Force, had been founded there. He wrote a Political Essay on Commerce, 12mo. a work of merit—Mahoud, the Gasnevide, an Allegorical History of the duke of Orleans' Regency, and Dissertations. This learned and well-informed man died at Paris, 1738.

MELLOT, John Baptist, a French writer, esteemed for his memoirs inserted in the volumes of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member, and for an edition of Joinville's Life of St. Lewis, with a Glossary. He was librarian to the king, and was employed to make a catalogue of the royal collection. He was born at Dijon, 1697, and died at Paris, 1760, much respected.

MELVIL, sir James, third son of lord Keith, was born at Halhill, Fifeshire, 1530. He was page to Mary, queen of Scots, when dauphiness of France, and was afterwards in the service of Montmorency, prime minister of France; and after travelling over Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, he returned again to Scotland, to attend his widowed mistress. He became distinguished at the Scotch court, was made a privy counsellor, and intrusted with the most important affairs of the kingdom. He merited this confidence by his loyalty to the unfortunate queen, whom he attended till her confinement at Lochleven, and he held the same rank of trust and of honor in the cabinet of her son. When James succeeded to the English crown, Melvil, too infirm to share in the affairs of state, came to England, to pay a visit of respect and duty to his sovereign, and returned to Scotland, where he devoted himself to the writing of his memoirs for the information and instruction of his son. These valuable memoirs were published by his grandson, 1683, in folio, and contain a very interesting detail of the state of affairs of Scotland, for several years. Sir James died at Halhill, 1606, aged 76.

MELVILLE, Henry Dundas, viscount, the son of Lord Arnistone, a Scotch judge, was born in 1740; was educated at the university of Edinburgh; was called to the bar; and in 1773, 1775, and 1777, became solicitor general, lord advocate, and joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. His political existence commenced in 1782, when he was made a privy counsellor and treasurer of the navy. The triumph of the coalition displaced him; but he returned to office with Mr. Pitt, and was ever after a firm and useful coadjutor of that minister. When the board of control was established, he was appointed its president. In 1791 he was made secretary for the home department, and in 1794, secretary of war. The latter post he held till he retired with Mr. Pitt, when he was created a viscount. When Mr. Pitt again became premier, Dundas was made first lord of the admiralty. But in 1805, he was impeached by the Commons, and though he was acquitted of the alleged malversations, and only proved to have been negligent of his duty with respect to his agents, he ceased to take a part in public affairs. He died May the 27th, 1811.

MEMNON, a Rhodian, general of Darins, opposed Alexander's invasion of Asia. He ably defended Miletus against the conqueror, and subdued the isles of Chios and Lesbos; but died suddenly, when his valor might perhaps have impeded the rapidity of the Macedonians.

MENAGE, Giles, a learned Frenchman, the Varro of his time, was born at Angers, 15th August, 1613. After a rapid progress in belles lettres and philosophy, he applied himself to the law, and becoming an advocate, he pleaded with great popularity at Angers, Paris, and other places. But the laborious profession of the law was disagreeable to a man who had a strong inclination to devote himself to polite literature, he therefore quitted it, much against his father's desire, and took orders. He was for some time in the family of cardinal de Retz, but on the death of his father he converted all his property to an annuity, that his literary engagements might be less disturbed with family affairs. He became the companion of the great and learned, and obtained some ecclesiastical preferment, but the wit of his conversation, and the propensity of uttering a joke even at the expense of a friend, brought upon him many enemies, and among them d'Aubignac, Boileau, Cotin, Salo, Bouhours, Baillet, and others. Mazarine too in the midst of his greatness was jealous of his influence, and a Latin elegy addressed to him by the poetical ecclesiastic was almost considered as a satire, not a compliment to the all-powerful minister. Menage was honored with a place at the Florentine academy, but when his friends proposed him for the French academy, his name was rejected. He unfortunately, late in life, put his thigh out of joint by a fall, and died 23d July, 1692, of a defluxion of the stomach, aged 79. This ingenious and learned writer, it is said, possessed a most retentive memory, and from this great storehouse, and the inexhaustible resources of a polished mind, could say, as Bayle observes, a thousand good things in a thousand pleasing ways. His works are numerous, the best known of which are, Origines de la Langue Françoise, 4to.—Miscel-lanea, or a collection of some of his poetical and prose pieces in Greek, Latin, and French—la Requete des Dictionnaires, an ingenious satire about the French Academy's Dictionary—Poemata, 12mo. 1656.—Origini della Lingua Italiana, 4to.—Observations sur la Langue Françoise, 2 vols. 12mo.—Juris Civilis Amenitates, 8vo.—Histoire de Sablé, folio.—an edition of Diogenes Laertius—Menagiana, published after his death.

MENANDER, a celebrated Greek poet, prince of the new comedy. All his plays have perished, and as he was esteemed superior to Aristophanes, it is an irreparable loss. Terence is said to have borrowed his six plays from him. He flourished at Athens, about 342 B.C.

MENANDRINO, Marsilio, or Marsilius of Padua, a learned lawyer of the 14th century. He was excommunicated by the pope, 1327, for writing "Defensor Pacis," a work in favor of his master, the emperor, Lewis of Bavaria, in which he boldly maintained that the imperial power was superior to that of the pope, both in temporal and spiritual affairs. He wrote besides de Translatione Imperii, &c. and died at Montemalto, 1328.

MENARD, Claude, a French magistrat at Angers, eminent as an antiquarian. He lost his wife in his old age, and in consequence quitted the world and became an ecclesiastic. He died 20th Jan. 1652, aged 72. He published Joinville's History of St. Lewis, 4to. with learned notes—St. Austin's books against Julian—Researches about the Body of St. James the elder, said to have been buried at Angers—History of Bertrand de Gueschlin, 4to.

MENASSEH-BEN, Israel, a Portuguese rabbi, of the sect of the Pharisees, son of a rich merchant. He was successor to Isaac Urrie, in the care of the synagogue of Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Basil, and attempted in London, against the wish of the presbyterians, to obtain from Cromwell a toleration of the Jews. He died at Middleburg 1660, aged 56. He published an edition of the Hebrew bible without points, 2 vols. 4to. Amsterdam, with a Latin preface—the Talmude with Notes, 8vo.—El Conciliador, 4to.—de Resurrectione, 8vo. de Fragilitate Humanâ—Spes Israelis, 12mo.—the Breath of Life, in Hebrew, 12mo.—the End of Life, 12mo. translated into English by Poccocke with a life.

MENCKE, Otto, a learned German, born at Oldenburg, Westphalia, in 1644. He studied at Rome, and at Breiten, and Leipsic, and afterwards visited the other German universities. He became in 1668 professor of morality at Leipsic, was five times rector of the university, and seven times dean of the faculty, and died there 1707. He published Marsham's Canon Chronicus, 4to.—Camden's Annals of Elizabeth—Jus Majestatis circa Venationem, 4to.—Respublica in Microcosmo conspicua, 4to. and was the first author of the "Acta Eruditorum," of Leipsic, a valuable work which established a correspondence with the learned of Europe, and first appeared 1682, 4to.

MENCKE, John Burehard, son of Otto, was born at Leipsic 1674. After travelling into Holland and England, he settled at Leipsic, where in 1699 he was appointed professor of history, and in this office he acquired great reputation. Frederic Augustus king of Poland made him his historiographer and aulic counsellor, as a mark of his esteem, and the royal societies of London and Berlin enrolled him among their members. He died April 1, 1732. His works are numerous and learned. He wrote, de Charlataneria Eruditorum Declamationes duæ, 8vo.—Scriptores Rerum Germa- nicarum, 3 vols. folio.—two Latin Discourses on the empiricism of learned men, 12mo. a weak performance. He continued also the "Acta Eruditorum," and had some share in the dictionary of learned men, Leipsic, folio, 1715.

MENDEZ PINTO, Ferdinand, a Portuguese, who from a menial servant, became celebrated in consequence of his adventures. He embarked for the Indies 1537, and after a residence of 21 years he returned to Portugal. He published an account of his adventures, in which he asserts that he was 13 times made a slave and sold 16 times. The work is interesting from the particulars which it communicates of the history of Japan, Brama, Pegu, Siam, Java, and Achem.

MENDEZ, Moses, an English writer of Jewish extraction, known as a poet and dramatic writer. He was, on account of his abilities, honored with the degree of M.A. by the university of Oxford, and he died 1758. He wrote also, some poems preserved in Dodsley's collection.

MENDELSON, Moses, a Jew of Berlin, of obscure origin at Dessau. He quitted commerce for literature, and acquired great reputation. He died 1785, aged 56. He published, Jerusalem, 1755, supporting that the Jewish religion is but deism—Phædon, 8vo. in which he maintains the spirituality and immateriality of the soul, in such sensible language and powerful argumentation, that he has been called the Socrates of the Jews—Philosophical works, 2 vols. 8vo.—Letter to Lavater, 8vo.—Translation of Genesis—Commentary on Ecclesiastes—treatise on the Sublime, and Letters on Sensations.

MENDOZA, Gonzales Peter le, archbishop of Seville and afterwards of Toledo, chancellor of Castile and Leon, was born at Guadalajara 1428. He early distinguished himself by his progress in literature, and his fidelity in the service of the kings of Castile, by whose interest he obtained a cardinal's hat from pope Sixtus IV. He also ably served Ferdinand and Isabella, and after a life of great virtue, wisdom, and moderation, died 11th Jan. 1495. He translated in his youth Sallust, Homer's Iliad, Virgil, and some parts of Ovid.

MENDOZA, John Gonzales, an Augustine friar of Castile, sent by the king of Spain as his ambassador to China, 1584. He wrote an History of China, 1589, 8vo. in Spanish, which has been translated into other languages. His last preferment was the bishopric of Propajan in the West Indies.

MENECRATES, a physician of Syracuse, who, proud of the success of his medical prescriptions, assumed the title of Jupiter, in the age of Philip, father of Alexander, who deservedly ridiculed him.

MENESES, Alexis de, a Portuguese Augustine monk, of noble birth at Lisbon. He was sent to Goa as archbishop, and there he held a synod, the acts of which were called Synodus Dianperensis. On his return to Europe he was promoted to the see of Braga, and was made viceroy of Portugal by Philip II. of Spain. He compiled an history of his order in Portugal, and died at Madrid 1617.

MENESTRIER, John Baptist le, a French antiquarian, author of medals, coins and ancient monuments of the Roman emperors, and of illustrious medals of emperors of Rome. He was born at Dijon, and died 1634, aged 70.

MENESTRIER, Claude Francis, a jesuit, born at Lyons 1633. He wrote, History of Louis XIV. by medals, emblems, &c.—Consular History of Lyons—the Art of Heraldry and the Philosophy of Images. He possessed a very astonishing memory, and it is said that to try him, Christina of Sweden pronounced in his presence 300 unconnected words, which he immediately repeated in the same order. He died 1705. There was another author born at Dijon, called also Claude. He wrote Symbolica Diane Ephesie Statuæ exposita, 4to. and died 1657.

MENGES, Antony Raphael, a famous painter born at Aussig, in Bohemia, 1726. His father, who was painter to Augustus III. king of Poland, saw and encouraged his rising abilities, and after studying at Rome for four years, the young painter returned to Dresden, where his genius soon displayed itself. He was patronized by Charles III. of Spain, who granted him a pension with a house and equipage; but though thus favored by the monarch, he resided not in Spain, but at Rome, where grief for his amiable wife and the ignorance of an empiric put an end to his life 1779. The chief of his paintings are preserved at Madrid and Rome, and in them he successfully united the graces and the beauties of his great masters Raphael, Correggio, and Titian. The altar piece of All-soul's chapel, Oxford, is also one of his admired pieces. He was also an author. His works were published with notes by d'Azara at Parma 1780, 2 vols. 4to. containing Reflections on Beauty and Taste in Painting—the Life of Correggio—the principal Pictures at Madrid. The works have been translated into French, and also into English, 2 vols. 8vo.

MENINSKI, Franciscus à Mesquin, or MENIN, an eminent German orientalist born in Lorraine 1623. He studied at Rome, and learned the Turkish language at Constantinople, and from interpreter to the Polish embassy, became himself ambassador to the Porte, and for his services was honored with the addition of ski to his name. He was afterwards in the emperor's service, and in 1669 went to Jerusalem. He obtained the dignity of counsellor of war to the emperor, and died at Vienna 1698. His great and very important work "Thesaurus Linguarum Orientalium," appeared at Vienna 1680, in 4 vols. folio, and in 1687 another volume was added. This valuable work was begun to be reprinted in 1780 at the expense of Maria Theresa, who thus favored the wishes of sir William Jones, and of the learned, who had expressed a desire to see the scarce volume republished. Meninski was unfortunately engaged in a controversy with Podesta, oriental secretary to the emperor, and much acrimony was shown on both sides.

MENNO, Simonis, an ecclesiastic of Friesland, who embraced the tenets of the anabaptists, and after being again baptized by Ubbo Philippi, became a powerful leader of his sect. He denied that Jesus Christ received a human shape from his mother, the Virgin Mary; and while he maintained the necessity of again baptizing adults, he inveighed against the custom of infant baptism, which he regarded as popish innovation. His eloquence and his learning were so much admired, that he gained a great number of followers in Westphalia, Guelderland, Holland, and Brabant; but though a price was set on his head, he had the good fortune to escape his persecutors. He was, in his opinions, more moderate than the rest of the anabaptists. His followers are still to be found in the Low Countries, under the name of Mennonites, divided into two distinct sects. He died at Oldeslo, between Lubec and Hamburg, 1565. His works were published at Amsterdam, 1681.

MENOCHIUS, James, a civilian of Pavia, possessed of such respectable abilities, that he was called the Baldus and Bartholus of his age. He was professor of law in several universities of Italy, and at last settled at Milan, where he was made president of the council, and where he died 10th Aug. 1607, aged 75. He wrote de recuperanda Possessione, de adipiscenda Possessione, 8vo.—de Presumptionibus, 2 vols. folio.—de Arbitrariis Judicium Questionibus & Causis Conciliorum, folio.—His son, John Stephen, was born at Pavia, and became a jesuit, which profession he adorned by his learning and his virtues. He died 4th Feb. 1656, aged 80. He was author of, Political and Economical Institutions—a learned treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews—a Commentary on the Scriptures, 2 vols. folio, and 4 vols. 4to. all in Latin, and works of merit.

MENON, James Francis, baron de, a modern French general and politician, was originally a deputy from the nobility of Touraine to the states-general, and one of the first of his order who entered into the commons' chamber. At this time he united himself with the duke of Orleans and the Jacobins, and was employed as mareschal-de-champ at Paris on the 10th of August, 1792. In 1793 he was sent against the insurgents of La Vendee, as general-in-chief, when he displayed great incapacity and was beaten by La Roche-Jaquelin. He was now superseded and returned to Paris. Having the command of a division, he defended the National Convention, in May 1795, against the Jacobins; but on a subsequent occasion his conduct exposed him to a degree of accusation as a traitor. He was however acquitted. He accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, as general of a division, in which post he displayed considerable talents, but the same deficiency of principle as in earlier life. He turned Mahometan, for the sake of obtaining in marriage the daughter of the keeper of the baths of Rosetta, who was rich; submitted to the peculiar rites of Islamism, and called himself Abdallah James Menon. On Kleber being assassinated he assumed the chief command, and was opposed to the English under general Abercromby; but he was at length obliged to capitulate, and returned to France in May 1802; Buonaparte immediately appointed him governor of Piedmont. He was afterwards sent in a similar character to Venice, where he died, August 13th, 1810.

MENTEL, John, a printer of Strasburg, to whom some authors have attributed the invention of printing, but not on sufficient grounds. He was originally a writer and illuminator of manuscripts, in the service of the bishop of Strasburg, and he was the first who introduced the art of printing there. His first publication was a bible, 1466, in 2 vols. folio, and other works followed. He obtained great celebrity, and equal opulence by his profession, and was ennobled by the emperor Frederic IV. He died at Strasburg, 1478.

MENTZEL, Christian, a native of Furstenwal, in Germany, celebrated for his great knowledge of medicine and botany, which he improved by travelling into foreign countries. He wrote, Index Nominum Plantarum, 1696, folio, reprinted and improved, 1715—a Chronology of China, 4to.—Natural History of Brazil, 4 vols. folio—on the Flowers and Plants of Japan, 2 vols. folio. These two last works are preserved in MS. in the Berlin library. He died 1701, aged 79.

MENZIKOFF, Alexander, a Russian prince. His father was a poor peasant, and he himself was apprentice to a pastry cook, and carried pies about the streets, till the Czar Peter saw and admired his wit and liveliness. From this low situation, or as others say, from the place of groom in the royal stables, young Menzikoff soon became a favorite and was appointed governor of Ingria; and in reward for his services, his abilities, and his zeal, was raised to the rank of prince and of major-general. He also distinguished himself in Poland, 1708, but his enemies accused him of peculation, and he was fined and disgraced, till the favor of his master again restored him to power, and sent him as ambassador to Poland 1722. He also gained the good graces of the empress Catherine, and after the death of Peter, the imperial heir, afterwards Peter II. was destined to marry the daughter of the favorite. At the accession of the young Czar, Menzikoff conducted himself with imprudence, and instead of securing the marriage of his daughter, he behaved with haughtiness, and even treated the monarch with contempt, so that his enemies, especially the Dolgorucki, took advantage of his folly, and he was soon banished from the court, and sent at last to end his days in the distant deserts of Siberia. He bore his misfortunes with great resignation, and died in his exile, 2d Nov. 1729, a victim to his ambition, and the intrigues of a court.

MENZINI, Benedict, an Italian poet born at Florence, 1646. His origin was humble, but his genius rose superior to poverty, and though unnoticed by those to whom he dedicated the efforts of his muse, and obliged to maintain himself occasionally by dictating extempore sermons to various ecclesiastics, he gained the patronage of Christina queen of Sweden, and afterwards was made canon of St. Angelo in Piscina by the pope. He was made member of the society of Arcadi, and of the Della Crusca academy. He died 1704, aged 58, and left nothing behind him but his works. His poetry was much admired, and his satires possessed great spirit. His works, containing elegies, hymns, Art of Poetry and a treatise on the Irregular Construction of the Tuscan Language, have been collected in 4 vols 4to. 1731, by Fabroni.

MERCADO, Michael de, or MOERCATI, a native of St. Miniato in Tuscany, who became first physician to pope Clement VIII. and his successors, and inspector of the botanical garden of the Vatican, where he formed a valuable cabinet of metals and fossils, of which a description appeared at Rome in fol. 1717, with an appendix in 1719. He was so highly esteemed that Ferdinand, grand duke of Tuscany, as well as the Roman senate, raised him to the honors of nobility. He wrote some works on botany, besides, a learned treatise in Italian on the Obelisks of Rome. He died 1593, aged 53.

MERCATOR, Nicolas, a well known mathematician and astronomer. He was born in Holstein, and settled in England about the restoration, and became a fellow of the Royal society. He published Cosmographia—Rationes Mathematicæ—de Emendatione Annuâ Diatribæ duæ—Hypothesis Astronomica—Logarithmo Technia—Institutionum Astronomicæ. With all his learning he was very credulous, and a great friend to astrology. He died about 1690.

MERCER, Hugh, brigadier-general, was a native of Scotland, and educated for the profession of medicine. On his emigration to America he settled and married in Virginia. He served with Washington in the war against the French and Indians which terminated in 1763, and was by him greatly esteemed. He was with Braddock in the campaign of 1755. In the action at fort Duquesne he was wounded, and faint with the loss of blood, he lay under a fallen tree. One of the pursuing Indians jumped upon the very tree, but did not discover him. Mercer found a brook at which he refreshed himself. In his hunger he fed on a rattlesnake, which he had killed. After pursuing his solitary way through a wilderness of one hundred miles, he arrived at fort Cumberland. At the commencement of the American revolutionary war he abandoned his extensive medical practice, and entered the army. He was distinguished at the battle of Trenton. In the action near Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, he commanded the van of the Americans, composed principally of southern militia. While exerting himself to rally them, his horse was killed under him. He was surrounded by some British soldiers, who refused him quarter, and stabbed him with their bayonets, and bruised his head with the butt end of their muskets, leaving him on the field as dead. He died from the wounds on his head Jan. 19, aged about 56. He was buried at Philadelphia; thirty thousand of the inhabitants followed him to the grave. He was a valuable officer. Provision was made by congress in 1793 for the education of his youngest son.

MERCER, John, governor of Maryland, was a soldier of the American revolution. In 1782 he was elected a delegate to congress from Virginia; in 1787 he was a member from Maryland of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and also a member of congress from Maryland. He was governor from 1801 to 1803. He died at Philadelphia Aug. 30, 1821, aged 64.

MERCIER, John, a philologist, born at Uzez, Languedoc, where he died 1562. He was Hebrew professor at the Royal college of Paris, 1547, after Vatablus, and distinguished himself by his great learning. He wrote Lectures on Genesis, and on the Prophets, Geneva, 1598—Commentaries on Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, 2 vols. folio—Tabulæ in Grammaticam Chaldaicam, 4to. His son Josius published notes on Ancient Authors—and an Edition of Nonius Marcellus, 4to. and died 1626.

MERCIER, Bartholomew, known under the name of abbé de St. Leger, was born at Lyons 1st April, 1734, and entered into the society of St. Genevieve, where he became librarian. He was noticed in 1764 by Louis XV. and made abbot of St. Leger in Soissons. He was a very learned and intelligent man, and wrote Letters on the Bibliography of Debure, 1763, 8vo.—Letter to Caperonier—Letters on the true Author of Richelieu's Political Testament—Supplement to Marchand's History of Printing, 4to.—Letter on the Maid of Orleans—Dissertation on the Author of the Book of the Imitation of Christ by Kempis—Notice on the curious Book called Pedis Admirandæ, by J. d'Artis—Letters on the Letters attributed to pope Ganganelli—Notice on the Tombs of the dukes of Burgundy—Library of Romances from the Greek, 12 vols.—Letters on Different rare editions of the 15th century, 8vo. &c. He was also engaged in the Journals de Trevoux and des Savans, and the Magazine Encyclopedique. This worthy man, whom the revolution reduced from comfort and independence, to poverty and wretchedness, died 13th May, 1799.

MERCURIALIS, Jerome, an Italian physician, born at Forli 30th September, 1530. He studied and took his doctor's degree at Padua, and practised at Forli, where he became so popular that his countrymen sent him in 1562, as ambassador to pope Pius IV. His abilities rendered him every where respected, and after being courted and patronised by cardinal Farnese, by the emperor Maximilian, and by the Venetians, and after being professor at Padua, Bologna, and Pisa, he retired to Forli, where he died of the stone 9th November, 1606. His chief works are de Arte Gymnasticâ—de Morbis Mulierum—de Morbis Puerorum—Consultationes & Responsa Medicinalia—Medicina Practica—de Hydrophobiâ collected together and published, Venice, folio, 1644. He also edited Hippocrates' works, Greek and Latin, with notes, 1588.

MERCY, Francis de, a native of Longwy, who became general of the Bavarian army, and distinguished himself in various campaigns. He took Rotwell and Friburg, 1643, but lost the battle near Friburg soon after, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Nordlingen, 3d August, 1645. His grandson Florinond, became by his valor marshal of the empire, and obtained the command of the German forces. He took the lines of Psaftenhoven and afterwards signalized himself in the wars against the Turks. He fell at the battle of Parma, 29th June 1734.

MERE, George Brossin, Chevalier de, a French writer, much admired at court for his rank, and for his learning. He wrote Discourses of Wit and Conversation—the Elegances of Discourse—treatises on Politeness, Eloquence, Speech and Letters: but though once applauded, his works are now forgotten. He died at his estate in Poictou, 1690, at an advanced age.

MERIAN, Maria Sibylla, a lady celebrated for her skill in drawing insects and flowers, daughter of an engraver, was born at Frankfort on the Maine, 1647, and married John Andricz Graff, a painter and architect at Nuremberg. The fame which she had acquired before her marriage was not lost in her husband's name, and she has preserved her maiden appellation as her public character. In her zeal for reputation she went on a voyage to Surinam, accompanied by her two daughters, to delineate with greater accuracy the insects, reptiles, and other natural curiosities of that country, and after two years' residence she returned to Holland, and obliged the world with the publication of her Dissertatio de Generatione et de Metamorphosis Insectorum Surinamensium, folio, containing sixty plates, to which her daughters Dorothea and Helena afterwards added twelve. She wrote besides the Origin of Caterpillars, &c. in Dutch, 2 vols. 4to. The two works have appeared united under the title of Histoire des Insectes de l'Europe et de l'Amerique, Amst. 1730, Paris 1768—1771. She died at Amsterdam 1717, aged 70. Her father Matthew Merian, published the Topography of the Universe, 31 vols. folio, and a Florilegium, 2 vols. folio.

MEROVÆUS, king of France after Clodion 448, defeated Attila 451, near Mery-sur-Seine, and extended the limits of his kingdom from the Somme to Treves, a town which he took and plundered. He died 456, and was succeeded by his son Childeric. He was the progenitor of the Merovingian race.

MERRET, Christopher, a native of Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, educated at Oxford. He practised physic in London, and became fellow of the college of physicians and of the Royal society. He wrote Pinax Rerum Natural. Britannic. continens Vegetabil. Anim. Fossil. Svo.—Short View of the Frauds and Abuses practised by Apothecaries, 4to.—Collection of Acts, Charters, &c. belonging to the College of Physicians, 4to.—Neri's Art of coloring Glass, translated—Papers in the Philosophical Transactions. He died 1695, aged 81.

MERRICK, James, a poet and divine, was born, in 1720, at Reading; was educated at the school of that place, and at Trinity College, Oxford; and died in 1769. Bishop Lowth speaks of him as being one of the best of men and most eminent of scholars. Among his works are, Poems on Sacred Subjects; Annotations on the Psalms, and on the Gospel of St. John; a translation of Tryphiodorus; and a metrical version of the Psalms.

MERSENNUS, Marin, of the religious order of Minims, and eminent as a mathematician and divine, was born at Oyse, in the province of Maine, September 8th, 1588. He studied at La Fleche with Descartes, and afterwards at the Sorbonne, and then taught philosophy at Nevers. He settled at Paris 1620, and there gained great reputation by his learning, so that he had an extensive correspondence with the literati of Europe, and his friend Descartes never ventured to publish any thing without his previous approbation. He is chiefly known for his discovery of the curve called a cycloid, to which he gave the name of Roulette, and which excited much admiration among the learned of Europe. He published—Quæstiones in Genesim, in fol. 1623, in which he mentions that there were in his time 50,000 atheists in Paris—Universal Harmony, on the theory and Practice of Music, 2 vols. fol.—de Sonorum Naturâ—the Truth of Sciences—Recreations of Learning—the Spherics of Menelaus—Cogitata Physico-mathematica—Impiety of Deists refuted, 2 vols. 8vo. He died 1648, aged about 60.

MERVILLE, Michael Guyot de, a French journalist, born at Versailles 1696. After travelling through Germany, Italy, Holland, and England, he settled as bookseller at the Hague, and in 1726, began to publish a journal. He afterwards went to Paris, where he wrote for the stage, but finding his circumstances involved he returned to Switzerland, and in a fit of melancholy drowned himself in the lake of Geneva, 1765. He wrote besides his Journal, Histoire Litteraire, 6 vols. 12mo.—Voyage Historique, 2 vols. 12mo. and several comedies. His dramatic works were published, Paris, 1766, 3 vols. 12mo.

MERULA, George, an Italian, born at Alexandria in the duchy of Milan, 1420. He taught youth at Venice and Milan, for 40 years, and published Antiquitates Vicecomitum Mediolanensium, fol.—Description of Vesuvius and Montserrat—Commentaries on Martial, Statius, Juvencal, Plautus, Varro, Columella, and Epistles. He died at Milan, 1494, respected by Erasmus and other learned men.

MERULA, Paul, a learned Hollander, born at Dort, 1558. After travelling to France, Germany, Italy, and England, he settled at Dort as an advocate, and afterwards became professor of history at Leyden after Justus Lipsius. He died 1607, from excessive application. He published Ennius, 1595, 4to.—Urbis Romæ Delineatio, 1599—Vita D. Erasmi—Cosmographia Generalis, 4to.—Opera Posthuma, 4to.

MESMER, Frederic Anthony, a German physician, the founder of animal magnetism, which is also called Mesmerism, was born, in 1734, at Merseburgh, in Swabia, and first made his doctrines known to the world, in 1766, by a thesis on Planetary influence, in which he contended that the heavenly bodies diffuse through the universe a subtle fluid, which acts on the nervous system of animated beings. He died in 1815. Of late years his theory has again excited great attention on the continent.

MESSENGUY, Francis Philip, a French ecclesiastic, born at Beauvais, Aug. 1677. He was for some time professor of belles lettres at Beauvais, and at Paris, and died at the latter place, Feb. 1769. He wrote Exposition of the Christian Doctrine, 6 vols. 12mo. a work disapproved at Rome, and condemned 1761, by Clement XIII.—Abridgment of the History of the Old and New Testament, 10 vols. 12mo.—the New Testament with notes, 3 vols.—Discourses on Religion—the Constitution Unigenitus, with remarks.

MESNAGER, Nicholas, a native of Rouen, of a respectable mercantile family. He was made knight of the order of St. Michael, and raised to the honor of nobility by Louis XIV. by whom he had been employed as a negotiator on the commercial affairs of India with Spain, and afterwards with Holland. He was one of the plenipotentiaries that signed the treaty of peace between England and France in 1711, and he afterwards was with Polignac at the conferences at Utrecht. He died at Paris 1714, aged 56. His memoirs have been published.

MESNARDIERE, Hippolytus Julius Pillet de la, a French poet, born at Loudun 1610. He studied medicine which he quitted for literature, and he was patronised by Richelieu and became maitre d'hôtel to the king. He died 1663. He wrote a treatise on Melancholy, 8vo.—Poétique, 4to.—Alinde, et la Pucelle d'Orleans, two indifferent tragedies—Pliny's three First Books of Letters translated—a Collection of Poems—and Relations of War.

MESSENIUS, John, a learned Swede, appointed by Gustavus Adolphus professor of law in Upsal university. The celebrity which he acquired, and the abilities which he displayed excited the envy of his rivals in the public favor, and he was at last cruelly and falsely accused of traitorous correspondence with the enemies of his country. The accusation was believed, he was thrown into prison 1615, and died there 21 years after. He is author of Scandia Illustrata, 14 vols. fol. Stockholm, 1714, a work of merit. His son Arnold was historiographer of Sweden, and wrote an History of the Swedish Nobility, fol. 1616. He wrote some satires, reflecting on the royal family, for which he was beheaded 1643. His son, though but 17 years old, suffered with him.

MESSIER, Charles, a French astronomer, was born, in 1730, at Badonviller, in Lorraine; was for a considerable period an assistant to Delisle; became astronomer to the navy, and a member of many learned bodies; and died in 1817. Messier particularly directed his attention to the discovering of comets, and his discoveries were numerous. Louis XV. called him the ferret of comets.

MESTON, William, a Scotch poet, born at Midmar, Aberdeenshire, 1633. He was educated at Aberdeen Marischal college, and by the interest of his friend Marshall Keith and family, where he had been private tutor, he obtained, in 1714, a professorship of philosophy there. He followed the principles of his patrons in 1715, and consequently was deprived of his professorship, and after concealing himself escaped by the act of indemnity. He afterwards attempted a school at Elgin, and in other places, but as he was more fond of conviviality than regularity and application, his labors did not succeed, and he subsisted upon the liberality of his friends. He died in the spring of 1745. His poetical pieces were chiefly satirical, and possess merit. His works were published, Edinburgh 1765, in 12mo.

METASTASIO, Pietro Bonaventura, the most illustrious poet of modern Italy, was born at Rome 6th Jan. 1698. His genius early developed itself, and at the age of ten he often collected little audiences in the streets, who listened with attentive admiration to the sweetness of his extemporary verses. The celebrated Gravina witnessed and admired his rising talents, he became his instructor and friend, but while he wished him to follow the law, he found poetry his favorite pursuit. This propensity was indulged, and Metastasio at 14 produced his tragedy of Giustino. He accompanied his patron to Naples, and without forsaking the muses, he again applied himself to the law, and at last assumed the clerical habit, and entered into the minor order of priesthood. The death of his friend left him disconsolate in 1718; he bewailed his misfortune in his elegy "la Strada della Gloria," and found afterwards that he was the heir of his fortune, worth 15,000 crowns, which in two years disappeared in the midst of cheerful conviviality and hospitable attention. Again reduced to dependence, he wished to study the law, but found poetry more pleasing, and when by the acquaintance of Bulgarella dicta Romanina the celebrated singer, he was prevailed upon to write for the stage, he found himself admired, courted and flattered as a poet, and more fully devoted to the muses. He now united his establishment with that of Bulgarella and her husband, and lived with them in the closest intimacy, till an invitation from the emperor in 1729, removed him to Vienna, as assistant imperial laureat, with Apostolo Zeno. He quitted Italy, and his friends with reluctance and settled at Vienna, where he constantly resided with the greatest regularity, dividing with punctilious exactness his hours of study, of recreation, and of repose. In this honorable abode he was deservedly respected; the city of Assisi, where his family had long lived, granted him the honor of nobility, he was affectionately patronised by the emperor Charles VI. and by his successors Charles VII. and Francis I. and the empress Maria Theresa, and Ferdinand VI. king of Spain, were also among the number of his friends and benefactors. In 1734, his favorite Bulgarella died and left him heir to all her property, which he with becoming propriety immediately bestowed on her husband. He died after a short illness 12th April 1782. His works consist of 26 operas, eight oratorios or sacred dramas, besides masques, sonnets, and other poetical miscellanies. Of his operas, he regarded Atilio Regolo as the best, of the oratorios, Betulia Liberata, and Artaserse, as the most fortunate of his dramas. Several editions have appeared of his works, and they have been translated into various languages. The superior excellence of his abilities may in some degree be attributed to his patron and friend Gravina; but for the sublimest flights of his muse, he was indebted to the powers of his genius; and the pictures of virtue and morality so sweetly delineated in his writings were drawn from the goodness of his heart.

METELLUS, Q. Cæcilius, a celebrated Roman, called Numidicus, from the war which he carried on against Jugurtha of Numidia. Though superseded in the command of the war by his lieutenant Marius, yet he deserved and obtained the gratitude of the Roman nation.

METEREN, Emanuel Van, a native of Antwerp, who on account of his attachment to the protestant faith fled to England for an asylum, where he died 1612, aged 77. He wrote the History of the Low Countries, from 1500, to 1612, in Latin, fol. a work of merit, translated into various languages.

METIUS, James, the inventor of telescopes about 1609, was born at Alcaer in Holland. His brother Adrian was professor of mathematics at Franeker, where he died 1636, author of Doctrina Sphæricæ. Astronomiæ Practicæ Institutio, 8vo.—Arithmet. et Geometr. Practica, 4to.—de Gemino Usu utriusque Globi, 4to.—Geometricæ per Usu Circini Nova Praxis, 8vo.

METTRIE, Julian Offray de la, a physician, born at St. Maloe's 1709. He studied under Boerhaave, and was patronised by the duke of Grammont. His book "the Natural History of the Soul," in which he maintained the materiality of the soul, was regarded as impious, and when persecution threatened him he wrote against the medical profession in a book called "Penelope, or the Machiavel in Medicine," 3 vols. 12mo. In consequence of this work he was obliged to leave France, and at Leyden he published "l'Homme Machine," a pernicious treatise of Materialism which was publicly burnt, and drove the author to Berlin. At Berlin he was patronised by the skeptical monarch, and he died there in consequence of his violent system of bleeding, 1751, aged 49. His works appeared at Berlin, 1 vol. 4to. or two in 12mo. and Frederic himself wrote his funeral oration.

MEURSIUS, John, a learned Dutchman, born at Losdun near the Hague 1579. He was educated at the Hague and Leyden, and made such rapid progress in classical literature, that at the age of 16 he wrote a commentary on Lycophron. He was afterwards tutor to the children of the famous Barneveldt, and with them for ten years travelled over the best part of Europe. On his return to Leyden in 1610, he was appointed professor of history and next of Greek, and historiographer to the states of Holland, but the unsettled affairs of the times brought him into trouble, and upon the execution of Barneveldt he was accused as a partisan of that unfortunate remonstrant, and his enemies endeavored to expel him from the professorial chair. He resigned in 1625, and on the invitation of the king of Denmark accepted a professorship at Sora. He was there highly respected and beloved, and died Sept 20th, 1639. In the knowledge of Greek and of antiquity Meursius possessed superior merit, though J. Scaliger has rudely stigmatized him as an ignorant and presumptuous pedant. His works were printed in 12 vols. folio, Florence, 1741. They contain treatises de Populis Atticæ.—Archontes Athenienses—Fortuna Atticæ—de Athenarum Origine—de Festis Græcorum—Historia Danica—Archontes Athenienses.

MEYER, James, a Flemish historian, born 1491, near Bailleul, whence he is called Balilolanus. He died Feb. 5th, 1552, rector of Blankenburg. He wrote Annales Rerum Flandricarum, folio—Flandricarum Rerum Decas, 4to.

MEYER, Hermanus, D.D. a native of Holland, but, for nearly thirty years, a minister of the Dutch reformed Church, first at Kingston, N. Y. and then at Compton, N. J. He died in 1791. Dr. Meyer was distinguished for great learning, for a mild disposition, and for piety. As a professor of the Oriental languages, he rendered important services in preparing candidates of his denomination for the ministry.

MEZERAI, Francis Eudes de, a French historian, born at Ry, near Argentau, lower Normandy 1610. He was educated at Caen, where he began to distinguish himself as a poet, but on going to Paris he was persuaded by des Yveteaux to devote himself to history and to politics. He was commissary of war for two or three campaigns, and afterwards determined to employ himself in studious retirement. The narrowness of his circumstances was removed by the publication of some severe but popular satires against the court, and at the age of 26 Mezerai entered upon the laborious character of historian of France. He was encouraged by Richelieu, and when his history appeared, the first volume of which was published 1643, the second in 1646, and the third in 1653, in folio, it was received with universal applause, and was rewarded with a handsome pension from the king. In 1669, he published an abridgment of the History of France, 3 vols. 4to. but as he had spoken in some parts with more boldness than could please the court, Colbert retrenched his pension, and at last totally withdrew it. He was in 1649, admitted member of the French academy in the room of Voiture, and in 1675, chosen perpetual secretary, and he deserved it, as he contributed much to their dictionary. He died 10th July, 1683. He wrote besides a treatise on the Origin of the French—a Continuation of the History of the Turks—History of a Mother and Son, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Vanities of the Court—a Translation of Grotius de Veritate Chr. Relig. As an historian Mezerai is deservedly esteemed, and in integrity, candor and faithfulness he is inferior to none.

MEZIRIAC, Claude Gaspar Bachet, sieur de, known as a poet, in French, Latin, and Italian, as a good Greek scholar, and able critic, was born of a noble family at Bresse. He was of the order of the jesuits, and was admitted into the French academy. He died at Bourg in Bresse, February 26th, 1638, aged 45. He was universally esteemed and respected, so that at one time it was in agitation to appoint him preceptor to Louis XIII. an honor from which he shrunk with diffidence and terror. He wrote various poems in Italian, Latin and French, he also published the six books of Diophantus, with notes—a Life of Æsop, besides several works not printed, and a translation of Plutarch's works, just completed when he died. In arithmetic and in geometry Meziriac was also respectable.

MICAL, N. abbé, a celebrated French mechanic. He constructed two heads of brass which had the power of articulation, and by means of springs could repeat various passages from authors. These curious but useless labors of human ingenuity were disregarded by the government, and the artist in disappointment, broke them to pieces, and died in the greatest indigence, 1789.

MICHAEL, I. succeeded Stauracius on the throne of Constantinople, 811. He was a mild and virtuous monarch, and after establishing regularity and promoting happiness at home, he made war against the Saracens, whom he defeated by his general Leo, the Armenian. He was less successful against the Bulgarians, and Leo taking advantage of his distress, declared himself against him. Michael descended without regret from the throne, 813, and retired to a monastery, where he took the religious habit, and ended his days in peace.

MICHAEL II. a Phrygian of obscure origin, raised to consequence and patrician honors by Leo the Armenian. His elevation created him enemies, and Leo was persuaded to send him to prison, and to order him to be burnt. The night preceding the fatal day the emperor was strangled in his bed, and Michael dragged from prison, was seated on the imperial throne, 820. Though hitherto the protector of the christians he became their persecutor, and obliged them to observe the sabbath and the other holy days of the Jewish law. This and other acts of cruelty and oppression rendered him unpopular, and Euphemius his general, spurred on by personal revenge, proclaimed himself emperor near Syracuse, but was slain soon after. Regardless of the murmurs of his subjects, Michael gave himself up to every extravagance and licentious debauchery, and died 1st Oct. 829.

MICHAEL III. surnamed the Drunkard, succeeded his father Theophilus, 842, though only six years old. His minority was governed by his mother Theodora, a woman of distinguished abilities, but he no sooner arrived to years of maturity than he obliged her to resign the reins of government and retire into a monastery. He next took for his associate Bardas, his mother's brother, who persuaded him to send into exile, St. Ignatius, the patriarch of Constantinople, and to place in his seat Photius, which proved the cause of the separation of the eastern and western churches. Michael afterwards put to death his associate, and created Basil, the Macedonian Cæsar, in his room, but soon after meditated his destruction because he re-proved his vicious and profligate habits. Basil, however, averted the blow, and caused the tyrant to be assassinated, 24th Sept. 867.

MICHAEL IV. called the Paphlagonian, from his birth place, ascended the imperial throne, 1034, by the favor of Zoe, the empress, who having fallen in love with him caused her own husband the emperor Romanus Argyrus to be assassinated, that she might gratify her criminal desires. Though successful in his wars against the Saracens and Bulgarians, he found unhappiness on the throne which he had gained by murder, and at last in 1041, stung by remorse of conscience, he retired to a monastery, where he died soon after.

MICHAEL V. surnamed Calafites, succeeded his uncle Michael IV. in 1041, by the intrigues of Zoe. The great qualities which he had displayed in private life disappeared on the throne. He became suspicious, cruel, and revengeful, and dreading the power of Zoe he sent her into exile. This measure, however, was so offensive to the people, that she was recalled, and Michael exposed to the popular fury had his eyes put out, and was in 1042 sent to a monastery, where he ended his days.

MICHAEL VI. or Warrior, was raised to the throne by the empress Theodora. He was old and weak, and though he chose his officers from among the senators he became unpopular, and was obliged to resign the crown in favor of Isaac Comnenus, 1057. He afterwards retired to a monastery, where he died.

MICHAEL VII. Palæologus, son of Constantine Ducas and Eudoxia, was deprived of his throne by the arts of his mother, who soon after his father's death married Romanus Diogenes, whom she proclaimed emperor. The defeat and captivity of Romanus by the Turks in 1071, enabled Michael to ascend the throne, but he was so weak and unpopular that Nicephorus revolted against him, and obliged him in 1078 to fly to a monastery. He died archbishop of Ephesus.

MICHAEL VIII. Palæologus, was regent of the eastern empire during the minority of John Lascaris, but taking advantage of the young monarch's weakness and inexperience, he dispossessed him of his throne, and put out his eyes, 1260. In 1261 he retook Constantinople from Baldwin II. after it had been for 58 years under the power of the French, and he labored earnestly to procure a reconciliation between the eastern and western churches. As the plan was not approved by the Greeks, Martin IV. excommunicated Michael under pretence that he was insincere. He died 11th Dec. 1282.

MICHAEL FOEDEROWITZ, was elected Czar of Russia, 1613. Though raised to power in times of great danger he showed himself brave, prudent, and sagacious, and after making peace with the Poles and the Swedes, he labored for the happiness of his subjects in the establishment of wise and salutary regulations. He died in 1645. He was the son of the daughter of John Basilowitz.

MICHAEL CERULARIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in 1043, prevented by his writings the union which the emperor Michael VI. wished to effect between the eastern and western churches. He was banished for his intrigues by Isaac Comnenus, 1059, and died of chagrin, in the island of Proconesus.

MICHAELIS, John David, a celebrated divinity professor in Göttingen university, who died 22d Aug. 1791, aged 75. His works are 49 in number, and are valuable, as chiefly designed to explain and illustrate the Holy Scriptures. The work most known in England, is his Introduction to the New Testament, published in 1750, and translated into English, 1761. The work has lately been again recommended to the notice of the public in a translation, 3 vols. 8vo. with valuable notes, by the Rev. Herbert Marsh, fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, for some time resident at Leipsic. The work exhibits great learning and deep research, but doubts and scepticism are occasionally introduced, which capriciously altering the text or the sense, undermine the authority, of scripture, and lessen the respect which should be paid to inspired writings.

MICHAUX, Andre, a botanist, was born in France in 1746. After extending his botanical excursions to Spain, and spending two years in Persia, he came to America in Oct. 1785. During about nine years he travelled over the middle, southern, and western states, and proceeded to the north to the neighborhood of Hudson's bay, procuring trees and shrubs for the establishment at Rambouillet. For the preservation of his plants he established botanical gardens at New York, and near Charleston. On his return to Europe in 1796, he was shipwrecked, but saved most of his collections. He had sent 60,000 stocks to Rambouillet, of which but few had escaped the ravages of the revolution. His salary for seven years he could not obtain, nor any employment from government. In 1800, however, he was sent out on an expedition to New Holland. He died of fever at Madagascar in Nov. 1802. He published Histoire des Chenes de Amerique Septentrionale, fol. Paris, 36 plates, 1801; Flora Borealis Americana, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1803, 51 plates.

MICHAUX, Francois Andre, son of the preceding, was born in 1770. He published the beautiful work, entitled the North American Sylva, 5 vols. 8vo. Philad. 1817, 150 colored engravings; and Voyage a l'Ouest de Monte, 1804; the same translated, entitled, Travels in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, London, 1805.

MICHELI, Peter Anthony, an able botanist, born at Florence, of mean parentage. He was at first an errand boy in a bookseller's shop, but showing great zeal in obtaining the Tithymalus Characias, a plant which it is said intoxicates fish, that he might angle with greater success, he was noticed by the monks of the abbey of Vallombrosa. Under the care of these benevolent fathers he greatly improved himself, and was enabled to follow his inclinations in the science of botany. By degrees his reputation was spread abroad. Tournefort, Sheard, and other learned men admired his taste and botanical knowledge, which proved so respectable as to recommend him to the grand duke of Florence, who appointed him director, with Tilly, of the botanical gardens at Pisa and Florence. Under the patronage of the duke he also visited Egypt, Greece, and other parts of the world, in pursuit of botanical discoveries, and died 1787, aged 58. He wrote various botanical works, the best known of which are Nova Plantarum Genera, 1729, Florence—Catalogus Plant. Horti Cæsar. Florent. fol 1748.

MICHELI, James Bartholomew, a Genevese of an ancient respectable family. He served as captain in the French army, but afterwards in 1738, retired to his native country, and devoted himself to philosophical and mathematical pursuits. Though absorbed in literary cares, he felt the troubles of civil dissension, and was for some time imprisoned by the Bernese government. He died March, 1766. Besides Tracts on Meteorology—the Power of the Tides—the Temperature of the Globe—Light—the Comet of 1680—the Deluge—Views of the Glaciers of Switzerland, he constructed some ingenious maps, and invented a new thermometer.

MICKLE, William Julius, a poet, known as the translator of the Lusiad, was born at Langholm, in the county of Dumfries, 29th Sept. 1734. He was educated under his father, who had been one of Bayle's translators, and after his death he was placed in the high school of Edinburgh, where about the age of 13 he accidentally met Spenser's Fairy Queen, and was enchanted with the poetical imagery. He settled at Edinburgh as a brewer, first for his aunt and then for himself; but his industry proved unsuccessful in trade, and in 1763 he left Scotland, for London. He introduced himself to the notice of lord Lyttleton, but was disappointed in his expectations of going to the East or West Indies in some mercantile occupation, and at last accepted the offer of corrector of the Clarendon press at Oxford. In this learned employment, so congenial to his taste, he published various things, and in 1771, after he had acquired a perfect knowledge of the Portuguese, he published the first book of the Lusiad as a specimen. The work was applauded and continued, and in 1775 was favorably received by the public, and again edited in 1778. Mickle afterwards went to Lisbon as secretary to his friend governor Johnstone, and there in 1781 he wrote his Almada Hill, a poem, 4to. At his return he married Miss Tomkins, June, 1782, daughter of the person with whom he resided at Forest Hill, after he had retired from Oxford for the more peaceful completion of his Lusiad, and with her he settled at Wheatley, near Oxford. He here wrote some few things, and made several communications to the European magazine. He died at Wheatley, 25th Oct. 1789, aged 55, leaving a son, but with scanty resources. By his Lusiad, an elegant and classical work, rivalled only by the Iliad of Pope, Mickle has obtained immortal fame. His poems were published 1794, in one vol. 4to. and appear among the English poets of Dr. Anderson. He wrote besides a letter to Dr. Harwood, on the Arian Controversy, 1769—Voltaire in the Shades, or Dialogues on the Deistical Controversy, 1770—a pamphlet on the Affairs of the East India Company. In his private character Mickle was very amiable; he lived without reproach, and wrote nothing but what virtue approved.

MICRELIUS, John, professor of divinity at Stettin, was born at Custin, Pomerania, 1597. He distinguished himself as a theological disputant, and was honorably noticed by Christina of Sweden. He had three wives, and died 3d Dec. 1658. His works are Lexicon Philosophicum, 4to.—Syntagma Historicum Mundi et Ecclesie, 8vo.—Tractatus de Copiâ Verborum—Ethnophronium contra Gentiles—Archeologia—Historia Ecclesiastica, 2 vols. 4to.—Orthodoxia Lutherana contra Bergium.

MIDDLETON, sir Hugh, a native of Denbigh, well known for his public spirit. He formed the project of supplying London with water, and though he met with numerous difficulties from the prejudices and the envy of others, and from the exhausted state of his affairs, he triumphed over all opposition, and brought the united streams of two rivulets in the parishes of Ware and of Anwell, in Hertfordshire, through a course of twenty miles to the capital. The work was begun 20th February, 1608, and on Michaelmas day 1613, water was brought into the great cistern at Islington. This honorable completion of an useful work was rewarded by king James, who had liberally supported the projector, and erected by charter, a company of proprietors. He was knighted, and afterwards made a baronet, and under Charles the moiety of the property, which he had given to the king's father for his assistance, was reconveyed to him for an annual sum, and is now become a source of princely fortune to the proprietors. Sir Hugh gave one share of the property to the company of goldsmiths, to which he belonged, for the benefit of their poor members. He died about 1636.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, D. D., an eminent British critic and able divine. He was the son of the rector of Hinderwell, near Whitby, and was born at York, 27th December, 1683. At the age of 17 he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1709 he joined the other fellows of the society in opposition to Dr. Bentley the master; but soon after he retired from college by marrying a widow of large property. In 1723 Middleton was elected principal librarian at Cambridge, and the following year, in consequence of his wife's death, he visited the continent, where he was received with great respect by men of learning and of rank. Soon after his return, in 1725, he drew upon himself the resentment of the medical world by an attack on Dr. Mead, Spon, and others, and in 1729 he highly offended the catholics by publishing his letters from Rome, showing an exact conformity between popery and paganism. In 1731 he incurred the public displeasure in a high degree, by publishing his letter to Dr. Waterland, who had attacked Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation, and in his pamphlet he spoke with such freedom of religion, and with such contempt of his respectable antagonist, that he not only was severely censured as an infidel, in an answer by bishop Pearce; but when known to be the author of the obnoxious tract, he was very nearly stripped of his academical honors. In 1731, notwithstanding his unpopularity, he was appointed Woodwardian professor at Cambridge, but as his pursuits were very different from the study of fossils and minerals, he resigned the place in 1734. In 1735 he published a Dissertation on the Origin of Printing in England, and in 1741 appeared his great work, the History of the life of M. Tullius Cicero, 2 vols. 4to. reprinted in 3 vols. 8vo. This performance is of superior eminence, written in correct and elegant language, and abounding in every thing which can interest the heart, inform the understanding, and polish the taste, though it must be confessed, that with all the partiality of an author, he has drawn the character of the orator with more glittering ornaments than belong to him, and in concealing his defects has magnified his virtues. In 1743 he published Cicero's epistles to Brutus, and those of Brutus to Cicero, in Latin and English, with a vindication of their authenticity in answer to Tunstall's objections. In 1745 appeared his Germana quedam Antiquitates Erudite Monumenta, and 1747 his Treatise on the Roman Senate. That same year was also remarkable for the publication of the introduction of his discourse on the miraculous powers supposed to have existed in the Christian church from the earliest ages, 4to. a work which excited in the highest degree the reprehension of the clergy. While preparing to answer his opponents he was seized with a hectic fever, and a disorder in his liver, which proved fatal, 23th July, 1750, in his 67th year, at Hildersham, Cambridgeshire. His miscellaneous works, not including the life of Cicero, appeared together in 1752, with several new pieces, in 4 vols. 4to. As a writer he ranks high, for elegance of language, animated description, and all the graces of profound learning and extensive information. Though attacked and reviled as an infidel, and an enemy to christianity, by his opponents, it appears from his letters to his friend and patron lord Hervey, that his opinions were not fully orthodox, and though he speaks with indifference of the preferment which was conferred on others not so well entitled to it for learning and abilities as himself, yet it is plain, that his language is the language of a disappointed man, who affected to despise what his intemperate writings had rendered it impossible for him to obtain.

MIDDLETON, Erasmus, rector of Turvey, Bedfordshire, and author of a dictionary of arts and sciences, of little merit, of sermons on Jackson and Binns, and editor of Biographia Evangelica, 4 vols. 8vo. died 25th May, 1805. He was one of the six young men expelled some years ago from Oxford, in consequence of which Macgowan's Satire, called the Shaver, was published. He was in his principles a strong follower of the methodists.

MIDDLETON, Arthur, was at the head of the government of South Carolina, after the departure of Nicholson, in 1725, until the appointment of governor Johnson in 1730. When the revolution took place in that colony in 1719, he was a member of the legislature which assumed the name of the convention, and was elected president. After the arrival of governor Johnson, he continued a member of the council.

MIDDLETON, Arthur, a patriot of the American revolution, was a native of South Carolina. His father Henry, was president of congress; his grandfather Arthur, was the first royal governor of South Carolina. He received an excellent education at Westminster and Cambridge, England, and then travelled several years on the continent. At the commencement of the American revolution, both he and his father, a man of great wealth, entered zealously into the American cause. In 1775, he was one of the secret committee of defence, and, also of the council of safety, and the next year, on the committee to prepare a constitution. He was also sent as a delegate to congress, and signed the declaration of independence, but resigned his seat at the close of 1777. In 1779, he suffered in his property, like others, by the ravages of the war. At the capture of Charleston in 1780, he was taken prisoner and confined at St. Augustine, nearly a year. At length in July, 1781, he was exchanged, and proceeded in a cartel to Philadelphia. He was now again appointed a member of congress. He died of an intermitting fever, Jan. 1, 1783, aged 43.

MIDDLETON, Thomas Fanshaw, bishop of Calcutta, was the only child of the Rev. Thomas Middleton, chaplain of the earl of Scarsdale, and minister of Keddleston, Derbyshire, and was born in the year 1769. He was a descendant of the celebrated Sir Richard Fanshaw, and through that ancestor related to some of the first families in England. He was educated at Christ's hospital, and thence went to Pembroke hall, Cambridge. In 1792, he took the degree of A.B. was ordained, and began to officiate at Gainsboro. He was soon afterwards nominated to the living of Tanor, Northamptonshire. In 1802, he was collated to the rectory of Little Bytham, with Bytham castle annexed, and in 1808, took the degree of D.D. The next year he resigned his two livings on being preferred to St. Pancross, near London. In 1812, he was made archdeacon of Huntingdon, by the bishop of Lincoln. The English ministry having now resolved on establishing a bishopric in India, he received the appointment from the king in 1814, and was consecrated to the holy office by the bishop of Exeter. He was elected at this time fellow of the Royal Society, and embarked immediately for India. For seven years he exercised the functions of his office with distinguished zeal and fidelity. His talents, acquirements, perseverance, and piety, gained him the most unqualified praise. He died at Calcutta on the 8th July, 1822, aged 55 years. A splendid monument by Chantrey, is now erecting to his memory in St. Pauls, at the instance of the "Society for promoting Christian Knowledge." His plan of an East India mission college, with an endowment of five scholarships has recently been carried into execution. He was the author of the Country Spectator, a periodical essay. A letter respecting the best method of propagating Christianity in India. Several charges to missionaries. Sermons, and a most learned work on the "Doctrine of the Greek Article," which established his reputation as a scholar. He was also for some time editor of the British Critic.

MILBOURN, Luke, M.A. an English divine, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, became rector of St. Ethelburgh, and lecturer of St. Leonard's Shoreditch. He published a poetical Translation of the Psalms—some Latin Verses—Notes on Dryden's Virgil—Thirty-one single sermons. His name is frequently mentioned with that of Blackmore, by Dryden, and has been introduced by Pope in his Art of Criticism, and in the Dunciad. Dr. Johnson speaks in Dryden's Life, with no great respect of his abilities. He died 15th April, 1720. His father Luke was a nonconformist, and in consequence, ejected from the living of Wroxall, Warwickshire, 1662. He died at Newington, 1667.

MILL, John, D.D. a learned English divine, born at Shap, in Westmoreland, 1645. He entered as servitor at Queen's college, Oxford, of which society he became fellow. In 1681, he was appointed chaplain to Charles II., and in 1685, made principal of Edmund hall. He was a good preacher, and published some sermons; but the work for which he is deservedly celebrated is his edition of the New Testament. This very valuable work, which was first begun by the advice of Fell, bishop of Oxford, and partly printed at his expense, was the labor of thirty years of application, and was published about a fortnight before his death, which happened 23d June, 1707. It is remarkable that bishop Fell's executors refused to complete the work which his lordship had so honorably begun, and Dr. Mill therefore repaid them what had been expended, and finished the whole at his own charge. These labors so popular and so useful, were not however received without censure. Dr. Whitby attacked the notes, and the thirty thousand various readings which had been collected by the indefatigable editor, were considered as likely to open the way for cavil and skepticism among free thinkers and wanton polemics. These arguments were ably refuted by Dr. Bentley, and Dr. Mill's Greek Testament is now deservedly regarded as a most valuable book.

MILL, Henry, an eminent engineer, born about 1680, near, or in Red Lion square, Holborn. He was well educated, and passed some time at one of the universities, and his mechanical abilities became so eminent that he was, when very young, employed as an engineer by the new river company. His labors were there so usefully directed in the improvement of the concern, that by gradual increase the original shares of one hundred pounds, are now sold for upwards of eight thousand pounds. His abilities were also employed in supplying the town of Northampton with water, for which he was presented with the freedom of the corporation, and he likewise ornamented Houghton, the seat of sir Robert Walpole, with an excellent stream. This worthy man was seized with a fit on Christmas day, 1770, and expired before the next morning. A monument was erected to him by his sister, in Breemoore church, near Salisbury.

MILLAR, John, a popular professor of law at Glasgow. He practised also at the Scotch bar, and for forty years maintained the high reputation of an able and intelligent professor. He was author of an Historical View of the English Government, 4to.—and on the Origin of Distinction of Ranks in Society, 1 vol. 8vo. He died 1801.

MILLEDGE, John, governor of Georgia, was in 1780 attorney-general, and governor in 1802. He was afterwards a member of congress, and a senator of the United States from 1806, to 1809. He died 1818, aged 61. He was the principal founder of the university of Georgia.

MILLER, James, a dramatic poet, born in Dorsetshire, 1703. He was intended for a merchant, but he preferred literature, and was sent to Wadham college, Oxford, where he began his famous comedy, "the Humors of Oxford," performed 1729. He wrote, besides some other comedies, occasional pieces, and Mahomet the Impostor, a tragedy, during the popular run of which the author died. Miller was a clergyman, and published some sermons; but he had no preferment till a few weeks before his death, he was presented to the living of Upeerne, Dorsetshire, which his father had held. He died 1744.

MILLER, Philip, author of the Gardener's Dictionary, was born 1691, in Scotland. He succeeded, in 1722, his father, as gardener of the company of apothecaries' garden at Chelsea, and united the knowledge and information of a botanist to the practice and mechanical drudgery of a gardener. He was well acquainted with the plans of Ray and Tournefort, and by the advice of sir William Watson and Mr. Hudson, with difficulty adopted the system of Linnæus, with whom he afterwards corresponded as a scientific and experienced botanist. He was made fellow of the Royal society, member of the Florence botanical society, and honored with the correspondence of several learned men in Europe, who called him, with flattery but truth, Hortulanorum Princeps. Linnæus said of his dictionary, Non erit Lexicon Hortulanorum, sed Botanicorum. He resigned through infirmity, some time before his death, his place at Chelsea, and died 18th Dec. 1771, aged 80. He published his Gardener's Dictionary, 1731, folio, which has passed through various editions, and has been translated into several languages—the Gardener's Calendar, 8vo.—a Short Introduction to Botany—Figures of Plants, 2 vols. folio, with three hundred plates—besides Papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and a large Herbarium of Exotics in MS.

MILLER, Edward, M.D., a physician of New York. Having studied medicine with Dr. Ridgely, he entered the army as surgeon's mate in 1780, and in 1781 went as surgeon in an armed ship to France. After attending the lectures at Philadelphia, he commenced the practice in Frederica, but removed thence to Maryland, and in 1786 to Dover, where he remained ten years. About 1793, he wrote an able letter to Dr. Rush, asserting the domestic origin of the yellow fever. In 1796 in order to enjoy the society of his only surviving brother he removed to New York, where his practice was extensive, and where he projected and published, with Dr. Mitchell, and Smith, the Medical Repository, the first number of which appeared in Aug. 1797. This was the first work of the kind in the United States; he lived to see nearly fifteen volumes completed. In 1803 he was appointed resident physician of New York. In 1805 he drew up a learned report, maintaining the domestic origin of the yellow fever. In 1807 he was elected the professor of the practice of physic in the university of New York; in 1809 one of the physicians of the hospital. The typhus fever, succeeding an inflammation of the lungs, terminated his life March 17, 1812, aged 51. His medical works with a biographical sketch by his brother, Samuel Miller, were published 8vo. 1814.

MILLES, Jeremiah, D.D. a native of Highcleer, Hants, where his father was minister. He was made dean of Exeter after Lyttleton, and became president of the antiquarian society, to whose literary labors he contributed very largely. He was also engaged in the Chattertonian controversy, and warmly supported the authenticity of those ancient poems imposed upon the world as the works of Rowley. His edition of the poems in 4to. with annotations, displayed his abilities as an editor, but exposed him to the severity of criticism. He died 1784, aged 71.

MILLER, James William, an American poet, and miscellaneous writer, passed his early life in a variety of different pursuits, without being able to fix himself permanently in any occupation. He pursued for a while the study of law, and subsequently engaged in literary pursuits in Boston, where he met with disappointments and was worn by disquietude. He left his native country for the West Indies in 1828, where he obtained a grant of land from the Spanish government, and died in the following year at the age of twenty-seven. A volume of his Poems and Sketches was collected and published at Boston in 1830.

MILLETIERE, Theophilus Brachet, sieur de la, a protestant, who studied law at Heidelberg, and practised as advocate, and afterwards became a divine. He wrote at Rochelle against Tilenus, and asserted that it was lawful for the protestants to resist by force of arms, the persecutions raised against them. He was, in consequence of this, suspected of disloyalty to the government, and sent as prisoner to Toulouse, where he was put to the rack. He was at last, by the intercession of friends, liberated, and then turned catholic, and endeavored by his writings to reconcile the Huguenots and his new friends to the same faith. He dedicated one of his books to Charles II. in his exile, and advised him to embrace the catholic tenets, that faith in which he insolently affirmed his father Charles I. had died. Milletiere died 1665, little respected.

MILLEVOYE, Charles Hubert, a French poet, was born, in 1782, at Abbeville; studied at Mazarin College, Paris; displayed poetical talents at the age of thirteen; and died in 1816. His works form four octavo volumes. Millevoye excels in elegiac composition. Many of his pieces are characterized by great feeling, elegance, and animation.

MILLIN, Aubin Louis, an eminent archæologist and naturalist, was born, in 1759, at Paris, and entered the ecclesiastical profession, but soon abandoned it for literature; and, being a man of fortune, he was not compelled to endure the misery of writing for bread. In 1794, he succeeded Barthelèmi as keeper of the cabinet of medals. Part of his time was spent in travelling in Italy and the south of France, and he published accounts of his tours.

Millin was one of the founders of the Linnæan Society at Paris. Among his numerous works may be mentioned, Elements of Natural History; National Antiquities; Ancient Inedited Monuments; Dictionary of the Fine Arts; Etruscan Vases and Paintings; and Introduction to Archæology. Millin also conducted the Encyclopedic Magazine from 1792 to 1816.

MILLOT, Claude Francis Xavier, a French historian, born at Bensaçon, March, 1726. He was for some time among the jesuits, but quitted their society, and was afterwards appointed professor of history at Parma, by the interest of the duke of Nivernois. After acquiring reputation as a professor, he returned to France, and was made preceptor to the duke of Enghein, in which situation he died 1785. In his manners he was a very diffident man, though amiable and benevolent. His works are valuable, and written with spirit, and in an elegant style. He published Elements of the History of France, 3 vols. 12mo.—Elements of the History of England, 3 vols.—Elements of Universal History, 9 vols.—History of the Troubadours, 3 vols.—Memoirs for the History of Louis XIV. and XV. 6 vols.—Translation of Orations from Latin Historians—Discourses on Academical Subjects.

MILLS, Samuel J. agent of the American Colonization society, graduated at Williams College 1809. At the theological Seminary in Andover he united with Newell, Judson, Nott and Hall, in a resolution to undertake a foreign mission. He with the three first offered themselves as missionaries to the general association of ministers of Massachusetts, at Bradford, June 27, 1810. In 1812 and 1813, he and J. F. Schernerhorn made a missionary tour in the western states. He was ordained with other missionaries at Newburyport, June 21, 1815. He made a second tour with D. Smith, in 1814 and 1815. He ascertained that in March 1815, not a bible could be found for sale, or to be given away, in New Orleans; in this city he distributed many bibles in French and English. Finding that seventy or eighty thousand families at the south were destitute of a bible, he suggested at the close of his report, the establishment of a national society like that of the British. His efforts contributed to the establishment of the society, May 8, 1816. The plan of the United Foreign Mission society, which, however, accomplished but little, originated with him, while residing with Dr. Griffin at Newark, as did also the African school, which existed a few years at Parsippany, near Newark. He attended the first meeting of the Colonization society, January 1, 1817, which was established by the exertion of Dr. Finley. Appointed with E. Burgess, to visit England, and explore the coast of Africa for the society, he sailed in November 1817, and in a wonderful manner escaped shipwreck on the coast of France. As the ship was drifting towards a ledge of rocks, the captain despaired of preservation, and jumped into the boat with his two sons, and were lost. A strong current, as the ship approached the rocks, carried her away from them. He sailed from England for Africa, February 2, 1818, and arrived on the coast March 12. After a laborious inspection of more than two months, he embarked on his return, in the brig Success, May 22, 1818. A severe cold which he took early in June, was succeeded by a fever, of which he died June 16, 1818, aged 34. His memoirs by Gardiner Spring were published 8vo. 1820.

MILNE, Colin, a divine and naturalist, was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college there, under his uncle, Dr. Campbell. From thence he removed to Edinburgh; after which, on becoming tutor to lord Algernon Percy, he took orders in the church of England, and was presented to the rectory of North Chapel in Essex. He was also chosen lecturer of Deptford, and obtained the degree of doctor of laws from Aberdeen. He died in 1815. He published—1. "A Botanical Dictionary," 8vo. 2. Linnaei Institutiones Botanicae, 4to. 3. Indigenae Botany, or the Habitats of English Plants. 4. A volume of sermons, 8vo.

MILNER, Isaac, was brought up to the weaving business; but even while at the loom his mind was intent upon study, and all the time he could obtain from labor, was devoted to the classics and mathematics. Such was his progress, that his brother took him for an assistant in the grammar school, and afterwards sent him to Queen's college, Cambridge, where in 1774, he was senior wrangler, and gained the first mathematical prize. He also became a tutor in that science; and among other pupils, had Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Pitt, with whom he made a tour on the continent. In 1783, Mr. Milner was appointed professor of natural philosophy; and in 1783 elected master of his college, on which he took his doctor's degree. The same year he was made dean of Carlisle; in 1792 he served the office of vice chancellor; and in 1793 he succeeded Waring as Lucasian professor of mathematics. He died in 1820. His publications are—1. Animadversions on Hawker's Church History.—2. A continuation of his brother's Ecclesiastical History. 3. Strictures on the publications of Dr. Marsh, respecting the Bible Society. 4. Life of Mr. Joseph Milner, prefixed to his sermons.

MILNER, John, D.D. a celebrated Roman Catholic divine and writer on theology, and ecclesiastical antiquities. His proper family name was Miller, and he was born in London in 1752. On the death of Bishop Stapleton, Dr. Milner was appointed to succeed him as vicar apostolic in the midland district, with the title of Bishop of Castabula. He for some time refused that dignity, but at length he was prevailed upon to accept it, and was consecrated May 22, 1803. His death took place April 19, 1826.

MILLO, Titus Annius, a Roman, who killed Clodius in the Appian Way, in consequence of a violent rivalry which existed between them in the solicitation of public honors. Though defended by Cicero, he was banished to Marseilles. The oration delivered by Cicero on the occasion is much admired.

MILTIADES, an Athenian general, celebrated for the great victory which he, at the head of ten thousand men, obtained over the numerous forces of the Persians at Marathon, 490 B. C. He was afterwards cruelly imprisoned by his suspicious countrymen, and died in confinement, 489 B. C.

MILTON, John, a celebrated English poet, was born December 9th, 1608. He was intended by his father for the church, but he expressed an aversion for the ecclesiastical profession, and by degrees grew dissatisfied with the established form of church government. When he left Cambridge he returned to his father, who had settled with a competent fortune at Horton, near Colnbrook, in Buckinghamshire, and in this retirement he laboriously devoted himself for five years to reading the purest classics in Greek and Latin. Here likewise he produced his Comus—L'Allegro—Il Penseroso—and Lycidas, poems of such intrinsic merit as would have transmitted his fame to the latest period of time, if he had written nothing besides. On his mother's death he obtained his father's permission to travel abroad, and in 1633, he embarked for the continent, attended by one servant. From Paris, where he was introduced to the great Hugo Grotius, he proceeded to Nice, and by sea to Genoa, Leghorn, Pisa, and then passed to Florence, where he spent two months, respected and beloved by persons of eminence, rank, and learning. His next visit was through Sienna to Rome, where he passed two months, delighted with the vast treasures of the Vatican, and honored with the kindness and civilities of cardinal Barberini, Holstenius, and other learned men. From Rome he went to Naples, and formed the design of visiting Sicily; but the disturbed state of affairs at home engaged now all his attention, and he determined to hasten back. In 1641, he published some pamphlets, in which he vented his virulence against the church, and supported the republican principles of the times. In 1643 he married the daughter of Mr. Powell, a justice of peace in Oxfordshire; but as she had been educated a firm royalist, this union proved unhappy, and after cohabiting with him about a month, she left him, and would not return. Disgusted with this conduct, the poet thought that he might be permitted to take another wife; and he not only wrote some strong tracts in favor of divorce, but paid his addresses to another lady, of great wit and beauty. This had due effect; and his wife, after long despising his invitations, relented, and throwing herself at his feet, obtained his forgiveness and reconciliation in 1645. His talents were too great to be neglected, and therefore he was appointed Latin secretary to the council of state, and in this office he answered the Icon Basilicon, by his Iconoclastes, 1649, and two years after published his celebrated work against Salmasius, pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, which not only spread his fame through Europe as an elegant Latinist, and able disputant, but procured for him from the government, a present of one thousand pounds. About this time he lost his eye-sight, which had been gradually decaying from his severe application to his studies; but he nevertheless continued zealous and active in the support of his principles. In 1652, his wife died, soon after the delivery of her fourth child, and some time after, he married a second. But though patronised and raised to independence by the favor of Cromwell, and of Richard, Milton saw with terror the dissolution of his favorite republic approaching, and not all the respectable labors of his pen could uphold the crumbling fabric. Anxious to insure his safety, on the restoration, he concealed himself in a friend's house in Bartholomew-close; but though his sentiments and his active conduct had marked him out at first for destruction, yet by the interest and influence of his friends, especially sir Andrew Marvell, Davenant, and others, who respected his learning and his abilities, while they detested his principles, he was included in the act of amnesty, and permitted to appear in public. Though reduced in his circumstances by the restoration, he refused to accept the Latin secretaryship which was honorably offered him by Charles II. and he devoted himself earnestly to the completion of his great poem, on which he had already bestowed much labor. He was assisted in his literary pursuits by Thomas Ellwood, a quaker, who acted as an amanuensis, and daily visited him. In 1665, during the plague, the poet retired to a small house at St. Giles, Chalfont, Buckinghamshire, and while in this place, he was visited by his friend, into whose hands he put his Paradise Lost, now finished, and modestly requested his opinion. Ellwood read the work with approbation, and in returning it to the poet, told him that he had said much about Paradise Lost, but, added he, what hast thou to say of Paradise Found. The hint was not lost; Paradise Regained was begun, and afterwards when visited by Ellwood, Milton presented him the poem which originated in his conversation. It is singular that the poet considered Paradise Regained as a superior performance to Paradise Lost, but posterity have decided otherwise; and this matchless poem, which long remained unknown from the prejudices entertained against the author, gradually rose to notice, to fame, and immortality. The critique of the Spectator opened the eyes of the nation, and in banishing prejudice, liberally proved that however violent the publications of Milton were, however biassed in his love of republican principles, and however blameable in some parts of his political life, yet his merits as a poet cannot be affected; he must shine as the greatest ornament of the British isles, and in the ranks of immortality, be placed by the side of Homer, of Virgil, and of Tasso. Milton died in the beginning of Nov. 1674. It is supposed that Milton drew his idea of his great work from an Italian tragedy on the Loss of Paradise, on which he originally intended to compose a tragedy; but as his matter enlarged, his genius gave it the form of an epic poem. His Samson Agonistes was written after the Greek model, but is unfit for representation: the Comus was first acted for the benefit of his grand-daughter, Mrs. Clarke, a widow in indigent circumstances, and the public support was earnestly solicited by a prologue from the nervous pen of Dr. Johnson. The prose works of Milton are numerous and highly respectable. Besides his political tracts, he wrote, an History of England, 4to. down to the conquest—Arcopagitica, or the Liberty of unlicensed Printing—Letters—History of Muscovy, a Treatise on Christian Doctrine, and some other works. The person of Milton was fair, so that he was called at Cambridge, the lady of Christ-college; his hair was light brown, and his features exact and pleasing. He was of the middle size, well proportioned, nervous and active; but his constitution was tender, and his health consequently weak. Though he did not inherit much from his father, yet frugality maintained him in a respectable manner, and at his death he left about fifteen hundred pounds besides the value of his household goods.

MINELLIUS, John, a Dutch grammarian, born at Rotterdam. The best part of his life was engaged in teaching the classics, and he facilitated the labors of future instructors, by publishing editions of Virgil, Terence, Sallust, Horace, Florus, and other works, with notes, adapted to the capacity of school boys. He died 1683.

MINOT, George Richards, judge and historian, graduated at Harvard college, 1778. He studied law, and afterwards commenced the practice in Boston. In 1781, he was chosen clerk of the house of representatives. He was secretary of the convention of Massachusetts, which ratified on the part of that state, the existing constitution of the United States. In 1792, he was appointed judge of probate for the county of Suffolk; and on the establishment of a municipal court for the town of Boston, he was made the judge. He died 1802, aged 43. His mildness, candor and moderation gained him universal respect. His conversation was interesting, for his mind was enriched with various knowledge, and there was a modesty, and benignity in his character, which attracted and delighted. He published an oration on the Boston massacre, March 5, 1782; history of the insurrection in Massachusetts, 1788; an address to the charitable fire society, 1795; eulogy on Washington, 1800; a continuation of the history of Massachusetts Bay from 1748 to 1765, with an introductory sketch of events from its original settlement. The first volume of this work, which is a continuation of Hutchinson, was published in 8vo. 1798; the second volume was almost completed at the time of his death, and it has since been published. The narrative is perspicuous, and the style simple and pure, and a model of historical eloquence.

MINTO, Walter, LL.D., professor of natural philosophy in the college of New Jersey, was a native of Scotland. By the persuasion of the earl of Buchan, he wrote a book to prove, that the original discovery of logarithms was to be attributed to Napier, the laird of Merchiston. The earl sent him to America in 1786, being desirous of laying a foundation of mathematical science in the land of Columbus and of Washington. Soon after his arrival, he was chosen mathematical professor in Princeton college. In this situation he was respected and useful. He died 1796, aged 42. Besides the book on Napier, he published a demonstration of the path of the new planet; recherches into some parts of the theory of the planets, 8vo. 1783; and an oration on the progress and importance of the mathematical sciences, 1788.

MINUTIUS, Felix, a Roman orator in the third century. His Octavius, with Christian and Pagan Disputations, is a work of merit, and in favor of Christianity; edited Cambridge, 1707, and Leyden, 1709, 8vo.

MIRABAUD, John Baptist, perpetual secretary to the French academy, was born in Provence 1674, and lived to the age of 86. He published a translation of Tasso's Jerusalem—and also of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso—Alphabet de la Fée Gracieuse, 12mo. 1734. The System of Nature, an atheistical book, published in 1770, was falsely ascribed to him, and has been translated into English.

MIRABEAU, Victor Riquetti, marquis de, of an ancient family of Provence, originally from Naples, was one of the chief instigators of the political assembly called economists. He published in 1755, PAmi des Hommes, 3 vols. 12mo. a work of some merit, containing, with much crude and extraneous matter, fine ideas on rural and political economy, and judicious remarks on the interests of society. His Theorie de l'Impot, in 12mo. proved so offensive to the government, on account of the freedom and boldness of his opinions, that he was confined in the Bastile. He wrote besides, Hommes Célèbres, published by his friend Roscovich, at Bassano, in 2 vols. 8vo. His works, collected together, except the last mentioned, have been published in 8 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1790.

MIRABEAU, Honoré Gabriel Riquetti, count de, son of the preceding, and deputy of Provence to the states general, was born 1749. After serving for some time in the army, during the war of Corsica, he married a rich heiress of Aix; but a fondness for dissipation soon squandered away the property which he had lately acquired, and he left his country, overwhelmed in debts, and in poverty. After being confined for some time in the prisons of If, and of Joux, he had an amour with the wife of Monnier, the president of the parliament of Besançon, and carried away the frail one to Holland. For this crime he was condemned to lose his head, and consequently was doomed to spend the rest of life in a foreign country. He was, however, seized in 1777, and confined in the castle of Vincennes, and three years after, by the power of interest, restored to liberty. Undismayed by reflections on his flagitious conduct, he appeared at Aix, before the parliament, to demand his wife, who indignantly refused to live with him, and he personally pleaded his own cause, which proved deservedly unsuccessful. The French revolution now arose to give employment to the talents of this depraved and ambitious man: and when rejected by the nobility of Provence, he, in contempt of their order, opened a shop, over which he inscribed, Mirabeau, marchand de draps. This probably recommended him to the populace of Aix, whose deputy he was elected to the third estate, and consequently called by the court, with contempt, the plebeian count. In the assembly, by his abilities, his eloquence, and his intrigues, he became a leading member; but though he aimed at popularity, he yet wished for power, and secretly planned the destruction of the monarchy, and the regeneration of the state under a new order of things. His ambition displayed itself in spite of his hypocrisy, and when the unfortunate Louis appeared in the assembly, all covered with diamonds, the aspiring deputy could not help exclaiming to one of his accomplices, behold the victim. Thus by his intrigues, and by the vast resources of his mind, he was capable of being apparently the friend and the leader of all parties; and while he created, as one of his biographers has observed, volcanoes, for the pleasure of extinguishing their flames, he flattered himself secretly with the hope of being one day, like another Cromwell, the protector of France. Whilst the favorite of the multitude he did not hesitate to accuse the Jacobins, and to denounce vengeance against the factious; but his threats were the signal of his death. He was attacked by a sudden disease, which in a few hours proved fatal, 2d April, 1791, and though the physicians, who opened his body, attributed his death to the violence of a fever, the public believed that he had been cut off by poison. His funeral was conducted with all the pomp of republican pride, and his remains were deposited near those of Des Cartes; but as he had observed that near the capitol was the Tarpeian rock, this same fickle populace dispersed, the following year, his ashes in the air, with every mark of ignominy. Mirabeau wrote a comparison between the great Condé and Scipio Africanus—History of Prussia under Frederic the Great, 8 vols. 4to.—Collections of his Labors in the National Assembly, 5 vols. 8vo.—Original Letters, containing an Account of his life and Amours, 4 vols. 8vo.—Secret History of the Court of Berlin, 2 vols. 8vo. a work burnt by the hands of the hangman—a treatise on Lettres de Cachet, 8vo.—Political Pamphlets—besides some indecent books.

MIRABEAU, Boniface Riquetti, viscount de, brother to the preceding, served with distinction in America, and at the time of the French Revolution, he was elected deputy of the nobility of Limousin to the states general. He ably opposed the union of the three chambers, and when the king, in an evil hour, sanctioned it, he, in quitting the room, broke his sword, and declared that the monarchy was at an end. The innovations introduced by the demagogues were resisted by him with equal boldness, and when he found that attachment to the throne became a crime, he emigrated, and raised a regiment, which served with credit under the prince of Condé. He died at the end of 1792, at Friburg, in the Brisgaw. He was author of some songs and other temporary satires, at the beginning of the revolution. He was much addicted to drinking, and was, it is said, a man of little courage. When he paid a visit to his brother, who had been wounded in a duel, he was received with great politeness, and thanked earnestly for his attention, because, observed with keen satire, the wounded man, I am afraid I shall never have the opportunity of returning your visit.

MIRÆUS, Aubertus, a learned German, born at Brussels, 1578. He was almoner and librarian to Albert, archduke of Austria, and died 1640, at Antwerp. He wrote, Opere Historica & Diplomatica, 2 vols. folio—Elogia Illustrium Belgii Scriptorum, 4to.—Vita Justi Lipsii, 8vo.—Origines Benedicte—Origines Carthusianorum—Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, 2 vols. folio—Rerum Belgicarum Chronicon—de Rebus Bohemicis.

MIRANDA, Don Francisca, general, was born of a Spanish family, at Caraccas, of which province his grandfather was governor. In 1783, he visited the United States, and travelled on foot over a part of Europe. In the French revolution he was a major-general in the service of France. From the prison into which he was cast, he escaped to England in 1797. Having been again banished from France for opposing the first consul in 1803, he resolved to emancipate South America, from the dominion of Spain. Having obtained secret assistance and encouragement, he sailed from New York in 1806, with a number of American volunteers. At St. Domingo, he chartered two schooners; they were captured on the coast, while he escaped in his ship. In 1810 he renewed his attempt, but was obliged to capitulate to general Monteverde, who in disregard of his agreement, treated him as a prisoner. He was sent to Spain, and died after four years' confinement in the dungeons of the inquisition at Cadiz.

MIRANDULA, John Picus, earl of, a celebrated Italian nobleman, born 24th February, 1463. He lost his father early, but he found in his mother a most attentive guardian, and the care which she took of his education, was repaid by the most astonishing improvement. To strong natural powers, Mirandula united unceasing application, and he possessed besides, a memory so retentive, that nothing which he heard or read was ever forgotten. After studying the law at Bologna, he visited the most celebrated universities of France, and by conversation, and by study, still enlarged the resources of his capacious mind. At his return to Rome, though only 53, he published 900 propositions in logic, mathematics, divinity, and physics, drawn not only from classical, but Jewish and Arabian authors, and challenged, through the universities of Italy, any philosopher or divine, to enter the lists with him in disputation. This public exhibition of learning was anticipated not only with astonishment but envy, and enemies soon arose, who persuaded pope Innocent VII. that thirteen of the propositions were heretical; and the disappointed Mirandula, though he explained in a submissive "Apology," was forbidden to read or dispute upon these theses. In 1491, Mirandula bid adieu to profane literature, to devote himself more attentively to divinity. He declared war against astrologers, because, it is said, they had foretold his death at the end of his 32d year. The prophecy was too true; this amiable scholar died at Florence, 17th Nov. 1494, in his 32d year. Though he died so young, he wrote several works, which were printed together at Bologna, 1496, folio, and latterly at Basil, 1501. They are written in elegant Latin, and have been translated into French and Italian, and they display profound learning, acuteness, and vivacity.

MIRANDULA, John Francis Picus, prince of, son of Galeoti Picus, the eldest brother of John, just mentioned, was born 1469. He succeeded in 1499 to his father, as the head of his principality, but he met with opposition in his family, and by the assistance of the emperor Maximilian I. and of the duke of Ferrara, his two brothers, Lewis and Frederic, obliged him to fly from his country. Thus a fugitive in various countries for nine years, he was at last reinstated in 1511, by the assistance of pope Julius II. but the next year the papal troops were defeated at Ravenna, and Mirandula again sent into banishment. The expulsion of the French from Italy in 1515, restored him again to power, and he continued in peaceful possession of his principality till October 1533, when his nephew Galeoti, the son of Lewis, supported by forty assassins, entered his castle in the night, and murdered him, with his eldest son. Though tossed in the troubles of political life, he was a great lover of learning, and was a more voluminous writer than his uncle; and though he was inferior to him in wit, sprightliness, and information, yet he was his superior in solidity. His works have been generally edited with those of his uncle.

MISSON, Francis Maximilian, a lawyer, distinguished for his eloquence in favor of the protestants, before the parliament of Paris. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to England, and engaged as travelling tutor to an English nobleman, through Italy, in 1688 and 9. He died at London, 16th January 1721. He published, a New Voyage to Italy, 3 vols. 12mo.—Hague, a work commended by Addison, and translated into English—the Sacred Theatre of Cevennes, or Account of Prophecies and Miracles performed at Languedoc, 1707, a weak performance—Observations of a Traveller, 12mo. a posthumous work.

MITCHELL, John, M.D. F.R.S., a botanist and physician, came from England to Virginia about the year 1700. He died in 1772. His residence was chiefly at Urbana, a small town on the Rappahannock, about seventy-three miles from Richmond. He appears to have been a man of observation, acuteness, and enterprise, as well as learning. He wrote in 1743, an essay on the causes of the different colors of people in different climates, which was published in the philosophical transactions, vol. 43. He attributed the difference of the human complexion to the same causes, which have been assigned by Dr. Smith, to the influence of climate and modes of life; and he thinks that the whites have degenerated more from the original complexion in Noah and his family than the Indians, or even negroes. The color of the descendants of Ham he considers a blessing rather than a curse, as without it they could not well inhabit Africa. He published also an essay on the preparations and uses of the various kinds of potash in philosophical transactions, vol. 45; a letter concerning the force of electrical cohesion in vol. 51; and a useful work on the general principles of botany, containing descriptions of a number of new genera of plants, 4to. 1769. It is believed, that he was also the author of the map of North America, published in 1755; which was accompanied by a large pamphlet, entitled, the Contest in America, and followed by another, entitled the present state of Great Britain and North America, 1767. His manuscripts on the yellow fever, as it appeared in Virginia in 1742, fell into the hands of Dr. Franklin, by whom they were communicated to Dr. Rush.

MITCHELL, Samuel L. LL.D., a celebrated physician, was born in the year 1763, and was for a great number of years professor of various branches in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York. He was elected to the assembly of New York soon after the revolution, and was afterwards a senator in Congress and colleague of De Witt Clinton. He was a man of immense acquisitions, and his labors are dispersed through many volumes. He was a member of most of the philosophical societies of any note in Europe and his native country. He died in 1831.

MITFORD, William, an historian and philologist, was born, in 1734, in London; studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and the Middle Temple; became colonel of the Hampshire militia, and M. P. for Newport, in Cornwall, Beerlston, and New Romney; and died in 1827. His principal works are, The History of Greece; and An Essay on the Harmony of Language.

MITHRIDATES, king of Pontus, was surnamed the Great. He made war against the Romans, which continued for several years, and though defeated by Lucullus, Sylla, and Pompey, he still maintained his armies in the field, and threatened to carry invasion into the heart of Italy. He put an end to his life, when his son Pharnaces rebelled against him, B. C. 64.

MIFFLIN, Thomas, a major-general in the American army, and governor of Pennsylvania, was born about the year 1744, of parents who were quakers, and his education was entrusted to the care of Dr. Smith, with whom he was connected in habits of cordial intimacy and friendship, for more than forty years. Active and zealous he engaged early in opposition to the measures of the British Parliament. He was a member of the first congress in 1774. He took arms, and was among the first officers commissioned on the organization of the continental army, being appointed quarter master general in August 1775. For this offence he was read out of the society of quakers. In 1777, he was very useful in animating the militia; but he was also suspected in this year of being unfriendly to the commander in chief, and of wishing to have some other person in his place. His sanguine disposition, and his activity might have rendered him insensible to the value of that coolness, and caution, which were essential to the preservation of such an army, as was then under the command of Washington. In 1787, he was a member of the convention, which framed the constitution of the United States, and his name is affixed to that instrument. In October 1788, he succeeded Franklin as President of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, in which station he continued till October, 1790. In September a constitution for this state was formed, by a convention, in which he was president, and he was chosen the first governor. In 1794, during the insurrection in Pennsylvania, he employed to the advantage of his country the extraordinary powers of elocution, with which he was endowed. The imperfection of the militia laws was compensated by his eloquence. He made a circuit through the lower counties, and at different places publicly addressed the militia on the crisis in the affairs of their country, and through his animating exhortations the state furnished the quota required. He was succeeded in the office of governor by Mr. Mc Kean at the close of the year 1799, and he died at Lancaster January 20, 1800, aged 56. He was an active and zealous patriot, who had devoted much of his life to the public service.

MOAVIA, general of the caliph Omar, avenged his master's death, and seized his kingdom, 643 A. D. After taking Rhodes, and destroying the colossus, he attacked Sicily, and afterwards carried devastation to the gates of Constantinople. He was, however, unsuccessful, and after besieging in vain the capital for seven years, he purchased peace by paying an annual tribute to the eastern emperor. He died 680. During this siege the Greek fire is said to have been invented, and to have been used with peculiar effect against the besiegers.

MODREVIUS, Andreas Fricius, secretary to Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland was a learned man, and wrote various works of which that "de Republicâ Eminentendâ," in five books, printed 1554, is highly esteemed as a most able political performance. In his religious opinions he showed himself very inconsistent, and while he inclined to the Lutherans he rendered himself suspected by the catholics, and exposed to the resentment of Pius V. He is regarded by Grotius as a person who wished to reconcile the different schemes of religion.

MOEBIUS, Godfrey, a native of Thuringia, and medical professor at Jena, was author of Physiological principles of Medicine, 4to.—Abridgment of the Elements of Medicine, fol.—Anatomy of Camphire, 4to. in Latin. His son of the same name was also a physician, and published Synopsis Medicinæ Practicæ, fol. 1667. He died at Halle 1664, aged 59.

MOEHSEN, John Charles William, M.D. was born at Berlin in 1772, and studied at the universities of Jena and Halle. Taking his degree at the age of twenty, he returned to Berlin, and succeeded his grandfather, M. Horch, as physician to the gymnasium of Joachim. In 1778, he was appointed physician to Frederick the Great, whom he attended in the war of the Bavarian succession. He now became a member of various learned institutions, and in 1795 was chosen an associate of the royal academy of arts and sciences at Berlin. His death took place the same year. His works relate to the history of medicine and its professors, including De Medicis Equestria Dignitate Ornatis, 1768, 4to.; A Catalogue of a Collection of Engraved Portraits of Celebrated Physicians, 1771, 4to.; A Description of Medals or Jettons struck in honor of Physicians, with Memoirs explaining the Coinage of the Ancients, as connected with Medical History and Literature, 1773, 2 vols. 4to.; and Remarkable Experiments to determine the Utility of Inoculation for the Small-Pox, 1782, 8vo.

MOINE, Stephen le, a learned protestant, born at Caen, 1624. He became professor of divinity at Leyden, and died there 1689. He wrote "Varia Sacra," 2 vols. 4to. and other theological works.

MOINE, Abraham le, a French divine, who left France on account of his religion, and became the minister of a protestant congregation in London, where he died 1760. He translated into French, Gibson's Pastoral Letters—Sherlock on the Witnessnes of the Resurrection, and on the Use and End of Prophecy, with learned and valuable notes and dissertations.

MOLANUS, or VERMEULIN, John, an ecclesiastic, professor of theology at Louvaine. He was born at Lisle, and died 18th of September 1585, aged 52. He published, Usnard's Martyrology, with notes and an appendix, 8vo.—Natales Sanctorum Belgii, 12mo.—Historia S. S. Imaginum Picurarum, 8vo. and 1771, 4to. with a Supplement by Paquot—de Canoniciis, a work of merit—de Fide Hereticis servandâ—de Piis Testamentis—Theologiæ Practicæ Compendium—Militia Sacra Ducum Brabant.—Rerum Lovaneng.

MOLANUS, Gerard Walter, a Lutheran divine, abbot of Lockum. He was the correspondent of Bossuet, with respect to an union between the catholics and protestants. He wrote some theological works, and died 1722.

MOLAY, James de, the last grand master of the Templars. The riches as well as the pride of his order, excited the suspicion and the jealousy of Philip the Fair, who, with the consent of the pope, seized their property, and summoned the master to appear at Paris, to answer for his conduct. Molay came, attended by sixty knights, but they were no sooner in the power of their persecutors, than they were seized, and all burnt alive, falsely accused as being guilty of atrocious crimes. Molay suffered 11th May 1314, and before the fatal torch was lighted, declared his innocence, and the innocence of his order.

MOLESWORTH, Robert, viscount, an able statesman, descended from an ancient family in Northamptonshire, was born December 1656, in Dublin, where his father, who died before his birth, had settled as a merchant. He was educated at Dublin, and displayed so much zeal and patriotism at the revolution, that James' parliament sequestered his property. The victorious William, however, rewarded his fidelity, made him one of his privy counsellors, and sent him as his ambassador to Denmark. After a residence of three years Molesworth offended the Danish court by not sufficiently respecting the customs and the privileges of the country, and left the place abruptly, and on his return to England published "an Account of Denmark." The book, though well received and translated into several languages, offended prince George of Denmark, by representing the Danish government as tyrannical, and a memorial of complaint was presented to king William, and an answer prepared to it by Dr. King. But Molesworth disregarded these measures, safe in the public approbation and the friendship of Shaftesbury. He was member of the commons in several parliaments, but rendered himself obnoxious to the clergy, by an affectation of popularity, and by profane insinuations that religion is a pious craft, an useful state engine, but far inferior to the principles which in the school of Athens and Rome, incited their attentive youth to the love of their country, and to the practice of the moral virtues. As he strongly supported the Hanoverian succession, notwithstanding the eccentricity of his principles, he could not but be acceptable, for his abilities and influence, to George I. by whom he was made a privy counsellor, and created a peer of Ireland 1716. He died 22d May, 1725. He published besides, an address to the House of Commons, and translated Hottoman's "Franco-Gallia."

MOLEVILLE, Bertrand de, a French statesman, was born in 1744. He was minister of the Marine in the reign of Louis XVI.; and when the revolution broke out he sought an asylum in England; where he published Memoirs of the Revolution, and several other works on that subject. He died at Paris, October 19th, 1819.

MOLIERE, John Baptist Poquelin de, a celebrated French comic writer, born at Paris 1620. His real name was Poquelin, and his father who was a tapestry maker to the court, intended him for his own business. The boy, however, being frequently taken by his grandfather to the theatre, acquired such a taste for dramatic representations that his contempt for tapestry making prevailed, and he was sent to study under the jesuits at the college of Clermont. In five years he here completed his education, and further improved his mind by attending, with his friends Chapelle and Bernier, the lectures of Gassendi the celebrated philosopher. He afterwards applied himself to the law, but after his father's death, he renounced all other employments for the stage, and uniting himself with one of those small theatrical parties which were now patronised by Richelieu, he assumed the name of Moliere which he has rendered so illustrious. He joined La Bejart, an actress of some merit, and with her went to Lyons in 1653, where he produced his first play called P'Etourdi, or the Blunderer, which was received with universal applause. He performed afterwards at Languedoc, was at Grenoble in 1657, and the next year went to settle at Rouen. Some visits to Paris recommended him to the great, he was noticed by the duke of Conti, by the king's brothers, and at last patronised^d by the monarch himself. He exhibited before the king, and with such success that he received a pension, and continued from that time to entertain the court by a rapid production of new plays. The last comedy which he produced was le Malade Imaginaire, or the Hypochondriac, and on the fourth night of its being acted, 17th February 1673, the author died. The death of their favorite actor deeply affected the Parisians, and Louis XIV. interested himself much in the honors to be paid to his memory. Though the archbishop would not permit his body to be deposited in consecrated ground, the severe sentence was reversed by the king's command, and the lamented poet was buried in St. Joseph's chapel. Moliere by his "Tartuffe" had drawn upon himself the indignation of the clergy, and that of the other orders by the severity with which he lashed their follies and extravagant conduct. He was, says Voltaire, the best comic poet that ever lived in any nation, and it must be confessed that he retrieved comedy out of chaos, as Corneille had tragedy. The plays of Moliere have frequently been printed, the best edition is that of Paris, 1772, in 6 vols. 8vo.

MOLIERES, Joseph Privat de, a French philosopher of noble birth. He was born at Tarascon, and was educated at the oratory, after which he went to Paris. As the friend of Malebranche, and a man of great abilities, he was admitted into the academy of sciences, and in 1723, made philosophical professor of the Royal college. He wrote Mathematical Lessons to understand Philosophy, 12mo.—Lessons of Philosophy, or Elements of Physies, to explain and improve the systems of Descartes and Newton, 3 vols. 8vo.—Elements of Geometry, 12mo. He died 1742, aged 65.

MOLINA, Lewis, a native of Cuenza, New Castille, of noble birth. He studied at Coimbra, and was admitted among the Jesuits, and for twenty years was professor of divinity at Eborac. He died at Madrid 1600, aged 65. He wrote besides Commentaries on the Summa of Aquinas—a treatise de Justitiâ & Jure—de Concordiâ Gratie & Liberi Arbitrii. 4to. a work in which the author is accused by the Dominicans of reviving Pelagianism. A Spanish author of that name, wrote a valuable work on the hereditary property of the Spanish nobles.

MOLINÆUS, Carolus, or Charles DU MOULIN, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 1500. An impediment in his speech prevented his displaying his abilities at the bar; but he wrote on jurisprudence with such success that he was called the Papinian of France. In 1552, in consequence of the persecution of the protestants he removed to Basil and other places, and on his return to Paris was confined in the Conciergerie for some severe reflections on the council of Trent, but was restored to liberty by the intercession of the queen of Navarre. In his old age he conformed to the Roman catholic tenets, and died 1566. His works were published 1631, in 5 vols. folio. It is said that he was allied to Elizabeth queen of England.

MOLINÆUS, or DU MOULIN, Peter, a protestant minister, of the same family as the preceding, born at Bechny in the Vexin, 1568. He studied at Sedan, and afterwards at Christ-college, Cambridge, and obtained the professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where he had among his pupils the celebrated Grotius. In 1599 he became minister of Charenton, and chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, the sister of Henry IV. whom he preserved in the protestant faith, against all the machinations of the catholics. In 1615 he was invited to England by James I. who greatly honored him and gave him a prebend of Canterbury. He was afterwards deputed by the Gallican church to the synod of Dorlt, where the affairs of the reformed churches were to be discussed, but was prevented by intrigues and menaces. He was offered in 1618, the divinity chair of Leyden, but declined it, though he afterwards settled at Sedan, as theological professor, and minister of the church. He died there 10th March, 1658, aged 90. He wrote among other things, a treatise on the Keys of the Church—the History of the Monks—a Defence of the Reformed Churches—the Anatomy of Arminianism, folio—Novitas Papismi.

MOLINOS, Michael, a Spanish ecclesiastic, born at Saragossa 1627. He was the cause of great controversies in the church by his "Spiritu Alguide," first published in Spanish, and afterwards in other languages. He inculcated in this famous work that man must annihilate himself in order to be united to the deity; and this passive doctrine called quietism, had many abettors, and among them Fenelon, and Madame Guyon. The author of it, however, fell into the hands of the inquisition, and was forced to abjure his errors, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in which he died, 1696.

MOLLER, Daniel William, a celebrated traveller, professor of metaphysics and history, and librarian in Altorf university, was born at Presburg, and died at Altorf, 1712, aged 70. He wrote Opuscula Ethica, &c. 12mo.—Opuscula Medico-historico-philologica, 12mo.—Mensa Poetica—Indiculus Philologorum ex Germaniâ oriundorum, 4to.—Meditatio de Insectis ex Acre delapsis, 12mo.

MOLLER, John, an able writer, born at Fleinsburg in Sleswick duchy, died 1725, aged 64. His son has published his life at Sleswick, 1734. He wrote a Latin History of the Duchies of Holstein and Sleswick, 8vo.—Cimbria Luterata, 3 vols. fol.—de Cornutis & Hernaphroditis, 4to.—Isagoge ad Historiam Chersonesi Cimbricae.

MOLLOY, Charles, an English dramatic writer born at Dublin, and educated at the college there, of which he became fellow. He entered at the Middle Temple, London, and was engaged as the conductor of the periodical paper "Fog's Journal," and afterwards of "Common Sense." He married a lady of fortune, and died 16th July, 1767. He wrote the Perplexed Couple—The Coquet—Half-pay Officer, and three comedies.

MOLSA, Tarquina, an Italian lady, was deservedly celebrated for her learning, her wit, her beauty, and her virtues. She was highly esteemed at the court of Alphonsus, duke of Ferrara, and honored with the appellation of singular, by the Roman senators, who bestowed on her and her family the rights of a citizen, December 8th, 1600. Besides some elegant translations from Greek and Latin authors, she wrote some original pieces, and was equally admired for her superior knowledge of music. She was married, but had no children, and losing her husband she refused, though young, again to marry.

MOLYNEUX, William, LL.D. an eminent mathematician, born 17th April, 1656, at Dublin, and educated at Trinity college there. He went to London, 1675, and entered at the Middle Temple, and after three years' residence there, he returned to Ireland. The bent of his genius led him to mathematics and astronomy. He was the correspondent of Flamstead, and other learned men; and to his exertions Ireland was indebted for the establishment of her philosophical society, of which he became the first secretary, and sir William Petty the president, 1683. In 1685, he was elected fellow of the Royal society of London, and then travelled to Flanders to improve himself in the knowledge of engineering, as he was surveyor of the works, and chief engineer of Ireland. In 1689 he fled from the political and religious disturbances which agitated Ireland, and settled at Chester, where he devoted himself to literature and science. He returned to Dublin in 1692, and was chosen member for the city; and in 1695, for the university. In 1698 he went to England to pay a visit to the great John Locke; but on his return to Ireland he was attacked by a severe fit of the stone, and during his agony broke a blood vessel of which he died 11th Oct. 1698. He wrote besides some papers in the philosophical transactions, a treatise on Dioptrics, published at Chester, 1692—Sciothericum Telesopicum, or a description of the telescope dial he had invented—the Case of Ireland stated as being not bound by acts of parliament in England. Some of his letters to Locke were also published.

MOLYNEUX, Samuel, the only son of the above by Lucy, daughter of Sir William Donville, was born at Chester, July, 1689, and lost his mother a few days after. His education was conducted after his father's death by his uncle Dr. Molyneux the physician, and he afterwards became secretary to George II. when prince of Wales. He devoted much of his time to the sciences and to astronomy, and brought to greater perfection the method of making telescopes, one of which he presented to John V. king of Portugal. When appointed one of the commissioners of the admiralty, public affairs superseded private studies, and he gave his papers to Dr. Smith, astronomy professor at Cambridge, by whom they were published in his "Complete Treatise of Optics."

MOLYNEUX, sir William, a gallant soldier in the service of Henry VIII. at the battle of Flodden field. On his death-bed he gave this advice to his son "let the underwood grow, the tenants are the support of a family, and the commonalty are the strength of a kingdom. Improve this fairly, but force not violently either your bounds or rents above your forefathers."

MONALDESCHI, John, the equerry of Christina queen of Sweden, was cruelly put to death at Fontainebleau, 10th Oct. 1657, for writing an account of the intrigues and licentiousness of his mistress. The step was rash and vindictive, and Christina was justly blamed, and felt the displeasure of government for such violence in a country where she was but a guest.

MONARDES, Nicholas, a physician of Seville, whose works were greatly esteemed, especially his treatise on the Virtues of the American Drugs, which have been translated into English, Latin, and Italian. He died 1578.

MONBODDO, James Burnett, lord, a learned but eccentric writer, was born, in 1714, at Monboddoo, in Scotland, and was educated at Aberdeen and Groningen. In 1738 he was admitted an advocate, and, in 1767, was raised to the bench. He died May 26, 1799. Lord Monboddoo was an excellent Greek scholar and metaphysician, but his whimsies threw a shade over his merits. He held modern learning in utter contempt, and believed in satyrs, mermaids, and the relationship of the human and monkey races. He wrote Ancient Metaphysics; and An Essay on the Origin and Progress of Language.

MONBRON, N. Fougeret de, a native of Peronne, known for his virulence as an author. He travestied the Henriade of Voltaire, and wrote besides the Cosmopolite—Preservation against Angiomania,—and some indelicate romances. He died little respected 1760.

MONCEAUX, Francis de, ambassador from Alexander Farnese, to Henry IV. was born at Arras. He is author of Bucolica Sacra, 8vo. 1589—Aaron Purgatus, sive de Aureo Vitulo, 8vo.—Templum Justitiæ, a poem—Lucubrationes in Cantica Cantie.—and the History of the Divine Apparitions to Moses.

MONCRIF, Francis Augustin Paradis de, member of the French academy, was born at Paris, and died 1770, aged 83. He wrote an Essay on the Means of Pleasing—the Friendly Rivals, a romance—the Alderites, a comedy, besides poems and smaller pieces, collected, 4 vols. 12mo.

MONCKTON, Robert, governor of New-York, was appointed in 1761, and took on him the administration in June, 1762. He had previously been lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, appointed in 1755, and had the same year the command of the expedition against the French settlements and forts south of the St. Lawrence. In 1758 he was appointed colonel of the royal American regiment, and was a brigadier-general in the expedition against Quebec, under general Wolfe. In 1762, he was engaged in the successful expedition against the French West India Islands, and commanded the land forces on that occasion. He remained governor of New-York but one year, and was succeeded by Sir Henry Moore. In 1765 he was appointed governor of Herbert castle. He died governor of Portsmouth, May 23d, 1792. He was the son of John, lord viscount Monckton, of Ireland, by a daughter of the duke of Newcastle.

MONGAULT, Nicolas Hubert, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1674. He studied under the fathers of the oratory, and at Mans, and boldly opposed the philosophy of Aristotle by that of Descartes. In 1710, he was appointed by Orleans, regent of the kingdom, to be preceptor to his son, the duke de Chartres, and in consequence of his faithful services he received the abbey of Chartrou, 1714, and that of Villeneuve, 1719. He published a valuable edition of Cicero's Letters to Atticus, 6 vols. 12mo.—and translated Herodian, and wrote two learned dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions. He was member of this society, and also of the French academy, and died 15th August 1746, aged 72.

MONGE, Gaspar, an eminent French geometer, was born, in 1746, at Beaune; displayed profound mathematical talents at an early age; taught physics and mathematics at the military school of Mezieres; and, in 1780, became a member of the Academy of Sciences. In 1793, he was for a short time minister of the marine, and acted as substitute for the war minister. In 1796 he was employed in Italy; and, in 1798, accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, where he was chosen president of the Institute of Cairo. Under the imperial government, he was made a senator and count of Pclusium. Napoleon also gave him an estate in Westphalia, and a present of two hundred thousand francs. On the return of the Bourbons he was deprived of all his employments, and in 1816, was excluded from the Institute. Grief and age combined to weaken his faculties, and he died, almost in a state of imbecility, in 1818. Of his works the principal are, Descriptive Geometry; the Application of Analysis to the Geometry of Surfaces; and an Elementary Treatise on Statics. Monge was the creator of descriptive geometry.

MONIS, Judah, the first Hebrew instructor in Harvard college, was a native of Italy, and after his arrival in this country began his instructions about the year 1720. Though a Jew he embraced the christian religion, and was publicly baptised at Cambridge in 1722. After the death of his wife in 1761 he resigned his office, which he had sustained for about forty years, and retired to Northborough. In that town he passed the remainder of his life in the family of Rev. John Martyn, who married a sister of his wife. He died April 25, 1764, aged eighty-one, bequeathing forty-six pounds to be divided among seven of the neighboring ministers, and 126l. as a fund, the interest of which was to be given to the indigent widows of ministers. He published truth, whole truth, nothing but the truth, 1722, and a Hebrew grammar, 4to. 1735.

MONK, George, duke of Albemarle, celebrated for restoring Charles II. to his throne, was born of an ancient family at Potteridge, Devonshire, 6th Dec. 1608. As he was a younger son he devoted himself to the profession of arms, and accompanied as a volunteer, sir Richard Grenville in his Spanish expedition, and the following year, 1626, he was made ensign in the expedition against the isle of Rhé. After some campaigns in Flanders, and great experience, he returned to England at the breaking out of the civil wars, and he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the king's expedition against the Scotch. In the Irish rebellion his services were so meritorious, that he was made governor of Dublin by the lords justices; but afterwards giving offence for making peace with the rebels, he fell under temporary disgrace, and then was appointed major-general, and intrusted with a command at the siege of Nantwich. Here he was surprised by Fairfax and sent a prisoner to Hull; but in 1646, he subscribed to the covenant, and was employed by the republicans in the Irish station. Though thus a friend to the parliament, it is to be observed that the king's power was now abolished, and that in serving his former enemies he had no other source of promotion or maintenance. He had, in 1648, the chief command of the army in the North of Ireland; but his treaty with the Irish rebel O'Neal, gave great offence to the parliament, yet Cromwell who knew his abilities reconciled him to his situation, and left him at the head of the army in Scotland, after the second Charles's invasion. In 1653, he was united with Blake and Dean in the command of the sea forces, and by courage and good conduct he obtained a victory over the Dutch fleet. Though suspected by Cromwell, he was invested still with the chief command of the North, and for five years recommended himself to the love of his army and the affection of the people by his affability, and conciliating manners. His popularity indeed gave uneasiness to the jealous protector, who is said in one of his letters to him to have added this postscript, "there be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart, I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him, and send him up to me." Monk, however, knew how to dissemble, and when Charles wrote to him, he sent the letter to the protector, and evinced his devotion to his service by promoting addresses from the army to him. After Cromwell's death he congratulated his successor; but when Richard dropped the reins from his hand, Monk conducted himself with deep and artful caution, and while he listened to some who wished him to seize upon the government, he seemed to pay little attention to those who recommended the establishment of a republic, or to those who sighed for the restoration of royalty. Apparently undecided he marched towards London, and being secure of the affection of his soldiers, and sensible of the general wishes of the nation, he called a free parliament, and insured the restoration of the exiled monarch, with whom he had long secretly corresponded. Replaced on the throne of his ancestors without bloodshed, Charles showed his gratitude to the illustrious character who had so prudently effected it. Monk was loaded with pensions and honors; he became knight of the garter, privy counsellor, master of the horse, first lord of the treasury, and was created baron Monk, earl of Torrington, and duke of Albemarle, with a grant of 7000*l.* to him and his posterity. His elevation gave pleasure to the whole nation, and the commons in full body attended the new peer to the house of lords, where his modesty, and unaffected behavior were the admiration of all. Deservedly popular, Monk was consulted and employed in every affair of importance. He was placed at the head of the admiralty, and afterwards with prince Rupert contributed much to the defeat of the Dutch fleet. During the plague the king, who retired to Oxford, trusted him with the care of London, and when the city was burnt in his absence in 1666, the people, fond of their favorite hero, exclaimed, that if he had been there the dreadful calamity would have been avoided. This great man was attacked by a dropsy which proved fatal, 3d Jan. 1669-70, in his 62d year. Monk, who displayed so much moderation, and refused to step to a throne which was within his reach, was fully entitled to all the honors paid to him. In his private character he was amiable, and he possessed also some learning as is proved by his book, "Observations on Military and Political Affairs," published after his death, in fol. 1671, and a collection of letters which appeared in 1715.

MONK, Nicholas, brother to the great Monk, was educated at Wadham college, and made rector of Kilhampton, Cornwall. As he assisted his brother in the restoration of the king, his services were rewarded by Charles with the provostship of Eton, and the bishopric of Hereford. He died 1661.

MONK, the Hon. Mrs., daughter of lord Molesworth, and wife of George Monk, was well acquainted with the Latin, Spanish, and Italian languages, and wrote poetry with elegance and spirit. She died about 1715, and her poems under the title of "Miranda, Poems and translations on several occasions," 8vo. appeared 1716, dedicated by her father to queen Caroline.

MONMOUTH, James, duke of, natural son of Charles II. was born at Rotterdam 1649, and educated among the Roman catholics. On his restoration Charles showed him various marks of kindness, and created him earl of Orkney, knight of the garter, and afterwards duke of Monmouth. He had the care of an expedition in Scotland, and afterwards served in an English regiment in France, and obtained the rank of general. In 1679, he defeated some of the Scotch rebels; but afterwards forgetting his duty he entered into a conspiracy to dethrone his father. This ingratitude was forgiven by Charles, but Monmouth still intent on schemes of ambition retired into Holland, and as soon as he heard that James II. had ascended the throne, he determined to invade the kingdom, and he landed in Dorsetshire. He had the rashness with few followers to attack the king's forces, and he was defeated at Sedgemoor, in Somersetshire, and taken afterwards in disguise in a field, with some peas in his pocket for his sustenance. He made the most humiliating petitions to James; but his death was determined upon, and he came out of the tower to ascend the scaffold. He was beheaded 25th July, 1685, and in his last moments showed resignation and fortitude.

MONNIER, Peter le, professor of philosophy, in the Harcourt college, at Paris, was author of Cursus Philosophicus, 6 vols. 12mo. and died at Paris, 1757, aged 82. His son Charles was also a man of science. He was professor of philosophy in the Royal college, member of the academy of sciences, and was one of those sent by the government in 1736, to measure a degree of the meridian near the pole. He died 1799.

MONNOYE, Bernard de la, a learned Frenchman, born at Dijon, 15th June, 1641. He obtained in 1671, the first prize of poetry offered by the French academy, on the suppression of duelling, and again gained the same honors 1675, and in 1677. Besides his poetry in French, and also in Greek, Latin, and Italian, in all of which he evinced the greatest elegance united with sweetness and simplicity, he wrote various other prose compositions. His Remarks on the Menagiana—his Dissertations on the Book de Tribus Impostoribus—his Dissertation on Pomponius Lætus, are well known, and to his extensive information and assiduity, Bayle was indebted for several curious particulars in his dictionary. He left in MS. some dissertations, epigrams, a collection of letters, and other things. His poems were edited at the Hague by Sallinger, with an enlogium. He died at Paris 15th October, 1728, aged 87.

MONNET, Anthony Grimoald, a French chemist of eminence, and inspector-general of mines, was born of low parentage, in Auvergne, in 1734. He settled as an apothecary at Rouen, but, becoming known as a superior chemist, he removed to Paris, and obtained in 1774, through the patronage of Malesherbes, the place of inspector-general of mines. He now prepared, in conjunction with Guettard, a mineralogical atlas of France, and was one of the few chemical philosophers who rejected and opposed the theories of Lavoisier. Deprived of office at the Revolution, he passed the latter part of his life in retirement, and died at Paris in 1817. He wrote also Memoire Historique et Politique sur les Mines de France, 1790, 8vo.; Demonstration de la Fausseté des Principes des Nouveaux Chimistes, 1798, 8vo.; besides a great number of analyses and memoirs in the public journals.

MONNOYER, John Baptist, a painter, born at Lisle, and educated at Antwerp. He was admitted into the academy at Paris with great applause, and afterwards came to England, where he was much flattered and approved. Several of his pieces are preserved in the collections of lord Carlisle, the duke of St. Alban's and others. He died in Pall-Mall 1669.

MONRO, Alexander, an eminent physician born in Scotland 1697. He studied at Paris and Leyden, and was the intimate friend of Boerhaave. In 1719, he returned to Edinburgh, and began those lectures in anatomy and on chirurgical subjects, which have rendered his fame so celebrated as a man of science, and a skilful inquirer after truth. He died 1767. His works are Osteology—Anatomy of the Nerves—Medical Essays and Observations—Success of Inoculation in Scotland, most of which have been republished in one vol. 4to. 1781, by his son, who was also successor in the professorial chair.

MONRO, John, an able physician of Scotch extraction. He was born 16th November, 1715, at Greenwich in Kent, and educated at Merchant Taylor's, and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was by the interest which his father possessed with sir Robert Walpole, elected in 1743, to one of Dr. Radcliffe's travelling fellowships, and in consequence of the appointment went abroad and studied under the famous Boer-leave at Leyden. After visiting France, Germany, and Holland, he returned to England, and in 1751, was elected joint physician with his father, to Bridewell and Bethlem hospitals. In this office he devoted the whole of his attention to cases of insanity, and in 1758, he published Remarks on Dr. Battie's treatise on Madness, in which, in bold and elegant language he retorted the censures thrown on his predecessors by his adversary, and at the same time paid an honorable and well merited compliment to the memory of his father. He died 27th December, 1791, aged 77. Though he published only the work already mentioned, he possessed very extensive information and great abilities, and from his knowledge of the early history of engraving, Mr. Strutt derived much assistance in his history of engravers.

MONRO, Alexander, D.D. a learned divine, born in Rosshire, 1648, and educated at king's college, Aberdeen, where he became professor of philosophy. In 1686, he was made principal of the university of Edinburgh, but unwilling to comply with the revolution, he was expelled and became an episcopal preacher. He wrote an Inquiry into the New Opinions, in which he attacked the Presbyterians with such severity that he was obliged to fly from their resentment. He returned afterwards to Edinburgh, where he died 1713, aged 65.

MONRO, George, M.D., a physician, was a native of Delaware. At the close of the American revolutionary war, he was a surgeon in the army. On the return of peace he spent three years in London and Edinburgh, and profited by the lectures of Cullen, Gregory, Black, Home, Brown and Monro. He published at this period, a Latin dissertation on Cynanche, which was commended by Cullen. In 1786, he settled on his farm at St. George's, Newcastle county: in 1793, he removed to Wilmington, where he passed the remainder of his life, in extensive practice as a physician and surgeon. He died 1819, aged 59.

MONROE, James, LL.D., president of the United States, was a native of Virginia. He was educated at William and Mary college, and in 1776, joined the army in the American revolutionary struggle, and continued with it till 1783, when he retired, and engaged in the study of the law. In 1780, he held the office of military commissioner for Virginia, and in that capacity visited the southern army. In 1782, he was a member of the Virginia assembly, and in 1783, a member of congress. In 1788, he was a member of the convention in Virginia to deliberate on the proposed constitution for the United States. In 1790, he was elected a senator of the United States from Virginia. In 1794, he received the appointment of minister plenipotentiary to France, and was recalled in 1797. In 1799, he was elected governor of Virginia. In 1802, he was sent on a special mission to France, which resulted in the purchase of Louisiana. In 1803, he was appointed minister to England. In 1805, he was associated with Mr. Charles Pinckney to negotiate with Spain. During his residence in England, he and Mr. William Pinckney negotiated a commercial treaty with Great Britain, but it was never submitted to the senate by Mr. Jefferson. He returned to America, in 1808. In 1811, he was governor of Virginia, and the same year received from Mr. Madison the appointment of secretary of state, which office he held till his election of president March 4, 1817. During a part of the time in 1814 and 1815, he also performed the duties of secretary of war. He was again elected president in 1821. He died July 4th, 1831.

MONSEY, Messenger, an eminent physician of extensive practice, and in his character very singular and eccentric. He was for many years physician at Chelsea hospital, and died 1788, aged 96, ordering, as he disapproved of interment in churches, that his body should be anatomized, and the skeleton hung up in Chelsea hospital for the benefit of the students.

MONSON, sir William, a brave admiral, born at South Carlton, Lincolnshire, 1569. He was for two years at Balliol college, Oxford; but the love of adventure, and the participation of danger were more congenial to his feelings, and therefore unknown to his friends he enlisted for a common soldier. He was afterwards in the sea service, and engaged in the expeditions of the duke of Cumberland against the Azores, and at the taking of Fayal. His bravery and undaunted spirit in the various expeditions in which he was employed strongly recommended him to the notice and favor of queen Elizabeth, by whom he was knighted. Under James I. he was appointed admiral of the narrow seas, and distinguished himself against the Dutch and the French. His services, however, were disregarded, and through the jealousy of the courtiers he was in 1616 imprisoned in the tower, but soon after discharged. He was consulted afterwards by the ministry on naval subjects, and he opposed as impracticable and improper the expeditions against Algiers, 1617, and against Cadiz, 1625, and Rhé, in 1628. In 1635, he was successfully employed against the French and the Dutch, and then retired to privacy. He died at his seat, Kinnersley, in Surrey, February 1642-3, aged 73. He published "Naval Tracts," a valuable performance, printed 1682, folio.

MONTAGUE, Richard, D.D., an English prelate, born 1577, at Dorney, Buckinghamshire, where his father was minister. From Eton, he went to King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and afterwards he was made chaplain to James I. and in 1616 installed dean of Hereford. He possessed other ecclesiastical preferment besides, and in 1621, he distinguished himself by his Diatriba on the first part of Selden's History of Tythes, which so pleased the king that he engaged him to write his Analecta Ecclesiasticæ Exercitationum, which appeared 1622. In 1624, he attacked some popish and jesuit missionaries who attempted to gain over his flock at Stanford Rivers, Essex, and in consequence of the controversy which took place his enemies selected some passages from his writings, which they threatened they would submit to the parliament as heretical and inclined to popery and Arminianism. With the king's approbation he withstood their attacks, and published his Appello Cæsarem, 1625, which, as being more objectionable, brought him before the first house of commons of Charles I. where he was censured by the Speaker, and obliged to give a security of 2000*l.* for his appearance. Though prosecuted by the commons, he, however, found a patron in the king, and he was in 1628, promoted to the see of Chichester, and ten years after translated to Norwich, where he died 1641. He wrote besides Versio et Notæ in Photii Epistolæ, and assisted Savile in his edition of St. Chrysostom's works. He was an excellent scholar, and Selden himself his great antagonist, owns him to have been a man well skilled in ancient learning.

MONTAGUE, Charles, earl of Halifax, was born at Horton, Northamptonshire, 16th April, 1661, and from Westminster school, he went in 1682, to Trinity college, Cambridge. His poem on the death of Charles II. in 1684, recommended him to the notice of the earl of Dorset, and of the learned wits of the time and the assistance which he gave to Prior in the composition of the Country and City Mouse, 1697, to ridicule Dryden's Hind and Panther, contributed still more to his celebrity. On James I's abdication of the throne, he was appointed one of the members of the convention, and on William's arrival he was presented to him by lord Dorset, and received a pension of 500*l*. In 1691, he began to display his oratorical powers in the house of commons, and was made that same year one of the lords of the treasury, and three years after chancellor of the exchequer. In 1695, he began the recoining of the current money of the kingdom, and completed it through all difficulties; and in 1696, he projected the scheme of a general fund, which has proved so essential to modern financiers under the name of the sinking fund. In 1698, he was appointed first commissioner of the treasury, the next year auditor of the exchequer, and in 1700, raised to the peerage by the title of baron Halifax. Though attacked by the commons in 1701, as guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, the accusation was disproved, and he gained in a stronger degree the confidence and protection of the monarch. His zeal in the cause of the Hanoverian succession procured him the favor of George I. on whose accession he was created earl of Halifax, and made knight of the garter, and first lord of the treasury. He did not long enjoy his honors, as he died suddenly, after an illness of four days, May 19, 1715. Halifax owed his elevation and honors to his merits. As a man of learning he was highly respectable, and the patronage which he extended to Addison, to Steele, Pope, Swift, and the other wits of the age, will extend his fame to the latest posterity. His poems and speeches, and memoirs of his life have been collected among the works of English poets.

MONTAGUE, Edward, earl of Sandwich, an illustrious character, who though he fought against Charles I. and advised Cromwell to assume the crown, was zealous for the restoration of the royal family. Distinguished as a general and as a statesman, he was equally so as an admiral, and in the Dutch war, which Charles II. undertook by his advice he behaved with astonishing valor in the battle of Southwold bay. After extricating his fleet, however, from the most imminent danger, his ships caught fire from one of the fire ships of the enemy, and in the general confusion he leaped overboard and was drowned, 1672. He had been created an earl by Charles II. He was distinguished also as a writer, and gave to the world Letters to Secretary Thurloe—Letters during his Embassy in Spain—the Art of Metals, translated from the Spanish, a book of merit—original letters, 2 vols. 8vo.

MONTAGUE, lady Mary Wortley, eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, earl, and afterwards duke of Kingston, was born at Thoresby, in Nottinghamshire 1690. She received a very learned education, and was instructed with her brother lord Newark, in the knowledge of the Greek and Latin classics. She married in 1712, Edward Wortley Montague, a gentleman of great political knowledge and influence, and distinguished not only as an eloquent and upright member of parliament, but as the friend of Addison, and in 1716 she accompanied him in his embassy to Constantinople. In this distant region she examined with accuracy the manners and habits of the natives, and communicated by letter her judicious observations to her friends in England. To her discernment Europe is indebted for the introduction of the small-pox by inoculation; but it is to be remarked that before she recommended it she made the first experiment upon her own son, and its success proved the means of disseminating the blessings and the continuation of life to thousands. In 1718, she returned to England and settled at Twickenham, where she formed a strong intimacy with Pope. This proved, however, of short duration, the poet was irascible, and he soon vented the severity of his satires against his fair friend, and when charged with the scurrility of his writings he had the meanness to deny them. In 1739, lady Mary went to settle at Brescia near Venice for the benefit of her health, where she continued till 1761, when she returned to England to see her daughter who had married lord Bute. She died the following year. The letters of lady Montague appeared before the public in 1763. These letters exhibit her powers in a very pleasing view. The many adventures which attended her in her travels are presented in interesting description, and prove that with a warm and romantic imagination she possessed great talents, and inexhaustible powers of language. Many passages, however, it must be acknowledged, especially in her poetry, cannot be read without a blush by a person of delicacy, and it is to be lamented as much, that such offensive pages should be presented to the public eye, as that they should issue from the pen of a lady of respectable character, of elegant taste and solid judgment.

MONTAGUE, Edward Wortley, son of the above, born at Warncliffe lodge, Yorkshire, was remarkable for his eccentricities. He ran away from Westminster school, to become a chimney sweeper, and when restored by accident to his parents he again left them to join himself to a fisherman, after which he embarked as a cabin boy for Spain, and hired himself there as a servant to a muleteer. Here again he was discovered and prevailed upon to return to his friends, who placed him under the care of a tutor, and with him he visited the West Indies, and other foreign countries. On his return he was elected member of parliament, and conducted himself with all the propriety becoming his birth and fortune; but soon his fondness for novelty gained its usual ascendancy, and he embarked for the East. At Constantinople he adopted the dress and the manners of the Turks; he kept a numerous seraglio of wives, he sat cross-legged, he wore a long beard, and behaved with all the pomp of oriental consequence. In early life he had married a woman of mean birth, with whom, however, he had never cohabited, and hearing, while at Constantinople, of her death, he determined, by a most extraordinary plan, to alienate his fortune from his relations, against whom he had a particular dislike. He caused, therefore, to be inserted in the English newspapers, an advertisement for a young woman as a wife, who was already advanced in her pregnancy, and a proper person was accordingly provided; but before the romantic hero could return thus to impose on the world his false heir, death arrested his purposes. He died in Italy, 1776, aged about 62. He was author of an Examination into the Causes of Earthquakes—and of Observations on the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire—Account of the Mountains of Arabia, which possess some merit, besides some interesting papers inserted in the philosophical transactions.

MONTAGUE, Elizabeth, daughter of Matthew Robinson of Horton, Kent, was a lady of great accomplishments, which were much improved under the tuition of Dr. Conyers Middleton. About 1742, she married Edward Montague, of Allerthorpe, Yorkshire, son of Charles, the fifth son of the first earl of Sandwich, and by him she had only one son who died in his infancy. She soon became a widow with an ample fortune, and numerous connections, and respected by the great, the learned, and the gay. She showed now greater attachment to literature, than to the amusements of the fashionable world, and she formed among her friends a literary club, which received the singular appellation of the blue stocking club, because one of the members, a gentleman, generally wore stockings of that color. Her abilities and correct taste were evinced in her essay on the writings and genius of Shakspeare, 1769, a valuable work which acquired deserved celebrity. She was much courted by lord Lyttleton, whom it is said she assisted in the composition of his dialogues of the dead. This very respectable lady died in 1800, much lamented by the tribe of chimney sweepers in the metropolis, to whom she had, for many years, with great humanity, and with some show of ostentatious vanity, given a splendid entertainment yearly on May-day.

MONTAGUE, Charles Greeville, governor of South Carolina, arrived in the province and assumed the administration in 1766. In 1773 he was succeeded by lord Campbell, and was appointed governor of Jamaica. He was the second son of the duke of Montague; born May 29th, 1741, and died in January, 1784.

MONTAIGNE, Michael de, a celebrated French writer, born of an ancient family at Perigord, 1533. He was educated under his father, and instructed to speak Latin first, as his mother tongue, and afterwards he studied at the college of Guyenne. He was intended for the law, but disregarding the drudgeries of the profession, he travelled for the improvement of his understanding by observation on men and manners. While at Rome he was honored with the title and privileges of citizen, and in 1581, he was chosen in his absence mayor of Bourdeaux in the room of marshal Biron. He was at the meeting of the states of Blois, 1588, where his conduct merited the approbation of his countrymen, and the notice of Charles IX. who there invested him with the order of St. Michael. He died 1592, at his seat of Montaigne near Bourdeaux, where he had retired to the enjoyment of learned ease and philosophical society, and his last moments evinced the character of a good and faithful catholic. His essays have been repeatedly published. The best edition is that of Peter Coste, with notes, 1725, or 1739, 3 vols. 4to. They are amusing, and convey much instruction to the heart, though it must be observed that often they abound with skepticism and obscurity. Cardinal du Perron called them the breviary of honest men, and lord Halifax, to whom they were dedicated by Charles Cotton, the translator, declares them to be the book in the world with which he was best entertained. His travels were printed, 3 vols. 12mo, 1772.

MONTALBANI, Ovid, professor of medicine and astronomy at Bologna, died 1672, aged 70. He was author of Index Plantarum, 4to.—Bibliotheca Botanica, 4to.—Arboretum Libri duo, folio.—Epistola de Rebus in Bononiensi Tractu Indigenis.

MONTALEMBERT, Mark René, a French general, born at Angouleme, of a respectable family. He served with great credit in the French, Russian, and Swedish armies, and distinguished himself as a man of learning, and as member of the academy of sciences. He was author of Perpendicular Fortification, or the Defensive superior to the Offensive Art, by a new Method of employing Artillery, 11 vols. 4to. 1776—Correspondence with Generals, 3 vols.—comedies and poems. He divorced his wife in 1794, at the age of 80, and took another, by whom he had a daughter. He died 1799, aged 85.

MONTANUS, Benedict Arias, a learned Spaniard, born at Frexenal de la Sierra, near Badajos, 1523. After acquiring a perfect knowledge of ancient and eastern languages, he travelled through France, Germany, England, and the Low Countries, to learn the living tongues, and at his return to Spain, was so admired, that Philip II. employed his abilities in the publication of a new Polyglott bible, after the Complutensian edition. This he completed with great labor and success, and it was printed at Antwerp, 1571. The work was attacked by various critics, but the Spanish king was sensible of the merits of the author, and offered him a bishopric, which he refused, preferring the peace of solitude and retirement to dignities. He died at Seville about 1600. He wrote besides, critical tracts, and Commentaries on the Scriptures.

MONTANUS, John Baptist, an eminent physician, born at Verona, 1488. He studied the law at Padua; but though it offended his father, he preferred physic, in which he soon acquired reputation and opulence. He retired to Padua, where he obtained a professor's chair, and though solicited by the emperor, by the king of France, and by the duke of Tuscany, he refused to quit this peaceful abode. He died 1551. He wrote Medicina Universa—Opuscula Varia Medica—de Gradibus & Facultatibus Medicamentorum—Lectiones in Galenium & Avicennam.

MONTARRAGO, or MASCARENHAS, Frere de, a learned Portuguese, born at Lisbon 1670. He wrote, a Natural, Astrological, and Political History of the World—an Account of Oudenarde and Peterwaradin—Narrative of the Death of Louis XIV. and other works, and died 1730.

MONTAULT, Philip de, duke of Noailles, renounced the protestant faith by the persuasion of Richelieu, and rose to high rank in the army. He was in 1669 sent to the relief of Candia, but failed in his attempt, though he retired covered with glory. He died at Paris, much respected, 5th February, 1684, aged 65. His Memoirs appeared in 1701, but are little interesting.

MONTAUSIER, Charles de Sante Maure, duke de, peer of France, knight of the various orders of the monarchy, and governor of the dauphin, was born of an ancient family of Touraine. During the civil wars of the Fronde, he maintained order in his governments of Saintonge and Angoumois, and when appointed over Normandy, he no sooner heard that the plague infested the country, than he hastened to the relief of the people. His family expostulated, but he replied, that governors were obliged to reside as well as bishops; and if not on all occasions, yet in the time of public calamity. In his conduct towards the dauphin, he behaved like a man of probity, virtue and integrity, and without flattering his vices, he wished to lead him to the paths of duty and honor. To inspire him with a due sense of the attentions, which sovereigns owe to the meanest of their subjects, he one day took the prince to a cottage, where he addressed him in these words; "behold, lodged in this wretched habitation, the father, the mother, and the whole family, who labor incessantly to provide gold, that your palaces may be adorned, and who almost perish with hunger, that your table may be spread with the most exquisite dainties." When his attendance on the prince was completed, he told him, "if you are a man of probity and honor, you will love me, but if you are not, you will hate me, and I shall comfort myself through the disappointment." This virtuous character died 17th May, 1690, aged 80. By his wife Julia Lucy d'Angenus, of the house of Rambouillet, a woman of great merit and virtue, who died 1671, aged 64, he had only one daughter, who married the duke of Usez.

MONTBEILLARD, Philibert Gueneau de, an eminent naturalist, born at Namur, 1720. He assisted Buffon in his great work, and wrote the History of Birds, and began that of insects, but died before its completion, 1785. He was author of Collection Academique, containing interesting extracts from the various learned societies of Europe.

MONTCALM, Lewis Joseph de St. Veran, marquis de, a native of Candiac, descended from a noble family. He was brought up to the military service, and in various engagements distinguished himself by his valor, particularly at the battle of Placenza in 1746. He rose by degrees to the rank of field marshal, and in 1756 he was selected to preside over the province of Canada. In this distant province he ably opposed the English general lord Loudun, and defeated his successor Abercrombie; but the attack of Wolfe proved fatal. The English general, determined on the conquest of Quebec, fell in the attempt, and died in the arms of victory; and Montcalm, who had opposed most valiantly this illustrious chief, also shared his fate, 1759.

MONTCHRESTIEN DE VATEVILLE, Anthony, a French poet, known for his contentious disposition, and his various adventures. He was for some time in England, in consequence of his being accused of murder; but as the accusation seemed false, he was permitted to return home. He was afterwards suspected of coining; and at last, engaged in the civil wars which distracted France, he was killed near Falaise, by a party of his enemies, who attempted to arrest him, after a most determined defence. The tribunal of Doufront ordered that his body should be torn to pieces and burnt, which was done, 21st October 1621. He wrote some tragedies—besides a pastoral—Susan, and a poem.

MONTECUCULLI, Raynard de, an able general, born at Modena, 1608. His uncle Ernest made him pass through all the gradations of military life, and enlisted him first as a common soldier. He first distinguished himself against the Swiss, ten thousand of whom he defeated with two thousand men, though he was afterwards taken prisoner by general Bannier. Restored to liberty, after two years of confinement, he gained fresh laurels against the Swedes, and at the peace of Westphalia, began to travel. In 1657 the emperor sent him as field marshal to the assistance of John Casimir, king of Poland, against the Swedes and the Turks, and in this campaign he gained several victories. In 1673 he was employed against Turenne, who fell in the battle, and afterwards against Condé, and in this arduous contest maintained unsullied the glory which he had acquired. He died at Lintz 1680. His Memoirs were published at Strasburg, 1735.

MONTENAULT, Charles Philip, a French writer, born at Paris. His History of the Kings of the two Sicilies, of the House of France, in 4 vols. 12mo. has been much admired. He wrote also in the journal de Verdun, and translated into prose Quillet's poem, called Callipædia. He died 1749.

MONTESPAN, Athenais Mortimar, madame de, was wife of marquis de Montespan, and is known as the mistress of Louis XIV. Her husband ventured indignantly to resist the intrigue, but banishment from the capital, and the fear of despotic power, soon reconciled him to his disgrace, and one hundred thousand crowns purchased his wife, his silence, and his virtue. From 1669 to 1675, this guilty woman exercised uncontrolled authority, by her wit and by her beauty, over the captivated monarch, and the people of France; till satiety, and the love of madame de Maintenon, alienated the king's regard. She however, for some time continued at court, treated with respect, but robbed of her personal influence, and she divided her time, which passed on heavily upon her mind, in acts of devotion, and in the drawing up memoirs of whatever passed at court. She had by the king a son, created duke de Maine, and two daughters, one married to the grandson of the great Condé, and the other to the duke de Chartres. The last years of her life were spent away from the court, on a pension of one thousand louis d'or a-month. She died at Bourbon, 1717. She was rather ashamed of her faults, says her biographer, than penitent for them; half of her life was spent in grandeur, and the rest in contempt. Her reign was so intolerable and fatal, that the French regarded it as a judgment from heaven.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles de Secondat, baron of Brede, a celebrated writer, of a noble family, was born at Brede, near Bourdeaux, 18th January 1689. He devoted himself to literature from his earliest years, and first displayed the strong powers of his mind in the publication of his Persian Letters, 1721, in which he ridiculed the follies and the vices of the French nation with spirit and success. In 1722 he made some eloquent and convincing remonstrances against a tax which was going to be imposed upon the people, and his appeal proved so effectual, that the tax was suppressed. He was in 1728, admitted member of the French academy, after the opposition of cardinal Fleury, who was displeased with the language of his Persian Letters, against religion and government, had been removed by the influence of marshal d'Estrées. Deeply engaged in the completion of his great work, the Spirit of Laws, he visited various countries for information, and after passing through Germany, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, and Holland, he fixed his residence for two years in England. In this country he was honored with the attention not only of the learned, but of the great, and of the queen herself; and he wisely observed, that England was the country where to think, and France where to live. On his return home, he finished his work, on the Cause of the Grandeur and Decline of the Romans, and in 1748 appeared his Spirit of Laws, 2 vols. 4to. This work, which better deserves the name of the Spirit of Nations, acknowledges three sorts of government, the republican, the monarchical, and the despotic; and in examining these divisions, the author displays astonishing depth of thought, vigor of imagination, and solidity of judgment, and deserves the honorable appellation of the Legislator of the Human Race. He did not, however, escape the censure of the malevolent; and while foreign nations admired this very philosophical performance, some of the French critics pretended to discover strong blemishes in the composition. He succeeded his uncle as president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, and, with all the resignation of a true Christian, died at Paris, 10th February 1755, aged 66, universally lamented, by the court, as well as by the people. His Letters were published in 1767, 12mo. but his works have appeared together in 3 vols. 4to.

MONTESUMA, emperor of Mexico, displayed great firmness and powers of mind in opposing the Spaniards, whom an ignorant people regarded as more than mortals. He was at last seized by Cortes, in a pretended sedition, and ignominiously loaded with chains, and obliged to acknowledge himself the vassal of Spain. The Mexicans resented the indignities offered to their king, and Cortes, apprehensive of a fatal insurrection, made his royal prisoner appear before his irritated subjects on the top of a house, and arrayed in his robes, attempt to repress their violence. His sight for a moment checked the popular fury; but the monarch, wounded by two arrows, and by the blow of a stone, fell to the ground, and soon after, refusing all aliment, and rejecting every invitation of becoming a christian convert, expired, to the great regret of the Spaniards, and of his subjects, 1520.

MONTFAUCON, Bernard de, a learned Benedictine, was born 17th January 1655, at Roquetaillade. He first became a soldier, but the death of his parents affected him so powerfully, that he renounced the world, and commenced Benedictine monk 1675. He now devoted himself to literature with astonishing labor, and in 1698 travelled to Italy, to consult libraries and learned men. He was received with respect wherever he went, and treated with kindness by the Roman cardinals, and by Innocent XII. In 1701 he returned to Paris, and published an account of his journey, called Diarium Italicum, 4to. The rest of his life was dedicated to literature, for which he was so well qualified by his extensive erudition, and his great knowledge of history and antiquity. He died at the abbey of St. Germain, 21st December, 1741, aged 87. His works are, Græca Analecta, 4to.—St. Athanasius' works, Greek and Latin, with Notes, 3 vols. folio—a Collection of Ancient Greek Fathers, 2 vols. folio—Palaographia Græca, folio—Remains of Origen's Hexapla, 2 vols. folio—Chrysostom's works, Greek and Latin, with Notes, 13 vols. folio—Monumens de la Monarchie Française, 5 vols. folio—Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, 2 vols. folio—Dissertation on Judith—and Antiquity Explained, a most valuable work in French and Latin, illustrated with figures engraved on copper, 10 vols. folio, with a supplement of 5 vols. more.

MONTFLEURY, Zachary Jacob, a native of Anjou, who was page to the duke of Guise. He afterwards, under the name of Montfleury, joined a strolling company in Burgundy, and was one of the first players engaged in the Cid. He also wrote the death of Asdrubal, a tragedy, and became the instructor of Baron, who outshone him as a theatrical hero. He died December 1667. His son Anthony Jacob, was born at Paris, and left the profession of the law, against his father's inclination, for the stage. He wrote several comedies, which possess little merit, and which have been collected in 4 vols. 12mo. 1775. He died 1685, aged 45.

MONTFORT, Simon count de, a great French general whose cruelty, however, in his crusades against the Albigenses, 1209, deeply tarnished his character. In 1213, he defeated Peter king of Aragon, and was killed in 1218, at the siege of Toulouse, by a woman who threw a stone upon his head from the ramparts. His younger brother was the earl of Leicester, so celebrated in English history.

MONTGAILLARD, Bernard de, a mendicant friar, born 1553. He was called the petit feuillant of the league, and acquired so much celebrity as a preacher, that the scripture expression of "happy is the womb that bare thee," was applied to him. He prostituted his powerful eloquence to the meanest and most bloody purposes of the league, and even excited de Rougemont to become the assassin of Henry IV. He was abbé of Orval, a rich appointment, and died of a dropsy, 1628.

MONTGOLFIER, James Stephen, a native of Annonai in France, eminent as an ingenious paper manufacturer, and as the first who made vellum paper, so much admired for its beauty and smoothness. A higher degree of celebrity still awaited him: in 1783, as he was boiling water in a coffee-pot, the top of which was covered with paper, folded in a spherical form, he observed that the paper gradually swelled, and rose up in the air, and from this simple incident, reflection and experiment proved to him that a light machine, filled with gas, not so heavy as atmospheric air, might float in the upper regions. The experiment was exhibited to the eyes of astonished Europe, and by this extraordinary invention, the bold aeronaut presumed to commit himself to the air, and claim as his own the regions which seemed assigned only to the feathered race. For this singular service to science, Montgolfier was made member of the academy of sciences, created knight of the order of St. Michael, and rewarded with a pension from the king of two thousand livres. He died in the autumn of 1799. His elegy was pronounced by Boissy d'Anglas, at Paris, and by Duret, at Annonai.

MONTGOMERY, Gabriel de, count of, a French nobleman of Scotch origin. In a tournament given by Henry II. of France, in honor of his daughter Elizabeth's marriage with the king of Spain, the young knight unwillingly entered the lists against the monarch, and had the misfortune to wound him so severely in the eye, that he died eleven days after. After this melancholy event, Montgomery retired to his estate in Normandy, and then travelled into Italy, till the civil wars recalled him home to support the cause of the protestants, and to defend Rouen. When at last the city surrendered after a brave defence, he escaped to Havre, and in 1569 he flew to the assistance of Bearne, which was attacked by the catholic army under Terrides. Here he was victorious, and pursued his flying enemy, whom he besieged in Orthez, a place which he took by assault. This gallant chief was at Paris during the general massacre, and he escaped by the swiftness of his horse. From France he passed to Jersey with his family, and then took refuge in England, from which he sailed the following year to the relief of Rochelle but without success. In 1573 he again went to France, and joined at St. Lo, the protestant nobles of Normandy. Here he was suddenly besieged by Matignon, the commander of Normandy, but he escaped to Domfront, where he was quickly pursued by his enemy, and obliged to surrender. This valiant nobleman was then conducted to Paris, and there beheaded, 26th June 1574, by order of Catherine de Medici.

MONTGOMERY, Richard, a major-general in the army of the United States was a native of Ireland. Previous to the American revolution, he settled in the state of New York. He had been an officer in the British army, and served under Wolfe at the taking of Quebec in 1759, and had earned a high military reputation. He had taken a decided stand in favor of the colonies against the mother country, and in 1775 he was appointed to the command of the northern department of the continental army, in conjunction with general Schuyler. Owing to sickness general Schuyler was compelled to remain inactive, and the chief command of course devolved on Montgomery. Success attended the commencement of his campaign, he captured fort Chambler, St. John and Montreal, and proceeded to besiege Quebec. The siege commenced in December 1775, and on the last day of the month, he tried to carry the place by storm, but in the attempt himself and two aids were killed, and the enterprise of course abandoned. He fell at the age of thirty-eight. A monument has been erected to his memory in front of St. Paul's church, New York, by authority of congress, and in 1818 his remains were removed from Canada, and deposited with the highest honors near his monument.

MONTGOMERY, James, D.D. Rector of St. Stephen's church, Philadelphia, his native city. He was born, November 25th 1787; graduated at Princeton college in 1805; and died the 17th March 1834. On the completion of his collegiate education he studied law, and was admitted to the practice of it; but, in 1816, was admitted by Bishop White to the order of Deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church. In the year following he was ordained priest by Bishop Croes. Previous to his election to the Rectorship of St. Stephen's church in 1823, where he remained till the close of his useful life, he had officiated for two years in Grace church, New York. Dr. Montgomery was an eloquent preacher; was particularly distinguished on account of his zeal for missions; and was actively engaged in all the institutions of the church of which he was a beloved minister.

MONTGON, Charles Alexander, a French ecclesiastic, born at Versailles, 1690. He was spy to the duke of Bourbon, near the person of Philip V. of Spain, to whom he was confessor; and when slighted by Fleury, his successor, he published "Memoirs," 8 vols. 8vo. in which he reflected with great severity upon the minister's conduct. He died 1770.

MONTI, Vincent, one of the most celebrated poets of modern Italy, and one of the most versatile of men in his political principles, was born about 1753, at Fusignana, in the duchy of Ferrara. He began by being a violent partisan of the papal government, and enemy of the French; became a republican, and next a panegyrist of Napoleon; and ended by offering his incense to the emperor of Austria. He died in 1828. In his Basvilliana he proves himself no unworthy disciple of Dante. Among his other works are, The Bard of the Black Forest; and the tragedies of Galeotto Manfred, Aristodemus, and Caius Gracchus. One of his last labors was of an unpoetical kind: it consisted in re moulding the Della Crusca Dictionary.

MONTIGNI, Stephen Mignol de, a native of Paris, member of the academy of sciences, and eminent as a mechanic. The memoirs of the academy contain various ingenious communications from him on mechanics, and on mathematics. He introduced into France the manufacture of some stuffs from England, and he improved also the method of printing cottons, of making carpets and of dying thread and stuffs. He died 6th May 1782, aged 68.

MONTLUC, Blaise de, a brave Frenchman, born 1500, in a village near Condour, of a noble family. He first served in the army in Italy, and gradually rose to the rank of marshal of France. He was at the battle of Pavia, 1525, where he was taken prisoner, and afterwards in the expedition to Naples, and he assisted in the brave defence of Marseilles against the attacks of Charles V. He next distinguished himself in Piedmont, and retook Boulogne from the English in 1547, and in 1551 raised the siege of Berne, which was attacked by the Spaniards. He was in 1554 intrusted by Henry II. of France, with the defence of Sienna in Tuscany, which had driven out the Imperial garrison, and implored the assistance of the French; and so determined was his opposition, that for eight months he withstood undaunted the judicious and well-directed attacks of Marignan, and surrendered at last on honorable terms, only after his troops had been obliged to feed upon the flesh of their cats and dogs. Tuscany, Piedmont, and Thionville afterwards witnessed his valor; and during the religious wars which desolated Guienne, he maintained his usual character, and was rewarded with the place of king's lieutenant over the country, for the signal victory which he obtained at Ver in 1562, over the Calvinists. He was wounded in the cheeks at the siege of Rabastens, and so disfigured, that he always afterwards wore a mask to hide his deformity. His meritorious services were rewarded with the rank of marshal in 1574. He died three years after, aged 77, at his seat d'Estillac, in Agenois. He was author of a Memoir of his own Life, written when he was 75, and it was published at Bourdeaux, 1592, in folio, and has often been reprinted.

MONTMAUR, Peter de, Greek professor in the royal college of Paris, was born in the Limousin, and educated among the jesuits, whose society he left to become a druggist at Avignon. He afterwards practised as an advocate, and then turned poet, and became the companion of the great and the opulent, whom he pleased and amused with his wit and jocularity, while he shared the profusion of their tables, to which he was so partial. Though very satirical in his observations, he met with many enemies, who wielded his own weapons against him with vigor and effect. Of those who entertained themselves and the public at his expense, Menage was the keenest, and the most able satirist. Montmaur, who was a polite scholar in Greek and Latin, died 1648, aged 74. The satires written against him were published 1715, by Sallengre, under the title of the History of Montmaur.

MONTMORENCY, Matthew de, constable of France under Louis the Younger, was of one of the most illustrious families of Europe. He married a natural daughter of Henry I. king of England, and for his second wife, the widow of Louis VI. of France. He died 1160. His grandson of the same name, deserved the title of Great by his courage and prudence. He distinguished himself at the battle of Pont-a-Bouvines in 1214, and the following year he fought with such bravery against the Albigenses in Languedoc, that he was made constable of France, and general of the army. He behaved with equal valor at the sieges of Niort, and Rochelle, in 1224, and against the English; and when intrusted by Louis VIII., on his death-bed, with the care of the minority of his infant son, the ninth Louis, he discharged his new duties with all the fidelity and zeal of a good subject, and an honorable man, and protected Blanche the queen mother, against the machinations of some of the insurgent nobles. This brave man died 24th November 1230.

MONTMORENCY, Anne de, of the same family, displayed the valor of his ancestors at the battle of Marignan, and in 1521 bravely defended the town of Mezieres against the forces of Charles V. and obliged his general count Nassau, to raise the siege. He was made marshal of France, and accompanied Francis I. into Italy, where against his advice, the battle of Pavia was fought and lost 1525. He shared the captivity of his master on that fatal day; but though rewarded for his services with the sword of constable of France, he was afterwards disgraced by the court. Restored to favor under Henry II. he took the Boulonnois 1550, and Metz, Toul, and Verdun 1552; but the intrigues of Catherine de Medicis at last drove him from the court. Under Charles IX. he was recalled to head the armies, and after a reconciliation with the Guises, he defeated the Calvinists at Dreux in 1562; but though victorious, he was unfortunately taken prisoner, and the next year set at liberty. He afterwards retook Havre-de-Grace from the English, and he again defeated the Calvinists under Condé, at the battle of St. Denis, 10th November 1567, but was himself slain, after performing prodigies of valor, and receiving eight dreadful wounds. When a cordelier exhorted the dying hero to prepare for his dissolution, he answered fiercely, "what, think you that after living nearly four score years in the field of honor, I know not how to terminate the short quarter of an hour which remains to me of life." He died, aged 74.

MONTMORENCY, Henry de, second son of Anne, distinguished himself at the battle of Dreux, where he took Condé prisoner, and also at the battle of St. Denis. He was made governor of Languedoc, and marshal of France; but when disgraced by the arts of Catherine de Medicis, he retired to Savoy, and made successful war against his country. He was reconciled to Henry IV. and obtained the sword of constable. He died 1st April, 1614. His son Henry, born 1595, was made admiral of France at the age of 18, and he supported the honors of his house by his valor and prudence. He defeated the Calvinists in Languedoc, and obtained another victory by sea, near the Isle of Rhé, which submitted to his arms. He distinguished himself in 1628, against the Huguenots, and afterwards in Piedmont; but puffed up with his conquests, he determined to resist the power of Richelieu, and joining himself to Gaston, the discontented duke of Orleans, he took up arms against his sovereign in Languedoc, where he was governor. The marshals de la Force and Schomberg, were sent to reduce them to obedience, and at the battle of Castle-naudaria, the rebels were defeated, and Montmorency taken prisoner. His former services pleaded loudly in his defence, and the voice of the people was raised for his preservation, but the court was inexorable, and Richelieu put the law into execution. He was beheaded at Toulouse, 30th October, 1632, aged 37. His sister Charlotte Margaret, who married the prince of Condé, is famous for her beauty, which captivated the hoary Henry IV., and exposed him to the ridicule of his courtiers. To avoid the importunities of this aged but powerful lover, her husband removed her to Brussels, from which she returned to France after Henry's death. She died 2d December, 1650, aged 57, four years after the death of her husband. Her son was the great and illustrious Condé.

MONTPENSIER, Anne Marie Louisa d'Orleans duchess de, daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, was born 1627. She inherited boldness, intrigue, and impetuosity from her father, and during the civil wars of La Fronde, she not only embraced the party of the duke of Condé, but she made her adherents fire the cannon of the bastille on the troops of Louis XIV. This rash step against the authority of her sovereign and relation, ruined her hopes, and after in vain aspiring to the hand of an independent prince, and among others of Charles II. of England, she in 1669, married the count de Lauzun. The king, however, who had permitted the union, threw difficulties in the way of the lovers; but after some sacrifices, and the cession of Dombes and Eu, of which she was the sovereign, this disappointed woman was allowed to see her husband. Happiness, however, did not prove her portion. She was violent and jealous, and her husband ungrateful and faithless; and she at last retired from the dreariness of conjugal felicity to obscurity, and the austerities of a convent. She died 1698, aged 66. Her memoirs were published at Amsterdam, 8 vols. 12mo. and are curious. She wrote two romances, and some books of devotion. She was best known by the name of Mademoiselle.

MONTPER, Josse, a painter of the Flemish school, born about 1580. Though he affected a studied negligence in his characters, and was too profuse of yellow colors, his pieces are interesting, and appear to advantage, when viewed at a distance.

MONTPETIT, Arnold Vincent, a native of Macon. After studying at Dijon, he left the profession of the law for painting and mechanics, and in 1759, he discovered the cludoric method of painting, in which water colors were covered with a coat of oil. Some of his horological machines were constructed with great ingenuity, and he not only attempted to improve the wheels of watches, but contributed to the increase of the powers of steam engines. He in 1779 presented a memoir to the academy of sciences on iron bridges, and proposed to the king of France the erection of one, of which the single arch was to be of four hundred feet span. This ingenious man died at Paris, 1800, aged 87.

MONTROSE, James, marquis of, a celebrated hero in the annals of Scotland, who by his genius, valor and perseverance during the civil wars, reduced the kingdom to the king's obedience, but was compelled to abandon his conquest for want of proper support. After the death of Charles I. he served with honor in Germany, and on the landing of Charles II. in Scotland, he sallied forth from his retreat, and night, with a few followers, again have acquired the ascendancy, had he not been defeated by superior forces, and unfortunately betrayed into the hands of his enemies, by the treachery of lord Aston. This heroic chief was now exposed to every indignity of triumphant barbarism. The book which related his exploits was hung in derision around his neck; but he regarded it as an honor, and suffered with the same magnanimity which marked his life. He was hung on a gallows thirty feet high, May 21st, 1650, at Edinburgh, and his quartered remains exposed over the city gates.

