DODDRIDGE, Philip, D.D., an eminent dissenting divine, born in London 26th June, 1702. He was educated at private schools at Kingston-on-Thames and at St. Alban's, and began at the latter place a lasting friendship with Dr. Samuel Clarke, who became his religious instructor, and, on his father's death, his faithful guardian. Tinctured with the tenets of the dissenters, he declined the liberal offers of the duchess of Bedford, who wished to bring him up at the university, and to raise him to preferment, and in 1719 he went to the academy of Mr. Jennings at Kibworth in Leicestershire, where he displayed uncommon diligence. He afterwards took the care of a small congregation at Kibworth, and soon after succeeded on Jennings' death to his academy, which, at the invitation of his friends, he removed to Northampton, where he continued the rest of his days, respected as a divine, successful as an instructor, and beloved as a private man. He died 26th October 1751, at Lisbon, where he had gone for the recovery of his health. This amiable character, so much respected by all parties, published several religious tracts, the best known of which are, the principles of the christian religion,—the rise and progress of religion in the soul,—remarkable passages in the life of col. James Gardiner,—ten sermons on the power and grace of Christ, and the family expositor, containing a version and paraphrase of the New Testament with critical notes, a valuable work, in 6 vols. 4to.

DODINGTON, George Bubb, a statesman, is said by some to have been the son of an apothecary, and by others, of a gentleman of fortune. He was born, in 1691, in Dorsetshire; was educated at New College, Oxford; and succeeded to a large estate on the death of a maternal uncle, whose name he assumed. Being at his outset a supporter of Sir Robert Walpole in parliament, he was appointed a lord of the treasury, and clerk of the pells in Ireland. He, however, deserted the minister, and then deserted his new friends, to become a partisan of the prince of Wales. In 1761, he was created Lord Melcombe, and he died in the following year. Dodington was generous, witty, prepossessing in private life, and gifted with no mean talents; but, as a politician, he is "damned to everlasting fame," by his profligate dereliction of all honorable principles. Irrefragable proof for his conviction is furnished by his Diary.

DODSLEY, Robert, a well known bookseller and writer, born at Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, 1703. Receiving little of education, he began life as footman in the family of Mrs. Lowther, but in this servile situation he indulged his natural talents for poetry and satire, and wrote the muse in livery, and a small dramatic piece, called the Toyshop, which accidentally was seen by Pope, and engaged all his attention. Interesting himself in the cause of this humble poet, he procured for him the introduction of his piece at the theatre, and manifested for him to the end of life the most cordial and honorable friendship. The Toyshop was succeeded by "the King and Miller of Mansfield," in 1736, and from the great success of these two pieces, he was enabled to settle himself independently as a London bookseller, a situation in which he maintained the greatest respectability of character with the most benevolent intentions and great humility of deportment. After acquiring a very handsome fortune, Dodsley retired from business in favor of his brother, and died 25th September 1764, in his 61st year. His works consist of six dramatic pieces of which the Cleone, a tragedy, is much admired, besides public virtue, a poem 1754, 4to. trifles 1745, 8vo. Melpomene, agriculture a poem, the economy of human life, and another book of trifles, collected after his death. He also collected some scattered poems of great merit in 6 vols. 12mo. and also plays by old authors in 12 vols. 12mo.

DODSWORTH, Roger, an indefatigable topographer, born 24th July 1585, at Newton Grange, St. Oswald, Yorkshire. He died August 1654, and was buried at Rufford, Lancashire. In his laborious researches in the antiquities of his native country he wrote 122 volumes, besides other MSS. which altogether amount to 162 folio vols, which were never published but are deposited in the Bodleian library. Gen. Fairfax was, notwithstanding the violence of the times, a great patron of Dodsworth, and to the liberality of his nephew, dean Fairfax of Norwich, the university of Oxford are indebted for this valuable collection.

DODWELL, Henry, a learned writer, born in Dublin, October 1641, but of English parents. He went over to England in 1648, and was placed at a school in York, but the death of his father by the plague at Waterford, and of his mother, by a consumption soon after, reduced him to a wretched and indigent situation, from which he was at last relieved by his uncle a clergyman of Suffolk, who in 1654 sent for him, paid his debts, and afterwards had him conducted to Dublin. In 1656 he entered at Trinity college under Dr. Stearne, and became fellow, but in 1666 quitted his fellowship because he would not go into orders, as the statutes required. He then passed over to England, but afterwards revisited Ireland, and in 1674 settled in London, where he soon formed a lasting friendship with several learned men, especially bishop Lloyd. In 1683 he was without his knowledge, and in his absence, elected Camden professor of history at Oxford, of which employment however he was deprived 3 years after for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance. He afterwards settled at Cockham, Berkshire, and separated from the church because new bishops were appointed to succeed such as refused the oath of allegiance. He was afterwards reconciled to the church, and died 7th June, 1711, aged 70. His writings, which are very numerous, and which prove him to have been a man of indefatigable diligence and extensive learning, are on controversial, theological, and classical subjects. The best known of these are annals of Thucydides and Xenophon—de veteribus Græcorum, Romanorumque eyelis, obiterque de cyclo Judeorum,—ætate Christi, dissertationes decem, cum tabulis necessariis 4to. 1701, a most excellent book according to Dr. Halley, and an epistolary discourse proving from the scriptures and the first fathers that the soul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, 1706, 8vo. a work which gave rise to a violent controversy.

DODWELL, Henry, eldest son of the preceding, was author of an anonymous pamphlet, "Christianity not founded on argument;" an artful work, in which he attempted to undermine and vilify religion. It was answered by his own brother, and by Leland, and Doddrige. He was brought up to the law, and was a zealous promoter of the society for the promotion of arts, manufactures, and commerce.—His next brother, William, D.D. of Trinity-college, Oxford, was arch-deacon of Berks, prebendary of Sarum, and rector of Shottesbrooke. Besides an answer to his brother's pamphlet, he wrote a dissertation on Jephthah's vow—practical discourses, 2 vols.—an answer to Dr. Middleton's free inquiry, and defence of the answer against Toll, 1751.

DOLBIN, John, descended from an ancient family in North Wales, was born at Stanwick, Northamptonshire, 1624, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford. During the civil wars, he bravely espoused the king's side, and was major in his army; but upon the triumph of the republicans, he returned to a collegiate life, and was turned out in 1648. At the restoration he became canon of Christ-church, arch-deacon of London, dean of Westminster, and in 1666, bishop of Rochester, and in 1683 was translated to York, where he died 1686. He was an eloquent and admired preacher, and his sermons, delivered before Charles II., and on other occasions, possess merit.

DOLET, Stephen, a learned Frenchman, born at Orleans 1508. He was a printer and bookseller at Lyons, where he published some of his works for the reformation and improvement of the French language. He ventured, however, to give way to licentious and profane ideas in his writings, which drew upon him the vengeance of the inquisition, so that he was condemned to be burnt for atheism. He suffered the dreadful punishment on his birthday, 3d August 1546. Though some attribute his sufferings to his attachment to Lutheranism, yet Beza and Calvin seem to place him in the number, not of martyrs, but of impious blasphemers.

DOLGORUCKI, Prince John Michaelovitsch, a Russian noble, was born at Moscow, in 1764, and died in 1824. In early life he served, with honor, several campaigns against the Turks and Swedes; and at a later period he filled several important offices. He was learned and accomplished. As a poet, he excelled in satires and epistles.

The best edition of his works appeared at Moscow in 1819, with the title of The State of my Mind.

DOLLOND, Peter, the eldest son of Mr. John Dollond, the optician, was born in 1730, and died at Kensington in 1820. He communicated in 1765, a paper to the Royal Society on his improvement of telescopes; and in 1772 another on his additions and alterations in Hadley's quadrant. In 1779 he gave an account of his equatorial instrument for correcting the errors arising from refraction in altitude: and in 1789 he published "Some account of the discovery made by his father in refracting telescopes."

DOLOMIEU, Deodat, commander of the order of Malta, member of the academy of sciences and of the institute at Paris, was made inspector of the mines. In the pursuit of knowledge he exposed himself to all the inclemencies of the air, the climate, and the seasons, and regarded neither expense nor difficulties for his favorite studies of nature. He was in Egypt with Bonaparte, and on his return was taken prisoner, and confined at Messina, from whence he was liberated by the kind interference of sir Joseph Banks. He died suddenly at Cree, near Macon, in 1802, as he was preparing a scientific excursion to the north, to examine the rocks and the natural curiosities of unexplored regions. He published a voyage to the isles of Lipari, 1781—memoir on the earthquake of Calabria in 1783—a mineralogical dictionary—a treatise on the origin of basaltes—and a memoir on Ætna.

DOMAT, John, a French lawyer, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, 1625. He studied the learned languages and belles lettres at Paris, and applied himself to the law at Bourges, where, though only 30 years old, he was offered, on account of his great proficiency, a doctor's hood. He became a pleader at Clermont, and, as advocate to the king, which he continued for thirty years, he was, for his integrity and extensive abilities, the arbiter of all the affairs of the province. He applied himself to simplify the laws of the state, and to reduce them from confusion to order and regularity; and was so successful in his plan that Lewis XIV. granted him a pension of 2000 livres, and encouraged him in the prosecution. The first volume was published 1689, in 4to. called, "the civil laws in their natural order;" to which three volumes of equal size and value were afterwards added. Domat was the friend of Pascal, whom he assisted in some of his experiments on air, and in other branches of philosophy. He died at Paris 1696. A new edition of his works appeared in 1777, in folio.

DOMENICHINO, an Italian painter, born at Bologna 1581. He was the pupil of Calvert the Fleming, and afterwards of the Caraccis; but he was so slow in his progress that his fellow students called him "the ox." Annibal Caracci observed, upon this ridiculous appellation, that "this ox, by dint of labor, would in time make his ground so fruitful that painting itself would be fed by what it produced"—a prognostic of his future greatness, which was most truly fulfilled. He applied to his work with great study and zeal; and though he wanted genius, yet solidity and judgment, and a strong enthusiastic ardor, made him one of the greatest Italian masters. According to N. Poussin, his communion of St. Jerome and Raphael's transfiguration, were the two best pieces which ever adorned Rome. He also shone as an architect, and built the apostolical palace for Gregory XV. He died 1641.

DOMINIC, de Guzman, a Spaniard, born 1170, at Calahorra, in Arragon, known as the founder of the order of the predicants, and the establisher of the inquisition in Languedoc. He was the first master of the sacred palace, an office which at his suggestion Honorius III. established. He died at Bologna 1221, and was afterwards canonized for his great services. Among the great men of the order were, Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, cardinal Cajetan, Dominicus Soto, and Lewis of Granada; and it is said that the Dominicans produced to the church no less than three popes, 48 cardinals, 23 patriarchs, 1500 bishops, 600 archbishops, 43 legates, and other inferior agents actively employed in the service of the Romish church.

DOMINIS, Mark Antony de, originally a Jesuit, afterwards bishop of Segni, and lastly archbishop of Spolato, in Dalmatia, in the 16th century. He was very unsettled in his religious notions, though so elevated in the church; and he wrote his famous book, called "de republicâ ecclesiasticâ," in which he assailed the papal power. This work was seen in MS. and corrected by the learned Bedell, who was chaplain to sir Henry Wotton, the ambassador of James I. to Venice, and by his means it was published in London. De Dominis accompanied his friend Bedell on his return to England, and was received with great respect by the English clergy. He was favored by the king, and made dean of Windsor; but, after preaching against the pope, and endeavoring to reconcile and reunite the Romish and English churches, he, with his usual wavering temper, expressed an inclination to return to Rome. He there abjured all his errors 1622, and was received into the pope's protection; but an expression against Bellarmine, who, as he said, had not refuted his arguments, in his answer to him, rendered him suspected to the catholics. He was seized and imprisoned, and died in confinement, in the castle of St. Angelo, 1645. It was afterwards discovered, that his writings and correspondence had been very hostile to the pope, and therefore, by order of the inquisition, his body was dug up, and together with his writings burnt in Flora's field. He was the first who gave a rational explanation of the colors of the rainbow.

DOMITIAN, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor, after Titus son of Vespasian. From a very mild character at the beginning of his reign, he became licentious, debauched, cruel, and vindictive, and was at last assassinated 96, in his 45th year.

DONALDSON, John, an artist, was born at Edinburgh in 1737. He painted portraits in miniature, and was distinguished also for his skilful imitations of the old engravers, which he executed with a pen so correctly as to deceive even connoisseurs. He published a volume of poems, and an Essay on the Elements of Beauty; among his other studies he cultivated chemistry, and discovered a method of preserving meat and vegetables during long voyages. He died in 1801.

DONATO, Jerom, a Venetian nobleman, eminent for his learning, for his military services, and particularly for his negotiations. He was the successful ambassador in the reconciliation made between his country and pope Julius II. When asked by the pope why Venice claimed the sovereignty of the Adriatic, he answered, your holiness will find the concession, on the back of the record of Constantine's grant to pope Silvester of the city of Rome and of the ecclesiastical states—a bold answer on a donation about doubting which in former times 1473 persons had at Strasburg been sent to the flames. This great statesman died of a fever at Rome 1511, just before the pacification was signed.

DONDUS, or DE DONDIS, James, a physician of Padua, surnamed Aggregator, from the number of medicines he had made. He was also well skilled in mechanics and in mathematics, and he invented a clock on a new construction, which pointed out not only the hours, but the festivals of the year, and the course of the sun and moon. He found out also the secret of making salt from the wells of St. Albano, and died 1350. He wrote Promptuarium medicinæ Venice, fol. 1481—de fontibus calidis Patavini agri, 1553, fol.—the flux and reflux of the sea.

DONEAU, Hugh, Donellus of Chalons-sur-Soane, professor of law at Bourges and Orleans, was saved from the massacre of Bartholomew by the affection of his scholars, and escaped into Germany, and died at Altorf 1591, aged 64. He wrote commentaria de jure civili, five vols. fol. reprinted at Lucca 12 vols. fol. 1770.—Opera posthuma, 8vo.

DONGAN, Thomas, governor of New York from 1683 to 1688, afterwards earl of Limerick, succeeded Brockholdst, and was succeeded by Nicholson. He was highly respected as governor, being upright, discreet, and accomplished in manners. He ordered an assembly to be convened by election, a privilege which the people had not before enjoyed. Yet he unjustly fell under the displeasure of his sovereign.

DONI D'ATTICHI, Lewis, a Florentine noble, whose modesty and learning recommended him to Richelieu, who made him bishop of Reiz, and afterwards of Autun. He died 1664, aged 68. He wrote in French a history of the Minims, 4to. a society to which he belonged,—and in Latin the life of queen Joan, 8vo.—of cardinal de Berulle, 8vo.—and of the cardinals, two vols. fol. 1660.

DONI, Jon Baptiste, an Italian, who died in his native city of Florence 1647, aged 51. He was professor of eloquence, and member of the Florentine and del crucea academies, and invented a musical instrument called lyra barbarini. He wrote a well known treatise on music in Latin, and other tracts on the same subject in Italian.

DONNE, John. D.D., an English poet and divine, born in London 1573, and descended by his mother from sir Thomas More. His friends were papists, but he refused to be shackled by their opinions and prejudices, and at the age of 19 he embraced the protestant faith. When 21 he began to travel, and accompanied the earl of Essex in 1596 and 97, against Cadiz and the Azores, and afterwards visited Spain and Italy, and formed the resolution of going as far as Jerusalem, which however he did not do. On his return to England he became secretary to Egerton keeper of the great seal. About the year 1612, he accompanied Sir Robert Drury to Paris, and about that time he displayed such ability in a treatise on the oaths of allegiance and supremacy then agitated, that king James highly favored him, and in compliance with his intimation and the request of his friends, he now applied himself to divinity and took orders. He was no sooner ordained than 14 livings in the country were offered to him, which he declined, to reside in London, and two years after was appointed chaplain to lord Doncaster's embassy to Vienna. In 1621, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards he was presented to St. Dunstan in the west and another benefice. His eloquence as a preacher was great, but his enemies represented him as hostile to the king, and therefore he was obliged to vindicate himself before James, who expressed himself much pleased with his conduct. He was in 1630 attacked by a fever which brought on a consumption. He preached at court the first Friday in lent, on the words "to God the Lord belong the issues from death," which was considered as his funeral sermon. He died 31st March 1631, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

DONNE, Benjamin, a mathematician, born 1729, at Biddeford, Devonshire, where for some years he kept a school, and afterwards at Bristol. He was made master of mechanics to the king in 1796, and died two years after, respected as a very ingenious and benevolent character. He wrote mathematical essays in 8vo. treatises on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry, an epitome of natural experimental philosophy, and the British mariner's assistant, and in the first part of his life received 100*l.* from the society of arts and commerce for his able survey of his native country.

DOPPLE-MAIER, John Gabriel, author of some tracts on geography, dialling, astronomy, of the account of the mathematicians of Nuremberg, and of several translations from English mathematical works into Latin and German, died at Nuremberg, where he was professor of mathematics 1750, aged 83. He was fellow of the London royal society, and of the academies of Berlin and Petersburg.

DORFLING, a Prussian, who from the profession of a tailor became a soldier, and gradually rose to the highest military honors under Frederic William, elector of Brandenburg. He distinguished himself greatly against the Swedes, and when become field marshal, some envying his elevation observed he had still the appearance of a tailor. "Yes," says the valiant Dorfling, "I was once a tailor; I formerly cut out cloth, but now, (clapping his hand to the hilt of his sword,) here is the instrument with which I cut off the ears of them that speak ill of me."

DORIA, Andrew, a Genoese noble and warrior, was born at Oneglia, in 1463. After having distinguished himself in the service of various Italian princes, and of his own country, he entered into that of Francis I. of France. In the hope of ameliorating the situation of his native land, Doria aided the French to become masters of Genoa; but, finding that he had failed in his object, he joined with the Imperialists to expel them. When his purpose was effected, he refused to accept the sovereignty, and his grateful fellow citizens honored him with the title of "the Father and Defender of his Country." After having performed many other exploits, he died in 1560. His life was twice attempted by assassins, but their conspiracy failed. Doria, though of a benevolent and humane temper, once yielded to a dishonorable resentment, and ordered de Fresco, a man who had conspired against him, to be sewn up in a sack and thrown into the sea.

DORISLAUS, Isaac, a Dutchman who went from Leyden to England, and by the interest of Fulk lord Brooke, read lectures on history at Cambridge. When expelled by Cosin the vice-chancellor, as suspected of republican principles, he became judge advocate in the royal army against the Scots, but with an unpardonable levity he quitted the king's service for that of the parliament, and assisted, it is said, in drawing up the articles of accusation against his sovereign. Thus recommended by guilt and profligacy to the ruling powers, he went in 1649, as ambassador from the republic to Holland, where he was attacked while at supper by some enthusiastic royalist and stabbed to the heart. His body, by the direction of the parliament, was carried over to England, and buried in Westminster-abbey, but removed at the restoration to St. Margaret's church-yard.

DORSEY, John Syng, M. D. professor of anatomy. He early studied physic, and was doctor of medicine at the age of eighteen. He afterwards visited France and England for improvement in medical science. In 1807 he was elected adjunct professor of surgery with Dr. Physick at Philadelphia, and on the death of Dr. Wistar was chosen professor of anatomy. He had now attained a height gratifying to his ambition, but he was doomed not long to enjoy it, as he died suddenly in 1818 at the age of 35. Besides papers for the periodical and an edition of Cooper's surgery with notes, he published elements of surgery, 2 vols. 1817.

DOSITHEUS, the first heresiarch, a magician of Samaria, who pretended to be the true Messiah, and applied to himself all the prophecies concerning the Saviour. Among his 30 disciples he admitted a woman whom he called the moon. He privately retired to a cave where he starved himself to death that he might persuade his followers that he was ascended into heaven. His followers always staid 24 hours in the same posture in which they were when the sabbath began. They existed in Egypt till the sixth century.

DOUGADOS, Venance, a capuchin born near Carcassone 1764. The revolution opened to him a field for the display of intrigue and of ambition, but as the friend of the federalists he was dragged to the scaffold and suffered 1794. He wrote some poetical pieces which possess merit, and have been published at Nice.

DOUGHERTY, Michael, remarkable for longevity, died at his plantation on Horn Creek in Scriven county, Georgia, May 29, 1808, aged 135 years. He was one of the first settlers of that state. The day before he died he walked two miles.

DOUGLAS, Gawin, youngest son of the sixth earl of Angus, was born at Brechin in Scotland, 1471, and educated at St. Andrew's. He perfected his education by travelling in Italy and Germany, where he cultivated the muses, and merited the acquaintance and commendation of the learned. On his return to Scotland in 1496, he was made provost of St. Giles's church Edinburgh, in 1515 bishop of Dunkeld, to which the rich abbey of Aberbrothie was afterwards added. He was exposed to the virulent persecutions of the times, and went to London, where he died of the plague in April 1522. His chief works, which prove him to be an eminent scholar and poet, are a translation of Virgil's Æneid—the palace of honor, a poem—auree narrations and comedie sacre—de rebus Scoticis liber. As Chaucer in England, so he in Scotland is the great forerunner of the revival of learning.

DOUGLAS, William, a Scotch nobleman, commissioned by Robert Bruce, who had made a vow which he could not fulfil, to go on a crusade, to carry his heart to the holy land. Douglas set out after the king's death, 1327; but he perished by the way, with the illustrious Scots who followed in his train.

DOUGLAS, James, an English anatomist, and great practitioner in the obstetric art, in the beginning of the 18th century. He wrote bibliographiæ anatomix specimen, 8vo. miographiæ comparatæ specimen, 1706—description of the peritonæum, London, 1730—a history of the lateral operation for the stone, 8vo.—and papers in the philosophical transactions. He patronized John Hunter; and died 1742. His brother John was surgeon in the Westminster-hospital.

DOUGLAS, James, earl of Morton and Aberdeen, was born at Edinburgh 1707, and distinguished himself by his love of science and literature. He established, when 26, the philosophical society of Edinburgh, and was, in 1733, elected president of the London royal society. The academy of sciences at Paris paid respect to his virtues, by electing him an associate; and as the patron of merit, and an able astronomer, he deserved the good opinion of the learned world. He died 1768.

DOUGLAS, John, an eminent divine and critic, was born in 1721, at Pittenweem, in Fife; was educated at Baliol College, Oxford; was present at the battle of Fontenoy, as chaplain of the third regiment of foot guards; and, after having been travelling tutor to Lord Pulteney, was rewarded by the earl of Bath with considerable church preferment. Having for some years held the minor dignities of canon and dean of Windsor, he was made bishop of Carlisle in 1787, and, in 1792, was transferred to Salisbury. He died May 18, 1807. Dr. Douglas was intimate with Dr. Johnson, and all the most celebrated of his contemporaries. As a literary character, he distinguished himself by castigating Lander for his attack on Milton; exposing Alexander Bower; and entering the lists against Hume, by publishing The Criterion, or a Discourse on Miracles. He also edited Cook's Second Voyage.

DOUSA, James, a noble Dutchman, born at Northwiek 1545. After studying with great reputation at Paris, he returned to Holland, where he applied himself to political affairs. For twenty years he was curator of the banks and dykes of Holland, and distinguished himself so much at the siege of Leyden in 1574, that the prince of Orange made him governor of the town, and curator of the university founded there. He was most eminent as a scholar, and his genius was displayed in several poetical productions. He also wrote the annals of his country, besides critical notes on Horace, Sallust, Plautus, Catullus, and Tibullus. He was in his private character as amiable as he was respected in his public duties. He died 1604.

DOUVRE, Thomas de, a native of Bayeux, raised, for his learning and virtues, by William the conqueror, to the see of York, where he rebuilt his cathedral. He composed some books on music, and was a great patron and benefactor to his clergy. After being archbishop for twenty-eight years, he died 1100.

DOUW, Gerard, a Dutch painter, a pupil of Rembrandt, was born at Leyden in 1613, and was the son of a master glazier. He died in his native city in 1674. The pictures of Douw are distinguished by exquisitely high finishing and splendid coloring, combined with some of the pictorial merits of his master's compositions. They are justly admired, and fetch high prices. Among them is a Dropsical Woman, which is considered as a masterpiece, the Young Housewife, the Village Grocer, and the Goldweigher.

DOW, Gerard, pupil of Rembrandt, was born at Leyden 1613. His pieces, which are all small, and to be viewed to advantage only by the help of a magnifying-glass, possess astonishing expression, and are extremely delicate. He was patient in his labors, and was not less than three days in representing a broomstick, and five in painting a hand. He died in a good old age, but when is not ascertained.

DOW, Alexander, a native of Scotland, was born at Creech, and bred a merchant, but entered the East India Company's service, and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. To the measures of Lord Clive he was a determined opponent. He died in 1779. Dow translated various works from the Persian, among which are a part of Ferishta's History of the Deccan, and of the Bahar Danush, and wrote the unsuccessful tragedies of Sethona and Zingis.

DOWAL, William Mac, a learned Scotsman, born in 1590, and educated for seven years by Nisbet at Musselburgh, and afterwards at St. Andrew's. In 1614 he went to Groningen, where he studied civil law, and took his doctor's degree, in 1625. He was made advocate to the army of count Nassau, and in 1629 and 1635 came as ambassador to Charles I. to support the freedom of the seas about the herring-fisheries. He was made by Charles one of the council of state for Scotland, in which office he was continued by Charles II. with the additional title of ambassador to the United States. He died in London, but when is not known.

DOWNING, Calibut, an English divine, doctor of laws, and incumbent of Hackney, Middlesex, and Hieckford, Bucks. He was disappointed in his views of higher preferment, upon which he embraced the republican party, and preached some violent sermons, asserting the lawfulness of subjects to take up arms against the king. In 1643 he was a grand covenanter, but died the next year. Some of his sermons have been printed.

DRAGUT, Rais, i.e. captain Ragut, the favorite and successor of Barbarossa, was born of obscure parents, in Natolia. In abilities no ways inferior to his master, he distinguished himself in the courts of Naples and Calabria; but being taken by Doria's nephew, he passed seven long years in captivity. In 1560 Doria was besieged in the harbor of the isle of Gerbes; but the artful pirate eluded the vigilance of his enemies, by conveying his galleys across the land, and took the capital of Sicily, to the astonishment of his opponents. In 1566, he assisted Solymán II. against Malta with fifteen galleys, and while reconnoitring, a piece of stone struck by a cannon ball gave him so violent a blow on the ear that he died a short time after.

DRAKE, Sir Francis, an eminent navigator, was born of obscure parentage, in 1545, at Tavistock, in Devonshire, and first served at sea under Sir John Hawkins, his relative. From 1570 to 1572, he made three expeditions, as commander, to the West Indies, and the Spanish main, in the last of which he gained a large booty. He next fought with such bravery in Ireland, under Essex, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to Queen Elizabeth. With five small vessels he sailed, in 1577, to attack the Spaniards in the South Seas. In this expedition he ravaged the Spanish settlements, coasted the North American shore as far as the latitude of forty-eight degrees north, and took possession of the country under the name of New Albion, and then returned home, by the Moluccas and the Cape, after a circumnavigation of nearly three years. Elizabeth dined on board of his ship at Deptford, and knighted him. In 1585, he successfully attacked the Spaniards in the West Indies; in 1587 he destroyed many ships at Cadiz; and in 1588, as vice-admiral, he participated in the destruction of the Armada. He died at Nombre de Dios, January 23, 1596. Plymouth, which he represented in parliament, is indebted to him for having caused to be brought to the town a supply of water, from a distance of several miles. His death was universally lamented, for he was respected not only as a naval hero, but as a worthy private character.

DRAKE, James, a physician and political writer, born at Cambridge 1667, and educated there. His "History of the last parliament of king William," 1702, was considered as so severe in his reflections on that monarch, that he was prosecuted by the attorney-general, but acquitted. In 1704, upon the rejection of the bill to prevent occasional conformity, he ventured, with Poley, member for Ipswich, to publish the memorial of the church of England, which highly offended Godolphin, and roused the vengeance of the house of commons, who offered a reward for the discovery of the author, who, however, though suspected, remained unattacked. In 1706 he was prosecuted for the publication of Mercurius Politicus, a newspaper which severely reflected upon the conduct of government, and though acquitted through a flaw in the information, he took to heart the asperity of his persecutors, and falling into a fever he died at Westminster the second of March 1707. He wrote, besides the "Sham lawyer," a comedy,—an English translation of Herodotus, never published,—a "new system of anatomy," a work of great merit, published by Dr. Wagstaffe, and again in 1717, in two vols. 8vo. with an appendix, 1723,—and notes to le Clerc's history of physic.

DRAKE, Roger, D.D., a physician, who afterwards became a popular preacher in London, and was one of the Savoy commissioners. He died after the restoration. He was learned, pious, and charitable, and wrote some sermons, besides a sacred chronology.

DRAKENBERG, Christian Jacob, the well known centenary of the north, was born at Stravenger, Norway, 1624, and died at Aarrhuys in 1770, aged 146. After living in celibacy till his 113th year, he married a widow aged 60. His great old age brought about him many respectable visitors, who were pleased with his good sense, his humility, and the sound state of his faculties.

DRAPER, Sir William, a native of Bristol, born in 1721, was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge. Entering the army, he distinguished himself in the East Indies, became a colonel in 1760, and acted as brigadier at the capture of Bellisle, in 1761. In 1763, he commanded the land forces at the capture of Manila. The place was taken, but the ransom of four millions of dollars, which the governor pledged himself to pay, was resisted by the Spanish government, and the conquerors were thus robbed of their expected reward. In 1769 he engaged in the controversy with the celebrated Junius, in defence of the marquis of Granby, and his two letters were answered with great spirit and severity by his unknown antagonist, whom, however, he again attacked under the signature of Modestus. In October 1769, he came to America for his health, where he married miss de Lancey, daughter of the chief justice of New-York. In 1779, he was made lieutenant governor of Minorca, and on the surrender of the place he exhibited twenty-nine charges against the governor, Murray, twenty-seven of which were deemed frivolous, and for the other two, the governor was reprimanded; after which the accuser was directed by the court to make an apology to his general, to which he acquiesced. He lived afterwards in retirement, and died at Bath 8th January, 1737.

DRAYTON, Michael, an English poet, born at Harshull, in Warwickshire, 1563. He was educated at Oxford, where, however, he took no degree, and devoted himself early to the cultivation of the muses. In 1593 he published the shepherd's garland, afterwards re-printed under the name of pastorals, and before 1593 he presented before the public his Barons' wars, England's heroic epistles, downfalls of Robert duke of Normandy, Matilda, and Gaveston. In 1613, he published the first part of his Poly-Olbion, a descriptive poem, which in its account of the rivers, mountains, productions, antiquities, and remarkable historical features, contains more correctness and truth of delineation than real and sublime poetry. In 1627, Drayton published a second volume of his poems, containing the battle of Agincourt, miseries of queen Margaret, court of fairies, quest of Cynthia, shepherds' syrena, elegies, and a spirited satire against female affectation called mooncalf. In 1630, another volume appeared called the muses' elysium, etc. Drayton died 1631.

DRAYTON, William Henry, a political writer, was a native of South Carolina. From 1753 to 1764 he studied at Westminster and Oxford. In 1771 he was appointed a judge. He was one of his majesty's justices when they made their last circuit in the spring of 1775, and the only one born in America. In his charge to the grand jury, he inculcated the same sentiments in favor of liberty, which were patronised by the popular leaders. Soon afterwards he was elected president of the provincial congress, and devoted his great abilities, with uncommon zeal, for the support of the measures adopted by his native country. Before the next circuit his colleagues were advertised as inimical to the liberties of America, and March 1776 he was appointed chief justice by the voice of the people. He died 1779, aged 36. He was a statesman of great decision and energy, and one of the ablest political writers of South Carolina. In 1774, he wrote a pamphlet addressed to the American congress under the signature of a freeman, in which he stated the grievances of America, and drew up a bill of American rights. He published his charge to the grand jury in April 1776, which breathes all the spirit and energy of the mind, which knows the value of freedom, and is determined to support it. Ramsay in his history has published this charge entire. His speech in the general assembly of South Carolina on the articles of the confederation was published in 1773. Several other productions of his pen appeared, explaining the injured rights of his country and encouraging his fellow citizens to vindicate them. He also wrote a history of the American revolution, brought down to the end of the year 1778, in three large volumes, which he intended to correct and publish, but was prevented by his death. It was published by his son in 1821. He was once challenged by gen. Lee in consequence of his censure in congress on the general's conduct at the battle of Monmouth; but he had the courage and the conscience to decline the combat and assigned his reasons.

DRAYTON, John, only son of the preceding, governor of South Carolina from 1800 to 1802, and from 1803 to 1810. At the time of his death, he was district judge of the United States. He died 1822, aged 60. The historical materials collected by his father, were by him revised and published with the title of memoirs of the American revolution from its commencement to the year 1776, inclusive, as relating to the state of S. C., 2 vols. 8vo. 1821. He had previously published view of S. C., 8vo. 1802.

DREBEL, Cornelius, a Dutch philosopher, born at Alcuera 1572, died in London 1634. As he pretended to be an alchemist some curious particulars are related with respect to his power to cause rain, and cold, by the operation of his machines. To his ingenuity some attribute the invention of the microscope and the thermometer, to which some add the telescope. Among other things he wrote de naturâ elementorum, 8vo.

DRELINCOURT, Charles, a calvinist minister, born at Sedan, July 1595, and educated there and at Saumur. Though a protestant and a powerful enemy against the papists, yet he was universally esteemed and beloved by them there and at Saumur

Many of his writings, thirteen in number, were controversial. Besides these he published consolations against the fear of death, which have passed through more than forty editions, and have been translated into various languages, and his charitable visits, in 5 vols. and 3 vols. of sermons, all equally remarkable for the piety, devotion, and religious assertions with which they inspire the attentive reader. He died the third of November 1669.

DRESSERUS, Matthew, a German, born at Erfurt in Thuringia, 1536. He became professor of rhetoric and history at Erfurt, and afterwards at Jena, and in 1581 accepted the chair of polite learning at Leipsic. He engaged, though unwillingly, in the puerile disputes which in those days divided the attention of the learned between the disciples of Aristotle and of Ramus. He was learned and laborious, and by his influence the confession of Augsburg, was received in the university of Leipsic. He died 1607. His writings were chiefly on controversial subjects, and are no longer remembered.

DRINKER, Edward, an American centenary, born Dec. 24th, 1630, in a small cabin where the corner of Walnut and Second-streets, Philadelphia, now stand. At the age of twelve he came to Boston as apprentice to a cabinet-maker, and in 1745 returned to Philadelphia, with his family, where he lived the rest of his life. He was four times married, and had 18 children, all by his first wife, and before his death he had a grandchild born to one of his grandchildren, being the fifth in succession from himself. He retained all his faculties to the last, though his eyesight failed him some time before his death. He lost all his teeth about thirty years before he died. In his meals he was moderate, but he eat often and never took any supper, and he was never seen in a state of intoxication. His memory continued so perfect that he could relate the minutest events in his youth, and never repeated them twice to the same company. He had the unusual happiness of seeing a place of desolation, the lurking spot of wild beasts and birds of prey, converted to a handsome, populous, and flourishing city, and after living under seven sovereigns, and beholding the great Peun establish his treaty with the Indians, and the congress sign their alliance with France, he hailed the day which made America a free independent republic. This venerable man, deservedly respected for his virtues in private life, died Nov. 17th, 1782, aged 103.

DROUAIS, Hubert, a painter, born at la Rouge, Normandy, died at Paris Feb. 9th, 1767, aged 68. He was the pupil of his father, who was likewise a painter, and he enjoyed the sublimest of satisfactions of sharing with his parents and in the bosom of his family the applauses which were liberally bestowed on the exertions of his pencil. By his genius and industry he raised himself from an humble situation to fame and opulence. His son Germain John was a painter of promising abilities, and died at Rome 1790, aged 27.

DROZ, Peter Jaquet, a mechanic, was born, in 1721, at La Chaux de Fond, in Switzerland, and died at Bienne, in 1790. Among his inventions was a writing automaton, so admirably contrived that every motion of the articulations of the hand and fingers was obvious to the eye, and perfectly similar to those of nature.

DROZ, Henry Louis Jaquet, a son and pupil of the foregoing, was born at La Chaux de Fond, in 1752, and surpassed even his father. His close attention to his favorite art brought him to the grave, in 1791. Among his inventions were, a drawing figure, and the figure of a female playing on the piano. The player followed the notes with the head and eyes, got up when it had finished playing, and made an obeisance to the company.

DRUMMOND, William, a Scotch poet, son of Sir John Drummond, was born at Hawthornden, in 1585; was educated at Edinburgh; and studied civil law at Bourges. On coming into possession of the family estate, he abandoned the law, and engaged in the more attractive pursuits of literature. The loss of an amiable and beautiful lady, to whom he was about to be united, drove him to the continent, where he remained for eight years. Returning at length to Hawthornden, he married, and had several children. He died in 1649, and his days are said to have been shortened by grief for the death of Charles I. As a prose writer, Drummond produced a History of the five Kings of Scotland, of the name of James; a work slavish in principle, and faulty in composition. But as a poet Drummond stands very high for the tenderness, elegance, and fancy of his ideas, and the melody of his verse. His poems have been admitted into various collections of the British bards.

DRUMMOND, Robert Hay, second son of the seventh earl of Kinnoul, by a daughter of Robert Harley lord Oxford, was born 10th Nov. 1711, at London, and educated at Westminster-school and Christ-church, where he was student. In 1736 he took orders, and the next year was made king's chaplain, and in 1743 was abroad with the king, before whom he preached after the battle of Dettingen. His abilities, and particularly the influence of his relations, insured his promotion in the church, he became prebendary of Westminster, in 1748 bishop of St. Asaph, in 1761 bishop of Salisbury, and soon after was translated to York. He published six occasional sermons, besides a sensible letter on theological study, which was edited in one vol. 8vo 1803, with his life. He died in 1773.

DRURY, Robert, was shipwrecked 1762, in the Degrave East Indiaman, on the south side of Madagascar, where he remained in slavery 15 years. On his return he published, 1729, a very interesting account of that uncivilized country, which, though extraordinary, is considered as accurate, as it corresponded with the papers of Mr. Benbow who shared the calamity. Three only with Drury escaped the ferocity of the natives.

DRUSIUS, John, a learned protestant, born at Oudenard 1555. He was educated at Ghent and Louvain, and upon his father's settlement in England went to Cambridge, where he learned Hebrew. His return to France was prevented by the Bartholomew massacre, and he went by invitation to Oxford, where he became professor of the oriental languages for four years, though only 22. He afterwards studied law at Louvain, and settled at Leyden as professor of oriental languages, where he married, and then removed in 1585, in consequence of the scantiness of his salary, to Franeker, where he filled the professor's chair with great credit till his death in 1616. He was very learned in Hebrew, and in the Jewish antiquities, and the text of the old testament, as his works fully evince.

DRYANDER, John, a physician and mathematician of Wetteren in Hesse, lecturer at Marburg, where he died 20th Dec. 1560. His works are valuable on medicine and mathematics, and his discoveries in astronomy and his invention of mathematical instruments are important.

DRYANDER, Jonas, a native of Sweden, went to England with Dr. Solander, and obtained the patronage of Sir Joseph Banks. He was librarian to the Royal Society, and vice-president of the Linnæan Society. He died in 1810, in his sixty-second year. His knowledge of natural history was extensive, and he possessed an extraordinary memory. He contributed to the Transactions of the Linnean Society, and drew up a classified and analytical catalogue of Sir Joseph Banks's library.

DRYDEN, John, an illustrious English poet, was born the 9th of Aug. 1631. He was educated at Westminster under Busby, and at Trinity college, Cambridge. He early gave proof of superior poetical abilities, and even while at school wrote a poem on the death of lord Hastings. In 1658 he published heroic stanzas on Cromwell, and in 1660, Astrea redux, on the restoration of Charles II. In 1662 he addressed a poem to chancellor Hyde, and published his satire on the Dutch. In 1666 appeared his Annus-mirabilis, and in 1668, he was appointed poet laureat to the king. He next wrote his essay on dramatic poetry, and in 1669, appeared his first play "The wild gallant." He was satirized and ridiculed, in 1671, under the character of Bays in the duke of Buckingham's comedy of the Rehearsal, an attack which he affected to despise, but which he fully resented by representing the duke as Zimri in his Absalom and Achitophel. In 1679 he published with lord Mulgrave his essay on satire. In 1680 he was concerned in the translation of some of Ovid's epistles, and the next year he published his celebrated poem Absalom and Achitophel, in which he satirized severely the rebels who espoused the cause of Monmouth against the king. The king appeared under the name of David, Monmouth of Absalom, Shaftesbury of Achitophel, and Buckingham of Zimri. A second part was written by Tate to which Dryden contributed about 200 lines, but it was far inferior to the first. In 1681 appeared the Medal, a satire against sedition, in consequence of Shaftesbury's acquittal, and the next year Religio laici was published, and in 1683 the tragedy of the duke of Guise, which proved so offensive to the whigs. The translation of Maimbourgh's history of the league was published in 1684, and the next year Dryden changed his religion to please his patron James II. His Hind and Panther was published in 1687, a production not calculated to increase the author's reputation. The Britannia rediviva appeared in 1688, and on that year the poet, in consequence of his religion, was removed from the appointment of laureat, which was bestowed on Shadwell. Lord Dorset however behaved with great liberality, and while as chamberlain he dismissed the catholic poet, he allowed a pension out of his own pocket equivalent to the royal salary. The spleen of Dryden on this occasion was discharged with astonishing efficacy on his successor in the Mac Flecknoe, a satire, the severest that has appeared in any country or language. About this time he translated father Bouhour's life of Xavier, and in 1693, he published the Juvenal of Persius, assisted by some of his friends. In 1695 he translated in prose du Fresnoy's art of painting, and two years after his Virgil appeared, a work which has in various editions continued to command the public admiration, and which, as Pope observes, is notwithstanding some human errors the most noble and spirited translation in any language. In 1698 he published his fables ancient and modern from Homer, Ovid, Boccace, and Chaucer. Besides these numerous works he was engaged in the translation of some of Plutarch's lives and various other miscellanies. This great man died May the 1st, 1701. Dryden's character as a prose writer is as well established as that of a poet. His dedications, essays, and prefaces, are very elegant and masterly productions, and display great powers of judgment, criticism, and erudition. His poems prove him one of the greatest poets of his country, and as Congreve says, no man has written in any language, so much and so various matter, and in so various manners, so well.

DUANE, James, judge of the district court of New York, was a member of the first congress, and received his appointment of judge in 1789. He was the first mayor of New York after its recovery from the British. He died 1797. He published a law case.

DUBOCAGE, Mary Anne le Page, a French lady, born at Rouen, 1710. She early displayed her poetical powers by a spirited translation into French of Pope's temple of fame, and afterwards of Milton's paradise lost, and of the death of Abel. Her Amazons, a tragedy, was received with flattering applause in 1749, and soon after her Columbiad, an epic poem in 10 cantos on the discovery of America, proved her to be animated by the strongest fire of the muses. She published besides, her travels through England, Holland, and Italy, in the form of letters, and also the composition which obtained the first prize granted by the Rouen academy in 1746. She died August 1802. Her works were collected in three vols. Lyons.

DUBOIS, William du, a French prelate, son of an apothecary at Limosin. Though originally but a valet in St. Michael's college, Paris, he rose to consequence by the influence of the regent Orleans, to whom he was reader, and afterwards preceptor, and whom he ably supported in all his schemes of licentious pleasure, and of wild ambition. In 1693 he obtained the rich abbey of St. Just, and afterwards became counsellor of state, and in 1717, passed as ambassador to England to sign the triple alliance. He was next appointed minister and secretary of state, presented to the archbishopric of Cambray, in 1721 made a cardinal, and in 1722 raised to the dignity of prime minister. He died 1723, aged 67, leaving behind him the unamiable character of a mean intriguing politician, of an immoral priest, and a designing hypocrite.

DUBRAU, or DUBRAVIUS SCALA, John, bishop of Olmutz in Moravia, was born at Piltzen in Bohemia, and died 1553. He was employed as ambassador in Silesia, and was the author of some learned works, especially a valuable history of Bohemia, in 33 books, edited 1575, and afterwards improved, Frankfurt 1638.

DUC, Fronton du, Fronto Duceus, a Jesuit of Bourdeaux, well known as a learned critic and an excellent Greek scholar. He devoted his time to study, devotion, and abstinence. He is the editor of Chrysostom's work, six vols. fol. 1613,—three volumes of controversy, and of the history tragique de la pucelle d'Orleans. He died at Paris 27th September 1624.

DUCAREL, Andrew Coltee, L.L.D., an antiquary, born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1715, was educated at Eton, and St. John's College, Oxford; was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, commissary of the diocese of Canterbury, and one of the commissioners for methodizing the records in the State Paper Office; and died in 1785. His principal works are, Anglo-Norman Antiquities; and Historics of Lambeth Palace, and of St. Catharine's Church. He was extravagantly fond of antiquities, and usually travelled every year for the purpose of adding to his knowledge in that department of literature.

DUCAS, Michael, a Greek historian, author of a history of the Grecian empire from Andronicus the elder to the fall of the empire. Though his language is harsh and inelegant, yet he relates with accuracy and impartiality. The work was printed at the Louvre, fol. 1649, and translated by Cousin into French 1672.

DUCHAL, James, D.D., a dissenting minister, born in Ireland 1697, and educated at Glasgow. After being 11 years minister of a dissenting congregation at Cambridge, on the removal of his friend Abernethy from Antrim, he succeeded him there, and at his death was chosen minister of the congregation in Wood-street, Dublin. He died 1761. In the decline of life he wrote above 700 sermons, out of which were selected the three vols. 8vo. published 1764. During his life he published a volume of sermons.

DUCHAT, Jacob le, a Frenchman, born at Metz 1653. He followed the profession of the bar till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and in 1701, he settled at Berlin, where he died, 1735. He was learned, and he is known rather as an editor than an author. He edited the Menippean satires, and the works of Rabelais, and contributed much to the completion of his friend Bayle's dictionary. A book called Duciana appeared at Amsterdam 1733, two vols. 12mo.

DUCHATEL, Gaspard, a deputy in the French convention, celebrated for his able and manly defence of the unfortunate Lewis XVI. These honorable efforts in the cause of innocence were regarded by the tyrants with envy, and Duchatel falsely accused of holding a treasonable correspondence with the Vendean rebels, was guillotined November 1793.

DUCHE, Jacob, a native of Philadelphia, and for several years an Episcopal minister in that city. He was an intimate friend of Washington; but, in consequence of his aversion to the American revolution, he left the country and went to England. He was a man of brilliant talents; an interesting, impressive orator, with much action; and he had also a fine poetical taste. He published, in this country, several occasional sermons; and, in London, 1780, two volumes of sermons. He died in Jan. 1793, aged about 60 years.

DUCHE DE VANCY, Joseph Francis, a French poet born at Paris 29th October, 1668. He was patronized by Madame de Maintenon, and he engaged and insured universal respect by the mildness of his manners, his inoffensive conduct, and his genuine wit, never directed against virtue or religion. He was member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, and died 14th December, 1704, aged 37. He wrote three tragedies, Jonathan, Absalom and Deborah, besides ballets and pieces for the opera, which had great merit, and were received with universal applause. His hymns, sacred canticles, and edifying stories, composed for the pupils at St. Cyr, possess great excellence.

DUCHESNE, Andrew, a learned and prolific French writer, was born in 1584, at l'isle Bouchard, in Touraine, and died at Paris in 1640. He was geographer and historiographer to the king. He left more than a hundred folio volumes of documents copied by his own hand; and, between 1602 and 1640, he published twenty-two works, among which are, Histories of England, of the Popes, and of the Dukes of Burgundy; and a Collection of French Historians.

DUCIS, John Francis, one of the most eminent of modern French tragic dramatists, was born at Versailles in 1733, and did not begin to write for the stage till he was in his thirty-third year. He died in 1817. The majority of his plays are free imitations from Shakspeare, and are honorable to his talents; but it would not be easy to prove what his countrymen assert, that he has embellished the productions of the bard of Avon. His works form 3 vols. 8vo.

DUCK, Stephen, a poet of extraordinary fortune, Though little blessed with education, he was naturally endowed with a strong mind and persevering temper; and at the age of 24 he began to apply himself laboriously to the acquisition of knowledge. By little and little he purchased a few and necessary books, and, with a scanty library, and great application, he became something of a poet and of a philosopher. The lines of Milton enriched his imagination, and the correctness of Addison's Spectators improved his understanding, and helped him in the regular disposition of his thoughts. By degrees his poetical attempts became respectable, and, by being reported in his neighborhood, were made known to some of the clergy, and at last to queen Caroline, who, pleased with him, settled a pension of 30*l.* upon him, and thus enabled him not only to live independently, but to take orders; after which he was presented to the living of Byfleet, Surrey. In this new office he behaved with great propriety; he was followed as a preacher, and respected as a man; but his spirits sunk into a dreadful melancholy, and, in an unfortunate moment, robbed of his reason, he threw himself from a bridge, near Reading, into the Thames, and was drowned, May or June 1756.

DUCLOS, Charles Dineau, historiographer of France, and secretary to the French academy, was born at Dinant in Bretagne, 1705, and educated at Paris. In 1744 he was mayor of Dinant, and in 1755 received a patent of nobility, and died 26th March 1772, respected and beloved. Though considered as one of the philosophers of France, he proved by his conduct, writings and conversation, that he was moderate in his opinions and the friend of morality and virtue. He never published any thing as historiographer, and observed, that he never would ruin himself by speaking truth, nor debase himself by flattery. His history of Lewis XV, was, after his death, lodged in the hands of the minister. His works are, romances, ingenious and interesting—the confessions of count —the baroness de Luz—history of Lewis XI. 3 vols. 12mo.—and memoirs on the manners of the 18th century. Though he took Tacitus for his model, he resembles him little in his delineation of characters, and the interest of his narrative. He was also engaged in the dictionary of the academy, and in the continuation of the history of that society.

DUCLOS, Mary Ann, a French actress, of great merit, born at Paris. She excelled chiefly in the representations of queens and princesses, and for many years engaged the public applause. Her maiden name was Chateaufneuf; that of Duclos was assumed; and she married, in 1730, Duchemin, an actor, from whom she was divorced three years after. She died at Paris 1748, aged 75.

DUDEFFANT, N., a French lady, well known in Paris for her knowledge of criticism, her elegant taste, and her pleasing and agreeable manners. She was acquainted with all the learned men of the times, who frequented her house. She died 1780, aged 84, the last thirty of which she had been blind.

DUDITH, Andrew, a divine, born at Buda, in Hungary, 6th February 1533, and employed by Ferdinand II. in affairs of importance, and rewarded with the bishopric of Tima, in Dalmatia. He was a man of great learning, and of such application that he is said to have transcribed three times the works of Cicero, to make himself perfect master of his style and manner. He was deputy at the council of Trent, where he became intimate with cardinal Pole; and at his return he embraced the protestant religion. He died 23d February 1589. His works on physic, controversy, and poetry, are numerous, and possess merit. He was a man of great mildness, benevolence, and regularity.

DUDLEY, Edmund, a celebrated lawyer and statesman, born in 1462, of a respectable family. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Gray's inn; and he became so respectable for his knowledge of law, and for his general information, that Henry VII., admitted him of the privy council, and made him one of his favorites. In 1504 he was speaker of the house of commons, and two years after he obtained the stewardship of the rape of Hastings. His services to his master were numerous; and it is said that Henry, to fill his coffers, used this artful favorite, who, little regardless of conscience or of reputation, joined with Empson to oppress and harass the people, and by various methods of influence, intrigue, or terror, extorted great fines and ransoms, so that, according to Bacon, they turned law and justice to wormwood and rapine. This conduct, however, did not pass unpunished. Henry was scarce in his grave before the public indignation called for the punishment of his wicked and corrupt ministers; and Empson and Dudley were both yielded up by Henry VIII.; and after being attainted and convicted of high treason, they lost their heads on Towerhill, 18th August 1510.

DUDLEY, John, son of the above, baron Malpas, viscount Plisle, earl of Warwick, and duke of Northumberland, was born in 1502. He soon became known at court as the friend of Suffolk, of Wolsey, and of Cromwell, and as the favorite of the king. Henry, pleased with the versatility of his talents, created him viscount Plisle, and knight of the garter, and afterwards, for his many services and his great courage, appointed him high admiral for life. He also received important grants of church lands, and was nominated one of the sixteen executors of the king's will. On the death of Henry, Dudley succeeded as high admiral by sir Thomas Seymour, brother to Somerset the protector; but, as an equivalent for his loss of dignity, he was created earl of Warwick, and chamberlain of England. His influence in the cabinet was now so great, that the young king confided much to his advice and authority; he was made duke of Northumberland; and a short-lived reconciliation was effected between him and the duke of Somerset, by the marriage of his eldest son with the latter's daughter. Rivalship, however, could never be extinguished. Somerset, though uncle to the king, was tried, condemned and executed for a pretended conspiracy against Northumberland. The victorious but guilty favorite now succeeded to all the honors of his fallen enemy, he became chancellor of Cambridge, and not only guided the young king, but in consequence of his weak state of health determined to raise his own family to the sovereign power. He with precipitation effected a marriage between his fourth son, lord Guildford Dudley, and lady Jane Gray, eldest daughter of the duchess of Suffolk, in whose favor he caused the yielding Edward to settle the succession. No sooner had Edward expired than Jane was conveyed to the tower by her ambitious father-in-law, and on the 10th of July proclaimed queen. Submission to these measures was demanded from Mary, and when the men of Suffolk rose up in her favor, Northumberland advanced with a body of troops to check the insurgents. He soon found however the unpopularity of his measures, when he reached St. Edmundsbury, no supplies arrived to support his plans, and he retired to Cambridge, where seeing his followers deserting his standard, he affected attachment to Mary, and caused her to be proclaimed queen, and threw up his cap into the air in sign of joy. Mary pleased with her success did not relent towards her enemy, Northumberland was arraigned and condemned, and he lost his head on Towerhill, after making a profession of the Romish religion 22d Aug. 1553. Thus fell this powerful subject, whose many virtues were lost by a restless and at last fatal ambition, which swept away not only him but the innocent lady Jane and her virtuous consort.

DUDLEY, Robert, baron Denbigh, earl of Leicester, son of John duke of Northumberland, and brother of Ambrose earl of Warwick, was born 1532. He became a favorite at the court of Edward, and was knighted, and in 1550, he married Amy daughter of sir John Robsart. Under Mary he fell into the same disgrace as his father, and he was condemned, but by the queen's favor pardoned in 1554, and afterwards restored in blood. On the accession of Elizabeth he became a great favorite, and was made knight of the garter, master of the horse, and a privy counsellor, and so much honored by the queen and flattered by the people, that he was called "the heart of the court." In 1564 he was created earl of Leicester with unusual solemnity, and to the honors of chancellor of Oxford and high steward of Cambridge, was added the order of St. Michael from the king of France. Though Leicester stood high in the graces of the queen, there were not wanting attempts to destroy his influence and consequence. In 1585 he went to the Low Countries as governor, at the request of the distracted inhabitants, but his conduct was displeasing to the queen, and he was recalled, and though criminated by his enemies for violence and maladministration, he was reinstated in the royal favor. In 1588 he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury to oppose the Spanish armada, and he there received high and flattering commendation from the queen. He died Sept. 4th, 1588. This ambitious favorite was endowed with great talents; the influence which he possessed over the queen he maintained by his intrigues and duplicity. He affected regularity and piety to an offensive degree, but when his views were thwarted, neither virtue nor innocence could resist the secrecy of his measures, or the perseverance of his guilt. Poisoning was the favorite recipe to which he had recourse to remove his enemies or rivals.

DUDLEY, Robert, son of the earl of Leicester, was born 1573. He settled at Florence, where he was patronised by the duke Cosimo II., and by the influence of his consort, sister to the emperor Ferdinand II. he was created a duke of the Roman empire, and ten years after he was enrolled by pope Urban VIII. among the Roman nobility. These high honors were deserved by the services which he performed for his patrons. He formed the plan for draining the extensive morass between Pisa and the sea, and by his wise regulations he raised Leghorn from an insignificant town, to a respectable and populous seaport. He lived in great magnificence, and to his titles assumed that of duke of Northumberland. He died at his castle of Corbello, three miles from Florence, Sept. 1659. In philosophy, chemistry, and physic, he was as eminent as in politics.

DUDLEY, Thomas, governor of the colony of Massachusetts, was a native of England. He came to Massachusetts in 1630 as deputy governor, and was one of the founders and pillars of the colony.

He was chosen governor in the years 1634, 1640, 1645, and 1650. He died 1652 aged 76.

DUDLEY, Joseph, governor of the colony of Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1665. In 1682 he went to England as an agent for the colony. When the government was changed in 1686 he was appointed president of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. His commission was received in May 1686. His authority was of short continuance, for Andros arrived at the end of the same year. He, however, was continued in the council and was appointed chief justice. In 1689 he went again to England, and in 1690 returned with a commission of chief justice of New York, and continued in America three years. He was then eight years lieutenant governor of the isle of Wight. He was appointed governor of Massachusetts 1702, and continued in the government till 1715. He died 1720 aged 72.

DUDLEY, Paul, F. R. S. chief justice of Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1690. He finished his law studies at the Temple in London. He returned in 1702 with the commission of attorney general, which he held till he was appointed chief justice in 1718. He died 1751, aged 75. From his regard to the interests of religion, and as a proof of his attachments to the institution in which he was educated, in his last will he bequeathed to Harvard college 100*l.*, the interest of which was to be applied to the support of an annual lecture to be preached in that college; the first lecture to be for proving and explaining, and for the proper use and improvement of the principles of natural religion; the second for the confirmation, illustration and improvement of the great articles of the christian religion; the third for detecting, convicting and exposing the idolatry and tyranny, the damnable heresies, and abominable superstitions, and fatal and various errors of the Romish church; the fourth for maintaining, explaining and proving the validity of the ordinations of ministers as the same hath been practised in New England from the first beginning of it. These subjects were successively to occupy the lecture, and he who should be chosen for the last, was directed to be a sound, grave, experienced divine of at least forty years of age. A copy of each discourse is required to be left with the treasurer. The first sermon on this foundation was preached by president Holyoke in May 1755. Mr. Dudley published twelve articles in the transactions of the royal society in vols. 31, 34 and 39; among them an account of the making of maple sugar; of discovering the hive of bees in the woods; of the earthquake of N. E.; of the poison wood tree; of the rattlesnake; of the Indian hot houses, and cures by sweating in hot turf; description of the moose deer; essay upon the natural history of whales. He published also an essay on the merchandize of slaves and souls of men, mentioned in Revelation XXIII. 13, with an application to the church of Rome.

DUFFIELD, George, D.D., was born in Oct. 1732. He was first settled in the town of Carlisle, Pen. but his talents attracting much notice he was afterwards made pastor of the second presbyterian church in Philadelphia. Dr. Duffield died, Feb. 2, 1790.

DUFRESNY, Charles Riviere, a native of Paris, called grandson of Henry IV. from his great resemblance to that monarch. He was employed about the court, in laying out the garden and pleasure grounds, and when dismissed he became a dramatic writer. His works were published in 6 vols. 12mo. He died very poor 1724, aged 36.

DUGARD, William, son of a clergyman, was born at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, 1606, and educated at Worcester school, and Sydney college, Cambridge. He was a man of great learning, and much and deservedly esteemed as a teacher. He died 1632. His "Lexicon Græci Testamenti" has been improved and edited by Bowyer. He wrote besides a compendium of rhetoric, a Greek grammar, and a selection of Lucian's dialogues.

DUGDALE, sir William, an eminent English historian and antiquary, born 12th Sept. 1605. He was educated at Coventry grammar-school, and instructed by his father in civil law and history. He devoted himself deeply to the study of antiquities, and in 1638 he came to London, and by the influence of his friends Hatton and Spelman he procured an appointment in the Heralds' office. In this favorite retreat he had the means of improving his collections, and by the encouragement of sir Christopher Hatton he was employed in taking draughts of the most celebrated of the English cathedrals, which were afterwards deposited in the library of his friends. He was with Charles at the battle of Edge-hill, and at the siege of Oxford, where he was in 1642, made M. A. Upon the reduction of Oxford he returned to London, and after compounding for his estate he applied himself laboriously with his friend Dodsworth in completing their collection from the records of the Tower, and other places. Of his Monasticon Anglicanum the first volume appeared in folio 1655, the second 1661, and the third 1673, a curious collection of all the foundation charters of the dissolved monasteries. His antiquities of Warwickshire were published in 1656, after the laborious researches of 20 years, of which valuable compilation a second edition appeared in 1730 by Dr. Thomas. His history of St. Paul's cathedral was published in 1658, and it was afterwards greatly improved and edited by Dr. Maynard. At the restoration, he was made norroy king at arms, and in 1677 created garter, and knighted by the king. He died at Blythe-hall, of a cold, 10th Feb. 1686, in his 81st year. He published several other works, and left 43 vols. in folio, of manuscript.

DUGOMIER, N. a French general, born at Martinico. In the revolution war he was appointed commander in Italy, and was afterwards successful in retaking Toulon from the English. He next was employed against the Spaniards, and defeated them in various encounters; but he was killed 17th Nov. 1794, at the battle of St. Sebastian. His name was inscribed in the Pantheon.

DUGUAY-TROUIN, René, a celebrated French admiral, born at St. Maloes, 10th June 1673. He early distinguished himself by his intrepidity and perseverance, and in various encounters with the English and the Dutch he came off victorious. In 1711 he took Rio Janeiro from the Portuguese, and every where in the Indies, and also in the Mediterranean against the corsairs, he displayed the greatest skill united with the most consummate wisdom. This brave man, honored by the king, and respected by the nation, died at Paris 27th Sept. 1736.

DUGUET, James Joseph, a French writer, born 1649. He was a priest of the oratory, and went to Brussels to his friend Arnauld, but returned to Paris, where he led a very retired life, and died 1733. He was a man of great learning, and uncommon sweetness of manners, but his firm opposition to the bull unigenitus, exposed him to much obloquy and trouble. He wrote nearly 20 works in French, on theological subjects, in a style clear, pleasing, and perspicuous.

DUHAMEL DU MONCEAU, Henry Lewis, a French agricultural writer, was born at Paris in 1709, and died in 1780. To the Academy of Sciences, of which he was a member, he furnished above sixty memoirs on agriculture, commerce, and shipping. Besides which, he published numerous works, among which are, A General Treatise on Fisheries; A Treatise on the Culture of the Soil; and A treatise on Trees and Shrubs.