MONTUCLA, Joseph de, a native of Lyons, associate of the national institute, and member of the Berlin academy. He studied at Toulouse and Paris, and went as secretary and astronomer to Cayenne, with Turgot, and was appointed, on his return, first commissioner of buildings. Devoting himself to mathematical studies, he had the good fortune to escape through the storms of the revolution, and the wants of his old age were relieved by a liberal pension from Buonaparte. He died at Versailles, 1800, aged 75. He wrote the history of Mathematics, 2 vols. 4to. 1758, a valuable work translated into English—History of the Researches about the Quadrature of the Circle. 12mo.—Collection of pieces on Inoculation.

MOODY, Joshua, minister of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was a native of England, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1658. He was ordained in 1671, and died in Boston, where he had come on account of his health, July 4, 1697, aged 64. We have thought Mr. Moody entitled to remembrance, as one who in America suffered persecution for conscience sake. Owing to some misunderstanding between him and Mr. Cranfield, the governor, an order was issued, requiring the ministers to admit all persons of suitable years, and not vicious, to the Lord's supper from the first day of January, 1684, under the penalty of the statutes of uniformity. Cranfield signified to Mr. Moody his intention of partaking the supper at his church, and requiring him to administer it, according to the liturgy. Mr.

Moody refused to admit him to his communion, or to conform to the liturgy. A prosecution was immediately commenced against Moody, and he was sentenced to six months imprisonment. He was released before the expiration of the term, upon a strict charge to preach no more within the province. He was employed for some time as an assistant minister of the first church in Boston. It is to be recorded to his honor, that he was one of the few, who understood, and exerted all his power and influence to oppose the witchcraft delusion.

MOODY, Paul, a celebrated mechanic, was born in Essex county, Massachusetts, about the year 1780, and was for some time in the employment of Jacob Perkins, of Newburyport. He was the head mechanic of the manufacturing establishments at Waltham, and subsequently of the great manufactories at Lowell, where he died suddenly, July, 1831.

MOORE, Philip, rector of Kirkbridge, and minister of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, was the chaplain, friend, and companion of the pious bishop Wilson, whose funeral sermon he preached. He superintended the revision of the translation of the bible into Manks, and other theological works. He was in his character a most exemplary and amiable man, and he died 22d January 1783, aged 78, universally regretted.

MOORE, sir Jonas, an able mathematician, born at Whitley, Yorkshire, 1620. He was noticed and patronized by Charles I., and during the civil wars he taught mathematics. At the restoration, Charles II. made him surveyor-general of the ordnance, and by his influence and interest with the monarch, he obtained the foundation of a mathematical school at Christ's hospital, and the appropriation of Flammstead house for an observatory. He wrote Arithmetic, in 2 books—Mathematical Compendium—General Treatise on Artillery, and a system of Mathematical Education, for the Hospital, published after his death, 1681, in 4to.

MOORE, John, M.D. son of a Scotch clergyman, was born at Stirling, 1730, and educated at Glasgow, where he studied medicine. He went in 1747 with the English army in Flanders as surgeon's mate, and after the peace, he came to London to improve himself in medical knowledge. He afterwards passed to Paris, where the English ambassador, lord Albemarle, engaged him as surgeon to his household. He next settled at Glasgow, as partner with Dr. Gordon, but in 1773, he travelled abroad for five years, as tutor to the young duke of Hamilton and his brother. On his return he settled in London, and published in 1779, his View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany, 2 vols. 8vo. which was received with universal approbation, and encouraged him to publish, two years after, Views of Society and Manners in Italy. His Medical Sketches, in 8vo. 1785, possessed merit, but were said to give offence to the medical world, because they betrayed some of the secrets of the profession. In 1792, Dr. Moore accompanied lord Lauderdale to Paris, and was an eye witness to some of the atrocious scenes which so much disgraced the French revolution, of which he published an account in 2 vols. 8vo. 1795, with a map to show the situation of the armies of Prussia, and those of France, under Dumourier. Dr. Moore died in London, 1802, highly respected as a man of letters, and of general information. Besides the above works, Dr. Moore published Zeluco, a novel, 2 vols. 8vo., a work of merit, and abounding with interesting scenes, but of which the principal character is so flagitious, as to raise in the reader sentiments of terror, rather than attention or amusement. His Edward, intended as a contrast to Zeluco, appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1796, but it does not excite equal interest. Mordant was published in 1800, 2 vols. 8vo., and contains pleasing sketches of life, characters, and manners, in various countries, and deserves to be read for its favorable views of virtue, and for the instruction which it imparts.

MOORE, John, D.D. archbishop of Canterbury, was son of a grazier at Gloucester. From the grammar school of that town, he entered at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and from which he was recommended to the duke of Marlborough, as tutor to his sons. In this employment, Dr. Moore conducted himself with great propriety and zealous activity, and he was rewarded for his attentive services by a prebendal stall at Durham, and in 1771, was made dean of Canterbury, and in 1776, raised to the see of Bangor. On the death of Cornwallis, 1783, he was recommended to the king by bishops Lowth and Hurd, who declined the honor, as the most proper person to succeed on the archiepiscopal throne of Canterbury, and he did honor to the appointment, as his authority was never exerted to excite dissatisfaction in the minds either of the friends, or of the enemies of the church establishment. He died 18th January, 1805, aged 74.

MOORE, James, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Blake in 1700, and continued in office until sir Nathaniel Johnson assumed it in 1703. The provocations of the Spaniards induced governor Moore in 1702, to propose to the assembly an expedition against St. Augustine. The measure was adopted, but proved unsuccessful, and entailed a heavy burden on the colony. To answer the public exigence on this occasion, the first paper money was issued in South Carolina, under the name of bills of credit. In 1719, when the revolution took place, and governor Robert Johnson was deposed, colonel Moore, who had early and zealously espoused the cause of the people, was chosen governor. He was well qualified by his prudence and enterprise for the crisis, and when the transfer of the government to the king was effected, and general Nicholson was placed at the head of the government, colonel Moore was elected speaker of the assembly, and continued to be rechosen until 1725.

MOORE, sir Henry, governor of New-York, was appointed in 1765, and arrived in the colony in November following. He had previously been governor of Jamaica, to which office he was appointed in 1756. He was like many of his predecessors, only nominally a governor. Colden, the lieutenant-governor continued to do the business, and enjoy the power, in its most essential branches. He was gay, good natured, and well bred, affable and courteous in a high degree, and a favorite with the people. He continued governor until his death, September 11th, 1769, aged 56.

MOORE, sir John, was born at Glasgow, in the year 1761. At the age of fifteen, he obtained an ensigncy in the fifty-first regiment of foot; of which, in 1790, he became lieutenant-colonel, and served with his corps in Corsica, where he was wounded in storming the Mozallo fort, at the siege of Calvi. In 1796, he went out as brigadier-general to the West Indies, under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who appointed him to the government of St. Lucia, in the capture of which he had a principal share. On his return home, in 1797, he was employed in Ireland during the rebellion, and was raised to the rank of major-general. In 1799, he went on the expedition to Holland, where he was again wounded severely; notwithstanding which, he soon afterwards went to the Mediterranean; and at the battle of Alexandria, received a cut from a sabre on the breast, and a shot in the thigh. On his return to England, he was made a knight of the Bath; and in 1808, was appointed to command an army in Spain, where, after a signal retreat before a superior force, he fell under the walls of Corunna, January 16th, 1809.

MOORE, Benjamin, D.D., bishop of the diocese of New-York. He was educated at King's—now Columbia college, in the city of New York; of which he was president from 1801, to 1811. He published several occasional sermons; and since his death, two volumes of his sermons have been published, which evince talents of no inferior character, and a devotion to the great duties of his profession, which cannot be too much admired. Bishop Moore died in 1816, aged sixty-seven years.

MOORE, Zephaniah Swift, D.D., graduated at Dartmouth college, in 1793. He was settled in the ministry at Leicester, from 1793 till 1811, when he accepted the appointment of professor of languages in Dartmouth college. In 1815, he was made president of Williams college. Having made an ineffectual attempt to change the location of the college, he resigned his office, and accepted the presidency of Amherst college, in 1821. He died 1823, aged 52. He published a sermon preached at Mr. Cotton's ordination, 1811; and election sermon, 1818.

MORAND, Sauveur Francais, a native of Paris, who came in 1729 to England, to study surgery under the well known Cheselden. His reputation procured him the place of surgeon-major to the French guards, and of director to the academy of surgeons, with the ribband of the order of St. Michael. He wrote a Treatise on the Operation for the Stone—a Discourse on the Necessity of Learning in the Surgical Profession—Eloge on Marechal—Experiments on the Stone—Miscellanies, 2 vols. 4to. He was made member of the Royal society, London, and of the academy of sciences at Paris, and died 1773, aged 76.

MORANDE, N. Thevenot de, a French writer. After being for some time in the military profession, and then escaping from the prison of Armentieres, where his extravagance and dissipation had confined him, he came to England, and procured money by his libel on the French court, called Le Gazetier Cuirassé. His intended publication against Mad. du Barry was purchased for a handsome sum, and the Courier de Londres was then undertaken, and gained the public favor by the satirical reflections which it contained. At the revolution this unprincipled libeller returned to Paris, and was one of those who were massacred in September 1792. He was concerned in some other periodical works.

MORANT, Philip, was born in the isle of Jersey, 6th October 1700, and educated at Abingdon school, and Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was chaplain to the English church, Amsterdam, and afterwards obtained some livings in Essex, the last of which was Aldham, 1745. He was in 1768, appointed to prepare for the press a copy of the rolls of parliament, the completion of which was unfortunately prevented by his death, 23d November 1770, occasioned by a cold, caught on the river as he passed from the Temple to Vauxhall. This work was afterwards finished by Th. Astle, esq. who married his daughter. Morant wrote an History of Colchester, 1748, of which two hundred copies only were printed—Beausobre's Introduction to the New Testament, translated—a Summary of the History of England—Geographia Antiqua & Nova, from Dufresnoy—the History of Essex—the Life of Edward the Confessor—150 sermons—those lives in the Biographia Britannica, marked C. and other works.

MORATA, Olympia Fulvia, a learned Italian lady, born at Ferrara, 1526. Her father, who taught belles lettres in some of the universities of Italy, saw and improved her natural talents, and she made such progress that she was called to be the companion and instructress of the duchess of Ferrara, in polite literature, and she declaimed in Latin, and spoke Greek to the astonishment of her auditors. She soon after left the court, and married a young German physician, called Grunthler, whom she followed, 1548, to Schweinfurt, in Franconia. The siege and the burning of this town, soon after, left her and her husband in great distress; they escaped with difficulty to Heidelberg, where Grunthler became professor of physic; but the hardships they had endured were too great for Morata's constitution. She sunk under them, and died 1555, and was soon after followed to the grave by her husband, and brother, who had come with her to Germany. She died a protestant. The greater part of her works perished at Schweinfurt; but some of her orations, dialogues, letters, and translations, appeared at Basil, 1562, 8vo.

MORATIN, Nicholas Ferdinand, a Spanish poet and dramatist, who was a barrister, and died in 1780, endeavored to assimilate the Spanish comic theatre to the strict rules of the French. He wrote three tragedies; a comedy; Diana, or the Art of Hunting; and other poems.

MORATIN, Leander Ferdinand, son of the foregoing, a Spanish dramatist, who is called the Molière of Spain, was born, about 1760, at Madrid; was obliged to quit his native country in consequence of having been a partisan of Joseph Buonaparte; and died at Paris, in 1828. He wrote several comedies; and, as a theatrical writer, is superior to his father.

MORDAUNT, Charles, earl of Peterborough, born 1658, succeeded his father John lord Mordaunt, 1675. He early distinguished himself in the naval service, especially in the African expedition under lord Plymouth, to the relief of Tangier, besieged by the Moors. He was afterwards in Holland, and attended William III. when he invaded England, and for his services he was created, in 1689, earl of Monmouth, sworn of the privy council, and made first commissioner of the treasury, which office, however, he retained only one year. In 1697 he succeeded his uncle as earl of Peterborough, and under queen Anne was appointed commander of the forces sent against Spain. In this expedition he acquired great renown. He took Barcelona with a handful of men, and not only gained possession of Catalonia, Valencia, Arragon, and other provinces, but with an inferior force, drove out of Spain the duke of Anjou and the French army. Though these extraordinary successes, which resemble romance rather than history, did not effectually establish Charles III. on the Spanish throne, yet Peterborough was deservedly honored abroad and at home. He was afterwards employed as ambassador to Sicily, and to negotiate with some Italian princes; and in 1714 he was made governor of Minorca, and under George I. general of all the marine forces of Great Britain. This great man died in his passage to Lisbon, 25th October 1735, aged 77. To bravery and heroism he added a penetrating genius, and a mind highly polished, and well instructed in ancient and modern literature, as his "Familiar Epistles," preserved among those of his friend Pope, fully evince.

MORE, sir Thomas, chancellor of England, was son of sir John More, one of the judges of the king's bench, and was born in London, 1480. From a free school in London he passed into the household of cardinal Morton, and in 1497 entered at Canterbury college, Oxford. After two years' residence he was admitted at New Inn, London, and afterwards at Lincoln's Inn, where he studied the law with great attention. When of age he was elected member of parliament, and distinguished himself in 1503 by an opposition to a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. with such eloquence, that the house refused the application. This conduct was so resented by the king, that young More was marked for persecution by the court, and his father was imprisoned in the tower till he paid a fine of 100*l*. The death of Henry freed him from further persecution, and he now became law reader at Furnival's inn, and upon being called to the bench, he was appointed in 1508, judge of the sheriff's court in London, an honorable and lucrative office. Though much engaged in his profession, he devoted some time to literature, and wrote his Utopia in 1516. He also held a correspondence with other learned men, especially Erasmus, who came to England to visit him. His celebrity for learning and abilities was now so firmly established, that he was introduced by Wolsey to Henry VIII. who made him master of requests, and soon after knighted him, and appointed him privy counsellor. In 1520, he was made treasurer of the exchequer, and gained so much of the king's attention and confidence that he assisted him in his attack upon Luther in defence of the seven sacraments. He was in 1523, chosen Speaker of the house of commons, and supported his office with such dignity, that he prevailed on the house to reject an oppressive subsidy proposed by Wolsey. This offended the favorite, and was reported to the king; but the abilities of More were too respectable to be despised, and in 1527, he was sent as joint ambassador with other lords to France, and afterwards to Cambrai, and in 1530, on Wolsey's disgrace, he was intrusted with the great seal. This elevation, it seems, was intended to gain him over to the opinion of the king, who wished to divorce the queen; but the diligence, fidelity, and integrity which he displayed in this new office, proved how well he deserved the royal confidence. Afraid, however, of the storm which hung over his head, because he resisted the king's iniquitous measures, he resigned his new dignity in 1533, and determined to live the rest of life in retirement at Chelsea. He found, nevertheless, the emissaries of the court intent to injure him, and after various fruitless accusations, he exposed himself to the royal displeasure by refusing, in 1534, to take the oath of supremacy. He was, upon this, arrested and sent a prisoner to the tower, but in this season of danger his friends stepped forward, and among them Cranmer, and by every argument of prudence, reason, and interest, they exhorted him to acknowledge the king's supremacy. So great, however, was his attachment to Rome, that he refused, though death was the consequence, and, therefore, rather than abjure what he considered as the test of his faith, he suffered himself to be tried and condemned as a traitor. He was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his head to be fixed on London bridge; but the ignominious punishment was changed by the king into beheading, and he suffered on Tower-hill, 5th July, 1535, showing, even in his last moments, resignation, and that innocent mirth and pleasantry which had in happier days adorned his conversation. Besides the Utopia, a kind of romance in which he gives an account of a country, said to be discovered by the companions of Americus, with an artful insertion of his own political opinions, sir Thomas More wrote in part an History of Richard III.—some polemical works, and other things in Latin as well as in English. The English works were published by order of queen Mary, 1557, and the Latin at Basil and Louvain, 1568 and 1566. The Utopia was translated into English by Dr. Burnet.

MORE, Henry, D.D., an able divine, born 12th October, 1614. As his parents were Calvinists, he was strictly educated in their principles, but, much against their wishes, he rejected those rigid tenets, and after being three years at Eton, he entered at Christ college, Cambridge, and assiduously applied himself to the study of Aristotle, and other more modern philosophers. These pursuits, however, yielded not the mental satisfaction which he expected, he left philosophy for platonic writers, and found in the "Theologica Germanica" of Tauleus, the instruction and information which formerly proved so agreeable to the celebrated Luther. In 1639 he was made fellow of his college, and afterwards became tutor to some persons of distinction, and among them, to sir John Finch, and his sister lady Conway, a woman whose powers of mind were of a singular cast, and at last brought her to quakerism. By means of these powerful friends he obtained, in 1675, a prebend at Gloucester, which he soon after resigned in favor of his friend Dr. Fowler, and satisfied with a small, but independent competence, he declined the offers of high preferment at home and in Ireland, which he might have obtained. After thus devoting himself to laborious study, and the writing of books, he died 1st September, 1687, aged 73, and was buried in the chapel of his college. His Mystery of Godliness—Mystery of Iniquity—Philosophical Collections, and other works, were at one time in high reputation, and were collected and published together in 1679, in three large folio volumes.

MORE, Alexander a protestant divine, born 1616, at Castres, Languedoc, where his father, a native of Scotland, was principal of the college. He studied at Geneva, and obtained there the Greek professorship, and three years after, the divinity chair in the room of Spanheim. As he was a very eloquent and popular preacher, and consequently envied by his associates at Geneva, he in 1649 became divinity professor at Middleburg, and afterwards removed to Amsterdam, and thence to Paris, where he was appointed minister of the reformed church. He died at Paris, September 1670. Though great as a preacher, his private character has been severely censured, and he has been accused not only of irregularity in his morals, but of inconsistency in his faith. He published "De Gratia," and *Libero Arbitrio—De Scripturâ Sacrâ—*a Reply to Milton's Second Defence of the people of England—Orations and poems in Latin.

MORE, John, D.D. a learned prelate, born at Harborough, Leicestershire, and educated at Clare hall, Cambridge. He was patronised by the chancellor, lord Nottingham, and was made bishop of Norwich, 1691, and translated to Ely, 1707. He died July 31st, 1714. His sermons were published by his chaplain, Dr. Samuel Clark, and his valuable library purchased for 6000 guineas, by George II. and presented to the university of Cambridge.

MORE or MOORE, James, an English writer, educated at Worcester college, Oxford. He wrote the "Rival Modes," a comedy condemned in the acting, but yet submitted to the public in 1727. He was the friend of the duke of Wharton, and joined him in writing a sarcastic periodical paper, called "The Inquisitor." He quarrelled with Pope, and in consequence, was made one of the heroes of the Dunciad. He was a polite writer, the companion of the great, but imprudent in his conduct, and too fond of being called a man of wit. He died at Whister, near Isleworth, 1734.

MORE, Hannah, a deservedly celebrated English lady, who was born in 1744, and died September 7, 1833. She was one of the five daughters of a village school master, whose means were not sufficient to give his children many of the advantages of education; but this deficiency was supplied by their own talents and perseverance. The literary abilities of Hannah early attracted notice, and a subscription was formed for establishing her and her sisters in a school of their own. When only 18 years of age, the subject of this notice wrote the "Search after Happiness, a pastoral drama." By the encouragement of Mr. Garrick, she tried her strength in tragic composition, and wrote "The Inflexible Captive, a Tragedy," which was printed in 1764. Her tragedy of "Percy," the most popular of her dramatic compositions, was brought out in 1778, and ran fourteen nights successively; and her last tragedy, the "Fatal Falsehood," was produced in 1779. Shortly after, her opinions on public theatres underwent a change, and, as she has stated in the preface to the third volume of her works, "she did not consider the stage, in its present state, as becoming the appearance or countenance of a Christian."—Early in life, she attracted general notice, by a brilliant display of literary talent, and was honored by the intimate acquaintance of Johnson and Burke, of Reynolds and Garrick, and of many other highly eminent individuals, who equally appreciated her amiable qualities, and her superior intellect. Subsequently she devoted herself to a life of active Christian benevolence, and to the composition of various works, having for their object the religious improvement of mankind. Her first prose publication was "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great," printed in 1788; followed in 1791, by her "Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World." In 1795, she commenced in monthly numbers, "The Cheap Repository," a series of admirable tales for common people, one of which is the well known "Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." The success of this seasonable publication was extraordinary; and within a year the sale reached the number of one million copies. Her "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education," appeared in 1790; Hints towards "Forming the Character of a Young Princess," in 1805; "Celebs in Search of a Wife," in 1809; "Practical Piety," in 1811; "Christian Morals" in 1812; "Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul," in 1815; and "Moral Sketches of the Prevailing Opinions and Manners, Foreign and Domestic, with Reflections on Prayer." The collection of her works comprises eleven volumes 8vo.—She is said to have realized upwards of £30,000 by her writings; and her charitable bequests exceeded £10,000. She was never married.

MOREAU, James, a French physician, the friend and disciple of Guy Patin, was born at Chalons sur Saone, 1647. He wrote Consultations on Rheumatism—a Treatise on the Knowledge of Continual Fevers—a Dissertation on the Dropsy, &c. and excited the envy of other practitioners by the boldness of his writings. He died 1729.

MOREAU, Jacob Nicholas, historiographer of France, librarian to the queen, censor royal, and counsellor of the court of aids, was born at St. Florentine. He wrote Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Carouacas, 12mo.—Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de notre Temps, 2 vols. 12mo.—Observateur Hollandois—Principes de Morale, de Politique, & de Droit Publique, ou Discours sur l'Histoire de France, 2 vols. 8vo. This able writer suffered on the scaffold, 27th March, 1794, aged 77.

MOREAU, John Victor, one of the most celebrated of modern French generals, was born in 1763, at Morlaix, and was brought up to the bar. The army, however, was the profession of his choice, and he entered a regiment before he was eighteen, but was taken from it by his father. The revolution enabled him to gratify his wishes, and he made his first campaign under Dumourier, in 1792. He gained the rank of brigadier-general in 1793, and that of general of division in 1794. In the latter year he commanded the right wing of Pichegru's army, and obtained great successes in the Netherlands. In 1796, he was placed at the head of the army of the Rhine. In that year he distinguished himself by penetrating into Bavaria, and by his masterly retreat before a superior force; in 1797, by his passage of the Rhine; and in 1800, by his campaign in Germany, crowned by the decisive victory of Hohenlinden. Having engaged with Pichegru, Georges, and other royalists, in a plot against the consular government, he was brought to trial in 1804, and sentenced to two years imprisonment, but was allowed to retire to North America. There he remained till 1813, when he was prevailed upon to join the allied sovereigns, and appear in arms against his country. He was, however, mortally wounded at the battle of Dresden, and died on the 1st of September, 1813.

MOREL, the name of some learned and ingenious printers in France. William was professor of Greek, and director of the king's printing house, Paris, and died 1674. Frederick was also professor of Greek and Latin, and king's printer, and died 1583. His son Frederick was also a printer, and the authors he printed prove him to have been a very learned man. He died 1630, aged 78. His descendants followed his steps, as distinguished in literature, and as elegant printers.

MOREL, Andrew, an eminent antiquary, born at Berne in Switzerland. He was a diligent and curious collector of medals, and in 1683, published at Paris, in 8vo. his "Specimen Universæ Rei Nummarie Antiquæ," in which he promised to give an account of twenty thousand medals exactly designed. He was placed in the cabinet of antiques at Paris by Louis XIV. but in consequence of some imprudent speech, he was sent to the bastille by the minister Louvois, and after three years' confinement, was with difficulty liberated. He afterwards went to Arnstadt, in Germany, where he was employed as antiquary at the court of Schwartzburg. He died there, of an apoplexy, 10th April, 1703. His "Thesaurus Morellianus," in which he gave an account of three thousand five hundred and thirty-nine medals, was part of his great work, and was published 1734, by Havercamp, 2 vols. folio.

MORELL, Thomas, D.D. an able divine, known as the editor of Ainsworth's Dictionary, and of Hederic's Lexicon. He wrote also Annotations on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and assisted Hogarth in the completing of his Analysis of Beauty, and selected the passages of scripture for Handel's oratorios. He died 1734, aged 83.

MORELY, lord, son of sir Thomas Parker, of Hallingbury, Essex, was a great favorite with Henry VIII. by whom he was raised to the peerage. He signed, with other peers, the letter to the pope, in favor of the divorce of Catherine of Arragon, and this more firmly secured the kindness of his master. He spent the last part of his life in retirement, and was author of some Latin poems. He died 1547.

MORERI, Lewis, D.D. the learned author of the great historical dictionary, was born at Barmont, in Provence, 1643. He studied at Draguignan, under the jesuits, and at Lyons, and after publishing some inferior things, undertook his great work, the first edition of which appeared at Lyons, 1674. This valuable book soon spread his reputation, and gained him friends; he was patronised by the bishop of Apt, and by De Pomponne, secretary of state, and might have obtained distinguished preferment, had his health permitted it. His great application, however, ruined his constitution, and he died July 10th, 1680, at the early age of 37. The second edition of his dictionary appeared soon after his death, 1681, 2 vols. and few alterations took place in the third, fourth, and fifth. The sixth was improved by Le Clerc, and the book received no alterations till the eleventh, which was corrected by Bayle. The 13th, in 5 vols. folio, was improved by Du Pin. The best editions are those of 1749 and 1759, enlarged to 10 vols. folio.

MORES, Edward Rowe, an able antiquary, born 13th January 1730, at Tunstall, in Kent, where his father was rector. He was educated at Merchant Taylor's school, and Queen's college, Oxford, where in 1748, he published an ancient fragment, called "Nomina & Insignia Gentilitia Nobilium Equitumque sub Edwardo Primo Rege Militantium," and also a new 8vo. edition of Dionysius' treatise, De Claris Rhetoribus. In 1752, he was elected fellow of the antiquarian society, and about this time spent much labor in making collections relative to the antiquities of Oxford, and especially of his own college, and All-Souls, and also Godstow nunnery. Though he was whimsical in his religious notions, and affected to follow the tenets of Erasmus, it is certain that he took deacon's orders; but it was said, that it was with the intention of escaping civil offices. He was the original promoter of the equitable society for assurance on lives and survivorship, of which he was nominated perpetual director, with an annuity of 100*l*. In the latter part of life he lost the industry and steadiness of his younger years, and sunk into indolence and dissipation, which at last occasioned a mortification, of which he died at his house at Low Layton, 28th November 1778, in his 49th year. The History of the Antiquities of Tunstall, in Kent, with plates, was the only work which he left completed for the press. He published a Dissertation on Typographical Founders and Foundries, of which only 80 copies were printed.

MORETO Y CABANA, Augustin, a Spanish dramatic poet of the seventeenth century, a contemporary of Calderon, was patronised by Philip IV. and entered into the ecclesiastical state on ceasing to write for the stage. He wrote thirty-six comedies; from two of which Moliere borrowed hints for his Princess of Elis and School for Husbands.

MORGAGNI, John Baptist, an eminent anatomist, born at Forli, in Italy, 1682. He studied at Bologna, where his abilities were displayed with such success, that he was early placed in the medical chair. He was afterwards appointed by the senate of Venice, to a professorship at Padua, and was enrolled by the royal societies of London and Paris among their members. He died 1771, much respected. He published Adversaria Anatomica—Nova Institutionum Medicarum Idea—De Sedibus & Causis Morborum per Anatomiam Indigatis—Epistolæ Anatomicae. His works were published together 1765, in 5 volumes.

MORGAN, William, a native of Wales, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards vicar of Welsh-pool, and in 1595, raised to the see of Landaff, and in 1601 translated to St. Asaph, where he died 1604. He was a learned prelate, and zealously employed in completing the translation of the bible into Welsh, which appeared in 1588.

MORGAN, George Cadogan, a native of Bridgend, Glamorganshire, educated under his uncle Dr. Price. He became teacher of a dissenting congregation at Norwich, and died 1798. He wrote Lectures on Electricity—Observations on the Light of Bodies in a state of Combustion.

MORGAN, John, M.D. F.R.S., a physician, was a native of Pennsylvania. He served with the provincial troops in the French war in the double capacity of lieutenant and surgeon. In 1760 he went to Europe for the purpose of completing his medical education. On being admitted to the degree of doctor of medicine, he published a thesis upon the formation of pus. He returned to America in 1765, and was immediately elected professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the college at Philadelphia. He soon disclosed a plan of his own, for connecting a medical school with the college, which was accepted, and in 1769, five candidates were admitted to the first medical degrees conferred in America. He was also instrumental in establishing the American philosophical society. He undertook a voyage to Jamaica in 1773 to solicit subscriptions for the benefit of the college. In 1775 he received from congress the appointment of director-general, and physician in chief to the hospital of the American army. In 1777 he was removed from office. He afterwards obtained a hearing before a committee of congress, appointed at his own request, and was honorably acquitted of all the charges preferred against him. He died 1789, aged 52. He published tentamen medicum de puris confectione, 1763; a discourse upon the institution of medical schools in America, 1765; four dissertations on the reciprocal advantages of a perpetual union between Great Britain, and her American colonies, 1766; a recommendation of inoculation, 1776; a vindication of his public character in the station of director-general.

MORGAN, Daniel, brigadier-general, was a native of New Jersey. In June 1775, he was appointed a captain by the American congress, and directed to raise a company of riflemen, and march them to the camp at Cambridge; he succeeded in enlisting ninety-six men, and having them at their place of destination in the short period of twenty-one days. In September he was detached on the expedition against Quebec; the result of this expedition is a matter of history, and Morgan was one among the prisoners. He was exchanged, and appointed to the command of a regiment. He was with general Gates at the capture of Burgoyne. He served in the southern campaign, and received from congress a gold medal, for the admirable skill and bravery he displayed in the defeat of Tarleton, at the battle of the Cowpens January 17, 1781, taking upwards of five hundred prisoners. In 1794 he commanded the militia of Virginia, ordered out by president Washington, for the purpose of suppressing the Whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania. He was elected a member of congress. He died 1802, aged 69. In 1799, he published an address to his constituents, vindicating the administration of Mr. Adams.

MORGUES, Matthew de, sieur de St. Germain, preacher to Louis XIII. and almoner to Mary de Medicis, was born at Vellai, in Languedoc, 1532.

He entered among the jesuits, but soon relinquished their society, and acquired universal reputation by his preaching. Upon the disgrace of Mary de Medicis he made his escape, as he had drawn upon himself the resentment of cardinal Richelieu, by the severity of his reflections upon his conduct and ministry. After the cardinal's death he returned to Paris, where he died 1670, aged 89. He wrote an "History of Louis the Just," besides a vindication of the queen-mother against the malevolent insinuations of Richelieu.

MORHOFF, Daniel George, a learned German, born at Wismar, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, 6th Feb. 1639. He studied at Stettin and Rostock, and visited Holland and Oxford, and in 1665 was invited by the duke of Holstein to become professor of poetry, eloquence and history, and librarian in the university of Kiel. He died 1691. His principal works are Polyhistor, sive de Notitiâ Auctorum & Rerum, 2 vols. 4to.—Dissertationes, 4to.—Orationes—besides Princeps Medicus, 4to. in which he spoke of the pretensions of the kings of England and France, to cure the king's evil—and a translation of his learned friend Boyle's philosophical works into Latin.

MORICE, sir William, a learned Englishman, raised through the influence of his friend and kinsman, general Monk, to the office of secretary of state, for which he was not fully qualified, as unacquainted with foreign affairs. He held it, however, for seven years, and without reproach, and resigned in 1668. He died Dec. 12th, 1676. He wrote the "Common Right of the Lord's Supper asserted," printed 1651, 4to. and 1660, folio.

MORIN, John Baptist, a French physician, born at Villefranche, in Beaujolois, 1583. He studied philosophy at Aix, and physic at Avignon, where he took his doctor's degree, and then came to Paris. He began in 1617, to apply himself to astrology, and lived in the retinue of several dignitaries, where the accidental fulfilment of some of his prophecies gave him great celebrity. In 1630 he was chosen professor royal of mathematics, and so well established was his astrological reputation, that he was consulted by the cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, and liberally rewarded for his calculation of the influence of the stars. He was also consulted in the affairs of Louis XIII. and as in examining the monarch's horoscope, he had the good luck to foretell that his approaching illness would be severe, but not fatal, he was very royally rewarded. He died at Paris, 6th Nov. 1656.

MORIN, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Blois, 1591. He studied at Rochelle and Leyden, and afterwards settled at Paris, where by the conversation of cardinal du Perron, he was converted from the protestant to the catholic faith. He then was admitted into the congregation of the oratory, and distinguished himself by his writings. He resided for nine years at Rome, where he was much courted by the pope and cardinals, and then was recalled by Richelieu to France. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 1659. His works are very numerous, but the best known are, Exercitations on the Samaritan Pentateuch—an edition of the Septuagint—an History of the Deliverance of the Church by Constantine.

MORIN, Stephen, a protestant divine, born at Caen, 1st Jan. 1625. He studied at Caen, and afterwards at Sedan, under du Moulin, and Rivet, and after acquiring a very extensive knowledge of classical and oriental literature, he returned to his native place, and married. In 1664 he was made minister of Caen, and at the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, he retired to Holland, and fixed first at Leyden, and then at Amsterdam, where he became professor of oriental languages. He died May 5th, 1700. His Latin Dissertations on various subjects of Criticism and Antiquity, were highly esteemed, the best edition of which is that of Dordt, 1700, 8vo.

MORIN, Peter, a learned critic, born at Paris 1531. He was for some years in the printing office of Paul Manutius, at Venice, and was afterwards employed by Gregory XIII. and Sextus V. to superintend the editions of the Septuagint, and of the Vulgate. He wrote a Collection of General Councils, and several learned works besides. He died at Rome 1608.

MORISON, Robert, a physician, born at Aberdeen, 1620. He studied in his native university, and took his master's degree; but the civil wars disturbed his pursuits, and after he had distinguished himself for his loyalty and bravery, especially in a battle on Aberdeen bridge, between the people of the town and the republican forces, where he was wounded in the head, he retired to France, in expectation of better times. At Paris he applied himself to botany and anatomy, and took his degree of M.D. at Angers, 1648, and obtained, two years after, the care of the royal gardens at Blois. At the restoration he followed Charles II. to England, and was made physician to the royal family, professor royal of botany, and afterwards was elected botanical professor at Oxford. He was unfortunately bruised by the pole of a coach, as he crossed the street near Charing-cross, and died the day after, 1683, aged sixty-three. He published 1669, Prælium Botanicum, 2 vols. 8vo.—Plantarum Umbelliferarum Distributio, folio—Historia Plantarum, folio, a valuable work, which he left incomplete. It was finished by Jacob Bobart.

MORLAND, Samuel, an eminent statesman, born in Berkshire. He was under-secretary to Thurloe, and his abilities were employed by Cromwell in embassies to Geneva, Savoy, and other states. In 1660 he waited on Charles II. at Breda, and so recommended himself by his extensive knowledge and faithful services, that he was created a baronet. He published Urim of Conscience, 8vo. 1695. The time of his death is not mentioned.

MORLAND, George, an eminent painter, born in London. His father was an able artist, and the son, being early employed in making drawings, acquired great ease and expedition. These essential advantages were aided by strong powers of genius; but the celebrity which these promising talents might have ensured, was prevented by vicious habits, and an unconquerable propensity for low and dissipated society. In proportion as his abilities expanded, and his pieces commanded the public esteem, his foibles increased, and his wants became more urgent. While the employment of his pencil in hours of sobriety and retirement, might have procured independence and general esteem, the efforts of his genius were never or seldom called forth but to extricate him from the grasp of persecuting creditors, the riotous company of a spunging house, or the horrors of a prison. Thus ever poor and ever exposed to the filthy temptations of an alehouse, or an intemperate party, he produced no historical piece, truly sublime for grandeur of conception, or vastness of execution. The scenes of rural and domestic life, indeed, received from his hand the most finished and captivating charms; and his farms, horses, rural views, shepherds, fishermen, smugglers on the sea-coast, dogs, and pigs, were delineated with the most striking and the happiest effect. This singular genius, whose pieces were generally the effect of accident, and fell into the hands of those who induced him to work with the selfish view of profiting by his extravagance, died in a spunging house, 1304, aged 40, leaving a wife, who survived him but two days. His life has been written, and a curious account of all his pieces given by Mr. Hassell, 1306.

MORLEY, George, a learned bishop, born in Cheapside, London, 1597. He was educated at Westminster school, and made student of Christ-church, 1615. He was afterwards chaplain in lord Carnarvon's family, and to Charles I. who gave him a canonry of Christ-church, 1641. Though chosen one of the assembly of divines, he adhered firmly to the interests of his master, and assisted him at the treaty of Newport, in the isle of Wight. After being imprisoned for some little time for loyalty, he left England, 1649, and officiated as minister to his fugitive countrymen at the Hague, Antwerp, and Breda. At the restoration, his zeal in the royal cause was not forgotten; he was restored to his canonry, 1660, made dean of Christ-church, and nominated to the see of Worcester the same year, and in 1662 translated to Winchester. By temperance he reached a good old age, and died in October 1684. He wrote some religious tracts, in 1 volume 4to. besides sermons and various other treatises.

MORLIERE, James Augustus de la, a native of Grenoble, who acquired some celebrity by his romances, the best of which is his Angola, 2 vols. 12mo. He wrote also Mirza-Nadir, 4 vols. 12mo.—some comedies, and other things, which obtained a temporary fame. He died at Paris 1785.

MORNAY, Philip de, lord of Plessis Marly, an illustrious nobleman, born at Buhi in Vexin, 1549. He was carefully educated by his mother in the protestant faith, and afterwards served in the army during the civil commotions of the times, but soon quitted the military life for literary pursuits. He passed to Geneva, and through Switzerland went to Heidelberg in Germany, where he applied himself to the civil law. He afterwards visited the most remarkable places of Italy, Germany, and Flanders, and also came to England, where Elizabeth received him with cordiality and interest. In 1576 he went to the court of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, by whom he was kindly treated, and made counsellor of state. He greatly distinguished himself by his abilities and negotiations in the king's service; but when he saw him inclined to become a convert to the catholic tenets, he gradually withdrew from the court to devote himself to literature. He had been made governor of Saumur by his master, but he was deprived of the office by Louis XIII. in 1621, and died at his seat of la Forest, near Poicteau, 1623. Du Plessis was an extraordinary character; though the heir of rank, dignity and opulence, he cultivated literature with taste and success; and in an age when religious opinions were guided by interest, and altered by political connections, he remained a protestant, firm and unshaken in his principles, virtuous in his conduct, and respected even by his enemies. His publications are numerous and valuable. The best known are a treatise on the Church, 1578—upon the Truth of the Christian Religion, begun 1579—upon the Eucharist, 1598, a celebrated treatise, which procured an interview between him and cardinal du Perron, and which obtained for him among the protestants, the title of protestant pope—the Mystery of Iniquity, or the History of Papacy, 1607—an Exhortation to the Jews concerning the Messiah.

MOROSONS, Francis, a native of Venice, who distinguished himself by his valor against the Turks, at the siege of Candia. He long maintained himself against an invading army of one hundred and twenty thousand men, with hardly a fourth part of the number; but though allured by promises from the enemy and offered the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, he continued firm to his country; and when the place surrendered, he was treated with great humanity. His countrymen afterwards, though for a moment displeased, appointed him procurator of St. Mark, and enabled him again to attack the Turks, whom he defeated in a dreadful naval battle near the Dardanelles. He was in 1678 elected doge of his country, and died six years after, aged 76.

MORRIS, Lewis, a native of Anglesea, engaged in the service of the admiralty in 1737, to survey the coast of Wales. He published in 1748 an account of his observations, and died at Pembryn, Cardiganshire, 1765, aged 63. He possessed some abilities as a poet, and several of his pieces in Welsh have appeared. Above eighty MS. volumes of antiquities, collected by him, are preserved in the Welsh charity school, London.

MORRIS, Lewis, governor of New Jersey. After having been for several years chief justice of New York, and a councillor of New Jersey, from 1702 till 1733, he was appointed the first governor of New Jersey, as a separate province from New York. He died 1746, aged 73. He directed his body to be buried at Morrisania, in a plain coffin, without covering or lining with cloth; he prohibited rings and scarfs from being given at his funeral; he wished no man to be paid for preaching a funeral sermon upon him, though if any man, churchman or dissenter, minister or not, was inclined to say any thing on the occasion, he should not object. He prohibited any mourning dress to be worn on his account, as he should die, when divine providence should call him away, and was unwilling that his friends should be at the unnecessary expense, which was owing only to the common folly of mankind.

MORRIS, Robert, was a native of England, and came to America at the age of thirteen, and entered the counting house of Charles Willing, an eminent merchant of Philadelphia. On the death of Mr. Charles Willing, he became the partner of his son Thomas Willing, and the connexion lasted thirty-nine years. His house was one of the most extensive, and eminent mercantile establishments in America; and he acquired himself the reputation of being a very able financier. At the commencement of the American revolution, he took a decided part on the side of the colonies against the mother country. He was a member of congress in 1776, and signed the declaration of independence. In 1781, he obtained the control of the American finances, and retained it till the close of the war. The services he rendered to his country in his peculiar department, were nearly as important, and placed him next to Washington, as an efficient agent in bringing the revolutionary war to a close. He was a member of the convention which framed the present constitution of the United States; and was chosen into the senate from Pennsylvania in the first congress assembled under it. Notwithstanding his valuable services to his country, he passed the latter years of his life in prison, confined for debt. Until the period of his impoverishment, his house was a scene of the most liberal hospitality. It was open, for nearly half a century, to all the strangers of good society who visited Philadelphia. He died in 1806, aged seventy-one.

MORRIS, Gouverneur, minister from the United States of America to France, and an eminent American statesman and orator. He graduated at King's college, in the city of New York, 1763. He was bred to the law, and attained great celebrity in the profession. In 1775, he was a delegate to the provincial congress from New York, and was employed in the public service, in various capacities, during the revolutionary contest, and in all of them displayed great zeal and ability. After the war of the revolution, he retired from public life, and passed a number of years in private pursuits, excepting being a very active member of the convention, which framed the present constitution of the United States. In 1792 he was appointed minister to France, and remained there in that capacity, till October, 1794. He returned to America in 1798, and in 1800 was chosen a senator of the United States from New York. He died 1816, aged 64. His publications were numerous. A selection from his papers, with a sketch of his life, has been published by Jared Sparks, in 3 vols. 8vo. 1832.

MORSE, Jedidiah, D.D., minister of Charlestown, Massachusetts, graduated at Yale college in 1783, and was installed 1789. In 1821 he was dismissed, and died at New Haven, 1826, aged 65. Dr. Morse is entitled to remembrance for his geographical works. The first publication was in 1784, and during his life-time the work was kept in perpetual progress, and passed through many editions. He also published the American gazetteer; and with E. Parish the history of New England. Dr. Morse published many sermons and theological tracts; and a report on Indian affairs, being a narrative of a tour made in 1820, 8vo.

MORTIMER, John Hamilton, an English painter, born 1739, at East Bourne, Sussex, and descended from Mortimer, earl of March. He learnt his art under his uncle, but afterwards improved himself under Hudson, and sir Joshua Reynolds, and greatly corrected his taste by studying attentively the graces and sublime beauties of the duke of Richmond's gallery. He honorably obtained the prize of the society for the encouragement of arts, by his picture of Paul preaching to the Britons, a valuable piece, preserved in Chipping-Wycombe church, Bucks. He was in 1779, without his solicitation, created royal academician by the king, but unfortunately died before he could enjoy the honor, after an illness of 12 days, at his house, Norfolk-street, 4th February, 1779. His Magna Charta, and battle of Agincourt, are eminent proofs of his great genius; but it is remarkable that while his feelings and taste seemed to lead him to the delineation of savage scenes, and all the horrid tortures of inquisitorial fury, and suffering martyrdom, he possessed the most benevolent heart, susceptible of tender impressions, and easily moved by the cries of distress.

MORTIMER, Thomas, was born in London in 1730, and received a liberal education. He obtained early in life the appointment of vice-consul for the Austrian Netherlands; but having been displaced, he adopted the profession of an author, which he exercised with great assiduity and respectability. His chief works are, The British Plutarch, 1762, 6 vols. 12mo. Dictionary of Trade and Commerce, 1766, 2 vols. folio; The Elements of Commerce, Politics, and Finances, 1772, 4to., of which a German translation, by J. A. Englebrecht, was published at Leipsic in 1781; History of England, 3 vols. folio; and the Student's Pocket Dictionary, or Compendium of History, Chronology, and Biography, 12mo. He also translated Necker's Treatise on the Finances of France; and edited Beaues's Lex Mercatoria. In 1809, Mr. Mortimer published a General Dictionary of Commerce, Trade, and Manufactures, 8vo., distinct from his former dictionary, and died in December of that year.

MORTON, Thomas, an English bishop, born at York, 1564, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow, 1592. He was in the service of lords Huntington and Sheffield, and in 1603 went as chaplain to lord Eure, ambassador to the emperor of Germany, and the king of Denmark. In 1606 he was made chaplain to king James, the next year dean of Gloucester, 1609 dean of Winchester. In 1615 he was made bishop of Chester, 1618 translated to Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1632 to Durham. During the civil wars, though esteemed for benevolence, piety, and moderation, he was exposed to much trouble from the parliament, and the republican forces, and after suffering imprisonment and persecution, he at last was permitted to retire to the house of his friend sir Henry Peyton, in Northamptonshire, where he died 22d September, 1659, aged 95. He was the author of some practical books of divinity.

MORTON, James, earl of, was born at Dalkeith, 1530, and educated under Buchanan, who was professor of philosophy at Paris. He returned to Scotland, 1554, and ably promoted the reformation, but the murder of Darnley, in which he was called an accomplice, obliged him to fly into England. On his return he was made chancellor of Scotland, and in 1574, succeeded Mar as regent, an office which he resigned 1579. His enemies prevailed at last against him, and in 1581 he was condemned for high treason, and lost his head, by a machine called maiden, said to resemble the modern French guillotine, which it is reported he had brought from Halifax, Yorkshire, for the execution of some of his opponents.

MORTON, John, a native of Dorchester, who rose by his abilities, his knowledge of law, and the favor of Henry VI. to places of dignity and consequence. He was privy counsellor to the king and his successor, and from the see of Ely he was translated to Canterbury, and was also raised by Henry VII. to the office of lord chancellor, and by the pope to the dignity of cardinal. He died 1500.

MORTON, Charles, minister of Charlestown, Massachusetts. He was educated at Oxford. In early life he was firmly attached to the king and church party, but afterwards became a republican and a puritan. In 1662 he was ejected from his living by the act of uniformity. For about twenty years he taught a school in the neighborhood of London, and then to enjoy more freedom in religion he resolved on coming to America. He arrived in New England in July 1686, and was installed in November following, at Charlestown. He died 1698, aged 71. He wrote a number of treatises, but mostly, if not entirely on religious subjects; two of his manuscripts are said still to be preserved, one in the library of Bowdoin college, and the other in the library of the Massachusetts Historical society. His publications were also numerous, but it would neither instruct nor amuse at this day, to give even their titles, and it is not known, that their fate is so good, as that of the manuscript just mentioned.

MORTON, Nathaniel, was a native of England, and came to America with his father in 1623. In 1645 he was appointed clerk of the judicial court in Plymouth, and held the office till his death in 1685, aged 73. A brief ecclesiastical history of the church at Plymouth, which is preserved by Hazard, was written by Morton. He was also the author of New England's memorial, 4to. 1669. A second edition of this work was printed in 1721; a third in 1772; a fourth in 12mo.; and a fifth, with notes by judge Davis, 8vo. 1826.

MORTON, John, one of the signers of the American declaration of independence, was a native of Pennsylvania. He was a member of the first American congress. On the question of adopting the declaration of independence, the delegation from Pennsylvania, without Morton, was equally divided, and he voted in the affirmative; of course it may be said, that his voice decided the vote of the state. He was an efficient agent in forming the confederation of the colonies, and was chairman of the committee of the whole, when the system agreed upon was adopted. He died 1777, aged 56.

MORYSIN, Sir Richard, LL.D., an eminent civilian of the sixteenth century, a native of Hertfordshire. He ingratiated himself much with Henry the Eighth, by his reply to John Cochlæus, who wrote against that monarch's divorce from queen Anne Boleyn with great asperity. For the zeal he showed on the subject, he received the honor of knighthood. In the reign of Mary, when the professors of the reformed doctrines, especially those who had in any way signalized themselves by assisting in their introduction into England, became obnoxious to persecution, sir Richard retired to the continent, and died at Strasburg in 1556.

MOSELEY, Benjamin, a physician, was born in Essex, and bred to the business of a surgeon and apothecary, which he practised several years at Kingston in Jamaica. On his return to Europe, he took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and by the interest of lord Mulgrave, obtained the situation of physician to Chelsea hospital. He gained some credit by "Observations on the Dysentery of the West Indies;" and "Two Treatises on Coffee and Sugar;" but disgraced himself by his virulence against the vaccine inoculation. He died June 15, 1819.

MOSHEIM, John Laurence, an able German divine, born 1695, of a noble family at Lubbeck. He distinguished himself in the German universities, and was invited to honorable situations by the king of Denmark and other princes. He became divinity professor at Helmstadt, and was afterwards appointed chancellor of the university of Gottingen, where he died, universally lamented, 1755. This very learned man wrote Dissertations Sacre, 4to.—Sermons—Cudworth's Intellectual System of the Universe, translated into Latin, with notes, but the best known and most useful of his works is an Ecclesiastical History, written in Latin, and translated into English by Dr. Maclaine.

MOSS, Robert, D.D., an English divine, born at Gillingham, Norfolk, 1666. He was brought up at Norwich school, and Benet college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was a popular preacher, and much followed in London, and became chaplain to king William and his two successors. He was made, 1712, dean of Ely, and held other ecclesiastical preferments. In the latter part of life, he was much afflicted with the gout, and died 26th March, 1729. His sermons have been published in 3 vols. 8vo. He wrote also some poetry, and small tracts. His nephew was raised to the see of Bath and Wells.

MOSS, Charles, an English prelate, was the nephew of the preceding. He received his education at Caius-college, Cambridge, where he took his doctor's degree in 1747. He became successively archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Salisbury, rector of St. Andrew, Undershaft, and of St. George, Hanover-square. In 1766, he was consecrated bishop of St. David's, from whence, in 1774, he was translated to Bath and Wells. He died in 1802. Besides some sermons, and a charge, he published a tract entitled "The Evidence of the Resurrection cleared from the 'Exceptions of a late Pamphlet.'" This was a vindication of bishop Sherlock's "Trial of the Witnesses," against Chubb. Dr. Moss also preached the Boyle's Lecture. His son became bishop of Oxford, and died in 1811.

MONTHE LE VAYER, Francis de la, counsellor of state, and preceptor to the duke of Anjou, only brother to Louis XIV. was born 1588, at Paris. He distinguished himself early by his learning, and in 1639, was admitted member of the French academy. He enjoyed the friendship and patronage of Richelieu, and Mazarin, and was appointed to places of honor and distinction. Though very regular, and exemplary in his conduct, it has been observed that he was occasionally licentious in his writings. He died 1672. His works collected by his son, and dedicated to Mazarin, appeared in 1663. The best edition is that of 1669, in 15 vols. 12mo. No French writer, more than he, says Bayle, approaches nearer to Plutarch. Beautiful thoughts, and solid arguments are every where interwoven in his writings.

MOTTE, Anthony Houdart de la, an ingenious Frenchman, member of the French academy, was born at Paris, 17th January, 1672. He studied the law, but quitted it for poetry and literature, and at the age of twenty he produced "lex Originaux," a comedy, ill received by the public, which so disgusted him with the world, that he retired to the abbey of la Trappe with the intention to live in retirement and devotion. Other ideas, however, soon prevailed, and his other productions met with a more favorable treatment from the public. He had many friends, but his literary enemies were more numerous than his admirers, and if he had not acquired celebrity by his writings he would have obtained it from the attacks of Racine, Boileau, Rousseau, and others. His "Discours sur Homere" is a masterly performance, but it was attacked by Madame Dacier, and with great spirit, but with moderation defended by the author in his "Reflexions sur la Critique." He became blind in his old age, and died 26th December, 1731, universally regretted. His works, consisting of epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, and lyrics, besides critical and academical discourses, and other prose compositions, were edited in eleven large vols. 8vo. 1754. He was, says Voltaire, of a solid and comprehensive rather than of a sublime genius. His prose possessed delicacy and method, but his poetry often is destitute of fire and elegance.

MOTTEAUX, Peter Anthony, a French writer born at Rouen in Normandy, 1660. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to England, where he became a respectable merchant, and acquired such a perfect knowledge of the language that he wrote in it various things, among them a translation of Don Quixote, poems, and dramatic pieces. He was found dead in a disorderly house in the parish of St. Clement Danes, on his birth day, 19th Feb. 1717-8, and was supposed to have been murdered.

MOTTEVILLE, Francis Bertrand, dame de, a French lady, born in Normandy, 1615. She was patronised by Anne of Austria, and though for a while banished from court by the jealousy of Richelieu, she was afterwards restored to favor, and wrote the "Memoirs" of her mistress, in 5 vols. 12mo. which have frequently been reprinted. She died at Paris, 1689.

MOUFET, Thomas, a medical writer, the first who introduced chemical medicines in England. He studied for some time at Cambridge, but took his doctor's degree abroad, and settled at Ipswich. The latter part of his life was spent at Bulbridge, near Wilton, in the retinue of the Pembroke family. He died about 1600. He is known for his "Theatrum Insectorum," folio, 1634, a work praised by Ray, though censured by Lister.

MOUHY, Charles de Fieux, a native of Metz, member of the academy of Dijon. He wrote several romances of no great merit, but to excite the public attention he gave to his works the title of some celebrated composition, as la Paysanne Parvenue, 4 vols. 12mo. after Miravaux's Paysan Parvenue—Mille et un faveurs, 8 vols. 12mo. after Mille & une Nuits, &c. He wrote besides, Memoires d'une Fille de Qualité, 4 vols. 12mo.—Tablettes Dramatiques, and died at Paris, 29th Feb. 1784, aged 82.

MOULIN, Peter du, son of the preceding, was chaplain to Charles II. and prebendary of Canterbury. He died 1684, aged 84. He was author of "the Peace of the Soul," 12mo.—Clamor Regii Sanguinis, ascribed by Milton to Alexander More—a Defence of the Protestant Religion.

MOULIN, Lewis, brother to the preceding, wrote Parænesis ad Edificatores Imperii, dedicated to Cromwell—Patronus Bonæ Fidei, against the church of England. He was a violent independent, and died 1680, aged 77.

MOULTRIE, William, a major-general in the army of the American revolution, was born in England, but emigrated to South Carolina at an early age. He served with distinction in the Cherokee war in 1760, and in its last campaign commanded a company. At the commencement of the revolution, he was a member of the provincial congress, and a colonel of the second regiment of South Carolina. For his brave defence of Sullivan's Island in 1776, he received the thanks of Congress, and the fort was afterwards called by his name. In 1779 he gained a victory over the British at Beaufort. He afterwards received the commission of major-general, and was second in command to general Lincoln at the siege of Charleston. After the close of the war he was repeatedly elected governor of South Carolina. He published Memoirs of the Revolution in the Carolinas and Georgia, consisting chiefly of official letters. He died at Charleston, in 1805.

MOUNTFORT, William, a native of Staffordshire, known as an actor, and as a dramatic writer. He possessed great comic powers, and once displayed them with effect before lord Jefferies, and the court of London aldermen, by mimicking the gestures, manners, and delivery of the great lawyers of the times. Cibber speaks with great approbation of his successful exertions in comedy, as well as in tragedy, which had not even yet attained their highest excellence at his death. He was basely murdered by captain Hill, and lord Mohun, in Norfolk-street in the Strand, in the winter of 1692. Hill immediately escaped, and Mohun, when tried by his peers, was acquitted, as the evidence against him was not sufficiently strong and connected. Mountfort was author of six dramatic pieces.

MOURAVIOF, Michael Nikititch, a Russian poet and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1757, at Smolensk; was preceptor to the sons of Catherine II.; was appointed by Alexander a senator, privy councillor, and assistant to the minister for the department of public instruction; and died in 1807. A complete edition of his works was published in 1820.

MOXON, Joseph, a native of Wakefield, Yorkshire, who became hydrographer to the second Charles, and died about 1700, aged 73. He wrote several books on navigation, mathematics, astronomy, Mechanic Exercises, or the Doctrine of Handy-work, and for some years taught mathematics in Warwick-lane, London, where he constructed globes, and maps.

MOYLE, Walter, an ingenious writer, born in Cornwall 1672. He was for some time at Oxford, and then entered at the Temple, where he studied the law, and acquired a strong bias in favor of the protestant succession. He was for some time in parliament, where he conducted himself in a very honorable and independent manner, and ably supported the bill for the encouragement of seamen. Retirement, however, was more congenial to him than the bustle of political life, and therefore he removed to his seat at Bake in Cornwall, and devoted himself assiduously to literary pursuits. He died 9th June 1721, aged 49, and in 1726 his works appeared in 2 vols. 8vo edited by Th. Serjeant, esq. and dedicated to his brother Joseph Moyle. A third volume was added 1727, by his friend Mr. Hammond. These volumes contain chiefly political pamphlets—dissertations on some of the works of Xenophon and Lucian—besides Remarks on Prideaux's Connection—letters—and a treatise on the Miracles of the Thundering Legion.

MOZART, Wolfgang, a German musician, born at Salzburg, where his father, also an eminent musician, was master of the chapel. He possessed such strong natural powers, that when a child he played before the emperor, and he, in approbation of his great merits, called him the Little Sorcerer. He was in 1763 in London with his father and sister, and after being heard with equal approbation by the king and the English nobility, he returned home three years after, and in 1769 went to Italy, where the pope honored him with the order of the golden spur. In 1781 he settled at Vienna, where he was liberally patronised by Joseph II. and the court, and where he died 1791, aged 35. Among his popular works, his six sonatas for the harpsichord, published in London, are particularly admired.

MUDGE, John, an ingenious physician, and able mechanic, who settled at Plymouth, where he died 1793, author of a treatise on Catarrhus Coughs, 12mo. He also improved the construction of the reflecting telescope. His brother Thomas acquired celebrity as an ingenious watch and clock maker, on which profession he wrote a treatise. Their father Zachary, was minister of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, and an able divine. He wrote a volume of admired sermons, and an Essay for a New version of the Psalms.

MUDGE, Zachary, an English divine, was born at Exeter, where he was educated for the ministry, among the dissenters, whom he left, and took orders in the church of England. In 1716 he became master of the grammar-school at Bideford, in Devonshire, where he remained till 1736, when he was elected to the rectory of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, with which he held a prebend in the cathedral of Exeter. He died in 1769. Mr. Mudge published a visitation sermon and a volume of excellent discourses. He left four sons, of whom Thomas, the second, was born at Exeter in 1715, and died in 1794. He served his apprenticeship to Graham, the watchmaker, and became equally eminent in that line with his master; and for his time-keepers, which were adjudged superior to any that had ever been invented, he obtained a parliamentary grant of three thousand pounds. Dr.

John Mudge was born at Bideford, and the fourth son of Mr. Zachary Mudge, became a physician at Plymouth. He published "A Dissertation on the inoculated Small Pox;" and a "treatise on the Cattarrhus Cough." He had also a mechanical genius, and received the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society for improvement in the specula of reflecting telescopes. His son, major-general Mudge, was employed on a trigonometrical survey of Great Britain, a considerable portion of which he completed before his death, in 1820. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, in whose Transactions are some of his papers on the great work in which he was engaged.

MUEHLENBERG, H. M., D.D. was a native of Germany, and came to Pennsylvania in 1742, where he founded the first Lutheran church, and officiated as its senior pastor. He was eminent for learning and his piety. He died at Philadelphia in 1787, aged 76. His three sons also, Peter, Frederick, and Henry were distinguished men. The second was treasurer of the state, president of the convention, which ratified the constitution of the United States, member of congress, and in 1793, speaker of the house of representatives.

MUEHLENBERG, G. Henry Ernest, D.D. son of the preceding, was born at New Providence, Pennsylvania, November, 17, 1753, and was educated at the university of Halle, in Germany. He returned in 1770, and was ordained an assistant pastor of the Lutheran church in Philadelphia. He removed in 1780, and assumed the pastoral care of the Lutheran church in Lancaster, where he continued, distinguished for his talents, piety, and usefulness until his death, May 23, 1815. He was a man of extensive science, and particularly eminent for his knowledge of botany. He enjoyed a correspondence with many of the most distinguished cultivators of natural science, and was a member of several learned societies at home and abroad. His chief works are—Catalogus Plantarum, Græminum Americae Septentrionalis, & Flora Lancastrænsis.

MULLER, John Von, a celebrated Swiss historian, was born in 1752, at Schaffhausen, and studied at Gottingen. He was, successively, professor of Greek at his native place, and of history at Cassel, secretary of state to the elector of Metz, counsellor of the Imperial chancery, and secretary of state, and director-general of public instruction of the kingdom of Westphalia. Muller, who has been called the Helvetic Thucydides, died in 1809. His principal works are, A History of the Swiss Confederacy; and A Course of Universal History.

MULLNER, Adolphus, an eminent German dramatic writer, was born, in 1774, at Langendorf, near Weissenfels; was brought up to the law; acquired great reputation as a dramatist and critic; and died June 11, 1829. Mullner was a man of genius, but the bitterest of censors, and the most quarrelsome of authors. Among his plays are the tragedies of Guilt; King Ingurd; and The Albanaserin.

MUNCER, Thomas, a Saxon fanatic, born at Zwickaw in Misnia. He was one of Luther's disciples, but afterwards preached against him with equal violence as against the pope, and became the leader of the anabaptists. In conjunction with Storck he destroyed the images in the churches, and being with all his followers re-baptised naked, he began to regard all things in common, and to abolish all distinctions. Backed by forty thousand enthusiasts, he commanded the sovereign princes of Germany to resign their authority to him as armed not only with temporal force, but with directions from heaven. His devastations were great, till the landgrave of Hesse took up arms. Muncer with the title of king, met him in the field, promising his associates a complete victory, but after losing seven thousand of his followers, he fled to Franchausen, where he was seized, and afterwards executed at Mulhausen, 1522.

MUNICH, Burchard Christopher, a native of New Huntorf in Oldenburgh. He learned the art of war under Marlborough and Eugene, and for his bravery at Malplaquet, was made lieutenant-colonel. He was afterwards in the Polish, and then in the Russian service, but after being distinguished by the Czar Peter I. and made marshal by the empress Anne, and acquiring military glory in the wars against the Turks, he was disgraced by Elizabeth in 1741, and sent to Siberia. After 20 years' exile, he was recalled by Peter III., and appeared at court in the same sheepskin dress which he had worn in his captivity. After being restored to the favor of Peter and Catherine, he lived in retirement, and died 1767, at Riga.

MUNSTER, Sebastian, a German divine, born at Inghelheim, 1489. He studied at Heidelberg and Basil, but after being in the society of the Cordeliers, he attached himself to the tenets of Luther. He published a Chaldee Grammar and Lexicon—a Talmudic dictionary—an Universal Cosmography, folio—and a Latin Version of the Old Testament, for which two last works, he was called the Strabo and the Esdras of Germany. He wrote, besides, other valuable works, but though living in controversial times, he never engaged in theological disputes. He died of the plague at Basil, 1552, aged 63.

MURAT, Joachim, ex-king of Naples, one of the most intrepid of the French marshals, was born in 1771; was the son of an inkeeper at Bastide, near Cahors; and was intended for the church. The army, however, was his choice; and in 1796, Buonaparte made him his aid-de-camp. In Italy, in 1796 and 1797, and in Egypt and Syria, in 1798 and 1799, Murat displayed great valor and military talent. He returned with Buonaparte to France, assisted him in overthrowing the Directory, and was rewarded with the hand of Caroline, the sister of the first consul. At Marengo and Austerlitz, he was one of the most distinguished of the French leaders. In 1806, Napoleon created him grand duke of Berg; and in 1808, he raised him to the throne of Naples. Murat took a conspicuous part in the campaigns of 1806, 1807, 1808, 1812, and 1813; but in 1814, finding that the throne of his patron began to totter, he joined the allies. In the following year, however, he was expelled from his kingdom; and, having made a desperate attempt to recover it, he was taken prisoner, and shot, at Pizzo, October, 13, 1815.

MURATORI, Lewis Antony, an Italian writer, born at Vignola in the Bolognese, 1672. He was invited, when only 22, by Charles Borromæus, to be librarian at Milan, and in 1700, he was recalled to Modena by the duke, to take care of his library, and to arrange his archives. Thus, in the enjoyment of ease and retirement he devoted himself to literature, but he met, like all others, persecution and trouble from his enemies. He was accused of heresy and atheism, and was obliged to justify himself before the pope, Benedict XIV., who received his apologies with humanity and friendship, and wrote him a letter of approbation. He died 1750. His works have appeared in 46 vols. folio, and possess great merit. The best known are Anecdota quæ ex Ambrosianæ Bibliothecæ Codicibus nunc primum eruit Notis et Disquisitionibus—Anecdota

Græca, quæ ex MSS. nunc primum eruit—Rerum Italicarum Scriptores ab Anno 500, ad 1500—Antiquitates Italicæ Medii Ævi—Novus Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum—Annali d'Italia—Della Perfetta Poesiana Italiana—le Rime del Petrarca—Italian poems.

MURETUS, Mark Antony, a learned critic, born at Muret, near Limoges, 11th April, 1526. His abilities early displayed themselves, he read lectures on Cicero and Terence at Auch, and afterwards visited Agen, Villeneuve, Paris, Poitiers, and Bourdeaux, where he occasionally taught Latin authors for his maintenance. In 1552, he returned to Paris, but while he distinguished himself here by his oratorical and poetical talents, he was accused of an unnatural crime. He fled to Toulouse, where he read lectures on civil law, but here again, it is said, he forgot his character, and was condemned in 1554, say the registers of Toulouse, to be burnt in effigy with Memmius Fremiot of Dijon, his associate, as being a huguenot and a sodomite. He escaped from the public indignation to Italy, and after instructing youth for several years at Padua and Venice, he was invited 1560, by cardinal Hippolite d'Est to Rome. Here he led a life of regularity, was honored with the title of citizen of Rome, by pope Gregory XIII., and was so much noticed by his patron, that he attended him in 1562, in his office of Legate to Paris. At Paris, Muretus acquired celebrity by his lectures on Aristotle's Ethics, and on civil law. In 1576, he became an ecclesiastic and obtained some preferment, and in the latter part of life, it is said, entered into the society of the jesuits. He died at Paris, 4th June, 1585. His works are numerous, and consist of valuable orations, various readings and translations from Greek authors, especially Aristotle, poems, and epistles, all written in a pure, polished, and elegant style. They were collected together and published at Verona, in 5 vols. 8vo. Muretus was the friend and correspondent of various learned men, especially J. C. Scaliger, Lambinus, and others.

MURPHY, Arthur, a dramatic writer of eminence. He was born in Ireland, of respectable parents, and educated at the school at St. Omer's, and on his return home, he was placed under the care of a relation in London, engaged in commercial pursuits. Business, however, had no attractions for him, and he soon left the house of his friend, to devote himself to the labors of a literary life. He had a strong partiality for the stage, but after trying his powers in Othello and other characters, he resigned all pretensions to eminence on the theatre, and he determined to support himself by his pen. He studied the law at Lincoln's inn, and was called to the bar, but did not practise, as the dramatic muse engaged the whole of his attention. He was particularly successful in his performances; of the twenty-two pieces which he wrote, most of them were received with the most flattering applause, and several of them are still retained on the stage, and at certain seasons exhibited to the public with increasing celebrity. As a man of letters, he was intimate with the wits of the times, with Foote, Garrick, Johnson, Burke, and others. Of his dramatic pieces, the best known are the Orphan of China—the Grecian Daughter—All in the Wrong—the way to Keep him—Know your Own Mind—Three Weeks after Marriage—the Apprentice—and the Citizen, which procured him with public esteem, both opulence and independence. He wrote besides, the Gray's Inn Journal, a weekly paper—the Test—and the Auditor, in favor of government—a Reply to Churchill's illiberal attack upon him; and evinced his abilities as a learned scholar by his elegant translation of Tacitus, in 4 vols.—and Latin Versions of the Temple of Fame and of Gray's Elegy. He wrote also Garrick's Life. He died 18th June, 1805, aged 78.

MURRAY, James, earl of, natural son of James V. of Scotland, by the daughter of the earl of Mar, was born in 1529, and created earl of Murray by Mary, Queen of Scots. He proved the ingratitude of his heart, by his barbarous conduct towards his unhappy princess, against whom he excited the nobles of the kingdom. On the flight and disgrace of Mary, he was appointed regent of the kingdom during the minority of the young king, 1567, and he was shot four years after, at Linlithgow, by Hamilton, a gentleman whose wife he had seduced.

MURRAY, James, a native of Dunkeld, educated at Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. He refused preferment at home and settled in London, where he preached to a congregation in Swallow-street. He was author of Alerheia, or System of Moral Truths, 4 vols. 12mo., and he died 1758, aged 55. Another dissenting divine of that name wrote History of the American war, 4 vols. 8vo.—Sermons to Asses, 12mo.—History of the Churches of England and Scotland, 3 vols., and died 1782.

MURRAY, William, earl of Mansfield, a celebrated lawyer, fourth son of David, viscount Stormont, was born 2d March, 1705, at Perth, in Scotland. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1723, was elected to Christ-church, Oxford. He took his master's degree in 1730, and then went on his travels, and at his return, entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar. He gradually rose to eminence, and distinguished himself as an eloquent orator, both at the bar and in the house of commons. He was in 1742, appointed solicitor-general, and during the trial of lord Lovat before the peers, he displayed so much candor and liberality, that he received the thanks of the accused, as well as of the president of the court, lord Talbot. In 1754 he succeeded to the office of attorney-general, and two years after, was raised to the dignity of chief justice of the king's bench, and soon after, created baron Mansfield. In the unsettled state of public affairs in 1757, he held for a little time, the office of chancellor of the exchequer, till by a coalition of parties, an efficient ministry was formed, whose vigor and wisdom upheld the glory of the British arms, and the honor of the nation. For some years after the accession of George III., this upright magistrate was attacked by malevolent insinuations, but the slanders and malice, and the virulence of party, failed to influence his conduct, or to interrupt that sedulous attention which he paid to the affairs of his office. To this unworthy treatment he alluded in pathetic, but firm language, on the business of Wilkes' outlawry, and concluded by observing that he honored the king, respected the people, but that many things acquired by the favor of either were not worth his ambition, and that he wished popularity, but such popularity as followed, not that which is run after. He was three times offered the great seal which he declined, and in 1776, he was created an earl, with remainder to his nephews by lady Stormont. In 1780, when London exhibited a scene of tumult, devastation and plunder, his house in Bloomsbury-square became an object of popular fury, and was burnt down by the mob, and together with it, a very large collection of books and valuable manuscripts. For these, however, when offered an honorable compensation by a vote of the commons, he refused to accept anything, but devoted himself with increasing assiduity to the labors of his high office. After filling with unusual activity and unshaken integrity this elevated situation for many years, the infirmities of age became so great that he resigned it in January, 1788, and in his honorable retirement was accompanied with the respect not only of the bar, but of the whole nation. This venerable man expired 20th March, 1793, in the 89th year of his age. The character of lord Mansfield stands high in the records of fame for integrity, wisdom, and sagacious discernment. Whilst he presided in the king's bench, the court was remarkable for the regularity, the punctuality, and the dispatch which his attentive mind introduced. With such impartiality were his decisions given, that only in two cases, where the opinions of the judges were very discordant, the judgment of the court has been reversed, and therefore, among those who have devoted the energies of their mind to promote the happiness and the good order of society, few will appear more entitled to the reverence and homage of applauding posterity, than lord Mansfield.

MURRAY, Richard, D.D., provost of Trinity College, Dublin, was born in 1726. After the usual course of study, he became a fellow of Trinity college about 1748, and was afterwards appointed professor of mathematics; in which office he displayed uncommon abilities as a teacher. There was simplicity, precision, and clearness in his method, by which he conveyed his ideas, even on the difficult and abstract science of analytics, with the greatest ease and accuracy; while the comprehensive view which he exhibited, of every branch of mathematics, proved him to possess a most vigorous understanding. He was afterwards promoted to the provostship, by earl Fitzwilliam, with the approbation of the whole University. From his abilities and length of standing, as well as from his offices, he was considered the father of the University; in which he always preserved the most perfect concord, which his predecessors had failed to do. He published an Epitome of Logic, which is much esteemed. He was so constantly devoted to study, that he never married. Though his income exceeded his expenses by at least 500*l.* a year, and during the last four years had 3000*l.* a year, yet his private charities were so numerous, that he did not leave above 4000*l.* at his death. He died at Dublin, June 20th, 1799, aged 73.

MURRAY, Alexander, D.D., professor of Hebrew in the University of Edinburgh, was born in October, 1775. Even in his juvenile days, he gave proofs of poetical genius, and gained an intimate acquaintance with many of the best English authors. He had made great progress, during this period in the acquisition of languages; in so much, that at the age of seventeen he was able to translate, with accuracy and without premeditation, the Hebrew language, before he ever heard a word of it pronounced. In 1793 he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, and was strongly recommended to Dr. Baird, the principal; who, astonished at the richness of his genius, and the extent of his acquirements, with a generosity worthy of himself, took the young student under his particular care, and continued to the end of his life his warm, zealous, and steady friend. Having obtained a slight knowledge of the Ethiopic alphabet in his youth, he subsequently acquired a complete acquaintance with that ancient language. In 1812 he was appointed professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages in the university. In the autumn following his appointment he prepared lectures for his class, and a syllabus, entitled Outlines of Oriental Philosophy, which was published in December next succeeding. But his great exertions were beyond his strength; his spirits began to fail him; and, on the 15th of April, 1813, he was removed from his earthly labors, at the age of 37 years. His principal work, the History of European Languages, though a posthumous publication, for erudition, originality, and accuracy, will entitle its author to the unqualified praise of the present day, and will procure him the respect and gratitude of future ages.

MURRAY, William Vans, was a native of Maryland. After studying law at the temple in London, he returned to America and engaged in the practice of law. He was soon elected a member of the legislature of Maryland, and in 1791 was a representative from that state in congress, until 1797, when he declined being a candidate. He was appointed by Washington Minister of the United States to the Batavian republic. In connection with Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie he negotiated a treaty with France in 1800. He returned to the United States in 1801, and died in 1802, aged 41.

MURRAY, James, major in the British service in India; was born in Rhode Island about 1765. His original name was Lillibridge, which he changed for that of Murray on account of some dissatisfaction with his relatives. He went to sea in early life, and after pursuing that occupation several years, about the year 1790 visited Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast. Learning that the Mahratta chiefs were desirous of obtaining foreigners to discipline their troops, he passed into their territory, and meeting with a flattering reception, engaged in their service, and soon distinguished himself by his courage and activity. He continued there fifteen years, during which he was engaged in a great variety of enterprises, and encountered every species of hardship and peril. He at length collected a large body of cavalry in his own name, took possession of a considerable district of country and established himself as an independent sovereign. On the breaking out of the war between the British and India, he joined the British with his forces, and rendered them the most important services. At the close of that war, having accumulated a large fortune, he resolved to return to his native country, and proceeded with that design to Calcutta, where he died in 1806.

MURRAY, John, jun. a philanthropist, was born in the city of New York, on the 3d of August, 1758, and was a brother of Lindley Murray, of York, England, the distinguished grammarian. He received a respectable education, and established himself in merchandise at an early age in New York. After a few years he withdrew from business, satisfied with his accumulations, and nobly devoted his income and life to the cause of philanthropy. He was for thirty-seven years a governor of the New York Hospital, took an active part in procuring the formation of the society for the manumission of slaves, in promoting the instruction of the aboriginal inhabitants in the state of New York, and in procuring the repeal of the criminal code of that state, and the establishment of the penitentiary system of punishment. He was the principal means of founding the New York Free School society, and was for some time its vice president, and co-operated in the establishment of most of the charitable institutions which exist in that city, and to them, and a variety of other charitable objects, made liberal benefactions. He was characterised by great modesty, amiableness of disposition, and manners, the most scrupulous integrity, friendliness to christians of every denomination, and great benevolence. He belonged to the society of Friends, and gave happy evidence of practical piety. He died on the 4th of August, 1819.

MUSCHENBROECK, Peter de, a celebrated natural philosopher and mathematician, born at Utrecht, 1692. He was professor of philosophy and mathematics in his native town, and afterwards at Leyden, and was honored with a seat in the Royal society of London, and the academy of sciences at Paris. He died at Leyden full of reputation and literary honors. He wrote Tentamina Experimentorum, 4to.—Institutiones Physicæ, 4to.—Compendium Physicæ Experimentalis, 12mo. and a course of natural and experimental philosophy very much esteemed, and translated into English by Colson, 2 vols. 8vo.

MUSCULUS, Wolfgangus, a famous divine, born at Diennez in Lorraine, 1497. He was very poor and taken out of charity among the Benedictines, whose society he forsook on embracing the tenets of Luther. He retired to Strasburg, where he married, but the narrowness of his circumstances obliged him to work for his bread, and while he gained applause as a preacher on a Sunday, he was under the necessity of laboring the rest of the week in transcribing the works of Bucer, who kindly entertained him in his house. From Strasburg he went in 1531, to Augsburg, where his eloquence was so powerful that the magistrates expelled their popish ministers. In 1548, however, Charles V. restored the catholic rites at Augsburg, and Musculus fled to Switzerland, where the magistrates of Bern promoted him to the divinity chair in their city. He died there August 30th, 1563. He was a man of great learning, though he was 32 years old before he became acquainted with Greek, and 40 with Hebrew, and his abilities as a disputant were also successfully employed in ecclesiastical conferences. He wrote commentaries on some of the scriptures, and translated some of the works of the fathers into Latin.

MUSGRAVE, William, a physician and antiquary, born at Charlton Musgrave, Somersetshire, 1657. He was educated at Winchester, and New-college, Oxford, where he became fellow and took his degree of M.D. 1689. He was made secretary to the Royal society, 1684, and member of the college of physicians, and in 1691, he settled at Exeter, where he practised with great reputation, and died 23d December, 1721. His works were de Arthritide—de Legionibus Epistola—de Aquilis Romanis—Geta Britannicus—Belgium Britannicum. His son was also a physician at Exeter, and wrote some critical pieces.

MUSIUS, Cornelius, professor of belles lettres and languages in Flanders, was born at Delft, 1503. He was afterwards placed at the head of a convent at home, and put to an ignominious and barbarous death, on account of his religion, by William Lumey, 1572. He was author of some poems much admired.

MUSSO, Cornelius, a famous preacher, made bishop of Bitonto by pope Paul IV. and sent to assist at the council of Trent. He was born at Placentia, 1511, and died at Rome 9th January, 1574. His sermons are curious, and contain quotations from Homer, and other mythological letters, as much as from the scriptures.

MUSTAPHA I. succeeded his brother Achmet as emperor of Turkey, 1617, and was at last strangled, 1623, by his janissaries, after being deposed and again reinstated during a turbulent reign of six years.

MUSTAPHA II. son of the fourth Mahomet, succeeded after his uncle Achmet II. 1695. He was an able warrior, and after defeating the Imperialists at Temeswar, he attacked the Venetians, Poles, and Russians with success, till a change of fortune rendered him unpopular and obliged him to make peace. He retired to Adrianople, where he forgot himself in luxury and lascivious pleasures, till a dreadful revolt of his subjects compelled him to descend from the throne 1703. He died of melancholy six months after.

MUSTAPHA III. son of Achmet III. succeeded to the Turkish throne 1757. He spent his time in the pleasures of his seraglio, and left the cares of government to his ministers and favorites. He died 1774, before the conclusion of that fatal war which had been kindled between him and the Russians.

MUSURUS, Marcus, a learned native of Candia, who taught Greek in the universities of Venice, Padua, and Rome, and contributed much to the revival of letters. He was made bishop of Malvazia, in the Morea, by Pope Leo X. and died of a dropsy soon after, 1517. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and to his critical knowledge the public was indebted for the first edition of Aristophanes and Athenæus. He published also Etimologicum Magnum Græcorum, a valuable work printed at Venice, folio, 1499, and Heidelberg, 1594.

MUY, Louis Nicolas Victor, count de, a native of Marseilles, who acquired celebrity in the military profession, and signalized himself by his valor in the battles of Fontenoy, of Hastenback, of Crevelt, and of Minden. He was raised for his services to the rank of marshal of France, and of war minister, but died soon after, of the stone, 10th October, 1775, aged 64.

MUYS, William, a native of Sleenvick, Overysel, who was successively promoted to the chairs of medicine, chemistry, and botany, at Franeker, where he died 1774. He was an able writer, and gave to the world besides orations, Elements of Natural Philosophy, 4to.—Inventio Fabricæquæ in Partibus Musculos componentibus extat, 4to.—de Virtute Seminali quæ Plantæ et Animalia Generi suo propagandæ, sufficient.

MYREPSUS, Nicolas, a physician of Alexandria in the 13th century. He collected a "Pharmacopœia," from the writings of Greek and Arabic physicians, which was for some time much followed among medical men in Europe. It was translated from the Greek into Latin, by Fusch, and published 1658.

MYTENS, Martin, a native of Stockholm, known as a painter. Though liberally invited by Peter the Great, whose portrait he took, to settle in Russia, he refused it, and after visiting Italy and other parts of Europe, he lived at Vienna, highly and deservedly respected by the emperor Charles VI. and by the court. He died there 1755, aged 60.

N.

NABI-EFFENDI, a Turkish poet of great merit. He was well acquainted with the classic writers of Greece and Rome, and gained applause by his poems. He flourished in the 17th century.

NADIR SHAH, or THAMAS KOULI KHAN, a Persian warrior and usurper, was born in 1688, at a village near Meshed, in the province of Khorasan; experienced many vicissitudes in his youth; and was taken into the service of Shah Thamas, in 1726, for whom he gained several victories over the Afghans and Turks. In 1732, however, he deposed him, and placed Abbas III. on the throne. On the decease of Abbas, in 1736, Nadir assumed the sovereignty, and retained it till he was assassinated in 1747. During his reign he vanquished the mogul, and made himself master of Delhi, and defeated the Usbecks and the Turks.

NAIRON, Faustus, a Maronite, and professor of Syriac in the Sapienza college, at Rome where he died 1711, aged 80. He wrote Euopla Fidei Catholice, 1694—Dissertatio de Maronitarum Origine, 1679. He maintains in these books that the Maronites have preserved inviolate the christian faith from the time of the apostles, and that they derive their name not from Maro the Monothelite, who died 707, but from St. Maro, an Anachoret, of the fourth century.

NANCEL, Nicholas de, a native of Nancel, near Soissons, who became a physician of some eminence, and after practising in several towns, settled at the abbey of Fontevrault, where he died 1610. He wrote Stichologia Græca Latinaque, 8vo.—the Life of Peter Ramus—De Immortalitate Animæ, 8vo.

NANI, John Baptist, a Venetian noble, proctor of St. Mark, was born 30th August 1616. He was, through his abilities, admitted into the college of senators, 1641, and went as ambassador to France, and in that capacity had such influence upon Mazarine, that he obtained from the French court succours in men and money to continue the war against the Turks in Candia. He was afterwards ambassador to the emperor, and received the highest approbation from his fellow-citizens, who appointed him, for his services, proctor of St. Mark, and captain-general of the marine. He died much respected, 5th Nov. 1673. He was the author of an History of Venice, undertaken at the request of the senate, the best edition of which is that of 1679, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote also an account of his embassy in France.

NANNIUS, Peter, born at Alcaer, 1500, was professor at Louvain, and died 1557. He wrote, Learned Notes on Classic Authors—Miscellaneorum Decas, 8vo.—Dialogues on Heroines, 4to. an excellent work—Paraphrase on the Canticles—a translation of the Psalms into Latin verse.

NANTIGNI, Lewis Chazot de, a French writer, author of Historical Genealogies of Kings, Emperors, and other Sovereigns of Europe, 4 vols. 4to.—Geographical Tables, 12mo.—Genealogies in the Supplement to Moreri, 1749—Historical, Genealogical, and Chronological Tables, 9 vols. He died at Paris, after being blind three years, 1755, aged sixty-five.

NANTUEIL, Robert, a French painter and engraver of eminence, born at Rheims, 1630. He was well educated, though his father was poor, but his exertions were not sufficiently rewarded at home, and therefore he went to Paris, in quest of employment and patronage. He particularly excelled in taking likenesses in crayons, and his portrait of Louis XIV. was executed with such dexterity and elegance, that the monarch liberally rewarded him with one hundred louis, and gave him a pension, with the new appointment of designer and engraver to his cabinet. Thus patronised, he soon gained a considerable fortune, and in the gratitude of his heart, sent for his aged father to share his honors and his independence. He died at Paris, December 18th, 1678. His works have been collected, and consist of about 240 prints.

NAOGEORGUS, Thomas, a native of Straubingen, in Bavaria, 1511. His real name was Kirchnayer, but was altered according to the fashion of the times. His satires, which possessed merit, were chiefly directed against the papists, and their many irregularities. His best work is Regnum Papisticum, 1559, 8vo. He died 1578.

NAPOLEON I. (Napolcon Bonaparte), emperor of the French was born, August 15, 1769, at Ajaccio, in Corsica, of a noble family, was educated at the military school of Brienne, and entered the artillery service, as a second lieutenant, in 1785. He served at the sieges of Lyons and Toulon, to the reduction of which latter city he greatly contributed; and he subsequently displayed high talents in the French army which assailed Piedmont on the Geneose frontier. In October, 1795, he commanded the force which victoriously defended the convention against the revolt of the Parisians. He now married Josephine Beauharnois, the widow of viscount de Beauharnois. Early in 1796, he was placed at the head of the French army in Italy, and here began his career of glory. In the campaigns of 1796 and 1797, he overran the whole of Italy, repeatedly defeated with inferior numbers the Piedmontese and Austrians, reduced all the Italian powers to submission, and at length compelled the emperor to sign a peace. On the 19th of May, 1798, Bonaparte, with a formidable armament, sailed to conquer Egypt; and, in his way thither, he took possession of Malta. Having subjugated Egypt, he invaded Syria; but his progress was stopped at St. John of Acre, by Sir Sidney Smith, and he returned to the banks of the Nile. There he learned the reverses which his countrymen had sustained in Europe; and, in consequence, leaving Kleber to command the troops, he embarked for France, and landed in safety at Frejus, October 9, 1799. On the 9th and 10th of November, he overthrew the directorial authority, and was raised to the supreme power, under the title of First Consul. His first care was to restore internal tranquillity by a system of moderation and order; his next was, to restore the military preponderance of his country. Having collected an army on the frontier of Switzerland, he, by almost miraculous exertions, led it over the Alps, and by the battle of Marengo, fought on the 14th of June, 1800, he recovered the whole of Italy. A peace ensued with the emperor, and, next, with England. The latter, however, was broken at the expiration of little more than a year. His life was, in the meanwhile, endangered by two conspiracies. In 1804, he was raised to the dignity of emperor, and was crowned by the pope; and, in the following year, he was proclaimed king of Italy. While he was preparing, at Boulogne, for an invasion of England, a league was formed against him by Austria and Russia, and he hastened to meet those powers in the field. The battle of Austerlitz, on the 2nd of December, 1805, dissolved the coalition, and obliged Austria to accept a humiliating peace. In 1806, Napoleon created several kings, and put himself at the head of the Confederation of the Rhine. Prussia declared war against him in the same year; but her army was utterly routed at the battle of Jena; and though, with the aid of Russia, she maintained the contest a while longer, she and her ally were under the necessity of making peace in July, 1807. Spain was unwisely and unjustly attacked by Napoleon in 1808, and this contest, which continued till 1814, was one of the causes of his downfall. In 1809, while he was thus occupied, Austria once more took up arms against him. The struggle was an obstinate one; but the decisive victory of Wagram, on the 5th and 6th of July, again compelled her to submit to the victor. Desirous of an heir to the crown of France, Napoleon, in 1810, divorced the Empress Josephine, and married Maria Louisa, a daughter of the Austrian emperor. A son, born in March, 1811, was the fruit of this union. Disputes now arose between France and Russia, which ended in war. Napoleon, in June, 1812, invaded the Russian territory with a mighty force, gained several battles, and made himself master of Moscow; but he was at length under the necessity of retreating, and nearly the whole of his army was destroyed, by the inclemency of the winter and the sword of the enemy. Prussia now joined the victorious monarch of Russia. Yet, in the following campaign, Napoleon defeated the allies at Lutzen, Bautzen, and Wurtzen, and would, perhaps, have conquered them, had not Austria united with them. The battle of Leipsic drove back Napoleon within the limits of France; and, in 1814, France was invaded on all sides. With a comparatively insignificant force, Napoleon nevertheless gained several victories over the invaders; but partly the overwhelming numbers of his enemies, and partly the treason of some of his generals, at length compelled him to abdicate, and to accept the sovereignty of Elba. At Elba, however, he did not long remain. At the head of only one thousand two hundred men, he landed at Frejus, on the 1st of March, 1815, and expelled Louis the Eighteenth from his kingdom. But nearly all Europe once more confederated against him; he was vanquished at Waterloo; and was a second time forced to abdicate. In this emergency he threw himself on the generosity of the British government. That government exiled him to St. Helena, where he expired, on the 5th of May, 1821, of cancer in the stomach; a disease the progress of which was probably accelerated by the climate, and by the vexations to which he was sedulously and perpetually subjected. Not merely one of the most consummate generals whom the world ever saw, but possessed, too, of splendid and varied talents, and of some virtues, Napoleon might have held a throne till the last moment of existence, had not his fatal ambition, and his repugnance to the principles of liberty, led him astray from the path of true glory, and rendered him at once an object of dislike to the friends of freedom, and of terror to the surrounding nations.

NAPIER, or NEPER, John, baron of Merchiston, was born near Edinburgh, 1550. He studied at the university of St. Andrew's, and after making the tour of France, Italy, and Germany, he returned to Scotland, and devoted himself assiduously to mathematical pursuits. His abilities were of a superior cast, and he has rendered his name immortal by the discovery of logarithms, published 1614. This science was afterwards further improved by himself, and also by Mr. Briggs, geometrical professor of Gresham college. Lord Napier published also an useful work, called Rabdology and Promptuary. His invention of the five circular parts in trigonometry, and the mode of calculation by rods, called Napier's rods, or bones, were very ingenious contrivances. He is also author of an "Essay on the Apocalypse," which proves his knowledge of theology in a very honorable degree. He died at Manchester, 1617. His life has been written by lord Buchan.

NARES, James, doctor of music, and brother to judge Nares, was born at Stanwell, Middlesex, 1715. He was one of the choristers of the royal chapel, and studied under Mr. Gates, and afterwards Dr. Pepusch, and in 1734 became organist at York. In 1755 he was appointed organist and composer to the king, in the room of Dr. Green, and the next year he took his musical degree at Cambridge, and in 1757 was made master of the choristers, which he resigned in 1730 to his pupil and friend, Dr. Ayrton. He died 10th February, 1738. He was highly respected by the great, and by men of learning, and his works are much admired, especially the Royal Pastoral, an ode, the words of which were written by Mr. Bellamy.

NASH, Thomas, an ingenious writer, born at Leostoff, in Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge. He took orders, but his irregularities were in the way of his preferment. His poems, chiefly directed against the puritans, and especially his "Pierce Pennyless," possess merit, but with their satire, breathe nothing but disappointment and disgust at the ingratitude of mankind. He died about 1600.

NASH, Richard, an extraordinary character, born at Swansea, Glamorganshire, 18th October 1674. From Carnarthen school he went to Jesus college, Oxford, where he became known more for his love of pleasure, and his intrigues, than for his application or industry. From college, where his extravagances gave offence to his superiors, he entered the army, and obtained a pair of colors; but this profession he soon relinquished for a town life, and the study of the law at the Temple. Admired and courted as a jovial companion, he became the arbiter elegantiarum of the fashionable world, and when the Middle Temple, according to custom, exhibited an entertainment for king William, Nash had the management of the ceremony, which was so well conducted, that the monarch offered him the honor of knighthood, which he declined. In 1704 Nash went to Bath, which now began to be a place of resort, and being elected master of ceremonies, by the influence of his friends, and the popularity of his own character, he soon made that city the resort of the gay, the fashionable, and the opulent. Under his direction the greatest regularity was made to prevail in the public rooms, and Bath, lately known to few, became the centre of attraction for persons in the higher rank of life. In the midst of this gay assemblage, Nash supported his expenses chiefly from the gaming table; but with this vicious propensity, predominant in his character, he was humane, generous, and charitable, and though persecuted by creditors, he has often been known to bestow on the cravings of indigence, what was due from him to patient industry. Flattered with the appellation of the king of Bath, and called in his gayer days, beau Nash, this umpire of fashion continued his career of genteel dissipation, though his income was precarious, and his resources depended on chance. In the decline of life, it is said, that he became very poor, and that the presents which formerly he had received from the partiality of the great, and the favor of the opulent, were all disposed of, to support his necessities. His last moments brought with them displeasing reflections, and he expired in great agitation of mind, 3d February 1761, aged 87. As he had so much contributed to the celebrity of Bath, and had been the chief promoter of the building of an hospital, the people of the city shewed due respect to his remains, which were conveyed with becoming funeral pomp to the abbey church, and there interred.

NASH, Francis, a soldier of the American revolutionary war, was a captain in the state of North Carolina, in 1771, during an insurrection. He was appointed a colonel in the revolutionary army by the convention of North Carolina in September 1775, and brigadier-general in the continental army in February 1777. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Germantown, October 4, 1777.

NASH, Treadway Russel, D.D. an English antiquary and provincial historian, who was a clergyman of the established church. Becoming possessed of a considerable estate in Bevere, near Worcester, he employed his time and fortune in the investigation of the antiquities of the country; and in 1782, he published "Collections for the History of Worcestershire," 2 vols. folio, comprising materials collected by the Habingtons in the seventeenth century, and augmented by Dr. Thomas and Bishop Lyttleton. Dr. Nash was a fellow of the society of Antiquaries, and he published, in the Archæologia, "Observations on the time of the Death and Place of Burial of Queen Katharine Parr." He also edited Butler's Hudibras, in 3 vols. 4to. His death took place in 1811, at the age of eighty-seven.

NASMITH, James, a divine, was born at Norwich in 1740, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1773 he was presented to the living of St. Mary Abchurch, which he exchanged for Snailwell in Cambridgeshire. He took the degree of doctor in divinity in 1797; and his last preferment was the rectory of Leverington, in the isle of Ely, where he died in 1808. Dr. Nasmith published "A Catalogue of Benet college Library;" an edition of the "Itineraries of Simon and William of Worcester," 8vo.; a new edition of Tanner's Notitia Monastica; a pamphlet entitled "An Examination of the Statutes relating to the Assize of Bread," &c.

NATALIS, Michael, an engraver of Liege. From the house of his father, who instructed him in the art of engraving, he went to Rome, and studied under Joachim Sandraart. His engraved representations of statues, after the paintings of Rubens, Titian, and others from the Justinian gallery, were much admired. He died 1670, aged 61.

NATHAN, Isaac, or Mordecai, the first who published a Hebrew Concordance, which he completed 1448, after ten years' labor. It was first printed at Venice, 1523, and afterwards improved by Buxtorf, and edited by Basil, 1632.

NATTIER, John Mark le, a French painter, born 17th March, 1635. His designs for the Luxembourg gallery have been engraved and printed, 1 vol. folio, 1710. He was professor in the academy of painting, and was patronised by Louis, but he declined the liberal invitations of the Czar Peter to settle in Russia. He died 1766.

NAVAGERO, Andrew a noble Venetian, whose abilities were employed as ambassador to Francis I. He died of a fever at Blois, 1529, aged 44. He was engaged in writing the History of Venice, but burnt the work in his last illness. His poems are preserved in the "Carmina, Poetarum Italarum," and his other works were printed at Padua, 1718, 4to.

NAVAGERO, Bernard, of the same family as the preceding, was bishop of Verona, and a cardinal. He assisted at the council of Trent, and died 1563, aged 58. He wrote the Life of pope Paul IV.

NAVARRE, Peter, a famous warrior in the 16th century. He was born in Biscay, of an obscure family, and after being for some time a seaman, he entered into the service of cardinal Aragon as valet. He next served in the army of the Florentines, and then engaged in the sea service, where he distinguished himself by his valor. Known for his bravery, he was employed by Gonsalvo de Cordova in the Neapolitan wars, as captain, and he contributed much to the taking of Naples by the judicious management of a mine. His services were rewarded by the emperor, who gave him the domains of Alveco, in Naples, from which he assumed the name of Navarre. He afterwards sailed in an expedition against the Moors of Africa, and took possession of Oran, Tripoli, and other fortified places; but part of his army was defeated by the Moorish cavalry. His campaigns in Italy afterwards were unfortunate, and he was taken at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and for two years endured captivity in France. The ill treatment of the Spanish king determined him to enter into the service of Francis I. and he distinguished himself in several expeditions, but in his attempt to relieve Genoa, he was taken by the imperial troops. For three years he languished in the dungeons of Ceuf, till the treaty of Madrid set him free. He was at the siege of Naples in 1523 under Lautree, and was taken prisoner at the retreat of Aversa, and again sent to the dungeons of Ceuf. Here his life was spared by the duke of Orange, and either in compassion for his misfortunes and his valor, or because he was laboring under a severe illness, he was not beheaded with the rest of the captives who were devoted to destruction. He died soon after, though some assert that he was strangled in his bed in an advanced age. An account of his life has been published by Paul Jovius, and by Philip Tomasini.

NAVARETTA, Ferdinand, a Spanish Dominican, of Old Castille, whose eloquence was employed as a missionary in China, 1659. He was well acquainted with the language of the country, and on his return to Spain 1672, he went before the pope to account for his mission. He was made by Charles II. archbishop of St. Domingo, where he died 1689. He printed at Madrid, in Spanish, his treatise, Historical, Political, and Moral, of China, but only one folio volume appeared, as the two others were suppressed by the inquisition.

NAUCLERUS, John, a native of Swabia, who changed the name of Vergeau into that of Nauclerus, and became professor of law at Tubingen, and provost of the cathedral. He died at the beginning of the sixteenth century. His Chronicle from the Creation to the year 1500, is a work of merit, of which the best edition is that of Cologne in folio, 1570.

NAUDE, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 12th February, 1600. After studying with great assiduity at Paris, he went further to improve himself to Padua, where he took his degrees in physic. In 1631, he was made librarian to cardinal Bagni, at Rome, and after his death he was with equal liberality patronised by Barberini. He was invited by Richelieu to Paris, and was treated with great kindness by his successor Mazarine, over whose library he presided, and from whom he received several benefices. He attended Christina at the court of Sweden, but did not remain long there; and the fatigues of his journey threw him into a fever, of which he died at Aberville, 29th July, 1653. He wrote, Apology for great Men who have been accused of Magic, 12mo.—Advice for forming a Library—Addition to the Life of Louis XI.—Bibliographia Politica—Synagma de Studio Militaria—de Studio Liberali—A Discourse against Libels.

NAUDE, Philip, a mathematician, born at Metz, 1654. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to Berlin, where he became professor of mathematics, and member of the academy. He died there 1729, much respected. He published a "treatise on Geometry," in German, 4to. and was succeeded in his professorship by his son, who died 1745.

NAVIER, Peter Toussaint, a native of St. Dizier, who died at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1779. He practised as a physician, and is eminently known for his discovery of nitrous ether, and the combination of mercury with iron, hitherto regarded as impossibilities. His knowledge in epidemical disorders was very great, and his prescriptions very successful; and to the truest meekness and modesty, he united the highest humanity and benevolence. He wrote a Dissertation on common Diseases—Observations on the softening of the Bones—Reflections on the Danger of Hasty Burials, and the Abuses of Interments in Churches—Antidotes against Arsenic, 2 vols. 12mo—on the Use of Burgundy in Putrid Fevers—and de Thermis Borboniensibus, 4to.

NAYLER, James, a quaker, born at Ardsley, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1616. He was in 1641, a private in the parliamentary army, and rose to the office of quarter-master under Lambert, but quitted the military life in 1649. The preaching and conversation of George Fox, converted him to quakerism, 1651, and thinking himself now divinely inspired, he became an itinerant minister of his persuasion. In 1656, he was imprisoned for his extravagant conduct at Exeter, where his followers addressed him as the prince of peace; and afterwards, when liberated from confinement, he went to Bristol; he was accompanied by an enthusiastic cavalcade, who sang before him, holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of hosts, Hosanna in the highest. This fanatic zeal was noticed by the parliament; Nayler was accused and condemned, as guilty of blasphemy, and as an imposter, he was exposed in the pillory, and whipped, and branded on the forehead, his tongue was bored through with a red hot iron at the Old Exchange, and he was then imprisoned in Bridewell for life. After two years' imprisonment he was set at liberty, and in 1660, he left London to return to Wakefield, to his wife and family, but died by the way, and was buried at King's Ripon. His writings have appeared in an 8vo. volume, 1716.

NEAL, Daniel, an English historian and divine, born in London in 1678, and educated in Merchant Taylors' school. He afterwards went to Utrecht and Leyden. In 1706, he was elected pastor of a congregation of Independents in Aldersgate street. He wrote a History of New England in 2 vols. 8vo., and a History of the Puritans in 4 vols. 4to., with some other works. He wrote also A Narrative of the Method and Success of Inoculating for the Small-Pox in New England, which led to an interview with the prince and princess of Wales, afterwards George II. and queen Caroline. His History of the Puritans is of considerable authority, and very honorable to the talents of the author. It called forth the Vindication of the Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship of the Church of England, as established in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, from the injurious Reflections of Mr. Neal's First Volume, 8vo., from Dr. Madox, bishop of St. Asaph: to which he published a reply, which he calls a Review of the principal Facts objected to, &c. His remaining volumes were reviewed in a similar spirit by Dr. Zachary Grey, to which Neal never replied, but an answer appeared, in a new edition of Neal, so late as 1797, 5 vols. 8vo., by Dr. Toulmin. Mr. Neal died in 1743.

NEANDER, Michael, a learned protestant, born at Soza in Silesia, 1523. He was made rector of the university of Ilfeldt, and presided over it for forty years, and at Pfortsheim, where he died 26th April, 1595. He was author of Erotemata Linguae Græcæ, 8vo.—a Hebrew Grammar—Pindarica Aristologia—Gnomologia.—There was a physician of the same name, who died at Jena 1581, author of Synopsis Mensurarum & Ponderum, 4to. 1555.

NECHO, or the PHAROAH NECHO of scripture, was king of Egypt after his father Psammetichus. The expedition which his ships undertook from the Red sea round the coast of Africa to the entrance of the Mediterranean, is famous, and was completed in three years. Necho marched against Assyria, and in his way defeated the Jews under Josiah, but was afterwards routed, and returned in disgrace. He died about 600 B. C.

NECKER, Noel Joseph, a native of Flanders, who applied himself to botany and to medicine, in which sciences he obtained celebrity. He wrote Deliciae Gallo-Belgicæ Sylvestres, 2 vols. 12mo—Physiologia Muscorum, 8vo.—Methodus Muscorum, 8vo.—Hist. Nat. du Tassilage, 8vo.—Elementa Botanica—Eclaircissemens sur la Propagation, 8vo. He died at Manheim 1793, aged 64.

NECKER, James, a native of Geneva, known as a financier. He was at first member of the council of two hundred at Geneva, and then went as ambassador from the republic to France, where in 1765, he obtained the office of syndic to the East India company, and in 1775, was made director of the Royal treasury. His abilities were so highly respected, that he was, though a foreigner, twice elevated to the rank of prime minister of France; but the revolution, to which, as some imagine, his financial schemes had imperceptibly contributed, destroyed his popularity, and he yielded to the storm and retired to Switzerland, where he died at Copet 1804, aged 72. He is author of a work on the Finances of France, 3 vols.—and a treatise on the Influence of Religious Opinions. His wife was the daughter of a protestant divine, and she rendered herself known not only by her writings, but by the amiable virtues of her character. When her husband was raised to the highest offices of France, she did not assume the manners of supercilious pride, but continued the friend of the learned, and the protectress of the poor, whose necessities she relieved with a liberal hand. Among her illustrious friends were Thomas and Buffon. She followed her husband's disgrace to Copet, where she died 1795. Her works are a treatise on Hasty Burials, 8vo.—Memoir on the Establishment of Hospitals—Reflections on Divorce—Miscellanies from her MSS. published after her death. Her daughter by Mr. Necker, married harou de Stael Holstein, the Swedish ambassador at the court of France, and she has acquired some celebrity not only by the intrigues which she carried on during the revolution, but by "Delphine," a romance, full of indecent and irreligious sentiments.

NEEDHAM, Marchionant, an English writer, born at Burford, Oxfordshire, August, 1620. He was educated at All Souls' college, and St. Mary's hall, Oxford, then accepted the place of usher in Merchant Taylors' school, and at the breaking out of the civil wars, became writer to an attorney at Gray's inn. Here he engaged in the publication of a periodical paper, called Mercurius Britannicus, in which he favored the republican party; but afterwards he was reconciled to the royalists, obtained the king's pardon, and began to serve his cause by his Mercurius Pragmaticus. This, however, soon endangered his safety; he was imprisoned by the parliament in Newgate, and then persuaded to embrace the cause of the independents, which he again did with warmth in his new paper, called Mercurius Politicus. He had in the mean time studied physic, and taken his degrees, and on the return of Charles II. he obtained his pardon under the great seal, and practised as a physician, much respected among the dissenters. He died suddenly 1678. He was a man of great abilities, but his change of principles according to the prevalence of party, rendered him suspected, and despicable. Besides his Mercuries, he wrote various political pamphlets, which, though read with avidity in his time, are not now worth recording.

NEEDHAM, John Tuberville, a Roman catholic, born in London 1713, and educated at Douai. His abilities recommended him to be professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon, and afterwards he became travelling tutor to several English and Irish noblemen. He was fellow of the London Royal society, and was appointed rector of the academy of sciences at Brussels, where he died 1781. Though a learned, he was a very superstitious character. He wrote Enquiries on Microscopical Discoveries, and Organized Bodies—Observations on Spallanzani's Discoveries—Enquiries on Nature and Religion—besides some Observations inserted in Buffon's Natural History.

NEEDLER, Benjamin, a native of Lalan, Middlesex, educated at Merchant Taylors', and at St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards minister of Margaret Moses, Friday-street, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He then settled at North Warnborough, Hants, where he died June, 1682. He wrote an Exposition of the first five chapters of Genesis.

NEELE, Henry, an ingenious poet and novel writer, who died by his own hand, February 9, 1823, in a fit of insanity, supposed to have originated from too intense application to study. He was the son of an engraver, and was educated for the profession of a solicitor, which he practised with reputation in London till his death. He was a man of amiable disposition, and inoffensive manners, and highly respected by his acquaintance. Among his publications are "Poems;" "Dramatic Scenes;" and the "Romance of History," 3 vols. 12mo., a series of tales relating to persons and events mentioned in the annals of his own country. As a poet Mr. Neele seems to have formed himself on the model of Collins, and several of his odes possess great power of picturesque personification, and otherwise display considerable mastery and spirit.

NELLER, George Christopher, a learned divine, belonging to the cathedral of Treves, and counsellor to the elector. He wrote, Dissertatio de Decretis Basilensibus—de Primatu S. Ecclesie Trevirensis—Hermania inauguralis in Balduani Trev. Documentum,—de Juribus Parochi Primitivi—de Genuina Idea & Signis Parochialitatis,—de Solido Ficto, de Solido Speciei Argento. He died at Treves, 1784, aged 74.

NELSON, Robert, a celebrated Englishman, generally called the Pious Nelson, was born in London, 22d June, 1656. He was educated at St. Paul's school, and afterwards privately, by Dr. G. Bull, of Saddington, Gloucestershire, and then sent to Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1680 he was admitted fellow of the Royal society, and in the same year he began his travels in the company of his friend Dr. Halley. He visited Paris, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he became acquainted with lady Theophila Lucy, the rich widow of sir Kingsmill Lucy, bart. and daughter of lord Berkeley, whom he married on his return to England. This lady soon after declared herself of the catholic persuasion, but though she spoke and wrote in favor of her principles, against what her husband published, their mutual affection was never diminished by controversy, or embittered by religious disagreements. Firm in his principles, Nelson remained attached to his creed, and to his sovereign, and he not only refused to transfer his allegiance to William, but declared himself a non-juror. This conduct did not render him less dear to his many respectable friends; he was still regarded by Tillotson, though they disagreed in political opinions, and such was their attachment, that the venerable prelate was attended in his last illness by his worthy friend, and died in his arms. About the end of 1709, he returned to the communion of the church of England, and in this he yielded to the arguments of some able and pious divines. He was, about 1713, attacked by an asthma and dropsy in the breast, of which he died at Kensington, 16th January 1714-5. This great, learned, and amiable man wrote various works, the best known of which are his Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England, 8vo. a useful work, often reprinted. He wrote besides, the Practice of True devotion, 12mo.—Transubstantiation contrary to Scripture, 4to.—the Great Duty of frequenting the Christian Sacrifice, 8vo.—the Life of his friend bishop Bull, 8vo.—a Letter to Dr. Clarke on his Doctrine of the Trinity—Address to Persons of Quality,—the Whole Duty of a Christian, in question and answer—a Letter on Church Government.

NELSON, Horatio viscount, an illustrious English seaman. He was the fourth son of the Rev. Edward Nelson, and was born 29th September 1758, at Burnham Thorpe, Norfolk, of which his father was rector. At the age of twelve, when the nation was threatened with war, he entered on board the Raisonable of sixty-four guns, under his maternal uncle captain Maurice Suckling. Soon after that ship was put out of commission, and the young seaman went to the West Indies, in the merchants' service, but again joined his uncle on board the Triumph, and in 1773 was permitted to accompany the expedition which was sent under the command of captains Phipps and Lutwidge on a voyage of discovery to the North pole. He rose to the rank of lieutenant in April 1777. In June 1779 he obtained under admiral Peter Parker, the appointment of post captain, and the command of the Hinchinbroke, and when an attack was expected in Jamaica from the French forces under D'Estaing, the youthful hero was intrusted with the care of the batteries of Port Royal, and the defence of Kingston and Spanish Town. The next ship which he commanded was the Janus, of forty-four guns, and soon after he was removed to the Albemarle, and continued on the American station with sir Samuel Hood till the peace. In 1783 he visited France, and the next year he was appointed to the Boreas of twenty-eight guns, at the Leeward islands, and during his continuance in this station he married, March 1787, Frances Herbert Nesbit, widow of Dr. Nesbit, of Nevis. He returned to England, November 1787, and retired to Burnham Thorpe, in the bosom of domestic happiness, till 1793, when the war with France called upon him for the exertion of his great talents. He obtained the command of the Agamemnon, of sixty-four guns, and joined lord Hood in the Mediterranean, where he assisted at the taking of Toulon, and at the siege of Bastia, in which he superintended the disembarkation of the troops, and ably commanded the batteries. He afterwards had a gallant encounter with five French ships of war, and then supported the siege of Calvi, where he lost the sight of his right eye. Under the next commander, lord Hotham, he continued to distinguish himself, particularly in the engagements with the French fleet, 15th March and July, 1795, and in the blockade of Genoa. When admiral Jervis succeeded in the Mediterranean command, the brave hero removed from the Agamemnon to the Captain, of seventy-four guns, and soon after obtained a commodore's pendant, and was employed in the blockade of Leghorn, and the taking of Porto Ferrajo. On his passage to Gibraltar, in the Minerva frigate, he fell in with two Spanish frigates, one of which, the Sabine, of forty guns, he took, and sailing immediately to join admiral Jervis, he was pursued by two ships of the Spanish fleet, a circumstance which was quickly communicated to the commander-in-chief, and in a few hours produced a general action. In this memorable fight, on the 14th February 1797, in which fifteen English ships defeated a Spanish fleet of twenty-seven ships, and took four three deckers, the commodore behaved with his usual gallantry. For his gallant conduct on this occasion, he was created knight of the Bath, and in April 1797, he was made rear admiral of the blue, and appointed to the command of the inner squadron in the blockade of Cadiz. After making some vigorous, but unsuccessful attacks on the town, he was sent by lord St. Vincent, to take the town of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, but though he obtained possession of the place for seven hours, he was unable to reduce the citadel, and therefore was permitted to retire unmolested to his fleet. During this desperate attack he lost his right hand, which was shattered by a shot. In consequence of his wound, the gallant admiral received a pension of £1000. Among other marks of public favor, he received the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, worth one hundred guineas; but these honors excited him to greater exertions, and he soon after joined in the Vanguard, lord St. Vincent, and was sent up the Mediterranean to watch the motions of the French ships, which were ready to convey Bonaparte to the invasion of Egypt. Notwithstanding his vigilance, the fleet escaped, but he sailed in its pursuit, and after returning from the Egyptian shores to Sicily, almost in despair, he again hastened to the mouth of the Nile, and to the general joy of his fleet, perceived the enemy moored in an advantageous situation in the bay of Aboukir, flanked by strong batteries, and supported by gun boats. The attack immediately began, and by a bold manœuvre on an unknown shore, part of his ships sailed between the enemy and the land, and thus exposed them to a double fire. The action continued with increasing violence during the night, and the sudden explosion of the French admiral's ship, the l'Orient, of one hundred and twenty guns, added to the terrors of the scene. Of the whole fleet, only two men of war, and two frigates were able to escape. The fame of this victory, which thus captured or destroyed eleven sail of the line, was received with general exultation by the people of England. In the mean time these services did not pass unrewarded; the brave admiral was created a baron, by the title of Nelson of the Nile, with the grant of a pension of £2000 pounds more; the sultan honored him with an aigrette, or plume of diamonds, and pelisse, and the king of Naples conferred on him a valuable estate in Sicily, with the title of duke of Bronte. Soon after his return home, where he was received with enthusiastic joy by every rank of society, lord Nelson was called away to break that confederacy which the capricious politics of the emperor of Russia had formed with Denmark and Sweden against his country. In consequence of this, the gallant admiral embarked as second in command, under sir Hyde Parker, and after passing through the Sound, in defiance of the batteries, he volunteered to make an attack on Copenhagen, 2d April, 1801. After a most vigorous defence, the Danes saw their strong batteries silenced, and seventeen of their men of war either sunk, burnt, or taken. A conference with the crown prince immediately succeeded this glorious victory, and after peace was restored by the heroic admiral, between the two countries, the fleet sailed to complete its triumph over the hostile squadrons of Sweden and Russia; but the sudden death of the emperor Paul rendered further exertions unnecessary. For these services, which were chiefly attributed to him, and not to the commander in chief, lord Nelson was created a viscount, and his honors made hereditary in his family, even in the female line. In August, 1801, he made an unsuccessful attack on Boulogne, but the negotiations for peace prevented the destruction of the armament in that harbor, which his ardent mind would, no doubt, have accomplished. The short-lived peace of Amiens restored him, for a little time, to retirement; but on the recommencement of hostilities, in 1803, he was summoned from his beloved retreat at Merton, to take the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean. Notwithstanding his active vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and from the Mediterranean, and after being joined by the Cadiz squadron, they sailed to the West Indies, but he pursued them with rapidity, and nearly came up to them near Antigua. Such, however, was the terror of his name, that they returned in consternation, back to Europe, and before their entrance into Cadiz, had a partial action, near Ferrol, with sir Robert Calder. Thus baffled in his attempts to overtake his terrified enemy, lord Nelson returned to England for the re-establishment of his health, but in a few weeks he was again prevailed upon to take the command of the fleet with very unlimited powers. On the 19th of October, 1805, Villeneuve, with the French fleet, and Gravina with the Spanish, sailed from Cadiz, and on the 21st, about noon, the English squadron had the satisfaction to close with them off cape Trafalgar. The carnage on both sides was dreadful, and the heroic chief, unfortunately not covering the star, and other insignia, which he wore on his person, became a marked object to the musketeers who were placed in the tops of the enemy's ships. A musket ball, from one of the riflemen of the Bucantaur, struck him in the left breast, and in about two hours after, he expired in the arms of victory. Of the thirty-three ships of the line in the combined fleet, which thus engaged the inferior number of twenty-seven English ships, sixteen were destroyed, four were carried to Gibraltar, six escaped into Cadiz, mere wrecks, and four which retired from the action, were thirteen days after, captured by sir R. Strachan's squadron. As a professional character, Lord Nelson possessed a mighty genius, an ardent spirit, and a resolute mind; cool, prompt, and discerning in the midst of dangers, he roused all his powerful energies into action, and the strong faculties of his soul were vigilantly exerted in the midst of the fury of battle, to make every accident contribute to the triumph of his crew, and to the glory of his country. So highly established was his reputation, that his presence was a talisman to the courage of his sailors, who fought under him as sure of victory, and regarded his approbation as the best solace for their fatigues and their sufferings. In his manners he was polished and gentle; he was no stranger to the mild charities of human nature, and in his heart he felt all the emotions of a devout and pious christian. His despatches from Aboukir, in which he attributed his success to the interference of Providence, excited sentiments of respect and admiration through the nation, and it was on that memorable occasion, that his venerable father exclaimed, Oh, my great and good son!

NELSON, Thomas, was a native of Virginia, and educated in England. He was a member of the general convention of Virginia in 1775, and introduced a resolution for organizing a military force. In the same year he was sent from that state to congress, and was one of the signers of the declaration of independence. During the revolutionary war he was employed in a military capacity, and at one time was commander-in-chief of the forces of Virginia. In 1781, he was chosen governor of Virginia. He died 1789, aged 50.

NELSON, Roger, general, a soldier and patriot of the American revolution, was a member of congress from the state of Maryland. He died 1815.

NEMOURS, Mary d^e Orleans, daughter of the duke de Longueville, was born 1625. Her Memoirs of the War of the Fronde are valuable, as containing anecdotes of the principal characters and events of her time, under the minority of Louis XIV. They are printed with those of de Retz and Joli, and have been translated into English, in 8 vols. 12mo. She died 1707.

NEPOS, Cornelius, a Latin historian, patronised by Augustus. Of all his works there only remain the lives of illustrious Greek and Roman generals, a composition of singular elegance, and highly interesting.

NERI, Philip de, an eminent historian, born of an honorable family at Florence, 1485. He was one of the forty-eight magistrates called senators, chosen by duke Alexander 1552, and after a life devoted to public services, he died at Florence, 17th January, 1556. His History of Florentine Affairs from 1214 to 1537, appeared at Augsburg, 1728, in folio.

NERI, St. Philip de, a native of Florence, celebrated as the founder of the congregation of the priests of the oratory in Italy, whose duties were to administer to the wants of the poor, to attend the sick, and to relieve strangers and distressed pilgrims. He died 1595, aged 80, and was canonized by Gregory XV. in 1622.

NERI, Pompeo, a Florentine, law professor at Pisa, eminently distinguished in the affairs of Maria Theresa, and of the duke of Lorraine. He was founder of the botanical academy at Florence, and died there, 1776, aged 69. He was the learned author of Observations on the Tuscan Nobility—on the Imports of Milan—on the Legal Value of Coin, and the difficulty of settling it. Anthony, the author of the Art of making Glass, printed at Florence, 1612, was also of this family.

NERO, Claud. Donit. Cæsar, a Roman emperor after Claudius, A.D. 50. The beginning of his reign was marked by humanity and virtue, but soon after, Nero showed himself vindictive, cruel, and licentious; his mother was inhumanly murdered, and every species of oppression and debauchery was indulged. Rome was set on fire, that the tyrant might behold the disasters of which he had read in the conflagration of Troy, and the virtue and honor of the senate and the people were insulted and trampled upon. At last, a conspiracy was formed to rid the world of the bloody tyrant, who in the moment of his distress, when deserted by his flatterers, destroyed himself, A.D. 68.

NESBIT, Thomas, son of the lord president Nesbit, of Dirlton, was born at Edinburgh, 1672. He was well skilled in antiquities and heraldry, and wrote a Vindication of Scottish Antiquities, preserved in MS. in the advocates' library, Edinburgh. He died at Dirlton, 1725.

NESLE, N. de, a native of Meaux, known by his writings. His poem, called Sansounet, in imitation of Vert Vert, is much admired. He wrote besides, the Modern Aristippus—the Prejudices of the People, 2 vols.—the Prejudices of the Ancients. He died in indigent circumstances at Paris, 1767, in an advanced age.

NESSE, Christopher, a native of Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. When ejected from his church at Leeds, in 1662, for non-conformity, he opened a school for ten years, and afterwards, in 1675, came to London, where he preached to a dissenting congregation. He wrote the Christian's Walk and Work on Earth, 8vo.—the Christian's Crown and Glory, 12mo.—Church History from Adam—Antidote against Popery—a Divine Legacy—the History and Mystery of the Old and New Testament, 4 vols. folio. He died 1705, aged 84.

NESTORIUS, a Syrian, who became bishop of Constantinople, 431. He was deposed for refusing to assent to the doctrine of the incarnation of the Redeemer, and his followers are still found in the eastern parts of the world.

NEUBAUER, Ernest Frederic, a native of Magdeburg, author of Academic Dissertations—Explanations of Scripture—Lives of the Divinity Professors of Giessen—sermons, &c. died at Giessen, where he was professor of antiquities, and of theology, 1748, aged 43.

NEUBAUER, Francis, a native of Bohemia, educated at Prague and Vienna. He was celebrated for his skill in music, and was musician to the chapel of the prince of Nassau. His compositions were much admired, but he unfortunately disgraced himself by immoderate intoxication. He died in 1795.

NEUMANN, Caspar, an eminent German chemist of the eighteenth century. He was at first an apothecary at Berlin, where his skill in pharmacy and chemistry attracted the notice of Frederick III. elector of Brandenburg and king of Prussia, who supplied him with the means of pursuing his studies at the university of Halle. He afterwards travelled for improvement in England, France, and Italy; and on his return to Berlin he was nominated professor of chemistry at the Royal college. He took his medical degree at Halle in 1727, and was honored by the king with the title of aulic counsellor. He died in 1737. Neumann contributed to the progress of science by his writings, which comprise some important facts and observations, and are still valuable, though more recent discoveries have overturned the theories which prevailed in his time. His chemical works were translated into English, and published in 1759, 4to. and in 1773, 2 vols. 8vo.

NEVE, Timothy, a native of Wotton, near Ludlow, Shropshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He afterwards kept a school at Spaulding, and became successively canon of Peterborough, prebendary of Lincoln, archdeacon of Huntingdon and rector of Alwalton, Huntingdonshire, where he died about 1740. He communicated, in 1727, to the Spalding society, of which he was the joint founder, an essay on the invention of printing, and on our first painters.

NEVERS, Philip Julia Mazarine Mancini, duke de, nephew of Mazarine, was born at Rome, and acquired some reputation by supporting Pradon against Racine. He wrote some sonnets, and poetical pieces, which were admired as the compositions of a duke, but possessed little merit. He died 1707, aged 76.

NEVISAN, John, an Italian lawyer, born at Asti. He studied at Padua, and taught at Turin. He is known by his work Sylvæ Nuptiales, 8vo. in which he asserts curious things, but without order or connection. It is said that the women of Turin were so offended against him on account of this book, in which he spoke with disrespect of the sex, that they drove him in disgrace with stones from the city, and would not suffer him to return before he entreated pardon on his knees. He died 1540.

NEUVILLE, Charles Frey de, a jesuit of Coutances, long known as an eloquent preacher in the capital. After the banishment of his order he retired to Compeigne, where he lived in privacy, and died 13th July, 1774, aged 81. He wrote sermons, 8 vols. 12mo. la Morale du Nouveau Testament, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. His brother, Peter Claude, was also a jesuit, and author of sixteen sermons. He died at Rennes, 1773.

NEUVILLE, Didier Peter Chicanau de, a native of Nancy, in the service of Stanislaus, king of Poland. He afterwards became professor of history at Toulouse, and died there October, 1781, aged 61. The best known of his writings is Dictionnaire Philosophique, 8vo.

NEWCOMB, Thomas, son of a clergyman in Herefordshire, was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1734, he became rector of Stopham, Sussex, and afterwards lived at Hackney, it is said in distressed circumstances. He was author of various original poems, and among other things turned Hervey's Meditations into blank verse, and also the Death of Abel from the German. The school which he established at Hackney has long continued to enjoy celebrity.

NEWCOME, William, D.D. a learned Irish prelate, born at Abingdon, Berkshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at the grammar school of his native place, and then elected on the foundation of Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was afterwards appointed tutor to Mr. Fox, at Hertford college, and to this connexion he was indebted for his elevation in the church. He became successively bishop of Ossory and Waterford, and was afterwards translated to Armagh, by lord Fitzwilliam, when lord lieutenant. This venerable prelate was a man of amiable manners, and as a scholar was eminent for his learning, and his extensive acquaintance with biblical knowledge. He died in Ireland, 1799, aged 70. His publications were very respectable, and particularly a letter to Dr. Priestley, on the Duration of our Lord's Ministry, 8vo.—Observations on our Lord's Conduct, 4to.—an improved Version of the 12 Minor Prophets, 4to.—Another Version of Ezekiel—a Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to our Lord's resurrection—an Historical Review of the English Biblical Translations, and after his death, his Version of the New Testament appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. He was member of the Royal Irish academy.

NEWCOMEN, Matthew, a non-conformist divine, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. As member of the Westminster assembly of divines, he assisted in the drawing up of their catechism, and he was one of the five divines who attacked bishop Hall's Vindication of Episcopacy. This curious work was called Smectymnus, from the initials of the authors' names, Stephen Marshal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, William Spurstow. He was ejected from the living of Dedham, Essex, in 1662, and then retired to Leyden, where he died, 1666.

NEWELL, Samuel, a missionary at Bombay, graduated at Harvard college, 1807. He sailed for Calcutta in 1812. Soon after his arrival he was ordered by the government to quit the country. He first proceeded to the Isle of France, and then to Ceylon. In 1817 he went to Bombay where he continued till his death in 1821, aged 35. He wrote with Mr. Hall, "The conversion of the world, or the claims of six hundred millions," 1818.

NEWELL, Harriet, the wife of the preceding, was the daughter of Mr. Moses Atwood, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, and born there, October 10th, 1793. She possessed a superior mind, enjoyed an excellent education, and early became a professor of religion. On the arrival of the missionaries at Calcutta, being directed by the government to leave that country, Mr. and Mrs. Newell proceeded to the Isle of France, where she died on the 30th November, 1812. She was a woman of uncommonly amiable disposition, and interesting manners, and by her intelligence, piety, and devotedness to the cause in which she was embarked, rendered herself an object of unusual interest and respect to all who became acquainted with her character and history.

NEWLAND, Peter, a learned Dutchman, son of a carpenter at Dimmermeer, near Amsterdam, where he was born, 1764. He was possessed of strong natural powers, so that at the age of ten he wrote poetry with elegance, and could resolve, without the instruction of a master, some of the most difficult problems of geometry. These great talents were happily encouraged by the government; the young prodigy was made one of the commissioners of longitude, and afterwards he filled with great ability the chairs of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht and Amsterdam. He wrote poems in Dutch, on the Means of enlightening a People—on the General Utility of Mathematics—on Lavoisier's System—on the form of the Globe—on the Course of Comets, and the Uncertainty of their Return—on ascertaining the Longitude at Sea—a Treatise on Navigation. He died 1794.

NEWMAN, Francis, governor of the colony of New-Haven, Connecticut, was in 1653, with several others, appointed an agent to governor Stuyvesant at Manhadoes, to obtain satisfaction for the injuries which the Dutch had inflicted on the colony. He was afterwards one of the commissioners of the United Colonies, and for a long time secretary during the administration of governor Eaton. In 1658 he was appointed governor of the colony, and continued in the office till his death in 1661. He was a man of great piety and prudence.

NEWMAN, Samuel, was a native of Banbury, England, and born in 1600. He was educated at the university of Oxford, and for many years was an able minister of the established church. In 1638 he came to Massachusetts, and after spending several years at Dorchester and Weymouth, settled at Rehoboth, where he remained greatly esteemed for his talents and piety till his death, in 1663. He compiled a concordance of the Bible superior to any which had before appeared. It was published in London in 1643, and on being republished in England with considerable improvements, was called the Cambridge Concordance. His poverty compelled him, while laboring at it in the evening, to use pine knots for light.

NEWTON, John, D.D., an English mathematician, born at Oundle, in 1622. He entered, in 1637, at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he applied to astronomy and mathematics. After the restoration he was rewarded for his loyalty, and made chaplain to the king, and appointed rector of Ross, in Herefordshire, where he died Christmas day, 1678. He wrote Astronomia Britannica, in three parts, 4to.—Help to Calculation, with Tables of Declination, Ascension,—Trigonometria Britannica, fol.—Geometrical Trigonometry—Chiliades Centum Logarithm.—Mathematical Elements—Perpetual Diary—Ephemerides—Introduction to Rhetoric—Cosmography.

NEWTON, sir Isaac, a most illustrious philosopher, born of a very ancient family, settled at Woolstrop, Lincolnshire, where he was born Christmas day, 1642. From Grantham school, where he was placed at the age of twelve, he was removed at eighteen to Trinity college, Cambridge, as he seemed to prefer studious pursuits to the management of his estate. At Cambridge, under the care of the famous Isaac Barrow, he began to apply to mathematics, but his powerful mind so easily comprehended the elements of Euclid, that he quickly passed to higher pursuits, and paid attention to Descartes's analytical method, which then was very popular, and as he proceeded in his studies he made marginal notes. In 1664, he discovered a new method of infinite series and fluxions, which he afterwards greatly improved, and the same year he took his bachelor's degree. His next pursuit was the grinding of optical glasses in one of the figures made by the three sections of a cone, for the improvement of telescopes, but not succeeding as he expected, he procured a glass prism, to make experiments on the phenomena of colors, lately discovered by Grimaldi; and the result of his skilful researches gradually matured his new theory of light and colors.—Whilst he reflected on this discovery that light was not homogeneous, but a heterogeneous mixture of refrangible rays, he was obliged to quit Cambridge in 1665, by the plague, and he retired to his house, where, though deprived of the assistance of his books, new truths were to be opened to his active mind. Whilst he was sitting alone in his garden, the falling of some apples from a tree led his thoughts to the subject of gravity, and considering that this power is not sensibly diminished, at the remotest distance from the centre of the earth, even at the top of the highest mountains, he thought that it must be extended much farther. Why not as high as the moon? was his next question to himself; therefore the moon may be influenced by this power of gravity, and retained in her orbit, and the whole planetary system moving round the sun as their common centre may obey this great principle, which, however, as he calculated, must decrease in strength in the duplicate proportion of the increase of distance. The further examination of this important subject was deferred, as he returned to Cambridge; and in 1667, being elected fellow of his college, he devoted all his attention to the construction of a reflecting telescope. In 1669, he succeeded to the mathematical chair at Cambridge, on the resignation of his friend Dr. Barrow, and for three years he delivered lectures on the discoveries which he had made in optics, and communicated his theory of light and colors, which he had brought to a great degree of perfection, to the Royal society, of which he was elected member in 1672. Some time after he presented to the same learned society his telescope, with a description of its properties. While laboring on the problems of his great system, his attention was attracted to the comet of 1680, and by repeated experiments he proved the truth of Kepler's supposition, about the motion of the primary planets, and after establishing his conclusions on the most infallible proofs, he in 1687 published, at the request of the Royal society, the result of his astronomical pursuits, under the title of Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica. In 1703 he was elected president of the Royal society, and for twenty-five years he adorned the chair of that learned body till his death. He also was made honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and received every mark of distinction from the learned of the continent. When he published, in 1704, his theory of light, after establishing its truth by repeated experiments, during the space of thirty years; he also made mention of his discovery of the nature of fluxions, which since 1672, had engaged his attention, but had not been communicated to the public; yet by mean suggestions Leibnitz laid claim to the merit of discovering them. While the Acta Eruditorum of Leipsic attributed the honor to the German philosopher, Keill of Oxford undertook the defence of his friend, and proved, by the clearest evidence, and from extracts from the papers of the Royal society, that this system, so important in mathematics, originated first in the genius of Newton. In 1715 Leibnitz proposed to the English philosopher his famous problem on the trajectories, which, while it might have puzzled other mathematicians, was resolved by Newton in a few hours, after the labors and the fatigues of the day. This great man, who had been in 1705 knighted by queen Anne, became a great favorite at the court of George I. and the princess of Wales, afterwards queen Caroline, took infinite pleasure in the conversation of the philosopher. As she had an uncommon genius for mathematics and astronomy, she often said, she considered herself happy in being born in an age when she could enjoy the conversation and the instruction of so illustrious a philosopher. At the request of the princess he drew up his abstract of chronology, but a copy of it was imprudently communicated to signor Conti, a Venetian, who with illiberal effrontery had it printed at Paris, and at the same time engaged some of the French literati to attack and abuse it. This drew a defence from Newton, inserted in the philosophical transactions, and soon after he published the work himself. On the night of the 11th March 1726-7, his intellects were visibly affected, and he continued insensible till he expired nine days after, aged 85. Sir Isaac had the happiness of enjoying during his life the fame, the honors, and the rewards which seldom attend the learned and the great, but which often are lavished with insulting profusion on their remains or their posterity. In his person this great man was of a middle stature, his countenance was pleasing and venerable, though it did not display that deep and penetrating sagacity which are every where perceptible in his writings. He never made use of spectacles, and it is said he lost only one tooth during the whole of his life. In his temper he was meek and unassuming, and so great a lover of peace and harmony, that he kept some of his publications from the eye of the public, that he might not excite the envy and the malice of opponents or rivals. With great powers of mind, and with a comprehension which embraced at one view the meaning of every subject to which he directed his attention, and overleaped as trifling, all the difficulties which had arrested the progress of other philosophers, he was thus enabled to shed lustre on the age in which he lived, and the country which gave him birth, and to introduce such astonishing improvements, and make such stupendous discoveries in science, in mathematics, and in astronomy, as would each of them individually have bestowed immortality. To his other great qualities he added the virtues of piety, and religious infidelity he marked with abhorrence; no remark of levity or indifference on the powers of the deity, or on revelation, ever was made in his presence without drawing from him the severest censure; and while he made the bible his favorite study, he employed some portion of his time in proving the great truths of the prophetic writers of scripture. His most valuable works have been collected and published, together with an excellent commentary, 1784, in 5 vols. 4to. by bishop Horsley.

NEWTON, Richard, D.D., a learned divine, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Westminster, and Christ church, Oxford. He distinguished himself as an able tutor, and in 1710, was inducted principal of Hart Hall. By the friendship of bishop Compton, he obtained the rectory of Sudbury, Northamptonshire, and in 1753 he was preferred to a canonry of Christ church by the interest of the duke of Newcastle, to whom he had been tutor. In 1740 he obtained a charter to erect Hart Hall into a college, and to separate it from the superintendence of Exeter college, to which it belonged, and this he effected at great expense, and was himself the first principal. He died at Lavendon Grange, deservedly respected, 21st April, 1753. He wrote a book against Pluralities and Non-residence—on University Education—and also edited Theophrastus, with notes in English, which work is said to have brought him 1000*l.* which he nobly applied in endowments on his college.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English bishop, born at Lichfield, 1st December, 1703. From Lichfield school he entered at Westminster, and in 1723 was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge. When in orders he removed to London, and became curate, afterwards assistant preacher at St. George's, Hanover square, and next, afternoon preacher to Grosvenor chapel. He was afterwards tutor to lord Tyrconnel, and in 1744 he obtained St. Mary-le-Bow rectory, Cheapside, by the friendship of the earl of Bath. In 1747 he was chosen lecturer of St. George's, Hanover square, and that year married the daughter of Mr. Trebeck the rector. He published in 1749 his edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, with useful notes, and a well written life. In 1756 he was made king's chaplain, and then prebendary of Westminster, and precentor of York, and 1761 he was nominated bishop of Bristol with the residentiaryship of St. Paul's, which he exchanged in 1763 for the deanery. Satisfied with his ecclesiastical honors he determined to solicit no more, and kept his word. He died at the deanery, 14th February, 1782, aged 79. He lost his wife in 1754, and in 1761 married a second, a daughter of John lord Lisburne, widow of Mr. Hand, whom he describes as an amiable and excellent woman. His dissertations on the prophecies in 3 vols. 8vo. is a work of great merit. He also preached Boyle's lectures. After his death, his miscellaneous works, with memoirs of his life by himself, were published.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English divine, born at Presbury, Cheshire. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Cambridge, and then obtained the grammar school at Macclesfield. Besides divinity, he paid attention to medicine, and practised with credit. He died at his living of Ilford, Essex, 1607. He was author of the History of the Saracens, 4to. —Approved Medicines, and Cordial Receipts, 8vo. —Illustrium Aliquot Anglorum Encomia, 4to. —Directions for the Health of Magistrates and Students —Herbal of the Bible, 8vo.

NEWTON, John, an exemplary divine, was born in London in 1725. He was bred to the sea under his father, who was master of a merchant-vessel. Afterwards he sailed in the Guinea trade, and led a very irregular life for some years; but at last he grew both serious and studious. By indefatigable diligence he attained a knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages; and in 1764 was ordained on the curacy of Olney in Buckinghamshire, where he became acquainted with Cowper, the poet, and Mr. Thornton, the banker; the latter of whom presented him, in 1779, to the living of St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard-street. He died in 1807. His works are—1. A Narrative of his own Life, 12mo. —2. A Review of Ecclesiastical History, 8vo.—3. Olney Hymns, in which are some by his friend Cowper—4. Omicron's Letters on Religious Subjects—5. Cardiphonia, or the Utterance of the Heart, 2 vols.—6. The Messiah, a Series of Sermons, 2 vols.

NEY, Michael, a French Marshal, prince of the Moskwa, duke of Elchingen, denominated "the bravest of the brave" by his countrymen, was the son of an artisan, and was born, in 1769, at Sarre Louis. He entered the army in 1787; exerted himself so much in the early campaigns of the revolution that he was called the Indefatigable; and rose to the rank of brigadier-general in 1796. He bore a part in all the achievements of the army of the Rhine, particularly the battle of Hohenliinden. In all the campaigns from 1805 to 1814, Ney held high commands, and constantly signaled himself by his military skill and his daring valor. He was made a peer by Louis XVIII., and was placed at the head of an army to stop the progress of Napoleon in 1815. Ney, however, went over, with his army, to his former sovereign, and fought for him at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. On the second restoration of the Bourbons, he was condemned to death, and was shot on the 7th of December, 1815.

NICAISE, Claude, a celebrated antiquary in the seventeenth century, descended from a respectable family at Dijon, where his brother was proctor-general of the chamber of accounts. He became an ecclesiastic, and was made a canon in the holy chapel at Dijon; but devoted himself to the study of antique monuments. In 1656 he resigned his canonry, and went to Rome, where he resided many years; and after his return to France, he held a correspondence almost all the learned men of Europe. This with took up a great part of his time, and hindered him from enriching the public with any large works. He published a Latin dissertation De Munnio Pantheo; An Explanation of an Antique Monument found at Guicenne, in the diocese of Aach; and a Discourse upon the form and figure of the Syrens, in which, following the opinions of Huet, bishop of Avranches, he undertook to prove that they were in reality birds, and not fishes or sea-monsters. He translated into French, from the Italian, a piece of Bellori, containing a description of the pictures in the Vatican, to which he added a Dissertation upon the Schools of Athens and Parnassus, two of Raphael's pictures. He wrote also a small tract upon the ancient music; but while he was laboring to explain that antique inscription, Minervæ Arpativæ, which was found in the village of Velley, he died there in October, 1701, aged 78.

NICAUSIS, or BALKIS, according to the Arabians, is the name of the famous queen of Sheba, whose visit to Solomon is mentioned in scripture. She reigned in Arabia Felix, or according to Josephus, in Egypt and Ethiopia.

NICEPHORUS, Gregoras, a Greek historian, author of a History of the Eastern empire, from 1204 to 1341, printed in 1702, Paris, 2 vols. folio, and also other works. He was a great favorite of the emperor Andronicus.

NICEPHORUS, Calistus, a Greek historian who flourished in the same age as the preceding. His ecclesiastical history extends from the birth of Christ to 610, the best edition of which is that of Paris, 1630.

NICEPHORUS, Blemidas, a monk of mount Athos in the 13th century, who, as attached to the Romish church, refused to accept the dignity of patriarch of Constantinople. His two treatises concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, were printed at Rome, 1659.

NICEPHORUS I. chancellor of the Eastern empire, seized the throne 802, and banished the empress Irene to Mitylene. Though attacked by his seditious subjects who raised Bardanes one, of his generals, to the throne, he overcame all opposition, till the Bulgarians appeared against him. He fell in battle, 811.

NICEPHORUS II. Phocas, a nobleman of Constantinople, so popular that his virtues elevated him to the throne, 963, on the death of Romanus the younger, whose widow he married. He attacked the Saracens with spirit and success, but at last was assassinated by John Zimisces, 969.

NICEPHORUS III. a Russian general raised to the throne of Constantinople by his army. He was three years after, 1081, deposed by Alexis Comnenus his general, and soon after died of grief in a monastery.

NICERON, John Francis, an eminent mathematician, born at Paris, 1613. He took the habit of the Minims, but though regularly employed in their ecclesiastical affairs, either as visitor or professor, he devoted much of his time to his favorite study of optics. He died at Aix in Provence, 22d September, 1646, but though only 33 years of age, he was author of some valuable works, especially l'Interpretation des Chiffres, &c.—Thaumaturgus Opticus, sive Admiranda Optices, Catoptrices, & Dioptrices.

NICERON, John Peter, the celebrated author of "Memoirs of Men Illustrious in the Republic of Letters," was born at Paris, March 11th, 1685, of an ancient family. He early determined to forsake the world, and therefore took the habit of a Barnabite jesuit 1703, and then studied at Montarges, Loches, and Poitiers. He became a very popular preacher, and to a great fondness for laborious studies, he brought an extensive knowledge of ancient and modern languages. He died after a short illness, 8th July, 1738. Besides his Memoirs, a valuable work, of which the first volume appeared in 1727, and the 39th in 1733, to which three more have been added, he wrote a translation of Hancock's book on the Virtues of Common Water, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Conversion of England to Christianity—Ouvington's Voyages.

NICETAS, Arhominates, a Greek historian, born at Chone, or Colossus in Phrygia. He fled from Constantinople when taken by the French 1204, and settled at Nice in Bithynia, where he died 1206. He wrote an History or Annals from 1118 to the death of Baldwin, 1205, of which a translation appeared at Basil, by Wolsius, 1557, and Geneva, 1593.

NICHOLAS, Wilson Cary, governor of Virginia, was an officer in the American revolutionary war. He was for many years a member of congress from Virginia, both in the senate and house of representatives. In 1814 he was chosen governor of Virginia and held the office until 1817. He died 1820.

NICHOLS, William, D.D. an English divine, born at Donington, Bucks, 1664. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, afterwards of Wadhani, and in 1684 was elected fellow of Merton. He was chaplain to lord Montague, and became rector of Selsey, near Chichester; but it appears from a letter of his to Robert, earl of Oxford, that he was disappointed in his expectations of a promised prebend in the church of Westminster. His life was usefully devoted to study, and to acts of piety. He died about 1712. His works were numerous and valuable; the best known are Conference with a Theist, 2 vols. 8vo.—Defensio Ecclesie Anglicanæ, 1707, 12mo. afterwards published in 8vo. and in English—a Commentary on the Liturgy of England, in 8vo. and folio, a very useful book—and Religion of a Prince.

NICHOLS, John, an antiquary and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1744, at Islington; was apprenticed to Bowyer the printer, and became his partner; conducted The Gentleman's Magazine for nearly half a century; and died November 26, 1826. Among his works are, The History and Antiquities of Liecestershire; Anecdotes of Bowyer; Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century; and Illustrations of the Literature of the Eighteenth Century.

NICHOLS, Richard, governor of New York and New Jersey, was one of the four commissioners appointed in 1664, to inquire into the state of the colonies, to determine complaints in the various departments of the governments of New England, and to subdue the Dutch at Manhadoes. They reached Boston in July, and soon proceeded against the Dutch; and governor Stuyvesant surrendered the government in August. After an administration in New York, in which he conducted with great prudence, integrity, and moderation, Nichols returned to England, and was succeeded by colonel Lovelace, in 1667. The government of New Jersey he reigned to Carteret, in 1666.

NICHOLLS, Frank, a physician, born in London, 1699. He was educated at Westminster and Christ church, Oxford, where he became reader of anatomy. His lectures were popular, but it has been observed that his remarks on subjects of anatomy, tended to inculcate infidelity in his pupils. He was physician to George II, and published an account of his death in the philosophical transactions. He wrote besides, a tract de Animâ Medicâ—de Motu Cordis & Sanguinis in Homine, and died in 1779, aged 80.

NICHOLSON, Sir Francis, governor of Virginia, was by profession a soldier, and was lieutenant-governor of New York under Andross, and at the head of the administration from 1687 to 1689. He entered on the government of Virginia in 1690, and continued till 1692, highly popular. From 1694 to 1699, he was governor of Maryland. He was then again appointed to the government of Virginia, but was greatly disliked by the people. He was superseded in 1705. He was appointed commander of the forces sent, in 1710, against Canada, where he captured Port Royal, and also of the unsuccessful expedition of the next year. In 1713, he became governor of Nova Scotia, and in 1720, of Carolina, where he exercised a useful administration. He returned to England in June, 1725, and died in London, March 5, 1728.

NICHOLSON, James, an officer in the American roy, was born in Chestertown, Maryland, in 1737. He followed the life of a sailor till the year 1763, when he married and settled in the city of New-York. Here he remained until 1771, when he returned to his native province. At the commencement of the revolution, the government of Maryland built and equipped a ship of war, called the Defence, and the command of her was entrusted to Nicholson. He performed various exploits during the war, and before the close of it was taken prisoner and carried into New York. He died in 1806.

NICHOLSON, William, an able writer on natural philosophy and chemistry, was born, in 1753, in London; was, successively, in the maritime service, agent on the continent for Mr. Wedgwood, a mathematical teacher, and engineer to the Portsea water works; and died in indigence, in 1815. His chief works are, An Introduction to Natural Philosophy; A Dictionary of Chemistry; and The Navigator's Assistant. In 1797 he established the scientific Journal which bears his name, and which he conducted till his decease.

NICIAS, an Athenian, who distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and was sent by his countrymen with Demosthenes and Eurymedon, to the conquest of Sicily. The expedition was unfortunate, and after two years' siege, the Syracusans attacked and defeated their invaders, and Nicias was cruelly put to death B. C. 413.

NICOLAI, John, a native of Monza, near Verdun, who took the habit of the Dominicans, and was for twenty years professor of theology at Paris, where he died 1673, aged seventy-nine. Besides an edition of the works of Thomas Aquinas, in nineteen vols. folio, he published some Dissertations on Ecclesiastical Discipline—a tract against Arnould, and other theological works.

NICOLAI Christopher Frederic, a German author, who was also a bookseller, was born at Berlin, in 1733, and died there in 1811. Among his numerous works are, The Life and Opinions of Scaldus Nothanger; A Tour in Germany and Switzerland; and Characteristic Anecdotes of Frederic II. He also edited The Library of Belles Lettres; Letters on Modern Literature; The German General Library; and The New German General Library; the whole forming nearly two hundred volumes.

NICOLAS I. surnamed the Great, was elected pope after Benedict III. 858. He sent ambassadors to Constantinople, and pronounced an anathema against Photius, the patriarch, which proved the cause of the schism which separated the Greek and the Latin churches. He died 867, much respected for his zeal, firmness and charity. His letters were published at Rome, 1542, in folio.

NICOLAS II. Gerard of Burgundy, became archbishop of Florence, and in 1058 was elected pope. He is the first whose coronation is mentioned in history. He was opposed by John, bishop of Valettri, under the name of Benedict X. but he soon destroyed the power of his rival. He extended the papal authority over some of the Norman princes in Lombardy and Naples, and died 1061.

NICOLAS III. John Gaetan, was elected pope after John XXI. 1277. He sent missionaries into Tartary, but with little effect; and he was guilty of some oppressive actions to enrich his family. He died of an apoplexy, 22d August 1280.

NICOLAS IV. N. de Rubois, was a native of Ascoli, and was raised to the popedom 1288, an honor which he accepted with much reluctance. He published a crusade against the infidels for the recovery of Jerusalem, but died before the plan was brought to maturity, 4th April, 1292. He was a man of learning, and wrote some Commentaries on Scripture.

NICOLAS V. Thomas de Sarzanne, bishop of Bologna, was a native of Luni, and was elected pope 1447, on the death of Eugenius IV. He succeeded in restoring peace to the church, which had been torn to pieces by the interests and the intrigues of rival popes, and he gained universal respect by his great wisdom and moderation. He celebrated this happy era by a jubilee in 1450, which drew to Rome an immense multitude of people. The conspiracy which was formed against him by Stephen Porcario, and the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the consequent calamities of the Christians, are said to have afflicted him so heavily that he died of grief, 24th March, 1455, aged 57.

NICOLAS of Cusa, son of a fisherman, rose by his merit, and assisted at the council of Basil 1481, and showed such eloquence that Eugenius IV. employed him as his ambassador at Constantinople, in Germany and France. He was patronised by succeeding popes, and made bishop of Brixen. He died at Todi, 11th August 1454, aged 53. He wrote several works on theological subjects.

NICOLAS of Lyra, so called from the place of his birth, near Evreux in Normandy, was a Jew, but was converted to christianity 1291, and took the habit of the Minors. He taught divinity with great reputation at Paris, and obtained the confidence of Jane, queen of Philip V. and was one of the executors of her will. He died at Paris, 23d October 1340. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, edited at Antwerp, 1634, in 6 vols. folio—a Disputation against the Jews, folio—Treatise against a Jewish Rabbi.

NICOLAS of Munster, founder of a sect, called the Family, or House of Love, about 1540, pretended to be inspired by the Holy Spirit, and therefore declared himself greater than Jesus Christ. He had many followers, and supported his doctrines by various publications, such as the Land of Peace—the Gospel of the Kingdom. Some of the followers of this sect appeared in England 1604, and they presented to James I. a profession of their faith.

NICOLAS EYMERICK, a Dominican of Girronne, inquisitor against the Vaudois, under Innocent VI. was author of the Directory of Inquisitors, printed in folio, 1687, and died in his native country 1399.

NICOLE, Claude, was born at Chartres, 1611, and became king's counsel, and president in the elections of Chartres. He died there, 22d November 1685. He was a good linguist, and wrote poetry, though his compositions were rather licentious. His works were printed at Paris, 1660, in 2 vols. 4to. and again, 1693, 2 vols. 12mo.

NICOLE, Peter, an eminent French divine, son of John, above-mentioned, was born at Chartres, 10th October 1625. He studied at Paris with great assiduity, and was for some time engaged in instructing youth under the society of Port-royal. He assisted his friend Arnould in the composition of some of his pieces; but his letter to Innocent XI. in the defence of the bishops of St. Pont and Arras, exposed him to persecution, and he withdrew from Paris. He afterward returned, but soon quitted it for a residence in Flanders. He returned afterwards under a feigned name to Chartres, and died there of an apoplectic fit, 16th November 1695. He was a man of great abilities; his erudition was extensive, his judgment solid, but he was little acquainted with the world; and his defence of the Jansenists, and latterly his support of Bossuet against the Quietists, raised him enemies in France, and caused an unpopularity which his private virtues did not deserve. His works are not less than one hundred in number, but chiefly on controversial subjects. His Moral Essays, and his Treatise on preserving Peace in Society, are much admired.

NICOLE, Francis, a native of Paris, distinguished for his extensive knowledge of mathematics. His essay sur la Theorie des Roulettes—his Traité du Calcul des Differences Finies—and his Traité des Lignes du Troisième Ordre, are most convincing proofs of the acuracy of his researches, and of the depth of his genius. He first became publicly remarkable by detecting the fallacy of a pretended quadrature of the circle. This quadrature, a M. Mathulon so assuredly thought he had discovered, that he deposited in the hands of a public notary at Lyons the sum of three thousand livres, to be paid to any person who, in the judgment of the Academy of Sciences, should demonstrate the falsity of his solution. M. Nicole undertook the task, and the academy's judgment was, that Nicole had plainly proved that the rectilinear figure which Mathulon had given as equal to the circle, was not only unequal to it, but that it was even greater than the polygon of thirty-two sides circumscribed about the circle. He was member of the academy of sciences, and died 10th January 1758, aged 75.

NICOLSON, William, D.D. a learned bishop, born at Orton, Cumberland, 1655. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he became fellow 1679. He was patronised by the bishop of Carlisle, who gave him a prebend and the archdeaconry of that church, and in 1702, he succeeded his patron in that see. He was translated in 1718, to Londonderry in Ireland, and in January 1726-7, he was raised to the see of Cashell, but died the 13th February following, before he took possession of his new dignity. He was a learned man, well skilled in antiquities. He published several things the best known of which are his descriptions of Poland, Denmark,—the English Historical Library—and Tracts on the Bangorian Controversy.

NICON, patriarch of the Russian empire, was born of mean parentage about 1613. He had a strong prejudice in favor of a monastic life, and the loss of his children determined him to assume the habit of a monk, and to send his wife to a convent. His austerities, as well as his learning, by degrees raised him to public consequence; he was patronised by his sovereign, and at last made archbishop of Novogorod, and patriarch of Russia. Some innovations which he introduced into the church, and the publication of the bible in the Russian language raised him enemies among the clergy, and at last by intrigue and violence he was obliged to abdicate his high office, 1658, and to be imprisoned; but the emperor Feodor permitted him to retire to the privacy of his original cell. He died 1679, after enduring much undeserved persecution. He is the author of a chronicle of Russian affairs, to the reign of Alexiowitz, printed at Petersburg, 2 vols. 4to. 1767.

NICOT, John, master of requests to the French king, was born at Nismes. He was ambassador from France to Portugal, from whence he brought tobacco, which in compliment to him was called by the French, Nicotiana. He wrote a French and Latin dictionary, folio—a treatise on Navigation—the Treasure of French Language, and died, 1600, at Paris.

NIDHARD, John Everard, a jesuit, born at Falkenstein in Austria. He accompanied the archduchess Mary when she married Philip IV. of Spain, and in this new situation he became a great favorite with the Spanish monarch. After the death of Philip, he was made by the queen's mother inquisitor general, and minister; but his abilities were not adequate to the administration of the political affairs of a kingdom. Flushed with the pride of power, he treated the nobles with insolence. You ought to respect me, said he one day to his rival, the duke of Lerma, for I daily have your God in my hands and your queen at my feet. The weakness and incapacity of his government appeared by the successes of Louis XIV. in the Netherlands, and in Franche Comté, and the favorite at last gave way to the intrigues of his enemies, and retired to Rome, as ambassador from Spain. He was made a cardinal by Clement X. and bishop of Edessa. He died 1st February 1681, aged 73.

NIEBUHR, Carsten a celebrated traveller, was born, in 1733, at Ludingsworth, in the dutchy of Lauenberg; was sent, in company with four other learned men, by the Danish government, in 1761, to explore Arabia; was employed for six years on that mission, and was the only one who returned; was liberally rewarded by the Danish monarch; and died in 1815. Among his works are, A Description of Arabia; and Travels in Arabia and the neighboring countries.

NIEBUHR, G. B., a son of the foregoing, was, successively, professor at the university of Berlin, counsellor of state, and Prussian ambassador to the pope. While he was at Rome, he discovered some valuable fragments of two of Cicero's orations. He died in 1830. His great work is 'The History of Rome, which is far superior to most of its rivals.