DUIGENAN, Patrick, L.L.D., an Irish civilian, was born in 1735.—His parentage was humble, and he was solely the creator of his own fortune. From being a sizar in the college of Dublin, he rose to the degree of doctor of laws, was made advocate-general, a judge of the prerogative court, vicar general of Armagh, and a privy counsellor. In the Irish parliament he zealously supported the union; and in that of Great Britain he as strenuously opposed the claims of the Romanists to political power. He died April 10th, 1816. Dr. Duigenan published—1. Lachryne Academicæ, 9 vo.—2. An Address to the Nobility and Gentry of Ireland, 8vo., and some other tracts on political subjects.

DUKE, Richard, a poet, educated at Westminster and made fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge. He was the friend of Otway, and of the poetical wits of the times, and was for some time tutor to the duke of Richmond. His poetry is not very respectable. He wrote a poem on the marriage of Anne and the duke of Denmark. He was made chaplain to the king, prebendary of Gloucester, and obtained the rich living of Witney, Oxfordshire, where he was found dead in his bed, after returning the preceding evening from an entertainment, 10th Feb. 1711. He published a volume of sermons and another of poems.

DUMANIANT, John Andrew, whose real name was Bourlein, an actor and comic writer, was born, in 1754, at Clermont, in Auvergne, and died in 1828. During the latter part of his life he was the manager of several provincial theatres. He is the author of more than fifty pieces; among which are, the French in Huronia; Open War, or Stratagem against Stratagem; the Night of Adventures; and The Intriguers. He also wrote three novels.

DUMARSAIS, Cæsar Chesneau, an eminent grammarian, was born at Marseilles in 1676. He was successively a preacher, a barrister, a tutor, and a writer for the Encyclopædia; and spent the greatest part of his life in a state bordering upon penury. Dumasais was not less modest than he was learned, and he disdained to resort to intrigues to better his condition. He died in 1756. Among his works, which form seven volumes, are, an excellent Treatise on Tropes; a Treatise on Logic; and a Method of learning Latin.

DUMAS, Charles Louis, a French anatomist, was born in 1765. He became a professor at Montpellier in 1795, and died there in 1814. His works are—1. An Inaugural Dissertation on Life. 2. A Treatise on Myology, 4to. 3. Principles of Physiology, 4 vols. 8vo. 4. A Physiological Sketch on the Transformation of the Organs of the Human Body.

DUMÉE, Joan, a learned lady, born at Paris. She married very young, and at the age of 17 lost her husband, who fell in Germany at the head of his company. She devoted herself with unusual application to astronomy, and published at Paris, in 1680, "discourses of Copernicus on the mobility of the earth," 4to. in which she displays great knowledge and Extensive erudition.

DUMESNIL, Maria Frances, a celebrated tragic actress, was born at Paris in 1713; went upon the stage in 1737; and was popular till the moment of her retirement in 1775. She died in 1803; having preserved to the last all her intellectual faculties. It was in queens and lofty characters, particularly in the parts of Merope, Clytemnestra, Athaliah, and Agrippina, that she most strikingly displayed her talents. When she exerted her full powers, she surpassed all her theatrical contemporaries in exciting the emotions of pity and of terror.

DUMMER, William, lieutenant governor of the province of Massachusetts. He was appointed in 1716. At the departure of gov. Shute in 1723 he was left at the head of the province, and he continued commander in chief till the arrival of gov. Burnet in 1728. He was also commander in chief in the interval between the death of gov. Burnet and the arrival of gov. Belcher. He died 1761, aged 82. During his life his alms were a memorial of his benevolence, and at death he left a great part of his estate to pious and charitable uses.

DUMMER, Jeremiah, a native of Boston, Massachusetts, and a graduate at Harvard college in 1699, early rendered himself conspicuous by an extraordinary brilliancy of genius, and progress of knowledge. Designing to devote himself to the ministry, he entered the university of Leyden, and obtained by his superior learning the applause of the celebrated Witsius, professor in that seminary. He afterwards abandoned the ministry, and became a civilian. He went to England, and was in 1710 appointed agent for Massachusetts. He engaged in the service of the party then in power, and received several important employments from lord Bolingbroke, but lost his hopes by the change in the administration at the death of the Queen, and unhappily by his intimacy with that profligate nobleman, made shipwreck also of his religious principles and morals. He sent forth religious and political publications, which bore the marks of an extraordinary mind, and have passed through several editions. He died in 1739, at Plastow.

DUMONT, John, a publicist, a native of France, born in the seventeenth century, settled in Austria, where he was appointed historiographer to the emperor, and created baron of Carlseer. He died at Vienna, in 1726. He is principally known by his voluminous collection of Treatises, in eight folio volumes, under the title of A Universal Diplomatic Code of the Law of Nations; and by his Voyages in France, Italy, Germany, Malta, and Turkey, in four volumes.

DUMONT, Stephen, was born at Geneva in 1759, was educated and ordained to the ministry, was pastor of the French reformed church at St. Petersburg, and afterwards tutor to the son of Lord Lansdowne. At the house of this statesman he formed an intimate connection with some of the most eminent politicians of Great Britain. The French revolution brought him to Paris in 1789, and he was there associated with the leading men of the cause, but became disgusted with the display of violence and cruelty, and returned to England in 1791. His intimacy with Jeremy Bentham led to a very singular arrangement in respect to the publication of the works of this extraordinary man. Bentham wrote his valuable treatises in an obscure and grotesque style; and they were entirely remodelled by Dumont, and made intelligible, before they were given to the world. The works thus produced were published in the following order, Treatise on Civil and Penal Legislation, in 1802; Theory of Rewards and Punishments, in 1811; Tactics of Legislative Assemblies, followed by a Treatise on Political Sophisms, in 1816; a Trea- tise on Judicial Proofs, in 1823; of the Organization of the Judiciary and Codification, in 1828. When Geneva recovered her independence, in 1814, Dumont hastened back to his country, and succeeded in effecting some important improvements in her constitution. He died at Milan in September, 1729.

DUMOURIEZ, Charles Francis Duperier, a French general, was the son of a military man of talent, who translated the Ricciardetto, and wrote some dramatic pieces, and other works. He was born at Cambrai in 1739, and was carefully educated by his father. At the age of nineteen he made his first campaign as a cornet, and before the close of the seven years' war had received twenty-two wounds. After the peace of 1763, he travelled in Italy and Portugal. In 1768 and 1769, he served with distinction in Corsica. He was afterwards employed as a secret diplomatist in Poland and in Sweden. The last of these missions was undertaken by desire of Louis XV. without the knowledge of the minister of foreign affairs, and it consequently brought on Dumouriez a persecution from that minister. He was even imprisoned for several months; but he recovered his liberty, and obtained satisfaction, on the accession of Louis XVI. In 1773, he was appointed commandant of Cherbourg; in 1791, was intrusted with the command of the country between Nantz and Bourdeaux; and, in 1792, was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and made minister of foreign affairs, from which office he was shortly afterwards removed to the war department. That department, however, he held only for three days, at the end of which he resigned. He was now placed at the head of the army destined to oppose the Prussian invading army under the duke of Brunswick. By a masterly disposition of his troops, in the defiles of Champagne, he completely foiled the enemy, and compelled them to retreat. He then broke into the Netherlands, gained the battle of Jemappe, revolutionized the whole country, and carried the French arms into Holland. Quitting his army for a while, he visited Paris, for the purpose of endeavoring to save the king; but in that he failed, and rendered himself an object of suspicion. The tide of military success, too, at length began to turn against him. He lost the battle of Neerwinden, and was forced to abandon the Low Countries. Commissioners were now sent by the Convention to arrest him; and, after having vainly endeavored to rally his army on his side, he was compelled to seek for safety in flight. He subsequently resided in Switzerland, at Hanburgh, and in Holstein, and finally settled in England, where he was often consulted by the ministers. In the restoration of the Bourbons he took no part; nor did he approve of their conduct. He died March 14, 1823. Besides The Present State of Portugal, and some other works, Dumouriez wrote his own memoirs in three volumes.

DUMOURIER, Anthony Francis Duperier, a native of Paris, eminent as a commissary in the French armies. He was author of Richardet, a poem, 2 vols.—some comedies translated from the Italian, Spanish, and English, and an opera. He died 1767, aged 60.

DUNBAR, William, an eminent poet of Scotland, born 1465 at Salton, on the south of East Lothian. He was originally poor, and after travelling as a novice of the franciscan order, he returned home in his 25th year. His "thistle and the rose," was written on the marriage of James IV. of Scotland with Margaret daughter of Henry VII. but whilst he expected ecclesiastical preferment for the offering of his poetry, he unfortunately was disappointed; for the great listen with delight to the flattering compliments of the learned, but seldom reward merit. He wrote besides, the golden terge—the freirs of Berwick—the twanarrit wemen—and the wedo. His poetry is commended by Warton, as next in rank to Chaucer's and Lydgate's; and Pinkerton, with national partiality, says, that he surpasses the morals and satires of Langland, Chaucer's humor and knowledge of life, Gower's allegory, and the description of Lydgate. His works were published with learned notes by sir David Dalrymple. He died about 1590.

DUNBAR, William, a planter, died at his seat at Natches, Nov. 15, 1810. He was an astronomer, and distinguished for his researches in natural sciences. To the philosophical society of Philadelphia, of which he was a member, he made several communications, which are published in transact. vol. vi. account of the language of signs among the Indians; meteor. observ. 1800; description of the Mississippi.

DUNCAN, William, a learned writer, professor of philosophy in the Marischal college of Aberdeen. He was born at Aberdeen in July 1717, and was educated there under the celebrated Dr. Blackwell. He went to London in 1739, and there chiefly employed himself in writing for the booksellers. His works appeared generally without his name. He translated some books from the French, and was concerned in that translation of Horace known under the name of Watson. He was the coadjutor of Dr. Johnson, Campbell, and Fordyce, in the preceptor which Dodsley published, and he wrote for his share the logical part. He also translated several of Cicero's orations, and likewise Cæsar's commentaries which appeared in 1752, folio, with fine cuts. In 1753 he removed to Aberdeen, where he had been the preceding year appointed professor of philosophy. He died May 1st 1760, aged 43.

DUNCAN, Adam lord, a well known English admiral, born at Dundee of a respectable family. As a younger son he was bred to the sea, and in 1761, was made post captain. He served under Keppel as his captain, and in 1787 was made rear admiral, in 1793 vice admiral, and in 1795 admiral of the blue. His station during the late war was in the north sea to block up the Texel, but in his temporary absence during the mutiny of the fleet, the Dutch escaped from their ports, and were soon brought to an engagement by the English admiral, near Camperdown, within five miles of their own shores. On this celebrated day, 11th October 1797, the Dutch admiral De Winter struck with eight ships to the superior valor of the English, and in reward for his conduct, Duncan was created the 21st of the same month viscount Duncan of Camperdown, baron Duncan of Lundie, Perthshire, with a pension of 2000*l.* on himself and his two successors in the peerage. Lord Duncan, whose character in private life as a man and as a christian, was equal to his bravery as a seaman, died 1804. He was in stature a comely person, full six feet three inches tall, so that he observed jocosely to the Dutch admiral, who was likewise a man of tall stature, I wonder how you and I have escaped the balls in this hot battle.

DUNCANBE, William, an English writer, born at Stocks, Hertfordshire. In 1726 he married the only sister of John Hughes, whose poems he edited in two vols. 12mo. 1735, and the miscellanies of the other brother Jabez, in one vol. 1757. He translated Racine's Athaliah, which met with applause, and afterwards edited the works of Mr. Needler, and he produced his L. J. Brutus on the boards of Drury lane, and it was published in 1735 and 1747. He besides edited some of Herring's sermons, and published Horace in English verse by several hands 1757. He died 26th February, 1769, aged 50.

DUNCOMBE, John, son of the preceding, was born in 1730. At the age of 16 he was admitted at Benet's college, Cambridge, at the recommendation of archbishop Herring his father's friend. In 1750 he was chosen fellow of his college, and three years after took orders, and became assistant preacher at St. Anne's Soho, where his eloquence as an orator, and his amiable manners in private life, gained him the respect of a populous neighborhood. In 1757, the primate Herring gave him the livings of St. Andrew and St. Mary Bredman, Canterbury, but the death of that excellent patron, two months after, cut off all hopes of further and more valuable preferment. In 1766, Secker appointed him one of the six Canterbury preachers, and the next primate, Cornwallis, presented him, in 1773, to the living of Herne, six miles from Canterbury. He was also master of Harbledown and St. John's hospitals, which, though places of trust and not emolument, enabled him to display his regard for the poor, and his humane endeavors to relieve their necessities. He was also an active magistrate, and in this office he was the means of encouraging virtue and of checking vice. He died on the 13th of January, 1786. His works are chiefly fugitive pieces published in Dodsley's collection, and in periodical magazines, besides the Seminead, and a poem on the death of Frederick prince of Wales. He also greatly assisted his father in his translation of Horace, and published the seventh satire of the second book in 1752, imitated, and inscribed to R. Owen, Cambridge.

DUNDAS, Sir David, general in the British army, was born near Edinburgh about the year 1735. He entered the army in 1752, and served in Germany in 1759, and in Cuba in 1762. He obtained the rank of colonel in 1781, and of major-general in 1790. He served at Toulon in 1793, and in Germany in 1794, where he for some time had the chief command of the British forces. He became quarter-master-general of the British army in 1797, and served that year with great reputation as a general officer in Holland. In 1803 he resigned his quarter-master-generalship, and was put on the staff as second in command under the duke of York, and in 1809 he became commander-in-chief of the forces, which rank he held two years. He about the same time became privy counsellor. His death took place February 18th, 1820. He published "principles of military movements, chiefly applicable to infantry," in 1783, and in 1792 "rules and regulations for the formations, field exercises, and movements of his majesty's forces."

DUNDAS, Henry, viscount Melville, son of lord Arniston, was born in 1740, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. In 1763 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, in 1773 appointed solicitor-general, in 1775 lord-advocate, and in 1777 joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. In 1782 he was sworn one of the privy council, and made treasurer of the navy; but when the coalition administration came into power he lost his places. This, however, was but for a short time; and when that party fell he resumed his station at the navy-board, on which he relinquished that of lord advocate. The board of control for East India affairs being established, Mr. Dundas was appointed first president; and in 1791 he became secretary of state for the home department, which he exchanged for that of the war office in 1794. He continued in active employment till 1801, when he resigned his places, and was created viscount Melville. On the return of Mr. Pitt to power, his lordship was made first lord of the admiralty, and continued so till he was impeached, in 1805, of high crimes and misdemeanors in his former situation as treasurer of the navy. Of all the charges brought against him, however, he was acquitted, and afterwards resumed his seat in the privy council, though he never returned to public business. He died in Scotland, May 27, 1811, being succeeded by his son, the present lord Melville.

DUNLOP, William, M.A., was born 1692 at Glasgow, where his father was principal of the university. He applied himself for about two years to the study of the law at Utrecht, but abandoned the plan at the representation of Mr. Wishart, and became, by means of his friend, regius professor of divinity and church history at Edinburgh 1716. He distinguished himself much as a preacher, and died 1720, aged 28. He published two volumes of sermons 12mo. and an essay on confessions of faith.

DUNLOP, Alexander, M.A., brother to the above, was born in 1684, in America, where his father was in exile. He came over at the revolution, and was in 1720 appointed professor of Greek in Glasgow university. He published in 1736, a Greek grammar which still maintains its superiority in the Scotch university, and died at Glasgow, 1742, aged 58.

DUNMORE, John Murray, earl of, the last royal governor of Virginia, was the governor of New York from 1769 to 1771, and governor of Virginia from 1770 to 1775. In his zeal for his royal master he removed the public stores from Williamsburg on board of armed vessels in April 1775, and afterwards abdicated the government, and retired for safety on board the Fowey man of war at York Town. He landed in different places, acting the part of a corsair and plunderer. He burnt Norfolk Jan. 1, 1776; but famine and disease obliged him to quit the coast. He was appointed in 1786 governor of Bermuda. He died 1809.

DUNN, Samuel, an English mathematician, born at Crediton, Devonshire, where he kept a school for some years, and where he founded a mathematical school. He afterwards removed to Chelsea, where he kept school, and was appointed mathematical examiner of those officers who entered into the East India company's service. He died 1792, author of several mathematical treatises—an atlas—treatises on book keeping.

DUNNING, John, Lord Ashburton, the son of a lawyer of Ashburton, in Devonshire, was born in 1731, served his apprenticeship to his father, and studied at the Temple. The circumstance which brought him into practice was his drawing up, for the East India Company, a memorial against the claims of the Dutch; and his conduct, as counsel for Wilkes, and on other constitutional occasions, established his reputation. In 1767, he became attorney-general, but resigned in 1770. Of the American war he was a decided opponent in parliament. In 1782, he was raised to the peerage, and appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He died in August, 1783.

DUNOIS, John, count of Orleans and Longueville, was the natural son of Lewis duke of Orleans, and born 23d November 1407. He distinguished himself in arms, in the defeat of the earls of Warwick and Suffolk, and in the defence of Orleans, till it was relieved by Joan of Arc. He pursued the English, and took from them Blaiz, Bourdeaux, and Bayonne. He was rewarded for his services by Charles VII. who called him the restorer of his country, and gave him large grants of lands, with the office of grand chamberlain of France. This great hero, so respectable also for the virtues of private life, died 24th November, 1468, aged 61.

DUNS, John, commonly called Duns Scotus, a celebrated theologian of the franciscan order, born at Dunstance, Northumberland. He became fellow of Merton, Oxford, and then went over to Paris, where his abilities and his acuteness in disputation procured him the appellation of the subtil doctor. He opposed the doctrines of Thomas Aquinas, hence his followers were called Scotists, and his opponents Thomists. He afterwards went to Cologne, where he died 1303. It has been said by Paul Jovius that he was attacked by an apoplexy and buried as dead, and that upon his recovery, he languished in a most miserable manner in his coffin till he expired. His works were printed at Lyons 1639, 10 vols. folio, and are now little regarded.

DUNSTAN, St. archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 924. He embraced the ecclesiastical life, and was made by Edgar bishop of Worcester, and afterwards in 959 translated to Canterbury. He was also abbot of Glastonbury. He is well known as a man of intrigue, and of great spiritual power, which he showed with unusual obstinacy in the English court, especially under Edmund. The pope knowing his influence, made him his legate. He died 983.

DUNSTER, Henry, first president of Harvard college, was inducted into this office Aug. 27, 1640. He succeeded Nathaniel Eaton, who was the first master of the seminary, being chosen in 1637 or 1638, and who had been removed on account of the severity of his discipline. Mr. Dunster was highly respected for his learning, piety, and spirit of government; but having at length imbibed the principles of antipeleobaptism, and publicly advocated them, he was inducted to resign his office in Oct. 1654. He now retired to Scituate, where he spent the remainder of his days in peace. He died 1659. He was a modest, humble, charitable man. By his last will he ordered his body to be buried at Cambridge, and bequeathed legacies to the very persons who had occasioned his removal from college. He was a great master of the oriental languages, and when a new version of the psalms had been made by Eliot, Welde, and Mather, and printed in 1640, it was put into his hands to be revised. He accordingly, with the assistance of Richard Lyon, improved the version, and brought it into that state, in which the churches of New England used it for many subsequent years.

DUNTON, John, a bookseller, born at Graffham, Huntingdonshire, 14th May, 1659. Upon failing in his business as bookseller, after twenty years' success, he began author, and in 1701 was employed in the Post angel paper. He afterwards began the Athenian Mercury, which was a plan to answer questions monthly proposed by unknown persons, and which was re-published by Bell under the name of the Athenian Oracle, 4 vols. 8vo. In 1710 he published his Athenianism, containing 600 treatises, in prose and verse, on all subjects. Though prolix and sometimes obscure as a writer, he yet possesses merit as a satirist, and some of his pieces will be read with pleasure. He also wrote "Dunton's life and errors." He died about 1725.

DU PATY, advocate general, afterwards president of the parliament at Bourdeaux, was born at Rochelle, and died at Paris 1788, not far advanced in life. He distinguished himself as an eloquent and powerful orator, and as an upright magistrate. His historical reflections on penal laws, are a very valuable work. He wrote also academical letters and discourses on Italy, two vols. 8vo. 1788. He affected to imitate Diderot, and was deficient in taste. Voltaire with sarcastic self-consequence spoke with indifference of his abilities.

DUPIN, Lewis Ellis, a learned, and well known critic, was born at Paris 17th June 1657. He early displayed great partiality for literature, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became doctor of the Sorbonne 1684. He devoted himself to the composition of his great work called "Bibliothèque universelle des auteurs ecclesiastiques," the first volume of which appeared 1686. The boldness, however, with which he spoke of various writers gave offence to the critics, and the author was obliged by Harlay, archbishop of Paris, to retract some of his opinions, and to suppress the work in 1693, with the privilege of continuing it under the altered title of Bibliothèque nouvelle. Besides this great work which was brought down in several volumes to the end of the 16th century, Dupin wrote others, the chief of which are—prolegomena to the bible,—notes on the psalms and pentateuch,—a profane history—a treatise of power ecclesiastical and temporal,—and method of studying divinity. He was professor of the Royal college, from which he was removed in the famous cas de conscience, but afterwards restored. He died at Paris 1719, aged 62. He was a man of extensive erudition, and of indefatigable application.

DUPLEIX, Scipio, was born at Condom 1566, and noticed by queen Margaret, who brought him to Paris in 1605, and made him master of requests, and afterwards historiographer of France. In his old age, which he reached without sickness or infirmity, he wrote a book on the liberties of the Gallican church, which he presented to chancellor Seguier for the liberty of printing, but the courtier with unparalleled audacity threw it into the fire, which so shocked the venerable author, that he returned to Condom and died soon after, of deep vexation, 1661, aged 92. His works are memoirs of the Gauls 1650, folio, a book of great value,—history of France in six vols. folio, not very accurate or impartial—an account of the flatteries heaped on Richelieu, and the violent reflections thrown on the deceased Margaret, now no longer the patroness of the author,—Roman history three vols. folio, an insipid performance,—a course of philosophy three vols. 12mo.—natural curiosity, 8vo. insignificant and often licentious,—and the liberty of the French language against Vaugelas.

DUPONT DE NEMOURS, Peter Samuel, a French political economist, was born at Paris, in 1739, and died in America, in 1817. During the revolution he filled several important situations, among which were those of president of the constituent assembly, president of the chamber of commerce, and secretary, in 1814, to the provisional government. He was also a member of the Institute. Dupont was moderate in his politics, and philanthropic in his views. Among his numerous productions are, several works on various branches of political economy; The Philosophy of the Universe; a variety of Memoirs on natural history and natural philosophy; and a translation of part of Ariosto.

DUPORT, James, a learned divine educated at Cambridge, where he became professor of Greek, and master of Magdalen college. He was raised to the deanery of Peterborough, and died 1680. His great erudition as a classical scholar is evinced in his learned works. He wrote a Greek version of the psalms,—gnomologia Homeri cum duplici parallelismo, Cambridge, 1660—poetica stromata, 1676, 8vo.—and lectures published with Nedham's Theophrastus' characters, 1712.

DUPPA, Brian, D.D., a learned prelate, born 1589, and educated at Westminster and Christchurch, Oxford. In 1641 he was translated to Salisbury, but he received little benefit from it, and on the suppression of episcopacy he attended his master, especially in the isle of Wight, and assisted him, it is said, in the composition of the Eikon Basilike. He afterwards lived in retirement at Richmond, till the restoration, when he was made bishop of Winchester, and lord almoner. He died in 1662 aged 73, at Richmond, in Surrey, a place which he loved, and where he erected and endowed an almshouse. A few hours before he expired, Charles II. visited this venerable prelate, and kneeling by his bed-side implored his blessing, which the dying man, placing one hand on the king's head, and raising the other to heaven, gave him with great fervor and piety. He was buried in Westminster-abbey. He left many charitable legacies to those places, or societies, with which either by birth, office, or predilection, he had been connected.

DUPRE, Mary, a learned lady of the 17th century, born at Paris, and educated by her uncle des Marets de St. Sorlin in the learned languages and in rhetoric, versification, and philosophy. She also studied Descartes, and was called the Cartesienne. She was intimate with the learned of her time, and her pieces of poetry and also her prose writings were read with great applause.

DUPRE DE ST. MAUR, Nicholas Francis, a native of Paris, who died there December the 1st, 1774, aged 80. He was a member of the French academy. He translated Milton's Paradise lost, with Addison's odes, and also Paradise regained, by a Jesuit, four vols. 12mo. He wrote an essay on the coins of France, 1740, 4to. a valuable work,—inquiries on the value of money, and the table of the duration of human life. He was well informed in matters of agriculture, economy, and commerce.

DUPUIS, Charles Francis, a French philosopher, was born at Tryé, near Gisors, in 1742; was educated at Harcourt College; and was successively professor of eloquence at the college of Lisieux, and of Latin eloquence at the college of France, a member of the convention, of the council of five hundred, and of the legislative body. Of the latter he became president. He was also a member of the Institute, and of the legion of honor. He died in 1809. His principal work is The Origin of all Modes of Religious Worship, or Universal Religion, three vols. 4to., with an atlas.

DUQUESNE, Abraham, a native of Normandy, who distinguished himself in the French navy in various fights against the Spaniards, the Dutch, the Genoese, &c. He died at Paris the second February 1638, aged 78, much and deservedly respected, not less in his private than his public character.

DURANT, Gilles, sieur de la Bergerie, advocate in the parliament of Paris. He was one of the nine appointed by the court to reform the customs of Paris. He possessed great talents for ludicrous poetry, and his verses on the ass that had joined the league, and had fallen during the siege of Paris 1590, are much admired. He wrote other humorous pieces, which equally command the approbation of the public, though some are of a licentious tendency. Some suppose that he was broke on the wheel, 16th of July 1618, for a libel on the French king, but the sufferer was another person, who with his two brothers endured that savage punishment. Durant's works were printed 1594.

DURANTI, John Stephen, a native of Toulouse, of whose parliament he was advocate-general, and afterwards in 1581 first president. He violently opposed the league, and perished in a tumult which he endeavored to appease, being shot by a musket ball 10th of Feb. 1589, and treated with every mark of insult and indignity by the mob. This meritorious martyr had the year before successfully employed his influence to preserve Toulouse from the plague, and he had deserved the affection of his country by his liberality and charity of some institutions which he founded for the education of youth and the relief of indigence. He wrote also a book de ritibus ecclesie, printed at Rome 1591 folio.

DURBACH, Anne Louisa, a German poetess, born 1722. From the mean occupation of watching cattle, she raised herself to distinction by the reading of books, and by uncommon application to literature. At 17 she married a woolcomber, but with him and with another afterwards, she was exposed to great poverty, till the age of 40, when her muse celebrated in a triumphal ode the battle of Lowoschutz. This piece was noticed, and recommended to the Prussian monarch, who sent for the poetess to Berlin, and by his patronage placed her above want. Her poems have been published, and possess great merit. She died about 1780.

DUREAU DE LAMALLE, John Baptist Joseph Renatus, an eminent translator, was born in St. Domingo, in 1782, and died, in France, in 1807. He was a member of the legislative body, and of the Institute. He published excellent versions of Tacitus and Sallust, and of a part of Seneca; and left an unfinished translation of Livy.

DURELL, John, D.D., a divine of eminence, born 1626 in the island of Jersey, and educated at Merton college, which he left at the beginning of the civil wars, and then passed to Caen, where he took his degree of M.A. He was ordained by the bishop of Galloway, at Paris 1651, and was afterwards invited by the church of Caen to supply the place of the famous Bochart during his absence at the court of Christina of Sweden, an honorable appointment, which however he did not accept. At the restoration he was chaplain to the king, and preferred to a prebend at Salisbury, afterwards at Windsor, and then at Durham. He died 1688, aged 58. His writings were chiefly controversial—a vindication of the church of England against schismatics, and a view of the government, of the church of England, 4to.—besides a translation of the liturgy into Latin and French.

DURELL, David, D.D., a native of Jersey, educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards became fellow of Hertford college, of which in 1757 he was made principal. He served the office of vice chancellor and died 1775, aged 47. He was author of critical remarks on the books of Job, Psalms, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, 4to.—the Hebrew text of the parallel prophecies of Jacob and Moses, relating to the 12 tribes, with a translation and notes, 4to.

DURER, Albert, a celebrated painter and engraver, born at Nuremburg 20th May 1471, of Hungarian parents. His Adam and Eve are still preserved in the royal palace of Prague, and also a picture of Christ bearing the cross, an adoration of the wise men, and at Frankfort two pieces of the passion and an assumption of exquisite beauty. In the senators' hall at Nuremburg are also still exhibited with national pride, a portrait of Charlemagne, and of some of the emperors, with the 12 apostles. His engravings are highly admired. Instead of the tedious mode of engraving on copper, he first attempted to work on wood, and his first pieces in that way, were the beheading of John the Baptist, and the presentation of his head to Herod, published in 1510. One of his best pieces is said by Vasari to be a St. Eustachius kneeling before a stag. The merit of Durer was not lost in obscurity, he was esteemed by the great, and the emperor Maximilian not only patronised him but granted him a pension and a patent of nobility. He died in his native city, 6th April 1528. He was cheerful but not licentious in his conversation, the firm friend of virtue and piety, and he never, like some of his fellow artists, employed his talents on any thing that was either obscene or profane.

D'URFEY, Thomas, a facetious English poet. His parents, who were Huguenots, left Rochelle before it was besieged by Lewis XIII. in 1628, and they settled at Exeter, where the poet was born. He applied himself to the law, but the liveliness of his genius, and the volatility of his mind, carried him to the cultivation of poetry, and as he possessed the powers of wit and the keenness of satire, his plays were received on the stage with great applause. His facetiousness and easy manners recommended him to the notice of the great, and Charles II. was often seen with this favorite of the muses, most familiarly leaning on his shoulder, or humming over a song with him. But though popular, his ballads, songs, and plays possessed all the coarseness of wit, licentiousness, and indelicacy which were fashionable in the days of the second Charles, and which better times have happily banished, so that within 30 years after his death, none of his pieces were suffered to appear on the stage. He died 26th February, 1723. His age is not exactly known, though it must have been about 70.

DURHAM, James, a Scotch divine, born in West Lothian 1620, and educated in St. Salvador's college, St. Andrew's. At the age of 30 by the persuasion of his friends he took orders, and became a very popular and eloquent preacher at Glasgow. He died of a consumption 1653, aged 33. He wrote a commentary on the revelations—discourse on scandal—sermons on the 53d of Isaiah and the Song of Solomon.

DUROC, Michael, Duke of Friuli, and marshal of France, was born at Pont à Mousson, in 1772, and entered the military service, in 1792, as a lieutenant of artillery. In 1796 he was appointed aide-camp to Bonaparte. He distinguished himself in Italy, Egypt, and Syria. On the formation of the imperial court, in 1805, he was created grand marshal of the palace. He was subsequently charged with diplomatic missions to Prussia, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. Resuming his military capacity, he fought with distinction at Austerlitz, Wagram, and Essling, and, finally, was slain by a cannon bullet, at the battle of Wurtzen, May 23, 1813. Napoleon was warmly attached to Duroc, placed a boundless confidence in him, and deeply regretted his loss.

DURY or DURÆUS, John, a Scotch divine, who labored earnestly to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists, but to little purpose. He began about 1634 to travel through Europe, engaged in this gigantic undertaking, and after conferring with the divines of England, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Geneva, and other places, he at last, after 40 years' laborious pursuit, found himself disappointed, and though all commended his spirit and extolled the purity of his intentions, none would resign their opinions and their faith to the decision of their neighbors. It is unknown when he died, but in the last part of his life he was honorably patronised, by Hedwig Sophia, princess of Hesse, who allowed him a comfortable retirement, with a table well furnished, and every convenience. He wrote much in favor of his grand plan, and evinced himself a man of extensive learning, great zeal, becoming piety, but rather fanatical. His letter to Dumoulin, concerning the churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland, under Cromwell, is curious. It was published London 1658, 12mo.

DUSSAULT, John Joseph, a journalist and critic, was born at Paris, in 1769, and died in 1824. He contributed largely to the Orator of the people, the Truth-teller, and the Journal of Debates. The critical articles which he had inserted in the last of those papers he afterwards published in five volumes, with the title of Literary Annals. He also wrote various pamphlets and essays, and several articles in the Universal Biography.

DUSSAULT; John, a native of Chartres, who after distinguishing himself in the war of Hanover under Richelieu, devoted himself to literary pursuits. At the revolution he became member of the convention, but his conduct was moderate and humane, and he was one of the 73 proscribed deputies who were imprisoned for opposing the measures of their more violent associates. He was afterwards member of the council of ancients, and president of the national institute, and died at Paris 16th March 1799, aged 71. He published a translation of Juvenal—de la passion du jeu, 8vo.—clogé de Blanchet—memoire sur les satiriques Latins, &c.

DUSSEK, John Louis, the son of an organist at Czaaslau in Bohemia, born in 1762. Having gone through the course of classical education at the university of Prague, he directed his attention principally to the study of music, and travelling to Hanburgh, put himself under the tuition of Emmanuel Bach. After visiting Poland, Prussia, and Paris, whence he was driven by the breaking out of the Revolution, he went to London, and in 1776 opened a musical establishment, in conjunction with N. Corri. In 1799 he returned to the Continent, and died in 1810 in the service of the prince of Benevento. He is the author of an immense number of sonatas, concertos, and other musical pieces.

DUSTON, Hannah, the wife of Thomas Duston of Haverhill in Massachusetts. In 1679 Haverhill was attacked by the Indians. Duston succeeded in placing himself and children in security, but his wife with her infant, and the nurse were taken by the Indians. After proceeding a short distance the Indians took the child from the nurse and killed it. After a fatiguing journey they were brought to an island just above Concord N.H. formed at the junction of the Contoocook river with the Merrimack, between Concord and Boseawen, now called Duston's island. The Indian family to which she had been assigned, consisted of twelve persons, two men, three women, and seven children; the prisoners in this family were three, Mrs. D. Mary Neff, and Samuel Leonardson, a boy, who had been taken at Worcester. Early in the morning of April 5, Mrs. D. awoke her confederates, and seizing the hatchets of the Indians, who were asleep, despatched ten of the twelve, a favorite boy being spared, and a wounded woman making her escape with him. Mrs. D. arrived safe at Haverhill, and for the scalps received 50*l.* from the general court, besides many valuable presents. In 1816 her house was standing, owned by Thomas Duston, a descendant.

DUTENS, Louis, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Tours, in 1730, and died at London, in 1812. In 1758 he became secretary and chaplain to the British minister at Turin, who, on his return to England, left him as chargé d'affaires. He afterwards obtained the living of Elsdon, in Northumberland, travelled with Lord Algernon Percy, and accompanied Lord Mountstuart to Turin, when his lordship was appointed envoy extraordinary. He is the author of various works, of which the principal are, An Inquiry into the Origin of Discoveries, and his own memoirs, under the title of Memoirs of a Traveller in Retirement. He also published an edition of Leibnitz, in six vols. 4to.

DUTTON, Matthew Rice, professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Yale College, at which institution he graduated in 1808. He was born in Watertown, Con. June 1783, and died July 17, 1825. In 1814 he was settled as a congregational minister of Stratford in his native state; here he remained about eight years, when he was removed to his professorship at New Haven.

DUVAL, Valentine Jaimeraï, a literary student, whose early attainments originated in a spontaneous taste for scientific pursuits. He was the son of a peasant in Champagne, and was born in 1695. After spending some time in rustic employment in various situations, his thirst for knowledge attracted the notice of some noblemen belonging to the court of the princes of Lorraine, by whom he was sent to Jesuits' college at Pont-à-Mousson. He there prosecuted his studies with great advantage, and afterwards, in 1718, he visited Paris. He next year was appointed librarian to duke Leopold of Lorraine, and professor of history at Luneville. On the removal of the family by which he was patronized, to Florence in 1738, he accompanied them thither; and he was subsequently made keeper of the imperial cabinet of Medals at Vienna; and in 1751 the office of sub-preceptor to prince Joseph, afterwards emperor, was conferred on him. He died in 1775, having amidst the splendors of a court life, preserved that simplicity of manners and fondness for study, which led to his advancement from the low station in which he was born. The works of Duval, relating to miscellaneous literature, with memoirs of his life, were published at Strasburgh and Petersburg, 1784—88, 2 vols. 4to.

DUVOISIN, John Baptist, a French ecclesiastic, born at Langres, in 1744. He was a doctor of the Sorbonne, and grand vicar of the diocese of Laon, in 1792, when he suffered deportation with a great number of his clerical brethren. He went to Brussels, and afterwards to Brunswick, where he employed himself in teaching mathematics and the belles lettres. Returning to France in 1802 he was raised to the bishopric of Nantes, and obtained the confidence and esteem of Bonaparte, who created him baron and made him member of the legion of honor. He was one of the four prelates who resided near the pope at Savonnie, and at Fontainebleau, and he is said to have endeavored as much as possible to lighten the captivity of the fallen Pontiff. He died at Paris in 1813.

DWIGHT, Timothy, D.D., L.L.D., president of Yale college, where he graduated in 1769. He was ordained in 1783 the minister of Greenfield, a parish of Fairfield, and continued there three years. While residing here he opened an academy, which was filled with pupils of both sexes, and which was highly celebrated during the whole period of its existence. After the death of Dr. Stiles he was chosen president of Yale college and inaugurated in Sept. 1795. For ten years he was annually appointed professor of theology. In 1805 the appointment was made permanent. He died 1817 aged 64. The following is a catalogue of his publications:—the history, eloquence and poetry of the Bible, 1772; the conquest of Canaan, a poem, 1785; election sermon 1791; the genuineness and authenticity of the N. Test. 1798; Greenfield Hill, a poem 1794; the triumph of infidelity, a poem, occasioned by Chauncey's work on universal salvation; two discourses on the nature and danger of infidel philosophy; a sermon on the death of Elizur Goodrich, 1797; the duty of Americans at the present crisis, 1798; on the character of Washington 1800; on some events of the last century 1801; on the death of E. G. Marsh, 1804; on duelling 1805; at the theological institution at Andover and ordination of E. Pearson, 1808; on the death of gov. Trumbull, 1809; a charity sermon, 1810; at the ordination of N. W. Taylor; on the fast; on the national fast 1812; a sermon before the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, 1813; remarks on the review of Inchiuin's letters, 1815; observations on language, and an essay on light in Mem. of Con. Academy of sciences, 1816; theology explained and defended in a series of sermons, 4 vols. several editions American and English; travels in New England, and New York, 4 vols. 8vo.

DYCKMAN, Jacob, M.D., graduated at Columbia college in 1810, and studied physic with Dr. Hosack. For some years he was physician of the city dispensary, and surgeon of the almshouse at New York; in 1821 he was appointed health commissioner. He died 1822, aged 34. He published a dissertation on the pathology of the human fluids; an improved edition of Duncan's dispensatory, 1813; an essay on Adipocire in trans. N. Y. Lyceum.

DYER, Sir James, an eminent lawyer, born at Roundhill, Somersetshire, 1511, and educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and removed to the Middle temple, London. Here by assiduity he distinguished himself, and in 1552, he was made sergeant at law, and elected speaker of the house of commons. In 1556 he was made one of the judges of the common pleas, in 1557 removed to the king's bench, and in 1559 again restored to the common pleas, and the next January he was made chief justice of that court. This respectable and upright magistrate died at his seat of Stanton, Huntingdonshire, 24th March 1581, aged 70. He wrote a large volume of reports, published 20 years after his death, and reprinted often, and deservedly commended by sir Edward Coke. He left also some other law tracts, and, for his learning and great excellence of character, fully merited the eulogium passed on him by Camden.

DYER, Mary, a victim of persecution, was the wife of William Dyer, who removed from Mass. to R. Island in 1633. Having been sentenced to execution for "rebellious seditious and obtruding herself after banishment upon pain of death," she was reprieved at the request of her son, on condition that she departed in forty-eight hours, and did not return. She returned, and was executed June 1, 1660.

DYER, John, an English poet, born at Aberglasney, Caernarthenshire, 1700. He was educated at Westminster school, and returned home to study the law, his father's profession, but he had a greater relish for poetry and design, and therefore he determined to become a painter. In 1727 he published his "Grongar-hill," a beautiful little poem, and afterwards set out for Italy to delineate the antiquities of that celebrated country, and employed much of his time among the enchanting prospects near Rome and Florence. At his return home in 1740 appeared his poem "the ruins of Rome," and soon after, by the advice of his friends, he took orders. He was presented to Calthorp, Leicestershire, which, after a residence of 10 years, he exchanged for Belchford, Lincolnshire. In 1752 he was presented by sir John Heathcote to Coningsby, and in 1756 the chancellor added to it, Kirkby on Bane; but whilst he began to enjoy himself, and prepared the improvements of his parsonage house, and of his garden, the cup of felicity was dashed from his hand, and he was carried off by a rapid consumption 1753.

E.

EACHARD, John, D.D., an English divine, born in Suffolk 1636. He was educated at Catharine-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He died 7th July 1697, aged 61, and was buried in the chapel, where a handsome inscription is placed over his remains. He is well known as the author of the grounds and occasions of the contempt of the clergy and religion inquired into, in a letter to R. L. 1670, which was attacked by several writers, and answered by him. In 1672 he published Mr. Hobbes' state of nature considered, in a dialogue between Philanthus and Timothy, dedicated to Sheldon the primate, which Hobbes never noticed, and perhaps wisely, as his superior powers must have sunk before the wit and raillery of his opponent. These two performances were long in esteem, and deserved the high commendations of Swift. All Dr. Eachard's works were printed complete in 1774.

EARLE, John, a native of York, educated at Merton-college, Oxford, and made tutor to Charles prince of Wales. He was a great sufferer during the civil wars, and at the restoration was made dean of Windsor, then bishop of Worcester, and in 1663 bishop of Salisbury, where he died two years after. He was author of a translation of the Icon Basilike into Latin—micro cosmography, or a piece of the world characterized in essays and characters, 12mo. and an elegy on Francis Beaumont the poet.

EARLOM, Richard, an engraver, born in 1740, was the son of the vestry clerk of St. Sepulchre's, London. His attention was first attracted to the arts by the paintings on the lord mayor's coach, and his father was induced to place him under Cipriani. He was employed by Boydell, to make drawings from the Houghton collection, and those drawings he afterwards engraved in mezzotinto; an art in which he was his own instructor. He died in 1822. His flower pieces, engraved from Van Huysum, are highly valued. Among the other admired productions from his burin are, Agrippina, from West; a tiger hunt, and other pieces, from Zoffany; and the first and second parts of the Liber Veritatis, from Claude.

EARLY, Peter, governor of Georgia, was bred a lawyer, and became distinguished in the profession. In 1802, he was chosen a representative in congress, and was among the most conspicuous of the members who supported the administration. In 1807, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Georgia, and in 1813, governor of the State, and rendered important services in those stations, by the intelligence, firmness, and freedom from party spirit, with which he discharged their duties, particularly by hindering the enactment of a law to prevent the collection of debts. He died August 15th, 1817.

EASTON, Nicholas, governor of Rhode Island, came to America in 1636, and in 1639 went to Newport, where he built the first house. He was governor of Rhode Island from 1650 to 1655, and in 1672 and 1674. He died 1675 aged 83.

EATON, Theophilus, first governor of New Haven colony was a native of England. He was bred a merchant, and was for several years agent for the king of England at the court of Denmark; and after his return prosecuted his business in London with high reputation. He accompanied Mr. Davenport to New England in 1637, and soon after his arrival was chosen one of the magistrates of Massachusetts. He was one of the founders of New Haven in 1633, and was annually elected governor till his death, Jan. 7th, 1657, aged 66.

EATON, William, general, graduated at Dartmouth college 1790. In 1792 he was appointed a captain in the army, and soon repaired to Ohio. He continued in service till 1797, when he was appointed consul at Tunis, and sailed in company with Mr. Catchcart consul to Tripoli in 1798. When the efforts of commodore Preble proved unavailing to humble the bashaw of Tripoli. Mr. Eaton projected an alliance with his brother Hamet, the rightful sovereign, then in exile at Tunis, the object of which was to recover for him the sovereignty, and with him to establish a permanent peace. The plan was approved, and he was authorized to carry it into effect in behalf of the United States. An army of five hundred men was raised by the united exertions of Hamet and Eaton. March 6, 1805, the army entered the desert of Lybia, it being arranged that the American fleet should cooperate in the expedition. After surmounting great obstacles and marching fifty days over a space of six hundred miles in the desert, the army encamped April 26, in the rear of Derne. This town was the capital of the richest province of Tripoli. It contained 15,000 souls and was defended by a fort and batteries, and strong garrison. Eaton with an army now increased by the addition of Arabs to 2500 men commenced the attack on the 27th with the important aid of three frigates. In two hours the town was captured. He was wounded in the left wrist by a pistol ball. A large army, collected by Jussap or Joseph Bashan, soon appeared before the town, and was defeated in a battle May 13, and met with a complete repulse June 10, and thus a way was opened to the gates of Tripoli. At this moment a peace was concluded by Tobias Lear, who had authority for the purpose, and thus an end put to the war. The feelings of Eaton, at being thus arrested in his career of triumph, can better be imagined than described. Returning to America in this state of excited feeling, it is not surprising that col. Burr should think him likely to lend a favorable ear to an invitation from him. Eaton probably thought that he had more to hope from fidelity to the government, than he could ever expect to get by adherence to Burr. He appeared as a witness against Burr on his trial. He failed to obtain the compensation he expected from the United States. He obtained from the legislature of Massachusetts a grant of 10,000 acres of land as a reward for his heroism. The last years of his life were passed amidst the pains of disease, and the distresses of poverty, to which his own imprudence had reduced him. He died 1811, aged 47.

EBELING, Christopher Daniel, was born in 1741, at Garnissen, in Germany. He studied theology at Gottingen, but afterwards devoted himself more particularly to geographical pursuits. His great work is entitled Geography and history of North America, published at Hamburg, in five volumes, 1793-9. He was afterwards professor of history and the Greek language in the Hamburg gymnasium, and superintendent of the Hamburg library. He died in 1817. His collection of books relating to America, amounted to more than 3900 volumes, which were purchased in 1818, by Israel Thordike, of Boston, and presented by him to the library of Harvard college.

EBROIN, mayor of the palace under Clothaire III., and Thierry I., maintained for a while the great power which his intrigues and hypocrisies had obtained, but his pride and cruelty offended the French nobles, and he was at last confined in a monastery. He however escaped, and soon returned with an army to regain his lost influence. His enemies and rivals were sacrificed to his ambition and revenge, and the greatest atrocities were exercised in the name of public justice. This tyrant, execrated by the people, was at last assassinated by Hernunfroi, a noble whose death he meditated, 681.

ECCARD, John George d', a German historian and antiquary, born at Duingen, Brunswick, 1670. He was professor of history at Helmstadt, and succeeded his friend Leibnitz in the chair of Hanover 1716. His debts obliged him to leave his situation 1723, and turning Roman catholic he retired to Wurtzburg, where he obtained the office of episcopal counsellor and librarian. He was ennobled by the emperor, and died 1730. His works are Corpus historicum medii aevi a Carolo magni tempor, ad finem seculi xv. two vols. fol. a learned and valuable work,—leges Francorum, and de origine Germanorum,—historia studii etymologici.

ECHELLENSIS, Abraham, a Maronite professor of oriental languages at Rome. He translated from the Arabic into Latin some of the books of Apollonius' conics, and went to Paris to assist le Jay in the publication of his polyglott bible. He quarrelled with le Jay, and also with Flavigny, who had attacked his edition of the bible, and he showed himself wantonly severe and licentiously satirical. He was recalled from Paris to assist the translating of the scriptures into Arabic, and died at Rome 1664.

ECHARD, Lawrence, an English historian and divine, born at Bassam near Beccles, Suffolk, 1671, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A., 1695. He took orders, and in 1706, published his history of England, from the time of the Romans to James I., in one volume folio, to which he added a second and a third volume 1713, up to the settlement of William and Mary. He wrote also an ecclesiastical history, and an English translation of Plautus and Terence, besides a gazetteer. He was made prebendary of Lincoln, and in 1712, archdeacon of Stowe, and soon after presented to the livings of Rendlesham, Sudbourn, and Alford, Suffolk. His declining state of health obliged him to go to Scarborough for the waters, but he died by the way, while in his chariot, 16th August 1730. He was an author of great judgment and perseverance, but the labors of more modern and elegant writers have rendered his works obsolete.

ECKHEL, Joseph Hilary, an eminent antiquary and numismatist, was born in Upper Austria, in 1736, and died in 1798, director of the medallic cabinet at Vienna. Few men have had so extensive a knowledge of medals as Eckhel. Among his valuable works on this subject are Nummi Veteres Anecdoti, two vols. folio; and Doctrina Veterum Nummorum, in eight vols.

ECKIUS, John, a learned professor of Ingoldstadt, born in Suabia 1483. He warmly opposed the great leaders of the reformation, and disputed at Leipsic with Luther, before the duke of Saxony, and at Worms against Melancthon. He was a divine of great abilities, warm zeal, and extensive erudition. His writings are chiefly on controversial subjects, in support of the popish supremacy against the protestants. He died at Ingoldstadt 1543.

ECKLEY, Joseph, D.D., minister of Boston, was a native of England, graduated at Princeton college New Jersey, 1772. He was ordained at Boston over the Old South congregation Oct. 1779. He died 1811 aged 60. He published an essay on the divine glory in the condemnation of the ungodly 1782; a sermon on the artillery election, 1792; at the installation of Mr. Evans; at the thanksgiving 1797; before the female Asylum, 1802; before the society for propagating the gospel, 1805; at the installation of H. Holley, in 1809; Dudleyan lecture of 1806, 1810.

EDELINCK, Gerard, an engraver, born at Antwerp 1641. The munificence of Lewis XIV., invited him to France, where he executed in the most finished style the holy family of Raphael, Alexander in Darius' tent by le Brun, and Mary Magdalen also by le Brun. Some of his portraits are excellent, especially his own. He died 1707, aged 66, at the hotel of the Gobelins.

EDEN, Sir Frederick Morton, a diplomatist and writer on political economy, was employed as ambassador, from 1792 to 1796, at the courts of Berlin, Madrid, and Vienna. He died in 1809. Of his statistical works the most important is, The State of the Poor; or, a History of the Laboring Classes in England, from the Conquest, three vols. quarto. The Globe Insurance Company was established by him.

EDEN, Charles, governor of North Carolina, arrived in the colony, May, 1714. During his administration, the noted pirate Theach, alias Blackbeard, surrendered himself with his companions to the government, in consequence of the king's proclamation of pardon. He, however, soon afterwards fitted out a sloop in North Carolina, recommenced his depredations, and was killed by a party detached from a British frigate in quest of him. From circumstances which afterwards transpired, it was believed that Eden and the secretary of the colony had been confederate with him. He died March 27, 1722, and the administration devolved on Thomas Pollock, president of the council.

EDEN, Sir Robert, the last royal governor of Maryland, succeeded Mr. Sharpe in 1768. He was a man of amiable manners, and at the commencement of the revolutionary controversy, was more disposed to moderation than any of the other British officers, and complied, though reluctantly, with the order of congress, to relinquish his government. After the restoration of peace, he returned from England to America for the recovery of his estates, to which he was entitled by the treaty of 1783, and died at Annapolis, September 2, 1784; at this time, he enjoyed a pension of 800*l.*, from the British government. He was a native of Durham, England, brother of Sir John Eden, and married lady Calvert, sister of Lord Baltimore.

EDES, Benjamin, a printer in Boston. He published the Boston Gazette and Country Journal, and during the controversy with Great Britain this paper was devoted to the cause of freedom, and had a wide circulation and great influence. By the depreciation of paper money Mr. Edes lost his property, and died in poverty 1803, aged 80 years.

EDGAR, succeeded on the throne of England after his brother Edwy 959, and deserved from his mildness the name of peaceable. He was a warlike prince, and obtained some important victories in Scotland and in Ireland, and also in Wales, where he exacted from the inhabitants a tribute of wolves' heads, which thus cleared the country from those rapacious animals. After the death of his queen Egelfida, he married the beautiful Elfrida, daughter of the earl of Devonshire, whom his favorite Ethelwolfe, overpowered with the love of her beauty, claimed for himself instead of demanding her for his master. Edgar died 975, aged 33.

EDGEWORTH, Richard, was born at Bath in 1744, and died at Edgeworth's town, June 13, 1817. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and next at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the temple. Instead, however, of studying the law, he applied the mathematical sciences, and became an excellent mechanic. In 1767, he invented the telegraph, which many years after he saw generally adopted. He also contrived several agricultural instruments, and wheel carriages, upon new principles. On going to France, he was employed in directing the works across the Rhine at Lyons. In 1780, he became a member of the Royal Society; and in 1785, he was named in the patent for establishing the Royal Irish Academy. He proved a great benefactor to that part of the country where he resided, by making railways, draining bogs, and introducing an improved system of agriculture. Some years before he died, he formed a spire for the church of Edgeworth's town, which was all constructed of frame-work on the ground, and then elevated by machinery to the tower, where it was fixed. Mr. Edgeworth published—1. Poetry explained. 2. Readings in Poetry. 3. Essays on Practical Education, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Professional Education. 5. Letter to lord Charlemont on the 'Telegraph. 6. Essay on the Construction of Roads; besides various tracts and papers in the Philosophical Transactions, the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, &c. He was married four times, and had several children, one of whom, Miss Maria Edgeworth, is well known by her excellent publications; and the continuation of her father's memoirs, from which this is extracted.

EDMONDES, sir Thomas, a statesman born in Devonshire about 1563, and introduced at court under the patronage of sir Francis Walsingham. He was employed by Elizabeth in some negotiations, but when her ambassador at Paris he was allowed only 20s. a day, so that he complains severely of his inability to support the dignity of a royal representative, and adds that "he has not the means wherewith to put a good garment on his back, to appear in honest company." He was sent in 1599 to Brussels, and was afterwards employed as one of the clerks of the privy council. He was knighted by James I., and engaged in affairs of trust and importance, and afterwards appointed to the offices of comptroller of the king's household, and privy counsellor, and in 1618, of treasurer of the household. In the two first parliaments of Charles I., he sat for Oxford, and some of his speeches are preserved. In 1629 he went as ambassador to the French court, and afterwards retired from office, and died in peaceful privacy 1639. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a negotiator, active as a courtier, upright, firm, and incorruptible, as attached to the privileges of his king and country. Some of his papers, which once consisted of 12 vols. folio, have been preserved, and some of his letters are published in Sawyer's three volumes of memorials of affairs of state 1725, and Dr. Birch's View of negotiations 1749, 8vo.

EDRIDGE, Henry, R. A., an artist, was born at Paddington, in 1768; studied under Pether; and, in 1786, obtained a medal from the Royal Academy. Miniatures in ivory were his first productions; he next drew his heads on paper in pencil and Indian ink; and, lastly, he adopted water colors. In all these varieties his works were excellent. In his latter days, he devoted much of his time to painting landscapes, which equalled his portraits. He died in 1821.

EDWARD, the elder, succeeded his father Alfred, as king of England 900. He defeated the Scotch and Welsh, and repressed the invasion of the Danes. He erected five bishoprics, and by founding the university of Cambridge, he extended his protection to learning. He died 925, and was succeeded by his illegitimate son Aldestan.

EDWARD, surnamed the confessor, son of Ethelred, succeeded his brother Hardeicnut 1041. He was a weak and impolitic prince, and suffered his kingdom to be governed by earl Godwin, whose daughter he had married. At his death, unable or unwilling to settle the succession about which he had consulted his friend William of Normandy, he left his kingdom a prey to ambitious factions. He died 5th January 1066, and after the short but unfortunate reign of Harold, he was succeeded the following October by William the conqueror.

EDWARD I. king of England, son and successor of Henry III. was born at Winchester. He was recalled from his expedition in Asia against the infidels to ascend the throne 1272, and he distinguished himself by the vigor and wisdom of his government. The Welsh were subdued, and to reconcile them to their change of master, the king created his own son prince of Wales. In 1286 he was appointed umpire between the rival competitors for the crown of Scotland, and he so artfully conducted himself, that he nearly made the whole kingdom subservient to his power. He died at Carlisle 5th July 1307, aged 68, as he was preparing to march against the Scots, who had revolted against him, and on his death-bed he recommended to his son the prosecution of the war. From the wisdom and equity of the laws which he established, Edward has been called the English Justinian, and to his fondness for war and his expensive levies, the people may be said to be indebted for their liberties, which were cemented by the weight and consequence given to their representatives first called to sanction and to support the measures and the taxes of government.

EDWARD II. son and successor of the preceding, ascended the throne 1307. He was devoid of that vigor and firmness requisite in the head of a turbulent kingdom, and his ill judged attachment to his worthless favorites Gaveston and the Spencers raised his barons in opposition to his measures and embittered the whole of his life. Not only his people but his own wife, rose up against him, and after the punishment of his favorites he was solemnly deposed by the nobles, and shut up in Berkeley castle, where soon after he was murdered in the most barbarous and insulting manner, 1327, aged 42.

EDWARD III. son of the preceding, ascended the throne on his father's death 1327. After a campaign in Scotland, where Baliol paid homage to him for his crown, he turned his arms against Philip king of France. His successes brought on the celebrated victory of Cressy 1346, in which 30,000 French fell, and after the capture of Calais, peace was re-established between the two countries. The succession of John on the French throne renewed the war, and in 1357 another dreadful battle was fought at Poitiers, by the black prince, who in the midst of the slaughter took the French monarch prisoner. The arms of Edward had also been successful against the Scotch, and their king David Bruce was taken prisoner, and thus England saw two captive monarchs in her capital. These brilliant actions were unfortunately obscured by the misfortunes of the latter end of the king's reign. The monarch abandoned the cares of government to his rapacious ministers, and lost himself in the grossest sensuality. He died 23d July 1377, aged 65, and was succeeded by his grandson Richard II. During his reign England was greatly improved by her connexion with the continent, and the arts and manufactures of the Flemish, were transplanted into the island, where the industry and the bold genius of the inhabitants have since cherished and improved them.

EDWARD IV. son of Richard duke of York, claimed the crown as descended from the second son of Edward III. in preference to the reigning monarch Henry VI. the descendant of a third son of Edward III. This rivalry, which filled the kingdom with blood, had already been disputed in six battles, in one of which Richard the duke of York fell, and in seven others it continued to engage the passions of contending armies, till Edward prevailed, and was crowned at Westminster 1461. His marriage with Elizabeth Woodville, disgusted greatly his friend Warwick, who received the surname of king-maker, and the dissatisfaction was so rooted, that another civil war was to decide the dispute. Warwick joining himself to the forces of the deposed Henry, defeated Edward's army at Banbury 1469, and soon after took him prisoner. Edward found means to escape, and Warwick, defeated in his turn, fled to France for new supplies, and soon returned to place Henry from a prison on the throne. In his turn, Edward became a fugitive, but unbroken by misfortunes, he collected forces on the continent, and on his return defeated his enemies, and slew Warwick in the field of battle, and in another fight in Tewksbury park so completely routed the forces of Margaret, the heroic queen of the cowardly Henry, that no further opposition was raised against him. Respectable as a warrior and as a negotiator, Edward became despicable as a monarch, and lost himself in effeminacy, and in the indulgence of the most sensual appetites. He died 9th April 1483, aged 41.

EDWARD V., a son of Edward IV. was only twelve years old on his father's death. The guardianship of his minority was intrusted to his uncle Gloucester, whose ambition prompted him to the commission of the foulest crimes. The young monarch with his brother the duke of York, were on pretence of greater safety, conducted to the tower, and soon after barbarously smothered 1483, and the cruel uncle ascended the vacant throne, under the name of Richard III. The bodies of these unfortunate princes were discovered in 1678, and conveyed to a decent burial in Westminster-abbey.

EDWARD VI. son of Henry VIII. by Jane Seymour, ascended the English throne at the age of 10, 1547. His character exhibited strong marks of benevolence, virtue, and humanity, but the goodness of his inclinations was often prevented by the intrigues or the malice of his ministers. He continued the work of the reformation begun by his father, and by the powerful co-operation of Crammer, nearly settled the religious establishment in the form in which it now exists. To avoid the errors of a popish reign he set aside by his will his two sisters Mary and Elizabeth, and settled the crown on his cousin the lady Jane Grey, but his benevolent wishes failed, and the bloody reign of Mary overturned for a while his excellent institutions. He died of a consumption 1553, aged 16. He showed himself a munificent patron of literature, by the foundation of several schools in the kingdom, and by the liberal endowment of Christchurch, Bridewell, and St. Thomas's hospital.

EDWARD, Prince of Wales, surnamed the black prince, from the color of his armor, was the eldest son of Edward III. He distinguished himself by his valor in the field of battle in the wars of France under his father, especially at Cressy, and afterwards he commanded the English forces on the victory of Poitiers, where he took John the king of France and one of his sons prisoners. Sensible of the deference due to royalty, he waited behind the chair of this illustrious prisoner on the evening of the battle, and when he conveyed him to London he entered the capital mounted on a small black horse, while the royal captive was borne by a beautiful white charger richly caparisoned. This warlike prince, who was the idol of the nation, died 1376, aged 46.

EDWARDS, John, D.D., a divine of the church of England, was born 26th February 1637, and educated at Cambridge. He took his master's degree 1661, and was soon after ordained, and then undertook the cure of Trinity church, Cambridge, where his sensible discourses and eloquent delivery procured him a large and admiring audience. He died 16th April 1716, aged 79. Though he had no collection of books, he drew much assistance from the libraries of the university, and in his writings, which are numerous, showed himself most indefatigable, well skilled in ecclesiastical history, and a subtle and able polemic. That he was occasionally unpopular among the clergy arose from his decided partiality for calvinistic principles, and his bias towards the abjured doctrines of the old puritans. Dr. Kippis has called him the Paul, the Augustine, the Bradwardine, the Calvin, of his age; but though he possessed merit in a very great degree, the commendation is perhaps immoderate. His writings are now little known.