NIELD, James, celebrated for his benevolence and philanthropy, was born at Knutsford in Cheshire, England, May 24, 1744. He was in the first instance designed for agriculture, but in his sixteenth year he became apprentice to a goldsmith in London, and when out of his time commenced business in St James's street, where he realized a handsome fortune. Having been much impressed by a visit which he paid, early in life, to the king's Bench prison, and possibly smitten by the example of the benevolent Howard, he explored all the prisons of the country with a view to the amelioration of human wretchedness, and the alleviation of the misery of his fellow-creatures under confinement. It was his constant practice in these excursions to wait upon the magistrates in the cities and boroughs, and represent to them what he saw amiss in their jails, or what his experience might suggest for their improvement. In this manner he occupied himself for thirty years, producing many substantial benefits, and by his example and communications to the Gentleman's Magazine, exciting kindred beneficence in others. This excellent person was also the prime founder of the society for the relief and discharge of prisoners confined for small debts, formed in 1773, and to which he was unanimously appointed treasurer. Mr. Nield died universally lamented, February 16, 1814.

NIEUHOFF, John de, a Dutchman who went as ambassador from the Dutch East India company, to the emperor of China, in the middle of the 17th century, of which he wrote an interesting account, translated into French by Le Carpentier. It is also to be found in Churchill's collection.

NIEUWENTYIT, Bernard, a learned Dutchman, born at Westgraafdyk, North Holland, 10th August 1654. He studied with unusual assiduity, and became a great philosopher and mathematician, and obtained high reputation as a physician, and as the upright and respected chief magistrate of Purmerende. He died 1730. He wrote in Latin, Considerations on the Analysis of Quantities infinitely small—Analysis of Curves by the Doctrine of Infinites—on the Principles of the Differential Calculus—Contemplations on the Universe, translated into English, in 3 vols. 8vo. called the Religious Philosopher.

NIEWLAND, Peter, a Dutch mathematician, was born, in 1764, at Dimmemeer, near Amsterdam, and died in 1794, professor of natural philosophy, mathematics, and astronomy, at Leyden. Niewland was an instance of precocious talent. At seven years of age he wrote a poem to the Deity, and at eight he solved difficult geometrical problems with uncommon facility. He is the author of various scientific works, and of a volume of poetry.

NIGHTINGALE, Joseph, an English dissenting minister, of considerable literary talent, was born in 1775. Having officiated for some short time to a congregation in the Wesleyan connexion at Macclesfield, he was induced to settle in the metropolis, where he supported himself principally by the exertion of his talents as an author. In this capacity he compiled several volumes of the "Beauties of England and Wales"—"English Topography," folio, 1816—"A Portraiture of Methodism," 8vo. This last work he published in 1807, having previously become a convert to Unitarianism.—"Sermons preached at Hanover-street and Worship-street chapels" 8vo. 1812—and "Reputation of a recent anonymous Pamphlet, entitled a 'Portraiture of Hypocrisy,'" 8vo. 1813. He also published, in 1812, "A Portraiture of Catholicism." His death took place, August 9, 1824.

NIGRISOLI, Jerome, an Italian physician, author of Prognymnasnata Medica, printed at Guastala, 1655. He died at Ferrara 1689, aged 69. His son Francis was also an able physician, author of some useful works, and also of Veterum Chartâ, ejuisque Usu, &c. He died 1727, aged 79.

NIPHUS, Augustin, a famous philosopher, born at Jopoli in Calabria. His works became so popular, that Leo X. created him count palatine, and permitted him to blazon his arms with those of the Medicis. He died about 1550. His works are in Latin and various, and contain commentaries on Aristotle and Averroes, 14 vols. folio—treatises de Amore—de Falsa Diluvii Prognosticatione, 4to.

NISBET, sir John, lord advocate of Scotland in the reign of Charles II. became popular by pleading against the standing militia, and was one of the commissioners appointed about the union of the two kingdoms.

NISBET, Charles, D.D., first president of Dickinson college, Pennsylvania, was a native of Scotland, and for many years the minister of Montrose. During the struggle between Great Britain and her colonies he dared to lift up his voice in favor of the latter. In 1783, on the establishment of Dickinson college, he was chosen its president, and came to America, and entered on the duties of the office in 1785. He died 1804, aged 66.

NIVELLE DE LA CHAUSSEE, Peter Claude, a French poet, born of an opulent family at Paris, 1692. Though favored by fortune he preferred the honors of literature to all other distinctions, and acquired some celebrity by his epistle to Clio, and his dramatical pieces. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris, 14th March, 1754. His pieces possess great merit, and are much esteemed in France. The best are the School of Mothers—Melanides la Gouvernante, comedies—Maximin—Prejugé à-la-mode—George Barnwell, tragedies. These works have appeared in 5 vols. 12mo. 1763.

NIVERNOIS, Lewis Julius Mancini, duke of, minister of state, member of the French academy, and of belles lettres, and well known as a poet, and a writer, was born at Paris 16th December, 1716. He left the military profession to serve his country as ambassador, and he represented his sovereign at Rome, at Berlin, and afterwards in London, where he negotiated the peace of 1763. Distinction at the court, however, had less charms for him than literary fame, and on his return to Paris, he withdrew from political life, and devoted himself to the muses. His poetical imitations of Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Tibullus, Ariosto, and Milton, possess great merit, and singular beauty, and his songs and fables were popular productions in France. During the revolution he was dragged to prison, but he had the good fortune to be liberated, and he died at Paris 1798, at the great age of 82. His other works are Dialogues of the Dead—Letters on the Use of the Mind—Reflections on the Genius of Horace, of Boileau, of J. B. Rousseau—the Life of Abbé Barthelini—Reflections on Alexander the Great, and Charles XII.—Translation of Tacitus' Life of Agricola—Pope's Essay on Man, translated—Portrait of Frederic the Great of Prussia—Adonis and Rich-ardet, from the Italian.

NIZOLIUS, Marius, an Italian grammarian, who published Thesaurus Ciceronianus, or a dictionary of the words and expressions of Cicero, folio—de Veris Principiis, et Verâ Ratione philosophandi, &c. 1553, much admired by Leibnitz. The time of his death is not mentioned.

NOAILLES, Lewis Antony de, D.D. cardinal and archbishop of Paris, was born of an illustrious family, 27th May, 1651. Though by birth duke of St. Cloud, and a peer of France, and the possessor of large domains, he preferred the ecclesiastical state to political distinction. In 1679, he was made bishop of Cahors, and the next year translated to Chalons, and in 1695, to the archbishopric of Paris. In this high dignity he framed excellent regulations for the government of his clergy, and zealously opposed the prevailing doctrines of Quietism, and of Jansenism. In 1700, he was raised to the rank of cardinal, at the request of Louis XIV. who observed to him, that he felt more pleasure in obtaining for him the hat, than he would in receiving it. The manner in which he sanctioned "the Moral Reflections," of Pasquin Quesnel on the New Testament brought him unwarily into trouble. Some of the jesuits accused the author of heresy and sedition, and the archbishop shared in the censure, and after appeals to pope Clement XI. there was issued from Rome 1713, the famous bull called "Unigenitus," which condemned the Moral Reflections as improper and dangerous. The clamor of the jesuits, increased by the intrigues of father Tellier, prevailed, the cardinal was exiled, but afterwards restored to favor, and his persecutor Tellier disgraced. The cardinal died at Paris, 4th May, 1729, and his remains were entombed in the cathedral. His brother Gaston succeeded him at Chalons, and died 1720.

NOAILLES, Adrian Maurice, duke de, son of Anne Julius duke of Noailles, was born 1678. He early devoted himself to the military service, and attended his father in the campaigns of Catalonia in 1693, and 1694. He was afterwards employed under Vendome, and then served in Flanders in 1696, and in 1700 he accompanied the young king of Spain to Madrid, and in the war of the Spanish succession maintained the honor of his nation and the prowess of his family. His intimacy and alliance with Madame de Maintenon secured his favor with the monarch, and in 1708 he was named general of the French armies in Roussillon, where he obtained some important advantages. He took the strong town of Gironne in 1710, and contributed to the submission of all Arragon, and for his services he was made a Spanish grandee by Philip V. and also raised to the honor of duke and peer of France. After the death of Louis XIV. he was made by the regent, president of the council of the finances, and admitted into the council of the regency, but the elevation of cardinal du Bois to the ministry proved his disgrace. He was recalled on the death of du Bois, by the regent, and restored with increased honors to the ministry, and in the campaign of 1733, he was invited to serve in the army. He distinguished himself at the siege of Philipsburg, and was rewarded with the rank of marshal, and the year after he drove the Germans from Worms. He was in 1735, placed at the head of the French army in Italy, where he gathered fresh laurels, but in the war of 1741, he was less successful. He afterwards abandoned the military profession, and served his country in assisting as a minister at her counsels, and died universally respected 24th June, 1766, aged 88. By his wife, who was niece to Madame Maintenon, he had two sons, both of whom rose to the rank of marshals of France.

NOBLE, Eustache de, a native of Troyes, who rose by his abilities to the appointment of procureur general of the parliament of Metz. An accusation of being guilty of mal-practices all at once robbed him of his reputation and office, and after being imprisoned in the Chatelet, he was banished for nine years. He appealed against this sentence, and was in consequence removed to the prison of the Conciergerie, where he became acquainted with Gabrielle Perreau, generally called la Belle Epicere, a woman of great beauty, and many mental accomplishments. He escaped from his confinement, and was followed by his frail but faithful mistress, by whom he had three children, and at last he finished a life of adventures, wretchedness, and poverty, 31st Jan. 1711, aged sixty-eight, and was buried by public charity. He wrote several things divided into serious pieces, poetry, and romances, collected together in nineteen vols. 12mo. The best known of these are the History of the Dutch Republic, 2 vols.—Account of Genoa—Dissertation on the Year of Christ's Nativity—Secret History of the Conspiracy of the Piazzi against the Medicis—l'École du Monde—History of the dethroning of Mahomet IV.—tales and fables.

NOEHDEN, George Henry, LL.D., a learned German, domiciled in England, and a librarian in the British Museum, was born January 23d, 1770, at Gottingen, and received his education there. At the university, he applied himself to the study of Greek and Roman antiquities, under Heyne, whom he assisted in his edition of Homer; and being in 1791 recommended to an English gentleman, at that time residing in Gottingen, he became tutor to his children, and domesticated in his family, and by means of that connection, he was introduced in the year 1793 to sir William Milner, whose son, the present baronet, he attended at Eton, where he obtained the friendship of Jacob Briant, Herschel, &c. After this, he accompanied a younger son of the family to Gottingen, where he wrote a dissertation De Porphyrii Scholiis in Homerum. In 1800, Noehden published in England, his German and English grammar, which has since gone through five editions, and is thought the best extant. He continued to reside in the Milner family till the death of sir William, in 1811, some time after which, his character and acquirements procured him to be elected one of the librarians of the museum. The year following, (1812,) he translated Goethe's Observations on the Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci, with a prefatory essay and notes; and soon after, succeeded to the superintendance of the Numismatology of the museum. His work on Northwick coins, which now appeared, he had intended to comprise in twelve numbers, but his death in March 1826, prevented its extension beyond the fourth number. Among his papers were found incomplete translations of Winckelmann's History of Art, and of Lessing's Laocoon; memoranda of his travels; and an Introduction to Numismatology.

NOGAROLA, Isotta, a learned lady of Verona. She was well acquainted with philosophy, theology, and the learned languages, and her reputation was so universally known, that cardinal Bessarion went to Verona to converse with her. In a dialogue on the question whether Adam was a greater sinner than Eve in eating the forbidden fruit, she ably defended the cause of the mother of mankind, against Louis Foscaro, who maintained a different opinion. She died 1468, aged 38, universally respected. Not less than five hundred and sixty-six of her letters were preserved in De Thou's library. Her sisters Genevieve and Laura, were equally eminent for their learning and piety. One of the same family, called Antoinetta, was also distinguished for her learning and beauty. She married Salvatico Bonacoli, a nobleman of Mantua; and her daughter Angela inherited her virtues and learning, and acquired celebrity by her explanation of the prophecies and difficult passages of scripture.

NOGAROLA, Lewis, a noble Venetian, well skilled in the Greek language. He translated into Latin, various Greek authors, in a style elegant and correct. He was at the council of Trent, and served his country in several important offices. He died at Verona, 1559, aged 50.

NOIR, John le, an ecclesiastic of Sees, who was persecuted for his heretical opinions, and at last condemned to perpetual imprisonment. He died at Nantes, 22d April, 1692. His works are numerous, and on all subjects of divinity and ecclesiastical discipline, and possess great merit, notwithstanding the charge of heresy, produced against them.

NOLDIUS, Christian, a Danish divine, rector of Lundsroon college, and divinity professor at Copenhagen, was born at Hoyboyen in Scania, 22d June, 1626. He travelled over Germany, Holland, and England, and was universally respected for his learning and virtues. He wrote Concordantia Particularum Hebræo-Chaldaicarum Veteris Testamenti, Jena 1734, 4to.—Historia Idumæa—Sacramentum Historiarum & Antiquitatum Synopsis—Logica—Leges distinguendi, &c. and died at Copenhagen, 1673.

NOLIN, Denys, advocate of the parliament of Paris, quitted his profession for the study of divinity. He wrote Letters of N. Indes, on the Septuagint Version, and dissertations on the French Bibles. He died 1710.

NOLLEKINS, Joseph, an eminent sculptor, the son of a painter, was born in 1737, in London; studied under Scheemaker, and subsequently at Rome, under Cavaceppi; remained nine years in Italy, during which period he gained great reputation as an artist, and also improved his fortune by dealing in antiques; returned to England in 1770; became a royal academician in 1772; and was so extensively employed, particularly on busts, that he accumulated £200,000. He died April 23, 1823. In his character, Nollekins had more than the usual share of that singularity which is supposed to be attendant upon genius.

NOLLET, John Anthony, a learned man, born at Pimbre, in the diocese of Noyon, 17th November, 1700. He studied at Clermont, Beauvais, and Paris, and with such success, that he soon became known to men of science and celebrity. Though an ecclesiastic, he devoted himself assiduously to philosophical pursuits. He visited England with Dufay, Duhamel, and Jussieu, in 1734, and was admitted into the London Royal Society, and in a subsequent excursion to Holland, he was honored with the friendship of Desaguliers, Gravesande, and Musseembroeck. On his return to Paris, he gave lectures on experimental philosophy, with illustrations of chemistry, anatomy, and natural history, and with such effect, that in 1738, the ministry, at the request of Maurepas established a professorial chair of experimental philosophy, purposely for him. He was, in 1739, admitted member of the academy of sciences, and a few months after, he was invited by the king of Sardinia, to fill the philosophical chair in the university of Turin. He was in 1744, recalled from Turin by the court, to instruct the young dauphin in experimental philosophy; and in reward for his services, he was appointed in 1753, first professor of experimental philosophy in the college of Navarre, and in 1757, philosophical instructor to the Royal family. This able philosopher, who by his experiments and discoveries contributed so much to the advancement of science, died at Paris, 25th April, 1770, aged 70. Besides lectures in 6 vols. 12mo., he published valuable treatises on Electricity, 5 vols.—on the Art of Making experiments, 3 vols. 12mo., and contributed ingenious papers to the memoirs of the academy.

NONIUS, Marcellus, a learned grammarian and peripatetic philosopher, whose treatise de Proprietate Sermonum, is highly esteemed. It was printed 1471, and in 8vo. 1614, with J. Mercier's notes.

NONNIUS, Lewis, a learned physician of Antwerp, in the 17th century, author of a curious treatise, called Dieteticon, sive de Re Cibariâ, with useful remarks to explain some passages in Horace and Juvenal. He wrote also a commentary on Greek Medals — Hispania — Ichthyophagia — and Epicedium Lipsiæ.

NONNIUS, Peter, or NUNES, a mathematician, born in 1497, at Alcazar, in Portugal. He taught mathematics at Coimbra, and was preceptor to Henry, son of king Emanuel. He was author of Latin treatises, de Arte Navigandi—de Crepusculis—Annotationes in Aristotelum—and a work on Algebra, written in Portuguese and in Spanish, and much esteemed. He died 1577, aged 80.

NOODT, Gerard, LL.D., an eminent civilian, born 1647, at Nimeguen. He studied in his native town with great reputation, and after visiting the other universities of Holland, Leyden, Utrecht, and Franeker, he returned to practise the law. He distinguished himself so much as a pleader, that he was honorably elected to the law professorship of Nimeguen, and in 1679, to that of Franeker. He afterwards accepted the invitations of the magistrates of Utrecht, and in 1686, those of the curators of Leyden university, of which he was chosen rector, in 1698. He died of an apoplexy, at Leyden, 15th August, 1725. He was highly respected for his knowledge of the law, and that philosophical ease with which he discussed subjects of right and jurisprudence. His works are all on law subjects, and have been collected in one vol. 4to. 1713.

NORADIN, son of Sanguin, or Emadeddin, sultan of Aleppo and Nineveh, inherited with Sessedin, his brother, his father's dominions, when that monarch was slain by his eunuchs, at the siege of Calgembar, 1145. He enlarged by his valor, the kingdom of Aleppo, which he had obtained to his share, and he bravely attacked the crusaders, who invaded his territories, and defeated Josselin, count of Edessa, and after seizing his dominions, he killed Raymond, prince of Antioch, in a dreadful battle. He next turned his arms against Iconium, and then subdued Egypt under his power, and caused himself to be acknowledged sultan of the country. He died 1174, universally respected as a man of generosity, prudence, and virtue.

NORBERG, George, a Swedish historian, was born at Stockholm, 1677, and having studied at Upsal, entered into the church, and in 1703, became almoner to the army. In 1707, he was made almoner and chaplain to the king, with whom he was at the battle of Pultowa. Having been sent to Russia, with count Piper, he was not liberated till 1715, when he joined his royal master in Pomerania. Soon after he was appointed minister of a church at Stockholm, where he died in 1744. Norberg was a celebrated pulpit orator, and published many funeral discourses, but his history of Charles XII. is his chief work. The materials which he used, were partly furnished by the Swedish government, and the manuscript was corrected by queen Ulrica Eleanora, the sister of that monarch. It was published at Stockholm, 1740, 2 vols. folio; and a French translation appeared at the Hague, in 1742, 3 vols. 4to.

NORDEN, Frederick Lewis, a learned Dane, born at Gluckstadt, in Holstein, 22d October, 1708. He was like his father, bred to the military service, and displayed in the profession great assiduity, and excelled in mathematics, and particularly in correct drawing. He was employed by the king of Denmark in travelling, and in examining the construction of ships, especially the gallees and vessels which navigate the Mediterranean. He visited with the curiosity and the judgment of a philosopher and of a man of science, Holland, Marseilles, Leghorn, Florence, and Rome, and every where was received with marks of high distinction. From Italy he passed to Egypt, and on his return to Denmark, he published an account of his Travels in Egypt and Nubia, which is interesting, correct, and valuable. In the war between England and Spain, Norden went to London, where he was treated with great kindness, and he went on board the fleet of sir John Norris as a volunteer, and afterwards, in 1740, went with sir Chaloner Ogle, in the fleet to reinforce admiral Vernon. When he found his health declining, he passed over to France, but died at Paris, 1742, much lamented. When in London, he was elected a member of the Royal society, and in return for the honor, he presented the public with drawings of some ruins, and colossal statues at Thebes in Egypt, 1744. His travels, with plates and drawings, are published in 2 vols. folio.

NORDEN, John, an able topographer, surveyor to the king's lands in the reign of James I. He wrote various works, and was the first author of a pocket-companion. Some of his books had curious titles, as the Sinful Man's Solace—Contrariety between the Wicked and the Godly, set forth in a Pair of Gloves fit for every man to wear, 1517. He wrote also, Labyrinth of Human Life, a poem, and a survey of Middlesex and of Hertfordshire. He was, according to Wood, born in Wiltshire, and studied at Oxford. He died about 1625.

NORDEN FLEICHT, Chederig Charlotte de, a native of Stockholm, celebrated among the Swedes for her elegant poems. Besides an ingenious Apology for Women, a poem, she wrote the Passage of the Belts, two straits in the Baltic, over which, when frozen, king Charles Gustavus marched his army, 1658. She died, 29th June, 1793, aged 44.

NORDENSCHOLD, a Swede, governor of Finland, and knight of the order of the sword, is known for his extensive knowledge of political economy, which he evinced in the many valuable communications made to the academy at Stockholm. This learned and intelligent man died 1764.

NORES, Jason de, a native of Nicosia in Cyprus. He left his country when it was ravaged by the Turks, and came to Padua, where he taught moral philosophy. He wrote various works in Latin, and in Italian. His Interpretatio on Horace's Art of Poetry, was much esteemed. He died 1590.

NORGATE, Edward, an ingenious artist. There is still preserved in the Stirling family, a grant of the government of Nova-Scotia to lord Stirling, by Charles I. in the initial letter of which, the king is represented sitting on his throne, delivering the patent to the earl; while around the border appears a miniature of the customs, mode of fishing, hunting, &c., of the country. This very able illuminator died 1649.

NORMANN EHRENFELS, Charles Frederic Lebrecht, count de, a distinguished military officer, born at Stuttgart, in 1784. At the age of eighteen, he entered as an ensign, into the Austrian service, and during the war with Prussia in 1807, he was decorated with military orders, and advanced to the rank of major. He became a colonel in 1809, and he commanded the light cavalry of the guard of Napoleon, during the campaign in Russia. In 1813, he was employed as major-general, at the head of several squadrons of cavalry, to suppress the free corps of Lutzow, which, in defiance of the suspension of arms, harassed the French army. After the battle of Leipsic, he refused to serve against the French, and sought refuge in Saxony, and afterwards in Austria, where he was employed in the military education of the son of count Ernest of Hesse Philipsthal. On the insurrection taking place in Greece, he determined to afford his personal aid to the patriots, and in January 1822, he embarked at Marseilles, with a number of German officers, and on arriving in Greece, he was appointed by the government, commandant of the fort of Navarino, where his conduct justified the confidence which had been reposed on him. After organizing a battalion of Philhellenes at Corinth, he joined Mavrocordata, had a share in the brilliant victory of Combotti, and was badly wounded in the unfortunate affair of Peta. He retired to Missolonghi, where he died of a nervous fever, November 4, 1822.

NORRIS, Henry, an Augustine monk, born at Verona 1631. He was carefully educated by his father, who was a native of Ireland, and after studying with great success at Rimini, he came to Rome, where he continued his improvement, and by a constant and regular application of fourteen hours every day, he acquired extensive knowledge and equal celebrity. He was liberally appointed ecclesiastical professor at Pisa, by the duke of Tuscany, and he obtained great reputation by his History of Pelagianism. This work, however, was not without its enemies; he was attacked and even denounced before the pope as a heretic; but Innocent XII. sensible of the merit of the author, appointed him sub-librarian of the Vatican, and at last in 1695, gave him a cardinal's hat. His abilities were afterwards engaged in all ecclesiastical affairs of moment, and in 1702 he was named among others to reform the calendar. He died at Rome, 1704. His works, which are elegantly written, and abound with erudition, have appeared together in 5 vols. fol. Verona, 1729 and 1730.

NORRIS, John, an English divine and platonic philosopher, born 1657, at Collingborne-Kington, Wilts, where his father was minister, and educated at Winchester school, and Exeter college, Oxford. In 1680 he was chosen fellow of All-Souls, and in 1689 he succeeded to the rectory of Newton St. Loe, Somersetshire, where he married. In 1691 he was made rector of Bemerton, near Sarum, where he died a martyr to intense study, 1711, aged 54. Mild, humble, and amiable in his manners, he was an enthusiast as a man, a mystic in theology, and in philosophy an idealist. He attacked Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and wrote against Dodwell on the Immortality of the Soul. His works are chiefly on moral and theological subjects, and against the quakers, Calvinists, and other seceders of the day, and his sermons are written in a clear, pleasing, and pathetic style. He wrote also some poems.

NORRIS, John, a native of Norfolk, educated at Eton and king's college, Cambridge. He showed himself a grateful benefactor to his university, by the grant of an estate of £190 a-year for a theological professorship, and for annual prizes on divinity subjects among the students of Cambridge. He died 1777, aged 43.

NORRIS, John, a merchant of Salem, Massachusetts, died 1808, aged 57. Mr. Norris was one of the founders of the theological seminary in Andover, to which he gave ten thousand dollars. His widow died at Salem in 1811, and bequeathed to the same institution thirty thousand dollars, and a like sum to trustees for the benefit of foreign missions to the heathen.

NORMANT, Alexis, advocate of the parliament of Paris, acquired deserved celebrity in his profession by his love of justice, his wisdom, and his integrity. This universally respected and most amiable man, died 4th June 1745, aged 58.

NORTH, Francis, lord keeper of the great seal under Charles II. and James II. was the third son of the second Dudley, lord North. He was educated at Bury school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards entered at the Middle Temple, and soon rendered himself eminent not only as a good lawyer, but as a great proficient in mathematics, history, music, and philosophy. He attended as counsel the Norfolk circuit, and soon distinguished himself as an able, acute, and discerning lawyer, and gradually rose through the offices of solicitor and attorney-general to the place of chief justice of the Common Pleas. On the death of lord Nottingham he succeeded to the seals, and in 1683 was raised to the peerage by the title of lord Guilford. He died at his house, Wroxton, 1685. He wrote an Index of Verbs Neuter, finished while at school, and printed with Lily's Grammar—a paper on the Gravitation of Fluids, considered in the Bladders of Fishes, printed in Lowthorp's Philosophical Transactions abridged—an Answer about sir S. Moreland's Statu Barometer—an Essay on Music—Concertos—and Political Papers.

NORTH, John, D.D. next younger brother to the preceding, was born September 1645. He was educated at Bury school, and Jesus college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1672 he was made Greek professor of the university, prebendary of Westminster 1673, and in 1677 he succeeded Dr. Barrow as master of Trinity college. In this office he met with some opposition from his fellows, but his integrity remained unshaken. He completed the college library begun by his predecessor, and died 1683, after being for some time unhappily robbed of his understanding by a dreadful palsy. He edited Plato's Socratis Apologia—Crito and Phædo, 1673.

NORTH, George, a native of London, educated at St. Paul's, and at Benet college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was made vicar of Codicote, Herts, by the bishop of Ely, and some time after, for an able treatise in defence of the Antiquarian society, he was admitted fellow of that learned body. He died on his living, 27th June, 1772. He wrote a table of English Silver Coins from the conquest to the Commonwealth—Remarks on the Money of Henry III.—and he began a History of the Antiquarian Society, which, however, he destroyed in his last illness.

NORTH, Frederic, earl of Guilford, better known as lord North, the minister under whose administration England lost her American colonies. He succeeded Charles Townsend as chancellor of the exchequer; and in 1770 the duke of Grafton, as first lord of the treasury, and continued in that high but laborious office till the conclusion of the war. As a public character, lord North was a flowing and persuasive orator, well skilled in argumentation, and master of great presence and coolness of mind, and in private life he was very amiable, cheerful and jocose in conversation, the friend of learned men, and correct in his conduct. The last years of his life were afflicted with blindness. He died July, 1792, aged 60, much and universally lamented.

NORTON, Thomas, an English writer, born at Sharpenhoe, Bedfordshire. He was a barrister, and in his principles a strong Calvinist. He assisted Sternhold and Hopkins in their version of the Psalms; and to the twenty-seven which he turned to metre, appear the initials of his name. He also translated into English some Latin poems—Calvin's Institutions—and Nowell's large Catechism, and assisted Thomas Sackville in his play called Ferrex and Porrex. He wrote besides, an Epistle to the Queen's poor deluded Subjects of the North, 1569—a Warning against the Practices of the Papists—and other pieces against popery. He died about 1600.

NORTON, lady Frances, was descended from the Frekes of Dorsetshire, and married sir George Norton, of Somersetshire, by whom she had three children. On the death of her daughter, who had married sir Richard Gethin, she wrote the Applause of Virtue, 4to. 1705—and Memento Mori, or Meditations on Death. She took for her second husband colonel Ambrose Norton, and for her third Mr. Jones, and died 1720, aged about 70.

NORTON, John, minister in Boston Massachusetts, was a native of England and educated at the university of Cambridge. He came to New England in 1634, or rather embarked for that purpose, but was compelled to reland, and sailed again the next year and arrived at Plymouth, in October. He preached at Plymouth during the winter. In 1636 he removed to Boston, and in the course of the year accepted an invitation to settle in Ipswich. In 1652, the church in Boston applied to Mr. Norton, to become their minister. He preached in Boston for some time with the consent of his people, but in 1655, they re-claimed him. Though a number of councils advised his removal to Boston, Ipswich declined releasing him. But the advice or result of a council summoned by the governor and magistrates had the desired effect, and he became the minister of Boston. Upon the restoration of Charles II. it was thought necessary to address him. Mr. Norton was one of the agents for that purpose, and sailed for England in February 1662, and returned in September following. He died 1663, aged 56. Besides a number of sermons, he published a discussion of the sufferings of Christ, and the questions about his righteousness active and passive, and the imputation thereof in answer to a dialogue of Mr. Pinchin 12mo. 1653.

NOSTRODAMUS, Michael, a celebrated French physician and astrologer, born at St. Remy in Avignon, December 14th, 1503. He studied at Avignon and Montpellier, and took his doctor's degree in the last city, 1529. He practised for four years at Agen, and afterwards went to Marseilles, and then to Aix, where his abilities were displayed in a very successful manner in checking the progress of the plague, by a powder of his own invention. These friendly services were acknowledged by the gratitude of the town, and during some years he received from them a liberal pension. After some time he quitted physic for the more captivating reputation of a prophet and astrologer, and in 1555, he published his prophecies in verse. He was in consequence noticed by the public as an extraordinary man; but while some regarded him as a foolish visionary, and others as an impious associate of the devil, he was sent for, to the court of Henry II. and of Catherine of Medicis, and was dismissed loaded with presents. Upon this he increased his work from three hundred quatrains to a complete milliade; and when it was discovered that on the king's death he had foretold it in some enigmatical way, his fame was spread over Europe, and he was now consulted not only by the vulgar, but by great men and by princes. He chiefly lived at Salon, where Charles IX. visited him, and declared himself particularly his patron. He died, however, soon after this mark of royal favor, at Salon, July 2d, 1566.

NOTT, John, M.D., a late polite writer, was born at Worcester, December 24th, 1751. Having studied surgery, under Sir Cæsar Hawkins, he visited Paris in order to complete his medical education, and subsequently went to China, as surgeon to an East Indiaman. Here he acquired an extensive acquaintance with the Persian language; his proficiency in which, he evinced on his return to Europe by his elegant translation of the Odes of Hafiz. In 1788, he took his diploma, and soon after attended the duchess of Devonshire to the continent. In 1793 he settled at Bristol, where he continued to reside till his death in 1826, being afflicted, during the last eight years of his life with paralysis. His writings are, Alonzo, a Poetic Tale, 4to. 1772; a translation of the Basia of Johannes Secundus, 8vo., 1775; Leonora, an Elegy, 4to. 1775; Poems from the Italian of Petrarch, 8vo. 1777; Original Pieces and Translations, 8vo., 1780; Heroic Epistle from Monsieur Vestris in London, to Madame Heinel in France, 4to., 1781; the Cynthia of Propertius, 8vo. 1791; Chemical Dissertation on the Springs of Pisa and Asciano, 8vo. 1793; On the Hot Wells of Bristol, 8vo. 1793; an edition of Catullus, with the Latin text rendered into English verse, and classical notes, 2 vols. 8vo. 1794; a translation of the Kisses of Bonifonius of Auvergne, with the Latin text annexed, 8vo. 1797; another of the First Book of Lucretius, with the Latin text, 8vo. 1799; The Odes of Horace, with the Latin text revised, 8vo., 2 vols. 1803; Sappho, after a Greek Romance, 12mo. 1803; On the Influenza which prevailed at Bristol, in 1803, 8vo., 1803; a further Selection from Petrarch, with notes, 8vo., 1808; select poems from the Hesperides of Herrick, 8vo. 1810; A Nosological Companion to the London Pharmacopœia, 12mo., 1811; and an edition of Decker's Gull's Horn Book, with Notes and Illustrations, 4to., 1812; besides several manuscript works, among which is an incomplete translation of Silius Italicus.

NOVARINI, Lewis, an ecclesiastic of Verona, of the order of the Theatines. He wrote Commentaries on the Four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, 4 vols. fol.—Electa Sacra, 6 vols. fol.—Adagia Sanct. Patrum, 2 vols. He died 1650, aged 56.

NOUE, Francis de la, a native of Brittany, born of an ancient family in 1531. He served in Italy with distinction, and on his return embraced the party of the Calvinists. He took Orleans in 1567, contributed to the victory of Jarnac two years after, and then took Fontenay, Oleron, Marennnes, Soubise, and Bronages. At the siege of Rochelle he lost his left arm, and had one made of iron, in consequence of which he was called Iron Arm. In 1571 he served in the Low Countries, where he took Valenciennes, and afterwards he was employed at Rochelle. He entered into the service of the States General in 1578, and took count Egmont prisoner, but was himself taken in battle two years after, and remained in confinement five years. He afterwards served against the league, and at last perished at the siege of Lamballe by a musket ball, 1591, universally and deservedly lamented. He wrote Discourses, Military and Politic, 4to. His son Odet served with distinction under Henry IV. and died 1613. He is author of Christian Poems.

NOUE, Stanislaus Louis de la, of the same family as the preceding, was count of Vair, and was born at Nazelles, near Clignon, 1729. He served with great reputation in the French army, in the campaigns of 1741 and 1756, and at last fell in the affair of Saxenhausen, 1760. When Louis XV. heard of his death, he exclaimed, "then we have lost the London of France." This brave warrior wrote New Military Constitutions, printed at Frankfort, 8vo. 1760, with plates. His life was written by Toustain.

NOUE, John Sauve de la, a native of Meaux, who acquired some celebrity as an actor. After playing at Ronen and Lisle, he came to Paris, and exhibited his powers at Fontainebleau 1752. He was patronised by the duke of Orleans and by the court, and obtained a pension. Voltaire wrote the Princess of Navarre on his account, that he might act the chief character of the piece. He died 15th November 1761, aged 60. He wrote Mahomet II. a tragedy—Zelica, a comedy—the Return of May—the Corrected Coquette. His works were collected together at Paris, 1765, in 12mo.

NOUE, N. la, a famous financier in France in the 17th century. Though of obscure origin, he raised himself to consequence, and by the immense riches which he possessed, he constructed superb mansions for his residence, which excited the envy of the nobility, and procured his downfall. He was accused of mismanagement and rapacity, 1705, and condemned for nine years to the galleys, and to be pilloried.

NOVATIAN, a pagan philosopher in the third century, who was converted to christianity, and privately ordained a bishop. He attempted to sieze the see of Rome, but when opposed by Cornelius, he declared himself the head of a new heresy, which considered it as sinful to admit to the Eucharist, persons who had once fallen into idolatry. The followers of this new doctrine were called Novatians, or Catharites, i. e. pure. Some of Novatian's works are extant, published by Jackson, London, 1723, in 4to.

NOYES, James, a native of Wiltshire in England, was one of the first ministers of Newbury, Mass. He was born 1603, and died October 22, 1656, aged 47. Mr. Noyes came to New England in 1634. He was considered one of the most eminent men of his day. He was a good classical scholar; his memory was tenacious; his invention was rich; and his judgment was profound. The following published works were from his pen; the "Temple Measured, or a brief survey of the Temple Mystical, which is the instituted church of Christ;" a "Catechism;" and "Moses and Aaron, or the rights of church and state."

NOYES, James, a son of the preceding, born the 11th of March, 1640. He graduated at Harvard college, in 1659, and was ordained the first minister of Stonington, Connecticut, September 10, 1674. Here he remained in the regular discharge of his official duties fifty-five years, and died December 30, 1719, aged nearly 81. He was a distinguished preacher; and, as a councillor, was eminently useful. He was one of the first trustees of Yale college.

NOYES, Nicholas, another of the first ministers of New England, was born December 22, 1647. He was a cousin of the preceding, and graduated at Harvard College, 1667. After preaching thirteen years he was settled in Salem, November 14, 1683, where he remained till his death, which took place, December 13, 1717, aged nearly 70 years. He had an agency in promoting the excitement respecting witchcraft, at that period; but afterwards confessed and lamented the error.

NOVATUS, a priest of Carthage, who supported the propriety of admitting to the communion, even without penitence, persons who had fallen into idolatry. He afterwards rejected the doctrine, and adopted that of Novatian, which was directly opposite to his former opinion. This great inconsistency caused a violent schism in the church in the third century.

NOWEL, Alexander, an English divine, born at Read, in Lancashire, and educated at Brazenose, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was made master of Westminster school, prebendary of Westminster, and dean of St. Paul's, and in the reign of Elizabeth he was elected member of parliament, but did not sit in the house, as being a clergyman. His Catechism in Latin, printed 1572, and 1578, was of universal use, and much admired, so that it was translated, not only into English, but into Greek. He died 1602. His brother Lawrence died dean of Lichfield, 1576, and left in MS. a Saxon-English Dictionary, now in the Bodleian library.

NOY, William, a lawyer, born at St. Burian, in Cornwall, and educated at Exeter college, from whence he entered at Lincoln's Inn. He was member for Helston, in James's reign, and afterwards for St. Ives, and was a violent opponent of the measures of the court. In 1631, his opposition ceased; he was made, by Charles I. attorney-general, and then all his abilities were exerted to support the king's attempts to levy money without the parliament. To his advice the project for ship money, so fatal to the royal prerogative, is attributed. Though abused for his attachment to the king, and his dereliction of former principles, Noy is universally acknowledged to have been a good lawyer, a tolerable orator, and a man of sound and strong judgment. He died August, 1634, at Tunbridge-wells, where he had retired for the benefit of the waters, and was buried at New Brentford. He wrote a Treatise on the Grounds and Maxims of the Laws of England, 4to. and Perfect Conveyancer.

NUGENT, Robert, earl, a native of Westmeath, Ireland, who abjured the Roman catholic tenets for the protestant, and obtained a seat in parliament in 1741, with the office of comptroller of the household of the prince of Wales. As the favorite of the court, he continued to hold offices of trust and great emolument, and in 1766, was created a peer of Ireland, and some time after advanced to an earldom. He wrote an Ode to Mankind in 1741—Verses addressed to the queen, with a new year's gift of Irish manufacture—Verses on the Memory of Lady Townsend, besides odes, and epistles, which possess considerable merit. He died 1788.

NUGENT, Thomas, LL.D. an Irishman, who acquired some celebrity by his useful publications, especially his Vocabulary of the Greek Primitives, 8vo.—a Pocket Dictionary of the French Language. He also translated the Port Royal Greek and Latin Grammars, 4 vols. 8vo. and published a Tour in Europe, 4 vols. 8vo. His daughter married the celebrated Edmund Burke.

NUMA POMPILIUS, second king of Rome, is known for the laws which he established, and the respect for religion and religious ceremonies which he introduced among his subjects. He died B. C. 672.

NUMENIUS, a Greek philosopher in the second century. He was a follower of the doctrines of Pythagoras and Plato; but called Plato, Moses speaking Greek, as he considered him as having borrowed much from the Jewish legislator.

NUMERAMUS, M. Aurelius, a son of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father in the east with the title of Cæsar, and at his death he succeeded him with his brother Carinus, B.C. 282. His reign was short. Eight months after his father's death he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law Arrius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. Numeramus has been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally eloquent, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.

NUNEZ, Ferdinand, a Spanish critic, born at Pincia, near Valladolid. He was professor of belles lettres at Alcala and Salamanca, and died very old, 1552. He wrote Commentaries on Pliny, Pomponius Mela, and Seneca.

NYE, Philip, a non-conformist, born in Sussex, about 1596. He entered at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and removed to Magdalen hall, where he was admitted to his master's degree, 1622, about which time he took orders. He was for some time curate of St. Michael's church, Cornhill, but rejecting the doctrines of the church of England, he retired to Holland, and resided at Arnheim, in Guelderland. On the decline of the royal power, he returned to England, and was made minister of Kimbolton, Huntingdonshire and afterwards was one of the assembly of divines, and became a great champion of the pre-byterians, and an asserter of the solemn league and covenant. His services were rewarded with the living of Acton, near London; but he now deserted to the independents, and was confidentially consulted and flattered by them, while he converted his influence and popularity to his own aggrandizement, and the emolument of his family. At the restoration he was forbidden to hold any offices whatever. He died 27th February, 1672. He wrote several sermons, and political tracts, and his seditious views, and hypocritical conduct, are humorously alluded to by Butler, who mentions in his Hudibras, Philip Nye's thanksgiving beard.

O.

OAKES, Uriah, president of Harvard College, came to America in his childhood, and graduated in 1649. He went to England and settled in the ministry. The society in Cambridge sent a messenger to England to invite him to become their minister in 1669. He accepted the invitation, and commenced his labors in Cambridge in 1671. In 1675, he was placed at the head of Harvard college, but still retaining his relation to the church in Cambridge. In 1680, he was formally inaugurated as president, and resigned his pastoral charge. He died 1681, aged 49. He published a number of sermons, and was distinguished as a poet, and classical scholar.

OATES, Titus, known for his infamies and plots under Charles II. was son of an anabaptist, and born about 1619. He was at first a conformist, then a papist, and again a conformist, but in his conduct, though a clergyman, very vicious. He was chaplain to a man of war, but dismissed for unnatural practices; and when honest resources failed, he contrived with Dr. Tongue, to disclose a pretended plot against the king, in consequence of which several respectable persons were not only accused, but upon his evidence condemned and executed. This succeeded so well, that he was rewarded for the discovery, with a pension of £1200 a year, and an honorable residence at Whitehall. Under James II. his infamous conduct was reviewed, and he was upon the testimony of sixty witnesses, convicted of perjury, and sentenced to be whipped and pilloried. He bore the punishment with great fortitude, and when released from imprisonment, at the revolution, he sunk into contempt, and died 1702.

OBEIRNE, Thomas Lewis, D.D., a learned prelate of the established church, and a native of the county of Longford, in Ireland, was born in 1748, of a Catholic family, by whom he was sent to St. Omers at an early age, with his brother John, to study for the priesthood. John in due course took orders, and became a Catholic priest in the diocese of which his brother was afterwards the protestant bishop. Thomas, on the contrary, renounced the Catholic creed, and at the commencement of the American war, having taken orders, accompanied lord Howe as chaplain of the fleet. On his return to England he published a vindication of his patron; whose conduct was at that time a subject of parliamentary inquiry, and his connexion with that noble family introduced him to the duke of Portland. In 1782, he accompanied the duke to Ireland, as private secretary, and obtained, the following year, from his grace, two valuable livings in Northumberland and Cumberland. He afterwards was first chaplain to earl Fitzwilliam, and was promoted to the see of Ossory, from which, on the death of Dr. Maxwell, he was translated to that of Meath. The writings of this popular prelate were, the Crucifixion, a poem, in 4to. 1775; The Generous Impostor, a comedy, 1780; A Short History of the last Session of parliament, 8vo., anonymous; Considerations on the late Disturbances, by a Consistent Whig, 8vo.; Considerations on the Principles of Naval Discipline and Courts-Martial, 8vo, 1781; and several sermons and charges. He died February 15th, 1823.

OBRECHT, Ulric, a learned German, born July 23d, 1646, at Strasburg. He studied at Strasburg, Montbeillard, and Altorf, and made the most astonishing progress in the sciences, as well as in the languages, ancient and modern. After finishing his travels, he settled at Strasburg, where he married the daughter of professor Boecler, whom he succeeded in the chairs of eloquence and history. Upon the conquest of Strasburg by Louis XIV. Obrecht changed his religion from protestant to Roman Catholic, and was in consequence, made by the victorious monarch, in 1685, president of the senate of his native town, with the title of prætor royal. In the midst of his numerous employments as a lawyer and president, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits. He died of a fever 6th August, 1701. He wrote, among other things, Prodromus Rerum Alsaticarum, 4to.—Excerpta Historica, de Naturâ Successionis in Monarch. Hispan. 3 vols. 4to.—Quintilian, edited with notes, 2 vols. 4to.—the Life of Pythagoras, from Iamblicus—De Vexillo Imperii—an edition of Diety's Cretensis.

OBSOPÆUS, John, a German physician, born at Bretin, 1556. He was made professor of physic at Heidelberg, and died there, 1596. He published some pieces of Hippocrates, with remarks. His brother Simon was also professor at Heidelberg, and died 1619, aged 44.

OCARIZ or OCARITZ, don Joseph, chevalier d' a Spanish diplomatist, who distinguished himself by his attempts to prevent the execution of Louis XVI. He was born about 1750, near the frontiers of Biscay, and having completed his studies at Madrid, he became secretary of the embassy at Turin, and then at Copenhagen. In 1783, he was sent to Paris as consul-general; and in August 1792, he held the post of chargé d' affaires. Shortly after, he wrote to the French minister, Lebrun, a letter in favor of Louis XVI, which seems to have produced a strong impression in the National Convention; and on the 17th of January, 1793, he wrote a second letter, addressed to the Convention, in which he offered the mediation of his sovereign to engage Prussia and Austria to terminate the war with France, on condition of the suspension of judgment against the king. When war was declared against Spain in the following month of March, the chevalier d' Ocariz quitted Paris, whither, however, he returned some time after, on the restoration of peace. He occupied other diplomatic situations; and at length, having been nominated Spanish ambassador at Constantinople he died on his way thither at Varna in Hungary, in 1805.

OCCAM, or OCCHAM, William, a scholastic divine of the fourteenth century; the disciple of Duns Scotus, and so renowned as to acquire the name of the Invincible Doctor. As he belonged to the Cordeliers, he was engaged by Michael de Cesena, the general of his order, to attack the church of Rome, and pope John XXII. and in consequence of this dispute, which gave rise to the question about the bread of the Cordeliers, both Occam and his friend were excommunicated by the pontiff. Occam was afterwards reconciled to the see of Rome, and died 1374. His works, which display both wit and subtilty, were published, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1476, but are now little regarded.

OCCOM, Samson, an American Indian preacher, born about the year 1723, at Mohegan, near Norwich in Connecticut. When nineteen years of age, he went to the Indian school at Lebanon of the Rev. Eleazer Wheelock, the first president of Dartmouth college, where he remained four years. Afterwards in 1748, he kept a school in New London. Soon, however, he removed to Montauk, on Long Island, where he was engaged, ten or eleven years, as a teacher among the Indians. Here also he commenced preaching to his own brethren. He was ordained August 29th, 1759. In 1766, he was sent, by president Wheelock, to England, as an agent for Moor's Indian charity school. Previous to this, England had never been visited by an American Indian preacher. He attracted, as might have been expected, much notice. The houses, in which he preached, were crowded. His success in the objects of his mission were great. Large donations were received, and the school was removed to Hanover, N. H. and was connected with Dartmouth college. After his return to America, Occom preached at various places, often acting as a missionary. He died 1792, aged 69 years.

OCHINUS, Bernardin, an Italian, born in Seine, 1487. He was at first a Cordelier, but afterwards studied physic, and again, in a moment of inconsistency, returned to the church, and in 1534, became a strict Capuchin, and rose to be the vicar-general of the order. His eloquence as a preacher recommended him to the notice of pope Paul III. who made him his confessor; but still inconsistent, he became a convert to the tenets of Luther, and preached openly in favor of them. Thus an enemy to Rome, he made his escape from Italy, and after visiting Geneva, Lucca, and Augsburg, he came to England with his friend Peter Martyr, 1547, and was by Cranmer made prebendary of Canterbury. On the death of Edward VI. he retired from England to Strasburg, to avoid persecution, and then went to Basil; and at last settled at Zurich. After presiding eight years over the Italian church in that city, he was banished by the magistrates of the town, 1563, for publishing some dialogues in favor of polygamy. He fled to Moravia and Poland, where he joined the Socinians. He died of the plague at Slakow, 1564, aged 77. He was author of some controversial works, and of some sermons in Italian, in 5 vols. 8vo. some of which have been translated into English.

OCKLEY, Simon, an able divine and orientalist, descended from a respectable Norfolk family, but accidentally born at Exeter, 1678. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D. and in 1705, was made vicar of Swavesey, Cambridgeshire, and in 1711, Arabic professor to the university. He died at his living, 9th August, 1720, much respected, but leaving his family in distressed circumstances. He was a very learned man, and well skilled in oriental literature. He published, 1706, Introductio ad Linguas Orientales—the History of the present Jews throughout the World, 1707—the Life of Hai Ebn Yokhdan, from the Arabic of Abu Jaafar Ebn Tophail, 8vo. 1708—the History of the Saracens, 2 vols. 8vo. a most valuable work—some single sermons.

OCTAVIA, sister of Augustus, married Marcellus, and after his death was given to Antony, to reconcile him and her brother. The death of her son Marcellus is pathetically described by Virgil. She was a woman possessed of great virtues, and died B.C. 11.

OCTAVIA, daughter of Claudius and Messalina, married Nero, by whom she was divorced, and afterwards put to death at the age of 20.

OCELL, Thomas, a gentleman of Buckinghamshire. He ruined his estates by supporting the cause of the court, and afterwards obtained the permission to erect a theatre in Goodman's-fields, 1729; but when his theatrical efforts promised to be successful, the city magistrates opposed him, and he disposed of his property to Mr. Giffard. He was in 1738 made deputy master of the revels, and died May, 1749. He wrote four dramatic pieces, which were for a little while favorably received.

ODENATUS, king of Palmyra, was admitted as the associate of Gallienus on the imperial throne, for his services against Sapor, king of Persia. He was assassinated by a favorite, 267, and his wife Zenobia assumed the reins of government at his death.

ODERICO, Casper Lewis, a learned Genoese antiquary and medallist, entered early into the society of the Jesuits, and going to Rome became professor of theology. He was admitted a member of the Etruscan academy of Cortona, under the name of Theodemis Ostracinis. On the suppression of his order he retired to his native city, where he was made conservator of the university library. In 1797 he went to Turin with his brother, to conduct some negotiations, and remained there six years. The revolution deprived him of his office at Genoa, but on the reorganization of the university he was replaced, and chosen a member of the Institute. He died December 10th, 1803, of apoplexy, aged seventy-eight. He published several valuable works on ancient medals and inscriptions; and left in MS. Notizicistoriche sulla Taurica fino all, anno 1475, written at the request of the empress Catherine.

ODO, Saint, second abbot of Clugni, was born at Tours, 879. The sanctity of his life greatly contributed to the reputation and increase of his abbey, and even kings and popes referred their disputes to his unbiassed judgment. He was a man also of great learning, and wrote some religious books. He died 943.

ODO, of Kent, was a Benedictine monk and prior, and abbot of his order in the 12th century. He was the friend of Thomas à Becket, of whose miracles he wrote an account, besides Commentaries on the Pentateuch.

OECOLAMPADIUS, John, D.D. a German divine, born at Reinsperg, Franconia, 1492. He studied at Heidelberg, Bologna, and Tubingen, and was for some time preceptor to the son of the elector Palatine. He was upon embracing the principles of Luther, made divinity professor, and preached in that city. He married in 1523, in consequence of which his friend Erasmus jocosely speaks of his change of situation. He died December 1531. He engaged against Luther in support of Zuinglius concerning the Eucharist, and his book on the occasion is mentioned by Erasmus with credit. He translated Chrysostom's commentaries on Genesis, and some of the works of Nazianzen and other fathers, and wrote besides some notes on Scripture.

ECUMENIUS, a Greek writer in the 10th century. He is called by some an able interpreter of scripture, while others speak with indifference of him. His works appear with those of Aretas at Paris, 2 vols. folio.

✓ OEDER, George Louis, an eminent German physician and botanist, born at Auspach in 1723, studied at Gottingen under Haller. Having practised as a physician, at Sleswick, he was in 1752 invited to the botanical chair at Copenhagen. The first part of his Flora Danica appeared in 1763. He also published, in 1769, a Memoir on the Civil and Political State of the Peasantry. Count Bernstorff consulted him; and under Struensee he was appointed counsellor of finance, and president of the council of revenues for Norway. On the fall of that minister he removed from Copenhagen, and was made bailli of the duchy of Oldenburgh, where he established a fund for the benefit of widows. He died the 28th of October, 1791. Besides the works referred to, he published Elementa Botanica, 1762—64, 2 vols. 8vo.; Nomenclator Botanica, 1769, 8vo.; Figures of Plants growing spontaneously in Denmark and Norway, 1766, folio; Observations on a Bank for Widows, Copenhagen, 1771, 8vo.; and many memoirs in periodical journals. Linnæus, in honor of this botanist, gave the name of Oedera to a genus of plants of the Cape of Good Hope.

OFFA, king of Mercia, on the death of Ethelbald 755, was successful against the kings of Kent and Wessex, and perfidiously murdered Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and seized his kingdom. His crimes, which were great, induced him to pay his court to the clergy for their support and forgiveness. He not only made a pilgrimage to Rome, but was the first who gave the tenth of his goods to the church, and established the Peter-pence tribute. He founded the monastery of St. Alban's, which he endowed most liberally. He reigned thirty-nine years, and died 794.

OGDEN, Samuel, D.D. an English divine, born at Manchester 1716, and educated at the grammar school there, and at King's college, Cambridge, from which he removed to St. John's, where he became fellow, 1739. In 1744 he was elected master of Halifax school, which he resigned 1753, to reside at Cambridge. He took his degree of D.D. and in 1764 was made Woodwardian professor, and 1766 presented to the rectory of Lawford, Essex, and a month after to Stansfield, Suffolk. He died 23d March, 1778. It is said that his manners were rustic, and his features occasionally disagreeable and ferocious, but his heart was most amiable and humane. His sermons have been published, 2 vols. 8vo. and defended by bishop Halifax against the attacks of Mainwaring. They are popular discourses, elegant, striking and pathetic.

OGDEN, Jacob, for nearly forty years a respectable physician of Jamaica, Long Island, was born at Newark, New Jersey in 1721. He died in 1779, aged fifty-eight years. He published letters on the malignant sore throat; and is supposed to be the first who recommended the mercurial treatment in that disorder.

OGDEN, Matthias, a patriotic citizen of the United States. He was actively engaged in the revolutionary war, entering the army at Cambridge; and so great was his zeal in the contest, that he accompanied Arnold in penetrating the wilderness to Canada in 1775. He was engaged in the attack on Quebec, and, in consequence of having been wounded, was carried from the place of engagement. He remained in the army till the conclusion of the war. Congress honored him with the commission of brigadier-general. He died 31st March 1791, at Elizabethtown, New Jersey. General Ogden was distinguished for his social virtues, and was much esteemed by all who knew him.

OGILBY, John, a Scotch writer, born near Edinburgh, November 1600. Though of a respectable family, he was obliged for his maintenance to pursue the profession of dancing-master, and in this capacity he recommended himself to the duke of Buckingham and other noblemen. In 1633, he was in the family of lord Stafford, and was by that nobleman appointed deputy master of the revels in Ireland. He in consequence built a theatre in Dublin, and met with great encouragement; but at the breaking out of the Irish rebellion, 1641, he lost his property, and returned to England poor. He then went to Cambridge on foot, and applying himself with great industry to the learned languages, he was enabled to translate the works of Virgil, which appeared 1649-50, and produced both money and reputation. He continued to exert his abilities as a writer, and gave the world poetical translations of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and in 1660 published a fine edition of the English Bible, with plates, which he presented to the king, and also to the House of Lords, by whom he was handsomely rewarded. He obtained in 1692, the patent place of master of the revels in Ireland, against the application of sir W. Davenant, and afterwards, though ruined by the fire of London, he erected another fortune as cosmographer and geographic printer to the king. He died after a life of great labor and chequered fortunes, 4th September 1676, and was buried in St. Bride's church, Fleet street. He published besides, an Account of Japan, folio—an Atlas, folio—Fables of Æsop, in verse, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Book of Roads, 8vo. afterwards improved by Bowen, and latterly by Patterson, and Cary.

OGILVIE, John, a Scotch divine and poet, was born in 1733; was educated at the university of Aberdeen, from which he obtained a doctor's degree; was for more than half a century minister of Midmar, in Aberdeenshire; and died in 1814, respected for his piety and talents. His poetical powers were by no means inconsiderable. His chief works are, Sermons; Poems; Britannia, an epic poem; Philosophical and Critical Observations on Compositions; and Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy.

OGLE, Samuel, governor of Maryland, arrived in the colony in December, 1731. He had previously had a military command in the Irish establishment. He continued governor until 1742, and was again appointed in the room of Bladen in 1747. He died in 1751.

OGLETHORPE, James, was a native of England. In 1732 he accepted the appointment of a trustee of the colony of Georgia, and arrived in America in 1733. He was the founder of the town of Savannah. He negotiated treaties with the Indians, and several times crossed the Atlantic on account of the colony. In 1738, he was appointed commander-in-chief, and brought a regiment of six hundred men from England to protect the southern frontier from the Spaniards. In 1740 he was the leader of an unsuccessful expedition against the Spanish forces in St. Augustine. In 1742, he succeeded in protecting the infant colony of Georgia from a powerful force sent against it by Spain; the address and courage he displayed on this occasion retrieved his character, and gained him the reputation of an able general. He returned to England, and did not again come to America. He held the rank of major-general in the rebellion of 1745, and for his conduct in the campaign was subjected to a court martial, but was honorably acquitted. The command of the British forces in America in 1775 is said to have been offered to Oglethorpe. He died 1785 aged 97.

O'HARA, James, a native of Ireland, came to America as a needy adventurer in 1772. He first engaged in the Indian trade, and thus made himself useful to the government, and was employed in frequent missions to the Indian tribes. He served in the army under Wayne as quarter-master general. He purchased a large tract of land in Pittsburgh Pennsylvania, and may justly be considered one of the founders of that place. He died 1819, aged 66.

OISEL, James, professor of civil law at Groningen, was born at Dantzic 1631. He wrote corrections and notes on various authors—Thesaurus Selector. Numismatum Antiquor. Ære expressorum, 4to.—catalogue of his valuable library. He died 1686.

OKSKI, Stanislaus, a Pole, who studied divinity under Luther and Melancthon, and preached with such zeal the tenets of the reformation among his countrymen, that he was called the Polish Demosthenes. He afterwards turned catholic and published his profession of faith at Warsaw, 1561. He wrote besides controversial tracts, Latin Annals of the Reign of Sigismund Augustus, 12mo.

OLAHUS, Nicolas, made by Ferdinand king of Hungary, bishop of Zagrab, chancellor of the kingdom, and afterwards archbishop of Stregonia, was born at Hernanstadt, and died at Tynau, 1568, aged 75. He wrote a Chronicle of his Time—a History of Attila—a Description of Hungary.

OLAVIDES, Paul, A. J. a Spanish statesman and modern victim of the inquisition, was born in 1725 at Lima in Peru, of wealthy parents. At an early age he was appointed auditor of the province; but having, by the liberality of his opinions given offence to the monks and friars, they had him sent to Spain, where he was committed to prison by the holy office, but shortly after liberated. He now took up his residence at Madrid, and was appointed agent for his Peruvian countrymen. Powerfully seconding the measures of the Spanish minister, the count d' Aranda, for the expulsion of the Jesuits, at length the government appointed him intendant of Andalusia, where he founded a new colony, which flourished greatly. But, having endeavored to exclude as much as possible the monastic and mendicant orders, they charged him with heresy; and in November 1776 he was arrested and thrown a second time into the dungeons of the inquisition. After two years' confinement he was brought up to receive his sentence. It was charged against him that he had in his library the French Encyclopedie, Bayle's Dictionary, Montesquieu's Spirit of laws, and the works of Voltaire and Rousseau, together with a letter from that philosopher to himself, containing the phrase—"It is much to be wished that Spain possessed forty such persons as yourself." Olavides was condemned to eight years' seclusion in a monastery to practice exercises of piety, and to be afterwards banished twenty leagues from all great cities; to be incapable of public enjoyment, &c. But he contrived to escape from the convent and took refuge in France and Geneva. On the death of Charles III. he was permitted to return to France, where he resided at the revolution; and under the reign of terror was imprisoned at Orleans. He employed the period of his confinement, and his subsequent leisure, in writing The Triumph of the Gospel, a work which attracted notice in his own country, and was translated into French. Its success induced those who had persecuted him to boast of his conversion, and they obtained his recall to Spain. Thither he went in 1798, and retired to his estate in Andalusia, where he died in 1803.

OLDCASTLE, sir John, the good lord Cobham, was the first nobleman who suffered martyrdom for his religion. He was born in the reign of Edward III. and distinguished himself as the friend of public liberty. He was a general in the French campaigns, and obliged the duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris; but as he was a follower of Wickliffe's doctrines, and maintained itinerant preachers for their greater dispersion, he incurred the hatred of the Romish clergy, and was accused of heresy and disaffection to Henry V. Henry endeavored to reason with him, but when Cobham declared the pope antichrist, the monarch, shocked at his impiety, delivered him up to the archbishop, who sent him to the tower. He had the art to escape from confinement, but so violent and watchful were his persecutors, that after four years' concealment in Wales, he was seized and dragged to London. As a heretic and traitor, he was hung up on a gallows alive, and a fire lighted under him, so that he was thus cruelly roasted alive, in St. Giles's fields, 1417. He wrote twelve conclusions addressed to the parliament of England.

OLDENBURG, Henry, a German, born in the duchy of Bremen. He was consul for his countrymen at London, under Cromwell's usurpation, and was afterwards tutor to the lords Obryan and Cavendish, and during his residence at Oxford, he was acquainted with the founders of the Royal society of which he was elected fellow, and assistant secretary with Dr. Wilkins. He published in this capacity the thirty-six numbers of the philosophical transactions, and had a most extensive correspondence with various learned men. He wrote besides, translations, and died August, 1678.

OLDENBURGEN, Philip Andrew, author of "Thesaurus Rerum Publicarum totius Orbis," 4 vols. 8vo. and other works, was professor of history and law at Geneva, where he died 1678.

OLDERMAN, John, a German writer, Greek professor at Helmstadt, where he died of a dropsy 1723, aged thirty-seven. He was author of some ingenious and valuable dissertations,—de Imperfectione Sermonis Humani—de Phraarte Fluvio—de Ophir—de Mari Algoro.

OLDFIELD, Anne, a celebrated actress, born in Pall-Mall, 1633. Her father, who was an officer, left her in dependent circumstances, but her fondness for plays and the sweetness of her voice, accidentally heard and commended by Farquhar, introduced her to sir John Vanburgh, and to Mr. Rich, the patentee of the king's theatre, where she first exhibited herself. She soon shone in the characters of Leonora, in sir C. Nice, and of lady Betty Moodish, in the Careless Husband. She died October 23d, 1730, and her body, after lying in state in the Jerusalem chamber, was buried in Westminster abbey with great pomp. Her wit and vivacity were said to be very engaging, her figure delicate and pleasing, and her manners fascinating in the extreme. The becoming neatness of her dress, as well as the acquired graces of her person and of her understanding, have been elegantly noticed by the Tatler.

OLDFIELD, T. P. a youth, whose history exhibits an extraordinary instance of precocious genius. At the age of five he was seized with scarlet fever, which produced such constitutional debility, that he became subject to paralysis of the lower extremities, and consequent permanent lameness; and after ten years of suffering, he was affected with dropsy, and hæmoptysis, which occasioned his death at Margate, July 10, 1804, in the sixteenth year of his age. He possessed great quickness of apprehension, and an extraordinary memory, so that almost all that he read was easily remembered. He made himself acquainted with mathematics, natural philosophy, geography, history, and painting. He could recite the principal events in the histories of Greece and Rome, and of his native country; and had become familiar with the discoveries of modern astronomers. The works of Newton and Locke were the favorite objects of his studies. He displayed taste and talent as an artist, and is said to have produced, from memory, admirable likenesses of persons whom he had seen. His temper was as amiable, as his capacity was excellent. Though a constant invalid, he bore his sickness without repining or impatience; and he seems to have exhibited a union of virtue, and abilities seldom found in one individual.

OLDHAM, John, an English poet, born August 9th, 1653, at Shipton, Gloucestershire. He was educated at Tetbury school, and removed to Edmund hall, Oxford. He was afterwards usher of the grammar school at Croydon, but the excellence of his poetry was noticed by lords Rochester and Dorset, and other wits of the age, and he was removed from the laborious drudgery of a school in 1678, and placed as tutor to the grandsons of sir Ed. Thurland. He afterwards was tutor to the son of sir William Hickee, and then settled in London as a wit and poet. Lord Kingston afterwards patronised him, and wished to make him his chaplain; but though the poet refused to submit to the dependence of the ecclesiastic, he continued in his house till his death, occasioned by the small-pox, 9th December, 1683. His writings were chiefly satirical, and though a man of temperance and virtue, he is frequently licentious in his poetry. The whole consists of fifty pieces, the most valuable of which are the four satires on the jesuits, written 1679. His works were printed by captain Thomson, 3 vols. 12mo.

OLDMIXON, John, a political writer, born near Bridgewater, Somersetshire. As a party writer he was violent and severe in the extreme, he opposed with unusual virulence the Stuart family, and attacked the great writers of the time with envy and ill nature. His conduct exposed him to the resentment of Pope, who has given him a conspicuous place among the sons of dulness in his Dunciad. He obtained by his party zeal a post in the revenue at Bridgewater, where he died 9th July, 1742, at an advanced age. He wrote History of the Stuarts, folio—a volume of Poems—the Life of A. Maynwaring, Esq.—the Life of Queen Anne—a tragedy—an opera, and other things.

OLYDS, William, an eminent English writer, natural son of commissary Olyds, the chancellor of Lincoln, born about 1637. Few particulars of his life are known, though it is too apparent that he was intemperate, profligate, and licentious. He was for some time librarian to lord Oxford, and made a catalogue of that celebrated collection, which Osborne the bookseller purchased for £13,000. He was also Norroy king at arms, as being well acquainted with heraldry. He died, 15th April, 1761, aged 74. His chief works were a Life of sir Walter Raleigh—various articles in the General Historical Dictionary—those Lives marked G. in the Biographia Britannica—Introduction to Hayward's British Muse—Observations on the Catalogue of English Lives—Poetical Characteristics—and Health's Improvement.

OLEARIUS, Godfrey, a learned German, born at Hall in Saxony, 1639. He became professor of Greek and of divinity at Leipsic, and in consequence of his great abilities was ten times rector of that university. He died August 1713. He was a great contributor to the "Leipsic Acts," and wrote various works on theology, and philosophy.

OLEARIUS, Godfrey, D.D. son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic, 23d July, 1672. He possessed great abilities, and after visiting Holland for some time, studied at Oxford, and became professor of Greek and Latin, and afterwards of divinity at Leipsic. He died in the flower of life, 10th November, 1715. He published a Dissertation on the Worship of God, by J. C.—a History of Rome and Germany—besides a Latin translation of Stanley's History of Philosophers, 4to.—and an edition of Philostratus, folio.

OLEARIUS, Adam, a German writer, secretary to the embassy from the duke of Holstein to the duke of Muscovy, and the king of Persia. He was six years in this employment, and at his return he published an account of his journey, with maps and figures, folio, translated into French by Wicquefort. He also published an abridgment of the Chronicles of Holstein, from 1448 to 1663, 8vo. and 4to. He was afterwards librarian to the duke, and died 1671, aged 68.

OLEARY, Arthur, a native of Cork, educated at St. Omer's, after which he entered into the order of the Franciscans, and became chaplain to a French regiment. As he refused to engage against his country, he was dismissed from his employment in the regiment, and permitted to return to Cork, where some time after his zeal in rousing up the catholics to take up arms during the American war, procured him the notice of the government and a pension. He afterwards came to London and displayed great abilities as a pulpit orator. He died 1801, author of some valuable political tracts, 8vo. 1783, and some sermons.

OLEASTER, Jerom, a Portuguese Dominican, chaplain to John III. king of Portugal. He was at the council of Trent, and for his services was offered a bishopric, which he declined for the office of grand inquisitor. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, fol.—Commentary on Isaiah, fol. 1629, Paris, and died 1563.

OLESNIKI, Ibigneus, a noble Pole, who from being secretary to king Ladislaus, entered into orders, and was made bishop of Cracovia and a cardinal. He was also engaged in the service of his country as an ambassador. He died 1455, aged 66.

OLIVA, Alexander, general of the Augustine monks, was born at Saxoferato, 1408. He studied at Rimini, Bologna, and Perusa, and when at Rome, as general of his order, his great learning was much admired, and his eloquence in the pulpit so applauded that at last the Pope Pius II. created him a cardinal, 1460, and made him bishop of Camerino. He died at Tivoli 1463, and was buried in the Augustine church at Rome. His works are de Christi Ortu Sermones Centum—de Cœnâ cum Apostolis Facta—de Peccato in Spiritum Sanctum.

OLIVA, John, a learned ecclesiastic, born at Rovigo, in the Venetian territory, 1639. He was librarian to cardinal Rohan, and secretary to the conclave. He wrote dissertations on subjects of antiquity, and edited Poggio's works, and Silvestri's book on Pollux and Castor. He died at Paris 1757.

OLIVAREZ, Gaspar de Guzman, count de, an illustrious Spaniard under Philip IV. He succeeded the duke of Uzeda as prime minister, and gained popularity by his wise and salutary regulations and improvements in the state. He enjoyed during a period of twenty-two years, almost unbounded authority. The commencement of his administration was distinguished by some useful regulations adapted to increase the population and resources of the country. The system he pursued with regard to foreign affairs, however, was unfortunate, and being constantly thwarted in his schemes by the bolder genius of the French minister Richelieu, he had the mortification to witness the revolt of the Catalonians, the dismemberment of Portugal from the crown of Spain, and the loss of Brazil and other foreign colonies, which fell into the hands of the Dutch. These national misfortunes rendered him so unpopular, that the king was forced to dismiss him in 1643, when he was succeeded by his nephew Don Louis de Haro.

OLIVER, of Malmsbury, a Benedictine monk. He was an able mechanic, but in attempting to fly from a tower with wings which he had made, he fell down and fractured his legs. He died 1660.

OLIVER, William, an able physician of Bath, author of treatises on the Bath Waters, and on Tar Water. He pretended to be an atheist, but in his last moments he saw his error, and died very penitent, 1764.

OLIVER, Claude Matthew, a native of Marseilles, advocate in the parliament of Aix. He contributed much to the establishment of the academy of Marseilles, and he was one of its first members. He possessed great powers of mind, and a most retentive memory, so that with little premeditation he supported the most intricate causes at the bar, with the most captivating eloquence, and the most convincing arguments. He died 1736, aged 35. He wrote the History of Philip of Macedonia, the father of Alexander, 2 vols. 12mo. a work of merit, though negligently written—Memoir on the assistance given to the Romans by the people of Marseilles, during the second Punic war, and the war of Gaul.

OLIVER, Peter, LL.D. graduated at Harvard college in 1730. In 1756 he received the appointment of a judge of the superior court without having been bred a lawyer, and was afterwards made chief justice. In consequence of his refusing to receive a grant for his services from the Province, he was impeached. He died in England in 1791, aged 79.

OLIVER, Andrew, graduated at Harvard college in 1724. He obtained the office of secretary of the province of Massachusetts Bay, and while in that office received the appointment of distributor of stamps in 1765. A Boston mob demolished his office, and compelled him to resign. He was lieutenant governor from 1770 to 1774. The publication of his letters, procured in London by Dr. Franklin, disclosed his base subserviency to the British ministry, and made the remainder of his life very wretched. He died 1774, aged 67.

OLIVER, Thomas, a gentleman of fortune and literature, of great amiableness and suavity, who was graduated at Harvard college, in 1753, and afterwards resided at Cambridge, was the last lieutenant governor of Massachusetts under the crown. He left America at the opening of the war, and lived in retirement in Europe till his death at an advanced age.

OLIVET, Joseph, a learned jesuit, born at Salins, 1632. He is chiefly known for his learned and valuable editions of Cicero's works printed at Paris, and then at Geneva, 9 vols. 4to. He published besides, translations of some of the orations of Demosthenes, and Cicero, and of Cicero's treatise de Nat. D. and various other works. He was member of the French academy, of which he wrote the history, and died 1768, much and universally respected.

OLIVETAN, Robert, a relation of the great Calvin, who printed at Neufchatel, 1535, fol. a French translation of the Bible, the first executed from the Hebrew and Greek texts. It is said that Calvin contributed much to the work. It was called the Bible of the Sword, because the printer assumed a sword as his emblem. The work is now very scarce. Olivetan died the year after at Rome, where it is said he was poisoned by the catholics on account of his publications.

OLIVERA, Francis Xavier de, a Portuguese knight of the order of Christ, was born at Lisbon, in 1702, and at the age of fourteen admitted into a public office. In 1732, he went to Madrid, where his uncle held a diplomatic situation, and presented him to the king of Spain. He shortly after succeeded his father as secretary of embassy at Vienna ; but having had a dispute with the count de Taronca, the ambassador, resigned his employment, and went to Holland in 1740. At Vienna, the Lutherans had excited in his mind suspicions of the soundness of his Catholic faith, which he shows in Memoirs of his Travels and Familiar Letters, published in 1741 and 1742. These works were accordingly censured by the inquisition ; while the author, having removed to England, made in 1746, an open profession of Protestantism. Here he published a Pathetic Discourse to his countrymen, on the earthquake at Lisbon, and the following year a second discourse. In September 1762, being declared a heretic at an Auto-de-Fe, he was burnt in effigy, on which he published a book entitled, The Chevalier d'Oliveyra burnt in Effigy as a Heretic—why and wherefore? Anecdotes and Reflections on the subject laid before the Public by himself. He died at Hackney in 1783, having written, besides the pieces above mentioned, a great number of MSS., including Oliveyriana, or Mc-moires, historical and literary, 27 vols. 4to.

OLIVIER, a French author, member of the academy of Lyons, who, in 1750, wrote an essay on the advantages derivable from music in the cure of diseases. His theory supposes that there exists a certain sympathy between the human body and the surrounding atmosphere, and that the former is consequently acted upon by the vibrations of the latter, which produce a kind of electrical effect. He was also the author of a work entitled L'Esprit d' Orphée, ou de l'Influence de la Musique.

OLIVIER, Guillaume Antoine, M.D., a modern French naturalist, and traveller, was born near Frejus in 1756, and studied at Montpellier, where he received his diploma, at the age of seventeen. Botany and entomology were his favorite pursuits ; at the age of twenty-three, he went to Paris to assist in the composition of a work on the natural history of that district. He was afterwards sent into England and Holland, to collect materials for a history of insects ; and was employed on the entomological part of the Encyclopedie Methodique. At the period of the revolution Olivier travelled to Persia with M. Bruguières, on a diplomatic mission planned by the minister Roland, whose death deprived the envoys of all their financial resources. Olivier returned to Paris, December, 1798, after an absence of six years, during which he visited Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Arabia, and Persia. He brought home valuable collections in natural history, of which he published an account in his Voyage dans l'Empire Ottoman, l'Egypte et la Perse, 3 vols. 4to., with plates. He died suddenly at Lyons, in 1814.

OLONNOIS, John David, a native of Olonne, near Poitou, famous for his bold adventures in the seventeenth century. He passed early into America, and afterwards joined the Buccaneers on the coast of St. Domingo. After spreading devastation and terror on the coasts of the Spanish settlements, he was at last attacked by the native Indians who cut his body to pieces and devoured it.

OLYBRIUS, Flavius Anicius, husband of Placidia, the sister of Valentinian III. was sent into Italy with an army against Ricimer, who had rebelled against Anthemius. Instead of fighting him, however, Ricimer proclaimed him emperor, and deposed his master Anthemius, and Olybrius thus raised to the throne of the West, gave hopes of a vigorous and peaceful reign, but died a few months after, 23d October, 472. He left one daughter, Juliana, married to the patrician Areobindus, who refused the purple of the Eastern empire.

OLZOFFSKI, Andrew, LL.D. a learned Polish divine. He travelled to France and Italy, and afterwards was in the service of the king of Poland, where he served as an able secretary, and as ambassador to Vienna. He was made bishop of Culmi, and afterwards high chancellor, and primate of the kingdom, and while his wisdom, prudence, and patriotism, influenced and regulated the affairs of the kingdom, he showed himself satisfied with the honors of his country, and refused the dignity of a cardinal offered by the court of Rome. He died in 1678, after an illness of three days, aged 60. He published in Latin some political tracts esteemed in his time.

OMAR I. successor of Aboukerque, and second caliph after Mahomet, began to reign 634. After defeating Ali, whom Mahomet had appointed his successor, he spread his conquests over Syria and Phœnicia, and took the city of Jerusalem after an obstinate siege. While successes attended him in Judæa, his generals extended his conquests over Persia and Egypt, and increased the worshippers of Mahomet by the terror of fire and sword. The fall of Alexandria under his power, was marked by the destruction of its celebrated library, which the Ptolemies had enriched with so many valuable works ; but if Egypt mourned the loss of the monuments of human learning, she saw the canal of communication between the Nile and the Red Sea restored to its ancient useful form by the persevering labor of her conquerors. While he promised himself more extensive conquests, Omar was stabbed at Jerusalem, by Firouz, a Persian slave, 644, in his sixty-third year. During his reign the Mahometans conquered thirty-six thousand towns or villages, destroyed four thousand Christian temples, and built fourteen hundred mosques. Omar was, in his character, a great warrior, in his manners austere and virtuous ; and regarding merit as the only title to superiority, he declared the crown elective, and placed his son in an inferior situation. He laid the foundations of Grand Cairo.

OMAR II. thirteenth caliph of the race of the Omuiades, succeeded his relation Solyman, 717. He laid siege to Constantinople, but his attempts to take it, supported by all the arts of military warfare, and the courage of a brave army, failed ; and the destruction of his fleet by a terrible tempest, obliged him to retire from the walls. His conduct towards the Christians was very cruel and vindictive. He was assassinated at Edessa, 720, by his own family, who dreaded lest his partiality for the house of Ali should deprive them of the throne. He had reigned two years and five months.

OMEIS, Magnus Daniel, author of Ethica Pythagorica—Ethica Platonica—Theatrum Virtutum & Vitiorm ab Aristotele Omissor.—Juvenci Historia Evangelica cum Notis, was professor of belles lettres at Altorf, and died there 1708, aged sixty-three.

ONESIMUS, a Phrygian slave, converted to christianity by St. Paul, and according to some, made bishop of Berea, where he suffered martyrdom.

ONKELOS, a Jewish rabbi, supposed to have been the disciple of Hillel the elder, and to have lived in the beginning of the first century. He was the author of the earliest Targum, or Chaldee interpretation of the Hebrew scriptures, extending however only to the Pentateuch. The Targum of Onkelos consists of little more than a verbal translation, but it is distinguished for accuracy and purity of style, and is therefore much esteemed both by Jews and Christians. The other Targums are that of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, on the historical and prophetic books of the Bible, from Joshua to Ezekiel inclusive, composed nearly at the same period with the preceding, and approaching to it in the style and manner of its execution; the Targum on the law of Moses, ascribed to Jonathan, but disgraced by the introduction of legendary tales and ridiculous digressions, and probably not of earlier date than the seventh century; the Jerusalem Targum, a Chaldee paraphrase on select parts of the law, apparently a compilation from various authors made in the seventh or eighth century; the Targum on the Hagiographa, or Psalms, Proverbs, &c. said to have been the work of rabbi Joseph the Blind, in the third century, but from its legendary character, and the corruptions of style which it exhibits, it is obviously the production of a much later period; the Targum on the Megilloth, or books of Canticles, Ruth, &c. apparently written in the sixth century, and, like the last, abounding in fables; three Targums, on the book of Esther, written in very corrupt Chaldee; and the Targum on the books of Chronicles, of a late date, and of little authority. The earliest and most important of these Targums are printed in Walton's Polyglott Bible.

ONUPHRIUS, Panvinius, an Augustine monk born 1529, at Verona. He continued the Lives of the Popes, begun by Platina, and dedicated them to Pius V. 1566. He published also other works, and was so skilled in historical knowledge, that he was called the Father of History. He died at Palermo in Sicily, 1563, aged 39.

OOST, James Van, a painter, born at Bruges 1600. He studied the manner of Annibal Caracci with great success, and his historical pieces, landscapes, &c. were much admired. His best piece is a descent from the cross, in the Jesuits' church, Bruges. He died 1671. His son James distinguished himself also as an artist, and died 1713, aged 76.

OPIE, John, a celebrated painter, was born, in 1761, at St. Agnes, near Truro, in Cornwall, and was the son of a carpenter, who destined him to follow that business. Young Opie displayed early talents. At ten years of age he could solve many difficult problems in Euclid, and at twelve he taught writing and arithmetic at an evening school in his native village. But drawing soon became his principal object, and he made several sketches and copies, which were much talked of in the neighborhood. He was first drawn from obscurity by Dr. Wolcot, and, about 1777, was patronised by Lord Bateman. After having practised for a few years in the provincial towns of the west, he settled in London in 1780, where he acquired both fame and fortune. He became a royal academician, and professor of painting to the Academy. Opie died in 1807. He wrote Lectures; a Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds; and a Letter on the Formation of a National Gallery.

OPITIUS, Henry, a Lutheran divine, born 1642, at Altemberg, Misnia. He was professor of oriental languages and theology at Kiel, where he died 1712. In his fondness for Hebrew literature, he wished to reconcile the grammar of the Greek to the rules of the Hebrew, and wrote some fanciful treatises on the subject. He edited also the Bible in Hebrew, 2 vols. 4to.

OPTIUS, Martin, a poet, born at Buntslow in Silesia, 1597. He died of the plague at Dantzic 1639. His poems in Latin and in German, are much admired for their elegance and spirit. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1633.

OPORINUS, John, a German printer, born at Basil, 1507. He studied physic for some time, but afterwards applied himself to Greek and Latin, and then began the business of a printer. Though careful, yet he was involved in debt, and died hardly solvent, 1563. He published no book which he did not himself correct. Besides the classical books which he printed he wrote Notes on Plutarch—on Cicero's Tusculan Quæst, and other authors.

OPPEDE, John Meynier baron d', president of the parliament of Aix, rendered himself odious by the atrocities which he committed against some heretics called Vaudois. Not only the nineteen who had been condemned by the parliament to the stake, were destroyed, but twenty-two villages were devoted to the flames, and above four thousand persons perished by the sword or by fire, during that horrible persecution. In other respects Oppede was an upright magistrate, but religious zeal tarnished his character. He was acquitted when brought to trial, by asserting that he executed the orders of his sovereign Francis I. and that God had commanded Saul to destroy those princes the Amalekites. He died 1558.

OPSOPÆUS, John, a German critic. From a corrector of the press he became a physician of eminence, and was elected professor of medicine at Heidelberg. He edited some of the works of Hippocrates, with learned notes; but his best known work is an edition of the Sibylline Oracles, published at Paris, 1607. He died 1596, aged 40. His brother Simon was also a physician, and died 1619, aged 44. Vincent, a poet of the same age, wrote a Latin poem on the Art of Drinking, 1578, 8vo.

ORELLANA, Francis, a Spaniard, who accompanied Pizarro in his conquest of Peru. From the love of adventure he deserted his companions, and penetrated into the country, and was the first European who saw the great river Amazon, the best part of whose course he observed, till he reached the Spanish settlements of Cubagna, from which he departed for Europe. In the relation of what he had seen, he united the marvellous and the true, and by reporting that he had passed through a country peopled by Amazons, he gave that name to the great river which he had discovered. He afterwards endeavored again to discover the mouth of that river, and perished in the attempt, about 1550.

ORGANA, Andrew, an Italian painter, born at Florence 1329. He was also distinguished as a sculptor and architect, and as a poet. His works are preserved at Pisa. In his picture of the last judgment, he represented all his friends in Paradise, and placed his enemies in hell. He died 1389, aged 60.

ORIGEN, one of the fathers of the church, was born, in 185, at Alexandria, and studied philosophy under Ammonius, and theology under Clemens Alexandrinus. Being persecuted by his diocesan Demetrius, he went to Cæsarea, and afterwards to Athens. During the persecution of Decius, he was imprisoned and tortured. He died in 253. His great works are, The Hexapla; Commentaries on the Scriptures; and a treatise against Celsus.

ORIGNY, Peter Adam, author of an history of Ancient Egypt—and of a System of Egyptian Chronology, was also distinguished in military life, and died at Rheims, his native place, 1774.

ORIENTE, Ferdinand Alvarez de, an esteemed Portuguese poet, was born at Goa, in the Indies, about the commencement of the reign of king Sebastian. He served in the royal navy, and was captain of one of the vessels belonging to the squadron, which admiral Tellez commanded in India, during the vice-royalty of Moniz-Barreto. His principal work is, "Lusitania Transformada." The language is pure, and the descriptions striking and natural. It was printed first at Lisbon, 1607, 8vo. A few years after, a more correct edition was published by father Fogos, of the oratory. Our poet also wrote an elegy, which has been highly esteemed, and the fifth and sixth parts of the romance of Calmerin of England.

ORKAN, son of Othoman, made himself emperor of Turkey 1326, by the destruction of his elder brothers, and extended his dominions by the conquest of Gallipoli, and other provinces. He married the daughter of the emperor John Cantacuzenus, and died 1360.

ORLANDI, Pelegrini Anthony, author of the Origin and Progress of Printing from 1457 to 1500—a history of Bolognese writers, 4to. in Italian—and Abecedario Pittorico, 4to. was an eminent Italian bookseller, who died 1730.

ORLEANS, Louis of France, duke of, son of Charles V. was born 1371, and he had a great share in the affairs of the kingdom during the reign of his brother Charles VI. He was basely murdered by his uncle John, duke of Burgundy, 1407, and this foul deed became the source of long and fatal disputes between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy.

ORLEANS, Charles, duke of, son of Louis of France, was called duke of Angouleme in his father's life time. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and after a captivity of twenty-five years in England, he returned to France, and undertook the conquest of Milan, which he claimed in right of his mother. He was, however, able to conquer only the county of Ast. He died at Amboise 1465, leaving one son, Charles, who married Louisa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I. He was a liberal patron of letters, and wrote some poetical pieces.

ORLEANS, Louis, duke of, prince of the blood, son of Philip the Regent, was born at Versailles, 4th August, 1703. The first part of his life was spent in idle dissipation; but after the death of his father, and that of his wife, better thoughts succeeded, and he abandoned the world and its follies to devote himself to a life of penitence, austerity, religion and literature. He settled at the abbey of St. Genevieve, and employed himself in works of charity and benevolence till the time of his death, which happened 4th February, 1752. He was an accomplished scholar, and was not only well skilled in the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Greek languages, but a perfect master of botany, chemistry, and painting, besides history, geography, and divinity. He wrote translations, paraphrases, and commentaries on Scripture—a Literal translation of the Psalms—Dissertations against the Jews—a liberal translation of St. Paul's Epistles—and treatise against Plays. His son Philip, who was born 12th May, 1725, is said to have inherited the virtuous qualities of his father. He died 18th November, 1785.

ORLEANS, Philip Louis Joseph, duke of, was born at St. Cloud, 13th April, 1747, and had the title of duke de Chartres during his father's life. From his earliest years he devoted himself to low pleasures, but with the desire to acquire consideration in the fleet, he entered in the navy, and he obtained the command of the St. Esprit, of 84 guns, in 1778, under the orders of admiral Orvilliers. The sight of the English fleet, it is said, terrified the cowardly prince, and during the action, which was fought off Ushant with admiral Keppel, it is reported that he concealed himself in the hold of the ship till the danger was over. This conduct was ridiculed not only by the wits of Paris, but by the court, and the duke felt the severity of the satire so deeply that he determined on revenge. His immense fortune gave him every opportunity to raise disturbances and create dissatisfaction, and he followed the iniquitous propensities of his heart. In 1787, he succeeded to his father's title, and soon after, the revolution afforded him occasions to gratify his revenge against the court. Though exiled and threatened, he maintained his rancorous opposition; he became one of the members of the national assembly, and as if ashamed of his family and of his birth, he took the name of Egalité. While the factious and the vile used his great opulence and his powerful influence, for their own vicious and diabolical purposes, he was satisfied if every measure tended to dishonor the monarch, and to overturn the throne, on which he hoped to seat himself. At the trial of Louis XVI. he gave his vote with the greatest indifference for the death of the king, a conduct which shocked even the most abandoned jacobins; but soon his own fate was determined by those who had squandered his riches, and abused his confidence. He was accused, and though he escaped to Marseilles, he was seized and brought back to Paris, and led ignominiously to the scaffold, 6th November, 1793. He suffered death with more courage than could be expected from a man whose character and morals were so infamous.

ORLEANS, Louis, an advocate of Paris, who boldly defended the cause of the league against Henry IV. The virulence of his writing at last caused his apprehension; but the mild monarch ordered him to be liberated from prison. This compassionate conduct of the monarch made a convert of the advocate, who became loud in the praises of his benefactor. He died at Paris, 1627, aged 87. He wrote a Defence of the United Catholics against the Protestants, 8vo.—Address to the English Catholics—Commentaries on Tacitus and Seneca—besides other political pieces, now deservedly forgotten.

ORLEANS, Peter Joseph, a Jesuit, born at Bourges, 1641. He professed belles lettres, and afterwards became preacher to his society, and died at Paris, 31st March 1698. He was author of an History of the Revolutions of England, 3 vols. 4to. and 4 in 12mo.—History of the Revolutions of Portugal, 5 vols. 12mo.—History of the two Tartar Conquerors, Chunchi and Canhi, 8vo.—The Life of Father Cotton, 12mo.—Lives of Lewis de Gonzaga, and other Jesuits—two volumes of Sermons—Life of Constance, minister of the king of Siam, 12mo.

ORLEANS DE LA MOTTE, Louis Francis Gabriel d', a native of Carpentras, who became bishop of Amiens 1733. He was a most pious and charitable prelate, and died 10th July 1774, aged 91. His spiritual Letters appeared at Paris 1777, in 12mo.—and his Life by Proyard, in 1778, in 12mo.

ORLOFF, Gregory, a favorite of Catherine II. of Russia, first served in the artillery under the empress Elizabeth, and was aid-de-camp to general Schuvaloff, whose mistress preferring him to the general, the intrigue was discovered, and Orloff was dismissed from his post. Catherine, then grand duchess, saved him from being sent into Siberia. He and his brother Alexis, who is said to have strangled the emperor, had a principal share in the subsequent revolution. He was now made grand master of the artillery, and raised to the first offices in the state. He even aimed at sharing the throne; but the empress, it is said, would only submit to a private marriage, which he imprudently refused. His influence, in consequence, declined, and he was supplanted by a new favorite. He was then ordered to travel, gratified with magnificent presents, and received the title of prince of the German empire. After an absence of five months he returned and resided several years at Petersburgh, hoping to recover his former influence. Disappointed in this, he made a tour in Germany, Italy, and France. He retired to Petersburgh in 1782, when he became deranged, and died at Moscow the following year. He had by the empress one son, named Bobrinski, educated under the direction of his mother, but he showed himself unworthy of her care.

ORME, Robert, an English writer, born at Bombay, where his father was a surgeon. From Harrow school he went as a writer to India; and to the friendship of Lord Clive he was indebted for his consequence in the East. He was in 1755, fourth member of the Madras council, and commissary-general, but returned to Europe in 1759, and was some time after honorably appointed by the East India company their historiographer, with a salary of £300 per annum. He was author of the Military Transactions of the British in India, 3 vols. of which the first volume appeared in 1763, and the second in 1775. He wrote besides, Historical Fragments of the Mogul Power, during the reign of Aurengzebe. He died in 1801, not in very opulent circumstances, aged 73.

OROBIO, Balthasar, a Spanish Jew, born at Seville. Though educated secretly as a Jew, he outwardly professed the Roman catholic faith, and became professor of metaphysics at Salamanca. He afterwards studied physic, and practised it at Seville; but as he was suspected of Judaism, he was seized by the inquisition, and treated with the greatest cruelty to oblige him to confess. His obstinacy in denying his religion at last procured his liberation, after three years' confinement, and he escaped from the Spanish dominions to Toulouse, where he was made professor of physic. He afterwards went to Amsterdam, and there openly professed himself a Jew, was circumcised, and took the name of Isaac. He here practised medicine with great success, and died 1687. He wrote against Spinoza in his "Certainen Philosophicum," and his interview with Limborch on the subject of the Christian religion, occasioned his writing a book in support of Judaism, in which he displayed much ingenuity, and great metaphysical subtlety. His antagonist afterwards published an account of the controversy in a pamphlet called Amica Collatio cum Judæo Erudito, 4to.

ORONO, an Indian chief of the Penobscot tribe, who died at Old Town, an island in Penobscot river, February 5th, 1805, aged 113 years. The tribe to which he belonged profess the Roman catholic religion. This aged chief lived to hunt in three different centuries, and for many years prior to his death his long hair was of a milky white. His mental powers were retained in an unusual degree to the latest period of his life. His wife died in January 1809, aged 115 years.

OROSIUS, Paul, a Spanish ecclesiastic of the fifth century, was born at Tarragona, and was a disciple of St. Augustine. The place and time of his decease are unknown. His chief work is a History of Human Calamities, in seven books, which was written at the request of St. Augustine, and has had the honor of being translated by Alfred the Great.

ORPHEUS, a Greek poet, musician and founder of some religious ceremonies, is supposed by some to be an imaginary person, but is probably a real one, though his history is involved in fable. He seems to have been a native of Thrace, son of one of the princes of that country, and to have been born about a century before the Trojan war. He is said to have been one of the Argonauts, to have subsequently travelled in Egypt, and to have introduced Egyptian science and customs into Greece. The works attributed to him are of a much later period.

ORR, Hugh, a native of Scotland, born January 13th, 1717. He learned the trade of a gunsmith, and having come to America, in 1738, he settled in Bridgewater, Massachusetts. Here he engaged in manufacturing scythes and other edged tools. About the year 1743, he made five hundred muskets for the state; and in the war of the revolution he cast iron and brass cannon, from three to forty-two pounders. He also discovered his mechanical genius by other useful inventions. He was highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens, and was for several years elected to the state senate. He died in 1798, aged 81 years.

ORRERY, Charles BOYLE, earl of, was born, in 1676, at Chelsea, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, under the tuition of Dr. Atterbury. He published while at college an edition of Phalaris. Bentley questioned the authenticity of the epistles; Boyle replied, and this led to a warm controversy, in which Bentley was fruitlessly opposed by a confederacy of wits. Boyle succeeded to the earldom on the death of his brother; was promoted in the army, employed as an ambassador, and made an English peer, by Queen Anne; but was in disfavor during the reign of George I., and was even imprisoned for six months. He died in 1731. He wrote As You Like It, a comedy; and some verses. The astronomical instrument which bears his name was so called in compliment to him by Graham, its inventor.

ORSATO, Sertorio, an Italian writer, well skilled in antiquities and in ancient inscriptions. He was born at Padua, and became professor of philosophy there. He died of a suppression of urine, 1678, aged 61. He wrote besides lyric poems in Italian, "the History of Padua,"—Commentaries and de Notis Romanorum, and other works.

ORSATO, John Baptist, an eminent physician and antiquary, born at Padua, 1673. His dissertations de Lucernis Antiquis—de Strenis Veterum—de Paterâ Antiquorum, &c. were much esteemed. He died 1720.

ORSI, John Joseph, an ingenious philologer and poet, born at Bologna 1652, of a noble family. He studied every branch of polite literature, in which he distinguished himself. He died 1733. He wrote sonatas, pastorals, and other poems in Italian—a Defence of Italian poets, and of Tasso—Letters—and the Life of Lewis de Sales.

ORSI, Francis Joseph Augustin, an able writer, born in Tuscany 1692, and raised to the purple by Clement XIII. He is author of an "Ecclesiastical History" in Italian, 3 vols. 4to.—Infallibilitas Act. Rom. Pontificis, 2 vols. 4to. He died 1761.

ORTE, Viscount d', a man of true honor, whose name deserves to be recorded. He was governor of Bayonne at the time of the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew. Having received an order from Charles IX. to put to death all the protestants in his government, he replied in the following words, "Sire, I have communicated your majesty's letter to the garrison and inhabitants of this city. I have found only brave soldiers and good citizens, and not a single executioner."

ORTELIUS, Abraham, a famous geographer, born at Antwerp, April, 1527. He travelled with the eyes of a philosopher over England, Ireland, France, Italy, and Germany, and was so respectable for his knowledge of geography, that he was honorably called the Ptolemy of his age. His "Theatrum Orbis Terræ," in folio, procured for him the place of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. He died at Antwerp, June, 1598. He published besides, Synonyma Geographia—Aurei Seculi Itinærio—Syntagma Herbarum Encomiasticum—Itinerarium per Gallia & Belgic. Partes.

ORTON, Job, a native of Shrewsbury. He was educated in his native town, and afterwards under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. When of the proper age he took care of a dissenting congregation at Kidderminster, and then removed to Shrewsbury, where he died 1783, aged 66. He had for some years retired from the pastoral duties to private life. He is author of an excellent Life of Dr. Doddridge—Sermons to the aged, 12mo.—Sacramental Meditations, 12mo.—Discourses on Christian Worship, 12mo.—Discourses on Practical Subjects, 8vo.—Practical Exposition of the Old Testament, published after his death, 6 vols. 8vo. He was a frequent correspondent with his friend Mr. Stedman, a clergyman of Shrewsbury, who published some of his letters, which prove him to have been a man of the most liberal sentiments, and an active supporter of piety, virtue, and devotion.

ORVILLE, James Philip de, a Dutch critic, of French parentage, born at Amsterdam, 1696. He improved himself by travelling over England, France, and Germany, and on his return was elected professor of eloquence, history, and Greek, at Amsterdam, which he held twelve years, and resigned 1742. He died 1751. He continued with Burman, Observationes Miscellaneæ, 10 vols. to which four more were added after his death. These contain a Dissertation on Delos, and Remarks on the Greek Romance of Chariton. He wrote besides a satire against De Pauw, called Critica Vanus—Observations on Sicily.

OSBORN, Sir D'Anvers, governor of New York. He was of Chicksands, Bedfordshire, and was appointed governor in the place of Clinton in 1753. He arrived in New York on the 6th of October, and was received with the usual demonstrations of respect, but died on the 12th of that month by his own hand, from despair of exercising a popular administration over the colony, which was agitated by violent parties. He married a sister of the earl of Halifax, and derived his name from the marriage of Sir Peter Osborn, one of his ancestors, to the daughter of John d'Anvers, Esq. of Wiltshire.

OSBORN, John, a poet, was born at Sandwich, Massachusetts, in 1713, and graduated at Harvard in 1735. He devoted himself first to the study of theology, and afterwards of medicine. He died at Middletown, Connecticut, where he had resided for some time, about the year 1753. He was the author of several poetical pieces of a highly respectable character, particularly, a whaling song, and an elegy on the death of a sister.

OSBORN, Selleck, an American poet, who produced some occasional pieces of great beauty. He learned the trade of printer, and was editor of several different newspapers at different times. In 1823, a volume of his poems was published at Boston. His death took place at Philadelphia October 1, 1826.

OSBORNE, Francis, an eminent English writer, born at Chicksand, Bedfordshire, 1583. He became master of the horse to William lord Pembroke, but in the civil wars he sided with the parliament, and obtained some offices under them, and under Cromwell. He wrote, while resident at Oxford, near his son, Advice to a Son, which was very popular, and was therefore inveighed against by the puritans of the time, besides other things in prose and verse. His works were published, 8vo. 1689, and again 1722, 2 vols. 12mo.

OSGOOD, Samuel, Post Master General of the United States, graduated at Harvard college in 1770. He was a member of the board of war during the early part of the revolution; and in 1775 and 1776, was an aid to general Ward. In the year 1781, he became member of congress; and in 1785, was appointed by congress first commissioner of the treasury. In 1789, he was selected by Washington for Post Master General, an office which he retained only two years. Subsequently he held other public offices. He died at New York, August, 12, 1813, aged 65 years. Mr. Osgood published a work on chronology; remarks on Daniel and revelation; a letter on episcopacy; and three other letters on different subjects.

OSGOOD, David, D.D. minister of Medford, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college in 1771, and was ordained in 1774. He died in 1822, aged 74. He was one of the most eminent preachers of his day. His zeal as a politician procured him many ardent friends, and not a few bitter enemies. During his life time he published many sermons, and a volume was published after his death.

OSIANDER, Andrew, a native of Bavaria, who studied at Wittenberg and Nuremberg, and was one of Luther's first disciples. He was appointed minister and professor in the university of Konigsberg, and he distinguished himself by a new opinion on justification, which he asserted to arise not from the imputation of Christ's justice, but the union of God's justice with our souls. He defended these sentiments with great vehemence, even against Luther, and chiefly rested on the words of Isaiah, the Lord is our righteousness. His learning was so respectable, that his tenets were tolerated, that no schism might be kindled among the protestants. He died 17th October, 1552, aged 54. He was so violent in his temper, that he treated all his opponents in the grossest language of satire and illiberality. His works are Harmonia Evangelica, fol.—Epistola ad Zwinglium de Eucharistiâ—Disertationes duæ de Lege & Evangelio et Justificatione—De imagine Dei quid sit. His son Luke was also a Lutheran minister, and died at Tubingen, 1604. He was author of Commentaries on the Bible—Institutions of the Christian Religion—Abridgment of the Centuriators of Magdeburg, 4to. Enchiridia Controversiarum, &c. Another Luke was chancellor of Tubingen university, and died 1638, aged 68.—He wrote on the Omnipresence of Christ, in two Latin pamphlets—Funeral Orations—De Baptismo & De Reginine. Ecclesiae. There were two others, Andrew and John Adam who wrote some Latin treatises. The first died 1617, aged 54, and the last 1697.

OSIUS, bishop of Cordova, presided at the council of Nice, which had been assembled 325, by Constantine, agreeable to his advice. He shared the confidence of Constantius as he had shared that of his father; but in those turbulent times, he was persecuted by the Arians, though nearly 100 years old, and at last, by threats and by blows, he was prevailed upon to subscribe to their confession of faith. This had such effect upon him that he led a life of penitence and sorrow, and soon after died, renouncing the tenets which he had embraced, and declaring them unchristian and heretical.

OSIUS, or OSIO, Felix, professor of rhetoric at Padua, was born at Milan, 1587. He published Romano Græcia—Tractatus de Sepulchris & Epitaphiis Ethnicor. & Christianor.—Elogia Scriptorum Illustr.—Orationes—Remarks on Mussati's History—Collection of Historians at Padua. He died at Padua, 1631.

OSMAN I., son of Achmet I., succeeded his uncle Mustapha, 1618, on the Turkish throne. His expedition in 1621, against Poland, was very unfortunate, and after the loss of eighty thousand men, and one hundred thousand horses, he submitted to a disadvantageous peace. These misfortunes were attributed to the Janissaries, and therefore a new militia of Arabs was substituted in their room; but this violent measure produced a revolution, and Osman was hurled from his throne, and strangled by the rebellious soldiery, 19th May, 1622, and Mustapha placed in his room.

OSMAN II., emperor of Constantinople after his brother Mahomet V., 1754, died after a short reign, 29th November, 1757, aged 59. He renewed, under severe penalties, the Mahometan law, that his subjects should drink no wine.

OSMOND, St., a Norman, who followed the fortunes of William the Conqueror, and was made by him, chancellor of England and bishop of Salisbury. The liturgy which he introduced in his diocese was universally adopted, and called the liturgy of Salisbury. He died 1099, and was canonized by Calixtus III.

OSORIO, Jerome, a learned Portuguese, born at Lisbon, 1506. He studied at Salamanca, Paris, and Bologna, and at his return home, was appointed professor of divinity at Coimbra. His abilities recommended him to the court, and he was made bishop of Sylva, by the queen regent. He went afterwards to Rome, and in consequence of the disasters of his country, brought on by the death of king Sebastian in the field of battle, and against his advice, he died, it is said, of a broken heart, August 1530. He wrote commentaries, paraphrases, and other works, and by the elegance and correctness of his diction, deserved to be called the Cicero of Portugal. His works were published at Rome, 1592, in 4 vols. folio, by his nephew.

OSSAT, Arnaud d', a learned cardinal, born of obscure parents, at a small village in Almagnac, 23d August, 1536. He was left poor and destitute at the death of his parents in his ninth year; but Thomas de Maria, a neighboring gentleman, saw and patronised his abilities, and by his own assiduous application, he soon became capable to be tutor to his patron's nephew, and other noblemen. He afterwards studied at Bourges, and applied to the law; and was called to the bar at Paris. In 1580 he went to Rome, as secretary to the archbishop of Toulouse, the ambassador from France, and on his death, he passed into the service of cardinal d'Este, and then of cardinal de Joyeuse. When Henry IV. of France quitted the religion of the protestants, d'Ossat, then French resident at Rome, obtained the papal absolution, and for this service, was made bishop of Rennes. He was afterwards raised by the pope to the dignity of cardinal, and made by Henry, bishop of Bayeux. He however still continued at Rome, as protector of the French nation, and died there, March 1604, aged 68. He was buried in St. Lewis's church at Rome. He was a most able, skilful, and sagacious negotiator, and in everything which he undertook, succeeded to increase the influence of his master, and the glory of his nation. His Letters have been frequently published, of which the best edition is that of Amsterdam, 5 vols. 12mo. 1708.

OSSIEN, the son of Fingal, an ancient Scotch bard, who flourished about the beginning of the third century. He accompanied his father in his wars, and in the latter part of life, which was protracted to a good old age, he became blind. In 1758, some poems appeared in a flowery and poetical style, said to be translated from the original Gaelic poems of Ossian, by the hands of Mr. Macpherson; and as they immediately excited the attention of the learned, by their beauty and simplicity, they produced an animated controversy about their authenticity. The ablest writers of the age were engaged in the contest, which never, perhaps, can be decided, and the poems have acquired a deserved celebrity through Europe.

OSTERVALD, John Frederick, a celebrated protestant divine, born at Neufchatel, in 1663, and descended from an ancient family. He made such rapid progress in his studies, that he became M.A. at Saumur before he was sixteen years of age. He afterwards studied at Orleans and at Paris. On his return to Neufchatel, in 1699, he became professor of divinity, and pastor of the church there; and contracted a strict friendship with the celebrated John Alphonsus Turretin of Geneva, and the illustrious Samuel Werenfels of Basil. The union of these three divines, which was called the triumvirate of the divines of Switzerland, lasted till his death. Mr. Ostervald acquired the highest reputation by his zeal in instructing his disciples, and restoring ecclesiastical discipline. He wrote many books in French, the principal of which are, 1. a Treatise concerning the Causes of the present Corruptions of Christians, and the remedies, which was translated into English, and has been often published; 2. a Catechism, or Instruction in the Christian Religion, which has been translated into German, Dutch and English; and the Abridgment of the Sacred History, which he prefixed to it, was translated and printed in Arabic, to be sent to the East Indies, by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, established in London, who admitted him an honorary member; 3. a Treatise against Impurity; 4. an edition of the French Bible of Geneva, with Arguments and Reflections, in folio; 5. Ethica Christiana; Theologicæ Compendium, &c. He died in 1747. He had a son, who was pastor of the English church at Basil, and maintained the reputation of his father. He published a work much esteemed, entitled Les Devoirs des Communions.

OSWALD, king of Northumberland, fled to Ireland at the death of his father Ethelfred, to avoid the persecution of his uncle Edwin, who usurped the throne. He returned, became a christian, defeated and slew Cerdowalla, king of the Britons, and was afterwards killed in battle with Penda, king of Mercia, 643. His virtues have been recorded by monkish writers, who declare that miracles were wrought at his tomb.

OSWALD, Erasmus, professor of mathematics and Hebrew at Fribourg, published a translation of the New Testament in Hebrew, and other learned works, and died 1579.

O'THO, Marcus Salvius, became emperor of Rome 69, after the murder of Galba and Piso, and three months after he was defeated near Cremona, by Vitellius, who also aspired to the throne. He killed himself, not to fall into the hands of the conqueror.

O'THO I., surnamed the Great, eldest son of Henry the Fowler, was crowned emperor of Germany at Aix la Chapelle, 936. He was an active prince, he defeated the Danes, subdued Bohemia, and carried his arms into Italy against Berenger who had assumed the title of emperor. Berenger was easily routed, and Otho crowned again at Rome, by the hands of the pope, John XII., as sumed the title of Cæsar and Augustus. Displeased with the chains imposed upon him, John XII. revolted against the power of Otho, but he was soon attacked and deposed, and Leo VIII. elected in his room, promised submission to the imperial decrees. The Romans, however, again revolted, and were severely punished by the offended emperor. Afterwards Otho was engaged in a war with the Eastern empire, because his ambassadors had been treated with insult and cruelty, by Nicephorus, and he therefore invaded Apulia and Calabria, which belonged still to the Greek emperors, and after desolating the country, he sent his prisoners to Constantinople with their noses cut off. Peace was at last restored between John Zimisces, the successor of Nicephorus, and Otho, and it was cemented by the marriage of Theophania, the niece of the eastern prince, with the son of Otho. Otho died 7th May, 973, aged 62.

OTHO II., son and successor of the great Otho, was surnamed the Bloody. Though his elevation was opposed by the arts of his mother Adelaide, he had the courage, though young, to expel her from the court, and to defeat her partisans, who had raised Henry, duke of Bavaria, to the throne. After routing the Danes and the Bohemians, who wished to take advantage of the troubles of the empire, he invaded the French territories with an army of sixty thousand men; but peace was restored in 980. The next year, Otho crossed the Alps, to reduce the Calabrians to subjection; but he was defeated in a battle by the Saracens, who supported the cause of his enemies; and in his escape, he fell into the hands of pirates, who restored him to liberty for a large ransom. Undismayed by calamity, he assembled another army, and attacked the Calabrians and Saracens, and obtained a great victory. He died soon after, on his return to Rome, according to some, by poison, 7th December, 983.

OTHO III., only son of Otho II., was crowned emperor at Aix la Chapelle, 983, though only three years old. His elevation was opposed by the duke of Bavaria, who before had rebelled against his father; but the energy of his ministers defeated the measures of his rivals. When he took the reigns of government, Otho went into Italy, where he was crowned by the hands of pope Gregory V., and soon after he re-visited the country, to repress the insurrection of Crescentius, and the anti-pope, John XVI.. On his return to Germany, Otho made Boleslaus, king of Poland, and soon after again went to Italy, to defend it against the Saracens. He died at the castle of Paterno, in the Campagna, 29th January, 1002, aged 22; after having enlarged the power of the pope, and enabled the see of Rome to dispute for temporal sovereignty with his imperial successors.

OTHO IV., surnamed the Proud, son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, was elected emperor, 1197. After being consecrated at Rome by Innocent III., he laid claim, against his solemn promise, to the territories of Ancana and Spoleto, which had been left by Matilda, to the Holy see. In consequence of this, he was excommunicated, and the princes of Germany, exhorted by their bishops, elected Frederic, king of Sicily, emperor. Otho in vain attempted to resist the power of his enemies. Though he leagued with the court of Flanders, he had the misfortune to see his army defeated at the battle of Bouvines, in 1214, and therefore he retired in disgrace and despair, to the castle of Hantzburg, where he died 19th May, 1218.

OTHO, Venius, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden, 1556. He studied at Liege, and afterwards resided seven years at Rome, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was next patronised by the emperor of Germany, the duke of Bavaria, and the elector of Cologne, and then returned to Antwerp, and afterwards was appointed master of the mint at Brussels, by the archduke Albert. He died at Brussels, 1634, aged 78. He had Rubens among his pupils. His brother Gilbert was eminent as an engraver, and Peter, as a painter.

OTIS, James, graduated at Harvard college in 1743. He studied law in the office of Mr. Gridley, and commenced the practice at Plymouth. It appears that the father of Otis had been disappointed in his expectation of receiving a high judicial appointment, and that he and his son, in consequence, were deeply disaffected towards the colonial government, and that the son was heard to say that he would set the province in a flame, if he perished by the fire. In 1761 an opportunity presented itself for him to attempt to carry his threat into execution. He opposed the application of the officers of the customs to the supreme court for writs of assistance. His speech on that occasion gained him great credit, and is said to have had an important hearing on the great questions then in agitation between the mother country and the colonies. He was immediately chosen a member of the legislature, and became a leader in it. He was a member of the congress held in New York in 1765, and in the same year published a pamphlet entitled the rights of the colonies vindicated. For some of the opinions expressed in this work, he was threatened with an arrest; yet he did not desist from supporting what he considered to be the rights of his fellow citizens. In 1767 he resigned the office of judge advocate, and renounced all employment under a government, which he thought had encroached on the rights of his countrymen. In consequence of some publications of his reflecting upon the conduct of the officers of the customs, in the evening of September 5, 1769, he was attacked by one Robinson, who assisted by others most shamefully abused him. The wounds he received did not prove mortal, but were so severe about his head, that combining with other cause he was forever after deprived of the full enjoyment of his reason. He recovered £2000 in an action for damages against Robinson, and which he afterwards released. Mr. Otis lived till May 29d, 1783, on which day, as he was standing at the door of his residence in Andover, he was instantly struck dead by a flash of lightning.

OTIS, Samuel Allyne, a merchant of Boston, who graduated at Harvard college in 1759. In 1776 Mr. Otis was chosen a representative, and subsequently a member of the convention which formed the constitution of Massachusetts. In 1788, he became a representative to congress; and, upon the adoption of the constitution was appointed secretary of the senate. He held this last office more than thirty years, distinguished for his unceasing fidelity, and for urbanity of manners. He died at Washington, April 22, 1814, aged seventy-three years. He was the father of Harrison Gray Otis, of Boston.

O'PROKOTSKIFORIS, Francis, a Hungarian, who studied at Utrecht, and became a protestant minister in his native country. He afterwards embraced the catholic faith, and was professor of law at Tirnau, where he died 1718. He wrote Origines Hungaricæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—Antiqua Religio Hungorum verè Christiana & Catholica, 8vo. besides some polemical works, which he refuted after he became a member of the church of Rome.

OTT, Henry, a learned Swiss divine, born at Zurich, where he became professor of eloquence, Hebrew, and ecclesiastical history, and where he died 1682, aged 65. As an orientalist, his abilities were very great, and he was the correspondent of several learned men in Europe.

OTWAY, Thomas, a celebrated dramatic writer, born at Trotting, Sussex, March, 1651. He was educated at Winchester school and Christ-church, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and repaired to London, where he became a writer and actor of plays. By the friendship of lord Plymouth, natural son of Charles II. he obtained a cornetcy in the army, and embarked with the forces for Flanders, in 1677; but a military life proved disagreeable to him, and he returned to London, poor, and necessitated to write for his support. He died April 14th, 1685, in a manner, says Dr. Johnson, which I am unwilling to mention. Having been compelled by his necessities, to contract debts, and hunted by the terriers of the law, he retired to a public house on Tower-hill, where he died of want, or, as related by one of his biographers, by swallowing, after a long fast, a piece of bread, which charity had supplied. He went out, as reported, almost naked, in the rage of hunger, and finding a gentleman in the neighboring coffee-house, asked him for a shilling; the gentleman gave him a guinea; and Otway, going away, bought a roll, and was choked with the first mouthful. As a writer, he had extraordinary powers, in touching the heart, in his tragedies, of which his Orphan, and Venice Preserved, are noble instances. Besides ten dramatic pieces, he wrote some miscellaneous poems and translations. His works have appeared in 3 vols. 12mo. 1757.

OUDET, James Joseph, one of the most distinguished officers in the armies of the French republic, was born at Meynal, in the department of Jura, about 1773. He had risen to eminence by force of merit at the period when Buonaparte returned from Egypt, and Oudet, who was sincerely attached to the republican institutions, beheld with sorrow the tyrant in the hero, and watched his movements with suspicion. The government, jealous of his influence, ordered him on a provincial command, as an adjunct of adjutant-general Malet, celebrated subsequently for his conspiracy against Napoleon. Oudet is supposed to have been concerned in the formation of a secret society, which was directed against the power of the emperor. After having been alternately employed and exiled, he had the command of the sixth supplementary regiment of the line at the battle of Wagram, in which he highly signalized himself; but the wounds which he received in that engagement caused his death shortly after.

UDIN, Casimir, a French monk, born at Mezieres, 1633; son of a weaver. He burst from the obscurity of his father's profession, and became a recluse in the abbey of Boucilly, in Champagne, where Louis XIV. accidentally passed, and discovered his abilities, which were soon after employed in visiting the archives of the monasteries of Lorraine, Alsace, and Burgundy. In 1690, he left France, turned protestant, and was made under librarian at the university of Leyden, where he died 1717. He wrote Commentarius de Scriptoribus Ecclesie Antiquis et eorum Scriptis, 3 vols. folio—Veterum alliquot Gallie & Belgie Scriptorum Opuscula Sacra, 8vo.—Supplement to Ecclesiastical Authors, omitted by Bellarmine, 8vo.—the Monk of Premontre unfrocked.

UDIN, Francis, a native of Vignori, in Champagne, who studied at Langres, and was admitted among the jesuits, 1691. He became professor of humanity and theology, and settled at Dijon, where he died of a dropsy in the chest, 28th April, 1752, aged seventy-nine. He was well versed in divinity and in the ecclesiastical history of the fathers. He published Somnia, an elegant Latin poem, odes, elegies, &c. printed in his Poemata Didascalica, 3 vols. 12mo.—Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu—Celtic Etymologies—Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans—Historia Dogmatica Conciliorum—Lives of several Persons included in Niceron's Collection.

UDINET, Mark Anthony, a French medallist, born at Rheims, 1643. He quitted his professorship of law at Rheims, to go to Paris with his relation Raissant, as keeper of the medals in the king's cabinet. The order and arrangement which he introduced in this valuable collection, obtained for him a pension from the king, and the honor of a seat in the academy of belles lettres. He died at Paris 1712. He wrote three dissertations of great merit on medals.

UDRI, John Baptist, a French painter, who studied under Largillieres, and acquired great celebrity in his correct representation of animals. Some of his hunting pieces adorn the palaces of France. His Adoration of the Magi is in high esteem. He was treated with distinction by the French king, and received a pension. He died at Paris, his native town, 1st May, 1755, aged 69.

UGHTRED, William, an English divine, born 1573, at Eton, and educated on the foundation there, from whence he was removed as fellow of King's college, Cambridge. In 1603 he was presented to the living of Aldbury, near Guilford, where he devoted himself to mathematical studies. During the usurpation of Cromwell, he was frequently molested, though a peaceful and harmless resident in his parish, and he was liberated from the danger of sequestration only by the interference of Lilly, Whitelocke, and other friends. He died the beginning of May 1660, aged 86. On hearing the news of Charles's restoration, he expired, it is said, in a sudden ecstasy of joy. He was the friend and correspondent of the most learned men of the times, and as a mathematician his works are numerous and valuable. He published in 1631, his "Clavis," a most valuable work, containing many new theorems in algebra and geometry, which have been adopted by Newton, and other learned philosophers. This little volume became a standard book at Cambridge, by the introduction of Seth Ward. His "Opuscula" were published after his death at Oxford, 1676.

OUSEL, Philip, a native of Dantzic, descended from a family originally from France. He became protestant minister at Leyden, and afterwards was appointed theological professor at Frankfort on Oder, where he died 1724, aged fifty-three. He was well skilled in Hebrew literature, and published Introductio in Accentuationem Hebræorum Metricam, 4to. in which he supports that the Hebrew points and accents are as old as the bible—de Accentuatione Hebræorum Prosaicâ, 8vo.—de Leprâ, 4to. His relation James wrote valuable notes on the Octavius of Minutus Felix, inserted in the variorum edition of 1672.

OUTHIER, Renaud, a French astronomer, who was a native of the province of Franche Comté. He embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and having studied astronomy he was nominated correspondent of the Academy of Sciences in 1731. After having been appointed secretary to the bishop of Bayeux, he in 1736 accompanied Maupertuis in his journey to measure a degree within the polar circle. Returning from that expedition, he obtained a canonry in the cathedral of Bayeux, which he resigned that he might be more at leisure for study

His death took place in 1774. He published "Journal d'un Voyage fait au Nord en 1736 et 1737," Paris, 1744, 4to., reprinted at Amsterdam, 1746, 12mo; besides charts and memoirs in the collection of the Academy of Sciences.

OVANDO, Don Nicholas de, governor of Hispaniola. He was appointed to the station in 1501, and arrived upon the island in the year following. He is represented as an unprincipled tyrant, greedy after lucre. His cruelty to Indians was excessive, and has rendered his name execrable. He was superseded by Don Diego Columbus in 1509, but was permitted to retain his wealth, which he wrung from the natives.

OVERALL, John, D.D., an English prelate, born 1559. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and removed to Trinity, where he became fellow. In 1596 he was made regius professor of divinity, and master of Catherine hall, and in 1601, he succeeded to the deanery of St. Paul. In 1614 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1618 translated to Norwich, where he died May 1619. His tomb remained neglected till 1669, when his pupil Cosin, bishop of Durham, erected a monument over it. Overall was a learned divine, distinguished by wisdom, erudition, and piety, and connected by literature with the most eminent men of the times. He wrote a "Convocation book," and other works.

OVERBEKE, Bonaventure Van, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a designer and an antiquarian. He went three times to Rome, to take correct copies of her ancient monuments, and he made beautiful engravings of his pieces. The description with which he accompanied his plates, written in Flemish, was translated into Latin and French, three vols. folio, and possesses great merit. He died at Amsterdam, 1706.

OVERBURY, sir Thomas, a polite English writer, born in 1581, at Compton-Scorfen, Warwickshire. He was of Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then entered at the Middle Temple; but he soon relinquished the law for literature, and for the favors of the court. He became the confidential friend of Car, earl of Somerset, by whose influence he was knighted; but he stained his character in promoting the amours of that profligate nobleman with the licentious countess of Essex; and as if ashamed of his conduct, he boldly attempted to dissuade him from marrying so worthless a woman. Car was weak enough to reveal the friendly advice, and the enraged countess meditated revenge. By the means of Car, Overbury was appointed ambassador to Russia, and by his insidious advice, encouraged to refuse the office, in consequence of which the king caused him to be sent to the Tower as a disloyal man. In this place poison was administered to him, and he at last thus fell a sacrifice to the diabolical intrigues of his perfidious friend and his guilty mistress, 15th September, 1613. The murder, though noised abroad, was hushed by the power of the offender; but two years after, it was fully disclosed; the under-agents were tried, condemned, and executed, but the earl and the countess, after being found guilty, were pardoned by the king. Sir Thomas, who has been compared in his learning, his wisdom, and his melancholy fate, to Germanicus Cæsar, was the author of some works in prose and verse, of considerable merit, reprinted 1753, 8vo.

OVID, Pub. Naso, a celebrated Latin poet, born at Sulmo, B.C. 43. He was bred up for the bar, but poetry had greater charms for him, and under the patronage of Augustus, he acquired celebrity and honors. He was afterwards banished by his imperial patron, for causes not satisfactorily known, and died on the borders of the Euxine sea, A.D. 17. His works, which are elegant, polished, and animated, though often licentious, are well known.

OVIEDO, John Gonsalvo de, a learned Spaniard, born at Madrid 1478. He was one of the pages of Ferdinand of Arragon and Isabella, and was at Barcelona in 1493, on the return of Columbus from the discovery of the new world. The adventures of this extraordinary man raised his attention; he became his friend, and accompanied him in his next voyage. As he had rendered important services to Spain in the wars of Naples, Ferdinand considered him as the fittest man to examine the commerce and resources of the new world; and on his return from the island of Hayti, he published the result of his intelligent inquiries, called the General and Natural History of the West-Indies, afterwards enlarged to a folio volume, Salamanca, 1535. In this work he paid particular attention to the venereal disease, which was lately become known in Europe, and which some thought was introduced from America; and he ascertained that the use of guaiacum was very salutary in the relief of this terrible disorder.

OWAIN, a prince of Powys, who fled to Ireland, in consequence of carrying away Ness, the wife of Gerald, constable of Pembroke. He succeeded his father Cadwygan ap Bledlyn in 1110, and was slain by Gerald four years after. He was in the service of Henry I. of England in Normandy, for some time, and was knighted by him.

OWAIN, or OWEN TUDOR, lord of Penmynydd, in Anglesea, married Catherine, the widow of Henry V. in 1426, and was father by her of three sons, the eldest of whom embraced the monastic life; the second was Edmund, earl of Richmond, father to Henry VII. and the third, Jasper, earl of Pembroke. After the death of his wife, he was confined in Newgate, but escaped, and died in Wales.

OWAIN GLANDWR, or OWEN GLENDOWER, last of the Welch princes, was in the service of Richard II. but was disgraced by Henry IV. In consequence of this he took up arms, burnt Ruthyn, and defeated lord Grey, who had, by false accusation, obtained his lands from the king; but afterwards he restored him to liberty for a large ransom. He continued his hostilities, and in 1402 routed Edward Mortimer in Radnorshire, and caused himself to be proclaimed by the voice of his assembled and unanimous people, independent sovereign of Wales. Though assisted by the French, his affairs, however, became desperate, and unable to withstand the incursions of the English, he led a life of retirement, and died at last in 1415, in the disguise of a poor shepherd.

OWEN, John, D.D. an eminent divine among the independents, of whom he is sometimes called the prince, the oracle, and the metropolitan. He was born 1616, at Hadham, Oxfordshire, and was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, which he left in 1637, as unwilling to submit to the regulations introduced by Laud, the university chancellor. He afterwards became chaplain to lord Lovelace, and at the breaking out of the civil war, embraced the party of the parliament with such warmth, that his uncle discarded and disinherited him. His "Display of Arminianism," published in 1642, rendered him very popular among the non-conformists; he was a frequent preacher before the parliament, and obtained the friendship of Cromwell, whom he served faithfully, and by whose influence he was made in 1650, dean of Christ-church. In 1652 he was, by Cromwell, chancellor of the university, nominated vice-chancellor. On the protector's death he was removed from the office of vice-chancellor, and at the restoration, he was deprived of his deanery, and retired into the country. He lived for some time in London, and then at Kensington, and died at his house at Ealing, Middlesex, 24th August, 1683, aged 67. Though violent as the friend of party and of usurpation, it is said, however, that he possessed moderation and kindness, and frequently exerted his influence in favor of such royalists as were distinguished for virtue and learning. His works were numerous, amounting to 7 vols. folio, 20 in 4to. and 30 in 8vo. the best known of which are, an Exposition of the Hebrews, 4 vols. folio—Discourse on the Holy Spirit, folio—treatise on Original Sin, 8vo—sermons and tracts, folio.

OWEN, John, an English epigrammatist, born at Arnen, Caernarvonshire, and educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He had such a vein for satire and epigram, that he even wrote in ridicule of a rich uncle on whom he depended, in consequence of which he was excluded from his will. He was afterwards supported by his friend Williams, bishop of Lincoln. He died poor 1622. His epigrams have been often printed. They are in Latin, and much esteemed, and possess the elegance and humor of Martial's pieces. They have been translated into English, French, and Spanish.

OWEN, Henry, was born in Merionethshire, and educated at Ruthyn school, and Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.D. He had applied himself to mathematics, and afterwards studied and practised physic, and then took orders and obtained the livings of Edmonton, and St. Olive's, Hart-street, London. He died at the close of 1795, aged 80. He was an able and pious divine, and wrote Observations on the Scripture Miracles—Remarks on the four Gospels—Inquiry on the Septuagint Version—Sermons at Boyle's Lectures, 2 vols. 8vo.—Introduction to Hebrew Criticism—Modes of Quotation by Evangelical writers explained—Posthumous Sermons, 2 vols.

OWEN, Rev. John, one of the secretaries of the British and Foreign Bible Society, was born in London, about the year 1765, and was educated at Cambridge, where, by his superior attainments, he obtained several prizes, and was elected fellow of the Corpus Christi college. He soon after took orders, and became distinguished as a preacher. He preached some time at Cogglesham, in Essex, and afterwards at Fulham, and at length became minister of Park chapel, near Chelsea, where he labored with great diligence till deprived of his health. He was present at the meeting held at the London tavern, March 7th, 1804, to deliberate on the formation of the Bible Society, and was one of the most active in promoting its establishment. From that time he devoted his life with the greatest zeal to the objects of the society; and its progressive extension, as well as its first establishment, was in a great measure effected through his instrumentality. During several of his last years, he suffered much from ill health in consequence of his arduous labors. His death took place September 26, 1822. He published Travels in Europe—the Christian Monitor—the Fashionable World Displayed—and a Vindication of the Bible Society.

OWTRAM, William, prebendary of Westminster in the reign of Charles II., was eminent as a preacher, and as a scholar in rabbinical learning. He died 1679. He published a learned book, de Sacrificiis, and after his death, a volume of sermons was published by bishop Gardner.

OXENBRIDGE, John, was a native of England, and educated at Oxford. Between 1634 and his coming to New England in 1669, he had been settled as a preacher at Bermuda, Surinam, and Barbadoes, and also passed some time as a fellow of Eaton college. April 10th, 1670, he was settled pastor of the first church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Allen. He died 1674, aged 65. He published a double watch word, or the duty of watching, and watching in duty, 1661; a proposition for propagating the gospel by christian colonies, in the continent of Guiana; election sermon, 1671; seasonable seeking of God.

OXENSTIERN, Axel, grand chancellor of Sweden, and prime minister to Gustavus Adolphus, deserved his elevation by his merit and his abilities. After the unfortunate battle of Lutzen, 1632, in which his master lost his life, he was placed at the head of affairs, and rewarded this confidence of the nation by the most consummate wisdom, and the strictest integrity exerted for the happiness of Sweden. He died universally respected, 28th August, 1654, aged 71. The second volume of the History of Sweden, in German, is attributed to him. Of his sons, John was penitentiary at the peace of Munster, where he distinguished himself by his firmness and talents; Gabriel was marshal of Sweden, and Benedict grand chancellor, and prime minister of the kingdom. His grand nephew N. was distinguished as a man of letters. He travelled over the greater part of Europe, and published Thoughts on different Subjects, with Moral Reflections, printed 2 vols. 12mo.; and died at an advanced age, 1707, governor of the duchy of Deux-ponts.

OZANHAM, James, a French mathematician, born at Boligneux in Brescia, 1640. He studied divinity in compliance with the wishes of his father, but after his death, he applied himself to mathematics, in which he was doomed to distinguish himself. He left his country, and taught mathematics at Lyons, and afterwards at Paris, where, though occasionally given to gaming and gallantry, he acquired some little property. The Spanish war, however, reduced his income by lessening his scholars, and the death of his wife, by whom he had twelve children, none of whom survived him, embittered with sorrow the last years of life. He died of an apoplexy, 3d April, 1717, aged 77. The best known of his works are, a Dictionary of Mathematics, 4to—a Course of Mathematics, 5 vols. 8vo.—Mathematical Recreations, 4 vols. 8vo.—Use of the Compass of Proportion, 12mo.—Elements of Algebra, 4to.—Practical Geometry.

OZELL, John, an indefatigable English writer, educated at Ashby-de-la-Zouch school, and afterwards at Christ's hospital. His friends designed him for a college education, but disdaining the restraints of university discipline, he qualified himself by a most perfect knowledge of arithmetic for a public office, and obtained the appointment of auditor-general of the city and bridge accounts, and auditor of the accounts of St. Paul's cathedral, and of St. Thomas's hospital. He died 15th October, 1743, and was buried in St. Mary Aldermanbury parish. Though he wrote nothing original, he yet showed great assiduity and judgment in his translations of foreign authors; and Moliere, by his labors, appears in an English dress far from inelegant and disinteresting. In his conversation and manners, Ozell was agreeable; he had a good knowledge of modern languages, and had improved himself by travelling. He was one of those heroes whom Pope immortalized in his Dunciad; and in consequence of this, Ozell published a warm and selfconsequential comparison between himself and his antagonist, more deserving ridicule than approbation.

OZEROFF, Vladislav Alexandrovitch, a celebrated Russian tragic author, was born in 1770, near Twer, and entered into the civil service, after having attained the rank of major-general in the army. He died in 1816. Ozeroff produced, between 1798 and 1809, the tragedies of the Death of Oleg; Edipus, at Athens; Fingal; Dmitri Donskoi; and Polixena. He also wrote some lyric poems.

P.

PAAS, Crispin, a native of Cologne, eminent as an engraver, and as the pupil of Cornehard, whose celebrity he equalled. He was patronised by the king of Denmark, and died at Copenhagen, in the beginning of the seventeenth century. His engravings were numerous and highly finished, especially those of the bible. His daughters Magdalen and Barba, also acquired celebrity as engravers; and there were besides two engravers of the same family, Simon, and Crispin the younger, who were equally distinguished by their merit.

PAAW, Peter, a native of Amsterdam, known as a physician and botanist. He practised with great reputation at Leyden, where he died 1617, aged 53. His works, once much admired, were a Commentary on Vesalius, 4to.—a treatise on the Plague, 4to.—Hortus Lugduno-Batavus, 8vo.—and other works, mentioned by Nicéron.

PABO, a British prince in the fifth century. It is said that after a defeat, he retired to the court of the king of Powys, and afterwards became a monk and a saint. The church of Mona was founded by him, and there his remains were deposited according to the inscription which still records his adventures.

PACA, William, a native of Maryland, and afterwards governor of that state, was born October 31, 1740. He was educated at the college in Philadelphia, where he took his degree in 1758. Having settled in Annapolis, he was several years a delegate to the assembly from that city, previous to the revolution. In 1774, he was appointed a member of congress, and continued in that body till the close of 1778. He also signed the Declaration of American Independence. From 1778 to 1780 he was chief justice of Maryland; then chief judge of the court of appeals in admiralty cases, which office he resigned, on being elected governor of the state; and in 1789, he was appointed the judge of the district court of the United States. He died in 1799, aged 59 years. He is represented to have been a man of great worth; distinguished for a highly cultivated intellect; for polished manners; and for public and social virtues.

PACE, Richard, a learned Englishman, born 1482. He was patronised by Langton, bishop of Winchester, and cardinal Bainbridge, and recommended himself by his great abilities to Henry VIII., who employed him in several negotiations. He then took orders, and was raised to a prebend of York, and to the deanery of St. Paul's, London, and also that of Exeter. He was afterwards employed in an embassy to Rome, to solicit the pope's pardon for Wolsey, and was next sent as ambassador to Venice. In this distant employment he felt all the weight of Wolsey's jealousy and resentment, no directions were sent him for his guidance, and no remittances of money made, and in consequence of this, his spirits were so affected that he became delirious. He returned home, but the ill treatment which he had received was not sufficient to open the king's eyes to the cruelties and oppression of his favorite. He resigned the deaneries sometime before his death, and expired at Stepney, where he had retired for his health, 1532, aged 50. He was a man universally beloved, and by his meritorious services deserved, and enjoyed the friendship of cardinal Pole, sir Thomas More, Erasmus, and other learned men. He wrote Epistles—de Fructu Scientiarum, 4to.—de Lapsu Hebraicorum Interpretum.

PACHECO, John de, marquis de Villena, was brought up with Henry IV. of Castille, and became his favorite. He acquired in consequence so much power that all offices of trust and honor were at his disposal; but so venal is the attachment of flatterers, that he was bribed by Louis XI. of France, and on the peace of 1443, he consented to various articles which betrayed the interests of his master, and were prejudicial to the honor of his crown. The injured monarch expostulated with the guilty subject, but Pacheco, full of resentment, revolted against him, and placed the prince Alphonsus on the throne of his brother. Alphonsus, though proclaimed king of Castille, 1465, soon after died, it is said, by poison administered by the too powerful favorite, who now was reconciled to his lawful sovereign, and continued in the office of prime minister to the end of life. This artful sycophant died 1473, and it is reported was sincerely lamented by Henry, who forgot his perfidy in the vigor of his measures for the welfare of the kingdom.

PACIAUDI, Paul Marie, a native of Turin, of the order of Theatins. He was correspondent of the Paris academy of belles lettres, and librarian to the duke of Parma. He was an able and learned antiquarian, and wrote Monumenta Peloponnesiaca, 2 vols. 4to.—Memoirs of the Grand Masters of the order of Jerusalem, in Italian, 3 vols. 4to.—Letters between him and count Caylus, 8vo. He died of an apoplexy, 1785, aged 75.

PACIFICUS, Maximus, born of a noble family at Ascoli, 1400, was an elegant Latin poet. His poems called "Hecatalegium," were printed at Florence, 1439, 4to. and it is remarkable that in them he makes mention of the venereal disease, supposed not to have been known before Columbus sailed to America. The best edition of his works is that of Parma, 1691, 4to, which is free from all licentious passages.

PACIUS, Julius, a native of Vicenza, who travelled over Switzerland, Germany and Hungary, where he maintained himself by giving lectures on jurisprudence. He was afterwards at Sedan, Montpellier, and Aix, and distinguished himself so much that he was offered a professor's chair at Leyden, at Pisa, and Padua. He settled at Padua, and was honored with the collar of St. Mark, and afterwards went to Valence, where he died 1635, aged 85. He is author of a treatise on Arithmetic, written when only thirteen years old—de Contractibus, folio 1606—de Jure Maris Adriatici, 8vo. 1669—in Decretales Libri quinque, 8vo.—Corpus Juris Civilis, folio. 1580—Aristotelis Organum, 8vo. 1593—an excellent translation of Aristotle's Logic. Pacius was a firm protestant, though it is said that by the representations of his pupil Peirese he embraced the Catholic tenets a little before his death.

PADARN, a British bishop, to whose honor several of the churches of Wales are dedicated. He is one of the three blessed visitors who preached the gospel to the astonished inhabitants. His two companions were Dewi and Teilo.

PADILLA, Don John de, a Spanish patriot, of a noble family, was the son of the commander of Castille; espoused the cause of the people; and supported it bravely during the struggle of the Spaniards for liberty, from 1420 to 1422. Being defeated and taken prisoner, at the battle of Villalar, he was put to death on the following day, and met his fate with heroic firmness.—His wife, Donna Maria Pacheco, was worthy of such a husband. During his life she participated in all his labors, and after his death she defended Toledo for several months, gained several advantages at the head of her troops, and did not quit the place till she was deserted by the citizens. She died in Portugal.

PADILLA, Mary de, a Spanish lady, who became the favorite of Peter the Cruel, king of Castille. She possessed such influence over him that three days after his marriage with the virtuous and beautiful Blanche of Bourbon, he abandoned his lawful wife for the company of his guilty mistress. After his divorce from Blanche, and his marriage with Jane de Castro, Peter showed himself an equally capricious lover, and two days after he was again at the feet of the all powerful Padilla, who died soon after, and was buried with all the magnificence due to a crowned head.

PAEZ, Francis Alvarez, a Portuguese divine, of the order of the Cordeliers. He was patronised by pope John XXII. who made him bishop of Coron, afterwards of Sylves, and sent him as his legate into Portugal. He died at Seville, 8th May, 1532. He is author of a famous treatise de Placitu Ecclesie, in which he boldly supports the temporal powers of the see of Rome—a Summary of Theology—Apology of John XXII. folio.

PAGAN, Blaise Francis, count de, a French mathematician, born at Avignon in Provence, 3d March, 1604. He entered into the army and early distinguished himself in various actions, but at the siege of Montauban he lost his left eye by a musket shot. At the passage of the Alps, and at the siege of Suza, he bravely led on his soldiers to glory, and in the year 1642 he was sent by Louis XIII. with the rank of field-marshal, to gather fresh laurels in the service of Portugal. Here, however, he had the misfortune to lose his eye-sight by a distemper, and with the volume of the world thus closed upon him, he retired to study and meditation. The mathematics and fortification were his favorite pursuits, and on these sciences he wrote some valuable works, consisting of a treatise on Fortification—Geometrical Theorems—Astronomical Tables—Theory of the Planets—Historical Relation of the Amazon River, 8vo. and Homme Heroique. This great man, beloved by his sovereign, respected by his country, and by all learned and virtuous men, for his genius, his abilities, and his benevolence, died at Paris, 18th November, 1665.

PAGANEL, Peter, a French statesman, who was a member of the legislative assembly and of the convention. He was born in 1745. He had before the Revolution been a public teacher, from which office he retired with a pension, after two years' service. In 1791 he was chosen a deputy to the legislative assembly; and on the 10th of August, 1792, when the unfortunate Louis XVI. sought an asylum in the hall of the representatives, Paganel was one of the first who offered to join in a deputation to the people, in order to restrain their violence. When in the convention he published a tract, in which he demanded that the trial of the king should be remitted to the ordinary tribunal of justice. Under the directory he was secretary general of the ministry of foreign affairs; and in 1803 he was made chief of the department of the grand chancery. As he had ultimately voted in the convention for the death of the king, he was obliged to quit France in 1816, and he took refuge at Liege, whence he removed to Brussels, where he died November 20, 1826. He was the author of "Essai Historique et Critique sur la Revolution Française," 3 vols. 8vo. which passed through three editions, and he translated into prose the "Animaux Parlants" of the abbé Lasti, and wrote a memoir "Sur l'Ancienneté du Globe;" and another "Sur les Causes de la Durée de l'Empire des Chinois." Paganel was a member of several French and foreign learned societies.

PAGE, William, D.D. an English divine, author of Animadversions on John Hale's Tracts of Schism—Genuflexionis ad Nomen Jesu Defensio, Oxon. 1631—Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, translated into English. He was a native of London, and was in 1619 fellow of All Souls, Oxford. During the civil wars he was exposed to great persecution for his attachment to the royal cause, and he died about 1669.

PAGE, John, governor of Virginia. He was one of the first representatives from Virginia under the constitution of the United States adopted in 1789. In 1800 he was an elector of president from Virginia. In 1802 he was chosen governor and held the office till 1805. He died 1808 aged 64.

PAGE, Benjamin, was born in Kensington, New-Hampshire, and was the eldest member of one of the most extensive and respectable families in Maine. He was a physician by profession, a member of the New-Hampshire medical society, and for several years, also, a member of the legislature of that state. He was a patriot of the revolution, and acted many months as surgeon in the American army, during the years 1777—81, and was present at the battles of Bennington and Ticonderoga. He removed to Maine in 1800, and continued in medical practice, to which he was ardently attached, until within the few last years of his life. His manners were courtly, and his mind active and intelligent, and he was greatly esteemed for his excellence as a man, his usefulness as a physician, and his patriotism as a citizen. He died in Hallowell, October 28th, 1824, aged 78, in the firm belief of the Christian religion, and assurance of future happiness.

PAGE, John Odlin, son of Benjamin, was born in Exeter, New-Hampshire, in 1772. In the early part of his life he removed to Maine, and soon became distinguished as one of her most worthy and enterprising citizens. He travelled in Europe for the benefit of his health, and was the bearer of American despatches from Paris to London in 1811, where he died. His remains were interred in St. Michael's church. He was distinguished for his elegance of person, urbanity of manners, decision of character, ardent philanthropy, and love of liberty.

PAGES, Pierre Marie François vicomte de, a French navigator, of a noble family, was born at Toulouse in 1748. He entered into the navy at the age of nineteen, and, in 1767, embarked at Cape François in St. Domingo, on a voyage with a view to explore the Indian seas, and travel through China and Tartary to the Northern Ocean. He arrived at the Philippine Islands in October 1768, and, it being impossible to penetrate China, went by sea to Bassora, and, travelling through the desert to Syria, reached France in December 1771. In 1773 he sailed in Kerguelin's expedition toward the South Pole; on his return made a voyage in a Dutch vessel employed in the whale fishery in the North Seas, when he proceeded as far as 81° 30' N. latitude. Pages obtained, as the reward of his services, the rank of captain, and the cross of Saint Louis, and was chosen a correspondent of the Academy of Sciences. He served in the American war, and after the peace of 1783 retired to St. Domingo, where he was murdered by the negroes in 1793. He published a work which Humboldt mentions with approbation, Voyages au tour du Monda, 1767-1776, 2 vols. 8vo.

PAGET, William lord, though but the son of a serjeant at mace, was noticed by Henry VIII. and on account of his abilities was patronised and made successively clerk of the signet, of the council, and afterwards of the privy seal. He afterwards went as ambassador to France, and on his return was knighted by the king, in approbation of his conduct. He was soon after made secretary of state, and was one of those who were executors of the monarch's will. His consequence increased; in the next reign he was sent ambassador to Charles V. but his intimacy with Somerset proved injurious to his interests, and he shared his disgrace, and was sent a close prisoner to the tower, and fined £6000. On the accession of Mary he was restored to favor, and continued in the service of the court under Elizabeth. He died 1564, and the queen in gratitude for his public services ordered his remains to be conveyed to London at the national expense, and to be magnificently buried.

PAGI, Anthony, a Cordelier, the ablest critic of his time, was born at Rogna in Provence, 1624. He was provincial of his order, and distinguished himself by his writings. His great work is a Critique on the Annals of Baronius, a most valuable performance, the first volume of which appeared at Paris 1689, and the rest was completed after his death, containing 4 vols. fol. Geneva, 1705. He wrote besides a Latin Dissertation on the Consular Office, and other things, and died at Aix 1699. His character was that of a learned chronologer and historian, candid and moderate in his expressions, and simple in his style.

PAGI, Francis, nephew to the preceding, was born at Lambese in Provence, 1654. He followed his uncle's example, and entered among the Cordeliers, and greatly assisted him by his learning in the completion of his Critique on Baronius, of which he published the three last volumes. He wrote besides in Latin "an History of the Popes," 4 vols. 4to. He died January 21st, 1721. His nephew was also a man of letters, and published a History of Cyrus, the younger, 12mo. 1736—a History of the Revolution in the Low Countries, 1727, 12mo.

PAINE, Thomas, a political writer, was born in 1737, at Thetford in Norfolk, where he was brought up to the business of a stay-maker. He afterwards became an exciseman at Lewis; but being dismissed for some malpractices, he came to America, where he much contributed to the Revolution by a pamphlet, entitled "Common Sense;" for which he was rewarded with five hundred pounds by the legislature of Pennsylvania. He also obtained a grant of land in New York. In 1790 he went to London, and excited considerable notice by his "Rights of Man;" in answer to Burke. A prosecution, however, being instituted against Paine, he went to France, where he was chosen into the National assembly; but in the time of Robespierre he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped the guillotine. During his confinement he wrote his infamous work, called "The Age of Reason," in which he endeavored to bring religion into contempt. After his liberation he published some political tracts of little moment; but one of them was a scandalous attack upon Washington. In 1802 he returned to America, where he ended his dishonored life, June 8, 1809.

PAINE, Robert Treat, LL.D. a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college in 1749. After trying various other pursuits, he finally settled as a lawyer in the town of Taunton. He was a member from Massachusetts of the first congress, and signed the declaration of independence. Before his appointment as judge he held for some time the office of attorney-general. He resigned the office of judge in 1804, and died 1814, aged 84.

PAINE, Robert Treat, a poet, was the son of the preceding, and was born at Taunton, Mass. December 9th, 1773; and graduated at Harvard college in 1792. Soon after, he was placed in the counting-room of a merchant, but left it for literary occupations, and published several poems and orations, which exhibited uncommon talents and were highly popular. His poem, delivered at Cambridge in 1795 called the Invention of Letters brought him a profit of 1500 dollars; and in 1797 his Ruling Passion, 1200. His song of Adams and Liberty, in 1798, yielded him 750 dollars; more than eleven dollars for each line. In 1800 he began the practice of law, but failed of success from want of application, and spent the close of his life in poverty. He died November 13, 1811, aged 38.

PAINTER, Gamaliel, judge of the county court of Vermont, was born at New-Haven, Connecticut, May 22, 1743. He enjoyed only the advantages of a common education, and was indebted for the influence and offices to which he was advanced to the superior energy of his mind. He removed in 1773 to Middlebury Vermont, and erected the first house in that town. In 1776 he joined the American army with a captain's commission, and served in the quarter-master's department. He commenced the settlement of the village of Middlebury in 1788, and resided there till his death, May 21st, 1819, aged 76. He filled at different periods the offices of representative, judge, and councillor, and was a member of the convention which formed the first constitution of Vermont, and was one of the most influential men in the state. He was a principal patron of Middlebury college, one of its trustees, and at his death left the institution a bequest of about 10,000 dollars.

PAGNINUS, Sanctes, a Dominican, born at Lucca, 1466. He was well skilled in the knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, and for twenty-five years he was engaged in examining the Vulgate bible with the originals, and in consequence of these labors published a new translation of it from the Greek and Hebrew, in which he was liberally patronised by pope Leo X. and his two successors. The work, however, is blamed by father Simon, as being too closely and severely translated, and in language barbarous, obscure, and full of solecisms. He wrote besides a Hebrew Lexicon, and a Hebrew Grammar, much commended by Buxtorf. He died 1536, aged 70.

PAISELLO, John, a celebrated composer, a pupil of Durante, was born, in 1741, at Tarento, in the kingdom of Naples. He began his public career in 1763 by two operas, which raised him at once into popularity throughout Italy. His subsequent works extended his reputation over the whole of the continent. Several sovereigns invited him into their service. He accepted the offer of the Empress Catherine, and resided in Russia for nine years. He next settled at Naples. In 1801 he went to Paris at the request of Bonaparte; but, after having lived nearly three years in France, he returned to Naples, and died there in 1816. His operas and other works are numerous, and are in high repute.

PAJON, Claude, a protestant divine, born at Romorantin, 1626. His abilities highly recommended him; at the age of 24 he entered into orders, and soon after was made professor of theology at Saumur, and afterwards Calvinistic minister at Orleans. He was engaged in controversy with Jurieu, on the power of grace, and on the conversion of sinners; and his followers who were numerous and respectable, assumed the name of Pajonites. He died 1685, aged 59. He wrote a Defence of the Calvinists, 2 vols. 12mo. and Remarks on l'Avertissement Pastoral, works of merit.

PAJOT, Lewis Leo, count of Osembray, was born at Paris 1678. He enjoyed, in consequence of his learning and abilities, the favor of Louis XIV. and his cabinet, on account of its curiosities in mechanics and natural history, was visited with attention by the Czar Peter, by prince Charles of Lorraine, and other great men. He contributed much to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was a member, and left his valuable collection to that learned body for the use of the public. He died universally lamented, 1753.

PAJOU, Augustin, an eminent French sculptor, was born in 1730, at Paris; gained the prize of the Academy at the age of eighteen, and was sent to study at Rome, where he remained for twelve years; and died, in 1809, professor of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and a member of the Institute, and of the legion of honor. His countrymen have called him the restorer of the art. Among his numerous works, some of the principal are, Pluto holding Cerebus chained, Pysche abandoned by Love, and statues of Demosthenes, Descartes, Bossuet, Pascal, and Turenne.

PAKINGTON, Dorothy, lady, daughter of lord Coventry, and wife of sir Thomas Pakington of Worcestershire, is supposed by Dr. Hickee to be the author of the Whole Duty of Man, though some ascribe the work to other authors. She was eminently distinguished for her learning, and had among her friends several celebrated divines, such as Bishop Fell, Hammond, Sanderson, Hickee, &c. She died 1679, and was buried in Hampton Lovet church, in Worcestershire.

PALAFIX, John de, a Spaniard of illustrious birth, born in Arragon 1600. He studied at Salamanca, and was patronised by Philip II. and when he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, he was appointed bishop of Los Angeles, in America, with the title of judge of the administration of the three viceroys of the Indies. In his new office he behaved with great humanity, and though he had to encounter the prejudices and the virulence of the jesuits, he maintained his character of moderation and of benevolence towards the unfortunate natives, and was rewarded by the king with the bishopric of Osma, 1653. He died 30th September 1659, universally respected. He wrote the history of the Siege of Fontarabia, 4to.—history of the Conquest of China by the Tartars, 8vo.—sermons, homilies, and religious tracts. His works have been published altogether at Madrid, 1762, in 13 vols. folio.

PALAGE, N. de la Curne, a native of Auxerre, member of the French academy, and that of inscriptions and belles lettres, and author of valuable Memoirs of Ancient Chivalry, 3 vols. 12mo.—Memoir on Glaber's Chronicle, inserted in the papers of the academy of inscriptions. He died at Paris 1731, aged eighty-four.

PALAPRAT, John, a French writer, born at Toulouse, 1650. He distinguished himself as a lawyer and as a poet, and in 1684, was made judge of the consistory. He paid his court to Queen Christina at Rome in 1686, and afterwards resided at Paris. He wrote eight pieces for the stage, and other things comprised in 5 vols. 12mo. He was employed as a negotiator, and acted with great sagacity, and died at Paris 1721.

PALEARIUS, Aonius, an eminent writer, born at Veroli, near Rome. He studied in various parts of Italy, and at last fixed his residence near Sienna where he married, and maintained himself by instructing some pupils in the learned languages. Here he had an unfortunate quarrel with a rival in literature, and afterwards in consequence of the able defence which he made of a certain nobleman, against the accusation of the monks, he became an object of persecution, and retired to Lucca, and next to Milan. In this place where he hoped to pass his days in peace, he found himself exposed to fresh persecution, he was again accused by the monks of heresy, and being carried to Rome was condemned for saying that Luther's followers were to be commended in some degree, and he was accordingly burnt to death, 1566. The best known of his works is his Latin poem on the Immortality of the Soul, 3 vols. Amsterdam, 1696, 8vo.

PALEY, William, D.D. an eminent English divine, born at Peterborough, July 1743. He was educated under his father, who after removing from Peterborough, where he was minor canon of the cathedral, became master of Giggleswick school, Yorkshire, and then entered at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1763. He was for three years after assistant at Greenwich school, till he was elected fellow of his college where he now became an active and popular tutor, and had for his coadjutor Dr. Law, afterwards bishop of Elphin. By the kindness of this friend's father, who was bishop of Carlisle, he obtained a living in Cumberland, and next Appleby, in Westmoreland, to which were afterwards added a prebend in Carlisle cathedral, and the living of Dalston. In 1780, he was made chancellor of Carlisle, and in 1785, he proved to the world how well entitled he was to the patronage of the great, by the publication of his Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy, in 4to. a most valuable work, often reprinted, in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1789, he declined the mastership of Jesus college, Cambridge, which the bishop of Ely, sensible of his great merit, wished to confer upon him. He was afterwards presented to a prebend at St. Paul's by the bishop of London, to the sub-deanery of Lincoln by Dr. Prettyman, and to the valuable living of Bishop Wearmouth, by the bishop of Durham. He published in 1790, Horæ Pauline, or the Truth of the Scripture—History of St. Paul, 8vo.—a View of the Evidence of Christianity, 3 vols. 8vo. 1794, dedicated to the bishop of Ely—Natural Theology, 8vo. 1802, besides some single sermons. The preferment which Dr. Paley held was justly due to his merits, as the friend of virtue, and the eloquent advocate of christianity, and he must be ranked among the few whose services to literature, to morality, and to religion, are honorably rewarded by the patronage of the great. This truly illustrious divine and accomplished scholar, died at Sunderland, 25th June, 1805, in his 62d year. His father, who was fifty-four years master of Giggleswick school, had the happiness of seeing the distinction and the honors which his son had deservedly acquired, and he died 29th September, 1779, aged 88.

PALFIN, John, an eminent surgeon, born at Ghent, where he acquired great reputation as reader of anatomy and surgery. He died there advanced in life, 1730. He wrote Osteology, much esteemed—Anatomy of the Human Body, translated into French by himself, and with additions, by his friend Davaux, 1718, 2 vols. 12mo.

PALINGENIUS, Marellus, an Italian poet of the 16th century, born at Stellada, in Ferrara. His real name was Pierre Angelo Manzoli. He wrote and dedicated to his patron Hercules II. duke of Ferrara, his poem in twelve books, called Zodiacus Vitæ; but he spoke with such freedom of the popish clergy that not only the book was prohibited, and publicly burnt as heretical, but the body of the author was ordered to be dug up and burnt, which indignity was, however, prevented by the duchess of Ferrara.

PALISSET DE MONTENOY, Charles, a French satirist and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1730, at Nancé; was throughout his life in a state of violent hostility with the French literary characters of the philosophical sect; and died in 1814. His works form six octavo volumes. Among them are, The Duciad; some comedies; Little Letters against great Philosophers; Memoirs for a History of French Literature, and a History of the early Ages of Rome.

PALISSY, Bernard de, a native of Agen, eminent as a potter, a chemist, and skilful painter on glass. He was patronised by Henry III. who wished him to embrace the Roman catholic religion, which he as a stern Calvinist refused to do. He was an able philosopher, he first explained the true theory of springs, and made many valuable discoveries in natural history. He wrote books on subjects of agriculture, fire, earth, and salts, collected and published at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. and again in 4to. 1777, with the notes of Faujas de St. Fond. He died about 1590.

PALLADINO, James, an ecclesiastical writer, called also James of Taramo, because born there. He was successively bishop of Monopoli, Tarentum, Florence, and Spoleto, and papal nuncio in Poland. The best known of his works is a pious romance often printed, and possessing some merit, in the midst of many incongruities, called Compendium per-breve, Consolatio Peccatorum nuncupatum et apud nonnullos Belial vocitatum, id est Proecessus Luciferi contra Jesum, Augsburg, 1572, fol.

PALLADIO, Andrew, a famous Italian architect, born at Vicenza, in Lombardy. He was early instructed in architecture, his favorite study, by George Trifflinus, and by visiting Rome he had an opportunity of viewing, and of studying the venerable relics of ancient times, which had been despoiled by barbarian ignorance. He made very beautiful drawings of these precious monuments of departed genius, and published them with commentaries, and afterwards gave to the world his four books of architecture, in 1570, a work translated into French, and also into English, and commented upon by the excellent remarks of Inigo Jones. The most magnificent monument of his architectural genius is the theatre called Degli Olimpici at Vicenza. He died 1580, and after his death appeared his work on the antiquities of ancient Rome.

PALLADIUS, a Cappadocian, who from a hermit became bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia, 401. He was the friend of Chrysostom, and wrote the History of Anchores, printed, 4to. Paris, 1455.

PALLAS, Peter Simon, an eminent traveller and naturalist, was born in 1741, at Berlin; studied at Halle, Gottingen, and Leyden; and acquired so much reputation by his Elenchus Zoophytorum and Miscellaneous Zoologica, that Catherine of Russia invited him to St. Petersburg, made him a member of the Academy, and for six years employed him, as a naturalist, in exploring various parts of her vast empire. During his tour he suffered such hardships, that his hair turned white, and his constitution was severely injured. In 1794, the empress gave him an estate in the Crimea. There he resided for fifteen years; but at length he quitted Russia, and settled at Berlin, where he died, September 3, 1811. Among his numerous works are his Travels, which Saussure denominated "an inexhaustible mine for the naturalist and statesman;" Historical Documents on the Mongols; and a Physical and Topographical Description of the Taurida.

PALLAVICINI, Anthony, a native of Genoa, descended from a noble family. His abilities as well as his birth recommended him to the pope, who employed him in several embassies, and in affairs of importance, and made him bishop of Pampeluna, and a cardinal. He died 1507, aged 66.

PALLAVICINI, Ferrante, an eccentric Italian, born at Plaentia of a noble family. He was early distinguished by his learning, and mental endowments, and assumed the habit of an Augustine friar; but instead of a regular life, he devoted himself to the amours of courtezans, and the most libidinous gratifications. Rendered poor by his incontinence, he had recourse to his pen for support, and wrote his "Courier robbed of his Mail," a periodical work, which for a while was read with avidity, but soon, from its satirical nature, attracted the notice of the inquisition. For a while he avoided the dangers of persecution by travelling into Germany; but upon his return to Venice, he again resumed his courier, and in greater violence vented his satire, not only against the secretary of the republic who had been his enemy, but against the pope Urban VIII. and all the Baberini family. In consequence of this he was seized, but he made his escape by means of one of his mistresses, and he might have avoided the impending storm, had not Morfu, a creature of the pope's nuncio, prevailed on him to go to France, in hopes of meeting there encouragement and protection from Richelieu. Pallavicini was caught in the snare, but instead of being conducted by his perfidious friend to Paris, he was brought to Avignon, where his person and papers were seized. After some severe and inhuman treatment he was brought to trial; but though he made an able defence he was condemned to lose his head, which took place at Avignon, 1644. Morfu who was liberally rewarded for his villany was afterwards murdered by one of Pallavicini's friends. This extraordinary character who debased the best faculties of the mind by a whimsical fondness for low company, and the most abandoned of prostitutes, wrote some books of merit which were printed at Venice, 4 vols. 12mo. 1655, the most curious of which is the Celestial Divorce, or separation of Jesus Christ from the Roman church.

PALLAVICINI, Sforza, an eminent cardinal, born at Rome 1607. Though eldest son of a noble family he preferred the ecclesiastical state, and he entered into the order of jesuits, among whom he taught philosophy and theology, and by his regular and exemplary life he gained the esteem and respect of the world. He was honored with the confidence of Innocent X. and made a cardinal by Alexander VII. He died 1667, aged 60. He wrote an Italian treatise on Style, and on Dialogue —some letters—but his best known work is the History of the Council of Trent, in opposition to that of father Paul, written in a correct style, but considered as partial. The best edition is that of Rome, 2 vols. folio, 1656.

PALLIOT, Peter, a native of Paris, eminently known as a bookseller and a printer. He settled at Dijon, where he died 1698, aged 90. He was well skilled in genealogies and in heraldry, and wrote some curious works, le Parlement de Bourgogne, ses Origines, Qualités, Blazon, fol. 1649—Science des Armoiries de Gelliot, avec 6000 Eussons, Paris 1660, folio, with plates engraved by himself. He left in MS. 13 vols, in folio, on the families of Burgundy.

PALLISER, sir Hugh, an English admiral who is known for his dispute with admiral Keppel in the battle of Ushant, 27th July, 1778, which unfortunately prevented the total defeat of the enemy's fleet. These circumstances which proved so disagreeable to the nation produced two courts martial. Keppel was tried at the instance of sir Hugh, and acquitted, and sir Hugh as second in command, was next brought to trial, and censured by his judges. His bravery however, was never impeached, and he was rewarded by the ministry with the appointment of governor of Greenwich hospital, where he died 1786, aged 65. In the former part of life sir Hugh had served in the Mediterranean under admiral Matthews, and he was also at the storming of Quebec. He was made post 1746, and afterwards was comptroller of the navy, and in 1773, created a baronet.

PALLUEL, Francis Crette de, a native of Dugu yin France, son of the post master of St. Denis. He was educated at Paris, and as he possessed a strong propensity for agricultural pursuits, he applied his attention to the improvement of this important branch of national prosperity. He was, on the revival of the Paris agricultural society by Malesherbes chosen one of its first members, 1779, and in the revolution he became a member of the national assembly, and directed his labors to the collection of useful papers for the improvement of agricultural knowledge. He was also a justice of peace, in which office he published a dissertation. He died 1799, aged 57. Some of his papers have appeared in the learned memoirs of the Paris academies, and reflect great honor on his abilities. His observations on draining marshes were universally admired.

PALMER, John, son of the door-keeper of Drury-lane theatre, imbibed from his earliest years a strong partiality for the stage, and despising the meaner occupation of a fruiterer to whom he had been bound, he began his theatrical career in a low character at Norwich; he rose to provincial eminence, and there married, and instead of fixing himself in some respectable company, he preferred the uncertain profits of an itinerant player and lecturer on heads. He afterwards acquired distinction as a comic actor at the Hay-market and at Drury-lane; but his erection of the Well-close-square theatre ruined his fortunes, as he was, through the opposition of the other theatres unable to obtain a license from the lord chamberlain. Thus reduced from a comfortable situation to indigence, he again engaged in provincial companies, and died suddenly while performing on the Liverpool stage in the Stranger, 1798, aged 57. The last remarkable words which he uttered when he dropped down were engraved on his tomb, "there is another and a better world!"

PALMIERI, Matthew, a native of Florence, distinguished in the council of his country, where he died 1475, aged 70. He wrote a treatise Della Vita Civile, 8vo. 1529—Citta Divina, a poem in three books, in which he maintained that our souls are those angels which in the revolt of Lucifer against God stood neuter, and that in punishment for this they are sent into the world, where their good or evil conduct is to entitle them hereafter to eternal happiness or misery. This work was condemned as dangerous, and was publicly burnt. He wrote besides a continuation of Prosper's Chronicle to 1449, which was afterwards continued still further to 1483, by Mattheus Palmieri of Pisa, in that age, who was the translator of Aristeus' History of the Septuagint Version, printed with the bible, 2 vols. folio, Rome, 1471.

PALOMINO DE CASTRO Y VELASCO, Aciscles Anthony, an eminent Spanish painter, was born, in 1653, at Bujalance, in Valencia; was a pupil of Valdes; became king's painter; entered into the clerical profession in his latter days; and died in 1726. Among his most remarkable works are, a Confession of St. Peter, of Valencia, and five pictures in the choir of the cathedral at Cordova. Palomino wrote the Pictorial Museum, three volumes folio; of which the third volume contains the lives of Spanish artists.

PALSGRAVE, John, an English writer, born in London. He studied at Cambridge and afterwards at Paris, and when Mary of England, sister to Henry VIII. was married to Louis XII. he was nominated her tutor in the French language. He afterwards returned to England, became chaplain to the king, and settled at Oxford. He was an able French grammarian though an Englishman, and published very useful rules for the pronunciation of that language. He translated also into English the Latin comedy called Acolastus, by Fullonius. He died after 1540.

PALUDANUS, John, a native of Malines, divinity professor at Louvaine, and minister of St. Peter's church there, died 1630. He was an able divine, and wrote Vindice Theologicae adversus Verbi Dei Corruptelas, 2 vols. 8vo. 1620—Apologeticus Marianus, 4to, de S. Ignatio Concio Sacra, 8vo.—Officina Spiritualis Sacris Concionibus adaptata, 4to.

PAMELIUS, James, a learned Fleming, born at Bruges, 1536. He became canon of Bruges, and arch-deacon of St. Omer's, and was nominated bishop of St. Omer's by Philip II. of Spain; but he died at Mons as he was going to take possession of his see 1587, aged 51. He wrote Liturgia Latinorum, 2 vols. 4to.—Micrologus de Eccles. Observationibus—Catalogus Commentariorum in Bibliani, 8vo.—Conciliorum Paralipomena—besides editions of Tertullian's and Cyprian's works, and Cassiodorus' treatise de Divinis Nominibus.

PANAGIOTI, a Greek of Chios, interpreter to the grand signior. He was a zealous opponent of the patriarch Cyril Lucar, and wrote in modern Greek the orthodox confession of the catholic and apostolic eastern church, printed in Holland. He died 1673.

PANARD, Charles Francis, a French poet, born at Couville, near Chartres, 1691. He was drawn from obscurity by Le Grand, the player, and was universally beloved for his probity and sweetness of manners. He died at Paris, of an apoplexy, 1765. His works, consisting of comedies, comic operas, epigrams, songs, and anacreontic odes, were published in 4 vols. 12 mo. 1763.

PANCIROLLUS, Guy, a famous lawyer, born of an illustrious family at Reggio, 1523. He studied law under his father, and improved himself further at Ferrara, Pavia, Bologna, and Padua, under the best masters; and in consequence of his great celebrity was nominated by the republic of Venice, in 1547, second professor of institutes in the university of Padua. He succeeded to the chair of Roman law, but at last, under pretence of ill-treatment, he retired to Turin, 1571, and was there made also professor of the Roman law. He was, however, recalled by his grateful countrymen, and in 1582, he was honorably replaced in his professorial chair at Padua. He died 1599, universally respected. He wrote De Rebus Inventis & Perditis, in Italian, translated by H. Salmuth into Latin—Commentarius in Notitiam Utriusque Imperii, & de Magistratibus, folio—De Magistrat. Municipal. & Corporibus Artificum.—De XIV. Regionibus Romæ, earumque Ædificiis.

PANCKOUCKE, Andrew Joseph, a bookseller of Lisle, who died at Paris, 1753, aged 53. He was an indefatigable writer; the best known of his works are the Best Studies for Young Ladies, 2 vols. 12mo.—Chronological Epitome of the History of the Counts of Flanders, 3vo.—a Collection of Bon Mots, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dictionary of French Proverbs, 8vo.—Philosophical Manual, 2 vols. 12mo.—Elements of Geography and Astronomy, 12mo.—Essay on Philosophers, 12mo.

PANCKOUCKE, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding, was born at Lisle, 1736. He followed his father's profession, and as he possessed genius and perseverance, he acquired celebrity in the typographical art at Paris. He wrote Mathematical Memoirs, addressed to the academy of sciences—Translations from Lucretius, Tasso's Jerusalem, Orlando Furioso, &c. 10 vols. 12mo.—Philosophical Discourse on the Beautiful, 8vo.—another on Pleasure and Grief—and Methodical Encyclopedia. He died at Paris 1799.

PANEL, Alexander Xavier, a native of Franche Comté, who embraced the order of the jesuits, and then passed into Spain, where he became preceptor to the royal family. He wrote a letter on the Medal of Le Bret, 4to.—Dissertation on Alexander's Medal—de Cistophoris, 4to.—de Colonia Tarraconæ Nummo, 4to. and other treatises on Coins and Antiquities. He died in Spain, 1777, aged 82.

PANIGAROLA, Francis, a native of Milan, who was made by Sixtus V. bishop of Asti in Piedmont, and was sent in 1590 with Gaetan and Belarmin into France, to support the interests of the league against Henry IV. His eloquence was powerfully exerted in encouraging the Parisians to resist their sovereign, and to submit to every privation, and to all the horrors of famine and pestilence, rather than to yield. On his return to Italy, he was so zealous in reforming the abuses of his clergy and of his diocese, that he was poisoned, as is generally supposed. He died at Asti, 1594, aged 46. His sermons appeared at Rome, 1596, in 4to. but of all his works his II Predicatore, or on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, published at Venice, 1609, in 4to. is the best.

PANIN, Nikita Ivanowitz, count de, a Russian statesman, one of the lieutenant-generals of the armies of the Czar Peter, originally of Lucca, was born 15th September, 1718. From being a horse soldier in the guards of the empress Elizabeth, he became by the friendship and patronage of prince Kourakin, gentleman of the imperial chamber, and rose gradually to offices of trust and dignity. In 1747 he was sent as ambassador to Copenhagen, and two years after to Stockholm, and on his return he was appointed governor of the grand duke Paul, and soon after became the prime minister of the great Catherine. During his residence at Stockholm he was so warm an admirer of the constitution, and of the aristocratical senate of the country, that he formed the plan of introducing it into Russia, which, however, he had not the courage to effect. With great powers of mind, and a comprehensive knowledge of the affairs and political connexions of independent states, he was, nevertheless, indolent in business, haughty in his conduct, and in his manners luxurious and intemperate. He died March, 1783; but though long at the head of affairs, so disinterested had been his conduct, that his property was inadequate to pay his debts. His brother distinguished himself as a general against the Prussians and the Turks, and by the taking of Bender. He also established the independence of the Crimea, and crushed the rebellion of Putgatscheff, and died soon after, respected as an able general.

PANNARTZ, Arnold, a German, who left Mayence with Ulric-Han, to come and establish a printing office in Italy, in the beginning of the pontificate of Paul II. They first published Donatus, and then Lactantius, 1465, and Augustin 1467, and afterwards the Letters of Cicero, issued from their press, which was set up, from the monastery of Sublac, their first residence, in the house of Francis de Maximis, a rich Roman.

PANORMITA, Anthony, a Sicilian, secretary to Alfonso, king of Naples. He possessed great poetical powers, and had such veneration for classical works, that he sold an estate to purchase a copy of Livy. He died 1471.

PANTÆNUS, a stoic of Sicily, at the head of the Alexandrian school in the reign of Commodus. He wrote Commentaries on Scripture, and was an able supporter of Christianity.

PAOLI, Sebastian, an ecclesiastic, born at Lucca. He was well skilled in antiquarian history, and contributed to the Italian journals, various dissertations, full of learning and deep research, on subjects of physic, history, sacred criticism, and antiquity. He wrote besides, the lives of several illustrious Italians. He died of a dropsy, 1751, aged sixty-seven.

PAOLI, Hyacinth, a native of Corsica, who acquired great weight among his countrymen, and was one of their chief magistrates, 1735. In consequence of the civil dissensions which distracted his country, and the oppression of the Genoese, he left Corsica and retired to Naples, where he died. His son Pascal was distinguished by his zeal in the cause of Corsican freedom, but all his struggles against the Genoese and the French were unavailing, and when the island became the conquest of France, he retired in 1769, to England, where he gained an honorable asylum, and where he died in privacy.

PAOLI, Pascal de, was born in the island of Corsica, in 1726. His father, Hyacinth Paoli, after laboring in vain to establish the freedom of his country, went to Naples, where Pascal was educated in the college of Jesuits. In his twenty-ninth year he was chosen generalissimo of Corsica, where he exerted himself in promoting such objects as were best calculated to secure the independence of the republic. The Genoese, however, having made a transfer of the island to France, that power sent such an overwhelming force into it as compelled Paoli to seek an asylum in England, where he obtained a pension. On the breaking out of the French revolution, he returned to Corsica, and prevailed upon his countrymen to submit to the English government, after which he returned to London, and died in 1807.

PAPEBROCH, Daniel, a jesuit of Antwerp, born 1628. He was a respectable professor of belles lettres and philosophy, and assisted Bollandus and Henschenius in their collection of the acts of the saints. In these labors he proceeded with great caution and impartiality, and rejected the improbable legends of former ages, but in consequence of this he drew upon himself the violent persecution of the Carmelites, because he had called Berthold, their first general, and refused to ascribe the foundation of their order to the prophet Elijah. Notwithstanding this persecution, which dragged him as a criminal before the pope, and caused the Spanish inquisition to condemn fourteen of the volumes of the acts of the saints, in which he was concerned, he continued his literary labors, and died 1714, aged eighty-six, universally respected for his learning and his virtues. He wrote also Propylæum ad Acta Sancti. Maii, fol. which gives an account of the popes.

PAPIAS, a bishop of Hierapolis, author of the doctrine of the Millenium, or the reign of Christ on earth, a thousand years before the resurrection. Some suppose him to be the disciple of St. John the Evangelist. A grammarian of that name lived 1053, and wrote Vocabularium Latinum, Milan, 1476, folio.

PAPILLON, Thomas, a native of Dijon, celebrated for his knowledge of jurisprudence, and his popularity as a pleader. He was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and died at Paris, 1596, aged eighty-two. He wrote Libellus de Jure Accrescendi—De Directis Hæredum Substitutionibus, 8vo.—Commentarii in quatuor priores Titulos Libri Primi Digestorum, 12mo.

PAPIN, Isaac, a French divine, born at Blois, 1657. He studied divinity at Geneva, and also at Saumur, under his uncle Pajon, whose opinion he espoused and defended, concerning the doctrine of efficacious grace, in opposition to the reformed church, and also to Jurieu. This measure proved offensive to the protestants, and Papin, to avoid contempt and persecution, came over to England, 1686, and was ordained according to the forms of the Anglican church. He afterwards left England and went to Hamburgh, where the resentment of Jurieu followed him, and from thence he was invited to Dantzic, to fill a chair among the French refugees. His refusal, however, to subscribe to the decrees of the Walloon churches in Holland, brought on him fresh troubles, and at last he, in 1690, embraced the Roman catholic tenets, for which he was accused, not only of inconsistency, but of all disregard for religion. He died at Paris, 19th June, 1709. His theological works were published by his relation Pajon, of the oratory, 1723, in 3 vols. 12mo.

PAPON, John Peter, a native of Pujet, near Nice, who was a priest of the oratory, and died at Paris in the winter of 1803, aged 65. He was a man of amiable manners, and regardless of the calls of ambition, concealed himself during the storms of the revolution. He wrote an Ode on Death—the Art of the Poet and Orator—and an Essay on Education, five times edited—Funeral Oration on Charles Emanuel, king of Sardinia, 8vo.—History of Provence, 4 vols. 4to.—Travels in Provence, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of the French Government, from the Assembly of the Notables, 22d February, 1787, to the end of 1788, 8vo.—Memorable epoch of the Plague.

PARABOSCO, Girolamo, a comic writer, born at Placentia, in the 16th century. He was author of six comedies, which possess merit and originality, and he also wrote some romances in the style of Boccaccio and Bandelli, besides letters. All these were published at Venice, 1553.

PARACELSUS, Aureolus Philippus Theophrastus Bombast de Hohenheim, a celebrated physician, born at Einsfilden, a village near Zurich, 1493. His father, the natural son of a master of the Teutonic order, himself distinguished as a practitioner in medicine, educated him with great attention, and permitted him to pursue his inclination towards alchemical studies. The young student, eager after fame, travelled through the various countries of Europe in pursuit of knowledge, and carefully treasured up the medical information respecting cures, which he could collect from physicians, barbers, old women, chemists, and conjurers. On his return to Switzerland, he was honorably received by the magistrates of Basil, who in 1527, made him professor of medicine. He soon became eminent here by the number, respectability, and attachment of his pupils; and by the many extraordinary cures in the leprosy, itch, dropsy, and particularly the venereal disease, which he performed by the prudent use of mercury and of opium, whose powers, till then, were little known, or unskillfully applied. In the midst of his medical celebrity he was called to the bed of a sick canon of Liechtenfels, who had been given over by his physicians, and so successful were his applications, that by the taking of three pills of laudanum, he recovered; but when he demanded the one hundred crowns which the patient had promised, he was rejected with contempt. The offended physician brought his cause before a court of judicature; but the judge, regarding more the medicine given than the skill of the practitioner, awarded him but a small gratuity, and Paracelsus, indignant of the treatment, left the court and the country with the highest disdain. He went to Alsatia, where he led a wandering, unsettled life, accompanied by his friend and follower, Oporinus; but while he pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone, and to have invented an elixir which would prolong his days to the age of Methuselah, he found himself poor, and he fell a sacrifice to a fever at a public inn at Saltsburg. He died September 1541, aged 48. The works of Paracelsus have been frequently edited. The best edition is that of Geneva, 1658, 3 vols. folio. The celebrity of Paracelsus is to be attributed as much to the ignorance and superstition of his contemporaries, as to the successful cures which he performed by the proper use of this empirical art. He pretended that there was a regular agreement between the planets and the various parts of the human body, and considered the seven planets as equally corresponding with the seven metals or minerals.

PARADIN, William, a laborious French historian, dean of Beaujeu, who died about 1582, aged 81. He published Aristeus' History of the Septuagint Pentateuch, 4to.—Latin History of his own Times, 1552—Annals of Burgundy, in French, folio—De Moribus Gallie Historia—Memoirs of Lyons—De Rebus in Belgio—Historia Ecclesie Gallicanæ—Chronicle of Savoy.

PARCIEUX, Anthony de, a French mathematician, born at Clotet de Cessoux, in the diocese of Uzes, 1703. He studied at Lyons and Paris, and acquired reputation by his valuable and intelligent publications, as well as by his lectures. He was member of the learned societies of Berlin, and Sweden, and died universally regretted, 2d September 1768. His works are a Treatise of Trigonometry, 4to.—Essays on the Probability of the Duration of Human Life, 4to.—Memoirs on the Practicability of bringing to Paris the Water of the Yvette, 4to. His nephew, of the same name, possessed equal abilities. He was brought up at the college of Navarre, at Paris, and at the age of twenty-four became a public lecturer. He was in 1779, professor of experimental philosophy in the military college of Brienne, and afterwards succeeded to a chair at the Lyceum at Paris. He was author of Orozio, a tragedy, written when young, and an elementary book on geometrical and astronomical calculations. He died at Paris, 1798.

PARDIES, Ignatius Gaston, a French jesuit, born at Paris, 1636. He for some years devoted his time to polite literature, and afterwards applied himself to the more laborious studies of mathematics and philosophy, in which he became a distinguished professor. He died at Paris, at the early age of thirty-seven, in consequence of a contagious distemper. He wrote Horologium Thaumasticum Duplex, 4to.—Dissertatio de Motu & Naturâ Cometaryum, 8vo.—Discourse on Local Motion, 12mo.—Elements of Geometry, 12mo. and the Science of Moving Bodies.

PARE, Ambrose, an eminent surgeon, born at Laval. Though a protestant he was surgeon to Henry II. of France, and to his three successors; and his services were so highly valued, that at the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Charles IX. saved his life by shutting him up in his own closet. He made some useful discoveries in anatomy, and died much respected, December, 1590, at an advanced age. His works were translated into Latin by Guillemeau, of which the best edition is that of Paris, 1614, folio.

PARE, David, D.D. a protestant divine, born 1548, at Francolstein, in Silesia. By the jealous treatment of his step-mother, his studies were checked, and he was placed with an apothecary, and afterwards with a shoemaker; but his father at last recovered to a sense of his duty, and permitted him again to cultivate literature. By the advice of his master Schilling he exchanged his German name of Wangler for the Greek word Pareus, which was equally derived from the substantive cheek; and he recommended himself so much by his abilities, that he was patronised by the elector palatine, and made theological professor at Heidelberg. The best part of his life was engaged in controversy, in which he displayed learning, spirit, and moderation. He died June, 1622. Besides some tracts against the pope, and Bellarmine, he published a commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which, when translated into English, was, for its anti-monarchical expressions, condemned by the university of Oxford, and burnt publicly by order of James I. His exegetical works were published, 3 vols. folio, Frankfurt, 1617.

PARE, Philip, son to the above, was a celebrated grammarian, born at Hambach, 24th May, 1576. He was early eminent for his abilities, and was received in various universities of Germany with respect. He was rector of the college of Neustadt, and afterwards of Hanua, and died 1650. Besides publishing his father's works, and defending them against David Owen, he wrote Lexicon Criticum, 8vo.—Lexicon Plautinum, or a Vocabulary of Plautus' Comedies—Galligraphia Romana, 8vo.—Analecta Plautina—a valuable edition of Plautus—Electa Symmachiana.

PARE, Daniel, son of Philip, was equally known as an able classical scholar. He was unfortunately killed by some highwaymen, in his father's life time. He published the Hero and Leander of Musæus, with notes—Mellificium Aticum, 4to.—Medulla Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ—and Lexicon on Lucretius.

PAREJA, Juan de, a native of the West Indies, originally the slave of Diego Velasquez, the painter. With strong natural genius for painting, he copied by stealth, the finished pieces of his master, and he acquired such skill, that he ventured to show one of his performances to Philip IV. of Spain, who often visited the house of Velasquez. The monarch was pleased with the abilities of the slave, and obtained his liberty; but the faithful Pareja would not abandon the service of his master, to whom he owed his own celebrity, and from whom he had received every mark of kindness and protection. He died 1670, aged 60. His pieces are highly finished, and deservedly admired.

PARENIN, Dominic, a jesuit of Lyons, who went in 1698 as missionary to China. He was kindly treated by the emperor Cam-Hi, for whom he translated into Chinese, some of the most interesting articles on geometry, anatomy and astronomy, from the memoirs of the French academy. His interference was honorably exerted in producing a reconciliation between the courts of Moscow and Peking. He published the Chart of the Chinese Empire, and wrote besides, several curious letters on the Chinese, which appeared in 1759, with the letters of Mairan. He died at Peking, 27th September 1741, in a good old age, and the emperor, in respect for his great learning and his many virtues, ordered his funeral expenses to be defrayed by the public, and his remains to be honorably attended to the grave by the noblest of the Chinese mandarins.

PARENT, Anthony, a French mathematician, born at Paris, 1666. His propensity to mathematical studies was so great, that even at the age of thirteen, he filled the margins of his books with notes on the subject. His friends indeed wished him to pursue the law; but though he went through a course in that faculty, he returned to his favorite studies in the college of Dormans, and soon after gave lectures on mathematics and fortification. He was made member of the academy of sciences, to whose memoirs he communicated some valuable papers, and was cut off by the small-pox, 1716, aged 50. His works were Mathematical and Philosophical Researches, 3 vols. 12mo.—Theoretical and Practical Arithmetic, 8vo.—Elements of Mechanics and Natural Philosophy, 12mo.

PARFAIT, Francis, the historian of the French drama, was born of an ancient family at Paris, 1698, and died 1753, much respected for his good nature, innocent conviviality, and original fund of anecdotes. He wrote General History of the French Theatre, 15 vols. 12mo.—History of the Ancient Italian Theatre, 2 vols.—Theatrical Dictionary, 7 vols. 12mo. and Dramatic Pieces, never represented.

PARINI, Joseph, an Italian poet, was born, in 1729, at Basizio, in the Milanese. He was patronised by Count Firmian, governor of Lombardy, and, afterwards, by Princess Maria Beatrix of Este, and was professor of belles lettres, eloquence, and the fine arts at Milan. He died in 1799. Parini was one of the most eminent lyric poets of Italy, and excelled also in satire. His works form six volumes octavo.

PARIS, Matthew, an English historian, who was a Benedictine of the order of Clugny, in the monastery of St. Alban's, in the 13th century. He was an universal scholar, and confessedly possessed in that dark age, great and astonishing erudition. His abilities, and his well known integrity were usefully employed in visiting and reforming the monasteries, and in re-establishing the ancient unsullied discipline of the church, even against the influence and power of the pope. His great work was "Historia Major," in two parts, from the creation of the world to William the Conqueror, and from the Conqueror to the year 1250, which he afterwards continued to 1259. The work was afterwards brought down to 1273, by Rishanger, a monk of the same monastery. This valuable work was first published by archbishop Parker, London, 1571, folio, and by Dr. W. Watts, 1640, 2 vols. folio.

PARIS, Francis, an abbé at Paris, of the order of the Jansenists. He was the son of a counsellor of parliament, but he renounced the honors and emoluments which, by means of his family, he might have obtained; and after bestowing all his property on his brother, and rejecting the preferment offered by cardinal Noailles, he devoted himself to the austerities of an ecclesiastical life. He died May 1st, 1727, at the early age of thirty-seven. Those who had admired his sanctity visited his tomb in reverence, and at last pretended that their diseases were cured by the touch of his holy monument. The report no sooner spread, than thousands flocked to the hallowed spot, through superstition or curiosity, till the government, apprehensive of the enthusiastic madness of the people, ordered the church yard to be shut; and the miracles of Paris ceased. He wrote Annotations on the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews.

PARISEAU, N. a native of Paris, distinguished as a dramatic writer. The seven plays which he produced were received with great approbation by the public, but his popularity was unable to save him from the horrors of the revolution, as he was guillotined among thousands of other victims, in 1794.

PARISH, Elijah, D.D., an eloquent preacher of Byfield, Massachusetts, was born in Lebanon, Connecticut, November 7, 1762, and graduated at Dartmouth college, in 1785. He was settled in Byfield in 1787, and remained in this town till his death, which took place October 14, 1825. He published a Gazette of the Eastern Continent; Modern Geography; Gazetteer of the Bible; fifteen occasional sermons; a History of New England, with Dr. Morse; and, with Dr. McClure, Memoirs of Eleazer Wheelock. After his death, a volume of his sermons was published.

PARK, Mungo, a celebrated traveller, the son of a farmer, was born in 1771, at Fowlshiels, near Selkirk, in Scotland, and was brought up to the medical profession. After having made a voyage to Bencoolen, he was engaged, in 1795, by the African Society, to penetrate into the interior of Africa, and explore the course of the Niger. He arrived in the Gambia in June, and, on the second of December, proceeded from Pisanian, on his adventurous journey. On the twentieth of July, he came in sight of the long sought river. After having traced it to a considerable distance, he was under the necessity of desisting from his enterprise. On his return to Scotland, Park married, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1804, however, he undertook a second expedition for the same purposes as the first. He again reached the Niger, and embarked upon it at Bamnakou, but was attacked by the natives, and drowned, in his voyage to Housh. His travels have been published in two volumes.

PARKER, Matthew, the second protestant archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich, 1504, and educated at Benet college, or Corpus Christi, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was not only eminent as a scholar well versed in antiquity, but as a preacher, and he was made chaplain to queen Anne Boleyn, and to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He was chosen master of Corpus college, by the recommendation of Henry VIII., and under Edward VI. he was elected dean of Lincoln:

But under Mary, he was stripped of all his ecclesiastical honors, on pretence that he was married. On the accession of Elizabeth, over whose education he had presided, he was recalled from privacy, and made archbishop of Canterbury. His consecration took place in Lambeth chapel, though the malevolence of the Romanists spread the report that this consecration took place at the Nag's head, Cheapside, a wicked falsehood, warmly refuted by some able writers. In his new character he behaved with great spirit and firmness, and zealously promoted the cause of the reformation not only in his own diocese, but over the whole kingdom. This venerable character died May 17th, 1575, aged 72. He published an edition of Matthew Paris, folio—an historical work on the Antiquity of the English church, besides other works, and he also improved the translation called the Bishop's Bible.

PARKER, Samuel, D.D., an English prelate, born at Northampton, September, 1640. His father was a practitioner of the law, and by his servility to the parliament and to Cromwell, he obtained a place in the high court of justice, and was made one of the barons of the exchequer, and serjeant at law at the restoration. The son was educated among the puritans, and in 1659, was admitted at Wadham college, Oxford, and became known in the university as a strict and regular student, more given to fasting and prayer, than to the amusements of the age. Soon after, however, interest or conviction induced him to renounce his favorite opinions; he became a zealous anti-puritan, was patronized by archbishop Sheldon, and continued a servile and temporizing follower of the court. Under James II. his hypocrisy was rewarded, he was made bishop of Oxford, privy counsellor, and by royal mandamus, appointed president of Magdalen college in the university, against the statutes of the society. Thus elevated in dignity, he sacrificed his religion to his interests, and became contemptible to his clergy. Though thus devoted to the papists, in compliance with the times, it is said that he wrote a letter to James II., to persuade him to return to the protestant faith. He died at Magdalen college, unlamented, 20th March, 1687. He wrote various things, respectable in themselves, in favor of the papists, besides an history of his own times, which has appeared in Latin and English. His descendants have continued to reside in Oxford.

PARKER, George, earl of Macclesfield, son of Parker the first earl and lord chancellor of England, is known for his knowledge of mathematics, which he evinced in preparing the bill by which the style in 1752 was to be altered according to the Gregorian calendar. The speech which he spoke on the occasion was published, and shows him in a very respectable light. He was at one time president of the Royal society, and died 1766.

PARKER, Richard, a native of Exeter, who served in the navy as midshipman, but was dismissed from the service for ill conduct. He was afterwards a common sailor on board of the fleet, and with all the mean arts which dissatisfaction could suggest, he obtained universal influence over the sailors during the unfortunate rebellion which distracted and dishonored the fleet at the Nore, in 1797. The address, ready elocution, and above all the deep dissimulation which he possessed, marked him for a desperate leader; but after he had for some days exercised the sovereign power over his associates, in the character of admiral of the fleet, he was delivered up by his penitent associates. When tried by a court martial, he answered to his accusation with great firmness, and when condemned, implored mercy on his accomplices. He was hanged on board the Sandwich, the scene of his short glory, 30th June, 1797.

PARKER, Thomas, a native of England, born in 1595, and educated partly at Oxford, and partly in Ireland. In 1634, with a number of christian friends, he came to America. At first he officiated as an assistant minister at Aggawam, now called Ipswich, in Massachusetts. The next year, 1635, he commenced the settlement at Newbury, and was chosen pastor of the church. Here he remained till April 1677, when he died, aged 81, leaving behind him the character of an excellent scholar, and of a most devoted and exemplary christian. Such was his application to study and books, that for several years before his death, he was blind. Mr. Parker was never married, and spent a portion of his property in giving young men a public education.

PARKER, Samuel, D.D., Bishop of the Eastern Diocese, was born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in August 1744, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1764. In 1773, he was elected assistant minister of Trinity church, Boston; and forthwith sailed for England, where he received ordination from the bishop of London, in February, 1774. On the 2d November following, he entered upon the discharge of the duties to which he had been appointed. Very soon after, the war of the revolution commenced; and so jealous were the people of the Episcopal church, from its connection with the established church of Great Britain, that all the episcopal clergy of Boston, excepting the subject of this article, Dr. Walter, the rector of Trinity church, Dr. Caner of King's chapel, and the Rev. Mather Byles of Christ church, retired within the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Parker, however, by great prudence and firmness, retained his post, and was able to share the affections of his people and every expression of their kind regard. Accordingly, in 1779, he was elected Rector of the parish, an office which he held till his death, which took place December 6th, 1804. On the 16th of September next preceding, he was consecrated Bishop of Massachusetts; but died before having engaged in the performance of any episcopal duty.

PARKER, Isaac, LL.D., graduated at Harvard college, 1786. He settled as a lawyer first at Castine, and afterwards in Portland, in the district, now state of Maine. He was a member of congress, and in 1806, received the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and in 1814, was made chief justice, which last office he held till his death in 1830, aged 62.

PARKES, Samuel, a chemist, was born in 1759, at Stourbridge, in Worcestershire; was educated under Dr. Addington, at Market Harborough; and died December 23, 1825. He was a great manufacturing chemist, and a member of the Geological and other Societies. He is the author of a Chemical Catechism, which has passed through numerous editions; Rudiments of Chemistry; an Essay on the Utility of Chemistry; and Chemical Essays.

PARKHURST, John, an able divine, born in London, and educated at Clarehall, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1751. He devoted himself much to classical literature, especially Greek and Hebrew, and published an excellent Greek and English Lexicon, 4to., and also a Hebrew and English Lexicon, 4to., reprinted in 8vo. These works display great learning and deep critical knowledge. He published also a pamphlet against J. Wesley—an answer to Dr. Priestley on the pre-existence of Christ, and he ably defended, with bishop Horne, and other celebrated characters of those times, the popular opinions of Hutchinson. He settled at Epsom, in Surrey, and died universally respected, 1797.

PARKINSON, John, an eminent botanist, born 1567. He was bred an apothecary in London, and obtained such reputation in his profession, and such botanical knowledge, that he was appointed botanist to Charles I. He published Paradisus in Sole, Paradisus Terrestris, a valuable book, in which he described nearly one thousand plants, and was thus the first who gave figures of the subjects of the flower garden. By the words Paradisus in Sole, he quaintly Latinized his own name, Park-in-sun. He published besides, Theatrum Botanicum, in which he describes above three thousand eight hundred plants, and in this and in his other work he shows himself, according to Dr. Pulteney, more of an original author than Gerard or Johnson. He died about 1645.

PARMA, Alexander Farnese, duke of, one of the most celebrated generals of the age in which he lived, first distinguished himself at the battle of Lepanto. Being appointed to the government of the Netherlands by Philip II., he gained several victories, and restored the greatest part of the provinces to the authority of his sovereign. In 1590, he compelled Henry IV. to raise the siege of Paris; and, in 1592, the siege of Rouen. In the last of these expeditions he received a wound in the arm, which he neglected, and which caused his death, at Arras, on the second of December, in the forty-seventh year of his age.

PARMENTIER, Anthony Augustin, an eminent French agricultural improver, was born in 1737, at Montdidier, and was successively apothecary to the army, in Hanover, and to the Hotel des Invalids at Paris. He died in 1813. To Parmentier, France is indebted for rendering the cultivation of the potato general, and for improving and introducing various other alimentary articles. His whole attention was paid to these subjects, and all his works relate to them.

PARNELL, Thomas, an eminent poet, the friend of Pope, was born in Dublin, 1679. He was educated at Dublin university, where he took his degree of M.A. 1700, and was ordained. He went to England in 1706, where his fame had preceded him, and he was introduced among the Scriblerus club, with Gay, Pope, Arbuthnot, Swift, and Jervas. He obtained a prebend in Ireland, and the vicarage of Finglass, by the recommendation of his friend Swift, from archbishop King, and might have risen to higher dignities, had not the death of his wife rendered the latter part of his life melancholy. He fled to society for relief, but acquired, instead of consolation, habits of intemperance, which proved fatal. He died at Chester, on his way to Ireland, July, 1717, in his 39th year. His poetical pieces were selected by Pope, and published 1721, 8vo., to which a volume was added at Dublin 1758. As a man, his character was benevolent, mild, and amiable; as a poet, he possessed not the higher powers of the muse, but elegance, delicacy, and grace every where abound. The moral tendency of his poems besides, cannot be sufficiently admired; and if he had written only his Hermit, Parnell would have ranked among the most pious and useful poets in the English language. He contributed also to the Spectator and Guardian, and the Life of Homer, prefixed to Pope's version, and written by him.

PARNY, Evryste Desire Desforges, viscount de, whom his countrymen denominate the French Tibullus, was born in 1753, at the Isle of Bourbon; was sent to France, at the age of nine years; was educated at the college of Rennes; and entered into the military service. His Elegies, inspired by an unfortunate passion, appeared in 1775, and at once gave him a conspicuous place among poets. Subsequent works sustained his reputation. It is, however, to be regretted, that in his latter years, he sullied his fame by several impious and licentious productions. He died in 1814.

PARR, Catherine, sixth queen to Henry VIII., was daughter of sir Thomas Parr, and widow of lord Latimer. She was carefully educated in polite literature, in the fashion of those days, and was well skilled in divinity, upon which she frequently conversed with the king. She labored much for the establishment of the reformation, and her interference proved at one time so disagreeable to the capricious monarch, that he permitted Gardiner, and her other catholic enemies to draw articles of impeachment against her, but her prudence restored her to the confidence and affection of the king. After Henry's death she married sir Thomas Seymour, lord Admiral of England, who treated her with great harshness, so that she died the next year in child-bed, not without suspicion of poison, 1548. She published her Lamentations of a Sinner—prayers and meditations.

PARR, Thomas, a peasant of Shropshire, who lived to the great age of 152 years and nine months. It is remarkable that he performed penance in his parish church at the age of 100, for a bastard child, and at the age of 120 he married a second wife, by whom he had a child. He was in 1685 brought to London, and introduced by lord Arundel to Charles I., but the change of situation, and his altered mode of life, and particularly drinking wine, soon proved fatal to a constitution hitherto supported by more temperate and abstemious habits, and he died the same year.

PARR, Samuel, LL.D., one of the most profound of Greek Scholars, was born in 1746, at Harrow on the Hill, and was educated at the grammar school of that place, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge. Having, in consequence of his youth, been disappointed of becoming head master at Harrow, he established a seminary at Stannore; which, however, he ultimately gave up, and was successively master of Colchester and Norwich grammar schools. His first church preferment was the rectory of Asterby, which he obtained in 1780. He subsequently received the perpetual curacy of Hatton, the living of Graffham, in Huntingdonshire, and a prebend of St. Paul's Cathedral. He died March 6, 1825. Among his works are, various Sermons; the Preface to Bellendenus; and a Letter from Irenopolis.

PARRHASIUS, James, an Italian grammarian, born at Cosenza, near Naples, 1740. According to the affectation of the times, he exchanged the name of Parisio for the more learned word Parrhasius, and taught belles letters and rhetoric at Milan, where he was much admired for his graceful delivery. On a charge of improper converse with his pupils, he retired to Vicenza, and afterwards to Rome, where he was patronized by Leo X. His great application, however, soon rendered him incapable of acting as professor, and upon his return home, he fell into a fever, which proved fatal. He wrote some fragments of Antiquity—Commentaries on Horace's Art of Poetry—Ovid's Ibis—and Claudian.

PARRIS, Samuel, the first minister of Danvers, then a part of Salem, Massachusetts, where he was ordained November 15, 1689. He was born in London, 1653, but having come to America, he received his education at Harvard college. In his family commenced the delusion of the Salem witchcraft. This took place in 1692, only three years after his settlement. An Indian woman, living in his family, was accused by his daughter, and niece, girls aged about twelve years, of bewitching them. Mr. Parris beat her till he compelled her to confess herself a witch. The delusion spread. Others were accused; and, it is said, that more than one hundred women were apprehended, and most of them were imprisoned. The wife of Governor Phipps was among the accused. The delusion in Salem lasted sixteen months; and in all, nineteen persons were hung, and one was pressed to death for not pleading. Mr. Parris was a zealous prosecutor; but at last his church brought charges against him. He confessed his error, but in 1696 was dismissed, and left the place.

PARROCEL, Joseph, a native of Brignoles in Provence, eminent as a painter and engraver. He studied at first under one of his brothers, and afterwards under Bourignon, and deserved to be admitted member of the French academy of painting. His portraits, and also his historical pieces, and his battles, were executed with great taste and effect. He died 1704, aged 56. His son Charles was also an eminent artist, and member of the academy, and died 1752, aged 53. His conquests of Louis XV. possess merit. Peter, the nephew and pupil of Joseph, was also distinguished as a painter of merit, and died at Avignon, 1739, aged 74.

PARRY, Richard, D.D., rector of Wichampton, Dorsetshire, and preacher at Market Harborough, Leicestershire, was a student of Christ church, Oxford. He died at his cure, Leicestershire, very poor, 9th April, 1780. He wrote some sermons, besides divinity tracts—a dissertation on Daniel's seventy Weeks—and Remarks on Dr. Kennicott.

PARRY, Richard, an able divine, educated at Oxford, and made master of Ruthyn school, Denbighshire, after which he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, 1604. He revised the first edition of the Welsh bible, which was published 1620.

PARRY, Caleb Hillier, M.D., F.R.S., an ingenious physician, and natural historian of Bath, father of the celebrated captain Parry. Dr. Parry is known as the author of A Treatise on Wool, containing the result of a series of experiments on this staple commodity to which his attention was originally directed by the circumstance of king George III. presenting two Merino rams to the Bath and West of England Society. But his principal work is the Elements of Pathology, printed in 1816. He died March 9th, 1822, having been deprived of the use of his faculties by palsy, in 1816.

PARSONS, Robert, or PERSONS, an English jesuit, was born 1546, and educated at Baliol college, Oxford, at the expense of the vicar of his parish. He soon distinguished himself as an able disputant, and became fellow and tutor of his college; but being accused by his society of incontinence, and of embezzling the college money, he left the university, and retired to Antwerp, then to Louvain and Padua, and afterwards to Rome, where he renounced the protestant faith, and entered among the jesuits. Here he acquired such reputation, that the pope permitted him to establish an English college at Rome, for the instruction of missionaries to attempt the conversion of the English nation to the catholic religion. He went himself in disguise to London, and in the character of preacher, he strongly and efficaciously recommended the Romish faith to his auditors, and prevailed upon the papists never to frequent or join in the service of the protestant church. This violent attack against the established religion of England, and the doctrine that Elizabeth might safely be deposed, were too daring to be long concealed from the penetrating knowledge of Burleigh, but Parsons escaped his pursuers, though some of his associates were seized. On the preparations of Philip to invade England, the good father was laboriously active in stirring up not only foreigners, but natives abroad against their country; and when the armada was destroyed he endeavored by means of lord Derby, to excite a rebellion in the kingdom. This turbulent, insidious, and intriguing jesuit, who proved so virulent an enemy to his country, died on the 18th April, 1610, and was buried with all the honors due to a cardinal, a dignity to which he aspired, but which he did not obtain. His writings were numerous, amounting to thirty-three tracts, chiefly on divinity and controversial subjects, and in favor and support of his religion and politics.

✓ PARSONS, James, an eminent physician, born at Barnstable, Devon, March, 1705. His father, the youngest of nine sons, was soon after his birth appointed barrack-master at Bolton in Ireland, and removing with his family into that kingdom, his son received his education at Dublin college. He studied medicine with great assiduity, and after improving himself in the celebrated schools of Paris, he took his degrees at the university of Rheims, and returned to London, 1736. He became physician to the Saint Giles's infirmary, and was made member of the Royal society, in 1740, licentiate to the college of physicians 1751, and he acquired deserved reputation, especially in the obstetrical art. He was the intimate friend of Dr. Douglas, sir Hans Sloane, Mead, and other celebrated men, and the learned correspondent of Buffon, and other great literary characters on the continent. He died in London, 4th April, 1770, and was buried at Hendon, seventeen days after, as he had required that his remains should not be intombed before a visible alteration took place in his corpse. He was a man of great and extensive erudition, as Dr. Maty, his successor in the office of secretary to the Royal society, has, in the language of truth and friendship observed; and he has obliged the world with various publications, the best known of which is his "Remains of Japhet, or Historical Inquiry into the Affinity and Origin of European Languages."

PARSONS, Jonathan, a graduate of Yale college, who was first settled as a congregational minister of Lyme, Connecticut, but spent the last thirty years of his life, at Newburyport, in the same capacity, with one of the largest congregations of the country. He graduated in 1729, and died July 19, 1776, aged about 66 years. He was one of the most distinguished and successful preachers of his time. He was eminent as a scholar, being familiar with classical literature. His publications were rather numerous; among them were sixty-six sermons on various subjects in two volumes, 8vo.

PARSONS, Moses, an eminent American preacher, was born June 20, 1716, and graduated at Harvard college in 1736. He was ordained at Byfield, Massachusetts, June 20, 1744, and died 14th December, 1783, aged 67 years. His personal appearance, his manners, and the high intellectual attainments possessed by him rendered him one of the most popular and influential ministers of his time. In 1772, he published an election sermon; and, 1773, a sermon delivered at the ordination of O. Parsons.

PARSONS, Theophilus, LL.D., graduated at Harvard college 1769. He commenced business as a lawyer, at Newburyport, and in 1800, removed to Boston. He was a member of the convention which formed the present constitution of Massachusetts, and also of the convention which adopted the constitution of the United States. In 1806 he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and died in that office in 1813, aged 63.

PARSONS, Levi, an American Missionary at Palestine, born in Goshen, Massachusetts July 18, 1792, and graduated at Middlebury college in 1814. Having been ordained, he sailed for Palestine in November 1819, and arrived at Smyrna in January 1820. He spent several months at Scio, and then proceeded to Jerusalem, where he remained from February to May 1821. On his return to Smyrna he was seized with a painful disease at Syra. In December he went to Alexandria, where he died, February 10, 1822, aged 29 years. He had the reputation of being a good scholar; and of an ardent devotion to the best interests of man.

PARSONS, Samuel H., a general in the army of the American revolution, was the son of the reverend Jonathan Parsons of Newburyport, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1756. He soon after established himself as a lawyer in New London county, Connecticut, and rose to distinction in the profession. At the commencement of the revolution, he entered the army, as lieutenant-colonel, and during the progress of the war, through the whole of which he served with reputation, was advanced to the rank of major-general. On the arrival of peace he resumed his profession. He was not long after appointed one of the commissioners to form a treaty with the Indians, northwest of the Ohio; and on the establishment of a territorial government over that district, was appointed its first judge. He removed to Marietta, and entered on the office, in 1778. He was drowned in the great Beaver Rivulet, near Pittsburgh, November 17th, 1789.

PARTHENAY, John de, lord of Soubise, was born 1512. While commanding the French troops in Italy, he imbibed the principles of the protestants, which he afterwards maintained with much firmness and constancy. He was made governor of Lyons 1562, by the prince of Condé, the head of the Huguenots, and he bravely defended it when besieged by the duke de Nevres. He died 1566, aged 54.

PARTHENAY, Catherine, daughter and heiress of the preceding, was eminent for her wit, her beauty, and her writings. In 1568, at the age of 14, she married du Quellence, baron du Pont, a man distinguished in the wars of those times, but accused of impotency by the malice of his mother-in-law. While the suit was pending, the husband was slaughtered among those who fell in the Bartholomew massacre; and his widow, who paid great respect to his memory, took for her second husband, 1575, Rénatus, viscount Rohan, who died 1586, leaving her two sons and three daughters. She was at Rochelle when the town was besieged, and she shared with magnanimity all the calamities of that disastrous siege, and refusing to be included in the capitulation, she was, with her surviving daughter, Anne, conveyed a prisoner of war to Niort. She died 1631, aged 77. She wrote some poems, printed 1572, besides a tragedy, called Holofernes, acted at Rochelle, and the Precepts of Isocrates, translated into French, and other works. Her eldest son was the famous duke de Rohan, who supported the cause of the protestants with such intrepidity in the reign of Louis XII. Her daughter Catherine, who married the duke of Deux-ponts, was the celebrated female who so nobly met the amorous addresses of Henry IV in these words: "I am too poor, sire, to be your wife, and too nobly born to be your mistress."

PARTRIDGE, William, a native of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, who became lieutenant-governor of that state. He obtained the appointment through the agency of Sir Henry Ashurst, and succeeded Usher in 1697. Mr. Partridge was by trade a shipwright of great mechanical genius; and, was also, by the aid of popular manners, well qualified for political life. In 1703, Usher was again commissioned as lieutenant-governor, and Partridge retired to Newbury, Massachusetts, where he died in 1729.

PARUTA, Paul, a noble Venetian, who usefully served his country in various embassies, and was afterwards governor of Brescia, and procurator of St. Mark. He died 1598, aged 58. He was the author of notes in Italian on Tacitus—Political Discourses—a History of Venice, from 1513, to 1572, and other works.

PAS, Manasses de, marquis de Feuquierres, was born at Saumur, after the death of his father who was slain at the battle of Ivry. He trode in the steps of his father for valor, and distinguished himself at the siege of Rochelle, where he was taken prisoner, but liberated after a month's confinement. His abilities were equally displayed in the cabinet, and he went as ambassador to the courts of Sweden and of Germany. He was placed at the head of the French army with the duke of Saxe Weimar in 1635, and died of the wounds which he received at the siege of Thionville, 14th March, 1640. The account of his negotiations in Germany was published 1753, in 3 vols. 12mo.

PAS, Anthony de, marquis of Feuquierres, a famous French officer, whose military merits remained unknown till his 40th year. In 1688, at the head of one thousand men in Germany, he so eminently distinguished himself, and afterwards in Italy, that his promotion was very rapid. He was so strict a disciplinarian that the wits said of him he was the boldest man in Europe, since he daily slept in the midst of one hundred thousand enemies, meaning his soldiers. He died 1711, aged 63. His memoirs, which, as containing the History of the generals of Louis XIV. are considered very interesting, were published in 4to. and in 4 vols. 12mo.

PASCAL, Blaise, a celebrated French divine, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, 19th June, 1623. He was educated by his father, who was president of the court of aids in his province, and possessed great mathematical abilities; but while his father sought for distinction as the friend of Descartes, he forbade his son the use of all books of geometry, that his attention might not be diverted from belles lettres and classical knowledge. Young Pascal from his infancy displayed extraordinary abilities; he enquired into the reasons and causes of every thing, and never was satisfied but with what appeared most probable and rational. His father who knew he had no opportunity of studying mathematics, accidentally discovered him surrounded with figures in charcoal on the floor of his chamber, and found on inquiry that he was engaged in what makes the thirty-second proposition of Euclid's first book, which the unassisted powers of his genius, by a connected series of ideas and of demonstrations had pointed out to him. At 16 he wrote his treatise of Conic Sections, and so ably composed that Descartes attributed it to the labors of the father and not of the son. At 19 he contrived an arithmetical machine, much admired for its ingenuity, and at 23 he saw, corrected, and improved the Torricellian experiment, and soon after solved a problem proposed by Mersennus, which had hitherto perplexed the ablest mathematicians of Europe. But in the midst of this increasing reputation, Pascal all at once renounced literary and mathematical pursuits for religion, and after being one of the greatest of philosophers, he became the most humble and penitent of devotees. He rejected all the pleasures of life, and frequently wore an iron girdle with sharp points towards his skin that he might thus mortify himself, and by inflicting pain on his body banish the vain or profane thoughts which might intrude on his holy meditations. Though, however, regardless of the world, he embraced the cause of the jansenists against the jesuits, and in his "Provincial Letters," attacked them with all the shafts of genuine wit, yet with the force of truth and conscious virtue. These letters, according to Voltaire, who calls him the first, and Boileau the second, satirist against the jesuits, are a model of eloquence and wit, equal to the finest comedies of Moliere, and possessed of the sublimity of the finest of Bossnet's orations. These celebrated letters have been frequently published, and have appeared in all the languages of Europe. Pascal died at Paris 19th August 1662, aged only 39. After his death were published from among his papers, "Pensées," on religion and other subjects, much admired, and also the "Equilibrium of Fluids," and the weight of "the Mass of the Air." Pascal was undoubtedly a very extraordinary man. If rivalled in talents, says his biographer, no one, however, of equal eminence, can be found who lived with such exemplary innocence. His works were printed Paris, 5 vols. 8vo. 1799.

PASCHAL I. St. Paschasius, a Roman who succeeded Stephen IV. on the papal throne 817. He was benevolent in his conduct, and received with great humanity the Greeks who had been exiled for their attachment to image worship. He crowned Lothaire emperor at Rome, and died 12th May, 824.

PASCHAL II. Reinier, a Tuscan who succeeded Urban II. on the papal throne 1099. He excommunicated the anti-pope Gilbert, and claimed with the most unyielding pertinacity the right of investitures, which was opposed by Henry I. of England, and Henry IV. emperor of Germany. Henry visited Italy in hopes of receiving from the sovereign pontiff the imperial crown; but Paschal refused to officiate till he renounced his claims to the investitures. The emperor incensed, seized the person of the pope, and though the Romans immediately took up arms in defence of their sovereign, he carried him away captive, and refused to restore him to liberty, till he had renounced his pretensions to the disputed rights. This extorted concession was cancelled by two councils held at Rome, in 1112, and 1116. The pope tired with the dissensions which harassed him wished to resign the sovereignty, but died before, 22d January, 1118. Some of his letters are preserved in the councils of P. Labbe. There were two anti-popes of that name, one in the age of Sergius II. and the other in the reign of Alexander III.

PASCHIUS, George, author of Tractatus de Novis Inventis quorum accuratori Cultui Facem prætulit Antiquitas, 4to.—de Fictis Rebus Publ. 4to.—de Variis Modis Moralia Tractandi, 4to. was the son of a merchant of Dantzic, and became professor of moral philosophy at Kiel, and died 1707, aged 56.

PASOR, Matthias, was born at Herborne, April 12th, 1599. He studied at Heidelberg and Marburg; but in consequence of the wars which disturbed his countrymen, he left Germany and came to England, and was incorporated A. M. at Oxford 1624. He here resided at Exeter college, and read lectures in oriental languages, and with great reputation and success, but 1629, he was induced to go to Groningen, where he was presented to some of the professorial chairs. He died there January 1658. He wrote several things but never published them.

PASQUIER, or PAQUIER, Stephen, an eminent advocate in the parliament at Paris, rewarded by Henry III. with the office of advocate-general to the chamber of accounts, in consequence of his able pleadings against Versoris, the defender of the jesuits. He resigned this honorable place to his eldest son Theodore, and died at Paris, August 31st, 1615, at the great age of 87. As a man his character was mild and benevolent, as a writer acute and sensible, and as a poet graceful and sublime. Of his poems the best known is his "Puce," or flea, in consequence of a flea which he saw on the breast of the learned Catherine de Roches, 1569. His other works consist of epigrams, epitaphs, letters, researches, and portraits. He left three sons worthy of him.

PASSEMANT, Claude Simeon, a native of Paris, brought up to trade, which he quitted to pursue the bent of his genius in the construction of optical and mathematical instruments. Among his ingenious labors are mentioned an astronomical pendulum with a moving celestial sphere, presented to Louis XV., a burning mirror, and some globes. He wrote a treatise on the reflecting telescope, and another on the use of telescopes. He died suddenly 6th November 1769, aged 67.

PASSERAT, John, professor of eloquence in the Royal college, at Paris, was born at Troyes in Champagne, 1534. He studied law at Bourges under Cujacius, and became professor of eloquence upon the assassination of Ramus, 1572. He acquired great and deserved eminence in this employment, and died of the palsy 1602. His works are numerous, and his poetry is particularly admired: besides some French and Latin poems he published, Commentaries on Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius—Orationes et Præfationes—Conjecturarum—Liber—& de Literarum Cognatione.

PASSERI, Gio. Battista, an Italian antiquary, born at Gubio, in the duchy of Urbino, November 1694. He studied the law at Rome for four years, and began to make collections of Etruscan antiquities; but in 1738, the loss of his wife had such influence on his feelings, that he embraced the ecclesiastical state. He became apostolic prothonotary, and vicar general of Pesara, and died February 1780, in consequence of being overturned in his carriage. He wrote Lucernæ Fictiles Musci Passeris, 3 vols.—on the History of Fossils—Pictura Etruscorum in Vasulis in unum collectæ, Dissertationibus Illustratæ, 3 vols.—Thesaurus Gemmarum Astrii Ferarum Antiquarum, tom. second and third in continuation of Gorri's first vol.—Thesaurus Gemmarum Selectissimarum, and other works mentioned in Saxius, Onomasticon.

PASSIONEI, Dominico, an Italian cardinal, born at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino, 1632. He studied at Rome, where he made a most valuable collection of books and manuscripts, and in 1706, he came to Paris where he became acquainted with Mabillon, Montfaucon, and other learned men. In 1708, he went to Holland and continued there, and attended the congress of Utrecht, 1712, as the pope's secret agent. He was afterwards employed by the pope in various negotiations, and every where displayed his zeal, sagacity, and talents. He published an Account of his Embassy in Switzerland, with the title of "Acta Legationis Helveticæ," folio 1738. While nuncio at Vienna, he pronounced the funeral oration of prince Eugene, and for his many services was made archbishop of Ephesus, and raised to the dignity of cardinal by Clement XII. This learned man particularly distinguished as the friend and patron of literature, died 15th July, 1761, aged 79.

PATER, Paul, a native of Menersdorf in Hungary, who was exiled from his country for his attachment to the protestant faith. He became successively librarian to the duke of Wolfenbuttle, mathematical professor at the college of Thorn, and afterwards at Dantzic, where he died 1724, aged 68. He was an able mathematician, and so ardent in the pursuit of knowledge that he slept only two hours in the summer, and four in the winter. He wrote Labor Solis, sive de Eclipsi Christo patiente Hierosolym. Visa.—de Astrologia Persicâ—de Mari Caspio—de Cælo Empyrio—de Insignibus Turcicis ex Variis Superstitionum Tenebris Orientalium maxime Illustratis.

PATERSON, Samuel, a native of London, chiefly educated in France. He settled as a foreign bookseller in the Strand, but did not succeed in business, in consequence of which he retired to the continent in 1776, and made a valuable collection of books, which on his return to England he recommended to the public in his catalogue called Bibliotheca Universalis Selecta. This performance was so much approved by the public that he acquired some celebrity as a bibliographer, and was not only engaged as a librarian by lord Lansdown, but was employed by the London booksellers in forming their catalogues, several of which, especially of the Beauclerk, Grofs, Pinelli, and other collections, he completed in a very satisfactory manner. He was author of Cursory Remarks on a Journey through the Netherlands by Coriat, 3 vols. 12mo.—Joineriana, or Scraps, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Templar, a periodical paper—Speculation on Law and Lawyers, 8vo. At one time of life he was engaged as an auctioneer, and had the good fortune to save from destruction sir Julius Cæsar's manuscripts, which from mere waste paper were made productive to him of £350. He died 1802, aged 74.

PATIN, Guy, an eminent French writer and physician, born at Houdon, near Beauvais in Picardy, 1602. His father intended him for the active life of an advocate, but he soon found medicine more congenial to his feelings, and after studying that science with great application, he became professor of physic in the Royal college of Paris, and distinguished himself by his defence of the ancients against the moderns. He also violently opposed the use of Antimony as a medicine, and wrote a book on it called "Martyrology of Antimony." His "Letters," published in 3 vols. after his death, acquired him great celebrity; they were read, says Voltaire, with avidity, because they contained things which every body loves, and satires liked still more. He died 1692.

PATIN, Charles, second son of the preceding, was born at Paris, 23d February 1633. His abilities were so early displayed, that at the age of 14 he maintained for five hours a disputation in Greek and Latin, and was admitted M. A. with great applause. He studied the law, but had a stronger inclination for physic, in which faculty he at last took his degrees. He practised with great success, and read lectures to numerous and admiring auditors; but dreading persecution and imprisonment for some unknown causes, he suddenly left France, 1668. After visiting England, and the North of Europe he fixed at Basil, and afterwards removed to Padua, where he became professor of physic, and was honored with the title of knight of St. Mark. He died there 2d October, 1693. His chief works are Itinerarium Comitis Brienne—Familie Romanæ ex Antiquis Numismat. fol.—Introduction to History by Medals, 12mo.—Imperatorum Romanar. Numismata. fol.—Travels in different Parts of Europe—Pratica della Medaglia—Suetonius ex Numismat. Illustratus. 4to.—de Optimâ Nedicorum Secta—de Avicenna—Lycaœum Patavinum. His works, says Voltaire, are read by men of learning, as his father's are by men of leisure.

PATKUL, John Reginald de, a Livonian gentleman, who resented the oppressions which his country suffered from the power of Charles XI. and XII. of Sweden. He appeared before Charles XI. 1639, at the head of six other deputies, who were empowered by their country to lay their grievances at the feet of their sovereign, but the circumstance was regarded as treasonable, and he escaped with difficulty into Russia, from his persecutors, who condemned him to death. Though afterwards invested with the sacred office of ambassador of Russia in Saxony, Charles XII. refused to make peace with Augustus of Poland, except Patkul was delivered into his hands, and by this base treachery the unfortunate man was seized, and broken on the wheel, and quartered, at Casimir, 1707. This cruel measure, so outrageous to humanity and to the independence of nations, has deservedly fixed an indelible stigma on the character of the otherwise heroic Charles of Sweden.

PATRICK, St., the apostle and guardian saint of Ireland, was, as is supposed, a native of Wales or of Cornwall, who was seized by pirates and carried to Ireland, where he converted the inhabitants to christianity. He was made the spiritual head of Ireland, and fixed his residence at Armagh, which is become the metropolitan see; and further to establish the doctrines which he taught with such eloquence and effect, he built several churches and religious houses. He died about 460, aged 83. Some pieces in Latin, under his name, have been published in London by sir James Ware, 1653, in 8vo.

PATRICK, Peter, a native of Thessalonica, in the age of Justinian, whom he served as ambassador to Amalasonthe queen of the Goths, and Chosroes king of Persia. For his services he was made master of the palace. He is author of the history of ambassadors in the collection of Byzantine historians, folio, Louvre, 1648.

PATRICK, Samuel, a learned English divine. He was one of the masters of the Charter house, and is known for his edition of Hederic's Greek Lexicon, which has since been improved by Ernesti, Morell, and others.

PATRICK, Simon, D.D. a learned prelate, son of a mercer at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, where he was born 8th September, 1626. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and of which in 1661, he was elected master, against Sparrow, appointed by Royal mandamus. His opponent, supported by power, prevailed, whilst he himself retired from Cambridge, and became Rector of St. Paul's Covent-garden, where he continued an active parish priest during the whole of the plague. In 1666, he was made chaplain to the king. In 1672, he was made prebendary of Westminster, and in 1679, dean of Peterborough. During the reign of James II. he showed himself an active advocate for the protestant cause, and though flattered and courted by the king, was steady and sincere in his principles. At the revolution his abilities were employed in settling the affairs of the church, and in reviewing the liturgy. In 1689, he was made bishop of Chichester, two years after translated to Ely, where he died 31st May, 1707, aged 80. This worthy prelate, so highly commended by Burnet, wrote sermons—tracts against Popery—Commentaries on the Scriptures, 3 vols. fol. which with Lowth on the prophets, Arnold on the apocrypha, and Whitby on the New Testament, contain a regularly continued commentary on the bible.

PATRIZI, Francis, author of dialogues in Italian, on the Manner of studying and writing History, 4to.—de Institutione Reipublice—de Regno & Regis Institutione. fol.—del Vero Regimento—Poemata de Antiquitate Sinarum, was bishop of Gaieta in Italy, and died there, 1494.

PATRIZI, Francis, a native of Cherso in Istria, who became professor of philosophy at Ferrara, Padua and Rome, and distinguished himself by his learning, and his bold opposition to the philosophy of Aristotle. He wrote some poems in Italian—a Parallel of the Military Art, between the Ancients and Moderns, and edited the works of Mercurius Trismegistus. He died at Rome 1597, aged 67.

PATRU, Oliver, a polite scholar, born at Paris 1604. He became eminent for his knowledge of literature, and as an advocate, he was the first, says Voltaire, who introduced correctness and purity of language in pleadings. When admitted into the French academy in 1640, he pronounced an animated speech, and from that circumstance the same adulatory address has continued to be expected from every new member. As a critic Patru was well informed and judicious, but rigid, so that he was called the Quintilian of France, and his grammatical decisions were submitted to, as oracles. His abilities were universally respected not only by the learned, but the great, and even by Colbert, and by the king. He died 16th January 1681. His miscellaneous works were printed at Paris 1670, 4to. of which the third edition appeared 1714, and the whole in 1732, 2 vols. 4to.

PATTEN, Thomas, D.D. fellow of Corpus Christi, Oxford, died 1790, rector of Childrey, Berks. He wrote the Christian Apology, a sermon—St. Peter's Christian Apology, a sermon against the objections of Ralph Heathcote, 8vo.—the sufficiency of the external Evidence of the Gospel against Heathcote—Opposition between the Gospel and the Religion of Nature—David's Character vindicated, 1762.

PATTERSON, William, governor of New Jersey and associate judge of the supreme court of the United States, graduated at Princeton college in 1763. He was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. He was a senator from New Jersey in the first congress. He was governor of New Jersey in 1790. He was afterwards appointed a judge of the United States supreme court. He died in 1806.

PATTERSON, Robert, LL.D. was a native of Ireland. He came to Philadelphia in 1768. He was employed as the principal of an academy at Wilmington Delaware. During the revolutionary war he held offices in the army. In 1779, he was appointed professor of mathematics in the university of Pennsylvania, and then vice provost. In 1805 he was appointed director of the mint of the United States. In 1819, he was chosen president of the American philosophical society. He died 1824 aged 81. He was the author of many of the papers published in the transactions of the philosophical society.

PATTISON, William, an English poet, born at Peasmarsh, Sussex, 1706. He was educated at Appleby school, where his rising talents were noticed and encouraged by Mr. Noble, a neighboring clergyman, and from thence he went to Sidney college, Cambridge, which, from a spirit impatient of discipline, he left without taking a degree. He went to London, but as he had nothing to support him he soon experienced all the horrors of indigence and distress. An intimate acquaintance with the wits of the time, and repeated solicitations for the cold and tardy patronage of the great were little calculated to dispel the miseries which poverty, intemperance, and imprudence, gathered around him, and therefore we find him describing himself as destitute of friends, of money, a prey to hunger, and passing his nights on a bench in St. James's park. The success of some of his pieces recommended him at last to Curl, who took him into his house, but a month after, the small-pox came to put an end to the sufferings of a dejected and broken heart. He died 1727, in his 21st year, and was buried in St. Clement Danes' church-yard. He possessed great genius, but without the cheering patronage of a friend his blossoms withered under an unpropitious sky. His works appeared, 2 vols. 8vo. 1728.

PAUCTON, Alexis, a French mathematician born of obscure parents near Lassay in Mayenne. He studied at Nantes where he paid great attention to mathematics and navigation, and afterwards he came to Paris, where with some difficulty he recommended himself and obtained patronage in the military school. He was amiable in his manners, and possessed of great erudition. He died at Paris 1799, aged 67. He is author of Theory of the Force of Archimedes, 12mo.—Metrology, or a treatise on the Weights, Measures, and Monies of all Countries, Ancient and Modern—Theory of the Laws of Nature, with Dissertations on the Pyramids of Egypt, 8vo. It is said that he left in MS. a translation of the Hymns of Orpheus.

PAVILLON, Nicholas, a French ecclesiastic whose abilities were distinguished at Paris, and became known to cardinal Richelieu, who made him bishop of Alet. In his diocese he labored with zeal for the suppression of vice, and the dispersion of ignorance, but though he founded schools, and in every respect devoted himself to enlighten the people, his conduct was misrepresented at court, and the king sent commissioners to examine the complaints preferred against him. Though acquitted, a fresh offence, and his unwillingness to submit to the royal mandate incensed the monarch against him, and he was deposed from his see, and died in exile, 8th December, 1677, aged above 80. His works are a Ritual for his Diocese—Synodal Statutes, and Ordinances.

PAVILLON, Stephen, a French poet, born at Paris 1652. He was advocate general in the parliament of Metz, but the laborious office was too difficult for his weak constitution, and he retired to literary ease. He was a member of both the academies, and received a pension from Louis XIV. His poems which are after the manner of Voiture, and possess some merit, were published in 1720, 2 vols. 12mo. He wrote also in prose, the Portrait of Pure Love, disinterested counsels, and other moral pieces.

PAUL, Mark, or MARCO PAULO, a Venetian traveller. He penetrated 1272 as far as the capital of Cublai Chan, the sixth descendant of Genghis Chan, of which he published an interesting account. Some authors imagine that Cambalus which he mentions is the town of Pekin. It is remarkable that he makes no mention of the great wall of China.

PAUL I. pope after his brother Stephen II. 757, died ten years after, respected for his wisdom and earning.

PAUL II. Peter Barbo, a Venetian noble, elected pope after Pius II. 1464. He permitted the cardinals to wear a purple habit, and the red cap of silk, and the mitre which hitherto had distinguished the sovereign pontiff. He died 26th July, 1471, aged 54.

PAUL III. Alexander Farnese, bishop of Ostia, was elected pope 1534, after Clement VII. In his time began the famous council of Trent, whose first sitting was in 1545. He made a treaty with the Venetians and the emperor against the Turks, and he established the inquisition, and approved of the institution of the jesuits, but condemned the interin of Charles V. and pursued measures of severity against the defection of Henry VIII. He was a pontiff of high character, respectable in private life, and at all times anxious to procure concord among the Christian princes. He died 10th November, 1549, aged 82.

PAUL IV. John Peter Caraffa, succeeded Marcellus II. on the papal throne 1555, aged near 80. He behaved with great haughtiness on his elevation; he not only issued a bull against all heretics, but he threatened with his severest displeasure Charles V. because he did not oppose sufficiently vigorous measures against the protestants; and when Elizabeth by her ambassador announced to him her accession, he complained that she had ascended the throne, especially as she was illegitimate, without the concurrence of the holy see, on which all the crowns of Europe were dependent. His reign tended little to advance the true interests of Rome, so that he died unlamented, 18th August, 1559. He wrote treatises de Symbolis—de Emendandâ Ecclesiâ.

PAUL V. Camillus Borghese, a native of Rome, made a cardinal by Clement VIII. and raised to the popedom after Leo XI. 1605. He was engaged in a dispute with the Venetians, and as he had humbled the Genoese, he expected the same success with this powerful republic; but though he excommunicated the doge and the senate, he found his decrees little regarded. He had recourse to arms, but without intimidating the Venetians, till at last by the friendly interference of Henry IV. of France a reconciliation was effected. Paul deserved the gratitude of the Romans for the various embellishments which he introduced, the collections of paintings, and sculpture, which he made, and the erection of public fountains and aqueducts. Greater as a priest than as a politician, Paul acquired the esteem of the learned whom he patronised. He died 28th January, 1621, aged 69.

PAUL, Petrowitz, emperor of Russia, son of the great Catherine and Peter III. was born 1st October 1754. He married 1774, the daughter of the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, who died two years after, and for his second wife he took a princess of Wirtemberg, niece to the king of Prussia. He began to travel in Europe in 1780, and during fourteen months visited Poland, Austria, Italy, France, and Holland, and everywhere displayed an amiable character, and a strong desire of understanding the various establishments which guide the destinies of Europe. On the death of his mother in 1796, he ascended the throne, and then began to take an active part in the general confederacy of Europe, against the tyrannical and ambitious conduct of France. He sent the brave Suwarrow into Italy, where victory followed his steps, and he attacked the northern frontiers of France, in conjunction with the English; but all at once, while the world expected still higher exertions in the cause of the allies, the fickle monarch was reconciled to his enemies. To show more strongly his change of sentiments, he seized the property of the English, and with unparalleled cruelty, banished their unhappy sailors to Siberia, while his own subjects experienced all the misfortunes of distracted councils and of capricious measures. This extravagance was stopped by the sudden death of the unfortunate Paul, who was assassinated in April, 1801, by some of his discontented nobles. The cause of this extraordinary change of politics has been ascribed to the influence of a beautiful French mistress, who was sent by the cabinet of Paris to second the labors of diplomatic intrigue, by the prostitution of her charms to the capricious monarch.

PAUL, a celebrated heresiarch of Samosata, a city of the Euphrates. He was raised to the see of Antioch in 260, and soon after he was invited to the court of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, who favored the Jewish religion, but could not comprehend the mysteries of christianity. Paul represented to the queen that the Trinity consisted not of three real persons, but only three attributes; and that the Saviour had appeared on earth not as a god, but as a man endowed with a superior portion of wisdom. This doctrine, which at first was propagated to convert Zenobia, was more fully defended by Paul, and therefore drew upon him the censures of the church. He was deposed from his dignity by a synod at Antioch, 270, and excommunicated. His followers, who were called Paulinists, did not increase, and few of them remained at the end of the fifth century.

PAUL, of Sancta Maria, a learned Jew of Burgos, who, it is said, was converted to christianity by reading a work of St. Thomas Aquinas. After the death of his wife he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and by his merits obtained places of honor and trust. He was preceptor to John II. king of Castille, and was afterwards successively archdeacon of Trevigno, bishop of Carthage, and then of Burgos, where he died 29th August, 1445, aged 82. Some authors report that he was patriarch of Aquileia. He was a learned prelate, and wrote Scrutinium Scripturarum, folio, 1474, and additions to Nicholas de Lyra's works. His three sons were baptized at the same time with him, when he became a christian convert, and they all distinguished themselves by their merit. The eldest, Alphonso, bishop of Burgos, wrote an Abridgment of Spanish History; the second, Gonsalvo, died bishop of Placentia, and the third, Alvares, published an History of John II. king of Castille.

PAUL, deacon of Aquileia, was secretary to Didier, the last king of Lombardy. He was afterwards in the service of Charlemagne; but when accused by his enemies, of conspiring against the life of his protector, he was banished to the island of Tremiti, in the Adriatic. He left his exile for the court of the duke of Benevento, after whose death he retired to a monastery. He died 801. He is author of an History of the Lombards, in six books, to the death of Luitprand, 744—History of the bishops of Metz, and he contributed much to the composition of the Historia Miscellanea, in continuation of the work of Eutropius.

PAULA, St. a Roman lady of noble birth, and of great learning. She embraced christianity, and when become a widow, she retired to Bethlehem, where she built a monastery, and displayed in the sight of her female associates, all the virtues and mortifications of ascetic life. St. Jerome was the director of her charitable institutions, and he also taught her to understand the Hebrew scriptures. She died 407, aged 60. It is said that she was descended from the illustrious families of the Gracchi and Scipios.

PAULET, William, marquis of Winchester, son of sir John Paulet, of Somersetshire, was one of the courtiers of Henry VIII. and of his three successors. He had the art during those times, when religious opinions and political sentiments were so liable to persecution, to retain his places, and when asked how he had so securely weathered the storm, he replied, by being a willow, and not an oak. He died 1572, aged 97, and transmitted his honors and fortunes to his family, one hundred and three of whom he saw descended from his loins.

PAULET, John James, a French physician, member of the Royal Society of Medicine at Paris, was born in 1740. He studied at the university of Montpellier, and having taken his degrees, he distinguished himself by the publication of a learned treatise on the "History of the Small-Pox," 1765, 2 vols. In 1776, he published "Recherches Historiques et Physiques sur les Maladies Epizootiques," 2 vols. 8vo; and he subsequently became editor of the Gazette de Santé. He died at Fontainebleau, in October, 1826. Besides the works mentioned, he was the author of "Traité des Champignons," 1775, 2 vols. 4to; and "Traité de la Morsure de la Vipère-aspic de Fontainebleau."

PAULI, Simon, author of treatises on Malignant Fevers—against Tobacco and Tea—Flora Danica, 4to.—and other medical works, was professor of medicine at Copenhagen, and physician to Christian V. who rewarded his services by making him bishop of Arrhas. He died 1680, aged 77.

PAULIAN, Aimé Henry, a jesuit, born at Nimes, 1722. He was a learned man, and wrote some valuable works, the best known of which are Dictionnaire de Physique, 5 vols. 8vo.—Système General de Philosophie, 4 vols. 12mo.—Dictionnaire Philosopho-Theologique, 4to. He died at the advanced age of 80.

PAULINUS, St. a native of Bourdeaux, whom his learning and virtues recommended to the highest offices of the state. He was made consul in 378, and soon after married Therasia, a Spanish lady of great opulence and high birth. He settled in Spain, and by the persuasion of his wife became a convert to christianity, and he applied his large resources to charitable uses, and the most benevolent munificence. To increase the labors of his christian calling, he took orders, 393, and soon after coming to Italy, was chosen bishop of Nola, where he died 431, aged 74. Some authors ascribe to him the invention of church bells. Some of his Latin poems, letters, and other works, are extant. There was another who was bishop of Treves, and the defender of Athanasius. He died an exile in Phrygia, 359. Another was bishop of Aquileia, and distinguished himself at the council of Frankfort, in 794. He was author of a Treatise on the Trinity and a book of salutary instructions, and died 804.

PAULMIER DE GRENTEMESNIL, Julian de, a French physician, educated under Fernel. He was physician to Charles IX. whom he succeeded to restore to health. He was afterwards in the service of the duke of Anjou, and died at Caen, 1588. He wrote treatises de Vino & Pomaceo—De Lue Venereâ—De Morbis Contagiosis, &c. His son James was also a physician, but educated in the protestant faith. He wrote Observationes in Optimos Auctores Græcos, 4to.—a Latin Description of Ancient Greece, 4to.—poems in Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish, not very valuable. He died at Caen, 1st October, 1670, aged 83.

PAULMY, Mark Anthony René de Voyer, marquis de, son of the marquis of Argenson, is known for his valuable library, which he sold to the count of Artois, brother to Louis XVI. He was also distinguished as a man of letters, and was honored with a seat in the French academy, and raised to the dignity of minister of state. He published Mélanges d'une grande Bibliothèque, 69 vols. 8vo. and also essays in the style of Montaigne, 9 vols. 8vo. 1778. He died 1787, aged 65.

PAULZE, N. a native of Montbrisson, made one of the farmers general of France by the influence of his relation Terray. He was a man of great intelligence and erudition, and he formed a company for the improvement of Guyenne, which was not however fully adopted. He was imprisoned during the revolution, and guillotined, 1794. The commercial details on the Indies in Raynal's History, are attributed to his pen.

PAUSANIAS, governor of the kingdom of Sparta, during his nephew's minority, was brave in war, and intriguing in the cabinet. After serving against the Persians, he grew discontented with his country, and made a secret treaty with the enemy. The measure was discovered, and to escape punishment he took refuge in a temple, where, on account of his perfidy, his mother first brought a stone to ensure his confinement. He was starved to death, B. C. 474.

PAUTRE, Anthony le, an architect of Paris, whose abilities were patronised by Louis XIV. He built the church of the nuns of the Port Royal at Paris, and contributed by other works to the embellishment of Paris. He was made member of the academy of sculpture, 1671, and died a few years after. His works appeared at Paris, 1652, in folio, with 60 engravings. One of his relations, John, was also a native of Paris, and eminent as a designer and engraver, especially in architectural ornaments. He was a member of the academy of painting and sculpture, and died 2d February, 1682, aged 65. His works appear in three vols. folio, adorned with above 1000 plates. His son Peter, who was born at Paris, 4th March, 1659, directed his attention to sculpture, and was made director of the academy of St. Luke. His Aeneas and Anchises, which adorns the Thuilleries, and his Lucretia stabbing herself in the presence of her husband, are very valuable specimens of his great genius. He died at Paris, 22d January 1744.

PAUW, N. de, a German ecclesiastic, uncle to the famous Anarcharsis Cloktz. Though bold and singular in his opinions, he was respected for his learning and virtues, and was much noticed by Frederic the Great, of Prussia. He wrote Enquiries on the Greeks, the Americans, the Chinese, and Egyptians, 7 vols. 8vo. a work full of curious details, bold conjectures, and energetic description, mixed with occasional weakness of thought and paradoxical sentiments. He died at Xanten, near Aix la Chapelle, in the summer of 1799.

PAYSON, Philips, D.D. a congregational minister of Massachusetts, was born in Walpole of that state, 18th January, 1736, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1754. He was settled in Chelsea, of his native state, where he remained till his death, which took place January 11, 1801, being sixty-four years of age. He was ordained, October 26, 1757; and his subsequent life was characterized by a faithful discharge of the duties of his office. He was much beloved by his people, to whom he ever acted the part of a friend and father. As a scholar, Dr. Payson became eminent; and his publications in the transactions of the American Academy of arts and sciences, are lasting evidence of his learning. He also published an election sermon, 1778; a sermon at the ordination of his brother Seth Payson of Rindge, New-Hampshire, 1782; and a sermon on the death of Washington, 1800.

PAYSON, Seth, D.D., a congregational minister of New-Hampshire, born in 1758, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1777. He was ordained at Rindge in that state, December 4, 1782, where he remained till his death, which took place, February 26, 1820. Dr. Seth Payson was esteemed a man of talents and a good preacher. He published two fast sermons; two funeral sermons; and an ordination sermon. He also published a small volume on illuminism, being an abstract of Robinsou and Barruel.

PAYSON, Edward, D.D., graduated at Harvard college in 1803. He was ordained as the colleague of Mr. Kellogg in Portland in 1807, and continued in the ministry in that town till his death in 1827, aged 44. He possessed a high reputation as a preacher, and had repeated and earnest solicitations to remove both to Boston, and New York. He published some addresses and sermons in his life time; and since his death two volumes of his sermons have been published.

PAZZI, James, a banker of Florence, of illustrious family. He headed the faction which opposed the Medicis, and he conspired with Salviati, archbishop of Pisa, and with cardinal Riario, to cut off the two brothers, Julian and Laurent, and to seize upon the sovereign power. The elevation of the host, 26th April, 1478, was the signal for this murderous action, and at the moment of this solemn ceremony, Julian was stabbed to the heart, by a brother of Pazzi; but Laurent escaped with a slight wound. The popularity of the Medicis, and the atrocity of the deed soon armed the people in their favor, and the conspirators were seized, and punished with death, and among them Pazzi suffered. The house of the Pazzis was afterwards reconciled to the Medicis, and became allied to them by marriage. One of their descendants, Cosmo, was archbishop of Florence, 1508, and would have risen to the dignity of cardinal, if he had not died before the elevation of his uncle Leo X. to the chair of St. Peter. He translated Maximus Tyrius into Latin. His brother Alexander wrote some tragedies, and translated the Poetics of Aristotle.

PEACOCK, Reginald, an Englishman, made by the interest of his friend Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, bishop of St. Asaph, and afterwards of Chichester, from which he was banished in disgrace, for opposing the papal authority, and denying transubstantiation. He was obliged to make a public recantation, and then retired to an abbey, where he died 1486. His books were burnt publicly, as profane and heretical.

PEALE, Charles Wilson, the founder of the Philadelphia museum. He learned the trade of a saddler, and connected with it that of harness maker, silver-smith, watch-maker, and carver; and by way of recreation, practised portrait painting, became a sportsman, naturalist, and preserver of animals. He made himself a violin and a guitar. He invented and executed a variety of machines. He was the first dentist in America that made sets of enamel teeth. Mr. Peale, being desirous to obtain some more accurate knowledge of painting, presented a Mr. Hesoelius, a portrait painter, with the handsomest saddle his shop afforded, and in this way introduced himself to him, and solicited the favor of seeing the mysterious operations of painting. He gained essential instruction, and received further aid from Mr. Copley, when on a visit to Boston. Soon after, by the aid of his friends, he went to England, and studied during the years 1770 and 1771 in the royal academy at London, under the direction of Mr. West. One day when colonel Trumbull was in Mr. West's painting room, some hammering arrested his attention. "Oh," said Mr. West, "that is only that ingenious young man, Mr. Peale, repairing some of my bells and locks, according to custom." This custom, much to the comfort and amusement of many a host, he continued through life. On his return to America, he removed to Baltimore, and afterwards to Philadelphia, where he opened a picture gallery. For about fifteen years, he was the only portrait painter in North America. During the revolutionary war, he raised a company, was often employed in confidential services, and was engaged in the battles of Trenton and Germantown. In 1777, he was elected a representative of Philadelphia in the state legislature, where he chiefly interested himself in the law for the abolition of slavery. During the revolutionary contest, he had painted the portraits of many distinguished officers, some of whom were afterwards killed. This collection constituted the chief interest of his gallery, and was from time to time extended, and afterwards made to comprise the portraits of men eminent in the different walks of life. Some large bones of the mammoth, found in Kentucky, and brought to him to be drawn, laid the foundation of his museum, when the name of museum was scarcely known even to our travellers, and Europe possessed none of great note but the celebrated Aldobrandine collection at Florence. The increasing income of his museum at length enabled Mr. Peale to procure almost an entire skeleton of the mammoth at an expense of five thousand dollars. A large quantity of the bones of an individual of this species was discovered in Ulster county, New York, which Mr. Peale purchased, together with the right of digging for the remainder in a swampy marl pit, which was obtained after very great exertions. Natural history, as yet, formed no part of the education of our youth, and Mr. Peale was the first to prepare and deliver a course of lectures on this interesting and popular subject, which he rendered attractive to a respectable class of ladies and gentlemen, by demonstrations with the real subjects, taken out of the museum. The museum has at length grown to an extent which justifies a comparison with the most celebrated establishments in Europe. He was foremost in the early attempts to establish an academy of the fine arts. When the Pennsylvania academy of the fine arts was founded, he zealously co-operated for many years, and lived to contribute to seventeen annual exhibitions. After a life of extraordinary exertion and temperance, he died in 1827, at the age of eighty-five.

PEARCE, Zachary, D.D., an English prelate, son of a distiller in Holborn, born in 1690. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, and distinguished himself at the university by some light compositions, and by some entertaining papers in the Guardian and the Spectator. He was patronised by lord Parker, earl of Macclesfield, to whom he dedicated his edition of Longinus, and from whom he obtained some preferment. In 1748 he was made bishop of Bangor, and in 1756, bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster. These honors were conferred unsolicited, and the bishop, who longed for the privacy of retired life, was anxious to resign; but as some of the ministry objected to the person thought of for his successor, he was permitted to divest himself only of the deanery of Westminster, in favor of Dr. Thomas. He died June, 1774.

Dr. Pearce was eminent as well for his philological learning, as his classical knowledge. He wrote a Vindication of the Miracles against the attacks of Woolston, besides an Account of Trinity College, Cambridge—Letters against Conyers Middleton, —a Review of Milton's Text—an Essay on the Origin of Temples and sermons. After his death appeared his Commentary on the Four Evangelists, and the Acts, 2 vols. 4to.—and 4 vols. of sermons.

PEARSON, John, D.D., an English prelate, born 12th February, 1612, at Snoring, Norfolk, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. In 1639, he resigned his fellowship at King's, and afterwards became chaplain to lord keeper Finch, and to lord Goring, and obtained the living of Torrington, Suffolk, and of St. Clement's Eastcheap, London. In 1661 he became Margaret professor at Cambridge; in 1662 was made master of Trinity college, and in 1673 succeeded Dr. Wilkins in the see of Chester. He died at Chester, 16th July, 1686. He is particularly known for his valuable "Exposition of the Creed," which appeared 1659, in 4to. and has often been republished. He wrote besides "Vindiciæ Ignatii," against Daille—Annales Cypriani, and some posthumous works.

PEARSON, Edward, D.D., a learned and amiable divine, was born on the 25th of October, 1756, in the city of Norwich. He was never placed at any public school, but derived all early education from private instruction, and his own assiduity. In 1778, he was entered at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; and proceeded to the degrees of B.A. 1782; and M.A., 1785. In 1786, he obtained the Norrisian prize, for an Essay on the Goodness of God, as manifested in the Mission of Jesus Christ, which was soon afterwards published, in conformity to the will of the founder. In 1792 he took the degree of B.D., and during a considerable period Mr. Pearson filled the situation of tutor to the college. In 1797 he was presented by his kind and esteemed friend, Dr. Elliston, the master, to the rectory of Rempstone, Nottinghamshire. In the same year he married Susan, the daughter of Richard Johnson, Esq., of Henrietta Street, Covent Garden. In 1807 he was chosen, by the trustees, to preach the Warburtonian lectures at Lincoln's Inn, which he completed early in 1811. In 1808, on the death of Dr. Elliston, he was elected master of Sidney Sussex college, on which occasion he received, by royal mandate, the degree of D.D., and in the same year was appointed vice-chancellor. In 1810, he was elected by the university to the office of Christian advocate. The arduous duties connected with these various and important appointments had visibly affected his health, and whilst taking his customary walk in the garden of his parsonage, at Rempstone, he was suddenly attacked with an apoplectic seizure, from which he never recovered sufficiently to articulate; but expired on the 17th of August, 1811. The works of Dr. Pearson, besides that already mentioned, are the following: Discourses to Academic Youth; a letter to a Member of the Senate of the University of Cambridge; and Remarks on the Theory of Morals. The Warburtonian Letters were also published, as well as several family prayers, written by him.

PEARSON, Eliphalet, LL.D., graduated at Harvard college, 1773, where he was professor of Hebrew and oriental languages, and also of the English language, from 1786 to 1806. He was professor of sacred literature in the theological seminary at Andover, 1808, 1809. He died 1826, aged 74. He published a few of his lectures and discourses.

PECHANTRE, Nicolas de, a French poet, born at Toulouse, 1638. He obtained three times the laurel at the academy of Floral games, and acquired great popularity by his tragedy of Geta, acted at Paris, 1687. He wrote besides the tragedies of the Sacrifice of Abraham—Joseph sold by his Brethren—the Death of Nero and Jugurtha. He died at Paris, 1709.

PECHLIN, John Nicholas, a native of Leyden, who studied medicine and became professor of it at Kiel. He was afterwards physician to the duke of Holstein Gottorp, and preceptor to the prince, his son. He wrote treatises De Purgantium Medicament Facultatibus—De Vulneribus Sclopetorum—De Aeris & Alimenti Defectu & Vita sub Aquis—De Habitu & Colore Æthiopum—Observationum Physico-Medicarum—a poetical Panegyric on Tea, in Latin. He died at Stockholm, 1706, aged 39.

PECHMEJA, John de, professor of eloquence in the college of La Fleche, was born at Villa Franca, in Rouergue, and died April, 1735, aged 44. His Eulogium on Colbert merited and received the approbation of the French academy in 1773. His best work is his Telephus, in twelve books, in which he draws a beautiful description of true friendship, of which he gave, with his friend Du Breuil, so interesting an example, that the two friends were called the Pylades and the Orestes of France.

PECK, Francis, an eminent antiquary, born May 4th, 1692, at Stamford, Lincolnshire. He was educated at Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and soon after obtained the living of Godeby, near Melton, Leicestershire, where he died 13th August, 1743. He published 1727, in folio, "the Antiquarian Annals of Stamford," inscribed to the duke of Rutland—Memoirs of Cromwell and of Milton, 2 vols. 4to. He published besides "Desiderata Curiosa," 2 vols. containing curious pieces of English history, and it is said, that before his death he had in contemplation no less than nine different works on historical and antiquarian subjects.

PECK, William Danbridge, first professor of natural history in Harvard college, was a native of Boston. After graduating in 1732, he passed a few years in the counting house of a merchant, but then withdrew from the world, and spent twenty years in the pursuits of natural history. The subscription for the establishment of a professorship of natural history at Cambridge, originated with his friends. He was accordingly elected the first professor in 1805, and subsequently spent three years in Europe. He died 1822, aged 59.

PECKWELL, Henry, D.D., an English divine, rector of Bloxham, Lincolnshire, and a popular Calvinistic preacher. He chiefly resided in London, where he studied physic and anatomy for the benefit of poor persons of his persuasion. He died of a mortification, caused by a wound in the dissection of a young woman who had died of a putrid fever, 1787, aged 40. He published some sermons.

PECQUET, John, a physician, born at Dieppe. He is distinguished for discovering the receptacle of the chyle, which he perceived to be conveyed by the lacteal vessels to the heart, and thence to the subclavian vein. This ingenious author died at Paris, February, 1674. He published his Discoveries in Anatomy, 4to. 1654—De Thoracis Lacteis, 1661.

PECQUET, Anthony, a French writer, grand master of the water works, and the forests of Rouen. He presided also over the military school there. He wrote Analysis of the Spirit of Laws, and of Political Maxims, 3 vols.—the Forest Laws of France, 2 vols.—Thoughts on Man, besides French translations of Guarini's Pastor Fido, and other Italian works. He died 1762, aged 58.

PEELE, George, a native of Devonshire, in the reign of Elizabeth, entered at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and thence was elected student of Christchurch, where he took his master's degree 1573. From Oxford he went to London, where he became the city poet, and had the management of the pageants. He died before 1598. He is mentioned by Wood as no inconsiderable poet, whose tragedies and comedies were acted at Oxford with great applause. His pastorals were also in high esteem. Only five of his plays are known, Edward I.—King David and fair Bethsabe—the Turkish Mahomet and Hyren, and the Old Wives' Tale.

PEIRESC, Nicholas Claude Fabri, LL.D., descended from a noble family at Pisa, was born 1580, and studied at Avignon, Aix, and Tournon, under the care of the jesuits. He devoted himself with uncommon assiduity to mathematics, and particularly to antiquities, though he studied the law to please an uncle from whom he expected some considerable property. In 1599 he began to travel in Italy, and after visiting Padua, Venice, Naples, Rome, and all the curiosities of that celebrated country, during a residence of three years, he returned to France, loaded with valuable collections of antiquities, and accompanied by the friendly wishes of men of learning and science. In 1604 he took his degree of doctor of laws at Aix, and succeeded his uncle, who fondly resigned to him his senatorial dignity. In 1606 he visited England, where he was honored with the friendship and attentions of Camden, Cotton, Saville, and other men of celebrity, and even of James I. himself, and then returned through Antwerp, Brussels, and Paris, to his residence at Aix. Though a layman, he was made by Louis XIII. abbot of Santa Maria Aquitriensis. He died at Aix, 24th June, 1637, aged 57. This learned man, so deservedly esteemed by Casaubon, by de Thou, by Grotius, by J. Scaliger, and other eminent men, was a most amiable and benevolent character, and not improperly compared by one of his biographers to the Roman Atticus. He wrote Historia Provinciæ Gallicæ Narbonensis—Nobilium ejusdem Provinc. Familiarum Origines—Commentarii Rerum omnium Memoriam dignarum suâ Etate gestarum—Liber de Ludicris Naturæ Operibus—Mathematica & Astronomica Varia—Nummi Gallici, Saxonici, Britannici,—Linguae Orientales, Hebraea,—Observationes in Variis Auctores, and other learned works. His library was very choice and valuable, and from it his friends were at liberty to take whatever pleased their taste or fancy.

PELAGIUS, I. a native of Rome, elected pope 555. He was a moderate and pious pontiff, but labored ardently in reforming the manners of his clergy, and in promoting the true spirit of christianity. When Rome was besieged by the Goths under Totila, and at last plundered, he softened the calamities of war among his subjects, by his interference with the enemy's general, who respected his virtues. He died 2d March, 560. He wrote sixteen epistles, still preserved.

PELAGIUS II. a Roman, who succeeded on the papal throne after Benedict I. 578. He maintained with spirit the rights of the church, and opposed the pretensions of John, patriarch of Constantinople, who had assumed the title of Œcumenical bishop. He died 12th February 590, of a pestilential disorder, which proved very fatal at that time, and was so violent in its effects, that the patients expired suddenly, either in sneezing or in gaping, whence arose, as is supposed, the custom still observed of saying, God bless you! to persons who sneeze, and of making the sign of the cross on the mouth of those who gape.

PELAGIUS, an illustrious Spaniard, related to the king of the Visigoths. He was driven from his possessions by the Moors, but after an obscure exile of three years, he attacked his enemies, and defeated them in 716, and assumed the title of king of Leon and the Asturias. He died 737, universally respected, for valor, piety, and prudence.

PELAGIUS, a celebrated heresiarch in the fifth century. He was a native of Wales, and as is supposed, a monk of Bangor, and he went to Rome, where he dropped his name of Morgan for the more classical Greek name of Pelagius. In his zeal to make converts, and to rouse those who pleaded temptations and human infirmities for their lukewarm conduct in the cause of practical religion, he became the supporter of new opinions, and rejected the doctrine of original sin, while he maintained free will in its fullest extent, and asserted that man may be saved by his own merits and virtuous exertions. His opinions, which he published in his book against St. Jerome, drew upon him the censures and condemnation of the synod of Carthage, and of several other councils. Pelagius left Rome with Celestius, the ablest of his followers, and retired to Jerusalem, but it is unknown where and when he died. He wrote besides letters, Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles.

PELETIER, Claude de, counsellor of the Chatelet, and of the parliament, president of the chamber of requests, provost of merchants, and builder of the quay which still bears his name at Paris, was born in that city 1630. He was educated for the law, and was the intimate friend of Boileau, Bignon, Lamoignon, and other great men, and he succeeded in 1683 the famous Colbert, as comptroller-general of the finances. After six years' laborious application, he resigned this office, and exchanged the court for a life of retirement and devotion. He died August 1711, aged 81. Though much engaged in public affairs, he however found time to publish Extracts and Collections from the Fathers, and Comes Senectutis—Comes Rusticus—Pithou's Comes Theologus & Comes Juridicus, and the Body of the Canon Law.

PELL, John, D.D. an English mathematician, born at Southwyke, Sussex, 1st March, 1610. He was educated at Stenning school, and at thirteen entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he applied himself to mathematics with unusual assiduity. After taking his master's degree, he was incorporated at Oxford in 1631, and by his various publications he acquired so much reputation that he was invited in 1639 to fill up a professor's chair at Amsterdam, to which he succeeded 1643. In 1646 he settled at Breda as professor of philosophy and mathematics, at the request of the prince of Orange, and in 1652 returned to his native country. In 1654 he was sent by Cromwell as English resident to the protestant cantons of Switzerland, and returned a little while before the protector's death. In 1661 he was ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, and obtained from the crown the rectory of Fobbing in Essex, to which the bishop of London afterwards added the rectory of Lavingdon in that county. Though respectable as a scholar, and a man of science, Dr. Pell was unfortunately very inattentive to the state of his domestic affairs, and consequently became poor in his old age, and was even confined in the king's bench as a debtor. He died December 12th, 1685. He published Controversia cum Longomontano de Verâ Circuli Mensurâ, 4to.—an Idea of Mathematics, 12mo.—Table of 10,000 Square Numbers, folio.—Demonstration of the second and tenth book of Euclid—Description of the Use of the Quadrant—Letter on Logarithms—Astronomical History of the Heavenly Motions and Appearances—Eclipticus Prognostica, and he left various Manuscripts which by means of Dr. Birch were obtained for the collection of the Royal society.

PELLEGRIN, Simon Joseph, a French ecclesiastic, born at Marseilles, 1663. He was of the society of the Servites, and obtained in 1704 the prize of the French academy, for his poetical "Epistle to the King on the glorious Success of his Arms." This made him known at court, and by means of madame de Maintenon, he was permitted to remove to the ecclesiastical order of Clugny; but as he kept a shop for the sale of poetical pieces, amorous odes, and ballads, and even wrote for the stage, he drew upon himself the animadversion of cardinal de Noailles, who insisted upon his relinquishing either his theatrical employments, or the privilege of officiating at the mass. He chose the latter, and subsisted afterwards by his pen. He died 5th September 1745, aged 82. His works consist of dramas from the Old and New Testament—the Psalms of David—besides a translation of Horace, 2 vols with notes.

PELLERIN, Joseph, commissary-general and chief clerk of the French marine, is famous for his fine and valuable collection of medals, which was purchased by the king in 1776. He published his interesting Observations on Medals, in 9 vols. 4to. with plates, a work of great beauty. He died August 1782, aged 99.

PELLETIER, John le, a native of Rouen, who studied painting, which he afterwards abandoned for literature. Blessed with strong powers of mind, he made himself completely acquainted with the learned languages, Italian, Spanish, mathematics, chemistry and astronomy, without the assistance of a master; and in the later part of life he devoted himself to religious studies. He died 1711, aged 78. He wrote a Dissertation on Noah's Ark—on St. Benedict's hemina—on the Journal of Trevoux—the Life of Sixtus V. by Leti, translated—Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, or Queen Elizabeth's History translated.

PELLETIER, Gaspard, physician and counsellor of Middleburg in Zealand, acquired reputation in his profession, and died in his native town, 1659. He is author of Plantarum tum Patriarum, tum Exoticarum in Wallachia, Zealand, nascentium Synonyma, 8vo. 1610.

PELLETIER, Bertrand, a native of Bayonne, distinguished for his knowledge of chemistry and pharmacy. He settled at Paris as an apothecary, and deserved to be admitted member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the Institute. He wrote various dissertations in the memoirs of the French academies, and had a share in the Journal of Natural History, and wrote besides, Observations on Arsenic. He died 1797, aged 36.

PELLETIER, James, a French physician, born at Mans, became principal of the colleges of Bayeux and Mans at Paris, where he died 1582, aged 65. He published Latin Commentaries on Euclid—Description of Savoy—treatise on the Plague—Curious Dialogue on Orthography—Poetic works—a French Art of Poetry, and other works.

PELLICAN, Conrad, a native of Ruscac in Alsace, who became a cordelier in 1494, and afterwards presided over the convent of Basle. He embraced the tenets of Luther, and abandoning the religious habit, in 1526, came to Zurich, where he settled and taught Hebrew and married. He died 1556, aged 79. He was the friend of Erasmus, and published some controversial works, and commentaries illustrative of scripture, in 7 vols. folio, much commended by Richard Simon.

PELLISON-FONTANIER, Paul, a French writer, born of an ancient family at Beziers 1624. He studied the law, which he afterwards abandoned for belles lettres. He settled at Paris, where he became the friend and correspondent of madame Scuderi, and in 1662 was made secretary to the king, and admitted into the French academy, in consequence of his excellent "History" of that society. He was much patronised by Fouquet, superintendent of the finances; but upon the fall of that minister, he shared his disgrace, and was sent for four years to the Bastille. When set at liberty 1666, he was honored with the attention of the learned and the great, and his merits as well as his innocence soon restored him to the favor of Louis XIV. whom he accompanied in his expedition against the United States, of which he wrote an interesting account. In 1670 he renounced the protestant religion, and embraced the ecclesiastical life, and thus obtained preferment. He died at Versailles, 7th February 1693. His works are very respectable, consisting of the History of Louis XIV.—the Life of Anne of Austria.—History of the Conquest of Franche Comté—poems—Historical Letters—Reflections on Religious Differences—treatise on the Eucharist—Pleadings in favor of his friend Fouquet, &c.

PELLOUTIER, Simon, a protestant divine, descended from a Lyonesse family, but born at Leipsic. He was member of the Berlin academy, and distinguished himself also as an able writer. His History of the Celts, particularly of the Gauls and Germans, is a valuable work, edited in 2 vols. 4to. and 8 in 12mo. He died 1757, aged 63.

PELOPIDAS, a celebrated Theban, the friend of Epaminondas. Devoted to the interest of his fellow-citizens, Pelopidas, with the assistance of his friend, raised Thebes from a dependent state to glory and victory. He was at last slain in battle, B.C. 364.

PEMBERTON, Henry, an English physician of eminence. His treatise on Chemistry, and his View of sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy, in 4to. display his abilities as a man of science and erudition, in a very favorable view. He was fellow of the Royal society, and died in an advanced old age, 1771.

PEMBERTON, Ebenezer, D.D., an American clergyman, who graduated at Harvard college in 1721. He was ordained August 9th, 1727; and, from this time to 1753, or about that period, he was settled in the city of New York. In 1754, he was installed over the society of Boston, worshipping in the new brick church. He continued in this situation till his death, which took place September 9, 1777, being 72 years of age. He published a sermon before the Synod, 1731; a sermon before the commissioners of the Synod, 1735; a sermon on the death of Dr. Nicoll, 1743; one on the death of Whitefield, 1770; one at the ordination of Mr. Brainerd, 1744; one at the ordination of J. Story, 1771; an artillery election sermon, 1756; and an election sermon 1757. He also published sermons on several subjects, 8vo., 1738; practical discourses on various texts, 12mo., 1741; and salvation by grace through faith illustrated and confirmed, in eight sermons 8vo., 1774. Dr. Pemberton was the son of the Rev. Ebenezer Pemberton, for many years a minister of the Old South church in Boston.

PENDLETON, Edmund, an eminent American citizen, belonging to the state of Virginia. He held various public offices, the duties of which he performed with the utmost ability. He was twice appointed a member of congress; and for many years he was a judge of the court of appeals in that state. In 1787, he was chosen president of the convention of Virginia, which met to consider the constitution of the United States. When the federal government was organised, he was selected by Washington, to be district judge for Virginia, but declined the appointment. He lived to a good and venerable old age, dying at Richmond, October 26, 1823, aged 82.

PENNINGTON, Isaac, son of a lord mayor of London, was born 1617. He was well educated, and much given to religious meditation; and by the conversation and preaching of George Fox, he became a zealous and active quaker. Not only as a writer, but as a travelling minister, he spread the tenets which he had embraced, and at last drew the attention of the magistrates so severely upon his conduct, that he was imprisoned not less than six times in the reign of Charles II. After suffering much undeserved persecution, this man, who was of inoffensive manners, and of a meek and quiet spirit, died at Goodnestone court, Sussex, 1679. His publications were numerous, and all in favor of the quakers. They are mostly dated from Alesbury, where he chiefly lived, and were collected into one folio volume, 1681, and afterwards reprinted in 2 vols. 4to., and 4 in 8vo. The persecution exercised against the son arose, it is said by some, from the conduct of Isaac Pennington, the father, who was an alderman, violent against Charles I., and who headed some of the riots against the court. He sat also as one of the king's judges, and at the restoration, was tried and condemned, but respited, and kept a prisoner in the Tower, where he died.

PENN, William, a native of Bristol, distinguished in the British navy as an able admiral. He was commander of the fleet in the reduction of Jamaica in 1655 by Venables, but he lost for a time, the good opinion of the protector, who confined him in the Tower, for absenting himself from the American station without leave. He was member for Weymouth, and after the restoration he obtained a high command under the duke of York, and greatly contributed to the defeat of the Dutch fleet, 1664. He was knighted by Charles II., for his services, and died at his house, Wanstead, Essex, 1670, aged forty-nine.

PENN, William, the founder of Pennsylvania, son of the above, was born in London, 1644. From a private school at Chigwell, Essex, he entered in 1660, as a gentleman commoner at Christ-church, Oxford; but as he withdrew from the national forms of worship with other students, who like himself had listened to the preaching of Thomas Loe, a quaker of eminence, who was fined for non-conformity, and the next year, as he pertinaciously adhered to his opinions, he was expelled from the college. His father sent him to France, and on his return, he entered at Lincoln's inn, as a law student. In 1666, he was sent to manage an estate in Ireland, and during his residence there, he renewed his acquaintance with Loe, and showed such partiality to the quakers, that he was in those days of persecution, taken up at a meeting at Cork, and imprisoned by the mayor, who at last restored him to liberty at the request of lord Orrery. His return to England produced a violent altercation with his father, who wished him to abandon those singular habits so offensive to decorum and established forms, and when he refused to appear uncovered before him and before the king, he a second time dismissed him from his protection and favor. In 1668, he first appeared as a preacher and as an author among the quakers, and in consequence of some controversial dispute, he was sent to the Tower, where he remained in confinement for seven months. The passing of the conventicle act soon after again sent him to prison in Newgate, from which he was released by the interest of his father, who about this time was reconciled to him, and left him, on his decease some time after, a valuable estate of about £1500 per annum. In 1672, he married Gulielma Maria Springett, a lady of principles similar to his own, and then fixed his residence at Rickmansworth, where he employed himself zealously in promoting the cause of the Friends by his preaching, as well as by his writings. In 1677, he went with George Fox, and Robert Barclay, to the continent on a religious excursion; and after visiting Amsterdam, and the other chief towns of Holland, they proceeded to the court of princess Elizabeth, the granddaughter of James I., at Herwerden or Herford, where they were received with great kindness and hospitality. Soon after his return to England, Charles II. granted him, in consideration of the services of his father, and for a debt due to him from the crown, a province of North America, then called New Netherlands, but now making the state of Pennsylvania. In consequence of this acquisition he invited, under the Royal patent, settlers from all parts of the kingdom, and drew up, in twenty-four articles, the fundamental constitution of his new province, in which he held out a greater degree of religious liberty, than had at that time appeared in the christian world. A colony of people, chiefly of his persuasion, soon flocked to share his fortunes; the lands of the country were cleared and improved, and a town was built, which, on the principle of brotherly love, received the name of Philadelphia. In 1682, Penn visited the province, and confirmed that good understanding which he had recommended with the natives, and after two years' residence, and with the satisfaction of witnessing and promoting the prosperity of the colonists, he returned to England. Soon after Charles died, and the acquaintance which Penn had with the new monarch, was honorably used to protect the people of his persuasion. At the revolution, however, he was suspected of treasonable correspondence with the exiled prince, and therefore exposed to molestation and persecution. In 1694 he lost his wife, but though severely afflicted by the event, he in about two years married again, and afterwards employed himself in travelling in Ireland, and over England in disseminating as a preacher the doctrines of his sect. He visited in 1699, his province with his wife and family, and returned to England in 1701. The suspicion with which he had been regarded under William's government, ceased at the accession of queen Anne, and the unyielding advocate of quakerism was permitted to live with greater freedom, and to fear persecution less. In 1710, he removed to Rushcomb near Twyford, Berks, where he spent the rest of life. Three repeated attacks of an apoplexy at last came to weaken his faculties and his constitution, and after nearly losing all recollection of his former friends and associates, he expired 30th July, 1718, and was buried at Jordan, near Beaconsfield, Bucks. The character of Penn is truly amiable, benevolent, and humane; his labors were exerted for the good of mankind, and with the strictest consistency of moral conduct and religious opinion, he endured persecution and malice with resignation, and, guided by the approbation of a pure conscience, he showed himself indefatigable in the fulfilling of what he considered as the law of God, and the clear demonstration of the truth of the gospel. The long prosperity of Pennsylvania, and of his favorite city, Philadelphia, furnishes the best evidence of his wisdom as a legislator. He published various works to advance and support his religious opinions, which were widely disseminated among the friends of his persuasion. The best known of these are, No Cross, No Crown, to show that the denying of self and daily bearing the Cross of Christ is the only way to the kingdom of God—a Brief Account of the Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers—Primitive Christianity revived—Innocency with her Open Face, written in his vindication when confined in the Tower.

PENN, Thomas, son of William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, was born March 8, 1702, and succeeded to the share in the proprietary previously owned by his brother John, who died in 1746. He left the province and went to England in 1741, but had the principal direction of its affairs for half a century. He was a principal founder of the College at Philadelphia, and the hospital, the library, and other literary, charitable and, religious societies, shared his bounty. He died in London, March 21, 1775.

PENNANT, Thomas, LL.D., an able naturalist and antiquary, born at Downing, his family estate in Flintshire, 1726, and educated at Wrexham school, and Oxford. He early distinguished himself by his application to natural philosophy, and after examining with judicious attention whatever was curious and valuable in England, he travelled on the continent, and was introduced to the wits and learned men of Europe, especially Buffon, Voltaire, Linnæus, and others. Soon after his return to England, he commenced author, and from the year 1750, when his British Zoology appeared, to the time of his death, he was usefully employed in elucidating the history, geography, and natural curiosities of his country. This truly amiable and virtuous man, whose learning was equalled by his goodness of heart, died at Downing, 1793. His works are numerous and very respectable, the best known of which are, Tour in Scotland, 1771, often edited—Tours in Wales, from Chester to London—Account of London—Literary Memoirs of himself—a Geographical Account of India, of which only the first volume appeared before his death, and other publications.

PENNICUIK, Alexander, a Scotch physician, born at New Hall, Edinburghshire. His father, who was of a very respectable and ancient family, had been surgeon under general Bannier in the Swedish army, and the son, after travelling abroad settled in his native country, where he published a topographical account of Tweeddale, and some poems, descriptive of the manners of his countrymen. He died 1722, aged 70. It is said that he communicated to Allan Ramsay the incidents which he has clothed in such interesting beauty of language in his Gentle Shepherd.

PENNY, Thomas, an English naturalist of celebrity. He travelled over England and other various countries in search of botanical knowledge, and brought from Majorca, the curious plant called Hypericum Valeriaricum, which Cusius in honor of him, names Myrto Cistus Pennæi. He was very communicative of his information to his friends, especially to Lobel, Gerard, Gesner, and other botanists. He wrote letters on insects, inserted in Trew's collection. He was fellow of the college of physicians, London.

PENRUDDOCK, John, son of sir John of Wiltshire, was zealous in the cause of his sovereign during the civil wars, and obtained the rank of colonel in the royal army. He was defeated by colonel Croke, who, after he had solemnly promised him pardon, caused him to be beheaded in 1655. He was a man of great piety, and equally distinguished for the virtues of private life. The letters which passed between him and his wife after his condemnation, have been published by Steele, and display him in the most affecting language, in the amiable light of the good christian and the loyal subject.

PENRY, John, or APHENRY, a native of Brecknock, who studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, where he took his master's degree. In consequence of some offence he altered his religious principles, and became an anabaptist or Brownist, and not only preached, but wrote with great virulence against the episcopacy. His writings under the assumed name of Martin Mar-Pre-late, gave great offence to the ministry; and in consequence of their seditious tendency he was arrested, and condemned and executed in 1593. His publications were numerous and all on divinity subjects.

PEPIN, the Short, son of Charles Martel, was the first monarch of the second French dynasty, and was elected at Soissons 752. Though small of stature he commanded the respect of his people, by the valor and heroic firmness of his conduct. He listened to the complaints of the pope Stephen II. and marched to attack Astolphus king of the Lombards who besieged Rome, and after he had routed him, he turned his victorious arms against the dukes of Saxony, and of Aquitaine, whom he defeated and made tributary to his power. He died at St. Denys, 23d September, 768, aged 54.

PEPPERELL, Sir William, a native of the district of Maine, and bred a merchant. He early engaged in military life and rose to the highest honors. He was made a baronet of Great Britain, an honor never conferred on any other native of New England. He died 1759 aged 63.

PEPUSCH, John Christopher, an eminent musician, born at Berlin, 1667. His abilities were so early displayed, that at the age of fourteen he was employed at the Prussian court to teach music to the prince royal. In 1700, he went over to England, and was engaged at Drury-lane, and acquired some celebrity and more fortune as a teacher. In 1713, he was admitted doctor of Music at Oxford, and about 1725, he married Margarita de Pepine, an Italian singer, of light character, but who had by her engagements on the stage amassed a fortune of ten thousand guineas. This woman, whose figure and complexion entitled her to the appellation of Hecate, by which her husband distinguished her, brought him one son, who died before his parents. Pepusch died 20th July, 1752, aged 85.

PEPYS, Samuel, a learned Englishman, known as the indefatigable secretary of the admiralty under the reign of Charles II. and his brother. He introduced order, regularity, and method in his department, and devoted much of his time to the collecting of memoirs of the navy, and other valuable documents, which have been preserved, together with his library, at Magdalen college, Cambridge. To his great exertions, his patriotic conduct, and his judicious arrangements, the navy of Britain is much indebted for the superiority in naval affairs which it began to acquire after the fatal effects of the civil wars. This respectable man died 1703. He was related to the great earl of Sandwich, who fell gloriously while fighting against the Dutch fleet, and he was descended from an ancient family settled at Impington, Cambridgeshire.

PERCEVAL, Spencer, was born in 1762. He was educated at Harrow school, and next at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree in 1782, and the year following became a student of Lincoln's Inn. He commenced practice as a barrister in the King's Bench, from whence he removed to the court of Chancery. In 1796 he was made king's counsel, and about the same time, attracted the notice of Mr. Pitt, by a pamphlet, proving that an impeachment of the House of Commons does not abate by a dissolution of parliament. The same year he was returned for Northampton. In 1801 he was made solicitor-general, and the next year, attorney-general. On the change of administration in 1807, he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, in which situation he displayed great political talents, particularly in the settlement of the regency; but, unhappily, he fell soon afterwards, in the lobby of the House of Commons, by the hands of an assassin, named Bellingham, who was actuated by no other motive than that of a determination to murder a minister, May 11, 1812.

PERCIVAL, Thomas, an English physician, born and educated at Warrington, Lancashire. He studied medicine at Edinburgh and afterwards visited the continent and took his degrees at Leyden, 1765. He settled in 1767, at Manchester where he continued to practice with increasing reputation till his death in 1804. In private life Dr. Percival was a most amiable man, and to his zeal in the cause of philosophy, Manchester is chiefly indebted for the establishment of its literary society, to whose memoirs he made many valuable contributions. He published besides moral and literary dissertations—medical ethics, and a Father's Instructions to his Children. In his principles Dr. Percival was a dissenter, and it is remarkable that one of his sons, after receiving all the instruction which so able and so learned a father could communicate, became a convert to the principles of the church of England, and was made one of its most active ministers.

PERCY, William, the progenitor of the illustrious house of the Percys, was one of the courtiers of William the Conqueror, and attended him from Normandy on his invasion of England, and was rewarded for his services and attachment by the grant of lands in the counties of York and Lincoln. The Percys, distinguished by their zeal in the cause of their sovereigns, were raised in 1377, to the rank of earl of Northumberland by Richard II. The most celebrated of the Percys was Henry, surnamed Hotspur, who after being the firmest support of the throne of Henry IV. took up arms against him, and after various encounters was at last defeated at the battle of Shrewsbury in 1403. His father who had instigated him to hostilities made peace with the conqueror, but again abandoned his allegiance, and at last, three years after, fell in the field of battle, fighting against the forces of his sovereign in Yorkshire.

PERCY, Thomas, a learned prelate, and related to the family of Northumberland, was born at Bridgenorth, in Shropshire, in 1728. He was educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his master's degree, in 1753, and, on entering into orders, was presented to the vicarage of Easton Mauduit, in Northamptonshire, which he held with the rectory of Willbye, in the same county. In 1769 he was made chaplain in ordinary to the king, in 1778 promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, and in 1782 advanced to the bishopric of Dromore in Ireland, where he died in 1811. His works are—1. Han Kiou Chouan, a translation from the Chinese. 2. Chinese Miscellanies. 3. Five Pieces of Runic Poetry, translated from the Icelandic Language. 4. A new Translation of the Song of Solomon. 5. Reliques of Ancient English Poetry 3 vols. 6. A Key to the New Testament. 7. The Northumberland Household Book. 8. The Hermit of Warkworth, a poem, in the ballad style. 9. A translation of Wallet's Northern Antiquities.

PERCY, George, president of the colony of Virginia, was appointed by the council in the place of captain John Smith, when he returned to England in September, 1609. Lord Delawar succeeded him in June, 1610. He was also at the head of the administration from the departure of lord Delawar in March until the arrival of Sir Thomas Dale in May, 1611.

PERCY, Baron Peter Francis, a celebrated French military surgeon, was born in 1754, at Montagney; was head surgeon to several of the French armies; introduced many improvements into surgical practice; received from Napoleon the title of baron and commander of the legion of honor; and died in 1825. Among his works are, The Army Surgeon's Manual; and Practical Surgical Pyrotechny.

PEREIRA-GOMEZ, George, author of Nova Veraque Medicini, Experimentis & Rationibus Evidentibus Comprobata, fol. 1558—and a now scarce treatise, to prove the Brute Creation to be mere Machines, 1554, was a physician of eminence, born at Medina del Campo in Spain.

PEREFIXE, Hardouin de Beaumont de, a French historian and divine, was born, in 1605, at Paris; studied at Poitiers and his native city; and, after having acquired great popularity as a preacher, was appointed preceptor to Louis XIV. in 1644. In 1648 he was raised to the see of Rhodéz, and, in 1662, was made archbishop of Paris. He died, generally regretted, in 1670. His principal work is the Life of Henry IV., which is the best history of that monarch, and has been translated into every foreign language.

PEREIRA DE FIGUEIREDO, Anthony, a Portuguese divine, born at Macao, 14th February 1725, died at Lisbon 14th August, 1797. In the dispute between the courts of Rome and Lisbon, he published various tracts to prove the independence of kings in ecclesiastical affairs, and received the applause of his countrymen for his learning, and spirited conduct. He wrote also a New Method of Latin Grammar, edited ten times—a Portuguese Translation of the Bible, 23 vols. 8vo.—Tentativa Theologica, 1769—Elements of Ecclesiastical History in the form of dialogues, 2 vols. 8vo. 1765, left unfinished.

PEREZ, Anthony, a Spanish writer, nephew to the secretary of Charles V. When disgraced in Spain he retired to Paris, where he died 1611. He published "letters," which are well written and interesting. His works appeared at Paris 1598. There was also a Spanish lawyer of eminence of that name, who died at Louvain 1672, aged 89. Also another who was surgeon to Philip II. and wrote a treatise on the plague.

PERGOLES, John Baptist, an Italian musician, born at Casoria, and educated under Gætano Greco at Naples. He was afterwards patronised by prince Stigliano, and his operas, when introduced on the theatre, were attended with extraordinary success. His Olympiad appeared at Rome, but by some accident did not meet the applause which its merits deserved. He died at the early age of 33, 1737. In compliment to his abilities he is called by the Italians the Dominichino of music. His chief works are—Stabat Mater,—Dixit et Laudate,—Salve Regina, la Serva Padrona—Orfeo & Eurydice. Dr. Burney thinks very highly of his genius and of his compositions.

PERIANDE, Giles, a native of Brussels, 1540, who became professor of belles lettres at Mentz, and published Germania, in qua Doctiss. Virorum Elogia et Judicia continentur, 12mo. 1567—Nobilitatis Moguntiaë Diœcesis, Metropolitanæque Ecclesiæ, 8vo. 1568.

PERICLES, an illustrious Athenian orator, warrior, and statesman, was born between 490 and 500 B. C., and received the lessons of Zeno, Damon, and Anaxagoras. In opposition to Cimón, he espoused the popular cause, and he acquired a wonderful ascendancy over the minds of his countrymen. For forty years he was at the head of affairs at Athens, during which period he increased the military glory of the state, and embellished the capital with many magnificent edifices. He died B. C. 429.

PERIER, James Constantine, an able French mechanist, was born, in 1742, at Paris, and died August 17, 1818, a member of the Academy of Sciences. He and his brother, who was a partner with him, were the greatest manufacturers in France of machinery, particularly of steam engines, and at one period had no less than ninety-three establishments. He wrote an Essay on Steam Engines; and some Essays in the Transactions of the Academy.

PERIER, Casimir, formerly a banker, and member of the French chamber of deputies, in which he was one of the most distinguished liberal orators, was born at Grenoble, in 1777, and, after finishing his education at the college of the oratory in Lyons, entered the military service at an early age. He served with honor in the campaigns of Italy (1799 and 1800), but on the death of his father, a respectable merchant, he abandoned the profession of arms for mercantile business. In 1802, he established a banking house in company with his brother, in the management of which he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the most difficult and important questions of public credit and finance. Cotton manufactories, machine manufactories, and several other manufacturing establishments, were carried on by the brothers, and Casimir introduced improvements into the processes. In 1815 Casimir Perier published a pamphlet against the system of foreign loans, characterized by clearness and soundness of views, and in 1817 he was elected to represent the department of the Seine in the chamber of deputies. Here he was no less distinguished as the firm and eloquent advocate of constitutional principles, than as an enlightened and sagacious financier. In the revolution of 1830, he took a decided part in favor of the national liberties; was one of the deputation appointed to wait on marshal Marmont during the three days; a member of the municipal commission of the provisional government, July 28; but did not sign their declaration of the dethronement of Charles X. When Charles made his last effort to retain the throne, he ordered the duke of Mortemart to form a ministry, who made M. Perier minister of finance, and general Gerard that of war. August 5th, Perier was chosen president of the chambers, and on the 12th formed one of the first cabinet of the new king, without holding the portfolio of any department. In March, 1831, he succeeded Laffitte as president of the council, with the department of the interior; Louis being minister of finance, Sebastiani of foreign affairs, and De Rigny of the marine. The chief endeavor of M. Perier's ministry, so far, appeared to be to keep France at peace with Europe, and thereby to make commerce and manufactures flourish, to establish civil liberty and repress the military spirit; and, secondly to render the government more firm. The opposition reproach him with ignominiously courting the favor of the absolute monarch; with having deprived France of the honorable and elevated position due to her in the European system, with being unwilling to follow up, frankly, the principles of the "July revolution," and with having sacrificed Italy to Austria, and Poland to Russia.

PERIGNON, marquis Dominique Catheline de, peer and marshal of France, was born at Grenoble in 1754. He was deputed to the legislative assembly from the department of Upper Garonne in 1791, which station he quitted to join the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, and gradually rose to the chief command as successor to general Dugommier. He displayed his talents at the battles of Jonquiere, St. Sebastian, and La Madeleine, and at the capture of the forts of Figuières and of Roses. On the conclusion of peace with Spain he was nominated ambassador at Madrid, where he signed an offensive and defensive treaty of alliance between France and Spain in 1796. He subsequently distinguished himself in the army of Italy, and in 1805, he replaced Jourdan as commander of the French at Naples, several years previously to which he had been made a senator and a marshal. In 1814 the count d'Artois nominated him commissary extraordinary of the first military division. On the return of Buonaparte he attempted to organize a plan of resistance in the south of France, and not succeeding he retired to his estates. After the second restoration of Louis XVIII. he was appointed to the government of the first military division, and was made a peer of France. His death took place in 1819.

PERINGSKIOLL, John, a native of Stregni in Sudermania, who became professor of antiquities at Upsal, secretary to the king, and counsellor. He wrote an history of the Kings of the North, 8vo. 1720—of the Kings of Norway, 2 vols. fol. 1697. Historical and Chronological tables from Adam to Christ, 1713, folio, besides an edition of J. Messenius's treatises on the kings of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, 14 vols. folio, 1700. He died 24th March, 1720, aged 66.

PERIZONIUS, James, a learned German, born at Dam in Holland, 26th October, 1651. He studied at Deventer, and afterwards at Utrecht under the learned Grævius, and in 1674, he removed to Leyden. He was afterwards made rector of the Latin school at Delft, and then professor of eloquence and history at Francker. He went in 1693 to Leyden, to fill the chair of eloquence, history, and Greek, and died there 6th April, 1717. He was a man of extensive erudition, great application, and sound judgment. He published various works in Latin on history, classical literature, and antiquities, the chief of which are Animadversiones Historiæ, 8vo.—Dissertationes on various Points of Antiquity, &c.—Orations—Origines Bæbylonicæ et Ægyptiacæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—an edition of Ælian, 2 vols. 8vo.—Historical Commentaries—an edition of Q. Curtius—and notes on Sanctius' Minerva.

PERKINS, William, a native of Marston, Warwickshire, educated at Christ-college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was in his principles a strict Calvinist, and his writings when translated into Dutch, drew upon him the attack of Arminius, and other polemics, and this occasioned the calling of the Synod of Dordt for the settlement of theological disputes. His works are comprised in 3 vols. fol. He died 1602, aged forty-six.

PERNETY, James, a native of Forez, historiographer of Lyons, and member of the academy there. He was an able writer, and assumed the pompous title of Miles Ecclesiæ Lugdunensis. He wrote History of Cyrus, 3 vols. 12mo.—Counsels of Friendships—Letters on Physiognomy, 3 vols.—Abuses of Education, 12mo.—Picture of Lyons—Lyonese worthy to be recorded, 2 vols. 8vo. He died 1777, aged 81.

PERNETY, Anthony Joseph, a relation of the preceding, born at Roanne in Forez, 13th February, 1716. He became librarian to the king of Prussia, and after residing for several years at Berlin, he returned to France, and died in the bosom of his family. He wrote a Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving, 12mo.—Dissertation on America against Pauw, 2 vols. 8vo. and History of a Voyage to the Maldives, 8vo.

PÉRON, Francis, a French naturalist and voyager, was born in 1775, at Cerilly, in the department of the Allier; entered the army in 1792, and served till 1795, during which period he was made prisoner and lost an eye; studied medicine and natural history after his discharge; was appointed, in 1800, zoologist to the expedition which was sent to the Australian ocean; and died in 1810. He is the author of a Narrative of his Voyage, two volumes quarto; and of Observations on Anthropology.

PEROUSE, John Francis Galoup de la, an illustrious navigator, descended from a noble family at Toulouse, and born at Albi 1741. He early entered into the French navy, and distinguished himself by his services for seventeen years in the Indian seas, and in 1778, was employed in America, under d'Estaing. He was present at the taking of Grenada, and in 1782, he destroyed the English factories which were established in Hudson's bay. At the peace he was selected by Louis XVI. to command the Astrolabe and the Boussole, on a voyage of discovery, and the expedition was so popular that the monarch himself traced out the places which he wished the bold adventurer to examine. After following the track of Cook, visiting the North West coast of America, and advancing to Behring's straits, Perouse came down the eastern coast of Asia along Japan, and in February 1788, visited Botany bay in New Holland, where he was received with merited distinction by the English settlers. In March, 1788, he sent home an account of his progress. From that period, however, nothing more was heard of him, though vain attempts were made to ascertain his fate. Chance has, at length, recently brought to light that both his vessels were lost on different islands of the New Hebrides.

PERRAULT, Claude, an eminent author, born at Paris, 1613. He was bred up a physician, but he practised only in his own family, and for the poor, and abandoned the profession for the more pleasing pursuits of literature and the fine arts. In architecture he was particularly great, and the entrance into the Louvre, as Voltaire observes, is one of the most august monuments of architecture in the world. At the request of Colbert he translated Vitruvius, and adorned the work with plates. He also contributed some valuable papers to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was member. He was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with Boileau, against whom he maintained the superiority of the moderns against the ancients; but though the poet ridiculed the artist, and was consequently abused in his turn, they were afterwards happily reconciled. Perrault died 9th October, 1683, aged 75. He wrote besides, Abridgment of Vitruvius, 12mo.—Description of Machines of his own Invention—Memoirs for a Natural History of Animals, folio—on the Ancient Columns of Architecture and their Ornaments.

PERRAULT, Charles, brother of Claude, was born at Paris, 1626. His abilities early recommended him to Colbert, by whom he was made clerk of the buildings, and afterwards comptroller-general of the finances. This high situation enabled him to gratify the wishes of his heart. He patronised learned men, and encouraged the arts and the sciences, and to his honorable influence the establishment of the academies of painting, sculpture, and architecture, was owing. The death of Colbert, however, in 1683, produced his disgrace, and he retired from an ungrateful court, to a life of solitude and study. He wrote various works in verse and prose, and his poem called La Heinture, was received in 1668 with great applause. Le Siecle de Louis le Grand, which appeared in 1688, was a declaration of war against the opinions of learned men, and by elevating the moderns to a rank superior to the ancients in every species of composition, he brought on a controversy, in which he had to oppose the powerful abilities of Boileau, Menage, and other respectable writers. The opposition of Boileau was guided by interest as well as pride, and when the prince of Conti threatened to write on his seat in the academy, "tu dors, Brutus," thou sleepest, Brutus, the poet considered himself seriously called upon to combat Perrault, which he did most ably, in his work annexed to Critical Reflections on Longinus. These two great antagonists were reconciled in 1699, and Perrault, some time after published his Historical Eulogiuns on the Great Men of the 17th century, 2 vols. folio. Perrault died 1703, aged 77. He was a man of great respectability, since madam Dacier, who has censured him with severity as an author, describes him as a pious, sincere, virtuous, polite, and modest character, employing his influence not to serve himself, but his friends. He wrote besides Parallel of the Ancients and Moderns—the Cabinet of the Fine Arts, folio—Reflections on Longinus, 8vo.—poems and Tacrius's Fables.

PERRIER, Francis, a French painter, born at Magon, 1590. He was dissipated in his youth, and ran away from his parents, and then joined himself to a blind beggar, whom he accompanied to Rome, and with whom he shared the alms obtained on the road from the hands of charity. In the midst of his distress at Rome, he applied himself to his pencil, and soon was enabled to live independently. He then returned to France through Lyons, and after a second residence of ten years, in Italy, he came again to Paris, in high favor with the great. He painted the gallery of the Hotel de la Vrilliere, and died professor of the academy, 1650. He etched some of Raphael's works, and other pieces, and also engraved in the chiaro oscuro, some antiquities in an admired style, of which he was said by some to be the inventor. In his manner he chiefly imitated Lanfranc, and in his landscapes was little inferior to Caracci.

PERRON, James Davy du, a cardinal celebrated for his learning, and his political knowledge. He was born of noble parents, 25th November, 1556, and educated in the protestant faith; and he displayed so much attention to his studies, that he was early distinguished as a scholar, and in 1576, he was introduced by Desportes, abbot of Trion, to Henry III. at Blois, as a prodigy of great learning. As a theological disputant he acquired much celebrity at Paris; but he soon after abjured the tenets of the protestants, and labored with great assiduity, to convert others to the catholic faith. Henry IV. was in the number of those on whom his eloquence and subtility prevailed, and so highly valued were his services, that he was made by the grateful monarch, at first bishop of Evreux, and afterwards grand almoner of France, archbishop of Sens, and at last raised to the dignity of cardinal, 1604. His abilities as a negotiator were repeatedly employed by the king with the see of Rome; and with the most persuasive eloquence and inviolate integrity, he served his master without injuring the interests of the church. The last years of his life were devoted to retirement and the revision of his works. He died at Paris, 5th September, 1618, aged 63. Du Perron was universally acknowledged to be a man of deep erudition, well versed in profane and ecclesiastical history, artful and penetrating, capable of painting his plans as plausible and reasonable, and so powerful and argumentative in disputes, that the ablest scholars were afraid of him, and even Du Plessis Mornay, himself so celebrated, appeared against him in the presence of Henry with almost inferior abilities. He wrote a treatise on the Eucharist—another against king James I. of England—letters—dissertations—Acts of Conference with Du Plessis Mornay, all of which have been collected in 3 vols. folio, with an account of his life.

PERRON, Anquetil du, a learned Frenchman, member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, and of the national institute. He undertook a voyage to the East, and became acquainted with the original works of Zoroaster, and also the language of the ancient Persians; and after surmounting many difficulties he returned to Europe, loaded with the literary spoils of India, which were deposited in the king's library at Paris. An account of this journey, so interesting to science, was published in 1771, 3 vols. 4to. This learned man died at Paris, November 1805, aged 73. He published several historical works besides, and left some valuable MSS.

PERRONET, John Rodolphus, member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the learned societies of London, Stockholm, &c. rose by his merit to the respectable office of director-general of bridges and roads in France. He was a pupil of Beaufire, and for his services was rewarded with the order of St. Michael, and became inspector, and afterwards director of the school of engineers at Paris. The bridges of Neuilly, Nantes, and Orleans, were constructed under his direction, and the public roads of the kingdom, were improved by his judicious plans. This worthy man, as respectable in private life, as he was esteemed for his public services, died 1794, aged 86. He published a Description of the Bridges which he had erected, 2 vols. folio—Memoirs on the Method of constructing Grand Arches of Stone from 200 to 500 feet, over Valleys, 4to.

PERRÔT, Sir John, was born of a respectable family, about 1527. Educated for the services of the court in the house of the marquis of Winchester, he quickly became one of the favorites of Edward VI. and was made a knight of the Bath at his coronation. Under Mary he was disgraced, and with difficulty escaped with his life, for extending his protection to some suspected protestants; but in the next reign he was recalled to court, and sent in 1572, as president of Munster, to quell a dangerous rebellion in Ireland. He also distinguished himself as admiral of the fleet, against the meditated invasion of Ireland by the Spaniards; but when appointed lord lieutenant of that kingdom, in 1583, he rendered himself very unpopular by the severity of his measures. His enemies had in consequence sufficient influence to procure his recall, and in 1588 he returned to England, and was sent to the Tower, and four years after tried for high treason, and condemned. His services pleaded so strongly in his favor with Elizabeth, that she acknowledged his innocence, and respited him. He died the same year in his confinement.

PERROT, Nicolas sieur d'Ablancourt, a learned Frenchman, born at Chalons sur Marne, April 5th, 1506. He studied at Sedan and at Paris, and applied himself to the law, and was admitted advocate of the parliament. He soon after abandoned that profession, abjured the protestant faith, and devoted himself to literature. His preface to the "Honnete Femme," of du Bose procured him high reputation, and soon after he again was reconciled to the protestant tenets, and then visited Holland and England, till the clamor, excited by his religious inconsistency, had been hushed. In 1637, he was admitted into the French academy, and afterwards undertook a translation of Tacitus. He spent his last years in retirement, and died on his estate of Ablancourt, of the gravel, November 17th, 1664. He translated into French, Tacitus, Minutius Felix, Lucian, Cæsar, Arrian, Thucydides, and others. He wrote besides, a Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul,—and an History of Africa, 3 vols. 4to.

PERRY, James, an able whig political writer, was born, in 1756, at Aberdeen; was educated at the high school and university of his native place; settled in London, in 1777, and was engaged as a writer in the General Advertiser and London Evening Post. In 1782, he established The European Magazine, the management of which he quitted at the end of a year, to become editor of The Gazetteer. He afterwards purchased The Morning Chronicle, of which he continued to be the sole proprietor till his decease; and he raised it to eminence among the public journals. He died December 4, 1821.

PERRY, Oliver Hazard, a distinguished officer of the American navy, born at Newport, Rhode Island 1755. In 1793, he entered the service as midshipman, and soon after joined the squadron destined to the Mediterranean. He served during the Tripolitan war, and, though debarred, by his extreme youth, from an opportunity of distinguishing himself, he acquired, by his conduct, the regard and favor of his superior officers, and the friendship and esteem of his associates. In 1812, he was advanced to be master-commandant; and, in 1813, he was appointed to the command of the squadron on Lake Erie. When he found himself in a condition to cope with the British force, although the latter were still superior in men and guns, he sought the contest, and on the morning of the 10th of September that year, he achieved the victory which has given his name a permanent place in the history of his country. The merit of Perry is greatly enhanced by the reflection, that, whilst no victory was ever more decidedly the result of the skill and valor of the commander, this was the first action of any kind he had ever seen. In testimony of his merit, Perry was promoted to the rank of captain, received the thanks of congress, and a medal; and the like marks of honor from the senate of Pennsylvania. He was afterwards appointed to command the Java frigate, built at Baltimore, and on the conclusion of peace with England, sailed, in 1815, in the squadron under commodore Decatur, despatched to the Mediterranean. In 1819, he sailed from the Chesapeake in the ship John Adams, for the West Indies; and, in August of the following year, he was attacked with the yellow fever, which in a few days closed his bright career of honor, at the age of 35.

PERSIUS FLACCUS, Aulus, a Roman satirist, was born, A. D. 34, at Volterra, in Etruria; studied at Rome, and imbibed the Stoic philosophy from Cornutus; was intimate with Lucan, Seneca, and other eminent men; and died in his 28th year. His six Satires, animated and often beautiful, but also often obscure, have been translated into English by Dryden, Brewster, Drummond, Howes, and Gifford.

PERTICARI (count Julio) an Italian philosopher and man of letters, born at Savignano, in 1779. He deserved the approbation of all true patriots by endeavoring in his writings, to excite his degenerate fellow-citizens to imitate the stern virtues of their ancestors, persuaded as he was that the inculcation of virtue was one of the first duties of a public writer. He was the author of some fragments published in the Propositions of Signor Monti for Corrections and Additions to the Dictionary of Della Crusca; and he was one of the principal contributors to the Giornale Arcadico of Rome. He died at Rome in 1822.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor of obscure origin. From an instructor of youth he became a soldier, and on the death of Commodus, 193, he was raised to the imperial purple. His virtues promised a happy reign for Rome, but the state was too deeply sunk into vice and debauchery, to suffer the rule of a magnanimous prince. He was assassinated by his soldiers a few months after his elevation.

PESCE, Nicholas, a famous Sicilian diver, who, according to Kircher, was, from his amazing skill in swimming, and his perseverance under water, surnamed the fish. This man had from his infancy been used to the sea; and earned his scanty subsistence by diving for corals and oysters, which he sold to villagers on shore. His long acquaintance with the water, at last brought it to be almost his natural element. Kircher says, he was frequently known to spend five days in the midst of the waves, without any other provision than the fish which he caught there and ate raw. He often swam over from Sicily into Calabria, a tempestuous and dangerous passage, carrying letters from the king. He was frequently known to swim among the gulfs of the Lipari Islands, no way apprehensive of danger. Some mariners out at sea one day observed something at some distance from them, which they regarded as a sea-monster; but, upon its approach, it was known to be Nicholas, whom they took into their ship. When they asked him whither he was going in so stormy and rough a sea, and at such a distance from land, he showed them a packet of letters, which he was carrying to one of the towns of Italy. He kept them thus company for some time in their voyage, conversing, and asking questions; and, after eating a hearty meal with them, took his leave, and, jumping into the sea, pursued his voyage alone. In order to aid these powers of enduring in the deep, nature seemed to have assisted him in a very extraordinary manner; for his fingers and toes were webbed, and his chest became very capacious. The account of so extraordinary a person did not fail to reach the king himself; who commanded Nicholas to be brought before him. The curiosity of this monarch had long been excited by the accounts he had heard of the bottom of the Gulf of Charybdis, which he now therefore commanded our poor diver to examine; and as an incitement to his obedience, ordered a golden cup to be flung into it. Nicholas was not insensible of the danger to which he was exposed, and he presumed to remonstrate; but the hope of the reward, the desire of pleasing the king, and the pleasure of showing his skill, at last prevailed. He instantly jumped into the gulf, and continued for three-quarters of an hour below; during which time the king and his attendants became very anxious for his fate; but he at last appeared, holding the cup in triumph in one hand, and making his way good among the waves with the other. Having refreshed himself by sleeping, there were four things he said, which rendered the gulf dreadful, not only to men, but to fish. 1. The force of the water bursting up from the bottom, which required great strength to resist. 2. The abruptness of the rocks that on every side threatened destruction. 3. The force of the whirlpool dashing against the rocks. And, 4. The number and magnitude of the polyptous fish, some of which appeared as large as a man; and which, everywhere sticking against the rocks, projected their fibrous arms. Being asked how he was able so readily to find the cup that had been thrown in, he replied that it happened to be flung by the waves into the cavity of a rock against which he himself was urged in his descent. This account, however, did not satisfy the king's curiosity. Being requested to venture once more into the gulf for further discoveries, he at first refused; but the king repeated his solicitations, and, to give them the greater weight, produced a larger cup than the former, and added also a purse of gold. With these inducements, says Kircher, the unfortunate diver once again plunged into the whirlpool, and was never heard of more.

PESCENNIUS NIGER, Caius, a Roman emperor, a native of Aquino, of a considerable family, was appointed governor of Syria, and commander of the legions in Asia, by Commodus. On the death of Pertinax, the troops of Pescennius proclaimed him emperor, in 193, but he was opposed by Severus. After having been defeated at Issus, in 195, he was killed by some soldiers, while he was on his flight to the Parthian dominions. His virtues rendered him worthy of a happier fate.

PESSELER, Charles Stephen, member of the academies of Nancy, of Amiens, Rouen, and Angers, was born at Paris, 9th July, 1712. His parents wished to educate him for the law, but such was his partiality for literature and poetry, that his leisure hours were assiduously devoted to the muses. He was united with Lallemand in the management of the finances of the kingdom, and the plans he proposed were applauded by the French ministry. His extreme application to financial affairs proved too powerful for his delicate constitution, and he fell a victim to excessive mental fatigue 24th April, 1763. He wrote "Ecole du Temps," a comedy—Esopé au Parnasse, a comedy—la Mascarade du Parnasse, a comedy in one act.—Letters on education, 2 vols. 12mo.—General Idea of the Finances, folio. 1759—Doubts addressed to the Author of Theory, of Taxation, 12mo.—Fables after la Fontaine's manner.

PESTALOZZI, or PESTALUZ, Henry, celebrated for having introduced a new method of education, was born, in 1745, at Zurich, in Switzerland. After having studied theology and jurisprudence, he relinquished his views with respect to the church and the bar, to cultivate his own small property. Witnessing the wretchedness of the peasantry he became anxious to ameliorate their situation by cultivating their mental faculties. In the pursuit of his benevolent purpose he published several works, and considerably injured his fortune. It was not till 1793, however, that his plans were patronised by the Helvetic government. Under that patronage he for several years conducted an institution, which acquired extensive celebrity. He died February 27th, 1827.

PETAVIUS, Dionysius, or DENIS PETAU, a French jesuit born at Orleans 21st August, 1583. His abilities were early observed and encouraged by his father, and after acquiring the most perfect knowledge of belles lettres, the classics, mathematics and philosophy, he was at the age of 19 made professor of philosophy at Bourges. He was admitted among the jesuits in 1605, and his great and extensive erudition was employed in the defence of the catholic religion against the protestants, and his criticisms were particularly directed against Scaliger, and even against his friend Casaubon. He died after a laborious life spent in the service of science and literature, 11th December 1652, at Paris, in the college of Clermont. He was according to Gassendus the most consummate scholar the jesuits ever had, and so high was his reputation that Urban VIII. and Philip IV. of Spain invited him with the most liberal promises to settle in their respective territories, which his attachment to his native country, and the precarious state of his health obliged him to decline. As a chronologist he was particularly eminent, and his Latin is universally acknowledged as elegant and refined. He wrote de Doctrina Temporum, 2 vols. fol.—Uranologia, 3 vols.—Rationarium Temporum, fol. and Leyden, 2 vols. 8vo. a valuable work abridged by Le Clerc—Dogmata Theologica, 5 vols. fol.—the Psalms translated into Greek verse, 12mo.—de Ecclesia Hierachia, folio, besides controversial pamphlets, and some valuable editions of some of the fathers.

PETHION DE VILLENEUVE, Jerome, a native of Chartres, who quitted the profession of the law to become a member of the constituent assembly. His conduct as a legislator was violent and factious, and as he possessed some powers as a speaker, he contributed much in extinguishing the splendor which surrounded the monarch. His popularity raised him to the dangerous office of mayor of Paris, and on the 20th of June he proved to the people how little he respected the unhappy Louis. His hatred against the king hastened the horrors of the 10th of August, and of the first days of September; but when he, as first magistrate of the city, might have checked or arrested the thirty assassins who murdered in cold blood the most innocent victims, he affected to permit the people to punish their enemies. The abolition of royalty and the fall of Louis completed the gratification of his guilty ambition, but while he aspired to the difficult office of guiding the destinies of a tumultuous republic, he found a powerful rival in Robespierre, and in the struggle was defeated by his antagonist. Outlawed by his victorious opponents, 31st May, 1793, he fled from the capital in disguise, and was some time after found lifeless in a cornfield near St. Emilion in the Gironde, a victim to hunger and misery, and with his corpse disfigured and partly devoured by birds of prey. His friends and supporters have represented him as a man of obliging manners, and of strict undeviating integrity; but posterity must view him as an ambitious hypocrite, whose sole aim was to gain popularity, and to ascend to the sovereignty on the ruins of the throne. His works, containing some Political Tracts, and speeches, have appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. 1792.

PETER, St. a bishop of Alexandria, 300, who suffered martyrdom 311. He was a learned prelate, and formed the penitential canons, and made some wholesome regulations for the suppression of vice in his diocese. Some of his letters are extant in Theodoret.

PETER III., king of Arragon, succeeded to his father James I., 1276. He laid claim to the dominions of Navarre, but was unable to establish his pretensions by force of arms. As he had married Constance, daughter of Mainfroy, king of Sicily, he formed the plan of seizing the kingdom against the claims of Charles of Anjou, and, to support the success of his designs, he determined to assassinate at one blow all the French in the island. This horrid massacre, which was perpetrated on Easter day, 1282, and which was therefore called Sicilian Vespers, made him easily master of the kingdom; but the indignation of the people rendered his possession precarious. Martin IV. excommunicated him, together with all the Sicilians, and also placed his Spanish dominions under the same interdict. Peter attempted to ward off the public odium by challenging his rival of Anjou; but though the day was appointed, he had not the courage to appear against him in the field. He died at Villefranche, 28th November, 1285.

PETER, the Cruel, king of Castille, succeeded at the age of 16 his father Alphonso XI. 1350. He was wanton and tyrannical, and three days after he had married Blanche, daughter of the duke of Bourbon, he repudiated her with every mark of disgrace, to renew his infamous connection with Maria de Pradilla his mistress. Another queen was treated with equal indignity, and Peter at last so irritated his subjects by his inhumanity that they rose up against him, 1366, headed by his natural brother Henry, count of Transtamarc. Though for awhile he withstood his enemies, by the assistance of the English, he soon found the general odium too great to be conquered, and in a battle which was fought 14th March, 1369, he was defeated and killed by his brother, who ascended the throne.

PETER ALEXIOWITZ I., surnamed the Great, son of Alexis Michaelowitz, Czar of Muscovy, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Theodore, to the exclusion of his elder brother Iwan, whose health and intellects were too feeble to support the cares and fatigues of government. This gave offence to the princess Sophia, his half sister, who roused into rebellion the Strelitzes, a formidable body of militia, nearly resembling the Janissaries of the Ottoman Porte; but Peter was too wise to foment a civil war, and he consented to share the throne with his brother Iwan. Without education, yet endowed with the strongest powers of nature, Peter felt that much was still to be acquired before he could realize the vast projects which he had formed in his mind. To counteract the formidable power of the Strelitzes, who were not only devoted to the interest of the intriguing Sophia, but more inclined to dispute than to obey the commands of their superior, he determined to become the favorite of the army, and enlisting as a private soldier in the company which were dressed and disciplined in the German manner, he gradually rose to command by his services, and by sharing the toils and the privations of the military life. The sight of some Dutch and English ships roused his attention to naval affairs, and while he meditated the aggrandizement of Russia, he never abandoned his favorite scheme of erecting a navy. By the death of his brother, in 1696, he became sole emperor, and then increased his dominions by the conquest of Azoph from the Turks. Still, however, feeling his inferiority as a naval power, he sent in 1698, an embassy to Holland, and went in a disguised character in the ambassador's suite; and that he might personally be acquainted with the process of ship building, he enrolled himself at Amsterdam among the ship carpenters, and worked with unusual assiduity, under the name of master Peter. The next year he passed over to England, where in four months he acquired the complete knowledge of ship building, and after receiving every mark of respect from William III., he left the country, accompanied by several English ship builders, and artificers, whom he employed with great liberality and kindness in his naval yards. From England, he went to Vienna; but the intelligence that Sophia had again intrigued with the Strelitzes, and roused them to rebellion, hastened his return to Moscow. The ringleaders were punished with severity; but the princess, who was the most guilty, was only confined with greater severity in the solitude of a monastery. Improved by the view of foreign countries, the forms of their government, and the knowledge of their commercial resources, Peter now displayed to the world the enlightened plans of his capacious mind. He not only sent his nobles to foreign countries, to improve and adorn their minds, but he liberally invited the wisest and the most learned among distant nations, to come and seek an honorable residence in Russia, and to instruct his uncivilized subjects in the various arts which humanize and sweeten life. The hitherto barbarous coasts of Russia were therefore visited by sailors, artists, mechanics, mathematicians, and adventurers of every degree and profession, and though his subjects viewed these new settlers with jealousy, the policy of Peter soon mingled and united them by the strong ties of mutual dependence and social union. In 1700, he declared war against Charles XII., of Sweden, and though frequently defeated by the superior tactics and heroic valor of his enemy, he nevertheless persevered with undaunted courage, observing, "though I know I must be overcome for a great while, my armies will at last be taught to conquer." In the midst of his disasters in Poland, he formed the vast project of erecting a new metropolis on the Baltic sea, for his immense territories; and after he had added to his dominions the best part of Livonia and Ingria, he in 1703 laid the foundations of Petersburg, which he destined for the northern capital of his empire. Though often defeated, at last the battle of Pultowa, in 1709, came to crown his earnest wishes, and he saw the long victorious Swedes conquered, and their heroic leader, Charles, obliged to fly for safety into the Turkish dominions. Peter used this great victory like a wise man; the Swedish prisoners were induced, by liberal offers, to settle among their conquerors, and not less than three thousand officers were prevailed upon, by the kind treatment of the Czar, to fix their residence and spread civilization, improvement, and the arts of polished life, in various parts of his extensive empire. In consequence of the victory of Pultowa, Peter was enabled to secure the possession of Livonia and Ingria, to which he afterwards added part of Pomerania and Finland; but the intrigues of Charles XII. at the Turkish court, at last prevailed upon the Ottomans to break the truce, and in 1712, Peter was suddenly surrounded on the banks of the Pruth, and his army devoted to destruction. While he considered everything lost, his wife, Catherine, had recourse to stratagem, and by offering a large bribe to the grand vizier, she saved her husband's honor, and his army, and in consequence of this meritorious action, the grateful Czar established the order of St. Catherine, into which only women are admitted. The defeat of the Swedish fleet near Holstein in 1714, and the subsequent treaty of peace with Charles XII., now enabled Peter to visit again foreign countries in pursuit of improvement and better knowledge. In 1716 he was in Denmark, and after visiting the schools, public places, and curiosities, he passed to Hamburg, Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, and Holland, and the next year proceeded to Paris. In the capital of France, he was received with great ceremony, and admitted member of the Academy of Sciences. Returned to Russia, Peter labored earnestly to reform and improve the character of his country. After breaking gradually to pieces the dangerous establishment of the Strelitzes, he established a regular body of one hundred thousand troops; he built a navy of forty ships of the line; he established colleges and schools of medicine, botany, and belles lettres, in the chief cities of his dominions, and by purchasing pictures of value and celebrity from Italy, he introduced a taste for painting and the fine arts among his subjects; and to supply resources for their gradual improvement, he made the largest possible collections of books and manuscripts in various languages, which were wisely distributed where they could prove most useful. In other respects he was equally attentive to the happiness and morality of his people. The laws were rendered more simple and less arbitrary, and the decisions of all law-suits, were to be announced before the expiration of eleven days; and in short, every measure which could tend to meliorate the situation of the people, to increase their knowledge, to enlarge their understanding, and to contribute to their comfort, was, with the wisest and most liberal policy, adopted and enforced. This truly great prince died 28th January, 1725, in his 53d year. Peter had a son Alexis, who lived to the age of manhood; but he unfortunately engaged in a conspiracy in 1717, against his father, and was condemned to die; and though the sentence was suspended, he died some short time after, not without suspicion of being cut off privately, by the resentment of the Czar, as several of his accomplices suffered the severest punishment of the law. At his death, Peter appointed for his successor his widow the Czarina, Catherine, whom, from a soldier's wife he had raised, in consequence of her great merits and heroic character, to share his bed and his throne. Peter is one of the few sovereigns who have been authors. He wrote several pieces on naval affairs; and as he was member of the Paris academy, he sent to that learned body a chart of the Caspian, which had been taken by his directions, and he always received with pleasure, the volumes of their memoirs, which were regularly transmitted to him.