EDWARDS, George, the father of ornithologists, was born at Stratford, Essex, third April 1694. He was brought up to trade, but the great powers of his genius began to be developed by the perusal of books on natural history, and antiquities, and at the expiration of his apprenticeship, he travelled abroad, and visited Holland, and two years after, Norway, where his researches were attended with the most unbounded friendship and hospitality from the natives. The first of his learned and valuable labors appeared in the history of birds, 4 vols. 4to. in the years 1743, 1747, 1750, and 1751; and in 1753, 1760, and 1764, three more 4to. vols. were added, called, "gleanings of natural history;" two most valuable works, containing engravings and descriptions of upwards of 600 subjects in natural history never before delineated. This worthy man died 23d July 1773, aged 81.

EDWARDS, Thomas, D.D., an eminent divine of the church of England, born at Coventry 10th August 1729. He early displayed his knowledge of the learned languages by the publication of a new English translation of the psalms from the original Hebrew, with notes, 8vo. 1755. In 1759 he published his useful work, "the doctrines of irresistible grace proved to have no foundation in the writings of the new testament;" and in 1752 he attacked Dr. Lowth's "metricæ Harianæ brevis confutatio;" and by thus supporting Hare's metrical system, he began a controversy, which was continued for some time, and after some pamphlets between the rival divines, ended at last in the general opinion of the superiority of Lowth's arguments. He died 30th June 1785, aged 56. Besides the above, Dr. Edwards published two dissertations, on bigotry, and on the interpretation of the new testament, and some very learned notes on some of the idyllia of Theocritus. As a teacher, Dr. Edwards was able and assiduous, and as a minister he was attentive, exemplary, and devout. The habits of a sedentary life, however, rendered him little fond of company, and though the correspondent of some learned men, he was the intimate friend of few, among whom bishop Law of Carlisle was the chief.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, president of the college in New Jersey, graduated at Yale college 1720. He was ordained a minister of Northampton 1727, and remained there till 1750, when he was dismissed. He was six years a missionary among the Indians. In 1758 he accepted the office of president of the college in New Jersey. He was inducted into office in Jan. and died the March following, aged 54. His publications were very numerous: the following is a catalogue of them,—a sermon preached at Boston, 1731; a sermon preached at Northampton, 1734; a narrative of the work of God in the conversion of many hundreds of souls in Northampton, 1736; five discourses on justification by faith alone, pressing into the kingdom of God, Ruth's resolution, the justice of God in the damnation of sinners, and the excellency of Jesus Christ, 1738; sinners in the hands of an angry God, a sermon preached at Enfield, 1741; a sermon on the distinguishing marks of a work of the spirit of God, 1741; thoughts on the revival of religion, 1742; a sermon at the ordination of R. Abercrombie, 1744; at the installation of S. Buell, 1746; a treatise on religious affections, 1746; an attempt to promote agreement in prayer for the revival of religion, 1746; life of D. Brainerd, 1749; an inquiry into the qualifications for full communion in the church, 1749; a reply to S. Williams' answer to the enquiry, 1752, a sermon preached at Newark, 1752; an inquiry into the modern prevailing notions of that freedom of will, which is supposed to be essential to moral agency, 1754; the great doctrine of original sin defended, 1753. Since his death the following works have been published from his manuscripts; eighteen sermons, with his life written by Dr. Hopkins, 1763; the history of redemption, 1774; on the nature of true virtue, 1788; God's last end in the creation; thirty-three sermons; twenty sermons, 1789; miscellaneous observations, 1793; miscellaneous remarks, 1796.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, D.D., president of Union college at Schenectady, graduated at the college in New Jersey 1765. He was ordained pastor of the church at White Haven in the town of New Haven, Jan. 5, 1769, and continued there till May, 1795, when he was dismissed. In Jan. 1796 he was installed pastor of the church at Colebrook in Litchfield county. In this retired situation, where he was enabled to pursue his theological studies with little interruption, he hoped to spend the remainder of his days. But in June 1799 he was elected president of the college, which had been recently established at Schenectady. In July he commenced the duties of the office. He died 1801, aged 56. He published a work entitled the salvation of all men strictly examined, in answer to Dr. Chauncey's dissertation on liberty and necessity; observations on the language of the Mohicanewor Stockbridge Indians, communicated to the Connecticut society of arts and sciences, and republished in Mass. hist. collections, with notes by J. Pickering; brief observations on the doctrine of universal salvation; numerous sermons, and a number of excellent pieces with the signature of I and O, in the New York theological magazine. He also edited, from the manuscripts of his father the history of the work of redemption, two volumes of sermons, and two volumes of observations on important theological subjects.

EDWARDS, Morgan, a baptist minister, was born in Wales in 1722, and began to preach in his 16th year. He came to America in May 1761 and became the pastor of a church in Philadelphia. He removed in 1772 to a plantation in Newark, Newcastle county. Being opposed to the revolution, he ceased preaching during the war. Afterwards he read lectures in different parts of the country. He had been intemperate: it was his own opinion, that a minister should not preach again after such a fall. He died 1795, aged 72. He once persuaded himself, about the year 1770, that he should die on a particular day and preached his own funeral sermon; but he lived a quarter of a century afterwards. He published a farewell discourse, 1761; at the ordination of S. Jones; customs of primitive churches; on new year 1770; materials towards a history of baptists of Penns. and N. Jersey 2 vols. 12mo. 1792; on the millenium; on the new heaven and new earth; res sacra, a translation. He left many volumes of sermons, and 12 volumes of manuscripts on various subjects.

EDWARDS, Bryan, a historian, was born in 1643, at Westbury in Wiltshire. He was brought up by his maternal uncle, a planter in Jamaica, to whose property he succeeded, as he also did to that of Mr. Hume, another merchant of the same island. In 1796, he was elected into Parliament for Gram pound, which place he represented till his death, July 15th, 1800. His works are—1. Thoughts on the trade of the West India Islands, 8vo. 2. A speech on the Slave trade. 3. History of the British Colonies in the West Indies, 2 vols. 4to. and 3 vols. 8vo. 4. The Proceedings of the governor and assembly of Jamaica in regard to the Maroon Negroes, 8vo.

EDWARDS, Edward, an artist, was born in London in 1738. He was brought up to his father's business of a chair-maker and carver; but quitted it for drawing, in which he acquired skill enough to become a teacher, and by that means he supported his mother when a widow, and also his brother and sister. He obtained two premiums from the society of arts for historical pictures, and in 1773, became an associate of the royal academy. After this he visited Italy, and on his return was employed by several gentlemen, particularly Horace Walpole, and Mr. Hamilton of Bath. In 1788, he was appointed teacher of perspective in the Royal Academy. He died in 1806. Mr. Edwards published a "Treatise on Perspective," 4to. And after his death were printed his "Anecdotes of Painters," 4to. with his own life prefixed.

EDWY, succeeded his uncle Edred as king of England 955, and married Elgiva, who was related to him within the prohibited degrees. This circumstance proved his ruin, and that of his queen, who was seized by Odo, the archbishop, and after being branded with a hot iron in the face, to destroy her beautiful features, was banished to Ireland, where she expired by a most cruel and violent death.

The king was also excommunicated, and died in exile 959.

ECKHOUDT, Gerbrant Van den, a painter, born at Amsterdam, 19th of August 1721. He studied the manner of his master Rembrandt with such success that his pictures drew equal applause, and possessed equal merit. He preferred historical subjects to portraits, and excelled chiefly in the representation of the feelings of the soul in the features of the countenance. His best pieces are—a Jesus among the doctors,—the infant Jesus in the arms of Simeon,—Abraham dismissing Hagar and Ishmael,—the continence of Scipio,—and a woman looking for the fleas of her dog. He died 22d July 1774, a bachelor.

ECKHOUTE, Anthony Vanden, a painter, born at Bruges. He travelled into Italy with his brother-in-law Deyster, and while he executed the flowers and the fruits, his companion completed the figures of the several pictures which were thus conjointly produced. After his return home, Eckhoute purchased an honorable post under the bishop of Bruges; but, to the astonishment of all, he suddenly abandoned his country, where he was loved and patronised, and embarked for Italy. In his way he was carried by a storm to Lisbon, where his works soon recommended him to general notice; and after the residence of two years he married a lady of quality, and of opulent fortune. His rivals, however, viewed his success with jealousy, and as he was riding out in his coach, he was shot with a ball and instantly expired, 1695. The causes of this melancholy catastrophe are unknown.

EGBERT, last king of the Saxon heptarchy, and first king of England, was proclaimed monarch of Wessex 800, and of all England in 823. He died 10 years after, distinguished for valor and success against his Danish invaders.

EGEDE, John, a Dane, who went as missionary to Greenland 1721, where he resided 15 years. His description of Greenland appeared 1729, and he died 1753. His son Paul assisted him in his endeavors to convert the Greenlanders, and was appointed bishop of the country, and died 1739, aged 81. He republished his father's history, besides a journal about the occurrences of Greenland.

EGERTON, John, L.L.D. a learned prelate, born 30th November 1721, in London, and educated at Oxford. He was son of the bishop of Hereford, and descended from the earl of Bridgewater's family. On taking orders he was presented by his father to the living of Ross, afterwards made archdeacon of Hereford, and the year after prebendary of Hereford. In 1749 he became chaplain to the king, and in 1750 was made dean of Hereford. In 1756 he was consecrated bishop of Bangor. In 1763 he was translated to Lichfield, and in 1771 to the see of Durham. These high and rapid preferments were not undeserved. The bishop possessed among his many virtues the manners of conciliation and humility, and by a temperate condescending conduct he restored peace and good will among the political contending factions which unhappily divided his county when he succeeded to Durham. By hospitality and affability he recommended himself to his clergy, and by his anxious concern for the general improvement of agriculture and the encouragement of useful projects through the diocese, he rendered himself deservedly popular, and greatly beloved. The respectability of the pastor, and the comforts of the poor were always nearest his heart, therefore his patronage was extended only to the virtuous and good, and his charity tended to encourage humble poverty in honest pursuits and in industrious diligence. This very virtuous and venerable prelate, after a life usefully spent in distributing liberally and judiciously the many favors which Providence had placed at his command, died 18th January 1787.

EGMONT, Lamoral count, one of the lords of the Low Countries, born in Holland 1522. He distinguished himself in the service of Charles V. in Africa, and also under Philip II. at the battles of St. Quintin and Gravelines, where he was general of horse. Though attached to his sovereign, he seemed unwilling to assist in the enslaving of his country, and therefore being suspected by the duke of Alva of favoring the cause of the prince of Orange, and moreover hated by the tyrant for his superior abilities, he was beheaded by the governor's order at Brussels, 5th June 1568, together with Philip de Montmorency count Horn. On this dreadful occasion the French ambassador wrote to his court that he had seen that head fall which had twice made France to tremble.

EGNATIUS, John Baptist, a learned man, born at Venice 1473. He was pupil to the famous Politian, and like him he contributed by the force and excellence of his instructions to the revival of learning. When grown old, the republic paid him the highest honors for his eminent services in education, and for his virtues, and decreed that his stipend should be continued as public teacher, and that he should be exempted from all taxes. The works which he published are numerous, but they do not exhibit any marks of superior excellence, as the abilities of the author consisted chiefly in an astonishing retentive memory, in a striking ready elocution, and in a convincing mode of conveying instruction. This respectable man died at Venice 1553. His works are orations,—epistles,—a poetical panegyric on Francis I. of France,—de Romanis principibus vel Cæsaribus,—de exemplis vivorum illustrium, and on the origin of the Turks.

EICHHORN, John George, a celebrated German divine and biblical critic, born in the principality of Hohenzollern Oehringen. He applied himself with great success to the study of Oriental literature, and became professor at Jena, where he published his "History of the commerce of India before Mohammed," 1775. In 1788 he removed to the university of Gottingen, and after having been one of the greatest ornaments of that establishment, he died June 25, 1827. Eichhorn was highly distinguished not only as an Orientalist and a divine, but also as a biographer and historian. Among his principal works are "History of Literature from the Earliest to the Latest Times," 11 vols.—a "General History of Cultivation and Literature in Europe," 2 vols.—"History of Eloquence in the Modern Languages," 3 vols.—"History of the Last Three Centuries," 6 vols.—"General Library of Biblical Literature," 10 vols.—"Repertory of Biblical and Oriental Literature," 18 vols.—"Introduction to the Old Testament," 5 vols.—"Translation of the Hebrew Prophets," 3 vols.—He was also editor of the "Goettingen Anzeigen."

EKINS, Jeffery, D.D., an English divine, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He held successively the rectories of Quainton, Sedgefield, Morpeth, and Durham, and was made dean of Carlisle. He published a translation of Apollonius Rhodius' loves of Jason and Medea, 3 vols. 4to. 1771, and died 1791.

ELBEE, N. d^s, a native of Poitou, for some time engaged in the service of Saxony. During the revolution he espoused the cause of his suffering countrymen in la Vendée, and put himself at the head of the royalists there, 1793, and, by the most masterly manœuvres, the greatest intrepidity, and the most consummate prudence, he succeeded in defeating all the republican forces sent for his destruction. After the victories of Grollean, Thonars, Saumur, Chatenay, and Clissot, he was unfortunately defeated at the battle of Chollet, and retired to Noirmontiers, where he was taken, and condemned to be shot. This extraordinary man, the bravest and the most formidable of the royalists of la Vendée, was then aged 42.

ELBERT, Samuel, major general and governor of Georgia. He was a soldier of the American revolutionary army. He entered the army in 1776 as lieutenant colonel. In 1778 he was engaged in the expedition against East Florida; and conducted with gallantry in command of a brigade in the action at Brier creek, March 2, 1799, in which he was taken prisoner. In 1785 he was governor of Georgia. He died 1788, aged 45.

ELBŒUF, René de Lorraine, marquis d', seventh son of Claude duke of Guise, died 1566. His grandson Charles married Catherine, the daughter of Henry IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrées, and died 1657. These great and illustrious characters were concerned in the intrigues and tumults of the French court under Richelieu and Mazarin. The last male descendant of this noble house was Emmanuel Maurice, duc d'Elbœuf, who died in France 1763, aged 86. He is particularly known as the discoverer of Herculaneum. As he had served the emperor in Naples, he settled there, at Portici, and being offered pieces of ancient marbles, to ornament his villa, by a peasant, who found them in digging a well, he purchased the ground, and by carefully making excavations Herculaneum was discovered.

ELIAS LEVITA, a celebrated Jewish rabbi, a native of Germany, was born at Neustadt, in Brandenburg, in 1472, and died at Venice, in 1549. For many years he was professor of Hebrew at Venice and Padua. Among his works, which are highly valuable, are, A Chaldaic, Talmudic, and Rabbinic Lexicon; A Hebrew Glossary; and a Commentary on the Grammar of Moses Kimchi.

ELIO, Francis Xavier, a Spanish general, who defended with courage the independence of his country against Napoleon, and at the restoration of Ferdinand VII. he was appointed governor of Valencia, in which station his devotion to the interests of the king procured him new favors from the court. On the revolution in 1820, part of the population of Valencia rose in opposition to the governor, who escaped from their fury in the first instance, but being taken prisoner, was tried by a military commission, declared guilty of tyrannical and arbitrary acts, and condemned to be strangled, which death he accordingly suffered. Ferdinand, on recovering his authority in 1823, reversed the proceedings against general Elio, and granted a pension to his widow and children.

ELIOT, John, minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, usually called the apostle of the Indians, was a native of England. In 1631, he came to America and arriving at Boston harbor November 3d, immediately joined the church in that town, and preached to them, as Mr. Wilson their minister was then in England. Here he was earnestly requested to remain; but he was settled as teacher of the church in Roxbury, Nov. 5, 1632. His benevolent labors were not confined to his own people. Having imbibed the true spirit of the gospel, his heart was touched with the wretched condition of the Indians, and he became eagerly desirous of making them acquainted with the glad tidings of salvation.

For this purpose he learned their barbarous dialect, and was enabled to address an assembly of Indians in their own language in 1646. He was violently opposed by the sachems, and pawaws or priests; when he was alone with them in the wilderness, they threatened him with every evil, if he did not desist from his labors, but he was a man not to be shaken in his purpose by the fear of danger. He said to them, "I am about the work of the great God, and my God is with me; so that I neither fear you, nor all the sachems in the country: I will go on; do you touch me, if you dare." The fatigue and dangers he encountered may be imagined from the following extract from one of his letters. "I have not been dry, night or day, from the third day of the week unto the sixth; but so travelled, and at night pull off my boots and wring my stockings, and on with them again, and so continue. But God steps in and helps. I have considered the word of God, endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." He made a missionary tour every fortnight, planted a number of churches, and visited all the Indians in Massachusetts and Plymouth colonies, pursuing his way as far as Cape Cod. In 1651, an Indian town was built on a pleasant spot on Charles' river called Natick, and the first Indian church established there. Other Indian churches were planted in various parts of Massachusetts, and he frequently visited them, but his pastoral care was more particularly over that which he first established. He died 1690, aged 86. Mr. Eliot had deep rooted prejudices against wigs and tobacco, and preached against both; but it is said that in contempt of all his admonitions, the hairless head would be adorned with curls of foreign growth, and the pipe would send up volumes of smoke. So remarkable was he for his charities, that the parish treasurer, when he once paid him the money due for his salary, tied the ends of a handkerchief into which he put it, in as many hard knots as he could, to prevent him from giving away the money before he should reach home. The good man immediately went to the house of a sick and necessitous family, and told them, that God had sent them some relief. Being welcomed by the sufferers with tears of gratitude, he began to untie the knots. After many fruitless efforts, and impatient of the perplexity and delay, he gave the handkerchief and all the money to the mother of the family, saying, "Here, my dear, take it; I believe the Lord designs it all for you." Mr. Eliot published several letters in a work, entitled, the glorious progress of the gospel among the Indians, 1649; tears of repentance, in conjunction with Mr. Mayhew, 1653; a late and further manifestation of the progress of the gospel among the Indians, 1658; and of the gospel among the Indians 1659; a brief narrative of the progress of the gospel 1670. A work of his, entitled the Christian commonwealth, was published in England about the year 1660. When it was received in Massachusetts, the governor and council, viewing it as full of seditious principles against all established governments, especially against the monarchy of their native country, required Mr. Eliot to make a recantation, which he accordingly did, acknowledging that government by kings, lords, and commons was not anti-christian. The book was not pressed. In 1661, he published his translation of the New Testament into the Indian tongue, and in 1663, his immense work the translation of the whole bible. As a specimen of the incredible labor he must have gone through, and at the same time the utter uselessness of it, we will give one word—"Wutapessstukqusunnoohwehtunkquoh,—kneeling down to him." Mr. Eliot also published the Jews in America, 1660, intended to prove the Indians were descendants of the Jews; an Indian grammar, 1666; the logic primer for the use of Indians 1672; the psalms translated into Indian metre, and a catechism, annexed to the edition of the New Testament in 1680; a translation of the practice of piety, of Baxter's call to the unconverted, and of several of Shepard's works; the harmony of the gospels in English 1678; the divine management of gospel churches by the ordinance of councils, designed for the reconciliation of the presbyterians and congregationalists. Nine of his letters to sir Robert Boyle are in the third, and his account of Indian churches in the tenth volume of the historical collections. In 1639, he assisted in making a new version of the psalms.

ELIOT, Jared, minister of Killingworth, Connecticut, graduated at Yale college 1706. Ordained 1709, and died 1763, aged 78. He was a botanist and a scientific and practical agriculturist. The white mulberry tree was introduced by him into Connecticut. He discovered a process of extracting iron from black sand. He was the first physician of his day in the colony. Such was his fame for the treatment of chronic complaints, that he was sometimes called to Boston and Newport, and was more extensively consulted than any physician in New England. Maniacs were managed by him with great skill. In the multitude of his pursuits his judgment seemed to be unfailling. His farms in different parts of the country were well managed. Living on the main road from Boston to New-York he was visited by many gentlemen of distinction. Dr. Franklin always called on him, when journeying to his native town. For forty years he never omitted preaching on the Lord's day. He published agricultural essays, several editions; religion supported by reason and revelation, 1735; election sermon 1738; sermon on the taking of Louisbourg, 1745.

ELIOT, Andrew, D.D., minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard college, 1737. He was ordained pastor of the new church in Boston as colleague with Mr. Webb, 1742. He died 1773, aged 59. When the British took possession of Boston, he sent his family out of the town with the intention of following them; but a number of the people belonging to his society and to other societies, being obliged to remain, requested him not to leave them. He complied with their request, and was eminently useful. He was a friend to the freedom, peace, and independence of America. He was a friend of literature and science, and rendered important services to Harvard college, and once had the offer of the presidency. He published a number of occasional sermons, and in 1774, a volume of twenty sermons, 8vo.

ELIOT, Samuel, a merchant of Boston, and a benefactor of Harvard college. He died 1818 aged 81. Some time before his death he presented to Harvard college twenty thousand dollars to found a professorship of Greek literature.

ELIOT, John, D.D., minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1772. After preaching a few years in different places, he was ordained as the successor of his father, (Dr. A. Eliot,) in 1779, pastor of the New North church in Boston. He died 1813, aged 58. As one of the ministers of Boston he was a member of the board of overseers, and for nine years one of the corporation of Harvard college. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts historical society, to the publications of which he contributed many writings. In 1809, he published a New England biographical dictionary, 8vo. In addition to his contributions to the historical collections, he published a number of sermons.

ELIOT, George Augustus, Lord Heathfield, the son of a Roxburghshire baronet, was born about 1717, and received his education at Leyden. He first bore arms in the Prussian service; but returned to Scotland in 1735, and, in the following year entered the engineer corps, from which he removed into the horse grenadiers. He distinguished himself at Dettingen, and during the seven years' war in Germany. His laurels, however, were chiefly gained at Gibraltar, of which fortress he was appointed governor in 1775, and which he defended with consummate constancy and talent. The title of Lord Heathfield and the order of the Bath were bestowed on him as a reward. He died in 1790.

ELIOTT, Richard, an English divine, born at Kingsbridge, Devon, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge, where he proceeded A.B. and took orders. He was expelled from St. George's chapel, Hyde-park, for printing a sermon on salvation by faith without works, and afterwards became minister of a dissenting congregation, Glass-house yard, Aldersgate street. He died suddenly in his pulpit 1789. He published some controversial tracts and sermons, and defended himself against the attack of Dr. Dodd, about his discourse on faith.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by Ann Boleyn, was born seventh September 1533. She lived in privacy and retirement, but on Mary's accession she was imprisoned and nearly sacrificed to the queen's bigotry by the influence of bishop Gardiner, who represented her as the future prop of protestantism. Philip, however, interceded for her, as he already marked her for his second wife on Mary's decease. She was drawn from prison to sit on the throne 1553, and thus educated in the school of adversity, she came to govern a gallant and rising nation, and by her wisdom and energy to fix their destinies on the most glorious basis. Prudent and discerning in all her measures, she proceeded with caution in her determination to establish the protestant religion, she treated the catholic party with tenderness, and professed a great willingness to be on amicable terms even with pope Paul IV. She was fortunate in the choice of her ministers, but though she could depend on Cecil and on Walsingham, she yet loved business, and regarded the prosperity and happiness of the nation as her immediate care. It is unnecessary here to mention the glorious events which marked her reign. The most indelible blot, however, on her character, is her treatment of the unfortunate Mary, whom, as her rival in beauty, and as her presumptive heir she hated. Instead of pitying her misfortunes indeed, she deceived her; and instead of granting her liberty, or replacing her on her throne, she ignominiously led her to a scaffold, and then meanly pretended to blame the horrible proceedings as the act of her ministers. After an illustrious reign of 44 years four months and six days, and after seeing her people grown powerful in arms, successful in extending navigation and commerce, and distinguished in science and literature, this great princess died twenty-fourth March 1603, aged 70. Never, says a Jesuit, did a crowned head better understand the art of government, and commit fewer errors in it, during a long reign. Her aim was to reign, to govern, to be mistress, to keep her people in subjection. She was not a warlike princess, but she knew so well how to train up warriors that England had not for a long time seen a greater number of them, nor more experienced.

ELIZABETH, of Austria, daughter of Maximilian II. was married to Charles IX. of France, 26th November 1570, at Mezieres. The dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew overwhelmed her with grief, but as she never meddled in the public affairs of the kingdom, she avoided the dangers of politics and retained the affections of her capricious husband, who on his death-bed tenderly recommended her and her daughter to the kindness of Henry IV. king of Navarre his successor. Thus respected and beloved in France as a most virtuous wife and most benevolent queen, she retired to Vienna after her husband's death, and though her sister-in-law, Margaret of Navarre, was different from her in temper and character, yet she honored her with her friendship, and sent her two books she had written with her own hand, one on the word of God, and the other on the remarkable events that had occurred during her residence in France. She died at Vienna in a convent which she herself had founded, 1592, aged 33, deservedly beloved and sincerely lamented.

ELIZABETH, Petrovna, daughter of Peter the Great, was born 1709. Her rank and personal attractions made her an object of admiration among her neighbors, and among her suitors are mentioned Lewis XV. of France, Charles Augustus bishop of Lubec, Charles Margrave of Anspach, Kouli Khan, and Lewis of Brunswick, but she rejected all. She ascended the throne of Russia in 1741, and received the appellation of humane, because she made a vow that no capital punishment should be inflicted during her reign. Severities however were practised, the public prisons were filled with wretches who frequently expired under tortures, and Elizabeth herself gave a strong example of cruelty, in condemning two ladies of her court, women of beauty and rank, the countess Bestuchef and Lapookin, to receive 50 strokes of the knout, in the open square of Petersburg, to have their tongues cut out, and to be banished to Siberia for divulging the secret amors of the empress. She died 25th December 1761, in the 21st year of her reign and 52d of her age.

ELLER DE BROOKHUSEN, John Theodore, physician to the king of Prussia, was born at Pletzkau in Anhalt-Bernburg, and died at Berlin 1760, aged 71. He was a man of great learning and of extensive experience in his profession. He wrote a Latin treatise on the knowledge and treatment of diseases, translated by Le Roy into French.

ELLERY, William, a member of the congress of 1776, graduated at Harvard college 1747. He was educated to the law, of the congress of 1776 he was an active and influential member. His name was affixed to the declaration of independence. On his retiring from congress in 1786, he was appointed commissioner of loans; he was also elected chief justice of Rhode Island. When the new government was organized, Washington appointed him in 1789 collector of Newport; an office, which he held, till his death in 1820, aged 82.

ELLCOTT, Andrew, professor of mathematics at West Point, was a native of Penns. and was employed in surveying and planning the city of Washington. He was also employed in ascertaining the boundary between the United States and Spain, which labor he commenced in 1796. He died 1820, aged 67. He published a journal, with a map of Ohio, and Mississippi, and a part of Florida, 1806; astronomical and other papers in the transactions of A. P. society.

ELLIOTT, Stephen, LL.D. a botanist and man of letters, was born at Beaufort, South Carolina, in 1771, and received his education at Yale College. On his return home he applied himself to the improvement of his paternal estate, devoting his leisure hours to history and poetry. At the age of 22 he was chosen to the legislature of his native state, where he obtained considerable influence, by his knowledge, attention, and power of argument. He was chosen president of the state bank, established in 1812, and continued to discharge the duties of this office with ability to the time of his death. His two volumes of the botany of South Carolina are held in high estimation, and his lectures before several literary and learned societies obtained great applause. His acquisitions in literature and science were extensive, and he left a valuable collection in the several branches of natural history scientifically arranged. He was the chief editor of the Southern Review, and the author of some of its best articles. He died in 1830. Most of his productions remain in manuscript.

ELLIS, John, a native of London, born in 1698, was by profession a money scrivener, and died in 1792, having possessed his faculties to the last. Johnson, who was his frequent guest, said, "The most literary conversation I ever enjoyed was at the table of Jack Ellis." Ellis wrote some fugitive poems: translated the Surprise, or Gentleman Apothecary; and burlesqued Maphæus's additional book to the Æneid. He also made a version, which was never published, of Ovid's Epistles.

ELLIS, William, an agriculturist, was born towards the close of the seventeenth century, and died after the middle of the eighteenth. He was a farmer at Great Gaddesden, Herts, and enjoyed considerable reputation in his time as an agricultural writer, and an inventor and maker of farming instruments. His principal work is, The Modern Husbandman, in eight volumes.

ELLIS, John, a naturalist, was born in London in 1710, and died in 1776. He held the office of agent for Florida and Dominica, and was a member of the Royal Society, to the Transactions of which body he communicated many papers. He is the author of various works, the chief of which are, An Essay towards a Natural History of British Corallines; and a Natural History of uncommon Zoophytes. Ellis was one of the first writers who established the animal nature of corallines.

ELLIS, George, a miscellaneous writer, was born in London, and educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was one of the writers of the Rolliad, a satirical publication, intended to annoy the administration of Mr. Pitt; but afterwards he became much attached to that statesman, and was appointed secretary to Lord Malmesbury when he went on the embassy to Lisle. Mr. Ellis was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and died at the age of 70, in 1815. His works are 1. Specimens of the early English poets, 3 vols. 8vo.—2. Preface, Notes, and Appendix to a translation of Le Grand's Fables, 2 vols. 8vo.—3. Specimens of English metrical Romances, 3 vols. 8vo.

ELLIS, Henry, F.R.S. governor of Georgia, was appointed 1757. He succeeded Reynolds, and continued governor until 1760. In 1761 he was appointed governor of Nova Scotia, where he was succeeded by Wilmot in 1764. He was a lawyer, educated at the temple, and became celebrated as a traveller, and as a man of genius and learning. He spent the close of his life in Europe, and died at a very advanced age.

ELLIS, Caleb, judge of the supreme court of New Hampshire, was born at Walpole, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1793; when admitted to the bar, he settled at Claremont, N. H. The talents and integrity which he displayed in his profession, the gentleness of his manners, and the purity of his life, rendered him peculiarly an object of the public esteem and confidence. In 1804 he was elected a representative in congress. He was afterwards a member of the council, and in 1811 elected a member of the senate of the state. In 1812 he was one of the electors of president and vice-president. In 1813 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and continued in that office until his death, May 9th, 1816, aged 49. He was a man of piety, and exhibited his regard for religion by the bequest of five thousand dollars for the support of the ministry in the town where he resided.

ELLSWORTH, Oliver, L.D., chief justice of the United States, graduated at the college in New Jersey, 1766. He studied law, and soon became eminent in the practice. In 1777 he was chosen a delegate in congress from Connecticut. In 1780 he was elected into the council of Connecticut, and was a member of that body till 1784, when he was appointed a judge of the superior court. In 1787 he was elected a member of the convention, which framed the federal constitution. In an assembly illustrious for talents, erudition and patriotism, he held a distinguished place. His exertions essentially aided in the production of an instrument, which has been the main pillar of American prosperity and glory. He was afterwards a member of the state convention of Connecticut, and contributed his efforts towards procuring the ratification of the constitution by that state. When the federal government was organized in 1789 he was a member of the senate from Connecticut. In 1796 he was appointed by Washington chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, and on account of ill health resigned the office in 1800. In 1799 he was appointed by president Adams envoy extraordinary to France for the purpose of settling a treaty with that nation. He died 1807, aged 65.

ELLYS, Anthony, D.D., an English prelate, born in 1693, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. In 1724 he was vicar of St. Olave's Jewry, rector of St. Martin's Ironmonger's lane, and the next year prebendary of Gloucester. In 1752 he was made bishop of St. David's, and died at Gloucester 1761. Besides three occasional sermons, he published, in 1736, a plea for the sacramental test, remarks on Hume's essay on miracles; and left unpublished tracts on the liberty, spiritual and temporal, of protestants in England, the first part of which was printed 1763, the second in 1765. These works prove the author to have been a man possessed of learning, of candor, of benevolence, and every christian virtue.

ELMANICUS, George, an Egyptian, of the 13th century, author of a Saracen history, from Mohammed to the year 1118. He professed himself to be a christian, and held places of honor under the caliphs; but the favorable manner in which he speaks of the mussulmans, of Mohammed, and of his religion, suggests a suspicion that he had little of the christian besides the name. This history has been translated from the Saracen into Latin by Erpenius and completed by Golius, Leyden, 1625, folio, and into French by Vattier, Paris, 1657; but both translations are very incorrect.

ELMSLEY, Peter, D.D., an eminent Scotch scholar and physiologist. He was born in 1773, and died in 1825. In 1802 he became one of the contributors to the Edinburgh Review. At a subsequent period he also wrote occasionally in the Quarterly Review. In pursuit of his philological studies he visited most of the principal libraries on the continent of Europe, and spent the whole of the winter of 1818 in the Laurentian one at Florence. On his return to his native country he became Camden professor of ancient history in the university of Oxford.

ELPHINSTON, James, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Edinburgh in 1721, being the son of an episcopal clergyman of that city. He was educated at the High School and university of Edinburgh; on leaving which he became tutor to lord Blantyre. In 1750 he superintended an edition of the Rambler, printed at Edinburgh, with translations of the mottos. The year following he settled near London and kept an academy till about 1778; after which he delivered a course of lectures on the English language at Edinburgh and Glasgow. He died Oct. 8, 1809. He was a man of learning, but rendered himself ridiculous by endeavoring to introduce a new mode of spelling. He translated Martial into English, and published "Propriety ascertained in her picture," 2 vols. 4to. which was followed by English Orthography epitomized," and "Propriety's Pocket Dictionary." In 1794 came out a selection of his correspondence, in 6 vols. 8vo; but his best work is a grammar for the use of schools, 2 vols. 12 mo.

ELPHINSTONE, William, a Scotch divine, born in the county of Stirling 1432, and educated at St. Salvador's, St. Andrew's, and at Paris, where he studied the law. On his return home he took orders, and became arch-deacon of St. Andrew's, provost of St. Giles, Edinburgh, and bishop of Aberdeen. In 1483, he went as ambassador to France, and in 1489, to Henry VII. of England; and in 1495, he was made chancellor of Scotland. The death of king James, at the battle of Floddenfield, 1513, so overpowered his spirits that he died soon after, aged 81.

ELSNER, James, a Prussian, professor of theology and oriental languages at Lingen, and afterwards master of Joachim's school, Berlin. In 1730, he became pastor of one of the Berlin churches, and was made member of the academy of sciences, and confessor of the royal consistory. He wrote observations sacre in novi testam. libros Utrae. 1720, 1723,—explanation of the epistle to the Philippians—state of the Greek church in Turkey, 8vo. 1737. He died 1750, aged fifty-eight.

ELSTOB, William, a learned divine and Saxon linguist, born at Newcastle 1673, and educated at Eton and Catharine-hall, Cambridge. He afterwards removed to Queen's college, Oxford, and thence was chosen fellow of the University, where he was tutor. In 1702 he became rector of Saint Swithin and St. Mary Bothaw, London, where he died, twelve years after. He published Lupus' Saxon history translated into Latin, and also Ascham's Latin letters, and wrote an essay on the great affinity and mutual agreement of the two professions, law and divinity. He was engaged also in the laborious edition of the Saxon laws, with notes, which he did not live to complete, and which was finished by Dr. Wilkins, 1721.

ELSTOB, Elizabeth, sister of the preceding, born in 1683, was well-skilled in the Saxon language. She retired, after her brother's death, to Evesham, Worcestershire, where she kept a small school. By lord Oxford's interference, she obtained from queen Caroline an annuity of 21l. but after the death of her majesty she was again reduced to poverty, and though skilled in 8 languages, she was obliged to become a governess. She was then engaged in the duchess of Portland's family, where she continued seventeen years, and died at Bulstrode 30th May 1756. She gave an English translation to the homily, which her brother published from the Saxon 1709. In 1715, she published a Saxon grammar, and, as Rowe Mores observes, "she was the indefessa comes of her brother's studies, a female student of the university, upon a genteel fortune, but pursuing too much the drug called learning."

ELZEVIR. The name of a celebrated family of printers, who resided at Amsterdam and Leyden. Louis, the first of them, exercised his profession from 1592, to 1617, and took for his device an eagle holding seven arrows, with the motto, Concordia res parve crescent. This he afterwards exchanged for that of a man standing, with the motto, Non solus; and this was adopted by his successors. His descendants continued in the profession till the end of the seventeenth century. Their editions are numerous, and highly valued.

EMANUEL, succeeded John II. as king of Portugal 1495, and distinguished himself by the liberal manner in which he patronised commercial adventures among his subjects. Their ancient privileges were restored to the nobility; and, by the persevering boldness of the Portuguese, the way to India by the Cape was discovered by Gama; Brazil was visited in 1501, by Cabral, and a regular intercourse was established with the kingdom of Congo and the other states on the African coast. This popular monarch, deservedly called the great, died 1521, aged fifty-three.

EMERSON, William, an eminent English mathematician, born, 14th May, 1701. His mind had been well cultivated. He was not only a general scholar, but well skilled in classical learning, and knew something of physic. With a noble independence of mind, his manners, as well as his dress and conversation, were singular and eccentric. When he had any thing for the press, he walked to London, and corrected every sheet himself. He was very fond of fishing, and generally stood up to his middle in the water while engaged in it. He expired 26th May 1782, aged near 81. His publications were sixteen in number, and all on mathematics, fluxions, algebra, optics, navigation, and mechanics. They are considered as very learned and accurate, as he never advanced a proposition before he had first tried it in practice.

EMERSON, William, minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard college in 1789. He was ordained minister of Harvard in 1792, and in 1799 he was installed the pastor of the first church in Boston. In 1804 he was one of the conductors of a literary journal called the monthly Anthology. He died 1811, aged 42. He published a number of sermons, and a history of the first church in Boston, 8vo.

EMLYN, Thomas, a learned English divine. He was born 27th May 1663, and educated by his parents for the ministry among the dissenters. After being at a private school, he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where however he staid little time, and removed to Doolittle's academy, near London. Though he occasionally officiated, he acquired no permanent settlement till May 1689, when, on the invitation of Sir Robert Rich, one of the lords of the admiralty, he undertook the care of a dissenting congregation at Leostoff. Here he continued about a year and a half, and applied himself to the examination of the then warmly disputed trinitarian controversy. The flight of James II. from Ireland allowed the dissenters to re-establish their regular congregations, and Emlyn, who was well known as a preacher in Dublin, was invited to settle there by his friend Boyse, and to share with him the labors of the ministry over his congregation in Wood-street. Emlyn consented, and in 1691 removed to Dublin. In this active scene he displayed great powers of eloquence as a preacher; he was universally followed; and he insured the public esteem by his pathetic discourses. His opinions with respect to the Trinity began to be suspected by some of the neighboring ministers, and he openly declared his sentiments, and after much disputation he was suspended from his office, and persuaded abruptly to leave the country. He went in consequence to London, where he published his case; but, after ten weeks' absence, he determined to return to Dublin to his family, and there roused the indignation and the animosity of all parties against him by the publication of his "humble inquiry into the scripture account of Jesus Christ, or a short argument concerning his deity and glory, according to the gospel." This book drew the arm of the law upon its author. He was arrested at the instance of the dissenters, his book was seized, and he was tried, and found guilty of blasphemously asserting that Jesus Christ was not equal to God the Father, to whom he was subject, and that with a seditious intention. He was accordingly sentenced by the lord chief justice to suffer a year's imprisonment, to pay a fine of 1000*l.* to the queen, and be confined till paid, and to find sureties for his future good behavior. After two years' confinement the fine was reduced to 70*l.* and he was liberated. He returned to London, where he occasionally preached among the dissenters; but by the death of some of his friends and supporters, his congregation was diminished, and at last he retired to peaceful solitude, where he engaged himself in polemic divinity. Emlyn died 30th July 1743, aged 79.

EMMET, Thomas Addis, an eminent lawyer, was born in Cork, Ireland, in 1764, the son of a physician. Educated at Trinity college, Dublin, he studied medicine at Edinburgh and took the degree of M.D. in 1784. He visited the most celebrated schools of the continent. On his return to Ireland, the death of a brother induced him to change his profession to that of the law. He spent two years at the Temple in London, and was admitted to the Irish bar at Dullin in 1791. While Mr. Emmet was rising to eminence in his new profession, the association of "United Irishmen" was constituted. He was one of the general committee which had a superintendency and control over all the associations under this name. Their object was rebellion, and from some disclosures made to the government, Emmet with others were arrested and thrown into prison. After the peace of Amiens he was set free and conveyed to the river Elbe. The winter of 1802 he spent in Brussels, where he saw his brother about to embark in the enterprise, which ended in his execution. From France Mr. Emmet proceeded to New York, where he arrived Nov. 11, 1804. He was soon admitted to the supreme courts of the state and of the United States, and stood among the first in his profession. In 1812 he was appointed attorney general of the state. In the circuit court of 1827 he was engaged in the important Astor cause, and on Monday Nov. 12th replied in an elaborate argument to Webster and Van Buren. On Wednesday, while occupied in another cause, he was seized with the apoplexy in court, and died Nov. 14, 1827, aged 63. While in prison in Scotland he wrote part of an essay towards the history of Ireland, which was published at N. Y. in 1807.

EMMIUS, Ubo, a professor of Groningen, born at Gretha, in East Friesland, 1547. He studied successively at Embden, Bremen, Rostock, and Geneva, and at his return was appointed rector of Norden college, 1579. He was however expelled from his office, for refusing to subscribe the confession of Augsburg, and 1588 he became rector of Leer college, which he raised to high eminence and distinction. In 1549 he was appointed over Groningen college, and when it was changed, in 1614, into an university, he was selected to be professor of history and Greek. After a life usefully and honorably spent in the service of the public, this worthy and learned man died at Groningen 1625, leaving several children by two wives. He was author of several works, the most known of which are, Vetus Græcia illustrata, 3 vols. published after his death—history of William Lewis count Nassau—decades rerum Friscarum,—chronological and genealogical works—and vita et sacra eleusina Davidis, Georgii.

EMPEDOCLEUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of Agrigentum, in Sicily, where he flourished about b. c. 444. He refused the sovereignty, which was offered to him by his fellow citizens, and established a popular government. He was skilled in philosophy and medicine, and had a talent for poetry. Some ascribe to him the Golden Verses, which others attribute to Pythagoras. The story that he died by throwing himself into mount Etna is, probably, as fabulous as another story, that he was carried away by a cloud.

EMPEREUR, Constantine P., of Oppyck, in Holland, was professor of Hebrew at Leyden, and died 1648, at an advanced age. His works are chiefly translations of Jewish and Talmudical books, which display deep research and great knowledge of oriental literature. He wrote also dē mensuris templi, 4to, 1630.

ENDECOTT, John, governor of Massachusetts, was sent to America by a company in England, as their agent, to carry on the plantation at Naumkeag or Salem, and arrived in Sept. 1623. It was here, that he laid the foundation of the first permanent town within the limits of the Massachusetts patent. The company in April 1629, chose him the governor of "London's plantation:" but in August it was determined to transfer the charter, and the government of the colony to New England, and John Winthrop, who arrived in the following year was appointed governor. In 1636, Mr. Endecott, was sent out on an expedition against the Indians on Block island, and in the Pequot country. He continued at Salem till 1644, when he was elected governor of Massachusetts and removed to Boston. He was also governor from 1649, to 1654, excepting 1650, and from 1655, to 1665. He died 1665, in his 77th. year.

ENFIELD, William, L.L.D., a native of Sudbury, educated at Daventry, under Dr. Ashworth, and made in 1763 the minister of a dissenting congregation in Liverpool. He was in 1770 tutor in belles lettres to the Warrington academy, and afterwards, in 1785, settled as pastor of a dissenting meeting at Norwich, where he died, 1797, aged 56. He published two volumes of sermons, of considerable merit—an history of Liverpool—institutes of natural philosophy—prayers and hymns—an history of philosophy, 2 vols. 4to.—biographical sermons—the speaker, a popular school book—and, since his death, 3 vols. of sermons have appeared, with his life by Dr. Aikin.

ENGEL, John James, a German writer, a native of Mecklenburgh, was born at Parchau in 1741, and died there in 1802. From 1776 to 1787, he was professor of morals and literature at Berlin, and had, subsequently, along with Ramler, the management, till 1794, of the Berlin theatre. His works, which are remarkable for perspicuity and correct taste, form twelve volumes. Among them are, Ideas on the Dramatic Art; Lorenz Stark, a romance; and two excellent comedies.

ENGELBRECHT, John, a celebrated German visionary, born in 1599 at Brunswick, was the son of a tailor. Bad health, misery, and religious fanaticism, combined to overthrow his reason. He fasted at times for a fortnight together, and remained without sleep for a much longer period, and occasionally fell into trances, during which he believed that he was transported to hell and to paradise, and that he received the mission of exhorting mankind to repentance. He wandered for several years through Germany, published his imaginary revelations, and was not without proselytes. At length, completely worn out, he died in 1642.

ENGHIEN, duke of, son of the duke of Bourbon, and grandson of the prince of Condé, was seized in the night at his seat at Ettenheim, in the territories of the elector of Baden, by an armed force, by direction of Bonaparte, and hurried to Paris. This atrocious step was followed by a mock trial, and the prince condemned for having carried arms against his country during the tyrannical reign of Robespierre. The sentence of his judges was carried into execution in the night of the 22d of March 1804, and he was shot in the wood of Vincennes. He died with heroic resignation, and rejoiced in his last moments that the soldiers who shot him were not Frenchmen, but the mercenary hirelings of the body guard of his bloody murderer.

ENGLEFIELD, Sir Henry Charles, was born in 1752, and died in 1822. He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and contributed largely to their transactions. His scientific knowledge was extensive, and he was an excellent classical scholar. Among his separate works are, Tables of the apparent place of the Comet of 1681; On the Determination of the Orbits of Comets; A Walk through Southampton; and a Description of the Picturesque Beauties and Geological Phenomena of the Isle of Wight.

ENGLISH, Hester, a Frenchwoman by descent, was eminent for fine writing in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Her performances are preserved in libraries and private hands. One of her pieces was preserved by Mr. Cripps, surgeon, London, called, "Octonaires upon the vanitie and inconstancie of the world, written by Ester Inglis, the firste of Januarie 1600." It is an oblong 8vo. French and English verse, the French in a print hand, the English, Italian or secretary, curiously ornamented with flowers and fruits, painted in water colors, containing on the first leaf her own picture in a small form, with the motto, "de Dieu le bien, de moy le rien."

ENGLISH, George Bethune, graduated at Harvard college 1807. He studied law in Boston, and was admitted to the Suffolk bar, but never engaged in practice. He gave up the profession of the law, and repaired to Cambridge, and became a student in divinity; and three years after commenced preaching, but never was a candidate for any parish. But his connexion with this last profession was dissolved by the publication of a volume, which is now hardly remembered, even by its title, and of which, the least that is said, is best, both for the memory of English, and the good of the world. He was now shut out from every employment that depended on public opinion. He applied in vain for a commission in the army. He spent some time in the Western country as an editor of a paper, and succeeded at last in obtaining the appointment of a lieutenant in the Marine corps. In this capacity he sailed to the Mediterranean; but from offers made him by Ibrahim Pacha, he resigned his commission in the Marine corps, and accepted a command in the Egyptian army then preparing for the conquest of Abyssinia. This was an unfortunate engagement for English, and he retired from it without either money or glory. He had however acquired some knowledge, and the government of the United States appointed him an agent with letters to their public functionaries in the Mediterranean. In 1827, he returned to America, and spent most of his time at the city of Washington, in endeavoring to obtain some appointment, till his death in August 1828, aged 39. In 1813 he published the volume referred to in this article; and an answer to it was published by the Hon. Edward Everett, a member of congress from Massachusetts, [1834], but then minister of the Brattle Street church in Boston; letter to Mr. Cary on his review of that work 1813; letter to Mr. Channing on his two sermons on infidelity; expedition to Dongola and Sennaar, 8vo. 1823.

ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, an eminent writer, born in Italy about 473. The loss of an aunt, at the age of 16, reduced him to poverty, from which he was relieved by marrying a lady of fortune and quality. He afterwards altered his mode of life, and took orders; and his lady also retired to the seclusion of a religious life. His writings raised his reputation, and in 511 he was advanced to the bishopric of Pavia, and was afterwards engaged to negotiate an union between the western and eastern churches. Though unsuccessful, he displayed great prudence as a negotiator. He died at Padua 521. His works were published by Scottus at Tournay 1610, and at Paris by Sirmoud 1611, with notes to illustrate the history of the age of the author.

ENSENADA, Zeno Somo de Silva, marquis de la, an able minister of Spain. From obscurity and the office of a book-keeper to a banker, he rose to places of honor and trust; and being ennobled by the king, took the name of Ensenada (nothing in itself;) either from modesty or from laudable ostentation. He was intimate with Farinelli, who, like himself, had risen from obscurity to consequence; and when dismissed from office, by the intrigues of the duke of Huescar, his friend had the boldness to reflect upon the severity of the measure in the presence of the queen. Though never reinstated in the office and influence of prime minister, he yet retained in privacy the esteem and good will of his sovereign. He died 1755.

ENTICK, John, an English clergyman, and school-master at Stepney, well known as the author of a Latin and of a spelling dictionary. He also wrote a history of the war terminated in 1763, 5 vols. 8vo. and a history of London, 4 vols. 8vo. abridged from Stow and Maitland, and other works. He died 1780, and was buried in Stepney church-yard.

ENZINAS, Francis, a native of Burgos, 1515, known also by the name of Dryander and du Chesne. He became a disciple of Melancthon, and at Wittenberg turned protestant, as his brother, John Dryander, had done. He translated the new testament into Spanish, for which he was imprisoned fifteen months; and escaping from imprisonment, he fled to Calvin at Geneva, 1545. He wrote a history of the Low Countries, and of Spain, which forms part of the protestant martyrology printed in Germany. His brother was burnt at Rome as a heretic, 1545.

EON, de l'Étoile, a fanatic of Britany. Taking advantage of his name, he thought himself the son of God, and the judge of quick and dead, per cum qui justificaturus est vivos et mortuos. He gave rank to his followers, calling some angels and some inferior spirits; and as he bribed those who were sent to seize him, it was considered by the vulgar that it was impossible to apprehend him. He was brought before pope Eugenius at the council of Rheims in 1148, and pretended, that when he held up to heaven the forked stick in his hand, two thirds of the world were under the power of God, and the other of himself, and when he turned the stick to the earth, that his authority extended over two parts and that of God only over one. He died wretched in prison, and some of his followers chose to be burnt rather than abjure.

EON DE BEAUMONT, Charlotte-Genevieve-Timothee d', a native of Tonnerre sur Armençon, born 5th October 1728. She was brought up as a boy by her parents, who wished at her birth to have a son, and, after going through the labors of a school and college education, she was recommended to the court, and sent three times as ambassador to Russia. She afterwards served in the army under marshal Broglio, and behaved with unusual courage, and after the peace of 1762, she was sent as secretary to the embassy in London, and also succeeded as ambassador. A wager determined her sex in London, and before the king's bench she declared herself to be a woman. The pension she had received was continued by the French king, but on condition she assumed the dress of her sex. This extraordinary woman died in 1790. She published tracts relative to the negotiations in which she had been engaged.

EPAMINONDAS, one of the most illustrious of the Thébans, brave, patriotic, and incorruptible, was the son of Polymnis. He saved the life of Pelopidas, in a battle against the Arcadians; incited him to liberate Thebes from the Lacedemonian yoke; defeated Cleombrotus, and gained the battle of Leuctra; overcame Alexander, tyrant of Phœria; and, at last, fell at Mantinea, b. c. 363, in the moment of gaining a victory over the Spartans. Cicero considered him as the greatest man that Greece ever produced.

EPEE, Charles Michael de l', a French ecclesiastic, celebrated for his most humane efforts to restore the deaf and dumb to the blessings and the enjoyment of society. By his salutary instruction, these unfortunate members of the community have been able to acquire the knowledge of even six different languages, they have become profound mathematicians, and ready calculators. This worthy and most benevolent man, after receiving the most honorable marks of esteem and gratitude from the empress of Russia, the emperor of Germany, the king of France, and the whole of Europe, died at Paris, February 1790. He was succeeded in his benevolent institution by Pabbé Sicard.

EPICHRMUS, an ancient poet and philosopher, who flourished about b. c. 440, and is said to have reached his ninety-seventh year, was born in the island of Cos, and was a disciple of Pythagoras. He wrote fifty-two comedies, all of which are lost, and he is supposed to have been one of the first who gave regularity to that species of composition. He also wrote upon medical and philosophical subjects.

EPICETETUS, a celebrated Stoic philosopher, who flourished in the first century, was born at Hierapolis in Phrygia, and was originally a slave to Epaphroditus, one of Nero's freedmen. Having obtained his freedom, he retired to an humble hut, and gave himself up wholly to the study of philosophy. His lessons were greatly admired, and his life afforded an example of unblemished virtue. Being banished from Rome, with the other philosophers, by Domitian, he settled at Nicopolis, in Epirus. Whether he ever returned to the Roman capital is uncertain; nor do we know the period at which he died. His memory was so much venerated that the earthen lamp which gave him light was sold for more than ninety pounds. His admirable Enchiridion, a manual of morality, was translated into English by Mrs. Carter.

EPISCOPIUS, Simon, an able divine, born of protestant parents at Amsterdam, 1533, and educated there and at Leyden. During the controversy between Gomarus and Arminius about predestination, he embraced the opinions of the latter, and was consequently exposed to persecution and obloquy, and considered as the public disturber of the church. He was ordained in 1610, and two years after he was appointed divinity professor at Leyden, in the room of Gomarus. In 1615 he went to Paris; but this journey, undertaken for purposes of curiosity, was viewed with suspicion by his enemies, and he was on his return accused of concerting with father Cotton the ruin of the protestant church and the United States. He was consequently obliged to appear before the synod at Dort, and because he and his friends refused to submit to the authority of arbitrary judges, they were deposed from their functions, and banished from the territories of the commonwealth. He retired to Antwerp, and in his banishment employed his pen in the support of his opinions, and in severe attacks upon the popish tenets. He afterwards visited Paris; and in the revolutions of party zeal and religious persecution he was again permitted to return to Holland, in 1626, where he became minister of the remonstrants' church at Rotterdam. He died 4th April, 1643. As the moon was under an eclipse at the moment of his death, his friends, in the wildness of their grief, considered it as the emblem of the church, which lost its brightest light by the departure of that shining luminary Episcopus.

EPPENDORF, Henry, a German noble, who acquired celebrity by his dispute with Erasmus. He was born near Friburg, a city of Misnia, and though he boasted of his nobility, he was the son of a plebeian. He reflected with vulgar severity on the illegitimate birth of Erasmus, who in his turn retorted against his adversary and censured him for his petulance, falsehood, and defamation. The interference of friends at last produced a reconciliation, but it was momentary, and a war of letters arose more fierce and inveterate than before. These things are to be lamented in the life of men of literary merit and christian virtue, but too many unfortunately forget their character and profession while intent to repel or avenge an injury. The time of Eppendorf's death is not recorded.

ERASMUS, Desiderius, D.D., a most illustrious character in the republic of literature, and in the cause of religion, was born 23th October, 1467, at Rotterdam. His studies at Deventer, where he had for his friend and fellow-student pope Adrian VI., were interrupted by the plague. Erasmus was removed from Deventer to Tergou, about the age of 14, and placed under the care of guardians, who wished to obtain possession of his small patrimony by devoting him to the seclusion of a monastery. He was first sent to a convent at Bois-le-duc, where, as he says, he lost 3 years of his life, then removed to Sion near Delft, and afterwards to Stein near Tergou, where, overpowered by the unceasing solicitations of his guardians, he became a regular canon 1486. In the retreat of a convent, which, as he describes, is a place of impiety rather than of religion, where every thing was done to which a depraved inclination could lead, under the sanction and mask of piety, and where it was hardly possible for any one to keep himself pure and unspotted, Erasmus could not long be confined. He was introduced to Henry a Bergis, archbishop of Cambray, who wanted a learned secretary on his visit to Rome; but though the journey was laid aside by the prelate, Erasmus determined not to return to the convent, but after being ordained priest at Utrecht 1492, he set out for Paris in 1496, to prosecute his studies. To maintain himself he instructed some pupils, some of whom were Englishmen, and among them William Blunt, lord Montjoy, who ever after treated him with respect. In 1497 he left Paris, and was kindly received at Cambray by the bishop. The same year he visited England under the patronage of his pupil lord Montjoy, and he entered at St. Mary's college, Oxford, where, in the company and conversation of Colet, Grocyn, Linacer, Latimer, and Moore, he devoted himself to classical studies, and especially to the learning of Greek, which now began to revive in England, and of which he knew nothing. After nearly a year's residence, he returned to Paris, and in consequence of the plague which prevailed in that city, he passed to Orleans, and in 1498, completed his Adagia. The kindnesses he had experienced in England could never be forgotten, and he again, in 1499, visited for a little time that country, which he describes as abounding with humanity, politeness, and learning. It was his intention to study divinity in Italy, but this plan he did not immediately adopt, as in 1502, he was pursuing theological studies at Louvain, under his friend Adrian Florent, afterwards Adrian VI. In 1510 Erasmus again took residence in England, wrote his Praise of Folly, while residing with Sir Thomas More; and was appointed Margaret professor of divinity, and Greek lecturer, at Cambridge. Returning to the continent in 1514, he vigorously continued his literary labors. Basil was chiefly the place of his residence. Among the numerous works which he now produced, may be mentioned an edition of the works of St. Jerome; an edition of the New Testament, with a Latin translation; his dialogue entitled Ciceronianus; and his celebrated Colloquies, which, attacking superstition and church abuses, gave such offence to bigoted catholics, that he was branded by them as having laid the egg which Luther hatched. With Luther, however, whom he had provoked by his treatise on Free Will, he was in open hostility. Erasmus died July 12, 1536. A complete edition of his works, in ten volumes folio, was published by Le Clerc. Rotterdam has not forgotten the celebrity she derives from giving birth to her favorite citizen. The house in which he was born is marked out to the admiration of the traveller by a becoming inscription, the college bears the name of Erasmus, and a beautiful copper statue erected in 1622, in an open part of the city, points out with how much pride the inhabitants reckon Erasmus in the number of their fellow-citizens.

ERASTUS, Thomas, a physician and divine, born at Baden 1524. He was educated at Basil, and afterwards studied at Bologna, and after 10 years spent in Italy he returned to his native country. He practised physic with great reputation at Henneberg, and at the court of Frederic III. elector palatine, and became professor of physic at Heidelberg university. The disputes about the real presence at the sacrament engaged his pen, and he attended the conference held on the subject between the divines of Wirtemberg and the palatinate, and he eloquently maintained that the words flesh and blood are to be used metaphorically. He retired to Basil afterwards, where he died 31st December 1553. Of his books on divinity the best known is "de excommunicatione ecclesiasticâ," published after his decease, which was attacked by various divines, who wished to maintain that the censures of the church extended beyond this life.

ERCILL-YA-CUNIGA, Don Alonzo d', a Spaniard, in the service of Maximilian. He was at the battle of St. Quintin under Philip II. in 1557, and afterwards travelled through France, England, and Italy. Animated with romantic bravery he went to the attack of the Indians who had revolted in Chili and Peru, and he defeated them, and made his adventures the subject of his poem called Araucana. This poem, which consists of 36 cantos, contains many tedious repetitions, but it abounds in bold descriptions, and possesses all the charms of animated poetry. The best edition is that of Madrid 1632, in 12mo.

ERIC IX. King of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, after Margaret 1412, married the daughter of Henry IV. of England. His pilgrimage to the holy land and his captivity in Syria disordered the affairs of his kingdom, and on his return to Europe he found the Swedes dissatisfied with his government, and the Danes anxious to revolt from him, because he wished to render their crown hereditary and not elective. Though he attempted to maintain his authority by arms, he found opposition unavailing, he was solemnly deposed 1439, and retired to Pomerania, where he died in privacy 1459. He wrote in his exile a history of Denmark to the year 1288.

ERIGENA, John Scotus, a celebrated scholar in the ninth century, born at Ayr in Scotland, though others give him a Welsh, others an Irish, origin. Eager in the pursuit of knowledge, he quitted his native country where only ignorance and superstition prevailed, and travelled into foreign lands, and at Athens so perfected himself in classical and oriental literature and science that he proved the greatest philosopher and most learned man of the age. At the invitation of Charles the Bald he resided for some years at the French court, and the king offered him the most munificent and honorable patronage, and bore with the severity of his raillery with good humor and most forgiving composure. Afterwards he took residence in England, and he was employed under Alfred in restoring literature in Oxford. According to Tanner he was in 879 professor of mathematics and astronomy in that university, and in consequence of some dispute, after three years' residence he retired to Malmsbury, where he opened a school. His severity in this place was said to be so great that his pupils murdered him. Others state that he died in France. The most celebrated of Scotus' works is his treatise on the division of nature, published from the MS. by Dr. Gale 1681, Oxford. It is written with great acuteness and metaphysical subtilty, and must rank its author if not among atheistical philosophers, yet among fanatical enthusiasts.

ERNESTI, John Augustus, a native of Tennstadt, professor of theology at Leipsic, and afterwards of ancient literature, and eloquence. He died 1731, aged 74, universally respected for learning, and indefatigable zeal in the service of literature. Besides excellent editions of Cicero, Xenophon, Suetonius, Homer, Tacitus, and Callimachus, with learned notes, he published institutio interpretis Novi Testam. Leips. 1761—opuscula oratoria, orationes prousiones & elogia, 8vo.—opusculorum, oratorum novum volumen, 8vo. 1791, and opuscula critica, 8vo.

ERPENIUS, Thomas, or Van Erpe in Dutch, a learned writer, born at Gorcum in Holland 11th September 1534. He studied at Leyden, where he took the degree of doctor in philosophy 1608, and afterwards travelled for four years into England, France, Italy, and Germany. His extensive learning, and the fame of his works made him known to the learned of Europe. In 1612 he was appointed professor of Arabic and of oriental languages at Leyden, where he died of a contagious disease 13th November 1624. His abilities were so much admired that he was earnestly solicited to settle in England, also in Italy, and in Spain, and his knowledge of Arabic was so correct that the emperor of Morocco showed his nobles, as a curiosity for its elegance and purity, a letter in Arabic, which he had received from him, as the interpreter and corresponding secretary of the states of Holland, to the powers of Asia and Africa. Though he was but 40 years old at the time of his death, yet he published 19 various works, on oriental history, and on subjects connected with his professorship, in which he displayed the great powers of his mind, and the vast stores of his retentive memory.