PETER II., emperor of Russia, son of Alexis Petrowitz, was declared grand duke of Russia, 1726, and the next year succeeded the empress Catherine, at the age of thirteen. The prominent feature of his reign is the banishment into Siberia, of the great favorite and minister, Menzikoff. The Emperor died of the small-pox, 1738, aged 15.

PETER III., Emperor of Russia, son of Anne Petrowna, the eldest daughter of Peter the Great, and Charles Frederic, duke of Holstein-Gottorp, was born 1728, and declared grand duke of Russia 1742, by his aunt, the empress Elizabeth, after whom he ascended the throne, 25th December, 1761. The beginning of his reign was auspicious; he disregarded the measures of severity which his predecessor had practised, and sought for popularity in the mildness and justice of his government.

He was a strong admirer of the character of the heroic king of Prussia, but unfortunately wanted the vigor and decision which marked that great man. His attempts therefore to reform his people proved abortive, and rendered him contemptible; so that his wife Catherine took advantage of his timidity, and dethroned him, 6th July, 1762, and assumed the reigns of government under the name of Catherine II. Peter died seven days after his degradation; but though his death was attributed by some to an hemorrhoidal flux, it is too evident that violence terminated his existence. Little respect has been shown to his memory, and probably because he meditated the subversion of the religion of his country, and the introduction of the simpler worship of the protestants, in the stead of the more eceremonious and corrupted forms of the Greek church.

PETER NOLASQUE, a native of Languedoc, in the service of James, king of Arragon, under whose patronage he established, in 1223, the order of Mercy, whose sole business was the redeeming of Christian slaves from the power of the infidels. This worthy ecclesiastic, who so successfully and honorably contributed to soften the horrors of warfare and of captivity, died 1256, aged 67.

PETER of Cluni, or the Venerable, was born in Auvergne, of a noble family, and embracing the ecclesiastical state, was made in 1121, general of the order of Cluni. He received with becoming magnificence at his abbey, pope Innocent II., in 1130, and he afterwards granted a kind and friendly asylum to the unfortunate Abelard. He died 24th December, 1156, aged 65. He was a man of great learning, and exemplary piety. He wrote among other things, Treatises on the Divinity of Christ—against the Jews—on Infant Baptism—the Authority of the Church—and the Sacrifice of Mass.

PETER, an ecclesiastic of Blois, who studied at Paris and Bologna, and was preceptor and then secretary to William II. king of Sicily. He was afterwards invited by Henry II. to England where he obtained the archdeaconry of Bath, and afterwards, that of London. He was a strict disciplinarian in the church, and a man of great piety. He died in England, 1200. Of his writings, one hundred eighty-three letters, and sixty-five sermons have been preserved, best edited by Goussainville, in folio, 1667.

PETER the Hermit, a gentleman of Amiens in Picardy, who quitted the military profession to become a hermit and pilgrim. He was actuated by the sentiments which pervaded the Christian world at the close of the 11th century; and under the expectation of the immediate dissolution of the world, he, with many other deluded men, hastened to the Holy land in 1093, that there he might terminate his days in a spot which had given birth to the Saviour of the world. On his return he spoke in so affecting a manner of the cruel treatment which the Christian pilgrims experienced in Palestine, that pope Urban II. sent him over Europe to preach a general crusade to deliver the Holy Land from the oppression of the infidels. The eloquence of Peter, and the spirit of the times prevailed; a numerous concourse of people flocked together for the pious labor, and the holy hermit began his march at the head of above forty thousand men, all animated with the zeal of devotion, and the hopes of celestial protection. In crossing Hungary this religious army committed the most horrid excesses, and so provoked the inhabitants to revenge, that in skirmishes with them and with the Turks, many lost their lives, and only three thousand reached the gates of Constantinople. In adwarding through Asia, the siege of Antioch delayed their progress, and Peter would have abandoned the hopeless enterprise had he not been bound by an oath by Tancred to share the dangers of the crusade. At the conquest of the Holy Land, and in the siege of Jerusalem 1099, Peter behaved with great valor, and for his services was appointed vicar-general of Palestine. He afterwards returned to Europe, and died at the abbey of New-Montier, of which he was the founder.

PETER, the wild boy, a youth found in a savage state in the woods near Hamelen in Hanover, 1726, where he had lived for some time on berries and roots. He was about twelve years old, but it is unknown how long he had been in that wild state; though from the remains of a shirt collar found about his neck, it is probable he had not been many years exposed. He came to England in 1727, by the direction of queen Caroline, and was placed at a farm-house at North Church, Herts; but neither care nor imitation could ever make him articulate words, and he died in 1735, a melancholy spectacle of savage idiotism, and uncivilized nature. He was in his conduct very tractable. The government very handsomely allowed a pension of £35 a year for his support.

PETER D'OSMA, an ecclesiastic of the 15th century, at Salamanca, who may be said to be the forerunner of the reformation, as he preached and wrote against the doctrines and the infallibility of the church of Rome. The archbishop of Toledo ordered his writings to be burnt, and the pope confirmed the sentence in 1479.

PETERS, Hugh, a native of Cornwall, England, born in 1599. In August, 1635, he arrived in America with Richard Mather; and, in the following year took charge of the church in Salem, Massachusetts, as successor to the celebrated Roger Williams. Such was his success as a preacher, that during the five years of his ministry in this place, one hundred and sixty persons annexed themselves to his communion. He was, nevertheless, at the same time, occupied in mercantile pursuits. He also engaged in political matters, and was one of the most distinguished citizens of that period in the country. In 1641, he sailed for England, with a view to procure some alteration in the laws of excise and trade; but did not again return to America. During the civil wars in England he supported the cause of the parliament, and contributed much aid to it by his preaching. He was accused of great violence, in urging the king's condemnation; but he affirmed that he was opposed to it. Be that as it may, Cromwell appointed him to several public trusts, and, after the restoration, he was tried for conspiring with Cromwell, and compassing the king's death. The trial terminated in his condemnation; and he was executed October 16, 1660, aged sixty-one years. His eloquence was of a peculiar and striking kind, and was calculated to gain the attention of the lower classes of people. He had thousands of hearers in London. He published sermons, and other occasional productions.

PETERS, Samuel A. LL.D., an American clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal church, born in Hebron, Connecticut, 1735, and graduated at Yale college in 1757. In the year 1762, he took charge of the parishes at Hartford and Hebron; but, not taking part in the revolution, in 1774, he went to England, where he remained till 1805, when he returned to America. Dr. Peters died at New York, April 19, 1826, aged ninety years. He published a history of the state of Connecticut.

PETERS, Richard, an eminent American judge and agriculturalist, was born near Philadelphia,

August 22, 1744. He received his education in Philadelphia, at the college of which city he was graduated. In entering into active life, he was a good Latin and Greek scholar, and acquainted with the French and German languages. He adopted the profession of the law, in which he obtained early and considerable success, particularly by means of his intimate knowledge of the land laws of the commonwealth, and the fluency with which he spoke German. Even in his youth, he was distinguished for wit and humor. His powers of pleasantry were felt even by the Indians, when he accompanied a delegation from Pennsylvania to the Six Nations. The Indian chiefs, delighted with his vivacity, formally adopted him into their tribes. At the opening of the American revolution, Mr. Peters became captain of a company of volunteers, but was soon transferred by congress to the board of war, in which he continued until the year 1781, when he resigned his post, and received from congress a vote of thanks for his services. He was closely connected with Robert Morris in all the exertions and sacrifices which were made for supplying the necessities of the American army. No one possessed more curious and instructive anecdotes of the distresses and trials of the American government. Some of these are well related in the sketch of his life by Samuel Breck, Esq. After Mr. Peters quitted the war office, he was elected a member of congress. When the new government was organized, under the present constitution, president Washington offered him the place of comptroller of the treasury of the United States. This he declined, but accepted that of judge of the district court of Pennsylvania. He occupied this station for thirty-six years, until his death, always assiduous, and highly useful, particularly in admiralty cases. Agriculture and public works formed the chief objects of judge Peters, besides his duties on the bench. He was the first president of the company at whose expense the great bridge at Philadelphia, over the Schuylkill, was built. To him its preservation may be ascribed. The country is indebted to him, also, for the use of gypsum in agriculture. In 1797, he published a relation of his experiments with it on his own farm, which was widely circulated, and produced important improvements in American husbandry. He was president of the Philadelphia agricultural society, and enriched its memoirs with many valuable communications. In private life, he was preeminent for convivial humor, and equalled, probably, any one of his contemporaries in the number and felicity of his bon mots. He was an exemplary husband, parent, neighbor, citizen, and Christian.

PETERS, Hugh, an English jesuit, known in history as the friend and confessor of James II. His advice contributed much to the rash measures which rendered the monarch so unpopular, and which at last hastened his ruin.

PETION, Alexander Sabes, the late president of the black republic of Hayti, was born at Port-au-Prince, April 2d, 1770. Being the son of a colonist who possessed considerable property, he received a liberal education; and he was scarcely twenty years old, when the revolutionary commotions broke out in the island. He was one of the first who took arms; was made an officer of artillery; and obtained the rank of adjutant-general during the civil wars. After the English had left the island, Petion joined Rigaud, a man of color like himself, in opposing the projects of Toussaint L'Ouverture. Rigaud, being unsuccessful, embarked for France with Petion. They both returned to Hayti, however, with general Leclerc, under whom Petion held a colonel's commission. The violent measures adopted by Leclerc and Rochambeau induced Petion to quit the French service; and, forming a union with the negro general Dessalines, assisted by the English, they succeeded in establishing the independence of Hayti in 1804. Petion obtained the government of the western district, while Dessalines, becoming chief of the republic, assumed the title of emperor; until, his conduct having given offence, he was assassinated in 1806. Christophe, his lieutenant, was elected president of Hayti by the senate, but he chose rather to take the title of king, and, behaving in a tyrannical manner, he was obliged to submit to a partition of his dominions. All the southern and western part of the island acknowledged the authority of the senate, by whom Petion was elected president, January 27th, 1807. A civil war now took place between the rivals, but Petion retained his office till his death in 1813, when he was succeeded by his lieutenant, general Boyer.

PETIS DE LA CROIX, Francis, interpreter of oriental languages to the French king, visited Turkey and Persia to perfect himself in the languages of those countries. He wrote the History of Gengis Khan, and other works on oriental history. He died at Paris, 1713.

PETIT, John Lewis, a celebrated surgeon, born at Paris, 1674. Under the kind directions of Littere, the anatomist, and Castel and Mareschal, the surgeons, he made such progress in anatomical and surgical knowledge, that he acquired a respectable practice in 1700. In 1726 he was invited to Poland, to cure the king, and he was equally successful in his attendance, in 1734, on Ferdinand, afterwards king of Spain. Though solicited to settle abroad on the most liberal terms, he preferred his native country, where he was noticed, and where he was honored with a seat in the academy of sciences, and with the rank of rector of the royal school of surgery. He died at Paris 20th April, 1750, aged 77. He invented some valuable surgical instruments, and wrote also, Surgery, published in three vols. 8vo. by Lesne, 1774—treatise on the Diseases of the Bones, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dissertations in the memoirs of the academy—besides Consultations on Venereal Complaints.

PETIT, Anthony, an eminent physician of Orleans. He wrote Chirurgical Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo.—Discourse on Surgery—Report in favor of Inoculation—Medical Consultations, and Project of a Reformation in Medicine. He was a member of the academy of sciences, and after practising with great celebrity at Paris, he retired to Olivet, near Orleans, where he died 21st October, 1794, aged 72.

PETIT, Samuel, an eminent scholar, born at Nismes, and educated at Geneva, where he became professor of theology, of Greek and Hebrew. He was a man of extensive learning, and very amiable manners, and died at Geneva, December 1645, aged 51. He wrote Miscellanea—Elogæ Chronologicæ, 4to.—Varie Lectiones—Leges Atticæ, fol. a valuable work.

PETIT, Peter, a French mathematician, born at Montlucon in the diocese of Bourges, 1598. He came to Paris, 1633, and was employed as engineer by Richelieu, and visited the sea ports to examine their state, and suggest improvements. These public employments did not prevent him from applying to philosophical experiments; he was the friend of Pascal, of Mersennus, and of Descartes, whose opinions he at first opposed, but afterwards warmly adopted. He died 1677. He was author of treatises on the Compass of Proportion—on the Construction and Use of the Calibre of Artillery—on Sight—on Eclipses—on preventing the Inundations of the Seine, and on Comets.

PETIT, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 1617. He studied medicine, and took his degrees at Montpellier; but he neglected the profession when he came to Paris, and was tutor to Lamignon's sons, and other great men. He was an excellent scholar, and wrote with great facility. He died 1687. His works are various. He wrote a treatise on the Motion of Animals—Homeri Neptthes, 8vo.—a Latin treatise on the Amazons, 8vo. and in French, 2 vols. 8vo.—Miscellaneous observations—a treatise on the Sibil—de Novâ curandorum Morborum Ratione per Transfusionem Sanguinis—de Naturâ & Moribus Anthropophagorum, 8vo. besides some poems, one of which, Codrus, in Latin, is mentioned with great applause.

PETIT, Radel, Louis Francis, a French architect, inspector-general of civil edifices, born at Paris in 1740. After having obtained several prizes from the Academy of Architecture, he travelled to Italy, and on his return home he delivered lectures on architecture. He consecrated a great part of his large fortune to the formation of a cabinet of antiquities, and other curious specimens of art. His death took place in 1818. Besides other works he constructed the grand basin of Roule. He also published engravings of ruins and architectural subjects; and a tract entitled "Projet pour la Restauration du Panthéon Français," 1799, 4to.

PETIT, Radel Philip, brother of the preceding, president of the faculty of medicine, was born in 1749. He went as surgeon-major in the army to the East Indies, and after residing three years at Surat, he returned home, and in 1782, became professor of surgery at Paris. Having made a second voyage to the East Indies, he returned in 1797, and the following year was nominated professor of clinical surgery at the school of medicine at Paris. He died in 1815. He published "Voyage Historique, Chorographique; et Philosophique, fait dans les Principales Villes d'Italie," 3 vols. 8vo.; and he wrote the "Dictionnaire de Chirargie" for the Encyclopedié Methodique, besides other works.

PETITOT, John, a celebrated painter, born at Geneva, 1607. From a jeweller, and the trade of enamelling, he acquired a great taste in painting; and with Bordier his friend and afterwards his brother-in-law, he travelled into Italy, and by studying chemistry obtained a perfect knowledge of the useful preparation and management of colors. They afterwards went to England, and Petitot, whose pieces were now in universal esteem, was introduced by Mayerne the physician to Charles I. and he had the honor to take portraits of the whole family. The unfortunate death of his royal patron, to whom he was particularly attached, obliged him to fly to Paris, where he was treated with kindness by the second Charles, and particularly noticed by Louis XIV. who granted him a pension, and a lodging in the Louvre palace. The revocation of the edict of Nantes terrified the painter, who was a zealous protestant, and after thirty-six years of residence he quitted France for Geneva. He died at Vevay in the canton of Berne, where he had retired, 1691, aged 84. In his private character he was very amiable, and of the meekest disposition. In the completion of his pictures he painted the heads and hands with astonishing effect of coloring, and his friend Bordier painted the hair, the draperies, and the ground. He is deservedly regarded as the inventor of painting in enamel, in which he greatly excelled.

PETITOT, Claude Bernard, director-general of the university of Paris, was born at Dijon in 1772. He went to Paris at the age of eighteen, and was employed in writing for the press till 1800, when he was appointed chief of the bureau of public instruction of the prefecture of the Seine. He relinquished that office in 1804, and five years afterwards his friend, M. de Fontanes, procured him the post of inspector-general of the university; and as he resigned his functions during the hundred days, he was, after the second return of the king, nominated secretary-general of the commission of public instruction. In 1821, he became a member of the royal council of the university; and he died in 1825. He was the author of three original tragedies, and he executed good translations of the tragedies of Alfieri, and the novels of Cervantes. He also edited Repertoire du Théâtre Français, avec Notices, &c. 1803-4, 23 vols. 8vo. and other works.

PETIVER, James, an English botanist, apothecary to the Charter house, and fellow of the Royal society, was distinguished as a judicious collector of natural curiosities. Sir Hans Sloane offered him £4000 for his valuable museum, and he afterwards obtained it when disposed of after his death. He died 20th April, 1718, and was honorably attended to his grave by the most eminent men of the age. He published Musei Petiveriani Centuriæ decem, 8vo.—Gazophylacii Naturæ & Artis Decades decem, folio—a Catalogue of the Plants on the Mountains near Geneva—Pterigraphia Americana, folio—and Plantæ rariores Chinenses,—besides communications to the philosophical transactions, and assistance to Mr. Ray. His works altogether appeared two vols. folio, and one 8vo. 1764.

PETRARCH, Francis, a celebrated Italian poet, deservedly called the father of modern poetry, as his genius and great learning tended to revive ancient literature in Europe. His father, who was of noble birth, was driven from Florence by the superior influence of the party of the Neri, and retired to Arezzo, where the poet was born, 1304. The future bard was intended by his father for the law, but poetry, eloquence, and history, had more charms for him than all the writers on jurisprudence. Losing his mother in 1324, and his father the next year, he was left to his own independent choice, and soon fixed his residence at Vaucluse, five miles from Avignon, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. This spot became more and more endeared to him from his love for the beautiful Laura de Noves, whom he first saw and passionately admired in 1327; but though the warm feelings of his heart were conveyed in the most rapturous language of elegant poetry, he could, it is said, make no impression on the heart of the unkind fair. Perhaps to divert his affections, he now began to think of travelling, and after visiting Paris, Flanders, Germany, and Rome, he was at last persuaded to enter into the service of pope John XXII. The love of Vaucluse and of Laura, however, prevailed over the temptations of greatness, and the favor of the powerful; and Petrarch, once more restored to his favorite seat, again devoted his hours to studious pursuits, and to the praises of his beloved mistress. The sweetness of his poetry, and the graces of his muse spread in the mean time his celebrity beyond the confines of Avignon, and at the same moment he was solicited by the senate of Rome, by the university of Paris, and by the king of Naples, to come and receive the poetical crown. The offers of Rome, once the mistress of the world, and the cradle of poets, historians, and orators, were too flattering to be withstood, and the modest bard appeared in the capitol, where the poetic crown was fixed on his head with the most solemn ceremony by the Roman senator Orso count d'Anguillara, on Easter-day 1341, and he was declared a citizen of Rome. From Rome he visited Parma, and in 1343 was drawn from his favorite Vaucluse by pope Clement VI. who sent him to compliment Joan on her accession to the Neapolitan crown. In 1352 he bid adieu for ever to his beloved retreat of Vaucluse, which the death of Laura had converted from a scene of pleasure and enjoyment, to corroding care and melancholy reflection; and he entered afterwards in the service of the Visconti at Milan, and was engaged in negotiations and political affairs. Though informed that his patrimony was restored by the Florentines, he preferred to these new honors from the city of Florence, the peaceful retreat of Arquà, near Padua, given him by his friend and patron, Francis de Carrara, and there he died July 1374, aged 70. Petrarch was an ecclesiastic, though he never took priests' orders, and he obtained an archdeaconry and two canonries. He was in private life a very amiable and respectable character; he neither coveted nor despised riches; but was guided by moderation, though flattered by the great, and honored by the powerful. Petrarch as a poet is deservedly celebrated as one of the restorers of classical learning, and he displayed all the powers of genius and poetical inspiration, not only in his own native language, but in Latin. His sonnets are esteemed as the sweetest, the most elegant, and most highly finished verses ever written in Italian, and his songs possess equal beauty and grace. His Latin poems are not entitled to similar praise. His Africa, or the Punic War, is censured as faulty, incorrect, and unclassical. His other works are De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ, 4to. translated into French—De Otio Religiosorum—De Verâ Sapientiâ—De Vitâ Solitariâ—De Contemptu Mundi—Rerum Memorabilium Libri Sex—De Republicâ optime administranda—Itinerarium Syriacum—Epistolæ—Orationes. His works have been edited in 4 vols. folio. Of his poems the best editions are that of Venice, 2 vols. 4to. 1756.

PETRE, sir William, LL.D. a native of Exeter, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1523, elected fellow of All-Souls. He applied himself to the study of the law, and was appointed principal of Peckwater-Hall. His abilities recommended him to lord Cromwell, who employed him in visiting the monasteries, and in the midst of the plunder of ecclesiastical property under Henry VIII. he received a considerable share. He had the art to continue in power under Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Mary, though the politics of the three reigns were very dissimilar; and under Elizabeth he added to his other employments, the office of secretary of state. Though dishonorably enriched by the plunder of the church, sir William was a man of great talents, and he evinced his respect for learning and piety by some munificent donations to Exeter college, and other charitable institutions. He died 1571.

PETRONIUS MAXIMUS, a Roman senator, who assassinated Valentinian III. and seized the throne, 455. He married the widow, who, ignorant of his crime, soon after called to avenge the death of her husband, Genseric, king of the Vandals. Petronius was put to death, and his body thrown into the Tiber.

PETTUS, Sir John, a native of Suffolk, who obtained the rank of deputy governor of the Royal mines, and was member of parliament for Dunwich, in the reign of Charles II. He wrote the History, Laws, and Places of the Chief Mines and Mineral Works in England and Wales, fol. 1670—Volatiles from the History of Adam and Eve, 8vo.—England's Independency of the Papal Power, 4to.—Fleta Minor, or the Laws of Art and Nature in knowing, and assaying, of Metals, fol. 1693, from the German, and translated while the author was in the Fleet prison. This intelligent man died about 1690.

PETTY, sir William, an eminent writer born 16th May, 1623, at Runsey in Hampshire, where his father was a clothier. In his native town, at the grammar school, by strong application, he acquired a competent knowledge of Latin, Greek and French, besides arithmetic, geometry, dialing, and navigation, and at the age of fifteen he went over to Normandy to improve himself further in the university of Caen. On his return home he was preferred in the navy, and at the age of twenty, being master, as he says himself, of three score pounds, he determined to travel abroad to augment his stock of knowledge. He visited Leyden, Utrecht, Amsterdam, and Paris, where he studied medicine, and so managed his little property that at his return to Runsey in 1646, he was richer by £10 than when he set out three years before. In 1647 he obtained from the parliament a patent for seventeen years for his invention of a machine for double writing; but though the scheme did not succeed, it yet recommended him to the notice of the learned, and procured him a settlement at Oxford, where he acquired some reputation as assistant to the anatomical professor. By the influence of the parliament he was appointed professor of anatomy, and soon after music professor at Gresham college. In 1652 he went as physician to the army in Ireland, under Lambert, Fleetwood, and Henry Cromwell; and in 1654 he obtained the permission of the government to measure the various estates of the island, so that by his perseverance and ingenuity, there was no estate worth £60 per annum, but was accurately marked, and all its boundaries ascertained. He was in 1655 made secretary to Henry Cromwell, and three years after was elected member of parliament for West Looe. At the restoration he was treated with great attention by the king, and knighted, and by patent created surveyor general of Ireland. About 1663 he invented his double bottomed ship, which could sail against wind and tide, of which he gave a model to the Royal society, a learned body, of which he was one of the first members, and the most active promoter of its establishment. Sir William, whose mind was perpetually engaged in promoting the honor of his country, by useful projects and ingenious inventions, paid at the same time particular attention to his own interests, and acquired honorable opulence by being concerned in iron works, in a pilchard fishery, in lead mines, and in the timber trade. He died 16th December, 1687. Sir William was a most correct and intelligent writer, and his various pamphlets on subjects of political economy, national and commercial pursuits, and financial affairs, all amounting to nearly thirty, display his abilities as a man of superior knowledge, extensive information, and the most consummate judgment, to which were united, the purest benevolence, and all the amiable virtues of private life.

PETTY, William, marquis of Lansdown, was descended from Sir William Petty, and born in 1737. He succeeded to the Irish title of earl of Shelburne, on the death of his father in 1761; and in 1763, was president of the board of trade, an office which he resigned to join the train of opposition led by Mr. Pitt (lord Chatham,) with whom he returned to office in 1766. When a change of ministry took place, in 1768, he became an antagonist of ministers till 1792, when he was nominated secretary of state for the foreign department. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham he was succeeded by lord Shelburne; but he was soon obliged to give way to the coalition between lord North and Mr. Fox. In 1784, his lordship became an English peer, by the titles of marquis of Lansdown and earl of Wycombe; and employed himself in the cultivation of science and literature at Bow Wood, his seat in Wiltshire. He collected a valuable library, the MSS. belonging to which were, after his death, purchased by the British Museum. His death took place in 1805.

PETYT, William, a native of Skipton, Yorkshire, eminent for his knowledge of law antiquities. He studied the law, and was bencher and treasurer of the Inner Temple, and keeper of the records in the Tower. He wrote the Ancient Rights of the Commons Asserted, 8vo.—a Summary Review of the Kings and Government of England, and of the Jus Parliamentarium, or Rights of Parliament, folio. He died at Chelsea, 1707. His valuable Collection of Parliamentary Tracts is preserved in the library of the Inner Temple.

PEUCER, Gaspard, an eminent physician and mathematician, born at Bautzen, in Lusatia, 1525. He was professor of medicine at Wittemberg, and married Melancthon's daughter, whose works he edited, 5 vols. folio; but his opinions brought him into trouble. He was for ten years imprisoned, and during that time he committed his thoughts on the margins of old books by means of ink, which he made with burnt crusts of bread infused in wine. He died 25th September 1602. He wrote De Præcipuis Divinationum Generibus—Methodus curandi Morbos Internos—de Febribus—Hypotheses Astronomicæ—Vita Illustrium Medicorum—the Names of Monies, Weights, and Measures.

PEUTEMAN, Peter, a painter, born at Rotterdam. It is said that he was roused by an earthquake from sleep, in the dissecting room of an anatomical school, which he had entered to become more familiarized with the appearances of dead bodies, in the representation of some scenes of mortality in which he was engaged; and when he saw, during the violent concussion, the skeletons all in motion from the ceiling, and the skulls rolling around him, he fled with terror and precipitation, and never recovered from the sudden shock, but died soon after, 1692, aged 42.

PEUTINGER, Conrad, a learned German, born at Augsburg, 1465. He studied in some of the Italian universities; and at his return home was appointed secretary to the senate of Augsburg. He was also useful to his country as an able negotiator in some of the European courts. He died 1547. He published Convivial Discourses, 8vo.—De Inclinatione Romani Imperii & Gentium Commigrationibus—De Rebus Gothorum, fol.—Romanæ Vestustatis Fragmenta in Augusta Viudelicorum, fol. besides a Chart formed in the reign of Theodosius the Great, containing the roads of the Roman armies in the Western empire, edited at Vienna, 1753, with dissertations and notes by Scheib.

PEYRERE, Isaac, a protestant writer, born at Bourdeaux. He was imprisoned at Brussels for publishing a book to prove that Adam was not the first man; but he was set at liberty by means of the prince of Condé his patron, and then went to Rome, where he abjured his opinions and Calvinism before pope Alexander VII. He died 1676, aged 84. He wrote a Relation of Greenland, 8vo.—of Iceland, 8vo.—and a book on the Restoration of the Jews, and other things.

PEYRE, Marie Joseph, a French architect, who was born at Paris, in 1730, and died in 1785. He was architect to the king, and a member of the Royal Academy of Architecture. In 1765 he published "Œuvres de Architecture," containing designs for a royal palace and a cathedral church; and he constructed, in concert with Wailly, the ancient hall of the Théâtre Français, now the Odeon. A second edition of his works was published at Paris, 1795, folio, by his son; who holds the office of architect to the government.

PEYREANLOINE FRANCOIS, brother of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1739. He studied painting, but subsequently adopted the profession of his elder brother. He became a pensionary student at Rome in 1763, and he executed three fine designs, representing the interior of the basilic of St. Peter; a view of the cupola and canopy enlightened, by the luminous cross on Good Friday; and another view of the colonnade during the procession on the day of Corpus Christi. After his return he successively became comptroller of the royal buildings at Fontainebleau, and then at St. Germain. He was imprisoned during the reign of terror, and being liberated on the fall of Robespierre, he was subsequently a member of the Institute, of the Council of Civil Architecture, and of the Administration of Hospitals. He died in 1823. His "Œuvres d'Architecture" were published at Paris, 1819-20, folio; and he was the author of several memoirs in the collection of the Institute.

PEYSSONNEL, Charles, a French writer, born at Marseilles 17th December, 1700. He went as secretary to Villeneuve the ambassador to Constantinople, and travelled over Asia Minor, with the judicious observations of the philosopher and antiquary, and not only accurately marked the situation of some of the most famous cities of ancient times, but made the most valuable collection of medals, coins, and curiosities. He was afterwards consul at Smyrna, and with equal zeal advanced the interests of his country, and the progress of science. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, whose memoirs he enriched by several valuable dissertations. He wrote besides an Eulogy on Marshal Villars—a Dissertation on Coral, and other pieces on Commerce. He died 1757, aged 69. His son was also consul at Smyrna, and a man of science and general information. He wrote Historical Observations on the Barbarians who once inhabited the shores of the Euxine and the Danube, 4to.—Observations on Baron de Tott's Memoirs, 8vo.—Les Numeros, 4 vols. 12mo. often edited—treatise on the Commerce of the Black Sea, 2 vols. 8vo.—Political Situation of France, 2 vols. 8vo.—Discourse on the Alliance of France with the Swiss and the Grisons, 8vo.—Examen of the Considerations on the Turkish War by Volney. This able and indefatigable author died in the year 1790, at the age of 80.

PEZAY, Masson, Marquis of, captain of dragoons, born at Blois. He instructed Louis XVI. in military tactics, and was rewarded with the place of inspector-general of the coasts. He behaved with haughtiness in this employment, and in consequence of complaints made against him was disgraced and banished to his estate, where he died soon after, 1773. He wrote poetry with great success. His Zelis au Bain, in six cantos, Les Soirees Helvetiennes, and the Campaigns of Maillebois, 3 vols. are admired. He also translated Catullus and Tibullus in French verse, but not elegantly.

PEZENAS, Esprit, a learned jesuit, born at Avignon, where he also died 4th February 1776, aged 84. He was professor of philosophy and hydrography at Marseilles, and published various things, the most known of which are a treatise on Pilotage, 8vo.—Theory of Gauging, 8vo.—Memoirs of Mathematics and Philosophy,—besides translations of Maclaurin's Algebra and Fluxions—Desagulier's experimental Philosophy—Ward's Young Mathematician's Guide—Baker on the Microscope—Smith's Optics—and Dyche's Dictionary of Arts.

PEZRON, Paul, a learned Frenchman, born at Hennebon, in Bretagne, 1639. He devoted himself to the study of Greek and Latin historians, and employed much time in tracing the origin of the language of the Goths, and set up a new system of chronology, in which he supposed that the world was far more ancient than 4000 years; but nearer 6000 before the birth of Christ. He was of the order of Cîteaux, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and in 1697, abbot of Charmoye. He died 10th October 1706. His works were l'Antiquité des Temps retablie, 4to. in which he ingeniously defends the chronology of the septuagint against that of the Hebrew text—a Vindication of that work against Martianay et le Qnién—Evangelical History confirmed by Jewish and Roman Histories—and on the Antiquity of the Nation and Language of the Celts, 8vo.

PFANNER, Tobias, called from his extensive knowledge, the living Archives of the house of Saxony, was secretary of the Archives to the duke of Saxe Gotha. He was born at Augsborg, and died at Gotha 1717, aged 76. He wrote the History of the Peace of Westphalia, 8vo.—the History of the Assemblies of 1652-4—Theology of the Pagans—and treatise on the Principle of Historic Faith, all in Latin.

PFEFFERCORN, John, a famous converted Jew, who wished to persuade the emperor Maximilian to burn all Hebrew books except the bible, because they contained magic blasphemies, and other dangerous things. This artificial scheme would have been adopted, had not Caprio and Ulic de Hutten exerted themselves successfully against it. He wrote Narratio de Ratione celebrandi Pascha apud Judæos—and de abolendis Judæorum Scriptis, and died about 1520.

PFEIFFER, Augustus, a learned orientalist, born at Lawenbourg 1640. He was professor of oriental languages at Wittenberg, Leipsic and other places, and became superintendent of the churches of Lubeck, where he died January 1698. He wrote Pansophia Mosaica—Critica Sacra—de Masora—de Trihaeresi Judæorum—Sciagraphia Systematica Antiquit. Hebræorum, and his philosophical works were collected at Utrecht in 4to. 2 vols.

PFEIFFER, Lewis, a native of Lucerne, distinguished as a famous general in the service of Charles IX. of France. At the retreat of Meux, he preserved that monarch's life against the artful manœuvres of Condé, and by his valor contributed much to the victory of Montcontour in 1569. He influenced the Swiss to favor the cause of the duke of Guise, and afterwards retired to his native country, where he died 1594, aged 64, chief magistrate of Lucerne.

PFENNINGER, Matthew, a Swiss painter and engraver, born at Zurich in 1739, and died about 1810. He executed Views in Switzerland, from his own designs; and others from the designs of Aberli; besides the Tomb of Virgil, and the Statue of Marcus Anrelius at Rome, after Bandoin.

PFENNINGER, Henry, a painter and engraver, of the same family with the preceding, born in 1749. He executed many figures for Lavater's Physiognomy; seventy-five portraits to illustrate Leonard Meister's Historical Abridgment of the Lives of Mustrious Natives of Switzerland, Zurich 1781, 3 vols. 8vo; and thirty-four more which accompany the same writer's Collection of the Portraits of the most celebrated German Poets, 1785, 8vo.

PFIFFER, Francis Louis de, a lieutenant-general in the French service, born at Lucerne, in Switzerland in 1716. He distinguished himself at the sieges of Menin, Ypres, and Fribourg, and in the battles of Rocoux and Lafeldt; and after fifty years' service he retired to his native country. He then commenced the formation of a plan of Switzerland, in relief. This work when finished was twenty-two feet and a half in length, and twelve in breadth, and was composed of one hundred and thirty-six pieces, which could be separated at pleasure. This fine monument of the industry and skill of the artist, which is remarkable for its accuracy, was engraved in the Tableaux Pittoresques de la Suisse, and also by Mechel in 1783, and by Clausner in 1795.

PHAFER, Thomas, a physician born in Pembroke-shire, and educated at Oxford. He studied the law for some time at Lincoln's Inn, but afterwards took his medical degrees 1559, and published various works, chiefly compiled from the French. He also translated the nine first books, and part of the 10th of Virgil's Æneid, in Alexandrines of seven feet. The other books, together with Mapheus' 13th book, were afterwards finished by Thomas Twyne, a young physician, but with some carelessness, as he prints, "they whisted all," contiuere omnes, in the opening of the second book "they whisted all," a ludicrous mistake. He died soon after, the 12th August 1560.

PHARAMOND, first king of France, and author of the famous Salique law, which forbid the succession of females on the throne, reigned at Treves about 420. Some consider him only as a general of the combined forces of the Franks.

PHARNACES, son of Mithridates king of Pontus, cruelly revolted against his father. He was defeated by Cæsar with such facility, that he expressed the rapidity of the conquest by these words, veni, vidi, vici.

PHELIPPEAUX, A. Le Picard de, a French officer of artillery, born in 1768. He received a military education, and was the fellow pupil and rival of Buonaparte. In 1786 he entered as second lieutenant into the regiment of Besançon; and having quitted France in 1791, he made a campaign the following year with the corps of emigrants under the French princes. In 1795 he re-entered France to organize a royalist insurrection, in the central provinces, when he raised a body of troops, took Saincerre, and for some time maintained his position in Berri. But he was at length obliged to seek concealment, and after being arrested and making his escape, he went to Paris, where he effected the liberation of sir Sidney Smith, then confined a prisoner in the Temple. With him he went to England, and sir Sidney procured for him the rank of colonel in the English service; and he afterwards accompanied an expedition to the Mediterranean and assisted in the defence of Acre against Buonaparte. He died of fatigue shortly after the raising of the siege of that place, May 20, 1799.

PHERECYDES, a philosopher of Syros, B.C. 560, known as the master of the great Pythagoras. The invention of prosody is attributed to him by Diogenes. There was another of that name 456 B. C. author of an history of Athens.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated sculptor of Athens. He formed for his country the famous statue of Minerva, and when banished in disgrace, he determined to outdo himself in making for the people of Elis the beautiful statue of Jupiter Olympius, which was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. He died about 432, B.C.

PHILELPHUS, Francis, a learned Italian, born at Zolentino in the march of Ancona, 1398. He was, after study at Padua, made professor of eloquence at Venice, and went as secretary to an embassy to Constantinople, where he married the daughter of the learned Emanuel Chrysoloras, 1419. He was afterwards noticed by the emperor John Paleologus who sent him to Sigismund of Germany, to implore assistance against the Turks. He afterwards taught at Venice, Bologna, and other Italian universities with great popularity; but he was so sensible of his eminence in literature that he wished to tyrannize over the rest of the learned, and therefore he quarrelled not only with literary men, but with Cosmo de Medicis, his patron and friend. He died at Florence 31st July, 1481, aged 83. He wrote treatises de Morali Disciplinâ—de Exilio—de Jocis & Seriis Conviviorum—dialogues, odes, and poems, which were all collected and published, Basle, 1739, folio. His eldest son Marius, a man also of learning; died at Milan 1480.

PHILIP II., king of Macedonia, was son of Amyntas, and ascended the throne 360, B.C. He had in his youth been educated at Thebes, and to the information and precepts which he received from the wisdom of Epaninondas, he added the most heroic valor and the most ardent ambition. After defeating the Illyrians and other barbarians, he made war against Athens, and aspired to the sovereignty of Greece. His gold proved as powerful as his arms, and neither the eloquence of Demosthenes, nor the desperate courage of the Athenians could oppose the torrent of his victories. He was assassinated by Pausanias, B.C. 336, whilst meditating the conquest of Persia, at the head of the Grecian forces, of which he had artfully been declared the general, and he left his projects to be pursued, to his son and successor, Alexander the Great.

PHILIP V., king of Macedonia, succeeded B.C. 220. His jealousy of the Roman power, and his alliance with Hannibal proved the source of his misfortunes. His dominions were invaded by the consul Lævinus, and he was conquered. He is deservedly censured for putting his eldest son, Demetrius, to death, at the base instigation of his other son Perseus. He died B.C. 178.

PHILIP, Marcus Julius, the Arabian, from an obscure origin, and the low rank of a common soldier, ascended the imperial throne of Rome, by the assassination of the younger Gordian, 244. Though guilty of murder, he acquired popularity at Rome by his conduct, and the magnificent manner in which he celebrated the secular games. He was assassinated by his soldiers near Verona 249.

PHILIP I., king of France, succeeded his father, Henry I., 1060, at the age of eight. His minority was under the care of Baldwin V., count of Flanders, but he lost this virtuous guardian in 1067, and gave way to mad schemes of ambition. He was defeated by the Flemings at Mont Cassel, and opposed with success by William the Conqueror of England; but he forgot his misfortunes in intoxication and voluptuous pleasures. Dissatisfied with his queen Bertha, he carried away Bertrade, the wife of the count of Anjou, and married her, for which flagitious conduct he was condemned by pope Urban II., and excommunicated by the council of Poitiers. He was afterwards, however, reconciled to the church, and his marriage with Bertrade declared valid. He died at Melun, 29th July, 1108, after a reign of forty-eight years

PHILIP II., king of France, surnamed Augustus, succeeded his father, Louis VII., 1180, when fifteen years old. His youth promised success to the machinations of his enemies, and therefore the king of England invaded his dominions; but Philip bravely met him, and obliged him to renounce his pretensions, and to renew the former treaties which existed between the two kingdoms. In the moments of peace he devoted himself wisely to improve the character of his subjects, and to meliorate their situation. His conduct towards the Jews, however, tarnished the glory of his reign, and all their extortions could not justify his cruelty, nor permit that their just and lawful debtors should be discharged from their bonds. His disputes with the count of Flanders, and afterwards with Henry II. of England, were forgotten in his wishes to accompany the crusaders to the Holy Land. With the new king of England, Richard I., he laid siege to Acre, at the head of three hundred thousand men; but though victorious, he returned to Europe with little glory, and with no solid advantage. Jealousy between him and the king of England had produced a rupture, but though, on a mutual reconciliation, Philip had sworn on the gospels, not to make any attempt against his rival's dominions, in his absence, he had the cowardice to invade Normandy, and to take Evreux, and other places. A defeat at Rouen was followed by a truce. In 1199, Philip supported the pretensions of Arthur to the crown of England, against his uncle, the usurper, John, and on the base murder of the young prince, the guilty monarch was summoned before the peers of France, to answer for his unnatural conduct. Condemned for the atrocious murder, he was deprived of his dominions on the continent, and Philip, pleased to strip so powerful a vassal, was still further animated in his hostility by the pope, whom John had offended. The French monarch was empowered by Innocent II. to seize England; but while he prepared to execute this pleasing command, the cowardly John resigned his dominions into the hands of the holy see, and Philip was required to desist from attempts against the fief of the church. The numerous armaments which had been prepared for the conquest of England, alarmed the neighboring princes, and Philip had a war to maintain against Germany; but the famous battle at Bouvines in 1214, restored peace to France. Still ambitious to possess England, the French king prevailed upon the English barons, who offered him the crown, to call to their assistance his son Louis, who, consequently with his support, invaded the British dominions, and was crowned king at London. The death of John, however, frustrated all the plans of Philip; the English renounced their allegiance to their foreign master, for their lawful prince, and Louis returned a private man to France. Philip died soon after at Nantes, 14th July, 1223, aged 59. He was the most powerful of the French kings of the third race, and more than any other, enlarged his dominions by the acquisition of new provinces.

PHILIP III., or the Hardy, was proclaimed king, 1270, in Africa, on the death of his father, Louis IX., whom he had accompanied against the infidels. After defeating the Saracens, and making a truce for ten years with the king of Tunis, he returned to France. The murder of the French at Palermo, at the Sicilian vespers, roused his indignation, and as Peter, king of Arragon, was the cause of this dreadful massacre, Philip marched against him with an army. He took the towns of Elna and of Girone, and might have enlarged his conquests, had he not been seized by a violent fever, which proved fatal at Perpignan, 6th October, 1285, in his 41st year.

PHILIP IV., or the Fair, succeeded his father, Philip III., at the age of seventeen. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Edward I., of England, and had, in consequence, to maintain a war against him, the count of Flanders, and the emperor of Germany. Philip proved victorious in Gnienne and at Furnes, 1296, but six years after, lost the battle of Courtrai, in which the count of Artois and ten thousand of the chosen troops of France lost their lives. Two years after, the French army recovered their honor at Mont-en-Puelle, where twenty-five thousand Flemings were slain, and to celebrate this important victory, the highly finished equestrian statue of the monarch was erected in the church of Notre Dame. The peace with the Flemings was followed by a new dispute with the pope, Boniface VIII., and by opposing the claims of the holy see, in the collation of benefices, Philip saw himself excommunicated, and his kingdom under an interdict. The monarch, undismayed, ordered the pope's bull to be burned with every mark of indignity; but the differences were at last settled by the death of the pontiff; and the two next successors, Boniface IX., and Clement V., more peaceful and moderate, annulled the proceedings of their more violent predecessor, and a reconciliation was effected with France. More fully to please Philip, the pope assented to the abolition of the order of the knights templars, and these innocent victims to royal prejudice, were in consequence, treated with great cruelty, and the most wanton persecution. Philip died by a fall from his horse, 29th November, 1314, aged 46.

PHILIP V., king of France, surnamed the Long, was the younger son of Philip the Fair, and succeeded to the throne after his brother, Lewis Hutin, 1316, to the exclusion of his niece, agreeable to the provisions of the Salique law. He made war against the Flemings, renewed the alliance with Scotland, and banished the Jews from his kingdom. He formed the plan of equalizing weights and measures all over his dominions, but could never effect it. During his reign, leprosy was very prevalent, and as those afflicted with that terrible disorder were exonerated from certain taxes, and enjoyed peculiar immunities; instead of being lessened, the evil seemed to increase, till the general indignation was excited, and the wretched sufferers, accused of flagitious crimes, were either put to death, or confined in prisons. The king died 3d January, 1328, aged 28.

PHILIP DE VALOIS, first king of France, of the collateral branch of the Valois, was son of Charles count de Valois, the brother of Philip the Fair, and he ascended the throne on the death of his cousin, Charles the Fair, 1328. His elevation was disputed by Edward III., of England, the maternal grandson of Philip the Fair, though he had lately done homage to the new monarch for the territories of Guienne, and in consequence of this, a terrible war was kindled between the two nations. Assuming the title of king of France, Edward invaded the country, supported by the arms of the Flemings, and victory marked his steps. His fleet defeated the French ships in 1340, and in 1346, the celebrated battle of Cressy was fought, in which France lost nearly thirty thousand men, among whom were the flower of the French nobility, and the gallant blind king of Bohemia. The loss of Calais, and other important places, were the rewards of this signal victory; but though Philip refused to accept the challenge of his rival to single combat, a short cessation of arms was agreed upon Philip died soon after, 23d August, 1350, aged 57, leaving an impoverished kingdom, and a disputed succession.

PHILIP I., son of the emperor Maximilian, by his marriage in 1490, with Jane, queen of Spain, the heiress of Ferdinand of Arragon, and Isabella of Castille, obtained the Spanish crown. He was a man of very moderate abilities, but regarded as the fairest man of his age. He died at Burgos, 25th September, 1606, aged 28, in consequence of exerting himself too much in playing at tennis.

PHILIP II., son of Charles V. and Isabella of Portugal, was made king of Naples and Sicily in 1554, on his father's abdication, and also king of England by his marriage with queen Mary, and two years after he ascended the Spanish throne by the extraordinary resignation of his father. He made war against the French, and obtained a famous victory at the battle of St. Quintin, in 1557, during which, it is said, he was so terrified that he made two vows; the one, never again to appear in a fight, and the next, to erect a monastery in honor of St. Lawrence, to whose powerful influence he ascribed the success of his arms. This celebrated victory, which might have made him master of France, was followed by the capture of only a few neighboring little towns; so that Charles, his father, on hearing of the battle, asked if his son was at Paris, and being answered in the negative, turned his back with contempt on the messenger. Another victory at Gravelines was equally abused, till the treaty of Cateau Cambresis re-established peace between the two monarchies in 1559. On his return to Spain, Philip gratified himself with the exhibition of an autodafe, when the inquisition condemned to the flames forty wretches who were accused of heresy. Sanguinary in his conduct, and violent in his measures, he soon alienated the affections of his subjects; and the Flemings, harassed by his oppressions, threw off the yoke. In vain the duke of Alva, by valor as much as by severity, attempted to restore subordination; seven provinces were severed from the Spanish yoke, and under the name of United Provinces, established their rank and independence among nations. Though unsuccessful in the Low Countries, Philip had the good fortune to subdue Portugal to his power, and in the madness of his ambition he now formed plans for the subjection of England, which the death of Mary had placed under the administration of the heroic Elizabeth. In 1588 the Invincible Armada sailed from Lisbon, for the conquest of England; but the storms and the valor of the English were enemies which the ambitious monarch was not prepared to encounter. The fleet was dispersed and cut to pieces, and when Philip heard of the loss of his one hundred ships, and of twenty thousand of his men, he replied with great resignation, I had sent my fleet against the English, and not against the winds; the Lord's will be done. He died 13th September, 1598, aged 72. Though represented by some, ferocious and unprincipled as Tiberius, and by others, wise and discreet as Solomon, Philip may be considered as a man of great abilities, too much, indeed, guided by superstition, and too strongly attached to family pride, and the love of universal dominion, yet, endowed with sagacity, able and eager to distinguish merit, and during a long reign, if not the first man, yet the chief personage in Europe who could decide and regulate the interests of states, and command respect among all nations.

PHILIP III. son of Philip II. and Anne of Austria, succeeded his father on the Spanish throne at the age of twenty. The war of the Netherlands was continued with increased virulence, and he made himself master of Ostend by his general Spinola, after a siege of three years, and the loss of eighty thousand men; but vigor was wanted to guide his counsels, and by making peace with his enemies, he firmly established the house of Nassau in the possession of the rebellious provinces of Holland. Dissatisfied with the conduct of his Moorish subjects, who were accused of being Musselmans at heart, though their general behaviour was peaceful, and their industry was the support of the kingdom, Philip, in an unlucky hour, issued a decree for their banishment in thirty days, and thus robbed his kingdom of the arts, the knowledge, and the laborious services of above a million of his subjects. This severe blow on the population and the industry of the country could never be recovered, though the monarch granted the most liberal privileges for the encouragement of agriculture and of the arts. He died 31st March, 1621, aged forty-three.

PHILIP IV. son of Philip III. and Margaret of Austria, was king of Spain after his father, 1621. On his accession the war with Holland was renewed, as the truce was expired; but though the Spaniards were successful while commanded by Spinola, they were defeated at sea by the Dutch, near Lima. In 1635 Philip increased the number of his enemies by declaring war against France; but though at first victorious, his troops were defeated at Avenness and Casal, and Artois was taken. The Catalonians also rebelled against their sovereign, under the patronage of France, and Portugal shook off her foreign yoke, and re-established her monarch under the auspicious government of the house of Braganza, 1640. These severe losses, occasioned by the incapacity of the monarch, and the negligence of his minister Olivares, instead of rousing the nation to active exertions, were received with indifference. Olivares was indeed disgraced; but the war, instead of being prosecuted with vigor, was concluded with France by a dishonorable treaty which separated Rousillon, Artois, and Alsace from the Spanish crown, 1659. The war with Portugal was still continued, but two unfortunate battles soon obliged Philip to acknowledge the independence of his rebellious subjects. His weak and effeminate monarch died 17th September 1665, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son Charles II.

PHILIP V. duke of Anjou, second son of Louis the dauphin of France, and Maria Anne of Bavaria, ascended the Spanish throne 1700, agreeable to the will of the last monarch Charles II. Though received with acclamations at Madrid, his elevation was opposed by the archduke Charles of Austria, supported by his father, the emperor, by England, Holland, Savoy, Prussia, and Portugal. The first events of the war were disadvantageous to the new king, he lost Arragon, Gibraltar, the Baleares, Sardinia, and Naples, and was obliged to quit his capital; but while he thought of relinquishing his European dominions, and of passing to America, there to establish a new kingdom, he received powerful assistance from France, under the duke of Vendome, and in the battle of Villa Viciosa, in 1710, he recovered his losses, and was more firmly fixed on his throne by the conquests of Villars, in Flanders, and by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. Devoted to the improvement of his people under the administration of Alberoni, Philip still sought the recovery of his lost dominions, and by degrees made himself master of Majorca, Minorca, Sardinia, and Palermo. The measures which he pursued, and the jealousy of his neighbors again kindled a new war in 1717, and the Spanish fleet was defeated with great loss in the Mediterranean, by admiral Byng. These and other disasters made the monarch anxious for peace, and the four allied courts of France, Germany, England, and Holland, insisted, as a preliminary, on the expulsion of the intriguing Alberoni, from the counsels of his master. Though peace was re-established in 1720, Philip no longer found happiness in the attachment of his people, but he became a prey to superstitious fears, and melancholy suspicions. Under this terrible mental calamity he resigned his crown, 1724, in favor of his son Louis, and retired to a monastery; but the sudden death of the new monarch, a few months after, of the small-pox, left the kingdom without a master. Roused from his retirement, Philip again resumed the reigns of government; and leaving all his superstitious apprehensions behind, he became the watchful, attentive, and affectionate father of his people. In 1733 he joined France, against the emperor, in the war which was rekindled in Europe, by the nomination of Stanislaus to the Polish throne, and he had the good success to see his son Don Carlos, with an army of thirty thousand men, conquer Sicily and Naples, and establish himself on the throne. These happy events from without were counterbalanced from within, by the dreadful conflagration which reduced the royal palace of Madrid, the archives of the kingdom, and the most valuable paintings, to ashes. Peace was restored in 1736, and Carlos confirmed in the possession of his Italian kingdoms. A new war was again kindled in 1739, but Philip died before its conclusion. He died 9th July, 1746, aged 63, after a reign of forty-five years, and was succeeded by his eldest son Ferdinand VI.

PHILIP, the Good, duke of Burgundy, Brabant, and Luxemburg, succeeded on the death of his father John, who was killed at Montrean, 1419. To avenge the fate of his father he warmly embraced the party of the English against Charles VI. of France and his successor Charles VII. He defeated the dauphin at the battle of Mons-en-Vimeux, 1421, and attacked with success, Jacqueline, countess of Hainault, and obliged her to acknowledge him as the successor to her dominions. In 1435 he abandoned the English interest, and was reconciled to Charles VII. but afterwards he embraced the party of Charles, duke of Berri, against his brother Louis XI. and engaged in all the tumults of war. He intrusted the command of his troops to his son, the count de Charolois, who treated with unparalleled cruelty the town of Dinan, near Liege, of which he burned the walls to the ground, and put the inhabitants to the sword; and instead of condemning such barbarity, the aged father caused himself to be carried from his bed of sickness to view with delight, the mournful spectacle. Philip, who by this lost all title to the appellation of Good, died at Bruges, 15th June, 1467, aged 71.

PHILIP DE DREUX, son of Robert of France, count of Dreux, was made bishop of Beauvais. Possessing, however, a strong inclination for military affairs, he joined the crusaders, and behaved with great valor at the siege of Acre, 1191. He afterwards joined Philip Augustus in his war against the English, and being taken prisoner, was treated with more harshness than was due to his rank. Philip complained of the severity of his confinement to pope Innocent III. who claimed him as his own son from Richard II. of England. The monarch in answer, sent to the pope the bishop's coat of mail all covered with blood, and asked the pontiff, in the words of Joseph's brethren, to Jacob, is this thy son's coat, upon which Innocent declined further to intercede. He was set at liberty 1202, and afterwards fought at the battle of Bouvines, in 1214, and again distinguished himself against the Albigenses, in Languedoc. He died at Beauvais, 2d November, 1217.

PHILIP, duke of Swabia, and son of Frederic Barbarossa, was elected emperor after the death of his brother Henry VI. 1198; but a more powerful party placed the imperial crown on the head of Otho, duke of Saxony. This unfortunate division kindled a war in Germany, but at last the pope threw the weight of his authority on the side of Otho, and excommunicated Philip. Philip, however, made so respectful a submission to the sovereign pontiff, that he withdrew his anathema, and labored earnestly to effect a reconciliation between the two rivals. Arms, nevertheless, would have decided their different claims, had not Philip been basely assassinated at Bamberg, 25th June, 1208, after a reign of eleven years. He was a prince of great wisdom and strong powers of mind, and his memory is still respected in Germany.

PHILIP the Bold, fourth son of John, king of France, is celebrated for the valor with which he fought at the battle of Poitiers against the English, though only 16 years old, whilst his other timid brothers fled from the scene of slaughter. He was created duke of Burgundy, and during the confusion which prevailed in France, under his nephew Charles VI. he was called upon by the general voice of the nation to support the tottering power of the government. This elevation, and his marriage with the queen, excited against him the jealousy of the duke of Orleans, and laid the foundation of that enmity which proved so fatal to those two illustrious houses and to the kingdom. This brave and virtuous prince unfortunately was profuse in his liberalities beyond example, so that at his death his body was seized by his creditors, and with difficulty redeemed by his duchess. He died at Hall, in Hainault, 27th April, 1404, aged 63.

PHILIP, a Phrygian, made by Antiochus Epiphanes, governor of Jerusalem. He behaved with great cruelty, and compelled the Jews to change their religion. He was appointed by Antiochus, on his death-bed, guardian of the minority of his son; but Lysias seized upon the authority, and obliged him to fly. Philip returned and took Antioch, but was afterwards defeated and put to death by his rival.

PHILIP, sachem of Pokanoket, known by the name of king Philip. Notwithstanding that in 1662 he renewed the friendship which had subsisted between him and the English, yet in 1678 he commenced a war of extermination. He foresaw the loss of his territory, and the extinction of the natives, if the English settlements were left unmolested, and he made one mighty effort to avert the calamity. He lighted up the flame of war in different parts of the country at the same time. But the infant colonies though they suffered much from his endeavors to accomplish his object, were delivered from this danger by his death in 1676. He was killed at Monnt Hope in Rhode-Island by a party under Captain Church.

PHILIPS, Thomas, a native of Ickford, Bucks, educated at St. Omers' among the jesuits, whose order he soon quitted. He was promoted to a prebend in Tongres cathedral, by the influence of the Pretender, and died at Liege, 1774, aged 66. He published a Letter to a Student in Divinity, 8vo. 1756, a performance of merit, and three times edited—the Life of Cardinal Pole, 2 vols. 4to. 1764, and 2 vols. 8vo. 1767, a work of great celebrity, in which he supported the principles of the Romish church, and attacked the tenets of the protestants, and thus drew against himself a host of able and judicious opponents. He had a sister of the same persuasion, who died abbess of a convent of Benedictine nuns in the town of Ghent.

PHILIPS, Catherine, a lady of great accomplishments, daughter of Mr. Fowler, a London merchant, born 1631. She married at the age of 16, James Philips of Cardigan, esquire, and died much regretted, of the small-pox, in London, 22d June, 1664. She translated Corneille's Pompey—and also the four first acts of his Horace, besides various poems, which she published under the assumed name of Orinda, of which a second edition appeared, 1673. Her poetical talents were very respectable, and she deserved to be celebrated by the learned men of her age, by lords Orrery, Roscommon, and by Cowley and others. Her elegant correspondence with sir Charles Cotterel appeared in 1705, under the title of Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus.

PHILIPS, John, an English poet, born at Bampton, Oxfordshire, 30th December 1676. He was educated at Winchester school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where extraordinary application marked his progress in literature. His first poem was the "Splendid Shilling," an excellent composition, which describes the most trivial things in the lofty language of Milton. "Blenheim" was the next effusion of his muse, and the "Cyder," a happy imitation of Virgil's Georgics, appeared 1705. He wrote besides a Latin "Ode" to his patron St. John, and it has been remarked by one of his biographers, that such was his addiction to tobacco, that he has introduced the praises of the fragrant fume in all his pieces except Blenheim. This excellent poet, whose character in private life was amiable and benevolent, died 15th February 1703, aged 32.

PHILIPS, Ambrose, an English poet, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. While at college he wrote his "Pastorals," a species of poetry in which he is said to have excelled, though Pope ridiculed them, and to render his satire more poignant, introduced into the Guardian a paper which, in a delicate strain of irony, compared the pastorals of the two rivals, and gave in an affected manner the superiority to Philips. Philips resented the attacks of the satirist, and unable to revenge himself by his pen, he stuck up a rod at Button's coffee-house, which was frequented by all the wits and literati of the age, and threatened to chastise his antagonist wherever he saw him. In his circumstances he was very independent, as connected with persons high in the state, and as the friend of the Hanoverian succession he was made a justice of the peace, and in 1717 appointed one of the lottery commissioners. He was in 1734 made registrar of Dublin prerogative court by his friend Boulter the primate, and he sat in the parliament of Ireland for Armagh. He returned in 1743 to England, to live on an annuity of £400 which he had purchased; but a stroke of the palsy carried him off, 13th June, 1749, aged 78, at his lodgings near Vauxhall. He wrote three dramatic pieces of some merit, the Distressed Mother—the Briton—and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester—besides the Life of archbishop Williams, and a little poem called "a Winter Piece," which Pope condescended to commend, though he ridiculed all his other works. Dr. Johnson says he was eminent for bravery, and in conversation solemn and pompous.

PHILLIPS, George, was a native of England, and educated at the university of Cambridge. He was settled in the ministry at Boxford in Essex. But becoming a non-conformist, he resolved to quit England, and he came to America with Governor Winthrop in 1630. He immediately became the minister of the new plantation at Watertown. He died 1664.

PHILLIPS, Samuel, graduated at Harvard college in 1708. He was ordained minister of Andover 1710, and died 1771, aged 81. He published numerous sermons.

PHILLIPS, John, LL.D., graduated at Harvard college in 1735. He was the sole founder of the academy in Exeter, New Hampshire, which bears his name. He was also a liberal contributor to the academy in Andover known by the name of Phillips academy. He died in 1795 aged 76. During his life time he appropriated £15000 for the Exeter academy. After assisting his brother in founding the Andover academy in 1778, in 1789 he gave that institution the further sum of $20,000. He bequeathed two thirds of his estate to Exeter Academy, and one third of the residue to the theological institution at Andover.

PHILLIPS, Samuel, LL.D., lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college in 1771. He was early engaged in public, being a member of the provincial congress, and of the house of representatives, and in 1780 assisting in forming a constitution for Massachusetts. On the adoption of the constitution, he was elected a member of the senate, and was its president from 1785 to 1801. He was chosen lieutenant-governor in 1801 and died in 1802, aged 50. He projected the academy in Andover, and was one of its distinguished benefactors. He hequeathed one thousand dollars, one sixth part of the interest of which he directed annually to be added to the principal, and the remainder to be expended in the purchase of bibles and other books to be distributed among poor and pious christians in other towns, and also among the inhabitants of places, where the means of religious knowledge are but sparingly enjoyed.

PHILLIPS, William, lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, was educated as a merchant; and on the death of his father became the possessor of a princely fortune. He was elected lieutenant-governor during the administrations of Strong and Brooks. He died 1827, aged 77. For many years he gave in charity from eight to eleven thousand dollars annually. During the last three weeks of his life he contributed $5000 to different objects. In his will he gave Phillips academy $15,000; to the theological institution in Andover, $10,000; to the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians; the Massachusetts Bible society; the foreign mission board; the congregational society; the education society; and the Massachusetts general hospital, each, $5000; to the medical dispensary, $3000; to the female asylum, and the asylum for boys, each $2,000; in all, $62,000.

PHILLIPS, John, president of the senate of Massachusetts, was a nephew of lieutenant-governor William Phillips, and graduated at Harvard college in 1788. He was bred a lawyer, and was appointed at an early age county-attorney for Suffolk. For the last nineteen years of his life he was a member of the senate of Massachusetts, and when Mr. Otis was elected into the house in 1813, succeeded him as president. He was also a member of the convention which revised the constitution of the state in 1820, and on the incorporation of the city of Boston in 1823, was elected the first mayor. He died May 29th, 1823, aged fifty-three. No man in Boston possessed through life a greater share of the public confidence, or was more continually employed in the public service. He was industrious, intelligent, faithful, and discreet.

PHILOCEMEN, a celebrated general, who has been called the last of the Greeks, was born B. C. 223, at Megalopolis, in Arcadia; became generalissimo of the Achaean league; reduced the Spartans to a tributary state, dismantled Sparta, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus; but was at length taken prisoner in a battle with the Messenians, and was put to death by poison, B. C. 183.

PHIPPS, Constantine, lord Mulgrave, eldest son of lord Mulgrave, was born 1746. He early embraced the naval profession, and by the influence of friends was made post captain in 1765. In 1768 he was elected member for Lincoln, and distinguished himself in parliament by his bold and manly conduct in the several popular questions which then agitated the house, especially the Westminster election, and the libel laws. His abilities as a sailor were employed in a voyage of observation and discovery towards the north pole in 1773, and he set sail with captain Lutwidge in two ships, and at his return published an interesting narrative of his remarks and observations in 4to. He was also author of a Letter of a Member of Parliament to his Constituents on the Proceedings of the House of Commons in the Westminster Election. He succeeded to the Irish honors of his father in 1775, and in 1790 was created an English peer, and died 1792.

PHIPS, Sir William, governor of Massachusetts. He lived in the wilderness of Maine till he was eighteen years of age, and was then an apprentice to a ship-carpenter four years. He went to Boston and learned to read and write. He chose to seek his fortune on the sea, and had the good fortune to discover the wreck of a very valuable Spanish vessel on the coast of Hispaniola, and by the aid of the British government, succeeded in fishing up plate, and pearls and jewels amounting in value to three hundred thousand pounds sterling, with which he sailed to England in 1687. He obtained by his enterprise sixteen thousand pounds, and the honor of knighthood. He returned to Boston in 1690, and commanded the expedition against Port-Royal, which place he captured. When the new charter of Massachusetts was obtained he was appointed the first governor under it. He arrived at Boston as governor in 1692. In 1694, in a dispute with the collector of the post he so far forgot his dignity as to descend to blows. He was removed from office, and returned to England. He received assurances of being restored, but before that event happened, he died in 1695, aged 44.

PHOCAS, a Chalcedonian noble, who seized on the empire of the East, by the murder of the emperor Maurice, and of his children, 602. To maintain his power, he dispersed his spies all over the empire, and devoted to destruction those who presumed to speak against his tyranny. But though absolute, he dreaded the attacks of foreign enemies, and afraid to meet the Persians in the field, he had the art to bribe their general, Narses, and to draw him to Constantinople, where in reward for his treachery, he burned him alive. A conduct so flagitious at last roused the general indignation, and Heraclius, governor of Africa, boldly conspired against the monster, and cut off his head and his right hand, 5th October 610.

PHOCION, an Athenian, illustrious for his virtues no less than for his talents, was born about B. C. 400, of an obscure family. Plato and Xenocrates were his masters in Philosophy. Forty-five times he was placed at the head of the Athenian armies, and on all occasions displayed bravery and skill. He was, however, a lover of peace, and he discouraged hostile proceedings against the Macedonians, because he was convinced that circumstances were such as to render success hopeless. In probity and disinterestedness, he was never surpassed. He was, nevertheless, condemned to die by poison, B. C. 318, and was even denied a grave in his own country. When the madness of popular passion had subsided, the Athenians raised a statue to his memory, and put his accuser to death.

PHORMIO, an Athenian general, who displayed great bravery during the Peloponnesian war. He sold his property to supply the pay of his army, but refused the rank of commander in chief.

PHOTIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, for ten years during which he was exposed to turbulent opposition and cabal. He was at last deposed, and died in a monastery, 891. He was author of a Commentary on Ancient writers, folio—a Collection of the Canons of the Church, folio—letters, folio.

PHREAS, or FREAS, John, an English writer, born in London about the close of the 14th century, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Baliol college. He settled at Bristol, but afterwards travelled to Italy, where learning was beginning to revive, and meeting with his countryman Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, he dedicated to him some of his performances. He translated into Latin, Diodorus Siculus, and Synesius, &c. He took his doctor's degree at Padua, where he read medical lectures, as well as at Florence, and Ferrara. He was presented by Paul II. to whom he dedicated his Diodorus, to the see of Bath, but survived the appointment only one month, being poisoned, it is said, by a competitor. It is said he acquired some fortune by practising physic in Italy. He died about 1466.

PIA, Philip Nicholas, an eminent chemist, born at Paris 15th September 1721. He was for some years chief surgeon of the hospital at Strasburg, and on his return to Paris, was named sheriff of the city in 1770. In this last place he exerted all his influence, and the knowledge which he derived from experience, to establish a society for the recovery of drowned or suffocated persons. He furnished the establishment with the necessary apparatus, and the first year not less than twenty-four persons were saved and restored from the waters of the Seine; but the revolution unfortunately ruined his humane projects, and reduced him to extreme poverty. This benevolent and amiable man died 11th May, 1799. He wrote an account of his humane projects in several vols. 8vo. and 12mo. published 1770, and 1773.

PIAZZI, Jerome Bartholomew, an Italian, born at Alexandria. He turned protestant from Dominican friar, and went to England, where he published a curious account of the inquisition in Italy, with which he was well acquainted, as he had been one of its delegate judges. He maintained himself by teaching French and Italian at Cambridge, and died there 1745.

PIAZZI, Joseph, a celebrated astronomer, was born, in 1746, at Ponte, in the Valteline; entered into the order of the theatins, and, after having been a professor at Genoa, Malta, and Ravenna, was invited to Palermo, in 1780, to fill the professorship of the higher branches of mathematics. At Palermo he obtained the establishment of an observatory, and entered into a correspondence with the most eminent European astronomers. He made a new catalogue of stars, containing seven thousand six hundred and forty-six, and, on the 1st of January, 1801, discovered an eighth planet, to which he gave the name of Ceres Ferdinandea. Piazzi died July 22, 1826. He is the author of Astronomical Lessons, and of various other scientific works.

PICARD, John, a French ecclesiastic, born at La Fleche. He was prior of Rille in Anjou, and member of the academy of sciences, and acquired great celebrity as an astronomer. By order of the French king, he visited in 1671, Uraniburg, and there assisted Tycho Brahe in his celestial observations, and after his return he was employed with Cassini in measuring an arc of the meridian in France. He died 1683. He wrote treatises on Levelling—on Measures—on Dioptries—on the Measurement of the Earth—An Account of his Observations at Uraniburg, besides communications to the memoirs of the French academies. He was also the first who applied a telescope to a quadrant.

PICARD, Louis Benedict, a celebrated French dramatist and romance writer, was born, in 1769, at Paris; and died there in 1824. For many years he was also a popular actor. He wrote nearly a hundred dramatic pieces, most of which were crowned with success. The collection of them forms ten octavo volumes. His romances, among which may be mentioned The History of Gabriel Desodry, The Gil Blas of the Revolution, and The Confessions of Laurence Giffard, are inferior to his comedies.

PICART, Michael, a native of Nuremberg, who was professor of philosophy and poetry at Altorf, where he died 1620, aged 46. He was the friend of Isaac Casaubon, and published Commentaries on some of Aristotle's works—Disputes—Harangues—Critical Essays—a Latin translation of Apian, 1604.—His Liber Singularis Periculorum Criticorum, was published at Nuremberg by John Sambert, thirty-seven years after his death.

PICCINI, Nicholas, a celebrated musician, born at Bari, in the kingdom of Naples. He was intended for the church by his father, but his fondness for music prevailed, and he had for his masters the famous Leo, and afterwards Durante, who saw and foretold his future celebrity. In 1754, he began to display his great abilities, and soon acquired the highest reputation in the cities of Italy. From Italy he went to Paris, and for awhile divided the applauses of the public with Gluck; but the climate of France was too severe for his weak constitution, and he returned to Naples. Instead, however, of being received with kindness, he was treated as a revolutionist, and accused before the government as a jacobin, mischievous and violent. Without the possibility of vindicating himself, he escaped from Italy and returned to France, and died at Passy, overpowered by age and misfortunes, 7th May, 1800, aged 72. In private life he was an amiable man, distinguished by benevolence, kindness, and affability. His operas, which he composed in Italy, are above one hundred in number, besides those performed in France, the best known of which are, Roland—Atys—Iphigenia in Tauris—and Dido. An account of his life and works has been published by his friend Ginguene at Paris.

PICCOLOMINI, James, an Italian ecclesiastic, born near Lucca. He became successively bishop of Massa, of Frescati, was made a cardinal 1461, and exchanged his name of Ammati for that of Piccolomini, out of respect for Pius II. his patron. He died 1479, aged 57. Sixtus IV. claimed the property which he had left at his death in the hands of his bankers, and appropriated part of it in the endowment of the hospital of the holy ghost. Piccolomini wrote Commentaries, or History of his own Times, from 1464 to 1469—besides Letters.

PICCOLOMINI, Alexander, author of several dramatic pieces, was born at Sienna, where he was coadjutor, and also archbishop of Patras. He died at Sienna, 12th March, 1578. He was the first who used the Italian language in philosophical subjects. His works are numerous, the best known of which are a treatise on the Sphere—Moral Institutes—a Theory of the Planets—and the Morality of Nobles. The work called, "Della Bella Creanza della Donne," is attributed to him.

PICHEGRU, Charles, a French general, born at Arbois in Franche Comte, 1761. Though of obscure birth, he received a good education among the monks of his native place, and then entering into the army, he rose from the ranks by gradual steps to command, and at the revolution obtained the office of general. His abilities were well known to his superiors, and therefore were usefully employed; and by the victory at Hagenau over the combined forces, he procured promotion, and was named commander in chief of the army of the north. The relief of Landau, the discomfiture of the Austrians under marshal Coubourg, and the able and rapid manœuvres by which he completed the conquest of Holland, tended strongly to recommend him to the national gratitude, and therefore he was elected in 1797 a member of the legislature. In this new office his conduct was firm and manly; but his opposition to the measures of the directory, drew upon him unpopularity, and he was one of those unfortunate victims who were accused of intentions to destroy the republic and restore royalty, and who were, without trial, and in the most arbitrary manner, sent with every mark of ignominy, prisoners to Cayenne. He had the good fortune to escape from this climate which proved so fatal to several of his fellow sufferers, and went to England. Here he remained an honorable exile till 1804, when he ventured to visit Paris in disguise; but so vigilant is an arbitrary government, he could not escape the eyes of the police, and as rumors of plots against the ruler of France were industriously circulated, he was seized with others on suspicion of machinations against the safety of the country, and immured in the Temple. A little time after, 6th April, 1804, he was discovered in his apartment, strangled by means of a black silk handkerchief, twisted round his neck with a short stick, taken from the faggot which was to light his fire. The position of his body was such that no struggle seemed to have been made in the agonies of expiring nature; but though it could easily be concluded that he had been assassinated, and that he could not possibly have been himself the cause of his own suffocation, the corpse was examined before a select number of medical men, and a prolix report was drawn up to prove that he had destroyed himself. So improbable an imputation against a man who had braved death in a thousand dangers, could not be believed even in the streets of Paris.

PICKERING, John, LL.D., and F. A. Acad. was born at Newington, New Hampshire, and graduated at Harvard college in 1761. He was an eminent lawyer, and sustained some of the first offices in the state with great respectability. He was a principal member of the convention which formed the constitution of New Hampshire, and was at the head of the administration from the period of governor Langdon's resignation in 1789, until a new election took place. In 1787, he was elected a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, but declined taking his seat in it. He was a judge of the supreme court of the state from 1790 to 1795, and at one period chief justice. Afterwards he was judge of the district court of the United States, for New Hampshire. For several years before his death his reason was impaired, and he was removed by impeachment in 1804. He died at Portsmouth, April 11th, 1805, aged 67.

PICKERING, Timothy, colonel, was born in Salem, Massachusetts, July 17th, 1745, of a respectable family. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1763, and, after the usual course of professional studies, was admitted to the practice of the law. When the dissensions between the mother country commenced, he soon became the champion and leader of the whigs of the quarter where he lived. He was a member of the committees of inspection and correspondence, and bore the entire burden of writing. The address which, in 1774, the inhabitants of Salem, in full town-meeting, voted to governor Gage on the occasion of the Boston port-bill, proceeded from his pen. A part of it, disclaiming any wish on the part of the inhabitants of Salem, to profit by the closing of the port of Boston, is quoted by Dr. Ramsay, in his History of the American Revolution. In April, 1775, on receiving intelligence of the battle of Lexington, he marched, with the regiment of which he was at the time commander, to Charlestown, but had not an opportunity of coming to action. Before the close of the same year, when the provisional government was organizing, he was appointed one of the judges of the court of common pleas for Essex, his native county, and sole judge of the maritime court (which had cognizance of all prize causes) for the middle district, comprehending Boston, with Salem and the other ports in Essex. These offices he held until he accepted an appointment in the army. In 1777, he was named adjutant-general by Washington, and joined the army then at Middlebrook, New Jersey. He continued with the commander-in-chief until the American forces went into winter quarters at Valley Forge, having been present at the battles of Brandywine and Germantown. He then proceeded to discharge the duties of a member of the continental board of war, to which he had been elected by congress, then sitting at Yorktown, Pennsylvania. In this station he remained until he was appointed to succeed general Greene in the office of quartermaster-general, which he retained during the residue of the war, and in which he contributed much to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. From 1790, to 1794, he was charged by president Washington with several negotiations with the Indian nations on our frontiers. In 1791, he was also made postmaster-general, and, in 1794, removed from that station to the secretaryship of war, on the resignation of general Knox. In 1795, he was appointed secretary of state in the place of Mr. Randolph. From that office he was removed by president Adams, in May, 1800. At the end of the year 1801, he returned to Massachusetts. In 1803, the legislature of that state chose him a senator to congress for the residue of the term of Dwight Foster, Esq., who had resigned, and, in 1805, re-elected him to the same station for the term of six years. After its expiration in 1811, he was chosen by the legislature a member of the executive council, and, during the war of 1812, he was appointed a member of the board of war for the defence of the state. In 1814, he was sent to congress, and held his seat until March, 1817. He then finally retired to private life. His death took place January 29, 1829, in the 84th year of his age. In his unassuming, colonel Pickering was plain and unassuming. In public life, he was distinguished for energy, ability, and disinterestedness; as a soldier, he was brave and patriotic; and his writings bear ample testimony to his talents and information. He was one of the leaders of the federal party in the United States.

PICTET, Benedict, a native of Geneva, who after studying in his native city, with great reputation, and travelling over Holland, England, and other parts of the continent, was honorably solicited to fill the chair of theology at Leyden. He declined the liberal offer, and preferred the divinity chair of his native town, which he filled with great ability. He died at Geneva 9th June 1724, aged 69. He was a most benevolent man, and a most pious and vigilant pastor. He was author of Christian Theology, 3 vols. 4to. in Latin—Christian Morality, 8 vols. 12mo.—History of the 11th and 12th centuries, 2 vols. 4to.—treatise against Religious indifferences—sermons—letters—and other religious tracts.

PICTET, Marcus Augustus, successor of the celebrated Saussure in the chair of philosophy at Geneva. He was born in that city in 1752, and he died there April 20, 1825, a correspondent of the French Institute, a member of the Royal Societies of London, Edinburgh, Munich, &c. In 1798 he belonged to a deputation appointed to negotiate the reunion of Geneva to the French republic, and to settle the debts of the ancient government. At the same time he was nominated one of the fourteen delegates to administer the funds destined for the support of the Protestant religion, and the establishments for public instruction. These employments did not prevent him from cultivating the physical sciences, to the study of which he was particularly devoted. He became a member and afterwards secretary of the tribunate; and on the dissolution of that body of the legislature, he was appointed one of the five inspectors-general of the imperial university. After the political events of 1814 he retired to his own country, and spent the latter part of his life in scientific occupation and commerce with his learned contemporaries. Among his works are, "Essai sur le Feu," 1791, 8vo; "Voyage de trois Mois en Angleterre en Ecosse et en Irlande," 1803, 8vo; besides contributions to the Journal de Paris, the Voyages de Saussure, the Lettres de Deluc, and the Histoire Littéraire de Genève, par Senéclier.

PICTET DE ROCHEMONT, Charles, brother of the foregoing, was born at Geneva 1755. At the age of 20 he entered into a Swiss regiment in the service of France, and ten years after returned to his native country. In 1692 he was employed to defend the city of Geneva against the attacks of the French under general Montesquiou; and in 1796, when the government was overturned by the French, he retired from the public service to devote his time to agriculture and literary pursuits. In conjunction with his brother and M. Maurice he conducted the Bibliothèque Universelle; and he also edited a Journal d'Agriculture, which he filled during twenty-nine years with instructive details, observations, and experiments made at his farm at Lancy, which became a model for rural establishments. The overthrow of the power of Napoleon led to his again engaging in the public service, and he was employed in missions to Paris, Vienna and Berlin, as minister plenipotentiary of the Helvetic confederation, after which he received from the diet a diploma of acknowledgement in the name of the twenty-two cantons. Honored and esteemed by his fellow citizens for his services, he resided at Geneva till his death, which took place December 29, 1824. He published "Traite des Assolimens, oul' Art d' établis des Rotations des Recoltes," 1801, 8vo; "Cours d' Agriculture," 10 vols. 8vo. and translations of Paley's Natural Theology, and Edgeworth's Practical Education.

PIDOU, Francis, lord of St. Olon, a native of Touraine, became gentleman in ordinary to Louis XIV. who discovered his abilities, and employed him as his ambassador to Madrid, Genoa, and Morocco. He acquitted himself much to the satisfaction of his master, and was made knight of St. Lazaris. He died at Paris, 1720, aged 80.

PIERRE, St. Jaques Henri Bernardin de, was born 1737 at Havre de Grace, where his parents, who were in easy circumstances, gave him a good education. But he embarked, at the age of twelve years, for Martinique, under the protection of one of his uncles, who commanded a merchant vessel. He soon returned, as he says in one of his letters, 'dissatisfied with his relative, with the sea, and with that island.' He then resumed his studies, and continued them successively at Gisors and at Rouen, under the Jesuits. His parents sent him to Paris to the school of civil engineers. He then entered into a corps of military engineers, and in the following year went to Malta. A quarrel determined him to embark for Holland with the intention of going to Portugal, then at war with Spain; but, an unforeseen obstacle preventing the execution of this design, he offered his services to Peter III. of Russia. He heard of the revolution, which precipitated that unfortunate monarch from the throne at this juncture, nevertheless he pursued his journey, under the idea of finding the empress Catherine at Petersburg; but on his arrival in that city he learned that she was at Moscow. He accordingly went thither, and obtained a commission as lieutenant in the corps of engineers, which he relinquished at the expiration of eighteen months. He then set out for France by way of Poland. That country was now convulsed by civil wars; he joined the party protected by France, and was taken prisoner by the Russians. Being released in a few days, he resided for some time at Warsaw, then visited Dresden, Berlin, and Vienna, with the intention of entering into the service of some foreign power; but, being unable to make up his mind on the subject, returned to Paris, and sailed for the Isle of France. Here he remained two years; but, the ordinary engineers considering him as an intruder, he quarrelled with them, and solicited and obtained permission to return home. Thus terminated his fruitless peregrinations and military career. At this period he commenced author. In 1773 was published his Voyage to the Isle of France, without his name. The Studies of Nature appeared at the end of 1784, when their author had attained the age of forty-seven years. Like Rousseau, his talents had no dawn, but suddenly burst forth in the full blaze of their splendor; his book was universally read, notwithstanding the well-founded censures of some natural philosophers, whose hostility was roused by his systems; and, in spite of the condemnation of a party, exasperated by his doctrines. The general voice of the public, and the applause of persons of taste, drowned those murmurs; new editions followed in rapid succession; the name of St. Pierre was enrolled among those of the best writers of France, and thenceforward poverty gave place to the comfort of honorable independence. Pensions and rewards now sought the man whom they had formerly shunned. The last lamented monarch of the house of Bourbon spontaneously appointed him intendant of the botanical garden and museum of natural history, with these words; 'I have read your book; it is the production of an honest man; and in you I have provided a worthy successor to M. de Buffon.' Under the Napoleon dynasty he received the cross of the legion of honor; and Joseph Buonaparte bestowed upon him, unsolicited, a pension of six thousand francs. Thus the declining years of St. Pierre were made comfortable; and, as he himself observes, 'his bark, long tossed by the tempest, advanced with propitious gales towards the haven of life.' In the first five years that succeeded the publication of the Studies of Nature, the author was engaged in preparing farther developments of his subject. He arranged his ideas slowly and leisurely; and, gradually disencumbering them of their first dress, at length clothed them in that delicate, picturesque, harmonious, and brilliant language which constitutes the charm of his works. This patient attention to the finishing of his compositions caused him to keep back, for several years, his Paul and Virginia, which he copied over seven or eight times. It was not published till 1789. Nearly at the same period he gave to the world the tale of the Indian Cottage, a production of a different stamp, in which satire was happily blended with that exquisite feeling for the physical and moral beauties of nature which pervades all the works of M. de St. Pierre. The fragments of the Arcadia, which he left unfinished, afforded the means of forming a complete idea of the original talents which he displayed as a painter and a colorist. He left behind him Harmonies of Nature, partly finished; Memoirs of his Life, and a number of irregular dramas and other sallies of imagination. He died 21st July, 1814.

PIERINO, or PIRING DEL VAGA, a native of Tuscany, son of a soldier, and nursed by a she goat. He was taught painting by Vaga, and exchanged the name of Buonapacorsi for that of his teacher. By great application he acquired extensive reputation, and was engaged by Raphael in the completion of his designs at Rome in the Vatican, and afterwards he embellished Doria's palace at Genoa, and adorned other cities of Italy with the extraordinary labors of his pencil. His passage of the Jordan, the fall of the walls of Jericho, the sun standing still at Joshua's command, are among his best pieces. He died of an apoplexy, 1547, in his 47th year.

PIERSON, Abraham, the first president of Yale college, which was then located in the town of Saybrook, Connecticut; but was afterwards removed to New Haven. Mr. Pierson was the son of a clergyman from England, of the same name, who, after officiating at Southampton, Long Island, and at Brantford, Connecticut, became the first minister of Newark, New Jersey. The subject of this article graduated at Harvard college in 1668, and was for twenty years colleague with his father at Newark. Subsequently he was installed minister of Killingworth Connecticut, and in 1701, on the establishment of the college, was chosen president, or rector, as he was styled. President Pierson was a fine scholar, a distinguished divine, and an impressive preacher. He wrote a system of natural philosophy which was studied in the college for many years. He died May 5, 1707, aged about 60 years.

PIGAFETTA, Anthony, a voyager of the sixteenth century, was one of eighteen companions of Magellan, who survived the voyage, and returned to Seville, in 1522. In 1524 he was made a knight of Rhodes. The time of his death is unknown. He wrote a Narrative of the Voyage, the MS. of which was supposed to be lost, but was discovered, some years ago, in the Ambrosian library at Milan.

PIGALLE, John Baptist, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris 1714. By the liberality of the elder Conston he was enabled to go to Italy, where with assiduous zeal he studied the works of the best masters. On his return, to France he was patronised by Louis, who made him knight of the order of St. Michael, and chancellor of the academy of painting. His best works are a Mercury and Venus, for the king, and presented by him to the king of Prussia—Saxe's Monument—the Statue of Louis XV.—Voltaire—a Boy holding a Cage—a Girl extracting a Thorn from her Foot. He died at Paris, 20th August 1785.

PIGANIOL DE LA FORGE, John Aymar de, a native of Auvergne, who acquired some eminence as a writer on geography and history. He is author of a Description Historical and Geographical, of France, 15 vols. 12mo. a work of merit,—a Description of Paris, 10 vols. 12mo. afterwards abridged in 2 vols. 12mo. Description of Versailles and Marly, 2 vols. 12mo. and Voyage de France 2 vols. This respectable man, amiable in private life, died at Paris, February 1753, aged 80.

PIGIUS, Albert, a native of Kampen in Overryssel, who studied at Cologne, and Louvaine, and was provost of St. John's church at Utrecht, where he died 1542, aged 52. He was author of Assertio Hierarchiæ Ecclesiasticæ, fol. and controversial works against Luther, Melancthon, and the other great reformers.

PIGIUS, Stephen Vinand, a learned German, nephew to Albert, was born at Kampen in Overryssel 1520. He was well versed in Roman antiquities, and was patronised by Cardinal de Granvelle, and by the prince of Juliers and Cleves, to whose son he was tutor. He died at Santen, where he was canon, in his 85th year. He published an edition of Valerius Maximus—Latin Annals of Rome, 3 vols. fol.—Hercules Prodicus, a panegyric on the premature death of his illustrious pupil, and other works.

PIGNEAUX, N., late bishop of Andran, was born in the department of the Aisne, in France, 1740. He went in 1770, with the authority of the pope, as a missionary to Cochin China, and gained the esteem of the king, Caung-Schung, who confided to him the education of his only son. The troubles which disturbed the empire of his protector, obliged him to fly to the town of Sat-Gond, whence he proposed invoking the assistance of France. The king had been surprised by three ambitious brothers, who overthrew his empire and forced him to seek an asylum in the isle of Pula-Wa. In 1787 the bishop departed for France, taking his pupil with him, and formed an offensive and defensive league between France and Cochin China, returning with the title of ambassador extraordinary to that kingdom. Before his arrival in Cochin China, the Revolution broke out, and all help was refused him. Still he did not lose his courage, but, going to the Isle of Pula-Wa, brought thence Caung-Schung, who, profiting by the discontent of his subjects, regained his empire in 1790. He now created Pigneaux his first minister, and under his direction founded several manufactories. The bishop translated for him a Treatise on Tactics, instituted schools, to which fathers of families were obliged to send their children at the age of four years, and died in 1800, when Caung-Schung caused him to be interred with the highest funeral honors of the Cochin Chinese.

PIKE, Zebulon Montgomery, a brigadier general in the army of the United States, was born at Lambertton, New Jersey, January 5th, 1779. When young he entered the army employed on the western frontier, as a cadet, and was some time after advanced to the rank of lieutenant. In 1805 he was employed at the head of a small party to explore the Mississippi, while Lewis and Clarke were sent on a similar errand up the Missouri. He was afterwards despatched to traverse the interior of Louisiana, and examine its principal rivers. He published an account of both those expeditions. In 1810 he received the commission of colonel; and at the commencement of the war, in 1812, was stationed on the northern frontier. In the beginning of 1813, he was appointed brigadier-general, and in April of that year despatched at the head of about 1500 troops against York, the capital of Upper Canada, and in a successful assault on that place was killed, with many of his troops, by an explosion of the magazine of the fort.

PILATE, Pontius, a Roman, governor of Judæa. It was before him that our Saviour was brought, and by him he was ignominiously condemned to death, through the fear of the Jews, though he asserted himself, from the tribunal, his innocence. Pilate was removed from Judæa by Tiberius for his cruelty and oppression, and sent an exile to Gaul, where he hanged himself, A.D. 57. The letter, said to be written by him, to Tiberius, giving an account of our Saviour, and his miracles, is spurious.

PILATRE DU ROSIER, Francis, a native of Metz, who learned the business of an apothecary in his native town, and then came to Paris, where he established a museum, and studied chemistry. The discovery of balloons by Montgolfier, roused all his attention, and he was one of the first who ventured to ascend the air in those frail and dangerous vehicles. After various successful experiments in the presence of the learned of Paris, and also of the Royal family, Pilatre formed the bold plan of passing over to England. He came to Boulogne, and on the 15th June, 1785, he, accompanied by his friend Romain, rose in a beautiful balloon before thousands of spectators, with the hopes of crossing the channel. Half an hour after, however, the machine caught fire, and the two unfortunate aeronauts were precipitated from a height of above 1500 feet to the ground, and dashed to pieces. Pilatre was taken up dead; but his companion showed signs of life for a few minutes. They were buried in the village of Winuille, where a monument records their merits and their misfortune.

PILES, Roger de, an ingenious painter, born at Clamecy, 1635. He studied at Nevers and Auxerre, and afterwards at Paris. He was tutor to Amelot, son of the president of that name, whom he attended when sent as ambassador to Venice, and other European courts, and thus had the opportunity of viewing the finest executions of art. After thus visiting Lisbon and Switzerland, he was in 1692, sent to Holland as a secret negotiator, but in character of a picture virtuoso. His intrigues, however, were discovered, and he was thrown into prison, from which the peace of Ryswick liberated him. In his confinement he wrote the lives of painters, and on his return to France received a pension. He died 1709, aged 74. He published besides a Translation of Dufresnoy—an Abridgment of Anatomy accommodated to Painting and Sculpture—Dissertation on the Works of Famous Painters—and Dialogues on the Knowledge of Painting.

PILKINGTON, Letitia, a lady of great wit and literary celebrity, daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, of Dutch extraction, was born in Dublin, 1712. She became early known for her poetical talents, and out of her many admirers she selected the Rev. Matthew Pilkington, author of some miscellanies, for her husband; but her union was attended with unhappiness. The husband grew jealous, and the wife rendered the quarrel more inveterate by her levity of conduct. They separated, but afterwards she followed her husband to London, and lived with him; but at last, the apprehension of a gentleman in her bed-room, at two o'clock in the morning, rendered the breach between them incurable. She attempted to vindicate herself by saying, that this nocturnal intruder was waiting for her reading a book, which he refused to lend; but the apology is as improbable as it is indelicate. She afterwards lived on the generosity of the great and the learned, and especially of Cibber, and at one time set up with a stock of five guineas, a small shop for books, in St. James's street. She died soon after at Dublin, 29th August 1750, aged 39. She wrote the Turkish Court, or London Apprentice, a comedy—the Roman Father, a tragedy—and Memoirs of herself, besides light poems of considerable merit.

PILON, Frederic, a native of Cork, in Ireland, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, under Dr. Cullen, but quitted it for the stage. Nature had not, however, formed him for eminence as an actor, and he had recourse to his pen, and commenced author, by the publication of an Essay on the Character of Hamlet, as performed by Henderson. He afterwards wrote the Invasion, or a Trip to Brighton, well received in 1778. He wrote besides the Humors of an Election, a farce, 1780—He would be a Soldier, a comedy, represented with applause at Covent Garden, 1786. This author, whose merit began to be liberally patronised by the town, and whose company was courted by the witty and the fashionable of the times, unfortunately gave way to debauched habits, and died of intemperance, 1788, aged 33.

PINÆUS, Severinus, or PINEAU, an eminent surgeon, born at Chartres, 1550. He became surgeon to the king, and acquired reputation in cutting for the stone, an operation then little understood. He published a Latin Treatise on the Marks of Virginity, much read, besides a French Account of Stones extracted from the bladder. He died at Paris, 1619.

PINCKNEY, Charles Cotesworth, major-general, a soldier of the revolution, was a native of South Carolina, and educated in England. On his return to Carolina in 1769 he engaged in the practice of the law. He early took up arms in defence of his country against oppression. He rose to the command of a regiment in his own state. He afterwards joined the northern army and was appointed aid de camp to Washington. He was intrusted with the defence of Sullivan's island. At the capture of Charleston he was among the prisoners. After peace he was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States. In 1796 he was appointed minister to France, and though the directory refused to receive him, he remained in Paris till February 1797, when he was ordered to quit the French territory. John Marshall and Elbridge Gerry were united with him as commissioners to France. When a demand of a loan was made as a pre-requisite to a treaty by some of the unaccredited agents of France, Pinckney replied, 'millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute.' After a short unsuccessful negotiation, passports were given to Pinckney and Marshall, while Gerry was invited to remain. He was nominated by Washington a major-general in the army, of which he accepted the command in the administration of president Adams. In 1800 he was one of the candidates for the office of president of the United States. He died 1825 aged 79.

PINCKNEY, Thomas, governor of South Carolina. He was a soldier of the American revolution. He was elected governor of South Carolina, 1787. He was minister from the United States to Great Britain during the administration of Washington. In 1800 he was a member of congress. He died 1828.

PINCKNEY, Charles, governor of South Carolina. He was a patriot of the American revolution. He was in the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. He was elected governor of South Carolina at four different elections between 1789 and 1808. He was a senator in congress in 1798. He was ambassador from the United States to Spain from 1801 to 1805. He died 1824 aged 66.

PINCKNEY, William, was a native of Maryland, and educated to the law. In 1796 he was appointed a commissioner under Jay's treaty, and resided in London eight years. In 1806 he was sent minister to England. In 1811 he returned to America and settled at Baltimore. The same year he was appointed attorney-general of the United States. In 1816 he was appointed minister to the courts of Naples and Russia, and returned in 1818. He was a member of the senate in 1820. He died 1822, aged 57.

PINDAR, prince of lyric poets, was born at Thebes in Bœotia. He was particularly happy in celebrating the conquerors at the public games of Greece, and his fame was so highly honored, that when Alexander sacked Thebes, he spared the house where the poet was born. He died about B.C. 440.

PINEAU, Gabriel du, a native of Angers, who was called to the bar, and came to Paris, where he acquired great celebrity by his genius and eloquence. His abilities were so respectable, and his opinions so disinterested, that he was confidentially consulted in all affairs of moment, so that he was made master of requests by Mary de Medicis, and by her son Louis XIII. mayor and captain general of the town of Angers. He was so universally respected that he acquired the extraordinary appellation of father of the people. He died 15th October 1644, aged 71. He was author of Latin Notes on the Canon Law, in opposition to Du Molin—Commentaries, Observations, and Consultations on various Questions on Custom and Law, with Dissertations, 4 vols. fol.

PINEDA, John, a learned jesuit, born at Seville. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and taught philosophy and theology in several colleges. He died 1637, much regretted. He wrote Commentaries on Job, 2 vols. fol.—and also on Ecclesiastes—a learned work De Rebus Solomonis, fol.—an Universal History of the Church, in Spanish, 4 vols. fol.—a History of Ferdinand II. in Spanish.

PINEL, Philip, member of the institute, and of the legion of honor, the Howard of the Insane, was born in 1745, at St. André, in the department of the Tarn, studied at Toulouse, and Montpellier, where he supported himself by teaching mathematics. In 1778, he went to Paris, and at first applied himself to the study of the sciences connected with medicine, but afterwards devoted himself entirely to that science itself. In 1791, he was made directing physician at the Bicêtre, an insane hospital, and, in 1794, at the Salpêtrière. The harsh treatment of the insane then in vogue, their chains and unhealthy dungeons, filled him with horror. He introduced gentle treatment, uniting firmness with kindness, and was the first definitely to recommend moral remedies (in his work Sur l'Aliénation mentale,) and one of the earliest to establish a regular police in the mad-houses. He also proved the existence of what he called manie sans délire. He placed less stress on physical treatments, and in particular he agreed with Bordeaux in condemning blood-letting. In general, he recommended delay. "What art cannot effect," he used to say, "time may accomplish." His pathology was founded on Condillac's system of philosophy, and was directed more to a consideration of the obvious phenomena, than to a thorough insight into the nature of diseases; yet his Nosographie philosophique, (Paris, 1798; 6th ed. 1818) formed an epoch in French medicine, as it supplied a want then generally felt. In many respects, Pinel is to be considered as the precursor of Bichat, since he was the first to point out the philosophical and pathological difference of the various textures. In the time of terror, Pinel concealed the unfortunate Condorcet (q. v.) in his house. In 1823, when the school of medicine was reformed by the government, M. Pinel was removed from his post on suspicion of entertaining liberal principles; and he died three years later, at the age of eighty-one years.

PINELLI, John Vincent, an Italian, son of a noble Genoese, was born at Naples 1533. He settled at Padua, where he showed his taste, and the fruit of his excellent education, by holding a learned correspondence with the most scientific men of Europe, and by making a noble collection of books, which, to his honor, was freely opened to the perusal of the curious. He died 1601, and his excellent library, enriched with the most valuable MSS. and the most curious specimens of antiquity, medal, and botany, was removed from Padua to Naples, where his descendants preserved it. In 1785, on the death of Maphæus, his descendant, who had been a learned printer at Venice, this noble collection passed into the hands of an English bookseller, and was sold in London by public auction in 1790.

PINGRE, Alexander Guy, librarian of St. Genevieve, was born at Paris, 14th September 1711. His great abilities, and his partiality for astronomy soon recommended him, and he was sent by the French government, in 1760, to the South seas, to observe the passage of Venus over the sun's disc. He afterwards went with Conrtaux, to Holland, to ascertain the accuracy of the sea time-pieces of Le Roy, and then embarked as historian on board of the Isis and Flora, on a voyage of discovery. He was, for his services to science, made marine astronomer, and admitted member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the Institute. This venerable philosopher died at Paris, 1796, aged 84. His works are, State of the Heavens from 1755 to 1757—Memoir on the Discoveries in the South Seas, 4to.—An Historical and Theoretical Treatise on Comets, 2 vols. 4to.—a translation of Manilius' Astronomy, 8vo.—History of Astronomy in the 17th Century—Memoirs of the Abbé Arnaud.

PINKERTON, John, a fertile but eccentric author, was born, in 1758, in Edinburgh. He was educated at Lanark Grammar School, and served five years as clerk to an attorney; after which he settled in London, and gave himself up to literature. He began his career by poetical productions, among which were, Rhymes, Odes, and Tales, but he did not rise above mediocrity. In emulation of Chatterton he also produced two volumes of pretended Ancient Scottish Poems. One of his earliest works was Letters on Literature, under the assumed name of Robert Heron, in which he displayed a degree of vanity and impudence which has seldom been equalled. In his latter years he took up his abode in France; and he died at Paris, March 10, 1826. One of the singularities of Pinkerton was his utter aversion of every thing Celtic. Among the works of this indefatigable writer are, an excellent Essay on Medals; The Treasury of Wit; A Dissertation on the Origin of the Scythians and Goths; A History of Scotland; Inconographia Scotia; Modern Geography; A Collection of Voyages and Travels; Recollections of Paris; and Petralogy, or a Treatise on Rocks.

PINTO, Ferdinand Mendez, a celebrated Portuguese traveller, was born, in 1510, at Montemor o Velho, and became a mariner at the age of thirteen. In the course of his peregrinations he visited Abyssinia, India, China, Siam, and many other oriental countries, and was several times reduced to a state of slavery. In 1558 he returned to Portugal, and published a narrative of his travels. The date of his death is unknown. Some of his stories are so extraordinary that they caused his authority to be discredited, and Pinto was long a synonyme for an enormous liar; but there is now reason to believe that he has been treated with injustice.

PINZON, Vincent Yanez, a Spanish navigator, accompanied Columbus on his memorable voyage; was the first European who crossed the line; discovered Brazil, and the river Amazons; was appointed one of the royal pilots; and died in the early part of the sixteenth century.

PIOZZI, Hester Lynch, a miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was Salisbury, was born, in 1739, at Bodvel, in Carnarvonshire; and was united, in 1763, to Mr. Thrale, an opulent brewer. For many years Dr. Johnson was the intimate friend of her and her husband. After the death of Mr. Thrale she accepted the addresses of Signor Piozzi; an act which occasioned a dissolution of her friendship with Johnson. For a considerable period, she resided at Florence with her second husband, and while there she contributed to the Florence Miscellany. She died at Clifton, in 1821. Among her works are, Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson; Observations in a Journey through France, Italy, and Germany; British Synonymy; and Retrospection.

PIPER, Count, counsellor of state and first minister to Charles XII. of Sweden, was taken prisoner by the Russians, at the fatal battle of Pultowa, and conveyed to Petersburg. His captivity was rendered more dreadful, as the Czar Peter suspected him to be the cause of the war which Charles had undertaken against Russia. He died in the fortress of Schlüsselburg 1716, aged 70, and his remains were delivered to the Swedish monarch, who by a magnificent funeral atoned for the hardships which his minister had endured.

PIRANESI, John Baptist, an eminent architect and engraver, born at Venice. He settled at Rome, where he acquired great celebrity. His style of etching was so free that he generally drew all at once upon the plate without a previous sketch, so that his plates were very numerous and equally well finished. His engravings have been collected in several vols. folio, containing a very great number of most interesting and valuable plates. He was intimate with some of the English artists, especially Mylne, the architect of Blackfriars bridge, and promised to dedicate one of his works to lord Charlemont, but erased, in consequence of a quarrel, the name of his patron from his plates. He died about 1778.

PIRANESI, Francis, a son of the foregoing, and the inheritor of his genius, was born, in 1748, at Rome. The magnificent works begun by his father he continued with such a kindred spirit that the labors of the parent and son cannot be distinguished from each other; and he executed many others of equal magnitude. He died at Paris, in 1810.

PIROMALLI, Paul, a Dominican of Calabria, sent as a missionary into the East. During his residence in Armenia he converted to the catholic faith several Eutycheans and other heretics, and after visiting Persia and Georgia, he returned to Europe to represent Urban VIII. as his nuncio in Poland. On his return to Italy he was seized by pirates and carried to Tunis, and when set at liberty he was received by the pope with every mark of kindness and esteem. After revising an Armenian bible, he was again sent into the East, and appointed bishop of Nassivan. After a residence of nine years there he returned to Italy, and died three years after, at Basignano, 1667. He was a zealous and most learned ecclesiastic. He was author of Controversial and Theological Tracts—two Dictionaries, the one Latin-Persian, and the other Armenian-Latin—an Armenian Grammar—and a Directory.

PIRON, Alexis, a French poet, dramatist, and wit, was born, in 1689, at Dijon, and was about to become a barrister, when family misfortunes compelled him, not very reluctantly, to relinquish the bar. He went to Paris, and for a while earned a scanty subsistence as a copyist. To write for the stage was his next resource. He began by composing pieces for the theatre of the Comic Opera, and Harlequin Deucalion was his first effort. In 1728 he tried the regular drama, and produced the comedy of The Ungrateful Son. It was not, however, till 1738, that he gained a place among the highest class of dramatists, by his admirable comedy of Metromania, which is justly considered as a masterpiece. He died in 1773. His works form seven octavo volumes.

PISANI, Victor, a Venetian general who distinguished himself against the Genoese and the Dalmatians. An unfortunate expedition turned his popularity into public odium, but the sentence of death was changed into imprisonment for five years. At the expiration of his confinement the sailors of Venice loudly demanded him to conduct them against the Genoese, who threatened their country with a dreadful war, and he was received with acclamations, and led his countrymen to victory. He died in the midst of his successes, 1330.

PISCATOR, John Fischer, professor of theology at Strasburg, was obliged to fly to Herborn, on embracing the tenets of the Calvinists. He was author of valuable Commentaries on the Old and New Testaments—Amica Collatio de Religione cum C. Vorstio, 4to. and died 1546.

PISISTRATUS, an Athenian, who flourished in the fifth century before the Christian era, and was distinguished for eloquence and valor. He thrice obtained the sovereign authority at Athens. Twice he was expelled, and in the last instance he remained eleven years in exile, before he could again seize the reins of power. He died about B.C. 527. Though bearing the name of a tyrant, Pisistratus was just and liberal. He established a public library at Athens, and collected the poems of Homer in their present form.

PISO CNEIUS, a Roman consul, accused of poisoning Germanicus in Syria, upon which he destroyed himself A.D. 20. A senator of that family assumed the imperial purple on Valerian's death, but was defeated by Valens, and put to death 261.

PISSELET, Anne de, a woman of great beauty, born in Picardy. She was one of the maids of honor to Louisa the mother of Francis I. and she captivated the heart of the young prince. More freely to enjoy her company, he married her to John de Brosse, who in thus assenting to a disgraceful union, recovered some lands which his family had lost, and rose to the rank of duke of Etampes, that his guilty wife might shine with greater splendor in a corrupt court. Though the new duchess had a polished mind, and deserved to be called the fairest of the learned, and the most learned of the fair, yet she used her powerful influence to crush her enemies; and to enrich herself she hesitated not to betray the secrets of the state to the emissaries of Charles V. After the death of Francis she retired to one of her estates in the country, by order of the next king, Henry II. and there she died neglected and despised, 1576. In the last years of her life she became a convert to the principles of the protestants.

PISTORIUS, John, D.D., a native of Nidda, who studied medicine and afterwards the law, and became counsellor to the margrave of Baden Durlach. Some time after he again changed his profession, and abandoning the protestant tenets embraced the catholic faith, and became a doctor of divinity, counsellor to the emperor, and provost of the cathedral of Breslaw, and prelate to the abbot of Fulda. He was author of treatises against the Lutherans—Artis Cabalisticæ Scriptores, a curious collection—Scriptores Rerum Polonicarum—Scriptores de Rebus Germanicis, 3 vols. fol. a valuable collection. He died 1608, aged 52.

PITCAIRNE, Archibald, an able physician, of an ancient family, born at Edinburgh, 25th December 1652. From Dalkeith school he was removed to Edinburgh, and applied himself to divinity, and afterwards to civil law; but at last adopted physic and mathematics as his favorite profession. He studied for some time at Paris, and on his return to Scotland, excited the public attention by a small publication in which he disputed the right of Harvey to the discovery of the circulation of the blood, which he asserted was fully known to Hippocrates. In 1692, he was invited to Leyden, where he accepted a chair as professor of medicine; but the next year he returned to Scotland and married. He acquired here greater reputation by his pen than by his profession. His Dissertationes Medicæ, appeared 1701, and were again edited 1713. He wrote besides some obscure Latin satirical poems, chiefly levelled against the friends of the revolution, which he by no means approved. He died 1713. His Leyden lectures were published after his death. His only daughter married the earl of Kelly.

PITHOU, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Troyes, 1539. He studied at Paris under Turnebus, and at Bourges under Cujacius, and soon became distinguished at the bar as a learned and eloquent civilian. He escaped with difficulty the slaughter of St. Bartholomew, and as if the catastrophe influenced his opinion he immediately embraced the Romish faith. He visited England in the retinue of the duke of Montgomery, and so great was his character for learning and integrity, that Ferdinand, duke of Tuscany, referred some intricate points to his impartial decision, and the third and fourth Henries employed his abilities, not only to oppose the league, but to support the Gallican church against the usurpations of the Roman pontiff. Pithou died on his birth day 1596. He published some valuable works on law, history, and classical literature, and to his indefatigable industry we are indebted for the discovery of Phædrus, of the Novella of Justinian, and other ancient books buried in obscurity. The best known of his works are treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church, 4 vols. fol.—Commentary on the Customs of Troyes, 4to. and notes on authors.

PITHOU, Francis, brother of Peter, was born at Troyes 1544, and became procureur general of the chamber of justice under Henry IV. against the financiers, and afterwards was admitted into the king's council. He discovered the fables of Phædrus, which he published conjointly with his brother. He was a learned and amiable man, and published of his own a comparison of the laws of the Romans with those of Moses, 12mo.—an edition of the Salique Law with notes—treatise on the Greatness and the Rights of the French Monarchy, 8vo.—an edition of Comes Theologus—Observationes ad Codicem, fol.—Antiqui Rhetores Latini, Rutilius Lupus, and Aquila Romanus. He died universally respected 7th February 1621.

PITISCUS, Samuel, a learned man, born at Zutphen, 1637. He studied at Deventer and Groningen, and was elected master of the school at Zutphen, and afterwards obtained the direction of the college of Jerome at Utrecht, where he died 1717. He was author of several learned works, Lexicon Latino Belgicum. 4to.—Lexicon Antiquitatum Romanorum, fol.—besides an edition of Rufinus' Rom. Antiquities—and editions of Suetonius, Q. Curtius, Aurelius Victor.

PITKIN, William, governor of Connecticut, was elected in 1766. He was appointed a judge of the supreme court in 1741, and chief justice in 1754. In this office he succeeded Mr. Fitch, and continued until chosen governor. In 1754, he was one of the delegates to the convention at Albany, and a member of the committee appointed to draw up the plan of union which was adopted on that occasion. He died at East-Hartford October 1st, 1769.

PILOT, Henry, a French mathematician, who was born at Aramion in the diocese of Uses, 29th May, 1695, and died there 27th December 1771. He was self-taught in mathematical knowledge, but so respectable that he gained the friendship of the great Reaumur, and in 1724, was admitted into the academy of sciences. He was in 1740, appointed by the states of Languedoc, their chief engineer, and he embellished the province with various monuments of his genius and abilities. He also conveyed water to Montpellier, from a distance of nine miles, by canals, which must ever excite the admiration of travellers. He was, in 1754, honored with the order of St. Michael, and he had been long before elected member of the Royal society of London, in consequence of his treatise on the Theory of the Management of Vessels, 1731, which was translated into English and much applauded. He enriched the memoirs of the French academies with valuable communications.

PITS, or PITSEUS, John, D.D., an English biographer, born at Alton, Hants, 1560, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. After two years' residence at Oxford he went to Donay, and thence to Rheims, and next to Rome, where he studied seven years, and became a priest. The civil wars of France drove him from the country to Lorraine, and afterwards to Germany. By the patronage of cardinal Lorraine he obtained a canonry at Verdun, and afterwards was confessor to the duchess of Cleves for twelve years. He next was promoted to the deanery of Verdun, where he died 1616. He wrote an useful work collected from English history, containing the lives of the kings, bishops, apostolical men, and writers of England, in four large volumes; but of these only part was published under the title of "de Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus," and some other works.

PITT, Christopher, an English poet, born at Blandford 1699, and educated at Winchester school, where he distinguished himself so much, that when chosen to college he presented to his electors a poetical translation of Lucan's Pharsalia, which unfortunately is not now extant. In 1722, he obtained from his relation Mr. Pitt of Stratfield-sea, the living of Pimpern, Dorsetshire, and after taking his master's degree in 1724, he went to reside in his native country. He closed a life of benevolence and virtue 1748, and was buried at Blandford, where a stone records the candor and simplicity of his manners, and asserts that he lived innocent and died beloved. He is chiefly known as the author of an eloquent translation of the Æneid, which rivals Dryden's, but of which it may be said, that while Pitt pleases the critic, Dryden charms the people, and that Pitt is quoted while Dryden is read; each indeed possesses peculiar beauties, but if Dryden is admired for his vigor, Pitt is entitled to the highest commendation for the excellence of his lines, and the correctness of his versification. He also translated Vida's Art of Poetry, and wrote besides some poems published in an 8vo. vol.

PITT, William, earl of Chatham, an illustrious statesman, born 15th November 1708. His father was Robert Pitt, Esquire, of Boconnock in Cornwall, and his grandfather Thomas, was the governor of Madras. The young statesman was educated at Eton, and in 1726, he entered at Trinity college, Oxford, which he left for the military profession, and the rank of cornet. A different field of action, however, was destined for the exhibition of his powers, and in 1735, he was elected into parliament for Old Sarum, and soon began to distinguish himself as an eloquent and well informed speaker. He enlisted early in the ranks of opposition against Walpole, and his speeches against the Spanish convention, and against the bill for registering seamen, displayed such acuteness, vehemence, and depth of argumentation as astonished the house, and marked him as worthy of the highest offices of the state. The duchess of Marlborough, also the inveterate enemy of Walpole, applauded the patriotism of the young orator, and in her will left him an honorable legacy of £10,000 for defending, as she said, the laws of his country, and preventing its ruin. In 1746, his abilities were solicited to support the administration which had succeeded to Walpole, and he became joint vice-treasurer of Ireland, and soon after treasurer, and pay-master of the army, and privy-counsellor. In 1755, he resigned; but though the next year he received the seals of secretary of State for the Southern department, his continuance in office was of short duration; the public voice of applause, however, accompanied him in his retirement, and had such effect on the government, that in June 1757, he was reinstated in his office of secretary. The restoration of this favorite of the people to power, was the beginning of a new era of splendid conquests, and of national glory. The arms of England proved everywhere successful in consequence of the judicious plans of the new minister; Quebec was conquered, the French were defeated in Africa and in the East, and the shores of Europe too witnessed the bravery and the victories of the British by sea and land. The death of George II. in the midst of these brilliant achievements, and the accession of George III. was soon followed by the resignation of the popular minister, who refused to co-operate with an administration, which by the influence of lord Bute, as it is supposed, thwarted his vigorous measures. His retirement was accompanied not only by the regrets of the nation, but by the honorable grant of a peerage to his lady, and a pension of £3000. The peace of 1763, was censured by this sagacious patriot, who declared that England from the extent of her victories was entitled to more solid advantages; yet whilst he blamed the minister, he did not continue a petulant and capricious opposition, but remained silent till the question of general warrants in 1764, called forth all his eloquence, and the keenness of his satire against the illegality and oppression of those unpopular engines of arbitrary power. In 1766, he was prevailed upon to accept the privy seal in the administration, and with an earldom; but he resigned the office November 1763, and ever after refused to be connected with the government. His health indeed declined, and a hereditary gout helped to undermine his constitution, without, however, diminishing the energetic powers of his mind. When the subject of the American war engaged the attention of the public, lord Chatham burst forth from his retirement, and, in his place in the house of lords, vindicated the honors of his country, and deprecated severe measures against the discontented colonists. On one of these occasions, after the duke of Richmond had replied to his powerful and convincing arguments in favor of conciliation, the venerable peer rose up to answer the speech of his opponent, but his debilitated constitution sunk under the attempt, and he fell in a fit into the arms of those who were near him. This extraordinary event, which exhibited a favorite statesman breathing his last, whilst he uttered the most animated sentiments for the honor, the glory, and the independence of his country, happened 8th April, 1778, and he died on the ensuing 11th May. All ranks and all parties now united to pay due respect to the memory of the departed patriot; the unpopularity which for a while had obscured his career, because he had accepted a pension and a peerage, had now disappeared in his unshaken character of the statesman, and the sagacious defender of the liberties of his country. As a statesman, says one of his biographers, lord Chatham was born with all the graces of the orator, and possessed every requisite to bespeak respect and even awe. A manly figure and penetrating look, fixed attention and commanded reverence, and the keen lightning of his eye spoke the high spirit of his soul, even before the lips had begun utterance. The most fluent and ready orators have shrunk back appalled from his all-powerful eloquence. He had not indeed the correctness of language so striking in the great Roman orator, but he had the verba ardentia, the bold glowing words, which darted with such irresistible efficacy, that Walpole, surrounded with power and the unshaken support of a decided majority, never heard his voice in the house of commons without being alarmed and thunderstruck.

PITT, William, a celebrated statesman, second son of the preceding, was born at Hayes, 23th May, 1759. From his earliest years he was instructed by his father, who foresaw the future greatness of his son, and taught him to argue with logical precision, and to speak with elegance, correctness, and force. He entered as student at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar, and afterwards went once or twice on the western circuit, where he was occasionally employed as junior counsel. A higher situation, however, awaited him. At the general election, he was proposed as member for Cambridge university, but few seconded his pretensions, and the next year he obtained a seat for Appleby, on the interest of sir J. Lowther. In the house, he enlisted on the side of opposition against lord North and the American war; and his first speech in support of Mr. Burke's bill, displayed that commanding eloquence which many of the members had before so warmly applauded in his illustrious father. The first motion which he offered to parliament was for the more equal representation of the people in parliament; and though it was lost by a small majority, it rendered him a popular and a leading member in the Commons. On the death of lord Rockingham, he accepted, at the age of 22, the office of chancellor of the exchequer; and under the administration of which he formed a part, the American war was concluded. Though he ably defended the conduct of his colleagues, the terms of the peace were regarded by the majority of the nation as unpopular, and the ministry was dissolved. Restored to privacy, Mr. Pitt passed some months on the continent; and after visiting Italy, and several of the German courts, he returned to England, and on the dismissal of the coalition administration of Mr. Fox and lord North, he was selected for the arduous office of first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer, 18th December, 1783. Thus seated at the head of affairs, he bent the great powers of his mind to the framing of a bill for the regulation of India affairs, which might be more palatable to the nation, and less objectionable than that of Mr. Fox. His attempts, however, were at first unavailing, as his predecessors, though dismissed from office, still retained their influence in the Commons; and in consequence of this struggle between the house and the king's prerogative, an appeal was made to the sense of the nation in a new parliament. The people warmly seconded the measures of the youthful premier, and the new parliament not only approved of his India bill, but adopted his financial system for the reduction of the national debt by a sinking fund, and cemented the commercial treaty which, under his auspices, had been concluded with France, on a basis advantageous to the interests and the prosperity of England. Hitherto popular and successful as a peace minister, Mr. Pitt had next to contend with a new and formidable hydra in the French revolution. The murder of the French king, and the ambitious views of the rulers of France, were productive of disputes with England, and war was declared in 1793. During the continuance of hostilities for eight years, in situations where all precedents were unavailing, and all the political principles of former times disregarded, the premier conducted the affairs of the nation with that vigor and manly energy which future historians will celebrate to his honor and glory. Amidst the political cares of the continent, his mighty mind planned, in 1800, the union with Ireland, which, though at first opposed upon national and constitutional grounds, was completed under his auspices. He soon after retired from the head of affairs, in consequence of disputes with respect to the catholic emancipation; but more probably to make room for an administration which might, with more propriety, and greater probability of success, negotiate a peace with France. The insidious peace of Amiens, effected under the administration of Mr. Addington, met with the approbation of Mr. Pitt, as the most advantageous which the situation of the continent, and the gigantic power of France could allow, and in 1804, he was again replaced at the head of affairs. Difficulties, however, surrounded him on all sides; many of his old colleagues had joined the ranks of opposition, and not a few condemned the method by which he had regained his ascendancy in the king's councils, and it may be asserted that all the complicated machine of government was to be directed, in all its minute parts, by him alone. In the mean time, while public affairs assumed the most threatening aspect, a hereditary gout weakened the delicate constitution of the minister, and the seeds of the illness under which he labored, in 1802, and which had never been completely eradicated, produced the most alarming debility in the nervous system. He expired on the 23d January, 1806, and the last words which quivered on the dying lips of this most extraordinary and patriotic man, were, Oh, my country! To appreciate the character of so mighty a mind is no easy task. His history is the history of civilized nations; as his counsels directed or influenced every measure which was carried into execution in every corner of the habitable globe. To him particularly belonged constancy and steadiness of purpose and principle, a pride of superiority, arising from the consciousness of great talents, and firm integrity; and when, therefore, he had fixed upon an end, he maintained his opinion against all obstacles. This firm adherence to principles which eventually might be erroneous, was indeed a foible; but it was the foible of a great genius, and of a lofty mind. His eloquence, if it did not possess the vehemence of Fox, nor the brilliant splendor of Burke, was always correct, powerful, and convincing; he had a perfect command of language, and in the arrangement of his matter, he was natural and luminous; without art, without affectation. Thus elevated above the rest of the world, in situation, in talents, and in character, it is not a matter of surprise, that he had not only political, but private detractors, and that at a period when obloquy is hurled against whatever is most dignified and sacred among mankind, his conduct was attributed to motives of pride, of ambition, and of tyranny. Envy, indeed, as one of his biographers observes, may revile, and self-interest may seek to blacken; but his fame, in spite of every effort to blast it, in spite of all the assaults of little and low minds, will flourish while this kingdom, or its language shall last. No state chicanery, no narrow system of vicious politics sunk him to the level of the guilty great.

PIUS IV., John Angelo, cardinal de Medicis, brother of the famous marquis de Marignan, and not of the Florence family, was born at Milan, 1499. He was early distinguished by his merit, and employed by Clement VII. and his successors in several honorable embassies, and in 1549, he was created a cardinal, by Julius III. He succeeded to the popedom on the death of Paul IV., 1559, and evinced his zeal for the church by his enmity against the Turks and against heretics. He re-established the council of Trent, and when it separated in 1563, he affirmed its decrees by a bull. A conspiracy formed against him by Benedict Accolti and others, in 1565, was discovered, and the conspirators punished. He died 9th December, 1565, aged 66.

PIUS V., Michael Ghisleri, was born at Bosco in Tortona, 17th January, 1504, and embraced the Dominican order. He was made archbishop of Sutri by Paul IV., and afterwards appointed inquisitor-general in the Milanese and in Lombardy, where his proceedings were often marked by cruelty and oppression. He was elected pope after Pius IV., 1566; but though in this new dignity he attempted to reform the morals of Rome and of his church, and to correct abuses, his measures frequently degenerated into severity, and rendered him unpopular among his subjects. His publication of the bull called In Cena Domini, by which he attempted to enforce the power and superior jurisdiction of the papal see in temporal affairs, raised him many enemies. He joined his forces to those of the Spaniards and Venetians, against the Turks, and under his auspices, the famous battle of Lepanto was fought 1571, in which the infidels were so dreadfully defeated. He died of the stone, 30th April, 1572, aged 68, and he was regarded as so formidable that the Sultan Selim noticed his death by three days of public rejoicings. Some of his letters have been published.

PIUS VI., John Angelo Braschi, was born at Cesena, 27th December, 1717. He was patronised by Benedict XIV., who made him treasurer of the apostolical chamber, and he was raised to the rank of cardinal, by Ganganelli, whom he succeeded on the papal throne, 1775. His reign was one of the longest, and likewise one of the most unfortunate in the Roman history. His government was marked by popular and useful measures; he repressed abuses, punished the speculation of his officers, and labored successfully in completing the noble museum of the Vatican, begun by his predecessor, by the collection of vases, medals, statues, and monuments, which were dispersed through the ecclesiastical states. Of this valuable treasure, a magnificent account, with engravings, has appeared in 6 vols. fol. From the arts Pius turned his attention to commerce, the port of Ancona was repaired and embellished, and the Pontine marshes were drained of their pestilential waters. This labor which had engaged the attention of the ancient Romans, and had been attempted by Augustus, and some of his successors, and by several popes, was regarded as an object of great public utility. To convert to purposes of agriculture and commerce, the vast marshes which extend from the Appenines to the sea, and from Astura to Terracina and the Neapolitan frontiers, and to remove those noxious vapors which render the neighboring lands unhealthy and dangerous to the inhabitants, was reserved in some degree for the perseverance of Pius. At Rome, Pius adorned the city with a new church and some hospitals, and in the provinces his magnificence was equally displayed. In his character he was mild, and in his conduct hospitable, and Joseph II., of Germany, Paul of Russia, and other princes, were witnesses of his kindness and of his virtues. In ecclesiastical affairs, though he was successful against the innovations of Leopold in Tuscany in 1775, he found himself unable to stop the reforming hand of the German emperor. The suppression of monasteries, and the rejection of the papal superiority in Germany alarmed the Roman see; and Pius repaired in person to Vienna; but though treated with deference and respect, the innovations of the imperial reformer could not be checked. Pius had fresh troubles to meet in Italy, and the court of Naples disputed his right of nomination to the sees of Naples and Potenza. The payment of a tribute on the accession of the Neapolitan monarch to the throne, at last settled the dispute; but new quarrels arose with the Venetians and the court of Modena, when the French revolution began to engage the attention of Europe, and in its rapid vortex to drown all inferior considerations. Pius naturally disapproved of the conduct of the French reformers, who levelled their impious hands against all ecclesiastical establishments, and he embraced the cause of the allies. He received with kindness the banished priests, and this particularly drew upon him the vengeance of the French rulers. Buonaparte was directed to attack the Roman states, and after taking Urbino, Bologna, and Ancona, he checked his conquests, and offered peace to the sovereign pontiff, on condition of his paying a large sum of money, and of sending to Paris the choicest pieces in painting and sculpture preserved at Rome. A reconciliation thus tyrannically effected, proved not of long duration. Basseville, the new French ambassador, behaved with such haughtiness, that the indignant Romans assassinated him, 1793; and though the pope was incapable of preventing this horrid deed, yet his enemies easily persuaded themselves that he was privy to it. The subsequent death of Duphot, who in the midst of Rome, while he attempted to restore order and tranquillity, was stabbed fatally, called on the French government for severe measures. Rome was therefore taken by the orders of Buonaparte, and the captive pope dragged a prisoner from his palace, and conveyed amidst the insults of the French soldiery, first to Sienna, and afterwards across the Alps into France. At Briançon, his presence converted the tumults and the ferocity of his oppressors into admiration and reverence, and at a moment when he expected to be murdered by them, he saw the enraged multitude suddenly moved with compassion, and fall down at his feet. From Briançon, he passed on to Gap, Grenoble, Voiron, and to Valence, where he was permitted to rest. Here his sufferings were completed; after an illness of eleven days, from fatigue and old age, he died 29th August, 1793, aged 82. This prelate, so well known by his misfortunes, was possessed of many virtues, and the humility, patience, and meekness, with which he endured the indignities of his barbarous persecutors, entitled him to universal veneration.

PIZARRO, Francis, the conqueror of Peru, was the illegitimate son of a gentleman by a woman of low condition, and born at Truxillo. Though thus obscurely born, and obliged to keep hogs for his support, he possessed an undaunted courage, and embarked for America with other adventurers. In 1524, fired with the love of glory, he united with Almagro and Lucque, to go in quest of new undiscovered countries. After incredible hardships and unceasing perseverance, he was enabled to penetrate into Peru, 1531, where he seized perfidiously the monarch Atahualpa, and afterwards cruelly and inhumanly put him to death. The possession of an opulent kingdom, and the servile submission of the inhabitants, did not inspire the Spaniards with the love of ease and tranquillity, but produced quarrels, and Almagro and Pizarro met in arms, 1538, to decide their superiority. Almagro was defeated and put to death; but the son and the friends of the fallen chief united against their oppressor, and Pizarro was assassinated in his palace, after making an obstinate resistance, 26th June, 1541. This bold adventurer, who knew not even how to read, was fully formed for command. He laid the foundations of the city of Lima, and might deserve the name of a hero, were not perfidy and cruelty indelible stains on his character.

PIZZI, Joachim, a native of Rome, educated among the jesuits, and made, in 1759, director of the academy of Arcades. He possessed genius as a poet, and vigor and correctness as a writer. His works are the Vision of Eden, a poem in four cantos—the Triumph of Poetry, a poem—Discourse on Tragic and Comic Poetry—Dissertation on an Antique Cameo. He died 1790, aged 74.

PLACCIUS, Vincent, an able philologist, born at Hamburg, 1642. He studied at Helinstadt and Leipsic, and after travelling over France and Italy, he was made professor of eloquence and morals in his native city, where he died 1699, much respected and beloved. He published Theatrum Anonymorum, et Pseudonymorum, 2 vols. fol.—Liber de Juris Consulto Perito, 8vo.—de Arte Excerptandi, 8vo.—Carmina Juvenilia, 8vo.

PLACETTE, John de la, a protestant minister, born at Pontac in Bearn 1639. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Denmark, and then to Holland, and settled at the Hague, and lastly at Utrecht, where he died 1718. He wrote Moral Essays, 6 vols. 12mo.—treatise on Pride, 8vo.—on Conscience, translated into English by Basil Kennet—on Good Works—on Restitution—Christian Reflections, and a treatise against Bayle on the Origin of Evil, and the Trinity.

PLATER, George, was a judge of the court of appeals of Maryland, and after the revolution, governor of the state; under the old confederation he was a delegate to congress, and in 1788 was president of the convention of Maryland, which ratified the federal constitution. He died at Annapolis, February 10th, 1792, aged 56.

PLATINA, Bartholomew Sacchi, a learned Italian, born at Piedena, near Crenona, 1421. He abandoned the military life for the church, and going to Rome, by the friendship and protection of cardinal Bessarion, he obtained some preferment, and was appointed apostolical abbreviator. He was deprived of this office, which was abolished by the succeeding pope Paul II. but when he respectfully complained of the treatment, as he had purchased the place, he was indignantly rejected by the sovereign pontiff, and even imprisoned and put to the rack. The next pope Sixtus IV. made amends for his sufferings, and appointed him to be librarian to the Vatican. He died of the plague 1481. He wrote the Lives of the Popes, printed first at Venice, 1479, folio—History of Mantua—the Life of Nerio Cappani, and some other works, all in Latin, and collected in fol. 1752.

PLATO, a celebrated philosopher of Athens. He was the pupil of Socrates, after whose death he travelled into various countries, and then settled at Athens, where his lectures were attended by numerous and respectable auditors. After a life devoted to virtue and philosophy, he died at Athens, 348 B.C. aged 81. His writings are very valuable, as not only his language is very beautiful and correct, but his philosophy sublime, so that some writers have imagined he drew many of his opinions concerning the Supreme Being, from the writings of Moses, while he resided among the Egyptian priests.

PLAUTUS (MARCUS ACCIUS) a celebrated comic writer of antiquity, was a native of Sarsina, a small town in Umbria. His real name was Marcus Accius; he is thought to have received the surname of Plautus from his ill formed and splay feet. He is supposed to have been the son of a slave, but few particulars of his life are known. Cicero fixes the period of his death, B.C. 184, in the first year of the elder Cato's censorship, when Lucius Portius Licinius and Claudius Pulcher were consuls. The comedies of Plautus were so much esteemed in his own time that he gained considerably by them; but unfortunately entering into trading speculations he was ruined, and at the time of a general famine he was obliged to work at the mill, and during this drudgery he composed three plays. The original number of his plays is uncertain, only twenty remain, and not all perfect. Such was the admiration in which they were held by the Romans, that some of them were performed on solemn occasions so late as the reign of Dioclesian. Both ancient and modern critics unite in their opinion of his style, which is considered a standard of the purest Latin, and of the humor of his characters, which surpasses that of all other Roman comic authors. His occasional coarseness is the most objectionable trait to a modern reader. Numerous editions of Plautus have been published; the first edited by George Merula, was published at Venice in 1472, folio; the most esteemed of the later ones are the variorum by Gronovius, Amst. 1684, 8vo; that of Ernesti, Leipsic, 1760, 2 vols. 8vo; and of Schneider at Göttingen, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo.

PLAYFAIR, John, was born at Bervie, near Dundee, of which parish his father was minister, in 1749. He received his education at St. Andrews, and, in 1772, succeeded to his father's living; but resigned it some years afterwards, and went to Edinburgh, where he became professor of mathematics. When the royal society was established there, he was appointed one of the secretaries, and contributed many papers to the memoirs of that institution. In his latter years the professor applied to the study of geology, which he pursued with indefatigable ardor; and, in 1816, undertook a journey to the Alps, for the purpose of making observations on those mountains. He died at Edinburgh, July 20, 1819. His works are—1. Elements of Geometry, 8vo. 2. Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth. 3. A Letter to the Author of the Examination of Professor Stewart's Statement. 4. An edition of Euclid. 5. System of Geography, 5 vols. 4to. 6. Outlines of Philosophy, 8vo.

PLAYFAIR, William, an ingenious projector and author, a brother of the foregoing, was born, in 1759, at Dundee; was originally apprenticed to a millwright; was for some time a draughtsman at the Soho manufactory; obtained patents for various inventions, and engaged in many speculations; became a fertile writer upon politics and other subjects; and died February 3, 1823. Among his works are, Statistical Tables; The Statistical Breviary; The Commercial and Political Atlas; History of Jacobinism; British Family Antiquity; Political Portraits; and France as it is.

PLEMPIUS, Vopiscus Fortunatus, a native of Amsterdam, who took his medical degrees at Bologna, and practised in Holland. He was made professor of medicine at Louvain, where he died 12th December 1671, aged 70. He was author of Ophthalmographia, or de Oculi Fabricâ, 4to.—de Togatorum Valetudine tuendâ—de Affectibus Capillorum et Unguium Naturâ—Tractatus de Peste—Antymus Coningius Peruvianâ Pulveris Defensor repulsus a Melippo Protymno, a refutation of the utility of the bark, which was introduced by Coningius, the assumed name of the jesuit Fabri, and thus attacked by Plempius under the appellation of Protymus.

PLINY, Caius Secundus, the Elder, was a celebrated philosopher, born at Verona. He perished during an eruption of Vesuvius, while he approached too near to make observations on the awful phenomenon, A.D. 79. Of his works, which were numerous, only his Natural History remains, which is a valuable compilation of facts and observations, by the hand of a judicious master.

PLINY, Cæcilius Secundus, the Younger, was the nephew of the preceding. He studied under Quintilian, and enjoyed the friendship of Trajan, who made him consul. He was for some time governor of Bithynia, where he checked the persecution excited against the christians. He died A.D. 113, universally respected. His letters &c. are fine specimens of correct writing.

PLOT, Robert, LL.D., an English philosopher and antiquary, born at Sutton Barn, Kent, 1641, and educated at Wye school in that county. In 1653, he entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he took his master's degree, and afterwards removed to University college, where he took the degree of doctor of laws 1671. He was elected member of the Royal society, and appointed one of its secretaries, and as such published the Philosophical Transactions from No. 143, to 166, inclusive. In 1683, he was nominated by Ashmole first keeper to his newly erected museum, and made also professor of chemistry, and in 1688, historiographer to the king. He was made in 1695, by the duke of Norfolk, Mowbray, herald extraordinary. He died of the stone 30th April, 1696, at Borden, leaving two sons. Dr. Plot, whose chief delight was the advancement of natural history and antiquities, published the Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire, both in fol. as essays towards a Natural History of England—de Origine Fontium, &c.—an Account of Eldon Hole—and several valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions. He left behind him several Manuscripts for the Histories of Kent, Middlesex, and London, which he intended to publish.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher, was born, in 203, at Lycopolis, in Egypt; was a disciple of Ammonius Saccas; encountered great danger in accompanying the emperor Gordian on his expedition against the Parthians, which he did with a view to obtaining a knowledge of Persian and Indian philosophy; and died, in 270, after having resided at Rome during many years. His works were translated into Latin, in 1492, by Ficino.

PLOWDEN, Francis, an historian and miscellaneous writer, a native of Ireland and a Roman Catholic, was a barrister and conveyancer. A verdict of £5000 obtained against him in an Irish court, in 1813, for an alleged libel in his History of Ireland, compelled him to retire to France, where he remained till his decease, at an advanced age, in 1829. Among his works are, The History of Ireland; Jura Anglorum; Church and State; The Case stated; and a Treatise upon the Law of Usury and Annuities.

PLUCHE, Antony, a French writer, born at Rheims 1668. He distinguished himself by his application, and at the recommendation of Rollin, was made tutor to the son of the intendant of Rouen, after which he went to Paris and gave lectures on history and geography. He was presented in 1749, to the abbey of Valence St. Maur, and died of an apoplexy 1761. His works are Spectacle de la Nature, 7 vols. 12mo. an excellent work, twice translated into English, and also into most European languages—Histoire du Ciel, 2 vols. 12mo. containing a Mythological History of the Heavens, also translated into English—la Mécanique des Langues, 12mo.—Harmonie des Pseammes et de l'Évangile, 12mo.

PLUKENET, Leonard, a well known English botanist, born 1642, and educated as is conjectured at Cambridge. He took his degrees in physic, but as he was without a patron, he had to struggle with numerous difficulties, till in his old age he was appointed by the queen superintendant of Hampton-court garden, and honored with the title of Royal professor of botany. His great work is his "Phytographia," to the completion of which he devoted much of his time and of his money. He had correspondents for his botanical researches all over the world; but though he assisted Ray with liberal contributions, he differed much from Sloane and Peltiver, and censured their labors with some asperity. He died about 1705. His Phytographia appeared in four parts 1691-1696, containing 328 plates, 4to. He published besides Almagestum Botanicum, 4to. 1696, containing 6000 species—Almagesti Botanicæ Mantissa, 4to. 1700, with twenty-five new plates—and Amaltheum Botanicum, 1705, 4to. His Herbarium contained 8000 plants, and is now in the British museum. His works were reprinted 1779, 4 vols. and in 1779, by Dr. Giseke of Hamburg with a Linnean index.

PLUMIER, Charles, a famous French botanist, born at Marseilles 1646. He was of the order of Minims, and studied mathematics at Toulouse under Maignan, but afterwards applied himself to botany and natural history. His reputation was now such that he was employed by Louis XIV. to go to the West Indies in search of curious and medicinal plants. He performed three voyages for this laborious and useful object, and explored not only St. Domingo, but the neighboring islands, and part of the continent. His zeal was honorably rewarded by a pension from the king, and the appointment of royal botanist. While at the request of M. Fagon the king's physician, he meditated a fourth voyage in the cause of natural history, he was attacked by a pleurisy, as he waited for the ship near Cadiz, and died there, 1706. His works are valuable, Nova Plantarum Americanarum Genera, 4to.—Description of the Plants of America, folio—Treatise on American Ferns, fol.—the Art of Turning, fol. with plates—Dissertations on Cochineal, in the Journal des Scavans. Besides these he left fourteen hundred drawings, which might make ten volumes more.

PLUNKET Oliver, D.D., a Roman Catholic divine, the titular archbishop of Armagh, went to Rome at an early age, and received the title of primate of Ireland from pope Innocent XI. In September, 1679, he was arrested on a charge of treason, and being sent to London, was executed at Tyburn in 1681. The life of this respectable man, whose innocence was subsequently established, fell a sacrifice to a conspiracy between some priests of a scandalous life, whose disorders he had censured, and certain persons under sentence of death.

PLUNKETT, William Conyngham, lord Plunkett, the son of a Presbyterian clergyman in the north of Ireland, was born in 1765, and educated at Trinity college, Dublin, where, as a reward for his classical merit, he obtained a scholarship. In 1787, he took the degree of bachelor of law, and he was then called to the bar under the auspices of lord Yelverton. His reputation in the courts soon became great, and his practice proportionally extensive. In 1797, he held a seat in the Irish parliament, and voted against the union. In 1803, he was appointed solicitor-general for Ireland, and in 1805, attorney-general and privy counsellor. On the trial of Robert Emmet, he was counsel for the prosecution, and was accused of some unfairness towards the prisoner; but from that charge he fully vindicated himself. Mr. Plunkett's practice, however, was chiefly in chancery, and he is described as displaying, in the complicated questions of that court, a mind at once subtle and comprehensive, with great power, acuteness and clearness of reasoning conveyed in perspicuous, copious, yet condensed language. His manner as a forensic speaker was characterized by great simplicity and earnestness; he was not so eminent as some of his brethren for mere law learning. During the short administration of the whigs in 1806, he continued to fill the office of attorney-general in Ireland, but retired when his friends were displaced. In January 1807, he first procured a seat in the imperial parliament, as one of the members for Midhurst, and in 1812, he was returned for the university of Dublin. In the house of commons Mr. Plunkett distinguished himself as an eloquent and argumentative speaker, particularly on the Catholic question. During the administration of lord Liverpool, he was again appointed attorney-general for Ireland, and in 1827 was raised to the peerage, under the title of baron Plunkett. Lord Plunkett was a constant and able advocate of the Catholic relief bill.

In December, 1830, on the formation of the whig ministry, he was made lord high chancellor of Ireland.

PLUQUET, Francis Andrew, a native of Bayeux, who exchanged his canonry for the professorship of history in the university of Paris. He was an able lecturer and a diligent and elegant writer, and died of an apoplexy 1790, aged 74. He wrote an Examination of Fatalism, 3 vols. 12mo.—a Dictionary of Heresis, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Classical Books of Chinese, 7 vols. 12mo.—treatise on Luxury, 2 vols. 12mo.—a treatise on Sociability, 2 vols. in which he establishes the natural propensity of man to kindness and religion, against the opinions of Hobbes.

PLUTARCH, a celebrated philosopher and historian of Cheronæa in Bœotia. He travelled over various countries to improve himself, and was honorably received by the emperor Trajan, who raised him to the office of consul. He died in his native town at an advanced age A. D. 140. The best known and most valuable of his many works, is the Lives of Illustrious Men, a composition of great merit and singular interest.

POCAHONTAS, daughter of Powhatan, a celebrated Indian warrior in Virginia, was born about the year 1595. She discovered the warmest friendship for the English, who colonized Virginia when she was about twelve years old, and was eminently useful to the infant settlement. The first remarkable evidence of this attachment was displayed in 1607, when captain John Smith, was taken prisoner by her countrymen, and brought before Powhatan, that he might put him to death. As the savage lifted his club, to dash out the brains of the prisoner, whose head was laid on a stone at his feet, Pocahontas threw herself on Smith's body, and prevailed on her father to spare his life. Captain Smith was suffered to return to Jamestown, whence he sent presents to Powhatan and his benefactress. From this time, Pocahontas frequently visited the settlements of the whites, to whom she furnished provisions at times when they were particularly needed. In 1609, Powhatan invited Smith to pay him a visit, promising him a supply of provisions, but designing to entrap and destroy him and his party. Pocahontas, becoming informed of this plot, ventured through the forest at midnight, to disclose it to Smith. For three or four years, she continued to assist these settlers in their distresses, and to save them from the effects of her father's animosity. During this period, the infant colony had experienced numerous vicissitudes of good and bad fortune. Smith had been driven by faction to England; and the rapacity of his successors plunged the settlement into an Indian war. An attack was made on one of the forts by the Indians under Powhatan, when the commander and thirty men, were slaughtered, only one person, a boy, surviving, who was saved by Pocahontas. About the year 1612, Pocahontas,—from what cause is not ascertained, but most probably on account of her extraordinary attachment to the whites,—incurring her father's resentment, left her home, and visited the territory of Japazaws, chief of Potowmac. Captain Argall, coming up the river on a trading expedition, and conceiving that Pocahontas would be a valuable hostage, prevailed on Japazaws, by the tempting offer of a copper-kettle, to surrender her to him. Powhatan refused to ransom her on the terms proposed. During her detention, Mr. Thomas Rolfe, an Englishman of respectable character, became attached to her, and offered her his hand. It was accepted, and, the consent of Powhatan being obtained, the marriage was solemnized in presence of the uncle of Pocahontas, and her two brothers. This event relieved the colony from the enmity of Powhatan, and preserved peace between them for many years. In the year 1616, Pocahontas embarked with her husband, and several Indians, of both sexes, for England, where she was baptized, exchanging her Indian name for that of Rebecca. She became a subject of curiosity to all classes of people. She received, in London, a visit from her former friend, captain Smith, whom, for some unknown purpose, she had been taught to believe was dead. When she first beheld him, she was overcome with emotion, and, turning from him, hid her face in her hands. During her stay in England, she advanced greatly in the knowledge of the English language, and her conversation was much sought at court. Her residence among civilized men, however, was destined to be short. While about to embark from Gravesend, in company with her husband, and an infant son, to revisit her native land, she died, at the age of twenty-two years, leaving one son, who was educated by his uncle, in London, and afterwards became a wealthy, and distinguished character in Virginia. His descendants still exist in that commonwealth.

POCOCKE, Edward, D.D., a celebrated orientalist, born at Oxford, November 8th, 1604. He was educated at Thame school, and at 14 entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which, two years after, he removed to a scholarship at Corpus, and afterwards became a fellow of the college. He soon distinguished himself by his great knowledge of classical and oriental literature, and by the friendship of G. Vossius, and other learned men; and by the interest of Selden, he obtained, when in orders, the place of chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo. He reached Aleppo in 1630, and devoted himself with unusual assiduity to the further acquisition of the oriental languages. He was in 1631, employed by Laud to make a collection of such valuable and curious MSS. and of such coins as might enrich an university library; and in 1636, he was informed by that liberal patron that he was nominated by him to fill his newly founded Arabic professorship in Oxford. He returned in consequence to England, but afterwards he went to Constantinople, in company with Greaves, who was going to explore the antiquities of Egypt. He was invited by Laud in 1640, to return, and in his way through Paris, he became acquainted with Grotius, to whom he communicated his intention of translating his book, de Veritate Christ. Religionis, into Arabic, which the pious author heartily approved. When he reached England, he found his learned patron in the Tower, and his death, and the consequent confusion of the nation, tended little to insure him tranquillity in the prosecution of his studies. In 1643, he was presented by his college to the rectory of Childrey, Berkshire, where he retired to perform his ecclesiastical duties; but he was deprived of his professorship by the republican party. His great merit, however, pleaded in his favor, he was in 1647, restored to his salary, and the next year nominated by the king, then a prisoner, professor of Hebrew and canon of Christchurch, an appointment approved by the parliament, but rescinded when he refused to subscribe to the engagement. The restoration reinstated him in all his offices, but he was neglected among those who had by their services contributed most to the advancement of religion and learning in the kingdom. He died at Oxford, 10th September 1691, aged 87. As a scholar and orientalist his abilities were most eminently displayed. His sole ambition was the advancement of oriental literature, to which he devoted himself with the most assiduous care. His works are Specimen Historiæ Arabum, 1648, much commended by Prideaux, Ockley, Selden, Reland, and others—Porta, Mosis, or six prefatory Discourses of Moses Mainonides—Eutychnus' Annals—Abul Feraji Historia Dynastarum, 4to.—Commentaries on Micah, Malactii, Hosea, and Joel, folio—St. Peter's second Epistle, the second and third of John, and that of Jude, translated into Syriac—Letters with several learned men, published by Twells, 2 vols. folio, 1740.

POCOCKE, Richard, LL.D., a learned divine, related distantly to the celebrated orientalist. He was born 1704, at Southampton, where his father was master of the free school, and he was educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford. He travelled into the East in 1737, and returned in 1742, and in 1744, was made precentor of Waterford. He accompanied as chaplain lord Chesterfield to Ireland, and was appointed by him arch-deacon of Dublin, and under another viceroy, the duke of Devonshire, he was made bishop of Ossory, 1756. In 1765, he was translated to Elphin and Meath, and died the September of that same year, of a fit of apoplexy during his visitation. He published a most valuable and interesting account of his travels, under the title of "Observations on Egypt, Palestine, the Holy Land, Syria, Mesopotamia, Cyprus," &c. 3 vols. folio. He enriched also the British museum, by the gift of various volumes of MSS. from 4811—4827.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, John Francis, a learned and illustrious character, born of a respectable family at Terranuova in Florence, 1380. He studied at Florence, where he learnt Latin under John of Ravenna, and Greek under Emanuel Chrysoloras; and applied also to the Hebrew, though some commentators assert that that language was not cultivated in Italy before the fifteenth century. He was for some time at Rome, where he held the place of writer of the apostolic letters for ten years, and afterwards became secretary to the pope. In 1414, he attended the council of Constance, and directed all his attention to the recovery of classical authors from the wrecks of time; and to his indefatigable researches posterity is indebted for the preservation of Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Ammian Marcellinus, Lucretius, Tertullian, and other authors. He next extended his researches to England, and from London passed into Germany and Hungary, and on his return to Rome, married a lady of great beauty, and young, though he himself was 54. After continuing apostolic secretary under seven popes, during forty years, he was prevailed upon in 1453, to become secretary to the republic of Florence, and died in the neighborhood, at an elegant villa, which he had built for his summer retreat, 1459, aged 79, leaving a widow and six children, five of whom were boys, distinguished afterwards for their abilities. The works of Poggio were a Latin History of Florence from 1350 to 1455, 4to.—Epistles—de Varietate Fortunæ—Funeral Orations—Facetiæ, or Witticisms, certainly unworthy of the author—a translation of Diodorus Siculus—of Xenophon's Cyropædia. To Poggio literature is much indebted. He not only cultivated letters himself, but promoted their advancement. Erasmus has censured his private character, which certainly was not always free from blame; but Machiavel and others speak in the highest praise of his learning, and the disinterestedness of his conduct; and his unavailing interference in favor of the unfortunate Jerome of Prague at Constance, must be recorded with every mark of approbation.

POIRET, Peter, a mystic enthusiast, born at Metz, 1646, and educated at Basil. He became minister at Heidelberg and Anwell, and by reading the works of madame Bourignon, and other mystical writers, he became an infatuated enthusiast. He afterwards retired to Holland, and died at Reinsberg, May, 1719. He wrote the Divine Economy, 7 vols. 8vo. translated into English—Cogitationes Rationales de Deo, Anima & Malo—Solid Principles of Christian Religion—Peace of Good Souls, 12mo.—Theology of the Heart, 2 vols. 12mo.—de Eruditione Triplici, 2 vols. 4to.—Life of Madame Bourignon.

POIRIER, Germain, a native of Paris, who was of the order of the Benedictines of St. Maur, which he quitted in 1769. He was engaged as a coadjutor in the art of verifying dates, and he continued with Preeux the 11th volume of the historians of Gaul and France, begun by Bouquet. He was afterwards member of the national institute, and died at the beginning of 1803, aged 80.

POISSON, Nicolas Joseph, a priest of the oratory, admired for his eloquence, and made superior of the abbey of Vendome. He died at Lyons, 5th May, 1710, very old. He was the friend of Descartes, and was eminent as a philosopher. He wrote Delectus Auctorum Ecclesie Universalis, seu Gemina Conciliorum, 2 vols. folio—Remarks on Descartes' Discourses on Method, Mechanics, and Music—a treatise on Benefices—Account of his Travels in Italy—and treatise on the Rights and Ceremonies of the Church.

POISSON, Raymond, son of a mathematician at Paris, was patronised, after the early death of his father, by the duke of Crequi; but he quitted the profession of a courtier for the stage. He was afterwards noticed by Louis XIV. and died at Paris, 1690, respected as one of the first comedians of the French stage. He wrote the Baron de la Crasse—the Good Soldier, comedies of one act—Lubin—and the Fool of Quality, published together at Paris in 2 vols. 12mo. 1743.

POISSONNIER, Peter Isaac, a French physician, born at Dijon, 5th July, 1720. He was one of the first who read chemical lectures at Paris; and he acquired such reputation as a medical man, that he was sent by the court, at the request of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, who wished for the advice of an eminent physician. On his return he was admitted into the academy of sciences, made first physician to the army, and obtained a pension of thirteen thousand livres. The revolution not only stripped him of his independence, but sent him with all his family into confinement; but he was restored to liberty after the fall of Robespierre, and died 1797, aged 79. He wrote treatises on the Means of rendering Sea Water potable—on the Fevers of St. Domingo—on the Diseases of Seamen, 2 vols. 8vo.—Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo.—and Course of Surgery, volume 5th and 6th.

POITIERS, Diana de, duchess of Valentinois, was born 31st March, 1500. When her father, the count of St. Vallier, was condemned to lose his head for favoring the escape of the constable Bourbon, Diana obtained his pardon by throwing herself at the feet of Francis I. and, according to some, by yielding her person to the wishes of the monarch. After the death of her husband de Breze, grand seneschal of Normandy, she was seen and admired by Henry II. and though aged forty, she so captivated the heart of the young monarch, who was only eighteen, that till his death in 1559, she remained sole mistress not only of his affections, but of the kingdom. She died in retirement, 26th April, 1566, aged 66. To great personal charms she united unusual powers of mind, and commanding dignity of manners.

POIVRE, N., a native of Lyons, who embraced the ecclesiastical order, and went as missionary to China, where he travelled with the sagacity of a philosopher and a naturalist. On his return to Europe, the ship in which he was embarked was attacked by Barnet, the English admiral, and during the fight he lost his right arm, which was shot off by a cannon ball, in consequence of which he renounced the ecclesiastical state. He was afterwards employed by the French East India company in 1743, to open an intercourse with Cochinchina, and in 1766, he was sent by the duke de Choiseul to the isles of France and Bourbon, with full powers to improve their commerce and agriculture. He there introduced the cultivation of various trees, especially the bread-fruit tree, the muscadine grape, and the clove. He returned to France, and died at Lyons, 6th January 1786. He is author of the Voyage of a Philosopher, 12mo.—on the Dying of Silks—on the History and Manners of China—and Orations.

POLE, Reginald, cardinal and archbishop of Canterbury, was of royal descent, as being the son of lord Montague, the cousin of Henry VII. by Margaret the daughter of George duke of Clarence, the brother of Edward IV. He was born, 1500, and entered, at the age of twelve, at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he had Cinacre and Latimer for his tutors. He took his first degree at fifteen, and when admitted into orders he was made prebendary of Salisbury, and soon after dean of Exeter. Thus liberally patronised by the favor of his relation Henry VIII. he was, with a splendid allowance, permitted to go to Italy to finish his education, and in the universities of Padua, Venice, and Rome, he acquired distinction by the extent of his learning, his engaging manners, and exemplary piety. He returned in 1525 to England, and was received with great kindness by Henry; but the agitation of the divorce from Catherine soon after disturbed the harmony which subsisted between him and the court. Henry wished to add to the favorable opinion of foreign universities the assent of his respectable kinsman. Pole, however, refused to approve what his conscience condemned, and after withdrawing from the presence of the king, who at one time was so enraged that he seized his poignard to stab him, he obtained permission to travel. In Italy the English ecclesiastic found retirement and tranquillity in the bosom of his friends, and in his intercourse with learned societies; but Henry, incensed against the pope, not only divorced his queen to marry Ann Boleyn, but determined to shake off the Roman yoke, and relying on the affection of his subjects, declared himself supreme head of the church. To reconcile this to the feelings of the people, a book was written in its favor by Sampson, bishop of Chichester, and sent over to Italy for the approbation of Pole. Without immediately answering the king's request, Pole expressed soon after his sentiments in a little book called Pro Unitate Ecclesiasticâ, which in maintaining the papal supremacy, highly offended Henry, and procured not only the withdrawing of all his pensions and his ecclesiastical revenues, but the passing of a bill of attainder against him. Stripped of his honors in England, Pole found protection and favor at Rome; he was created a cardinal, and sent as legate to France and Flanders, where, however, the intrigues of Henry were so powerful, and his influence so great, that he returned to Rome for safety. On the death of Paul III. 1549, Pole was twice elected by the cardinals to succeed to St. Peter's chair, but he rejected the proffered honor, and soon after retired to a monastery in Verona, where he continued till the death of Edward VI. On the accession of Mary, Pole was selected as the fittest legate to reconcile England to the holy see; and after he was informed that the bill of attainder which condemned him and set a price on his head was repealed, he returned to his native country. He appeared before the parliament, and easily prevailed upon them to be reconciled to the ceremonies of Rome, after the example of their queen; and after he had granted them absolution, he made his public entry into London, with all the solemnity of Italian pomp. But though invested with great authority as the legate of the pope, and the favorite of the queen, Pole did not assent at first to those violent measures which bigotry and persecution wished to follow. Mild by nature, and humane in his disposition, he preferred the arms of persuasion to the violence of authority; but his opposition was at last overpowered, and by the influence of the queen, some severe measures were adopted against the protestants, which reflect disgrace, not so much upon the heart as upon the accommodating conduct of the legate. His forbearance, indeed, had been such that he was accused to the pope as a heretic, and for a while his legatine powers were withdrawn from him; but the respectability of his character, and the good opinion of the queen, prevailed at Rome, and restored him to his office. On the death of Gardiner, whose violent measures he reprobated, he was confirmed by the pope in the see of Canterbury, to which he had before, on the expulsion of Cranmer, been elected; and to his other dignities was added the honor of being chancellor to both universities. He was attacked by a quartan ague which proved fatal, November 18th 1558, sixteen hours after the death of his royal mistress, whose demise is said to have hastened his own. If his attachment to the see of Rome had not been so bigoted and violent, Pole might have shone a very perfect character, as in learning, piety, eloquence, humility, and all the amiable virtues of private and of public life, no man was superior to him. Besides the tract already mentioned, he wrote two defences of it; one addressed to Henry, and the other to Edward VI. and several other pieces.

POLEMON, a Greek philosopher, the disciple of Xenocrates. By the representation of his master, whose school he once entered in a state of intoxication, he was persuaded to reform his conduct, and he became a most temperate man, and a very intelligent instructor. He died B.C. 270.

POLENI, John Marquis, a native of Padua, eminent as a professor of astronomy and mathematics. He was in 1739 admitted into the academy of sciences at Paris, after obtaining three prizes from that respectable body, and he was also honored with a seat in the London Royal society, the Berlin and other learned societies. His knowledge of hydraulics was such, that he was consulted by several states, and was appointed surveyor of the water works of the Venetian territories. He was also an able architect and his opinion was solicited by pope Benedict XIV. about St. Peter's church at Rome. He was the friend and correspondent of all the great men of Europe, of Newton, Leibnitz, Cassini, and the Bernouillis. He was also well skilled in antiquarian knowledge, and published a supplement to the collections of Grævius and Gronovius, 5 vols. fol. 1737, Venice. He died at Padua 1761, aged 78.

POLI, Marin, a native of Lucca, who studied and professed chemistry at Rome. It is said that he discovered some powerful agent of destructive effect in military affairs, which he communicated to Louis XIV. The monarch commended his ingenuity, and rewarded him liberally with a pension, and the title of engineer; but insisted that the secret should die with him, observing that the methods of destroying life, and increasing human miseries are already sufficiently numerous. This able man who had been admitted associate in the academy of sciences, and was invited by the French king to settle at Paris, died there of a violent fever soon after his arrival, 29th July, 1714, aged 52. He published Il Triomfo degli Acidi, an Apology for Acids, &c. 1706.

POLIDORO, Da Caravaggio, a painter so called from the village of Caravaggio near Milan, where he was born 1495. He was originally a day laborer to carry the stones and mortar for the masons in the buildings of the Vatican; but while he supplied materials for the fresco, his genius incited him to observe with accuracy, and to copy with success the figures described upon it. The first exertions of his pencil were so remarkably spirited, that Raphael, astonished at his powers, encouraged him and employed him among the other artists in the decorations of the Vatican; and not only that noble building, but many other edifices were ornamented by the labors of his genius. When Rome was besieged by the Spaniards he fled to Naples, and afterwards to Messina, where he was murdered by his servant, who had observed the great sums of money which he had drawn from the bank, with the intention of returning to Italy. He died 1543, aged 48. The murderer was discovered, and torn to pieces between four horses.

POLIGNAC, Melchior de, a French cardinal, born of a noble family 1662. He studied at Paris, and was well versed in the philosophy of Aristotle, and afterwards embraced the doctrines of Descartes, both of which he ably defended. He accompanied cardinal de Bouillon to Rome, and was afterwards sent by Louis XIV. as ambassador extraordinary to procure the succession to the crown of Poland in favor of the prince de Conti, upon John Sobieski's death. His ill success on this business produced his disgrace at court; but he was afterwards restored to favor, and sent to Rome, and in 1709 employed as one of the plenipotentiaries at the conferences at Gertruydenburg; and five years after he assisted at the settling the peace of Utrecht. Clement XI. raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and he resided at Rome under Louis XV. as minister of France. In 1726 he was raised to the see of Auch, and 1732 made commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. He died at Paris 1741, aged 81. He was member of the French academies, and evinced his abilities by his Latin poem called Anti-Lucretius, seu de Deo & Natura, in nine books, inculcating doctrines exactly contrary to those of Lucretius.

POLINIERE, Peter, a native of Couloune near Vire, who studied philosophy at the Harcourt college, Paris, where he took his degree of doctor in medicine. He was so well versed in philosophy, mathematics, and chemistry, that he was the first who read lectures on those abstruse sciences at Paris, where he had the king frequently among his auditors. He died suddenly at his house at Couloune, 9th February 1734, aged 63. He was a man of great learning, but little acquainted with the world, and more fond of his books and of retirement than of public life. He wrote Elements of Mathematics—treatise on Experimental Philosophy, 2 vols. 12mo. 1741.

POLITI, Alexander, professor of rhetoric, philosophy and divinity at Genoa, was born at Florence, 1679. In 1733 he became professor of eloquence and Greek at Pisa, and died there July 23, 1752, of an apoplexy. He is known for his edition of Eustathius's Commentary on Homer, with a Latin translation and notes, 5 vols. fol.—the Roman Martyrology, corrected in fol.—and Orations in the Academy of Pisa.

POLITIANO, Angelo, an ingenious Italian, born July 1454, at Monte Pulciano in Tuscany. His real name was Basso, or according to others Ambrogini. He learnt Greek under Andronicus of Thessalonica, and studied philosophy under Ficinus, and Argyropylos. He was noticed by the Medicean family, and was for some time preceptor to Lorenzo's children, and afterwards professor of Greek and Latin at Florence. He was the intimate friend of the learned men of the times, and especially of Picus of Mirandula. He died 1494 and some have attributed his death to his great grief for the misfortunes of the Medicean family, who had been cruelly expelled from their country. Politiano was a man of great erudition, vast application, and a most sound judgment. As a poet his lines on the tournament of Julian de Medicis are much admired. He wrote besides the history of the Pazzi conspiracy—Miscellanea—some other poems, and a Latin translation of Herodian, so elegant and so spirited that it is doubted which is the more valuable, the original or the version—and a treatise on Anger. His works altogether were printed in 1550, 3 vols. 8vo. and 1553 folio, Basil. Though admired for his learning, wit, and vivacity by Erasmus, and others, Paul Jovius has described him as a malevolent satirist, who viewed the literary labors of others with mean jealousy, and with ferocious virulence resisted every criticism upon his own productions.

POLIZIANO or POLITIAN, Angelus, an eminent Italian scholar, whose family name was CINIS, was born, in 1454, at Monte Pulciano, in Tuscany; was professor of Greek and Latin at Florence, and tutor to the children of Lorenzo the Magnificent, who gave him a canonry in the cathedral of the Florentine capital. He died in 1494. Among his works are, The History of the Conspiracy of the Pazzi; Poems; the drama of Orpheus; and a translation of Herodian.

POLYBIUS, a Greek historian, of Megapolis. He was the friend of the great Philipœmen, and distinguished himself as a soldier against the Romans in the Macedonian war. After the ruin of Macedonia, Polybius became the friend of the Romans and of Scipio and wrote a valuable and interesting Universal History, of which only part remains. He died B.C. 121.

POLYDORE VIRGIL, a native of Urbino, who went to England in the suite of Corneto the papal legate. He so pleased Henry VIII. by his manners and his learning that he detained him in England by giving him the archdeaconry of Wells, and prevailed upon him to employ his talents in an history of the country. He afterwards left England in consequence of the tyrannical conduct of Wolsey, who had imprisoned him for one year for revenge, because his patron Corneto had solicited the see of York, and he retired to Italy, where he died 1555. His works are the History of England to the end of the seventh Henry's reign, dedicated to Henry VIII. a work written in elegant Latin, but not very accurate as an history, edited at Basil 1534, fol.—de Inventoribus Rerum, 12no.—treatise on Prodigies, fol.—Corrections on Gildas—Collection of Proverbs.

POMBAL, Sebastian Joseph Carvalho, marquis of, a famous Portuguese minister, born at Soure near Coimbra, 1699. He studied at Coimbra, and afterwards embraced a military life, which he quitted for retirement and an union with Donna Ahmada, a rich and noble Spanish lady, who died 1739. He was in 1745 sent ambassador to Vienna, where he married the countess of Daun, related to the marshal of that name, and by means of this lady who became a great favorite with the queen of Portugal, he rose to eminence in the state. On the succession of Joseph to the throne, 1750, Pombal was appointed secretary for foreign affairs, and he displayed his abilities by the wisdom of his administration, and the excellent regulations which he introduced for the promotion of the agriculture, the finances, and the marine of the kingdom. A haughtiness in his conduct, however, displeased some of the nobles, and a conspiracy was secretly formed against him and the king; but the discovery of it brought disgrace and death on the accomplices, and the jesuits, who were concerned in the plot, were expelled from the kingdom. In the dreadful earthquake which destroyed Lisbon 1755, Pombal showed great benevolence, and the most liberal patriotism, and by his means the city rose from her ruins, with new splendor and increased magnificence. On Joseph's death 1777, Pombel fell into disgrace and was banished to one of his estates, where he died May 1782, aged 85.

POMEROY, Benjamin, D. D., an American divine, who graduated at Yale college in 1733. He was ordained at Hebron in Connecticut, 1735. During the visits of Whitefield, in that state, the subject of this article became much excited; and, in consequence of some disregard of the laws of Connecticut, he was for seven years deprived of his stated salary. In one instance, he was also brought before the assembly, for some supposed irregularity. He died December 22, 1784, aged 80 years. He has been described as a good scholar and an eloquent preacher.

POMEY, Francis, a jesuit of Lyons, known by his Pantheon Mysticum, translated into English by Andrew Tooke, as his own performance. He wrote besides a French and Latin Dictionary, 4to.—Flos Latinitatis—Libitina, or on the Funerals of the Ancients—Novus Rhetoricæ Candidatus, and died at Lyons, 1673, aged 55.

POMFRET, John, an English poet, born about 1667, at Luton, Bedfordshire, where his father was rector. He was educated at Cambridge, and when in orders, obtained the living of Maldon, in Bedfordshire. In 1703 he went to London, for institution to a larger living, but found bishop Compton strongly prejudiced against him, for four lines in his poem called Choice, in which it was falsely said, that he preferred a mistress to a wife, and before the prelate's scruples could be removed, the unfortunate candidate for his favor, caught the small-pox, and died of it, aged 35. In his "Cruelty and Lust," he has introduced the character and conduct of Kirk, with great effect and pathos. No poem, says Johnson, has been oftener perused, than his Choice. A volume of his poems appeared 1699, and two other pieces were published after his death by Philalæthes.

POMPADOUR, Jane Antoinette Poisson, marchioness of, the mistress of Louis XV. was daughter of a financier, and married D'Etiole, nephew of Normand Tournemem. The licentious monarch first saw her while he was hunting in the forest of Senar, and from that time he made her his favorite, and raised her, in 1745, to the rank of a marchioness. She enjoyed great influence at court, till her death, 1764, at the age of 44. The liberal manner with which she patronised the arts and literature, has in some degree blunted the shafts of criticism against the infamy of her life. Her memoirs have been published, 2 vols. 8vo. and also her letters, 3 vols. in which she is represented as having great influence in the politics of France, and especially in the war of 1756.

POMPEY, Cneius, the Great, a celebrated Roman, who after bearing the highest honors of the state, and distinguishing himself in war, formed the first triumvirate with J. Cæsar and Crassus. An union ill cemented, was quickly broken, and war was declared between him and Cæsar. The battle of Pharsalia proved fatal to the cause of Pompey and of Rome, and the great fugitive flying from his enemy, was basely murdered in Egypt by order of king Ptolemy, whom he had formerly established on the throne, B.C. 49.

POMPIGNAN, John James le Franc, marquis of, a French writer, born at Montauban 1709. He was educated for the magistracy; but his genius led him to the cultivation of the muses, and his tragedy of Dido raised him to the rank of an able poet, little inferior to Racine. He became a member of the French academy, in 1760, and he had the courage to pronounce, at his admission, a discourse in favor of christianity, by proving that the man of religion and virtue is the only true philosopher, an oration which drew upon him the ridicule and satire of the profligate philosophers of the times; of Voltaire, Helvetius, and their infidel associates. This illiberal treatment drove him from Paris to his estate, where he spent the rest of his days in the labor of true philosophy and active religion, and died there of an apoplexy, 1784, highly and deservedly respected. His works were published in 6 vols. 8vo.

POMPIGNAN, John George le Franc de, a learned French prelate, brother to the preceding, born at Montauban, 22d February, 1715. He was, at the age of 29, made bishop of Puy, and afterwards translated to the see of Vienne. At the revolution he was deputy from Dauphiné to the constituent assembly, and became one of the ministry. The pope wrote to him, and called upon him to exert his authority and influence to prevent all the meditated innovations in the church. He died at Paris, 29th December 1790. He was author of sixteen different works, the best known of which are Critical Essay on the Present State of the Republic of Letters—on the Secular authority in Matters of Religion—Religion avenged on Incredulity by Incredulity itself—Scepticism convicted by the Prophecies—Letters from a Bishop, 2 vols.—Pastoral Letters—and Defence of the Clergy of France in Religion.

POMPONATIUS, Peter, an Italian philosopher, born at Mantua, 1462. He was of a dwarfish stature, but possessed great genius, and taught philosophy with uncommon success at Padua and Bologna. His book "De Immortalitate Anime," in 1516, occasioned a violent controversy, but while he maintained the immortality of the soul as a matter of faith, and not by the support of philosophical reasoning; he was, though patronised by Bembo, universally branded with the name of an atheist. His work, therefore, was condemned and publicly burnt. His philosophical works were printed at Venice, folio, 1525. He died 1525.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, Julius, an eminent scholar, whose real name was Julio Sansverino, born at Amendolara, in Calabria, 1425. He was well acquainted with Latin, though totally ignorant of Greek, but rather inclined to heathenism, since he is said to have dedicated altars to Romulus, and to have refused to read the bible, for fear of acquiring a bad and corrupted taste. He was accused of conspiring against pope Paul II. and in consequence fled to Venice, but returned to Rome after that pontiff's death. It is said that before his death he became a sincere and penitent christian. He died 1495. He wrote Abridgment of the Lives of the Cæsars, fol.—de Romanæ Urbis Vetustate, 4to.—De Mahumedis Exortu, fol.—De Sacerdotiis, Legibus, 4to.—De Arte Grammaticâ—Vita Statii & Patris ejus—Editions of Sallust, Pliny, and Cicero—Commentaries on Virgil, Quintilian, Columella, though some consider these, from their Greek quotations, with which he was unacquainted, as the work of some other person.

PONA, John Baptist, author of Diatribe de Rebus Philosophicis, Venice, 1590—Latin Poems—Il Tirreno, a pastoral, &c., was a native of Verona, who died there, very young, 1538. His brother John was an eminent botanist at Verona, and wrote Plantæ quæ in Baldo Monte reperuntur, 4to., reprinted in De l'Écluse's Historia Rariorum Stirpium—Del Vero Balsamo degli Antichi, 4to., Venice, 1623.

PONS, John Francis de, a French ecclesiastic, of an illustrious family, born at Marly. He studied at Paris, and obtained a canonry at Chaumont, which he resigned to settle at Paris, to indulge his literary pursuits. He ably defended La Mothe, against Mad. Dacier. He was a learned man, deformed in his person, but of the best character. He died at Chaumont, 1732, aged 49. He was author of a System of Education—Four Dissertations on Languages, &c., printed together, 12mo. 1738.

PONT DE VESLE, Antony de Ferriol, count de, a comic writer, who loved retirement, but was drawn into public life by his uncle cardinal de Tencin. He was made governor of Pont de Vesle, and intendant general of marine, and died at Paris, 8d September, 1774, aged 77. He was author of the Complaissant, a comedy—the Coxcomb Punished, a comedy—Sleep Walker, a farce—songs, and many other fugitive pieces. His uncle Ferriol, ambassador at Constantinople, published one hundred engravings in folio, 1715, explanatory of the dress and manners of the Eastern nations.

PONTANUS, John Jovian, a learned Italian, born at Cerreto, 1426. He was preceptor, and afterwards secretary to Alphonso, king of Arragon, whom by his influence he reconciled to his father Ferdinand. These services ought to have been rewarded, but Pontanus, finding himself neglected, inveighed in his Dialogue on Ingratitude, against the conduct of the prince, who nobly disregarded the satirical attack. He died 1503, aged 77. He wrote the History of the Wars of Ferdinand I. and John of Anjou, 4 vols. 8vo. Basil, 1556. His other works, which are miscellaneous, and contain some licentious and indelicate poetry, appeared at Venice, 3 vols. 4to. His epitaph on himself, has been imitated by Dr. Forster.

PONTANUS, John Isaac, an author, born in Denmark, of Dutch parents. He became historiographer to the king of Denmark, and died at Harderwyck, where he had for some time taught medicine and mathematics, 1640, aged 69. He was author of Historia Urbis & Rerum Amstelodam, folio.—Itinerarium Gallie Narbonens. 12mo.—Rerum Danicarum Historica cum Chorographicâ Regni Urbiumque Descriptione, fol., a valuable work—Disceptationes Chorographicæ de Rheni Divortii & Ostii, et Accollis Populis adversus P. Cluverum, 8vo.—Observationes in Tractatum de Globis Cælesti & Terr. 8vo.—Discussiones Historicæ, 8vo. against Selden's Treatise on the Sea—Historia Gædrica, fol. translated afterwards into Flemish—Origines Francicæ, 4to., a learned book—Historia Ulrica, fol.—and the life of Frederic II. of Denmark.

PONCHASTEAU, Sebastion Joseph du Carnout, baron de, a French author, nearly related to Richelieu. He was born in 1634, and after traveling over Italy and Germany, he bid adieu to the world, and passed several years of his life, engaged as the gardener of the Port Royal congregation. He afterwards retired to Rome, and then to Orval, and died at Paris, 27th June, 1669, aged 57. His acts of charity and devotion were very numerous and singular. He was author of Treatises on the Cultivation of Fruit Trees, 12mo.—on the Moral Practice of the Jesuits—and Letter to Preface.

PONIATOWSKI, Prince Joseph, an illustrious Polish general, who was called to the Polish Bayard, was born in 1763, at Warsaw; distinguished himself in the cause of his country during the fruitless struggles of 1792 and 1794; entered the French service, and displayed conspicuous bravery and talent in the campaigns of 1806, 1809, 1812, 1813, and 1814; was appointed a marshal on the field of battle at Leipsic; and was drowned in attempting to cross the Elster, on the 19th of October.

PONTERA, Julian, a native of Pisa, professor of botany at Padua, and superintendent of the botanic garden there. He was member of the learned societies of Paris, and died 1757, aged 69, universally respected for his extensive knowledge of botany. He wrote Compendium Tabularum Botanicarum in quo Plantæ 272, in Italiâ nuper detectæ, recensentur Patavii, 1718, 4to.—de Florum Naturâ 4to.—Antiquitat. Latin Græc. Enarrationes.

PONTOPPIDAN, Eric, bishop of Bergen in Norway, was author of a valuable History of the Reformation in Denmark, folio, and another of Norway, translated into English. He died about 1750. His uncle of the same name, was a native of the island of Funen, and became bishop of Drontheim, where he died 1678, aged 62. He wrote a Danish grammar, much esteemed, and other learned works.

POOLE, Mathew, an eminent nonconformist, born at York, 1624. He was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and when ordained according to the tenets of the presbyterians, he was made minister of St. Michael le Quern in London, from which he was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity. Among his other works, he wrote with great zeal against the papists, and according to Titus Oates' deposition in 1679, he was on the list of those who were to be cut off. In consequence of this meditated violence, he retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam, October, 1679. He possessed great learning, and was indefatigable in his studious pursuits. Besides English Annotations on the Bible, completed after his death, in 2 vols. folio, and other things, he compiled that useful work, Synopsis Criticorum Biblicorum, or Elucidations of Scripture by various hands, 5 vols. folio, 1669.

POPE, Alexander, an illustrious English poet, born 8th June, 1688, in the Strand, where his father was a hatter. He was sent to a popish school near Winchester, and then removed to a seminary near Hyde-park corner. At the age of 12, he went to live with his parents at Binfield in Windsor forest, and first discovered his taste for poetry by reading Ogilby's Virgil and Sandys' Ovid; but the writings of Spenser, Waller, and Dryden, now became his favorite employment. He early began to try his strength in poetry, and it is said that at the age of ten, he converted some of the stories of Homer into a play, which his school-fellows acted, with the assistance of his master's gardener, who undertook the part of Ajax. His first regular composition was his Ode on Solitude; but his pastorals, begun in 1704, introduced him soon as a promising bard to the wits of the age, especially Wycherley and Walsh, who applauded the labors of the youth, and strongly recommended to him to study correctness. In 1704, he also wrote his first part of Windsor Forest, which was completed not till six years after, and inscribed to lord Lansdown. The Essay on Criticism appeared in 1708, and in this most incomparable performance, though not yet twenty years old, he evinced all the taste, the genius, and judgment of the most mature reflection, and the most consummate knowledge of human nature. The fame of the essay was soon surpassed by the Rape of the Lock, which was published in 1712. The poet chose for his subject, the sportive conduct of lord Petre in cutting off a lock of Mrs. Fermor's hair; and he had the happiness, by the elegant and delicate effusions of his muse, and the creative powers of his imagination, to effect a reconciliation between the offended parties. The Temple of Fame next engaged the public attention, and in 1713, he published Proposals for a translation of Homer's Iliad by subscription. This was generously supported by the public, and the poet received from his subscribers £6000, besides £1200, which the bookseller Lintot gave him for the copy. In 1717, he published a collection of his poems; but in his edition of Shakspeare, which appeared in 1721, he proved to the world that he had consulted his private emolument more than his fame. The success with which the Iliad had been received, encouraged him to attempt the Odyssey, with the assistance of Broome and Fenton, whose labors he rewarded with £500, and he received the same honorable subscription as before, but only £600, from the bookseller. In 1725, he joined Swift and Arbuthnot in writing some miscellanies, and in 1727, he published his Dunciad, with notes by Swift, under the name of Scriblers. This singular poem owed its origin to the severe and illiberal remarks to which the poet had been exposed, from the inferior scriblers of the day, and after long exhibiting patience, he revenged the attack by the keenest of satires. As a composition, the Dunciad is a work of great merit; and Cibber himself, the hero of the piece, bears the most manly testimony to the talents of his persecutor, by declaring that nothing was ever more perfect and finished in its kind, than this poem. The principles, however, of the poet, must be condemned; if it was justice to retort abuse on those who had offended him, it was the most illiberal and profligate conduct to hang up to immortal ignominy, the characters of men of genius, talents, and respectability, who instead of censuring him, had been loud in his praise. Lord Bolingbroke, in 1729, entreated him to turn his thoughts to moral subjects, and this produced his Essay on Man, a work of acknowledged merit, containing a system of ethics in the Horatian way. A collection of his letters appeared in 1737, and the following year, a translation of his Essay on Man, was published in France, by Resnel, and at the same time, a severe animadversion on it by Crousaz, a German professor, who declared it nothing but a system of materialism. This publication was answered by Warburton, and appeared as a commentary on the republication of the poem, in 1740. In 1742, the poet gave to the world a fourth book of his Dunciad, and prepared a more perfect and comprehensive edition of his works; but death stopped his hand. He expired 30th May, 1744, aged 56. A very interesting Essay on his writings and genius appeared in 1756, and in 1782, by Dr. Warton. Though a catholic in religion, it is generally supposed that Pope was little more than a deist, as his Essay on Man fully justifies, yet in the latter part of his life, he attended the service of the English church. In his person he was little, and somewhat crooked; but the powers of the mind compensated for all the defects of the body. He was capricious in his friendships; and though he was courted by men of rank and fashion, by lords Harcourt, Bolingbroke, and others, distinguished for opulence, as well as celebrity and wit, yet he never forgot the homage which should be paid to the man of poetical eminence, and of acknowledged literary fame.

POPHAM, sir John, an eminent English lawyer, born at Huntworth, Somersetshire, 1531. He was of Baliol college, Oxford, and afterwards went to the Middle Temple, and rose to high honors in the law. He was solicitor and attorney-general, and in 1592, was made chief justice of the King's Bench. He was considered as a severe judge against robbers; but his strictness proved of service to the kingdom; and reduced the number of depredators. He died 1607, aged 76, and was buried at Wellington. He published Reports and Cases in Elizabeth's Reign, folio—Resolutions and Judgments, 4to.

POPHAM, sir Home Riggs, a naval officer and knight commander of the Bath, was born in Ireland in 1762. He rose to the rank of lieutenant in the American war and after the peace went to India, where he commanded a country-ship and discovered a passage for navigation at Pulo Penang. In 1794, he rendered such service to the duke of York in Holland as to be appointed to the rank of master and commander, and shortly after attained that of post captain. He was next employed in the Baltic, where the emperor of Russia gave him the cross of Malta. In 1800, he was appointed to a command in the East Indies, and in 1803, he entered the Red Sea, where he settled advantageous terms of commerce for the English merchants. On his return home, however, his conduct was rigorously examined, and the most unfavorable report of it was made to the house of commons; from which he was effectually cleared on farther inquiry. He was afterwards engaged in the expedition against Buenos Ayres; but though successful, he was brought to a court-martial, and censured for it when the administration by whose orders he acted could no longer protect him. After the last peace he obtained the appointment of commander-in-chief on the Jamaica station, from whence he had but just returned, when death closed his services at Cheltenham, September 13th, 1820. Sir Home published—"A Statement of the Treatment experienced by him since his return from the Red Sea," and "A Description of Prince of Wales' Island."

PORDENONE, John Anthony Licinio, a painter, born in the village of Pordenone, near Udino, 1484. He studied attentively the works of Giorgione, and by his abilities deserved to be called the rival of the great Titian. He was for some time at Genoa, under the patronage of Doria, and then went to Venice, and to Ferrara, where he died 1540, it is said by the effects of poison, administered by some painters jealous of his fame. He was knighted for his services by Charles V. His nephew, called the younger Pordenone, born at Venice, studied under him, and became also eminent. He died at Augsburg, 1570.

POREE, Charles, a French jesuit, born near Caen in Normandy, 1675. He acquired reputation as professor of belles lettres, rhetoric, and theology at Caen, and afterwards in the college of Louis the Great at Paris. He died 1741, at Paris. He wrote comedies and tragedies in Latin—Orations, 3 vols.—poems, &c.—His brother Charles Gabriel, was of the society of the oratory, and canon of Bayeux cathedral, and died at his cure of Louvigny, near Caen, 1770, aged 85. He was author of la Mandarinade, or Histoire du Mandarinat de l'Abbe de St. Martin, 3 vols. 12mo.—and Letters on burying in Churches.

PORPHYRY, a platonic philosopher of Tyre, who wrote a violent book against the scriptures, which was publicly burnt by order of Theodosius the Great. He wrote besides various treatises, and died at the end of Dioclesian's reign.—There was a poet of that name in the reign of Constantine.

PORSON, Richard, an eminent hellenist and critic, was born, in 1759, at East Ruston, in Norfolk; was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge; was elected Greek professor in 1793; became librarian of the London Institution; and died September 19, 1808. In profound knowledge of Greek, critical powers, and acuteness, Porson had few equals. Among his works are, Letters to Archdeacon Travis; editions of Æschylus, and some of the plays of Euripides; and Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms.

PORTA, John Baptist, a Neapolitan, eminent for his learning, and his knowledge of mathematics, medicine, and natural history. As he admitted a society of learned friends into his house, he was accused of magical incantations, and exposed to the censures of the court of Rome. He died 1515, aged 70. He invented the Camera Obscura, improved afterwards by Gravesande, and formed the plan of an Encyclopedia. He wrote a Latin treatise on Natural Magic, 8vo.—another on Physiognomy, mixed with Astrology, &c.—de Occultis Literarum Notis—Physiognomica, seu Methodus cognoscendi ex Inspectione vires Abditas ejusque Rei, folio—and de Distillationibus, 4to.

PORTE, Joseph de la, a native of Befort, who died at Paris, December, 1779, aged 61. He was for some time among the jesuits, but quitted their society for a literary residence at Paris. He published the Antiquary, a comedy of no great merit, and afterwards was engaged in a periodical work, called Observations on Modern Literature, which ended in the ninth volume. Afterwards he assisted Freron in the forty first volumes of the Literary Year, and he published separately the Literary Observer. He next was engaged in the publication of the School of Literature, 2 vols. 12mo. Dramatic Anecdotes, 3 vols. 8vo.—Literary History of French Ladies, 5 vols. 8vo.—the French Traveller, 24 vols. 12mo.—Pensées de Massillon.

PORTER, Francis, a native of Meath in Ireland, who was educated in France, and was admitted into the order of the Recollects, and was afterwards divinity professor in the convent of Isidorus at Rome, where James II. gave him the title of his historiographer. He published Securis Evangelica ad Hæresis Radicis posita—Palmodia Religiosis prætense Reformatæ—Compendium Annualium Ecclesiasticorum regni Hiberniæ, 4to.—Systema Decretorum Dogmatic. ab initio nascentis Eccles. per sumum, Pontific. Concil. Generalia & Particul. huc usque editorum 1698. He died at Rome 7th April, 1702.

PORTER, Anna Maria, an English authoress advantageously known to the reading community. The following popular works were from her pen; "The Recluse of Norway;" "The village of Mariendorpt;" and "The Fast of St. Magdalen." She was never married, and was the sister of the gifted Miss Jane Porter, author of "The Scottish Chiefs," and "Thaddeus of Warsaw." The subject of this article died June 21st, 1832.

PORTER, sir Robert Ker, was born at Durham. His mother was left a widow with five children, and in scanty circumstances. Robert early manifested an uncommon genius for drawing, many of his sketches made, when he was only six years of age, being remarkable for their spirit; and, in 1790, he became a student at the royal academy, under the auspices of Mr. West. Not more than two years had elapsed since his commencing his studies at the academy, when he was employed to paint the figures of Moses and Aaron, for the communion-table of Shoreditch church. In 1794, he presented to the Roman Catholic chapel of Portsea, an altar-piece representing Christ calming the storm; and in 1798, he gave to St. John's college, Cambridge, an altar-piece, the subject of which is St. John preaching in the wilderness. He was only twenty-two when he began his large picture of the storming of Seringapatam. Though it contained nearly seven hundred figures as large as life, it was finished in ten weeks; nor did it bear any marks of haste, it being both in composition and coloring, a work of high merit. It was succeeded by two other pictures of the same magnitude—the Siege of Acre, and the Battle of Agincourt. In 1804, he was invited to Russia by the emperor, who made him his historical painter. He consequently visited St. Petersburg, where he was received with distinction, and employed to decorate the admiralty hall, in the Russian capital. While residing there, he gained the affections of the princess Scherbatoff, and was on the point of marrying her, when a rupture with England obliged him to leave Russia. He passed into Sweden to join the British forces under Sir John Moore, whom he accompanied to Spain, sharing in the hardships and perils of the campaign, which ended with the battle of Corunna. After having remained for some time in England, he again went to Russia, and received the hand of the princess Scherbatoff. With her he revisited his native country, where, in 1813, he obtained the honor of knighthood. From 1817, to 1820 inclusive, he was engaged in travelling through the East; and, in the course of his travels, explored the countries from the banks of the Black sea to the Euphrates, and from the Euphrates to the mouth of the Persian gulf. Among his works are Travelling Sketches in Russia and Sweden, 2 vols. 4to. 1803; Letters from Portugal and Spain 8vo. 1809; Narrative of the campaign in Russia, 1813; Travels in Georgia, Persia and Armenia, 1822.

PORTES, Philip des, a French poet, born at Chartres 1546. He greatly improved the French language, and was liberally rewarded for his poetical works. Henry III. bestowed on him ten thousand crowns, Charles IX. gave him eight hundred crowns of gold for a poem, and admiral de Joyeuse conferred on him an abbey for a sonnet. Though in high favor with the court, and promoted to various benefices, he yet refused a bishopric. He was an eminent friend to learned men. He obtained latterly the friendship of Henry IV. and died 1606. He wrote a translation of the Psalms—Imitations of Ariosto—Christian poems—the Amours of Hippolytus and Diana—Sonnets—and Elegies.

PORTEUS, Beilby, Dr., bishop of London, was a native of Yorkshire, where he was born about the year 1731; but he himself was accustomed to trace his descent from a Scottish family. His father, a tradesman of but little eminence, resided for many years in the north of England; and it was at the grammar-school at Ripon, under the care of the Rev. John Hyde, that young Porteus commenced his classical career. By that gentleman he was qualified for the university, having determined on the church as a profession; and accordingly, with a zeal worthy of his future fortune, but an ambition that did not extend beyond a rural cure, he was entered at Christ's college, Cambridge. Mr. Porteus obtained his first degree of B.A. in 1752, when he was only seventeen or eighteen years of age. The same year he gained one of the two gold medals, held out as a remuneration to those who should produce the best classical essays. In 1755, the degree of M. A. was conferred upon this respectable student, who now began to behold the dawn of his good fortune; for he was elected a fellow by his college, and nearly at the same time appointed one of the preachers at Whitehall chapel. It was not, however, until 1759, that Mr. Porteus was known beyond the limits of his university, for it was then that he obtained the Seatonian prize, for the best composition on Death, which he published soon after, in conformity with the will of the founder. In 1761 his pen was occupied in controversial divinity. A little before this period appeared a work, entitled the History of the Man after God's own Heart; in which the many glaring defects in the character of David were artfully exposed and heightened. Mr. Porteus undertook to vindicate the Scripture account of the royal psalmist; he accordingly preached a sermon November 29th, before the university of Cambridge, which he published under the title of the Character of David, King of Israel, impartially stated. It is perhaps to this little work that his future fortunes are to be attributed; for Dr. Secker, who, in 1758, had been translated from the see of Oxford to the archiepiscopal throne of Canterbury, having read this discourse, was induced to take Mr. P. under his immediate patronage. He accordingly was pleased immediately to appoint him one of his domestic chaplains and presented him with a living in Kent, and another in Middlesex. A prebendal stall in Peterborough soon followed; in return our divine on the death of the archbishop in 1768, edited and published his sermons and life. Previously to this event Mr. P., in 1765, married Miss Hodgson, a lady of some fortune, whose father had resided at Matlock in Derbyshire. The ceremony was performed there by his friend the primate. Two years after this the degree of D.D. was conferred on him by his own university, and still greater honors now awaited him. The queen, hearing of Dr. Porteus's reputation, and being apprized of the excellence of his private character, appointed him her private chaplain; and such a high opinion did her majesty entertain of his piety and endowments, that she was determined to complete what Secker had begun. Accordingly in January 1777, on the translation of Dr. Markham to the archbishopric of York, the royal interposition was employed in favor of our divine, who was immediately raised to the see of Chester. In 1783 he produced a volume of his own sermons on several subjects; it was followed by two more, and these have since been considered as models. In 1787 a considerable change took place in his life, and the scene of his labors was not a little extended; for, on the death of the amiable and learned bishop Lowth, Dr. Porteus was translated to the see of London. This event gave entire satisfaction to every description of Christians in the metropolis. In the year 1792 he commenced a series of very popular lectures, at St. James's church, Westminster. They were delivered every Friday, to crowded and genteel audiences, and had for their object to demonstrate the truth of the gospel history, and the divinity of Christ's mission. It was on this occasion that, towards the latter end of his life, he acquired the character of an accomplished orator; and seems fully persuaded himself of the truth of those doctrines so earnestly recommended by him. This good prelate died early in 1809.

PORTHAN, Henry Gabriel, professor of rhetoric at the university of Abo, where he was born about 1739. He became one of the most learned men which Finland ever produced; and he was admitted into the Academy of Belles Lettres at Stockholm. He published the Chronicum Episcoporum Finlandensium of Justen with Notes; Academical Dissertation on Findlandish Poetry; Historia Bibliothecæ Regiæ Acad. Aboensis; besides other works. He died in 1804.

PORTUS, Francis, a native of Candia, educated at the court of Hercules II. of Ferrara, after whose death he retired to Geneva. He taught at Ferrara, and afterwards at Geneva the Greek language, and at Geneva embraced the protestant tenets. He died 1531, aged 70. He wrote Additions to Constantine's Greek Lexicon, folio.—Commentaries on Pindar, Thucydides, Longinus, Xenophon, and other Greek authors. His son Æmilius was also an able Grecian, and published Dictionarium Ionicum & Doricum, Græco-Latinum, 2 vols. 8vo.—a translation of Suidas, and other learned works. He was professor of Greek at Lausanne and Heidelberg.

PORUS, king of India, is celebrated in history for the bold resistance which he opposed to the invasion of Alexander the Great, and the noble answer he made when asked how he wished to be treated.

POSSEVIN, Anthony, a jesuit, born at Mantua 1532. He distinguished himself as a preacher, and was employed by pope Gregory XIII. in embassies to Poland, Sweden, Germany, and other courts. He died at Ferrara, 26th February 1611, aged 78. He wrote Bibliotheca Selecta de Ratione Studiorum, 2 vols. folio—a Latin Description of Muscovy, folio—Miles Christianus—Apparatus Acer, 2 vols. folio—Confutatio Ministrorum Transilvaniæ & Fr. Davidis de Trinitate. He had a nephew of his name, physician at Mantua, who wrote Gonzagaram Mantuæ & Montis Serrati Ducum Historia, 1628, 4to.

POSTEL, William, a French visionary, born at Dolerie in Normandy, 1510. At the age of eight he lost both his parents by the plague, and had now to struggle with poverty, and a supercilious world. By persevering assiduity, however, he not only gained his livelihood, but improved his mind by study, and going to Paris, he became the assistant and the companion of some students in the college of St. Barbe. His merits at last became known to Francis I. who sent him to the East to collect curious MSS. At his return he was rewarded with the place of professor royal of mathematics and languages, with a good salary; but his strong attachment to the chancellor Poyet proved fatal to his happiness; and by the influence of the queen of Navarre, he was deprived of his literary honors, and banished from France. Now a fugitive, he wandered from Vienna to Rome, where he became a jesuit, and afterwards retired to Venice, where he was imprisoned. When liberated, he again came to Paris, and then to Vienna, where he obtained a professorship; but afterwards he made his peace with his French persecutors, and was restored to his chair for a while, till another fit of madness and eccentricity drove him away to die a penitent fanatic in a monastery, where he expired, 6th September 1581, aged 71. Though wild and extravagant in his conduct, he was a man of deep erudition, and of extensive information, so that his lectures were attended by the most numerous and respectable audiences. His works are twenty-six in number, on curious and strange subjects, the best known of which are, Clavis Absconditorum à Constitutione Mundi, 12mo. 1547—History of the Gauls—Description of the Holy Land—de Phœnicum Literis—de Originibus Gentium—Aleorani & Evangelii Concordia, 8vo.—de Lingvæ Hebraicæ Excellentia—de Ultimo Judicio,—de Tribus Imposituribus, &c. attributed by some to him.

POSTHUMUS, Marcus Cassianus Latinus, a Roman emperor, one of the thirty tyrants, was of obscure birth, but rose rapidly in the army till he obtained the command in Gaul. He assumed the imperial title in 257; ruled Gaul and a part of Spain, and obtained various successes against the Germans; and was murdered by his soldiers in 267.

POTEMKIN, Gregory Alexander, a Russian prince descended from a Polish family, and born at Smolensko, in 1736. He was an ensign in the horse-guards when his person first attracted the notice of Catherine, and he rapidly rose to the envied situation of favorite, and of war minister. He suggested to his imperial mistress the necessity of seizing upon the Crimea, and by his advice the foundations of Cherson were laid in 1778, on the banks of the Nieper, and a new city suddenly arose, important for its maritime situation, and well protected by a population of above forty thousand inhabitants. In the enjoyment of the favors of the empress, Potemkin sighed for new distinctions, and to obtain the riband of St. George, which was bestowed only on victorious generals, he persuaded his mistress to declare war against the Turks 1787, and he took the field in person at the head of one hundred and fifty thousand men. In the midst of the winter he laid siege to Oczakow, which he took by assault, and delivered up to the plunder of his licentious troops, who sacrificed to their fury upwards of twenty-five thousand men. Thus victorious he was received by Catherine with unusual pomp; the most splendid presents were lavished upon him, and he was better enabled to indulge that fondness for luxury and debauched intemperance which covered his table with the choicest dainties, and the rarest fruits at the most extravagant expense. He attended afterwards the congress of Yassi, which was to cement a reconciliation between the Russians and the Turks; but his intemperance here brought on indisposition, and as he wished to remove to the more salubrious air of Nicolæff his distemper grew so violent, that he alighted from his carriage by the way, and expired suddenly under a tree, 14th October 1791, aged 55. Potemkin in his character was violent, haughty, and tyrannical; not only the courtiers of Catherine felt the overbearing power of this guilty favorite, but even foreign ambassadors were treated with studied disdain and ceremonious superiority. It is reported that not satisfied with the pompous title of chief of the Cossacks, he aspired to the dignity of duke of Courland, and to the throne of Poland, and in the midst of his elevation there were not some wanting who expected that at the head of the Russian armies he would declare himself independent, or presume to dethrone his benefactress.

POTHIER, Robert Joseph, one of the most eminent of the French juris consults, was born, in 1769, at Orleans; was professor of law in his native city; and died in 1772, as much beloved for his virtues as admired for his extensive learning. His great work is his Digest of the Pandects of Justinian, in three folio volumes. His treatises on various legal questions form seventeen volumes octavo.

POTOCKI, Count Stanislaus, a Polish writer, and statesman, of a family which has produced several eminent characters, was born, in 1757, at Warsaw; was one of those who contributed most actively to establish the constitution of 1791; was appointed a palatine senator and one of the ministers of the grand duchy of Warsaw; was president of the senate in 1818; and died in 1821. Among his works are, a Treatise on Eloquence and Style; and the Journey to Ciennogrod, a Satirical romance.

POTT, Percival, a very able surgeon, born in Thread-needle street, London, December 1713. Though he might have obtained preferment in the church, by means of his patron, bishop Wilcox, he chose the profession of a surgeon, and under the judicious directions of Mr. Nourse, soon distinguished himself. In 1745, he was elected surgeon of Bartholomew hospital, and by sound judgment, attention, and experience, he was enabled to introduce a mild and rational mode of practice in the treatment of his patients. In 1764, he was made fellow of the Royal society, and the next year he attracted the public attention by his lectures, and then removed from Watling street to Lincoln's Inn, and in 1777, to Hanover square. After a long life, devoted to the service of mankind, universally respected and admired, he died December 1788, in consequence of a cold which he caught in visiting a country patient. This worthy man advanced the science of surgery, not only by the result of long experience, but by the invention of several surgical instruments, and by the publication of some valuable treatises. The chief of his works are, a Treatise on the Hernia—on the Wounds of the Head—Observations on the Fistula Lacrymalis—Remarks on the Hydrocele—on the Cataract, &c. all of which have been collected and published 1790, in 3 vols. 8vo. by his son-in-law, Mr. Earle.

POTTER, Christopher, an English divine, born in Westmoreland, 1591. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and became fellow, and also succeeded his uncle, Dr. Barnaby Potter, 1626, as provost. He published a sermon, preached at his uncle's consecration as bishop of Carlisle, 1628, and he himself was made dean of Worcester, 1635, and in 1640, vice-chancellor of Oxford. He signalized himself by his loyalty during the civil wars, and sent his plate to the king, saying that he wished rather to drink like Diogenes in the palm of his hand, than that his majesty should want. In January 1646, he was nominated to the deanery of Durham; but he died in his college the following March, and before he was installed. He was a learned and exemplary character. He wrote besides some tracts on predestination against the Calvinists.

POTTER, John, D.D., primate of England, was born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1674. He was educated at University college, Oxford, and at the age of nineteen, began to distinguish himself as an able Grecian, and acute critic, by his publication of Variantes Lectiones ad Plutarchi Librum de audiendis. He was in 1694, chosen fellow of Lincoln college, where he became an eminent and popular tutor. He was in 1704, made chaplain to archbishop Tenison, and went in consequence to reside at Lambeth. In 1708, he was appointed canon of Christ church, and regius divinity professor, and in 1715, was raised to the see of Oxford. In 1737, he succeeded Wake, at Canterbury, and after supporting this high office with becoming dignity, died 1747. In his private character, it is said that he was haughty, and to prove this, it is mentioned that he disinherited his son for marrying below his rank. He published Antiquities of Greece, 2 vols. 8vo.—which have passed through several editions—an Edition of Lycophron, folio, much valued—Discourse on Church Government—and Edition of Clemens Alexandrinus. His theological works and charges were edited, 3 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1753.

POTTER, Francis, an English divine, born in Wiltshire, and educated at Oxford. He succeeded his father as minister of Kilmington, 1637, and was admitted member of the Royal society in consequence of his presenting a curious hydraulic machine to that learned body. He was equally eminent as a painter; but his Explication of the Number six hundred and sixty-six, in the Apocalypse, 4to. Oxford, 1642, does not reflect much on his sense or genius as a commentator. He died blind, 1678.

POTTER, Robert, a learned divine, was born in Norfolk, in 1721, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1741. His first preferment was the vicarage of Searning in Norfolk, where he wrote several ingenious poems in imitation of Pope, which were published in one volume, octavo, in 1774. In 1777, appeared his translation of Æschylus, with notes, 4to.; reprinted in 1779, in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1781, came out the first volume of his translation of Euripides, and the second volume in the following year. In 1788, he printed his Sophocles, for which his old school-fellow, lord Thurlow, gave him a prebend in the church of Norwich; and bishop Bagot presented him to the vicarages of Lowestoft, and Kessingland. He died at Lowestoft in 1804. Besides the above works, Mr. Potter wrote "Observations on the Poor Laws;" an "Answer to Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets;" "A Translation of the Oracle concerning Babylon," &c.

POUCHARD, Julian, a native of Lower Normandy, who was engaged in the direction of the Journal des Scavans, and was also professor of Greek in the royal college at Paris. He wrote a Discourse on the Antiquity of the Egyptians—and another on the Liberalities of the Romans, and died 1705, aged 49.

POUGET, Francis Amé, a French divine, born at Montpellier, 1666. He was priest of the oratory, doctor of the Sorbonne, regent of an ecclesiastical school at Montpellier, vicar of St. Roche, Paris, and died at the convent of St. Magloire, 1728. He was an able theologian, and is said to have proved his powers by the penitence and conversion of La Fontaine. He wrote a Catechism of Montpellier, or a Body of Divinity, 5 vols. 12mo., afterwards translated into Latin, in 2 vols. fol.—Christian Instructions on the Duties of the Knights of Malta, 12mo.

POULLE, Lewis, preacher to the king, and abbot of Nogent, died at Avignon, his native place, 8th November, 1781, aged 79. Besides eloquence, which he possessed in the highest degree, he was also eminently known as a poet, and he obtained the poetical prize at Toulouse, in 1732 and 1738. His sermons were very popular, and it is remarkable, that he never committed them to paper, but retained them in his memory, and at last, after the lapse of forty years, he was with difficulty prevailed upon by his friends, to favor the public with discourses, which had charmed and consoled the most numerous audiences. They appeared in 2 vols. 12mo., 1778.

POUPART, Francis, a native of Mans, who studied anatomy and philosophy at Paris, and took his degree of M.D. at Rheims. He wrote a dissertation on the Leech, in the Journal des Sçavans—a Memoir on Hernaphrodite Insects—History of the Fornicæ-Leo, and Fornicæ-Pulex, besides other valuable tracts, inserted in the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was a member. Though in narrow circumstances, he maintained his character of gaiety, good humor, and modesty. He died October, 1709, aged 49.

POURCHOT, Edme, a native of Pouilly, near Auxerre, who became professor of philosophy in the college of the Grassins, and then of that of Mazarin, at Paris. He was a man of great information, and intimate with Racine, Despreaux, Mabilion, Montfaucon, and the other learned men of his time. He wrote Institutions Philosophicæ, edited a fourth time in 4to, 1744, and 5 vols. 12mo., and also other works, and died at Paris, 22d June, 1734, aged 83.

POURFOUR, Francis, a physician, who died at Paris, his native place, 1741, aged 77. He is author of three letters on a New System of the Brain, 4to.—Dissertation on the New Method of operating for the cataract, 12mo—and on the Diseases of the Eyes, 4to., in three letters. He was also a most skilful herbalist, and after his death, which happened at Paris, 18th June, 1741, in his 77th year, there was found among his papers, a valuable MS. herbal, of 30 folio vols., of which the plants had been carefully prepared by himself.

POUSSIN, Nicholas, an eminent French painter, born at Andely, in Normandy, 1594. He studied at Paris, and in his 30th year, passed to Rome; but scarce able to maintain himself by his pencil, till his genius burst through the clouds of prejudice, and established his character, as a great and sublime artist. He devoted much of his time to the contemplation of the sculptured heroes of ancient Rome, and her various relics of antiquity; and thence arose that exactness in the manners and customs, the times and places, which he every where mingles with elegance of form, correctness and variety of proportion, and interesting air, and boldness of feature. His fame was so great, that Louis XIII. sent him an invitation which he could not refuse; but though he was flattered, and lodged in the Thuilleries, he sighed for the classic retreats of his favorite Rome, and at last returned there, and died there, of a paralytic stroke, 1665. His chief works in France, were the Lord's Supper—the Labors of Hercules, for the Louvre, which he did not complete, in consequence of the satirical remarks made by Vouet and his pupils, upon him.

POWEL, David, D.D., a learned Welshman, born in Denbighshire, 1552. He was educated at Oxford, and became vicar of Ruabon, Denbighshire, and had some other preferment in the church of St. Asaph. He died 1590, and was buried in his own church. He published Caradoc's History of Cambria, with annotations, 4to., 1594—Annotations in Itinerarium Cambriæ per Sylv. Geraldum, 1535—Annotations in Cambriæ Descrip. per Gerald.—De Britannicâ Historiâ recte Intelligendâ—Pont. Virunnii Historia Britannica.

POWELL, William Samuel, an able divine, born at Colchester, 27th September, 1717. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1740, and master, 1765, after promoting its interests as an active tutor. He was also archdeacon of Colchester, and rector of Fresh-water, in the isle of Wight, and died January 19th, 1775. He published a well-known sermon on subscribing to the thirty-nine articles, and other excellent discourses.

POWHATAN, a famous sachem, of great authority among the Indian tribes in Virginia, at the period of its colonization. He was deeply versed in all the savage arts of government and policy, and was insidious, crafty, and cruel. After the marriage of his daughter, the celebrated Pocahontas, to Mr. Rolfe, he remained faithful to the English. Powhatan died, 1618.

POWNALL, Thomas, an English writer, born in Lincolnshire. He came early to America, and obtained the government of New Jersey, and afterwards that of Massachusetts, which he exchanged in 1760, for that of South Carolina. During the American war he returned to England, and was made comptroller-general of the expenditure of the army in Germany, and was also elected member of the commons in three parliaments. He afterwards retired from public business, for the pursuit of literary labors, and died at Bath, much respected, 1795, aged 73. He was a man of great information, and well skilled in antiquities, and contributed much to the memoirs of the Antiquarian society, of which he was a member. He wrote Memoirs on Drainage and Navigation—Letter to Adam Smith on his Wealth of Nations—treatise on Antiquities—Memorials to the sovereigns of Europe—Memorial to the Sovereigns of America—the Right, Interest, &c. of Government concerning East India Affairs—Topographical Description of Part of North America—Description of Antiquities in the Provincia Romana of Gaul—Intellectual Physics—Essay on the Nature of Being—and Treatise on Old Age.

PRADON, Nicolas, a French poet, who affected to be the rival of Racine. Through prejudice and party, his Hyppolytus and Phædra, for a time balanced the merits and the popularity of that great poet, but his presumption and ignorance have been severely censured by Boileau. He was born at Rouen, and died at Paris, 1698. His works were printed 1744., in 2 vols. 12mo.

PRATT, Charles, earl of Camden, third son of sir John Pratt, chief justice of the king's bench, was born 1713. From Eton and from King's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, he entered at the Inner Temple, and studied assiduously the law. His merits, however, remained buried in obscurity, till called forth by the protection of Henley and of Mr. Pitt, and when the former was made chancellor in 1757, he obtained the office of attorney-general for his friend. In 1762, he was raised to the dignity of chief justice of the common pleas, and it was in this office that he gained such deserved popularity, when after a patient hearing of arguments on both sides, he pronounced the detention of Mr. Wilkes illegal, against the opinion and the wishes of government. This impartial conduct procured for him the thanks and the freedom of the city of London in a gold box; his picture was placed in Guildhall, as an honorable testimony of his virtues, and various cities in the kingdom re-echoed the sentiments of the capital. In 1765, he was raised to the peerage, and in 1766, advanced to the seals; but his opinion on the Middlesex election was so opposite to the views of the ministry, that he was stripped of his honors, though he had the satisfaction to see some of his colleagues proud to share his disgrace. In the American war he reprobated the violent measures pursued by lord North, and in the case of the libel laws he wished to give greater power to the deliberation of jurymen. In 1782, he was appointed president of the council, and though the next year he resigned for a little time, he continued in the honorable office till his death. This venerable character died 18th April, 1794.

PRATT, Samuel Jackson, a once popular novelist, and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1749, at St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire, and after having been an actor, an itinerant lecturer, and a bookseller, he became an author by profession. He died in 1814. Of his numerous works, the principal are, the poems of Sympathy and Landscapes in Verse; the tragedy of The Fair Circassian; the novels of Liberal Opinions, Emina Corbet, the Pupil of Pleasure, Shenstone Green, and Family Secrets; Gleanings through Wales, Holland, and Westphalia; Gleanings in England; and Harvest Home.

PRATT, Benjamin, chief justice of New York, was born in Massachusetts, in 1710, and was graduated at Harvard college. He studied law, and entering on its practice in Boston, soon became eminent. Turning his attention to public affairs, he soon rose to political distinction, and by the influence of governor Pownall, was appointed chief justice of New York. He died in January, 1763. He had made collections for a history of New England, and possessed considerable talent for poetry.

PREBLE, Edward, in 1779, served as a midshipman under captain Williams, but soon obtained a lieutenantcy on board the sloop of war commanded by captain Little. In 1801, he was appointed to the command of the frigate Essex, and sailed in her for the protection of the East India trade. In 1803, he was made a commodore of the squadron fitted out against Tripoli. Commodore Preble commanded the expedition with great skill and bravery, and settled the difficulties with the Barbary powers, on the most favorable terms. He died 1807, aged 45.

PREMONTVAL, Peter le Guay de, member of the academy of sciences at Berlin, was born at Charenton, 1716. He wrote Monogamia, or a Tract on Single Marriage, 3 vols. 8vo.—Preservative against the Corruption of French Language in Germany, 8vo.—the Mind of Fontenelle, 12mo.—Thoughts on Liberty—Memoirs on the Berlin Academy. He inclined to the doctrines of Socinus and Epicurus, and of fortuitous creation. He died at Berlin, 1767.

PRESCOTT, William, a distinguished revolutionary officer, was born in 1726, at Groton, in Massachusetts. At the capture of Cape Breton, in 1758, he was a lieutenant of the provincial troops, and attracted, by his conduct in that campaign, the notice of the British general, who offered him a commission in the regular army, which, however, he declined. In 1774, when the struggle between the colonies and the mother country was at hand, he was appointed to command a regiment of minute-men, organized by the provincial congress, and on receiving notice of the intended operations of general Gage against Concord, marched with it to Lexington. Before he arrived, however, the British had retreated, and he then proceeded to Cambridge, where he entered the army that was ordered to be raised, the greater part of his officers and men volunteering to serve with him for the first campaign. On the 16th of June, 1775, he was ordered to Charlestown with three regiments, and directed to throw up works on Bunker-hill. On reaching the ground, it was perceived that the neighboring elevation, called Breeds' hill, was a more suitable station; and on it the defences were erected. The next day, as is well known, general Howe with a force more than quadruple that under the orders of colonel Prescott, attempted to dislodge him, and, after a contest among the most memorable in the American annals, succeeded in effecting that object with immense loss. Colonel Prescott was one of the last to leave the intrenchments when he found it necessary to order a retreat, and he offered to the commander-in-chief to retake the position the same night, if he would give him two regiments. In 1777, he resigned his command, and returned home; but in the autumn of the same year, he went as a volunteer to the northern army under general Gates, and was present at the capture of Burgoyne. This was his last military service. He subsequently sat in the legislature of his native state for several years. He died in 1795, in his seventieth year, highly esteemed as an energetic, brave, and patriotic citizen.

PRESTON, Thomas, LL.D. fellow of King's college, Cambridge, was doctor of civil law, and master of Trinity hall in Elizabeth's reign. When the queen visited the university 1564, he played with such success in the Latin tragedy of Dido, that her majesty settled a pension of £20 on him. He wrote some dramatic pieces.

PREVILLE, Peter Louis Dubus de, an eminent French actor. He was intended by his parents for the ecclesiastical profession; but for some childish misconduct he left his father's house, and after working for a little time with some masons, he joined himself to a company of strolling players. From Lyons, where he first gained popularity, he came to Paris, and in his exhibition before the Royal family he so much pleased the king Louis XV. that he was made one of the comedians of the court. He withdrew from the stage in 1785, but again re-appeared in 1792, in support of his profession which had suffered by the revolution. He afterwards retired to the house of his daughter at Beauvais, where he died blind in 1800. As an actor he possessed great power, he could adopt the manners and expressions of every age and profession, and after exciting the loudest laughter, he has been known to rouse the deepest compassion, and to draw tears from his auditors.

PREVOT D'EXILES, Antony Francis, a French writer, born at Hesdin in the province of Artois, 1697. He was educated among the jesuits, but relinquished their society for the army, and afterwards retired among the Benedictines of St. Maur. The love of pleasure and of the world, however, prevailed upon him again to violate his vows, and fly from the monastery. He went to Holland, where he formed a connexion with a woman of some merit and beauty, and with her visited England 1733, and the following year returned to France. Under the patronage of Conti he promised himself a peaceful old age; but a fatal accident terminated his days. On the 23d November 1763, he was found in an apoplectic fit in the forest of Chantilly, and a surgeon, supposing him dead opened his body. The beginning of the operation restored the fallen man to his senses, but too late, as the vital parts had been lacerated. He is known as the author of translations of Clarissa Harlowe, and of sir Charles Grandison into French, besides which he wrote Memoirs of a man of Quality, in 6 vols. a romance of some merit—History of Cleveland, natural son of Cromwell, 6 vols.—Pro and Con, a periodical journal, continued in 20 vols. in which he censured with too much freedom the works of his contemporaries—the Dean of Coleraine, a novel—a General History of Voyages—History of Margaret of Anjou, 2 vols. 12mo. and other works.

PRICÆUS or PRICE, John, an Englishman who resided in Paris, but returned to England in 1646, which he left in consequence of the civil wars. He afterwards settled at Florence, where he became a Roman catholic, and was made keeper of the medals to the grand duke, and Greek professor. He died at Rome 1676, aged 76. He wrote notes on the Psalms—on St. Matthew—on the Acts—on Apuleius, 1650, &c. in which he evinced extensive erudition and great taste.

PRICE, sir John, a gentleman of Brecknockshire, who was employed in surveying the monasteries which were doomed to dissolution at the reformation. He was well skilled in antiquities, and wrote a defence of British history in an answer to Polydore Virgil, published by his son Richard 1573. He died about 1553.

PRICE, Richard, D.D. LL.D. an eminent English dissenting minister and able political writer, born about 1723 in Glamorganshire. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, and began early to preach at Newington, Middlesex, and afterwards removed to Hackney. In 1764, he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and some years after obtained the degree of doctor of divinity from a Scotch university; and the degree of doctor of laws from Yale college in Connecticut. In 1772, he commenced author by his appeal to the public on the national debt, and in 1776, during the party disputes which attended the beginning of the American war, he published his famous observations on the nature of civil government. As preacher at the meeting-house in the Old Jewry, he delivered a discourse in 1789, which was afterwards made public. In this sermon 'on the Love of Our Country,' he enlarged on the French revolution with party prejudices, and with democratic zeal, and asserted the right of the people to cashier their governors for misconduct. These allusions to the fate of the French monarch were read and commented upon by Mr. Burke with great severity. Dr. Price died 19th March, 1791. As a political writer he carried his ideas of equality and liberty much farther than the vices and the passions of men will with safety allow. As a calculator on political questions he was eminently distinguished. His works are four dissertations on providence and prayer, on the evidences of a future state, on the importance of christianity—a Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals, 8vo.—Observations on Reversional Payments, Annuities, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.—Discussion of the doctrines of Materialism and Necessity, in a Correspondence with Dr. Priestley, 8vo.—Essay on the Population of England and Wales 8vo—a volume of sermons on various occasional subjects. Mrs. Chapone has described him in her miscellanies, as a very amiable man in private life.

PRIDEAUX, John, an English prelate, born at Stowford, Devonshire, 1578. His parents were very poor, and when disappointed as candidate for the clerkship of Ugborough church, near Harford, he travelled on foot to Oxford, and from the mean occupation of a helper in the kitchen of Exeter college, he rose to be one of its most respectable fellows, and in 1612, was elected the rector of the society. In 1615 he was made regius professor of divinity, and canon of Christ-church, and afterwards served the office of vice chancellor, and in 1641 was raised to the see of Worcester. The troubles of the state exposed him to great persecution for his loyalty, so that he died poor, of a fever, at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. H. Sutton, at Bredon, Worcestershire, 1650. He wrote various works in Latin, besides orations, lectures, and Fasciculus Controversiarum. Theologicarum.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, D.D. an eminent divine, born at Padstow, Cornwall, 3d May, 1648. He was educated under Busby, at Westminster, and entered at Christ-church, Oxford, 1668; and in 1676, when he took his master's degree, he published his Marmora Oxiensia &c. in folio, a work of some merit, which explained more fully than Selden's account, the Arundelian marbles. This publication recommended him to the patronage of Finch, lord Nottingham, the chancellor, who gave him the living of St. Clement's in Oxford, and afterwards added a prebend in the church of Norwich, in 1681. He refused, in 1691, the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, of which he afterwards repented; but in 1702 he was promoted to the deanery of Norwich. He was unfortunately afflicted with the stone, for which he was cut in 1712; but so unskilfully was the operation performed, that he was afterwards obliged to void his urine through the orifice by which the stone had been extracted. This disagreeable accident disabled him from appearing in the pulpit; but his hours were devoted to the public service, and he then wrote his connections of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. fol. and 4 vols. 8vo. a work of great merit and utility, which has been translated into various languages, and often edited. This worthy character, amiable in private life, and respectable as an intelligent and learned author, died 1st November 1724. He wrote besides, the Right of Tithes—Directions for Church-wardens—some pamphlets—sermons, and a life of Mahomet, of which three editions were sold in one year, as part of a larger work on the Saracen Empire, a design which he abandoned.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, LL.D. an English philosopher and dissenting divine, born at Fieldhead, Yorkshire, 1733. He was educated at Daventry, under Dr. Ashworth, for the ministry among the dissenters, and at the proper age he took care of a congregation at Needham market, Suffolk, and afterwards at Nantwich, Cheshire. He became in 1761, professor of belles lettres in the Warrington academy, and after seven years residence there he removed to Leeds, and two years after accepted the office of librarian and philosophical companion to the earl of Shelburne. In this retreat the philosopher devoted himself laboriously to metaphysical and theological studies, and published various works, and when at last he separated from his noble patron he retired with an annual pension of £150 to settle at Birmingham as pastor to a unitarian congregation in 1780. While here usefully employed in advancing the cause of philosophy, and too often engaged in theological disputes, he became the victim of popular fury, and the conduct of some of his neighbors in celebrating the anniversary of the French Revolution in 1791, with more intemperance than became Englishmen and loyal subjects, excited a dreadful riot. Not only the meeting houses were destroyed on this melancholy occasion, but among others Dr. Priestley's house, library, manuscripts, and philosophical apparatus, were totally consumed, and though he recovered a compensation by suing the county, he quitted this scene of prejudice and unpopularity. After residing some time at London and Hackney, where he preached to the congregation over which his friend Price once presided, he determined to quit his native country, and seek a more peaceful retreat in America, where some of his family were already settled. He left England in 1794, and fixed his residence at Northumberland in Pennsylvania, where he died in 1804. His writings were very numerous, and he long attracted the public notice, not only by discoveries in philosophy, but by the boldness of his theological opinions. Had he confined his studies merely to philosophical pursuits, his name would have descended to posterity with greater lustre; but he who attempts innovations in government and religion, for singularity, and to excite popular prejudices, must be little entitled to the applauses of the world. His chief publications are, an Examination of Dr.

Reid's Work on the Human Mind, Dr. Beatie's on Truth, and Dr. Osborne's on Common Sense, 1755—Disquisition on Matter and Spirit, in which he denied the soul's immateriality, 1777—Experiments and Observations on various Kinds of Air, 2 vols. 8vo. and other learned and valuable communications to the philosophical transactions—Letters to Bishop Newcome on the Duration of Christ, Ministry—History of the Corruptions of Christianity, 2 vols. 8vo. a work of singular character, which brought on a controversy with Dr. Horsley, and also excited the animadversion of the monthly reviewers and other writers—and History of Early Opinions concerning the Person of Christ. He also published charts of History and Biography—History of Electricity—History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colors—Lectures on the Theory and History of Language, and on the principles of oratory and criticism. He at one time adopted the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in which Dr. Price ably opposed him; and in America he defended his Socinian principles with great warmth in a controversy with Dr. Linn of Philadelphia. His discoveries and improvements in the knowledge of chemistry were very great and important; but he lived to see the general explosion of the doctrine of phlogiston, which he had so zealously established, and so pertinaciously defended. From his extensive information as a philosopher he had correspondents in every part of the world, and was member not only of the London society, but of other learned bodies in the two continents.

PRIMEROSE, Gilbert, D.D. a Scotch divine, minister of the French church in London, chaplain to James I. and canon of Windsor. He died 1642. He is author of Jacob's Vow in opposition to the vows of monks and friars, in French, 4 vols. 4to.—the Trumpet of Zion, in 18 sermons, and other theological works. His son James was a physician who for some time practised at Paris, and afterwards settled in Yorkshire. He wrote several treatises de Mulierum Morbis, 4to.—de Circulatione Sanguinis—Enchiridion Medico-Practicum—Ars Pharmaceutica—de Vulgi Erroribus in Medicinâ, 8vo. translated into French by Rostagny, and into English by Dr. Wittie, 1651, 8vo.—Academia Mouspeliensis Descripta.

PRINCE DE BEAUMONT, Mad. le, a French lady, born at Rouen. She was long engaged in education in England, and by her various popular publications rendered instruction pleasing and delightful to her youthful readers. Her pieces are le Magasin des Enfants—des Adolescentes—l'Education complete—and other works, all of which are highly interesting, and promote the cause of morality and virtue. She died 1780.

PRINCE, Thomas, governor of Plymouth colony, was a native of England. He came to America in 1621, and was chosen governor of Plymouth in 1644, and was again elected in different years till 1657, and was then chosen without intermission till 1672. He died 1673, aged 73.

PRINCE, Thomas, minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1707. He was ordained pastor of the old south church, as colleague with Dr. Sewall, October 1st, 1713. He died 1758, aged 71. Mr. Prince had a valuable collection of manuscripts relating to the civil and religious history of New England. The papers were left to the care of the old south church, and during the American revolutionary war, were unfortunately lost or destroyed. His publications were numerous, but mostly sermons.

PRINCE, Nathan, a distinguished American scholar, graduated at Harvard college in 1713. In 1723 he was appointed tutor of that institution; and in 1737 he became a fellow. His reputation as a mathematician and philosopher, and as a classical scholar and logician, ranked him among the first men of this country at that time. After leaving Harvard college, he took orders in the episcopal church. He died July 25, 1748, at Ratlin in the West Indies, where he was a minister.

PRINGLE, sir John, an eminent physician, born in Roxburghshire 10th April, 1707. He studied medicine at Edingburgh, and afterwards completed his education under Boerhaave at Leyden, where he took his medical degrees. He was in 1742, appointed physician to the army in Flanders, and he attended the forces of the duke of Cumberland to the battle of Culloden, after which he settled in London, and was made physician to the queen in 1761. His practice was great, and his reputation such, that he was created a baronet in 1766, and elected president of the Royal society, from 1772 to 1773, and physician to the king. This respectable man died in London, 18th January, 1782. He is author of Observations on the Diseases of the Army, 8vo.—Memoirs on Septic and Anti-septic Substances, 8vo. for which he received the gold medal of the Royal society—Observations on the Treatment of Fevers in Hospitals and Prisons—Anniversary Discourses before the Royal society.

PRIOLO, Benjamin, author of a good Latin History of France, from the death of Louis XIII. 1643 to 1664, was born of a noble family at Venice, 1602. After studying at Orthez, Montauban, and at Leyden, under Heinsius and Vossius, he visited Paris, and afterwards Padua, and at last became the friend and the associate of the duke de Rohan. After his patron's death, 1633, he retired to Geneva, and afterwards was engaged in various negotiations in favor of the French court. He died of an apoplexy at Lyons, 1667, as he was going on a secret embassy to Venice. The best edition of his history is that of Leipsic, 1686, 8vo.

PRIOR, Matthew, an English poet of celebrity. He was born 21st July, 1664, in London, where his father was a joiner. After his father's death, his uncle, a vintner near Charing-cross, took care of him, and sent him to Westminster school, with the intention of bringing him up to his business; but while he pursued occasionally his studies, he was fortunately called to settle a dispute on a passage in Horace, by some company in his uncle's house, and lord Dorset was so pleased with his abilities and ingenuity, that he liberally patronised him. He was therefore sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he soon became fellow; and the application which he bestowed to learning, advanced him still more in the good opinion of his patron and of his friends. In 1686 he joined his friend Mr. Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, in ridiculing the Hind and Panther of Dryden, in the story of the country and city mouse, and at the revolution, when his poetical merits became publicly known, he was introduced by lord Dorset to king William, and employed about the court. In 1690 he was secretary to the plenipotentiaries at the Hague, and the king, sensible of his merits, kept him about his person, as gentleman of his bed-chamber. He was afterwards secretary of the negotiations at Ryswick in 1697, and also principal secretary of state, in Ireland, and the next year he went as secretary to the embassy in France. In 1700 he was one of the lords commissioners of trade and plantations, and obtaining a seat in parliament for East Grinstead, he voted for the impeachment of the lords who had advised the partition treaty.

Though he celebrated the illustrious deeds of the English at the battle of Blenheim, yet he was an advocate for peace, and in 1711 he was sent by queen Anne to France as ambassador plenipotentiary. He continued in that character even after the accession of George I. but he was accused by the parliament, and committed to close custody; yet, though exempted from the act of grace passed in 1707, he was liberated from confinement, and no charge laid against him. He retired from public life to his seat, Down-hall, Essex, engaged solely in literary pursuits. He was employed for some time on a history of his own time, but he was suddenly carried off by a fever, September 18, 1721, in his 58th year. The History of his own Time appeared after his own death; but though said to be published from his papers, was evidently a spurious composition. The poems of Prior are chiefly on light subjects, but written with elegance, ease, and spirit. His Solomon on the Vanity of the World, was inscribed to his early patron lord Dorset.

PRISCIAN, or PRISCIANUS, a celebrated grammarian, was born at Cæsarea, and was the master of a famous school at Constantinople, about A.D. 525. His principal work is a treatise on Grammar. His rigid attention to correctness gave rise to the saying of "breaking Priscian's head," which is applied to the violators of grammatical rules.

PRITZ or PRITIUS, John George, a protestant divine born at Leipsic 1662. He was professor of divinity at Gripswalde, and died much beloved, as one of the ministers of Frankfort, 24th August, 1732. He published an Introduction to the New Testament, 8vo.—de Immortalitate Hominis—an edition of Macarius' works—Milton's Letters—and an edition of the Greek Testament.

PROBUS, M. Aurel Valer, a general, made emperor of Rome at the death of Tacitus 276. He was successful against the Goths and other barbarians; but at last was murdered by his own soldiers, 282. He was a prince of great worth, and deservedly beloved by his subjects.

PROTAGORAS, a Grecian sophist, was born at Abdera, about B. C. 488; exercised in his youth the calling of a porter; opened at Athens a school of philosophy, and acquired great reputation and riches; was banished on a charge of atheism; and perished by shipwreck at the age of seventy. Prodicus was one of his disciples.

PROTOGENES, an eminent Grecian painter, a native of Caunus, in Caria, flourished about B.C. 336. A considerable part of his life was spent in obscurity, but he was at length brought into notice by Apelles giving a large price for one of his pictures. His masterpiece was a picture of Ialysus, the founder of Rhodes, on which he was employed for seven years.

PRYNNE, William, an English lawyer, distinguished during the civil wars. He was born 1600, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's inn, 1620. His Histriomastix, or Discourse on Stage Plays, in 1632, was noticed by the court, as it was supposed to throw reflections on the queen, and the author was condemned by the star chamber to be pilloried, to pay a fine of £5000 and to lose his ears. This severity did not check his pen; he wrote other books which satirically reflected on the conduct of Laud, and for this offence he was in 1637, again brought before the star chamber, and condemned to be pilloried, fined £5000 to lose the remainder of his ears, to have S. L. schismatical leveller, branded on both his cheeks, and to be imprisoned for life. He was, pursuant to the sentence, confined in Mount Orgueil castle in Jersey; but in 1640 he was set at liberty by the Commons, and he returned to London in triumph. He was member for Newport in Cornwall, in the long parliament, and was one of the visitors at Oxford in 1647. He was a violent enemy to Laud, and was the chief manager of his trial; but he attacked with equal violence the independents, and did not spare their leader Cromwell, by whom he was imprisoned in Dunster castle, Somersetshire. He was restored to his seat in parliament when the recall of Charles II. took place, and sat afterwards for Bath. At the restoration he was made keeper of the records in the Tower, with a salary of £500 per annum, and died at Lincoln's inn, 24th October 1669. He wrote a great number of books, chiefly on politics and religion, the best known of which are, his History of Laud, folio—the Lives of John—Henry III.—and Edward I.—Records, 8 vols. folio.

PSALMANAZAR, George, an extraordinary character, whose real name and birth place are unknown, though he is supposed to be a native of France. With an excellent education, obtained in some of the colleges of the jesuits, he began at an early age to impose upon the world, first in the habit of a pilgrim, and afterwards in the character of a native of Formosa. He travelled from Germany to Liege, pretending to be a Japanese converted to christianity; but afterwards he professed himself to be a heathen, and by the assiduity and zeal of the chaplain of brigadier Lauder's regiment, stationed at Sluys, he was admitted into the pale of the Christian church, and baptized. The conversion of so able and so extraordinary a man, procured an easy introduction to Compton, the bishop of London, and Psalmanazar was taken into his house, and patronised as a deserving character. He was prevailed on to translate the church catechism into the Formosan language, and he also composed a grammar of that language; and though there were some who suspected the imposition, yet he was generally considered by the learned as a man of superior abilities, and a great prodigy. He afterwards published his History of Formosa, which quickly passed through two editions; and that greater confidence might be placed in his narrations, he accustomed himself to feed on raw flesh, roots, and herbs. Some absurdities, however, were discovered in his history, and at last, after living some years on the credulity of the public, he confessed himself an impostor, and declared his sorrow for the impropriety of his conduct. Though thus disgraced and abandoned by his former patrons, yet he found sufficient means to subsist by his pen; he undertook a share in the Universal History, and displayed in the execution great abilities. He lived many years after in an exemplary manner, and died 1763, fully sensible, and sorry for the vile imposition which he had practised.

PSAMMETICUS, a king of Egypt, who shared the sovereign power with eleven other princes. When exiled by his royal associates, he returned, and with the assistance of the Greeks defeated them, and made himself sole monarch. He died 616 B.C.

PSELLUS, Michael Constantius, a Greek writer, who flourished about 1105, and was tutor to Michael, son of the emperor Constantine Dumas. He was a good scholar, and wrote comments on twenty-four of Menander's plays extant in his time. He wrote besides, de quatuor Mathematicis Scientiis, 1556, 8vo.—de Lapidum Virtutibus, 8vo.—de Operatione Dæmonum, 8vo.—de Victus Ratione, 8vo.—Synopsis Legum, Versibus Græcis edita.

PTOLEMY LAGUS, or SOTER, was the son of Arsinoe, the mistress of Philip of Macedon, and he became one of the generals and favorites of Alexander the Great. On the hero's death he obtained Egypt as his share of the spoils, and founded there a kingdom, and made Alexandria his capital. He patronised learning and the arts, and died B.C. 235.

PUCCI, Francis, a noble Florentine, who left the popish tenets for the protestant, but afterwards returned at Prague to his ancient principles. He travelled through Poland, and with new inconsistency again embraced the protestant faith, for which he was seized at Strasburg, and hurried to Rome, and burnt as a heretic 1600. In a book inscribed to pope Clement VIII. 1592, he supported the opinion that Christ by his death had made sufficient atonement for the sins of mankind.

PUFFENDORF, Samuel de, a famous civilian and historian, born 1631, at Flet, near Cheunnitz, in Upper Saxony, where his father was minister. He studied at Grim and Leipsic, and Jena, and by his great application qualified himself to become an active and distinguished counsellor in some German court. He was advised by his brother to seek for preferment and honor out of his country, and in consequence he accepted the place of tutor to the son of M. Coyet, a noble Swede, who was ambassador at the court of Denmark. War between the two countries, however, obscured his pleasing prospects; he was seized with all the retinue of the Swedish ambassador, and imprisoned, and during the tedious hours of his confinement for eight long months, he digested in his mind observations on what he had read in Grotius' book, de Jure Belli & Pacis, and Hobbes' work, and afterwards published it at the Hague, 1660, by the title of Elementorum Jurisprudentiæ Universalis Libri duo, and this gave rise to his excellent treatise de Jure Naturæ & Gentium. His literary reputation now procured him the appointment of professor of the law of nature and of nations at Heidelberg, on the presentation of the elector palatine, and in 1670 he was honorably invited by Charles XI. of Sweden, to be professor in the newly founded university of Lund. His fame continued to increase as a writer, and as a professor, and he was nominated historiographer and counsellor to the king, and raised to the dignity of a Swedish baron. He was afterwards in 1638 invited to Berlin in the most liberal manner, with the distinction of historiographer and counsellor, by the elector of Brandenburg, to write the life of the elector William the Great, and he died there 1694, of a mortification in one of his toes, in consequence of cutting the nail. This most enlightened philosopher wrote various works the most known of which are, History of Sweden from 1628 to 1654—History of Charles Gustavus, 2 vols. folio—History of the elector William, 2 vols. folio—An Historical and Political Description of the Papal State—Introduction to the History of the principal European States, 8vo.—treatise on the Law of Nature and Nations, 2 vols. 4to.—Opuscula Juvenilia.

PUGATSCHEFF, Yemelka, a Cossack, who, after serving against the Prussians and the Turks, deserted from the army, and after spending some time among some Polish hermits, appeared in Russia, and laid claim to the crown as the real Peter III. He met at first some success, and might have seized Moscow; but at last the cruelties which he exercised upon the inhabitants of the places where he passed, revolted even his own followers against him, and he was delivered up to the officers of Catherine. He was conveyed in an iron cage to Moscow, where he was beheaded 21st January 1775, and in his last moments he showed as much weakness as he had displayed vigor and intrepidity at the head of his desperate adherents.

PUISAYE, Count Joseph, one of the most able of the French royalist chiefs, was born, about 1754, at Montagne, and was descended from an ancient and noble family. He was intended for the church, but preferred the military profession. In 1789, the nobility of Perche deputed him as their representative to the states general. He sat in the constituent assembly, and was an enlightened friend of reform. In 1793, he held a command in the departmental army, under Wimpfen, and was consequently proscribed by the Convention. He took refuge in Brittany, where, by dint of eloquence, talent, and activity, he organized a formidable force, under the name of Chouans. He visited England in 1794, obtained a powerful succour, and returned with it to France in 1795; but his hopes were blasted by envious intrigues of his own party, who occasioned the disaster at Quiberon. After having continued his efforts for two years longer, he resigned his commission, disgusted by the conduct of the Bourbons, and fixed his abode in Canada, whence he afterwards removed to England. He died December 13th, 1827. He published his own Memoirs.

PULASKI, Count, a celebrated soldier, was a native of Poland, and made brave though unsuccessful efforts to restore his country to independence. He came to the United States during the revolutionary war, and was appointed a brigadier-general in the American army. He was mortally wounded in the attack on Savannah in 1779. Congress voted to erect a monument to his memory.

PULCHERIA, St., daughter of Arcadius, ascended the throne with her brother Theodosius the younger, and at his death in 450, she married Marcianus. She was a great patroness of learned men, and in her conduct very devout and exemplary. She assembled the council of Chalcedon, 451, and died three years after.

PULCI, Louis, an Italian poet of merit, born of a noble family at Florence, December 3d, 1431. He was the friend of Lorenzo de Medici. His chief work is Morgante Maggiore, an epic romance, which though compared by some to the compositions of Tasso and Ariosto, has been rightly considered by others as a vulgar and profane work, which unites the most solemn and serious subjects with the burlesque and comic. He wrote besides a poem on a tournament at Florence, 1468, called Giostra di Lorenzo de Medici, and some sonnets. He died about 1487. His brothers Luke and Bernard were also known as the successful votaries of the muses.

PULTENEY, William, earl of Bath, was born of an ancient and opulent family, 1682. He was early elected into the House of Commons, and was an able and eloquent opposer of the ministry in queen Anne's reign. At the accession of George I. he was made secretary at war; but after some years of cooperation with Sir Robert Walpole, he disagreed with him, and warily opposed his measures for advancing the interests of Hanover at the expense of England. Difference of opinion produced altercation, and altercation hatred, so that Walpole's measures were opposed with personal virulence, and the king at last struck off the name of Pulteney from the list of privy counsellors, and put him out of the commission for the peace. These violent steps increased the opposition, and the popularity of Pulteney, and his sarcasms and his attacks were pointed with the most powerful effect against the minister, who often declared that he dreaded his tongue more than another man's sword. At last opposition prevailed, Walpole was disgraced in 1741, and Pulteney rose in his seat, and was restored to the privy council, and made earl of Bath; but when he got into place, he lost his popularity, and afterwards despised that good public opinion which he could not procure. He died 8th June, 1764, and without issue. He was concerned in the "Craftsman," and wrote some political pamphlets.

PULTENEY, Richard, a native of Loughborough, Leicestershire, who after practising as an apothecary at Leicester, took his medical degrees at Edinburgh 1764. He was patronised by his relation the earl of Bath, and settled at Blandford, Dorsetshire, where he acquired great reputation in his profession. He was fellow of the Royal society, and other learned bodies, and died 1801, aged 71. He is author of a General View of the Life and Writings of Linnæus, 1781—Historical and Biographical Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England, 2 vols. 8vo. and he made besides valuable communications to the History of Leicestershire by Mr. Nichols, and to that of Dorsetshire by Hutchins, newly edited by Gough; but he particularly contributed to the pages of the Gentleman's magazine, which he enriched by various dissertations and papers on antiquities, and especially on history, a science to which he was very partial, and which he had studied with great skill and attention. An Account of his Life has been published by Dr. Maton in 4to.

PURBACH, George, a learned German, born at Purbach. He was eminent as a divine and philosopher, and particularly applied himself to astronomy, in which science he made several observations, and for the improvement of which he invented some instruments, and calculated useful tables. He translated Ptolemy's Almagest, and died at Vienna, 1462, aged 39.

PURCELL, Henry, a celebrated musical composer, born in 1658. His abilities were early displayed, so that at the age of 18 he was appointed organist of Westminster, and in 1682, he was made one of the organists of the chapel royal. He soon distinguished himself by the publication of some sonatas, and anthems, and divided equally his services between the church and the theatre. Dryden, some of whose poetry he set to music, has highly complimented his powers, and from the superior style of his church music, he deserved the greatest encomiums. He died 21st November 1695. His works were published by subscription, under the title of Orpheus Britannicus, 1698, and dedicated to his patroness, lady Howard. His brother Daniel, a famous punster, was organist of Magdalen college, Oxford, and of St. Andrews, Holborn.

PURCHAS, Samuel, an able divine, born at Thaxstead, Essex, 1577, and educated at Cambridge. He obtained in 1604, the vicarage of Eastwood, Essex, which he entrusted to the care of his brother to prosecute with greater facility his studies in London. He obtained afterwards the living of St. Martin's Ludgate, London, and was also chaplain to archbishop Abbot. He died about 1628. His great work was his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World, and the Religions observed in all ages, 5 vols. folio. These are a valuable compilation.

PURVER, Antony, an extraordinary character, born at Up-Hursborn, Hants, 1702. His parents were quakers; but though he was taught only to read and write, he applied himself with such assiduity that he was well versed in the most difficult parts of arithmetic, and had such a retentive memory, that, when young, in twelve hours he could repeat twelve of the longest and most difficult chapters in the bible. He was apprenticed to a shoemaker, but still turned his thoughts to learning, and acquired such a knowledge of the learned languages, that he began to translate the bible from the original text. To maintain himself he kept school at his native village, and at Trenchay Gloucestershire, where he married, and afterwards settled at Andover, where he completed, in 1764, his translation of the Old and New Testament, a most laborious work, the fruit of thirty years' application. It appeared in 2 vols. folio, by the generosity of his friend Dr. Fothergill, who gave him £1000 towards his expenses, and though it is occasionally deficient in judgment and taste, it yet possesses great and pleasing simplicity, as being very literal. As a preacher among the quakers, Purver was highly respected. He died at Andover, 1777, and was buried there in the ground of the quakers' meeting.

PURVES, James, a learned Arian preacher, born at a little village of Berwickshire, in 1734. His father was only a keeper of cattle and intended James for the same profession. He meanwhile, having obtained the loan of some books on mathematics, made himself master of geometry and trigonometry, and afterwards taught these sciences with other branches of mathematics, and assisted some public authors in compiling mathematical works, which have been well received. He joined a party of the ancient Cameronians, and in 1769, at one of their general meetings, was called to be a pastor among them. To qualify himself for this office he studied the Greek and Hebrew languages, and compiled a Hebrew grammar, which is still in MS. These acquisitions led him into the study of the Arian Controversy, when finally he adopted the opinions of Arius; and afterwards became preacher to a small Arian congregation in Edinburgh; where he also kept a school and a book shop, for many years before he died. His works are, 1. A Humble Attempt to investigate the Scripture doctrine of the Trinity. 2. Observations on Prophetic Times, 2 vols. 3. A Treatise on Civil Government. 4. Observations on Socinian Arguments. 5. A Scriptural Catechism. 6. Correspondence with the Buchanites. 7. Dissertation on the Seals, Trumpets, &c. 8. Enquiry into the Nature of Faith and Regeneration. 9. Review of Paine's Age of Reason. 10. A Treatise on Sacrifices. 11. Review of some Religious opinions, established by the Powers of the World, favorable to Despotism. 12. An Historic and Prophetic Representation of Events. 13. Scheme of the Lives of the Patriarchs. All these were published at Edinburgh within the last twelve years of his life, an evidence at least of uncommon industry. He was three times married, and left a daughter by each wife. He died in 1789.

PUFEANUS, Erycius, LL.D., properly VAN-DEPUTTE, an eminent scholar born at Venlo, Guelderland, 1574. He studied at Dort, Cologne, Louvain, and afterwards at Padua, and in 1601, was chosen professor of eloquence at Milan. His reputation as a teacher was so great that the king of Spain appointed him his historiographer, and the Romans enrolled him in the number of their patri-cians. In 1601, he was appointed to succeed his master, the celebrated Justus Lipsius, in the professor's chair at Louvain, and was further honored with the title of governor of the castle there. He died at Louvain 1646. He wrote several works on literary and political subjects, the best known of which is his Statera Belli & Pacis, the balance of peace and war, 1633, during a negotiation between the Spanish monarch and the United Provinces. His works form 5 vols. folio.

PUTNAM, Israel, major-general in the American revolutionary army was a native of Massachusetts. He settled as a farmer in Connecticut, and early discovered that energy and decision of character, which distinguished him through life, and the remarkable instance he gave of it in the destruction of a wolf will always go with his name. He was engaged in the French war, and a detail of his adventures and distresses border on romance. He was among the first to take up arms at the occurrence at Lexington, and performed a distinguished part at the battle of Bunker-hill. He had an important command during the whole war. On one occasion a British officer by the name of Palmer was detected in Putnam's camp as a spy. He was claimed by governor Tryon as a British officer, and vengeance threatened in case he was not given up. Putnam wrote the following in answer to Tryon's letter. "Sir, Nathan Palmer, a lieutenant in your king's service, was taken in my camp as a spy; he was condemned as a spy; and he shall be hanged as a spy. I. Putnam. P. S. Afternoon. He is hanged." The last military service performed by Putnam was that of preparing the works at West Point, a spot selected by himself for a fort by direction of Washington. He received a paralytic shock in 1779, which destroyed the activity of his body, and compelled him to pass the remainder of his life in retirement. He died 1790, aged 72.

PUTNAM, Rufus, an American citizen, born at Sutton, Massachusetts, in 1738, much distinguished in the war of the revolution, holding the office of brigadier-general. On the return of peace he retired to his farm; and for several years was a member of the state legislature. In 1788, he with forty others planted himself at a place, which they called Marietta, in Ohio, then a wilderness. Here he died, May 1st, 1824, aged 86, having lived to see this wilderness become a populous state. Here he held various public offices; and sustained through life an excellent character.

PUY, Peter de, a learned Frenchman, author of some valuable political works, on the salique law, and other antiquarian subjects. He was born at Paris, and died 1652, aged 69, universally lamented. Voltaire as well as De Thou speaks highly of his abilities.

PUY SEGUR, James de Chastenot, lord of, a celebrated general, born of a noble family at Armagnac, 1600. He served his country forty-three years, and though present at one hundred and twenty sieges, and thirty battles, in which he behaved with activity and courage, he was never wounded. He died at his castle of Bernouille, near Guise, 1682. His memoirs, extending from 1617, to 1658, have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. and are written with boldness and truth. His son James was marshal of France, and author of a work on the Military Art, in folio, and 2 vols. 4to. 1743. He died 1743, aged 88.

PYE, Henry James, LL.D., a poet of an ancient Berkshire family, was born in 1745, in London; was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; ruined his fortune by becoming a candidate for Berks; was appointed poet laureat and a police magistrate, in 1790 and 1792; and died in 1813. His principal works are, Alfred, an epic; translations of the poetics of Aristotle, six odes of Pindar, and Homer's Hymns; The Democrat; The Aristocrat; and Comments on the Commentators upon Shakspeare.

PYLE, Thomas, an eminent divine, born at Stodey near Holt, Norfolk, 1674. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, and then became minister of King's Lynn, where he distinguished himself as a good preacher, and as an exemplary man. He engaged warmly in the Bangorian controversy, and for his services he was made prebendary of Salisbury, by Dr. Hoadly, and two of his sons also were presented to prebends in the church of Winchester. His paraphrase on the Acts, and all the epistles, is an excellent work, often reprinted. He published besides 3 vols. of sermons. This excellent character died at Lynn, 1757.

PYM, John, a lawyer, was born, in 1584, in Somersetshire. After having finished his education at Broadgate Hall, Oxford, he studied law at one of the inns of court, and was called to the bar. During the reigns of James I. and Charles I. he had a seat in parliament, and was a strict puritan, and a strenuous opponent of the arbitrary measures of the crown. He was one of the five members whom the infatuated Charles demanded to be given up to him by the House of Commons. Pym died in 1643, not long after having been appointed lieutenant of the ordnance.

PYNAKER, Adam, a landscape painter born at Pynaker, near Delft in Holland, 1621. He improved himself at Rome, and acquired great celebrity by the excellence and correctness of his pieces, especially his cabinet pictures. He died 1673.

PYRRHO, a Greek philosopher, who flourished about B. C. 340, was born at Elea, in the Peloponnesus, and was originally a painter, but became a disciple of Anaxarchus, whom he accompanied in the expedition of Alexander. On his return his fellow citizens made him their high priest, and the Athenians gave him the rights of citizenship. He lived to the age of 90. Pyrrho founded the sect of the Sceptics or Pyrrhonists.

PYRRHUS, a king of Epirus, celebrated in history as the friend and ally of the Tarentines in their war against the Romans. He afterwards made war against Sicily and against Sparta, and was killed at Argos by a tile thrown down upon his head by a woman, B. C. 272.

PYTHAGORAS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. After visiting Egypt and other places to improve his knowledge, and cultivate his mind, he settled at Crotona in Italy, where he established a famous school. He also reformed the effeminate manners of the Crotonians, and rendered infinite service to mankind, by the wisdom, prudence, and virtues, with which he inspired his numerous pupils. He was well acquainted with the true system of the universe as he placed the sun in the centre. He was the author of the absurd doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and forbade the eating of animal flesh. He died about 490 B. C.

PYTHEAS, a Greek philosopher, in the age of Aristotle. His discoveries about the different length of the days in various climates, appeared astonishing to the philosophers of his age.

Q.

QUADRATUS, St., a disciple of the apostles, and the learned author of an apology for the Christians, a valuable work which he himself presented to the emperor Adrian. Some suppose him to be the angel, or Bishop of Philadelphia, mentioned in the apocalypsc, and it is asserted that he was made bishop of Athens, about 126. Only fragments of his apology remain.

QUADRIO, Francis Xavier, a jesuit, born 2d December, 1695, in the Valteline. He was of a melancholy turn of mind, and retired to Zurich, where, with the consent of the pope, he became a secular priest. He died at Milan, 21st November, 1756. He is author of a treatise on Italian poetry, under the name of Joseph Mary Andrucci—History of Poetry, 2 vols.—Historical Dissertations on Rætia and the Valteline, 3 vols. 4to. 1755.

QUARLES, Francis, an English poet, born 1592. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge, and then entered at Lincoln's inn, and was afterwards cup-bearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I., electress Palatine, and queen of Bohemia. He was next secretary to archbishop Usher in Ireland, and was a great sufferer in the Irish rebellion. He did not meet that friendly reception in England which his loyalty deserved, and it is said that the loss of his valuable MSS. preyed deeply upon his mind, and hastened his death, which happened 1644. He was eminent as a poet, and in no case, says Langbaine, offended in his writings against the high duties he owed to God, to his neighbor, and to himself. He wrote some theatrical pieces, but the best known of his works, are his Emblems, Meditations, and Hieroglyphics. Some have imagined that Pope was much indebted to his writings. He died of the plague in London, 1665, aged 41.

QUATROMANI, Sertorio, a native of Cosenza in Naples. He obtained admission into the Vatican by means of his friend, Paul Manutius, and in this valuable library, he devoted himself with indefatigable diligence to the study of Greek literature. His great abilities recommended him to the notice of the duke of Nocera, in whose service he was for some time employed. He, after his patron's death, went into the family of the prince of Stigliano, but soon left him, and died 1606, aged 65. He was in his temper, capricious and haughty, easily offended at trifles, and censorious on the faults of others. He, however, possessed learning and information, and his translation of the Æncid into Italian verse, is held in estimation. His other works have been collected in 1714, in 8vo.

QUENSTEDT, John Andrew, a Lutheran divine, author of a Latin account of learned men from Adam, to 1600, 4to.—Sculptura Veterum, 8vo. his best work—a System of Divinity, according to the confession of Augsburg, 4 vols. folio, and some other works. He was born at Quedlinburg, and died 22d May, 1688, aged 71.

QUENTAL, Bartholomew du, a native of the Azores, distinguished for his piety and learning. He became confessor to the king of Portugal, and refused a bishopric, that he might with greater ardor devote himself to preaching, and to the more laborious works of charity. He died 20th December, 1698, aged 72. Clement XI. gave him the appellation of the Venerable.

QUERLON, Anne Gabriel Meusnier de, an eminent scholar, born at Nantes, 15th April, 1702. For twenty-two years, he published a periodical paper for Britany, and other prints, and had also some share in the Journal Encyclopedique. He died April, 1730, universally regretted. His chief works are, Les Impostures Innocentes, a little entertaining novel—Collection Historique—Marsy's Latin Poem on Painting, translated into French—Editions of Lucretius, with notes—also of Phædrus, and of Anacreon.

QUERNO, Camillo, an Italian poet, born at Monopolis, in Naples. He carried his poem, called Alexiada, containing twenty thousand lines, to Leo X., who honored him with his friendship, and made him his buffoon, 1514. After the taking of Rome, he retired to Naples, and died in the hospital there, about 1528.

QUESNAY, an eminent French physician, born at Ecquevilli, 1694. Though the son of an obscure laborer, he rose to reputation in his profession, and became first physician to the king of France, member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the London Royal Society. He had an early taste for agriculture, and was a leading man in the society of Economists. He died December, 1774. His works are, Observations on Bleeding, 12mo.—Essay on Animal Economy, 3 vols. 12mo.—the Art of Healing by Bleeding—Treatise on Continued Fevers, 2 vols. 12mo.—on Gangrene, 12mo.—on Suppuration—and Physiocratia, besides an elegant poem, called the Farm House.

QUESNE, Abraham, marquis du, a native of Normandy, who entered into the naval service of France, under his father, and soon distinguished himself. He was in 1637, at the attack of the Isles of St. Margaret, and the next year he greatly contributed to the defeat of the Spanish fleet at Cattari. He afterwards signalized his valor before Tarragona, Barcelona, and before Cadiz, and in 1644, he went into the service of Sweden, and was particularly instrumental in the defeat of the Danish fleet. He was recalled home in 1647, and intrusted with a squadron in the Mediterranean, and he next obliged Bourdeaux, which had revolted, to surrender, and afterwards, in 1676, in three engagements, defeated the combined fleets of Holland and Spain, under Ruyter, near Sicily. He next carried the terror of his arms against Algiers and Genoa, and every where commanded respect and submission. This gallant officer was deservedly ennobled by the French king. He died at Paris, 2d February, 1688, aged 78, leaving four sons.

QUESNEL, Pasquier, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and priest of the oratory, born at Paris, 1634. In 1675, he published at Paris, the works of St. Leo, 2 vols. 4to., and as his notes defended the ancient Gallican church, against the opinions of the Roman pontiffs, the work was condemned at Rome, and the author, in 1685, retired, through fear of persecution, to Brussels. He published in 1687, his Moral Reflections on the New Testament; but though he seemed strongly to favor the Jansenists, the work was well received, and became very popular, on account of the meekness and philanthropy of his sentiments; but the work, though thus publicly countenanced, and even commended by pope Clement XI., was soon after attacked by the jesuits, and condemned, for reasons of state, even by the pope himself, who issued against it his famous bull, called Unigenitus. By the influence of the jesuits, Quesnel was seized and imprisoned; but, by means of a Spanish gentleman, who secretly espoused his cause, he escaped, and reached Amsterdam, where he died, 1719. He was author of various works, but chiefly on polemical subjects. The author of the History of the Jesuits, was also a Quesnel, Peter, and he died at the Hague, 1774.

QUEVEDO DE VILLEGAS, Francisco de, a Spanish author, born at Madrid, 1570. He possessed great powers of writing in verse, as well as prose, and on subjects of wit, of morality, and of science, showed himself correct, judicious, and enlightened. His works were published by Gonzales de Salas, under the title of Parnasso Espagnol, in 3 vols. 4to. His Visions, a prose work, have been indifferently translated into English, from a French version, and some others of his works have also appeared in an English dress. His satire was so keen, and so imprudently used, that he rendered count d'Olivares, the prime minister, his enemy, and in consequence of this, was imprisoned, till the fall of the royal favorite. He died 1645, or, according to some, 1647.

QUIEN DE LA NEUFVILLE, James le, a French author, born at Paris, 1647. He was successively an officer in the French Guards, an advocate at the bar, and lastly, a literary character. His General History of Portugal, 2 vols. 4to., procured his admission into the academy of Inscriptions, at Paris. He afterwards published a Treatise on the Use of Posts among the Ancients and Moderns, 12mo., 1734, which was so well received, that it gained him the office of director of the posts of French Flanders. In 1713, he went with the French ambassador to Portugal, and was received with great kindness by the court, and rewarded with a pension. Out of gratitude to the monarch, he determined to continue his History of Portugal, which had concluded in 1531, at the death of Emanuel I.; but excessive application brought on disease. He died at Lisbon, 20th May, 1728, aged 81.

QUIEN, Michael de, a French Dominican, born at Bologne, 1661. He was an able scholar, and well versed in oriental literature. He published Panoplia contra Schisma Græcorum, 4to.—Nulity of the English Ordinations, against Courayer—Ornens Christianus in quatuor Patriarchatus digestus in quo exhibentur Ecclesie, Patriarchæ, cæterique Præsides Orientis, 3 vols. folio—Defence of the Hebrew Text against Perron, besides an edition of John Damascenus, 2 vols. fol. He died at Paris, 1733.

QUILLET, Claudius, a French writer, born 1602. He studied physic, and practised for some years; but his views were changed by his interference with the affair of the nuns of Loudun, who were said to be possessed of the devil. He ridiculed the measures which were pursued there by the secret intrigues of Richelieu; and in consequence of this he fled to Rome, for fear of persecution. He became, at Rome, acquainted with d'Étrées, the French ambassador, who made him his secretary; and there he wrote his famous poem called "Callipædia," on the Art of having fine Children, in which he reflected with satirical severity on cardinal Mazarine. The cardinal, instead of persecuting the author, made him his friend, and gave him an abbey, and Quillet, in gratitude, when he published the second edition of his poem, erased the offensive parts, and dedicated it to his noble patron. This well-known poem is written in elegant poetry, and contains many very beautiful passages. The work, however, though defended by Bayle and de la Monnoye, as containing only the language of a man who wrote like a physician, has been deservedly censured by Baillet, as abounding in description both indelicate and licentious. The Callipædia has been translated into English by Rowe. He wrote besides two other short Latin poems. He died 1661, aged 59.

QUIN, James, a celebrated actor, born in King-Street, Covent Garden, 24th February 1693, and descended from a respectable family in Ireland. After performing inferior parts on the Dublin theatre, he went to London, and engaged himself with the managers of Drury-lane, and two years after, 1717, he removed to Rich's theatre, Lincoln's Inn Fields. In 1732, Quin, who was now become a popular performer, removed, with the Lincoln's Inn Fields company, to Covent-Garden, which was opened on the 7th December for their reception; but two years after, he quitted it for Drury-lane. In this theatre, he continued a favorite actor till 1742, when he returned again to his old friend Rich, at Covent-Garden. At this time he had to struggle against the rising fame of young Garrick, of whom he said sarcastically, that he was a new religion, and that, as Whitfield, he was followed for a time, but that people would all come to church again. In this, however, he was disappointed; Garrick, contrary to his expectations, rose to high and deserved reputation; but the two rival heroes, who now divided the applauses of the town, were prevailed upon to act together in the Fair Penitent. Their appearance on the stage together, was received with loud and reiterated plaudits, and each performed with admirable success, and fully supported his former claims to superior eminence. In 1751, Quin retired from the stage to Bath, though, in a few instances, he afterwards appeared in the character of Falstaff, for the benefit of his theatrical friends; and the 19th March, 1753, was the last time of his acting, when, in compliment to his abilities, the price of admission to the pit and boxes, was raised to five shillings. This respectable actor died at Bath, of a fever, 21st January, 1766, aged 73. He was, in consequence of his merit, patronised by Frederic, prince of Wales, and he had the honor to teach his children a correct mode of pronunciation and delivery. In his character, Quin, was a man of strong sense; his wit was pointed, often coarse, and in his temper he was occasionally violent, but not devoid of the noblest feelings of human nature. When Thomson, the author of the Seasons, was arrested, Quin who knew him only by character, nobly stepped forth, and liberated the poet from the spunging-house, by paying the debt and the costs. He was, at times, intemperate in the use of the bottle, and some pleasant stories are related of his character, as an epicure.

QUINAULT, Philip, a celebrated French poet, born at Paris, 1635. His first theatrical piece, called "Les Sœurs Rivaless," a comedy, appeared before the public when he was only eighteen, and his future years were, with equal diligence and good success, devoted to the muses. His marriage with a rich widow, set him above dependence, and he afterwards became auditor of accounts. Though satirized by Boileau, he was commended by his contemporaries; and Voltaire has observed of him, that artless and inimitable strokes of nature frequently appear with interesting charms in his writings. His works consist of sixteen dramatic pieces, which have all appeared on the stage, besides operas, which were set to music by the famous Lully. His works were published at Paris, with his life prefixed, in 5 vols. 12mo. 1778. He was member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions, and died at Paris, 1688.

QUINCY, John, author of a Dictionary of Physic, 8vo.—an Universal Dispensatory, 8vo.—Chemical Pharmacopœia, 4to. besides a Translation of Sanctorious' Aphorisms, and other valuable works; was a physician of high reputation, who practised with success in London, and died there, 1723.

QUINCY, John, an American citizen, born 1689.

He having graduated at Harvard college, in 1708, was early employed in public life. For forty years without interruption he was a representative and a member of the council; and was long the Speaker of the House. He inherited an ample fortune, and discharged with fidelity the various offices with which he was honored. He died July 13, 1767, aged 78 years. When that part of Braintree, in which the Quincy farms lay, was incorporated, the general Court, in honorable remembrance of his long and faithful services, gave it the name of Quincy. He left an only son, who died without issue. His daughter was the mother of the wife of John Adams; and his paternal estate is now the property of John Quincy Adams, his great-grandson.

QUINCY, Edmund, agent for Massachusetts at the court of Great Britain, was born at Braintree, October 21st, 1681, and graduated at Harvard college in 1699. In 1718, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and held a seat for a long time in the house of representatives, and in his majesty's council. In 1737, he was selected as an agent to the British court to procure a decision of the controversy, respecting the boundary line between Massachusetts and New-Hampshire, and died while in London, on the 23d of February, 1738, in his fifty-seventh year. The general court testified the high respect in which they held him, by erecting a monument to his memory in Bunhill Fields, on which they commemorate him as distinguished for talents, learning, piety, and uprightness, and ability in discharging the various public duties to which he had been called.

QUINCY, Josiah, jun., a distinguished lawyer, orator, and patriot, of Boston, Massachusetts, was born in that place in 1743, and educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1763. He early became eminent in the practice of law, from superior talents as a speaker, and extremely popular for his courage and zeal, in the cause of liberty. In 1774, he took a voyage to Europe for the benefit of his health, and to advocate the cause of the colonies. He died on his return on the 25th of April, 1775, the day the vessel arrived in the harbour of Cape Ann. His eminent talents, and zealous attachment to the cause of freedom, as well as his amiable and interesting manners, made his death a subject of universal lamentation.

QUINETTE, Nicholas Marie, a member of the national convention, who before the Revolution was an attorney or notary at Soissons, his native place. He voted for the death of Louis XVI. and having been sent a commissioner to the army commanded by Dumouriez, he was one of the four deputies delivered up to the Austrians. In 1795, they were exchanged for the daughter of Louis XVI. and Quinette returning to Paris became a member of the council of Five Hundred. He was in 1799, appointed minister of the interior, and in 1800, under the consular government, made prefect of the department of the Somme. He displayed great wisdom in his administration, and after holding various offices under the imperial government, he, in 1814, gave in his adhesion to the deposition of Buonaparte, who notwithstanding nominated him commissary extraordinary of the Somme, and the Lower Seine, and a member of the chamber of peers during the hundred days. After the second abdication of Napoleon, Quinette was called by Fouché to form a part of the provisional government. Towards the close of 1815, he was banished as a regicide, when he retired to Brussels, where he died in 1821. He was the author of a "Report of the Representatives of the People, Camus Bancal, Lamarque Quinette, and Drouet, on their de-tion, read to the Council of Five Hundred," Paris, 1796, 8vo.

QUINTILIAN, Marcus Fabius, a Roman orator and critic of great celebrity. He was intimate with Pliny, and patronised by the emperors, and he established a school of rhetoric at Rome, where he died about sixty A.D. His Institutiones Oratoricæ are well known, edited by Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Leyden, 1724.

QUINTINIE, John de la, a famous French gardener, born at Poitiers, 1676. He studied philosophy and the law, and was admitted an advocate at Paris. After practising with great reputation, he devoted himself totally to agricultural pursuits, and enlarged his knowledge of that pleasing science by travelling into Italy, and by visiting England. He received liberal offers from Charles II. to settle in England; but he preferred the service of his king, and was appointed director-general of the fruit and kitchen-gardens of Louis XIV. He died at Paris, after 1700, universally regretted. He published, in 2 vols. 4to. "Directions for the Management of Fruit and Kitchen Gardens," which have been adopted throughout Europe.

QUIRINI, Angelo Maria, a Venetian cardinal, born 1680, or, according to others, 1684. He was admitted among the benedictines at Florence, and after storing his mind, with astonishing application, he began in 1710, to travel over Germany, Holland, England, and France; and every where received distinguishing marks of respect and esteem. Thus noticed and honored by the friendship of Basnage, Gronovius, Kuster, Bentley, Newton, Burnet, Cave, Potter, Fenelon, Montfaucon, and other learned characters, he returned to Italy, and was raised to the dignity of cardinal, and of archbishop, by Benedict XIII. This amiable man, equally respected by protestants and catholics, for his liberality and benevolence, as well as for his learning, died in the beginning of January 1755, of an apoplexy. His works are numerous and respectable, the best known of which are Primordia Coreyre, ex Antiquissimis Monumentis Illustrata, 4to.—Veterum Brixie Episcoporum Vita—Specimen Variæ Literaturæ quæ in Brixia, ejusque Ditone, Typographiæ in Cunabula florebat, 4to.—Enchiridion Græcorum—Gesta et Epistolæ Franc. Barbari—De Mosaicæ Historiæ præstantiâ.

QUIROGA, Joseph, a Spanish jesuit, distinguished by his labors as a missionary in South America. He was a native of Lugo in Galicia, and having studied mathematics was admitted into a naval school, and subsequently made several sea voyages, before he took the habit of St. Ignatius. He then went to America to preach the Gospel, and also had a commission from the king of Spain to explore Terra Magellanica, and ascertain whether that country afforded any harbour fit for commercial establishments. Returning to Europe, he visited Rome, to give an account of the missions of Paraguay, and he died at Bologna in 1734. He published "Tratado del Arte Vercladera de Navi-gar por Circulo paralelo a la Equinoxial," 1734; and the journal of his travels is also extant. Many of his MSS. are preserved at Bologna.

QUISTORP, John, a Lutheran divine, author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles—Articuli Formulæ Concordiæ Illustrati—Manuductio ad Studium Theologicum. He was the friend of the great Grotius, and attended him during his last illness. He died at Rostock, 1646, aged 62.

QUITA, Domingos dos Reis, a Portuguese poet, born January 6, 1728. He passed the early part of his life in penury, and received no instruction but what he derived from reading the works of Ca-moens and F.R. de Lobo. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a barber, but his attachment to learning enabled him to overcome all obstacles to improvement, and at length he obtained the patronage of count San Lorenzo, and was admitted a member of the society of Arcades at Lisbon. He suffered from the earthquake in 1755; but he fortunately found a protector in donna Theresa Theodora de Alvieu, the wife of a physician, in whose house he resided till his death, in 1770. He was the author of five tragedies; sonnets, elegies, pastorals, &c. His best production is a tragedy entitled "Inez de Castro." His works were published at Lisbon, in 2 vols. 8vo.

R.

RABAN-MAUR, Magnentius, a native of Fulda, of noble birth. He studied at Fulda, and afterwards at Tours, under Alcuinus, and on his return home he was elected abbot of Fulda. He was made archbishop of Mayence, in 847, and afterwards engaged in a controversy with Gotescale, whose doctrines he condemned, and whose person he delivered up to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. He died at Winsel, 856, aged 68. His works, which are numerous, and on theological subjects, were published at Cologne, 1627, in 6 vols. folio.

RABAUD St. ETINNE, John Paul, a protestant minister, born at Nismes, from which place he was sent as deputy to the constituent assembly. He possessed eloquence and address; but though deluded by the factious spirit of the times, he resumed his moderation in the convention, and spoke with boldness against the punishment of Louis XVI. These sentiments marked him for death under the sanguinary Robespierre, and though he escaped to Bourdeaux, he was, two months after, seized and brought to Paris, where, the day after, he was guillotined, 23th July, 1793, aged 50. He was a man of learning and information, and published a Letter on the Life and Writings of Gebelin, 8vo.—Letters on the Primitive History of Greece, 8vo.—Considerations on the Interest of the Tiers Etat.—and Pieces on the Revolution.

RABELAIS, Francis, a celebrated wit, born 1483, at Chinon, in Touraine, where his father was an apothecary. He was admitted among the Franciscans at Poitou; but he excited the envy of the fraternity, on account of the application with which he studied literature, and especially Greek, then regarded as a barbarous language. An intrigue exposed him to fresh insults, and he escaped, at last, from persecution, and was permitted by pope Clement VII. to renounce the order of Franciscans, and to enter into the society of the Benedictines, whom also he soon after left. He next settled at Montpellier, and took his degrees in medicine, and became a popular professor. When du Prat, the chancellor, abolished the privileges of Montpellier university, that learned body deputed their professor to go to Paris, and his eloquence and arguments proved so powerful, that the decree was reversed, and Rabelais' successful interference was ever after commemorated by investing, in the robe which he wore, all future candidates for academical honors. He quitted Montpellier in 1532, for Lyons; but in 1534, followed du Bellay, bishop of Paris, to Rome, as his physician, and six months after, returned to France, and obtained from the Roman pontiff, the privilege, though now a layman, of holding ecclesiastical benefices. In consequence of this he obtained the abbey of St. Maur, near Paris, and died 1553. His chief work is the "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel," a satirical romance against priests, popes, fools, and knaves, which, though praised by some as a magazine of wit, learning, and science, may be considered as a bold, unintelligible rhapsody, wild and irregular, and disgraced by profane allusions, coarse railery, obscene and vulgar jests. He wrote besides, some medical works, and other tracts, the whole of which have been published in 5 vols. 8vo. 1715, and in 1741, 3 vols. 4to. Rabelais was universally acknowledged as a man who possessed great brilliancy of wit, and smartness of repartee.

RABURN, William, governor of Georgia, was born in Halifax county, North Carolina, April 8th, 1771, and removed to Georgia at the age of fifteen, where with few advantages of education, he rose by his superior mental powers, industry, and exemplary moral and religious deportment, to the highest honors of the state. After having been a judge of the inferior court and member of the assembly and senate, he was in 1817 elected governor. The second year of his administration was memorable for the Seminole war on the frontiers of Georgia, and the neighboring Spanish territory. He held the office till his death, October 23d, 1819.

RACAN, Honorat de Bueil, marquis of, a French poet, born at Roche Racan, in Touraine, 1589. He wrote pastorals, sacred odes, letters, and memoirs of his friend Malherbe, of whom he learnt the art of poetry, and though not a first rate poet, deserved to be highly commended by Boileau and by Menage. He was one of the first members of the French academy, and died 1670. His works were edited 1660, 8vo. and 1720, 2vols. 12mo.

RACINE, John, an illustrious French poet, born at Ferté-Milon, 1639. He was educated at Port Royal, where his abilities began to unfold themselves by the most rapid progress in the attainment of the Greek and Latin, and by an excessive fondness for the sublime compositions of Euripides and Sophocles. He afterwards went to Paris, and in 1666, he produced his Alexandria. About this time he was engaged in a controversy with Nicole, of the Port Royal, who had inveighed against romance and dramatic writers, and denominated them poisoners not of bodies, but of souls, and in consequence of this attack, produced two spirited pamphlets. In 1668 he produced his "Plaideurs," a comedy, and Andromache, a tragedy; and in 1670 appeared Britannicus, Berenice in 1671, Bajazet in 1672, Mithridates in 1673, Iphigenia in 1675, and Phœdra in 1677. He had formerly worn the ecclesiastical habit at the Port Royal, but his confessor in this instance, with commendable sincerity, expostulated with him, and prevailed upon him to marry, and thus instead of bidding adieu to the world, to become one of its most useful and honorable members. He was afterwards prevailed upon by Mad. Maintenon to write a sacred tragedy to be acted by her young ladies at St. Cyr, and this produced Esther, and afterwards Athalie, which last was, when after his death introduced on the public theatre, rewarded with the most unbounded applause. He was in 1673 admitted member of the French academy, and in 1677 he was employed with Boileau his friend to write the history of Louis XIV.; but the efforts of these two great geniuses proved abortive, and the work was never completed. Racine afterwards drew up the History of the Port Royal, 2 vols. 12mo. in an elegant and pleasing manner. His excessive sensibility at last proved his death. He wrote a memorial on the Miseries of the Poor, which he lent to Mad. Maintenon, but it fell accidentally into the hands of the king, who expressed his indignation at the presumption of the poet. Racine heard of the royal displeasure, and was so terrified that he fell into a fever, and though the king was very kindly inquisitive after his welfare, the disorder at last proved fatal. He died 1699. A pension was honorably settled by the king on his family. He wrote besides, Canticles or Hymns, for the use of St. Cyr—Letters and Epigrams, &c. He has often been compared to Corneille, and on them Perrault observes, that if Corneille surpassed Racine in heroic sentiments, and the grand character of his personages, he was inferior to him in moving the passions, and in purity of language. His works appeared in London, 2 vols. 4to. 1723.

RACLE, Leonard, an eminent architect, born at Dijon in France, 1736. He acquired a knowledge of mathematics almost without a master, and was also skilled in various branches of natural philosophy. Being introduced to Voltaire, he was employed to erect the buildings which had been projected at Ferney. Racle afterwards established near Versoix, and then at Pont-de-Vaux, a manufacture of China-ware; and he was also employed in the construction of canals, and erected the first iron bridge which was seen in France. He likewise invented a kind of durable cement, susceptible of a high polish. His death took place in 1791. He published "Reflexions sur le lours de la Riviere de l'Ain et les Moyens de le fixer," Bourg, 1790, 8vo.; and he left other works in manuscript. M. Amanon published Notice Biographique sur L. Racle, Dijon, 1810, 8vo.

RADCLIFFE, John, a celebrated English physician, born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1650. From the school of his native town he went to University college at Oxford; but not finding, as he expected, a vacant fellowship, he removed to Lincoln, where he became fellow. In 1677, he resigned his fellowship in consequence of a quarrel with the rector of the college, and two years afterward removed to London. Here his reputation had preceded him, he quickly became the most popular practitioner of the town, and added to his other honors the title of physician to the princess Anne of Denmark. When called in 1693, to attend king William, his rough address proved very offensive to the court. 'The king showing him his swollen ancles, asked his opinion; I would not, answered the blunt physician, have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms. Though discarded from the court, he found his practice undiminished in the town; but his popularity created him enemies, and while his opinion was consulted above that of others, his medical opponents censured him as an adventurous empiric, whom success and not merit had raised to eminence. On the last illness of queen Anne, it is said by some of his biographers that he refused to visit her, though requested by the privy council; but it seems by his own statement, that he was never solicited to attend, and that the unpopularity which consequently awaited him on the occasion of the queen's death, and the attempts to censure him in the house of commons, were totally unmerited. He died Nov. 1, 1714, aged 64, three months after the queen; and it is said that the public odium which was heaped on him in consequence of the charge of disrespect and obstinacy towards his sovereign, hastened his death. In his character and conduct Radcliffe was violent, fickle, and avaricious. His maxim to make a fortune was to use all mankind ill; but though he practised in some degree what he taught, it has been observed, that Mead who followed a contrary rule obtained much greater opulence. The vast bulk of his fortune was left to charitable purposes; besides creating two travelling fellowships in University college, Oxford, he left ample provision for the erecting of an infirmary, and of a splendid library in his favorite city, which bear his name. The library, in the erection of which above £40,000 were expended, was finished in 1747, and opened 12th April, 1749, with great academical pomp. Dr. Radcliffe was chosen member of parliament for Buckingham the year before his death.

RADCLIFFE, Anne, a celebrated romance writer, whose maiden name was Ward, was born, in 1764, in London. In her 23d year she married Mr. Radcliffe, who was brought up for the bar, but was never called to it, and became proprietor and editor of the English Chronicle. Her first production was The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne, and it did not indicate that high talent which she subsequently displayed. It was succeeded by the Sicilian Romance, The Romance of the Forest, the Mysteries of Udolpho, and the Italians; works which placed her fame upon an imperishable basis. "She seems (says Mrs. Barbauld) to scorn to move those passions which form the interest of common novels; she alarms the soul with terror; agitates it with suspense, prolonged and wrought up to the most intense feeling by mysterious hints and obscure intimations of unseen danger." She died February 7, 1823. Besides the above works she wrote A Journey through Holland, and the romance of Gaston de Blondville; of which the last was a posthumous publication.

RADEGONDE, St., daughter of Bertarius, king of Thuringia, renounced, at the age of 10, paganism for the Christian faith, by the direction of Clotaire who afterwards married her. She united to personal charms the most amiable virtues of private life; but such was her attachment to religious duties, that she obtained from her husband, six years after her marriage, the permission of retiring from the world and of devoting herself to the seclusion of a monastery. She died 13th August, 587, aged 68, at the abbey of St. Croix, after acts of the greatest charity and most exemplary devotion.

RADLOFF, John Gattlieb, a German writer, born in 1775 at Lauchstadt, and died at Berlin in 1825. He was professor-emeritus at the gymnasium of Bonn, and was the author of some valuable works on the early history of Germany and on the German language.

ROGOTZKI, Francis Leopold, prince of Transylvania, was imprisoned at Neustadt in 1701, on suspicion of attempts to make the Hungarians revolt against the emperor. He, however, escaped soon after, and from Poland repaired to Hungary, where he joined the disaffected, and was declared chief of the insurgents. Success emboldened him, and when degraded by the imperial court, and condemned to lose his head, he caused himself to be proclaimed protector of Hungary and prince of Transylvania. In 1713, when peace was restored, he retired to France, and from thence went to Constantinople, where the Turks paid great deference to him. He died at Rodosto on the sea of Marmora, 8th April, 1735, aged 56. His Memoirs on the Revolutions of Hungary, in 2 vols. 4to. or six in 12mo. are interesting; but the Testament Politique and Moral which passes under his name is supposed to be a fictitious publication.

RAFFENEL, Claudius Denis, a French author, was born, about 1707, in the department of the Jura; travelled in the Levant and Africa; and gave promise of future eminence in literature, but was killed by a cannon bullet at Athens, in 1827, while serving as a volunteer in the Greek service. He wrote a complete History of the Events in Greece; A History of the Modern Greeks; and Summaries of the History of Persia, and of the Lower Empire.

RAFFLES, Sir Thomas Stamford, LL.D., an eminent statesman, was born at sea, in 1781, off Jamaica, and entered the East India Company's service, at an early age, a clerk in the home secretary's office. In 1805, he was appointed assistant secretary at Prince of Wales's Island; in 1810 he was made agent of the governor general with the Malay states; and, in 1811, was raised to be lieutenant governor of Java. During his government, which lasted till 1816, he acted upon the most enlightened principles, and gained the warm affection of the Javanese. In 1818 he was placed at the head of the factory at Bencoolen, and he introduced many important reforms there. But the master stroke of his policy was the establishing of the settlement and free port of Singapore in 1819. In 1824 he left Bencoolen, but, at a short distance from the land, the vessel took fire, and all his valuable collections and manuscripts became a prey to the flames. He died, of apoplexy, at Highwood Hill, in Middlesex, July 5, 1826. His chief work is, The History of Java, two volumes quarto.

RAGUEAU, Francis, a professor of jurisprudence at Bourges, author of a Commentary on the Customs of Berry—and of an Account of the Royal Rights. He died 1605.

RAGUENET, Francis, a learned ecclesiastic of Rouen, who obtained the prize of eloquence in the French academy 1689, on the subject of the dignity and merit of martyrdom. His parallel of the Italian and French music and operas, in which he allows the superiority to the Italians, occasioned a long paper war between him and Frenuse. He died in a good old age, 1722. He wrote besides the Monuments of Rome, or a Description of the Finest Works of Painting, Sculpture, &c. of Rome, with Observations, 12mo.—History of Oliver Cromwell, 4to.—History of the Ancient Testament—and History of Turenne, 12mo.

RAHN, John Henry, a Swiss physician, born at Zurich in 1749. He obtained the professorship of natural philosophy at the gymnasium in his native city; and in 1782 he became one of the founders of the Medico-surgical Institute, and he contributed to the establishment of various other scientific societies. Being created a count-palatine by the elector Charles Theodore, he was a deputy to the Helvetic National Assembly in 1799. He died in 1812, leaving many medical works, chiefly written in German.

RAIMONDI, John Baptist, a celebrated Orientalist, born at Cremona in Italy, about 1540. He passed several years in Asia, where he acquired a knowledge of the Arabic, Armenian, Syriac, and Hebrew languages. Returning to Italy, cardinal Ferdinand de Medicis made him director of the Oriental press, whence originated the famous institution of the Propaganda. Raimondi was for a long time engaged in preparing a Polyglott Bible more complete than those of Alcalá and Antwerp, but want of funds obliged him to abandon the undertaking. He published in 1610 an Arabic Grammar, dedicated to pope Paul V. The period of his death is uncertain.

RAINAUD, Theophilus, a jesuit, born at Sos-pello in Nice, 1588. He was engaged in teaching belles lettres and theology among the jesuits, and died at Lyons 31st October, 1663, aged 80. Though learned and well informed he was singular and capricious in his conduct, and his writings are often obscure and uninteresting. His works appeared at Lyons 1665, in 20 vols. fol.

RAINE, Matthew, a divine, was born in 1760, and educated first under his father, who was a clergyman, at Hackforth, in Yorkshire; and next at the Charter-house, from whence he was elected to Trinity-college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1791 he was appointed master of the Charter-house school. In 1798 he took his doctor's degree; and in 1809 was elected preacher of Gray's Inn. He died in 1810. Dr. Raine published only two sermons.

RAINOLDS, John, D.D., an English divine, born at Pinto, Devonshire, 1549. He was of Merton college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, where he became fellow. In 1598, he was made dean of Lincoln, but the next year exchanged it for the presidency of his college. He was offered a bishopric by Elizabeth, but modestly refused it. He died 1607. He was a man of learning, and his private character was exemplary for piety and every virtue. He was one of those divines employed in the translation of the bible under James I. He wrote besides Censura Librorum Apocryphorum Vet. Testamenti.—Apologetia Thesium de Sacra Script. et Eccles.—de Romanæ Eccles.—Idolat. in Cultu Sanctorum, &c. He had a brother William, originally of New college, who turned papist, and became Hebrew professor of the English college at Rheims. He was author of Calvino-Turcismus, 8vo.—and a Defence of the Rhemish Translation of the New Testament, and died at Antwerp 1594.

RAKOUBAH, or RAGUBAH, peishwah, or prince-regent, of the Mahrattas, was born about the middle of the eighteenth century. He acted an important part in the events which occurred in the East Indies from 1772 to 1782. Having usurped the sovereign power, to the prejudice of his nephew, he was deposed and abandoned by all the Mahratta chiefs, when he fled to Bombay and procured the protection of the English government. At length peace taking place between the East India company and the Mahrattas, the cause of the peishwah was abandoned by the former, and he was allowed four months to decide on the place of his future residence. From that time he sunk into obscurity, and the date of his death is not recorded.

RALEIGH, sir Walter, an illustrious Englishman, born at Hayes, in the parish of Budley, Devonshire, 1552. He was for some time at Oriel college, Oxford; but the pursuits of ambition, and an active life were more congenial to his feelings than academical labors. In 1578 he embarked for the Netherlands with the troops sent against the Spaniards, and the next year he went with his half-brother sir Humphrey Gilbert, on an expedition to discover and colonize some part of North America. The plan did not succeed, and in 1580 he engaged as captain in the wars of Ireland, and became one of the commissioners for the government of Munster in lord Ormond's absence. On his return to England he became a favorite of the court by his polite attention and gallantry to the queen. In 1583 he sailed again with his brother Gilbert in an expedition to Newfoundland; but though his companions were attacked by a contagious disease, and his brother was drowned on his return, he still was animated with the desire of new discoveries. In 1514, therefore, he obtained letters patent, and sailed to America, where he discovered Wigandacoa, which was called Virginia, in honor of his virgin mistress, and in this country he afterwards in a second and third voyage settled flourishing colonies. He had been chosen member of parliament for Devonshire in 1584, and knighted, and now the favor of the queen appointed him seneschal of Cornwall, and warden of the Stannaries; but the wish to improve navigation by the discovery of the North West passage, and by visiting distant countries, was still the ruling object of his ambition. A fourth and a fifth expedition were fitted out to Virginia; and if he had done no other service to the nation, his recommendation of tobacco, which he first introduced into the country from Virginia, would in a commercial point of view have procured him high distinction. In 1588 his courage was eminently displayed against the Spanish armada, to the destruction of which he ably contributed, and the following year he was employed with a fleet in the restoration of Don Antonio the expelled king of Portugal. In 1592 he was at the head of the expedition, sent to attack the Spaniards at Panama, and on his return he became an active and eloquent speaker in the house of commons. He engaged in 1595 in the discovery and conquest of Guiana in South America, and after storming the city of St. Joseph, and taking the Spanish governor prisoner, he returned to England. He was afterwards employed against Cadiz, and then became active in his opposition to Essex, and greatly contributed to the defeat of his treasonable designs; but on the death of the queen his happiness was at an end. On the accession of James, Raleigh was not only stripped of his honors, but tried and condemned for high treason, on charges not only frivolous, but oppressive and arbitrary. Though reprieved, he remained for several years a prisoner in the Tower, while his estates were lavished on Car, the royal favorite. During his long captivity, the heroic prisoner devoted himself to literary pursuits, and wrote some valuable works, among which is his History of the World, of which the first volume appeared in 1614, folio. In 1616, after a confinement of nearly thirteen years, this illustrious character was permitted to leave his prison, and James, as if pretending first to discover his merits, sent him on an expedition to explore the golden mines of Guiana. The affair proved unfortunate, sir Walter lost his eldest son, who was killed by the Spaniards at St. Thomas, and after destroying the town, which was burnt against his orders, he returned home to meet the most cruel and arbitrary treatment. Incensed at his conduct, the Spaniards were loud in their complaints by Gundamor their ambassador, and James ordered Raleigh to be seized. Though no blame could attach to him for his conduct in Guiana, the king, determined on his punishment, ordered his execution on his former attainder. In vain the unfortunate leader pleaded in his defence, and asserted that his life could not be taken away in consequence of a sentence passed fifteen years before, and which had been revoked, since in his late expedition, the king had granted him power of life and death over his crew. Nothing, however, availed, and the pusillanimous James, either to please the vindictive Spaniards or to gratify his own personal enmity, assented to his death. This injured hero was beheaded in old palace yard, 29th October 1618, and suffered with great magnanimity. Without hesitation sir Walter must be pronounced one of the greatest and most useful characters of those times. His perseverance in making discoveries and in visiting foreign countries first inspired the nation with that ardor after maritime distinction, which has since not only increased its commerce and prosperity, but raised its glory to the most exalted rank. He was distinguished not only as a bold navigator and a valiant leader, but as an able negotiator; and as a man of letters his valuable works, composed in the obscurity of a dungeon, on subjects of history, politics, geography, and philosophy, as well as some respectable poetical pieces, will transmit his name with honor to the most distant posterity.

RALLE, Sébastien, a French Jesuit who became a missionary among the North American Indians. He arrived at Quebec in October 1689; and, having spent several years in travelling through the interior, he settled at Norridgewock on the Kennebec river. Here he remained twenty-six years till his death; which took place in 1724. He was considered an enemy to the English, and as exciting the Indians to commit depredations. A party was hence got up, who proceeded against the village in which he lived. Being unconscious of danger, Ralle and about thirty of the Indians were killed and scalped. He was a man of talents, and was so familiar with the Latin language as to speak it with facility, and great purity. His urbanity of manners gave him great influence over the Indians. He spoke the language of the Norridgewocks, called the Abnakis, and was acquainted with the Huron, Outawis, and Illinois. He left a manuscript dictionary of five hundred pages quarto of the Abnakis language, which is now preserved in the library of Harvard university. His death occurred when he was in the 67th year of his age.

RALPH, James, a miscellaneous writer, originally a school-master at Philadelphia. He went to London in the beginning of the second George's reign, and wrote himself into notice. His "Night," a poem, and some theatrical pieces, were received with applause. His History of England possesses merit, and some of his political pamphlets for a time enjoyed popularity. He died January 24th, 1762. He was one of the heroes of Pope's Dunciad.

RAMAZZINI, Bernardin, an Italian physician, born at Capri, near Modena, 1633. He studied and took his degrees at Parnia, and after visiting Rome, settled at Modena, where he became medical professor, and practised with great success. In 1700 he removed to Padua, and though blind, discharged the duties of professor with great applause. He died 1714, upon his birth day, 5th November aged 81. His works appeared at London, 1716, in 4to.

RAMEAU, John Philip, a celebrated musician, born at Dijon, 25th September 1683. He at first travelled over the country with a strolling company, and afterwards was made organist of Clermont cathedral in Auvergne. He now studied the principles of his art with great success, and produced his treatise on Harmony, and his new System of Music. In 1750 he gave to the public his famous "Demonstration of the Principles of Harmony," in which he makes the whole depend on a single and clear principle, the fundamental base, and for this excellent work he has been deservedly called the Newton of that science. He was made manager of the opera at Paris, and for his great merit appointed composer to Louis XV. and by him honored with the order of St. Michael, and raised to the rank of nobility. He died at Paris, September 12, 1764. He was a man of exemplary character, a good husband, and a benevolent neighbor. As a theorist he is deservedly admired by Handel, but as a composer some dispute his merit.

RAMEL, John Peter, a French general officer, born at Cahors in 1770. He was chief of a battalion in the army of the Pyrenees in 1794, when he incurred the hatred of the jacobins, and narrowly escaped falling a sacrifice to their vengeance. Being set at liberty after sixteen months' imprisonment, he was appointed adjutant-general, and made a campaign on the Rhine under Moreau. He valiantly defended the fortress of Kehl, of which he had the command; and in 1797 he was made commander of the guard of the two councils, under the directorial government. His conduct in this station has been the subject of much animadversion; and he was one of the victims to the revolution of the 18th of Fructidor. He was then banished, with fifteen more persons, to Cayenne, whence Ramel, Pichegru, Barthelemy, Willot, and others, made their escape in June 1798 to the Dutch colony of Surinam. Ramel thence embarked for England; and in 1799 he published "Journal sur les Faits relatifs a la Journée du 18 Fructidor, sur le Transport, le Séjour, et l'Évasion des Déportés." After the elevation of Buonaparte to power, this officer returned to France, and entering into active service made many campaigns. In 1814 he was made a major-general, and in 1815 appointed commander of Toulouse. He retained that post after the second restoration of Louis XVIII., and he exerted himself to establish tranquillity among the inhabitants; but having endeavored to disarm the companies of Verdets, whose existence was not authorized by the government, he became all at once the object of public displeasure. A band of ruffians having vowed his destruction, rushed into his hotel, wounded him in several places, and covered with his blood paraded the city. The unfortunate general survived this outrage two days, and died August 17, 1815, without having denounced his assassins. M. de Villele, who was then mayor of Toulouse, published a proclamation relative to this affair.

RAMLER, Charles William, a German poet and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1725, at Colberg, of poor parents; became professor of logic and belles lettres at the Berlin royal cadet school; and died in 1798. He was called the German Horace. Among his works are, Odes; Poems; and a complete translation of the Odes of Horace.

RAMMOHUN ROY, Rajah, a learned Bramin, was born about the year 1780, at Bordouan, in the province of Bengal. The first elements of his education he received under his paternal roof, where he also acquired a knowledge of the Persian language. He was afterwards sent to Patna, to learn Arabic; and here, through the medium of Arabic translations of Aristotle and Euclid, he studied logic and mathematics. When he had completed these studies, he went to Calcutta, to learn Sanscrit, the sacred language of the Hindoo Scriptures; the knowledge of which was indispensable to his caste and profession as a Bramin. About the year 1804 or 1805, he became possessed, by the death of his father and of an older brother, of the whole of the family property, which is understood to have been very considerable. Shortly after this he commenced his literary career; making himself acquainted with the English, French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. It is said, he was acquainted, more or less, with ten different languages. He understood two, the Sanscrit and Arabic, critically. He also spoke and wrote fluently, the Persian, Hindostanee, Bengalee, and English; and, he published works in five different languages. Among his publications is a work Against the Idolatry of all Religions; and in 1820 he published a series of selections, principally from the first three gospels, entitled "The Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness." Rajah Rammohun Roy died in England, September 27, 1833, to which country he had sometime previous come, on a political mission. He was charged with a commission from the king of Delhi to enforce a claim against the British East India Company to the extent of £500,000 sterling. Previous to his death a compromise on the subject had been made. In this compromise, he and his heirs were to receive annually forever the sum of from £3,000 to £4,000. So soon as he thought himself seriously ill, he called his native servant, Ram Rotton to him, and charged him to closely observe all his actions, that he might, on his return to India, testify to his countrymen that he had never changed his religion or lost his caste; and that servant, when the Rajah was in the extremities of death, actually went through the rites of the Braminical religion.

RAMSAY, Andrew Michael, called also the chevalier Ramsay, was a Scotchman, born at Ayr, 9th June, 1686. He studied at Edinburgh, and was tutor to lord Wemyss's son at St. Andrew's, and afterwards travelled to Leyden, where the conversation of Poiret the mystic divine, shook his religious principles. In 1710 he visited the celebrated Fenelon at Cambrai, and became by his persuasion a convert to the catholic faith, and in consequence of this connection obtained the place of tutor to the duke of Chateau Thierry, and to the prince of Turenne, and was made knight of St. Lazarus. He was afterwards at Rome engaged in the education of the children of the pretender called there James III. but soon after returned to Scotland, where he was favorably received. In 1730, he was honored by the university of Oxford with a doctor's degree, and afterwards returned to France, and died in the service of his patron the duke of Turenne, at St. Germain-en-laie, 6th May 1743. He wrote Discourse sur la Poesie Epique—la Vie de Fenelon, in return for the influence of the learned prelate in his conversation—Essay sur le Gouvernement Civil—les Voyages de Cyrus, the best of his works—Histoire de M. de Turenne—la Psychometre, or Reflections on lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics, besides a Plan of Education, and Philosophical Principles of natural and revealed Religion, two vols. 4to. and smaller pieces.

RAMSAY, Allan, a Scotch poet, born at Peebles, 1696. He was originally a barber at Edingburgh; but possessing emulation, and a strong genius, he devoted himself to the muses, and was honored with the patronage of the great and the learned. Of all his poems the most deservedly known is his "Gentle Shepherd," a pastoral comedy, which was first acted at Edingburgh 1719, and which for merit, simplicity, and elegance is most universally admired. For some time the poet kept a bookseller's shop, but retired in his old age, and died a private man, 1763, aged 67. His poems form 2 vols. 4to. and his songs 4 vols.

RAMSAY, Alexander, M.D., a native of England, but for several years an itinerant lecturer, in this country, on anatomy and physiology. He was considered a man of skill in his profession; and published Anatomy of the heart, cranium, and brain, with a series of plates, which was deemed a work of merit. He died, November 24th 1824, at Parsonsfield, Maine, about 70 years of age. Two years previous he had been bitten by a rattle-snake; and, he supposed his last sickness was occasioned by the poison he then received.

RAMSAY, David, M.D., the historian, was born in Pennsylvania, April 2d, 1749. He early exhibited a superiority of talent, and made uncommon proficiency in his studies, both at school and at college. He was graduated at Princeton, in 1765. After two years devoted to general literature, he commenced the study of medicine at Philadelphia, and received a diploma, from the Medical college of that city in 1772. After practising medicine a short time in Maryland, he went, in 1773, to Charleston, South Carolina, where he soon rose to eminence in the profession, and enjoyed extensive employment. At the commencement of the war of the revolution, he took a decided and active part in the cause of freedom, and contributed much to its promotion by his exertions in the legislature of South Carolina, of which he was a member during the whole war; and in the army, where he served for some time as a surgeon, as well as by his conversation and numerous publications in the papers. He was one of the privy council for some time, and was banished, with others, by Cornwallis to St. Augustine, where he remained eleven months. In 1782, he was elected to a seat in congress, and was a conspicuous member of that body. He was again elected in 1785, and chosen president, pro-tempore, during the illness of Hancock, and discharged the duties of that station through the year. In 1786, he resumed his profession, and was distinguished for an assiduous attention to its duties, and for skill. During the progress of the revolution, doctor Ramsay employed himself in collecting materials for a history of that event; and his great impartiality, his fine memory, which retained whatever came within his observation, and his extensive intercourse with many of the principal persons, both of the army and national legislature, eminently qualified him for that task. He gave his History of the Revolution in South Carolina to the public in 1785, a work characterized, like all his others, by vigorous thought, neatness of style, judiciousness, and fidelity. In 1790, he published a History of the American Revolution; in 1801, a Life of Washington; and in 1803, a History of South Carolina. He also wrote a Universal History, and a History of the United States up to the year 1803, which have been published since his death. He was distinguished through the whole course of his life by great enterprise, industry, and perseverance. He was eminently philanthropic and pious, engaged with ardor in every plan to advance the well-being of mankind, and exhibited a bright example of the Christian virtues. He died on the 7th of May, 1815, of a wound received in the street from a maniac.

RAMSAY, Martha L. the wife of Dr. David Ramsay, and daughter of Henry Laurens, was born November 3, 1759. She spent ten years in England and France; and having returned to this country, she was married in 1787. She was a woman of talents, piety, and learning. One of her Sunday employments was to read the Greek Testament. Such were her attainments in classical literature, that she fitted her sons for college, and she was as much characterized for her benevolence as for her learning. When in France her father presented her with five hundred guineas. A portion of this sum she used in purchasing French Testaments for distribution. Mrs. Ramsay died June 10, 1811, aged 51 years. Her husband published an interesting account of her life, with extracts from her writings.

RAMUS, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Vernandois in Picardy, 1515. Though of a respectable family, his parents were poor; but such was his devotion to literature, that rather than abandon it, he was content to attend the college of Navarre at Paris in the humble character of a servant. Assiduity, however, overcame every difficulty, and when a candidate for his master's degree he boldly attacked the prejudices of the times, by assuming for his thesis that all that Aristotle had written was false. This kindled a violent disturbance in the university of Paris, where Aristotle's works were regarded as the effusion of more than human powers, and the young professor was not only accused of intentions of sapping religion, but he was forbidden to teach philosophy; and that his disgrace might be more publicly known, the sentence was published in every street in Paris, and his person and character exposed to ridicule on the stage. He, however, was gradually restored to public favor, and in 1551, was made Royal professor of philosophy and eloquence, but the Sorbonne viewed with a jealous eye his elevation, and when he attempted an innovation in the pronunciation of Latin, by pronouncing Quisquis with the sound of the Q, and not Kiskis, as in the old way, he was exposed to great virulence till the matter being referred to a court of justice, was dismissed; and every person allowed to pronounce his words as he pleased. When Ramus deserted the catholic religion for the protestant, he exposed himself to fresh persecutions, and was in consequence driven from his professorship; but though afterwards restored for a while to favor, he found himself still attacked by new injuries, and at last fell by the hands of the assassins in the massacre of St. Bartholomew 1572. He wrote various learned works, the best known of which are treatises on Arithmetic and Geometry—de Militiâ Cæsaris—de Moribus Veterum Gallorum—Grammars in Latin, French, and Greek.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, LL.D., a native of Kent, educated at Christ-church, and made master of Broadgate-hall, Oxford, 1549. He was disgraced by Mary on account of his religion, but his abilities as a negotiator were employed by Elizabeth in France, Russia, and Scotland, and he was knighted for his services, and made chamberlain of the exchequer and master of the posts. He died 1590, aged 60. He wrote an Account of his Embassy in Russia, 1568, inserted in Hakluyt's Voyages—Letters and Instructions.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, an English poet, born at Newnham, Northamptonshire, 1605, where his father was steward to lord Zouch. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He possessed great genius, but unfortunately was too much addicted to pleasure, and thus shortened his life. He was the friend and favorite of Ben Jonson, who often called him his son, and in his poems he displayed all the vivacity of a genuine wit. He died 1634, when not yet 30. His works, among which is the "Muse's Looking Glass," a superior comedy, and three other dramatic pieces, were collected by his brother Robert, of which the fourth edition appeared in 1664.

RANDOLPH, Edward, an agent sent from Great Britain to ascertain the state of the New England colonies, and who gave them great trouble by his hostility to their interests. He came to Boston in 1676, and was the principal means of depriving Massachusetts of her charter. He was a conspicuous character during the government of sir Edmund Andross, and was imprisoned with him in 1689 as a traitor. He was, however, released and went to the West Indies, where he died. He was violent in his prejudices, arbitrary, unjust and implacable in enmity to the colonies.

RANDOLPH, Peyton, first president of the American congress, was a native of Virginia, and one of the most distinguished lawyers and patriots of that state. He was as early as 1756 appointed king's attorney for that colony, and held the office for many years. In 1766 he was elected speaker of the house of burgesses, and in 1773 a member of the committee of correspondence. The following year he was appointed a delegate to the congress which assembled at Philadelphia, and was elected its president, and also presided in the congress of 1775, till obliged to return to Virginia, when Hancock was chosen his successor. He soon resumed his seat in congress, but died suddenly on the 22d of October, 1775, aged 52.

RANDOLPH, Edmund, governor of Virginia, was the son of John Randolph, attorney general of that colony before the revolution. He was an eminent lawyer, and a warm friend of the revolution. After having held several honorable stations in the state he was in 1779 elected to a seat in congress, and held it till 1782. In 1787 he was a member of the convention which formed the federal constitution, but voted against its adoption. The next year he was chosen governor of Virginia, and in 1789 was appointed attorney-general of the United States, and in 1794 secretary of state, but engaged in an intrigue with the French minister, by which he lost the confidence of the cabinet, and resigned in August 1795. He died September 12, 1813.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, born about the commencement of the eighteenth century, in the city of Canterbury, and was educated at Oxford. Besides the benefices of Petham, Waltham, and Saltwood, all in the immediate neighborhood of his native city, his distinguished talents, as a theologian, raised him to the lady Margaret divinity chair, and the archdeaconry of Oxford, to which latter dignity he was elevated in 1768. He acquired considerable reputation by his Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity—A View of the Ministry of our Savior Jesus Christ 8vo. 2 vols.—The Christian's Faith a rational Assent—Citations from the Old Testament contained in the New—and a volume of Sermons preached at St. Mary's, Oxford. He died in 1783.

RANDOLPH, John, D.D., an English prelate, born in 1740. After having held several offices of honor, in 1799 he was elevated to the bishopric of Oxford. In 1807 he was translated to that of Bangor; and, thence, in 1809, to that of London. In 1811 he was elected a member of the Royal Society. He passed a great part of his life in the University of Oxford, and enjoyed a considerable reputation for learning, and it is generally understood, that, when he was elevated to the see of Oxford, the university was complimented with the nomination by the crown. By some, however, it has been insinuated that his opinions were somewhat too high and determined, to succeed so very mild and conciliating a prelate as Dr. Porteus. His publications are—A sermon preached at an ordination, 1779; A Sermon on the consecration of Dr. Lewis Bagot, 1782; A Sermon before the Society for Propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, 1803; and several other charges, sermons, and other works. Bishop Randolph died in 1812.

RANDOLPH, John, an American citizen distinguished for genius, eloquence, and eccentricity, was born in Virginia, on the 2d of June 1773. He was descended, in the seventh generation, from the celebrated Pocahontas, the daughter of Powhatan, a great Indian chief. His father died in 1775, leaving three sons and a large estate; and his mother was married, in 1793, to St. George Tucker, who was the guardian of Randolph during his minority. Mr. Randolph's early life was spent at different places under different instructors, of most of whom he said 'he never learned anything.' He passed a short time at Princeton college, at Columbia college, and at William and Mary college, and was a little while a student at law under Edmund Randolph. Of himself he remarks, "With a superficial and defective education, I commenced politician." He was elected a member of congress in 1799, and continued a member of the House of Representatives, with the exception of three intervals of two years each, till 1829. He was also in one of those intervals a member of the United States Senate; and was afterwards appointed minister plenipotentiary to Russia. Mr. Randolph was never married; his estate was large; and at the time of his death, he had three hundred and eighteen slaves, and one hundred and eighty horses. He died at Philadelphia, May 24, 1833, aged 60 years. As a declaimer, his name and eloquence form a conspicuous portion of the history of every measure which was discussed in Congress while he was a member. He never spoke without commanding the most intense interest. At his first gesture or word, the house and galleries were hushed into silence and attention. His voice was shrill and pipe-like, but under perfect command; and, in its lower tones, it was music. His tall person, firm eye, and peculiarly 'expressive fingers' assisted very much in giving effect to his delivery. His eloquence, taking its character from his unamiable disposition, was generally exerted in satire and invective; but he never attempted pathos without entire success. In private life he was capable of kindness, generosity, and courtesy. He was a kind master, a good neighbor, and among his immediate constituents was even popular.

RANS, Bertrand de, a native of Rheims, who, after living in deep solitude as a hermit in the forests of Parthenay and Tournay, imposed himself in 1336 upon the credulity of the people as the emperor Baldwin I. of Constantinople, who about twenty years before had been defeated by the Bulgarians, and put to death. 'Though the daughter of Baldwin, who was governess of Flanders, discovered his artifice, the imposture prevailed, and Rans was acknowledged by the Flemish nobility as their lawful sovereign. At last deception ceased, and the usurper, when tortured, confessed his guilt, and was hanged at Lisle.

RANTZAN, Josias, a noble native of Holstein, who left the Danish service for the French, and was made marshal of the kingdom by Louis XIII. He was wounded and lost an eye 1636 at Dole, and afterwards lost an arm, a leg, and one of his ears. In 1645 he became a protestant, and died five years after in prison. He is chiefly known as the active instrument by whom the protestant religion was established in Denmark.

RAPHAEL, Sanzio, an illustrious painter, born at Urbino, on Good Friday, 1483. His father was a painter, and under him and Perugino he first began to cultivate his talents, after which he visited Siena, and Florence to see the incomparable works of Leonardo da Vinci, and Michael Angelo. By studying thus the best masters, he soon rose to eminence and reputation, and merited the appellation of the divine Raphael. He also excelled as an architect, and was employed by Leo X. in the building of St. Peter's at Rome, and he enjoyed the patronage and esteem not only of the popes, but of Francis I. of France, and of other princes. He unfortunately was too much given to licentious pleasures, which at last hurried him to an untimely grave, on his birth day 1520. He surpassed says a connoisseur, all modern painters, because he possessed more of the excellent parts of painting, and above all he possessed the graces in so advantageous a manner, that he has never since been equalled by any other.

RAPHELENGIUS, Francis, a learned Fleming. He studied the oriental languages at Paris, and was Greek professor at Cambridge. He was afterwards corrector of the press to Christopher Plantin, whose daughter he married, and he was concerned in the publication of the famous Antwerp Hebrew bible, printed 1571. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew and Arabic at Leyden, and died there 20th July, 1597. His works besides are, a Hebrew Grammar—an Arabic Lexicon—and a Chaldee Lexicon.

RAPIN, Nicholas, a French poet, born at Fontenai-le-Comté, Poitou. He was the favorite of Henry III. by whom he was made provost of Paris, from which he was expelled by the league, but afterwards restored by Henry IV. His works, which were elegantly written, consisted of odes, epigrams, and elegies. He attempted to banish rhyme from the French poetry, and to write after the Greek and Latin metre. He died 1609. His poems are among the Delices des Poetes Latins de France.

RAPIN, Renatus, a learned jesuit, born at Tours 1621. He taught for nine years polite literature with success, and wrote Latin with great elegance. His poem on Gardens, in four books, has been translated into English by Evelyn, and also by Gardiner. This and his other poems, consisting of odes, and sacred eclogues, were published 2 vols. 12mo. 1681. His treatises on Polite Literature were translated from the French into English, by B. Kennet, 2 vols. 8vo. They contain well written comparisons between Demosthenes and Cicero on eloquence, between Homer and Virgil, and are intended to restore good taste and polite studies in France. He died at Paris 1687.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, Paul de, a Frenchman, known as an eminent historian, born at Castres, Languedoc, 1661, and descended from an ancient family in Savoy. He studied at Puy-laurens and Saumur, and then, after the example of his father, who was an advocate of respectability, he applied himself to the law. He afterwards abandoned the law for the profession of arms, but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he left France, and went to England in 1686; but after a short stay in London, he went to Holland, where he enlisted in a company of French volunteers. He accompanied William III. into England, and served in the army in Ireland, and was at the battle of the Boyne, and the siege of Limerick, where he was wounded. In 1693 he became tutor to the son of the earl of Portland, with a pension of £ 100 from the king, and the promise of greater patronage, which he never received. He travelled over Europe with his pupil, and married at the Hague, where he settled for some time. In 1707 he retired to Wezel, in the duchy of Cleves, with his family, and there devoted himself for seventeen years to the completion of his History of England. His health suffered by his great application, and the attack of a fever carried him to his grave after a week's illness, 1725. He published before his death eight vols. 4to. of his history, to the death of Charles I. and two more were added in 1724. This history has been translated by Tindal, and published in 8vo. and in folio, with a continuation to 1760, and notes, and also by J. Kelly, in two vols. folio. As an historian, Rapin has his admirers and detractors, and while admired by some for moderation, he is charged by others with tediousness and obscurity. Voltaire has said of him, that he was the author of the best and most impartial history of England that had hitherto appeared.

RAPP, John, a modern French general, was born of an obscure family at Colmar in 1772, and entered upon a military life in 1788. Having become a lieutenant, in the tenth regiment of chasseurs, he served as aid-de-camp to Dessaix in the campaigns of 1796 and 1797, and afterwards in Egypt. After the battle of Marengo he became aid-de-camp to Buonaparte; and in 1802 was employed in the subjugation of Switzerland. Returning to Paris the following year, he accompanied Buonaparte into Belgium: at the battle of Austerlitz he defeated the Russian imperial guard, and took prisoner prince Reppin. In December 1805 he was a general of a division; and appointed governor of Dantzic in 1807. After the campaign of 1812 he commanded the garrison of that city, which he defended with great skill and valor, but he was at length obliged to capitulate. In 1814 he submitted to the Bourbons; but joined Napoleon on his return; and after all his vicissitudes died in 1823 in favor with Louis XVIII., and a member of the chamber of Peers. Mémoires du General Rapp appeared at Paris the same year, 8vo.