ERSCH, John Samuel, an eminent bibliographer, a native of Silesia, was born in 1766, and died in 1828, principal librarian, and professor of geography and statistics, at the university of Halle. Among his works are, Literary France, 5 vols. A Catalogue of Anonymous and Pseudonymous German works; and A Manual of German Literature, 2 vols.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, son of Ralph Erskine, was born 1680, in the prison of Bass, where his father was confined in the persecutions of the times. In 1701 he took his master's degree at Edinburgh, and the next year was ordained minister of Portnoak, Fifeshire, from whence he removed in 1728 to Stirling. In 1747, in consequence of some disputes with the clergy, he joined the seceders called burghers, and died at Stirling 1755, aged 75. Four volumes of his sermons were printed at Glasgow, 1762, 8vo. and a fifth at Edinburgh, 1765.

ERSKINE, James, lord Alva, was born at Edinburgh 20th June 1722, and made one of the barons of the Scotch exchequer 1754, which he resigned in 1761, on being appointed to the supreme civil court of Scotland. He assumed the name of lord Barjarg, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Alva. He died at Drumsheugh, near Edinburgh, 13th May 1796.

ERSKINE, Thomas, lord, the most celebrated of modern forensic orators, was the third son of the earl of Buchan, and was born in Scotland in 1750. After having received a good education at Edinburgh high school and St. Andrew's university, he went to sea as a midshipman, under Sir John Lindsey. His early fondness for the sea, however, soon evaporated, and, in 1763, he entered the army, as an ensign of the first regiment of foot. With that regiment, after having married, he went to Minorca, where he resided for three years. The scanty pittance of the rank which he held being but ill calculated to support a family, he was persuaded by his mother to turn his talents to the law; and accordingly, in his twenty-sixth year, he commenced his legal studies. Buller and Wood, both of whom became judges, were his instructors. In 1778 he was called to the bar, and he was instantly successful. The splendid powers which he displayed, in the memorable case of Captain Baillie, placed him at once in the first rank of his profession. His subsequent efforts more than sustained his fame. Among the most prominent of them may be mentioned, his speeches for Carnan, Admiral Keppel, Lord George Gordon, Dean Shipley, Stockdale, Paine, and the persons who were tried for high treason in 1794. In 1783 he was returned to the Commons' House as a member for Portsmouth, and he continued to sit in that house till he was removed to the other. In principle he was a whig, and he was a strenuous opposer of the war against the French republic. On the Causes and Consequences of that war he published a pamphlet, which went through nearly fifty editions. In 1806 he came into office with his friends, as lord chancellor, with the title of baron; and when, in the following year, his party was deprived of the reins of government, he retired with the usual pension. During the latter years of his life he labored under considerable pecuniary embarrassment, and displayed some of those "follies of the wise" which have been too often witnessed in the decline of eminent men. He died November 17, 1823. Besides his tract on the French war, he wrote a political romance, called Armata, and some pamphlets in favor of the Greeks. But as a writer he has little claim to praise. 'The pen seems to act on him like a torpedo; his style is lax and spiritless. Nor did he stand high as a parliamentary orator. It was at the bar that he was truly in his element. There, his voice, his manner, his rhetorical skill, his copiousness of language, and his mastery over the feelings and prejudices of his hearers, bore away the palm from all his rivals, and, on most occasions, insured to him a complete triumph.

ERVING, William, a benefactor of Harvard college, was graduated in 1753, and quitted the British army, in which he was an officer at the commencement of the American revolution. He died at Roxbury May 27, 1791, aged 56, bequeathing to the college, in which he was educated, 1000*l.* towards establishing a professorship of chemistry, and matéria medica.

ERXLEBEN, John Christian Polycarp, a native of Quedlinburg, who studied at Gottingen, and gave lectures in physic, the veterinary art and natural history. He was an able naturalist, and his principles of natural history in 8vo. 1763, are particularly admired. He died 1777, aged 33.

ERYCEIRA, Ferdinand de Meneses count d', was born at Lisbon 1614, and distinguished himself in military affairs, as governor of Penicha and of Tangiers. He was also an able historian, and wrote the history of Tangiers, fol. printed 1723,—history of Portugal, 2 vols. folio, from 1640 to 1657,—and the life of John I. king of Portugal.

ERYCEIRA, Francis Xavier de Meneses count d', great-grandson of the foregoing, was born at Lisbon 1673, and died 1743. He was known also as a literary and military character. He was honored by several princes, and many learned men, and by the present of their works and other munificent donations, he increased the valuable library of his ancestors with 15,000 new volumes, and 1000 manuscripts. He wrote above 100 different publications, the best known of which are his memoirs on the value of the coins of Portugal,—reflections on academical studies,—58 parallels of illustrious men, and 12 of illustrious women, and the Henriade of Voltaire translated, with observations.

ESCALO, Mastin de l', was elected podestat of Verona 1259, but though prudent and humane in the administration of affairs, he raised himself enemies by whom he was assassinated 1273. The sovereign authority remained however in his family, and his descendant Mastino III. added Vicenza, Brescia, and even Padua to his dominions. His tyranny at last was repressed by the Venetians, and he died 1337, after a life of cruelty and perilous adventures. The families of l'Escalo and the Carraras of Padua had long and bloody contests, but Verona at last became independent till overpowered by the intrigues of her neighbors.

ESCARBOT, Mark, published Nova Francia, or an account of New France, as described in late voyages into the countries called by the Frenchmen Lu Cadie, 4to. London 1654; translated from the French edition of 1812: the same in Purchas and Churchill.

ESCOBARY MENDOZA, Anthony, a celebrated Spanish casuist, born at Valladolid, in 1539; entered the society of the Jesuits at the age of fifteen; was for many years a popular preacher; and died in 1669. He is the author of several works, extending to forty volumes (most of them folio), the principal of which are, his Moral Theology, and his Cases of Conscience; the last of these, in particular, Pascal has rendered notorious by the severity with which he has treated it in the Provincial Letters.

ESCOUBLEAU, Henry d', archbishop of Bourdeaux. He was at the siege of Rochelle, under Lewis XIII. and at the retaking of the isles of Lerins under Harcourt. He quarrelled with the duke of Epemon, who struck him a blow, which was punished by the excommunication of the guilty lord, which disgrace however was removed by his falling on his knees before the haughty prelate. He died 1645.

ESMÉNARD, Joseph Alphonso, a French poet, a member of the Insatute, was born, in 1770, at Pelissane, in Provence; was connected with several literary and political journals during the revolution; travelled in various parts of Europe, and accompanied General Leclerc to St. Domingo; and was killed, in 1811, by his horse throwing him down a precipice. He is the author of Navigation, a poem; the operas of Trajan and Ferdinand Cortez; and some articles in the Universal Biography.

ESPAGNAC, John Baptist Joseph de Sapuguet Danarzil baron d', a French general, born at Brive-la-Gaillarde 25th March 1713, and died at Paris 23th February 1783. He signalized himself in the campaigns of Italy, and Bavaria, and was made major-general of the army under marshal Saxe, and as governor of the Hotel-des-invalides he introduced some useful regulations. He wrote several books on the military profession, among which are his campagnes du roi, 1745, 4 vols. 8vo. essai sur la science de la guerre, a valuable work, 3 vols. 8vo., and Historie du marechal de Saxe, 3 vols. 4to. He had four sons and a daughter by his wife baroness de Beyer.

ESPAGNÉT, John d', president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, became known by his Enchiridion physicæ restitutæ, in which he establishes a complete system of physics contrary to the tenets of Aristotle. He considers earth and water to be the only elements, and he places the real fire of the world in the sun, which he calls the eye, not only of the universe but of the Creator. He wrote also arcanum hermiticæ philosophiæ opus, on the philosopher's stone. In 1616 he published an old manuscript, called le Rozier des guerres, of which an earlier edition had appeared in 1523.

ESPAGNOLET, Joseph Riberia l', a Spanish painter, born at Xativa, in Valencia 1580. He studied the manner of Caravaggio, and surpassed him in correctness. In poverty he was extremely happy in his delineations, but prosperity rendered him indolent, and regardless of his art. The countenances of his figures were extremely expressive, and he was particularly successful in the representation of terror, anguish, and ferocity. He was patronised at Naples, where he died 1656, aged 76. His chief works are preserved in the Escorial and at Naples.

ESPEN, Zeger Bernard Van, was born 1646, at Louvain, where he became professor of laws. His observations on the fornicary, and on the bull ungenitus, proved the sources of great bitterness to him, so that to avoid persecution, he retired to Maestricht, and afterwards to Amersfort, where he died 2d October, 1729, aged 83. His works which are considered as valuable, especially his jus ecclesiasticum universum, were published at Paris 1753, in 4 vols. folio.

ESPENCE, Claude d', a native of Chalons-sur-Marne, rector of the university of Paris, and doctor of the Sorbonne. He attended the cardinal de Lorraine in Flanders, and likewise at Rome 1555, where he displayed so much eloquence as an orator, that the pope, Paul IV. wished to bestow on him a cardinal's hat, which he refused. He died at Paris 5th October 1571, aged 60. He was a man of great learning and moderation. He wrote some commentaries on Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus, and some controversial tracts. His Latin works were printed 1619, folio, Paris.

ESPER, John Frederic, a German naturalist and astronomer, was born at Drossenfeld, in Bayreuth, in 1732, and died in 1781. He was the first who examined and described the curious fossil remains in the subterranean caverns of Bayreuth. On this subject he published An Accurate Description of the Zoolites of unknown Animals, with plates. He is also the author of A Method of determining the Orbits of Comets, &c. without instruments or mathematical calculation.

ESPERIENTE, Philip Callimachus, a native of St. Geminiano, in Tuscany, who under Pius II. formed an academy, the members of which assumed Greek or Latin names. Under Paul, Pius' successor, the academy was considered as an assembly of seditious men, and the founder therefore fled to Poland, where he became preceptor to the children of king Casimir III. He was also employed as ambassador to Constantinople, Vienna, Venice, and Rome, and on his return to Poland, an accidental fire destroyed his house, library and manuscripts, and overwhelmed him with grief. He died soon after at Cracow 1496. His works are commentarii rerum Persicarum, folio.—historia de iis quæ a Venetis tentata sunt, Persis & Tartaris contra Turcas movendis,—Attila historia de rege Vladislao, 4to.

ESPREMENIL, James Duval d', a Frenchman, born at Pondicherry, the nephew and heir of Duval de Leyril, the governor of the city, and the accuser of Lally. He became an advocate, and counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and was remarkable for his violent proceedings during the revolution. He was guillotined April 23, 1794. He was asked by his old opponent Chapelier, as he was going to the scaffold with him, 'To which of us two are the shouts of the mob addressed?' To both, replied D'Espremenil. He wrote remonstrances, published by the parliament 1788,—nullity and despotism of the assembly, 8vo.—actual state of France, 1790, 8vo.

ESSARS, Pierre des, a French nobleman, who served in the Scotch army against the English, and was taken prisoner in 1402. On his return to France he attached himself to the duke of Burgundy, by whom he was raised to places of trust and honor, but he became suspected of partiality to the duke of Guienne, and fled to Cherbourg, of which he was the governor. In 1413 he secretly returned to Paris, and was thrust into the bastille, and soon after condemned, and he lost his head, 1st July, 1413. His body was interred in the Mathurins' church, by his widow, who obtained the restitution of his property.

ESSARS, Charlotte des, countess of Romorentin, and daughter of lieutenant-general des Essars in Champagne, was a lady of great beauty. She was in England with the countess de Beaumont, and on her return to France she was introduced 1590 to Henry IV. by whom she had two children, afterwards legitimated. She afterwards lived with Louis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, by whom she had a son called the chevalier de Romerentin, and she married in 1630 marshal de l'Hopital, known under the name of Hallier. Her wishes to advance her son Romerentin by her intrigues proved fatal to her, as she fell under the resentment of the French king and Richelieu, by whom she was arrested, and placed in confinement where she died 1651.

ESSEX, James, F. A. S., was born 1723, and distinguished himself by his great knowledge of architecture. He repaired and improved King's college chapel, Cambridge, and the cathedrals of Ely and Lincoln, besides other colleges in Cambridge, which will remain lasting monuments of his great skill and judgment. His proposals for publishing plans and sections of King's college chapel, appeared in the Brit. Topog. vol. 1. p. 237, and he enriched that valuable collection with many other curious and ingenious communications. He died 14th September 1734, in his 61st year.

ESTAING, Charles Henry count d', a French admiral, born in Auvergne. He was under Lally in the East Indies, and escaped from an English prison, by breaking his parole. He was commander of the French squadrons in the American war, and he took Grenada. At the revolution he became member of the assembly of notables, and was at last guillotined 29th April, 1793, as a suspected character.

ESTCOURT, Richard, a native of Tewksbury, Gloucestershire, who at the age of 15 escaped from his friends and joined a company of strolling players at Worcester, where he first appeared on the stage in women's clothes, in the part of Roxana in Alexander the great. His disguise did not prevent his discovery, he was pursued to Chipping-Norton, by his father, who immediately bound him to an apothecary in Hatton-garden, London. In this engagement he continued until business failed him, though others declare, he quitted his master abruptly, and wandered about the country for two years. He went afterwards to Ireland, where he was well received, and appeared at Drury-lane for the first time, in the part of Dominic in the Spanish Friar. His chief merit consisted in mimicry. Without great powers of his own, he could imitate with wonderful success the greatest players of the times, though he frequently offended the audience by the introduction of sentences which the author never wrote. He became, by his manners and conversation, a great favorite of the town, and when the chief wits and leading men of the times, and among them the duke of Marlborough, erected the beef steak club, Estcourt was appointed providore, and wore, as the badge of his office, a gold gridiron suspended from his neck, by a green silk riband. Some years before his death he quitted the stage. He died 1713. He left two dramatic pieces, Fair Example, a comedy, 1706, 4to., and Prunella, an interlude, 4to.

ESTOILE, Pierre de l', grand auditor of the chancery of Paris, died 1611. From his MSS. were published his journal of Henry III. beginning May 1574 to August 1589, improved by du Fresnoy 1744, five vols. 8vo.—Journal of the reign of Henry IV. four vols. 8vo. improved also by du Fresnoy. These works are valuable, and illustrate the private history of France. The author, under the character of ease and openness conceals a severe and sarcastic disposition.

ESTOILE, Claude de P, son of the preceding, was member of the French academy 1632, and died 1652, aged 54. He was one of the five authors consulted by Richelieu in the making of his bad plays. D'Estoile wrote some poems and plays, and it is said that, like Moliere and Malherbe, he read his pieces for the stage to his maid servant, on whose approbation proceeding from simple and ingenuous motives, he could depend. His odes are published in the recueil des poetes Francois, 1692, five vols. 12mo.

ESTOUTEVILLE, William d', of an illustrious Norman family, was archbishop of Rouen, and a cardinal. He reformed the university of Paris, and enjoyed the confidence of Charles VII. and Lewis XI. and was a man of great firmness of character, and of the strictest integrity, and very charitable. He died at Rome 22d December 1483, aged 80. Besides his archbishopric he held six bishoprics in France and Italy, four abbeys, and three grand priories, and was dean of the cardinals.

ESTRADES, Godfrey count d', marshal of France and viceroy of America, was also an able negotiator. He was ambassador in England in 1661, and the next year he negotiated with Charles II. for the evacuation of Dunkirk, which he effected, though contrary to the wishes of the English parliament. In 1666, he had a dispute with Vatteville the Spanish ambassador, about precedency in London, and the year following he negotiated the peace of Breda, and in 1673, assisted at the conferences of Nimueguen. He died 26th February 1686, aged 79. His negotiations were printed at the Hague 1742, nine vols. 12 mo. from the originals, which consisted of 22 vols. folio.

ESTREES, Francis Annibal d', was born in 1573, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and was made bishop of Laon by Henry IV. He soon however quitted the church for the army, and distinguished himself at the taking of Treves, and by other military exploits. He was made duke, peer, and marshal of France, and was employed in 1636, as ambassador to the court of Rome, where he offended the pope Urban and his nephews, for which he was recalled. He died at Paris 5th May 1670, aged 93. He wrote in an unadorned style, but with great fidelity, memoirs of the regency of Mary de Medicis, printed 1666, 12mo. and relation of the siege of Mantua in 1630, and another of the conclave which elected Gregory XV. pope, 1621.

ESTREES, Cæsar d', cardinal, abbot of St. Germain des Prés, was son of the preceding, and was born 1628. He was made bishop of Laon 1653, and produced a reconciliation between the pope's nuncio, and four of the French bishops who resisted his authority. He was afterwards employed by the French king at the court of Bavaria, and also at Rome, where he skillfully conducted himself to procure the elections of the popes Alexander VIII. Innocent XII. and Clement XI. He accompanied Philip V. when he took possession of the Spanish throne, and he died 13th December 1714, aged 87, respected as an able negotiator, a benevolent man, and an agreeable companion.

ESTREES, Victor Marie d', vice-admiral of France, after his father John, was born 1660. He bombarded Barcelona and Alicant 1691, and again in 1697 he besieged Barcelona. In 1701 he was made commander in chief of the French and Spanish fleets, and in 1703 was created marshal of France, and afterwards grandee of Spain, and knight of the golden fleece. He was a man well acquainted with literature, and he was member of several learned bodies. He died at Paris 28th December 1737, aged 77.

ESTREES, Lewis Cæsar duke d', marshal of France and minister of state, was born first July 1695. His father was Francis Michael le Tellier de Courtanvaux, and by his mother he was descended from John count d'Estrées, vice-admiral of France. He first distinguished himself in the war against Spain, and afterwards in the war of 1741, where, at the blockade of Egra, the battle of Fontenoi, the sieges of Mons and Charleroi, and the victory of Lafeldt, under marshal Saxe, his bravery was conspicuous, and his services were most meritorious. In the war of 1756 he was placed at the head of the French forces in Germany, and he gave battle to the duke of Cumberland at Hastenback, and paved the way for the success of Closterseven, which Richelieu, who superseded him through intrigue, obtained over the Hanoverians. He was made a duke in 1763, and died 1771, second January, aged 76, leaving no children behind him.

ETHELBERT, king of Kent, became a christian by the preaching of Austin, who came to England at the invitation of Bertha the queen, daughter of Caribert king of France. He enacted a code of laws, and died 616, in the 56th year of his reign.

ETHELRED, son of Edgar, was king of England, after his brother Edward the Martyr 978. To deliver himself from the oppressive tax which he paid to the Danes, called Danegelt, he caused those unfortunate foreigners to be all murdered, in consequence of which Sweyn the Danish king invaded the kingdom, and obliged him to fly to Normandy. After Sweyn's death he resumed his authority, and died 1016.

ETHEREGE, George, a dramatic writer, born 1636, of an ancient family in Oxfordshire. It is supposed that he studied at Cambridge, and afterwards applied himself to the law at one of the inns of court in London. Besides his plays he wrote various sonnets, songs, and short poems, which with great ease and elegance contain the voluptuous descriptions, and the immoral levities which were so fashionable in the reign of Charles II. His comedies, though very popular, are not free from licentiousness; and however we may admire the politeness of the dialogue, the sprightliness of the conversation, the faithful delineation of the characters, and the interesting intricacies of the plots, yet the loose tendency and the impurities of the whole cannot escape the severest censures of every friend of virtue and morality.

ETHRYG, George, or Etheridge, or Edrycus, a native of Thame, Oxfordshire, educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1539. In 1553 he was appointed king's Greek professor, but in Elizabeth's reign he was dismissed from the office in consequence of the persecution which he had encouraged against the protestants in Mary's reign. He then practised medicine at Oxford with success, and engaged in the education of young persons of his persuasion, though he was exposed to severe trials on account of his popish tenets. He was living in 1588, but the year of his death is unknown. He excelled in the knowledge not only of the Greek and Hebrew, and of medicine, but also of music. Some of his musical compositions and of his Latin poems are extant in manuscript.

ETTMULLER, Michael, a physician, born at Leipsic 26th May 1644, where he took his degree of M.D., 1666. After travelling through France, England, Holland, and Italy, he was appointed assessor of the medicinal faculty 1676, and in 1681 professor of botany. He died in consequence of an unsuccessful operation in chemistry March 9th, 1688. He wrote several things on medicinal subjects, and some of his works were published by his son at Frankfort 1708, and afterwards by professor Cyrillo, five volumes folio, Naples, 1729.

ETTMULLER, Michael Erne St. son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic 26th August 1673, and educated there and at Wittemberg. He took his degree of M.D., at Leipsic 1699, after visiting England, Holland, and Germany, and was elected professor of anatomy and surgery at the Lazaretto, Leipsic 1706, and after many honorable appointments, he was made in 1730, director of the imperial academy of nature curiosorum, and died 25th September 1732. He published his father's works, with a preface, and wrote several learned and curious treatises on medical subjects.

EUCLID, an eminent geometrician, is said by Pappus and Proclus to have been a native of Alexandria, in which city during the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, about b. c. 300, he taught mathematics. It was he who first established a mathematical school there. He wrote on Music, Optics, Catoptries, and other subjects; but the work which has immortalized his name is The Elements of Geometry. Of the fifteen books which compose those elements, however, the last two are supposed to be the production of Hypsicles.

EUDOCIA, Feodoruna, daughter of the hoyar-Feodor Lapookin, was made, 1689, the first wife of Peter the great, whom he chose out of the hundred young girls that he had by proclamation assembled at Moscow. Her complaints against the infidelity of her husband produced her disgrace. She was hurled from the throne, divorced in 1696, and confined in a convent at Susdal. In her retirement she formed an intimacy with general Glebof, and, trusting to the predictions of a fanatic bishop, she expected the death of her husband, and her restoration to power under the reign of her son. Peter was informed of her plans, and she was scourged by two nuns, and then immured in the convent of Nova Ladoga, and afterwards in the fortress of Shlusselburgh, from which she was released at the accession of her grandson, Peter II. at whose coronation she was present. She died in the monastery of Devitza, 1731, aged 59. Glebof was cruelly put to death by order of the inhuman Peter, and with his last breath he asserted his innocence, and that of the injured empress.

EUGENE, Francis, prince, a grandson of the duke of Savoy, and son of the count of Soissons, was born at Paris in 1663. He was intended for the church, and was known in his youth by the familiar appellation of the little Abbé. Eugene, however, had no fondness for theology, but much for military glory. He requested a regiment; was refused; and immediately entered the service of the emperor, as a volunteer against the Turks. So greatly did he distinguish himself, that Leopold gave him a regiment of dragoons. Louvois, the minister, now endeavored to bring back Eugene and the other French volunteers, by a menace of perpetual exile in case of disobedience. But the prince laughed at his threats, and exclaimed, "I will enter France again in spite of him." Savoy was the next theatre of his exploits, whence he was recalled on the duke joining the French, and was placed at the head of the army of Hungary. Louis XIV. who had at length discovered his merit, offered him a marshal's staff, a pension, and the government of Champagne, but they were disdainfully rejected. In 1697, he gained, in contempt of orders not to fight, the decisive battle of Zenta, in which the Turks lost thirty thousand men. The war of the Spanish succession raised his reputation to the highest pitch. He participated largely in the victories of Blenheim, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet; defeated La Feuillade, saved Turin, expelled the French from Italy, and invaded Provence; reduced Lisle; and performed many other splendid actions. In 1716, he routed the Turks at Peterwaradin, and, in the following year, he compelled Belgrade to surrender, after having inflicted on them another ruinous defeat. At the expiration of sixteen years of peace, which he had spent in cultivating and patronising the arts and literature, he was again, in 1733, called into the field, as commander on the Rhine: but no important events occurred. He died, unmarried, April 21, 1736. Activity, daringness, and promptitude in repairing his own faults and profiting by those of his adversaries, were the distinguishing military qualities of Prince Eugene. He was also the patron of learned men, and himself no indifferent scholar. Thomas à Kempis' book, de imitatione, was the constant companion of his travels and campaigns, and he wisely observed, with Gustavus Adolphus, that a good christian always made a good soldier. His collection of books, pictures, and prints, is preserved in the imperial library.

EUGENIUS IV., Gabriel Condolmero, a Venetian, elected pope 1431, after Martin V. He had a violent dispute with the council which had assembled at Basil, and issued a bull to dissolve it; but the bishops resisted his authority, and he was at last obliged to assent to their resolutions, and to confirm them. Another council at Ferrara was equally obstinate, though the pope proposed a reconciliation and union between the eastern and western churches, supported by the presence and authority of the emperor John Palæologus, and of several Greek bishops. The sudden breaking out of a plague dispersed the council, which removed to Florence; but the terms of pacification which were there adopted were soon violated. The council of Basil presumed to depose the pontiff, and to appoint Amadeus VIII. duke of Savoy in his room, under the title of Felix V.; but the cause of the dishonored Eugenius prevailed, and he died at Rome in the full enjoyment of his privileges, 1447, aged 64.

EULER, Leonard, one of the most illustrious and fertile mathematicians of the eighteenth century, was born at Basil in 1707, and was a pupil of John Bernouilli. He was one of the learned men whom Catherine the First invited to St. Petersburg, and in that capital he resided, as professor, from 1727 to 1741. In 1741, he removed to Berlin, at the request of the king of Prussia, and he remained there till 1766, when he returned to the Russian capital. He died of apoplexy, at St. Petersburg, in 1783. For many years previous to his decease he had been blind, but the privation of sight did not put a stop to his labors. Among the works produced while he was in a state of darkness were The Elements of Algebra, and The Theory of the Moon. His writings are so numerous, that a mere catalogue of them fills fifty pages. Many of them are to be found in the Memoirs of the Academies of Saint Petersburg, Berlin, and Paris, especially in the first two. Euler was a man, as his impartial and eloquent eulogist, Fuss, has mentioned, of astonishing powers, great and extensive erudition, and of such retentive memory that he could repeat the whole of the Æneid, and in one night he calculated in his head the six first powers of all the numbers above 20, which he repeated the next day most correctly to his astonished friends. Affable, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, he could abandon the most abstruse studies to mix with the general amusements of society, and, with unusual vivacity, enter into all the trifles and the frivolous anecdotes which often fill up the vacuum of company. His piety was ardent but sincere, he loved mankind, and defended the great truths of religion with earnestness and fidelity.

EULER, John Albert, a son of the foregoing, was born at St. Petersburg in 1734, and died there, 1800. Though inferior to his father, he was an able mathematician. He was secretary of the Imperial Academy of Sciences, inspector of the Military Academy, and counsellor of state. Several of his papers, on astronomy, mechanics, optics, &c. were published in the Transactions of various learned bodies.

EULER, Charles, the second son of Leonard, was born in 1740, at St. Petersburg, and died there, in 1766, physician to the court, and a member of the Imperial Academy of Sciences. He produced a paper On the Motions of the Planets, which some, from its excellence, have been disposed to attribute to his father.

EULER, Christopher, the youngest son of Leonard, was born at Berlin, in 1743; manifested early a genius for mathematics; was first in the Prussian artillery service, and afterwards in that of the empress of Russia, who placed him at the head of a manufactory of arms, near the Gulf of Finland. He was an excellent astronomer also, and was one of the persons selected to observe the transit of Venus in 1769. The year of his decease is not known.

EUMENES, one of the most celebrated of Alexander's generals, was a native of Candiopolis, in the Thracian Chersonese. After the death of his sovereign, the government of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia was assigned to him. Severe contests ensued between him and the other generals, which, after he had displayed splendid talents and gained many victories, ended by his falling into the hands of Antigonus, who put him to death, B. C. 315.

EURIPIDES, one of the three great tragic bards of Greece, was the son of Mnesarchus, and was born in the isle of Salamis, about B. C. 480. Socrates, Prodicus, and Anaxagoras were his instructors in ethics, eloquence, and philosophy. Dramatic composition he began to attempt in his eighteenth year. Some of his finest works are said to have been composed in a solitary cave near Salamis. He wrote seventy-five, or, as others say, ninety-two tragedies, of which only nineteen are extant. In two marriages Euripides was unhappy, and this circumstance is supposed to have rendered him hostile to the female sex. He is said to have been torn to pieces by the king's hounds, in his seventy-fifth year, at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia; but some attribute his death to natural decay. In pathos and in moral sentiment Euripides far excels both of his illustrious rivals.

EUSDEN, Lawrence, an English poet, descended from an Irish family, and born at Spotsworth in Yorkshire, where his father was rector. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and upon taking orders, was made chaplain to lord Willoughby de Broke. He was also patronised by lord Halifax, and by the duke of Newcastle, whose marriage with lady Henrietta Godolphin he celebrated in verse, for which the duke, on Rowe's death, appointed him laureat 1718. This elevation was viewed with jealousy by the contemporary bards; and Pope, without any known cause, assigned to the laureat a distinguished place in his Dunciad. Eusden died at his rectory at Coningsby, Lincolnshire, 27th September 1730. He left a MS. translation of Tasso. Some of his poems are preserved in Nichols's select collection.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Pamphilus, from his friendship with the martyr of that name, is supposed to have been born A. D. 267, at Cesarea, of which city he became bishop in 315. He died in 339 or 340. He was one of the most learned and eloquent men of the Christian church. As, however, he was hostile to Athanasius, his character has not been spared by the partisans of that personage. St. Jerome calls him the prince of the Arians. His works were numerous, but many of them are lost. His Ecclesiastical History, which is extant, has gained for him the title of the Father of Ecclesiastical History; and his Evangelical Demonstration induced Scaliger to apply to him the epithet of Divine.

EUSTACE, John Skey, an officer who served in the American army during the war of the revolution. He held for some time the place of aid-de-camp to general Lee, and afterwards served in that capacity with general Greene. At the close of the war he removed to Georgia, and entered on the practice of law. While there he received the appointment of adjutant general. In 1794, his love of a military life led him to France, where he obtained the commission of brigadier-general, and afterwards that of major-general, in which station he served the French for a considerable time. In 1797, he commanded a division of the French army in Flanders. He returned to the United States in 1800, and spent the remainder of his life in retirement in the state of New-York. His death took place at Newburgh in 1805.

EUSTIS, William, M. D., governor of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780, graduated at Harvard college 1772. He was one of the physicians of Boston, and at the beginning of the revolutionary war was appointed the surgeon of a regiment. During the greater part of the war he was employed as hospital surgeon in the state of New-York. At the termination of the war he returned to his practice in Boston. In 1800 he was elected a member of congress. In 1809 he was appointed secretary of war, and resigned in 1812. In 1815 he was sent ambassador to Holland. After his return he was chosen a member of congress from Massachusetts in 1821, and in 1823, governor. He died 1825, aged 71.

EUTHYMIUS, Zigabenus, or Zigadenus, a Greek monk of Constantinople, the favorite of Alexius Comnenus. He wrote at the emperor's command, Panoplia dogmatica orthodoxæ fidei, or the whole armor of the orthodox faith, against heretics. He wrote nine other works besides. The time of his death is unknown, though it was after 1118.

EUTOCIUS, a Greek mathematician of Ascalon, in Palestine, who wrote commentaries on the conics of Apollonius, published in Halley's edition. He wrote also commentaries on Archimedes, published at Oxford 1792. He is a very learned, accurate, and judicious commentator. He flourished in the sixth century.

EUTYCHES, abbot of a convent near Constantinople, opposed violently the Nestorians, and maintained in his zeal that Christ's body was an aerial form, and therefore not human. These notions were censured in the council of Constantinople 448, and Eutyches was deposed, though another council was summoned to reverse the sentence; and a third composed of 630 bishops confirmed the sentence of the first, and declared that in Christ were united two natures without mixture or confusion.

✓ EUTYCHIUS, a christian author, born at Cairo 876. He practised physic with great success among the Mahometans, and afterwards became, in 933, patriarch of Alexandria, and exchanged his name of Said Ebn Batrick for its Greek correspondent word Eutyehius. He wrote, in Arabic, annals from the beginning of the world to 900, curious, but not always authentic. He wrote also, de rebus Siciliæ, preserved in M.S. in Cambridge public library; and died 950. An extract from his annals relating to the church of Alexandria appeared, in Arabic and Latin, at Oxford, by Selden, 1642, 4to., and the whole annals were published, Arabic and Latin, by Pocock, 1659, 4to.

EVANS, Abel, D.D., known best by the name of Dr. Evans the epigramatist, was of St. John's college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1699. He was intimate with the wits and poets of the times, especially Pope, and dean Swift. He was vicar of St. Giles', Oxford, and bursar of his college. His poetry is now forgotten. A good specimen of it may be seen in Nichols' select collections, especially his "Apparition," and "Vertumnus," and some epigrams.

EVANS, John, D.D., a dissenting minister born in Shropshire 1630. He was ordained minister of a meeting in Shropshire, and in 1716, succeeded Dr. Williams as pastor in Petty France, Westminster. He was popular as a preacher. He printed some occasional sermons, but his thirty-eight sermons on the christian temper is his best work, in great esteem with many divines. He died of the dropsy 1732, aged 52.

EVANS, Caleb, D.D., a native of Bristol, where his father was a dissenting baptist minister. He became also himself a preacher and instructed young people for the dissenting ministry. He died 1791, aged 54. He published scripture doctrine of the son and holy spirit,—hymns for public worship,—address to serious professors of Christianity—the doctrine of atonement or Christ crucified.

EVANS, John, deputy governor of Pennsylvania, arrived in that capacity December, 1703. His administration was unpopular, and he was removed by impeachment. Gookin succeeded him in March, 1709.

EVANS, Nathaniel, minister and poet, was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1742, and graduated at the college in that city in 1765. Having been ordained by the bishop of London, he entered on a mission near the close of that year, under the patronage of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, in Gloucester county, New-Jersey, where after laboring nearly ten years, he died 29th October, 1767. He had a high reputation for talents, and left a variety of manuscripts, from which a selection of poetry and prose was soon after published.

EVANS, Lewis, eminent for his acquaintance with American geography, was a surveyor in Pennsylvania, and died in June 1756. He made many journeys into the neighboring colonies, and had been frequently employed in surveying lands purchased of the natives. He had collected a great store of materials from other sources. From these he compiled a map of the middle colonies, and of the adjacent country of the Indians lying northward and westward. The first edition of it was published in 1749, and a second in 1755, accompanied with an explanatory pamphlet. The first edition of this map was chiefly limited to New-York, New-Jersey, and Delaware; the second was much enlarged, being made a general map of the middle British colonies, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New-Jersey, New-York, Connecticut and Rhode Island, and the country of the confederate Indians.

EVANS, Oliver, a mechanic, was a descendant of Evan Evans, D.D., the first episcopal minister of Philadelphia, who died in 1728. He made various improvements in the arts. His iron foundry, steam factory, and steam mill, were located at Philadelphia. He died at New York April 15th, 1819, aged 64. He published the young engineer's guide 1805; miller and millwright's guide, 23 plates 1807.

EVARTS, Jeremiah, secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, graduated at Yale college, 1802. From 1803 to 1804, he was the instructor of the academy at Peacham, and afterwards studied law with judge Chauncey of New Haven, where he commenced practice. In 1810 he removed to Charlestown near Boston in order to become editor of the Panoplist, a religious and literary monthly publication. In 1820 the Missionary Herald was substituted in place of the Panoplist, and published under the authority of the American Board. This work was also committed to him. He had been chosen treasurer of the Board in 1812, and the next year one of the prudential committee. He served as treasurer till 1822. In 1821, he succeeded Dr. Worcester as corresponding secretary, in which office he continued nearly ten years till his death. He died 1831 aged 50. Besides his labors in editing the Panoplist, he wrote the ten annual reports of the American Board from 1821, to 1830, the last of which contains a most weighty and valuable discussion on the future growth of this country, and the means of saving it from ruin. His essays, twenty-four in number, on the rights and claims of the Indians under the signature of William Penn were published 1829; and he subsequently wrote various other pieces on the same subject, one of which is an article in the N. American Review. He edited the volume of speeches on the Indian bill, and wrote the introduction.

EVANSON, Edward, a native of Warrington, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, after which he became curate to his uncle at Mitcham, Surrey, and then obtained in 1763, South Mimms living, Middlesex. In 1770, he was presented to the living of Tewksbury, Gloucestershire, and afterwards to Longdon, Worcestershire. His conduct in these parishes, and the alterations which he presumed to introduce in the liturgy and in the forms of the church duty, highly offended his auditors, but though he escaped the punishment of the ecclesiastical law, from some irregularity in the proceedings adopted against him, his unpopularity continued to increase and he resigned his livings in 1778. He afterwards resided at Mitcham, where he took some pupils, and died at Colford, Gloucestershire, 25th September, 1805, aged 74. He published without his name, in 1772, the doctrines of a trinity and the incarnation of God, examined on the principles of reason and common sense, &c.—the dissonance of the four generally received evangelists 1792, 8vo.—Argument against and for the observance of Sunday, &c.—letter to Dr. Priestley, —reflection on the state of religion in christendom, &c.—and he was also engaged in a controversy with bishop Hurd, on the subject of prophecy. An account of the prosecution established against him was published 1774, fol.

EVELYN, John, L.L.D., a native of Surrey, was born at Wotton, in 1620; was educated at Baliol College, Oxford; studied for a while at the Middle Temple; and then sought refuge on the continent from the storms of civil war, and resided in France and Italy till 1651. After his return to England, he gave his time to literary pursuits. The Restoration, to which he had lent the aid of his pen, introduced him into public life. He was appointed one of the commissioners for sick and wounded seamen, and for rebuilding St. Paul's Church, and also a member of the board of trade. When the Royal Society was established he was one of the first who was nominated a fellow. James II. made him one of the commissioners for the office of lord privy seal, and William III. gave him the situation of treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. His devotion to literature, however, continued undiminished, and he produced many valuable works. Among them are, Sylva, or a Discourse on Forest Trees; Terra, a Philosophical Discourse of Earth; Numismata, or a Discourse of Medals; Sculptura, or the History and Art of Chalcography; and Acetaria, a Discourse of Sallets. He died in 1706. It was a happy addition to the virtues and extensive powers of mind which he possessed, that he was in easy and independent circumstances, which left him no wish unsatisfied, which a man of worth and virtue could form. His library was large and selected; his grounds and gardens about his mansion were neatly cultivated, and adorned with all the embellishments of nature and art which his fertile genius could suggest; and among his friends he could number the greatest and the most ingenious and learned men of the times. His services to literature and mankind have been celebrated by Cowley, Joseph Glanville, Dr. Wotton, bishop Burnet, Roger North, Morhoff and others. His life was a course of inquiry, study, curiosity, instruction, and benevolence.

EVELYN, John, son of the preceding, was born 14th January 1654. When little more than 15, he wrote that elegant Greek poem which is prefixed to the second edition of his father's Sylva. The powers of genius thus early displayed were cultivated with the greatest attention, and gave birth to some other original pieces of poetry, inserted in Dryden's miscellanies. He also translated, in elegant language, the four books of gardens from the poems of Rhenatus Rapinns, 1673—besides Alexander's life, from Plutarch, inserted in the 4th volume of Plutarch, by several hands—and the history of the grand visiers, with the secret intrigues of the seraglio, 1677, 8vo. He died in the flower of his age, in London, 24th March 1698, aged 45.

EVELYN, Sir George Augustus William Shuckburgh, whose original name was Shuckburgh, was M. P. for the county of Warwick, and a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He died in 1804, in his fifty-fourth year. He was an excellent mathematician. To the Transactions of the Royal Society he contributed various papers, among which are, Observations made in Savoy, to ascertain the Height of Mountains by the Barometer; on the Temperature of Boiling Water; and an Account of the Endeavors to ascertain a Standard Weight and Measures. In the endeavors recorded by the last of these papers he took a very active part.

EVERARD, Sir Richard, baronet, governor of North Carolina under the proprietors, was appointed in 1724, but did not arrive in the colony until 1725. Burrington was his predecessor. His administration was disturbed by frequent altercations with the council. In 1729, the proprietors of Carolina surrendered the province into the hands of the king, who appointed Burrington governor of the northern division. He died in London, Feb. 17th, 1733, and was succeeded by his son Richard, in his title and estate.

EVERETT, Solomon, a physician, died at Canton, Con. in July 1822. He bequeathed 10,000 dollars to religious and missionary purposes.

EVERETT, David, editor of the Boston Patriot, graduated at Dartmouth college 1795, and engaged in the profession of the law in Boston. In 1809 he commenced the Patriot. In 1811 he was appointed register of probate, he held the office but a short time. In Sept. 1812 he commenced the Pilot, a paper devoted to Dewitt Clinton. He removed to Marietta and died there in 1813, aged 44. He published Common Sense in dishabille, or the Farmer's monitor, 1799; Davanzel a tragedy, 1800; essay on the rights and duties of nations; Junius Americanus in Boston Gazette in defence of J. Adams.

EVERMOND, St. Charles de St. Denis lord of, a well known French writer of a noble family in Normandy, born at St. Denis le Guast, April 1st, 1613. He was educated in the college of Clermont, Paris, and at Caen, and being a younger son, was intended for the law, but his inclinations turned to a military life, and before he was sixteen he obtained an ensigncy. He signalized himself in the army, and was as well known for his politeness and literary accomplishments, as for his valor in the field, so that the duke of Engbien admiring his character made him lieutenant of his guards to have him near his person. He was at the siege of Arras in 1640, and served in the campaigns of Rocroy and Friburg, and was wounded in the knee in the battle of Nortlingen. In the campaign of 1649 he served in Flanders, and soon after he accompanied Mazarin in the negotiation and conclusion of a treaty with the Spanish ministry. Of this journey and negotiation he gave a written account to the marquis of Crequi, which contained such severe reflections on the character of Mazarin, and such odious charges of sacrificing the honor of France, to private interest, that the composition was considered as treasonable, and though the cardinal was dead, the writer was obliged to fly to Holland, in 1661, from the persecution of the court. From Holland he immediately passed to England, where he had been sent the year before by the French king to congratulate Charles on his restoration, and he was received with great courtesy by Buckingham, and the English nobility. Devoting himself here to literature, and the society of his friends, he did not however forget his native country, and he solicited his return from the court, but to no purpose. At last the French king relented, and offers of reconciliation were sent by count Grammont, but St. Evermond now refused to quit a country where he had been so hospitably treated, and where his old age and infirmities could meet with a continuation of long experienced comforts. He died on the 9th of September, 1703, in his 95th year, and was buried in Westminster-abbey.

EWALD, John, a native of Copenhagen, who, in the hopes of seeing the world, embraced the military profession, and became a sergeant in the Prussian service. He afterwards deserted from his regiment, and returned to Denmark, where he studied divinity, but did not enter into orders. Poetry was his favorite pursuit, and, to enlarge his understanding, he studied the best English poets. He wrote poems in the style of Ossian—Adam and Eve, a dramatic poem—a theatrical piece called the fisherman—and other poems, which possess great merit and rank high in the temple of poetry. He died 1781, aged 33, and his works were collected together at Copenhagen in 1791, in 4 vols.

EWING, John, D.D., minister in Philadelphia, and provost of the college in that city, graduated at Princeton college 1752, and afterwards accepted the appointment of a tutor. He pursued his theological studies under the direction of Dr. Allison. At the age of twenty-six he was employed as the instructor of the philosophical classes in the college of Philadelphia, during the absence of Dr. Smith, who was then provost. In 1753 he accepted an unanimous call from the first presbyterian church in Philadelphia, of which he continued a minister till his death. In 1779 he was elected provost of the university of Pennsylvania. He died 1802, aged 70. He published a few sermons, and several communications in the transactions of the American philosophical society. His lectures on natural philosophy were published 1809.

EYCK, John Van, brother and disciple to Hubert Van Eyck, died 1441, aged 71. He is supposed to be the inventor of painting in oil, which he discovered by mixing linseed oil in the composition of a brilliant varnish. The secret was conveyed to Italy by one of his pupils, and divulged to the world. He is sometimes called John of Bruges. His historical pieces and landscapes are much admired.

EYMAR, A.M. d', a deputy from Forcalquier to the states-general in 1789, evinced his attachment to the opinions and the system of Rousseau, as a lover of republicanism. He was sent as ambassador to Piedmont, and discovered the treaty which the Sardinian king had made to espouse the cause of the confederates against France; and in consequence of this, by his intrigues, he forced the unfortunate monarch from his Italian dominions. He was afterwards prefect of Leman, and died at Geneva 1805. He wrote some small tracts, not devoid of merit.

EZRA, Juan Josaphat Ben, a Spanish divine, born in America, who professed himself a convert from judaism to the Catholic faith. Towards the middle of the eighteenth century he published an account of his sentiments, under the title of "Vendida del Mesias en Gloria y Magestad," reprinted at Paris in 1825, 5 vols. 12mo.

F.

FABER, John, a German divine, born in Suabia, and, from one of his works against the reformers, called the Mallet of Heretics. He was made, 1526, confessor to Ferdinand, king of the Romans, and in 1531, advanced to the see of Vienna, where he died 1542, aged 63. He owed his elevation to his zeal in the defence of the papists against Luther and his adherents. His works, which display warmth and fluency of language, are contained in 3 vols. folio, Cologne, 1537-1541.

FABER, Basil, a zealous Lutheran, born at Soraw in Lusatia. He was teacher in the schools of Nordhausen, Tennstadt, and Quedlinburg, and rector of Erfurt. His chief, and most valuable work is Thesaurus Eruditionis Scholasticæ, published 1571, and improved afterwards by Cellarius and others. The best edition is 2 vols. fol. 1735. Faber died 1576.

FABERT, Abraham, an officer, who raised himself, by his extraordinary merit, to the dignity of marshal of France under Louis XIV. He distinguished himself in 1635, at the siege of Turin 1640, when he was badly wounded, at the siege of Perpignan 1642, and in 1654 at the taking of Stenai. As he was not duly qualified by nobility of ancestors, he refused the collar of the royal order, observing, he would not be decorated with a cross, with his soul disgraced by an imposture. Though brave, he was childishly addicted to astrological calculations.

FABIAN, a saint of the Romish church, made pope 326. He was active in the dissemination of christianity and the building of churches, and he suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Decius.

FABIUS, Maximus Rullianus, a Roman, master of the horse to the dictator Papirius. He triumphed over seven nations, and was himself dictator, B. C. 237.

FABIUS, Maximus Quintus, an illustrious Roman, who opposed Annibal in Italy, and in consequence of his dilatory, but salutary measures, was called Cunctator. When the senate refused to ratify a ransom of prisoners on which he had agreed, he sold his estates to pay the money. He died B. C. 203.

FABRE, N. a native of Languedoc, famous for his filial piety. When his father was condemned to the gallies for his adherence to Calvinism, in 1752, he, unperceived, took his place among the condemned, and remained for six years in confinement, till this virtuous sacrifice was made known to Mirepoix, the governor of the province, who liberated him, and presented him to the court as an illustrious character.

FABRE, D'EGLANTINE, Philip Francis Mazaire, was born at Carcassone, 28th Dec. 1755, and, with a restless spirit, became successively an actor, a comic writer, and a statesman. In the convention he was the friend and confidential associate of Danton, Des Moulins, and the other promoters of the massacres, and of the miseries of France, and though originally poor, he soon became very rich. Robespierre, who viewed his assumed consequence with jealousy, hurled him from his eminence before the revolutionary tribunal, and he was guillotined 5th April, 1794. He wrote some plays which possess merit, and he is particularly known as the person who recommended and introduced in France that puerile calendar which combated the habits, the opinions, and the prejudices of the rest of Europe.

FABRETTI, Raphael, a learned antiquary, born at Urbino in 1619. He studied at Cagli and Urbino, and then practised at Rome as an advocate. He was sent by cardinal Imperiali to negotiate into Spain, and he conducted himself there with such success and ability that he was made procurator fiscal of the kingdom. After 13 years' residence in Spain he returned to Rome, where he was appointed judge of appeals to the capitol, and afterwards auditor of the legation of Urbino, under Cerri the legate. Some time after he was engaged in drawing up the apostolical briefs to the pope's vicar, and lastly was secretary of the memorials to pope Alexander VIII. After Alexander's death he devoted himself to his favorite pursuits, the study of antiquities, and with his horse, to which his friends gave the name of Marco Polo, he made excursions in the neighborhood of Rome to visit and examine whatever was most rare, curious, and valuable. Innocent XII. had such respect for him that he drew him from his retirement to make him master of the secrets of the pope's temporal state. He died 7th Jan. 1700. He published these valuable works, De Aquis, & Aquæductibus Veteris Romæ Dissertationes tres, 4to. 1680.—De Columnâ Trajanâ Syntagma, fol. 1683. Jasitheï ad Gronovium Apologemâ, in ejusque Titivilitiâ, sive de Tito Livio Somnia Annuadversiones 1686, 4to.—Inscriptionum Antiquarum, Explicatio, fol. 1699, &c. He was learned, and in his researches indefatigable.

FABRICIUS, Cains, a Roman general, who obtained some victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and indignantly rejected the offers of Pyrrhus, who attempted to bribe his integrity. He afterwards discovered to Pyrrhus the plot which his physician had formed to poison him. He died B. C. 250.

FABRICIUS, George, a learned German, born at Chemnitz, in Misnia, 1516, and famous for his Latin poetry. He travelled to Italy as tutor to a nobleman, and at Rome he composed his work called Roma, containing an interesting and very animated description of that city. After returning home, he was for 26 years master of the school of Messen, where he died 1571. His poems, which are written with great powers of genius, and in the most elegant and correct language, appeared at Basle 1567, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote also some odes, hymns, &c. besides prose works, such as the Annals of Messen, in seven books, Origines Saxonice, 2 vols. folio, 2 vols. on the affairs of Germany.

FABRICIUS, Jerome, an Italian physician, called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth. He studied languages at Padua, and acquired his medical knowledge under Fallopius. He practised for 40 years at Padua, and with such repute that Venice, sensible of his great merits, settled an annual pension of 1000 crowns of gold on him, besides the honor of a golden chain, and of a statue. He died about 1603, and left 2 vols. folio, the one on surgery, published Holland, 1723, and the other on anatomy, Leyden, 1738.

FABRICIUS, John Albert, D.D., a learned German, born at Leipsic, 11th Nov. 1663, and educated at Quedlinburg. He showed astonishing powers of application, and after staying five years in the house of his friend Meyer at Hamburgh, he was chosen professor of eloquence in that city 1699. He was invited by the langrave of Hesse Cassel, to settle in his dominions, but so great was his reputation at Hamburgh, that the senators prevailed upon him, by a superior salary, not to relinquish his residence among them. This most indefatigable scholar, equally admired for his modesty, and the simplicity of his manners, died at Hamburgh, 3d April, 1736. Of his numerous works, the most useful are Bibliotheca Latina, sive Notitia Auctorum Veterum Latinorum quorumcumque Scripta ad nos pervenerunt, 2 vols. 4to. republished by Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo.—Bibliotheca Græca, sive Notitia Scriptorum Veterum Græcorum, quorumcumque Monumenta Integra, aut Fragmenta, Edita extant, tum Plerorumque ex MSS. & Deperditis, 14 vols. 4to.—Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Collectus, 3 vols. 8vo. 1719.—Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti, 2 vols. 8vo. 1722, and 1723.—Bibliographia Antiquaria, sive Introductio in Notitiam Scriptorum qui Antiquitates Hebraicas, Græcas, Romanas, & Christianas Scriptis illustraverunt, 4to. 1716.—Delectus Argumentorum, &

Syllabus Scriptorum qui veritatem Relig. Christ. adversus Atheos, &c. asseruerunt, 4to. 1725.—Salutaris Lex Evangelii, 4to. 1731.—Bibliotheca Medice & Infimæ Latinitate, 5 vols. 8vo. 1734, and 6 vols. 4to. 1754, Padua.

FABRICIUS, John Christian, the greatest of modern entomologists, was born, in 1742, at Tundern, in Sleswick. He was the pupil and friend of Linnæus. Medicine was the profession which he adopted; but his principal attention was turned to entomology, and, for the purpose of improving that science, he visited all the museums of northern and central Europe. He died at Copenhagen, in 1807. The calamities to which his country was then exposed are said to have been mainly instrumental in causing his death. Fabricius was counsellor to the Danish monarch, and professor of rural and political economy. He is the author of Systema Entomologia; Philosophia Entomologia; Entomologia Systematica; Systema Eleutheratorum; and other works, both on his favorite science and on political economy. It is from the organs of the mouth that Fabricius classifies the insect tribes.

FABRIS, Nicholas, an Italian mechanician, was born at Chioggia, in 1731, and died there in 1801. He was of the clerical profession. Among his numerous and ingenious inventions were, a pianoforte which, while it played, noted down the music; a barrel which excluded air by contracting in the interior as the liquor was drawn off; a wooden hand to beat time; a watch, which marked at once the French and Italian hours, minutes and seconds, with the equinoxes and solstices; and a species of clock, of which a magnet was the motive power.

FABRONI, Angiolo, a native of Marradi in Tuscany, educated at Pienza and at Rome. He was made by Peter Leopold prior of St. Lorenzo's church at Florence, and afterwards curator of Pisa university. He wrote an account of the learned men of Italy in the 17th and 18th centuries, of which 21 vols. were published, and one was left unfinished. He published also an account of Cosmo, Lorenzo, and the other illustrious members of the house of Medici, besides some religious tracts. He died at Pisa 1802, aged 70.

FABROT, Charles Hannibal, a French lawyer, born at Aix in Provence, 1580, where he became advocate and professor of law. In 1617 he came to Paris, and in 1637 he was prevailed upon by Seguier the chancellor, who granted him a pension, to give an edition of the Basilicæ, or constitutions of the Eastern emperors. This great work appeared in 7 vols. fol. 1647, with a Latin translation and notes, and two years after he published Cedrenus, Nicetas, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Constantine Manasses and Glycas, in 2 vols. fol. with curious notes. In 1653 he published the works of Cujacius, revised and with notes, 10 vols. fol. His great application brought on disorders, which put an end to his life, 1659. He wrote besides notes on the Theodosian code, and a treatise against Salsmasius.

FACIO, Bartholomeo, a learned Italian, born at Spezzia near Genoa. He was secretary to Alphonso king of Naples, and intimate with Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius II. He died about 1457. He wrote de Bello Veneto Claudiano, seu inter Venetos & Genuenses, anno 1391, 8vo. 1573—de Rebus ab Alphonso Neapolit. gestis, Libri decem—de Humanæ Vitæ Felicitate ad Alphonsum Neap. Reg.—de Viris Illustr. sui Temporis, 1475. His enmity to Laurentius Valla was almost proverbial.

FACUNDUS, bishop of Hermianum in Asia, known for his defence of the three chapters, at the council of Constantinople, 547. In consequence of his zeal on this occasion, and in favoring the Nestorians, he was banished by Justinian, but in his exile he still defended his opinions, and wrote no less than 12 books addressed to the emperor.

FAERNUS, Gabriel, a native of Cremona, known as a critic and a poet in the 16th century. He was the favorite of cardinal de Medicis, afterwards Pius IV. He wrote Latin elogies, besides pieces of criticism, and notes on Terence, so valuable that Bentley has inserted them whole in his edition of that poet. He wrote also in iambic verse 100 fables, so much in the style of Phædrus, that Thnanus has accused him of concealing from the world that Latin fabulist then unknown, to procure celebrity for his own composition; but of his 100 fables only five treat the same subjects as Phædrus, and therefore the idea of either deceit or plagiarism is puerile. Faernus died at Rome 1561.

FAGEL, Gaspar, an eminent Dutch statesman, was born at Haerlem, in 1629, and died in 1638. He was grand pensionary of Holland, and distinguished himself on various occasions; particularly by his firmness when Louis XIV. invaded the country, and by the activity and spirit with which he seconded the plans of the prince of Orange, for the expulsion of James II. from England.

FAGIUS, Paul, a protestant minister, born at Rheinzabern in Germany, 1504. His German name was Buchlein. He was educated at Heidelberg and Strasburg, and after making great proficiency in Hebrew, which then was become fashionable, he undertook in 1527 the care of a school at Isna where he married. He afterwards abandoned this employment, and entering into orders he distinguished himself in 1541, by his zeal in administering to the necessities and comforts of the poor, during the plague which raged at Isna and the neighboring places, from the infection of which he happily escaped. He afterwards preached at Strasburg, and became professor at Heidelberg, where he published some works for the advancement of Hebrew literature. During the persecution of the protestants in Germany he was invited to England by Crammer, where he went with Bucer in 1549. These two learned men were then engaged at Cambridge to complete a new translation of the bible, Fagius of the Old, and Bucer of the New Testament. This was never completed, as Fagius died of a fever at Cambridge, in Nov. 1550, and Bucer about a year after. The bodies of these two protestant divines were dug up and burnt under the gallows, in the reign of Mary. Fagius wrote on the Hebrew language and on the Targums.

FAGNANO, Julius Charles count of, marquis of Toschi, a native of Sinigaglia, who published at Pesaro 1750, his works in 2 vols. 4to. in which he treats in a clear manner of the discoveries of the property and of the use of the geometrical curve, called the Lemniscate. He died 1760, aged 70.

FAGON, Guy Crescent, an eminent physician, born at Paris. He early supported the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and gained the royal approbation by his indefatigable researches in collecting plants on the Alps, and in the South of France. He was made professor of botany and chemistry in the royal gardens, and gradually rose to be physician to Louis XIV. in 1693. It was by his advice that the king sent Tournefort to collect plants in the East. Though of a delicate constitution he lived by proper regimen to the age of 80, and died 1713, leaving two sons, one of whom became a bishop, and the other a counsellor of state.

FAHRENHEIT, Gabriel Daniel, an ingenious experimentalist, born at Dantzic, 14th May, 1686. He was intended for commerce, but his genius was bent to philosophical pursuits. In 1720 he improved the thermometer by substituting mercury for spirits of wine, and fixed the extremity of his scale at the point of cold, which he had observed in Iceland in 1709, but at Petersburg the cold had been known forty degrees below the ° of this thermometer. The English in general have adopted his scale, but the French adhere to Reaumur's. He travelled through Holland and on the continent in pursuit of knowledge, and died 16th Sept. 1736. He wrote a Dissertation on 'Thermometers 1724.

FAIRCLOUGH, Samuel, a native of Haveril, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge. He was minister of Barnardiston, and afterwards of Ketton, Suffolk, and was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He was a most amiable character in private life, and though he disapproved of some things in the liturgy, he was the friend of episcopacy. He published a sermon preached at sir Nat. Barnardiston's funeral, and some other tracts, and died 1673, aged 84.

FAIRFAX, Edward, an English poet in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, son of sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, Yorkshire. He early displayed poetical talents, and according to Dryden himself a judge of merit, he deserved to be ranked above Spenser in point of harmony. His first attempt was a translation of Tasso's Godfrey of Bouillon, a performance very respectable, and highly valued by the wits of the times, and esteemed greatly by James and Charles I. He wrote also some eloges, besides controversial treatises on the pope's infallibility, &c. and deserved the amiable character of a modest, benevolent man, who preferred solitude and peace to the war and tumults of the times. He died about the year 1632.

FAIRFAX, Thomas, Lord, one of the principal generals in the civil wars of England, was the eldest son of Lord Fairfax, and was born, in 1611, at Denton, in Yorkshire. The love of a military life induced him to quit St. John's College, Cambridge, to serve as a volunteer, in the Netherlands, under Vere. When the war broke out between Charles I. and the Parliament, Fairfax espoused the cause of the latter. In some of his earliest actions he was unsuccessful; but he distinguished himself at Marston Moor, and he was appointed general in chief when Essex resigned. After having been victorious at Naseby, he reduced the West to obedience, and compelled Colchester to surrender. To the execution of the dethroned monarch he was hostile. At length, he withdrew from all public employments, and he ultimately contributed to the restoration of Charles II. He died in 1671. Fairfax wrote his own Memoirs, and a few poems.

FAIRTHORNE, William, an English painter, who became a soldier during the civil wars, and being taken at Basing-house was banished for refusing to swear allegiance to Cromwell. He studied abroad under Champagné, and on his return home applied himself chiefly in engraving, in which he also excelled. He wrote a book "upon drawing, graving, and etching," celebrated by Flatman the poet, and died at Blackfriars 1691, aged 75. His son William acquired celebrity by mezzotinto engraving.

FALCONBERG, Mary, countess of, the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and second wife of Thomas viscount Falconberg. She possessed great beauty, and so much spirit and activity that, as Burnet observes, she was more worthy to be protector than her brother. On Richard's deposition she exerted herself strenuously for the restoration of Charles II. with whom her husband was in great favor. She died 14th March, 1712.

FALCONER, William, a poet, born about 1730, was the son of a barber at Edinburgh; entered the merchant service when young; rose to be second mate; and was cast away in the Levant. He was, afterwards, a midshipman in the Royal George, and, next, purser of the Glory. In 1769, he was appointed purser of the Aurora, in which ship he is supposed to have been lost, on her voyage to India. He is the author of 'The Shipwreck, a poem; some minor poetical productions; and a Marine Dictionary. His lesser poems, with the exception of 'The Storm, a song, have little to recommend them; but his Shipwreck is a work which entitles him to hold an honorable place among British poets.

FALCONER, William, a physician, was born in 1743, and died in 1824, at Bath, where he was highly popular in his medical capacity. To him belongs the discovery of the properties of carbonic acid gas, which has been erroneously attributed to Dr. Priestley. He wrote many works on medical subjects; among which are, On the Influence of Climate; On the Bath Waters; On the Poison of Copper; and On the Influence of the Passions. He also translated Arrian's Voyage round the Euxine Sea.

FALCONET, Camille, a French physician, the friend of Malebranche, born at Lyons 1671. He was elected in 1716 into the French academy, and from his excellent collection of nearly 500,000 volumes, he liberally enriched the royal library with such books as were deficient. He lived to the age of 91 in 1762, and is supposed to have, like Fagon, prolonged life by his medical skill. He wrote a translation of Villemont's Systema Planetarum—an edition of the Pastorals of Daphnis and Chloe, translated by Amyot—an edition of Desperier's Cymbalum Mundi, besides Dissertations.

FALCONET, Stephen Maurice, a French sculptor, was born at Paris, in 1716, and died in 1791. His parents were in humble circumstances, he received little education, and was apprenticed to a cutter of barber's blocks; but he spent every leisure moment in modelling; obtained the patronage of Lemoine, the sculptor; rose to eminence as an artist; and, by dint of study, became an excellent scholar. In 1766, he was invited to Russia, to execute the statue of Peter the Great, and he resided there for twelve years. Among his best works are, Milo of Cotrona; Pygmalion; a threatening Cupid; Moses; David; and St. Ambrose. His writings, on the fine arts, form six volumes 8vo.

FALIERI, Ordelafo, a doge of Venice, who went with a fleet in 1102 to assist Baldwin of Jerusalem in the conquest of Syria. On his return he conquered Dalmatia, Croatia, and other provinces, and afterwards lost his life at the siege of the revolted city of Zara in Dalmatia, 1120.

FALIERO, Marino, a Venetian noble, after having held several important offices, succeeded Andrew Dandolo, as doge of Venice, in 1354. He was then seventy-six years of age, and had a young and beautiful wife. Jealous of Michael Steno, he quarrelled with and was insulted by him at a masquerade. For the insult Steno was condemned to a month's imprisonment; a punishment which Faliero deemed so inadequate, that, burning with revenge, he entered into a plot with the plebeians, to overturn the government, and massacre the patricians. The conspiracy was discovered on the night before it was to be carried into effect, and Faliero was decapitated, April 17, 1355. This story forms the subject of a tragedy by Lord Byron.

FALK, John Peter, a learned Swede, born at Westrogothia, and educated at Upsal, where he studied medicine and also botany under Linnaeus. He was made professor of botany in the Apothecaries' garden at Petersburg, and keeper of the natural history cabinet, and he published Observations on his travels, 3 vols. 4to. 1785, Petersburg. In a fit of melancholy, to which he was often subject, he unfortunately destroyed himself, 1774, aged 47.

FALKENSTEIN, John Henry, a native of Franconia, made, in 1714, director of the academy of noblemen at Erlingen. He was next in the service of the bishop of Eichstadt, and afterwards of the margrave of Anspach. He left the protestant for the Roman catholic religion, and died 1760, aged 78. He published the Antiquities of Nordgan in the diocese of Eichstadt, 3 vols. folio, and other works on ecclesiastical and antiquarian subjects.

FALLOPIUS, Gabriel, a celebrated Italian physician and anatomist, born at Modena, 1490. He travelled through Europe, and afterwards practised with the greatest success and reputation. He was professor of anatomy at Pisa, 1548, and three years after at Padua, where he died 9th Oct. 1563, aged 72. He made various discoveries in anatomy, and especially the tubes by which the ova descend from the female ovarium into the uterus, called from him "Fallopian tubes." His works, which are all on subjects of medicine and anatomy, were published in 3 vols. fol. Venice, 1584, and 1606.

FALSTER, Christian, a Danish critic of Flensburg, the time of whose death is not accurately ascertained. He wrote Supplementum Linguae Latinae, 1717—Animadversiones Epistolicae—Questiones Romanae—Cogitationes Philologicae—Sermo Panegyricus, Vigilia prima Noctium Ripensium—Amœnitates Philologicae, 3 vols.—the 14th satire of Juvenal translated into Danish, 1731.

FANCOURT, Samuel, a dissenting minister, born in the west of England. He settled at Salisbury, where for 20 years he took some pupils, and had the care of a congregation; but his writings against Calvinism exposed him to persecution, and driven from his residence, he went to London. About the year 1740, or 1745, he established the first circulating library in the kingdom; but, however, his plans did not succeed to his wishes, and after advertising for subscribers, and offering to teach the classics, so as to enable his pupils to write and speak fluently in 12 months for 12 guineas, he sunk into poverty and neglect, and from the corner of one of the streets of the Strand, where he had a shop, he retired to Hoxton square, where his indigence was relieved by the charitable contributions of his friends. He died 8th June, 1768, aged 90. His publications, which were numerous, are mentioned in the Gent. Magazine, 1784, p. 274.

FANEUIL, Peter, founder of Faneuil Hall in Boston, died March 3, 1743. He possessed a large estate, and he employed it in doing good. While his charities were extensive, his liberal spirit induced him to present to the town of Boston a stately edifice for the accommodation of the inhabitants at their public meetings.

FANNING, Edmund, L.L.D., was a native of Connecticut, and was graduated at Yale college in 1757. He studied law and settled at Hillsborough, North Carolina, and at the time of the insurrection of that state in 1770, suffered severely from the regulators, in his person and property. He embraced the British cause at the commencement of the revolution, and commanded a party of royalists, and was celebrated for his talents, activity, and severity, towards the Americans. After leaving the country, he was appointed lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia and of Prince Edward's Island, and promoted to the rank of general. He died at London in 1818.

FANSHAW, sir Richard, L.L.D., an English gentleman, was born 1607. After studying at Cambridge, he travelled on the continent, and in 1655, was engaged in the service of Charles I. who sent him as envoy to Spain. In 1644 he attended the king at Oxford, and was afterwards appointed secretary to Charles Prince of Wales. He was treasurer of the navy under Rupert, in 1648, and was created 1650, a baronet by Charles II. and sent as envoy to Spain. He was taken at the battle of Worcester, and imprisoned in London, from which however he was liberated in consequence of a severe illness, by giving bail. In 1659, he visited the king at Breda, by whom he was knighted, and at the restoration he was made master of requests, and secretary of the Latin language. He afterwards was ambassador in Portugal, to negotiate the marriage of Charles and the infanta Catharina, and on his return 1663, he was sworn of the privy council. He was in 1664 sent as ambassador to Philip IV. of Spain, with whose successor he concluded a treaty of peace in 1665. He died at Madrid 16th June, 1666. Though engaged in political affairs, he found time to write some respectable pieces, and among them a translation in rhyme of Guarini's Pastor Fido, 1646, a translation of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess, into Latin verse—Odes of Horace, translated into English—Virgil's fourth Æneid—and Camoens's Lusiad, translated into English, besides some poems, and original letters, published during his embassies in Spain and Portugal, 1702.

FANTIN-DESODOARDS, Anthony Stephen Nicholas, a political writer and historian, was born, in 1738, at Point de Beauvoisin, in Dauphiné, and died in 1820. He was originally an ecclesiastic, but adopted revolutionary principles, and was connected with Danton, Robespierre, and other demagogues. Among his works are, Continuations of Henault's and Velley's Histories of France; a Philosophical History of the French Revolution; and a History of the Revolutions of Europe subsequent to the Fall of the Roman Republic.

FAREL, William, an able reformer, born at Gap in Dauphiné 1489. He studied with great assiduity at Paris the Hebrew and Greek tongues, but soon after he became a teacher, the spirit of persecution against the protestants drove him from France. He went to Strasburg, and then to Switzerland, and he successfully engaged with the duke of Wirtemberg, to introduce the reformation into Montbeliard, Aigle, Morat, and other places. He afterwards went to Geneva, but his violence against popery was resisted by the clergy, and he retired, though in 1534 he was recalled. In 1538 he was again banished from Geneva with Calvin, and retired to Basil, and then to Neuchâtel. Zealous in the cause of reformation he labored assiduously as a preacher, and though exposed to a thousand dangers from persecution and from the jealousy of the papists, he escaped them all, and after increasing his proselytes at Metz and the neighboring places, he visited Calvin on his death-bed at Geneva 1564, and expired himself the next year on the 13th Sept. at Neuchâtel.

FARIN, Emanuel de Sousa, a Portuguese knight, who accompanied Rodrigo, as ambassador to Rome. He died at Madrid 1650, aged 60, reduced to poverty, by his negligence of his property. He wrote poems in a manly and nervous style, collected into seven volumes after his death, besides moral and political discourses, commentaries on the Lusiad of Camoens, a history of Portugal to the reign of Henry the cardinal, and Portuguese Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.

FARINGDON, Anthony, an English divine, born at Sunning, Berks, 1596. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor, and afterwards he was vicar of Bray, near Maidenhead, 1634, and divinity reader in Windsor chapel. In the civil wars, he was ejected from his parish, and reduced to great poverty, till invited by sir John Robinson, alderman of London, to officiate at St. Mary Magdalen, Milkstreet, London, where he died Sept. 1658. He published in 1657, a folio volume of his sermons, and after his death two other folio volumes of his MS. sermons, were published by his friends.

FARMER, Hugh, a dissenting minister, educated under Dr. Doddridge. He settled at Walthamstow, and lived in the house of his friend Mr. Snell, where he died 5th Feb. 1787. He wrote a dissertation on Miracles, 8vo.—a treatise on the Worship of Human Spirits among the Heathens, 8vo.—on Christ's Temptation, 8vo.—and on the Demoniacs, 8vo.

FARMER, Richard, D.D., a celebrated scholar and critic, was born at Leicester, England, May 4, 1735. His ancestors for several generations had resided in Aylesley, in Warwickshire, and one of them, with several children, emigrated from that place to New-England, and settled at Billerica, Mass. about 1673. He was educated at Emanuel College, in Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor, and took his degree of A.M. 1760. In 1766, he published "An Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare," in which he undertook to show that in the time of the bard, there existed translations of most of the classical writers, and that Shakspeare knew little or nothing of the ancients but by translations. This work, as it settled an important question, passed through several editions, and has been prefixed to a number of editions of Shakspeare. It gained him the notice and approbation of many distinguished scholars. In 1767, he was appointed one of the Whitehall preachers. In 1775, he was elected master of his college, on which occasion he took his degree of D.D. He obtained afterwards a prebend, and the chancellorship in Lichfield cathedral, and soon became the principal librarian at Cambridge university and served as vice-chancellor. Lord North conferred upon him a prebend of Canterbury, and the Earl of Chatham twice offered him a bishopric, but he preferred a residentiaryship of St. Paul's, which he exchanged for his prebend. He had collected materials for the history of his native town, which, with the engraved plates he had procured, he gave to Mr. Nichols for his history of Leicestershire. For a man of his rare endowments he published but little; the "Essay" referred to; "Notes on Shakspeare;" a "Poem on laying the first Stone of the Public Library;" a "Sonnet on the King's death," in 1760, "Directions for the study of English history;" and "Letter on Dennis the Critic," being all that are known, and these excepting the first two, were printed in periodicals. Dr. Farmer died 8th Sept. 1797, aged 62. He left no children. His youngest sister, who married the Rev. Richard Byron, great uncle to the poet, is still living in England at an advanced age.

FARNABY, Thomas, an eminent grammarian, born in London 1575. He was servitor of Merton college, Oxford, and was persuaded by the jesuits to leave his country and religion, and retire to Spain. Tired of the discipline of his new instructors, he at last with difficulty escaped, and went a voyage with sir Francis Drake, and sir John Hawkins, 1595. He afterwards served as a soldier in the Low Countries, and then returned to Cornwall, poor and destitute. He settled at Martock, Somersetshire, where he taught grammar with great success, and then came to London, where he met with much encouragement, and had not less than three hundred pupils. During the civil wars he became obnoxious to the parliament, because he had said it was better to have one king than 500. He was therefore imprisoned in Newgate, and though his enemies wished to transport him to America, he was removed to Ely house, Holborn, where he continued till within a year of his death. He died 12th June, 1647. His works were Notæ ad Juvenalis & Persii Satiras, 1612.—Notæ ad Seneceæ Tragœdias 1613,—ad Martialis Epigr. 1615,—ad Lucani Pharsalia, 1613,—Index Rhetoricus, 1625,—Florilegium Epigrammat. Græc. 1629,—Notæ ad Virgil, 1634, and Systema Grammatic. 1641. His works display every where great erudition, and his notes, says Boyle, are of great use, being short, learned, and designed to clear up the text.

FARNESE, Alexander, was born 1520. He was made bishop of Parma, by Clement VII. and advanced to the purple in 1534, by his grandfather Paul III. by whom he was employed as ambassador to Germany, France, and the Low Countries. His talents as a negotiator were very great, and he was respected for his learning, as well as patronage of literature, and of learned men. He died at Rome, 1589. Charles V. said of him, when dean of the sacred college, that if all the members resembled him, the college would be the most august assembly in the world.

FARNEWORTH, Ellis, an English divine, born at Bonteshall, Derbyshire, where his father was rector, and educated at Chesterfield and Eton, and then at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was presented to the rectory of Carsington, Derbyshire, 1762, by dean Yorke, and died there 25th March, 1763. He wrote the Life of pope Sixtus V. from the Italian of Leti, folio, 1754,—Davila's History of France, 2 vols. 4to. 1757,—Machiavel's works translated 1761, reprinted 1775, 4 vols. 8vo.

FARQUHAR, George, an eminent comic poet, son of a clergyman, born at Londonderry, 1673. He was educated at Dublin college, and afterwards engaged himself with a company of players. In this employment, at the representation of Dryden's Indian Emperor, he was nearly converting the play into a real tragedy, for forgetting to exchange his sword for a foil, he, as Guyomar, wounded his antagonist Vasquez so dreadfully that from that moment, he in terror bid adieu to the stage. He came to London in 1696, and at the repeated solicitations of Wilks the actor, he turned his thoughts to the composition of a theatrical piece. His opportunities of study and meditation were improved by the kindness of lord Orrery, who gave him a lieutenant's commission in his regiment. In 1698 his first comedy appeared, called "Love in a Bottle," and was well received. The success which it obtained he followed up, between 1698 and 1707, by supplying to the theatre The Constant Couple, Sir Harry Wildair, The Inconstant, The Twin Rivals, The Stage Coach, The Recruiting Officer, and The Beaux's Stratagem. Some of these still retain possession of the stage. He also published a volume of Miscellanies. In spite of his exertions, Farquhar was poor, and his difficulties were increased by his marriage with a portionless lady, who, being passionately attached to him had caused herself to be represented as the possessor of a large fortune. To his honor be it recorded, that he never even reproached her for the deception. He died in 1707. In the dramas of Farquhar there is much wit and sprightliness, unfortunately tinctured with the licentiousness which was the besetting sin of the drama in those days. For the success of his comedies, Farquhar is indebted to the natural delineation of his characters, the interesting tendency of his plots, and the flowing graces and sprightliness of his wit.

FASTOLFF, sir John, an English general, born at Yarnouth in Norfolk, about 1377. He attended the duke of Clarence, as lieutenant of Ireland, about 1405 and 1406, and in 1403 he married a rich widow of that kingdom, and soon after went over to France, where, under the English regecy, he was promoted to places of trust and honor. He returned home 1440, covered with laurels bravely won in the field, and in his private conduct now he exhibited the hospitable, generous, and benevolent man. He bestowed large legacies on Cambridge to build the schools of philosophy and civil law, and was a most liberal benefactor to Magdalen college, Oxford, founded by his friend Wainfleet. He died 1459, aged upwards of 80, according to what Caxton his contemporary has mentioned. Shakspeare has been severely censured for abusing this great and good man under the character of sir John Falstaff. The age and the name of these two knights are so different, that the apparent coincidence must be purely accidental. Fastolf, as is well observed, was a young and grave, discreet and valiant, chaste and sober commander abroad, and eminent for every virtue at home; but the Falstaff of the poet is an old, humorous, vaporing, cowardly, lewd, lying, drunken, debauchee. It is besides to be recollected that Shakspeare's Falstaff was first acted under the name of sir John Oldecastle, though modern critics dispute it.

FAUCHET, Claude, a French antiquarian, historiographer to Henry IV. He died 1601, aged 72, overwhelmed in debts. The monuments of his extensive reading and deep researches are found in his Gaulish and French Antiquities,—a treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church,—on the Origin of Knights, Armorial Bearings, and Heralds,—Origin of Dignities and Magistracies in France. These works printed together in 4to. 1610, are curious, but so inelegant that, it is said, the perusal of them gave Louis XIII. a distaste for reading.

FAUCHET, Claude, a native of Dorne in the Nivernois, who became vicar-general to the archbishop of Bruges, and preacher to Louis XVI. The theatrical manner, and ridiculous affectation of his delivery, however, offended the devotion of the monarch, and in consequence of this disgrace, Fauchet, at the revolution, was most hostile to the government. He was one of the most active in the destruction of the Bastille, and preached a thanksgiving sermon on the event. These extravagancies rendered him popular with the mob; he was deputy from Calvados in the national assembly and in the convention, and became the constitutional bishop of Bayeaux. He was at last accused as a disaffected person before the revolutionary tribunal, and guillotined 1793, in his 49th year. He wrote a panegyric on St. Lewis, before the French academy,—a funeral Oration for the duke of Orleans,—Discourse on Universal Manners, and Eloge on Benjamin Franklin.

FAUCHEUR, Michael le, a French protestant divine, admired as a preacher at Montpellier, Charonton, and Paris. After hearing him discourse on duelling, marshal de la Force said, "if a challenge was sent to me, I would refuse it." He died universally regretted at Paris, 1667. He wrote a treatise on Oratorical Action,—sermons in 8vo.—Christian Prayers and Meditations,—a treatise on the Eucharist, against cardinal Perron, Geneva, folio.

FAUGERES, Margaretta V., an American lady, was the daughter of Ann Elizabeth Bleecker, born in 1777, and was distinguished for her literary accomplishments. Her youth was spent at Tomhantic. She afterwards resided and married in New-York. Many of her poetical pieces were published in the periodical works of the day, and much admired. To the volume of her mother's works, which she published, she added memoirs of her own life, and several essays of her own, and afterwards she produced the tragedy of Bellisarius. By the profligacy of her husband Peter Faugeres, a physician of New-York, she was reduced to extreme poverty, and after his death, in 1798, resorted to teaching for support. She died in January, 1801.

FAULKNER, George, a printer of eminence, the first who raised his profession in Ireland to credit and respectability. He was the friend of dean Swift, and of lord Chesterfield, whose letters to him under the name of Atticus, are much admired. He had the misfortune to break his leg, in consequence of which Foote, with more humor than good breeding, introduced him in his Orators, 1762, in the character of Peter Paragraph. The insult was felt, and Faulkner commenced an action against the mimic, which, however was dropped by the interference of lord Townshend. He raised himself to opulence by the success of his "Journal," and was universally respected for his fair and upright conduct in his profession. He died Alderman of Dublin, 23th August 1775.

FAUQUIER, Francis, governor of Virginia from 1758 to 1767. He died 1768. He was well educated, had fine talents, sustained an excellent character, and his administration was very popular.

FAUR, Guy de, lord of Pibrac, a native of Toulouse, eminent as an advocate, and sent by Charles IX., as ambassador to the council of Trent, where he manfully defended the liberties of the Gallican church. In 1565 he was made advocate general in the parliament of Paris, and in 1570, counsellor of state. In 1572 he vindicated the massacre of St. Bartholomew, no doubt compelled by his superiors, as his own character was mild, humane, and far from vindictive. He made peace between the court and the protestants under Henry III., whom he had accompanied to Poland, when he was elected king there. He possessed great influence with his master, and was created one of the chief presidents of the court of law. He died 1584, aged 56. He published some speeches, but he is best known by his "Quatrains," or Moral Stanzas of four lines, so much admired at that time, that they were translated into all languages, and into English by Sylvester.

FAWCETT, Sir William, an English general, born at Shipden hall near Halifax, Yorkshire. He received his education at a grammar school in Lancashire, and early embraced the military profession, and served in Germany during the seven years' war under Eliot and Granby. His abilities were applauded by the king of Prussia, who made him liberal offers to accept a command in his army, but he preferred the service of his native country, and was gradually promoted to the rank of a general, and made knight of the bath, colonel of the third regiment of dragoon guards, and governor of Chelsea hospital. He died 1804, and was buried with great military pomp in Chelsea college chapel. He translated from the French count Saxe's reveries, or Memoirs on the Art of War, 4to. 1757—Regulations for the Prussian Cavalry, from the German, 1757—Regulations for the Prussian Infantry, and the Prussian Tactics, 1759.

FAWKES, Francis, a poet, was born about 1721, in Yorkshire; was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge; and, after having been curate of Bramham and Croydon, and vicar of Orpington and St. Mary Cray, died in 1777, vicar of Hayes, in Kent. He wrote many miscellaneous poems; translated Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, Theocritus, Musæus, and Apollonius Rhodius; and edited the Poetical Calendar, in conjunction with Woty. Though not bearing the stamp of superior talent, his poetry is pleasing and elegant.

FAYETTE, Louisa de la, a French lady of great celebrity. She was maid of honor to Anne of Austria, and enjoyed the confidence of Louis XIII., without sullyng her good name or her virtue. So great was her influence upon this monarch that she reconciled him to his queen, and when she had thus served the man whom she respected, she retired uncontaminated to a convent, and took the veil. Louis visited her in her retreat, but she resisted every invitation to the court. She died in her convent, universally beloved, and deservedly admired for that uncommon display of virtue and self-command which, in a young and beautiful woman, could resist the most flattering offers of distinction and of rank, and sacrifice the world, and her innocent attachment to a king, to the meek spirit of devotion.

FAYETTE, Marie Madeleine, countess of, daughter of Aymer de la Vergne, governor of Havre de Grace, and wife of count de la Fayette, is celebrated for her knowledge of literature and of the fine arts, and her intimacy with Rouchefoucault, Huetius, Menage, Segrais, and other learned men. She died 1693. Though abused for levity of conduct by the author of the memoirs of Madam de Maintenon, she is represented by Madam de Sevigné as a woman of respectable and exemplary character. She wrote Zaide—La Princesse de Cleves—La Princesse de Montpensier, romances—Memoires de la Cour de France 1688 and 1689—Histoire d'Henriette d'Angletere—divers portraits, &c. These works are still esteemed. She is the first, says Voltaire, who exhibited in her romances the manners of people of fashion in a graceful, easy, and natural way.

FEATLEY, Daniel, D.D., or FAIRCLOUGH, an English divine, born at Charlton, Oxfordshire, March 1582. He was educated at Magdalen college school and Corpus Christi, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1602. He distinguished himself so much by his extensive knowledge of school divinity, and by his eloquence as a preacher, that he was sent as chaplain to sir Thomas Edmund's embassy to France, where he continued three years. He became, in 1613, rector of Northill, Cornwall, and chaplain to Abbot the primate, who made him rector of Lambeth. He suffered much in his property by the civil wars, and hardly escaped with his life, as he was seized and imprisoned in 1643, for opposing the covenant. He grew so weak and dropsical from the confinement that he was permitted to remove to Chelsea college, where he died April 1645. He was a very able disputant, and a most smart scourge, says Wood, of the church of Rome. He published nearly 40 works, all of the polemical kind, besides "Cygneæ Cantio," 1629, and the scholastic duel between him and king James.

FECKENHAM, John de, D.D., so called as being born of poor parents near that forest in Worcestershire. His right name was Howman. His promising abilities were observed and improved by the priest of his parish, and he was educated carefully in the monastery of Evesham, and afterwards at Gloucester hall, Oxford. He was afterwards chaplain to bishops Bell and Bonner, and in 1549 he was committed to the tower for refusing, it is said, to administer the sacraments after the manner of the protestants. On Mary's accession he was released, and raised to distinction in the church. In 1554 he disputed at Oxford with Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, before they suffered martyrdom; but though favored by the papists, he exercised every office of benevolence and kindness towards the suffering protestants. On Mary's death, Elizabeth, before her coronation, sent for him, and as he had interested himself warmly in her favor during the last reign, she acknowledged his services, and offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury if he would conform, which he absolutely refused. In the queen's first parliament he was the last abbot that sat there, and he then spoke so boldly against the reformation, that he was sent to the tower in 1560. He continued in custody, either in the house of some bishop, or in a public prison, the rest of his life; but though he acknowledged the queen's supremacy, he never would conform to the reformation. He died a prisoner in Wisbech castle, in the isle of Ely, 1585. Though a violent papist, he was a most humane and charitable man, whose mildness, piety, and goodness of heart, have been warmly commended by Camden, Fuller, Burnet, Dart, and Reyner.

FEIJOO, Benedict Jerom, a Spanish Benedictine, who attempted by his writings and example, to correct and reform the vitiated notions of his countrymen. His Teatro Critico, in 14 vols. 4to. is a work of great merit, which, with great freedom and spirit, censures the ignorance and licentiousness of the clergy, and exposes the futility of pilgrimages, pretended miracles, and superstitious exorcisms. This unusual boldness against the prejudices of the times proved very offensive to the church, and the author was, with difficulty, saved from the horrors of the inquisition. He died 1765.

FEITHUS, Everard, a learned German, born at Elburgh, in Guelderland. After devoting himself with great assiduity to literature at Berne, he returned home; but the invasion of the Spaniards under Spinola so terrified him, that he retired to France, where he taught Greek, and was honored with the friendship of Casaubon, Thuanus, Du Puy, and other learned men. As he walked one day at Rochelle, attended by a servant, he was invited into a house by one of the citizens, and from that moment, it never could be known what became of him, though the mysterious occurrence was diligently inquired into by the magistrates of the place. He was then young, but had given great specimens of superior learning. Of his MS. works were published Antiquitatum Homericarum Libri Quatuor, 12mo. Leyden, 1677—De Atheniensium Republicâ—and De Antiquit. Acticis, very learned and interesting.

FELIBIEN, Andrew, a native of France, born at Chartres, in 1619, was secretary to the French embassy at Rome, in which city he became intimate with Poussin, and his intercourse with that eminent painter doubtless heightened and matured Felibien's natural taste for the fine arts. On his return to France, he was appointed superintendent of the royal buildings, and of arts and manufactures. He was also one of the first eight members of the Academy of Inscriptions and Medals. He died in 1695. The most considerable of his works are, Dialogues on the Life and Works of Painters; and The Principles of Architecture, Painting, and Sculpture.—His eldest son, JOHN FRANCIS, who died in 1733, wrote, among other things, An Historical Collection of the Lives and Works of celebrated Architects.

FELIBIEN, John Francis, succeeded his father in all his appointments, and inherited all his taste and knowledge of the fine arts. He wrote an Historical Collection of the Lives and works of the most celebrated Architects, 4to. 1687—Description of Versailles ancient and modern, 12mo.—Description of the Church of Invalids, fol. 1706 and 1756. He died 1733.

FELL, Dr. John, a learned prelate, born at Longworth, Berks, 23d June, 1625. During the civil war, he bore arms for the king, and for his loyalty he was expelled from the college, and lived in retirement till the restoration, when he was made prebendary of Clichester, and canon and dean of Christ-church. In 1666, and the three following years, he served the office of vice-chancellor, and by his indefatigable attention he contributed much to restore the good order and ancient discipline of the university. In 1675-6 he was made bishop of Oxford, without giving up his deanery, and now, besides charitable contributions, he applied a large part of his income to the rebuilding of Cuddesden palace. He died 10th July, 1686, and was buried in Christ-church cathedral, where an inscription by Aldrich, his successor, marks his grave. He wrote the Life of Dr. Hammond, 1660.—Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxon, 2 vols. folio, translated from Wood's—Alcinoi in Platonicam Philosophiam Introductio—In Lauden Musices Carmen Sapphicum—St. Clement's two Epistles to the Corinthians, Greek and Latin—Allestree's Life—sermons—an edition of Cyprian's works, and other classics.

FELL, John, a dissenting minister, born at Cockermonth, 1732. He was originally a tailor; but after living in that employment in London, he acquired some knowledge of the classics, and became pastor of a congregation at Beccles, Suffolk, and afterwards Thaxsted, Essex. He was afterwards tutor at an academy at Homerton, from which he was dismissed, says his biographer, for reading a newspaper on a Sunday. A subscription of 100 guineas was made that he should preach sermons on the evidences of Christianity. Four only of these discourses were delivered at the Scots' church, London Wall, when the preacher fell a victim to a dropsy, 13th Sept. 1797. The sermons were continued and published by Dr. H. Hunter. Fell was the author of Answers to Farmer's Essay on the Demoniacs—and his treatise on the Idolatry of Greece and Rome—Genuine Protestantism—an Essay on the Love of one's Country—a Letter to Burke on the Penal Laws—and an Essay on English Grammar.

FELLER, Francis Xavier, an ex-jesuit, born at Brussels. He wrote an Historical and Literary Journal from 1774 to 1794, at Luxemburg—a Geographical Dictionary—Observations on Newton's Philosophy—and Buffon's Epochs of Nature examined—an Historical Dictionary, 8 vols. 8vo. Liege, said by the editors of the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, to be pirated from their own work. He died at Ratisbon, 1802, aged 67.

FELLTHAM, Owen, an English writer born in the reign of James I. in Suffolk, where his family had been settled for several generations. Few particulars are known of his history, though it appears that his learning and virtues recommended him to the notice of the earl of Thomond, in whose family he lived for some years in easy and honorable dependence. He wrote Resolves, Divine, Moral and Political, a work of great merit, and singular excellence, of which the 12th edition appeared in 1709, in 8vo. The time of his death is unknown, though he was living in 1677.

FENDALL, Josias, governor of Maryland, who exercised also the powers of chief justice, received his appointment from the commissioners of parliament in 1658. He had previously been appointed governor by the proprietors, but rendered himself unworthy of their confidence by his intrigues, which caused great confusion in the province. In June, 1660, he was succeeded by Philip Calvert. Twenty years after he was fined forty thousand pounds of tobacco, and banished from the province for his seditious practices.

FENELON, Francis de Salignac de la Motte, archbishop of Cambrai, was born 6th Aug. 1651. He was educated at Cahors, and afterwards finished his studies at Paris, and began early to acquire popularity as a preacher. At the age of 24 he took orders, and in 1686, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he was sent by the king at the head of the missionaries who were to convert the protestants of the coast of Saintonge and the Pays de Annis, who had not yet submitted to the influence of military force. In 1689 he was appointed tutor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and he displayed such abilities in the education of these princes, that the king in gratitude for his services gave him the abbey of St. Valery, and soon after the see of Cambrai, to which he was consecrated by Bossuet, 1695. Having espoused the cause of Madam Guyon, and published a work, The Maxims of the Saints, which was considered as teaching her doctrine of quietism, he was bitterly attacked by Bossuet, and his book was ultimately censured by the Pope. Fenelon himself read his recantation in his own cathedral. He afterwards assisted the Jesuits, in their successful attack against the Jansenists, and procured the disgrace of Noailles their patron, and the condemnation of their writings. The work from which Fenelon derives immortality is his "Telemachus." It was indeed exposed to the jealousy of Louis and his courtiers, who pretended to see the character of Madam de Montespan in Calypso, of Mademoiselle de Fontanges, in Eucharis, of the duchess of Burgundy, in Antiope, of Louvois, in Protesilaus, of James II. in Idomenus, and of Louis XIV. in Sesostris, but though its publication was prohibited in France, it appeared at Paris surreptitiously in 1699, and in a corrected form at the Hague, 1701. Such is the merit of the work, that it ranks, though in prose, among epic poems, and by the elegance of its style, and the sublimity of its moral, it has secured universal applause, and has been translated into all the modern languages of Europe. The last part of Fenelon's life was spent in the conscientious discharge of the pastoral office, in his diocese, where his benevolence, and goodness of heart, gained him the affection and gratitude of his people. This amiable prelate died 7th Jan. 1715, aged 63. Besides his Telemachus, and his Explication of the Maxims, he wrote some other valuable works, a treatise on the Education of daughters, 12mo. much admired—Dialogues of the dead, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dialogues on Eloquence, and the Eloquence of the Pulpit, 12mo.—Lives of ancient Philosophers, abridged, 12mo.—Spiritual Works, 4 vols. 12mo.—A Demonstration of the Existence of God, 12mo.—Directions for the Conscience of a king—and sermons.

FENTON, Elijah, a poet and divine, was born, in 1633, at Shelton, in Staffordshire; was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge; was at one period private secretary to the earl of Orrery; assisted Pope in translating the Odyssey; and died tutor to the son of Lady Trumbull, in 1730. Fenton was an amiable and worthy man, and an elegant writer of verse. Besides his poems and his share in the Odyssey, he produced Marianne, a tragedy; and the Lives of Milton and Waller.

FENTON, sir Geoffrey, an eminent writer, descended from a good family in Nottinghamshire. He served queen Elizabeth in Ireland, where he became member of the privy council 1531, and where he married the daughter of Dr. Robert Weston, lord chancellor of the island. He was afterwards appointed to the secretaryship of the lord lieutenant, and continued in that responsible office under all the changes of government. He died 19th October 1603, in Dublin. He translated Guicciardini's Wars of Italy, dedicated to queen Elizabeth, besides Golden epistles from Guevara's works.

FERDINAND I. emperor of Germany, second son of the archduke Philip, was born at Medina, in Castile, 1503. He was crowned king of Hungary, and Bohemia 1527, on the death of his brother-in-law, Louis the younger, the last king, and in 1531 he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1558 he succeeded as emperor, on the abdication of his brother Charles V. He governed with moderation and prudence, and after making peace with the Turks, and producing a reconciliation between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, he died of a drop-sy at Vienna, 25th July 1564, aged 61.

FERDINAND II. archduke of Austria, and son of Charles, duke of Süria, was made king of Bohemia 1617, and of Hungary 1618, and raised to the imperial throne 1619. His subjects of Bohemia revolted, and placed on the throne Frederick V. elector Palatine, but Ferdinand attacked, and defeated them at the battle of Prague 1620, and the dukedom of the usurper was given to Maximilian, duke of Bavaria. The fortunes of the unfortunate Palatine, were supported by Christian, king of Denmark, but the victories of Tilly, the imperial general, rendered his opposition hopeless, and obliged him to sue for peace 1629. These brilliant successes roused against Ferdinand the king of France, and Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and the imperial general was defeated at Leipsic 1631, though soon after the Swedish conqueror fell covered with glory in the celebrated battle of Lutzen. The battle of Nortlingen in 1634, proved favorable to the cause of the Germans, and the following year tranquillity was restored among the rival powers. Ferdinand died at Vienna, 8th Feb. 1637, aged 59.

FERDINAND III. surnamed Ernest, eldest son of the preceding, was made king of Hungary 1625, of Bohemia 1627, and of the Romans 1636, and elected emperor on his father's death. He pursued the same plans of ambition and aggrandizement as his father, but in his war against the Swedes, his troops were defeated by Bernard duke of Weimar, who in four months gained four important victories. The French under the great Condé supported the Swedish arms, and Ferdinand was besieged in Ratisbon where he held a diet of the empire. In 1645 another battle was fought and won by Condé at Nortlingen on the same spot where the Swedes had been eleven years before defeated. Tranquillity was at last restored to the empire by the peace of Westphalia, 1643, and the treaties of Osnaburg and Munster, which granted Pomerania to the Swedish Monarch, and made him one of the members of the Germanic body, and tolerated the Lutherans and Calvinists in the midst of the Roman Catholic religion. The emperor died 1657, aged 49. He was three times married.

FERDINAND V. surnamed the Catholic, was son of John II. king of Arragon. He married in 1469 Isabella of Castile, and thus united the two kingdoms of Castile and Arragon. He made war against Alphonso king of Portugal, and defeated him at Toro 1476, and he next turned his arms against the kingdom of Grenada, which he totally subdued after a war of eight years, and thus put an end to the Moorish power, which for 800 years had flourished in Spain. Ambitious and enterprising, Ferdinand next turned his arms against Navarre, and by means of his brave general Gonsalvo of Cordova, he conquered part of the kingdom of Naples, but whilst his dominions were thus enlarged in Europe and in Africa, a new continent submitted to his power by the great discoveries of the immortal Columbus. Ferdinand left four daughters, and died 1516.

FERDINAND of Cordova, a learned Spaniard of the 15th century, who was not only well skilled in the logic of Aristotle, and the learning of the ancients, but an accomplished master in the polite arts, so that he passed among the vulgar for a magician. He wrote de Artificio Onnis Scibilis—and Commentaries on Ptolemy's Almagest, and on the Bible.

FERDONSI, Hassan Ben Scharf, a Persian poet, whose epic poem called Schanameh is very celebrated. It is the labor of thirty years, and consists of 60,000 verses, each of which is a distich. It contains the annals of the kings of Persia. He died at Thous 1020.

FERGUSON, Robert, a native of Edinburgh, who studied divinity, but preferred poetry and literary fame to all other pursuits. He obtained a place in the sheriff clerk's office Edinburgh, but dissipation abridged his days, and he died insane in the lunatic asylum of Edinburgh 1774, aged 24. His pastoral, humorous, and lyric poems have been edited in Dr. Anderson's collection.

FERGUSON, James, an ingenious Scotlman, self-taught as a philosopher, born of poor parents at Keith in Bamfshire, 1710. He was for four years a common shepherd, and in this solitary employment he marked accurately the position of the stars with a thread and bead. His ingenuity was observed and encouraged by his opulent neighbors, who had him instructed in arithmetic, algebra, and geometry, and under the patronage of sir James Dunbar for many years he supported himself by drawing and taking portraits. His ingenuity was so great that after the accidental sight of a watch and of a clock, he made one of each with wood. In 1744 he came to London, and in consequence of his astronomical rotula to show the new moon and eclipses, he was introduced to the learned and ingenious, and made fellow of the Royal society. He was a man of inoffensive manners, mild and benevolent in his character. The present king at his accession granted him a pension of 50*l.* a year, and occasionally took great delight in his conversation. He invented some useful instruments, and died 16th Nov. 1776. He wrote "Select Mechanical exercises," 1773—Introduction of Electricity, 1770—to Astronomy, 1772—treatise on Perspective, 1775—and Astronomy Explained on Newton's principles, edited for the fourth time 1770—Lectures on Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Hydraulics, Pneumatics, edited the fifth time, 1776.

FERGUSON, Adam, a distinguished writer, was born in 1724, at Logierait, in Scotland, of which parish his father was minister. He was educated at the school of Perth, from whence he removed to St. Andrews, and after obtaining his degree of master of arts, he went to Edinburgh to qualify himself for the ministry. His first situation as a clergyman was in the capacity of chaplain to the 42d regiment of foot, with which he served in Flanders till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and then returned to Edinburgh; where, in 1759, he was appointed professor of natural philosophy, which chair he afterwards resigned for that of moral philosophy. In 1767 he published his "Essay on Civil Society," which was well received, and the author honored with the degree of doctor of laws. Soon after this he married a niece of Dr. Black; and in 1773 he accompanied the late earl of Chesterfield on his travels. In 1776 he published an answer to Dr. Price on "Civil Liberty," which procured him the favor of the ministry, who appointed him secretary to the mission sent to America in 1778, to effect a reconciliation between the two countries. On his return, Dr. Ferguson sat down to the duties of his professorship, and the composition of his "History of the Roman Republic," which work was published in 3 vols. 4to. in 1783. He now resigned his professorship in favor of Mr. Dugald Stewart, and took that of mathematics as less laborious. In 1793 he reduced his lectures to the form of a "Treatise on Moral and Political Science," 2 vols. 4to.; and not long afterwards went abroad. On his return he settled at St. Andrews, and died there, Feb. 22, 1816. Besides the works already noticed, he published "Institutes of Moral Philosophy," 8vo. as a text book for students in that class.

FERISHTA, Mohammed Casem, an Indian historian, who flourished at the beginning of the seventeenth century, was born at Ahmednagur, in the Deccan. Being neglected by Jehanguire, he accepted the invitation of the sovereign of Visiapour, who patronized him in the most liberal manner, and raised him to important offices. In 1609, he published his History of India under the Mussulmans; a work which bears a high character for veracity and impartiality. Parts of it have been translated by Dow, Scott, Stewart, and Anderson. The time of his decease is not known.

FERMAT, Peter, an eminent mathematician, born at Toulouse 1590, where from his knowledge of the law he became counsellor in the parliament, and an upright magistrate. As a philosopher he may be said to have prepared the way for the Infinites of Newton and Leibnitz, and to have introduced new geometry. He was connected with Descartes, Huygens, and Pascal, and died 1664. His works highly valued were published at Toulouse, 2 vols. fol. 1679. His son Samuel was eminent as a literary man, and wrote some learned dissertations.

FERMOR, William count Von, a native of Phaskow, the son of a Scotchman. He like his father, was in the Russian service, and greatly distinguished himself against the Turks. In 1755 he was commander of the Russian forces, and for his services in defeating the Prussians he was made count of the empire by the emperor Francis. He defeated the king of Prussia at the famous battle of Zorndorff, and afterwards took Berlin. He died 1771, aged 64.

FERNEL, John Francis, physician to Henry II. of France, was born at Montdidier in Picardy 1506. He applied himself to study with the most indefatigable zeal at Paris, and he made such progress that his lectures on philosophical subjects were greatly admired for eloquence and erudition. He afterwards studied physic, and when admitted to practice, he divided his time between his patients and his books, allowing himself scarce five hours of rest in 24. When invited to court by the king, whose friendship and good opinion he had secured by curing one of his favorites, he excused himself, and when solicited to accept honors and places of enolument, he modestly refused, and preferred the retirement and studies of private life to every other pursuit. Fernal died 1558. He wrote several works on medical subjects in high repute, as he was considered one of the great restorers of medicine. His practice was so great that his gains were yearly 12,000 livres.

FERRACINO, Bartolomeo, a self-taught mechanic, born at Bassan in Padua 1692. He was a sawyer, and his invention of a saw which worked by the wind recommended him to the notice of the great. He built a famous bridge over the Brenta in his native town, and died soon after the completion 1764. An account of his life and inventions was published by Memo, Venice.

FERRAR, Robert, a native of Halifax, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made bishop of St. David's by the influence of Cranmer, to whom he had been chaplain. He was imprisoned on suspicion in Edward's reign, and under Mary he was burnt as a heretic at Caermarthen, 1555.

FERRAR, Nicholas, a native of London, son of an East India merchant. He was educated at Cambridge, and after travelling on the continent, he was made secretary to the Virginia company, and in 1624 elected member of Parliament, and directed, with two others, to draw the impeachment against lord Cranfield the treasurer. He soon after retired to Little Gidding, Huntingdonshire, where he established a protestant monastery, and devoted himself to devotional pursuits. In 1626 he took deacon's orders, and died 1637. He had translated from the Spanish Valdeso's Considerations on Religion.

FERRARI, Octavian, an Italian author, born at Milan, 1518. He was much respected as a professor of ethics and politics at Venice, Padua, Milan, and other places of Italy. He died at Milan, 1586, considered for his learning as a second Aristotle. He wrote de Sermonibus Exoreticis, 1575—de Origine Romanorum, 1607—a Latin translation of Athenæns, and notes on Aristotle.

FERRARI, Francisco Bernardino, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Milan, 1577. He was a doctor of the Ambrosian college, and he was encouraged by the archbishop of Milan to travel not only to improve himself, but to make a collection of books. This valuable selection, made in Spain, Italy, and in other countries, laid the foundation of the Ambrosian library. Ferrari died at Milan, 1669, aged 92. He wrote de Antiquo Ecclesiasticarum Epistolarum Genere Libri tres, 1613—de Ritu Sacramni Ecclesiæ Catholice Concionum Libri tres, 1620—de Veterum Acclamationibus & Plausu Libri septem, 1627. These works are very curious, and display the great erudition and deep researches of the author.

FERRARI, Octavio, of the same family, was born at Milan, 1607, and educated at the Ambrosian college, of which he became professor of rhetoric at the age of 21, on account of his great proficiency. Six years after he was invited by the republic of Venice to Padua, where as professor of Greek, of eloquence, and politics, he collected a great number of pupils, and restored the declining reputation of the university. His learning was so extensive, and his fame so deservedly established, that Christina of Sweden honored him with presents, and Louis XIV. settled on him a pension of 500 crowns for seven years. He died 1682, respected for his amiable manners, and that sweetness and humanity of character which procured him the name of Pacificator. His works are chiefly on classical antiquities, the most known of which is Origines Linguae Italicae, fol. 1676, a subject treated before by Scaliger, in 24 books, now lost.

FERRARIS, Joseph, count de, an Austrian general, was born, in 1726, at Luneville; entered the army in 1741; and in 1767 was appointed director general of artillery for the Austrian Low Countries. It was while he held this situation that he undertook the map of the Netherlands, in twenty-five sheets, which bears his name. In the campaign of 1793 he distinguished himself on various occasions; and at the end of it was called to Vienna, to fill the place of vice president of the aulic council of war. He was made a field-marshal in 1808, and died in 1814.

FERRARS, George, a learned man, born of an ancient family near St. Alban's, 1512. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's inn, and soon distinguished himself as an advocate under the patronage of Cromwell, earl of Essex. He became afterwards a favorite with Henry VIII. and his arrest, when he was member of parliament for Plymouth, created such confusion, that in the event, it established the privileges of the members of the house. On the fall of Somerset under Edward VI. he was named lord of misrule, to entertain the public with pastimes, and for twelve days he exhibited at Greenwich all the pomp and magnificence of assumed greatness, to the satisfaction of the court, and the gratification of the populace. Ferrars possessed such versatile talents, that though the religion of the court frequently changed at the caprice of the sovereign, he continued still a favorite with all, and died a protestant at Flamstead, Herts, 1579. He wrote the history of Queen Mary, which was inserted in the chronicle under the name of Richard Grafton. He also contributed to the poetical work called "the Mirror for Magistrates," published 1559—the Fall of Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice,—the tragedy of Thomas Woodstock, duke of Gloucester—tragedy of king Richard II.—the story of Eleanor Cobham.

FERRAUD, N. a native of Daure, near the Pyrenées, who was a deputy in the convention, and distinguished himself by his cunnity to the monarchy. He was commissary in the armies of the Rhine, where he behaved with coolness and intrepidity, and on his return to Paris, when opposing the attack made on the convention, 26th May, 1795, he was shot through the heart with a pistol. His murderer was executed, and the convention appointed a day to celebrate his obsequies.

FERREAS, Don John of, a Spanish divine born at Rabanezza 1652, and educated at Salamanca. His wit and learning recommended him to the court, from whose favors he refused the pressing offer of two bishoprics. He was made member of the academy of Madrid 1713, and appointed Librarian to the king. He contributed much to the Spanish Dictionary, published by the academy 1789, in 6 vols. fol. He died 1735, leaving several works in philosophy, divinity, and history, the best known of which is his history of Spain, translated into French, by Hermilly, 10 vols. 4to.

FERRETI, or FERRETUS, a poet and historian of Vicenza, of the 14th century, who contributed much to the revival of learning in Europe. He wrote an history of his own times from 1259, to 1328, in seven books, and other works in verse and prose, in Italian.

FERRI, Paul, a learned divine, born at Metz 1591, and educated at Montauban. He became a minister in his native town, and gained popularity by his eloquence, and his dignified address as a preacher. He zealously employed himself to reconcile the protestants, and for these benevolent motives he was accused by his enemies of being bribed by Richelieu to form a coalition of the two religions. He died 1669, of the stone, and more than 80 calculi were found in his bladder. He published, 1616, Scholastici Orthodoxici Specimen, a book approved by Du Plessis Mornay—Vindiciæ pro Scholastico Orthodoxo 1619—and General Catechisme de la Reformation, 1654.

FERRIAR, John, a physician and writer on elegant literature, was born, in 1764, at Chester; studied medicine, and took his degree at Edinburgh; and settled at Manchester, where he acquired an extensive practice, and was chosen physician to the Infirmary and the Lunatic Asylum. Of the Literary and Philosophical Society he was an active and efficient member. He died in 1815. Ferriar is the author of Medical Histories and Reflections; Illustrations of Sterne, in which he proves the literary larcenies committed by that writer; The Bibliomania, a poetical epistle; An Essay on the Theory of Apparitions; and some smaller pieces in prose and verse.

FERRIER, Arnaud de, a lawyer, born at Toulouse 1506, and, from the greatness of his abilities, called the Cato of France. He was professor of the university, and afterwards counsellor of the parliament of Toulouse, and he was, in 1562, deputed by the French king to the council of Trent, where the boldness of his harangues in favor of his master offended some of his Italian hearers. He afterwards went to Venice, where he assisted father Paul in the collection of materials for the History of the council of Trent. He was at heart a protestant, and professed it at the solicitation of Du Plessis Mornay. He was made chancellor to the king of Navarre, and he formed the design to declare the French king head of the Church, after the example of England. He died in his 79th year. He wrote some works.

FERRIER, Jeremy, a divinity professor at Nismes, who, from protestant, became papist, even after declaring in a public disputation that Clement VIII. was Anti Christ. He was afterwards made state counsellor to the French king, and he attended him in Britany in 1626. He was patronised by Richelieu, and wrote some tracts, especially "Catholique d'Etat," in favor of his religion and principles. He died of a hectic fever 1626. He had a large family, but only one daughter, who married Tardieu, and of whom some anecdotes are recorded in Boileau's tenth satire.

FERRON, Arnould du, a lawyer of Bourdeaux, who died 1563, aged 48. He wrote in elegant Latin in the style of Terence, and continued to the reign of Francis I. The Latin History of France by Paulus Æmilius the Veronese. It was published at Paris 1555, and very highly esteemed for curious and interesting details.

FERTE, Henry de Senecterre Mareschal de, a famous general under Lewis XIII. and his successor, distinguished at the siege of Rochelle 1626, and at the battles of Rocroi and Lens. In 1650, he defeated the duke of Lorraine, at the battle of St. Nicholas, and was made marshal of France, but in 1656, he was taken prisoner, at Valenciennes, by the Spaniards. He died 1681, aged 82, respected as a warrior, but inferior to Turenne, whose fame he envied.

FETTI, Dominico, a painter born at Rome, 1589, and educated under Ludovico Civoli, of Florence. He studied and imitated the paintings of Julio Romano, and was patronised by the duke of Mantua, whose palaces he adorned with his highly finished pieces. He ruined his constitution by licentious indulgences at Venice, and died in his 35th year. His pictures are very scarce, and much sought after. His sister, a nun, was also a good painter, and she adorned her convent, at Mantua, with some of her pieces.

FEULLEE, Lewis, a French naturalist, born in Provence 1660. His great abilities were honorably employed by Louis XIV. in different parts of the world, to advance the knowledge of natural history, and at his return he received a pension, and an observatory was built for his residence at Marseilles, where he died 1732. He wrote a journal of observations physical, and botanical, on the Coasts of South America, 3 vols. 4to. and presented the French king with a large folio of curious drawings, executed in the South-seas.

FEVRE, Guy le, sieur de la Boderie, a poet, born in Lower Normandy. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and published some works in Syriac and Chaldee, and assisted in editing of Montanu's Polyglott bible. He died 1598, aged 57.

FEVRE, James le, or Jacobus Faber, a learned Frenchman, born at Estampes, in Picardy 1440. He was suspected of protestantism, and therefore exposed to persecution, and after taking refuge at Meaux, Blois, and Guienne, he at last found a safe retreat at Nerac, under the protection of Margaret, queen of Navarre, sister of Francis I. He died there 1537, nearly 100 years old. Though not professedly a protestant, he yet disapproved of many of the tenets of the church of Rome, and he held a conference with Bucer and Gaptio, at Strasburg, about the reformation of the church. In 1512, he published a translation of St. Paul's epistles, with notes, and gave the rest of the New Testament in 1522, with copious commentaries. Though the intimate friend, and correspondent of Erasmus, he quarrelled with him in consequence of some disputed passages in scripture, and Erasmus, much to his honor, after repelling the attack, solicited the continuance of his friendship. It is said that he was murdered in his bed, after weeping in the presence of queen Margaret, and lamenting that he had not, like many of his disciples, had the fortitude to become a martyr in the defence of his opinions.

FEVRE, Nicholas le, or Nicholaus Faber, an ingenious and learned man, born at Paris, 2d June, 1544. In his youth, he had a dreadful accident, while cutting a pen, a small piece of the quill flew into his eye, and caused such acute pain, that he lifted, in sudden anguish, the knife to his eye, and struck it out of the socket. He studied the civil law at Toulouse, Padua, and Bologna, and after residing 18 months in Rome, he returned to Paris, and applied himself to belles lettres. His edition of Seneca, appeared in 1587, with learned notes. He also devoted some time to mathematics, and with such success that he discovered the falsity of Scaliger's demonstration of the quadrature of the circle. On the accession of Henry IV. to the crown, he was made preceptor to the duke of Condé, and after the king's death, he held the same office in the education of Louis XIII. He died 1611. His works, which are few, were collected after his death by his friend le Begue, in a 4to. vol. 1614 Paris. He was not indeed anxious to appear as an author, but he was more willing to communicate instruction and intelligence to those who enriched the world with literary productions, and therefore for his liberality, and for his modesty, and the amiable qualities of a private character, he is deservedly commended by Baillet, Lipsius, and others.

FEVRE, Tanaquil, or Tannequi, a learned man, father of Madame Dacier, was born at Caen in Normandy, 1615. After studying with the greatest success at home, and under the care of his uncle, he went to Paris, and was soon recommended to the patronage of Richelieu, who settled a pension of 2000 livres upon him, to inspect the books published at the Louvre. The death of his patron, and the neglect of the next minister Mazarine, altered his plans of life, and he turned protestant, and accepted a professorship in the university of Saumur. Here his learning and his reputation drew pupils from all quarters. He died 12th Sept. 1672, and left a son of his own name, who was a protestant divine in Holland, and at London, but became a Roman catholic at Paris, and published a Tract de Futilitate Poetice 1697. He published among other books, Luciani de Morte Peregrini Libellus, 4to. 1653. Diatriba Flavii Josephi de Jesu Christi Testimonium suppositum esse 1655, 8vo.—epistolarum Pars Prima, 1659, Secunda, 1665,—a short account of the Lives of Greek poets—the life of Theseus, from Plutarch—Methodo pour Commencer les Humanités Grecques & Latines—editions of Xenophon's Convivium, of Plato's Alcibiades, of Plutarch's de Superstitione, besides notes on Apollodorus, Longinus, and other classics.

FEVRET, Charles, a French civilian, born at Saumur 1533. He studied the law at Heidelberg under Godefroy, and in 1607 he returned to Dijon, where he married Anne Brunet of Beaulne, by whom he had 19 children, 14 of which were born in eight years. He was a popular advocate at Dijon, and became counsellor of the three estates of the province. When Louis XIII. came to Dijon to punish an insurrection, Fevret was the only person considered as capable to plead the cause of the insurgents, and to petition the monarch, and so eloquent and persuasive was his address that the king desired him to print it, and forgave the rebels. His abilities rendered him universally known, the princes of Condé appointed him their counsellor, and he held the same honorable office also with Frederic Casimir the palatine of the Rhine. He died at Dijon 1661, aged 78. He published 1645 a Latin treatise de Claris Fori Burgundici Oratoribus—and in 1653 his famous "Traite de l'Abus," which has been frequently reprinted.

FEUSTKING, John Henry, D.D., a native of Holstein, who became professor in the university of Wittemberg. He was also confessor to the elector of Saxony, and counsellor to the duke of Saxe Gotha, and died 1713, aged 41. He wrote various works in German and in Latin.

FEVRET DE FONTETTE, Charles Marie, great grandson of the preceding, was born at Dijon 1710, and became eminent as a lawyer, and obtained a pension from government. He was a member of the academy of belles lettres, and was laboriously employed in editing "le Long's Bibliothèque Historique de la France," which he enlarged from one to five large fol. vols. He died 1772.

FEYJOO Y MONTENEGRO, Benedict Jerome, an able Spanish writer, was born at Compostella, in 1701; studied at the university of Oviedo; and, in 1714, entered the convent of St. Benedict, in that city. He became professor of theology, and abbot of the monastery of Saint Vincent. Feyjoo was one of the most indefatigable of human beings. Besides performing his official duties, and preaching frequently, he acquired a knowledge of several of the sciences, and of the best Greek, Latin, Spanish, English, Italian, and French authors, and wrote an astonishing number of volumes. He allowed scarcely four hours to sleep, and seldom mixed with society. His talents were devoted to rooting out prejudices, and promoting the welfare of his country. Of his works the principal are, The Universal Critical Theatre, sixteen vols.; and Curious and Instructive Letters, eight vols. He died in 1764. In 1780, a complete edition of Feyjoo's productions was published, in thirty-three volumes, by Campomanes.

FICHARD, John, a lawyer and syndic, of Frankfort on the Mayne, where he died 1581, aged 69. The best known of his works are, Virorum Qui Superiori Nostroque Sæculo Eruditione et Doctrinâ Illustrates atque Memorabiles Fuerunt, Vitæ, 1536, 4to.—Vitæ Juris-consultorum, 1565—Onomasticon Philosophico-Medico Synonymum, 1574—de Cautilis, 1577—Concilium Matrimoniale, 1580.

FICHTE, John Theophilus, one of the most celebrated German philosophers of the modern school, was born, in 1762, at Rammenau, in Lusatia; studied at Wittemberg and Leipsic; was successively professor of philosophy at Jena and Erlangen, and rector of the university of Berlin; and died in 1814. He is the author of more than twenty works, in most of which he unfolds the doctrines of transcendental idealism. Schelling was his most formidable opponent.

FICINUS, Marsilius, a learned Italian, born at Florence 1433, and educated at the expense of Lorenzo de Medicis, to whom his father was physician. He distinguished himself as an able scholar, a great philosopher, physician, and divine, and under the patronage of his friends Lorenzo and Cosmo de Medicis, he restored in the West the study of the platonic philosophy, and translated not only his favorite author Plato, but also Plotinus, Proclus, Iamblicus, and Porphyrius. Though originally a skeptic, the eloquent preaching of Savanorola brought him to a due sense of religion and of religious duties, but like many of the learned of his time he still remained devoted to astrology. By care and a proper regimen he supported his naturally feeble constitution to the age of 66. He died at Correggio 1499, and soon after, as Baronius gravely affirms, appeared according to his promise to his friend Michael Mercatus, to prove thus the immortality of the soul. His writings sacred and profane are very numerous, they were collected and printed at Venice 1516, and at Paris 1641, in 2 vols folio.

FIDDES, Richard, D.D., an English divine, born at Hunnamdy near Scarborough, Yorkshire 1671. He entered at Corpus Christi college, and afterwards removed to University college, Oxford, and after taking his bachelor's degree he returned to Yorkshire, where in 1693 he married. In 1694, he was presented to the living of Halsham, but the marshy situation of the place proved so injurious to him that he was suddenly deprived of his speech, and never after completely recovered it. Thus disabled from performing his duty, he went to London 1712, and no longer able to shine as before as an eloquent preacher, he determined to maintain himself by his pen. By the friendship of Swift he was recommended to lord Oxford who made him his chaplain, but the hopes of preferment and independence vanished at the death of the queen and the changes of the ministry. He died at Putney 1725, aged 54, leaving in destitute circumstances his wife and six children. Of his writings the most known are, "a Body of Divinity Explaining the Principles and the Duties of Natural and Revealed Religiou, 2 vols. fol.—52 Discourses—and the life of Cardinal Wolsey, in fol. These works appeared under the patronage of a large subscription, but their popularity was severely attacked. Stackhouse found great fault with the body of divinity, and for the life of Wolsey the author was acrimoniously censured in the London journal, as being a friend to popery, and the secret enemy of the reformation.

FIELD, Richard, an English divine, born at Hempstead, Herts 1561, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. In 1598 he was appointed chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and under James her successor, he was made successively canon of Windsor, and dean of Gloucester. The bishopric of Oxford was intended for him, but he died before the appointment was conferred in form, 21st Nov. 1616, aged 55. He was a man highly respected for his learning, and anxiously devoted to the healing of dissensions in the church, so that at one time James wished to employ his great abilities to produce a reconciliation between the Lutherans and Calvinists of Germany. The first time the king heard him preach he faintly observed, "this is a Field for God to Dwell in," and almost in similar words he was styled by Fuller, "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a Field which the Lord hath blessed." The most famous of his works is his "Four Books of the Church," augmented with a fifth in the second edition, which appeared 1610. His memory was retentive to a surprising degree, so that whatever he read he accurately remembered.

FIELDING, Henry, the celebrated English novelist, was born 22d April, 1707. Young Fielding was educated at home, under the care of Mr. Oliver, a clergyman, whom he afterwards turned to ridicule in the humorous but coarse character of parson Trulliber in Joseph Andrews. He then went to Eton, where he formed an early intimacy with the future leading men of the age; with Lytleton, Fox, Pitt, Hanbury, Williams, and others, and then, when 18, he passed to Leyden, where he devoted himself to the study of civil law for two years. Being ill supplied with money by his father, he soon found that something must be done for bread. He therefore commenced author, and produced his first dramatic piece, "Love in several Masques," 1727, which together with "the Temple Beau," the next year, drew forth the applauses of crowded audiences. He was not, however, always successful, but the severity of criticism, and the frowns of disapprobation were unheeded in the friendship and patronage of the great and powerful, especially of the duke of Argyll, and lord Lytleton. About the year 1734 he married Miss Craddock at Salisbury, a woman of great beauty, and a fortune of about 1500*l.*, but this, together with the estate of Stower, Dorsetshire, which fell to him by his father's death, was quickly squandered away in expensive hospitality, and at 30 Fielding found himself poor, and destitute of every resource. He now applied to the law, and in due time was called from the Temple to the bar, and began to make a respectable figure in Westminster hall; but the frequent attacks of the gout, prevented the success which his abilities fairly promised. To maintain himself and a wife and children whom he tenderly loved, he again had recourse to his pen. In the full vigor of genius he produced his Joseph Andrews, and Tom Jones, novels so universally admired, as to be above the praise of his biographer. His "Wedding Day," however, did not meet on the stage the success which he expected, and while he meditated on the gloomy aspect of his affairs, the death of his wife came to embitter the cup of his affliction, and it proved so poignant, that his friends dreaded the loss of his senses. By time he recovered the severity of the blow, and he began again to struggle against fortune. He undertook to contribute to two periodical papers, but reduced as his income was, he found great assistance in the appointment of justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex. In the busy avocation of this office he planned and executed his Amelia, a work very respectable, but certainly inferior to Tom Jones. His constitution was now so enfeebled that his friends advised his removing to the softer climate of Lisbon, and two months after he arrived there he died, 1754, aged 48. Yet though weak, and laboring under the attacks of disease, he employed his pen in the humorous journal of his voyage to Lisbon, published in London 1755. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote an Essay on Conversation,—on the Knowledge and Characters of Men,—a Journey from this World to the next,—and the History of Jonathan the Wild. His dramatic pieces are twenty-six in number, and the whole of his works has been published in several sizes, with an Essay on his Life and Genius, by Arthur Murphy. Some years after Fielding's death, the French consul at Lisbon, de Meyriounet, offered to erect a monument over his grave, but the English factory roused by the generous views of a stranger, discharged a debt due to departed literary merit.

FIELDING, sir John, the fourth half brother to Henry Fielding, was his successor in the office of Westminster magistrate. Though blind from his youth, he discharged his duty with great activity and impartiality, and for his services to the public received the honor of knighthood 1761. He published various tracts on subjects of police, charges to the grand jury, essays on important subjects, but it is supposed that most of these appeared under his borrowed name, and that he wrote nothing but Cautions against the Tricks of Sharpers, 1777. He died at Brompton, Sept. 1780.

FIENNES, William, Say and Sele, born at Broughton, Oxfordshire, 1582, was educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He was raised from the dignity of baron to that of viscount, by James I., but in the reign of his successor he showed himself violent, inconstant, and vindictive. In the long parliament of 1640, he was very active with Hampden and Pym, and though made master of the court of wards, he slighted all reconciliation with the king, so that he was attainted of treason for not attending the king's person at Oxford. After the king's death he left the presbyterians whom he had hitherto supported, and joined himself to the independents, and during the usurpation he was created one of Cromwell's peers. At the restoration he was greatly noticed by Charles II., made lord privy seal, and lord chamberlain, though, as Wood observes, he had been a grand rebel for 20 years, and while others who had been reduced to a bit of bread for his majesty's cause, were left to pine and languish under insult and disappointment, and though a promoter of the rebellion, and in some respect accessory to the murder of Charles, he died quietly in his bed 14th April, 1662. He is called by Whitlock a man of great parts, wisdom, and integrity; and Clarendon, allowing him the same merit, describes him as ambitious, the enemy of the church, and a violent and dangerous leader of the discontented party. He wrote some political tracts, besides an attack against the quakers, who it seems were numerous in his neighborhood.