RASORI, John, an eminent Italian physician, born at Parma in 1767. He studied medicine at Florence, Pavia, and in England, where he adopted the Brunonian system, and on his return home he published a translation of the works of Dr. Brown. He became professor of pathology at Pavia, but was obliged to resign that office on account of his political opinions. On the entrance of the French into Italy in 1796 Dr. Rasori went to Milan where he published a journal entitled "L'Amico della Libertà e dell'Uguaglianza." He was made secretary to the minister of the interior of the Cisalpine republic, which employment he was forced to resign in 1797; and he then returned to Pavia, where he was professor of the practice of medicine. He afterwards removed to Milan, and when the Austro-Russian army entered the Milanese in 1799, he took refuge at Genoa, where Massena then held the command. After the battle of Marengo he again went to Milan, and obtained the places of first physician to the government, chief of the military hospital, and professor of chemical medicine at the hospital of the Santa Corona. From these offices he was removed by the minister of the interior of the kingdom of Italy. Towards the end of 1814 he was arrested as an accomplice in the conspiracy of the Carbonari, and confined in the citadel of Mantua, whence he was released two years after, and he died in 1823. Besides the works of Dr. Brown, he translated Darwin's Zoonomia, and was the author of "Storia della Febre Petechiale di Genova," 1803, 8vo. and various other publications.

RASTAL, John, an eminent printer, born in London, and educated at Oxford. He wrote a Description of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in the form of a drama, with cuts—and also Canones Astrologici—Dialogues concerning Purgatory—Rules of a good Life—Anglorum Regum Chronicon—and Apology against John Fryth. He married a sister of the great sir Thomas Moore, and died 1536. His son William was one of the justices of the King's Bench under Mary, and at her death retired to Louvain. He published a Chronological Table from the Conqueror—the Chartuary 1580—Terms of the English Law—Collection of Statutes, and the Life of sir Thomas Moore.

RATRANUS, a monk of the abbey of Corbie in the ninth century. He published two books on predestination, against Hinemar, archbishop of Rheims, which are inserted in the Vindiciæ Predestinationis, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides, treatises on the Conception of Christ—and on Transubstantiation, a work much quoted by the Calvinists.

RATTE, Stephen Hyacinth de, an astronomer, was born at Montpellier in 1722. He was secretary to the Academy of Sciences in his native city, and published two volumes of its memoirs; but was prevented from continuing the collection by the Revolution. He was also counsellor of the court of aids; and when the National Institute was formed he was chosen an associate. He died in 1805. His observations have been published by Flauguergues.

RAULIN, Joseph, an eminent physician, born in the diocese of Auch in 1708. He engaged in the practice of his profession at Nerac, where his merit was not sufficiently appreciated; but the president de Montesquieu having induced him to remove to Paris, he there acquired great reputation, was loaded with honors, and employed by the government in the composition of various medical works. He died in 1784. Among his principal productions are, "Traité des Maladies occasionées par les prompts Variations de l'Air," 1752, 12mo; "Traité des Maladies occasionées par les Exces de Chaleur, de Froid, &c." 1756, 12mo; "Traité des Affections Vapoureuses du Sexe," 1759, 12mo; "De la Conservation des Enfants," 1768, 2 vols. 12mo; and "Traité de la Phthisic Pulmonaire," 1784, 8vo.

RAVAILLAC, Francis, a native of Angouleme, who took the habit of the Feuillans, a society from which he was soon after expelled on account of his irregularities. The excesses and the fanatical discourses of the advocates of the league had so deranged his understanding, that he formed a most inveterate hatred against Henry IV. and determined to cut him off. Full of melancholy fury he went to Paris, and for some days followed the monarch to commit his horrid purpose. On the fatal 14th May, 1610, when the royal carriage was stopped in the street by some waggons, the murderer raised himself upon the wheels of the chariot, and with two blows stabbed the monarch to the heart. He was seized by the duke of Epemon, and condemned to be torn to pieces by four horses. The dreadful sentence was executed the following 27th May, and he declared to the last that he had no accomplice in the cruel deed.

RAVIUS, Christian, a native of Berlin, who travelled into the East, where he learned the Persian, Turkish, and Arabian languages, and collected valuable MSS. On his return to Europe, he became professor of oriental languages at Utrecht, afterwards at Kiel, and at Frankfort on the Maine, where he died 21st June, 1667, aged 64. He was also one of the learned correspondents of queen Christina. He wrote a Plan of Hebrew Orthography and Etymology—a Grammar, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, and English, London, 8vo.—A Latin translation from the Arabic of Apollonius Pergæus.

RAVRIO, Antoine Andre, a famous manufacturer of gilt bronzes, born in 1759, at Paris, where he died in 1814. He united great skill in the art he professed, with considerable knowledge of various sciences, and he consecrated his leisure to poetry and literature. Ravrio was a member of the academical society of the Children of Apollo, and of the societies of Arts and of Friendship. He printed for his friends a collection of pieces entitled "Mes Delassemens, ou Recueil de Chansons," 1810–12, 2 vols. 8vo; and he was also the author of "Arlequin Journalisté,"—and other dramatic productions.

RAWDON, Hastings, Francis, marquis of Hastings, earl of Rawdon, &c. was the son of John, baron Rawdon, and earl of Moira, of the kingdom of Ireland, and was born December 7, 1754. He was educated at Oxford, and after a short tour on the continent, he entered into the army in 1771, as an ensign in the fifteenth regiment of foot. Having obtained a lieutenantancy, he embarked for America in 1775, and he was present at the battle of Bunker's Hill. After having served in other engagements, he was nominated in 1778 adjutant-general of the British army in America, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. He next commanded a distinct corps in South Carolina, where he successfully opposed general Gates; and at the battle of Camden, on the 16th of August, 1780, lord Rawdon commanded one wing of the army under lord Cornwallis. He subsequently defeated general Green; but the surrender of lord Cornwallis's army, and the declining state of our affairs, put a period to his exertions. A severe and dangerous illness, however, obliged him to quit the army before the conclusion of hostilities. He embarked for England, and the vessel which carried him was captured and taken to Brest, but he was immediately released, and returning home was made aid-de-camp to the king, and created an English peer by the title of baron Rawdon. He distinguished himself both in the English and Irish parliaments, particularly in the former, in the debates relative to the bill for the relief of persons imprisoned for small debts. In June 1793 he succeeded his father as earl of Moira, and the same year he was advanced to the rank of major-general. In the summer of 1794, he was sent with a reinforcement of ten thousand men to join the duke of York, opposed to the French in Holland. In 1797 an attempt was made to place him at the head of the ministry; but the scheme did not succeed. When the whigs, with whom he had acted, came into power in 1806, he was appointed master-general of the ordnance, which post he resigned on the fall of his party. He was engaged subsequently in political negotiations, which proved abortive; and in 1812, as he could not act with the administration then in power, he obtained the appointment of governor-general of British India. In 1816 he was created viscount Loudoun, earl of Rawdon, and marquis of Hastings; and he twice received the thanks of the East India Company, and of the houses of parliament, for his able services in the Indies. He returned to England in 1822, when he was succeeded by lord Amherst. In March, 1824, he was nominated governor of Malta, where he resided till near the time of his death, which occurred November 28, 1825, on board his majesty's ship Revenge, in Baia bay, near Naples. The later years of the life of this conspicuous nobleman were clouded by the consequences of his profuse liberality and generous hospitality, particularly to the French emigrant noblesse. Unhappily, as is usually the case with men of uncalculating generosity both with regard to themselves and connexions, the permanent evil in the sequel is sure to exceed the temporary good. The marquis of Hastings endured much himself; others have encountered ruin and broken hearts.

RAWLET, John, B. D., an English divine, lecturer of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a place which he refused to quit for the living of Coleshill, Warwickshire. He wrote the Christian Monitor, an excellent book often edited—and a treatise on Sacramental Covenanting, and died 1686, aged 44.

RAWLEY, William, D. D., chaplain to Charles I. and II. and also to the great Bacon, and the editor of his works, was born at Norwich 1588. He was educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, and in 1616 obtained the rectory of Landbeach, near Cambridge, from which he was expelled during the rebellion, but replaced at the restoration. He died there 18th June, 1667.

RAWLINSON, Thomas, a judicious collector of books, and a liberal patron of learning, and of learned men. While in Gray's inn, he had four chambers filled with his valuable collections, and he removed to London-house, Aldersgate-street, which though once the palace of a bishop, could scarce contain the number of his books. He died there 6th August 1725, aged 44. His library was disposed of by auction after his death, and his MSS. took sixteen days in the sale, and the books a much greater portion of time. Addison alluded satirically to him in the 158th number of the Tatler, under the character of Tom Folio.

RAWLINSON, Richard, LL. D., fourth son of sir Thomas, was an eminent antiquary, educated at St. John's college, Oxford. This indefatigable man made a collection for the enlargement of A. Wood's Historia and Antiquitates Oxon. and for the continuation of the Athenæ Oxoniensis, and History of Oxford, and he assisted liberally his contemporary antiquaries in the completion of their works. He also published a translation of Fresnoy's New Method of studying History, 2 vols. 8vo.—and the English Typographer, &c. 8vo. He also founded in 1750 an Anglo-Saxon professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed to the university all his books, papers, MSS. seals, and curious and valuable collections. He died at Islington, 6th April, 1755. He was also a great benefactor to Hertford college, and particularly to St. John's college, to which he left an estate worth £700 per annum. Dr. Rawlinson's printed books were sold in 1756. The sale lasted fifty days, and that of the pamphlets ten days more.

RAWLINSON, Christopher, eminent for his knowledge of Saxon and Northern literature, was born at Springfield, Essex, 13th June, 1677, of an ancient family, situated at Clarkhill, Lancashire. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and published, whilst there, an edition of Alfred's Saxon translation of Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ, 8vo. He left a valuable collection of MSS. respecting the counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland. He died 8th January 1732-3, aged 55, and was buried in the abbey church of St. Alban's.

RAWSON, Grindall, a graduate of Harvard college in 1678, who became an ordained minister at Mendon Massachusetts about two years afterwards. At this time there were only about twenty families in that town. Here were also a number of Indians; and, such was his benevolence towards them, that he studied their language that he might preach to them, in the most acceptable manner. This he usually did, on Sunday evenings. He died in the year 1715, aged 56, much esteemed for his talents and piety.

RAWWOLF, Leonard, a native of Augsburg, who, in pursuit of botanical knowledge, travelled into Syria, Judæa, Arabia, and other Eastern countries, where he obtained a great number of curious plants. On his return to Europe 1576, he removed to Lintz, and gained some reputation as a medical practitioner, and was made physician to the archdukes of Austria. He died 1606. His Travels were published at Frankfort, 1582, in 4to, which were translated into English by Staphrost, 1693, and afterwards by Mr. Ray. The catalogue of his plants was published by J. F. Gronovius, at Leyden, 1755, under the name of Flora Orientalis, 8vo.

RAY, or WRAY, John, an eminent English naturalist, born 1628. He was educated at Cambridge, from which two years after, he removed to Trinity college, where he obtained a fellowship. As he distinguished himself in the university by his application, he was in 1651, made Greek lecturer of his college, and two years after, mathematical reader, and in 1655, humanity reader. Not only, however, the business of the college commanded his attention, but he devoted himself particularly to botany, and the universal history of nature, and in 1660, published a catalogue of the Cambridge plants. To enlarge his knowledge of plants, he travelled over the greater part of England, Wales, and Scotland, and in these journies was generally accompanied by his pupil and friend, Mr. Willoughby, by sir Philip Skipton, and Mr. P. Courthope. At the restoration, he took orders, but two years after, he resigned his fellowship, as he refused to subscribe against the solemn league and covenant. In 1663, he embarked for the continent, where he continued about three years with his learned pupil, in pursuit of botanical knowledge, of which he published an account in 1673. In 1667, he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and contributed much, by his valuable communications to the philosophical transactions. He died 17th January, 1704-5. As a botanist, Ray has acquired great and deserved celebrity, and his writings are held in high estimation. To strong benevolence of heart, he added great humility of mind and modesty of manners, and in his character he was so amiable, that those who knew him, respected him, not so much for his literary acquirements, as from personal friendship. The best known of his works are, the Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation, 8vo. edited three times—three Discourses on the Primitive Chaos, the Creation, Deluge, and Conflagration of the world, 8vo.—Synopsis Methodica Animalium, Quadrupedum, Avium, & Piscium—Rawwolf's Travels into the East translated, 8vo. Persuasive to a Holy Life, 8vo.—Collection of English Proverbs, often reprinted, 8vo.—Catalogue of English Plants—Observations, Topographical and Moral, in foreign Countries—Discourse on Seeds and the differences of Plants—Methodus Plantarum Nova—Historia Plantarum Generalis—Fasciculus Stirpium Britannicarum—and Synopsis Methodica.

RAYNAL, William Francis, a celebrated French historian, born at St. Genies, in Rouergue, 1718. He early entered among the jesuits, and became a popular preacher; but his love of liberty and independence was too great to continue in the confinement of a cloister, and he left the society in 1748, and settled at Paris. Here determined to support himself by his pen, he wrote Literary Anecdotes, 3 vols., and Memoirs of Ninon de L'Enclos, and was engaged in the Mercur de France; but as he had greater partiality for commercial occupations, he devoted himself more closely to that subject, and in 1770, published his History, Philosophical and Political, of the Establishment, and of the Commerce of the Europeans in the East and West Indies. This work was received with general approbation; but while the style and the language were admired, his calculations were discovered to be erroneous, his principles suspicious, and his conclusions false. To correct and improve, therefore, a composition which embraced so many concerns of policy and commerce, he travelled over France, Holland, and England, in pursuit of information, and of well attested facts. His reputation was such, that in England, the speaker of the commons observing him among the spectators, suspended the business of the house, till he had seen the historian placed in a more commodious seat. On his return, he published a new edition of his work at Geneva, in 10 vols. 8vo.; but though corrected in some parts, his severe language against governments drew upon him the censure of the parliament of Paris, and not only his history was burnt with ignominy, but his person was ordered to be seized. He was, however, allowed sufficient time to make his escape, and he went to reside in Germany, and received marks of favor and protection from the king of Prussia, and from the empress of Russia, though he had spoken of them with sarcastic indifference. In 1788, he returned to Paris, and viewing the rapid progress of the constituent assembly, in the destruction of whatever was venerable and useful in the French monarchy, he had the boldness, in 1791, to address a letter to that body, and in firm and energetic language, he censured the imprudence of their proceedings. This magnanimous appeal to the sense of the legislators was ridiculed as the effusion of dotage; but it proved too prophetic of the calamities which followed. Displeased with the tumults of the capital, the venerable philosopher retired to Passy, where he expired, 6th March, 1796, aged 84. Though the favorite of great men, and of princes, he died in poverty, and the only property found belonging to him, was an assignat of fifty livres, worth not three pence in ready money. His reputation, nevertheless, will be immortal, and though he is to be censured for his opinions, which are often licentious and skeptical, his writings possess vigor, clearness, and elegance, and exhibit the nervous powers of an ardent imagination, and the striking features of a rapid invention. He published besides, an History of the Stadtholcrate, 2 vols.—History of the English Parliament, 2 vols. 12mo.—Historical Anecdotes from the Age of Charles V., 3 vols. 12mo.—History of the Divorce of Henry VIII.—Ecole Militaire—Historical Memoirs of Europe—History of the Revolutions of the English American Colonies, 2 vols. It is said, that he had written besides, an History of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which he partly destroyed during the reign of the sanguinary Robespierre.

READ, George, a distinguished American citizen, of Irish descent, born in Maryland, 1734. He studied law, and settled in the state of Delaware, where he was attorney-general of the three lower counties from 1763 to 1775. In 1774, he was chosen a member of congress, and continued, during the revolutionary war, a member of that body. He was president of the convention which formed the first constitution of Delaware, a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and was a senator of the United States. From 1793 to the autumn of 1798, the time of his death, he was chief justice of the state of Delaware. In his several stations of honor and responsibility, he had the reputation for talents and wisdom.

READ, John, a lawyer of Boston, Massachusetts, distinguished for genius, learning, wit, patriotism, eloquence, and integrity, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1697. He studied divinity, and preached for some time, with popularity, but at length left that profession for the law, and soon became eminent in the practice. He first reduced the redundant and obscure phraseology of the English deeds of conveyance, to the simple form now in use. He held a conspicuous place for some time also in the house of representatives and council. He died at an advanced age, in 1749, after having been long and justly regarded as one of the greatest and most useful lawyers his country had produced.

REAL, Cæsar Richard de St., a French writer, born at Chamberri. He came early to France, and afterwards visited England. After living some time at Paris, he returned to Chamberri, and died there, 1692, very old and poor. He possessed great abilities, and was well acquainted with history and literature. He wrote Discourses on History—Don Carlos, an historical novel—Account of the Conspiracy of the Spaniards against the Venetian republic—the Life of our Saviour—Discourse on Valor—treatise on Criticism—and Apostacy of Geneva, all which were published together, in 5 vols. 4to. 1722, at the Hague, and also at Paris, 1745, with his letters to Atticus.

REAL, Gaspar de, seigneur de Curban, author of a valuable work on the science of government, in 8 vols. 4to. was born at Sisteron, and died at Paris, 8th February, 1752, aged 70. His nephew, the abbé, was also born at Sisteron, and died 1774, aged 73, author of a Dissertation on the Name of the Royal Families of France and Spain, 1762, in 12mo.

REAUMUR, René Anthony Ferchault sieur de, a French philosopher, born at Rochelle, of a good family, 1688. He studied philosophy at Poitiers, and the law at Bourges; but his inclinations led him particularly to the pursuits of mathematics and physics, and for that purpose he removed to Paris. His high reputation as a philosopher, procured him a seat in the academy of sciences at Paris, 1708, and he repaid the honor by contributing largely to their memoirs. He died in 1757, in consequence of a fall. His works were very ingenious, and therefore much admired. The best is his History of Insects, 6 vols. 4to., besides a History of the Rivers of France.

REBOULET, Simon, a native of Avignon. He was brought up among the jesuits, but left them on account of bad health, and afterwards married. He was author of Histoire des Filles de l'Enfance, 2 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs du Chevalier de Forbin, 2 vols.—Histoire de Louis XIV. 3 vols. 4to.—Histoire de Clement XI. 2 vols. 4to., &c. He died at Paris, 1752, aged 65.

REDI, Francis, an Italian physician, born at Arezzo, 1626. He studied at Florence, and then at Pisa, where he became doctor of philosophy and medicine. Though in great reputation as the physician of Ferdinand II., duke of Tuscany, he devoted much of his time to literature, and assisted greatly in the compilation of the Crusca dictionary. He published experiments on the Generation of Animals, 4to.—Observations on Vipers—Experiments on Natural Curiosities brought from India, 4to. He was not only a learned man, but the liberal patron of learning. He was found dead in his bed, 1697.

REDMAN, John, M.D., a native of Philadelphia, born February 27, 1722. After a regular course of medical study, he went to Bermuda, where he commenced practice, and spent several years. Subsequently he proceeded to Europe, in order to perfect himself in medical science. For this purpose, he spent one year in Edinburgh; attended lectures, dissections, and hospitals, in Paris; and was graduated at Leyden, in 1748. He now returned to America, and established himself in his native city, where he became the first president of the college of physicians in Philadelphia. In the evening of his life, he withdrew from the labors of his profession. His death took place in 1808, at the age of 86 years. Dr. Redman was distinguished for piety and benevolence. In a sick room, his talents were remarkable. It is said he would soothe pain by his kind and affectionate manners; or would chase it away by his conversation, which was occasionally facetious and full of anecdotes, or serious and instructive.

REED, Joseph, a patriot of the American revolution, was graduated at the college in New Jersey, in 1757. While a member of Congress, in 1778, the British commissioner endeavored to procure his influence to bring about a reconciliation between the colonies and the mother country; he rejected their offers with the reply—"That he was not worth purchasing; but such as he was, the king of Great Britain was not rich enough to buy him." In 1778, he was chosen president of Pennsylvania, and retained that office till his death, in 1781.

REED, Isaac, an ingenious writer, was born in London in 1742. He was brought up to the conveyancing business; but relinquished it for literary pursuits, though he retained his chambers in Staple's Inn, where he collected a large and curious library. In 1768, he published the poems of Lady Mary Wortley Montague; in 1773, he edited the Seatonian prize poems; in 1780, he revised and enlarged Dodsley's old plays; in 1782, he published the Biographia Dramatica, 2 vols.; in 1783, four volumes of humorous pieces, under the title of the Repository; and in 1785, an edition of Shakspeare, in 10 vols., which he extended afterwards to 21 vols. Mr. Reed was for many years editor, and one of the proprietors of the European Magazine. He died January 5, 1807, and was buried at Amwell. The sale of his library took up thirty-nine days, and produced four thousand pounds.

REES, Dr. Abraham, an author and dissenting divine, was born in 1743, in North Wales, was educated at the dissenting establishment, Hoxton, of which he became the mathematical tutor; was appointed theological professor at Hackney College; officiated more than forty years as minister of the congregation in the Old Jewry; was a fellow of the Royal Society, and of other institutions; and died June 9, 1825. He wrote Sermons, and contributed to the monthly review; but is best known as the editor of the enlarged edition of Chambers's Cyclopædia, and of the still more extensive Cyclopædia, in forty-four volumes.

REESÉ, Thomas, D.D., a graduate of Princeton college, in 1768. Subsequently, he was for several years settled over the presbyterian church at Salem, in South Carolina. He died at Charleston of that state, in 1796. He is known to have published the following works only;—an Essay on the influence of religion in civil society—the death of Christians is Gain—and the Character of Haman.

REEVE, Tapping, LL.D., an eminent lawyer, was born at Brook-Haven, 1744, and was graduated at Princeton college. He established himself as a lawyer in Litchfield, Connecticut, where he founded the law school, of which, for nearly thirty years he was the principal instructor. He was for many years judge of the supreme court of that state, and some time chief justice. His legal attainments were of a high order, and as a man, he possessed the esteem and respect of the community.

REEVES, John, was born in 1752, was educated at Eton and Merton College, Oxford, studied the law in the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in 1780. Disgust, however, at being called upon to defend alike the right and the wrong, soon induced him to discontinue the active practice of his profession. After having been law clerk to the board of trade, he was in 1791, appointed chief justice of Newfoundland. In 1792, on his second return from the colony, his alarm on witnessing the prevalence of revolutionary principles, induced him to form the celebrated Association for protecting liberty and property against republicans and levelers. In 1795, he was prosecuted, by order of the House of Commons, for an alleged libellous passage in his Thoughts on the English Government; but was acquitted. He was appointed one of the king's printers in 1799; and from 1803 to 1814, he held the superintendence of the alien office. He died August 7, 1829. His learning was extensive, his judgment was acute, and no man ever possessed a more kind and benevolent heart. Among his principal works are, a *History of the English Law—History of the Law of Shipping and Navigation—*and a Collection of the Hebrew and Greek Texts of the Psalms.

REGA, Henry Joseph, professor of medicine, and physician at Louvain, was author of various treatises of merit, on his profession. De Urinis Tractatus duo—Sympathia, seu de Consensu Partium Humani Corpor. 12mo.—Accurata Methodus medendi per Aphorismos Proposita, 4to.—Dissertatio Medica de Aquis Mineral. Fontis Marimont. He died at Louvain, 1754, aged 64.

REGIOMONTANUS, an eminent astronomer, whose real name was John Mullerus, born at Königsberg, Franconia, 1436. He studied at Leipsic, and then removed to Vienna, where he was the pupil, and afterwards the successor of the famous Purbachius, the professor. To be able to read Ptolemy, he travelled in the suit of cardinal Bessarion to Italy, and began to learn Greek under Beza, and after visiting the universities of that country, he returned to Vienna. He was afterwards employed at Buda, to make a library for Corvinus, king of Hungary, and in 1471, he settled at Nuremberg. In 1474 he went to Rome, to assist pope Sixtus IV. in the reformation of the calendar, and for his services, was named by him archbishop of Ratisbon, but died at Rome, 1476, of the plague, or, as some assert, by poison, administered by the sons of his enemy Trapezentius.

REGIS, Peter Sylvain, a French philosopher, born at Agenois, 1632. He studied at Cahors, under the jesuits; but the lectures of Rohault determined him to leave divinity for the study of philosophy. He went in 1665, to Toulouse, and there acquired great reputation as a lecturer on the new philosophy introduced by Des Cartes, and in 1670 he removed to Paris, where he was attended by such numerous audiences, that the followers of the old doctrines prevailed upon the archbishop of Paris to silence this bold and eloquent innovator. He was member of the academy of sciences, and died 1707. He wrote System of Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to.—Use of Reason and Faith, 4to.—and an Answer to Huet's Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ. These works, though once popular, and written with plausibility, have long since ceased to interest the public in consequence of the new lights thrown on the walks of philosophy.

REGIUS, Urban, or LE ROY, was born at Langenargen. He studied at Lindaw, Friburg, Basil, and Ingolstadt, and distinguished himself so much by his literary talents, that he received from the hands of the emperor Maximilian, the poetical and oratorical crown. He was afterwards made professor of poetry and rhetoric; but being a convert to Luther's opinions, he went to settle at Augsburg, where he established a reformed church. He died suddenly at Zell, 1541. His works are contained in 3 vols. folio.

REGANARD, John Francis, next to Moliere, the best comic writer in France, was born at Paris, 1647. He early indulged his passion for travelling; but in passing from Italy to Marseilles, the ship in which he embarked was taken by pirates, and carried to Algiers. Now doomed to slavery, he gained the good graces of his master by his skill in making ragouts, and thus he became a useful man in the kitchen; but an amour brought on new difficulties and dangers. He was discovered, and had no choice, but either to turn Mahometan, or to be burnt alive. The French consul, however, extorted him from his situation, by ransom, and sent him back to his country. In 1631 he resumed his travels, and visited Flanders, Holland, and Sweden, and extended his excursion to Lapland, as far as the borders of the icy sea. He returned through Poland and Vienna, and after three years' absence, settled at Paris, and ardently devoted himself to the muses. He was made treasurer of France, and lieutenant of the waters and forests, and in the midst of independence, led the life of a voluptuary. He died at Dourdan, near Paris, it is said, of chagrin, 1709. His dramatic pieces have been published in 5 vols. 12mo.

REGNAULT, Michael Louis Stephen, a French statesman, born at St. Jean d' Angeli in 1760. He adopted the profession of an advocate, and became lieutenant of the presidency of the marine at Rochefort. Having distinguished himself at the bar, he was chosen a deputy to the States-General from the tiers-etat of the county of Aunis. He became the editor of a daily paper, called "Journal de Versailles;" and when the constituent assembly removed to Paris, he supplied notes of its proceedings for a paper entitled Postillon par Calais. Being proscribed after the 10th of August, 1792, he fled from Paris, and being discovered and arrested at Douai, he did not obtain his liberty till after the fall of Robespierre. He was subsequently employed in the army of Italy, where he became known and attached to Buonaparte; and he was one of those who contributed to bring about the revolution of the 18th of Brumaire, 1799. Successively appointed councillor of state, secretary of state to the imperial family, count of the empire, and attorney-general in the superior court, he acquitted himself of his different functions with great ability. On the opening of the Russian campaign he foresaw the fall of Napoleon, to whose interests notwithstanding, he continued faithful to the last. He followed Maria Louisa to Blois; and when Napoleon returned from Elba he again appeared on the scene. After the battle of Waterloo he pleaded for the resignation of Buonaparte in favor of his son; and his proposition being rejected, he quitted France for America. Having obtained permission to return home after four years' exile, he landed in his native country in the last stage of sickness, and died a few hours subsequent to his arrival, March 10, 1819. Besides the works already mentioned, he assisted in the Journal de Paris, and in the Année des Patriotes, 1791, 4 vols. 8vo.

REGNIER DES MARETS, Seraphin, a French writer, born at Paris, 1632. He went in 1662, as secretary to his patron, the duke de Crequi, ambassador to Rome, and in consequence of some elegant Italian sonnets, obtained a seat in the Crusca academy. In 1684 he became secretary to the French academy, in the room of Mezeray, and died 1713, prior of Grammont, and an abbot. He published a French Grammar—an Italian translation of Anacreon—Poems in French, Latin, Spanish, and Italian—and History of the Disputes of France with the court of Rome. Besides a translation of Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice, finished at the age of fifteen. Voltaire says of him, that he did great service to the French language.

REGNIER, Claude Ambrose, duke of Massa, minister of justice under the government of Napoleon. He was born at Blamont, in the department of La Meurthe, in 1736; and at the beginning of the Revolution he exercised with success the profession of an advocate at Nancy. He adopted popular principles, was nominated a deputy to the states-general, and afterwards to the Constituent Assembly, in which he chiefly devoted his attention to matters of judicature and administration. Having escaped from the proscription of the 10th of August, he lived in obscurity during the reign of terror, and again appeared on the political stage after the fall of Robespierre. He then became a member of the Council of Ancients, and took an active part in several public measures. He was one of those who assisted in the elevation of Buonaparte, and on the establishment of the consulate he was made a member of the council of state in the section of finance; and in 1802 he was appointed grand judge, minister of justice, and charged with the direction of the general police. In 1813 he resigned his office to become president of the legislative body, in which post he continued till the abdication of Buonaparte, in whose reverse of fortune he was associated. The duke of Massa died June 24, 1814.

REYMIER, Jean Louis Antoine, a naturalist and writer on agriculture, brother of general Regnier. He was born at Lausanne in 1762. After travelling in Holland and various parts of France, he settled on an estate in the Miernais, which he quitted to join his brother in Egypt, where he obtained a civil employment. After the return of Buonaparte to France, Regnier was called by general Kleber to the committee of administration and under Menou he was charged with the direction of the finances. Joseph Buonaparte, when governing in Italy, made him commissary-royal in Calabria, and Murat afterwards employed him as superintendent-general of the posts in the kingdom of Naples. The events of 1814 having deprived him of all his functions, he went and settled in the canton de Vaud, where he accepted the direction of the posts, devoting his intervals of leisure to scientific pursuits. He died at Lausanne in 1824. He was a contributor to the Encyclopedie Méthodique, and to various periodical journals; besides which he published Du Feuet de quelqun de ses principaux Effets, 8vo; Guide du Voyageur en Suisse, 12mo; Precis d'une Collection des Médailles Antiques, 8vo; and Traité de l'Economie Publique et Rurale de plusieurs Peuples Antiques.

REICHSTADT, duke of, son of Napoleon Buonaparte was born at Paris, March 20th, 1811, the only off-spring of the marriage of Napoleon with the archduchess Maria Louisa. Immediately upon his birth he received the title of king of Rome; but the downfall of the father entirely changed the condition and prospects of the son. His name was changed from Napoleon to Francis-Charles-Joseph; and in 1818 he was created duke of Reichstadt. He was very tall in stature; possessed of distinguished talent and great kindness of disposition; and early gave indications that his ruling passion was military ambition. He died July 22d, 1832, aged 21 years. He is said to have been attended by the archduchess with great affection during his last illness. But the parent and child had been estranged from each other; and the large family borne by Maria Louisa to her second husband (the late Count Neipperg) is supposed to have in some degree alienated her imperial highness from the solitary pledge of her first nuptials.

REGULUS, Marcus Atilius, a Roman general, who went to Africa to carry war against Carthage. His rapid successes were checked by the arrival of Xantippus, and Regulus, defeated and taken prisoner, was sent by the Carthaginians to Rome, to induce his countrymen to make peace. He dissuaded the Romans from accepting the offer, and on his return to Carthage, was cruelly put to death, B.C. 251.

REID, Thomas, D.D., a late eminent Scottish writer, was the son of the Rev. Lewis Reid. He was born at Strachan in April, 1710, and educated first at the parish school of Kincardine O'Neil, whence he was sent to the Marischal college, Aberdeen, in his twelfth year; where he took his degree of M.A. and studied theology. After obtaining his license he cultivated mathematics under professor John Stuart, whose place he often supplied in his absence. After this he was preferred to the church of New Machar, and soon overcame the popular prejudice against him, on account of that patronage. On the 22d November, 1751, he was appointed professor of philosophy in King's college, Aberdeen; an office for which he was peculiarly qualified. Soon after this he wrote his Essay on Quantity, published in the Philosophical Transactions, vol. 45; which is esteemed the finest specimen of metaphysical mathematics extant. About this time, too, he was made D.D., and published his celebrated Inquiry in the Human Mind, on the principles of Common Sense. On the death of Dr. Adam Smith, he was called to be professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow, on the eleventh of June, 1764. In 1773 appeared in lord Kane's Sketches of the History of Man, a brief Account of Aristotle's Logic, with Remarks by Dr. Reid; which is esteemed the best analysis yet given of that philosopher's writings. In 1785 he published Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, dedicated to Dr. Gregory and professor Stewart of Edinburgh; and, in 1788, Essays on the active powers of Man; both in 4to. He died in October 1796, aged 87. He had been married, and left one daughter.

REIHING, James, a native of Augsburg, who, after violently opposing the tenets of Luther, at last embraced them with unusual warmth, and obtained the chair of professor of theology at Tubingen. As he married, the catholics ascribed his conversion to his attachment to the female sex. He died 1623, aged 48. His works are all controversial.

REINEGGS, James, a German traveller and adventurer, born in 1744, who was the son of a barber at Isleben, in Saxony, named Ehlich. He at first followed his father's employment, but at length quitted his native country, and became successively a journeyman barber, a student of medicine at Leipsic, a theatrical performer at Vienna, a physician in Georgia, and favorite of prince Heraclius, who raised him to the rank of a bey, and had his name inscribed in letters of gold on the fountry near Teflis. Reineggs acquired a title to these honors by spreading among the Georgians the knowledge he had gained in Europe. He improved the manufacture of gunpowder and the casting of cannon; and he erected a printing-press, where he had printed the Principles of Political Economy of his countryman Sonnenfels, which he translated into Persian, whence a Georgian version was made. But after having conferred so many benefits on the country in which he had found an honorable asylum, Reineggs was induced to sacrifice its interests to his own ambition: being sent by Heraclius as a negotiator to the court of Catherine II. he became the secret agent of that princess, and thus contributed to destroy the independence of Georgia. As the reward of his treachery he was made counsellor of the imperial college, director of the students in surgery, and perpetual secretary of the imperial college of medicine at Petersburg, where he died in 1793. He was the author of a History of Georgia, published by the celebrated traveller Pallas in the second volume of his Nordische Beytrage; and a Topographical and Historical Description of the Caucasus, found among his papers after his death, was published by Schroeder, Gotha, 1796, 2 vols. 8vo.

REINESIUS, Thomas, a learned native of Gotha, in Thuringia, who studied medicine, and practised at Altenburg, where he became burgo-master. He was afterwards counsellor to the elector of Saxony, and then retired to Leipsic, where he died 1667, aged 80. He was also an elegant scholar, and philologist, and published besides medical treatises, Variarum Lectionum Libri tres, 4to.—Syntagma Inscriptionum Antiquarum, 2 vols. folio.—Some letters and lectures, &c.

REINHOLD, Erasmus, an eminent astronomer, and mathematician, born at Salfeldt, Thuringia, 11th October 1511. He studied and was also professor at Wittenberg, and died 19th February 1553. He published an edition of Pinbadius' Theorie Planetarum—Ptolmy's Almagest, and other astronomical works. His son of the same name was also eminent as a mathematician and physician.

REINHOLD, Charles Leonard, a German metaphysician, born at Vienna in 1758. He studied among the jesuits, and was engaged in his novitiate when their order was suppressed in 1773. He then entered among the Barnabites, and became professor of philosophy. He formed an acquaintance with many of the German literati, and was a contributor to a philosophical journal published at Vienna, connexions which probably led to his renouncing his profession, and removing to Leipsic, where he published an Apology for the Reformation, 1783. He afterwards settled at Weimar, and married the daughter of the celebrated Wieland, in conjunction with whom he edited the Mercury, a periodical journal. He occupied for a time the chair of philosophy at Jena, which he quitted in 1794 to become attached to the university of Kiel, where he died in 1823. His son, professor of philosophy at Jena, published an interesting account of his life and literary labors, 1825, 8vo. Besides other works, he wrote an Essay to conciliate the Discussions of Philosophers; and Letters on the Philosophy of Kant, of which he was an enthusiastic admirer.

REISKE, John James, an eminent critic, born in the duche of Anhalt, 1706. He studied at Leipsic, and by application surmounted the difficulties which arise from narrow fortune, and the want of powerful patrons. He afterwards went to Leyden, where he resided eight years, till the severity of his remarks on Burman's Petronius excited a cabal against him, which obliged him to return to Leipsic. In 1758, he was placed above independence by being appointed rector of the academy of Leipsic and his classical reputation was increased by his marriage in 1764, with Ernestina Christina Muller, a lady of great talents, well versed in literature, and well qualified to assist and cheer his literary labors. He died 1774. He published animadversiones in Auctores Græcos, 5 vols. a valuable work—an edition of the Greek Orators, 12 vols. 8vo. which were completed by his widow—Dionysius of Halicarnassus, 7 vols.—Plutarch's Works, in 9 vols.—and Theocritus.

RELAND, Hadrian, a learned orientalist, born at Ryp, North Holland, July 17th, 1676. He studied at Amsterdam, and made such progress in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, and in polite literature, there and at Utrecht, under Grævius and Lensden, that at the age of twenty-two he was offered a professorship at Linden, which, however, his father would not permit him to accept. In 1699 he accepted the professorship of philosophy at Harderwick, and two years after removed to the chair of oriental languages at Utrecht. This learned and amiable man died of the small-pox at Utrecht, 5th February 1718. His chief works are Paestina Monumentis vet. Illustrata, 2 vols. 4to.—Dissertations on the Medals of the Ancient Hebrews, 3 vols. 12mo.—Introduction to Hebrew Grammar—Antiquitates Sacrae Veterum Hebræorum—de Religione Mahomedicâ, 3vo.—de Spoliis Templi Hierosolymit. in arcu Titiano Romæ conspicuis—Epictetus, a new edition—Dissertationes Tredecim, on some curious subjects. These works are all in elegant Latin.

REMBRANDT, Van Rein, a celebrated Flemish painter, son of a miller, born on the banks of the Rhine near Leyden, 1606. His education was so neglected that he scarce knew how to read, but nature supplied all the deficiencies of art, and gave him a genius with which he soared to fame, affluence, and immortality. His manner was entirely his own, and his knowledge of the chiaro oscuro was particularly correct. His chief aim was to imitate living nature, and he here succeeded to an admirable degree. He was singular in his conduct, he was fond of low company, and in his appearance was slovenly. He died at Amsterdam, 1663, or as some say 1673. When once told that his grounds were dark, he replied that he was a painter, not a dyer.

REMI or REMIGIUS, St., archbishop of Rheims, is known as the prelate who converted Clovis to christianity and baptized him. He died before 535. The letters published under his name are spurious.—Another, almoner to the emperor Lothaire, became archbishop of Lyons, 854. He presided at the council of Valentia, and was also present in other ecclesiastical synods. He died 875, author of a tract in support of St. Augustine's doctrine of predestination.—Another professor in the university of Paris, and author of a commentary on the Psalmus. He died about 998.

REMI, Joseph Honoré, a native of Remiremont, who was advocate in the parliament of Paris. He lost his eye-sight at the age of eight by the small-pox, but recovered it six years after. He acquired celebrity by his learning, and was author of Cosmopolisima—Days, a burlesque, in opposition to Young's Night Thoughts—la Code des François, 2 vols. 12mo.—Eloge on the chancellor de l'Hopital, a valuable work crowned by the French academy, though censured by the Sorbonne—eloges on Moliere, Colbert, Fenelon, besides several articles of jurisprudence in the New Encyclopedia.

REMUSAT, M. J. P. Abel, one of the most distinguished linguists, and orientalists of Europe, was born at Paris, September 5, 1783. He was long secretary of the Asiatic Society of Paris, and some time president. He was also Keeper of the Royal Library; and, in 1814, was appointed Professor of the Chinese and Tartar language in the College of France. Professor Remusat died at Paris, June 3, 1832.

RENAU D'ELISAGARAY, Bernard, a mathematician, born at Bearn, of an ancient family. Under the protection of Colbert du Terron, of Seignelay, and of the count de Vermandois, he obtained distinction, and was employed by Louis XIV. in the improving of the construction of vessels, for which he was rewarded with a pension. He advised the bombarding of Algiers which succeeded against the opinion of other engineers, and afterwards he was very useful in conducting the sieges of Philippsburg, and Manheim. His services were honorably noticed, and he was made counsellor of marines, and grand cross of the order of St. Louis, and enjoyed the rank and privileges of a captain of the navy. This ingenious man died 30th September, 1719, aged 67. He wrote the Theory of the Management of Ships, 1689, 8vo.—Letters in Answer to the Objections of Huygens and Bernouilli against his Opinions and Theory.

RENAUDOT, Eusebius, was born at Paris 1646. He was educated by the jesuits, and acquired great knowledge of oriental literature. In 1700, he went with cardinal Noailles to Rome, and received from Clement XI. high marks of attention, and the priory of Fossay in Britany. He was also honorably received by the grand duke of Tuscany, and admitted member of the Crusca academy. Some of his learned dissertations are published in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member, as also of other learned societies. He died at Paris, 1720, highly respected for his learning and piety. He prevented, says Voltaire, the publication of Bayle's dictionary in France. His works are, a Continuation of Nicole's Book on the Perpetuity of Faith, 2 vols. 4to.—Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum, Jacobitarum, &c. 4to.—Relations on the Indies and China, from the Arabic—Collection of Ancient Oriental Liturgies, 2 vols. 4to.—and Athanasius's Life, from the Arabic.

RENNELL, Thomas, F.R.S., son of Dr. Rennell, dean of Winchester, master of the temple, &c. and grandson, by the mother's side, of Sir William Blackstone, was born at Winchester in 1787. At an early age he was placed at Eton, where he distinguished himself by his progress in classical literature, and obtained Dr. Buchanan's prize for the best Greek Sapphic ode on the Propagation of the Gospel in India. He joined at this period three of his contemporaries in the publication of a series of essays, under the name of the Miniature, which went through two editions. In 1806, he removed to King's College, Cambridge, and gave additional proof of his literary attainments, by gaining, in 1808, Sir William Browne's annual Greek medal for an ode entitled Veris Comites, as well as by his contributions to the Museum Criticum. Having taken orders he became assistant preacher to his father at the Temple church, and in 1811, published his Animadversions on the Unitarian Translation of the New Testament, under the designation of a Student in Divinity, and about the same time became editor of the British Critic. In 1816, he was elected Christian advocate in the university of Cambridge, and the bishop of London conferred on him in the same year the vicarage of Kensington. In the former capacity he produced his Remarks on Scepticism as it is connected with the subjects of Organization and Life. Mr. Rennell was the rather induced to enter into this inquiry as he had himself made no slight progress in the study of anatomy. It was first printed in 1819, and went rapidly through six editions. His last work, undertaken in the same character, was entitled Proofs of Inspiration, or the Grounds of Distinction between the New Testament and the Apocryphal Volume. In 1823, he obtained the mastership of St. Nicholas' hospital, with a stall in Salisbury cathedral; and in the same year a pamphlet appeared from his pen addressed to H. Brougham, Esq. M.P., on the subject of a speech made by that gentleman at Durham, taken in connexion with some articles in the Edinburgh review. In the autumn of this year he married a Miss Delafield, of Kensington; not many weeks after which a violent attack of fever terminated in a gradual decline, which carried him off in June the following year; just as he had completed his new translation of Munter's Narrative of the Conversion of Count Struensee. In private life he was highly esteemed.

RENDEL, John, an eminent English geographer, was born, in 1742, at Chudleigh, in Devonshire; and entered the naval service at the age of fifteen. He quitted the sea, however, in his twenty-fourth year, went to India as an officer of engineers, resided there for some years, and rose to the rank of major and surveyor-general of Bengal. On his return home he became a member of the Royal Society. He died May 29, 1830. Among his chief works are, The Bengal Atlas; a Map of Hindostan; Memoirs on the Geography of Asia; and The Geographical System of Herodotus explained.

RENNIE, John, one of the most celebrated civil engineers and mechanists, was born, in 1761, at Plantassie, in East Lothian, and first became known by the talent which he displayed in the mill work of the Albion Mills. He soon, however, became eminent in labors of a superior kind. Among his numerous works are the Crinan, Lancaster, Kennet and Avon, and many other canals; the Southwark, Waterloo, and New London Bridges; the Breakwater at Plymouth; and several docks and harbors, among which are those of London, Hull, and Sheerness. He died October 4, 1821.

REPTON, Humphrey, an ingenious gentleman, was born at Bury St. Edmund's in Suffolk, in 1752. He accompanied Mr. Wyndham to Ireland, in 1783, and for a short time held a lucrative situation in the castle of Dublin; but when his friend quitted that kingdom, Mr. Repton also returned to England. He now directed his attention to drawing, architecture, and particularly ornamental gardening, in which last line he obtained considerable employment. He died in 1818, leaving several sons, one of whom married a daughter of lord Eldon. Mr. Repton published some books on miscellaneous subjects; but his principal works are on landscape gardening.

RESENIUS, Peter John, counsellor and professor of moral philosophy at Copenhagen, was born there 1625. He studied at Leyden, and afterwards travelled over France, Spain, and Italy, and was made counsellor at Padua. He was, on his return home, promoted to offices of trust and honor, and ennobled. He died 1688. He published Jus Aulicanum Norvegicum, 4to.—an Icelandic Dictionary, 4to.—an edition of Edda Islandorum, Danice and Latine, 4to.—translated by Mallet in his introduction to the History of Denmark.

RESTIF DE LA BRETONNE, Nicholas Edmund, a French author, equally remarkable for his fertility as a writer, and for his cynicism and vanity as a man, was born, in 1734, at Saey, in Burgundy, and died at Paris, in 1806. He wrote more than two hundred volumes of novels, and other productions, of which the best is Le Paysan Perverti. At one period he was a printer, and some of his compositions were transferred from his head to the press without being previously committed to paper.

RESTOUT, John, a native of Rouen, eminent as a painter. He became painter to the king, member and president of the academy of painting, and died 1768, aged 76. His best pieces are Alpheus saved in the arms of Diana, the triumph of Bacchus, painted for the king of Prussia, and the destruction of the palace of Armida. His son John Bernard, became also known as a painter. He studied at Rome, and was member of the French academy of painting. He died 1797. His best pieces are Anacreon with a cup in his hand, Jupiter and Mercury entertained by Philemon and Baucis.

RETZ, John Francis Paul de GONDI, cardinal de, remarkable for his daring and intriguing spirit, was born, in 1614, at Montmirail; became coadjutor to the archbishop of Paris, archbishop of Corinth, and a cardinal; took a prominent part in the troubles of France, and in opposing Mazarin, during the minority of Louis the fourteenth; was imprisoned, but escaped, and remained in exile till 1661; practised in his declining years those virtues which he had trampled under foot in his youth; and died in 1679. His Memoirs are highly interesting.

RETZIUS, Anders Jahan, professor of natural history, and chemistry at the university of Lunden in Sweden. He was born at Christianstadt, in 1742, and devoting himself to the study of the natural and physical sciences, he attained great reputation, especially as a botanist. Retzius was a member of thirty-one learned associations, and he founded at Lunden a Physiographical Society. His death took place in 1821. Among his publications may be mentioned, Observationes Botanicae, sex Fasciculis comprehensae, Leips. 1779—91, folio, with colored plates.

REUHLIN, John, a learned German, who greatly contributed to the revival of literature, born at Pforzheim 1455. He studied at Paris and Basil, and took the degree of doctor of law at Orleans, 1479. Both at Basil and at Orleans he acquired great reputation as a scholar, and as professor of Greek and Latin. He accompanied the count of Wirtemberg to Italy, and when he came to Rome he was persuaded by the learned of that place to alter his German name, which signifies Snoke, into the more dignified corresponding Greek word Capnion. He was afterwards sent by the court of Wirtemberg as ambassador to the emperor Frederic III. by whom he was honorably received; but after the death of his patron, he retired to Worms, till again employed in negotiations at Rome by the elector Palatine. He died 1522, universally respected for his learning, and regarded as the first scholar who introduced the study of the Hebrew among modern christians. He wrote de Arte Cabalisticâ, folio, 1517, and the celebrated, "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum," according to some authors.

REVELLIERE LEPAUX, Louis Marie, one of the members of the French executive directory, was born in 1753, at Montaign in La Vendée. He was educated for the bar, and in 1775, admitted a counsellor of the parliament of Paris; but he relinquished his profession, and applied himself to the study of botany, on which he delivered lectures at Angers. The Revolution taking place, he displayed great ardor in support of popular opinions, and was chosen a deputy to the states-general, and afterwards a member of the national convention. He assisted in the formation of a republican club, and the publication of a journal, in which he advanced his own peculiar opinions. It was he who, by way of reprisals against the manifesto of the duke of Brunswick, procured the decree of the convention, purporting "that the French nation would give assistance to all oppressed people who wished to recover their liberty." He voted for the death of the king, and against the appeal to the people. He afterwards opposed Danton, and in vain defended the proscribed Girondists. He was obliged himself to seek for safety in concealment, but after the overthrow of Robespierre he returned to Paris. In March, 1795, he resumed his seat in the convention, and his first act was to oppose the outlawry of the former president of the committee of public safety, by whom he had been recently proscribed. After other employments, he became a member of the directory, in which sovereign-council his influence was not very considerable; and after the events of the 30th of Prairial, he gave in his resignation, and retired to private life. On the creation of the Institute he was nominated a member of the class of moral and political sciences. He read before that assembly Reflections sur le Cullé, les Cérémonies Civiles, et les Fêtes Nationales, in which he advocated the principles of theophilanthropy; and he was regarded as the high-priest of that once prevalent mode of religion. He refused to take the oath of fidelity to Buonaparte required from the members of the Institute, and retired to the neighborhood of Orleans, where he lived for some time in obscurity, and afterwards returned to Paris. He died March 27, 1824. He dictated to his son Memoirs of his Life, to be published at some future period after his death; and he was the author of several tracts, besides his "Reflections on Public Worship," already noticed.

REYHER, Samuel, a native of Schleusingen in Henneberg, professor of mathematics and jurisprudence at Kiel, and counsellor of state to the duke of Saxe Gotha. He wrote Mathesis Biblica—a Dissertation on the Inscription on the cross of Jesus Christ, and on the Hour of his Crucifixion—and translated Euclid into German. He died at Kiel, 22d November, 1714, aged 79.

REYNEAU, Charles René, an eminent mathematician, born at Brissac in Anjou, 1650. He taught philosophy at Pezenas and Toulon, and in 1683, was promoted to the mathematical chair at Angers. He published Analysis demonstrated 2 vols. 4to. a popular work, in which he attempted to reduce to a body the theories of Newton, Descartes, and Leibnitz. He was member of the French academy, and distinguished himself further by the publication of "Science du Calcul des Grands," 2 vols. 4to. and a tract on Logic, 12mo. He died 1723, universally esteemed.

REYNER, Edward, author of Precepts of Christian Practice—Vindication of Human Learning and Universities, was a native of Yorkshire, and educated and graduated at Cambridge. He settled at Lincoln 1627, but was ejected from his living for nonconformity at the restoration, and died soon after. His son John was born at Lincoln, and became fellow of Emanuel college, Cambridge. He took orders, but was deprived for nonconformity, after which he studied physic, and practised at Nottingham, where he died young. He wrote some things of considerable merit.

REYNOLDS, Edward, a native of Southampton, educated at Merton college, Oxford, and appointed rector of Braynton, Northamptonshire, and preacher of Lincoln's Inn. Though he favored the ruling party in the civil wars, and was a member of the Westminster assembly, and one of the presbyterian ministers at the Savoy conference, yet he became bishop of Norwich, to the great offence and indignation of his dissenting brethren. He died 1676, aged 81. He was in his opinions a strong Calvinist. His works, all on theological subjects, have appeared in one folio vol.

REYNOLDS, sir Joshua, a celebrated painter, born 16th July, 1723, at Plympton, Devonshire, where his father, a clergyman, was master of the grammar school. He had very early a strong partiality for painting; but being intended for the church, he was sent to Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts. Nothing, however, seemed so congenial to his taste as painting, and his father indulged him, and placed him in London under the care of Hudson, after which, about 1749, he travelled into Italy. Here he continued two years in company with Mr. afterwards lord Keppel, and after improving himself in the Italian school, and copying the best productions of Roman genius, he returned to England. His first production which attracted notice, was a portrait of his friend Keppel, and other pieces equally correct, and equally finished, continued to command the public attention, and to rank him among the greatest artists of the age. But though portrait painting was the fashion of the times, the young artist did not neglect historical subjects, but acquired from these more solid fame. On the establishment of the academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture, in 1769, none seemed more entitled to the honorable office of president than Reynolds, and he accordingly was appointed, and received the dignity of knighthood on the occasion. But not only as a painter the name of Reynolds must stand respectable, but also as a literary character, and as the active promoter of the literary club, which was established in 1764, and which had among its illustrious members the names of Johnson, Burke, Garrick, Douglas, Goldsmith, the Whartons, Windham, &c. He furnished some valuable annotations to his friend Mason, when he published in 1782, a translation of Dufresnoy's Art of Painting, and he also contributed much to the illustrations of Shakspeare's text by his curious and original remarks. In the academic lectures which he delivered, sir Joshua displayed not only great taste and a perfect acquaintance with his profession, but strong powers of language, sound judgment, an elegant style and luminous order. His merits did not pass unrewarded; he was created doctor of laws by the universities of Dublin and Oxford, and was honored with the friendship of the greatest men of the age at home and abroad. The last portrait which he painted was that of Mr. Fox, which displayed to the last period of life the strong powers of his genius and elegant taste. He resigned the chair of president of the Royal academy, and died 23d February 1792, aged 69.

REYNOLDS, John, governor of Georgia, was the first who held that office after the resignation by the trustees of their charter to the king. He was an officer in the navy at the time of his appointment in 1754. In 1757, governor Ellis succeeded him, and Reynolds returned to England.

REYRAC, Francis Philip de Laurens de, canon of Chancelade, minister of St. Maclon of Orleans, and member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, was born at Longueville, Limousin, 1734, and died at Orleans 21st December 1782, aged 49. He was not only a learned but an amiable character. He wrote an Hymn to the Sun, in poetic prose—Idylls also in prose—sacred poems, 8vo.—Manuale Clericorum.

REYS, Antony dos, author of Latin poems—Life of Ferdinand de Menaza, in Latin—Introduction to a collection of Portuguese Poets—and an edition of a Corpus Illustrium Poetarum Lusitanorum qui Latine scriperunt, 7 vols. 4to. was a native of Peres, and died at Lisbon 1738, aged 48. He was chronologer of Portugal and an ecclesiastic; but he refused to be raised to a bishopric, satisfied with retirement and privacy.

RHAZIS, Mohammed Eben Zacharia Abuberial, a learned Arabian physician, born at Rhei in Chorosana, 852. He was the first after Serapion who introduced the medical art among his countrymen, and wrote various useful works, published folio 1548. His treatise on the Small Pox, was published by Dr. Mead, 8vo. 1767. He died about 935.

RHENANUS, Beatus, author of an History of Germany, 4to.—Illirici Provinciarum Utrique Imperio cum Romano tum Constantinopolitano Ser- vientis Descriptio, 8vo.—an edition of Velleius Paterculus, and other classics, was a native of Scelestat, and died at Strasburg 1547, aged 62. He was for some time corrector of the press to Frobenius at Basil, and thus became acquainted with Erasmus, whose life he wrote.

RHETICUS, George Joachim, a German astronomer, born at Faldkirk, Tyrol. He was mathematical professor at Wittenberg, and afterwards assisted the great Copernicus in his calculations. He was afterwards professor in Poland, and at Cassaria in Hungary, where he died 1576, aged 62. He published Narratio de Libris Revolutione Copernici.

RHODIUS, Ambrose, professor of physic and mathematics at Anglo in Norway, was a native of Wittenberg. During the civil dissensions which prevailed in Norway he was seized and cruelly sent to prison, where he died 1633, aged 56. He was author of a treatise on the Transmigration of the Soul, and other works.

RHUNKEN or RHUNKENIUS, David, LL.D. a celebrated German critic, was born at Stolpen in Pomerania, in 1723. Intended for the clerical profession, he passed some time at the university of Konigsberg, devoting himself to classical literature; he then removed to Wittenberg, and afterwards to Leyden, where Hemsterhuis procured him the situation of a tutor, and through his advice he published an edition of the Greek Lexicon of Timæus. He subsequently went to Paris, and in 1757 became assistant to Hemsterhuis at Leyden; and in 1761 he succeeded Oudendorp as professor of Latin and of history. He died much regretted in 1798. His chief works are an eulogium on his friend Hemsterhuis; an edition of Rutilius Lupus on Rhetoric; and of the history of Velleius Paterculus.

RIBADENEIRA, Peter, a Spanish jesuit of Toledo, elegant as a writer, but superstitious in the extreme. He studied at Paris and Padua, and was professor of rhetoric at Palermo. He died at Madrid 1611, aged 84. He was author of Lives of Saints, folio, 1616, of Ignatius Loyola, of Francis Borgia, of Lainez, and Salmeron, &c.—a treatise on the Schism of England—the Prince—and the Library of the Jesuits, 8vo.

RIBAS, Joseph de, a general officer in the Russian service, who was descended from a family of Spanish origin, but was born at Naples in 1735. He was banished from Italy on account of some intrigues in which he had engaged, and taking refuge at Leghorn he became acquainted with Alexis Orloff, who commanded a Russian fleet, which had been sent thither to carry off the natural daughter of the empress Elizabeth, whom prince Radziwill had taken to Rome and abandoned to a state of the utmost destitution. Ribas assisted Orloff in this undertaking, and then went to Russia to obtain from Catharine II. the reward of his services. He was placed as a military instructor in the corps of cadets at St. Petersburg; and he afterwards attended on his travels the son of the empress by Gregory Orloff. On his return to Russia he obtained a regiment of carabiners; and in 1790 he commanded, with the rank of admiral, the fleet destined for the attack of Kilia and Ismail, to the success of which he greatly contributed. He again signalized himself in 1791, and he was nominated one of the three commissioners to treat of peace with the Turks at the congress of Jassy. In December 1792 the empress made him a rear admiral, and shortly after gave him a pension of 20,000 rubles. He subsequently was appointed commandant of the projected port of Hagi Bey, on the Black Sea RICARD, Dominic, a native of Toulouse who settled at Paris, where he devoted himself to literature. Between 1783 and 1796, he translated the works of Plutarch in 17 vols. 12mo. in a manner elegant, correct, and faithful, and wrote the Sphere, a poem, in eight cantos, with learned and curious notes. This benevolent ecclesiastic died at Paris, January 1803, aged 63.

RICARDO, David, a celebrated writer on finance and statistics. He was of a Jewish family, and was born in London, April 12th, 1772. His father was a Dutch merchant; and the son being intended for the same profession, was sent to Holland for education. At an early age he offended his friends, by uniting himself in marriage with Miss Wilkinson, a quakeress, whose relations were equally displeased at the temerity of the young couple, who were thus, with few resources but their own industry, left unsupported on all sides. Mr. Ricardo, however, young as he was, had established among his father's connexions a character for probity, industry, and talent, which procured him immediate offers of assistance and support, of which he availed himself; and becoming a member of the Stock Exchange, he gradually accumulated immense property. In 1810 he first appeared before the public as a writer in the Morning Chronicle on the subject of the depreciation of the national currency; and he afterwards embodied his ideas in a distinct work, and defended his opinions against the animadversions to which they were subjected; and he had the satisfaction to see his reasonings adopted and confirmed in the Report of the Bullion Committee of the House of Commons. His most important production is his treatise on Political Economy and Taxation, which affords a luminous exposition of the origin and fluctuations of national wealth and expenditure, and which deserves to be ranked with the most celebrated productions on those subjects. In 1819 Mr. Ricardo obtained a seat in Parliament for the Irish borough of Portarlington. He died in 1823.

RICAUT or RYCAUT, sir Paul, an English writer, the tenth son of sir Peter Ricaut, knight. He travelled over Europe, Asia, and Africa, and in 1661, accompanied lord Winchelsea, the ambassador at the Ottoman court as secretary, and while there he wrote the Present State of the Ottoman Porte in three books, printed 1670, folio. He was afterwards consul at Smyrna for eleven years, and during his residence there wrote the State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, published 1679. In 1685, he went with lord Clarendon, the viceroy of Ireland, as secretary for the provinces of Leinster and Connaught, and he was, in 1688, knighted by James II. and made judge of the Irish court of admiralty. He went afterwards as resident for king William in the House towns, and after ten years absence returned to England in 1700, and died that same year. He wrote besides a Continuation of Knolles' History of the Turks, fol.—a Continuation of Platina's Lives of the Popes, fol.—Vegra's Commentaries of Peru translated, fol.—the Spanish Critic, 8vo.

RICCATI, Vincent, a jesuit, born at Castel Franco in the Trevisa. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna till the suppression of his order, after which he retired to his native town, where he died 1775, aged 68. He wrote some mathematical works, the best known of which is his treatise on the Integral Calculus, 3 vols. 4to.

RICCI, Matthew a jesuit, born at Macerata, 1552. He went to India, and after finishing his studies at Goa, he was sent as missionary to China. With difficulty he reached Pekin, where his mathematical knowledge recommended him to the notice of the emperor, for whom he formed a geographical map, in which out of flattery he placed China in the middle of the earth. He conducted himself with such address that he obtained leave to build a church at Pekin. He died there 1610, aged 58. He wrote Lettres Edifiantes—and Memoirs of China.

RICCI, Michael Angelo, a cardinal, born at Rome. He was an able mathematician, and was patronised by Innocent II. who raised him to the purple 1681. His treatise de Maximis and Minimis, is a valuable performance. He died 21st May, 1682, aged 63.

RICCI, Lawrence, a native of Florence, of illustrious birth. He embraced the order of the jesuits, which was suppressed while he was general. He was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo by pope Clement XIV. and obliged to write a circular letter to his order to announce their final suppression. He died in his confinement, 24th November, 1675, aged 72. He wrote a memoir which appeared after his death, in which he protested against the violence offered to the jesuits, and declared that they had committed nothing which deserved such harsh treatment.

RICCIOLI, John Baptista, an Italian astronomer, born at Ferrara, and educated among the jesuits, of whose society he became a member. He taught rhetoric and philosophy, at Parma and Bononia, but chiefly devoted himself to mathematics and astronomy, and died 1671, aged 73. His best known works are, Geographiæ, and Hydrographiæ, lib. 12, 1672.—Chronologia Reformata, fol.—Astronomia Vetus, 2 vols. fol.—Astronomia Reformata, fol.

RICCOBONI, Lewis, a native of Modena, who distinguished himself on the Italian theatre, and in 1716, came to France with his wife and his son, where he acquired equal celebrity. He abandoned the stage in 1729, in consequence of religious scruples, and died 1753, aged 79. He wrote several comedies, some of which were received with great applause, Thoughts on Declamation—Discourse on the Reformation of the Theatre, 12mo.—Observations on Comedy, and on Moliere's Genius—History of the Italian Theatre, 8vo.—Reflections on the Theatres of Europe, 8vo. His second wife Mary Laboras de Mezieres was a native of Paris, who acquired reputation as an actress in the Italian theatre, which she quitted 1761. She was a woman of great sensibility, elegant taste, and vast information. She wrote several romances, which possess merit, besides letters and other miscellanies. She died in great distress 6th December, 1792, aged 68. His son Antony Francis, by his first wife, was born at Mantua. He was on the stage in the Italian theatre at Paris, from 1726 to 1750, and played with success. He wrote some pieces, some of which are still in MS. but his Art du Theatre in 8vo. 1750, possesses great merit, and is still read with satisfaction. He died 15th May, 1772, aged 65.

RICE, John H. D.D. an eminent Presbyterian clergyman of Virginia, who died September 3d, 1831, aged 52. He was professor in the Union theological school of state, established in 1824. He was also for some years editor of the Virginia Evangelical and Literary magazine. And he published memoirs of S. Davies; an Illustration of the Presbyterian church in Virginia; and a Discourse before the foreign Board of Missions.

RICH, Claudius John, a learned writer, was born in 1776, and at the age of 17, became resident of the East India Company at Bagdad; for which situation he was indebted solely to his merit and literary attainments. His researches into the antiquities of the East were extensive. He wrote Memoirs of Ancient Babylon. He died at Shiraz, in 1821.

RICHARD I. king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, succeeded his father Henry II. 1189. The beginning of his reign was disgraced by the massacre of the Jews, and by the plunder of their property, not only in London, where their appearance at the coronation had excited the indignation of the populace, but at York and other places. In 1190, Richard, instead of establishing order and tranquillity in his dominions, set sail with Philip Augustus of France for the Holy Land. Though, however, dissension between these monarchs partly defeated the purpose of the enterprise, and caused the return of Philip to France, Richard led his army against the infidels, defeated Saladin in a battle at Cæsarea, and then concluding a truce with him, embarked for Europe. In his return he was shipwrecked on the Venetian shores, and as he passed in disguise through Germany, he was seized by Leopold duke of Austria, and delivered to the emperor Henry VI. and cruelly doomed to the horrors of captivity. His retreat was discovered by the fidelity of his friend Blondel, and by the eager loyalty of his subjects, and for a large ransom he was restored to liberty and landed at Sandwich 1194. To give greater dignity to his return, he was crowned a second time, and soon after marched against Philip Augustus, who had not only excited John against his absent brother, but had seized part of his continental dominions in Normandy. Though a peace was made in 1196, Richard three years after renewed the war and while besieging Chalus in the Limousin, he received a mortal wound from an arrow. He died 6th April 1199, aged 42. Though brave, Richard was haughty and avaricious, and it was said of him that he would have sold even London, if he could have found a purchaser.

RICHARD II. son of Edward prince of Wales, succeeded his grandfather Edward III. on the English throne 1377. The severity of some taxes imposed by the parliament, raised discontent among the people, and an armed multitude, headed by Wat Tyler, appeared in Smithfield in defiance of the government. Richard, though but 15, boldly rode up to meet the insurgents, and when the lord mayor, Walworth, who attended him, had with the blow of his mace struck dead the chief of the rebels, the young king called out to the multitude, who prepared by acts of violence to avenge the death of their leader, "what, my lieges, will you kill your king? follow me, I will be your leader." The appeal was successful, and the people returned to their duty; but though their grievances were redressed after the punishment of a few violent leaders, still by degrees acts of oppression were permitted to prevail. Afterwards Richard made war against France and Scotland, but his administration revolted some of the nobles, and at last Henry duke of Lancaster, his cousin, offended with the tyranny of his conduct, took up arms against him. The king, abandoned by his subjects, threw himself on the mercy of his victorious enemy, and begged only for life and a pension. He was afterwards deposed by the parliament, and on the breaking out of an insurrection in his favor, eight murderers entered his apartments at Pontefract castle, determined to take away his life. The unhappy man wrested a battle axe from one of the assassins, and after laying four dead at his feet, perished by the repeated blows of the others, 1400.

RICHARD III. duke of Gloucester, and brother of Edward IV. was a monster of iniquity. He caused his infant nephews Edward V. and Richard duke of York to be murdered in the Tower, and then procured his own nomination to the crown, 1409. Soon after he had to defend himself against Buckingham, who had supported him in his crimes; but he triumphed and beheaded his enemy. He was less fortunate against Henry, earl of Richmond, who had invaded the kingdom. The rival armies met in Bosworth field, and after performing prodigies of valor, Richard fell, covered with wounds, and left his victorious antagonist in possession of the throne, 22d August 1485. Though a tyrant and a hypocrite he possessed great courage, and for firmness of mind had few equals.

RICHARD I., surnamed the Fearless, succeeded his father William as duke of Normandy, 942. His territories were invaded by Louis IV. of France, and by Otho of Germany; but his rights were defended by the valor of his subjects, and the aid of the king of Denmark and the count of Paris. He died at Fecamp 996, aged 64.

RICHARDS, James, missionary in Ceylon, was born at Abington, Massachusetts, February 23d, 1734, and graduated at William's college in 1809. He studied theology at the seminary at Andover, Massachusetts, and medicine at the medical school in Philadelphia. He was one of the mission sent by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to Ceylon, and embarked for that island in October, 1815. Soon after his arrival there he was seized with a pulmonary complaint, which suspended his labors as a missionary, and at length terminated in his death on the 3d of August, 1822.

RICHARDSON, John, a native of Cheshire, educated at Oxford, and afterwards incorporated at Dublin. He became bishop of Ardagh, in Ireland; but left the country during the rebellion, and came to London. He died 1654. He is author of Observations on Ezekiel, &c. fol.

RICHARDSON, Samuel, an eminent English novel writer born 1689. In 1706, he was bound apprentice to Mr. Wilde, of Stationers' hall, and afterwards he worked as compositor, and corrector of the press, till, on taking his freedom, he hired a house in one of the courts of Fleet street, from which he removed to Salisbury square. He was in 1723, engaged with the duke of Wharton, in the publication of the True Briton; but as the work was violently severe against the government, he stopped at the sixth number. He next was concerned with the Daily Journal, and afterwards with the Daily Gazetteer, and at last, by the friendship of Onslow, the speaker, he obtained the lucrative office of printer of the Journals of the house of commons. In 1754, he was elected master of the company of Stationers, and in 1760, he purchased a moiety of the patent of law printer to the king, which he conducted with Miss Lintot, afterwards the wife of sir H. Fletcher. In 1740, he appeared before the public as the author of Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded, a novel, which was universally read, and universally approved; and afterwards he produced Clarissa Harlowe, and then Sir Charles Grandison. These works were particularly popular, and the author was every where regarded as a man of the most virtuous sentiments, of the most amiable modesty, and possessed of the most dignified powers of the imagination. By the creative faculties of his mind, Richardson thus raised himself to celebrity and opulence; but his elevation was still adorned by all the humble virtues which rejoice in the opportunity of doing good, and of disseminating blessings wherever human nature is capable of improvement. Sedulous in business, he acquired property and independence; but in the midst of the consequence of wealth, and the flattery of admiring friends, he was the kind master and the hospitable friend, and never forgot to add exemplary conduct to religious appearances, and sincere devotion to pious exhortations. This worthy and amiable man, who was honored with the friendship, or favorable good opinion of every person of talents, of virtue, and of rank, in his time, was afflicted in the last part of life with a paralytic disorder, which proved fatal, 4th July 1761, in his 72d year. Besides his excellent novels, he published a volume of familiar letters, for the use of young people—Æsop's fables, with reflections—a paper, No. 97, in the Rambler—Negotiation of sir Thomas Roe, ambassador to the Porte.

RICHARDSON, William, a Scotch poet and miscellaneous writer, a son of the minister of Aberfoyle, became a student at Glasgow, in 1758; accompanied Lord Cathcart, who had been his pupil, to Russia; was for more than forty years professor of humanity at Glasgow; and died in 1814. Among his works, all of which are marked by elegance and learning, are Anecdotes of the Russian Empire; Essays on Shakspeare's Dramatic Characters; Poems; and Dramas.

RICHELET, Cæsar Peter, a French writer, born at Cheminon, in Champagne. He was the author of an useful dictionary of the French language, full, however, of satirical reflections and obscenities, in 4to. Geneva, afterwards enlarged to two vols. fol. 1721, Lyons, and again 3 vols. fol. Lyons, 1755. He also translated Vega's Conquest of Florida, and wrote a dictionary of Rhimes, and other critical works. He died 1693.

RICHELIEU, Armand du Plessis de, a celebrated statesman in France, born of noble parentage at the castle of Richelieu, 5th September, 1585. He studied at the Sorbonne, and at Rome, and in 1607 was made bishop of Lucon. On his return to Paris, he became the favorite of Mary de Medicis, to whom he was appointed almoner, and he soon was made secretary of state. The death of marshal d'Ancre, however, his friend and protector, checked his ambition, and he retired with the queen mother to Blois; but soon again to be restored to favor. By intrigue he effected a reconciliation between the queen and her son Louis XIII. and in 1624 he was placed in the difficult office of prime minister of France, and afterwards of superintendent of navigation and commerce. Naturally bold, and fond of war, the new minister, who had been raised to the dignity of cardinal, determined to reduce Rochelle, whose protection of the protestants was offensive to the nation, and whose independence and naval power seemed a disgrace to the greatness of France. After a vigorous siege, during a year, Rochelle opened her gates to the conqueror, 23th Oct. 1628, and proud of his conquest, the minister advanced to the subjugation of the protestants in other parts of the kingdom. He next attacked Savoy, and after taking Pignerol and Casal, he returned to Paris, to conquer the intrigues of his enemies, and to restore himself to the undisputed favor of the king. By his power, Gaston, the king's brother, was banished, and Mary de Medicis, the queen, to whom he owed his elevation, was sent to end her life in melancholy exile at Cologne, and while all France was submissively obedient to his nod, the neighboring kingdoms were, by his intrigues, torn by dissensions, secretly agitated by fears, or openly threatened by insurrections. Yet while engaged in establishing his own power, he did not forget to consolidate the prosperity of the people; and while he persecuted, and cruelly punished his enemies and his rivals, he did not neglect the glory of France. He erected the French academy, rebuilt the Sorbonne, founded the royal print ing house; and established the botanical garden, with a munificence worthy not merely the minister, but the monarch of a great kingdom. He was liberal in his patronage to men of letters; but as he had a poetical turn, he was unfortunately jealous of the celebrity of the Cid of Corneille, and employed some of the literary hirelings of the court to depreciate the merits of the immortal bard. He died 4th December 1642, aged 59. In his character Richelieu united all the abilities, and the ambition of a great man, but little of the virtues of a good man; and while he patronised the arts and sciences, and extended protection to literature and industry, it might proceed not from the motives of a generous mind, but the ostentatious wish of being surrounded by men whose works and gratitude can confer immortality. Besides the dignity of cardinal conferred on him by Gregory XV. he was created duke and peer of France, and enjoyed all the favors which the partiality of the king, and the adulation of the nation could bestow on him. He wrote Political Testament, 2 vols. 8vo.—Methods of Controversies concerning Points of Faith—Defence of the Catholic Faith—Christian Instruction—Perfection of a Christian—a Curious Journal—letters, and relations. His life has been written by J. Le Clerc, 5 vols. 12mo. 1753.

RICHELIEU, Louis Francis Armand du PLESSIS, duke of, a French marshal, descended from the brother of the cardinal, was born in 1696, and died in 1788. He was an odd compound of scoundrel and hero; in which admirable mixture the first ingredient bore a large proportion. He distinguished himself under Villars, and afterwards at Kehl, Philippsburgh, Dettingen, and Fontenoy; and reduced Minorca. He compelled the duke of Cumberland to capitulate at Closter Seven, after which he pillaged the electorate of Hanover in the most infamous manner. On more than one occasion he proved himself an able ambassador. The rest of his life was spent in open defiance of all the laws of morality.

RICHELIEU, Armand Emanuel du PLESSIS, duke of, a French statesman, grandson of the foregoing, was born, in 1766, at Paris. He emigrated at the commencement of the revolution; entered the Russian service; and distinguished himself at the siege of Ismael. After having fought for a while under the banners of the prince of Condé, he went back to Russia, and was appointed governor of Odessa. By his prudent measures he raised that city from insignificance to the height of prosperity. The restoration of the Bourbons enabled him to return to France, and in 1815 and 1820 he held the office of prime minister. He died in 1822, respected for his disinterestedness and his good intentions.

RICHER, Edmund, a native of Chaource, in Langres. He possessed great powers of mind, and a lively imagination, and he embraced with unusual ardor, the party of the League, whose conduct he ably defended with his pen. He took his degrees in theology at Paris, and in 1611, wrote against the Dominicans, and asserted the superiority of general councils over the pope. This drew upon him the censures of the pope's legate, though he was defended by the parliament of Paris, and at last he was dismissed from the office of syndic in the university, and afterwards imprisoned, and obliged by the virulence of his enemies, to make a public recantation of his opinions. These proceedings injured his constitution, and hastened his death, which happened 23th November 1631, aged 72. His other works are Vindiciæ Doctrinæ Majorum de Auctoritate Ecclesiæ in Rebus Fidei and Morum 4to.—de Protestate Ecclesiæ in Rebus Temporalibus, 4to.

—History of General Councils, three vols. 4to.—Obstetrix Animorum, 4to.

RICHER, Henry, a native of Longueil, in Caux. He was intended for the law; but he preferred literature, and settled at Paris, where he died 12th March, 1749, aged 63. He translated into verse Virgil's Eclogues—a Collection of Fables—Life of Mæcenas, with notes—Sabinus and Coriolanus, two tragedies.

RICHER, N. a French philosopher, who first observed the shortening of the pendulum, while at Cayenne, 1672. This singular discovery, in the hands of Newton and Huygens, led to the most astonishing truths.

RICIMER, a Roman patrician, who acquired such power as a general, that he put down the emperors, and introduced revolutions into the state, as he pleased. He put to death Majorian, and raised to the throne in his room, Libius Severus, 461, and he afterwards bravely repelled the Vandals of Africa, who attacked the dominions of his master. After the death of Severus, Anthemius was made emperor, and Ricimer married his daughter, but soon after dethroned him.

RICIUS, Paul, a converted Jew, professor of philosophy at Pavia. He was afterwards physician to the emperor Maximilian, and was highly esteemed by Erasmus, and other learned men. He had a controversy with Ecceius, and supported that the celestial bodies are animated. His works are, De Cœlesti Agriculturâ, fol.—Talmudica Commentariola, 4to.—De LXXIII. Mosaicæ Sanctionis Edictis, 4to.

RICOBONI, Antony, a learned native of Rovigo. He was professor of eloquence at Padua, and died there, 1599, aged 58. He wrote in elegant Latin, Historical Commentaries—treatise on Rhetoric, 8vo.—History of Padua university—Commentaries on Aristotle's and Cicero's Works.

RIDER, William, author of a History of England—a Commentary on the Bible—and other popular works, was lecturer of St. Vedast, Fosterlane, and for several years under-master of St. Paul's school. He died 1785.

RIDLEY, Nicolas, an eminent bishop and martyr, born of an ancient family in Tynedale, Northumberland, 1500. He was educated at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. His abilities were such that he was invited to University college, Oxford, but declined the liberal offer, and went for three years to travel on the continent. On his return to Cambridge, he distinguished himself by his application, and by his zeal in favor of the reformation. By the friendship of his patron Crammer, he obtained the vicarage of Herne in Kent, and afterwards was chosen master of Pembroke hall, and nominated chaplain to the king. During the royal visitation in the north of the kingdom, he attended the visitors and preached to the people, and explained with eloquence and ability the true principles of religion. In 1547, he was appointed bishop of Rochester, and three years after, on Bonner's expulsion from the see of London, he was placed in his room, where he behaved with tenderness and affectionate attention to the mother and relatives of his predecessor. He was very instrumental in settling the articles of religion, the liturgy, and the homilies, and by his influence with the king, he procured the establishment of those noble foundations, Christ's hospital, St. Thomas's, Southwark, St. Bartholomew's, and Bridewell. The share which he bore in the labors of the reformation, marked him as an object of hatred under Mary, and particularly the zeal with which he embraced the cause of the unfortunate Jane Grey. He was ordered to dispute on theological subjects at Oxford with some popish bishops; and when he refused to recant the principles which he had advanced, he was cruelly sentenced to the stake. He suffered this inhuman treatment with great resignation, and was burnt near the corner of Baliol college, with his friend, the venerable Latimer, 1555. He was author of a treatise against transubstantiation, and some of his letters and sermons were afterwards published.

RIDLEY, Thomas, a native of Ely, of the same family as the preceding. He received his education at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and then applied himself to the study of the civil law. His abilities recommended him to the court; he was knighted, made master in chancery, and afterwards vicar general to the archbishop of Canterbury. He was author of a View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law, and died 1626.

RIDLEY, Gloster, LL.D., an eminent divine, born at sea, in 1702, in the Gloster Indianan, from which circumstance he received his christian name. He was educated at Winchester school, and became fellow of New college, Oxford. He had a great partiality for the stage in his younger years, and wrote with some friends, a tragedy, in four acts, and to this partiality may be attributed the eloquence and graceful delivery which he displayed in the pulpit. He obtained the living of Westow, Norfolk, and the donative of Poplar in Middlesex; and after some years spent in the peaceful obscurity of a country curacy, he was at last, in 1768, in consequence of his able labors, presented to a golden prebend in Salisbury, by archbishop Secker. He died 3d November, 1774, and had his virtues recorded in an epitaph by the learned Dr. Lowth. He published the Life of bishop Ridley, from whom he was descended—Sermons at lady Moyer's Lectures—Melampus, a poem—two tragedies, never printed—Review of Philip's Life of cardinal Pole—and Psyche, a poem. His son James was author of the Tales of the Genii, 2 vols., a book much admired—and James Lovegrove, a novel. He was minister of Romford, Essex, and had been educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford.

RIDPATH, George, a native of Stirlingshire, educated at Edinburgh. For his attachment to protestantism, and for boldly opposing the second James in his religious innovations, he fled from Scotland; but afterwards returned at the revolution, and was one of the clerks of session. He died 1717, aged 54. He translated Craig's Scotland's Sovereignty.

RIEDESEL, John Herman, baron de, a learned German, author of Travels in Greece. He was in the service of the Prussian court, and resided as ambassador at Vienna, where he died 1785, aged forty-five.

RIENZI, Nicolas Gabrini de, a remarkable character in the 14th century, who, though but the son of a miller, or a common vintner at Rome, raised himself to the sovereign power. By education and labor he polished and improved a mind, naturally strong, fervent, and ambitious, and in reading the historians of ancient Rome, he flattered himself that he should one day restore the glories and the liberties of his country. Inveighing with bitterness against the debaucheries of the great, and painting, in the most striking colors, the ancient glories and the present decay of Rome, he persuaded his friends and followers that he was able to restore their country to its former dignity. Surrounded by those who were necessary to his views, he ascended the capitol, and after haranguing the people with the permission of the papal vicar, he raised up the ensigns of liberty, and promised to the Romans that he would reward their obedience to the laws by the grandeur and the powerful influence of their forefathers. Declared sovereign of Rome, he had the address to obtain the pope's approbation to his measures, and to conciliate his protection; but though he for a while commanded the respect of the Romans, envy attended him, and enemies arose, determined to effect his downfall. While he reprobated the conduct of the nobles, he himself was guilty of excesses, and the obscure plebeian, raised to sovereignty, not only feasted with all the luxury of the monarch, but acted frequently in a capricious and oppressive manner. After enjoying absolute power for six months, under the title of tribune of Rome, he was forced to fly by the nobles, and being seized by his enemies, was sent to the pope at Avignon, and thrown into a dungeon. Innocent VI., the successor of Clement, knew, however, the influence of his prisoner, and he drew him from his confinement, where he had pined away three years, and sent him to Rome, with the title of governor and senator, hoping that by his gratitude he might defeat the schemes and insurrections of those petty tyrants who harassed and distracted the state. Rienzi again raised himself, over the opposition of his enemies, to power; but success again made him violent and resentful, and four months after his second elevation, during a tumult excited by some conspirators, a dagger was aimed at his heart, which deprived him of life, 8th October, 1354. Petrarch, who witnessed his elevation, speaks with raptures of his conduct, and recalling to mind the splendid achievements of Rome, compares him to the immortal Brutus.

RIGALTIIUS, Nicolas, an ingenious Frenchman, born at Paris, 1577. He was brought up by the jesuits, and applied himself to the law, which, however, he soon relinquished for polite literature. He soon recommended himself to the notice of the learned, particularly Thuanus, and he was appointed king's librarian, after the departure of Isaac Casaubon to reside in England. He was also made by the king procureur-general of the court of Nancy, and counsellor of the parliament of Metz. He died 1654. His works are, excellent editions of Cyprian, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix, with valuable notes—Continuation of Thuanus' History—de Verbis in Novellis Constitutionibus post Justinianum Glossarium, 4to. Diatribe de Juvenalis Satira—Fusus Parasyticum—Auctores Finium Regundorum—and de Modo Fœnori Proposito.

RINUCCINI, Octavio, an Italian poet, born at Florence. He went to France in the retinue of Mary de Medicis, and was said to be the inventor of the opera, which, however, some attribute to Emilio del Cavabero, of Rome. His poetry, as well as his operas, are highly and deservedly admired. He died 1621, at Florence, where his works were published.

RIOLAN, John, a physician at Paris, born at Amiens. He defended the doctrine of Hippocrates against the modern chemists, and wrote various works on anatomy and medicine, printed together, Paris, 1610, fol. He was a man of great erudition, and died 18th October, 1605. His son John was also a physician of eminence, and professor of anatomy and botany. He wrote Comparatio Veteris Medicinæ cum Novâ, 12mo.—Schola Anatomica, 8vo.—reprinted in folio, with additions—Gigantomachia, 8vo., in consequence of the pretended discovery of the skeleton of a giant—Gigantologia, 8vo.

RIPAULT, Louis Madelin, a learned antiquary and philologer, who was born at Orleans, in 1775.

He was educated for the church, and at the age of fifteen, he obtained a benefice, but at the revolution, he quitted his profession, and settled at Paris, as a bookseller and public writer. He became one of the conductors of the Gazette de France, and afterwards, joining the expedition of Buonaparte to Egypt, he was made librarian to the Egyptian Institute, and also librarian to Buonaparte. The latter situation he resigned in 1807, and retiring to the neighborhood of Orleans, died there, in 1823. He published Description abrégée des principaux Monumens de la Haute Egypte, 1806, 8vo.—Histoire Philosophique de l'Empereur Marc-Antoine, 1820, 4 vols. 8vo.—and an abridgment of the last mentioned work; besides which he left a quantity of manuscripts relating to hieroglyphics, and the Eastern languages.

RIPPERDA, John William, baron de, a native of Groningen, of illustrious family, who, after serving the States General as colonel of infantry, was sent as ambassador to Spain. His conduct was so pleasing to Philip V., that he settled at Madrid, and was employed on affairs of importance, and was created a duke and peer of the kingdom, and intrusted with the departments of marine, war, and finance. These offices were too high for his abilities, and he was disgraced, and afterwards sent to the prison of Segovia; but he escaped to Portugal, and after passing through England, he landed in Holland, where he was persuaded by the ambassador of Morocco, to go and settle in Africa. At Morocco, he became a great favorite with the emperor, and professed the religion of Mahomet. To render himself still more popular, and to acquire authority, he pretended to establish a religion which embraced all the tenets of the Christian, Judaic, and Mahometan doctrines; but these measures at last created him enemies, and he fled from Morocco to Tetuan, where he died, November, 1747. His two sons were drowned in coming from Spain to England.

RISBECK, Gaspard, a German writer, born near Mayence. An ardent imagination and the love of independence hurried him into extravagance, and at last, while he despised all political and civil employments, he found himself poor and without resources. He then entered into the service of a bookseller, and afterwards travelled, and then settled at Zurich, and next at Aran, where he died, 3d February, 1736, aged 36, a victim to melancholy and affected misanthropy. He wrote Travels through Germany—and an History of Germany.

RITSON, Joseph, a native of Stockton on Tees, who became a conveyancer in Gray's inn, and afterwards purchased the office of high bailiff of the Savoy, in 1735. He studied antiquities, and published observations on Shakspeare's editions by Johnson and Stephens—Criticisms on Malone's edition—Descent of the English Crown—Observations on Warton's History of English Poetry—English Anthology—Collection of English Songs, 3 vols.—and of Scotch Songs, 2 vols.—Bibliographia Poetica—Metrical Romances, 3 vols.—Treatise on Abstinence from Animal Food, &c. Though a man of learning and information, he adopted a most singular and capricious form of orthography, and in his temper was violent and overbearing. He died 1803, aged 51.

RITTENHOUSE, David, LL.D., a celebrated mathematician, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1732. During his early life, he was employed in agriculture, but as his constitution was feeble, he became a clock and mathematical instrument maker. In 1770 he removed to Philadelphia, and practised his trade. He was elected a member, and for some time president, of the philosophical society; and one of the commissioners employed to determine the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Virginia, and between New York and Massachusetts. He was treasurer of Pennsylvania from 1777 to 1789, and from 1792 to 1795, director of the United States mint. His death took place in 1796. His mathematical talents were of the highest order.

RITTERSHUSIUS, Conradus, a learned civilian, born at Brunswick, September 25th, 1560. He studied at Helmstadt, and afterwards became professor of law at Altorf, where he continued to reside till his death, 1613, though he had the most liberal invitations from German and Dutch universities. He edited Oppian's Cynegeticon, and some other works. His son George wrote the life of his father, and his son Nicolas was afterwards professor of law at Altorf, and published Genealogiæ Imperatorum, Regum, Ducum, Comitum, &c., 7 vols. folio. He died 1670.

RIVARD, Francis, a native of Neufchateau in Lorraine, eminently known as a mathematical professor at Beauvais. He published several valuable treatises on geometry, &c. and died at Paris, 5th April 1778, aged 81.—Another of his name, Denis, was an eminent surgeon at Neufchateau, and very skilful in cutting for the stone. He died 17th March, 1746.

RIVAROL, Anthony de, a French writer, born at Bagnols in Languedoc, 17th April, 1757. He settled at Paris, and became the friend of the learned, of Voltaire, d'Alembert, and Buffon. On the breaking out of the revolution, he retired to Germany, and lived for some time at Hamburgh and at Berlin, where he was honored by the notice of the royal family, and where he died 11th April 1801. He was a man of great information and some genius. He published the Universality of the French Language, which obtained the prize of the Berlin academy, 1784—Hell, translated from Dante—Letters on Religion and Morality—a little Almanack of great Men, a satire—Letters to the French Nobility, 1792, 8vo.—La Fayette's Political Life—Prospectus of a New Dictionary of the French Language—a Discourse on the Intellectual and Moral Faculties of Man, 4to.—poems. His life was published in 1802, 2 vols. 12mo.

RIVINUS, Andrew, a native of Hall in Saxony, whose real name was Barchmann. He was a physician, and became a professor of poetry and philosophy at Leipsic, and died 4th April 1656, aged 56. His works are, Remarks on Ancient Christian Poets—Dissertations on Literary subjects, published under the title of Philo-Physiologica, 4to.—Veterum Scriptorum de Medicinâ Collectanea, 8vo.—Mysteria Medico-Physica, 12mo.

RIVINUS, Augustus Quirinus, a professor of medicine at Leipsic, who died there 1722, aged 70, respected as an able practitioner and botanist. He wrote Introductio in Rem Herbariam, folio, with plates—Ordo Plantarum quæ sunt Flore Irregulari monopetalo, tetrapetalo, pentapetalo, folio, with figures—Censura Medicamentorum Officiali, 4to.—Dissertationes Medicæ, 4to. Manuductio ad Chymiam Pharmaceuticam, 8vo.—Notitia Morborum.

ROBBINS, Chandler, D.D., was born at Branford Connecticut, August 24, 1738, and graduated at Yale college in 1757. In 1760 he was ordained at Plymouth Massachusetts, where he remained till his death, June 30, 1799, aged 60 years. In his private and social life he was exemplary and amiable; and, as a man of talents and learning he had a reputable standing in his profession. He published several occasional sermons and other small works. Among the former was an election sermon, 1791;

a Sermon on the landing of our forefathers, 1794 ; and, a Sermon before the humane society, 1796.

ROBERT, king of France, surnamed the Wise or the Devout, succeeded his father Hugh Capet, 996. He married Bertha, daughter of Conrad, king of Burgundy ; but as she was his cousin, this union was annulled by the pope, Gregory V. and the monarch afterwards took for his second wife Constance, daughter of the count of Arles and Provence. He refused the crown of the empire and of Italy, better satisfied to reign over his native dominions, where he labored earnestly for the happiness of his people. He died at Melun, 20th July 1031, aged 60, much respected.

ROBERT of France, count d'Artois, brother of St. Louis, refused the empire of Germany offered to his ambition by pope Gregory IX. and he accompanied his brother to the Holy Land. He behaved with great valor at the battle of Massourah, 9th February 1250 ; but being too eager in pursuit of the flying enemy, he was attacked with stones, and perished.

ROBERT of Anjou, succeeded his father, Charles the Lame, on the throne of Naples, 1309. He supported the papal power against the encroachments of the emperors, and died 19th January 1343, aged 64, universally respected by his subjects and by foreign nations.

ROBERT the Magnificent, duke of Normandy, succeeded his brother Richard, 1023. In 1035 he undertook a pilgrimage on foot to the Holy Land, and on his return was poisoned at Nicæa in Bithynia. He was succeeded by his natural son William, better known as the Conqueror.

ROBERT, surnamed Short Shanks, was son of William the Conqueror, and obtained for his inheritance the dukedom of Normandy. He was in the holy wars, where he behaved with great valor ; but on his return, he found himself stripped of the throne of England, which belonged to him, and afterwards he lost Normandy, and being made prisoner by his brother Henry, remained in long and cruel captivity till his death in 1134.

ROBERT Bruce, a Scotch nobleman, who disputed the crown with John Baliol. The influence of Edward I. of England, prevailed in favor of his rival ; but after his deposition, though watched by the English, he escaped from retirement, and appearing in the midst of his countrymen, he was unanimously elected king. He maintained his elevation by valor, and defeated the English at the famous battle of Bannockburn, 1314. Peace was afterwards re-established between the two kingdoms, and Robert devoted himself to advance the happiness and the prosperity of his subjects. He died 1299, and desired that his heart might be conveyed to Jerusalem, and buried in the holy sepulchre. He was succeeded by David II.

ROBERTS, Barré Charles, was the son of Edward Roberts, esq. deputy clerk of the pells of the exchequer, and born in Westminster, March 13, 1789. He was educated first at Chiswick, and next under Mr. Goodenough at Ealing, where he remained six years, during which he became an excellent classical scholar. His favorite study, however, was history ; in his application to which he became particularly partial to numismatics ; on which subject he wrote several articles in the Gentleman's Magazine. In 1805 he went to Christ church, Oxford, where he obtained a studentship, and took his first degree ; but died of a consumption, January 1st, 1810. In 1814 his Letters of Miscellaneous Papers were printed, with a memoir in quarto.

ROBERTS, Peter, a learned divine, was born in North Wales, and educated at Trinity-college, Dublin, where he took the degree of master of arts. On entering into orders he was presented by the bishop of St. Asaph to the rectory of Halkin, in the county of Flint, where he died in 1819. His works are—1. Observations on the Principles of Christian Morality. 2. Christianity vindicated against Volney. 3. Harmony of the Epistles. 4. Sketch of the early History of the Cymri, or ancient Britons. 5. View of the Policy of the Church of Rome. 6. Chronicle of the Kings of Britain. 7. Cambrian Popular Antiquities.

ROBERTSON, William, D.D., an eminent divine, born in Dublin, 16th October 1705. From Dublin he went to Glasgow university where he distinguished himself as a zealous defender of the rights of the students to elect their rector, in which cause after much trouble and great obloquy, he at last succeeded. His conduct on this occasion recommended him to the notice of lord King, bishop Hoadly, and other leading characters, and he afterwards took orders and went to settle in Ireland, as rector of Ravilly in the county of Carlow. Other preferments followed, and he acquired some distinction among the clergy by freeing his parishioners from tithes, and by defending in pamphlets his conduct. Thus popular, and in the way of procuring higher ecclesiastical honors, he happened to read Free and Candid Disquisitions, which totally changed his ideas with respect to his profession, and at last induced him in 1764 to resign all his preferments. About 1766 he returned to London, and was complimented in consequence of his Apology of his Faith and Conduct, by his alma mater of Glasgow, with the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1768 he was appointed by the company of Merchant Taylors, master of Woolverhampton free school. He died there 20th May, 1783, and was buried in the church yard of the new church.

ROBERTSON, Joseph, a native of Knipe, Westmoreland, educated at Appleby school, which he quitted in 1746 to enter at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. When in orders he obtained Herriard vicarage, Hants, and in 1770 was presented to Sutton rectory in Essex, and nine years after to Horncastle vicarage in Lincolnshire. He possessed eminent literary talents, and from 1764 to 1785, supported by his able criticisms the character of the Critical Review. He was also author of a small volume called Introduction to the study of Polite literature, 1782, and in 1785 he published his valuable essay on Punctuation, and three years after his dissertation on the Parian Chronicle, which excited some controversy. His translation of Telemachus with the author's life, and learned notes appeared in 1795, and in 1793, an Essay on the Education of Young Ladies. His Essay on the Nature of English verse was published 1799, and he died 1802.

ROBERTSON, William D.D., a celebrated historian born in Scotland 1721. He was educated at Edinburgh university, and from his earliest years evinced the most laudable application, and the strongest wishes of distinguishing himself in literature. His first and greatest work, the History of Charles V. was followed by the History of Scotland, in which he labored earnestly to vindicate the character of the unfortunate Mary. His next work was the History of America, which is unfinished, and afterwards he published a disquisition concerning India. These popular compositions did not pass to the perusal of the public unrewarded. The author was made principal of the university of Edinburgh, historiographer to the king for Scotland, one of his majesty's chaplains for Scotland, and one of the ministers of the Old Grey-friars church, Edinburgh, and he might have risen to higher honors, if he had been willing to remove from Scotland into the English church. As a preacher, zealous, active, and pious, he acquired no less fame than as an elegant, well informed and luminous historian. His learning and abilities have conferred immortal honor, not only on the university over which he presided with such dignity, but on the whole kingdom; and the History of Charles V. will be read to the latest times with increasing approbation. This worthy man left two sons and three daughters, and died universally, and most deservedly, esteemed, at Grange-house, Edinburgh, June, 1793. His works have passed through several editions. He published besides a sermon before the Scotch society for promoting christian knowledge.

ROBERTSON, Abraham, Savilian professor of astronomy, and superintendent of the Radcliffe Observatory at Oxford. He was born at Dunse in Berwickshire, in 1751, and receiving some education in the country, at the age of twenty-four he removed to London. Being disappointed in his expectations of procuring a situation in the East Indies, he went to Oxford, and through the patronage of professor Smith and others, he obtained admission into Christ church college. Subsequently taking orders, he was made one of the chaplains of Christ church; and in 1789 he was presented to the collegiate benefice of Ravensthorpe, near Northampton. In 1792 he superintended the printing of Torelli's edition of Archimedes at Oxford; and the same year he published a work entitled Sectionum Conicarum Libri VII. In 1795 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society; and contributed some valuable papers to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1797 he succeeded Dr. Smith as Savilian professor of geometry; in 1807 he took the degree of D. D.; and in 1810 having succeeded Dr. Hornsby at the Radcliffe Observatory, he exchanged the geometrical chair for that of astronomy. His death took place at Oxford, December 4th, 1826. He was the author of a treatise on the Elements of Conic Sections; and he published the second volume of Bradley's Astronomical Observations, besides other works.

ROBERVAL, Giles Personne, sieur de, author of a treatise on Mechanics, inserted in the Harmony of father Mersennus, and of an edition of Aristarchus Samius, was a native of Roberval in Beauvais. He was professor of mathematics at Paris, and in his philosophical inquiries had some disputes with Descartes. He died 27th October, 1675, aged seventy-three.

ROBESPIERRE, Maximilian Isidore, a sanguinary demagogue during the French revolution. He was born at Arras of poor parents, 1759, and was educated at the expense of the bishop of the diocese. After studying at Paris he applied himself to the law, and in 1784 obtained the prize of the academy of Metz, by his discourse on the disgrace which attends the relations of criminals. At the meeting of the constituent assembly he obtained a seat, and began now to distinguish himself more by the originality of his observations, than his eloquence. Though not visibly engaged in the atrocious scenes of the 20th of June, of the 10th of August, and of September, he was anxious to reap the fruit of those bloody transactions, and when admitted into the convention he artfully employed his influence, and the darkest intrigues to render his opponents unpopular, and to lead them to the scaffold. With the criminal wish of being declared dictator, he hastened the destruction of the unfortunate Louis, and persecuted his innocent family, and after making Danton, Hebert, and others, the guilty ministers of his atrocious deeds, he prevailed upon the intimidated convention to send them to the guillotine. France was now filled with denunciations, in every province, and in every town tribunals were erected, which condemned alike the innocent and the guilty, and no man could with safety, intrust his secrets, or his life into the hands of his parent, his neighbor, or his friend. Suspicious, timid, and irresolute, the tyrant yet had sufficient art to interpret the machinations formed against his power as treason against the republic, and to sacrifice his personal enemies, and his public rivals as the most abandoned and perfidious citizens of France. Proscription thus followed proscription, and every day the streets of Paris exhibited the melancholy procession of wretched victims dragged to the scaffold, on the accusation of persons whom they had never known, and for crimes which they never had meditated. If he had known how to spare, Robespierre might have longer continued to direct the government of France; but his cowardly conduct in sacrificing those who were ready to be his associates and ministers in the vilest deeds, at last roused the courage of a few, who suspected that they were next marked for destruction. The tyrant and his two accomplices Couthon, and St. Just, were suddenly impeached in the convention, and "down with the tyrant," were the only exclamations which were heard on all sides when these bloody assassins attempted to ascend the tribune to defend themselves. In vain the commune of Paris took up arms against the convention to protect its accused leaders, Robespierre was conducted as a criminal, fearful and suppliant, and no longer haughty and ferocious, to the Hotel-de-Ville, where a gen-d'arme discovering him in the midst of the uproar and confusion, concealed in an obscure corner, fired a pistol at him, and broke to pieces his lower jaw. Extended on a table, in the severest agonies, yet without uttering a groan, the tyrant viewed in silence the preparations made for his punishment. On the morrow, 28th July, 1794, at four in the evening he was carried with twenty-two of his accomplices, amidst the groans, the hisses, and the rejoicings of the populace, to that scaffold where he had made to bleed so many thousand innocent victims. Such was the influence of this sanguinary monster, that France forgot her religion and her honor at his command; but after he had seen the altars insulted, the churches thrown down, and the public worship abolished, he claimed the merit of restoring to the Supreme Being some share in the government of the universe, and he appeared in the name of the convention, as the priest and founder of a new religion, and decreed with great solemnity that a god existed in the world.

ROBIN-HOOD, the leader of a band of robbers, who issued out from the recesses of Sherwood forest, Nottinghamshire, and spread terror and confusion over the kingdom. This formidable body of depredators, over which presided Little John, as second in command, continued their plundering life with success, and with little opposition, from the year 1189 to 1247. Some authors have asserted that Robin-Hood, was no other but Robert earl of Huntingdon, whom the malice of his enemies banished from the favor of the first Richard.

ROBINS, Benjamin, an eminent mathematician, born at Bath, 1707. His parents were quakers, and possessed of little property, yet he received some instruction, which, by severe application, he greatly improved. His knowledge of mathematics was such that he was recommended to Dr. Pemberton, and went to live in London, as mathematical teacher. Here, besides his professional engagements, he devoted much time in perusing the works of the most celebrated mathematicians in ancient and modern times; and as a proof of his abilities he published in the Philosophical Transactions, 1727, a demonstration of the last proposition of Newton's treatise on Quadratures. The next year he attacked in the present state of the republic of letters, Bernouilli's dissertation in support of Leibnitz's Opinion of the Force of Bodies in motion. After bestowing much attention on gunnery, and visiting some of the best fortified places in Flanders, he engaged in a controversy against Dr. Berkeley's Analyst on the Fluxionary Method, and published in 1735, a discourse concerning the nature and certainty of sir I. Newton's Method of Fluxions, and of prime and ultimate ratios. He afterwards defended sir Isaac against Baxter, and printed Remarks on Euler's Treatise on Motion. In 1739 he published three political pamphlets, which attracted much of the public attention, and in 1742, appeared his New Principles of Gunnery, a work of merit, and the result of his own laborious experiments. In 1748, lord Anson's Voyage round the World was published, and though it appeared under the name of Walter, the chaplain of the Centurion, it is clearly ascertained that the whole work was written by Robins, from the materials furnished by the journals, and the observations of the reverend gentleman. He afterwards wrote an apology for the unfortunate affair of Preston-pans, in favor of sir John Cope, and by the protection of lord Anson, he was employed in superintending the improvements made in Greenwich observatory. His reputation was now such that he was offered to go to Paris as commissioner, to settle the boundaries of Acadia, or to proceed to the East Indies as general engineer of the company, in visiting and repairing their forts, and he accepted this last honorable appointment. He reached India in 1750, and immediately formed plans for the improvement of the forts of Madras, and of St. David; but unfortunately did not live to see them carried into execution. The climate proved unfavorable to his constitution, and a gradual consumption proved fatal, 29th July, 1751.

ROBINSON, Robert, a native of Swaffham, Norfolk. He was well educated at the public grammar school of his native town; but the indigence of his parents was ill calculated to support further expenses at the university, and, therefore, he was apprenticed to a hair dresser. Instead of shaving, and of combing wigs with diligence, he paid more attention to books, and by the preaching of Whitfield, he became a convert to methodism. With enthusiasm he now embraced the tenets of Calvin, which he soon after exchanged for those of the baptists, and then settled at Cambridge, where his abilities and eloquence were exerted with great success in his appeals to crowded audiences. The respectable character which he here supported, endeared him not only to the inhabitants of Cambridge, but to some of the learned in the university, and his Plea of the Divinity of Christ, when published, proved to the world that he was not destitute of talents, nor of the powers of argumentation. He was in 1785, invited to preach to the baptists in London; but after some trials, he preferred his farm at Chesterton, near Cambridge, and the approbation of his neighbors, to the uncertain profits of a residence in the metropolis. He died in the summer of 1790, at Birmingham, where he had gone on a visit to Dr. Priestly, aged 55. He published besides a translation of Saurin's Sermons, 4 vols. 8vo.—an Essay on the Composition of a Sermon, and a History of Baptism. In the latter part of life he was a Socinian.

ROBINSON, Richard, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Westminster school, from which he was elected to Christ church, Oxford. He was made prebendary of York, and vicar of Aldborough, by archbishop Blackburne, to whom he was chaplain, and in 1751 he went as chaplain to the duke of Dorset in Ireland, and obtained the bishopric of Killala. In 1759, he was translated to Leighlin and Ferns, two years after to Kildare, and in 1765, to the primacy of Armagh, and in 1777, he was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of baron Rokeby. He employed the munificent patronage which he possessed in the most liberal manner, and not only built an elegant palace at Armagh, which he adorned with an observatory, but he founded a school, and built four new churches. He died 10th October 1794.

ROBINSON, John, LL.D. a Scotchman, who became director of the marine cadet academy at Cronstadt in Russia, and on his return to Scotland was made professor of chemistry at Glasgow. He afterwards became professor of natural philosophy at Edinburgh. Besides elements of mechanical philosophy, and some articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica, he published in 1797, Proofs of a Conspiracy, a work which, together with that of the abbé Baruel on the same subject, produced a great sensation in Europe, and in tracing the various causes of the French revolution, proved that it proceeded from a conspiracy among the illuminati of France and Germany, for the destruction of all society, of morality and religion in the world. Dr. Robinson died at Edinburgh 1805.

ROBINSON, Moses, governor of Vermont, succeeded Mr. Chittenden in 1789. He was afterwards a representative from that state, and a member of the senate of the United States under the administration of president Adams. He was one of the minority, who were opposed to the ratification of Jay's treaty. He died at Bennington, May 26th, 1813, aged 72.

ROBINSON, Jonathan, brother of the preceding, was appointed chief justice of Vermont, in 1801, in the place of judge Smith, resigned, and in 1806 succeeded Mr. Smith as senator in congress. He died at Bennington, November 3d, 1819, aged 64.

ROCCA, Albert John Michael, a French officer, knight of the legion of honor, who served as a lieutenant of hussars in the campaigns of Buonaparte in Prussia and in Spain. In the latter he was severely wounded, and was obliged to quit the army. About 1811 he retired to the residence of his family at Geneva, where he became acquainted with the celebrated madame de Staël, to whom he was secretly married. The union was divulged after her death in July 1817; and M. Rocca survived her but a few months, dying January 30, 1818, in the thirty-first year of his age. He was the author of "Memoire sur la Guerre des Français en Espagne," 1814, 8vo., which was translated into English; and "Campagne de Walcheren et d'Anvers en 1809," 1815, 8vo; besides which he wrote a novel, entitled "La Maladie du Pays," which has never been published.

ROCHEFORT, William de, author of a Translation of Sophocles—of a refutation of M. Rabaud's System of Nature—of Ulysses, Antigone, and Electra, three tragedies—and of a Critical History of the Opinions of the Ancients on Happiness, was a native of Lyons, and member of the academy of instructions and belles lettres at Paris. He died 1788, universally and deservedly respected.

ROCHEFOUCAULD LIANCOURT, Francis Alexander Frederic, duke de la, was born in 1747, and was grand master of the wardrobe to Louis XV. and XVI. During the revolution, he was the friend of liberty, but the enemy of licentiousness. The downfall of the throne compelled him to quit France, and, after having resided for some time in England, he visited America. In 1799 he was allowed to return to his native country, and he died in March, 1827, generally respected for his liberal principles and his active benevolence. It was chiefly by his exertions that vaccination was introduced into France. His principal work is, Travels in the United States.

ROCHEJAQUELEIN, Henry de la, one of the most eminent of the Vendean royalist leaders, was born, in 1773, near Chatillon sur Sevre and was a son of the marquis de la Rochejaquelein. First as one of the chiefs, and afterwards as generalissimo, of the royalists, he displayed great talent, and the most daring valor. On first taking the command he addressed his men in the following pithy harangue: "I am young, and inexperienced, but I have an ardent desire to render myself worthy of heading you. Let us march to meet the enemy; if I give way, kill me; if I advance, follow me; if I fall, avenge me." He was killed in March, 1794.

ROCHESTER, John Wilmot, earl of, a celebrated wit at the court of the second Charles, born April, 1648. He was well educated at Burford school, and then entered at Wadham college, Oxford, and afterwards travelled over France and Italy. He was in 1665 in the action at Bergen, under lord Sandwich, when an attack was made on the Dutch fleet that had taken shelter there, and he was in another engagement, in both of which he displayed great intrepidity and coolness, though his courage was afterwards called in question for refusing to fight a duel with lord Mulgrave. The excellent qualities of his mind were, however, ruined by the dissipation of the court, and so fond of intemperance and of voluptuous indulgence did he gradually show himself, that he was the greatest libertine of the age, and was, for five years, as he confessed to Dr. Burnet, in a continual state of intoxication. Thus devoted to low gratifications, the lamp of life was soon extinguished, and at the age of 31 he found all the debilities and the rapid decay of extreme old age. Sickness at last brought on reflection, and in a moment of contrition he sent for Dr. Burnet, to whom he opened his heart, and the alarming state of his conscience, and after living an atheist and a libertine, he prepared himself to die a good Christian, and a sincere penitent. He expired 29th July, 1680, leaving a son behind him, who died the next year, and three daughters. The writings of this licentious nobleman have, unfortunately for religion and morality, been too much and too extensively dispersed, and not perhaps with the antidote which his contrition and a death-bed repentance should convey to the profligate mind. Besides his licentious poems, he wrote a tragedy, called Valentinian, and a speech, delivered in the character of a mountebank, a profession which for some time he followed with great success in Tower-street. His wit rendered him a cheerful companion, and at the court he was regarded as lively and facetious, full of mirth, repartee, and extravagance.

BODGERS, John, D.D., minister of New-York, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, August 5th, 1727. His parents removed while he was young to Philadelphia, and gave him a classical education. He early became pious by the instrumentality of Mr. Whitefield, and in 1747 was licensed to preach, and after having spent some time as a missionary in Virginia and Maryland, was settled in St. George's, Delaware, on the 19th of March, 1749, where he continued to labor with popularity and usefulness until 1765. In July of that year he removed to New-York, and became collegiate pastor of the Wall-street presbyterian church at that time the only church of that denomination in that city. He continued in that station, laboring with exemplary diligence in the duties of his office, and enjoying in an unusual degree the affection of his people and the respect of his fellow-laborers in the gospel, till the close of his life. He died on the 7th of May, 1811, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and the sixty-third of his ministry.

RODNEY, George Brydges lord, a brave English admiral, son of a naval officer, of a Somersetshire family, was born about 1718. He was early engaged in the naval service of his country, and in 1751, was promoted to the rank of commodore, and in 1759, employed, as admiral, to bombard Havre de Grace. In 1761, he was sent against Martinico, and for his great services in that expedition was made knight of the bath. The return of peace, and interference in a severely disputed election at Northampton, rendered his pecuniary resources very scanty, and he fled to France to escape the importunities of his creditors. His distresses were seen by the French government, and very liberal offers were made to him to enter into the service of the king of France, a proposal which he rejected with becoming indignation. This noble conduct was not, however, buried in oblivion. It was honorably mentioned by M. Sartine the French minister to the English government, and Rodney, at the invitation of lord Sandwich, returned to serve his country. He was immediately placed at the head of a fleet, and had the good fortune, in 1780, to capture a Spanish convoy near Cadiz, and a few weeks after to defeat the squadron of admiral Langara, by the capture of five ships of the line. This great success was the prelude of new victories. In 1781 he took St. Eustathius from the Dutch, and on the 12th April, 1782, he obtained a complete triumph over de Grasse's fleet in the West Indies, by the sinking of one ship and the capture of five others. For these services he was raised to the peerage, and had a pension of two thousand pounds a year settled upon him. Lord Rodney died 1792.

RODOLPH I., of Hapsburg, surnamed the Clement, was elected emperor of Germany 1273. Though he refused to go to Rome to be crowned by the pope, he made a treaty of alliance with him. He made war against Ottocar king of Bohemia and obtained with victory the cession of Austria, Styria, and Carniola. This disgrace, and the doing of homage to the conqueror disgusted Ottocar, and by the advice of his queen he renewed the war, and was defeated and slain at the battle of Marckfeld near Vienna, 26th August 1278. The emperor died at Gemersheim, 30th September 1291, aged 73.

RODOLPH II., son of Maximilian II., was born at Vienna 1552. He was made king of Hungary 1572, of Bohemia and of the Romans 1575, and the following year elected emperor on his father's death. He was an irresolute and unfortunate monarch, his dominions were invaded by the Turks, and he showed neither spirit nor courage to repress the attack, and when his brother Matthias revolted from him he yielded up to him with little opposition the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary. He was very superstitious, and though he patronised learned men, he had the weakness to listen to the suggestions of astrologers. He died unmarried 20th January 1612, aged 60.

ROE, sir Thomas, an eminent statesman, born at LOW Layton, Essex, 1580. He resided for about two years at Magdalen college, Oxford, and then studied at one of the inns of court. He was knighted by James 1604, and 1614 went as ambassador to the court of the Great Mogul, where he continued four years. In 1621, he went as ambassador to the Grand Signior, and remained there till 1628. During his residence abroad, not only the commercial interests of his country were his chief concern, but also literature, and he made a most valuable collection of MSS. in the Greek and Oriental languages, which at his return he presented to the Bodleian library. He brought also as a present from Cyril, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. the famous Alexandrian MS. of the Greek bible, since transcribed and published by Dr. Grabe. In 1629, he successfully negotiated a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, and in that embassy gained the confidence and friendship of the great Gustavus Adolphus, whom he advised to make a descent on Germany to restore the freedom of the empire, which he actually effected. In 1640, sir Thomas was elected member for Oxford, and afterwards went again as ambassador to Ratisbon in favor of the king of Bohemia's son. At his return he was made chancellor of the garter, and privy counsellor. He died 1644, no doubt broken in heart to see the disastrous affairs of the times. His curious account of his negotiations, &c. at the Porte were published 1740. There are besides published of his, Speeches in Parliament—and a Discourse on the Spanish King's Seizure of the Valteline.

ROEMER, Olavs, a Danish astronomer, born at Arhusen in Jutland, 1644, and educated at Copenhagen. He accompanied back to Paris, Picard, who had been sent by the French king to make observations in the North, and so great did his knowledge of mathematics appear, that he was appointed to instruct the dauphin. After ten years' residence at Paris he was, in 1681, recalled back to Copenhagen by Christian V. and made professor of astronomy there. His abilities were employed in reforming the coin of the kingdom, and in measuring the roads. He died at Copenhagen 1710, leaving no literary work behind him. Some of his observations were published by his pupil Horrebow in 1735, under the title of Basis Astronomiæ, 4to. His observations on light were noticed and applauded as correct by the great Newton.

ROGER, first king of Sicily, conquered Apulia, Calabria, and Naples, and by embracing the party of the antipope Anacletus he strengthened his power. He took Innocent II. prisoner, and restored him to liberty only upon his confirming his dominions in Italy. He afterwards made war against the Eastern empire, and after plundering Athens, Corinth, Negropont, &c. and advancing to the gates of Constantinople, he returned to Sicily loaded with booty. He died 1154, aged 58.

ROGERS, John, an English divine, educated at Cambridge. He was for some time chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, and on the succession of Edward VI. he returned home and obtained a prebend of St. Paul's church. As he was an eloquent and zealous preacher, he was marked for persecution in Mary's reign, and was the first who suffered martyrdom at the stake in Smithfield, 1555. He had assisted Coverdale and Tindal in translating the bible into English.

ROGERS, John D.D., an able divine, born 1679, at Ensham, Oxfordshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at New college school, and became fellow of Corpus Christi, and in 1712, went to London as lecturer of St. Clement Danes. He obtained in 1716, the rectory of Wrington, Somersetshire, and about that time married lord Coleraine's sister. He engaged in 1719, in the Bangorian controversy, and he acquired on that occasion so much credit by his discourse on the visible and invisible church of Christ, that the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of divinity in 1721. He obtained a canonry, and the office of sub-dean, in the cathedral of Wells, and in 1728, when he wished for the retirement of a country life, he was promoted to the living of St. Giles', Cripple-gate, London. He died six months after, May 1, 1729. After his death were published 4 vols. of his sermons—and a Persuasive to Conformity, addressed to Dissenters. He wrote besides, a Defence of Christianity against Collins' Scheme of Literal Prophecy.

ROGERS, Nathaniel, a native of England, who came to America in 1636, and in 1639 was settled as a minister of Ipswich, Massachusetts. He died July 3, 1655, aged 57 years. The subject of this article was a grandson of John Rogers, the martyr, and was educated at Cambridge of his native country. Having had liberal advantages for intellectual improvement, he became one of the most eminent men among the first settlers of New England. As a preacher he possessed a lively eloquence, which charmed his hearers. His son John was president of Harvard college.

ROGERS, Ezekiel, the first minister of Rowley, Massachusetts, and a cousin of Nathaniel Rogers of Ipswich, was born in England, 1590. He was educated at Cambridge of his native country; and on entering the ministry, became highly popular as an orator. Although liberally patronized, he was induced, in consequence of the religious troubles of that country, to repair to New England, which he reached in 1638, bringing with him a number of respectable families. In 1639, he commenced the settlement at Rowley, where he spent the remainder of his days. He had the reputation of being pious and zealous in his profession. He bequeathed his library to Harvard college; and his house and lands to the town of Rowley for the support of the ministry. In 1643, he preached the election sermon. His death took place, January 23, 1661, at the age of 70 years.

ROGERS, John, president of Harvard college, was born at Assington, England, and came with his father to Massachusetts in early life. He was educated at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1649. He studied theology, and preached some time, but at length became a physician. He was elected successor of president Oakes, in 1682, and installed in August, of the next year, but died suddenly in 1684, on the 2d of July, the day after commencement.

ROGERS, William, D.D., a Baptist minister, born at Newport, Rhode Island, in 1751; and graduated at Brown university of that state, in 1769, being a member of the first class which received the honors of that institution. In 1771, he was settled over the first Baptist church of Philadelphia. In 1789, he was appointed professor of belles lettres in the college of that city, which office he relinquished in 1812. Dr. Rogers was an eloquent preacher, and was highly esteemed by brethren and all who knew him. He died, April 24th, 1824, aged 73 years.

ROHAN, Henry, duke of, a peer of France, prince of Leon, born at Blein castle in Brittany, 1579. He gained the friendship of Henry IV. by his bravery at the siege of Amiens, and afterwards distinguished himself at the head of the Huguenots, for whom he obtained a very advantageous peace with Louis XIII. From France he passed into the service of Venice, and was made general in chief of the armies of that republic against the imperialists. He was then recalled by Louis XIII. and his abilities were employed in negotiation as well as in war, but the jealousy of Richelieu drove him to Geneva. From Geneva he went to join the arms of his friend the duke of Saxe Weimar against the imperialists, and was fatally wounded in battle, and died six weeks after, 13th April, 1638. His memoirs of the political affairs of France, from 1610 to 1629, in 2 vols. 12mo. are much admired. He wrote besides, the Interest of Princes, printed Cologne, 1666, 12mo.—on the Government of the 13 Cantons—an Abridgment of Cæsar's Commentaries.

ROHAULT, James, a French philosopher, born at Amiens, 1620. He studied at Paris, and was well versed in the philosophy of the ancients, but attached himself most zealously to the popular doctrines of Des Cartes, and wrote an account of them under the title of "Physics." This work, written in French, was translated into Latin by Dr. Samuel Clarke, and adapted to the system of Newton's philosophy, and it has also appeared in English, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote besides Elements of Mathematics—treatise of Mechanics, and died 1675, respected as a man of learning and probity.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIERE, J. M., a native of Villefranche, near Lyons. As he was the youngest of five brothers, who, though of respectable family, were left poor and early orphans, he determined to quit his native town in quest of his fortune, and at the age of nineteen, not to enter into the ecclesiastical profession, he left home and travelled on foot to Nantes. Here he was dissuaded from going to the East-Indies on account of the bad state of his health, and therefore he removed to Rouen, where he had the good fortune to be noticed, and to find his knowledge of commerce and political economy rewarded by the appointment of inspector general at Amiens, and afterwards at Lyons. His travels in Switzerland, Italy, and other countries, tended to enlarge his understanding, and to render him known as an able and well informed writer. His Memoirs on the Rearing of Cattle, and the preparing of Wool, 4to.—his Art on the printing of Woollen, and Cotton Stuffs—and his Letters from Sicily, Switzerland, Malta, and Italy, were read with avidity and with interest, and therefore at the revolution he was easily selected as one of the deputies from Lyons. His abilities recommended him to the court, and he became one of the ministers of Louis XVI. but instead of conciliating the good opinion of his master, he offended his feelings by his republican conduct, his coarse, affected manners, and the singularity of his dress. Though driven from the ministry by the monarch, he was restored by the voice of the people; but whilst he labored for the establishment of liberty, he often permitted those excesses which proved so fatal to the dearest interests of France. He resisted, indeed, with manly indignation the violence of faction, and wished to suppress the massacres of September, but in vain. The popular fury was too strong to permit a man of independent spirit to continue long in power, and when the fall of Brissot and of the Girondists was terminated, Roland saw his fate decreed in theirs, and he escaped from Paris at the moment when his person was going to be seized. He retired to Rouen, where he might have concealed his misfortunes; but when he heard that his wife had perished on the scaffold he resolved not to survive her, and going about four leagues from Rouen on the Paris road, he stabbed himself to the heart, 15th November 1793. He wrote besides, a dictionary of manufactures and the arts depending upon them, 3 vols. 4to.

ROLAND, Mary Jane Philipon, wife of the preceding, was born at Paris 1754, and received from her father, an excellent education. Early devoted to books she acquired a very extensive knowledge of the arts, and became known for her wit and learning. At the age of twenty-five she married Roland, though much older than herself, and when he was raised to consequence in the revolution, she lent all the resources of her mind to assist him, and often wrote the dispatches and letters which were to issue from his hands. Her house was the receptacle of the learned, the powerful, and the intriguing, and she was the soul of the party, and secretly guided many of the public measures which were proposed in the convention. Her influence escaped not, however, without envy, and when accused, she appeared before the convention and cleared herself with all the graceful energy of innocence. When her husband was proscribed, she hoped to be permitted to remain secure at Paris, but in vain; she was soon after seized and sent to prison, and after five months' confinement she was dragged to the scaffold, as the active accomplice of the Girondists. She was guillotined 8th November 1793, aged 41, and as she expired she exclaimed, O liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name. Her works consist of tracts on melancholy, morality, and friendship, besides memoirs which she wrote during her captivity, and in which she gave an interesting history, or appeal to posterity, about her husband, his conduct, his ministry, and their private life. She also published an account of her travels in England and Switzerland, two places where she imbibed true principles of liberty and government. In her character she was an amiable woman, but unfortunately her partiality for republican liberty tinged her conduct with an affectation of Roman virtues and ancient forms. Respectable in private life, and followed as a woman of superior information and great talents of mind, she might at any other period have most powerfully contributed by her example and by her writings to the recommendation of virtue, and to the happiness of mankind.

ROLAND D'ERCEVILLE, B. G., president of the parliament of Paris, was a learned and popular character, but all his merits could not save him from the revolutionary tribunal. He was guillotined 20th April, 1794, aged 64. He wrote a Letter on the Authority of the States of France, 12mo.—Discourse on the Jesuits—and a Plan of Education.

ROLE, Michael, a French mathematician, born at Ambert in Auvergne, 1652. He for some time maintained himself by writing for an attorney; but by attending mathematical lectures became himself a popular lecturer, and afterwards a respected member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a treatise on Algebra—and Methods of resolving undetermined Questions in Algebra, and died 1719.

ROLLIN, Charles, an eminent French writer, born at Paris 30th January 1661. He was intended for the business of his father, a master cutler, but his genius was happily discovered by a Benedictine, and he was permitted to study in the college of Plessis, where his abilities soon procured him the appellation of the Divine. He succeeded his beloved master, Hersan, in 1687, as professor of rhetoric and eloquence, and in 1694 he was appointed rector of the university. In these important offices he distinguished himself by his zeal for the improvement of his pupils and the honor of learning, and by his example and attention the Greek language was cultivated with great attention, and emulation introduced among the students. In 1699 he was made coadjutor to the college of Beauvais, which his reputation soon rendered popular, respectable and flourishing; but in 1712, the disputes between the jesuits and jansenists proved fatal to his repose. By the influence of Tellier, the king's confessor, the tool of the jesuits, he was driven from his appointments and retired to privacy. In 1720 he was chosen again rector by the university of Paris; but two months after the election was disannulled by a lettre de cachet, and from that time Rollin devoted himself in retirement to the composition of his excellent works. His valuable publications are, an edition of Quintilian, two vols.—treatise on Studying and Teaching the Belles Lettres, 4 vols.—Ancient History of the Egyptians, Carthaginians, and Babylonians, 13 vols.—the Roman History, from the Foundation of the City to the Battle of Actium, completed to the time of Constantine by his pupil Crevier, and published in 16 vols. 12mo.—Miscellaneous Discourses and Lectures. This learned man was as amiable in private life as he was respected in public; pious, benevolent, and humane, the friend of virtue, morality, and religion. So highly respected was he among his countrymen, that the poet Rousseau ventured from his banishment in disguise to Paris to see and converse with the venerable professor. Voltaire has deservedly passed high eulogiums on his merits as an historian, and called his Ancient History the best compilation in any language, correct, eloquent, and pleasing. He died 14th September 1741.

ROMAINE, William, an English divine, born 1714. For some years he was a popular preacher before the university of Oxford; but the love of singularity, and a propensity to the doctrines of Calvin, prevailed upon him to seek for distinction in the applauses of a London audience. He was elected lecturer of St. Dunstan in the West 1749, to which was afterwards added the offices of morning preacher at St. George's, Hanover-square, and of astronomical professor of Gresham college, which he soon resigned. He was in 1764 appointed rector of St. Ann's Blackfriars, and when not engaged in the itinerant labors of the ministry, he continued to collect there and at St. Dunstan's, those numerous congregations which admired the vehemence of methodistical effusions, and the familiar addresses of a vociferous preacher. He published various sermons and tracts which have been edited in 3 vols. 8vo. and he also edited in 1749 Calasio's Concordance to the Hebrew bible, 4 vols. folio, in which he made some unpardonable alterations in favor of the then prevalent doctrine of Hutchinson. He died 1795.

ROMANA, Don Peter CARO Y SUREDA, marquis de La, a Spanish general, was born, in 1761, at Palma, in Majorca; was educated at Lyons, Salamanca, and Madrid; served as aid-de-camp to Moreno, at the siege of Gibraltar; and distinguished himself in the campaigns against the French, on the Pyrenean frontier, from 1793 to 1795. La Romana commanded, in 1807, the auxiliary Spanish corps of fourteen thousand men, which was sent to the north of Germany by Napoleon. When Spain rose against her oppressor, La Romana, aided by an English squadron, succeeded in embarking his troops from the island of Funen, and leading them home in safety. He displayed great talents, both in the field and the council, in 1809 and 1810; but his career was unfortunately cut short by death January 23, 1811.

ROMANUS I., emperor of the East, surnamed Lecapenus, was a native of Armenia, and was raised to distinction, from the obscurity of a common soldier, by saving the life of the emperor Basil in a battle against the Saracens. By marrying his daughter, Constantine X. cemented the union which existed between them, and he then raised him as his associate on the throne, 919. In his elevation Romanus displayed great powers of mind; he defeated the Muscovites and the Turks, and to superior military talents he joined the milder virtues of humanity and benevolence. When he wished to restore greater powers in the empire to his son-in-law, Constantine, he was driven by the jealousy of his own son Stephen, into a monastery, where he died 948.

ROMANUS II., the Younger, was son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, whom he succeeded 959. He was an effeminate and worthless prince; he drove his mother Helena from the palace, and obliged his sisters to prostitute themselves, and he destroyed himself by his intemperance and debauchery, 963. During his short reign Phocas, his general, was successful against the Saracens in Candia.

ROMANUS III., son of Leo, the imperial general, obtained the crown by marrying Zoe, the daughter of Constantine the Younger, 1029. His indolence, and the success of the Saracens, who seized upon Syria, offended his subjects, and his wife having fallen in love with Michael, the treasurer of the empire, determined to depose her husband, and raise her favorite to the throne in his stead. Romanus was therefore poisoned, and afterwards strangled, April, 1034.

ROMANUS IV., surnamed Diogenes, by marrying Eudoxia, the widow of Constantine Ducas, ascended the throne of Constantinople. He marched against the Turks, and defeated them; but in 1071 he was unfortunately taken prisoner by Asan, the enemy's general, who instead of insulting his misfortunes, generously set him at liberty. On his return he found the throne usurped by Michael, the son of his predecessor, and in a subsequent battle, he was defeated by his rival, who cruelly ordered his eyes to be put out. Romanus died in consequence of the operation, October 1071.

ROMANZOFF, N., marshal de, a distinguished Russian general. He defeated the Turks, 1770, at the battle of the Pruth, and then at Kagoul, where one hundred thousand of the enemy were left on the field; and thus, by his extraordinary successes, he contributed to the enlargement of the Russian dominions, and to the free navigation of the Black sea, and of the Dardanelles. He received with modesty the presents and the honors which the gratitude of Catherine heaped upon him, and afterwards went with Paul, the grand duke, to the court of Berlin, where Frederick the Great received him with every mark of esteem and respect. In the war of 1787, he refused to share the command with the favorite Potemkin, and was permitted on account of his great age, to retire from the service, and he died in 1796, universally respected as one of the greatest warriors of the age.

ROME DE L'ISLE, John Baptist, a native of Gray in Franche Comté, who from his birth devoted himself to observations on mineralogy and natural history. He possessed great abilities, but in his opinions differed from other mineralogists, and thus gave rise to opposition. He published among other works, Crystallography, 4 vols. 8vo.—External Characters of Minerals, 8vo.—Metrology 8vo.—Letters to Bertrand on the Polype of Fresh Water, 12mo. He died at Paris, 10th March, 1790.

ROMEYN, Theodoricus, D.D., professor of theology in the Reformed Dutch Church, was born at Hackensack, New Jersey, January 12th, 1744, and educated at the college at Princeton, in that state, where he was graduated in 1765. He was settled in the ministry in his native town in 1766, and continued there till 1784, when he accepted the care of a church in Schenectady, New York. His death took place in 1804. He was twice offered the presidency of Queen's college, New Jersey, and was for a considerable time a professor of theology in the Reformed Dutch Church. He was a man of extensive learning, and one of its most active patrons. It was chiefly by his efforts that Union college was instituted at Schenectady, not long after his removal there. He was distinguished for piety, was an eloquent preacher, and enjoyed in a high degree the respect and esteem of his contemporaries.

ROMILLY, John, an ingenious mechanic and clock-maker, born at Geneva. He presented to Louis XV. a watch which went a whole year without winding. He died at Paris, 16th February 1796, aged 82. He wrote all the articles on clock-making in the Encyclopedie, and published besides a Letter against the Possibility of Perpetual Motion. He also established the journal de Paris, 1st January 1777. His son, John Edme, was a Calvinistic minister at Geneva and London, and published 3 volumes of Discourses. He was the friend of d'Alembert, Voltaire, and J. J. Rousseau, and died 1779.

ROMILLY, Sir Samuel, an eminent advocate and senator, was born, in 1757, in Westminster, and was the son of a jeweller. He was called to the bar in 1783, and gradually rose to high reputation in the court of chancery. When the whig party came into power, in 1806, he was appointed solicitor general, was knighted, and sat in parliament for Queenborough. He was one of the managers of the impeachment of Lord Melville. As a senator he distinguished himself on many occasions; but most conspicuously in his attempts to introduce a reform of the criminal law. In 1818 he was elected one of the representatives for Westminster. He, however, never took his seat. In a fit of temporary insanity, occasioned by the death of his wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, he put an end to his own existence, November 2, 1818.

RONDELET, William, a native of Montpellier, who studied anatomy with great success, and acquired celebrity as a physician. He wrote a Latin treatise on Fishes, 2 vols. folio—and various tracts on medicine, published, 8vo. 1628. He died at Realmt, 18th July 1566, aged 59, in consequence of eating figs to excess.

RONSARD, Peter de, a French poet, of a noble family, born at Vendomois, 1524. He studied at Paris, and became page to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards was for two years in the service of James V. of Scotland. On his return to France, he was engaged in negotiations, and at the same time devoted much of his time to literature and poetry. He was the favorite of Henry II. of France, and his four successors, and though a layman, obtained some ecclesiastical dignities in commendam, especially St. Cosmas priory, near Tours, where he died 1585. His poetry was much admired in France, so that he obtained in that age the honorable appellation of the poet of France. His genius was certainly great, and his conceptions sublime, yet he was deficient in judgment.

RONSIN, Charles Philip, a native of Soissons. The French revolution opened a scene for the display of the impetuous passions and bold design of his character, and by the influence of his friends Danton and Marat, he was soon promoted to the office of war minister, and then to the command of the revolutionary army. In La Vendée, and at Meaux his steps were traced by all the horrors of open murder and secret assassination; but on his return to Paris, he was soon marked for destruction when he attempted to raise the power of the communes above the convention. He was guillotined 24th March 1794, aged 42.

ROOKE, sir George, a brave admiral, born of a respectable family in Kent, 1650. He was educated for a learned profession, but his father yielded at last to his wish to serve in the navy, and in this favorite employment, he soon distinguished himself. His most glorious exploits were in saving the Sinyrna fleet from a French squadron, in taking the almost impregnable fortress of Gibraltar, 1703, in destroying the French ships at the battle of la Hogue, in the affair of Malaga, and at the glorious action before Vigo. His brilliant services, though acknowledged with gratitude by William, were disregarded by the Whig party, which swayed the kingdom in Anne's reign, and the gallant admiral, because he voted in the House of Commons against the ministry, was considered as no longer fit to serve his country, and retired, neglected, to his seat in Kent, where he died 24th January, 1708-9. His fortune was very moderate, and he truly said, in making his will, "the little I leave was honestly gotten, never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing."

ROOKE, Laurence, an English astronomer and geometrician, born at Deptford in Kent, 1623, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge from which he removed, 1650, to Wadham college, Oxford. In 1652 he was chosen astronomical professor at Gresham college, which he exchanged three years for the chair of geometry. He was one of the first members of the Royal society, to whose formation he greatly and zealously contributed. He died at Gresham college, 1662. His works are Observations on Comets—Methods of observing Eclipses of the Moon—Observations on the Eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites—Directions to Seamen going to the Indies.

ROOT, Jesse, a native of Northampton, Massachusetts, was born in January, 1737. He graduated at Princeton college in 1756; preached about three years; and then studied law. He was admitted to the bar, and settled in Hartford, Connecticut. He took part also in the revolutionary war; and, from 1779 till the close of that war was a member of congress. In 1789 he was appointed a judge of the superior court, and was chief justice from 1796 till his resignation in 1807, on reaching the age of 70 years. In his judicial character he was learned and dignified; in his social relations he was kind and affectionate; and, as a Christian he was sincere and devoted. He died March 29th, 1822, aged 85 years.

ROQUE, John de la, member of the academy of belles lettres at Marseilles, wrote a Voyage into Arabia Felix, 12mo.—into Palestine—into Syria and mount Libanus, and assisted his brother Anthony in the composition of the Mercure de France. He died at Paris, 8th December, 1745, aged 84. Anthony, who wrote Medea and Jason—and Theone, two tragedies, died at Paris 1744, aged 72.

RORENMULLER, John George, a German divine and critic, was born in 1736 at Ummerstadt in the county of Hildburghausen. In 1773 he was appointed to the divinity professorship at Erlangen, whence he removed in 1783 to Giessen and in 1785 to Leipsic, where he principally contributed to the foundation of a free-school, and died in 1815. He published—1. Scholias on the New Testament.—2. Historia et Facta interpretationis librorum Sacrorum.—3. Sermons.

ROSCIUS, Quintus, a celebrated Roman actor. He was a native of Gaul, and came to Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero, and the other great men of the age, and acquired such high celebrity as a dramatic performer, that he was allowed a public salary. He died about 61 B. C.

ROSCOE, William, a biographer and miscellaneous writer, was born, about 1751, at Liverpool. His parentage was humble; his education imperfect; and he began his career in life as articled clerk to an attorney. In the few hours, however, which he could snatch from the law, he made himself master of the Latin, Italian, and French languages; and he subsequently acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek. His first literary attempt, a poem called Mount Pleasant, was written in his sixteenth year. On the expiration of his clerkship, he entered into partnership with Mr. Aspinwall, an attorney of Liverpool. After having followed the profession for several years, he entered himself at Gray's Inn, with the purpose of becoming a barrister; and he subsequently became a partner in a banking house. As a banker he unfortunately failed. In 1806 he was elected one of the members for Liverpool; but he declined a contest at the next election. His two great works, The Lives of Lorenzo the Magnificent, and of Leo X. were published in 1796 and 1805, and gave him an enduring reputation. He died June 30th, 1831. Among his other works are, Poems; a translation of Tansillo's Nurse; and various pamphlets on politics, and against the slave trade.

ROSCOMMON, Wentworth Dillon, earl of, an English poet, born in Ireland, 1633. He was brought up in England, but the commotions of the times, and the impeachment of his uncle, lord Stafford, drove him from the country to Caen, where he finished his education under the great Bochart. He afterwards travelled to Italy, and at the restoration came to England, where he was honorably received by Charles II. and made captain of a band of pensioners. He nearly ruined himself by gaming, and by the vicious indulgences prevalent at a corrupted court; but when master of horse to the duchess of York, he prudently married Frances, daughter of lord Burlington, widow of colonel Courtney, and then began to devote himself to literature and poetry, and to plan with Dryden, a design to fix and refine the English language. He died 17th January 1684. His poems are few, and of those the best are, his Essay on translated Verse—and his translation of Horace's Art of Poetry. Though perhaps not a sublime poet, he certainly is a correct one, and he has the singular merit of being the only moral writer in Charles's days.

ROSE, George, a statesman and writer, was born, in 1744, at Brechin, in Angusshire, and was the son of a clergyman; was originally a purser, but, through the influence of lord Marchmont, was made keeper of the records in the exchequer; displayed talents for business, by which he obtained the confidence and friendship of Mr. Pitt; rose to be president of the board of trade, and treasurer of the navy; and died January 13th, 1818. Among his works are, A Report on the Records; Observations on Mr. Fox's History; and an Examination into the Increase of British Revenues, Commerce, and Navigation.

ROSE, Samuel, a lawyer, was born in 1767, at Chiswick, where he was educated under his father Dr. William Rose, who conducted an academy there many years. He next went to Glasgow, where he gained several prizes; after which he attended the courts of law at Edinburgh, and in 1786, entered himself a student of Lincoln's Inn. In 1796, he was called to the bar. He died of a consumption in 1804. Mr. Rose wrote the Life of Goldsmith, and edited Comyns's Reports, and Digest.

ROSINUS, John, a learned German, born at Eisenac, Thuringia, 1550. He was educated at Jena, and in 1592 became preacher of the cathedral of Naumberg in Saxony, where he died of the plague, 1626. The best known of his works is, Romanorum Antiquitatum Libri decem, a most valuable composition, of which the best editions are those of Amsterdam, 1685, 4to. and of Utrecht, 1701, 4to.

ROSOI, Barnaby Firmin du, a French writer, born at Paris 1745. He solicited the public attention by various dramatic pieces, which, though acted with applause, possess little merit. At the revolution he distinguished himself in favor of the unfortunate monarch, by the publication of his gazette, called l'Ami du Roi, and in consequence of the unyielding independence of his principles, he was marked for death. In his last moments he wished to benefit mankind by soliciting that his blood might be extracted from his veins, and transfused into the body of an old man, which was rejected. He was executed by the light of torches, August, 1792.

ROSS, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, born at Aberdeen, 1640, and educated at St. Andrew's. He was, in 1686, made bishop of Edinburgh; but the revolution put an end to his power, and to the episcopal authority in Scotland. He died at Edinburgh, 1720, aged 80. He was author of some tracts now little known.

ROSS, John, D.D., a native of Herefordshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He afterwards obtained Frome vicarage, Somersetshire, and in 1773, on the death of bishop Keppel, was preferred to the see of Exeter. He wrote a Defence of Dr. Middleton against the attacks of Mr. Markland, 1746, and in 1749 edited Cicero's Epistles ad Familiares, in 2 vols. 8vo. He published besides some single sermons, and died 1792.

ROSS, George, judge, member of congress, and signer of the Declaration of American independence, was born at New Castle, Delaware, in 1730, being the son of an episcopal clergyman of that place. He studied law with his brother in Philadelphia, and settled as a practitioner in Lancaster. From 1774 to 1777 he was a member of congress; and in 1779 was appointed judge of the court of admiralty. Judge Ross was distinguished as a learned jurist, a patriotic citizen, and as a man of the best social and domestic virtues. He died in July 1779, aged 49 years.

ROSSI, Bernard Marie de, a native of Forly, educated at Florence. He became theological professor to the Dominicans of Venice, and declined all the ecclesiastical honors offered to him. He wrote several works on historical and antiquarian subjects, the best known of which are, his Account of the Church of Aquileia. He died 1775, aged 83.

ROSSLYN, Alexander Wedderburn, earl of, an able lawyer, descended from an ancient family, and born in Scotland, 13th February, 1733. He was educated at Edinburgh university, and called to the Scotch bar, 1752; but he was ambitious of a wider sphere for the exertion of his abilities, and he came the next year to London, and entered at the Inner Temple. He was in 1757 called to the bar, and six years after, in consequence of his merit, he was appointed king's counsel. In parliament, where he sat as member for Richmond, he distinguished himself as an able and well-informed orator in support of Mr. George Grenville's administration, and he zealously espoused the cause of the mother country in her struggles to reduce the revolted American colonies. Mr. Wedderburn was appointed solicitor-general in 1771, attorney-general in 1778, and created, June 1780, baron Louchborough, and made chief justice of the Common Pleas. He supported the coalition ministry; and was in 1783 made first commissioner for keeping the great seal; but was dismissed with lord North and Mr. Fox, whose opposition to the new ministry he ably seconded in parliament. In 1793, however, he accepted the seals under Mr. Pitt's administration, and was in 1801 created earl Rosslyn, and soon after resigned the office of chancellor to retire to privacy. He died suddenly, 2d January, 1805. As a lawyer and a judge, lord Rosslyn supported a most respectable character; he proved himself on the bench the friend of the seamen, whose rights had been invaded by their commanders; but he was censured by some for arbitrarily placing at the trial of the Southwark rioters, in one indictment, men who were strangers to each other, and who thus were deprived of the privileges afforded by the law even to the greatest criminals. He was author of a pamphlet, called Observations on the State of the English Prisons, and the Means of Improving them, a work of merit, and dictated by the purest humanity.

ROTGANS, Luke, a native of Amsterdam, who engaged in the wars of Holland in 1672, but after two years' service, retired to his country seat, where he devoted himself to poetry. His epic poem, in eight books, on the Life of William III. is held in high estimation by the Dutch. He wrote also other poems, and shares with Vondel and Antonides the honor of being at the head of the bards of Holland. He died of the small-pox, 3d November, 1710, aged sixty-six.

ROTHERAM, John, author of an Apology for the Athanasian Creed—Essay on the Truth of Christianity—Discourse on Faith, and its Connection with good Works, 8vo. and other religious tracts, was rector of Houghton-le-Spring, Durham, and died 1788.

ROTRON, John de, a native of Dreux, distinguished as a poet, and as a magistrate. While an epidemic disorder raged in Dreux, and all fled for safety, the humane Rotron remained to administer to the necessities of the poor; and in answer to his brother, who earnestly solicited his departure, he said, "the bells are tolling for the 22d person who has died this day, and how soon soever they may announce my departure, I know not, but I will not desert my post." Soon after the contagion carried him off, 28th June, 1650, in his 41st year. He was patronised by Richelieu, but never would condescend to please his patron, to attack the Cid of Corneille, a poet whom he revered and loved. He wrote thirty-seven plays, tragedies, and comedies, with vigor, spirit, and success, of which the best known are Chosroes, Antigone, and Wenceslaus, tragedies.

ROUCHER, J. A., a native of Montpellier, distinguished as a poet. He hailed the approach of the French revolution as an era which was to bless the earth; but when he beheld its atrocities, he spoke with freedom against the tyrants whose violent measures deluged the kingdom with blood. His observations drew down upon him the resentment of the revolutionary tribunal, and he was guillotined July 1794, and he met death with great composure and resignation, after seeing thirty-seven heads struck off before he suffered. His chief work is the Months, a poem in twelve cantos, which though occasionally tedious and weak, contains beautiful and animated descriptions. He also translated Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and some of his fugitive pieces appeared after his death, 2 vols. 8vo.

ROUILLE, Peter Julian, a Jesuit of Tours, professor of theology and philosophy to his order. He was engaged with Catrou in the composition of the Roman History in 21 vols. 4to. and also assisted in revising the Revolutions of Spain by d'Orleans. The Journal de Trevoux, was conducted by him from 1733 to 1737. He died at Paris 17th May, 1740, aged 57.

ROUSSEAU, John Baptist, an eminent French poet, born at Paris 1669. In 1693, he went as page in the embassy to Denmark, and from thence passed with marshal Tullard as his secretary to the English court. Distinction in literature, and not in opulence, was his chief aim, and therefore he refused about this time some honorable appointments which would have set him above dependence, and was better pleased to be enrolled member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres. About this time some satirical verses, very severe and grossly abusive, were produced as his own, and though he solemnly declared his innocence, and pronounced them forgeries invented by his enemies, he was tried by the parliament and banished the kingdom. The sentence was harsh, as even Voltaire his personal enemy admits, and he ever after protested that the treatment he received was unjust, cruel, and illiberal. From France he went to Switzerland, where he was protected by de Luc the French ambassador, and he afterwards went to Baden, where he was noticed by prince Eugene, and with him visited Vienna. In 1721 he came to London, where he published a collection of his poems, 2 vols. 4to. and by that means found his resources respectable. He returned to Paris incognito 1739, and listened to those offers of reconciliation which his friends promised to procure for him; but soon after he was attacked by a fit of apoplexy, at the Hague, and died of that dreadful visitation at Brussels, 17th March 1741. His poems consisting of odes, epigrams, epistles, and comedies in verse, have been published in 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 12mo. 1743. His poetry, particularly his odes, in Voltaire's opinion, are beautiful, diversified and abound with images. In his private character he was overbearing and unsubmitive; he quarrelled with his patron prince Eugene, and with the same levity and rudeness affronted the duke of Arenberg, who had kindly and liberally noticed him.

ROUSSEAU, John James, a celebrated philosopher, born 28th June, 1712, at Geneva, where his father was a watch-maker. Some juvenile frolic induced him to quit his father's house, and without protectors he changed his religion to procure bread. By the care of the bishop of Anneci, in whose house he solicited an asylum, he was placed with Mad. de Warens, a lady who had lately abandoned the protestant for the catholic tenets, and devoted part of her fortune to deeds of charity. Rousseau some time after quitted the hospitable roof of this amiable female, who had been to him a mother and a friend, and as he was fond of music he began to teach it at Chamberri. From Chamberri he came, in 1741, to Paris, and two years after went as secretary with Montague, the French ambassador, to Venice; but his proud and restless spirit could not long bear the confinement of servitude, and in consequence of a quarrel with his employer, he returned to Paris. Here he was noticed by Dupin, the farmer general, who gave him an office in his department, and at last, in 1750, he began his literary career, and obtained the prize of the academy of Dijon, on the subject, whether the re-establishment of the arts and sciences has been conducive to the purity of morals? He adopted, by the advice of his friend Diderot, the negative position, and defended it with such eloquence and success, that he excited a number of literary antagonists against him. He next attracted the public attention by his discourse on the cause of inequality among men and on the origin of society, a work of singular character, and which unites the boldest flights of imagination, with the most incoherent ideas, and elevates savage nature above the comforts of domestic and social life. This composition, dedicated in animated language to the republic of Geneva, restored him to the favor of his native country, and to the bosom of the protestant faith. After returning for a while to Paris, he retired to solitude, and devoted himself to study. His letter to d'Alembert, written about this time, and published in 1758, on the subject of establishing a theatre at Geneva, drew upon him the censures and the persecution of Voltaire and it was remarked with surprise that this bold advocate for the purity of morals against the contagion of theatrical representation had himself written a comedy, and a pastoral, which had been exhibited on the Paris stage. His next work was the Dictionary of Music, which contains many valuable articles, but not without inaccuracies. His New Heloise appeared in 1761, in 6 vols. 12mo. and, notwithstanding its many defects, and its immorality, excited much of the public attention, for its bold delineation of character, its interesting details, and its fascinating language. Heloise was followed in 1762 by Emilius in 4 vols. 12mo. a moral romance of still greater celebrity. In this popular work the philosopher wishes to leave in education every thing to nature, and whilst he inveighs in warm language against the luxuries, the vices, and the prejudices of the age, he speaks truths worthy of Plato and of Tacitus. It is, however, much to be lamented that in tracing out the education of a young man, and in drawing a most affecting picture of the benign author of christianity, and of the sublime beauties of the gospel, he attacks with blind misguided fury the miracles and the prophecies, on which that divine revelation rests, and builds his system of salvation on reason and natural religion. The book, though popular, was exposed to the censures and condemnation of the parliament of Paris, and the author hastened out of France. He sought an asylum at Geneva, but the gates of the city were shut against the disgraced philosopher, and he retired to Neuchâtel in Switzerland, where he began to write a defence of his works, and of his principles. Here, however, the populace was roused to acts of violence, by the pulpit discourses of the ministers of the neighborhood, and therefore fearing greater insults than the pelting of his windows, he fled from Neuchâtel. Berne, where he sought an asylum, was shut against him, and he therefore hastened to Strasburg, where the marshal de Contades relieved his necessities, and enabled him to proceed to Paris, in which place he expected the protection of David Hume. With the English philosopher he travelled to London, and found in that country a peaceful residence; but whilst he fled from persecution, the citizen of Geneva still longed for celebrity. In England he was a common man, and not the favorite of the people, admired and applauded, and therefore he soon quarrelled with his protector, Hume, and left the kingdom in disgust. He passed through Amiens and returned to Paris, where he was permitted to remain, provided he wrote nothing offensive against religion or the government. Ever restless and suspicious he now appeared in the Armenian dress, and when flattered by the homage of those who revered his abilities, he declared himself insulted, and began to interpret the approbation of the world as a regular system of persecution excited against him by men of letters. The last years of his life were spent in the company of a few friends, and while he seemed to condemn the fallacy of former opinions, he resigned himself to the peaceful studies and solitude of declining age. He died 2d July 1778, aged 66. The works of this singular character have been collected in 33 vols. 8vo. and 12mo.

ROUSSEL, Peter, a native of Ax in Panniers, who took his medical degrees at Montpellier, and was the pupil of the great Bordeu. He published Système Physique & Moral de la Femme, 12mo. a work of great merit, and began a work on the same subject on man. He died at Chateaudun, 1803, aged 60, and his eulogy was pronounced by his friend Bordeu.

ROUX, Augustin, a native of Gascony, who studied medicine, and took his degrees at Bourdeaux. He published a treatise on Purifying Liquors—Memoirs of Chenuistry—Typographical Annals—New portable Encyclopedie, 2 vols. 8vo.—and also continued Vandermonde's Journal of Medicine. He died 1776, aged 50.

ROWE, Nicolas, an eminent English poet, born 1673. Though his abilities might have raised him to eminence in the law, yet he preferred literature to all other pursuits, and at the age of twenty-five he produced his first tragedy the Ambitions Stepmother, which was received with universal applause. Tamerlane—the Fair Penitent—Ulysses—the Royal Convert—Jane Shore—and Lady Jane Grey, succeeded, and with equal approbation; but the poet found his powers inadequate to the ease and sprightliness of comedy, and his "Biter," was so little popular that it is not even inserted in his works. His literary fame made him known to the great; the duke of Queensbury, when secretary of state made him his public secretary, and on the Hanoverian succession he was appointed poet laureate, and land surveyor of the customs of the port of London, and afterwards chancellor Parker's secretary to the presentations, and clerk to the prince of Wales' council. He died 6th December 1718. He translated into verse Lucan's Pharsalia, and Quillet's Callipædia, and edited Shakspeare's plays, with an account of his life. Rowe is still a popular poet on the stage, and his Jane Shore, as Johnson says, is always seen and heard with pity. Though he does not often excite terror, yet he elevates the sentiments, and though he seldom pierces the breast, he always delights the ear, and often improves the understanding.

ROWE, Elizabeth, an English lady, known for her genius and virtues, daughter of Mr. Singer, a dissenting minister, and born at Ilchester, 11th September 1674. She early displayed a poetical genius, and in her 22d year were published some of her poems under the title of poems on several occasions, by Philomela. Her talents and virtues rendered her soon a favorite with the public, and among her respectable suitors she had the poet Prior; but she disregarded all applications till 1710, when she gave her hand to Mr. Thomas Rowe, a gentleman already known for his literary acquisitions. After his death, which happened 1715, and which she recorded in one of her best elegies, she lived in retirement at Frome, in the cultivation of the muses. She died 20th February 1736-7. After her death, agreeable to her request, her devotions were published by Dr. Watts, under the title of Devout Exercises of the Heart, and in 1739, appeared her miscellaneous works in prose, and verse, 2 vols. 8vo. These works contain the History of Joseph, a poem—Friendship in Death—and Letters Moral, and enforce by the strongest conviction and the most interesting examples, the love of virtue and the practice of every good and benevolent action.

ROWE, Thomas, the husband of the preceding, was son of Benoni Rowe a dissenting minister. He was born in London, and educated at the Charter-house, and at Leyden university. In 1710, two years after his return from the continent, he married Miss Singer, with whom he lived five years in the enjoyment of every domestic comfort, till a lingering illness put an end to his life, May 1718, in his 28th year. Among other things he wrote an ode to his wife, some time after his marriage, under the title of Delia, a proof of his love and of her many virtues. He also undertook to give a translation of Plutarch's Lives, but finished only eight.

ROWE, John, an English divine, born at Crediton, Devonshire, and educated at New Inn hall, Oxford. He was for some time a popular minister at Witney, Oxfordshire, and then removed to Tiverton, in his native county, and in 1654, settled as preacher in Westminster abbey, from which he was ejected 1662, for nonconformity. He died 12th October 1677, and was buried in Bunhill fields. His "Love of Christ," in thirty sermons, are a much esteemed publication. He wrote besides, some practical treatises.

ROWLAND, David S., congregational minister of Windsor, Connecticut, was born at Fairfield, in that state, in 1719, and graduated at Yale college, in 1743. He was first settled in Plainfield, and afterwards at Providence, Rhode-Island, where he remained twelve or thirteen years. At the commencement of the revolution he removed, and was installed, March 27th, 1776, pastor of the first church in Windsor, where he continued, greatly esteemed for his talents, piety, and usefulness, till his death, January 13th, 1794, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and forty-seventh of his ministry.