FIENNES, Nathaniel, second son of the above, was born at Broughton, 1608, and like his father educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He travelled on the continent, and at Geneva, and in Switzerland confirmed that aversion which he derived from his father against the church. At his return he was made member for Banbury, and displayed the same violence against the royal party as his father. During the civil wars he was colonel of horse, under Essex, and governor of Bristol, which he too easily yielded to the assault of prince Rupert, for which he was condemned to lose his head. His father's influence, however, saved him, and he left the army disgraced, but still virulently animated against the king. He joined the independents like his father, and when Cromwell became protector, he was made one of his privy council, and sent among his lords. At the restoration he retired into the country, and died at his seat of Newton Tony near Salisbury, 1669. He wrote some things in support of Cromwell's usurpation, and in another tract defended his conduct at Bristol. Clarendon represents him as an able man, and in council inferior only to the great Hampden.

FILANGIERI, Gaetano, a celebrated Italian publicist, of an ancient family, was born at Naples, in 1752. He was placed in the army at the age of fourteen, but soon quitted it that he might give himself up to study. He subsequently, however, held an honorary office at court, and commission in the marines, and, in 1787, was made a member of the supreme council of finance. He died in 1793. His great work, the Science of Legislation, gives him a conspicuous place among the writers upon that important subject.

FILICAJA, Vincenzio di, an elegant poet of Florence, who died 1707, aged 65. He was senator in his native city, and his wants were honorably and liberally relieved by Christina, queen of Sweden. His poems, which are in a delicate and refined style, were collected by his son in folio, and reprinted at Venice, 3 vols. 12mo. 1747.

FILMER, sir Robert, an English writer, born at East Sutton in Kent, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He died 1688. He wrote the Anarchy of a limited and mixed Monarchy—“Patriarchia,” in which he proves the original government to be monarchical, derived from the patriarchs, and heads of families—and “the Freeholders Grand Inquest.” His Patriarcha was attacked by Locke.

FINÆUS, Orontius, Finé, professor of mathematics in the college founded by Francis I. at Paris, was born at Briançon, Dauphiné, 1494. By his genius and application he recommended himself to the notice of the great, but though as a mathematician, and as a man of letters he was highly respectable, yet he was pinched by poverty, and at his death in 1555, he left his wife and six children in very reduced and distressed circumstances. He invented a clock in 1553, and pretended that he had found out the quadrature of the circle. His works were collected in 3 vols. folio, 1532, 1542, and 1556.

FINCH, Heneage, earl of Nottingham, son of sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London, was born in 1621. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, and at the Inner Temple he assiduously applied himself to the study of law. He was made solicitor-general to Charles II. and created a baronet, and in 1661 he was elected member for the university of Oxford. He was very active in the impeachment of lord Clarendon, in 1667, and in 1670 he was made attorney-general, and three years after lord keeper, and raised to the peerage. In 1675 he was appointed lord chancellor, and in 1691, he was created earl of Nottingham, and died the year after. He was a man of great wisdom and eloquence, and though born in dangerous and troublesome times, he so conducted himself that he retained in every situation the good opinion of the king and of the people. Burnet has commended him for his attachment to the church, Dryden has recorded him in his Abraham and Achitophel, in the character of Amri, and for his powers in oratory, he acquired and deserved the name of the Roscins and Cicero of England. Some of his speeches in parliament, and on judicial causes, have been published.

FINCH, Daniel, earl of Nottingham, son of the preceding, was born in 1647. Though he was one of the privy counsellors who proclaimed the elevation of the duke of York to the throne, he never appeared at court during the reign of James, but upon his abdication he wished the appointment of a regent, and not the setting up of another king. He was secretary under William, and held the same office under Anne, till 1704. At the accession of George I. he was one of the lords for the administration of affairs, and was declared president of the council. He retired from public affairs 1716, and died 1730. He wrote a very elaborate book in reply to Whiston's letter to him on the trinity, for which he was thanked by the university of Oxford.

FINLAY, John, a native of Glasgow, was born in 1782, and was educated at the university of his native city, at which he distinguished himself by his talents, and was much beloved for the sweetness of his disposition. His poem of Wallace of Ellerslie was given to the world when he was only nineteen. He died at Moffat, in 1810. Besides his Wallace, he published A Collection of Historical and Romantic Ballads, 2 vols.; wrote A Life of Cervantes; and edited editions of Blair's Grave, and Smith's Wealth of Nations. His poetry is characterized by no trifling portion of elegance and animation.

FINLEY, Samuel, D.D., president of the college of New Jersey, was a native of Ireland, and came to America 1734. Having been licensed to preach, he was ordained by the presbytery of New Brunswick 1740. The first part of his ministry was spent in fatiguing itinerant labors. His benevolent zeal sometimes brought him into unpleasant circumstances. The legislature of Connecticut had made a law prohibiting itinerants from entering parishes, in which a minister was settled, unless by his consent. For preaching to a presbyterian congregation in New Haven Mr. Finley was in consequence of this law seized by the civil authority, and carried as a vagrant out of the colony. In 1744 he was settled as the minister of Nottingham, Maryland, where he remained seven years. While here he established an academy which acquired great reputation. On receiving the appointment of president of New Jersey college he removed to Princeton. He died 1766, aged 50. He published a number of sermons.

FINLEY, Robert, D.D., president of the university of Georgia, graduated at Princeton college 1757. From 1793 to 1795 he was a tutor, and a trustee from 1807 till 1817, when he resigned. He was the minister of Basking Bridge, N. Jersey, from June 1797 till 1817. Deeply interested in the welfare of the free blacks, he formed a plan of sending them to Africa, and may be considered as the father of the Colonization society. In Dec. 1816 he went to Washington and succeeded in calling a meeting of gentlemen Dec. 21, at which addresses were made by Mr. Clay and Mr. Randolph. The next week a constitution was adopted and judge Washington chosen president. On his return Dr. Finley caused the establishment of an auxiliary society at Trenton. Being at this period chosen president of Franklin college at Athens, Georgia, he repaired to that place in 1817, and in a few months died there, aged 45. He published several sermons.

FIRENZUOLA, Angelo, an Italian poet, born at Florence, and patronised by pope Clement VII. He was for some time an advocate, and then became an ecclesiastic, and died at Rome 1545. His prose works were published at Florence 1543, 8vo. and his comedies and other poetical pieces the year after, and in 1763, in 3 vols.

FIRMICIUS MATERNUS, Julius, a Christian writer of the fourth century, of whom little is known. His book "de Errore Profanarum Religionum," has been often printed, and is a valuable performance. The eight books of astronomy or mathematics, printed at Venice 1497, which bear his name, are supposed not to be by him, or at least to have been written by him before he was converted from heathenism to Christianity.

FIRMIN, Thomas, a most benevolent Englishman, born at Ipswich, June 1632. He was apprenticed by his parents who were puritans, to a linen manufacturer in London. He was very prosperous in his business, and he honorably employed the fruits of his industry and success to the most charitable purposes. He was in his religious opinions a Socinian, but he nevertheless was held in esteem by the clergy, by Wilkins, Whicheot, and especially Tillotson, who frequented his company even when archbishop. He was settled in Lombard street, and the ravages of the plague in 1665, and the fire of 1666, gave full activity to his extensive benevolence. In 1676 he erected a warehouse in Little Britain for the industrious employment of the poor in the linen manufacture, and in 1692 he established another manufactory of the same kind at Ipswich for the benefit of the protestants who had fled from France on account of religious persecutions. For the last 20 years of his life he was governor of Christ hospital, London, to which he was a great benefactor. There was indeed scarce a charitable institution to which he did not liberally contribute, with the most humane and benevolent of intentions. This worthy and great character, died 20th Dec. 1697, aged 66. He published in 1673 Proposals for the Employing of the Poor, and the Prevention of Beggary, 4to.

FISHER, John, D.D., an English prelate, born at Beverly, Yorkshire, 1459. In 1501 he was made vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1504 was nominated bishop of Rochester, and the next year accepted the headship of Queen's college, Cambridge. On Luther's appearance he stood forth as the champion of Rome, but though long favored by the king, he fell under his displeasure 1527, on account of his zealous defence of the queen, in the affair of her divorce. In 1530 he narrowly escaped poisoning by one Rouse, who threw in the cook's absence poison into the gruel, of which luckily the bishop did not taste, but which proved fatal to two of the servants, and nearly so to 15 others who partook of it. Upon the question of the king's supremacy in 1531, Fisher opposed it with great freedom, and increased the dissatisfaction of the court, by listening to the predictions of the holy maid of Kent, and more at last by refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to the king, and to his children, by Anne Boleyn. He was committed to the Tower for his contumacy, and though solicited by his friends he refused to alter his opinion, or assent to the lawfulness of the divorce, and the marriage of the king. He was attainted of high treason, but he might have languished in confinement the rest of his life, had not the gratitude of the pope been unreasonably manifested towards him. Pleased with the firmness of the venerable bishop, Paul III. in 1535, created him a cardinal, an honor which displeased Henry so much, that he gave orders that none should bring the hat into his dominions. He was soon after arraigned, and condemned to suffer death for high treason, and on the 22d June, 1535, he was beheaded, and his head fixed on London-bridge, the next day. He was then nearly 77. As he was the literary opponent of Erasmus, the opinion of that illustrious author must be considered as impartial. He describes him as a man of great and extensive powers of mind, and for integrity, sweetness of temper, and greatness of soul, far superior to all the men of his age.

FISHER, Alexander M. professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Yale college, Connecticut, was born in Franklin, Massachusetts, in 1794. He was graduated at Yale College, in the year 1813, and in 1815 appointed a tutor in that seminary. In 1817, he was advanced to the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy. He early discovered very uncommon talents for the acquisition and communication of knowledge, and excited the highest expectations of his usefulness and distinction. His power of attention, quickness, and clearness of apprehension, rapid discernment of the relations of objects, accuracy of judgment, and independence, caution, and originality in investigation, are rarely equalled, and constituted a genius of the highest order for the department of science to which he devoted his attention; and his attainments were as extraordinary as his endowments. After having once delivered his course of lectures he undertook a voyage to Europe, to improve himself in his professional studies, and perished in the wreck of the packet Albion, on the coast of Ireland, on the 22d of April, 1822. He possessed great amiableness, modesty, and delicacy of taste, and his conduct was marked by an uncommon regard to religious obligation. Several of his scientific papers may be seen in Silliman's Journal of Science and the Arts.

FISHER, Myers, a lawyer at Philadelphia, and a quaker, died March 12, 1819, aged 71. He was a man of science and an eloquent orator. He published an answer to Paine's age of reason.

FISK, Pliny, a missionary, graduated at Middlebury college 1814. Having studied theology at Andover, where he was one of the "group of stars," commemorated by Wilcox, he was employed as an agent for the board of foreign missions one year, and sailed for Palestine with Mr. Parsons 1819. On arriving at Smyrna they engaged in the study of the eastern languages; but in a few months removed to Scio, in order to study modern Greek under professor Bambas. The college at Scio then had 7 or 800 students. But in 1821 the island was desolated by the barbarous Turks. In 1822 he accompanied to Egypt his fellow laborer, Mr. Parsons, and witnessed his death and buried him in the Greek convent. From Egypt he proceeded in April 1823 through the desert to Judea, accompanied by Mr. King and Mr. Wolff. Having visited Jerusalem, he went to Beyroot, Balbee, Damaseus, Aleppo, and Antioch. He made a third visit to Jerusalem with Mr. King. When he withdrew from Jerusalem in the spring of 1825, he retired to the mission family of Mr. Goodell and Mr. Bird at Beyroot, where he died in Oct., aged 33. He was eminently qualified to be a missionary in the east. He was a preacher in Italian, French, Modern Greek, and Arabic. He had been employed in preparing a dictionary in English and Arabic, and on the day of his seizure by his sickness he had put down against the last letter of the English alphabet the last word, which he knew in Arabic. His various communications are found in several volumes of the missionary herald.

FISKE, Nathan, D.D., a congregational minister of Brookfield, Mass. He was born in Weston of that state, Sept. 20, 1733; graduated at Harvard university in 1754; and was ordained May 20, 1758. He continued to officiate in the duties of his office for a period of more than forty years; and died at the age of 66, Nov. 24, 1799. He was much respected for his piety and talents. The following is a list of his publications—a sermon on the settlement and growth of Brookfield, 1775; a Fast Sermon, 1776; three Funeral sermons, 1778; 1779, and 1784; an Oration on the capture of Cornwallis, 1781; a volume of sermons, 1794; Duddleian lecture, 1796; and the Moral Monitor, 2 vols. 12mo. 1801.

FITZHERBERT, Sir Anthony, an able judge, was born at Norbury, in Derbyshire, and studied at Oxford and one of the inns of court. He rose, in 1523, to be judge of the court of common pleas; and he died in 1533. Among his legal works are, The Grand Abridgment; The New Natura Brevium; and The Office and Authority of Justices of Peace. The Book of Husbandry, and a Treatise of the Surveying of Lands, are also generally attributed to him; but some suppose them to have been written by his brother John.

FITZHERBERT, Thomas, grandson to sir Anthony, was born at Staffordshire 1552, and educated at Oxford, either at Exeter, or Lincoln college. As he was a zealous catholic, he left the university without a degree, and fled as a voluntary exile to France 1582. He afterwards went to Madrid, and Milan, and at last entered into the society of Jesus, at Rome 1614. He was afterwards at Brussels, and for 22 years presided over the English college at Rome, where he died 1640, aged 88. He was a man of great learning, and he wrote several books, on controversial subjects, against Barlow, Downe, Andrews, and other divines. His treatise concerning policy and religion, in three parts, was much admired by papists and protestants.

FITZHERBERT, Nicholas, grandson to sir Anthony, and cousin to Thomas, was born 1550, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1572, he went abroad as a voluntary exile, on account of his religious principles, and settled at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome, in the house of William Alan, the English cardinal. He was unfortunately drowned in a journey from Rome 1612. He wrote Casse Galatæi de Bonis Moribus, 1595—Oxonien-sis in Angliâ Academicæ Descriptio 1602—de Antiquitate & Continuacione Catholicæ Religionis, in Angliâ, 1603—Cardinalis Alani, Vitæ Epitome, 1608.

FITZJAMES, James, duke of Berwick, natural son of the duke of York, afterwards James II, by Arabella Churchill, sister to the duke of Marlborough, was born at Moulins 1671. He was early inured to the labors of a military life, and was wounded at Buda 1686, and signalized himself at the defeat of the Turks at Mohatz, and afterwards in Ireland at the siege of Londonderry, and at the battle of the Boyne. In 1703, he headed the French troops in Spain, reduced the rebels in the Cevennes, and in 1705 took Nice, and for his services was made marshal of France by the king. He gained the famous victory at Almanza, over the English and Portuguese under Galloway 1707, and thus secured the Spanish crown, on the head of Philip V. He was killed at the head of the French army, by a cannon ball, at the siege of Philipsburg, in Germany 1734. He was a man of a benevolent character, generally poor from the great sacrifices which he made to support the emigrants in his father's cause. Montesquieu has drawn up his character, and 2 vols. of his memoirs have been published, 12mo. by Margon.

FITZPATRICK, Richard, a whig politician and wit, was born in 1748, and was educated at Eton. At the age of eighteen he entered the army, and he rose to the rank of lieutenant general. From 1774 till the period of his decease, in 1813, he was a member of the House of Commons. During the coalition in 1783, and the whig administration in 1806, he was secretary at war. He contributed to the Rolliad and the Probatinary Odes, and wrote various small poems. Of his senatorial eloquence the best specimen is his speech, delivered in 1796, on a motion to effect the liberation of M. de la Fayette.

FIXLMILLNER, Placidus, an Austrian astronomer and mathematician, was born, in 1721, near Lintz, and died in 1791. He was a monk of the monastery of Kremsmunster, and held several monastic offices, besides being professor of canon law, and apostolical notary of the Roman court. He is the author of Decennium Astronomicum; Reipublicæ Sacræ Originis Divinæ; and other works. Fixhuillner was one of the first who calculated the orbit of the Georgium Sidus.

FIZES, Anthony, a famous physician of Montpellier, who died there 1765, aged 75. His works are esteemed. Opera Medica, 4to. 1742—Lecons de Chymie, 1750.—Tractatus de Febribus, 12mo. 1749.—Præctatus de Physiologiâ, 12mo, 1750, and dissertations.

FLAMEL, Nicolas, a notary of Paris, born at Pontoise. He suddenly rose from poverty to extensive opulence, and gave rise to a report that he had discovered the philosopher's stone. His riches, however, were nobly used in the relief of indigence, and in the erection of hospitals. It is supposed that his riches arose from successful speculations in commerce, at that time little known. He was living in 1399, and Lucas amused his readers by declaring that he had seen him in India after his decease. Some works on Alchymy have been attributed to him.

FLAMINIO, Marc Antonio, son of the preceding, born at Imola. He was patronized by cardinal Farnese, who appointed him his secretary at the council of Trent, an office which his infirmities prevented him to execute. He died at Rome 1550, aged 57. His letters and epigrams appeared 1561, 8vo.—and his paraphrase of thirty psalms, 1558. His latinity is very pure. He was learned, and his other writings are much esteemed.

FLAMSTEED, John, a celebrated astronomer, was born, in 1646, at Denby, in Derbyshire, and was educated at Derby free school; but his weak state of health did not then allow him to proceed to the university. Some years afterwards, however, he entered himself of Jesus College, Cambridge. To astronomy his attention is said to have been directed by perusing Scrobosco's work De Sphæra; and he cultivated the science with such assiduity as to become one of the most eminent astronomers of his time. He was appointed astronomer royal and the observatory at Greenwich was erected for him. Flamsteed was also in orders, and held the living of Burstow, in Surrey. He died in 1719. His Historia Cœlestis Britannica, of which the best part was printed before his death, was published by his widow 1725, in 3 vols. fol. and dedicated to the king. His papers, as he himself tells us in his preface, had been examined by the direction of George, prince of Denmark, by Roberts, Newton, Gregory, Arbuthnot, Wren and others, and under this high recommendation, were afterwards presented to the public.

FLATMAN, Thomas, an English poet, born in Aldersgate street, London, 1633, and educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He left the university without a degree, and became barrister of the Inner Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. He now turned author, and wrote several light poems, one of which, on the death of lord Ossory, was read by the father, the duke of Ormond, with such gratification that he sent the author a mourning ring, with a diamond in it, worth 100*l*. He died in Fleet-street, London, 1698. He was an indifferant poet; but, says Granger, succeeded better as a painter, as one of his heads is worth a ream of his Pindarics. His poems, third edition, were printed 1682, in one vol. 8vo.

FLAVEL, John, an English divine, born in Worcestershire, and educated at University college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. He was ejected from his living at Dartmouth, in 1662, for nonconformity, and retired to Hudsott, near South Molton. He returned to his living on the indulgence granted by Charles II. and died there 1692. He wrote Navigation and Husbandry spiritualized, &c. His works, which are respectable, were published 2 vols. fol. and 6 vols. 8vo.

FLAXMAN, John, a distinguished modern sculptor, the son of a sculptor who worked for Roubilliac and Scheemaker, was born, in 1755, at York; and, in 1770, was admitted a student of the Royal Academy. Modelling in wax and clay was one of his first occupations; and he also painted in oil colors. In 1787 he went to Italy. During his seven years studies there, he executed several important works, and made his drawings to illustrate Homer, Eschylus, and Dante. To these he subsequently added illustrations of Hesiod. The engravings from these designs spread his fame throughout Europe as an artist of truly classical taste. In 1794 he returned to England; and his first work after his return, Lord Mansfield's monument in Westminster Abbey, placed him in the first rank of modern sculptors. Thenceforth he was constantly employed, and his productions are consequently numerous. Among these may be mentioned the monuments of Collins, the poet; Miss Cromwell; Earl Howe; Lord Nelson; Sir Joshua Reynolds; Countess Spencer; and the Baring family. In 1818, he completed drawings and a model for the shield of Achilles, as described in the Iliad; from which four casts in silver have since been made. He died December 9, 1826. "To the aid of his art," says a celebrated reviewer, "he brought a loftier and more poetical mind than any of our preceding sculptors; and learning unites with good sense and natural genius in all the works which come from his hand." Flaxman was professor of sculpture at the Royal Academy.

FLECHIER, Esprit, a celebrated French prelate, born 1632, at Perne, near Avignon. He distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and became known as an elegant scholar, by his poetical description of a carousal in pure latinity. His funeral orations were much admired, especially that on Turenne, and that on Montausier, which raised him to the same rank of reputation with the well known Bossuet. In 1679 he wrote his History of Theodosius the Great, and in 1685 he was honorably promoted to the see of Lavaur, on which occasion the king said, Be not surprised I have so long delayed to reward your merit; I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses. In 1687 he was translated to Nismes, where, as a preacher and a bishop, he was successful in drawing many of the protestants to the catholic faith. In the famine of 1709, his charity and benevolence were unbounded. This most virtuous and exemplary man died 1710, lamented, says d'Alambert, by the catholics, regretted by the protestants, having exhibited to his brethren an excellent model of zeal and charity, simplicity and eloquence. His works are Œuvres Mêlées—Panegyric of Saints—Funeral Orations—sermons, 3 vols. 12mo.—the History of Theodosius—Gratiani de Casibus Illust. Vir.—the Life of Ximenes, 4to.—letters, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Life of Cardinal Commendon, 4to.—posthumous works. Those who compare Bossuet with Flechier observe, that the former has less elegance but greater strength, and that the style of his rival is more flowing, finished, and uniform. Bossuet owes all to nature, Flechier much to art.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English lawyer, recorder of London in Elizabeth's reign, was natural son of Mr. Fleetwood of Hesketh, Lancashire. He was educated at Oxford, and studied the law in the Middle Temple, and soon distinguished himself by his abilities. He was made recorder of London 1569, he showed himself very active against mass-houses, and popish priests. In 1580 he was made serjeant at law, and in 1592 serjeant to the queen. He died 1593, and was buried at Great Missenden, Bucks, where he had an estate. He was married, and had some children who survived him. He was an eloquent orator, says Wood, and his skill as a politician recommended him much to the notice of Leicester. He published an oration at Guildhall before the lord mayor—a table to Plowden's Reports—the Office of a Justice of the Peace, 1658—Annalium tan Regum Edwardi V. Richardi III. Henrici VII. quam Henrici VIII.—Titulorum Ordine Alphabet & Elenchus 1579 and 1597.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English prelate, descended from the Lancashire Fleetwoods, and born in the tower of London 1st Jan. 1656. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, and on taking orders, became an eloquent preacher. He was made chaplain to king William, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Eton, and the rectory of St. Austin's, London. He was installed canon of Windsor 1702, but in 1705, he quitted the tumults of the town, and, much to the concern of large audiences, who attended his eloquent and persuasive discourses, he retired to the privacy of Wexham rectory, in Bucks. In 1706, without any solicitation on his part, or that of his friends, he was nominated to succeed Beveridge in the see of St. Asaph, and in 1714 he was translated to Ely. He died at Tottenham, in Middlesex, where he had retired for change of air, 4th August, 1723, and he was buried in Ely cathedral, where his lady, who soon followed him to the grave, erected a monument over him. His only son, Dr. Charles Fleetwood, rector of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, did not long survive him. Bishop Fleetwood's character was respectable in every point of view. Admired as a preacher, he made an exemplary life, and a benevolent heart, the noblest ornaments of his persuasive eloquence in the pulpit. As a bishop he was beloved by his clergy, and did not arrogantly assume that superiority over them which conscious merit disdains, but illiberal pride asserts. As a writer he was highly respected, his sermons and divinity tracts were widely circulated; but the firmness of his opinions, however, drew upon him the censure of the house of Commons. Besides these, Fleetwood published Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge, 8vo. 1691—a translation of Jurieu's Method of Devotion, 1692, the 27th edition of which appeared 1750—an Essay on Miracles, 8vo. 1701—the Reasonable Communicant, 1704—Sixteen Practical Discourses on the Relative Duties of Parents, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 1705—the Thirteenth of Romans vindicated, 1710—the Judgment of the Church of England in Lay Baptism and Dissenters' Baptism, 1712—the Life of St. Wenefrede, 1713—Chronicon Preciosum, or Account of English Money, Price of Corn and other Commodities for the last 600 Years, 1707, besides smaller works.

FLEMING, Robert, a North Briton, born at Bathens, 1630. He was educated at St. Andrew's, and at the age of 33 became pastor of a congregation, from which office he was ejected after the restoration. He then settled at Rotterdam, in Holland, as minister of the Scots' congregation there, and died 25th July 1694. His "Fulfilling of the Scriptures," has been a popular work among the dissenters.

FLEMING, Robert, son of the preceding, was a native of Scotland, and educated at Leyden and Utrecht. He settled at Leyden as minister, and then removed to Amsterdam, from whence he came to London, and officiated at the Scotch church, Lothbury, and at Salters' hall. He wrote, among other things, sermons—tracts—Christology, 3 vols. 8vo.—the Rise and Fall of Popery, of which it is said that many passages are particularly applicable to the first events of the French revolution. He died 1716.

FLEMMING, or FLEMMYNGE, Richard, a native of Croston, Yorkshire, educated at University college, Oxford, and made prebendary of York 1403. He was, in 1442, made bishop of Lincoln, and went as deputy to the council of Constance. The pope raised him to York; but as the king refused his consent he continued bishop of Lincoln till his death, 1431. He was founder of Lincoln college, Oxford, and was a strenuous opposer of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he afterwards warmly embraced. To his disgrace he was instrumental, however, in digging up the bones of that bold reformer, according to the impotent resolutions of the Constance council.

FLESSELLES, N. de, a French magistrate, respectable for his loyalty, and the mildness of his manners. He attempted in vain to repress the tumults which preceded the revolution; but on the 14th of July 1789, his benevolent and patriotic interference proved fatal at the taking of the Bastille. He received a shot from a pistol, and his head, being cut off, was carried on a pike in triumph through the streets.

FLETCHER, Richard, D.D. father of the dramatic poet, was born in Kent, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was made dean of Peterborough 1533, and three years after attended the Scotch Mary's execution, where he displayed more zeal than good sense in pressing that unfortunate queen to turn protestant. In 1539, he was advanced to the see of Bristol, in 1592, translated to Worcester, and 1594, to London. After the death of his wife he took a second, lady Baker, a woman of great beauty, about 1595, and this so offended Elizabeth, who was averse to the marriage of the clergy, especially of bishops, that she caused Whitgift to suspend him. Though afterwards restored to favor, the queen's conduct sat heavily upon him, and he died suddenly in his chair 1596. As he was fond of tobacco, then little known, Camden imputes his death to an immoderate use of it.

FLETCHER, Giles, L.L.D. brother to the bishop, was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. His abilities were employed by queen Elizabeth, as commissioner in Scotland, Germany and the Low Countries, and in 1583, he was sent as ambassador to Russia, to reconcile the Russians to the English commerce, and to efface the disadvantageous impressions which the jealousy of the Dutch and other powers had excited. On his return he was made secretary to the city of London, and in 1597 treasurer of St. Paul's. He died 1610. He wrote a curious account "of the Russian Commonwealth," with a description of the fashions and manners of the people, 1590, 8vo. The book was suppressed, but appeared in Hakluyt's collection, 1643.

FLETCHER, John, a dramatic writer, son of the bishop of London, was born in Northamptonshire 1576. He was educated at Cambridge, probably Benet college, and distinguished himself as a writer of plays conjointly with Beaumont. He also assisted Ben Jonson in his "Widow," and after Beaumont's death he consulted Shirley in the formation of the plots of his pieces. The respective share of these joint authors is not known, though it is said that Beaumont's judgment corrected the redundancies of Fletcher's wit. Once at a tavern the brother bards debated upon the plot of a tragedy, and Fletcher being overheard by the waiter to say that he would kill the king, he and his friend were both seized for high treason, till explanations proved to the magistrate that the intended murder was the innocent sacrifice of a theatrical hero. Fletcher died of the plague in London 1625, and was buried in St. Mary Overy's church, Southwark. Fletcher was ranked with Jonson and Shakspeare, in the great triumvirate of chief dramatic authors, by Edward Philips, and Dryden says that his plays, as possessing gaiety in the comic parts, and pathos in the more serious characters, were acted more frequently than those of Jonson or Shakspeare. Now, though they possess great merit, the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher are little regarded, and seldom appear on the stage.

FLETCHER, Phinchas, a poet, son of Giles Fletcher. He was educated at Eton, and elected to King's college, Cambridge, 1600. He was made minister of Hilgay in Norfolk, 1621, by sir Henry Willoughby, and died there about 1650. He is known as the author of "Purple Island," a poem containing an allegorical description of man, and very popular at the time of its publication. He wrote besides "Piscatory Eclogues," which were published at Edinburgh 1772, and the Purple Island, with Giles's "Christ's Victory," 1733 London.

FLETCHER, Andrew, son of sir Robert Fletcher, of Saltoun, Scotland, was born 1653. He was educated under bishop Burnet, and when in parliament he so strongly opposed the measures of the court that he was obliged to leave the country and go to Holland. He landed in the West of England with Monmouth 1685, and afterwards fought against the Turks in the Hungarian army. The revolution restored him to his country, and he became a commissioner to settle the government of Scotland. He died in London 1716. His works, which are all on political subjects, and in the bold style of theory, appeared together in 1 vol. 8vo. 1732.

FLETCHER, Benjamin, governor of New York, succeeded Ingoldsby in August, 1692, and continued in the administration until 1698. He was passionate, avaricious, and arbitrary, and rendered himself unpopular. He gave the colony of Connecticut some trouble by endeavoring to obtain the command of its militia, which had been improperly given him in his commission. Piracy prevailed on the coast during his administration, and he was accused of countenancing it. He was during the same period governor of Pennsylvania, but resigned the administration into the hands of Markham, his deputy.

FLEURIEU, Charles Peter Clarel de, a hydrographer, was born at Lyons, in 1733. He became a captain in the marine service, and in 1790, was appointed minister of that department. In 1792 he was made tutor to the dauphin, but soon afterwards was thrown into prison by the revolutionary party. Buonaparte nominated him to the offices of the intendant of horse and governor of the Thuilleries, which places he resigned in 1805. He died in 1810. Fleurieu published a work, entitled "Decouvertes des Francois en 1763 et 1769, dans le sud-est de la Nouvelle Guinée," 4to. A voyage to prove some time pieces, 2 vols. 8vo. He spent many years in completing a great "Hydrographic Atlas," but left it unfinished.

FLEURY, Claude, a French advocate, born at Paris 1640. After being at the bar nine years he took orders, and in 1672 became preceptor to the princess of Conti, and in 1690 to the count de Vermandois. Under Fenelon he was subpreceptor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and for his services he was made abbot of Locdieu, which he resigned in 1706, for the rich priory of Angenteuil. In 1716 he was confessor to Lewis XV., and died 1723, aged 82, greatly respected for his learning and virtues. His works are numerous, the chief of which are, Manners of the Israelites—Manners of the Christians—Ecclesiastical History, in 13 vols. 4to. a valuable book—Institution of Ecclesiastical Law—a treatise on the choice and method of Studies—Duties of Masters and Servants—treatise on Public Law, 2 vols. 12mo.

FLEURY, André Hercule de, a famous cardinal, born at Lodeve in Languedoc 1653, and educated at Paris. Recommended by abilities, and by a pleasing address, and handsome figure, he rose from canon of Montpellier to the bishop of Frejus, and was appointed by Lewis XIV., preceptor to his grandson, after Bossuet and Fenelon. In 1726 he was made cardinal and prime minister, though aged 70, and so active was his conduct, and sagacious his measures, that the kingdom of France prospered greatly under his administration, the succession war was gloriously finished, and Lorraine added to the French dominions. His economy, however, neglected and ruined the marine, and in the war of 1740, his plans were not crowned with victory, so that it is said, he died with a heart broken with grief, 1743. Without the pride of Richelieu, and the avarice of Mazarine, he possessed great abilities; and though the misfortunes of the last war were attributed to him, he rather deserved the gratitude of the nation for his prudent management of the finances, and more for the benevolence of his heart.

FLINDERS, Matthew, an eminent modern navigator, was born at Downton, in Lincolnshire, and entered early into the merchant service, from which he removed into the king's, and went with Captain Hunter to New South Wales. After having, in a small boat, in conjunction with Mr. Bass, discovered the straits which now bear the name of his companion, he was appointed to the command of the Investigator, in which he explored a considerable part of the coast of New Holland.

His vessel was at length wrecked on a coral reef. On his passage homeward to England, in 1803, he touched at the Isle of France. There he was detained for more than six years a captive, and was deprived of his journal and papers. He died in 1814. His Voyage was published, in two quarto volumes, shortly after his decease.

FLODOARD, or FRODOARD, a French historian of Epernai. He was an ecclesiastic in the church of Rheims, where he wrote a Chronicle from 916 to 966—and a History of his Church from its Foundation to 949. The best edition is that of 1617. He wrote also poetry, and died 966, aged 73.

FLOGEL, Charles Frederic, author of a History of the Human Understanding—History of Comic Literature—and Present State of the Belles Lettres in Germany, in German, was professor of philosophy in the college of noblemen at Leignitz, where he died 1783, aged 59.

FLOOD, Henry, a celebrated Irish orator, the son of the chief justice of the king's bench in Ireland, was born in 1732; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at Oxford; became a member of the Irish House of Commons, in 1759, and distinguished himself by his eloquence and his patriotic exertions; was elected, in 1783, member for Seaford, in the British Parliament; and died in 1791. From 1775 to 1781, he held an office under government, and during the rest of his career he was in the ranks of the opposition. One of the most remarkable events of his senatorial life was the violent interchange of invective which, in 1783, took place between him and Grattan.

FLORIAN, John Peter Claris de, a French writer, was born, in 1755, at the castle of Florian, in the Lower Cevennes. Voltaire, to whom he was related by marriage, and who had a warm affection for him, recommended him to the duke of Penthièvre as a page. The duke soon contracted an equal regard for him. He gave him a company in his own regiment, and, afterwards, employed him about his person, treated him as a confidential friend, and afforded him the means of pursuing the career of literature. Thenceforth, Florian became a fertile and a popular writer. Among his earliest works were, Galatea; Estelle; Numa Pompilius; Comedies; Tales; and Gonsalvo of Cordova. His Fables, which rank him second among French fabulists, appeared in 1792. In 1794, he was for a while imprisoned, and he died on the 13th of September, shortly after his liberation. Besides the works already mentioned, he produced several others, among which may be mentioned Eliczar and Naphtali; William Tell; Ruth; a translation of Don Quixote; and his own memoirs, under the title of Memoirs of a young Spaniard. Elegance, simplicity, and benevolent feeling, are the distinguishing qualities of Florian's writings.

FLORIO, John, the Resolute, as he styled himself, was born in London in the reign of Henry VIII. His parents who were Waldenses, and descended from the Florii of Sienna in Tuscany, had fled from the persecutions of popery in the Valteline, and settled finally in England under Elizabeth, after a short absence during Mary's bigoted reign. Florio taught Italian and French in the university of Oxford, and was admitted at Magdalen college. He was tutor in those languages to prince Henry, and to Anne the queen of James I., to whom he was clerk of the closet. He died of the plague at Fulham 1625, aged 80. Of his works the principal are, "first Fruits and second Fruits," containing proverbs and witty sentences—Garden of Recreation—a translation of Montaigne's Es- says—and an Italian and English Dictionary, fol. 1597, a work of merit. He married the sister of Sam. Daniel, the poet.

FLOOD, William, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a member of the committee of correspondence of New-York in 1774, and a delegate to congress from Suffolk county. He continued in that station until near the close of the revolution, after which he removed to the then unsettled valley of Oneida, and resided there during the remainder of his life. In 1789 he was again elected a member of congress. In 1792 he was one of the electors of president and vice-president, and was repeatedly appointed to the same office at subsequent elections. He died at Western, August 3d, 1821, aged 89.

FLOYER, sir John, a native of Hinters, Staffordshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his medical degrees. He afterwards settled as a respectable practitioner at Lichfield and was knighted. He wrote the Touchstone of Medicines, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Virtues of Cold Water, 8vo., and died 1720, aged 71.

FLUDD, Robert, an English philosopher, son of sir Thomas Fludd, knight, born at Milgate, Kent, 1574. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and after taking his degrees in arts, applied to physic and travelled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, to improve himself. He took his degrees in medicine 1605, and settled in London, and became fellow of the college of physicians. He began to publish about 1616, and was a voluminous writer, chiefly on the powers and wonders of Alchymy, and the Rosicrucian doctrines. His works are in Latin, and written in an obscure and mysterious language. They amount to about 20, and are all mentioned in Wood's Athenæ. Two of his productions were against Kepler and Mersennus, and they were answered by those great philosophers.

FOBES, Perez, LL.D., a graduate of Harvard college, in 1762. In 1766, he was ordained to the ministry at Raynham, Mass., and in 1786, he was appointed professor of mathematics in Brown university. Dr. Fobes died Feb. 23, 1812, aged 70. He published a History of Raynham; a Sermon on the death of President Manning; and an Election sermon.

FOES, or FOESIUS, Anutius, a learned physician, born at Metz, 1523. He was well skilled in Greek and Latin, and translated the works of Hippocrates into Latin, as also the commentaries of Galen. His abilities are praised by Huctius. He practised physic at Lorraine with reputation, and died 1596.

FOINARD, Frederic Maurice, a native of Conches in Normandy, who was eminent as a Hebrew scholar, and became vice-principal of the college of du Plessis. He published Breviarium Ecclesiasticarum, 2 vols. 8vo.—Genesis Explained, French and Latin, 2 vols. 12mo, and the Psalms in Historical Order. He died 1743.

FOIX, Odel de, lord of Lautrec, a French general of eminence. He was wounded under Louis XII. at the battle of Ravenna 1512, and appointed governor of Milan by Francis I. The success of Colonna, however, soon after drove him from Milan, Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia, and after the unfortunate battle of Bicoque he retired to Guienne 1522. In 1523 he re-entered Italy, took Pavia, and boldly besieged Naples, before which he died. His body was conveyed to Spain, and 20 years after buried in the tomb of the great Gonsalvo of Cordova.

FOLARD, Charles, a French officer born at Avignon 1669. His military genius was roused by the reading of Caesar's commentaries, and at the age of 16 he became a soldier. His father confined him in a monastery, but he escaped, and still more attached to the army, became aide-de-camp to Vendome, who commanded in Italy 1702, and intrusted him with part of his forces. He was honored for his services with the cross of St. Lewis, and had a pension of 400 livres settled on him. In 1705 he was wounded at the battle of Cassano, and in consequence lost the use of his left hand. In 1706, he defended Modena against prince Eugene, by whom he was taken prisoner some time after the battle of Blenheim. In 1711 he was made governor of Bourbourg, in 1714 he assisted in the defence of Malta against the Turks, and afterwards went into the service of Charles XII. of Sweden. He accompanied him in his invasion of Norway, and was present at his death, at the siege of Frederickshall 1718. On his return to France he served as colonel under the duke of Berwick, and afterwards applied himself to the study of the military art. He died at Avignon 1752, aged 83. He wrote some valuable commentaries on Polybius, in 6 vols. 4to. a book of new discoveries in war—a treatise Concerning the Defence of Places. Though not an accomplished writer, yet his publications show great knowledge of the military art.

FOLENGO, Theophilus, known by the assumed name of Merlin Cocaye, was of a noble family in Mantua. He fled from Bologna, and for some time was in the military profession, which he quitted for the society of the Benedictines in St. Euphemia monastery. He died 1544, aged 51, at the priory of St. Croce, Bassano. The best known of his works are "Opus Macaronicum," 1651, a popular work—Orlandino, 1526, and Chaos del Triperuno, two licentious poems—on the three Ages of Man, 1527,—le Humanita del Figlio di Dio, 1533.

FOLKES, Martin, LL.D., an English antiquary and philosopher, born at Westminster 1690. He was of the Royal society, London, and became its president after Sir Hans Sloane 1741. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and was a great connoisseur of old and modern coins. He died in London 1754. Boyer's anecdotes contain an ample account of him. He wrote a 4to. volume of English Silver Coin, from the Conquest to his own time.

FONTAINE, John, de la, a celebrated French poet, born at Chateau-Thierry, 8th July 1621. He read with eagerness the best poets of Greece, and Rome, of Italy, and of his country, and in the writings of Plato and Plutarch, collected all that morality which has enriched and beautified his fables. Though not a libertine he was most indifferent to religious truths, and he informed the priest with great composure that he had the New Testament which he thought a tolerable good book. He died 13th April, 1695, and it is said he was found with a hair shirt on, a proof of sincere repentance according to some.

FONTAINE, Nicholas, son of a scrivener, admitted at the age of 20 among the society of Port Royal, where he had afterwards the superintendance of the pupils. In 1664 he was confined for four years in the bastille with Sacy, and at last finally settled at Melun where he died 1709, aged 84. He wrote "Lives of the Saints of the Old Testament," 4 vols. 8vo.—Lives of Saints in General, 4 vols. 8vo.—the Figurative Language of the Bible, 4to.—Memoirs of the Solitaries of Port-Royal, 2 vols. 12mo.—Chrysostom's Homilies on St. Paul's epistles, translated, 7 vols. 8vo. For private worth, for learning, and piety, and for indefatigable and patient industry, Fontaine not only equalled but surpassed his contemporaries.

FONTAINE DES BERTINS, Alexis, a celebrated French geometer, was born, in 1725, at Claveison, in Dauphiné, and died in 1771. He was the first who applied himself to the general theory and the applications of the integral calculus. His mathematical papers, on that and other important subjects, form a quarto volume.

FONTAINES, Peter Francis Guyot des, a French critic, born at Rouen 1685. He took the habit of a jesuit at 15, and quitted the society at 30. For some time a priest, he became a man of wit, and in 1724, he was intrusted by Bignon with the care of the "Journal des Savans." The severity of his censures drew upon him the accusation of an abominable crime from his enemies, but, after some confinement, his character was cleared up and re-established. In 1731, he began the "Nouvelliste du Parnasse, on Reflexions sur les Ouvrages Nouveaux," of which he wrote 2 vols. till the work was suppressed for the severity of its contents. In 1735, he began "Observations sur les Ecrits Modernes," which, after 33 vols. were completed, was also suppressed 1743. The next year another periodical paper, "Jugemens sur les Ouvrages Nouveaux," was undertaken; but after 11 vols. had appeared, death stopped the labors of the critic 1745. He published translations of Virgil and other classics, besides those of Pope, Swift, Fielding and others.

FONTANA, Dominico, a Roman architect and mechanic, born at Milan 1543. His chief work was the setting up of the obelisk, in front of St. Peter's, which had been buried for many years, and considered as an impracticable thing by all other mechanics. He was deservedly commended and rewarded for the bold and successful execution of this, and in 1592, he removed to Naples as an architect to the king, and died there greatly respected 1607.

FONTANA, Charles, an Italian architect, was born, in 1634, at Bruciato, and died in 1714. He was patronized by Popes Innocent XI. and Clement XI., and executed many important works, among which are several fountains, the mausoleum of Queen Christina, and the Grimani, Bolognetti, and Mount Citorio palaces. He wrote various architectural treatises, among which are descriptions of the Vatican and the Flavian amphitheatre.

FONTANA, Felix, an eminent Italian philosopher and naturalist, was born at Pomarolo, in the Tyrol, in 1730, and died at Florence, in 1805. From Pisa, where he was professor of philosophy, Leopold II. invited him to Florence, and confided to him the formation of the fine cabinet of natural history which is now one of the boasts of the Florentine capital. He is the author of various physiological and chemical works, one of the best known of which is a Treatise on Poisons.

FONTANA, Gregory, a brother of the foregoing, a mathematician, was born in 1735, in the Tyrol; became a monk at an early age; succeeded Boscovich as mathematical professor at Pisa; filled that office with distinguished reputation for more than thirty years; was elected a member of the legislative assemblies of the Cisalpine and Italian republics; and died in 1805. He wrote a great number of mathematical papers in the transactions of various learned bodies; and translated several scientific works from the English, French, and German.

FONTANES, Louis De, an eminent French writer, was born at Niort, in 1761. He first became known to the public by his poems, among which were the Orchard, and a translation of Pope's Essay on Man. During the revolution he edited, first, the Journal called the Moderator, and afterwards, with La Harpe, The Memorial. For the latter he was proscribed in 1797, and obliged to take refuge in England. After the establishment of the consulships he took a share in the management of the Mercury. He was one of the original members of the Institute, and was successively a member and president of the legislative body, grand master of the university, and a senator. Louis XVIII, whose recall he was one of the first to propose, made him a peer, and a privy counsellor. He died in 1821. His last work was an ode on the Violation of the Tombs of St. Denis. By his countrymen he is considered as standing among the highest of their poets of the second class, and in the ranks of their first rate orators.

FONTANINI, Juste, archbishop of Ancyra, was born in the Frioul, and died at Rome 1736. His chief works are Bibliotheca Della Eloquenza Italiana, 2 vols. 4to. 1753,—a Literary History of Aquileia, 1742,—a collection of Bulls of Canonization from John XV. to Benedict XIII.

FONTE-MODERATA, a Venetian lady, whose real name was Modesta Pozzo. She was born at Venice 1555, and though placed at first in a monastery, she married, and after 20 years of conjugal happiness, died in child-bed 1592. Her memory was so retentive that she could repeat verbatim a discourse when only once heard. She wrote a poem called "il Floridoro," and another on the Passion and Resurrection of Christ, besides "Dei Meriti Delle Donne," a prose work in which she maintains that the female sex is not inferior in understanding to the male.

FONTENELLE, Bernard le Bovier de, son of an advocate in the parliament of Rouen, by a sister of the great dramatic Corneille, was born at Rouen, 11th Feb. 1657. Though so weak at his birth that his surviving was unexpected, he attained the age of 100, never troubled with attacks of disease till his 90th year, when his eyes became dim and his hearing dull. He died Jan. 1757. He displayed early proofs of genius, and before he had reached his 20th year he had written a great part of his Bellerophon, a tragic opera. He did not, however, shine as a dramatic writer equal to his uncle Corneille, but in his other pieces he exhibits great powers, delicacy of wit, and profoundness of thought, so that Voltaire has truly observed that he was the most universal genius which the age of Louis XIV. produced. His "Plurality of Worlds" is a most fascinating performance, in which he introduces a lady conveying the sublimer truths of philosophy in a dialogue, pleasing, lively, and refined. In his office of secretary to the academy of sciences, in which he continued more than 40 years, he devoted himself to the "History" of that learned body, and introduced elegance of language into the most abstruse parts of science. The "Eloges" delivered on deceased members are perused with particular attention and delight, and his apology for Descartes' virtues, though in favor of an exploded system, must be read with interest and admiration due to a great but mistaken genius. No man more than Fontenelle deserved and enjoyed the respect and confidence of his contemporaries. In his temper he was mild and affable, and with the feelings of a true christian he observed that a man should be sparing in superfluities to himself, that he may supply necessities to others. Though originally poor, he acquired, by industry and commendable economy, an independent fortune; but not despising the rest of the world for his superiority of mental talents and of riches, he said that men are foolish and wicked, but such as they are we must live among them. He wrote besides the works already mentioned, Pastoral Poems 1688—History of the French Theatre to Corneille—Reflections on Theatrical Poetry, particularly Tragely, a judicious and valuable work—Elements of Geometry—of Infinities, 1727—a tragedy, and six comedies—Endymion—Moral Discourses—the History of Oracles—and Dialogues of the Dead. His works have been published at Paris in 8 vols. 8vo. His Eloge was pronounced by le Cat.

FOOTE, Samuel, a dramatic writer, called the English Aristophanes, was born at Truro, Cornwall, 1722. He was at Worcester college, Oxford, and then removed to the temple, but the law was too dry and abstruse a pursuit for his volatile temper, and he therefore went on the stage. He appeared first in Othello, but his success in performing the character of other writers did not please him, and he commenced author and actor in the Hay-market, where in 1747, he first appeared before the public in "the Diversions of the Morning." This entertaining piece, at first opposed by the Westminster justices, as representing characters in real life, was altered to "Mr. Foote's giving Tea to his Friends," and thus for upwards of 40 mornings drew crowded and applauding audiences. The next year presented "An auction of Pictures" which met with equal approbation, though it reflected on the popular characters of the day, on sir Thomas de Veil the justice, Cock the Auctioneer, and Henley the orator. From 1752, to 1761, his success continued uninterrupted by the introduction of new pieces, and the versatility with which he himself represented various characters, and the little theatre Haymarket was now considered as the regular summer theatre, after the close of the other two. As he was on his way to France by the advice of his physicians, he was taken ill and died a few hours after at Dover, 20th Oct. 1777. In his private character Foote was respectable, and the wit and humor of his conversation were very powerful. Dr. Johnson, as Boswell relates, met him for the first time at Fitzherbert's. Having no good opinion of the fellow, says he, I was resolved not to be pleased, and it is very difficult to please a man against his will. I went on eating my dinner pretty sullenly, affecting not to mind him, but the dog was so very comical, that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork, throw myself back in my chair, and fairly laugh it out. Sir, he was irresistible. His dramas are 20 in number, mostly built on temporary topics, and full of personalities. He borrowed liberally from Molere, but made all his own by his own peculiar powers of humor and originality. His works have been collected and published in 4 vols. 8vo. His life has been published with entertaining anecdotes by Mr. Cooke.

FORBES, Patrick, a Scotch prelate, of a noble family, born in Aberdeenshire 1564. He was educated at Aberdeen and St. Andrew's, and being ordained presbyter at the age of 23, he was, in 1618, raised to the see of Aberdeen, much against his will, but at the pressing solicitations of king James. This great and good man died 1635, aged 71. His Commentary on the Revelations appeared London, 1613. He was a great benefactor to Aberdeen university, of which he was chancellor, and he revived the professorship of law, physic, and divinity.

FORBES, John, son of the preceding, was made bishop of Aberdeen, by king James. He was expelled from the divinity professorship at Aberdeen by the covenanters, and after two years residence in Holland, he returned to his native country and ended his days at his estate at Corse 1648. He was a very learned man, as his theological and historical institutions fully evince. His works were published at Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1703.

FORBES, William, bishop of Edinburgh, was born at Aberdeen 1535, and educated there. After studying at Leyden, and in the universities of Germany, he came to England, where he rejected the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, that he might re-establish his health by returning to the air of his native country. He was highly esteemed by his countrymen, and as his health would not permit his frequent preaching, he was appointed principal of the Marischal-college Aberdeen. On the foundation of the see of Edinburgh by Charles I. Dr. Forbes was honorably placed by the monarch to fill it, but he enjoyed his dignity only three months, and died 1634. He was a man of extensive learning, but was very moderate in his opinions, and pacific in his temper, as his treatise to diminish controversies printed London 1653, and re-printed at Frankfort 1707, fully proves.

FORBES, Duncan, a Scotch judge, born at Culloden 1635. He studied at Edinburgh, Utrecht, and Paris, and on his return to Scotland 1710, practised as an advocate. In 1722. he was elected member for Invernesshire, and 1725 was made lord advocate. In 1742, he was raised to be lord president of the court of sessions, and, in the rebellion of 1745, he nobly opposed the pretender, but the refusal of government to refund what he had lost by his liberal support of the royal cause, proved so disagreeable to his feelings, that it produced a fever of which he died 1747, aged 62. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and wrote Thoughts on Religion,—a Letter to a bishop on Hutchinson's writings,—Reflections on Incredulity, 2 vols. 12mo. 1750.

FORBES, Sir William, a native of Scotland, born in 1739, at Pitsligo, was one of the first who, with Sir James Hunter Blair, founded a banking establishment at Edinburgh. As a commercial character he was distinguished by liberality of conduct. His intellectual powers were of a superior order; and he was early a member of the Literary Club, in London, to which Johnson and other eminent men belonged. He died in 1807. His only work is, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Dr. Beattie.

FORBES, James, a native of London, born in 1749, was sent out to India, as a writer in his youth, and returned from thence, with a fortune, in 1784. During his residence in India, he travelled over a considerable part of it, and made notes and drawings, which afterwards formed the basis of Oriental Memoirs, four volumes 4to. He is also the author of Letters from France; and of Reflections on the Character of the Hindoos. Forbes died in 1819.

FORBES, John, a brigadier general in the British army, and commander-in-chief of the forces employed in the expedition against fort Duquesne in 1753, was a native of Petincrief, Fifeshire, Scotland, and educated a physician. He left his profession, entered the army, and in 1745 was advanced to the rank of lieutenant colonel. He acted as quarter-master-general of the army under the duke of Cumberland, and in 1757 was appointed brigadier-general, and sent to America. In the expedition against fort Duquesne he was successful; the fort was abandoned on his approach, and he changed its name to that of Pitt, in compliment to the prime minister. After having concluded treaties with the Indian tribes on the Ohio, he returned to Philadelphia, and there died, March 13th 1759, aged 49.

FORBES, Eli, D.D. minister of Brookfield, and of Gloucester, Massachusetts, entered Harvard college in 1744. In the month of July in the following year he was demanded as a soldier, and he cheerfully shouldered his musket and marched more than a hundred miles to oppose the French and Indians. Having been released by the interposition of his friends, he returned to his studies with a sharpened appetite, and was graduated in 1751. He was ordained minister of the second parish in Brookfield 1752. In the year 1753, and 1759, he was a chaplain in one of the regiments. In 1762 he went as a missionary to the Oneidas, one of the six nations of Indians, and planted the first christian church at Onaquage, on the river Susquehannah. Having established in this place a school for children, and another for adults, he returned bringing with him four Indian children, whom he sent back again in a few years, after furnishing them with such knowledge as would be useful to them. He also brought with him a white lad, who had become a complete savage; but he was civilized, and being educated at Dartmouth college, where he received a degree, was the agent of congress during the revolutionary war, and was very useful. In March 1776 he was dismissed from Brookfield, and in June installed at Gloucester. He died 1804, aged 77. He published a family book, and a number of single sermons.

FORBIN, Claude Chevalier de, a French naval officer, born in 1656. He was early brought up to the sea service, and in 1686 became chief admiral to the king of Siam in the East-Indies. He afterwards distinguished himself in Europe, on the coast of Spain, and in the service of Louis XIV. The king was pleased with his valor, and the disinterestedness, and generosity of his character, but though favored by the prince, he was neglected by the ministers, and therefore he retired in discontent from the service 1710. He died 1733, aged 77. His maxims to persons in the sea service, were two, never to interfere with any thing not belonging to their employment, and to pay a blind obedience to the orders they received, however repugnant to their private opinions.

FORCE, James duke de la, son of Francis, lord of la Force, who, with his eldest son Arnaud, was murdered in his bed, on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew. He was then nine years old, and was between his father and his brother in the bed, but being unperceived by the assassins, he escaped with his life, a circumstance which Voltaire has recorded in the 2d canto of his Henriade. He fought under Henry IV. and espoused the side of the protestants, against Louis XIII. especially at Montauban 1621. He soon after made his peace with the king, upon which he was created marshal of France, a duke, lieutenant general of the army of Piedmont, besides a present of 200,000 crowns. He afterwards took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carignan 1630. He was afterwards engaged in the German wars, and took Spire, after raising the siege of Philipsburg. He died full of years and glory 1652, aged 89.

FORDYCE, David, a learned Scotsman, born at Aberdeen 1720, where he was educated, and where he became professor of moral philosophy, in the marischal college. He travelled through France and Italy, and other parts of Europe, and was drowned on his return, in a storm on the coast of Holland 1751. He wrote Dialogues concerning Education, 2 vols. 8vo.—treatise of Moral Philosophy—Theodorus, a dialogue concerning the Art of Preaching—and the Temple of Virtue, a dream.

FORDYCE, James, a Scotch divine, brother to the above, born at Aberdeen, and educated there.

He was minister of Brechin, and afterwards of Alloa, and in 1762, he removed to Monkwell street, London, where he was assistant, and then successor to Dr. Lawrence. He afterwards settled in Hampshire, and died at Bath 1796, in his 77th year. He is author of Sermons to young Women, 2 vols.—Address to young Men, 2 vols.—Addresses to the Deity—a sermon on the Eloquence of the Pulpit—poems—and single sermons.

FORMEY, John Henry Samuel, a native of Berlin, minister of the French church there, and afterwards professor of philosophy in the French college, and then secretary to the royal Berlin academy of sciences, and privy counsellor. He died 1797, aged 86. He was author of Abridgement of Ecclesiastical History—History of Philosophy abridged, both translated into English—Researches on the Elements of Matter—Considerations on Cicero's Tusculanum—the Christian Philosopher—Pensées Raisonnables—Anti-Emile against Rousseau, and other works, and he conducted, with Beau-sobre, the Bibliothèque Germanique.

FORSTER, John, a protestant Hebraist of Wittenburg, born at Augsburg 1495. He was the friend of Luther, Reuchlin, and Melancthon, and died 1556. He published a Hebrew Lexicon, 1564, folio, Bale. Another person of the same name published Commentaries on Isaiah, and other works.

FORSTER, John Reinhold, L.L.D., a naturalist and traveller, was born in 1729, at Derschau, in Prussian Poland, and was educated at Berlin and Halle. After having been a minister of the gospel in Prussia, he was invited to Russia to superintend some new colonies at Saratoff. From Russia he soon removed to England, and became a teacher in the dissenting academy at Warrington. In 1772, he was engaged, with his son, to accompany Captain Cook, as naturalist. Subsequently to his return, his conduct gave, on more than one account, so much offence to the British government, that he thought it advisable to leave England. For some time he was much distressed; but in 1780 he was fortunate enough to be appointed professor of natural history, and inspector of the botanical garden, at Halle, in Saxony. He died in 1798. Among his works are, Observations made on his Voyage; and a History of Voyages and Discoveries in the North.

FORSTER, John George Adam, the son of the foregoing, was born near Dantzic, in 1754; accompanied his father in the voyage round the world; and was successively professor of natural history at Cassel and Wilna, and principal librarian to the elector of Mentz. Having adopted republican principles, Forster was sent to Paris, by the revolutionists of Mentz, to desire that their city might be united to France. This step was his ruin, and he was compelled to find an asylum in the French capital; where he died, in 1794, while preparing for a voyage to Hindostan and Thibet. He is the author of a Voyage round the World; a Journey along the Banks of the Rhine; and several other works: and he assisted his father in the Characteres Generum Plantarum.

FORSTER, Nathaniel, a native of Plymstock, Devonshire, educated at Plymouth and Eton school, and afterwards at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became fellow. He obtained Hethere rectory, Oxfordshire, and in 1750 was chaplain to Butler, of Durham, who made him his executor. He was, in 1752, chaplain to Herring the primate, and two years after obtained a prebend in Bristol cathedral, and Rochdale vicarage, Lancashire. In 1756 he was chaplain to the king, and then preacher to the Rolls. He died 1757, aged 40. He published Platonis Dialogi quinque, 1745—Reflections on the Antiquity of Egypt—Appendix Liviana, 1746—Poetry destructive of the Evidence of Christianity, a sermon—Dissertation on Josephus' Account of our Saviour—Biblia Hebraica, sine Punctis, 4to.—and on the Marriage of Minors, 8vo.

FORSYTH, William, a horticulturist, born in 1757 at Old Meldrum, in Aberdeenshire, was a pupil of Philip Miller, and succeeded him at the Chelsea physic garden. In 1784, he became superintendent of St. James's and Kensington Gardens. He died in 1804. Forsyth invented a composition to cure the wounds and diseases of trees; and wrote Observations on the Diseases, &c. of Fruit and Forest Trees; and a Treatise on the Culture of Fruit Trees.

FORTESCUE, Sir John, an English lawyer, born of an ancient family at Wear Gifford, in Devonshire. He was according to Tanner, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn. In 1441 he was made king's serjeant at law, and the next year chief justice of the king's Bench. His integrity, wisdom, and firmness recommended him to Henry VI. by whom his salary was raised; but his attachment to the house of Lancaster proved the source of persecution. In the first parliament of Edward IV. he was attainted of high treason, and he followed his exiled master into Scotland, where he was nominated chancellor of England. He embarked for Holland in 1463, with queen Margaret, and continued several years in exile in Lorraine. In this foreign country he employed himself in the composition of his book "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," written for the instruction of young prince Edward; but not published till the reign of Henry VIII. The year of his death is unknown, though he lived to nearly his 90th year, and was buried in the church of Ebrington, Gloucestershire, where, in 1677, one of his descendants repaired his monument. He wrote besides, "the Difference between an absolute and limited monarchy," published by J. Fortescue Aland, 1714, besides other works remaining in MS. The best edition of his book, "De Laudibus" is that of 1741. His character was very respectable for piety, learning, and benevolence, and, as attached to his country, none deserves a better name.

FORTIGUERRA, Nicolas, an Italian prelate and poet, born 1674. He was made a bishop by Clement XI. but he was so often disappointed by Clement XII. who as the patron of poets, had promised him a cardinal's hat, that he fell ill in consequence, and died 1735, aged 61. He wrote "Ricciardetto," a burlesque poem in 30 cantos, in a short time, to prove to some of his friends the ease with which he could write in the manner of Ariosto. This poem, though very faulty, exhibits sallies of pleasantry and strokes of genius. It has been translated into French by du Mourrier. Fortiguerra translated Terence into Italian 1736.