ROWLEY, William, an eminent physician, descended from an Irish family, born in London, 18th November 1743. After applying himself to the medical profession, he served in the army and was at the siege of Belleisle, and at the taking of the Havannah, and his conduct was so meritorious that he was employed by the ministry under the patronage of lord Keppel to make professional visits to Cuba, and all the Leeward islands, for which he was honorably rewarded. He settled afterwards in London, and acquired an extensive practice, but though he was honored with a doctor's degree from St. Andrew's, and had been admitted bachelor of medicine from St. Alban's hall, Oxford; some objections were made in that university to his obtaining the next degree, and he never took it. His publications were respectable in number, and all on medical subjects. Though a man of great observation and of extensive experience, it is remarkable that either from the love of singularity, or from prejudice, he opposed the vaccine inoculation, and thus impeded by the weight of his authority the adoption of a system which bids fair to extirpate one of the greatest scourges of the human race. This excellent man, whose humanity and benevolence were as conspicuous as his medical reputation was extensive, died 17th March, 1806, and was privately buried in St. James's chapel, Tottenham court road.

ROWNING, John, an able mathematician, fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards rector of Anderby, Lincolnshire. He died in Carey street, London, November 1771, aged 72. His compendious system of natural philosophy, 2 vols. 8vo. is a popular work, and has often been reprinted, and was once a standing class book at Cambridge.

ROY, Julian le, a native of Tours, who from his earliest years showed great mechanical knowledge. He came to Paris at the age of eighteen, and in 1713, was admitted into the society of clock makers. He raised his profession to the highest pitch of excellence, and his watches acquired the same celebrity in France, as those of Graham in England. He died at Paris, 20th September, 1759, aged 74, leaving four sons. Peter, the eldest, was watchmaker to the king, and published Memoirs for the Clock Makers of Paris, 4to.—Etrennes Chronometriques—treatise on the Labors of Harrison and le Roy for the discovery of Longitude at Sea, 4to.—Letter to M. de Marivetz. He died 1785. Julian David, another son, was member of the national institute, and became professor of architecture. He travelled over Greece and other countries, and published Ruins of the Finest Monuments of Greece, fol., a work of merit—History of the Construction of Christian Temples, 8vo.—Observations on the Edifices of the Ancients—on the Marine, Ships, Sails, &c., of the Ancients. He died of an apoplexy at the end of January, 1803, aged 75.

ROYSE, George, D.D., an English divine, born at Martock, Somersetshire, 1655, and educated at Edmund hall, Oxford. He became fellow of Oriel college, and was afterwards chaplain to king William, and to Tillotson the Primate, who gave him Newington rectory, Oxfordshire. He was elected provost of Oriel 1690, and afterwards was made dean of Bristol, and died April, 1708.

ROZIER, Francis, an eminent agriculturist, born at Lyons, 24th January, 1734. Though he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became doctor in divinity, and prior of Nanteuil, he devoted himself deeply to the study of his favorite science, and to botany, chemistry, and natural history. At Paris, he was noticed by the great and the powerful, but he sought for retirement at Bezieres, where he composed and finished his valuable course of agriculture in 10 vols. 4to. In 1783, he returned to Lyons, where the academy admitted him among its most honorable members. During the revolutions, he showed himself firm and moderate, but when Lyons was besieged, a bomb fell on his bed while he was asleep, and buried his shattered limbs among the ruins of the house, 29th September, 1793. He wrote besides, Memoirs on making Wine, on Mills and Presses, and other useful works on agricultural and commercial subjects.

RÜBENS, sir Peter Paul, a celebrated painter, born at Cologne, 1577. He studied at Antwerp, from which, for a time, the civil wars had driven his family; but while he applied to the belles lettres, he displayed a strong partiality for the art of designing. This taste was happily promoted, and after receiving instruction from the best Flemish masters, he went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself, especially by studying accurately the coloring of Titian, and all the striking beauties of Julio Romano, and Raphael and other illustrious painters. After an absence of seven years spent in viewing the cabinets of Italy, he returned to Antwerp. The fame of his great talents soon spread over Europe, and he was deservedly courted by great men and princes. He was invited to Paris by Mary de Medicis, to paint the Luxembourg gallery, and he became such a favorite with the infanta Isabella of Spain, that she sent him as her ambassador to England, to negotiate a peace in 1630. On his return to Spain, he was honorably received by Philip IV., and made secretary of state in Flanders. He died 1740, leaving an immense fortune behind him. Reubens was deservedly held in high esteem, and it is said, that few persons passed through Flanders without seeing a man, of whose talents and great reputation they had heard so much. Of his many pupils, Vandyke acquired the greatest celebrity.

RUDBECK, Olaus, professor of medicine at Upsal, wrote Exercitatio Anatomica, 4to.—Atlantica, sive Manheim Vera Japheti Posterorum Sedes ac Patera, 3 vols. fol. with an Atlas—Leges West-Gothicæ, fol.—Collection of Plants on Plates, 2 vols. fol.—Laponia Illustrata, et iter per Upland, 4to.—Dissertation on the Bird called Selai in the Bible. He died 1702, aged 73. His son, of the same name, was also an eminent physician, and published Dissertatio de Hederâ—a Catalogue of the plants of Lapland—Specimen Linguae Gothicæ, quarto.

RUDDIMAN, Thomas, a learned Scotchman, born in Aberdeenshire, 1684, and educated at Aberdeen. He was made overseer of the king's printing house, Edinburgh, and for near fifty years continued keeper of the advocates' library there, and distinguished himself for the many valuable books which he edited. He was strongly attached to the Stewart family, and therefore opposed the revolution. His diplomata et Numismata Scotiæ, are admired, but particularly his excellent Latin Grammar, with valuable notes. He died at Edinburgh, 1757, aged 84.

RUEDING, Rogers, an English divine, was born at Leicester, August 9, 1751. He became fellow of Merton college, Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of divinity, in 1782. In 1773, he was presented to the college living of Meldun in Surrey, and soon after, he was elected a fellow of the society of antiquaries, to whose archæologia he was a contributor. He published Annals of the Coinage of Britain, and its dependencies, in 4 vols. 4to. He died in 1820.

RUE, Charles de la, a French orator and poet, born at Paris, 1643. He was educated among the jesuits, and distinguished himself as a professor of belles lettres and rhetoric, and as an eloquent preacher. He published in 1667, the Conquest of Louis XIV., a Latin poem, which Corneille translated into French, with many high commendations of the original author. He was among the editors of the Dauphin classics, and published Virgil. He wrote also tragedies in Latin and French, which possessed great merit, besides 3 vols. of sermons, and died 1725, aged 82.

RUE, Charles de la, a Benedictine monk, born 1635. He was very learned in Greek and Hebrew, and became the friend and associate of Montfaucon, and by his advice, published the works of Origen, in 3 vols. fol. He died 1739.

RUFINUS, a father of the church. He was born at Aquileia, and was the friend and afterwards the antagonist of St. Jerome. He died in Sicily, 410. Besides a Latin translation of Josephus, and of some of the works of Origen, he wrote the lives of some of the fathers of the desert.

RUGGLES, Timothy, a brigadier-general, under general Amherst, in the expedition against Canada, was born at Rochester, Massachusetts, October 11th, 1711, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1732. He established himself as a lawyer first at Sandwich, and afterwards at Hardwick, and attained to high respectability in the profession. He served as a brigadier-general in the French war, and was second in command in the battle with Dicksaw. In 1756, he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for Worcester, and in 1762, chief justice, and held the office till the revolution, when he joined the Royal party, and left the state. He had been for many years a member of the legislature, and possessed a large share of influence, and was, in 1765, sent a delegate to the congress, which met at New-York, but refused to concur in the measure adopted by it, for which he was reprimanded by order of the legislature. After the war, he resided in Nova Scotia, and died in 1798.

RUHNKENIUS, David, a native of Stolp in Pomerania, who became professor of belles lettres and history, and librarian in Leyden university. He died 14th May, 1798, aged 75. He wrote Epistolæ Criticæ in Hesiodi and Homeri Hymnos—de Vitâ et Scriptis Longini—Timæi Sophistæ Lexicon—Historia Critica Oratorum Græcorum, 2 vols. 8vo.—Editions of V. Paterculus, Rutilius Lupus. The life of this able and learned critic has been published by Wyttenbach.

RUINART, Thierry, a Benedictine monk, born at Rheims, 1657. He was an able theologian, and was the associate of Mabillon, in his literary labors. He was author of the Acts of the Martyrs of the Four first centuries, 4to.—History of the Persecution of the Vandals, 4to.—the Life of Mabillon—the Life of Pope Urban V., besides an edition of Gregory of Tours. He died 1709.

RULE, Gilbert, a native of Elgin, educated at Aberdeen, where he became professor of philosophy. He was, in 1659, made principal of his college; but he was ejected two years after, for non-conformity, after which he went to Leyden, and took his degrees in medicine. At the revolution, he was appointed principal of the university of Edinburgh, and died there, 1705, aged 77. He wrote some pieces in defence of his nonconformity, and against episcopacy, of little merit. Some specimens of his pulpit oratory are preserved in the Scotch presbyterian eloquence.

RULHIÈRES, N. de, a learned Frenchman, secretary to the French ambassador l'Hopital in Russia, when Peter III. was hurled from his throne. He published a short but very interesting account of this extraordinary event, and afterwards gave an history of the revolution in Poland. He was preparing an account of the French revolution, when he died suddenly, 30th January, 1791. He wrote besides, a pamphlet of great merit, on the Protestants of France, and two poems on Disputes—les Jeux des Mains. Two volumes of his posthumous works appeared 12mo., 1791.

RUMJANZOFF, Nicholas Petrowitsch, Count, Chancellor of the Russian Empire, who distinguished himself in the reign of Catharine, by victories over the Turks. He commenced his career about the year 1785; and after holding various stations of honor in the government, he devoted his time and his wealth to the interests of literature and philanthropy. In 1820, he established a charitable school. He collected from sixty to two hundred of the vagrant and mendicant children of bond peasants, in a wing of his castle, where they were clothed, fed, taught on the system of mutual instruction, and exercised in some trade. To him we are indebted for the first edition, in the Tartar language, of Abulgasi's History of the Mongols and Tartars. He died 1826, aged 73 years.

RUMSEY, James, an ingenious mechanic of Berkley county, Virginia, who invented a method of employing steam in navigation, in 1782, and obtained a patent for it from Virginia, in 1787. In 1784 he published a treatise on the subject in controversy with John Fitch, who claimed to have also about the same time discovered a method of propelling vessels by steam. Rumsey's method was carried into effect on a small scale both in the United States and England, but did not succeed. He died at Philadelphia, while publicly delivering a description of his invention. Fitch also, whose invention was subsequent to Rumsey's, obtained a patent for it from Virginia in 1788, and made a trial of it on the Delaware. But it was equally unsuccessful.

RUMPHIUS, George Everard, doctor of medicine in Hanau university, became consul at Amboyna, and paid there particular attention to botanical pursuits. Though he had the misfortune to lose his sight at the age of 43, he yet followed his favorite studies, and by the delicate powers of his taste and of his smell, he still distinguished all the varieties of plants. His learned labors were presented to the public in 1755, with a supplement by John Burmann, in 6 vols. fol. He published besides, Imagines Piscium Testaceorum, fol. 1711, and Political History of Amboyna.

RUNDLE, Thomas, LL. D., a learned prelate, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. The friendship of lord Talbot, to whom he was chaplain, procured him preferment, and he became archdeacon of Wilts, treasurer of Sarum, rector of Sedgfield, and prebendary of Durham, which he exchanged in 1735, for the see of Derry. He was the intimate friend of the learned and of the polite in his age. A volume of his letters has been printed. He died 1743.

RUPERT, Prince, son of Frederic king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth daughter of James I., visited England at the beginning of the civil wars, and as he acquired some military knowledge abroad, he was intrusted by Charles with the command of some of his armies, and behaved with spirit and address. Under the second Charles he was placed at the head of the navy, and defeated the Dutch fleet in 1673. In the midst of his military engagements he paid particular attention to the arts and sciences, he was fond of chemistry, and from the accidental observation of a soldier scraping his rusty gun he invented mezzotinto printing, of which he himself executed the first specimen, still to be seen in Evelyn's Sculptura, first edition. This gallant prince died 1682.

RUSH, Benjamin, M.D., LL.D., a distinguished American physician, was born January 5th, 1745, near Bristol, about twelve miles from Philadelphia. His father died while he was young, and left him to the care of an intelligent and pious mother, who gave him a virtuous education. At the age of eight or nine years he was placed under the tuition of Dr. Samuel Finley, afterwards president of the college at Princeton, and after becoming accomplished in the knowledge of Latin and Greek, he entered that institution, then under the care of president Davies, and was graduated in 1760. The next succeeding six years he devoted to the study of medicine, under the direction of Dr. John Redman of Philadelphia. He there embarked for Europe, and attended the medical lectures at the University of Edinburgh for two years, and afterwards spent some time at the hospitals in London. In 1769 he returned to America, with qualifications for his profession seldom equalled, and commenced the practice of physic in Philadelphia, where his superior talents and learning, and highly amiable and engaging manners, soon procured him extensive practice. Not long after his establishment there he was appointed professor of chemistry in the medical school in that city. In 1789 he became professor of the theory and practice of medicine; in 1791 of the institutes of medicine and clinical practice; and in 1805 was chosen to the united professorships of the theory and practice of medicine, and of clinical medicine, which he held the remainder of his life. On the commencement of the contest with Great Britain, Dr. Rush entered with warmth into the defence of the rights of the colonies, and in 1776 was elected a member of congress, and signed the declaration of independence. In April of the next year he was appointed surgeon-general of the military hospitals of the middle department; but, preferring the place of physician-general, for which his studies had better qualified him, he was transferred to that station in July. He resigned that office in 1778, and after employing his influence to promote the establishment of a new constitution in Pennsylvania, and serving as a member in the convention of that state, which ratified the constitution of the United States, retired from political life, and devoted himself to medical studies. He had before this period published several medical tracts, and he continued for many years to add frequently to their number. In 1798 he collected his works relating to medicine, and published them in five volumes. They were republished in 1804, in four volumes, and again in 1809. His volume on diseases of the mind he gave to the world in 1812. He died on the 18th of April, 1813, in the 69th year of his age. Dr. Rush was one of the greatest and best men who have adorned his country. He possessed an acute and rapid perception, a discriminating judgment, a brilliant imagination, a retentive memory, and a cultivated taste. He was a most assiduous and persevering student; his knowledge was various and profound, and he eminently excelled in the several departments of his profession, both as a practitioner and lecturer. His writings are a noble monument of his genius. His investigations were characterized by great independence and originality. He added many important facts to the science of medicine, and was peculiarly felicitous in his method of describing diseases. His works enjoyed an uncommonly extensive circulation, and gave him a rank in the estimation of foreigners, as well as his own countrymen, among the greatest men who have adorned his profession. In private life he was distinguished by amiableness, modesty, uprightness, affability, uncommon powers of conversation, great punctuality to his engagements, and great philanthropy; and he enjoyed to a remarkable degree the confidence, esteem, and admiration of all around him. To those characteristics he also added, in an eminent degree, the virtues of an enlightened and practical Christian.

RUSH, Jacob, LL.D., brother of Dr. Benjamin Rush was born in 1746; and graduated at Princeton college in 1765. For several years he was president of the court of common pleas in Philadelphia, where he died January 5th, 1820, aged 74 years. He published charges on moral and religious subjects; and, was also engaged in some controversial publications.

RUSHWORTH, John, a learned Englishman, born in Northumberland 1607, and educated at Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar. He was very expert as a short hand writer, and in consequence of his great dexterity was employed to minute down the particulars of the most important debates and causes in parliament, and in the courts of justice. He was in 1640, appointed joint clerk to the house of commons, and afterwards attended his relation general Fairfax as his secretary. In 1658, he was chosen member for Berwick, and also in 1660, and 1678, and the next year, and he recommended himself to the king's favor, by presenting to him some valuable records of the privy council, which he had preserved during the civil wars. Either through extravagance or carelessness, he was imprisoned in the king's bench, and died there after six years' confinement, 12th May, 1690. His historical collections of private passages in state, appeared at various times in 7 vols. fol. and were reprinted in 1721, with an additional volume.

RUSSEL, Alexander, physician to the English factory at Aleppo, was born and educated at Edinburgh. During his residence in Turkey, he applied himself to acquire the knowledge of the language, and gained great celebrity by his medical abilities, which procured him the patronage and friendship of the pacha of Aleppo. He returned to Europe in 1759, and was elected physician of St. Thomas's hospital, London. His history of Aleppo has been considered as a valuable performance, which has been translated into various languages. He died in London 1770.

RUSSEL, lord William, third son of William, the first duke of Bedford, was born about 1641. He obtained a seat in the house of commons under Charles II. and distinguished himself as a violent opposer of the succession of the duke of York to the throne. His conduct was regarded by the court with a jealous eye, and at last he was arrested as guilty of treasonable practices, in conjunction with the duke of Monmouth, and condemned to death. He was beheaded in Lincoln's inn fields, 21st July, 1683. After the revolution his sentence was revised, and an act passed to examine who were the authors of his death. He had married, in 1667, Rachael, second daughter of Thomas Wriotesley, earl of Southampton, widow of lord Vaughan, a woman of great merit and piety. When she heard of his condemnation, she threw herself at the king's feet, but she implored in vain; Charles was inexorable, and she immediately went to the Tower, and employed all the powers of affection and eloquence in exhorting her husband to support the dignity of his character, and to die with heroic resolution, and all the firmness of a Christian. She parted from him on the day of his execution, and he, turning from her exclaimed, "the bitterness of death is now past." This excellent woman continued a widow till her death, 1723, at the age of 87, and she had the consolation to see her second son succeed to the honors and to the estates of the Bedford family. The letters which passed between her and her husband have been published, and display, in the strongest features, the characters of a man of upright integrity, and of a woman of the most generous heart, and the most affectionate sentiments.

RUSSELL, William, LL.D., a Scotch historical writer of some eminence in the last century. He was born in 1746, and, having received his education, was apprenticed to a bookseller and printer. On the termination of his indentures, he published a Collection of modern Poems; and removing to London, he engaged in business as a printer, but afterwards employed his time in writing for the press. He was the author of the History of America from its Discovery by Columbus to the Conclusion of the late War, 1778, 2 vols. 4to.; and the History of Modern Europe, with an Account of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, in a Series of Letters, 1779, 4 vols., 8vo. are very popular. He received his degree from a Scottish university. His death took place in 1793.

RUSSELL, Chambers, a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was the son of the Hon. Daniel Russel, a member of the council and inquest officer of Massachusetts, by a daughter of the Hon. Charles Chambers. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1731. In 1747 he succeeded Mr. Auchmuty as judge of the admiralty court, and died at Dover in England, in 1766. The family of Russels was one of the first rank and respectability in Massachusetts. Richard Russell the ancestor who came first to America, was from Herefordshire in England. He was treasurer, and a magistrate of the province, in 1659. His son, grandson, and two great grandsons, were members of the council.

RUSSELL, Thomas, who died in Boston, in 1796, was a descendant of the above. He was a merchant, and a member of the council. The first American ship employed in the Russian trade was owned by him. His wife was a daughter of colonel Watson of Plymouth, and after his death the lady of sir Grenville Temple.

RUTGERS, Henry, a citizen of the city of New York, and a patriot of the American revolution. His house was used by the British for a hospital, and he fought upon the heights of Brooklyn. Colonel Rutgers was a man of great wealth; and his charities were abundant for almost every public object. For individuals also he gave liberally. In one instance he received a note, in which the writer, then at the door, begged his assistance, intimating that in the failure of it he should kill himself. It appeared that the young man had ruined himself by gambling. By cautiously interposing, this good steward of wealth, saved the applicant from his meditated crime and from misery, who afterwards became a man of respectability and piety.

RUTHERFORD, Daniel, a natural philosopher and physician, was born, in 1749, at Edinburgh, at the university of which he studied. In 1786 he was appointed professor of botany, and keeper of the botanic garden. He died in 1819. Dr. Rutherford was the discoverer of nitrogen, and was one of the first, if not the first, who observed the acidifying power of oxygen.

RUTHERFORTH, Thomas, D.D., a divine, was born, in 1712, at Rapworth Everard, in Cambridgeshire; was educated at Saint John's College, Cambridge; became professor of divinity in 1745; and died, in 1771, rector of Barley, in Hertfordshire, and archdeacon of Essex. Of his works, the most important are, A System of Natural Philosophy; Institutes of Natural Law; A Discourse on Miracles; and Sermons.

RUTLEDGE, John, an eminent patriot of South Carolina, who early distinguished himself in the cause of the American revolution. He was a member of the first congress in 1774. When the temporary constitution of South Carolina was established in March 1776, he was appointed the president, and commander in chief of the colony. He continued in this station till the adoption of the new constitution in 1778. In 1779 he was chosen governor. In 1784 he was a judge of the court of chancery; in 1789 a judge of the supreme court of the United States; in 1791 chief justice of South Carolina; and in 1796 chief justice of the United States. He was a man of eminent talents, patriotism, energy, and firmness. Judge Rutledge was a native of Ireland, but came to America about the year 1735. He died in July 1800.

RUTLEDGE, Edward, governor of South Carolina, and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Charleston in 1749. He was a brother of the preceding, in whose office he was placed to prepare himself for the practice of law. Afterwards he went to England and completed his legal education. On his return home he established himself in his profession at Charleston, where he soon rose to distinction. From 1774 to 1777 he was a member of congress. In 1798 he was elected governor. He died January 23d, 1800, aged 50 years. The services of governor Rutledge were of great value to his country, and they will long be held in high estimation. When in the profession of law, it is said, he would not engage in a cause unless he believed it good; not being willing to lend his powers of persuasion to support iniquity or to shield oppression. His eloquence was of a high grade, being insinuating and conciliatory.

RUYSCH, Frederic, a famous Dutch anatomist, born at the Hague, 1633. He studied at Leyden and Franeker, and then settled at the Hague, which he left on an honorable invitation to become anatomical professor at Amsterdam. Here he devoted himself, with indefatigable industry, in the dissection and examination of the various parts of the human body, and made a most valuable collection of natural curiosities, which he was prevailed upon to present, for 30,000 florins, to the Czar Peter, when he visited Amsterdam, and honored the professor with his notice and esteem. His anatomical works, which are very valuable, appeared in 4 vols. 4to. He was member of the London royal society, and of the Paris academy of sciences, and died February 22d, 1731, aged 93.

RUYTER, Michael Adrian, a famous Dutch admiral, born at Flushing in Zealand, 1607. At the age of 11 he began his military career, and after various services, after going eight times to the West Indies, and twice to the Brazils, he was made admiral in 1641. He assisted the Portuguese against the Spaniards with great bravery, and afterwards went to the port of Salee, on the Barbary coast, where he defeated a superior force of Algerine corsairs. In 1653 he was second in command to Van Tromp in the three battles fought against the English, and two years after he displayed his valor against the Turks in the Mediterranean. His services to Denmark against the Swedes in 1659, procured to him a liberal pension from the king, and the honors of nobility. His next expedition was against the combined fleets of England and France in 1672, where he upheld his former character of bravery and intrepidity, and the next year he was engaged again in three battles with the same hostile squadrons. He was in 1676 in the Mediterranean, and in an engagement with the French fleet before Sicily, he unfortunately received a wound, which proved fatal a few days after. His death was lamented not only by his nation, but even Louis XIV. expressed his sorrow at the fate of a man who had carried personal bravery and cool presence of mind to so high a pitch.

RYCQUIUS, Justus, a native of Ghent, who travelled into Italy, and was honored with the title of citizen of Rome, in consequence of his writings. He was made by Urban VIII. professor of eloquence at Bologna, where he died 1627. His work de Capitolio Romano, 1617, 4to. is a valuable composition, which was again edited at Leyden, by J. Gronovius, with learned notes.

RYLAND, John, author of the Christian Student and Pastor—the Preceptor—Elements of Mechanics—sermons—and some controversial tracts, was a baptist preacher at Northampton. To increase his income, he kept for some years an academy, and died at Enfield, 1792. As his reputation was extensive among people of his persuasion, he received the honorary degree of M. A. from Edinburgh university, and as a literary character he was flattered by the friendship and correspondence of Dr. Johnson, Doddridge, Hervey, and other learned men.

RYMER, Thomas, an eminent English antiquary, born in Yorkshire, and educated at Northallerton school, and at Cambridge. He afterwards entered at Gray's inn, and in 1692, became historiographer to William III. He devoted some of his time to poetry, but his tragedy of Edgar possesses little merit, and his View of the Tragedies of the last Age, displays his abilities as a critic in a very unfavorable light, as severe, partial, and uncandid, and an acrimonious detractor of the immortal reputation of Shakspeare. The best known work of Rymer is his Fœdera, in 20 vols. folio, a most valuable collection, containing public acts, conventions, treaties, state papers, letters, foreign correspondence, reprinted at the Hague in 10 vols. abridged by Rapin, and translated by Whatley in four vols. 8vo. 1731.

RYVES, sir Thomas, a civilian, born in Dorsetshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He applied himself to the civil law in Doctors Commons, and distinguished himself greatly in that profession. He was made master in chancery, king's advocate, and was knighted by Charles I. whom he served with great ability, not only in the cabinet, but in the field during the civil wars. He died in 1651, and was buried in St. Clement Danes, near Temple bar. He was a learned man, and wrote the Vicar's Plea—Historia Navalis Antiqua—and Historia navalis Media.

RYVES, Bruno, a celebrated preacher, related to the preceding. He was chaplain to Charles I. and for his attachment to his master, was exposed, during the civil wars, to persecution and plunder; but at the restoration, he was made dean of Windsor, and secretary to the Garter. He died 1677. He was author of Mercurius Rusticus, a political paper, first printed, 22d August 1642.—Querela Cantabrigiensis,—a Catalogue of those Lords, Persons of Quality, slain or executed during the civil war—and some Sermons.

RYVES, Eliza, an Irish lady, known for her literary abilities. Her family was respectable; but a law-suit devoured the little property which she possessed, and she found protection and subsistence by the labors of her pen. She wrote the Hermit of Snowdon, a novel—besides some popular translations from the French, and a liberal contribution to the annual registers. She died in London, 1797.

RZEWIESKY, Wenceslaus, a Polish nobleman, was born in 1705; filled various high offices, among which was that of grand general of the crown; was six years a prisoner in Russia, for his opposition to the election of Stanislaus Potowski; and died in 1779. He is the author of two tragedies; two comedies; poems; A Course of Rhetoric; several other works; and a translation of Horace's Odes.

S.

SA, or SAA, Emanuel, a jesuit, born at Condé, in Portugal. He was public professor of theology at Coimbra and Roine, and then became a preacher, and was employed by Pius V. to complete a new edition of the bible. He wrote besides, Scholia in quatuor Evangelia—Notationes in totam Sacram Scripturam—Aphorismi Confessoriorum, and died at Arona, 30th December 1596, aged 66.

SAADAS GAON, a Jewish rabbi, author of a book on the Belief of the Jews—an Arabic translation of the Old Testament—Commentaries on Ezra and Daniel—Explanation of the Jezirah. He was at the head of the school at Sora, near Babylon, and died 943.

SAAS, John, a native of Franqueville, near Rouen, who died of an apoplexy, 10th April 1774, aged 72. He was member of the Rouen academy, secretary to the archbishop, and afterwards canon of the church, and librarian. He wrote an account of the MSS. of the Cathedral of Rouen—an Abridgment of the French Historical Dictionary, 4 vols.—Criticisms on the Supplement to Moreri—on the Encyclopedie, and other things.

SAAVEDRA, Michael de Cervantes, a celebrated Spanish writer, author of Don Quixote, born at Madrid, 1549. He was from his very youth unusually fond of reading novels, and curious adventures, and thus he began to lay the foundation for those comic and striking incidents which prove so amusing and so interesting in his hero. He quitted Spain for Italy, and he was chamberlain to cardinal Aquaviva at Rome. He was also for some time engaged in the hardy profession of a soldier, under the victorious Colonna, and was at the battle of Lepanto, 1571, in which he lost his left hand, which was either shot, or dreadfully maimed by an harquebus. In 1574, he was unfortunately taken by a Barbary corsair, and carried to Algiers, where he endured, for five years and a half, all the horrors of captivity, till ransomed by the religious society of redemption. On his return to Spain, he began to write comedies and tragedies for his maintenance; but though his pieces were acted with universal applause at Madrid, he pined in poverty, and at last found himself in a prison. In his confinement he began his Don Quixote, of which the first part appeared in 1605, and the second part ten years after. This immortal work was a strong and pleasant satire on the books of knight errantry, which were then so fashionable in Spain, and it met with universal approbation; and though written to ridicule the follies of a particular age, it continues still to be read and admired in every known language. Though deservedly popular, Cervantes, such is too often the fate of literary men, was little noticed by the great; the book was read, but the author was neglected, and he could not obtain the small pittance of a pension, which might have kept him above want. Yet, in the midst of his wretchedness, he preserved his serenity and pleasantness, and in his last moments displayed that unconcern and jocularly which would have become a happier period of life. He received extreme unction at Madrid, 18th April, 1616, and died soon after, but what day is not ascertained. Besides Don Quixote, and dramatic pieces, he wrote the Troubles of Persiles and Sigismunda, a novel—Galatea, a novel, in six books.

SAAVEDRA FAJARDO, Diego, a noble Spaniard, born in Murcia. He was for some time ambassador in Switzerland, and was made knight of St. Jago, and member of the supreme council of the Indies. He wrote Idea of a Politic Prince— the Gothic Crown—the Literary Republic, a work of merit, translated into French at Lausanne, 1770. He died 1648.

SABBATHIER, Peter, a native of Poitiers, of the order of the Benedictines of St. Maur. For twenty years, he was engaged in making a collection of the Latin versions of the bible, which was published in 1743, under the title of Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinæ Versiones Antiquæ, 3 vols. folio. The two last volumes were published, not by the author, but by Charles de la Rue. He died at Rheims, 24th March, 1742, aged 60.

SABELLICUS, Mark Anthony Cocceius, a learned Italian, born at Vicovaro, and made professor of belles lettres at Udina, and librarian to St. Mark's at Venice. He was an able teacher, and began an Universal History, of which one vol. appeared, besides an History of the Venetian Republic, folio, and other pieces in prose and verse. He died 1506, aged about 70.

SABEO, Faustus, a native of Bresse in the Venetian territory, who distinguished himself as a poet. His edition of Arnobius, Rome, 1542, in folio, is much valued. He was honored with a gold chain from the emperor, Henry II., to whom he dedicated his epigrams, 1556. He died about 1558, aged 80.

SABINA, Julia, wife of Adrian, was celebrated for her respectable character in public and private life. Her husband, at his death, prevailed upon her to take poison, and not to survive him, A.D. 138.

SABINUS, George, an excellent modern Latin poet. He was born in the electorate of Brandenburg, 1508, and by his talents, acquired the esteem of the learned of his times. He married in 1536, Melancthon's eldest daughter, after whose death, at Königsberg, 1547, he settled at Frankfort on the Oder, where, in the character of professor, he acquired great celebrity. He was patronised by the elector of Brandenburg, and also employed in various negotiations by the emperor, Charles V., who esteemed him, and respected his talents. He died in consequence of an illness contracted in Italy, 1560. His Res Gestæ Cesarum Romanorum, and other poems, are well known.

SABLIER, N., a French writer of eminence. He published Variétés Sérieuses & Amusantes, 4 vols. 12mo.—Essai sur les Langues, 8vo.—besides translations from Goldoni, and other authors. He died at Paris, 10th March, 1785, aged 93. Another of that name wrote two dramatic pieces for the Italian theatre, and died about 1760.

SABLIÈRE, Anthony de Rambouillet de la, a French poet. He died at Paris, 1680, and his Madrigals, admired for their simplicity and delicate sentiments, were published by his son. His wife, Hesselin, seemed to retain his virtues, and she was the friend of the learned, and particularly of Fontaine, who has repaid her kindness, and the honorable asylum which for many years she gave him in her family, by immortalizing her name in his poems.

SACCHI, Andrea, an Italian painter, born at Rome, 1601. He studied with great assiduity, the labors of his predecessors, and the antique marbles; and by the directions of Albani, and his own exertions, he soon acquired a celebrity superior to that of his cotemporaries. He was ambitious to be correct, and therefore did little, and but slowly; and as he said, he never did anything but what he proposed should be seen by Raphael and Hannibal. He was patronized by some of the cardinals, and particularly by Urban VIII., whose picture he drew, and in such a correct style, as to be equal to the best efforts of ancient or modern times. He died 1661.

SACCHINI, Antoine Marie Gasper, an able musician, born at Naples, 1735. He studied under Durante; and at Rome, Venice, and Naples, he began to display those great powers of composition and harmony which procured him so much applause in Germany, Holland, England, and Paris. He was of a benevolent disposition, and died at Paris, 1786. His operas were much admired.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, D.D., an English divine, of celebrated notoriety. He was son of a poor clergyman at Marlborough, and was educated by the kindness of his god-father, and placed at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he became deny, 1687, and afterwards fellow. His regularity and polite manners rendered him a favorite tutor in the college, and his Latin poems, some of which appeared in the Muse Anglicanæ, proved him an elegant scholar and a man of respectable talents. He was at Oxford, the contemporary and the friend of Addison, who inscribed his farewell poem to the muses, to him, as his dearest friend and colleague. His first preferment was Cannock, Staffordshire, to which, in 1705, was added the preachingship of St. Saviour's, Southwark. His two famous sermons were delivered at Derby, 14th August, 1709, and at St. Paul's, November 9th, before the lord mayor, and as in one of them he was supposed to allude, under the name of Volpone, to lord Godolphin, they excited great attention, and drew upon him the resentment of parliament. His trial before the peers, began 27th February, 1709-10, and ended the 23d March; but though he was suspended for three years from preaching, and his sermons were burnt by the hands of the executioner, so violent was the party spirit of the times, that in laying the foundation of his future preferment it completely overturned the ministry. The queen saw with pleasure, the propagation of sentiments which enforced the divine rights of monarchs, and submissive obedience to her authority, and when the punishment of this persecuted divine, therefore, was expired, he was presented to the valuable living of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and received with such enthusiasm by the people, that of the first sermon which he preached, and which he sold for £100, forty thousand copies were immediately distributed through the nation. Thus, for a while, regarded as the champion of the church, and as the victim of party, Sacheverell enjoyed honors and popularity, till at last he sunk into retirement and obscurity. He died 5th June, 1724, and by his will, left £500, to bishop Atterbury, who is supposed to have written for him the defence which he made before the peers, and to have composed the elegant Latin inscription for the silver bason gilt, which he presented to his counsel and defender, sir Simon Harcourt. He is described by the duchess of Marlborough, who, no doubt, was displeased at his popularity, as an ignorant impudent incendiary, a man who was the scorn of those who made use of him as a tool; and Burnet, with equal contempt, observes of him, that he possessed little of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense, but forced himself to preferment, by railing at dissenters and low church men.

SACKVILLE, Thomas, first lord Buckhurst, was born at Buckhurst, Sussex, 1536. He was entered at Oxford, and then removed to Cambridge, and afterwards to the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar. He early acquired celebrity by his Induction, or introduction to the Myrror of Magistrates, a series of poems, and by his Gorboduc, a tragedy, acted in 1561, with great applause, at Whitehall, before the queen. When thus distinguished as a writer, he laid down his pen, and became a statesman. He was called up to the peerage, and served Elizabeth, to whom he was related by her mother's side, in various negotiations. In 1590, he was made knight of the garter, and the next year chancellor of Oxford, and in 1593, treasurer, in the room of lord Burleigh. Though he had been one of the commissioners who tried the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots, he was noticed by James, on his accession to the English crown, and was created, 1604, earl of Dorset. He died suddenly, April, 1608. It appears according to the testimony of Naunton, and others, that he was an able, virtuous, and magnanimous statesman, and few first ministers have left so fair a character.

SACKVILLE, Charles, earl of Dorset and Middlesex, descended from lord Buckhurst, was born 1637. He sat for some time as member for East Grinstead; but he was too fond of gallantry, and the licentious excesses of a corrupt court, to apply himself to political affairs. He served as volunteer in the Dutch war in 1665, under the duke of York, and the night previous to the naval engagement, composed a celebrated song, still regarded as the best of his poetical pieces. He was afterwards employed in embassies by the king, and in 1674, succeeded to the estates of his uncle, earl of Middlesex, and to the honors of his father, two years after. The violent measures of James were wholly disagreeable to him, and he warmly espoused the cause of the prince of Orange, and accompanied Anne in her flight to Northampton, and for his attachment to the revolution, he was made chamberlain of the household, a privy counsellor, and knight of the garter. He died at Bath, 19th January, 1705-6, and was succeeded by Lionel, his son by his second wife, who in 1720, was raised to the dignity of a duke. Lord Dorset was not only a poet, but also the friend and patron of learned men, and he has been commended in the highest strain of panegyric and admiration, by Dryden, Congreve, Addison, and especially by Prior, whose dedication of his works to his son is deservedly considered as a composition of superior merit. His poems are short and few, but possess great beauty.

SACKVILLE, Edward, earl of Dorset, and grandson of the above, was born 1590. He was sent in 1620, with a force, to assist Frederic, king of Bohemia, and was at the battle of Prague, fought that year, and in 1621, he went as ambassador from England to the French court. His abilities recommended him strongly to the favor of his master Charles, and after his brother's death, to whose title and estates he succeeded, 1624, he was advanced in the government, and made knight of the garter, president of the council, and lord privy seal. He died 1652, and was succeeded by his son Richard, who died 1677. There is in the 129th paper of the Guardian, an account of a duel which he fought in Zealand, with lord Bruce, in 1613, and in which he killed his antagonist.

SACKVILLE, George viscount, third son of the first duke of Dorset, was born in 1716. From Westminster school he went to Ireland, where his father was appointed viceroy, and he received his education in Trinity college, Dublin. He afterwards embraced the military profession, and was at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy, and distinguished himself under the duke of Cumberland, against the Scotch rebels. In 1758, he rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and went with Marlborough in the expedition against St. Malo's. At the battle of Minden, the next year, where he commanded the united English and Hanoverian cavalry, his conduct was highly censured, because during the action he did not bring up his troops with the celerity which he was ordered. Whether the delay originated in the unintelligible manner in which the orders were conveyed, or the timidity of the general, is unknown; but a court martial dismissed him from the service, and his name was struck off from the list of privy counsellors. These severe measures were condemned in the next reign, and he was restored to the favor and protection of his sovereign, and advanced to places of trust and honor. In 1769 he assumed the name of Germaine, according to the will of lady Elizabeth Germaine, to whose property he succeeded, and the next year he attracted much of the public notice by the duel which he fought with governor Johnstone, who, in one of his speeches in the house of Commons, had reflected on his conduct with more asperity than good manners permitted. He was, in 1775, made secretary of state for the colonial department, and also first lord of the board of trade; but on the change of ministry he gave up his appointment, and in 1782 he was created a viscount. He died 26th August 1785.

SACY, Lewis de, an eloquent advocate of the parliament of Paris, and a learned member of the French academy. He published an excellent French translation of Pliny's Letters, and a Panegyric on Trajan, 3 vols. 12mo.—treatises on Friendship—and on Glory—a Collection of Facts, and other pieces, 2 vols. 4to. He died at Paris, 26th October 1727, aged 73.

SADDER, or SAAHDI, a famous Persian poet, born at Schiraz, 1193. The invasion of Persia by the Turks, drove him into Palestine, where he fell into the hands of the Franks, then on a crusade, and was treated as a slave, till ransomed by the kindness of an Aleppo merchant, whose rich daughter he married. This union proved not the source of happiness, and the poet complained bitterly of the disagreeable temper and manners of his wife. He died, it is said, at the advanced age of 116. His poems have been much admired, though Voltaire and others affect to speak of them with contempt. They have been translated at Calcutta, 1795, folio.

SADELER, John, a native of Brussels, 1550, eminent as a designer and engraver. He was patronised by the duke of Bavaria, and after travelling into Italy, and presenting some of his pieces to Clement VIII, who received them with barren praise, he returned to Venice, where he died. His brother and pupil Raphael, was also an excellent artist. He accompanied his brother to Rome, and died at Venice. Their nephew Giles, was superior to his uncles in taste, and in the neatness and elegance of his engravings. He was for some time in Italy, and was patronised by the emperor Rodolphus II. and his two successors. He died at Prague, 1629, aged 59. His Vestiges of the Antiquities of Rome, folio, 1660, are much and deservedly admired.

SADLEIR, sir Ralph, an English statesman, born at Hackney in Middlesex, 1507. He was educated under Cromwell earl of Essex, and by his abilities and good conduct became known to Henry VIII. who employed him in several political affairs, and at last admitted him into the privy council, and made him secretary of state. He was at the battle of Musselburgh in Scotland, and for his bravery was made a knight banneret. After being also in favor with Elizabeth, and holding under her offices of trust and honor, he died at his seat of Standon, Herts, 30th March, 1587, aged 80.

SADLER, John, an English writer, born in Shropshire, 1615, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He entered afterwards at Lincoln's inn, and was in 1644 made master in chancery, and in 1649 town clerk of London. He was in great favor with Cromwell, and was offered, by him, the place of chief justice of Munster in Ireland, which he declined. He was also member of parliament; but at the restoration he lost all his places, because he refused to subscribe to the oath which declared it unlawful, under any pretence whatever, to take up arms against the king. To this public misfortune was afterwards added the loss of some of his houses by the great fire of London, and in consequence of these calamities, he retired to privacy on his estate of Warmwell, Dorsetshire, where he died, April 1674, aged 59. He wrote Rights of the Kingdom, or Customs of our Ancestors, much esteemed—and "Olbia," or the New Island discovered.

SADLER, Anthony, D.D. a native of Chilton, Wilts, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of doctor of divinity. He was chaplain to Charles II. after the restoration, and published a Divine Masque, inscribed to general Monk—several tracts—and sermons, and died 1680.

SADLER William Windham, an ingenious aeronaut, who fell a victim to the practice of his profession. On the 30th of September, 1824, he ascended from the neighborhood of Blackburn in Lancashire; and in the descent, the car being driven against a chimney, Mr. Sadler was thrown out, at the height of about forty yards from the ground, when his skull was fractured, and he was otherwise so injured as to occasion his death, in the twenty-eighth year of his age. He had made thirty aerial voyages, in one of which he crossed the Irish channel, ascending at Dublin, and alighting on the Welsh coast, and possessed considerable talents as a chemist and engineer, in which capacities he was employed by the first gas company established at Liverpool, where he had also fitted up warm, medicated, and vapor baths.

SADOC, supposed founder of the sect of the Sadducees among the Jews, lived two centuries before the birth of Christ. His tenets were, that virtue, for its own sake, is to be loved and practised, as there are neither rewards nor punishments after this life. These opinions were very prevalent, and in the days of our Saviour, the sect was become very numerous and powerful. It is said that the Sadducees still exist in Africa, and in other places.

SADOLET, James, a learned Italian, born at Modena 1477. He received an excellent education under his father who was a civilian, and professor at Ferrara, and acquired a most extensive and perfect knowledge of Latin and Greek. He lived in great intimacy with the learned at Rome, and became with Bembo secretary to pope Leo X. and to reward his merit the sovereign pontiff made him against his will bishop of Carpentras, near Avignon, and he held the same office of honorable confidence with some of his successors, Clement VII. and Paul III. who raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and employed him in various negotiations. He died 1547, not without suspicion, say some, of poison, because he maintained too confidential a correspondence with the protestants. His works consist of epistles, discourses, expositions of the Psalms, and St. Paul's epistles, and poems, published at Verona, 3 vols. 4to. These compositions are written in elegant and truly Ciceronian Latin; and to the character of a polite scholar, Sadolet united the amiable qualities of mildness, moderation, and exemplary virtue, so that Erasmus has called him with truth, eximium ætatis suæ decus.

SAGE, Alian René le, an ingenious writer, born at Ruys in Brittany 1667. His compositions display not only wit, taste, and judgment, but elegance and neatness. Though indebted for the plan and subject of his romances to Spanish writers, yet he possessed peculiar merits of his own. His works are "Gil Blas"—the Diable Boiteux—besides the Bachelier de Salamanque—the New Don Quixote, and other theatrical pieces, and the letters of Aristenetus from the Greek. His Gil Blas is, and ever will be, a popular performance, and must be read, because, as Voltaire has observed, he has imitated nature. He died near Paris 1747.

SAGE, John, a native of Fifeshire, educated at St. Andrew's, and made, after the revolution, bishop of Edinburgh. He was an able divine, and published a sensible defence of episcopacy, against the persecution of the presbyterians, called the Principles of the Cyprianic age, and other tracts, and died 1711, aged 59.

SAGE, Balthasar George, an eminent natural philosopher and mineralogist, was born, in 1740, at Paris, and after having been professor of experimental mineralogy, was appointed superintendent of the school of mines. At the beginning of his career Sage contributed much to the progress of mineralogy in France, but he subsequently set his face against the modern discoveries in that science and in chemistry. He died in 1824, a member of the Institute. Among his works are, Elements of Docimastic Mineralogy; and a Theory on the Origin of Mountains.

SAGITTARIUS, Gaspard, a native of Lunenburg, who became professor of history in the university of Hall, and historian to the duke of Saxony. He was also, as a divine, an able supporter of the doctrines of Luther. He published Dissertations on the Oracles—the Succession of the Princes of Orange to William III.—History of the City of Hardewyck—Life of St. Norbet—Historia Antiqua Norbergiæ—Genealogy of the Dukes of Brunswick—History of Lubeck—Antiquities of Thuringia. This learned man died 9th March, 1694, aged 51.

SAGREDO, John, a noble Venetian, procurator of St. Mark, and in 1675 elected doge, and afterwards employed as ambassador to various courts. He wrote the History of the Ottoman empire, in Italian, 1677, 4to. a work valuable, candid, and elegant, and deservedly compared to the labors of Tacitus. A translation of it in 6 vols. 12mo. appeared at Paris.

SAILLANT, N. du, a French officer, who at the beginning of the revolution raised around his retreat at Jales near Mende, an army of nearly twenty thousand men, who like himself were zealous for the defence of the monarchy, and the protection of the king's person. While, however, he hoped to persuade these adherents to march with him against Paris, he found their loyalty grow faint, and soon saw them desert from his ranks. He was at last surrounded with the few brave men who determined to share his fortunes, and conducted to Vans, where he was massacred in cold blood.

SAINT-AMAND, Mark Antony Gerard de, a native of Rouen, who spent the best part of his life in travelling, and in writing poetry. He might have obtained a settlement near the person of the queen of Poland, but in his inconstant conduct he refused it, and died poor 1660, aged 67, and of grief, because Louis XIV. censured his poem on the Moon. His name is immortalized in Boileau's satires. His best piece is an Ode on Solitude. His works are collected in 3 vols. 12mo.

SAINT-AULAIRE, Francis Joseph de Beau-poil, marquis de, an ingenious French poet, born at Limosin. He spent the younger part of his life in the army, but his love of literature prevailed, and he sought retirement and learned ease. He wrote short and light pieces, much in the manner of Anacreon, and what is remarkable, his best compositions were those of his old age, when he had reached his ninetieth year. He was admitted into the French academy, though Boileau exclaimed against it, because he was an immoral poet. He was for forty years the favorite of the court of the dukes of Maine, and died at Paris 17th December 1742, aged near 100.

SAINT-CLAIR, Arthur, a general in the American army, was born at Edinburgh, was a lieutenant under general Wolfe, and afterwards settled in Pennsylvania, and became a naturalized citizen. On the commencement of the revolution, he embraced the cause of the American army, and in February 1777, was appointed major-general. He served with distinction, and in 1783, was elected president of the Cincinnati Society of his adopted state. In 1785 he was elected a delegate to Congress, and in 1787 was chosen president of that body. He was afterwards governor of the North West Territory, and in 1790, commanded an army against the Miami Indians. He resigned his commission of major-general in 1792. His latter years were passed in poverty. He died in 1818.

SAINT-CYRAN, John du Verger, de Houranne, abbot of, a learned ecclesiastic, born at Layonne, 1581. He was educated in divinity at Louvain, where he gained the friendship of Lipsius, and he was patronised by the bishop of Poitiers, who resigned to him the abbey of St. Cyran. He wrote various books, and was universally esteemed for his learning. He became celebrated in France for maintaining what was called two extraordinary paradoxes, that a person under certain circumstances may kill himself, and that bishops may take up arms. He was for some time persecuted by Richelieu, and he was one of those who disapproved of the council of Trent, and considered it as a political assembly, rather than as an ecclesiastical meeting. He died 1643.

SAINT-FOIX, Germain Francis Poullain de, a French writer born at Rennes, 25th February 1703. After serving in the army he settled at Paris, and devoted himself to literature. He was appointed historiographer of the order of the Holy Ghost, and died highly respected at Paris, 26th August 1776. His works are Turkish Letters, an epistolary romance of merit, yet inferior to the work of Montesquieu in the same style—Historical Essays on Paris, 7 vols. 12mo.—History of the Order of the Holy Ghost, 3 vols. 12mo.—Comedies, 3 vols. 12mo. All his works were published together at Paris, 6 vols. 8vo. 1778.

SAINT-GELAIS, Octavian de, a native of Cognac, who by the favor of Charles VIII. was made bishop of Angouleme. He died 1502, aged 36. He is author of some poetical pieces, the Life of Louis XII.—Translation of Terence—Ovid's Heroides.

SAINT-GELAIS, Melin de, the natural son of the preceding, as is generally supposed, became known as a poet, and deserved the name of the French Ovid. He was educated at Poitiers, and Padua, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession. He opposed Ronsard the poet, at the court of Henry II. but this jealousy ended in the closest friendship. He died at Paris, 1559, aged 67. His works are in Latin and in French, and consist of elegies, epistles, sonnets, epigrams, songs—and Sophonisba, a prose tragedy,—and were first published at Paris, 1719, in 12mo.

SAINT-GERMAIN, Robert, count of, a native of Lons-le Saunier in Franche Comté, who left the jesuits for the profession of arms. He distinguished himself in Hungary, and in the war of 1737, against the Turks, and afterwards in the French service, in the campaigns of 1741, and 1757. Displeased, however, with the treatment of the French court, he went into the service of Denmark, where he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal, and made knight of the Elephant. The death of Struensee, and the commotion which took place on the occasion, rendered him dissatisfied with the Danish court, and he retired to Hamburgh, where he lost nearly the whole of his property by the failure of a banker, to whom he had intrusted it. This severe blow did not break his spirits, and he withdrew to the privacy of a small estate which he had near Lauterbach in Alsace. He was called away from his obscurity by Louis XVI. who knew his merit, to preside over the war department, and after reforming several abuses, and contributing to the comforts of the military, he died 15th January, 1778, aged 70. He wrote Memoirs, one vol. 8vo. 1779.

SAINT-HYACINTHE, Themiseul de, a French writer born at Orleans, 1684. He taught Italian for his support, and after travelling over several countries of Europe he settled at Breda, where he married, and where he died 1746. He forced himself much upon the public notice by his quarrel with Voltaire who heaped upon him every opprobrious epithet. He wrote Le Chef d'Œuvre d'un Luconnu, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mathanasiana, 2 vols. 8vo.—and some romances of little merit.

SAINT-JOHN, Henry, viscount Bolingbroke, a great politician and philosopher, born 1672, at Battersea, of an illustrious family. He was educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, and though his earlier years were disgraced by extravagance, and an immoderate love of pleasure, he laid the foundation of that eminence which afterwards distinguished him as an orator, and as a statesman. To wean him from dissolute habits his friends married him to the daughter of sir Henry Winchcombe, and soon after he obtained a seat in parliament for Wotton Bassett, 1700. He here acquired great influence among the Tories, and in 1704, was made secretary at war, but resigned when his friend Harley was dismissed from the seals in 1707. Three years after he again shared the honors of Harley, who was called to the office of chancellor of the exchequer, and he became secretary of state; but the part which he supported in framing the peace of Utrecht has exposed him to much censure. In 1712, he was created lord St. John, viscount Bolingbroke, and made lord-lieutenant of Essex; but dissatisfied with these honors because he was not raised to the rank of an earl, he ambitiously meditated a separation from his long tried friend Harley, and in the attempt to place himself at the head of affairs, he ruined his own fortunes, and those of his former associate. On the accession of George I. in 1714, the seals were taken from him, though he had shown himself a friend to the Hanoverian succession, and all the papers of his office were also secured. Finding it dangerous to continue in the country, where threats of impeachment were thrown out against him, he retired to France, March, 1715, and he resolutely rejected the overtures which were made to him by the pretender. The persecuting spirit, however, of his enemies at home, made a change in his sentiments, and he accepted at last the office of secretary of state to the pretender, and prepared for the invasion of England. These measures were no sooner known than he was impeached by Walpole; but while disgraced at home, he was exposed to equal persecution abroad, and his new master stripped him of his office and impeached him of treachery, incapacity, and neglect. Thus discarded, he determined to effect a reconciliation with the government at home, and by means of lord Stair, the ambassador in France, he obtained a promise of pardon from the king, 1716, which was fully granted in 1723. Restored to his country, and to his forfeited property, he settled near Uxbridge, and devoted himself to literary and rural employments, and to the conversation and correspondence of Swift, Pope, and other learned friends; but finding the royal mercy not granted to its full extent, as he was still excluded from a seat in the House of Lords, he vented his disappointment against the minister, Walpole, and attacked his measures in the Craftsman, and in some pamphlets. For ten years he showed his opposition and virulent hostility against the minister, and then laid aside his pen, and retired in 1735, to France, resolved never again to enlist in political contests. He afterwards returned to England, and settled at Battersea, where the last part of his life was spent in the otium cum dignitate. He died there 15th November, 1751, on the verge of 80. His manuscripts were left to Mallet, who published them with the rest of his works, in 5 vols. 4to. 1754. His works may be divided into political and philosophical, the former consisting of Letters upon History—Letter to Wyndham, on patriotism—Papers in the Craftsman published separately in 3 vols. 8vo. under the title of political tracts,—and the latter—substance of letters written to de Pouilly—Letter on one of Tillotson's sermons—letters and essays, addressed to Pope. As a writer lord Bolingbroke was nervous, elegant, and argumentative, and in him were united, as a panegyrist has observed, the wisdom of Socrates, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace. It is, however, to be lamented that in his writings he is too often skeptical, and that he disregards or ridicules the great truths of revelation, and of christianity.

SAINT-JUST, Louis Leon de, one of the sanguinary revolutionists of France, was born at Blerancourt near Noyon 1768. He obtained a seat in the national convention, and gained the friendship of Robespierre, by devoting himself to his infamous purposes, and by supporting all his cruel measures. His easy eloquence, his bold effrontery, and unappalled conduct, rendered him a fit partner for all the atrocities of that dreadful period, and by his influence the property of the emigrants was exposed to sale, the Giroudists were conducted to the scaffold, and the effects of foreigners were confiscated. The reign of Louis XVI. was described by this artful and shameless orator as a scene of horrible tyranny; while the government of Robespierre exhibited nothing but lenevolence and happiness to the people of France. The punishment of this worthless tyrant at last approached, and after he had insulted the feelings of human nature, interpreted pity into crimes, and condemned to death those who presumed to weep for the loss of their friends and relatives, it was not to be expected that he could excite much of the commiseration of the world. He was conducted to the scaffold with Robespierre, in 1794, and suffered death with more courage than could have been expected from such a tyrant. He wrote Esprit de la Revolution, &c. 8vo. 1791.

SAINT-LAMBERT, Charles Francis de, member of the French academy, and afterwards of the national institute, was born at Nanci 1717, and died at the age of 85. He was the friend of Voltaire, and his genius and poetical abilities gained him the esteem of the learned of France. He wrote Les Fêtes de l'Amour, a comedy—Essay on Luxury—the Four Parts of the Day—the Seasons, a poem, which Voltaire prefers, but with injudicious partiality, to the Seasons of Thomson—Oriental Fables, besides fugitive pieces.

SAINT-MARTIN, N., a native of Amboise, who, after serving six years in the army, retired to privacy and literature. The retirement which he loved, and the sweetness of his manners, saved him during the horrors of the revolution, and he died at Annai in the house of a friend, in the beginning of 1804, aged 60. He is author of an excellent book on Error and Truth, 8vo. 1775, often edited—a Picture of Natural Order, 8vo.

SAINT-PAVIN, Denys Sanguin de, a French poet. He was an ecclesiastic, but he preferred literature and pleasure to the austerities of a monastic life, and after spending much of his time in frivolous and often profane pursuits, he died very penitent 1670, in an advanced old age. He was attacked by Boileau in his satires, and he retorted the censure. His poems consist of epigrams, sonnets, and epistles, published in 1759, with those of Charleval, 12mo.

SAINT-PIERRE, Eustache de, a native of Calais, celebrated for his noble disinterestedness and patriotism. When Edward III. in 1347, displeased with the obstinate resistance of the people of Calais, demanded six of the chief men to be devoted to death, Saint-Pierre in the midst of the hesitation of his countrymen offered himself, and walked with five others, who followed his great example to the conqueror, with halters about their necks. The English queen by her entreaties with difficulty obtained the pardon of these devoted men.

SAINT-PIERRE, Charles Ireneus Castel de, a French ecclesiastic, born in Normandy 1658. He accompanied cardinal de Polignac to the conferences of Utrecht, but though a popular character he was excluded from the French academy, for preferring the measures of the regent duke of Orleans, to those of Louis XIV. He was very intelligent as a man of letters, and as a politician, and died at Paris 29th April, 1743, aged 86. He was author of a project for universal peace among the European powers, 3 vols. 12mo.—Projects for reforming the Orthography of the European Languages—and Memoirs on Various Subjects. His works have been collected in 13 vols. 12mo. 1744.

SAINT-PREUIL, Francis de Jussac d'Embleville de, a French warrior, distinguished at the battle of Castelnaudari, in which he took Montmorenci prisoner, and at the siege of Corbia, which he defended against the Spaniards. He was afterwards governor of Arras, and was condemned to be beheaded by his political enemies for having attacked by mistake a body of men who had surrendered prisoners of war. He suffered at Amiens, 9th November 1641, aged forty.

SAINT-SIMON, Louis de Rouvroi, duke of, a French statesman, born at Paris 16th June, 1675. He quitted the military service to become ambassador in Spain, 1721; but without sharing the guilt of the perfidious and artful measures of the government of the regent Orleans, he retired to his country seat where he composed his memoirs. He is accused of jansenism, and of reflecting with too much acrimony against his contemporaries. His works have appeared in 13 vols. 8vo. Strasburg, 1791.

SAINT-SIMON, Claudius Henry, count de, of the same family as the foregoing, was born, in 1760, at Paris, and died in that city in 1825. He is the founder of the politico-philosophical school of the Industriels; the leading dogma of which school is, that industry is the definite purpose of human society, and that those engaged in it constitute the superior class of society. Saint Simon published an Introduction to the Scientific Labors of the Nineteenth Century; Political, Moral, and Philosophical Discussions; and other works, to disseminate his doctrines.

SAINT-VINCENT, John Francis Fauris de, a native of Aix, who distinguished himself as an upright magistrate, and president of the parliament of Provence. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, and contributed to its memoirs two valuable papers on the coins of Provence, and on the ancient monuments of Marseilles. He died 22d October 1798, aged 80.

SAINTE-ALDEGONDE, Philip de Marnix, lord du Mont, an illustrious statesman, born at Brussels, 1538. He early signalized himself by the copious resources of his mind, and by a perfect knowledge of the classics, of civil law, politics and divinity; but when his country was persecuted by the tyranny of the Spaniards he withdrew from oppression into Germany. At Heidelberg he was, in consequence of his merits raised to the office of counsellor in ecclesiastical affairs; but the miseries of his country at last recalled him home in 1572, and he prepared to assert her liberties, and to defend her religion by the vigor of his mind. He was sent as one of the deputies to England to solicit the protection of Elizabeth, and afterwards went to the diet of Worms, and here his eloquence painted in frightful colors the tyranny of Alva, and called aloud for the assistance of the Germans. In 1580, he again served his country as ambassador, and went to France, and offered the sovereignty to the duke of Alencon, whom he the next year accompanied to England. He was, in 1584, consul of Antwerp, when that city was besieged by the duke of Parma, and he died at Leyden 1598, aged 60. For wisdom, sagacity, and decision, he is deservedly respected as one of the greatest politicians of his age. He published, in Dutch, 1571, Alvearium Romanum, a ludicrous work, which was received and read with great applause, as it ridiculed with well directed satire the church of Rome. His Tableau des Differens de la Religion, in French, published after his death, was equally popular. He wrote besides other things, and particularly a famous song in praise of prince William of Nassau, which animated his countrymen to resist their oppressors, and like the muse of Tyrtæus, roused them to despise dangers, and to brave death in the support of their rights and liberties.

SAINTE-BEUVE, James de, a learned ecclesiastic, who became divinity professor at the Sorbonne, from which he was expelled for not subscribing to the censure on Arnauld. He died in retirement 15th December 1677, aged 64. His decisions, 3 vols. 4to. were published by his brother.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Gaucher de, better known by the name of Scævola, was an active character under Henry III. and Henry IV. His conduct was very firm and loyal in the states of Blois, 1588, and afterwards by his influence he reconciled the town of Poitiers to the cause and interests of his master, whom he again served with successful zeal in the assembly of the notables at Rouen. He died at Loudun, 29th March 1623, aged 87, honored with the title of father of his country. He wrote Gallorum Doctrinâ Illustrium, and elogia, besides some poetical pieces of great merit in Latin—and epigrams, collected together, in 1633, in 4to.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Gaucher de, or Scævola, and Louis de, twin brothers, sons of Scævola, were born at Loudun, 20th December 1571. They resembled each other in their features, as well as in the qualities of their mind, and they both were appointed historiographers of France, and wrote together some valuable works. The elder died at Paris 7th September 1650, and Louis 29th April 1656. Their works are Genealogical History of the Royal family of France, 2 vols. fol.—the Genealogical History of the house of Beauvau, fol.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Glaude de, grandson of the Scævola just mentioned, embraced the ecclesiastic profession, and died in retirement at Coubeville, 11th October 1690, aged 71. He wrote some theological pieces. His brother Denis was also an ecclesiastic of great learning and exemplary piety, in the congregation of St. Maur. He wrote the Life of Cassiodorus—and the History of Gregory the Great. There were besides other members of that family also illustrious for learning.

SAINTE-PALAYE, John Baptist de, a native of Auxerre, who became member of the French academies and of that of inscriptions. He devoted himself assiduously to the study of antiquities, and wrote some valuable works, especially on Ancient Chivalry, three vols. 12mo. He also formed the plan of an Universal French Glossary in forty vols. folio. He died at Paris much respected 1st May, 1781 aged eighty-four.

SALADIN or SALAHEDDIN, sultan of Egypt and Syria after Adad, was celebrated for his valor during the crusades. After conquering Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia, he marched to the attack of Jerusalem, and with an army of fifty thousand men he defeated the christians near Tiberias, and took Guy de Lusignan the king of Jerusalem prisoner. This signal victory opened the gates of Jerusalem to his forces; but while all expected death Saladin behaved with humanity to the conquered, and restored to their wives and children the various captives who had been detained in slavery and in chains. These conquests alarmed the christians of Europe, and already the kings of England and France, with numerous forces marched to the relief of the oppressed christians of Palestine, but discord defeated their successes. Though Acre, Cæsarea, and Jaffa, yielded to the arms of the Europeans, Richard king of England found his forces so weak by desertion and discord, that he concluded a truce with the Egyptian sultan for three years and three months, 1192. Saladin died the next year at Damascus, aged fifty-seven, leaving seventeen sons, who divided his extensive dominions among them. He was a man of high character, who viewed with the eyes of a sage and a christian the vanity of human grandeur. In his last illness he ordered to be unfurled before his army the winding sheet which was to encircle his remains, while a herald proclaimed aloud, this is all which Saladin the vanquisher of the East can retain of all his conquests. A French History of this extraordinary character was published in 1758, in 2 vols. 12mo. by M. Marin.

SALE, George, a learned Englishman, well skilled in oriental literature. He contributed much to the completion of the universal history, but his chief work is a translation of the Koran, with notes, with a long and valuable preliminary discourse. He died in London, 14th November 1736.

SALERNE, Francis, a physician of Orleans, who devoted himself to the elucidation of natural history. He published with Arnault, the Animal Kingdom—and the Natural History of Animals. He also translated Ray's Synopsis Avium. He died 1760.

SALESBURY, William, author of a Welsh dictionary—of some poems—of a treatise on rhetoric—and other works, flourished in Wales at the beginning of the seventeenth century. He was bred up to the law, and assisted bishop Davies in the translation of the New Testament into Welsh, an useful performance, published 1620.

SALINAS, Francis de, a native of Burgos. Though he lost his sight at the age of ten, he acquired a most perfect knowledge of Greek and Latin, and of mathematics and music, and was liberally patronised by the duke of Alba, Paul IV. and others. He died 1590. He was author of an excellent treatise on music, fol. and he translated into Spanish verse some of Martial's epigrams.

SALIS, Ulysses de, a noble Swiss. After serving in the Venetian armies, he engaged in the wars of Valtelline, and then entered into the service of France. He distinguished himself at the siege of Rochelle under Louis XIII. and afterwards went to the aid of his native country, whose independence the Austrians had threatened. In 1635, he, at the head of a French army, defeated the Spanish troops at Mont-Francisco, and afterwards signalized himself at the siege of Coni. He died in the country of the Grisons 1674, aged 79.

SALISBURY, Robert Cecil, earl of, an able statesman, son of William, lord Burleigh, born 1550. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and was introduced by his father into the business and the intrigues of political life. He was first secretary to lord Derby, ambassador in France, and in 1596, was made under secretary to sir Francis Walsingham, after whose death he succeeded to the place of principal secretary of state. He was made chancellor of Lancaster 1597, and afterwards succeeded his father lord Burleigh as prime minister, and in this high and dangerous office behaved with great prudence and sagacity. The influence which he possessed under Elizabeth, he retained in the next reign, and James was so pleased with the conduct of this minister, that he created him earl of Salisbury in 1605, and made him knight of the garter. On the death of lord Dorset 1608, he succeeded to the office of high treasurer, and applied his great talents to restore the finances of the kingdom to a more regular and improving state. He died of the complicated attacks of the dropsy and scurvy, 24th May, 1612. His opposition to the earl of Essex who at last ended his life on the block, is exposed to reprehension; but his enmity to the virtuous Raleigh continued with increasing asperity, renders his character on that subject peculiarly odious and criminal. He was deformed it is said in his person, but the energies of his mind made sufficient amends for the defects of personal appearance.

SALLENGRE, Albert Henry de, a learned writer, born at the Hague 1694. He was educated at Leyden, and became an advocate of the court of Holland, and afterwards commissary of the finances of the States General; but his further and deserved advancement was stopped by the small-pox, which carried him off 1723, aged 30. He was much respected by the literati of England and France, whom he visited, and was author of Memoirs of Literature, 2 vols.—History of Montmaur, 2 vols. 12mo.—Novus Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum, 3 vols. fol.—Essay on the History of the United Provinces, 4to. which was part only of a larger work which he did not live to complete.

SALLO, Denis de, a French writer, born at Paris 1626. Though dull in his youth, his powers gradually expanded, and he became an acute classical scholar, and in 1652, was admitted counsellor of the parliament of Paris. He did not, however, abandon literature, but was the first who, in 1664, formed the project of a Journal des Sçavans. But so severe were his censures on the labors of his contemporaries, that a crowd of enemies rose up against him, and he dropped in dismay his critical remarks. The plan nevertheless was adopted by the learned of Europe after his example, but with more moderation, and consequently greater success. He died 1669, and though an author of some ability, he is remembered now only as the inventor of a scheme of periodical criticism, which has proved so useful and so entertaining to the polished nations of the world.

SALLUST, Caius Crispus, a celebrated Latin historian. He was in the early part of life so debauched, that his name was erased from the list of senators; but the friendship of Cæsar restored him to his dignity, and gave him the government of Numidia, where he amassed an opulent fortune. He built some stately edifices at Rome, which still bear his name. He died B.C. 34. Though devoted to luxury and voluptuous ease, he wrote valuable histories of the Jugurthine war, and of the Catiline conspiracy.

SALMASIUS, Claudius, or SAUMAISE, a most learned writer, born at Saumur, 1588, of a respectable family. He was educated under his father, who was a member of the parliament of Burgundy, and afterwards studied at Paris, and then passed to Heidelberg, where he publicly professed the protestant religion, which he had imbibed from the precepts and example of his mother. In this place he drew upon himself the admiration of the university by his learning and continued application, and proved himself deservedly to be what his friend, Isaac Casaubon, had described him, "ad miraculum doctus." His literary reputation was now such that he received pressing and most liberal invitations from Venice, from Oxford, and even from the pope; but these he declined, and settled in 1632 in Holland, where he succeeded Scaliger as professor at Leyden. In 1640, on the death of his father, he visited Burgundy, and received the strongest solicitations from Richelieu, and the offer of a pension of twelve thousand livres a-year to settle in France; but this he again rejected, and preferred the independence and freedom of Holland to the servility of a courtier. In 1650 he visited Christina, queen of Sweden, who received him with great respect, and treated him with the most flattering marks of friendship. His reputation, in the mean time, suffered in the controversy which he had with Milton; for while he defended, at the request of the exiled family of England, the conduct and principles of Charles I. his antagonist brought against him, if not more learning, yet more wit, more fancy, and more poignancy of thought, so that the labors of the Englishman were read with more applause throughout Europe than the duller composition of the defender of royalty. He died 3d September 1653. His answer to Milton was published by his son. Salmasius was universally acknowledged to be the most learned man of his time. He was well acquainted with all the languages of Europe, and in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and the other oriental tongues, he was a most perfect master; but all these great qualities were tarnished by self love, by a fastidious disregard of others, and the most inveterate odium against all such as dared to controvert or differ from his opinions. His works are very numerous, the best known of which are his "Notæ in Historiæ Augustæ Scriptorum—and Exercitationes Plinianæ in Soffinum, besides good editions of Tertullian, Florus, Polyhistor, Simplicius on Epictetus—and Treatises de Modo Usurarum—de Re Militari Romanorum—de Hellenistica—and de Fœnere Trapezotico.

SALMERON, Alphonsus, a native of Toledo, who finished his studies at Paris. He was one of the first and of the most zealous followers of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the jesuits, and after travelling through Germany, Poland, the Low Countries, and Ireland, he appeared at the council of Trent, where he displayed his learning and eloquence. He afterwards was very active in the establishment of the jesuits' college at Naples, where he died 13th February 1585, aged 69. He wrote Commentaries on the Scriptures, and other works, edited in 8 vols. folio, 1612.

SALMON, Nathanael, LL.D., an antiquarian, born at Mepsall, Bedfordshire, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge. He entered into orders, but though he had taken the oaths to William, he refused to do it to Anne, and being thus driven from the church, he applied himself to physic, which he practised at St. Ives', Huntingdonshire, and Bishop's Stortford, Herts. He wrote a Survey of Roman Stations in Britain, 8vo.—a Survey of Roman Antiquities in the Middle English Counties, 8vo.—the History of Hertfordshire, folio—the Lives of English Bishops from the Reformation—the Antiquities of Surrey, and of Essex. He died 1742.

SALMON, Thomas, brother to William, was a writer of reputation. He was author of the Present State of all Nations—a Geographical Grammar, 8vo. afterwards improved by Guthrie—the Chronological History of England, 2 vols. 8vo.—Examination of Burnet's History of his own Times, besides valuable assistance in the Universal History. He died suddenly, April, 1743, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church.

SALTER, Samuel, D.D., a learned divine, born at Norwich, and educated at the Charterhouse, and Benet college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was appointed by sir Philip Yorke, afterwards lord Hardwicke, tutor to his children, and to this connection, so well deserved by his talents and attention, he was indebted for his preferment in the church. He was prebendary of Norwich, and had some livings. He died May 2d, 1778. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a scholar, and popular as a preacher, and blessed with such a retentive memory, that he always delivered his sermons without even the use of notes. He printed some single sermons, &c.—an edition of his maternal grandfather, Dr. Jeffery's tracts and sermons, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He was for some time the friend of Bentley, and some anecdotes of that celebrated critic are preserved from his papers, by Bowyer.

SALTONSTALL, Gurdon, was born in Haverhill, Massachusetts March 27, 1666, and graduated at Harvard college in 1684. On the 25th of November, 1691 he was ordained minister of New London, Connecticut, where he remained several years much respected. In 1707 he was persuaded, by the advice of the clergy, to undertake the administration of the affairs of the colony, and he was annually chosen governor till his death, which took place September 24, 1724, at the age of 58 years. As a divine he held a high rank, both for the soundness of his views, and for the eloquence with which he vindicated and enforced them. The music of his voice, the power of his arguments, the polish of his style, and the beauty of his allusions, placed him among the first orators of his time. Nor was he less eminent as a statesman. To a quick perception he united correctness of judgment. He was long remembered with the respect due to a great and good man.

SALTONSTALL, Richard, nephew of the governor, and grandson to the Hon. Nathaniel Saltonstall, was born in 1703, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1722, and as early as 1728 he was a representative from Haverhill, and was afterwards a member of the council. In 1736 he was appointed a judge of the superior court, and held the office until a few months before his death, when he resigned on account of ill health. He died October 20th, 1756, aged 54. His eldest son Richard was graduated at Harvard college in 1751. He was an officer in the war with the French, and afterwards sheriff of Essex county. He married a daughter of the Hon. Elisha Cooke of Boston. At the commencement of the revolution he left the province and died at Kensington, England, in 1785.

SALVATOR, Rosa, an Italian painter, born at Renessa, near Naples, 1615. His youth was dissipated, and passed frequently in the abandoned company of banditti, in whose wild and rugged retreats he imbibed that taste for rough scenery which he described on canvass with so masterly a hand. His human figures are much admired, but few of his larger works are to be found in England, though he was so rapid in his execution, that he often began and finished a picture in one day. His prints, of which he etched a great number are in general esteem. He distinguished himself also as a poet, and deserved, by the force and popularity of his satire, to be called the Juvenal of Italy. His works were printed, Amsterdam, 1719, 8vo. He died at Rome, 1673.

SALVIANI, Hippolitus, a noble native of Cittadi-Castello, who practised medicine at Rome, and died there 1572, aged 59. He is author of a treatise on Fishes, folio—de Crisibus ad Galeni Censuram—poems and comedies in Italian.

SALVIATI, Francis, a painter of Florence, born 1510. He was patronised by cardinal Salviati, and in consequence of this he exchanged his name of Bossi for that of his benefactor. He was at Paris 1554, but looked with envy upon the eminence of rival painters, and afterwards returned to Italy. He was much admired for the grace which he gave to his naked figures, and the beauty and ease of his draperies. The best of his pieces are preserved at Florence, Venice, and Rome. He died 1563.

SALVINI, Anthony Marie, an eminent scholar, born at Florence, and professor of Greek there. He was member of the de la Crusca academy, and contributed much to the completion of their Dictionary, in 5 vols. folio. Besides elegant poetical translations into Italian of the Iliad and Odyssey, of Theocritus, Hesiod, Anacreon, and other Greek poets; besides Ovid's Metamorphoses, Horace's Satires and Art of Poetry, and other Latin works; and Boileau's Art of Poetry, and Addison's Cato, he wrote some elegant sonnets—Academical Discourses—and a Funeral Oration for Magliabechi. He died at Florence 1729.

SAMBUCUS, John, a native of Timau in Hungary, who studied medicine and improved himself by travelling through Germany, Italy, and France. He was patronised by the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. and was appointed counsellor of state and historiographer of the empire. He wrote Lives of the Roman Emperors—History of Hungary—Emblemata—Icones Medicorum, folio—translation in Latin from Hesiod, Plato, Thucydides, &c. This learned and well informed man died of an apoplexy at Vienna, 13th June, 1584, aged 53.

SAMPSON, Henry, a native of South Leverton, Notts, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He obtained the living of Framlingham but was ejected for non-conformity at the restoration, and then studied physic at Leyden and Padua, and practised with success in London. He died 1705. He published an edition of Porter on Divine Grace, and prepared materials for a history of non-conformists, which, however, he never published.

SAMWELL, David, a native of Nantglyn, Denbighshire, known as the surgeon of the Discovery, at the time when the unfortunate Cook was murdered by the natives of Owlyhee. As he was present at this dreadful scene, he gave to the public a very circumstantial account of it. He also published some poems in Welsh, and died 1799.

SANADON, Noel Stephen, a learned jesuit, born at Ronen, 1676. He taught with reputation at Caen, and afterwards with equal success, was professor of rhetoric at Paris. He was intrusted with the education of prince de Conti, and made librarian to the king. He died 21st September, 1733. He was author of some orations and poems, much admired, besides a translation of Horace's works, accompanied with learned notes, the best edition of which is that of Amsterdam, 1735, in 8 vols. 8vo. containing Dacier's version and notes.

SANCHEZ, Antonio Nunes Riberio, a learned physician, born 7th March, 1699, at Penna-Macor, in Portugal. He studied at Coimbra and Salamanca, and afterwards passed to London, and then visited Leyden, where he further improved his knowledge under the direction of Boerhaave. When in 1731, Anne, empress of Russia, required of that illustrious professor to recommend her three physicians, Sanchez was honorably nominated one of the number. In this distant country he was appointed physician to the army, and he distinguished himself by his extensive and successful practice, and at last became first physician at court. The revolution of 1742, however, changed his prospects, and in the midst of the proscriptions which he daily witnessed, he had the good fortune to be permitted to leave the country. He retired to Paris, where he died 14th October 1783. His correspondence with the learned was extensive, and his papers are now, it is said, in the hands of Dr. Andry. It is to be observed, that Catherine, when she ascended the Russian throne, rewarded his services to her subjects with an honorable pension of 1000 roubles. The works of Dr. Sanchez, are Dissertations on the Origin of the Venereal Disease—on Earthquakes—and a method of studying Medicine.

SANCHEZ, Thomas, a learned jesuit, born at Corduba, 1551. His reputation for chastity and mortification was very great. He died at Grenada, 19th May, 1610, and was buried with extraordinary magnificence. His works on the Decalogue, on Monastic Vows, &c. in 4 vols. folio, display great genius; but in examining the controversies concerning marriage, he has used language too often coarse and indelicate.

SANCHEZ, Peter, Anthony, a Spanish divine, was born at Vigo, in Galicia, in 1740. He became canon of the cathedral of St. James, and professor of divinity at his native place, where he was admired as a preacher, and esteemed for his charity. He died in 1806. His works are—1. Summa theologiae Sacrae, 4 vols. 2. Annales Sacri, 2 vols. 3. A Treatise on Toleration, 3 vols. 4. History of the Church of Africa. 5. Essay on the Eloquence of the Pulpit. 6. Sermons, 3 vols. 7. On the Means of encouraging Industry.

SANCHO, II., surnamed the Strong, king of Castile, resented the division made by his father Ferdinand, of his dominions, and therefore on his mother's death, he dethroned his brothers. Garcias was banished from Galicia, and Alphonsus quitted the throne of Leon, to end his days in a monastery. Sancho afterwards stripped his sisters of their patrimony; but in besieging Zamora, which belonged to the eldest, he was assassinated, 1072.

SANCHO, Ignatius, a negro of extraordinary character, born 1729, at sea, on board a ship in its passage from Guinea to Spanish America. He was baptized at Carthage, by the name of Ignatius, and when two years old was brought by his master to England, and given to three maiden sisters near Greenwich, who contemptuously bestowed on him the appellation of Don Quixote's squire. Though treated with harshness by his austere mistresses, he found a patron and a friend in the duke of Montague, and after that nobleman's death he lived with the duchess in the capacity of butler, and at her decease, received from her bounty an annuity, of £30. A habit of low debauchery, however, and a fondness for gaming, soon ruined his little fortune, till at last reflection brought him back to his senses and as he was very partial to theatrical representations, he presented himself as a proper character, to portray the person of Othello and Oronoko. The attempt did not, however, answer the public expectation; but though thus disappointed, a marriage with a respectable young woman, of West India origin, dictated to him the necessity of industrious and honest exertions. By the friendship of the Montague family, he was again placed above want and settled in a small grocery shop where his good conduct enabled him, in the enjoyment of domestic comforts, to provide a decent subsistence for himself and his numerous family. He died 15th December, 1780. This singular character, patronised by the great, by the duchesses of Queensbury and Northumberland, and noticed by the learned and the fashionable, by Sterne, Garrick, and others, was author of several letters, which possess great originality, and display strong powers of intellect, and which appeared for the benefit of his family under the benevolent care of Miss Crewe.

SANCROFT, William, an eminent English prelate, born at Fresingfield, Suffolk, 1616. He was educated at Bury school, and Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1642. He was ejected from his fellowship in 1649 for refusing to conform to the republican establishment, and then went over to the continent, where he continued till the restoration. He returned to England soon after Charles, and became chaplain to Cosin, bishop of Durham, who gave him the valuable living of Houghton-le-Spring, and a prebendal stall. In 1662, he was elected master of Emanuel college, in 1664 made dean of York, and a few months after promoted to the deanery of St. Paul. In this new situation he contributed much to the repairing of the cathedral, and when it was destroyed by the fire of London, he gave £1400 towards rebuilding it. In 1677 he was unexpectedly raised by Charles II. to the metropolitan see of Canterbury, and added dignity to that high station by his exemplary conduct and paternal care of the church. He attended his royal master in his last moments, and it is said, used great freedom of exhortation. Under his successor he evinced a strong attachment to the established church, by his opposition to popery, and he was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower in 1688. Though thus zealous against the papists, and one of those lords who declared for the prince of Orange, on James's abdication, yet he refused to wait upon the new made monarch, to whose elevation he had so powerfully concurred, and for this pusillanimous conduct he is deservedly censured by Burnet and others. This conduct and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance rendered him unpopular with the court, he was suspended, and Tillotson in 1691 was appointed in his room. As he refused to leave Laubeth, he was cited before the court of exchequer as an intruder, and now, finding all resistance vain, he retired to Fresingfield, where he lived for two years in obscurity, till an intermittent fever carried him off, 24th November 1693. Though a man of great learning, he published little besides sermons—and Familiar Letters. His MSS. were purchased for eighty guineas, and presented to the Bodleian library by bishop Tanner.

SANCTORIUS, an ingenious physician, professor at Padua, was born at Capo d'Istria, 1561, and died at Venice 1636. He is chiefly known for his curious experiments on insensible perspiration, which he made on himself in his statical chair, ascertaining, with incredible accuracy, what he gained by aliment, and what he lost by secretion and other discharges. This ingenious system was presented to the admiring world in his Ars de Staticâ Medicinâ, Venice, 1614, translated into French, 1722, and into English by Dr. Quincy. He published besides, Methodus vitandorum Errorum in Arte Medicâ, 4to.—Commentaria in Galeni, all together collected in 4 vols. 4to.

SANDEMAN, Robert, the founder of the sect, called Sandemianians, was born at Perth in Scotland about the year 1718, and was educated at St. Andrews. Instead of entering into the church for which he was intended, he became a linen manufacturer, and afterwards turned preacher. He came to America in October 1764, and from Boston he went to Danbury, Connecticut. In that town he gathered a church the following year. He afterwards established several societies in New England. He died at Danbury, April 2d 1771, at the age of 53. Individuals are still found, who adhere to his peculiarities, and are known by the name of his sect. He wrote an Answer to Harvey's Theron and Aspasio, said to be a work of talent, but exhibiting great asperity.

SANDERS, Robert, an English writer, born near Breadalbane, in Scotland, about 1727. From a comb-maker he became a hackney writer, when transplanted to London, and besides engagements in some periodical publications, was amanuensis to lord Lyttelton, when he wrote his History of Henry II. He wrote the complete English Traveller, folio—the Newgate Calendar—Gaffer Grey-beard, a novel, in 4 vols. 12mo. in which he occasionally employs his wit with effect against fanaticism. In his last years he projected a Chronology of all Nations, but died before its completion, of a disorder on his lungs, 19th March, 1783.

SANDERS, Nicolas, divinity professor at Louvain, was born at Charlewood, Surrey, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, from which he was banished for his religious tenets. He was with cardinal Hosius, at the council of Trent, and afterwards went to Poland, and he was sent by Gregory XIII. as his nuncio to Ireland, where he led for some time a wandering life in the woods and mountains during the civil troubles, and at last died of want, 1581. He wrote against the reformation, De Origine & Progressu Schismatis Anglicani, 8vo.

SANDERSON, Robert, D.D., an eminent prelate, born at Rotherham, Yorkshire, 19th September 1587. After receiving his education at Rotherham school, he entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1606. In 1618 he was presented to the living of Wybberton, which he resigned the next year, on account of the unhealthiness of the place, and then succeeded to Boothby Pagnel rectory, which he enjoyed for forty years.

He was afterwards promoted to a prebend of Southwell, and on account of his extensive learning, was recommended by Laud to the king, and made his chaplain. In 1642 he was appointed regius professor of divinity, and canon of Christ-church. His attachment to the king rendered him an object of persecution with the parliament; but he adhered to his principles, and attended the king at Hampton-court, and the Isle of Wight, and advised him with respect to the proposal of the parliament, to alter, and even abolish the episcopal government of the church, and also published his sentiments under the title of Episcopacy, not prejudicial to regal power. In 1643 he was ejected from his professorship, but permitted to retain, though with difficulty, his living; and at the restoration, he was reinstated to all his ecclesiastical honors, and soon after raised to the see of Lincoln. Though he held this new dignity but a little time, yet he assiduously was engaged in promoting the interests of religion, and in improving the poor vicarages of his diocese. He died 29th January 1662-3. As a divine and a scholar Sanderson was well versed in ecclesiastical and antiquarian history, and was considered as the ablest casuist of the times. He used to say that he read only three books, Aristotle's Rhetoric, Aquinas' Secunda Secundæ, and Cicero's works, especially his Offices, which he could repeat without book. The strong sense and manly diction of his writings have been deservedly admired. The chief of his works are Logicæ Artis Compendium, thirty-six sermons, fol.—Nine Cases of Conscience resolved—De Juramenti Obligatione—De Obligatione Conscientiæ, translated into English by Charles, during his confinement in the Isle of Wight—Pax Ecclesiæ, about predestination,—Discourses concerning the Church—Lectures in the Divinity School, Oxford.

SANDRART, Joachim, a German painter, born at Frankfort, 1606. He studied at Prague, Utrecht, London, Venice, and Rome. His abilities were noticed and rewarded by the king of Spain; but instead of living the whole of his life abroad, he returned to Frankfort, where he married, and afterwards settled at Nuremberg, where he established an academy of painting. He published some works on his art, the best known of which is the Lives of Painters, with their effigies, abridged from Vasari and Ridolfi. He died at Nuremberg, 1683.

SANDYS, Edwin, D.D., a distinguished prelate, born in 1519, in Lancashire, at Hawkshead, as it is supposed. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1547 was elected master of Catherine hall, and in 1553, vice chancellor. He was a strong advocate for the reformation, and therefore willingly seconded the views of Northumberland in proclaiming Jane Gray queen; but when two days after, the same nobleman, yielding to the times, wished him to proclaim Mary, he boldly resisted. For this contumacy he was deprived of his honors, sent to the tower for seven months, and at last liberated with great difficulty. His attachment to the protestant cause was so zealous, that Gardiner meditated his ruin; but he escaped to the continent, where he continued till the accession of Elizabeth. On his return to England he was appointed one of the nine divines who were to dispute against nine catholics before the assembled parliament, and he was also named one of the commissioners for the revision of the liturgy, and the reformation of the church. He was raised to the see of Worcester, and in consequence of his great learning, was one of those employed in the translation of what is called the Bishops' Bible, in which he translated for his share, the books of Kings and Chronicles. In 1570 he succeeded Grin-dal in the see of London, and in 1576 was translated to York. His severity against the papists, in the cause of the reformation, was so great, that he created himself many enemies, and so resentful were some of these religious opponents, that they scrupled not to charge the bishop of adultery, by introducing, while he was asleep at an inn at Doncaster, the wife of the inn-keeper into his bed, and then exciting the husband, in pretended irritation, to chastise the violence offered to his honor. This infamous conspiracy was fully detected, and the accomplices, men of rank and fortune, were severely punished in the star chamber. The archbishop, thus persecuted and exposed during his active life to great obloquy and much contention, died 10th July, 1588. As a preacher, Dr. Sandys was much admired; and twenty two of his sermons were published in 4to. and some of his letters have also appeared in print.

SANDYS, sir Edwin, second son of the archbishop, was born in Worcestershire, 1561, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, under the celebrated Hooker. In 1581 he obtained a prebend in the church of York, and afterwards travelled into foreign countries, and published an Account of his Observations, under the title of Europæ Speculum. He resigned his prebend in 1602, and was knighted by king James, and employed by him in affairs of trust and importance with foreign states. He opposed in 1621, the measures of the court in parliament, for which he was imprisoned, but soon after set at liberty, by the interference of the commons. He died 1629. He left £1500 to the university of Oxford, for the foundation of a metaphysical lecture. Some sacred hymns have appeared under his name, though some attribute them to another person of the same name.

SANDYS, George, brother to the preceding, was the seventh and youngest son of the archbishop, and was born at Bishopsthorp, 1577. In 1588 he entered at St. Mary hall, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, and in 1610 set out on his travels, and during an absence of two years, visited not only the chief countries of Europe, but the most celebrated places of the East, the Holy Land, and Egypt. He published on his return, an Account of his Travels, in folio, 1615, with plates, which was very popular, and was often reprinted. He was also distinguished as a poet, and translated in 1632, Ovid's Metamorphoses into English verse, in folio—besides the Psalmus of David Paraphrased—Christ's Passion, a sacred drama, from Grotius. He died, in 1643. His learning and virtues have been commended not only by his contemporaries, Lucins, lord Falkland, and others, but by Dryden, who called him the best versifier of his age, and by Pope, who declared that English poetry owed much of its beauty to his translations.

SANNAZARIUS, James, an eminent Italian poet, born at Naples, 28th July, 1458. He was patronised by Frederic, king of Naples, and accompanied that prince into France, after his expulsion from his kingdom. He afterwards returned to Naples, where he devoted himself to study and to pleasure. He died 1530. His Latin poems, consisting of elegies, eclogues, and epigrams, have been often edited. His epic poem, De Partu Virginis, in three books, is considered as an elegant and highly finished performance, though the mixture of christianity and paganism must be regarded as offensive to truth and probability. He wrote also two pieces in Italian, Arcadia, in prose and verse, and Rime, a poem.

SANSEVERO, Raymond di Sangro, prince of, a man of multifarious talents, was born in 1710, at Naples; made many discoveries in mechanics, hydraulics, fortification, painting, and other sciences and arts, and died in 1771. Among his mechanical inventions, was a four-wheeled vehicle to pass over the surface of the water, which he exhibited on the bay of Naples.

SANSON, Nicholas, a French geographer and engineer, who is considered as the creator of geography in France, was born in 1600, at Abbeville; constructed, when he was only sixteen, a map of ancient Gaul, was appointed engineer in Picardy by Louis XIII., published above three hundred maps, and several volumes, in illustration of them, and died in 1667. His three sons, Nicholas, William, and Adrian, were all eminent geographers.

SANSOVINO, Janies, called Fatti, a native of Florence, eminent as a sculptor and architect. The mint, the library of St. Mark, and the palace of Cornaro, at venice, are beautiful specimens of his skill and genius, which were so highly admired, that in a public tax, he and Titian were exempted from the general contribution. He died at Venice, 1570, aged 91. His son Francis was born at Rome, 1521, and studied at Venice, but took his degrees in law at Padua. He, however, abandoned jurisprudence for polite literature, and erected a printing house at Venice, where he printed his own works, and those of others. He wrote a Chronology of the World, to 1582—a Translation of Plutarch—Annals of the Ottoman Empire—Description of the Government of Genoa, Lucca, and Ragusa—a collection of one hundred novels of illustrious Italian writers, &c. He died at Venice, 1586, aged 65.

SANTA CRUZ DE MARZENADO, Don Alvar de Navia Osorio, marquis of, an able Spanish officer and diplomatist, was born, about 1687, in the Asturias, distinguished himself, in the service of Philip V., during the war of the succession, acquired equal reputation subsequently as a negotiator at Turin, the congress of Soissons, and Paris, and was killed in 1732, in a sally from Oran, of which city he was governor. He is the author of Military Reflections, eleven volumes quarto.

SANTEUL, John de, an eminent modern Latin poet, was born in 1680, at Paris, studied under the Jesuits, at the colleges of St. Barbe, and Louis the Great, distinguished himself early by his talents for composing Latin verse, entered among the canons of the abbey of St. Victor, was patronised by Louis XIV., and several illustrious personages, and died in 1697. Santeul was a man of much wit and humor, and of eccentric habits. His works form three volumes. His Inscriptions for Public Buildings, and his Hymns, are his best productions.

SAPPHO, a celebrated poetess, born in Mitylene, about 600 B.C. Her poetical powers in lyric composition were so respectable, that she was called the tenth muse, and her countrymen even stamped her image on their coin. Her manners, however, were dissolute, and it is said that she threw herself into the sea, on account of the coldness with which young Phaon returned her love.

SARASIN, John Francis, a French writer, born at Hermantville, near Caen, 1604. He studied at Caen and Paris, and though not very learned, was eminent for his vivacity, his wit, and his acquaintance with polite literature. He was made secretary to the prince of Conti; but though long protected and favored by him, he was at last dismissed from his service with ignominy, because he had prevailed upon him, through interested motives, to marry cardinal Mazarine's niece. This severe treatment weighed heavily upon his spirit, and at last occasioned his death, 1654. His works were published under the care of his friend Menage. They are in French, and consist of a Discourse on Tragedy—History of the Siege of Dunkirk, 1649—the Funeral Pomp of Voiture—Miscellanea—besides poems, odes, eclogues, and epigrams.

SARAVIA, Adrian, a native of Hesdin, in Artois; protestant professor of divinity at Leyden, where he joined the conspiracy for delivering up the city to Robert de Leicester. Upon the failure of this plan he fled to England, where he became canon of Canterbury, and the friend of Hooker, whose last moments he attended. His works have been collected into one vol. folio. He died 1611, aged 81. He is represented by P. Burman, as avaricious, inconstant, and ambitious.

SARGEANT, Nathaniel Peaslee, chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts. He became a graduate of Harvard college in 1750, and in 1776, was appointed a judge of the superior court. In 1789, he was appointed chief justice of that court. His death took place at Haverhill, in October 1791, at the age of 60 years.

SARGENT, Winthrop, governor of Mississippi, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1771. In July 1775, he entered the army, and served in various capacities with great reputation, until the termination of the war. After the peace, he became connected with the Ohio company, and in 1786, was appointed by congress surveyor of the North-Western Territory, and in 1787, secretary of the government established there. He repaired thither in 1788, and the succeeding year, was authorized to take upon him the government, in case of the death or resignation of St. Clair. The administration devolved on him in 1790, during the absence of the governor. He attended general St. Clair in the capacity of adjutant-general, in his unfortunate expedition against the Indians, and was wounded in the retreat. He was also adjutant-general and inspector under general Wayne, and on the departure of St. Clair, was again governor of the territory. He was removed from office in 1801, and succeeded by Claiborne. He died on a voyage from Natches to Philadelphia, June 3d, 1820.

SARISBURY, John of, an English ecclesiastic, born at Rochester, 1110. He was the favorite of Henry II., and of Thomàs Becket, and for some time was the English resident at the court of Rome. He was afterwards the friend and faithful companion of Becket, and was with him when he was assassinated at Canterbury. He then passed over to France, and was made bishop of Chartres, 1179, but died soon after. He was a man of great genius and extensive learning, which he showed in a Latin treatise, called Policraticon, sive de Nugis Curialium—besides his Letters—a Life of Becket—a treatise on Logic and Philosophy, much commended by Du Pin, and by Lipsius.

SARJEANT, John, a secular priest, whose real name was Smith, born in Lincolnshire, 1621, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became secretary to Morton, bishop of Durham; but afterwards went to Lisbon, and in the English college there, changed his religion. He returned to England, 1652, and wrote some tracts in favor of the new tenets which he had embraced, especially against Tillotson, Bramhall, Pierce, and Hammond. He died about 1670.

SARPI, Peter Paul, commonly known by the name of father Paul, was born at Venice, 14th August, 1552. At the age of twelve, he entered in to the order of the Servites, and soon acquired distinction, by his learning and abilities. Well skilled in the knowledge of the learned languages, he was equally conversant in philosophy mathematics, and theology, and had made some progress in medicine and anatomy. These high acquirements were noticed and rewarded; he was not only made provincial of his order, but was honored with the esteem of cardinals and of princes. The quarrels of Venice with pope Paul V., engaged the attention of Sarpi, and he so ably defended the rights of his fellow-citizens, that the pope ordered him to come to Rome, and on his refusal, excommunicated him. Undismayed by the displeasure of the pontiff, he did not cease to advocate the cause of Venice against foreign powers, in his speeches and in his writings; but his boldness proved almost fatal to him. He was attacked on the bridge of St. Mark by five assassins, who, after stabbing him in three places, escaped to a ten-oared barge, which waited their arrival; and though the public, incensed at the treatment of their brave defender, offered a high reward, the murderers were never discovered. The wounds were not mortal, but they hastened the dissolution of Sarpi, whose constitution was very delicate, and his health feeble. He died 14th January, 1623, aged 71, and his last words were, esto perpetua, expressive of his wish for the immortal glory of his country. This learned man wrote several works of merit, and his knowledge was so extensive, that the Italians have not hesitated to ascribe to him the discovery of the circulation of the blood. He was author of the History of the Council of Trent, a valuable work, printed in Italian, London, 1619, and Latin, 1620—Considerations of the Censures of Paul V., against the Venetian Republic—treatise on the Interdict—De Jure Asylorum—treatise on the Inquisition—on Benefices—Letters—Memoirs of his Life appeared at Venice, 1766. His works were collected at Venice, 1677, in 6 vols. 12mo.

SARTO, Andrea de, an Italian painter, born at Florence, 1471. He was first apprentice to a goldsmith; but he was born with a genius for painting, and by copying and imitating, at his leisure, the pieces of the greatest masters, and by the instruction of Basile, Cossimo, and Bigio, he soon acquired correctness and celebrity. He was invited by Francis I., to France, and received very honorable marks of the royal bounty; but when permitted to visit Florence, to make a collection of pictures to adorn the king's palaces, he not only shamefully forgot his promise, but dishonorably embezzled the money intrusted by the monarch to his care. This dishonorable conduct rendered him despised and poor; but he forgot himself for a while in the intoxication of unlawful pleasures, and died of the plague, 1520, aged 42. As an artist, he possessed superior powers, though his pictures are said to be deficient in boldness, in strength, and life.

SATURNINUS, Pub. Serronius, a Roman general, who assumed the imperial purple, 263. He was murdered by his soldiers, four years after. A general of Aurelian, of the same name, was proclaimed emperor by the Alexandrians, 280, and reluctantly accepted the honor, but soon after destroyed himself.

SAVAGE, Richard, an eminent English poet, natural son of Anne, countess of Macclesfield, by the earl of Rivers, was born 1698. Doomed to misery, his infancy was intrusted to the care of a poor woman, by his unnatural mother, who wished not, indeed, to conceal her shame, but punish her offspring. His father was prevented from leaving him a legacy of £6000, because the cruel countess declared that he was dead, and after thus robbing him of independence, she endeavored to send him to the plantations, and then placed him apprentice to a shoemaker in Holborn. The death of the nurse who had taken care of him, now altered his situation, and in searching the effects of a woman, whom he considered as his mother, Savage discovered letters which informed him of his real birth. Leaving, therefore, in disdain, his humble profession, he addressed himself to his mother, and tried, by every art of tenderness and regard, to awaken her affection. His appeals were in vain upon the obdurate heart of the countess, and therefore, as he had acquired some little learning at St. Alban's school, he commenced author, to gain subsistence. But though noticed by the wits of the age, by sir Richard Steele, and by Wilks, Savage often passed his nights in the open fields, or in the streets, unable to pay even for an obscure lodging. His tragedy of sir Thomas Overbury, at last raised him to the short independence which could be gained from the profits of £200; but whilst he congratulated himself on his success, he had the misfortune, in a drunken quarrel at a house of ill fame, to kill one of his companions in debauchery, a Mr. Sinclair. He was tried for the offence, and found guilty, and it was now that he discovered his mother's cruel conduct. She not only rejoiced at his condemnation, but used all her influence to cause him to be executed, and her diabolical wishes would have been gratified, had not the countess of Hertford, out of compassion, reported to the queen the extraordinary sufferings of the condemned culprit, and procured his pardon. Thus incapable of raising compassion in the breast of his mother, he thought he might extort money from her by the powers of ridicule, and he succeeded. Lord Tyrconnel received him, in consequence, into his family and friendship, and allowed him £200 a year. But the manners of Savage were licentious; he was fickle in his temper, violent and irascible, and he easily quarrelled with his patron, and was dismissed from his favor. His next effort for subsistence, was the publication of his Bastard, a poem of great beauty, and which grew so popular, that his mother, at that time at Bath, was obliged to fly from the place, to avoid hearing the lines, which were repeated on all sides, to create in her, shame and confusion. His Volunteer Lanreant, on the queen's birth-day, procured him from the royal purse, a present of £50, with a promise of the like annual sum; but the money was soon squandered, and the poet, left without resources, often quitted the house of a friend, where his wit and politeness procured him an invitation, to pass the night in the society of the meanest rabble, in the summer on heaps of rubbish, and in the winter among the ashes of a glass-house. The death of the queen, in 1733, brought on, with the loss of his pension, increasing poverty; yet his friends exerted themselves in his favor, and promised to raise £50 a year for him, if he would retire to Wales, and live there in privacy. He accepted the kind offer, and departed for his distant residence, but soon grew tired, and sighed for the dissipation of London. On his return, he passed through Bristol, where his elegant manners, and pleasant conversation procured him admittance to the tables of the rich; but after a time his company grew disagreeable, from his late hours, and his irregularity of conduct. Poverty too increased his miseries; his clothes were now too shabby for genteel company, and at last he was arrested by the mistress of his coffee-house, for the small sum of £8. Six months he languished in the confinement of a jail, when a fever came to terminate his wretched existence. He died 1st August, 1743, aged 46, and was buried in St. Peter's church-yard, at the expense of the gaoler. This unhappy man, whose character was so chequered with vices and good qualities, might have become, from the strong natural powers which he possessed, a most respectable member of society; but his mind was untutored, and the cruelty of his mother made him quarrel with the whole world, which he regarded with the consequence of persecuted virtue, and injured innocence. Whatever kindnesses he received, he considered as due to his merits, and he seldom suffered the good opinion of a friend towards him, long to continue in his favor.

SAVAGE, John, D.D., president of the Royston club, and lecturer of St. George's, Hanover-square, was made rector of Clothall, Herts, by lord Salisbury, whom he had attended on his travels. He was educated at Westminster, and ever after showed great fondness for the school. He died 24th March 1747, and out of respect the scholars of Westminster inscribed a small tablet to his memory, in the east cloisters of the abbey. He printed two occasional sermons.

SAVAGE, Samuel Morton, D.D., a dissenting divine, educated under Eames. He afterwards was assistant to Dr. Jennings, whom he quitted in 1785. He received the degree of doctor of divinity from Aberdeen university, 1767, and died 1791, aged 70. He published some single sermons of little merit.

SAVARY, James, a French writer, born at Doué, in Anjou, 1622. He was employed in the first part of his life in commercial pursuits, and afterwards was admitted of the council for the reformation of commerce. As his knowledge on mercantile subjects was very extensive, he digested his ideas into a volume, which he published 1675, 4to. under the title of the Parfait Negociant, a most useful work, translated into every language of Europe, and of which the eighth edition appeared with additions by his son Philemon Lewis, 1721. He further published a supplementary volume in 1688, and died 1690. Two of his sons, James and Philemon, labored together to complete that useful work, the Universal Dictionary of Commerce, which was published, 2 vols. fol. 1723, and again in 3 vols. fol. 1748. James died 1716, and Philemon, 1727.

SAVARY, N., a French writer, born at Vitre, in Brittany. He studied at Rennes, and in 1776, travelled into Egypt, where he continued three years, earnestly attentive to the manners and habits of the inhabitants, and to the antiquities of the country. On his return he visited the islands of the Archipelago, and in 1780, published a translation of the Koran, and afterwards produced his Letters on Egypt, 2 vols. 8vo. a popular work, translated into various European languages. He published also Letters on Greece. He was a man of good talents, and refined taste, but too warm an imagination for the soberness of an historian. He died 1788, at Paris.

SAVERIEN, Alexander, a French mathematician and writer, was born, about 1720, at Arles; spent his life in mathematical and literary pursuits; and died, unpatronised and in obscurity, in 1805. It was upon his suggestion that the naval academy was established at Brest. Among his works are various treatises on maritime tactics and shipbuilding; Dictionaries of mathematics and of naval affairs; Histories of ancient and modern philosophers; and a History of the Progress of the Human mind in the Sciences.

SAVILE, sir Henry, a learned Englishman, born at Bradley, near Halifax, Yorkshire, 30th November 1549, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He early distinguished himself as an excellent classical scholar, and after travelling on the continent, was made tutor, in the Greek language, to queen Elizabeth. In 1585 he was appointed warden of Merton, over which society he presided with great dignity thirty six years, and in 1596 he was advanced to the provostship of Eton College. He was as great a favorite with James as he had been with Elizabeth; but he declined all offers of promotion either in church or state, and was satisfied with the honor of knighthood conferred, 1604. Upon the loss of his son, he devoted all his property and his time to the encouragement of learning, and with commendable munificence, founded in 1619 two professorships at Oxford, one in astronomy, and the other in geometry, and bestowed various sums of money, and also lands, for other benevolent purposes of improvement in the university, besides some valuable books to the Bodleian. This amiable man died at Eton college, 19th February 1621-2. His character has been deservedly applauded by his learned contemporaries, by Is. Casaubon, Jos. Scaliger, Mercerus, Meibomius, Montagu, &c. and the university of Oxford, in a public speech, paid also the highest honors to this their worthy benefactor. His works are four books of Tacitus' history, and the Life of Agricola, translated into English, fol. with notes—Commentaries concerning Roman warfare—a Latin Collection of Ancient Writers of English History, with a Chronological Table from J. Cæsar to William the Conqueror—St. Chrysostom's Works in Greek, 8 vols. folio, a valuable edition which cost him eight thousand pounds in the publication. He published besides, Bradwardin's de Causâ Dei—Prælectiones, thirteen in Euclid. His brother Thomas was fellow of Merton, and afterwards of Eton, and distinguished himself for his learning, and his intimacy with Camden. He died in London 1592-3.

SAVILLE, sir George, marquis of Halifax, an eminent statesman, descended from a Yorkshire family, and born 1630. He contributed greatly to the restoration, and was rewarded for his services with a peerage. In 1672 he went as ambassador to Holland, with Arlington and Buckingham, to treat about a peace with France, but with little success; and in 1675 he was removed from the council board for opposing the test bills, and the declaration for a toleration, by the influence of the duke of York, whose measures he warmly reprobated as hostile to the constitution. He was, however, so violent against the exclusion bill, that the commons addressed the king to remove him from his council, to which he had lately been restored, but his firmness prevailed; the parliament was dissolved, and he was raised to the dignity of an earl, and refused the office of secretary of state, and of lord lieutenant of Ireland. In 1682 he was created a marquis, and made privy seal, and on James's accession, he was appointed president of the council; but when he refused to consent to the repeal of the test act, he was dismissed by the king from all his offices. When James abdicated the crown, Halifax was made president of the lords, and in the convention parliament, was appointed speaker of the upper house, and vigorously supported the elevation of the prince of Orange to the vacant throne, and for his services was nominated privy seal. In 1689 he quitted the court, and ever after displayed a strong and determined opposition to the measures of the ministry till his death, which happened in April, 1695, occasioned by a gangrene in a long neglected rupture. Halifax was a man of great abilities as a statesman and a speaker, but the soundest arguments and the most solid truths, were too often turned into contempt by the force of ridicule, and a vicious propensity to low and vulgar wit, which he was eager on all occasions to show.

Though reputed an atheist by the world, he confessed to Burnet, who attended his last moments, his firm belief in the goodness of God, and the mediation of Christ. His titles were extinct, by the death of his only surviving son in 1700. He was an elegant writer, and besides his valuable "Advice to a daughter," he published the character of a Trimmer—the Anatomy of an Equivalent—a Letter to a Dissenter—Maxims of State—the Character of king Charles II.

SAUNDERS, sir Edmund, from a common beggar, rose to eminence in the law, by the friendship of a lawyer of Clement's inn, who saw and patronised his abilities by admitting him among his clerks. From a clerk he became a counsel, and at last was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, where he supported the dignity of his office by patience, integrity, and impartiality. He died 1683.

SAUNDERS, William, a physician, was born in 1743. He took his degree in Scotland; but after settling in London, entered himself at Cambridge, where he regularly graduated, and then became a fellow of the college of physicians. He was senior physician to Guy's hospital; and died at Enfield in 1817. His works are—1. Treatise on Mercury in Venereal Cases. 2. A tract on the Devonshire Cholera. 3. Observations de Antimonis. 4. Treatise on the Mephitic Acid. 5. Treatise on the Red Peruvian Bark. 6. Dissertation on the Structure and Diseases of the Liver. 7. Oratio Harveiana. 8. On the Chymical History of the most celebrated Mineral Waters. 9. On the Hepatitis of India.

SAUNDERS, John Cunningham, a surgeon, was born at Lovistone, in Devonshire, in 1773. He served his apprenticeship to an eminent practitioner at Barnstaple; after which he became a pupil of St. Thomas's hospital, where at the end of two years, he was chosen demonstrator of anatomy. In 1804 he instituted an infirmary for diseases of the eye, in operating on which organ he was remarkably successful; but while thus prosecuting his favourite pursuit, he was cut off by an apoplexy, February 9th, 1810. He published a folio volume on the Anatomy and Diseases of the Ear; and an Essay on the Inflammation of the Iris. After his death appeared the papers which he had left on disorders of the eye, with some account of the author prefixed.

SAUNDERSON, Nicolas, LL.D., a celebrated mathematician, born at Thurlston, Yorkshire, 1682. When twelve months old, he was deprived of his sight by the small-pox, and therefore retained no idea whatever of light and of colors. His education, however, was not neglected; at Penneston grammar school he acquired such knowledge of the classics, that he could most perfectly understand Euclid, Archimedes, and Diophantus, when read in Greek. His fondness for mathematics began to appear when first he was made acquainted by his father with numbers, and soon, by the power of his memory, he formed intricate calculations, and resolved difficult problems. The friendship of Mr. West, who observed his unusual powers, initiated him into the knowledge of algebra and geometry, and under the further assistance of Dr. Nettleton, he acquired all that correctness, and that vast information which raised him to such celebrity. He afterwards improved his knowledge of logic and metaphysics at a private school near Sheffield, and at the age of twenty-five appeared at Cambridge, as a resident in Christ's college, though not a member of the society. His extraordinary powers, and the difficulties of a narrow fortune, however, procured him friends and admirers, and Whiston, the mathematical professor, very liberally permitted him to lecture before the university. His lectures were on the Newtonian philosophy, and were attended by crowded audiences, and so deservedly popular did he become, that on the removal of Whiston from his professorship, the blind lecturer was honorably called upon, by the wishes of all the university, to fill up the Lucasian chair. His inauguration speech was delivered in elegant Latin, and his reputation continued to increase, so that when George II. visited the university, the professor was, by royal favor, created doctor of laws. This great character became, by close application, a valetudinarian, and at last was attacked by a mortification in his foot, which carried him off, 19th April 1739, aged 57. The vivacity and wit of his conversation were much admired; but his judgment of persons and things was often expressed with such freedom, and such unconcern, that he created himself many enemies. This singular character had astonishing powers of feeling; when in a garden, where observations were making on the sun, he could point out every cloud that obscured the sky, and he discovered such quickness in observing the voice of persons with whom he conversed, that he recollected every one with the most singular exactness. He was a great proficient in playing on the flute, and cultivation was only wanting to have made him as great in music as in mathematics. His Elements of Algebra were published at Cambridge, by subscription, 1740, 2 vols. 4to. and a treatise on Fluxions, 8vo. appeared also after his death. It is needless to say that he was the friend of the great men of his times, admired and respected by them, and repaying their esteem by the strongest gratitude. Of sir Isaac Newton, whom he knew intimately, he always spoke in a style almost bordering on veneration.

SAVONAROLA, Jerom, an Italian monk born at Ferrara, 1492. He entered into the Dominican order at Bologna, and became an eloquent and popular preacher, after teaching for some time physics and metaphysics. His influence in the pulpit was so great at Florence, that for some years he guided the state as its sovereign; but when he inveighed against the corruptions of the church of Rome, and the scandalous life of the pontiff Alexander VI. he drew down upon him the vengeance of the holy see, which neither his popularity, nor the purity of his morals could divert. He was condemned to be hanged and burned, and suffered that dreadful punishment in 1498 with great resignation. He wrote sermons—The Triumphs of the Cross, and various other theological works, printed Leyden, 6 vols. 12mo. J. Fr. Picus, of Mirandula, has written his life.

SAVOT, Lewis, a native of Saulieu in Burgundy, who studied medicine, and became physician to Louis XIII. He also applied himself to antiquarian pursuits. His works are, Discourse on Ancient Medals, 4to.—French Architecture in Private Buildings, a work of merit, 4to.—Galen's Art of Healing by bleeding, from the Greek—de Causis Colorum, 8vo. He died 1640, aged 61.

SAURIN, James, son of a protestant lawyer, was born at Nismes, 1677. He left France with his father on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and went to Geneva, where he studied with great assiduity, and afterwards served as a cadet in lord Galloway's regiment in the campaign of 1694. He, however, abandoned the military life for philosophy and divinity, and after improving himself further at Geneva, he passed, in 1700, into Holland and England, and in 1703 married. In 1705 he settled at the Hague, where his eloquence as a preacher was displayed with astonishing effect to crowded audiences. He died at the Hague, 30th December, 1750. He wrote a treatise on education, dedicated to the princes, sons of George II. and was rewarded with a pension by the princess of Wales. He published besides, his sermons, highly esteemed, in 12 vols. 8vo. which have been translated into English by Robinson and Hunter; but his greatest work is Discourses Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most memorable Events of the Old and New Testaments, left incomplete, but continued in 6 vols. folio. He was unfortunately engaged in a controversy with la Chapelle and others, for asserting in a pamphlet that, in some cases, truth may be disguised, and though a strong friend to toleration, he was severely treated by his antagonists.

SAURIN, Joseph, a French mathematician, born at Courtson, in the principality of Orange, 1659. He was a protestant, but afterwards abjured his principles at Paris, and was admitted member of the academy of sciences, and received a pension from the king. He devoted his life to geometrical pursuits, and communicated some valuable papers to the Memoirs of the academy, and the Journal des Sçavans. He was engaged in a controversy with Rousseau, who had falsely charged him with writing some libellous verses against some persons of distinction, which he himself, it is supposed, had composed; a scandalous conduct, which when examined, proved the innocence of Saurin, and the guilt of Rousseau. Voltaire has vindicated his memory, but still his character must be considered as violent and unbending. He died at Paris, 1737.

SAURIN, Bernard Joseph, son of the preceding, was advocate of the parliament of Paris, and member of the French academy. He disregarded the law for literature and poetry, and became the friend of Voltaire, Montesquien, and Helvetius. He wrote some plays of great merit and popularity, especially Spartacus, Blanche and Richard, tragedies—Anglomanie, a comedy, the Marriage of Julia—Mœurs du Temps, &c. His dramatic pieces were collected in 2 vols. 8vo. 1733. He was so much esteemed by Helvetius that the philosopher allowed him a handsome pension. He died at Paris, 17th November, 1781.

SAUSSURE, Horace Benedict de, was born at Geneva, 17th February, 1740. From his earliest years he evinced great partiality for literature, especially natural history, and at the age of twenty-one he was elected to the chair of philosophical professor at Geneva, which he filled with great public advantage for twenty-five years. He first visited Paris in 1763, and afterwards examined the discoveries of Montgolfier at Lyons, and after travelling through Holland, Belgium, and England, he, in 1772, extended his philosophical researches to Italy. He visited the island of Elba, and with sir William Hamilton, examined the wonders of Vesuvius, and afterwards measured the crater of Ætna. In the progress of his important researches he discovered some valuable plants, and also invented various instruments, very useful in the operations of science and of art. His next excursions were on the Alps, and after crossing them fourteen times by eight different places, he ascended, through a thousand difficulties, to the summit of Mont Blanc, where he could scarce breathe. These laborious exertions in the cause of science, rendered him deservedly popular; he was made member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of other learned bodies, and the emperor Joseph, when he visited Geneva, paid particular attention to the philosopher. In the French revolution, he was elected, on the union of his country to France, to the national assembly; but the disorders which prevailed not only ruined his little fortune, but broke his heart, and he died of chagrin, 1799. He is author of an Eulogy on his friend Bonnet, 8vo.—Dissertatio Physica de Igne—Inquiry on the Bark of Leaves—Dissertatio Physica de Electricitate, 8vo.—Plan of Reform for the College of Geneva—Description of the Electrical Effects of Thunder—Essay on Hygrometry, 4to.—Voyages in the Alps, 4 vols. 4to. a most valuable work, and various communications to the memoirs of the learned societies of which he was a member.

SAUVAGES, Francis Boissier de, a native of Alais, who applied himself to medical pursuits, and became professor of botany and medicine at Montpellier and member of several of the learned societies of France, and of foreign nations. His reputation was so extensive, that he was consulted from all parts of France, and he received the merited surname of the Boerhaave of Languedoc. This able and respected physician died at Montpellier, 19th February, 1767, aged 61. He wrote Theoria Febris—Nosologia Methodica, 5 vols. 8vo.—Physiologia Mechanicæ Elementa, 12mo.—Methodus Foliorum, 8vo.—a translation of Hales' Statistical Essays on Animals—Dissertations—and Memoirs.

SAUVAL, Henry, an advocate in the parliament of Paris. He is author of a laborious work, the History of the Antiquities of Paris, 3 vols. folio, on which he was engaged for twenty years, and which he did not live to complete. He died 1670, and in consequence of the death of his continuator, the work did not appear till 1724. It was again edited in 1733.

SAUVEUR, Joseph, a French mathematician, born at La Fleche, 1653. He was dumb till his seventh year, and then his powers of speech appeared very weak and imperfect, so that what he uttered was with difficulty and slowness. He had a strong propensity for mechanical knowledge, and disregarding the classical instruction which he received in the jesuits' college, applied himself to mathematical studies, against the wishes of his friends, who had marked out for him preferment in the church. To maintain himself, he began to teach mathematics, and so great was his reputation, that at the age of twenty he had prince Eugene among his pupils. His abilities recommended him to the great and the learned; he was esteemed by Condé, honored with the notice of the royal family, and in 1686 was made professor of mathematics to the royal college, and in 1696 admitted member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a treatise on Fortification, and to enable himself to do it scientifically, he attended the siege of Mons. He wrote besides, a treatise on Music, and papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died 1716.

SAXE, Maurice, count de, natural son of Frederic Augustus, elector of Saxony, and king of Poland, by the countess Konigsmark, was born at Dresden, 13th October, 1696. He showed fondness for war from his very infancy, and refused to undergo the labors of study, except his application was rewarded with the permission of riding or of military exercise. When the king of Poland, in 1711, besieged the fortress of Stralsund, the young warrior appeared there to great advantage; he encouraged the soldiers by his example, and crossed the river in the sight of the enemy; and in the following dreadful battle of Guedelbusck, he had a horse shot under him, while he rallied three times the retiring troops. In 1717, he was with the emperor at the siege of Belgrade, where he defeated the Turks, and on his return he was decorated with the order of the white eagle. After the treaties of Utrecht and Passarowitz, he went to France, where the duke of Orleans gained his attachment and services by bestowing on him the brevet rank of field marshal. During the peace of the continent, he laboriously employed himself in improving his mathematical knowledge, and in introducing strict military discipline in the regiment intrusted to his care; but in 1726, he was roused from his tranquil retirement by the states of Courland, who unanimously elected him their sovereign. Poland and Russia opposed his elevation, but he defended himself with bravery, and with a small force resisted with success thousands of his invaders; but at last he gave up the unequal contest, and abandoning the supreme power which his valor so much deserved, he retired, in 1729, to privacy in France. Here, during the attacks of a fever, he composed, in thirteen nights, his Reveries, a work worthy of the pen of a Cæsar or a Condé, and valuable for the important instructions which it conveys to the general as well as to the soldier. The death of the king of Poland, his father, in 1733, rekindled the flames of war through Europe, and Saxe prepared to share the dangers and the glories of the approaching campaign. He declined the command of the Saxou troops, offered him by his brother, the elector, and preferred serving in the French armies on the Rhine under marshal Berwick. He distinguished himself at the battle of Etlingen, and at the siege of Philipsburg, and for his services was rewarded with the rank of lieutenant-general. In the war which followed the death of Charles VI. Saxe gathered fresh laurels. He besieged Prague in 1741, and took it by assault, and soon after made himself master of Egra, and then marching to the Rhine, he seized the strong lines of Lauterburg. In 1744, he was made marshal of France, and intrusted with the armies in Flanders. Though ill, he immediately left Paris for his post, and opened the campaign of 1745, by the famous battle of Fontenoy, which he gained, though carried around his camp in a litter. This was followed by the fall of Tournay, Bruges, Ghent, Oudenarde, Ostend, and Brussels, and the next year another victory at Rocoux crowned his arms, and procured for him the most flattering honors from the king of France, and the title of marshal of all his armies, and of governor of the newly conquered countries. In the next campaign the victory of Lawfeldt was followed by the fall of Bergen-op-Zoom, and then of Maestricht, when the terrors of the Dutch arrested the career of the conqueror, and peace was concluded in 1748. After the peace Saxe, visited Berlin, where he was received with all the honor due to his merits, and then he returned to France, where he devoted himself to literature and the arts. This great hero, whose celebrity was extended over the whole world, died 30th November 1750, aged 54, and was buried in the Lutheran church of St. Thomas, Strasburg.

SAXE-WEIMAR, Bernard, duke of, one of the greatest generals of the seventeenth century, was born, in 1600, at Weimar, and first served under his brother in the contest between Frederic V. of Bohemia and the Austrians. From 1623, till 1639, when he died, he was constantly engaged in Germany, performed numerous splendid actions, and was looked up to as one of the firmest and most valuable champions of the protestant cause. It was he who assumed the command after the fall of Gustavus Adolphus, and secured the victory of Lutzen.

SAXO, Grammaticus, a celebrated writer, whose origin and even country is involved in obscurity. He is generally acknowledged to have been a native of Zealand, an island of Denmark, and to have flourished in the 12th century. He studied theology, and was employed in the cathedral of Roschild, and went in 1161, to Paris, to invite some of the monks of St. Genevieve, to come and to reform the morals of the Danish priests. He died about 1208, aged upwards of 70, and was buried in Roschild cathedral, where, three centuries after, Lago Urne, bishop of Scalandra, placed an inscription on his tomb. By the encouragement of Absalom, bishop of Roschild, Saxo undertook the History of Denmark and other northern nations, and after twenty years of labor completed it in a manner worthy a man of learning and virtue. This valuable work was first published by Petrus at Paris, 1514, and reprinted at Basil and Frankfort afterwards, and in 1644, at Sora, under the care of Stephanus.

SAY, Jean Baptistet an eminent writer on Political economy, was born at Lyons, in 1767. In early life he removed to the city of Paris, where he became professor in the school of Mechanics, and where he died, November 10, 1832. His principal work on Political Economy, has been translated into most of the languages of Europe.

SAYLE, William, first governor of Carolina, was sent by the proprietors, in 1667, to examine the country. After exploring the coast he returned to England, carrying a favorable report, and encouraging them to establish a colony there. The settlement was commenced, and Sayle appointed governor in 1669. He was driven among the Bahama Islands on his passage, and he gave so favorable account of them that the Carolina company obtained a charter also for them. He first landed in Carolina, at or near Beaufort, early in 1670, but soon moved northwardly, and established on the banks of Ashley river the foundations of old Charleston. He fell a victim to the unhealthiness of the climate, and died in 1671. West succeeded him.

SCALA, Bartholomew, LL.D., an Italian statesman, born about 1424. Though but the son of a miller, he rose to distinction at the bar under the protection of Cosmo de Medicis at Florence. After the death of his patron, he retained the same confidential offices with his successor Peter, and was employed by him in some important negotiations. He was for his services ennobled at Florence, and knighted by the pope, and made senator of Rome. He died at Florence, 1497. He wrote the History of Florence in twenty books, of which four books only have been published, besides letters—a Speech made to Pope Innocent VIII.—and pro Imperatoris Militaribus Signis.

SCALIGER, Julius Cæsar, a celebrated writer, born 1484, at Ripa in the territory of Verona, and descended from the princes of Verona. His father was in the military service of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, and at the age of twelve, the son was presented to the emperor Maximilian, and continued as page about his person for seventeen years. During his attendance on the emperor he was engaged in various expeditions, and was at the battle of Ravenna 1512, where he lost his father and brother. At the age of forty he abandoned the military life, and after studying divinity, applied assiduously to medicine, and settled in 1526 at Agen. In this retirement he devoted himself with uncommon application to literature and the modern languages, and while he practised physic for his maintenance, he acquired celebrity by the labors of his pen. He died 1553, at Agen. The abilities of Scaliger were undoubtedly great, but though commended by his son as a benevolent and amiable character, he was vain and petulant, and among others treated Erasmus with great virulence and illiberality, because he had ridiculed some of the learned men of Italy for their servile attachment to the Litany of Cicero. The best known of his writings are, Exercitationes contra Cardanum de Subtilitate, 4to.—de Causis Linguae Latinae, 4to.—Poetices Libri septem, folio.—Poemata—Epistolæ—Commentarii in Theophrasti Libros—in Aristotelis Animal. folio—in Hippocratis Librum de Insomniis, 8vo.—de Causis Plantarum, folio.—Animadversiones in Historiam Plantarum, 8vo.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, son of the preceding, was born at Agen, 1540. He studied at Bordeaux and under his father; but after his death he passed to Paris to attend the lectures of Turnebus. His eagerness to improve, however, could not await the slow progress of regular lectures, and therefore he applied himself without the assistance of an instructor to Greek, and when a perfect master of the language he turned his attention to the Hebrew, and with such activity that he was well acquainted with thirteen different languages. So much learning, to which was united a profound knowledge of the sciences, rendered his name very celebrated. He was invited to fill the chair of belles lettres at Leyden, in 1603, and he accepted the honorable appointment, and died there of a dropsy 21st January 1609. Like his father, Scaliger possessed great abilities, but certainly superior learning, so that he was deservedly called the most learned man of the age; but these high qualities were obscured by a haughty deportment, and a contemptuous disregard of the merits of others, attended with abusive and illiberal language profusely directed against every opponent. The works of this extraordinary man are numerous and various, but the best known and the most useful is his Opus de Emendatione Temporum, in which he not only displays vast erudition and an extensive knowledge of ancient writers, but lays the foundation of regular and systematic chronology, especially by the invention of the Julian period, and deserves the name which he has received, of the father of chronology. He wrote besides Thesaurus Temporum, in which he corrected some of the errors of his former work—de Tribus Sectis Judæorum, 2 vols. 4to.—Latin poems, 8vo.—Epistolæ, notes on Varro, and on almost all the authors of ancient Greece and Rome, containing various learned remarks, with bold, ingenious and interesting conjectures. Two Scaligerana have appeared, one at the Hague 1666, and the other at Groningen, 1669.

SCAMOZZI, Vincent, an eminent Italian architect, was born, in 1550, at Vicenza; settled at Venice in 1583; and died in 1616. He was the rival of Palladio, and after the death of that artist, had no competitor. Venice, Florence, and Genoa, contain some of his finest edifices. He wrote a Treatise on Architecture, and a Treatise on the Antiquities of Rome.

SCANDERBEG, or GEORGE CASTRIOT, king of Albania, was born 1404, and was delivered up by his father with three of his brothers, as hostages to Amurath II., emperor of the Turks. The three brothers were cut off by poison, and George was spared on account of his youth, and by his valor soon distinguished himself in the service of the bloody oppressor of his family. He was circumcised, and took the command of a body of troops under the title of Sangiac; but on the death of his father 1432, he determined to recover the dominions of his ancestors. In the expedition with which he was intrusted against Hungary, he formed a secret correspondence with Huniades Corvinus, the king of the country, and enabled him to defeat the Turks, thirty thousand of whom fell in the field. After this he compelled the secretary of the sultan, who was in the camp, to write letters, sealed with the imperial signet, demanding the delivery of the capital of Albania into his hands. After the messengers were dispatched, he put to death all those who were witnesses of his measures, that no report might be carried to Amurath, and then hastening to Albania he was received as a deliverer by his countrymen, and acknowledged king 1443. In vain Amurath and his successor Mahomet made war against this enterprising hero, and besieged Croie his capital; their numerous armies were defeated, and after several years of hostility, peace was restored in 1461, and the independence of Albania confirmed. At the request of Pius II. the Albanian monarch visited Italy, and not only relieved Ferdinand of Arragon who was besieged at Bari, but assisted him to defeat his victorious enemy, the count of Anjou. Afterwards Scanderbeg was again engaged in war with the Turks, and his capital was twice besieged, but immediately relieved by his conquering arms. This heroic prince who had been present in twenty-two battles, and had killed two thousand Turks with his own hands without receiving only a slight wound, died at Lissa, in the Venetian territories, 17th January, 1467, aged 63. Though occasionally severe, he was a man of mild manners, and of the most benevolent heart, and he exhorted earnestly his soldiers to chastity, observing that nothing was more prejudicial to their profession than sensual pleasures. His life was written by the jesuit du Poncet, 1709, in 12mo.

SCAPULA, John, a lexicographer who studied at Lausanne, and was afterwards engaged in the printing house of Henry Stephens. While thus employed, he privately made an abridgment of the great work which his master was preparing for the press, and by publishing it in 1580, under the title of a Greek Lexicon, he not only gained a considerable sum, but thus dishonorably ruined in some degree the laborious Thesaurus of Stephens, which when it appeared, found few purchasers. Stephens vented his indignation in the Latinity of Lipsius, but found no other redress.

SCARBOROUGH, sir Charles, physician to Charles II. and his two successors, was eminent for his extensive practice, as well as for his knowledge of mathematics, in which he was so perfect that he could repeat in order all the propositions of Euclid, Archimedes, and other ancient authors. He was assistant and successor to Dr. Harvey, as lecturer on subjects of anatomy and surgery, and he was the first who judiciously applied mathematics to medical subjects. He wrote Syllabus Muscalorum—an Elegy on Cowley, and died 26th February 1693.

SCARELLA, John Baptist, an ecclesiastic of Brescia, who warmly supported the principles of Newton's system. He wrote Physica Generalis, 3 vols. 4to.—de Rebus ad Scientiam pertinent. 2 vols. 4to.—de Magnete 4to. Hydrodynamica, 4to.—Elements of Logic, Ontology, and natural Theology, 4 vols. 4to. He died February 1779, aged 70.

SCARLATTI, Alexander, a celebrated Italian composer, was born in 1650, at Naples, and died there in 1725. He produced nearly a hundred operas, and two hundred masses, besides many other compositions, and contributed greatly to restore a pure musical taste in his native country.—His son Dominic, and his grandson Joseph, were both composers of merit.

SCARPA, Anthony, an eminent Italian anatomist and surgeon, was born about 1746, and died in 1826 at Pavia, at the university of which city he was professor. He enjoyed an extensive reputation both as a practitioner and an observer, and contributed greatly to the improvement of surgery. Among his works are, An Anatomical Description of the Auditory and Olfactory Organs; Observations on Aneurism; and A Treatise on the Principal Diseases of the Eye.

SCARRON, Paul, a French poet and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1610, at Paris, and was intended for the church, but never took orders; for which, indeed, his habits rendered him unfit. In his seven and twentieth year, one of his wild pranks having obliged him to hide himself in a marsh, he lost the use of all his limbs. For some time he subsisted by the composition of burlesque comedies, which were exceedingly popular. Anne of Austria afterwards gave him a pension; which, however, he subsequently lost by writing a satire on Mazarin. In 1652 he married Mlle d'Aubigné, who, at a later period, acquired such celebrity as Madame de Maintenon. At his house all the Parisian wits were accustomed to assemble. He died in 1660. Of his works, The Comic Romance is the only one which is still read.

SCHAAF, Charles, a learned German, born at Nuys near Cologne, 1646. He was educated at Duisbourg, and became professor of oriental languages there, from which he removed in 1679 to Leyden, to fill the oriental chair. He died of an apoplexy at Leyden 1729. He wrote Opus Aramaicum cum Grammatica Chaldaicâ & Syriacâ, 4to.—Novum Testamentum Syriacum cum Versione Latinâ, 4to.—Levicon Syriacum Concordantiale—Epitome Grammaticæ Hebraicæ, 8vo.—a letter in Syriac.

SCHACHT, Christian Paul, a native of Harderwyck in Holland. He took his degrees of M. D. and became professor of medicine, botany, chemistry, and natural history in his native place 1791, and died nine years after, aged 92. He is author of some valuable memoirs, inserted in the Dutch journals.

SCHANK, John, a distinguished naval officer born in Fifeshire in Scotland, in 1740. He went to sea in the British service when young, and in the American war he was employed on the lakes of Canada, where he displayed great talents both as a seaman and engineer. Returning home on peace taking place, he obtained the rank of post-captain. He devoted his leisure to the improvement of naval architecture; and in 1793 he published a treatise on a method which he had invented of navigating vessels in shallow water by means of sliding keels. He contributed to the foundation of the Society for the Encouragement of Naval Architecture; and in 1794 he was nominated agent of transports. He subsequently was employed as an engineer in superintending the defence of the eastern coast of England. On the establishment of the Transport Board he was made one of the commissioners; in 1805 he was raised to the rank of admiral; and in 1822 to that of admiral of the blue. His death took place at Dalish in Devonshire, in June 1823. Admiral Schank distinguished himself by several ingenious inventions, and he wrote some memoirs on ship-building.

SCHATEN, Nicholas, author of Historia Westphaliæ, fol. 1690—Annales Paderbornenses, fol.—and a Dissertation on Charlemagne, was a German jesuit at the end of the 17th century.

SCHÉELE, Charles William, an eminent Swedish chemist, born in 1742, at Stralsund. When very young he received the usual education at a private school; and at a very early age showed a strong desire to follow the profession of an apothecary. With Mr. Bauch, an apothecary at Gottenburg, he passed an apprenticeship of six years, and laid the first foundation of his knowledge. Among the various books which he read, on chemical subjects, Kunckel's Laboratory was his favorite. He repeated many of the experiments in that work privately in the night, when the rest of the family were asleep. A friend of Scheele's had also excited his attention to experiments in chemistry by advising him to read Neuman's Chemistry. After his departure from Gottenburg in 1765 he obtained a place with Kalstrom, an apothecary at Malmo. In 1767 he went to Stockholm, and in 1773 to Upsal, where he had free access to the University Laboratory. Here also he commenced the friendship which subsisted between him and Bergman. During his residence at this place, Prince Henry of Prussia, accompanied by the duke of Sunderland, visited Upsal, and went to see the Academical Laboratory and Scheele was appointed by the university to exhibit some chemical experiments to them; and he showed some of the most curious processes in chemistry. In 1777 Scheele was appointed by the Medical College to be apothecary at Koping, where he showed his abilities. When he was at Stockholm he discovered the fluoric acid; and whilst at Upsal, he made many experiments to prove its properties. At the same place he began his series of experiments on manganese. At Koping he finished his Dissertation on Air and Fire; a work which the celebrated Bergman most warmly recommended in the friendly preface which he wrote for it. The theory which Scheele endeavors to prove in this treatise is, that fire consists of pure air and phlogiston. The author's merit in this work was sufficient to obtain the approbation of the public; as the ingenuity displayed in handling so delicate a subject, and the many new and valuable observations dispersed through the treatise, justly entitled the author to that fame which his book procured him. The English translation is enriched with the notes of Richard Kirwan. Scheele now diligently employed himself in contributing to the Transactions of the Academy at Stockholm. He first pointed out a new way to prepare the salt of benzoïn. In the same year he discovered that arsenic, prepared in a particular manner, partakes of all the properties of an acid, and has its peculiar affinities to other substances. In a Dissertation on Flint, Clay, and Alum, he clearly overturned Beanne's opinion of the identity of the siliceous and argillaceous earths. He published also an Analysis of the Human Calculus. He published an excellent dissertation on the different sorts of ether. His investigation of the coloring matter in Prussian Blue, the means he employed to separate it, and his discovery that alkali, sal ammoniac, and charcoal, mixed together, will produce it, are strong marks of his penetration and genius. The valuable discoveries of this great philosopher, many of which are to be found in the Transactions of the Royal Society at Stockholm, are too numerous for us to attempt to give a list of them. Most of his essays have been published in French by madame Picardet and M. Morveau of Dijon. Dr. Beddoes also made a very valuable English translation of the greater part of Scheele's dissertations, to which he has added some useful and ingenious notes. His last dissertation was his very valuable observations on the acid of the gall-nut. The character of Scheele, as a chemist is too generally established to need any eulogium. He mixed but little with society; as, when his profession permitted him, he was employed in his experimental inquiries. His chemical apparatus was neither neat nor convenient; his laboratory was small and confined; nor was he particular in regard to the vessels which he employed in his experiments, so that it is surprising how such discoveries, and such elegant experiments, could have been made under such disadvantages. He understood none of the modern languages except the German and Swedish; so that he was compelled to wait till discoveries were conveyed to him through the slow channel of translation. An offer was made to him of an annuity of £300 if he would settle in this country; but death put an end to this project. He died in May 1786.

SCHEFFER, John, a learned German, born at Strasburg, 1621. When driven by war from his country he went to Sweden at the invitation of queen Christina, and obtained the chair of eloquence and politics at Upsal. He was also librarian, and honorary professor of the law of nations in that university. He died there 1679. He published de Militiâ Navali Veterum—Upsalia Antiqua—Laponia, translated into English—Suecia Literata—de Re Vehiculari Veterum, besides notes on Pædrius, Ælian, and other classics.

SCHEGKINS, James, a native of Schorndoff, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, professor of philosophy and medicine at Tubingen. Though blind, he pursued his favorite studies, and even refused to submit to an operation for the restoration of sight, observing that he wished to avoid seeing many odious and disagreeable objects. He wrote a dialogue, de Amicis Principatu—a treatise de unâ Personâ & duabus Naturis in Christo, adversus, Anti Trinitarios—Refutatio Errorum Sinoaii, fol. 1573. He died at Tubingen 1587.

SCHNEIDER, Christopher, an able astronomer, rendered memorable for first discovering the spots on the sun's disc. He was born at Mecklenburg in Germany, and entered among the jesuits, and afterwards taught Hebrew and mathematics at Ingolstadt, Brisa, and Rome. He was also counsellor to the archduke Charles, and died rector of the jesuits' college at Neisse in Silesia, 1650. His observation of the solar spots was at Ingolstadt, 1611; but he was afraid to publish the discovery, which, however, Veserus to whom he communicated it, inadvertently did, and Galileo himself laid claim, but improperly, to the merit of being the first observer. He published these phenomena in 1630, in folio, under the title of Rosa Ursina, containing accurate delineations of the spots.

SCHLHAMMER, Gouthier Christopher, a native of Jena, who was professor of medicine at Helmstadt, afterwards at Jena, and then at Kiel, and was physician to the duke of Holstein. He wrote Introductio ad Artem Medicam, 4to. and other medical works, and died 1716, aged 75.

SCHENCK DE GRAFFENBERG, John, a physician, who was born at Friburg, and died there 12th November 1595, aged 67. He was author of Observationum Medicarum, Rararum, Admirabilium & Monstros, Volumen fol. edited by Spon. His son John George was also eminent as a physician, and settled at the Hague, where he died about 1620. He wrote de Formandis Medicinæ Studiis, 12mo.—Hortus Patavinus—Monstrorum Historia, 4to.

SCHERTLIN, Sebastian, a native of the duchy of Wirtemberg, who first served in Hungary, and afterwards greatly distinguished himself at the defence of Pavia. At the taking of Rome and Narni, and in the defence of Naples 1528, he displayed such valor and intrepidity, that several potentates solicited his services; but he attached himself to the independence of Augsburg. He espoused the cause of the league of Smalkalde against the emperor, and afterwards passed into the service of France, and accompanied Henry II. in his Expedition to the Rhine and the Low Countries. Charles V. afterwards restored him his property, which had been confiscated at Augsburg, and he distinguished himself in the service of the emperor Ferdinand I. and died 1577 aged 82, deservedly respected as a brave general.

SCHFUCHZER, John James, a native of Zurich, who became there professor of mathematics and medicine. His reputation as a physician and a man of letters was such, that the Czar Peter made him liberal offers to settle in Russia; but the people of Zurich detained him by their generosity. He died in his native town 1733, aged 61. He published Natural History of the Bible in German, four large vols. fol. translated into Latin 1735, and into French 1736, but of this the original edition in German is the most valuable, on account of its 750 plates—Itinera Alpina, 2 vols. 4to.—Piscium Querele, 4to.—Herbarium Diluvianum, fol.—Museum Diluvianum, 8vo.—Homo Diluvii Testis, 4to.—Historiæ Helveticæ Naturalis Prolegomena—Sciagraphia Lithologica, 4to.—Neva Literaria Helvetica, or Journal of Swiss Literature—a treatise on the Mineral Waters of Switzerland, 4to.

SCHIAVONE, Andrea, a Venetian painter, born at Sebenico in Dalmatia 1522. Though poor and uneducated, he rose by the powers of his genius, and his great application to eminence. His designs, however, were not much admired, while his coloring, and the elegance of his draperies were superior to the efforts of his contemporaries. His pictures were esteemed after his decease, though unfortunately for him disregarded by his contemporaries. He died poor, 1582, at Venice.

SCHICKARD, William, professor of Hebrew at Tubingen, died of the plague 1635, at the age of 43. He wrote Horologium, or Hebrew Grammar, 8vo.—treatises de Jure Regio Judæorum, 4to.—Series Regum Persiæ, 4to.

SCHILL, Ferdinand Von, an intrepid and patriotic Prussian officer, was born in 1773, at Sott-hoff, in Silesia; and entered the Prussian army as a cadet in 1789. He was severely wounded at the battle of Jena; but took the field again, and distinguished himself, at the head of a free corps, before the end of the war, for which he was rewarded with the rank of colonel. In 1809, with the hope of contributing to free his country from the French yoke, he collected a small body of troops, and commenced operations on the Elbe against the forces of Napoleon; but, after having obtained several successes, and displayed equal ability and bravery, he was overpowered and slain, at Stralsund, on the 31st of May.

SCHILLER, Frederic, a German dramatic writer of celebrity. He was born at Maribah in Wirtemberg, and educated in the military school of Stutgard, where he produced his first dramatic piece, called the Robbers. The principles inculcated in this piece gave such offence to his superiors, that he fled from their resentment to Manheim, and for some time supported himself in the capacity of a regimental surgeon. An appointment in the theatre at Manheim proved more congenial to his feelings, and enabled him to produce his Conspiracy of Fiesco, his Intrigue and Love, his Rhenish Thalia, and other pieces. Eager after distinction he went from Manheim to Mentz, and afterwards to Dresden, and then to Leipsic, where he completed his tragedy of Don Carlos. For some time he resided at Jena as professor of history, and then removed to Weimar, where he died 1805. He wrote besides, the History of the Revolt of the Netherlands from the Spanish Government—the Maid of Orleans, and other dramatic pieces, much admired for originality, fire, and elegance, though occasionally immoral, and deficient in unity.

SCHILLING, Drebold, a native of Soleure, who wrote in German an History of the Wars of the Swiss against Charles Duke of Burgundy, published, Berne, fol. 1743. The work is very accurate, as he was present at the scenes which he describes. He lived in the 15th century.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Frederic, a celebrated divine, born at Breslau, in 1768. His parents were attached to the church of the United Brethren; but, in 1787, he joined the Lutheran church, and entered the university of Halle, where he listened to the instructions of Nosselt, Knapp, and Wolf, but adopted Spinoza as his model, and imbibed much of the pantheistic system. He commenced public life as a preacher, and afterwards became a professor of theology at Halle, and was distinguished for the energy of his character, and the extent of his acquirements. In the "Biblical Repository," he is said to have been a man "of great simplicity of manners, and one of the deepest thinkers of the day, who wanders at will over the whole field of theology. He seems to stand between the rationalists and evangelical party, being however more distant from the former than the latter." He died at Berlin, February 12th 1834.

SCHLICHTINGIUS, Jonas de Bukowic, a native of Poland, banished on account of his Socinian principles by the diet of Warsaw. He retired to Muscovy and Germany, and then settled at Zullickaw, where he died 1661, aged 65. His works which are chiefly commentaries on the holy scripture, were published at Amsterdam, 1666, fol.

SCHMIDT, Erasmus, professor of mathematics, and of Greek at Wittenburg, was born at Delitzsch in Misnia, 1560. He published an edition of Pindar with learned notes, 1616, 4to. and died at Wittenburg, 1637.

SCHLOETZER, Augustus Louis, a German historian, was born, in 1737, at Jagstadt; was educated at Wittenburg and Gottingen; was invited to Russia, and resided there for some years; became professor of philosophy and politics at Gottingen; and died in 1809. Among his works are, a History of Lithuania; and various publications on the history of Russia.

SCHMIDT, John Andrew, a Lutheran divine, born at Worms, 1652. He was theological professor at Mariendal, and died there 1726. He wrote Compendium Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 8vo.—de Bibliothecis, 4to.—Lexicon Ecclesiasticum Minus, 8vo. besides Pardies' Geometry, translated into Latin.

SCHMIDT, Michael Ignatius, a German historian, was born, in 1736, at Arnstem, in the bishopric of Wurzburg; was brought up to the church; and died at Vienna, in 1794, public counsellor and keeper of the archives. His History of the Germans, of which he published only eleven volumes, is much esteemed. It was continued by Milbiller, from the papers of Schmidt.

SCHOEPFLIN, John Daniel, a learned German Lutheran divine, born September 6, 1694, at Sulzbach, in Baden Dourlach. He studied at Dourlach, Basil, and Strasburg, and was appointed, in 1720, professor of eloquence and history in this last university. His reputation for learning was so great that he received the most honorable invitations from the empress of Russia, from Sweden, from Frankfort, from Leyden, and other learned bodies, but he preferred the tranquillity and retirement of Strasburg. In 1726, he quitted his professorship, and travelled at the public expense, and as a philosopher, he visited Italy, Paris, London, and other places. He died at Strasburg of a slow fever, August 7th, 1771, universally and deservedly lamented. His works are Historia Zaringo-Badensis Carlsruhe, 7 vols. 4to.—Alsatia Diplomatica, 2 vols. fol.—Alsatia Illustrata, 2 vols. fol.—Alsatiarum Rerum Scriptores, fol.—Vindiciæ Typographicæ, 4to.—Vindiciæ Celticæ—Memoirs of a Rising Academy, addressed to the elector palatine.

SCHOMBERG, Henry de, of an ancient family of Misnia, established in France, was made governor of la Marche, and served with reputation under Charles IX. and his two successors. He died suddenly in 1599. His son of the same name succeeded in his government of la Marche, and distinguished himself in Piedmont in 1617, under marshal d'Estrées, and against the Huguenots, in 1622, for which he was made marshal of France. He contributed much in 1625, to the defeat of the English in their attack against the isle of Rhé, and two years after he forced the passage of Suza, where he was severely wounded. In 1630 he made himself master of Pignerol, and relieved Casal, and soon after defeated the rebels in Languedoc, at the famous battle of Castelnaudari, where Montmorenci was wounded and taken prisoner. He was in reward for his services made governor of Languedoc, and died the next year 17th November aged 49. He was a man of abilities in the cabinet, as well as in the field. He was ambassador for some time in England, and Germany, and he wrote a Relation of the War in Italy, in which he had been engaged, printed 1630, 4to. again 1669, and 1682.

SCHOMBERG, Frederick Armand de, of an illustrious family, but of a different branch from the preceding, was early engaged in the service of Frederick Henry prince of Orange, and afterwards of his son William. He went in 1650, into the service of the French king, and was made governor of Gravelines and Furnes, and in 1661, sent to command the army in Portugal, where he behaved with such bravery and prudence that Spain was obliged to acknowledge the family of Braganza as lawful sovereigns of Portugal. He was in 1675, made marshal of France, though a protestant, and the next year he went to the campaign of the Low Countries, and obliged the enemy to raise the siege of Maestricht and Charleroi. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes 1685, he quitted France and retired to Prussia where the elector of Brandenburg, appointed him his prime minister, and commander in chief. He was afterwards in Portugal and in Holland, and he accompanied William of Orange into England when he invaded the kingdom, and for his services he was created an English duke, made knight of the garter, and rewarded with a pension by the parliament. In 1689, he was sent to Ireland as commander in chief, and the following year he attended William at the battle of the Boyne, and bravely crossed the river which was obstinately defended by the enemy. He was, however, wounded by one of the soldiers of James II. and soon after shot dead by mistake by one of the French refugees in his own regiment, 11th July, 1690, in his 82d year.

SCHONER, John, a German philosopher, born at Carolstadt 1477. His abilities were so great that he was chosen, when young, to be mathematical professor at Nuremberg. He was, however, too fond of astrology, though in other respects a man of vast intelligence, and erudition. He published some valuable astronomical tables after those of Regiomontanus—a treatise on Dialling—on the Astronomical equator—Use of the Globes—Organicum Uranicum. He died 1547.

SCHOOKIUS, Martin, a native of Utrecht, successively professor of languages and philosophy at Utrecht, Derventer, Groningen, and Frankfort on the Oder. He was a man of erudition, though extremely satirical. He is author of Exercitationes Variæ—de Hærcngis, seu Halecibus—de Signaturis Fœtus—de Ciconis—de Statu Reipublicæ Fœderati Belgii—de Septicismo—de Sternutatione—de Imperio Maritimo—de Linguâ Hellenisticâ. He died at Frankfort 1669, aged 55.

SCHOTTUS, Andreas, a learned German, born at Antwerp, 1552. He was educated at Louvain, and Douay, and upon going to Spain, was in consequence of his great abilities made, 1580, Greek professor at Toledo. He entered among the jesuits in 1586, and afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome, and after three years' residence returned to Antwerp, where he spent the rest of his life, and died 23d January, 1629. He was author of Hispania Illustrata, 14 vols. fol.—the Lives of Francis Borgia, Ferdinand Nunez, Peter Ciaconius, &c. besides valuable editions of Pomponius Mela, Cor. Nepos, Valerius Flaccus, Aurelius Victor.

SCOTTUS, Gaspard, a jesuit, born at Wurzburg, in Franconia, where he died 1666, aged 58. He resided for some time at Palermo in Sicily, and at Rome, where he became intimate with the famous Kircher. He is the learned author of Physica Curiosa, or Mirabilia Naturæ & Artis, 2 vols. 4to.—Magia Naturalis & Artificialis, 4 vols. 4to.—Tehnica Curiosa, 4to.—Machina Hydraulico-Pneumatica—Pantometrum Kircherianum, seu Instrumentum Geometricum Novum—Itinerarium Statiuum Kircher—Encyclopedia, containing a course of mathematics—Mathesis Cæsarea, 2 vols. 4to.—Anatomia Physico-Hydrostatica Fontium & Fluminum, 8vo.—Arithmetica Practica Generalis, 8vo.—Schola Stegano-graphica—Organum Mathematicum, 4to.

SCHREVELIUS, Cornelius, a laborious critic of Holland, born at Harlaem, 1615. He published editions of Homer, Hesiod, and other classics, said to be not very correct. The work by which he is best known, is his Greek Lexicon, 8vo. now in general use. He died 1667.

SCHROETER, John Samuel, an eminent musician born at Saxony. He went to London in 1774, with his father, who was also a musician, but of great eminence. But young Schroeter improved himself under the famous Emanuel Bach; and some time after composed a set of Lessons for the Piano-Forte, which Napier published, and paid him liberally for the copyright. This raised his fame, and procured him several scholars. After the publication of his first set of Concertos, he obtained the lead in all musical entertainments. About this time he married a young lady, who was his pupil, through whom he became entitled to a large fortune; but her friends threatening him with the terrors of the court of chancery, he gave up his claim for an annuity of £500, with this condition, that he should perform no more in public. But the prince of Wales not long after appointed him one of his band of music with a liberal salary. His last Set of Sonatas, with an elegant accompaniment for the violin and violincello, were composed at the desire of the prince, to whom it was dedicated. He died in 1785.

SCHULEMBOURG, Matthias John, count of, was born in 1661, and from his earliest years devoted himself to military affairs. He was first in the service of the king of Poland who intrusted him with the command of the Saxon troops in 1704, and with a small force he bravely withstood, in an advantageous situation, five attacks of Charles XII. of Sweden. In 1708 he was placed at the head of nine thousand Poles, who were in the service of the Dutch, and the next year he was at the battle of Malplaquet, where prince Eugene saw and admired his valor, and gave him his esteem. In 1711 he went into the service of the Venetians, and ably defended them against the Turks at the siege of Corfu, where his conduct was so intrepid, that a large pension was bestowed upon him, and a statue raised to his honor. In 1726 he visited his sister, the countess of Kendal in England, and was received with distinction by George I., and he afterwards returned to Venice, where he died, 1743, universally respected.

SCHULTENS, Albert, a German divine, born at Groningen. He was minister of Wassenaar, and professor of oriental languages at Francker, and afterwards at Leyden, where he died 1741, aged 70. His works are a commentary on Job, 2 vols. 4to.—a Hebrew Grammar—the Life of Saladin, from the Arabic, folio—Commentary on Proverbs, 4to.—Animadversiones Philologicæ and Criticæ ad Varia Veteris Testam. Loca—a treatise of Hebrew Roots.

SCHULZE, John Henry, a physician born at Colbitz in Magdeburg. He was medical professor at Halle, where he died 1745, aged 58. He was also well skilled in Greek, and in Arabic literature, and wrote Historia Medicinæ a Rerum Initio ad Annum Urbis Romæ, 535, Deducta, 4to.—Physiologia Medica, 8vo.—Pathologia Generalis et Specialis—de Materiâ Medicâ Dissertationes Medicæ and Historicæ.

SCHURMAN, Anna Maria, a German lady born at Cologne 1607. She possessed uncommon powers, and not only excelled in music, painting, sculpture, and engraving, but in the knowledge of the learned languages, of Greek, Hebrew, Syriae, and Arabic, as well as the modern tongues. When six years old she cut on paper all sorts of figures without model, and two years after designed flowers in a very masterly manner. These great accomplishments were adorned further by the most modest and diffident manners; but her powers were too great to be long concealed from the world, and by the means of her friends and correspondents, of Vossius, Spanheim, Rivetus and others, her reputation was spread over Europe; and she was visited by Richelieu, and other persons of the highest rank, and even princesses. Her devotion was said to be equal to her learning, but in 1650, her attachment to Labadie lessened her fame, and after living with that enthusiast at Altona, and attending him in his last moments, she retired to Wiemar, in Frisland, where she died 1678. She wrote Latin poems—a Defence of female study—Eukleria in defence of her attachment to Labadie—Opuscula in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, printed 1652, 4to.

SCHURTZFLEISCH, Conrad Samuel, a native of Corback in Waldeck, professor of history, poetry, and Greek at Wittenburg. He travelled over Germany, France, England, and Italy, and was made counsellor and librarian to the duke of Saxe Wiemar. He died 1708, aged 67. His works are Disputationes Historicæ Civiles, 3 vols. 4to.—Letters, 3 vols. 8vo.—Continuation of Sleidan till 1678—Dissertationes and Opuscula. His brother Henry Leonard, wrote Historia Ensiferorum Ordinis Teutonici, 12mo. 1701.

SCHUYLER, Peter, mayor of the city of Albany, New York, well known for his patriotism and for the influence which he was able to exercise over the Indians. In the year 1691, with a party of three hundred Mohawks, and about as many English, he made an attack upon the French settlements at the north end of lake Champlain. Victory was the consequence, not less than three hundred of the enemy being slain. With the five nations Colonel Schuyler had a wonderful popularity. Whatever he recommended to them had the force of law. In 1710 he went to England with five of their chiefs, for the purpose of exciting the government to expel the French from Canada. In 1719, being the oldest member of the council, the chief command of New York devolved upon him; but, in the following year he was relieved from the responsibilities of the office by the arrival of governor Burnet.