FOSCOLO, Ugo, a distinguished Italian writer, was born at sea, in 1776, near Zante, of which island his father was the Venetian governor. He was educated at Padua, and produced his tragedy of Thyestes before he was twenty. After the Venetian territory was placed under the Austrian yoke, he returned to Lombardy, where he produced his celebrated Letters of Ortis, a romance which established his fame. Having entered into the first Italian legion, he formed a part of the garrison of Genoa when that city was besieged by the Austrians in 1800, and two of his finest odes were composed while he resided in the Genoese capital. He retired from the army in 1805. In 1807, he published The Tombs, a poem; and, in the following year, an edition of the works of Monteculi. He was appointed professor of literature at Pavia, in 1809; but the bold language of his introductory lecture, On the Origin and Office of Literature, is said to have induced Napoleon to suppress the professorship immediately. In 1812, Foscolo gave still farther offence by his tragedy of Ajax, which was supposed to be a satire on the emperor, and a panegyric on Moreau. He was consequently obliged to withdraw from the kingdom of Italy to Florence. In 1814, he was compelled to fly to Switzerland, in consequence of having joined in a plan to expel the Austrian oppressors from Italy; and in the following year he settled in England. Here he published his tragedy of Ricciarda; Essays on Petrarch; Dissertation and Notes on Dante; and contributed to the Edinburgh Quarterly, Westminster, and Retrospective Reviews, and other periodicals. He died, Sept. 10, 1827; having for a considerable period suffered much from disease and penury.

FOSTER, Samuel, an English mathematician, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. 1623. He was elected in 1636, to the professorship of astronomy in Gresham college, which he resigned the same year, and to which he was again elected in 1641. During the civil wars he formed one of that society of learned men who united for philosophical purposes, and were afterwards incorporated under the name of the Royal society by Charles II. He not only applied himself to astronomy, and to curious and intelligent observations on eclipses and on celestial bodies, but he constructed and improved with great ingenuity, several mathematical and astronomical instruments. He died at Gresham college, of a decline, 1652. The chief of his works are "The Art of Dialling," 4to. 1638—four treatises of Dialling, 4to. 1654—Miscellanies or Mathematical Lucubrations—descriptions of several Instruments invented and improved. There were two other mathematicians of the name of Foster in the same century; William, a disciple of Oughtred, and author of the Circles of Proportion, and the Horizontal Instrument, 1633, 4to. and Mark, who published a treatise of Trigonometry.

FOSTER, James, D.D., a dissenting minister, born 16th Sep. 1697, at Exeter, at the grammar school and in an academy of which place he was educated. With great abilities, a sound judgment, and a ready elocution, he began to preach 1718, but the warm disputes which prevailed in the west of England, and especially Exeter about the Trinity, rendered his situation in Devonshire unpleasant, and he removed to Melborne, Somersetshire, and soon after to Ashwick. In Barbican he acted as pastor nearly twenty years, and also as lecturer in a meeting house in the Old Jewry. He was an eloquent preacher, and popular among many who differed from him in their tenets, and who filled all ranks and conditions of life. He attended lord Kilmarnock after his trial in 1746, and died in consequence of a paralytic stroke, 5th Nov. 1753. His character for humanity and benevolence of heart was equal to his learning, popular as a preacher, and liberal in his religious sentiments. He wrote A Defence of the Usefulness, and Truth of Christian Revelation against Tindal, "Tracts on Heresy," in a controversy with Dr. Stebbing—4 vols. of sermons, 8vo.—2 vols. of Discourses on Natural Religion, and Social Virtue, 4to. Bolingbroke attributes to him that false aphorism, "that where mystery begins, religion ends." Pope has mentioned him with commendation in the preface to his satires.

FOSTER, John, an elegant scholar, born at Windsor 1731, and educated at Eton college, where under the able tuition of Plumtree and Rurton, he distinguished himself as a superior proficient in the Greek and Hebrew languages. In 1748 he was elected to King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards became assistant to Dr. Barnard, whom he succeeded in 1765, in the mastership of Eton college. But though eminent in learning, and great in mental powers, he was deficient in manners, in temper, and in a perfect knowledge of the world, which are so necessary for such a situation, and which were possessed in a high degree by his predecessor Barnard, so that his authority became unpopular, and he at last resigned. His merits, however, were rewarded by a canonry at Windsor in 1772, but his infirmities were increasing so rapidly, that he did not enjoy his honors long. He went to the German Spa for the recovery of his health, and died there Sep. 1773. His remains were afterwards brought over to England, and buried at Windsor near those of his father who had been mayor of the town, and over his tomb is an elegant Latin inscription written by himself. He wrote besides a prize dissertation on the doctrines of Epicurus, and the Stoics, Cambridge—an Essay on the Different Nature of Accents and Quantity, with their Use and Application in the Pronunciation of the English, Latin, and Greek Tongues, with the Defence of the Greek Accentual Marks, against Js. Vossius, Sarpedonius, Dr. Galy, &c. 8vo. 1762. It is a curious and valuable performance.

FOSTER, Michael, a learned judge, born at Marlborough, Wilts. He was educated at Marlborough school, and Exeter College, Oxford, and in 1707, entered at the Middle Temple. In 1737, he was elected recorder of Bristol, and in 1745, he was made one of the justices of the king's bench, and then knighted. He died 1765, aged 74. He published an Examination of the Scheme of Church Power, laid down in bishop Gibson's Codex, 1735—Report of some Proceedings on the Commission for the Trial of Rebels in 1746, in the county of Surrey, 1762.

FOSTER, Jedediah, judge of the superior court of Massachusetts, was born at Andover in 1726, and was graduated in 1744, at Harvard college. He established himself at Brookfield, where highly respected for his talents and integrity, he enjoyed a number of civil and military offices. He took his seat on the bench of the superior court in 1776. He was a distinguished member of the body which formed the constitution of Massachusetts, and died during its session, 17th October, 1779.

FOSTER, Benjamin, D.D., a Baptist minister successively officiating in Leicester and Danvers, Mass.; Newport, R. I.; and in the city of New York. He was born, June 12, 1750; graduated at Yale college in 1774; and subsequently studied divinity with the late Dr. Stillman of Boston. Dr. Foster was distinguished for his knowledge of the Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldean Languages; and he was characterized for uprightness and benevolence, and for an amiable disposition. During the prevalence of the yellow fever in New York, he shrunk not from exposure in visiting the sick and dying; and on the 26th of Aug. 1798, fell a victim to that disorder, aged 48 years. When at Leicester he published a work on the mode of baptism; and, subsequently a Dissertation on the 70 weeks of Daniel.

FOSTER, John, D.D., for many years a highly respected clergyman of Brighton, Mass. He graduated at Dartmouth college in 1783, and died in Sept. 1829. He published several occasional sermons; before a charitable society; on the death of Washington; on the death of C. Winship; on infidelity; at the installation of his brother; at a fast; at artillery election; at a dedication; and before the society for propagating the gospel. The wife of Dr. Foster wrote the Coquette, or the History of Eliza Wharton, a popular novel, founded on facts, well known in some parts of New England.

FOTHERGILL, George, D.D., eldest of seven sons, was born the last day of the year 1705, at Lockholm, Westmoreland, of an ancient family. He was educated there, and at Kendal school, and then removed to Queen's college, Oxford, where he became fellow and tutor. In 1751, he was made head of St. Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hampshire. He died of an asthma, 5th Oct. 1760, and was buried in the chapel of his hall. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons.

FOTHERGILL, John, an eminent physician, born 8th March, 1712, at Carr-end, Yorkshire, of respectable quakers. He was educated at Sedburgh school, Yorkshire, and in 1718 bound apprentice to an apothecary at Bradford. In 1736, he removed to London, and studied two years under Wilmot at St. Thomas's hospital, and then went to Edinburgh, where he took his doctor's degree. He afterwards visited Leyden, and travelled through France and Germany, and in 1740 settled in London. He was a licentiate of the college of physicians, London, and fellow of Edinburgh, and of the royal and antiquarian societies. He continued to rise in fame and practice, so that his business brought him little less than 7000*l.* per ann. and enabled him to accumulate a property of 80,000*l.* He died 26th Dec. 1780. Besides his medical engagements, he devoted much of his time to natural history, and made a collection of shells and other natural curiosities, which were sold after his death to Dr. Hunter for 1200*l.* He formed an excellent botanical garden at his house at Upton in Essex, and he liberally endowed a seminary of young quakers at Aeworth near Leeds, for the education and clothing of above 300 children. He published some tracts, the best of which is "on the Ulcerous Sore Throat," and was a great patron of learned men. He assisted Sydney Parkinson in his account of his south sea voyage, and at the expense of 2000*l.* printed a translation of the bible from the Hebrew and Greek original, by Anthony Purver the quaker, 2 vols. fol. 1764, and in 1780, published Percey's Key to the New Testament, for the use of his seminary.

FOUCHE, Joseph, duke of Otranto, one of the most celebrated, and perhaps one of the most calculatingly wicked, of the French revolutionists, was born at Nantes, in 1763. Capacity, steadiness, and a love of learning, he early displayed, and he gained applause, as a professor, among the fathers of the Oratory. At the bar, however, which he chose as his profession, he was little known: it was the revolution that raised him into notice. Having established a popular club at Nantes, and shone as one of its most violent orators, he was chosen, in 1792, as a deputy to the National Convention. He voted for the death of the king. In 1793 he was sent to Lyons with Collot d'Herbois, and the cold-blooded cruelty which he there exercised stands recorded against him in the damning evidence of his own letters. To the downfall of Robespierre he assented, not because he hated the crimes of that individual, but because he feared to be a victim. His desertion of his jacobin friends did not prevent a decree from being passed to arrest him for his participation in their enormities; but he contrived to conceal himself till the amnesty restored him to safety, and he soon re-appeared in public life. After having been intrusted with a mission on the Spanish frontier, he was appointed ambassador to the Cisalpine republic. He was recalled to Paris for disobedience of instructions, and remained unemployed till a change in the directory raised him to the office of minister of the police. Bonaparte retained him in it till after the peace of Amiens, when he suppressed the office. It was, however, speedily revived, with Fouché again at its head, who, in 1805, was created duke of Otranto. In 1809, during the campaign in Austria, he was also minister of the home department, and was, in fact, at the head of the government. But some circumstances in his conduct displeased Napoleon, and he was dismissed, and doomed to a kind of exile, though the disgrace was gilded by the nominal rank of governor of Rome. In 1813 he was once more called forth on the political stage, and employed by the emperor on various occasions. He was consulted, but his advice was not followed, by Louis XVIII.; and when Napoleon returned, Fouché again became minister of police. It is past a doubt, however, that he acted the part of a traitor to the restored emperor, and contributed to the second return of the Bourbons. For a while Louis XVIII. retained him in the ministry, but the earliest opportunity was taken to discard him, and at length he was included among the regicides who were banished from France. He died at Trieste, in 1820, regretted by no party; for all parties had, by turns, been oppressed, insulted, and betrayed by him.

FOUCQUET, Nicolas, marquis of Belle-Isle, was born 1615, and for his talents was early advanced in the state. He was at the age of 35 procurator-general of the parliament of Paris, and at 33 superintendent of the finances. His peculation and extravagance, however, were little calculated to repair the mismanagement of Mazarin, and when he had spent above 150,000*l.* of the public money in adorning his seat at Vaux, and attempted to rival his master in the affection of la Valliere, his ruin was complete. He was arrested in 1661, and condemned to perpetual banishment, exchanged afterwards for imprisonment. He died March 1690, aged 65, in the citadel of Pignerol.

FOUCQUET, Charles Lewis Augustus, grandson of the preceding, better known by the name of mareschal Bellisle, was born 1634. He entered early into the army and distinguished himself at the siege of Lisle, for which Louis XIV. promised him his favor and protection. After that monarch's death, he shared the disgrace of the minister le Blanc, and was confined in the Bastille, till his modest justification recommended him to the court, and paved his way to promotion and honor. He was commander in Flanders in the war of 1733, and became the adviser and confidential friend of cardinal Fleury. In 1741 he was created mareschal of France, and in 1742 he assisted at Frankfort at the election of the emperor Charles VII. where his influence was equal to his great magnificence. Afterwards being deserted by the Prussians and Saxons, he effected his escape with great difficulty from Prague, but with sagacious dexterity, so that he was created by the emperor member of the Golden Fleece, and a prince of the empire. He was taken prisoner in 1743 at Elbingerode near Hanover, and brought over to England. He afterwards served against the Austrians in Provence, and was made peer of France 1743. He was made prime minister 1757, and died four years after, a sacrifice to his zeal in the service of his country, and his anxiety to restore her finances and commerce to a prosperous course. He died Jan. 1761, aged 77. He was a great character, respected in private life, and much attached to the glory of his country. He was a patron of merit, and free from blame, except in his criminal partiality for the fair sex. His only son, born of a second wife, was killed in battle 1758.

FOULON, N., a French politician who advised the government to recover its credit by a general bankruptcy. He was placed over the finances at the beginning of the revolution, but in the midst of the general confusion he became one of its first victims. He in vain attempted to conceal himself, when discovered 22d July, 1793, he was dragged with the greatest insult, and in the most execrating manner to Paris, where he was hanged amidst the acclamations of a rejoicing, and ferocious populace.

FOUNTAIN, sir Andrew, an antiquarian, born at Narford, Norfolk, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford. He studied here the Anglo-Saxon language, and published a specimen of his great proficiency in his instructor Hicke's Thesaurus, under the title of Numismata Anglo-Saxonica & Anglo-Danica, brevier Illustrata ab Andréâ Fontaine, eq. aur. & ædis Christi Oxon. Alumno, 1705. He was knighted by king William, and afterwards travelled through Europe in making a collection of valuable pictures, medals, statues, and inscriptions. He was the intimate friend and correspondent of Swift, and he embellished his Tale of the Tub, with excellent designs. Sir Andrew, as a masterly connoisseur of medals and antiques, improved his property greatly by collecting for some of the largest cabinets in the kingdom. He was vice-chamberlain to Caroline, when princess of Wales and queen, and in 1727 was made warden of the mint, an office which he held till his death, 4th Sept. 1753.

FOUQUIER-TINVILLE, Anthony Quentin, a Frenchman of infamous memory, born at Herouan near St. Quentin. From a bankrupt, he became the friend of Robespierre, and so sanguinary was his conduct, and so ferocious his principles, that he was deemed by the tyrant, worthy to be the public accuser. In this office he displayed the most bloody and vindictive character. The young, the aged, the innocent, were hurried with insulting indifference to the scaffold, and in one instance, in four hours, 80 individuals were devoted to immediate death. When one of the gaolers observed that a person brought up before the tribunal was not the accused, Fouquier observed with unconcern, that one was as good as the other, and the unhappy victim marched to the guillotine. On another occasion, under a similar mistake, he exclaimed, it matters little, to-day is as good as to-morrow, and the wretched prisoner suffered death. The fall of Robespierre checked not the hand of this monster, on the day of the tyrant's arrest, he observed, on signing the condemnation of 42 persons, that justice must have her course. At last punishment came though late, the vindictive Fouquier appeared before that tribunal where he had exercised such bloody tyranny, and on the 7th May, 1794, he was guillotined, aged 43, and universally execrated.

FOURCROY, Anthony Francis, an eminent French chemist, was born at Paris in 1755, and studied at Harcourt College. In 1784, he was appointed professor of chemistry at the Royal Garden, in which office he soon became celebrated, by his scientific knowledge, and by his fluent, elegant, and impressive manner of speaking. He was, successively, a member of the Convention, the Committee of Public Safety, the Council of Elders, and the Council of State. As Counsellor of State, he was intrusted with the management of all affairs connected with public instruction; and he established three medical schools, twelve law schools, and more than three hundred seminaries for education. His chemical labors, too, were incessant, and his discoveries important. He died in 1809. Among his works are, a System of Chemical Knowledge; Chemical Philosophy; Medicine enlightened by Physical Science; and Synoptical Fables of Chemistry.

FOURMONT, Stephen, professor of Arabic and Chinese at Paris, was born at Herbelai near that city 1683. He devoted himself with unusual application to study, and had so retentive a memory that the most difficult passages became familiar to him. He was so well known as a man of erudition, that once or twice a week conferences were held at his house, on literary subjects, by learned Frenchmen, and foreigners. He was liberally invited by count de Toledo to settle in Spain, which he declined. He succeeded Galland in 1715, as Arabic professor, and was admitted into the learned societies of Paris, Berlin, and London, and was afterwards secretary to the duke of Orleans his friend and patron. He died 1743. His works are "the Roots of the Latin Tongue in Metre,"—Critical Reflections on Ancient History, to the time of Cyrus, 2 vols. 4to.—Meditations Sinice, folio—a Chinese Grammar in Latin, folio—Dissertation in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions.

FOURNIER, Peter Simon, a French engraver and letter founder, born at Paris 1712. In 1737, he published a table of proportions to be observed between letters, to determine their height. He wrote also dissertations on the rise and progress of the typographical art, published since in 1 vol. 8vo. divided into three parts. His great work is Manuel Typographique utile aux Gens de Lettres, & a ceux qui exercent les Differentes Parties de l'Art de l'Imprimerie, 8vo. 2 vols. This excellent character, who had done so much for his profession, died 1763.

FOURQUEVAUX, Raymond of Pavia, baron of, an Italian, of the family of Beccari in Pavia, who came to France in the wars of the Guelphs and Gibbelines, and signalized himself in the defence of Toulouse against the Huguenots in 1562. He was for his services made governor of Narbonne, where he died 1574, aged 66. He wrote the lives of 14 great French generals, 4to. Paris 1543, much esteemed.

FOWLER, Christophe, a puritan of some eminence, born at Marlborough 1611, and educated at Magdalen-college, and Edmund-hall, Oxford. He took orders, but in 1641 declared himself a presbyterian, and drew crowds after him by the oddity of his gestures and the violence of his appeals in the pulpit. He afterwards was vicar of St. Mary's Reading, and then fellow of Eton, and an able assistant to the Berkshire commissioners in the ejection of what then were called ignorant and insufficient ministers. At the restoration he was ejected from his preferments, and died 1676, considered as little better than distracted. His writings are not worth mentioning.

FOWLER, Edward, D.D., an English prelate, born 1632, at Westerleigh, Gloucestershire, where his father was minister. He was educated at the college school Gloucester, and removed to Corpus Christi college, Oxford. As he had been brought up among the puritans, he at first objected to conformity with the church, but became afterwards one of its greatest ornaments. As he was an able preacher he was made by the primate Sheldon, rector of All-Hallows, Bread-street, 1673, and two years after he became prebendary at Gloucester, and in 1681 vicar of St. Giles' Cripplegate. He was an able defender of protestantism, and appears as the second of the London clergy, who refused to read king James's declaration for liberty of conscience, in 1688. He was rewarded for his eminent services in the cause of religion, and in the promotion of the revolution, by being made in 1691, bishop of Gloucester. He died at Chelsea 1714, aged 82. He wrote sermons and various pieces on divinity, the most known and useful of which is his "Design of Christianity," often printed, and defended by the author against Bunyan, the writer of the Pilgrim's Progress.

FOWLER, Thomas, a physician, was born at York in 1736. He commenced business as an apothecary in his native city in 1760; but in 1774, he went to Edinburgh, and graduated there in 1778. After this he settled at Stafford, as physician to the infirmary; but in 1791 he returned to York. He died in 1801. His works are—1. Medical Reports on the Effects of Tobacco, 1785. 2. Medical Reports on the Effects of Arsenic, 8vo. 3. Medical Reports on the Acute and Chronic Rheumatism.

FOX, Edward, an English prelate and statesman, born at Dursley, Gloucestershire, and educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became provost 1523. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Wolsey, by whom he was engaged as an ambassador to Rome with Gardiner, to promote the divorce of the king from Catharine of Arragon. He was afterwards sent on embassies to France and Germany, and in 1535 raised to the see of Hereford. He was an active promoter of the reformation, and if inferior to Cranmer in abilities, he was his superior in dexterity. When in Germany he zealously invited the protestant divines to unite themselves to the doctrines of the church of England. He died in London 1538. He wrote in the midst of his political engagements, a book called de Verâ Differentiâ Regiæ Protestantis et Ecclesiasticæ et quæ sit ipsa Veritas, et Virtus utriusque 1534; translated into English by lord Strafford. His maxims were that "an honorable peace lasts long, but a dishonorable peace no longer, than till kings have power to break it; the surest way therefore to peace is a constant preparedness for war," and "two things must support a government, gold and iron,—gold to reward its friends, and iron to keep under its enemies."

FOX, John, an English divine, and ecclesiastical historian, born at Boston, Lincolnshire 1517. In his younger years he displayed poetical genius in the publication of some Latin plays on scriptural subjects, but he afterwards turned all his thoughts to divinity, and to the reformation which now engaged the attention of Europe. To acquire the judgment and information necessary on such important points, he read with great care the Greek and Latin fathers, studied Hebrew, and perused every work from which he could reap information; but his seclusion, and his frequent absence from public worship, alarmed his friends and encouraged his enemies. He was therefore accused of heresy in 1545, and with difficulty escaped with his life by expulsion from college. In his distress, and abandoned by his father-in-law, he was generously received in the house of sir Thomas Lucy of Warwickshire, to whose children he became tutor. He afterwards married a person of Coventry, and after residing there some time, he went to London still exposed to the privations of a narrow income. His wants, however, says his son, were relieved by an unknown stranger, who gave him an untold sum of money, and bade him hope for better times, which in three days arrived by his being admitted into the service of the duchess of Richmond, and made tutor to her nephew lord Surrey's children. He lived at Ryegate under the kind protection of this noble family, and though the persecuting Gardiner, in the bloody reign of Mary, plotted his ruin, he remained for some time unhurt by the influence and the dexterity of his worthy pupil now duke of Norfolk. At last, he escaped from the pursuit of the artful prelate to the continent with his wife, and passing through Antwerp and Frankfort he settled at Basil, and there maintained himself by correcting the press for the famous printer Oporinus. Here he formed the plan of his great work, and at the end of Mary's reign returned to England, where he was received with all the respect due to his merits. His pupil, the duke of Norfolk, settled a pension on him, and Cecil obtained for him a prebend in the church of Salisbury, but though he might have risen high in preferment by the interest of his friends Walsingham, Drake, Gresham, Grindal, Pilkington, and others, he refused to subscribe to some of the canons, and when urged by Parker the primate, he produced a Greek testament, adding, to this only will I subscribe. He died 1587, aged 70, and was buried in the church of St. Giles' Cripplegate, of which for some time he had been vicar. Fox is deservedly celebrated as the author of the history of the acts and monuments of the church, called "Book of Martyrs" published in London 1563, in one volume folio, and afterwards improved and enlarged, and published in a ninth edition 1684, in 3 vols. fol. That Fox is occasionally intemperate and abusive cannot be denied, but though Jeremy Collier accuses him of disingenuity and ill-nature, he is still to be read with interest, as he is accurate, minute, and generally impartial.

FOX, George, the first preacher of the sect called quakers, was born at Drayton in the Clay, Leicestershire, 1624. He was bound by his father, who was a weaver, to a shoemaker and grazier, and the occupation of his youth was chiefly the tending of sheep. He did not however follow the professions in which he had been engaged, as, in 1643, he began his wandering life, and after retiring to solitude, and at other times frequenting the company of religions and devout persons, he became a public preacher in 1647 or 1648. He inveighed, with sullen bitterness, against the drunkenness, the injustice, and the vices of the times, he attacked the clergy, and the established modes of worship, and asserted that the light of Christ, implanted in the human heart, was alone the means of salvation and the right qualification of the gospel ministry. Such doctrines produced persecution, he was imprisoned at Nottingham in 1649, and during the whole course of his laborious life, he suffered the same treatment eight times more, and often with great severity. In his pious zeal, Fox visited not only England, Ireland, and Scotland, but he extended his travels to Holland, and Germany, to the American colonies, and the West-India Islands, recommending in his life and conduct the merits of a meek, devout, and inoffensive character. He died in London 1690. Though illiterate he wrote much. His journal was printed 1694, his epistles 1698, his doctrinal pieces, about 150 in number, 1706. The name of quakers was first given to him and his followers at Derby, in consequence of the odd contortions of their body.

FOX, Richard, a native of Grantham, Lincolnshire. Though of obscure origin, he was well educated at Boston school, and Magdalen college, Oxford, from which he removed in consequence of the plague, to Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was by the friendship of Morton bishop of Ely, recommended at Paris, to the notice of Henry earl of Richmond, who on his accession to the English throne, made him a privy counsellor, and raised him to the see of Exeter. His abilities were employed by the monarch in various embassies on the continent, and he was translated to the see of Durham, and then to Winchester. He was a liberal patron of learning, and founded besides several free schools, Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He died 1528.

FOX, Charles James, an eminent statesman, born 13th Jan. 1749. He was the second son of lord Holland. Westminster and Eton schools, and Hertford College, Oxford, were the seminaries at which he received his education. In classical learning his proficiency was great, and he always retained a fondness for it. Having completed his studies, he set out on his travels, and an intellect like his could not fail to profit by such an enlarged field of observation. Unfortunately, however, his powerful mind did not preserve him from dissipated habits, and from a propensity to gaming, which long continued to be the bane of his existence. In the hope of weaning him from these follies, he was, when only nineteen, elected member for Midhurst, through the influence of his father. Prudence, perhaps, kept him silent in the House till he was of an age legally to hold a seat in it. His lips were unlocked in 1770, and for four years he continued to be the advocate of the ministry. After sharing the favors of the minister as a lord of the Admiralty, and afterwards as a lord of the Treasury, he was dismissed from his offices, and had the singular fortune before he reached his 24th year, of being the ablest supporter of the government during one session, and in the next of becoming one of its most eloquent and dangerous opponents. During the American war he was a regular, consistent, and active antagonist of the ministry, and on the removal of lord North he was raised to a seat in the cabinet as secretary of state. The death of lord Rockingham soon after dissolved the new ministry, and Mr. Fox after some time opposing the measures of lord Shelburne returned to power by his well known coalition with lord North. So heterogeneous an union gave great offence to the people, and reflected little honor on the integrity of the two colleagues, and therefore the memorable India-bill proved fatal to their interests, and brought on their downfall. The French revolution was an event which Fox hailed as the harbinger of freedom, happiness, and prosperity, not only to France, but to neighboring nations, but he lived to witness the fallacy of his rash conclusions. In his addresses at some of the public meetings at the Crown and Anchor tavern, he gave offence to the ministry, and in consequence of his speeches, in which he affected to treat the sovereign with disrespect, his name was struck off from the list of the privy counsellors. On the lamented death of his great rival Pitt, in the beginning of 1806, he was drawn from the ranks of opposition, and by the advice of lord Grenville, placed as secretary of state for foreign affairs. He died 13th Sept. 1806. Of this extraordinary character, it must be acknowledged that he was one of the greatest men that country ever produced. As an orator his powers were gigantic, his eloquence irresistible, vehement and sublime. It was a torrent which in its impetuous force hurried along its hearers in spite of all opposition. His mind capacious and intelligent, at one view grasped the whole subject of debate, at one glance he saw the weak and the strong parts of his adversary's defence, and with masterly dexterity he combated the most formidable opponent, and improved every advantage which in the field of debate lay exposed to his attacks. If he was less copious, less elegant, and less sententious than Pitt, if he was deficient in the dazzling and flowery profusion, in the lively sallies of imagination of his great master Burke, he possessed the pathos, the forcible argument, the convincing language, the imposing earnestness which captivated and enchained every hearer. In a profound acquaintance with the human character, and a mature knowledge of domestic and foreign politics, he was above all others supremely happy. In private life he was universally beloved. He was the convivial friend, the pleasing companion, the man of integrity and honor. As a man of letters, Mr. Fox is highly respectable. His letter to the electors of Westminster, passed through several editions, not only on account of the political situation of the times, but the abilities and the force of argument displayed in the address. Some copies of his verses are preserved, and show great genius and strong poetic fire. It was said that he was engaged in the composition of an History of England from the Revolution, and that he visited Paris during the short interval of peace, after the treaty of Amiens, to collect materials, but probably little, if any, progress was made in the work.

FOXCROFT, Thomas, minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1714. His father, who was a member of the church of England, was desirous that his son should be an episcopal minister. This was also his intention until the course of his studies and inquiries, led him to believe, that the congregational mode of worship was most agreeable to the scriptures. He was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Wadsworth, Nov. 20, 1717. Dr. Chauncey was settled as his colleague in 1727. He died 1769 aged 72. His publications were numerous, but altogether sermons.

FOY, Maximilian Sebastian, celebrated both in the field and the senate, was born, in 1775, at Hamm, in Picardy; studied at the military school of La Fere; and made his first campaign, in 1792, under Dumourier. In the war which was terminated by the piece of Amiens he acted with conspicuous talent and bravery, particularly at the assault of the bridge head of Huningen, the passages of the Lech, the Rhine, and the Limmat, and the action of Peri, in the Tyrol. In 1805 he bore a part in the Austrian campaign; in 1807 he was sent to Turkey, with a corps of French artillerymen, and assisted in defending the Dardanelles; from 1807 to 1814 inclusive, he fought with great gallantry in Spain and Portugal, and on the Pyrenean frontier; and he closed his military career at the battle of Waterloo. The rank of general he attained in 1809. In 1819 he was elected a member of the chamber of deputies, and in this capacity he continued to be one of the most active and eloquent defenders of the liberties of his country till his decease, Nov. 28, 1825. He was attended to his grave by thousands of his countrymen, and a subscription was made to provide for his children, and erect a monument to his memory. He had begun a History of the War in the Peninsula. The part which he completed was published by his wife.

FRACASTORIO, Girolamo, an Italian poet and physician, born at Verona 1483. Two singular things are related of him in his infancy. When born his lips adhered so closely together, that the knife of a surgeon was necessary to separate them, and his mother when she took him up in her arms was killed by lightning, and he remained unhurt. He was a man of great parts and address. By his influence pope Paul III., removed the council of Trent to Bologna, on pretence of a contagious disease. He was also eminent as an astronomer and mathematician, and the intimate friend of cardinal Bembo, of Julius Scaliger who esteemed him inferior only to Virgil, and other learned men. He died of an apoplexy at Casi near Verona 1553, and six years after the town of Verona honored his memory with a statue. His chief poem is "Siphilis, or de Morbo Gallico" his medical pieces—de Sympathiâ & Antipathiâ,—de contagione & Contagiosis Morbis,—de Causis Criticorum Dierum. The works were printed collectively, the best edition that of Padua, 2 vols. 4to. 1735.

FRACHETTA, Girolamo, a political writer of Rovigno, engaged in several public affairs. His great services procured him enemies, and to escape from their persecution he retired to Naples, where he vindicated his conduct to the Spanish court, and was protected by Benevento viceroy of Naples, and received a liberal pension. He died at Naples the beginning of the 17th century. His great work is "Il Seminario de Governi di Stato & di Guerra," which contains about 8000 military and state maxims. The work is highly esteemed. The best edition is that of Genoa 1648, 4to.

FRA DIAVOLO, whose real name was Michael Pozzo, was a native of Calabria, and was originally a stocking weaver, but quitted his occupation to join a band of robbers, of which he subsequently became the chief. So formidable was he in the Calabrias, that the government offered a reward for his head. In 1799, however, when Cardinal Ruffo was laboring to expel the French from Naples, he gave Fra Diavolo the command of a large body of the insurgents, and the bandit behaved with equal bravery and ferocity. In 1806 Fra Diavolo took the field against the troops of Joseph Bonaparte; but, after having displayed much talent, and gained some advantages, he was taken, and sentenced to be hanged.

FRAGUIER, Claude Francis, a French writer born at Paris 1666, and educated among the Jesuits, Rapin, Jouvenci, and La Rue. He taught belles lettres at Caen for four years, but on his return to Paris he quitted the order of the Jesuits 1694, and devoted himself to the greater cultivation of his mind, and to literary pursuits. As he was well skilled in the classics, and in modern languages, he assisted the abbé Bignon in the Journal des Savans, and undertook a translation of Plato. He died 1728, aged 62. His works consist of Latin poems published at Paris 1729, 12mo. with dissertations concerning Socrates, and other subjects inserted in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member.

FRANCIS, a Romish saint, born at Assisi in Umbria, 1182. He abandoned the profession of his father as merchant, and devoted himself to austerity. He founded one of the four orders of mendicant friars, which was approved and confirmed by Innocent, III., 1210. His followers increased so rapidly that in 1219, his order consisted of five thousand members. He afterwards travelled to the Holy Land, with the intention of converting the sultan Meledin, and offered to throw himself into the flames, to prove the truth of what he preached. He died at Assisi 1226, and was canonized by Gregory IX., four years after. His order rose to great consequence in time, and was distinguished not only for its services to the Roman see, but for the popes and other great men whom it nurtured.

FRANCIS XAVIER, a famous ecclesiastic, born at Xavier at the foot of the Pyrenees, 7th April, 1506. He taught philosophy at Paris, and there became acquainted with Ignatius Loyola, whom he assisted in the establishment of the order of Jesuits, and with whom and five others he made a vow to labor in the conversion of infidels. Consequently he embarked at Lisbon 1541 for Goa, and as the apostle of the Indies he preached on the coast of Comorin, at Malacca, in the Moluccas, and at Japan; but as he formed the design of proceeding as far as China, he was cut off by disease 1552. He was canonized by Gregory XV., 1622. He wrote five books of Epistles, Pavia, 1631, 8vo.—a Catechism and Opuscula.

FRANCIS de Sales, a Romish saint, born at Sales, near Geneva, 21st August 1567. He studied at Paris and Padua, and in his zeal is said to have converted to the faith 70,000 protestants. In 1612 he was made bishop of Geneva, and founded the order of the Visitation, established by pope Paul V., 1618. Though invited to settle in France by Henry IV., he refused to quit Geneva. He died at Lyons 1622, aged 56, and was canonized by Alexander VI., 1665. His works are, Introduction to a Devout Life—a treatise on the Love of God, and letters, all displaying much piety and goodness of heart.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, emperor of Germany, was son of Leopold duke of Lorraine, and was born 1708. He married in 1736 Maria Theresa, the daughter of the emperor Charles VI., and after his father-in-law's death 1740, he was associated in the empire by his wife, and after the death of his opponent Charles VII., he was elected emperor 1745. The war which a disputed succession had occasioned was terminated by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 1747, but new disturbances arose in 1756, and hostilities again began, till the treaty of Hubertsburg in 1763 restored tranquillity to the empire. Francis was a great patron of literature, of the arts, and of commerce, among his subjects. He died suddenly at Inspruck, 18th Aug. 1765, aged 58.

FRANCIS I. king of France, son of Charles of Orleans, and Louisa of Savoy, was born at Cognac, 12th September 1494. He succeeded to the French throne on the death of Louis XII. 1515, and immediately determined to obtain possession of the Milanese, which he claimed as descended from duke Valentine his maternal grandfather. His progress was stopped by the Swiss, but he defeated them in the dreadful battle of Marignan, Sept. 1515, and entering the Milanese obliged the duke Maximilian Sforza to resign his power into his hands. After making treaties with the Genoese and the pope, Francis in 1516, met Charles V. at Noyon, and swore eternal peace between their dominions. This pledge so solemnly given was observed only two days, and Francis dissatisfied that his rival had obtained the imperial crown against him, sought revenge in war. Successful for a while in Navarre, Francis acquired greater advantages over his enemies in Flanders, and took Landrecies, Bouchain, &c. In 1522, the French under Lautrec were defeated at Bicoque, Cremona and Genoa were taken, Toulon and Marseilles were besieged, and Provence was invaded. Francis flew to the relief of his suffering provinces, and began the siege of Pavia, but was soon after defeated, 24th Feb. 1525, in battle, and made prisoner with the bravest men of his army. On this melancholy occasion he wrote to his mother, and declared that all was lost except his honor. A prisoner at Madrid, Francis was treated by Charles with great and unpardonable severity, and he was restored to liberty in 1526, only upon signing his renunciation to Naples, the Milanese, Genoa, Aost, Flanders, and Artois. The peace of Cambray 1529, put an end to the disputes between the rival sovereigns. Francis took for his second wife Eleanora the emperor's sister, and agreed to ransom for a large sum his two sons who were still detained as hostages at Madrid. Still jealous of the power of his rival, Francis in 1535, seized upon Savoy, while he saw his provinces of Provence invaded, and Marseilles again besieged, but at last a reconciliation was effected by means of the pope Paul III. 1538. The peace was of short duration, Francis attacked Italy, Roussillon, and Luxemburg, but though his general, the duke of Engliën, defeated the imperialists at Cerisoles in 1544, his enemy supported by the powerful assistance of Henry VIII. of England made a formidable invasion in Picardy and Champagne. Boulogne and Soissons opened their gates to the conquerors, and fresh victories appeared probable, when the protestant princes united their forces against the conqueror, and stopped his career. Peace was restored with Germany 1554, and two years after with England. Francis died at Rambouillet, 31st March, 1547, aged 53.

FRANCIS, duke of Alençon, Anjou, and Berri, son of Henry II. placed himself at the head of the malecontents when his brother, Henry III. ascended the throne. He was seized and imprisoned by order of his mother Catherine de Medicis, but his brother the king restored him to liberty, and thus enabled him to excite fresh troubles. He supported the disturbances in the Low Countries, and was at last crowned 1582, duke of Brabant, but the oppressive conduct of his government revolted his new subjects against him, and the next year he was obliged to fly to France for safety. He died there 10th Feb. 1584, aged 29. He is known in English history as the suitor of queen Elizabeth in 1581, who flattered his vanity, but with unbecoming coquetry rejected his addresses, after she had given him a ring as a pledge of her affection.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, duke of Guise, and of Aumale, was born at Bar 17th Feb. 1519. He early displayed courage and abilities in war, and his defence of Metz in 1553, against the arms of Charles V. is deservedly commended. The next year he distinguished himself at the battle of Renti, in which he defeated the Germans, and after some glorious campaigns in Italy and Flanders, he was named lieutenant-general of all the king's armies. His next exploit was against Calais, which he took after a siege of eight days from the English, who had possessed it for 210 years, and this was followed by the fall of Thionville. His services were such that he governed the kingdom under Henry II. and Francis II. and received from the parliament the glorious title of the saviour of his country. The death of Francis II. was the signal for civil war, and while the duke supported the cause of the catholics, the interests of the protestants were ably protected by the valor of Coligni. He took Rouen and Bourges, and defeated his enemies at Dreux 1562, and he was preparing to besiege Orleans, the chief and strongest town of the protestants, when he was assassinated by a pistol shot from the hands of Poltrot de Mére, one of the Huguenots, 24th Feb. 1563.

FRANCIS, Philip, D.D. an eminent divine, son of an Irish dean. He is known by his excellent translations of Horace and Demosthenes. He wrote also Eugenia and Constantia, two tragedies not very successful, and for his services as a political writer, it is said, he was rewarded by government with the rectory of Barrow, Suffolk, and the chaplainship of Chelsea college. He died March 1773.

FRANCIS, Sir Philip, a son of the foregoing, was born at Dublin in 1740, and was educated at St. Paul's School. After having been a clerk in the secretary of state's office, secretary of the embassy to Portugal, and a clerk in the war office, he was raised to a situation of much higher importance. In 1773, he was appointed one of the members of the council of Bengal. In India he remained from 1774, to 1780, during which period he was active in opposition to the measures of Mr. Hastings. Such was their mutual animosity that a duel ensued, in which he was shot through the body. In 1784, he obtained a seat in parliament, and he continued to sit there for the greatest part of his life. He voted with the whigs, and took a prominent part on many questions, particularly those of the impeachment of Hastings, India affairs, the slave trade, reform, and the war with France. When his friends came into power, he received the order of the Bath, and they at one time intended to send him to Hindostan as governor general. He died in 1813. Francis published nearly thirty speeches and political pamphlets; the style of which has a very large portion of point and spirit. The Letters of Junius have been attributed to him; and it must be owned that to no one have they been assigned with more probability. He, however, always disclaimed them.

FRANCISCO, Henry, died near Whitehall, state of N. York, Nov. 1820, aged 134. A native of England he was present at the coronation of queen Anne. He had lived in this country 80 or 90 years, and served in the French and revolutionary wars.

FRANCKENSTEIN, Christian Godfrey, a native of Leipsic, distinguished as an advocate, and more as a man of letters. He wrote the life of Christina of Sweden—History of the 16th and 17th centuries—and a Continuation of Puffendorf's Introduction to History, and died 1717, aged 56.

FRANCO-BARRETO, a poet, was born at Lisbon in 1606, and died in 1664. In 1646 he fought gallantly against the Dutch in Brazil. On his return home, he took his doctor's degree; was appointed secretary of embassy in France; ultimately entered the church; and became vicar of Barreiro in 1643. He wrote many poems, and translated the Æneid, and the battle of the Frogs and Mice. His style is admired for its spirit, elegance, and purity.

FRANCOIS, Abbé Laurent, an able opponent of the French philosophers, who died 1782, aged 84. His works which were useful, were a Book of Geography—Proofs of the Religion of Jesus Christ, 4 vols. 12mo.—Defence of Religion, 4 vols. 12mo.—Examination of the Catechism of an honest Man—of the Facts on which Christianity is founded, 3 vols. 12mo.—Observations on the Philosophy of History, 8vo.

FRANCOWITZ, Matthias, a protestant divine, the pupil of Luther and Melancthon, born at Albano in Illyria 1520, in consequence of which he assumed the name of Flaccus Illyricus. He taught the Greek and Latin languages at Wittemberg privately, and was afterwards public professor. He opposed the interim of Charles V. and was concerned in the drawing up of the centuries of Magdeburg. He died 1575. His best work is a Key to the Holy Scriptures, 2 vols. fol. He wrote besides a Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth, 4to.—de Translatione Imperii Rom. ad Germanos & de Electione Episcoporum.

FRANKLIN, Thomas, D.D. son of Richard Franklin the editor of the Craftsman, an anti-ministerial paper, was born in London 1720. He was educated at Westminster-school and Trinity-college, Cambridge of which he became fellow.

For some time also he was Greek professor. He was in 1758, made vicar of Ware and Thunbridge, and afterwards obtained the rectory of Brasted in Kent. He was also chaplain in ordinary to the king, and died March 15th 1784. He possessed learning, genius, and application. He translated Phalaris, Sophocles, and Lucian, and he wrote the earl of Warwick, and Matilda, two tragedies which were received with great applause, and also "the Contract," a comedy in two acts performed at the Hay-market. Voltaire's works appeared translated under his name; but only two tragedies, the Orestes and Electra were by him. He published also some sermons on the relative duties.

FRANKLIN, Benjamin, L.L.D. a philosopher and statesman, and emphatically a self-made man, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, 1706. He was the offspring of poor parents, and was compelled to give the time, which ought to have been devoted to learning, in assisting his father in his business of a soap boiler and tallow chandler. He was then bound as an apprentice to a brother to learn the art of printing. This was an employment suited to his taste, and he made great proficiency in it; it also afforded him an excellent opportunity to gratify in some degree his insatiable desire for knowledge. At this period he was willing to forego not only the amusements but to risk even his life, by deprivation of food and sleep, in the pursuit of his darling object. Owing to some misunderstanding with his brother he determined to quit Boston. He privately went on board a sloop and soon arrived at New York. Finding no employment there, he pursued his way to Philadelphia, and entered the city without a friend, and with only a dollar in his pocket. He found employment in the printing office of a Mr. Keimer. Sir William Keith the governor having been informed, that Franklin was a young man of promising talents, invited him to his house, and treated him in the most friendly manner. He advised him to enter into business for himself, and in order to accomplish this object to make a visit to London, that he might purchase the necessary articles for a printing office. Receiving from the governor the promise of assistance, he prepared himself for the voyage, and on applying for letters of recommendation, previously to sailing, he was told that they would be sent on board. When the letter bag was opened in England, there was no packet for Franklin; and he now discovered that the governor was one of those men, who love to oblige every body, and who substitute the most liberal professions and offers, in the place of active substantial kindness. The object for which he went to London being thus defeated, he was compelled to seek employment as a journeyman printer. About two years after he returned to America as a clerk to Mr. Denham a merchant, but he dying the following year, he again entered the office of Keimer as his foreman. He next commenced business in partnership with a Mr. Merideth, but it was of short continuance. Having purchased Keimer's newspaper, he adopted such a style in conducting it as attracted much attention, and also opened a stationer's shop. The claims of business did not extinguish his taste for literature and science. He formed a club called the junto, for purposes exclusively literary, and which also led him to form a plan of a public library, which was carried into effect in 1731, and became the foundation of that noble institution the library company of Philadelphia. In 1732 he began to publish poor Richard's almanac, and continued it twenty five years. The maxims contained in this work, have been collected and published, in various forms, under the title of the way to wealth. In 1636 he entered public life, being appointed clerk of the general assembly of Pennsylvania, and in 1737 post-master of Philadelphia. The first fire company was formed by him in 1733. When the frontiers of Pennsylvania were endangered in 1744, and an ineffectual attempt was made to procure a militia law, he proposed a voluntary association for the defence of the province, and in a short time obtained ten thousand names. In 1747 he was chosen a member of the assembly and continued in this station ten years. In 1753 he was appointed deputy post master general of the British colonies; in the same year the academy of Philadelphia projected by him was established. In 1754 he was one of the commissioners who attended the congress at Albany to devise the best means of defending the country against the French. After the defeat of Braddock, he was appointed colonel of a regiment, and he repaired to the frontiers and built a fort. In 1757, he was sent to England as the agent of Pennsylvania, and while residing there was appointed agent of Massachusetts, Maryland, and Georgia. He now received the reward of his philosophical merit. He was chosen a member of the Royal society, and was honored with the degree of doctor of laws by the universities of St. Andrew, Edinburgh, and Oxford, and his correspondence was sought by the most eminent philosophers of Europe. He returned to America in 1762, and in 1764 was again sent to London, as an agent for the province, to procure a change of the proprietary government. In 1766 he was examined at the bar of the house of commons respecting the repeal of the stamp act; and there he evinced the utmost self-possession, and an astonishing accuracy and extent of information. He returned to America in 1775, and the day after his arrival was elected a member of Congress. In 1776 he was one of the committee appointed to inquire into the powers, with which lord Howe was invested in regard to the adjustment of our differences with Great Britain. When his lordship expressed his concern at being obliged to distress those whom he so much regarded, Dr. Franklin assured him, that the Americans out of reciprocal regard, would endeavor to lessen as much as possible, the pain which he might feel on their account, by taking the utmost care of themselves. He was one of the signers of the declaration of independence. He was president of the convention which met in Philadelphia to form a new constitution for Pennsylvania in 1776. He assisted in the negotiation with France, and had much influence in forming the treaty of alliance and commerce which was signed in 1778. He also completed a treaty of amity and commerce with Sweden. In conjunction with Mr. Adams, Mr. Jay, and Mr. Laurens he signed the provisional articles of peace, Nov. 30, 1782, and the definitive treaty Sept. 30, 1783. While he was in France, he was appointed one of the commissioners to examine Mesmer's animal magnetism in 1784. He returned to America in 1785. He was received with universal applause, and was soon appointed president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania. In 1787 he was a delegate to the convention which formed the constitution of the United States. He was first president of a society established in Philadelphia, for alleviating the miseries of public prisons, and also of one for promoting the abolition of slavery. In 1788 he retired wholly from public life, and died 1790, aged 84. He published experiments and observations on electricity, made at Philadelphia, in two parts 4to. 1753: new experiments 1754; a historical view of the constitution and government of Pennsylvania, 1759; the interest of Great Britain considered with respect to her colonies, 1760; his experiments with the addition of explanatory notes, and letters and papers on philosophical subjects 1769; political, miscellaneous and philosophical pieces 1779; and several papers in the transactions of the American philosophical society. Two volumes of his essays, with his life, brought down by himself to the year 1730, were published in England 1792. A collection of his works was first published in London 1806, entitled the complete works of Dr. Franklin, first collected and arranged with a memoir of his life, 3 vols. 8vo.

FRANKLIN, William, the last royal governor of New Jersey, the son of Dr. Franklin, was born about 1731. He was a captain in the French war, and served at Ticonderoga. After the peace of Paris he accompanied his father to England. Going to Scotland he became acquainted with the Earl of Bute, who recommended him to lord Halifax, and by the latter he was appointed governor of New Jersey in 1763. He continued in office, firm in loyalty, till the beginning of the revolution, when the whigs, in July 1776, sent him to Connecticut. On his release he went to England, and obtained a pension for his losses. He died 1813, aged 82.

FRANKLIN, Eleanor Ann, a poet, the daughter of Mr. Forden, an eminent architect, was born in 1795. She early manifested great talent and a strong memory, and acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek and other languages. Her first poem, The Veils, was written when she was seventeen. Her next was The Arctic Expedition, which led, in 1823, to her marriage with Captain Franklin. Her principal work is the epic of Cœur de Lion, which appeared in 1825. Her poems display much elegance, spirit, and richness of imagination.

FRANTZIUS, Wolfgang, a German divine, born at Plawen, in Voigtland, was professor of divinity at Wittenberg, where he died 1620, aged 56. He wrote Animalium Historia Sacra—Tractatus de Interpretatione Sacrarum Scripturarum, 4to.—Schola Sacrificolorum Patriarch. Sacra—Commentar. in Leviticum, &c. and other works.

FRASSON, Claude, a French monk, born at Peronne, in Picardy. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, theological professor at Paris, and superior of the Franciscan convent there. He wrote dissertationes Biblicæ, 2 vols. 4to.—a valuable system of Philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. He died 1711, aged 91.

FREDEGONDE, wife of Chilperic, king of France, was born at Avancourt in Picardy, of obscure parents. She was in the queen's retinue, and by her arts, and by the influence of her personal charms, she became the third wife of the weak Chilperic. Raised to the throne, she sacrificed the members of the royal family to her pride and ambition, and by the sword, as well as by poison, she cut off all those whom, either on account of talents, influence, or birth, she regarded as enemies or rivals. She at last completed the measure of her iniquities, by the death of Chilperic, who was assassinated in hunting, that the guilty queen might indulge her criminal passions for her favorite Landri. This detested character, who possessed bravery in the field of battle, died 597.

FREDERIC I. surnamed Barbarossa, was born 1121, and succeeded his father Frederic as duke of Swabia 1147, and in 1152, he ascended the imperial throne after the death of his uncle Conrad III. He passed in 1155 into Italy, where after some difficulties on account of the superiority which the pope claimed over him, he obtained the crown, and consecration from the hands of Adrian IV.

The disputes between him and the holy see were kindled anew on the death of Adrian, and Alexander III. the next successor, was soon opposed by the successive elevation of three anti-popes to the chair of St. Peter. The advantages obtained at Rome were followed by the defeat of the Milanese, and by the destruction of their city, and the overthrow of Brescia and Placentia, but at last the troops of Frederic were conquered at the battle of Como, and this disaster produced a peace. The emperor met the pope at Venice and a reconciliation was effected in 1177. New quarrels however soon arose, till Frederic was prevailed upon by Urban III. to undertake a crusade against Saladin. At the head of a numerous army he marched into the East, and after defeating the Greeks, and the Turks, he penetrated into Syria, where death stopped his victories. He died 10th June 1190, in consequence of bathing imprudently in the Cydnus, in Cilicia, where Alexander the Great, some ages before, had nearly fallen a sacrifice to the same recreation.

FREDERIC II., grandson of the preceding, and son of Henry VI. was born 1194, and was elected king of the Romans, two years after. In 1210, he was elected emperor of Germany, on the excommunication of Otho IV. by Innocent III. but he obtained peaceful possession of his power, only after the death of his rival 1218. After settling his affairs in Germany, he went to Italy, where he was solemnly crowned by the hands of Honorius III. 1220, and promised to extend the papal power by undertaking a crusade. His invasion of the Holy Land was so formidable, that Saladin, Sultan of Babylon, not only made a truce of 10 years with him, but yielded to him some of the Asiatic cities near Jerusalem. This conduct provoked the resentment of the pope, who stirred up war against Frederic, and incited his son and his father-in-law to take up arms against him. Frederic hastened back to Europe to oppose this unnatural conspiracy, and seizing Romagna, Ancona, Spoleto, and Benevento, defeated the plans of his enemies. His partisans in these troublous times bore the name of Gibelins, while those of the pope were called Guelfs, and carried on their shoulders the impressions of two keys. At last however tranquillity was restored, and Frederic made peace with the Roman pontiff, 1230, to be enabled to reduce to obedience his rebellious son Henry, whom he degraded from the title of king of the Romans in favor of his second son Conrad. In 1240, Frederic passed again to Italy, and reduced the Milanese, and Sardinia, and after defeating the Genoese and Venetians, and seizing Tuscany and Urbino, he laid siege to Rome. The pope opposed his attack by the terrible denunciation of excommunication, but Frederic disregarded the impotent thunders of the Vatican, and defeated all the forces which were sent to check his progress. The death of the pope soothed for a while the enmities between Rome and Germany, but at last Innocent IV. had the courage to depose this powerful enemy of the holy see, at a council at Lyons 1245, and Frederic rendered unpopular by the artifice of his opponents, saw Henry of Thuringia, elected in 1246, to fill the imperial throne, and the next year, William, count of Holland. Frederic died 13th Dec. 1250, aged 57.

FREDERIC I., the Pacific, king of Denmark 1523, after the expulsion of Christian, distinguished himself by the wisdom of his measures, and by his alliance with Gustavus I. of Sweden, and with the Hanseatic towns. After the conquest of Copenhagen, he reconciled to his government the Danish nobility, and rendered himself popular by his liberality, and the prudence and utility of his public measures, and by the introduction of Lutheranism among his subjects. He died 1533.

FREDERIC II., king of Denmark, after his father Christian III. increased his dominions, by the conquest of Diethmarsia. He was the patron of learning, and of learned men, and the protection which he extended to Tycho Brahe, added celebrity to his reign. He was for some time engaged in war with Sweden, but tranquillity was restored in 1570. He died 4th April 1588, aged 54.

FREDERIC III., archbishop of Bremen, succeeded his father Christian IV. in 1648, as king of Denmark. Though he lost some places in a war with Sweden, he enlarged the happiness of his people, by rendering them more independent of the nobles, and by making the crown hereditary, and no longer elective. He died 9th of Feb. 1670, aged 61.

FREDERIC IV., succeeded his father Christian V. as king of Denmark, 1699. He joined the Czar Peter, and the king of Poland in hostilities against Charles XII. of Sweden, but he was obliged to make peace, by the rapidity of the victories of his enemy. During the captivity of Charles in Turkey, Frederic drove the Swedes from his dominions, and recovered some of the places which the fortune of war had wrested from his hands. He died 1730, aged 59.

FREDERIC V., grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne 1746, and died after a reign of 20 years. On his death-bed, he called his son and successor Christian VII. and addressed him in these remarkable words, "It is a great consolation to me, my son, in my last moments, to reflect that I have offended no one, and that I have shed the blood of none of my subjects."

FREDERIC Augustus I., king of Poland, was son of John George III. elector of Saxony, and was born at Dresden 1670. He succeeded to the electorate after the death of his brother 1694, and distinguished himself against the French on the Rhine, and defeated the Turks, in 1696, at the battle of Oltach. By embracing the catholic religion, he recommended himself to the Polish nobles, and was in 1626, elected king, but the glories which he acquired in foreign wars, were eclipsed by the successes of Charles XII. of Sweden, and Frederic beaten at Riga, Clisow, and Frawstadt, was obliged to sign the peace of 1706, by which he was stripped of his dominions, and consented to see the crown of Poland placed on the head of Stanislaus. The battle of Pultowa, and the defeat of the Swedes, proved favorable to his views, he recovered the Polish throne, and maintained his power and independence till his death, 1st Feb. 1733, in his 63d year. His court was for a long time one of the most brilliant in Europe, and the patronage which he extended to literary characters, and to the arts, reflected the highest honor on his memory.

FREDERIC Augustus II., son of the preceding, was born 1696, and succeeded his father on the Polish throne 1734. The last years of his life were unhappily embittered by the miseries of war, and the king of Prussia invaded his dominions, and obliged him soon to yield to the rigorous fate of unconditional submission. Augustus was permitted indeed to return to Poland, but Saxony remained in the hands of the conqueror, till the peace of Hubersburgh, 15th Feb. 1763. Augustus died the following October. Respectable in private life, this monarch was unequal to the arduous duties of reigning, and whilst he devoted himself to the pleasures of luxury, and to indolence, he made no preparations against the attacks of his powerful neighbors of Russia and Prussia. By his wife Mary Josephine, daughter of the emperor Joseph, he left several daughters, one of whom was the mother of the unfortunate Louis XVI. of France.

FREDERIC WILLIAM, surnamed the Great, elector of Brandenburg, was born at Cologne, on the Spree 1620. He made successful war against the Poles, but the treaty of Braunsberg, in 1657, put an end to hostilities. In 1674 he joined himself against Louis XIV. with Spain and Holland, and invaded Alsace, but his progress was checked by the intelligence that the Swedes had laid waste several of his cities, and he returned hastily to repel them, and seized the towns of Stralsund, Ferschantz, and Grispwald. Peace was soon after restored and Frederic directed all his attention to improve the commerce of his dominions, and joined the Spree to the Oder by the opening of a canal. He died 1683, aged 68, highly respected by his subjects as a liberal, generous, benevolent, and patriotic prince.

FREDERIC I., elector of Brandenburg, son of the preceding, was born at Konigsberg, 1657. The ambition of this prince was flattered with the hopes of erecting his duchy into a kingdom, and Leopold the emperor, although he, in 1695, had rejected his solicitations, granted his requests in 1700, provided he assisted him in the war against France, England, Holland, Sweden, and Poland; and in consequence of this elevation his title was fully acknowledged at the peace of Utrecht. The Prussian dominions were increased under him by the acquisition of Guelders, of the county of Tecklenburg, and of the principalities of Neuchatel and Valengin. Frederic died 1713, aged 60. He founded the university of Halle, the royal academy of Berlin, and the academy of nobles.

FREDERIC WILLIAM I., king of Prussia, was born at Berlin 15th Aug. 1683, and succeeded his father just mentioned 1713. His reign was begun by a strict reform in the expenditure of the kingdom, and of the 100 chamberlains kept for ostentation by his father only 12 were retained. He unwillingly engaged in war against Charles XII., of Sweden, from whom he took Stralsund. Eager to encourage commerce and industry among his subjects, he invited foreign artisans into his dominions by the offer of liberal rewards, and while he contributed to the prosperity of the nation, he watched over its safety, and created a large standing army of sixty thousand men. He died 31st May, 1740, aged 52.

FREDERIC II., son of the preceding, was born 24th Jan. 1712, and ascended the throne of Prussia 1740. On his accession to the throne, Frederic laid claims to the province of Silesia which had been long occupied by the German emperor, and all the attempts of Maria Theresa to defend it against his invasion proved abortive. Count Neuperg the Hungarian general was defeated at Mollwitz, and, in 1741, all Lower Silesia submitted to the conqueror, and his possession was confirmed by the treaty of Breslaw 1743. The following year war was rekindled, and Frederic advanced with 100,000 men to the siege of Prague, which he took with 16,000 prisoners, and this advantage was soon followed by the decisive battle of Friedburg over prince Charles of Lorraine. Another treaty signed at Dresden 1745, again restored peace to the continent, and Austria ceded to the Prussian conqueror all Silesia with the county of Glatz. In 1755 a new war, called the seven years' war, burst forth with increased violence, and while Prussia had for its auxiliary the English nation, Austria was supported by France and by the elector of Saxony, and Frederic soon saw the number of his enemies augmented by the accession of Russia, Sweden, and Germany. Undismayed in the midst of his powerful enemies, Frederic laid the foundation for victory and success in the strict discipline of his army, and in the fortitude and resignation with which he supported the reverses of fortune, and shared the fatigues of his soldiers. Though France attacked his dominions from Guelders to Minden, and Russia penetrated into Prussia, and the Austrians into Silesia, Frederic on all sides rose superior to misfortunes. Though defeated by the Russians he routed the Austrians, and again suffered a check in Bohemia, but on the 5th Nov. 1757, he avenged himself by the terrible defeat of the Austrians and French at Rosbach, and by an equally splendid victory the next month over the Austrian forces at Lissa near Breslaw. These important successes appalled his enemies, the Russians and Swedes retired in dismay from Prussia, and Frederic supported by a liberal supply of money from the English government, and by an army of Hanoverians under the duke of Brunswick, penetrated into Moravia, and laid siege to Olmutz. Though here checked by marshal Daun, he rapidly advanced against the Russians at Custrin, and defeated them in the dreadful battle of Zorndoff. The battle of Hochkirehen against Daun was adverse to his fortunes, and he also suffered a severe check at the doubtful fight of Cunnersdoff against the Russians, and in consequence of these repeated disasters, Brandenburg and the capital fell into the hands of the victorious enemy 1761. The defeat of Daun at Torgan gave a new turn to the affairs of the undaunted monarch, his territories were evacuated by the enemy, and he in every situation displayed such activity, such vigilance, and such resources of mind, that in 1762 a treaty of peace was concluded with Russia and Sweden, and the next year with France and the Empire, by which Silesia was for ever confirmed in his possession. While cultivating the arts of peace, Frederic was still intent on enlarging his dominions, and he joined with Austria and Russia, in 1772, in that unpardonable league which dismembered the defenceless territories of Poland, and added some of its most fertile provinces to his kingdom. In 1777, the death of the duke of Bavaria without children kindled the flames of discord and of war between Austria and Prussia. Frederic placed himself at the head of his troops, but the differences of the rival princes were settled by the peace of Teschen 13th May 1779. The last years of Frederic's life were earnestly devoted to the encouragement of commerce and of the arts, justice was administered with impartiality, useful establishments were created, and the miseries of the indigent and unfortunate were liberally relieved by the benevolent cares of the monarch. Frederic died 17th Aug. 1786, aged 75. His works are numerous and respectable. Four volumes in octavo were published in his life-time, and fifteen since his death. The chief of these are Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg—a Poem on the Art of War, a composition of great merit—the history of his own Time—the History of the seven Years' War. All these have been collected together in 25 vols. 8vo. 1790, with an account of his life.

FREDERIC, surnamed the Wise, elector of Saxony, was born 1463. He enjoyed the good opinion and shared the councils of the emperor Maximilian, after whose death he might have been placed on the imperial throne, an honor which he refused, while he supported the election of Charles

V. He was one of the first and most zealous friends of Luther, and contributed much to the establishment of the reformed church. He died 1526, and was succeeded by his brother John surnamed the Constant, whose son John Frederic, when raised to the sovereign power, became a powerful protector of the reformers, and was chief of the famous league of Smalkalde 1536. In the war which followed this league John Frederic was taken prisoner by Charles V. and condemned to lose his head, but the sentence was reversed on condition that he consented to the renunciation of the electoral dignity for himself and his posterity. He died 3d March 1554, aged 51.

FREHER, Marquard, a German, born at Augsburg 1565. He studied civil law in France under Cujacius, and at the age of 23 was counsellor to Casimir prince Palatine. He was afterwards professor of law at Heidelberg, and engaged in important affairs by the elector Frederic IV. He died at the age of 49. His books on law, criticism, and history, are very numerous and respectable. His abilities, and the amiable character of his private life, are highly commended by Douza, Melchior Adam, Scioppius, Casaubon, and others.

FREIGIUS, John Thomas, a learned German, born at Friburg, son of a husbandman. He studied the law under Zasius and Rannus, and taught first at Friburg, and afterwards at Basil, and then at the moment when he thought of retiring from the ingratitude of the world to the peace of a rural life, he was appointed rector of the new college of Altorf 1575. He died 1583 of the plague. Of his works, the chief are Questiones Geometricæ, and Stereo-Metricæ Logica Consultorium—Ciceronis Orationes Perpetuis Notis Logicis, &c. 3 vols. 8vo.

FREIND, John, an English physician of eminence, born 1675. He was educated under Busby at Westminster, and came in 1690 to Christ-church, where Aldrich presided. His abilities as a scholar were already so distinguished, that he then in conjunction with a friend published an elegant edition of Demosthenes, and Æschines de Coronâ, and about the same time revised, for publication, the Delphin edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses. He now directed his attention to physic, and displayed great knowledge of the subject, by addressing a letter concerning the hydrocephalus to sir Hans Sloane in 1699, and another in 1701 de Spasmi Rarioris Historiâ, which are inserted in the philosophical transactions, Nos. 256 and 270. In 1703 he drew the public attention to an useful and valuable work called "Emmenologia, in quâ Fluxus Muliebris Menstrui," and in 1704 was elected chemical professor at Oxford. The year after he accompanied lord Peterborough in his Spanish expedition, and after two years' attendance on the army, he visited Italy and Rome, and conversed with Baglivi and Lancisi, men of eminence and medical celebrity. On his return in 1707, he published an account of the earl of Peterborough in Spain as an able vindication of the honor and character of his friend since the raising of the siege of Barcelona, and during the campaign of Valencia; and the work became very popular and passed rapidly to a third edition. At this time he was created M.D., and two years after he published his Prælectiones Chemicæ, dedicated to sir Isaac Newton. This work was censured in the Acta Eruditorum by the German philosophers, and drew forth a defence from the author inserted in the philosophical transactions. In 1711 he was elected member of the Royal society, and that year went with the duke of Ormond as physician to Flanders. In 1716 he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and at that time he had a controversy with Dr. Woodward of Gresham college, in consequence of his publication of Hippocrates de Morbis Popularibus, and afterwards on the subject of the fever in the small-pox, in which unpleasant dispute, more acrimony was shown, on both sides, than prudence or decorum could approve. In 1722 he was elected M.P., for Launceston in Cornwall, and the freedom and eloquence of his speeches in the house, together with his intimacy with Atterbury, drew upon him the suspicion that he was concerned in the plot of that unfortunate bishop, and consequently he was committed to the Tower, March, 1722-3, from which he was bailed the June following. In his confinement he wrote a letter on some kind of small-pox, addressed to his friend Mead, and he formed the plan of his great work "the History of Physic," the first part of which appeared in 1725, and the second 1726. He died 26th July, 1728, in his 52d year. His Latin works were published together, London 1733, in fol. by Wigan, who added a Latin translation of the History of Physic, with an elegant dedication to the queen.

FREINSHEMIUS, John, a learned German, born at Uhn in Swabia 1608. He was professor of eloquence at Upsal, librarian to Christina of Sweden, and afterwards professor at Heidelberg, where he died 1660. He was a most able classical scholar, and to the knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, united an intimate acquaintance with all the languages of Europe. His critique on Florus, and his notes on Phædrus and Tacitus, are valuable, but he derives his greatest celebrity from his excellent supplements to Livy and Quintus Curtius, in which he has been so successful that we almost cease to lament the loss of the originals.

FREMONT D'ABLANCOURT, Nicholas, nephew and pupil of Perrot d'Ablancourt, retired to Holland at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and was appointed historiographer to the prince of Orange. Besides a defence of his uncle Tacitus against la Honssaye, he translated Lucian's dialogue between the letters and the supplement to the true history, and after his death, which happened in 1693, his Memoirs of the History of Portugal, appeared in 12mo.

FRENCH, Jonathan, minister of Andover, Mass. was born Jan. 30, 1740, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1771. He was ordained in September of the following year. At the age of sixteen Mr. French was a soldier in the French war, and afterwards was stationed at castle William, near Boston. His desire to obtain an education, although at an advanced age, was encouraged by several literary gentlemen with whom he became acquainted at the castle. In the revolutionary war he partook of the patriotic spirit of that period. On hearing of the battle of Breed's hill he took his musket and his surgical instruments and repaired to the army. Mr. French died, July 23, 1809, aged 69. He published a sermon on extortion; four ordination sermons; an election sermon; a thanksgiving sermon; and a sermon at a lecture in 1805.

FRERET, Nicolas, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1688. Though bred to the law he applied himself to the study of history, and at the age of 25 was admitted into the academy of inscriptions, in consequence of his Discourse on the Origin of the French. This valuable treatise was considered as offensive to the court, and the author was sent to the Bastille, where the reading of Bayle's dictionary rendered him sceptical. He wrote letters "of Thrasylbulus to Leucippe," in favor of atheism—and Examination of the Apologists for Christianity. He died 1749, aged 61.

FREON, Elie Catherine, a French journalist, and an able opponent of the new philosophy, was born at Quimper 1719. He was educated by the jesuits, but in 1739 he left them, and began the life and profession of author. His "Letters on Certain Writings of the Times," appeared in 1749, and were continued to 13 vols. In 1754 he began his "Année Littéraire," in 7 vols. to which he added yearly 3 vols. till his death in 1776. He was an able and acute critic, but his remarks on Voltaire drew upon him all the violence and fury of the satirist, and he became the hero of his Dunciad. To a well informed mind, Freon added an excellent private character. He died 10th March, 1776, and besides his periodical publications, wrote miscellanies, 3 vols.—les Vrais Plaisirs, from Marino, and part of a translation of Lucretius.

FRESNE, Charles du Cange du, a learned Frenchman, born at Amiens 1610. He studied the law at Orleans, and was advocate of the parliament of Paris. He spent some time in his native town, in the pursuits of literature and philosophy, and then settling at Paris, he was in 1663 engaged by Colbert to make a collection from all authors who had written on the history of France. His labors, however, did not please the minister, and he resigned all his engagements in the undertaking, and then finished his "Glossarium Mediæ & Infimæ Latinitatis" 3 vols. fol. an excellent and useful work, often reprinted. He afterwards wrote a Greek Glossary of the middle age, in 2 vols. folio. He wrote also the History of Constantinople under the French emperors, and published besides, editions of Nicophorus, Cinnamus, Anna Comena, & Zonaras, with learned notes. He died 1633, aged 73. Du Cange's Latin Glossary was afterwards enlarged and improved, and afterwards abridged in 6 vols. 8vo. Halle, 1772.

FRESNEL, Augustine John, an experimental French philosopher, was born, in 1788, at Broglie, and died in 1827. By profession he was a civil engineer. Fresnel particularly distinguished himself by his masterly experiments on the diffraction, inflection, and polarisation of light. His scientific merit occasioned him to be admitted as a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of the British Royal Society.

FREWEN, Accepted, an English prelate, born in Kent, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and president. He was chaplain to Charles I, 1631, was made dean of Gloucester, and in 1643, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. He was translated to York at the restoration, and died at Thorpe castle 1634, aged seventy-five.

FRISBIE, Levi, for thirty years a settled minister at Ipswich, Mass. He was born at Brauford, Con. in April 1748, and graduated at Dartmouth college, 1771, in the first class of that institution. Previous to his settlement at Ipswich he spent several years as a missionary among the Indians. Mr. Frisbie died, Feb. 25, 1806, aged 57. His mind was strengthened by close habits of study; and all his acquisitions were consecrated to moral and religious purposes. His life displayed the humility, meekness, and benevolence of the christian. He published an oration on the peace, 1783; on the death of Moses Parsons, 1784; two sermons on a day of public fasting; a thanksgiving sermon; an eulogy on the death of Washington, 1800; and a sermon before the society for propagating the gospel among the American Indians, 1804.

FRISBIE, Levi, a distinguished professor of the university in Cambridge, Massachusetts, first of the Latin language, and afterwards of moral philosophy. He was born in the year 1784, and died in the year 1822. He was eminent for his integrity and deep sense of religion; and for his acuteness and force of mind. For the last eighteen years of his life, he was afflicted by a disease of his eyes, which almost deprived him of their use for the purposes of study; and prevented him from giving to the world many proofs of his uncommon powers of intellect. He was however, the author of several publications, which, after his death, were collected, together and edited with some extracts from the manuscript notes of his lectures. His prose compositions have great merit; and his version of the Epistle of Horace to Julius Harus, is much superior to that of Francis. See "A collection of the miscellaneous writings of Professor Frisbie; with some notices of his life and character," Boston, 1823, 8vo.

FRISCH, John Leonard, a German naturalist and philologist, was born, in 1666, at Sulzbach. From 1690 to 1693 he spent in wandering over Europe. He settled at length at Berlin, became a member of the Academy of Sciences, rector of the Grey Convent Gymnasium, and a professor. He died in 1743. Among his numerous works are, A German and Latin Dictionary; A Description of all the German Insects; and Descriptions and Figures of German Birds. The last of these was completed by his son. Frisch was the first who cultivated the mulberry in Brandenburg, and introduced the silk manufacture.

FRISCHLIN, Nicodemus, a learned German, born at Baling, in Swabia, 1547. He was educated under his father, who was a minister, and at Tübingen, and so great were his powers that at the age of thirteen he could write with elegance Greek and Latin poetry. He became at twenty, professor at Tübingen, and in 1580, published an oration in praise of a country life, with a paraphrase on Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics. In this celebrated work he inveighed severely against courtiers, and the satire was felt and resented. Even his life was in danger, so that he fled to Laubach, in Carniola, where he opened a school; but the insalubrity of the air, and the ill health of his wife and children obliged him to return home. He afterwards passed to Frankfort, and thence into Saxony, and to Brunswick, and at last, overpowered by his necessities, he wrote to the prince of Wirtemberg for relief; but his application was disregarded, and he afterwards imprisoned in Wirtemberg castle. From this illiberal treatment he determined to escape, but unfortunately in the attempt, the ropes which he used were so weak that he fell down a deep precipice, and was dashed to pieces on the rocks, in 1590. He left behind him the character of an unfortunate, persecuted man, whose abilities, however, were strongly exhibited in his tragedies, comedies, elegies, and elegant translations from Greek and Latin authors, and also by a well digested Latin Grammar.

FRISI, Paul, a mathematician and philosopher, was born, in 1723, at Milan, and died there in 1784. Mathematics he learned without assistance, and so rapidly and perfectly, that, before he was twenty-two, he composed his celebrated Dissertation on the Figure of the Earth. He was a member of many learned bodies, and professor of mathematics at his native city. Frisi introduced into the Milanese the use of conductors to secure buildings from lightning, and he contributed greatly to root out the superstitious notions of the people respecting magic and sorcerers. His works, on hydrau-tics, astronomy, and many other sciences, are numerous and valuable.

FROBENIUS, John, an eminent German printer, born at Hammelburg, Franconia. He was educated at Basil, and after great progress in literature began the business of printer there. The respectability of his character, and his constant care of never printing any thing offensive to morals and religion, produced him both celebrity and opulence. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and he printed his works. He had formed the design of publishing all the Greek fathers, but death prevented the completion. His death, which happened at Basil 1527, was supposed to have been occasioned by a fall five years before, which at last ended in a dead palsy. He was universally lamented; but by none more than Erasmus, who loved him sincerely, and who, in proof of his affection, wrote his epitaph in Greek and Latin.

FROBISHER, sir Martin, a celebrated navigator, born near Doncaster in Yorkshire. He was early brought up to a sea life, and was the first Englishman who attempted to discover a north-west passage to China. After fruitless endeavors to complete his favorite scheme for 15 years, he at last obtained the protection of Dudley earl of Warwick, and with three barks he sailed from Deptford, 8th June 1576, in the sight of queen Elizabeth, who waving her hand bade him farewell. After visiting the coasts of Greenland, and penetrating to a strait to which he gave his own name, he returned, and arrived at Harwich the 2d October. As he brought with him some of the produce of the lands which he visited, a black and heavy stone, which was on board, was discovered to contain gold, and in consequence a new expedition was quickly planned. With a ship of the royal navy and two barks, he sailed from Harwich 31st May 1577; and after passing by some very dreadful islands of ice on the coast of Friezland, he discovered and gave names to various bays and isles; and at last, after loading his ships with some of the golden ore of which he was in pursuit, he came back and reached England at the end of September. The queen received him with great condescension. The ore he had brought was examined before commissioners, and was proved to be valuable; and another expedition was prepared to make still further discoveries. The third expedition, consisting of fifteen ships, sailed from Harwich on the 31st of May, and returned back with the usual success, at the beginning of October. Afterwards Frobisher served in sir Francis Drake's expedition to the West-Indies; and three years after, in 1588, he commanded the Triumph in the defeat of the Spanish armada. He was knighted in his own ship for his great services; and afterwards was employed to command a fleet on the Spanish coast. In 1594, he supported Henry IV. against the leaguers and Spaniards; but in an attack against Croyzon near Brest, he was unfortunately wounded by a ball in the hip, 7th November, and died soon after, it is said, through the ignorance of his surgeon, who, by neglecting to extract the wadding, did not prevent the festering of the affected part. This brave man was buried at Plymouth.

FROISSARD or FROISSART, John, an eminent historian, born at Valenciennes 1337. Though bred to the church, he was fond of gaiety, and travelled through England, Scotland, Italy, and other places. He was for some time in great favor with Philippa, the queen of Edward III. and died canon and treasurer of Chimai about 1410. His "Chronicle" is a valuable work, containing an account of the events which took place in England, France, and Spain, from 1326 to 1400. The best edition is that of Lyons, 4 vols. fol. 1599. It has been abridged by Sleidan, and continued to 1466 by Monstrelet. It has been lately edited and elucidated by the labors of Mr. Johns.

FROMENTIN, Eligius, senator of the United States from Louisiana from 1813 to 1819. In 1821 he was appointed judge of the western district of Florida. Gen. Jackson, the governor, having demanded in vain certain documents of col. Callava, the late Spanish governor, threw him into prison, from which he was relieved by a writ of habeas corpus, granted by judge Fromentin. This act of judicial authority occasioned a long and bitter altercation with the general, who claimed the supreme power. The judge resigned his office, and died of the yellow fever 1822.

FRONTENAC, Louis, count, governor general of Canada 1678, and in the spring of the following year built upon lake Ontario the fort which bore his name. He was recalled in 1682, but was reinstated in his office in 1689. He died 1698, aged 77.

FROST, Edmund, missionary to Bombay, was a native of Vermont, graduated at Middlebury college, and studied theology at Andover. He was ordained at Salem 1823, and embarked for Calcutta. He arrived at Bombay 1824, and died there 1825.

FROWDE, Philip, an English poet, educated at Oxford, where his intimacy with Addison introduced him to the notice of the great. He was author of some very elegant Latin poems in the Musæ Anglicanæ, and wrote besides, two tragedies, "the Fall of Sagnetum" and "Philotas." He died in 1738, leaving a most amiable character behind him. No man, says his biographer, could live more beloved, no private man could die more lamented.

FRUGONI, Charles Innocent, an Italian poet, born at Genoa 1692. He entered into the society of the Sommasques, but afterwards with the pope's leave laid aside the clerical character, and became perpetual secretary to the academy of fine arts at Padua. He died 1768, aged 76. His works consisting of minor poems were published at Parma 1779, in 9 vols. 8vo.

FRYTH, John, an English martyr, born at Seven Oaks in Kent. He was educated at King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he became one of the canons in Wolsey's college. The acquaintance and conversation of Tyndale converted him to the tenets of Luther, for which he was imprisoned. Upon his liberation in 1528, he left England, and two years after returned, and began with increased zeal to preach his opinions. His influence was so great that he was sent to the Tower by sir Thomas More, and refusing to recant he was condemned by the catholic commission, and was burnt in Smithfield 1533. He wrote several treatises against popery, which were reprinted in London in fol. 1573.

FUCA, John de, whose real name was Apostolos Valerianos, was a native of Cephalonia, born in the sixteenth century, and died at Zante, in 1632. For more than forty years he acted as a pilot in the Spanish American possessions. In the year 1592, he discovered the strait that leads into the extensive archipelago, on the coast of the North Pacific, subsequently explored by Vancouver; but he mistakenly supposed it to communicate with the Atlantic ocean.

FUCHS, or FUCHSIUS, Leonard, a physician and botanist, was born, in 1501, at Wemdingen, in Bavaria, and took his degree at Ingolstadt. Charles V. ennobled him. He died, in 1561, at Tubingen, at which university he had, for five and thirty years, been professor of medicine. He wrote several medical works, which attest his superior skill; but he is principally remembered by his History of Plants. His name was given by Plumier to an American genus, remarkable for the beauty of its leaves and flowers.

FULBERT, an Italian, educated under pope Sylvester II. He acquired great celebrity in France as a public preacher, and obtained the bishopric of Chartres. He wrote with strong zeal against Berengarius on the eucharist, and was the first who introduced into France the worship paid to the Virgin Mary. He died 1023. His works and letters are extant.

FULKE, William, D.D., an English divine, born in London, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1564. He spent six years at Clifford's Inn, but his fondness for literature was greater than his partiality for the law, though against the wishes of his father. In consequence of his acquaintance with Cartwright, he was suspected of puritanism, and was expelled from his college, but the patronage of the earl of Leicester restored him to public favor, and presented him 1571, to the living of Warley, Essex, and two years after to Didington, Suffolk. He died 1589. He wrote several works in Latin and English, chiefly against the papists, and dedicated to queen Elizabeth, and to her favorite Leicester. His Comment upon the Rheims Testament is the most known of his works. It appeared in 1580, and again in 1601, 1617, and 1633, in fol.

FULLER, Nicolas, was born at Southampton 1557, and educated at the free school there. He became secretary to Horne bishop of Winchester, and to Watson his successor, and afterwards he went as tutor to a Mr. Knight's sons at St. John's college, Oxford, and took his degrees in arts at Hart hall. He became prebendary of Salisbury, and rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, and died 1622. He was an able scholar, well skilled in Hebrew, and superior to all the critics of his time. His "Miscellaneous Theologica," in four books, a valuable book, was published in Oxford 1616, and London 1617, and it is inserted with some other works in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum. Some of his MSS. are preserved in the Bodleian library.

FULLER, Thomas, D.D., an English historian and divine, born in 1608. His proficiency was so great that at the age of 12 he was sent to Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and afterwards removed to Sidney college, of which he was chosen fellow 1631. That year he obtained a prebend at Salisbury, and was afterwards presented to the living of Broad Windsor, Dorsetshire, where he married. Upon the loss of his wife about 1641, he removed to London, and became minister of the Savoy. In 1642, he preached at Westminster abbey, and gave such offence in his sermon by his zealous support of the royal cause, that his life was considered in danger. He joined the king at Oxford in 1643, but his sermon there, before his royal master, appeared as lukewarm, as that at Westminster had been interpreted as violent, a strong proof no doubt of the moderation to which he warmly exhorted all parties. In 1644, he was chaplain to lord Hopton, and was left with part of his army at Basing house when it was besieged by Sir William Waller, and in this situation he behaved with such courage that the parliamentary general raised the siege with loss. Fuller afterwards retired to Exeter, where he was chaplain to the princess Henrietta, and where he continued during the siege of the city, and at the close of the war he returned to London, and became a popular preacher at St. Clement's lane, and afterwards at St. Bride's Fleet-street. In 1648, he was presented to the living of Waltham, in Essex, by lord Carlisle, and in 1654, he married a sister of viscount Batinglasse. At the restoration, he found himself a favorite at court, and would have risen to a bishopric, had not a fever unfortunately carried him off, 16th Aug. 1661. The most celebrated of his works are "the Church History of Britain, from the birth of Christ, till 1648," with the History of Cambridge University, and the History of Waltham-abbey annexed, 1656—History of the Worthies of England, a valuable book, published in 1662, fol.—Good Thoughts, in Bad Times, and in Worse Times—the History of the Holy War, 1640, fol.—the Holy State, fol. 1642—Pisgah Sight of Palestine, and the Confines thereof, with the History of the Old and New Testament, 1650—Abel Redivivus, or English divines, 1651, 4to.—the Speech of Birds, moral and mystical, 8vo. 1660—Andronicus, or the Unfortunate Politician, 1649, 8vo. besides sermons.

FULLER, Isaac, an English painter of some celebrity. The resurrection in All Soul's college-chapel, and that of Magdalen college, and an historical piece only in two colors, in Wadham college, Oxford, are excellent proofs of his great abilities. He studied under Perrier, in France, and was very accurate in the anatomy of his figures, but he often offended in decency and historical truth. He died at the end of the second Charles' reign in London.

FULLER, Andrew, a minister, eminent among the Baptists, was born, in 1754, at Wicken, in Cambridgeshire, and was engaged in the labors of husbandry till he was twenty years of age. By diligent study he acquired a considerable degree of learning; and he became a preacher of the gospel, first at Soham, and next at Kettering. He died, at Kettering, in 1815. Fuller was secretary to the Baptist Missionary Society, and in that capacity was very active. He was also an acute controversialist against the Socinians. He wrote the Calvinistic and Socinian Systems examined and compared; Socinianism Indefensible; Discourses on the Book of Genesis; Sermons, and other works.

FULTON, Robert, a celebrated engineer, was a native of Pennsylvania. His genius disclosed itself at an early period. He was attracted to the shops of mechanics; and at the age of seventeen he painted landscapes and portraits in Philadelphia. Thus he was enabled in part to purchase a small farm for his widowed mother. At the age of twenty-one he by the advice of his friends repaired to London, to place himself under guidance of Mr. West, the painter, and by him was kindly received, and admitted as an inmate of his house for several years. Prosecuting his business as a painter, he spent two years in Devonshire, where he became acquainted with the duke of Bridgewater and with lord Stanhope, well known for his attachment to the mechanic arts. In 1793, he engaged in the project of improving inland navigation, and in 1794, obtained patents for a double inclined plane, and for machines for spinning flax and making ropes. The subject of canals now chiefly occupied his attention, and at this period, in 1796, his work on canals was published. In his profession of civil engineer he was greatly benefited by his skill in drawing and painting. He went to Paris in 1797, and being received into the family of Joel Barlow, he there spent seven years, studying chemistry, physics, and mathematics, and acquiring a knowledge of the French, Italian, and German languages. In Dec. 1797, he made his first experiment on sub-marine explosion in the Seine, but without success. His plan for a submarine boat was afterwards perfect. In 1801, while he was residing with his friend Mr. Barlow, he met in Paris chancellor Livingston the American minister, who explained to him the importance in America of navigating boats by steam. Mr. Fulton had already conceived the project as early as 1793, as appears by his letter to lord Stanhope. He now engaged anew in the affair, and at the common expense of himself and Mr. Livingston built a boat on the Seine in 1803, and successfully navigated the river. The principles of the steam engine he did not invent; he claimed only the application of that machine to water wheels for propelling vessels. In 1806, he returned to America; and he and Mr. Livingston built, in 1807, the first boat, the Clermont, 130 feet in length, which navigated the Hudson at the rate of five miles an hour. In Feb. 1809, he took out his first patent. In 1810, he published his Torpedo war. In 1811, and 1812, he built two steam ferry boats for crossing the Hudson, he contrived also very ingenious floating docks for the reception of these boats. In 1813, he obtained a patent for a sub-marine battery. Conceiving the plan of a steam man of war, the government, in March 1814, appropriated $320,000 for constructing it, and appointed him the engineer. In about four months she was launched with the name of Fulton the first. He was employed in improving his sub-marine boat when he died suddenly, 1815, aged 50.—The following is a brief explanation of some of his inventions, besides the steam boats.—A machine for making ropes, which can stand in a room forty feet square, and by which the rope yarns are put on spools, and any sized cordage made by one man.—The sub-marine boat—which had a mainsail and jib like a sloop; the mast and sails could be taken in, and the boat dive under water in one minute, and be rowed and steered by a compass. Thus a torpedo could be fixed to the bottom of ships of war. Mr. F. and three others continued under water one hour. He supposed that five men might continue under water six hours, and rise 15 miles from the place where they went down.—The torpedo—which is a copper case, containing 50 or 100 lbs. of powder, discharged by a gun-lock, which strikes by means of clock work set to any short time. He proposed to attach it to a rope of 60 or 80 feet, and fasten it by a gun harpoon to the bow of a vessel, whose motion would draw it under her bottom, and thus she would be blown up. A few row boats, each with a torpedo might attack a ship of war, and be pretty sure to succeed.

FURETIERE, Anthony, a lawyer born at Paris 1620, and eminent as an advocate in the Parliament. He afterwards took orders, and became abbot of Chalivoy and prior of Chuines. He was expelled in 1685, from the French academy, on the accusation that he had composed "a Dictionary of the French Tongue" which, being borrowed from the same materials, was intended to supersede theirs. This valuable work was published two years after his death, in 1690, 2 vols. folio.

FURMAN, Richard, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Baptist denomination. For nearly forty years he was pastor of a church in Charleston, S. C. He died Aug. 25, 1825.

FURST, Walter, or FURSTIUS, a Swiss, revered as one of the founders of the liberty of his country. He seized in 1307, with some of his brave countrymen, the forts by which his country was enslaved under Albert of Austria, and by their demolition the independence of the Swiss was re-established.

FUSELI, or FUESSLI, Henry, an eminent painter, was born, about 1739, at Zurich, in Switerland. Though in his boyhood he manifested a talent for drawing, his father, an artist, was desirous to see him in the church, and he was educated accordingly. At Berlin, where he studied under Sultzer, Sir Robert Smith, the British ambassador, induced him to visit England. Fuseli's entrance into active life was as tutor to a nobleman's son. With the English language Fuseli was thoroughly acquainted, and, in 1765, he published Reflections on the painting and sculpture of the Greeks. This he followed up by a Defence of Rousseau against Voltaire. Still the longing after pictorial fame was uppermost in his mind. In order to decide whether he should follow the bent of his genius, he showed some of his drawings to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and requested his candid opinion of them. "Young man," said Sir Joshua, "were I the author of these drawings, and offered ten thousand a year not to practice as an artist, I would reject it with contempt." Fuseli hesitated no longer. In 1770 he visited Italy, and he studied diligently there for eight years. On his return he painted several pictures for the Shakspeare Gallery, and, in 1790, became a Royal Academician. The opening of his Milton Gallery, in 1798, first made known to the public the full extent of his genius. In 1799 he was appointed professor of painting, and, in 1804, keeper of the Royal Academy. He died in April, 1725, and, notwithstanding his advanced age, the vigor of his faculties was unimpaired. In his domestic character Fuseli was truly estimable. He was, too, an excellent scholar, and enjoyed the friendship of his most eminent literary contemporaries. The works of art which he produced are numerous. His imagination was lofty and exuberant; but, in aspiring to the sublime, which he often reaches, he occasionally falls into extravagance and distortion. Still, his extravagance is that of a man of genius. His anatomical knowledge was extensive. It must, however, be owned that, in some instances, he displayed it too ostentatiously, so as to give to his figures rather the forms seen in the dissecting room than those which characterize the living subject.

FUSI, Anthony, a doctor of the Sorbonne, minister of St. Bartholomew church at Paris. He was imprisoned by the jesuits, whose opinions and conduct he opposed, and accused of incontinency and heresy, but he was afterwards set free, and retired to Geneva, where he publicly embraced the protestant tenets. He wrote against the errors and corruptions of the Romish church, besides an account of his own case. He died 1630.

FUST or FAUST, John, a goldsmith of Mentz, to whom with Gutenberg and Schæffer, is attributed the invention of printing. It is more probable that he only assisted Gutenberg with money, to enable him to make movable metal types at Strasburg in 1444. Koster, however, at Harlaem invented, in 1430, the cutting of wooden blocks, and Schæffer, in 1452, found out the method of casting metal types. The first printed book with metallic types is Durandi Rationale Divinorum Officiorum 1459, and afterwards Catholicon Joannis Januensis, though it is said that there is a psalter, with the date of 1457 printed at Mentz. Fust died at Paris 1466 of the plague. The report of his being arrested as a magician at Paris, for having in his possession various copies of the bible in unusual exactness, is false.

FYOT DE LA MARCHE, Claude, count of Bosjam, a native of Dijon, highly honored by Louis XIV. and made councillor of state, and prior of Notre Dame. He wrote an History of the Abbey of St. Stephen, fol. and some religious tracts, and died at Dijon 1721, aged 91.

G.

GABRIEL, Severus, a Greek bishop, born at Monembasia in Peloponnesus. He was made bishop of Philadelphia, but, in 1577, came to Venice, and presided over the Greeks in that republic. His various tracts on theological subjects, Greek and Latin, were published Paris 1671, 4to.

GABRIEL, Sionite, a Maronite, once professor of oriental languages at Rome, died at Paris 1648, then professor of Syriac and Arabic. He assisted le Jay in the polyglot bible, and published a translation of the Arabic Geography, called Geographia Nubiensis, in 1619, 4to.

GABRIEL, James, a French architect, the pupil of Mansard. He was born at Paris, and died 1742, aged 77. His merit, as the able builder of several noble edifices in France, placed him in the office of inspector general of buildings, gardens, arts, and manufactures, and of first architect and engineer of bridges and public ways in the kingdom. He was also knight of the order of St. Michael.

GACON, Francis, a French poet, born at Lyons. He became father of the oratory, and died at his priory of Baillon 1727, aged 58. He is known for his severe satires against Bossuet, Rousseau, la Motte and others. Though he had personally attacked almost all the members of the academy, yet the poetical prize was adjudged to him in 1717. The best of his works is a translation of Anacreon. His other pieces are chiefly satirical.

GADSDEN, Christopher, lieutenant governor of South Carolina and a distinguished friend of his country, was born in Charleston in 1724. He was appointed one of the delegates to the congress, which met at New York in Oct. 1765, to petition against the stamp act. He was also chosen a member of the congress which met in 1774. He was among the first who openly advocated republican principles, and wished to make his country independent of the monarchical government of Great Britain. "The decisive genius," says Ramsay, "of Christopher Gadsden in the south, and of John Adams in the north, at a much earlier day might have derived a complete separation of America from Great Britain, but till the year 1776, the rejection of the second petition of congress, and the appearance of Paine's pamphlet, common sense, a reconciliation with the mother country was the unanimous wish of almost every other American." During the siege of Charleston in 1780 he remained within the lines with five of the council, while governor Rutledge with the other three left the city at the earnest request of general Lincoln. Several months after the capitulation he was taken out of his bed, and with most of the civil and military officers transported in a guard ship to St. Augustine. This was done by the order of lord Cornwallis, and it was in violation of the rights of prisoners on parole. Guards were left at their houses, and the private papers of some of them were examined. A parole was offered at St. Augustine; but such was his indignation, at the ungenerous treatment which he had received, that he refused to accept it, and bore a close confinement in the castle for forty two weeks with the greatest fortitude. In 1782, when it became necessary, by the rotation established to choose a new governor, he was elected, but declined on account of his age. He died 1805, aged 81.

GAERTNER, Joseph, a native of Calu in Swabia, son to the physician of the duke of Wirtemberg. He studied at Tubingen, but his fondness for natural history was so great that he abandoned divinity to devote himself more fully to his favorite pursuits, and to mathematics and medicine. He next attended the lectures of Haller at Gottingen, and after travelling over part of Europe; in 1759 applied himself to botany and vegetable anatomy at Leyden. His visit to England was marked by his friendly reception among men of rank and of science, he was made fellow of the royal society and enriched the philosophical transactions with a curious paper on the fructification and propagation of Confervæ. In 1768, he was honorably appointed professor of botany and natural history at Petersburg, and was thus enabled to examine the natural curiosities of the Ukraine with the eye and attention of a philosopher and botanist. He returned to Swabia in 1770, and, in 1778, again visited London to finish the drawings and figures for his great work called Carpology, which he dedicated to sir Joseph Banks. This indefatigable naturalist died 1791, aged 59, leaving behind him many valuable manuscripts.

GAFFARELL, James, a French writer, born at Mannes, in Provence, 1601, and educated at the university of Apt in that province. He studiously devoted himself to the Hebrew language, and to Rabbinical learning, and at the age of 22 wrote a large 4to. volume in defence of the mysterious doctrine of the Cabala. He was appointed librarian to Richelieu, and enabled by his munificence to travel into Italy to make a collection of valuable books and manuscripts. On his return his abilities were employed by his patron in the difficult and unavailing task of reconciling the protestants to the papists. He died at Sigonce, where he was abbot, 1681, aged 81. By the recommendation of Richelieu, whom he survived many years, he was dean of canon law at Paris, prior of Revest de Brousse, and commandant of St. Omeil. His works are numerous, learned, and curious. The most known are "Unheard of Curiosities concerning the Talismanic Sculpture of the Persians,—the Horoscope of the Patriarchs and the Reading of the Stars," a work which passed through three editions in six months, and in asserting some bold things concerning magic, drew upon the author the censures of the Sorbonne,—a History of the Subterranean World, with an account of Grottos, Vaults, and Catacombs, seen during his travels, with plates, left unfinished at his death—and a treatise of Good and Evil Genii. Though learned he was very superstitious, and more fond of magic than became his knowledge of the world, and his experience.

GAGE, Thomas, or friar Thomas of St. Mary, a catholic missionary was an Irishman, educated at St. Omer's and joined the Dominicans. In 1625 he went out from Spain to Mexico with a band of missionaries, destined for the Philippine islands: but not relishing so distant a mission he fled to Gauthama, where, and in other neighboring places he lived as a missionary to the Indians ten or eleven years. In 1637 he escaped to England and became a protestant minister at Deal. He published a new survey of the West Indies, giving an account of his mission to New Spain, and of his travels. It is a curious and interesting book; though Clavigero, an Italian might well after the lapse of 100 years decry it, and represent it as full of falsehood, for it unveils much of the secrets of catholicism, and describes the pope as antichrist.

GAGE, Thomas, the last governor of Massachusetts appointed by the king of England. After the conquest of Canada in 1760 he was appointed governor of Montreal. At the departure of general Amherst in 1763, he succeeded him as commander in chief of his majesty's forces in America. In 1774 he was appointed governor of Massachusetts, and arrived at Boston May 13th. Several regiments soon followed him, and he began to repair the fortifications on Boston neck. As precautionary measures he caused the powder in the arsenal at Charlestown to be seized, and sent detachments of troops to take possession of the military stores deposited in Salem or its vicinity, and also to Concord. With the detachment sent to Concord, hostilities commenced at Lexington early in the morning of April 19th 1775, with the Americans, were renewed at Concord, and continued till the British troops reached their encampment at Charlestown towards evening. The events of this day have always been considered as the beginning of the American revolutionary war. In May the provincial congress declared Gage to be an inveterate enemy of the country, disqualified to serve the colony as governor, and unworthy of obedience. In June he issued a proclamation, offering pardon to all the rebels, excepting Samuel Adams and John Hancock, and establishing martial law. An answer to this proclamation was prepared by congress, but before its publication, the battle of Bunker hill, now the subject of history, put an end to the paper war. He embarked for England in October, and died there in 1787.

GAGNIER, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, and educated there. He was a most able orientalist, and upon abandoning the popish faith, for the tenets of the English church, he came to England, where, in honor of his merits, the two universities conferred on him the degree of M.A. He lived some time at Oxford, by teaching Hebrew, but during the absence, and after the death of Dr. Wallis, he was appointed Arabic professor, and delivered lectures to the university, with universal approbation, till his death 1725. In 1706, he edited Jos. Ben Gorion's History of the Jews, in Hebrew, with a Latin translation, and notes 4to. and in 1723, he published Abulfeda's life of Mahomet, in Arabic, with a Latin translation in fol. His translation of Abulfeda's description of Arabia, had appeared in Hudson's Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores, 1712, 8vo.

GAGNY, John, first almoner to Francis I. was chancellor of Paris university, and author of Commentaries on the New Testament,—and the Psalms in verse. He died 1549.

GAGUIN, Robert, a French historian, born at Colines, near Amiens, and educated at Paris, where he took his doctor's degree in law. His abilities were employed by Charles VIII. and Louis XII. in embassies to England, Germany, and Italy. He was royal librarian, and general of the Unitarians, and died 1501, advanced in years. His chief work is "De Gestis Francorum" from 1200 to 1500, in 11 books folio, Lyons, 1524.

GAIL, John Baptist, a celebrated Hellenist, was born at Paris, in 1755, and died in the same city, in 1823, professor of Greek literature at the College of France. He was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, and a knight of the legion of honor. He contributed greatly to render the study of Greek popular in France. Among his productions are, A Greek Grammar; and Translations of Xenophon, Thucydides, Theocritus, Bion, Moschus, and Lucian's Dialogues of the Dead.

GAIL, Sophia, the wife of the foregoing, was born about 1779, and died, at Paris, in 1819. For the arts, and particularly for music, she manifested an early taste, and she began to compose when she was not more than twelve years of age. Among her principal compositions are the operas of The Jealous Pair, Mademoiselle de Launay in the Bastille, and The Serenade.

GAILLARD, de Lonjumeau, bishop of Apt, from 1673, to his death 1695, is to be recorded as being the first projector of an universal historical dictionary. In the execution of his useful work, he patronised his almoner Moreri, and enabled him to consult the libraries of Europe, and the Vatican. According to Moreri's dedication of his first edition, Gaillard was a man of eminent virtues, exemplary in public and private life, and distinguished as the encourager of literature, and of learned men.

GAILLARD, Gabriel Henry, a French miscellaneous writer and historian, was born, in 1723, at Ostel, near Soissons; abandoned the bar to become wholly an author; was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, the French Academy, and the Institute; and died in 1806. His most important works are, Miscellanies, in four volumes; his Histories of Mary of Burgundy, of Francis I., of Charlemagne, of the Rivalship of England and France; the Historical Dictionary of the Methodical Encyclopedia; and Observations on Vally's History of France.

GAINAS, a Goth, who by his valor, became a general under Arcadius, and ruined and destroyed Rufinus, and the Eunuch Eutropius, who were the favorites of their imperial master. He invaded and desolated Thrace, because refused a church for the Arians, according to the promise of Arcadius at Chalcedonia, and was at last killed near the Danube, A.D. 400, and his head carried in triumph through the streets of Constantinople.

GAINSBOROUGH, Thomas, an English painter, born at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1727. He was self-taught, and after trying the powers of his genius, in delineating the scenes of the country, he came to London, where he acquired celebrity, by the superior style of his portraits, and the elegant simplicity of his landscapes. He was of a very benevolent turn of mind, and it is said that he impoverished himself by his extensive liberality. He died 1788, aged 61. His eldest brother was also eminent as an artist, and another, minister of a dissenting congregation at Henley, Oxon, was said to be a very able and ingenious mechanic.

GALADIN, Mahomet, a popular emperor of the Moguls, who died 1605. He gave twice a day audience to his subjects, and was very careful that their complaints should be listened to and redressed, for which purpose he had a bell in his room, with a rope descending into the street, to the ringing of which he punctually attended.

GALANUS, Clement, an Italian of the order of the Theatin monks, for some years a missionary in Armenia. His grammar of the Armenian tongue, appeared at Rome, 1650, and also some treatises in that language, with Latin translations, 2 vols. fol.

GALAS, Matthew, a general who from being page to baron Beaufremont, so distinguished himself by his valor and intrepidity under marshal Tilli, that he succeeded him in the command of the imperial forces. After being in the service of the emperor Frederic II. and of Philip IV. of Spain, he fell into disgrace in consequence of the loss of a battle, against Torstenson, the Swede, near Magdebourg. He was restored afterwards to favor, but died shortly after, at Vienna, 1647, leaving behind the character of a very great general.

GALATEO FERRARI, Antonio, a scholar and physician, born at Galatina, in the territory of Otranto. He was physician to the king of Naples, but retired from the court through ill health, and died at Lecce, in his native province, 1517, aged 73.

He wrote "a Description of Iapygia"—a tract in praise of the Gout—Latin verses, and a treatise on the Elements.

GALE, John, D.D., a baptist preacher, born May 26th, 1630, in London. At the age of 17 he was an able scholar, and passed to Leyden to complete his studies, and there took, in his 19th year, his degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy. From Leyden, where his abilities had been acknowledged with universal applause, he went to Amsterdam, and studied under Limborch, and began a lasting intimacy with J. le Clerc. In 1711, he published his Reflections on Wall's Defence of Infant Baptism, and so high was the character of this work, that he acquired great influence among the dissenters. At the age of 35 he began to preach among the people of his persuasion, and became one of the ministers of St. Paul's alley near Barbican. A meeting upon the disputed subject of baptism, took place between Wall and Gale, but though each endeavored to convince the other, both parted dissatisfied, and Wall published soon after in 1719, his Defence of the History of Infant Baptism, which was so highly respected that the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D.D. To this defence it is said that Gale prepared an answer, which death prevented him from completing. He died of a fever Dec. 1721, aged 42. Besides the book already mentioned, Gale published some sermons, 4 vols. of which appeared in a second edition, 8vo. 1726. He was in private life a respectable character, much esteemed by bishops Hoadly and Bradford, and by chancellor King.

GALE, Theophilus, a learned English divine, born 1623, at King's Teignton, Devonshire, where his father was vicar. He entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, in 1647, and in 1649, in consequence of his great proficiency in literature, he was presented with his degree of bachelor in arts. In 1650 he was chosen fellow of his college, and became an active tutor. He afterwards became a popular preacher and settled at Winchester, but at the restoration he was ejected from his fellowship for refusing to conform, and in 1662 attended as tutor to the two sons of lord Wharton to Caen university in Normandy. He returned in 1665, and the following year saw the city of London in flames, but in the midst of the general calamity he had the good fortune to find his papers saved from the conflagration, and "the Court of the Gentiles" was destined to appear before the public. He assisted Rowe in the ministry of his congregation in Holborn, and succeeded him in 1677, and then took a few private pupils at Newington. He died March 1678, and as a proof of his attachment to the non-conformists, he left his property to trustees for the education of students in his own persuasion, and he also bequeathed his library for the promotion of the same principles in New England. Besides his Court of the Gentiles published in four parts, between 1669 and 1677, in which he proved that the theology and philosophy of the pagans were derived from the holy scriptures, he wrote "the True Idea of Jansenism," 4to. 1669—the Anatomy of Infidelity, &c. 8vo.—a Summary of the two Covenants, and other tracts.

GALE, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, born 1636, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and M.A. 1662. His great abilities recommended him to be professor of Greek in the university, and in 1672 he was elected master of St. Paul's school, and had the honor to receive a handsome present of plate from the city, for writing the inscription on the monument which records the conflagration of London. In 1676, he became prebendary of St. Paul's, and was made member of the Royal society in consequence of his presenting that learned body some curiosities, especially a Roman urn with ashes, found at Peckham in Surrey. After presiding with great popularity and national advantage over his school for 25 years, he was made dean of York in 1697, and showed his liberality by not only presenting the new library of his college with five Arabic MSS. but by improving the cathedral, and displaying the hospitality of a virtuous and noble minded dignitary. He died at his deanery, 8th April, 1702, aged 67. Though engaged the best part of life in active and laborious employments, he yet devoted much of his time to literature and classical learning. He published in 1671, the Greek Mythologic Authors, Ethic and Physical—Historiæ Poeticæ Scriptores, 1675—Rhetores Selecti, Gr. and Lat. 1676—Jamblicus, &c. 1678—Herodoti Historia, Gr. and Lat. 1679—Cicero's works, 2 vols. folio, 1681, and 4—Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores quinque, 1687, fol.—Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicae, Ang. Danicæ Scriptores quindecim, 1691, fol. and other works.

GALE, Roger, F.R. and A.S.S, son of the dean, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1697. He was a man of large property, and represented North Allerton in three parliaments, and was commissioner of excise. He was the first president of the Antiquarian society, and treasurer to the Royal Society. He was considered as one of the most learned and polite scholars of the age. He died at Scruton 25th June, 1744, aged 72. He published Antonini Iter Britanniarum Commentariis Illustratum, T. G. 1709, 4to.—the Knowledge of Medals, by F. Jobert, translated from the French, and other works. He left his MSS. to Trinity college, Cambridge, and his cabinet of Roman coins to the public library there.

GALE, Benjamin, a physician, graduated at Yale college in 1733. He was an eminent physician and agriculturist, and was deeply concerned also in politics. He invented the drill plough; he wrote a dissertation on the prophecies; he published a treatise on the inoculation for the small pox. His method of a preparatory course of mercury was commended in England. In the transactions of the royal society vol. 55, he published hist. memoirs on inoculation, and account of the cure by salt of the bite of the rattlesnake. He died at Killingsworth, the town in which he first settled, in 1790, aged 75.

GALEN, Bernard Van, a native of Westphalia, known as a bishop and as a general. He was originally in the service of the elector of Cologne, and then took orders and became canon, and then bishop of Munster, but when the pope refused to confirm his elevation, he determined to secure his power by having a garrison of soldiers devoted to his own interest. The citizens in vain interfered, Galen was resolved to have recourse to arms, but hostilities were suspended, and his attention was drawn to the war against the Turks, in which he had an important command. In this however he did not engage, but in 1665, he attacked the United States. Though pacified by the interference of France, he again, in 1672, formed a league with England and France, against the States, and afterwards directed his arms against Sweden, in conjunction with Denmark, and distinguished himself in this war, as he had done before, by great valor, but not unmingled with cruelty. He died 19th Sept. 1678, aged 74, little regretted by his people, whom his ambition and intrigues had contributed to render dissatisfied and unhappy.

GALERIUS, Caius Valerius Maximianus, a Roman emperor, was a native of Dacia, and kept flocks when a boy, whence he acquired the surname of Armentarius. Entering into the army, he raised himself to the highest ranks by his courage, and was adopted by Diocletian, who gave him his daughter in marriage. Among his subsequent exploits was the defeat of the Persians. He ascended the imperial throne A.D., 305, and died in 311. Galerius was of a cruel disposition, and a violent persecutor of the Christians.

GALHEGOS, Mannel de, a Portuguese poet, was born, in 1597, at Lisbon; was patronised by the duke of Olivares, and loaded with honors at the court of Philip IV.; and died in 1665. He was the friend of Lopez de Vega, by whom he was highly praised in the Laurel of Apollo. Galhegos is the author of Gigantomachia, a poem; The Temple of Memory, a poem; a volume of poems; and a great number of dramatic pieces.

GALIANI, Ferdinand, a noble writer, born at Chieti, in Abruzzi, and educated under his uncle the archbishop of Tarento. In 1750 he published his work on Money and Specie, in consequence of the scarcity of cash in the two Sicilies, and in 1772 appeared his Catalogue of Stones found near Vesuvius, which he presented to Benedict XIV., with this inscription on one of the boxes which contained the collection: Beatissime pater, fac ut lapides isti fiant panes. The witty sentence procured a living from the pope, and Galiani, in 1759, was sent as secretary to the embassy at Paris, where his genius and his talents were seen and admired by the French literati. He returned, in 1779, from Paris, and died at Naples 1787. Besides his anonymous dialogues on the corn trade, written while at Paris, and which possessed merit, he published a Commentary on Horace, and a treatise on the Duties of Princes towards belligerent powers.

GALIGAI, Eleonora, the wife of Concini, marshal D'Ancre, was daughter of a joiner and a washerwoman in Italy. She was foster-sister to Mary of Medici, who loved her with strong affection, and to this partiality were owing her greatness and misfortunes. She came to France with her patroness, and though her features were plain and even disgusting, she married Concini. In this elevated situation, she did not show that moderation and self-command which her great powers of mind seemed to promise. She was haughty and imperious, and by her conduct soon gave offence to Louis XIII., the son of her partial mistress, who, with the cruelty of those barbarous times, caused her husband to be assassinated, and herself to be brought to trial, though no crime but that of being a favorite and of governing the queen, could be proved against her. She was charged with sorcery; and when questioned by what magic she had so fascinated her mistress, she made this well known answer, "By that power which strong minds naturally possess over the weak." She was condemned in May, and the July following 1617, she was executed. She had a son and daughter; the daughter died young, and the son returned to Italy to enjoy the vast possessions which his mother's good fortune had heaped together.

GALILEI, Galileo, an illustrious philosopher, the son of Vincent Galilei, a Florentine nobleman of talent, was born, in 1564, at Florence. His dislike to the medical profession, for which he was designed, was so great, that his father allowed him to desist from preparing for it, and to study the mathematics. So rapidly did he attain a proficiency in his favorite science that, at the age of twenty-four, he was appointed mathematical professor at Pisa. His dislike of the Aristotelian philosophy, however, raised him up so many enemies, that, in 1592, he resigned the chair at Pisa, and accepted the professorship at Padua, in which he continued for eighteen years. Cosmo III., at last invited him back to Pisa, and, soon after, called him to Florence, with the title of principal mathematician and philosopher to the grand duke. In 1609, Galileo was informed of the invention of the telescope, and he immediately constructed one for himself, with which he proceeded to explore the heavens. With this instrument he discovered four satellites of Jupiter, the phases of Venus, the starry nature of the milky way, the hills and valleys of the moon, and the spots on the solar disk, from the motion of which he inferred the rotation of the sun. The result of his discoveries was, to convince him of the truth of the Copernican system, and the consequence of this conviction was, that he was twice persecuted by the Inquisition, in 1615 and 1633, on a charge of heresy. On both occasions he was compelled to abjure the system of Copernicus; in the last instance, after having repeated the abjuration, he is said to have stamped his foot on the earth, and said, in a low tone, "it moves, nevertheless." Galileo was blind for about three years before his death. He died January 8, 1642. Besides what has been already mentioned, Galileo discovered the gravity of the air, invented the cycloid and the simple pendulum, and was the first who clearly explained the doctrine of motion. His works form two volumes quarto.

GALISSONNTERE, Rolland Michael Barria marquis, a French admiral, born at Rochefort, 11th Nov. 1693. After serving with distinction in the navy, he was made governor of Canada 1745, and in 1756 he had a severe engagement near Minorca with the English fleet under Byng. He died the same year at Nemours, 17th Oct. deservedly respected by the nation for bravery, humanity, and benevolence.

GALL, John Joseph, a celebrated physiologist, the founder of the science now called phrenology, was born, in 1753, at a village in the duchy of Baden; studied at Baden, Bruchsal, and Strasburg; was for a considerable period a physician at Vienna; but, in consequence of the Austrian government having prevented the exposition of his new doctrines there, he travelled through the north of Germany, Sweden, and Denmark, delivering lectures; and settled at Paris, in 1807, where he died August 22, 1828. The system of Gall, which has since been developed by Spurzheim, assumes that each faculty of the mind has a separate organ in the brain, and that those organs are marked externally by elevations on the cranium.

GALLAND, Antony, a French antiquary, born of poor parents at Rollo, in Picardy, 1646. He was educated at Noyon and Paris, and in consequence of his great knowledge of the Hebrew and the oriental languages, he was sent to travel in the East by Colbert, and at his return he enriched the literature of his country by his publications. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, and professor of Arabic at Paris, where he died 1715. He published a Collection of Maxims and Bon Mots from oriental writers—a treatise on the Origin of Coffee—an Account of the Death of the Sultan Osman,—Arabian Nights' Entertainments, and some curious dissertations on medals.

GALLITZIN, Basil, a noble Russian, in great favor with the regent princess Sophia during the minority of the Czars Peter I., and Ivan, who reigned jointly. He was unfortunate in his military expeditions against the Tartars, and his influence was greatly diminished. When the princess regent was discovered in her secret intrigues to destroy the Czar Peter, and to raise her favorite to the throne by marrying him, she was confined to a monastery near Moscow, and Gallitzin banished to Kargapol, in Siberia. He afterwards recovered his liberty, and retired to a monastery, where he died in great austerity 1713, at the age of 80. Though unsuccessful in his ambitious views, he was a man of great merit, whose attention introduced improvement and civilization into the Russian empire, and prepared the way for the illustrious reign of Peter the Great.

GALLITZIN, Michael Michaelowitz, prince of, of the same family as the preceding, was born 1674, and distinguished himself under Peter the Great against Charles XII., of Sweden. He commanded 10 years in Finland, and concluded the peace of Neustadt. He died 1730, field-marshal, and president of the college of war, and highly respected as an able minister and meritorious general. At the victory of Lerna he asked only the pardon of one of the captives for the reward of his services.

GALLOIS, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1632. He was well acquainted with the ancient and modern languages, and of such universal information and splendid talents that he engaged with de Sallo in the conducting of the Journal des Sçavans, a periodical paper, which, from its commencement, Jan. 5th, 1665, has, under various names, and under different revolutions and characters, claimed the public attention. Gallois was patronized by Colbert, whom he instructed in Latin, chiefly in his coach, as he travelled between Versailles and Paris. He was made member of the academy of sciences 1668, and of the French academy 1673, and after his patron's death, librarian to the king, and then, Greek professor of the Royal college. He died of the dropsy 1707, and in 1710 a catalogue of his books was printed, consisting of upwards 14,000 volumes.

GALLONIO, Antonio, an ecclesiastic at Rome, known for his writings on the saints, martyrs, and holy virgins, and especially his work which describes the various cruelties exercised on primitive martyrs, with plates, 1594, in 4to. He died 1605.

GALLOWAY, Joseph, an eminent lawyer in Pennsylvania, was a member of the assembly of that province in May 1764, when the subject of a petition in favor of a change of the government, from that of a proprietary to a royal government was discussed. John Dickinson was opposed to the petition and Mr. Galloway answered his speech with much warmth. After having been some time speaker of the house of assembly, he was appointed a member of the first congress in 1774. He afterwards deserted the American cause, joining the British at New York in Dec. 1776, and remained with the army till June 1773. His counsels and exertions were of little avail against the resolute spirit of millions, determined to be free. By his own account he abandoned an estate of the value of 40,000*l.* In 1779 he was examined before the house of commons on the transactions in America, and his representation did not do much credit to the British commander. He died in England 1803, aged 73. He published a number of political pamphlets, among them,—observations on the conduct of sir William Howe; a letter to Howe on his naval conduct; letters to a nobleman on the conduct of the war in the middle colonies 1779; reply to the observations of Gen. Howe; cool thoughts on the consequences of American independence; candid examination of the claims of Great Britain and her colonies; reflections on the American rebellion; he also published brief commentaries upon such parts of the revelation and other prophecies, as immediately refer to the present times, London, 1780.

GALLY, Henry, D.D. was born at Beckenham, Kent, August 1696, and educated at Benet's college, Cambridge. In 1721 he was made lecturer of St. Paul's Covent-Garden, and rector of Wanden, Bucks, and in 1728 he was presented to a prebend of Gloucester by King, lord chancellor, to whom he was chaplain. He afterwards had a prebend at Norwich, and became rector of Ashton, Northamptonshire, and St. Giles' in the Fields, and in 1735 chaplain to the king. He died Aug. 7th, 1769. He wrote some sermons, besides the Characters of Theophrastus, translated from the Greek, with notes—a dissertation against pronouncing the Greek language according to Accents, 1754, 8vo. and a second dissertation on the same subject, 8vo.

GALVANI, Lewis, an eminent physiologist, born at Bologna. He studied medicine under Galeazzi, whose daughter he married, and in 1762 he began to give lectures in anatomy in his native city. He accidentally discovered, while preparing broth from frogs for his sick wife, that the muscles of these animals were thrown into convulsion by the touch of a dissecting knife, and exhibited all the appearance of the electric shock. The subject was accurately examined by the patient philosopher, and upon incontrovertible grounds he proved that the nerves of all animals are thus powerfully acted upon, and he had the honor of giving his name by this important discovery to this new system of physiology. His observations were communicated to the world in his treatise de Viribus Electricitatis in Motu musculari Commentarius, 1691, and the subject afterwards engaged the attention of Valli, Fowler, Aldini, and especially Volta, who introduced very great improvements in the system. After the death of his wife, in 1790, Galvani became a prey to severe melancholy, and died 1798, aged 61.

GALVANO, Antony, a native of the East-Indies, governor of the Moluccas. He was prudent and vigorous in his administration, and cleared the sea of pirates, but he reduced himself so much by his liberality that he returned poor to Europe, and not meeting with the treatment which he deserved from John III. king of Portugal, he died in an hospital at Lisbon 1557.

GAMA, Vasco, or Vasquez de, an illustrious Portuguese, born at Sines, on the sea-coast of Portugal, immortalized as the discoverer of a passage to the East-Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. He set sail from the Tagus 8th July, 1497, with four ships, and though his expedition was considered as most perilous, he boldly encountered the storms of the African coast, and the more dangerous mutiny of his followers, and on the 20th November doubled the cape, which hitherto had been called the Cape of Tempests, and proceeded as far as Calicut. He redoubled the cape April, 1499, and returned home after an absence of two years and nearly two months, and was loaded with honors due to his merit and services. In 1502 he again visited the East-Indies, with twenty ships, as admiral of the eastern seas, and returned September 1503, with thirteen ships richly laden. Under John III. he was appointed viceroy of India, and for the third time returned to the country and fixed the seat of government at Cochin, but he unfortunately died soon after, 24th December 1525. He was a man of the greatest intrepidity and the most persevering courage, but he also possessed in a very eminent degree the virtues of private life and for a while forgot his ambition and his fame in deploring the death of his brother and companion, Paulus de Gama. His adventures have been immortalized by the poem of Camoens, called "the Lusiad" translated into English by Mickle.

GAMACHES, Stephen Simon, a member of the French academy of sciences, who died at Paris 1756, aged 84. He was author of Physical Astronomy, 2 vols. 4to.—Literary and Philosophical Dissertations, 8vo.—System of the Heart—the Elegancies of Language reduced to their Principles, a valuable book.

GAMACHES, Philip de, author of 2 vols. of Commentaries on the Summa of Aquinas, was divinity professor in Paris university, and ably defended the Gallican church against the encroachments of the papal power. He died at Paris 1625.

GAMAGE, William, M.D. a physician in Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1802, and died 1813, aged 37. He published several articles in the New England journal of medicine, and some account of the fever of 1817, and 1818, with remarks on typhus.

GAMBIER, James, Lord, Admiral, long a distinguished officer in the British navy, and the commander of the fleet which took possession of the Danish navy in 1807. His grandfather was a French refugee, who left France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He was president of the church Missionary Society, and was characterized by great piety and benevolence. He died, April 19, 1832, leaving no heirs; and the peerage is extinct.

GAMBOLD, John, a native of Haverford-west, educated at Christ church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. A. 1734. He was on the presentation of Secker, vicar of Stanton Harcourt, and wrote there "the Martyrdom of Ignatius," a tragedy, 1740, and in 1742 edited at the Oxford press, the New Testament, after Milles. He joined in 1743 the united Moravian brethren, and was for many years their minister in Neville's court, Fetterlane. He was consecrated bishop of his fraternity at the synod 1754, and in 1765 he established a congregation at Coothill in Ireland. He died in his native town, Sept. 13, 1771, and though an enthusiast he was universally respected for his learning and information, and for his inoffensive manners. He wrote several things for the use of his Moravian brethren, besides a Character of count Zinzendorf—16 Discourses on the second Article of the Creed—and the History of Greenland, translated from the Dutch.

GANDON, James, an eminent architect, a native of England, was a pupil of Sir William Chambers, and was the first who received the architectural gold medal of the Royal Academy. He went to Ireland, and resided there for many years, till his decease, in 1824, at the age of eighty-two. Gandon designed the court houses of Nottingham and Waterford; the Custom House, the Four Courts, and the portico of the House of Lords, at Dublin; and many other elegant structures. The concluding part of the Vitruvius Britannicus was edited by him.

GANO, John, minister in New York, collected the first baptist society in that city, and was ordained its pastor in 1762. Early espousing the cause of his country in the contest with Great Britain, at the commencement of the war he joined the standard of freedom in the capacity of chaplain. His preaching contributed to impart a determined spirit to the soldiers, and he continued in the army till the conclusion of the war. He left his society in New York in 1788, and removed to Kentucky. He died 1804, aged 77. Memoirs of his life, written principally by himself, were published in 1806.

GANSEVOORT, Peter, Jun. a distinguished officer in the army of the United States, was born at Albany, July 19th, 1749, of a highly respectable family. In 1775 he was appointed by congress a major in the second New York regiment, and in August of that year joined the army under Montgomery, which invaded Canada. In March, 1776, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in November appointed to the colonelcy of the third regiment, and assigned the command of Fort George. In April, 1777, he was transferred to the command of Fort Stanwix, at Rome, and gallantly defended it against the British, under St. Leger, who, after besieging it from the 2d to the 22d of August, retreated. By preventing the co-operation of that general with Burgoyne, he contributed most essentially to the embarrassment and defeat of the latter, and obtained the distinguished applause of the country. In 1781 the state of New York appointed him a brigadier-general, and he continued in that rank till the close of the war. He afterwards filled a number of respectable offices, among which were, commission of Indian affairs and for fortifying the frontiers, military agent, and brigadier general in the United States' service, which appointment he received in 1809, and held till his death, July 2d, 1812. He was an eminently brave and skilful officer, discharged the duties of the several stations which he filled with intelligence and fidelity, and was greatly respected and esteemed in private life.

GARASSE, Francis, a jesuit, born at Angoulême 1535. He displayed his genius by his publication of the elegies on the death of Henry IV. and in a poem in heroic verse addressed to Louis XIII. on his inauguration. As a preacher he was very eloquent and popular, but he aspired to the public admiration by the force and consequence of his writings. In his style he was violent and scurrilous, and his "Horoscope of Anti-Cotton," and his "Calvinistic Elixir," were proofs of the virulence and buffoonery with which he defended his order against the attacks of his enemies. In 1620 he published "Rabelais Reformed," and afterwards in other publications attacked the ghost of Pasquier, an affront which was severely resented by the indignant sons of this reverend father. His "Somme Theologique des Verités Capitales de la Religion Chretienne," published 1625, first raised the torch of dissension and hatred between the jesuits and Jansenists. The book was attacked by the abbot of St. Cyran, and in 1626, the rector of the Sorbonne complained to his society of the evil tendencies of a composition which recommended heretical opinions, and abounded in false quotations from scripture. Garasse was in consequence of this, after a solemn examination censured, but the virulence and animosity which had been excited between the two orders continued to be displayed on both sides with increasing violence. Though supported by the jesuits in the dispute, Garasse was banished to one of their houses at some distance from Paris. During the pestilence which raged at Poitiers, he showed himself charitably active in the relief of the infected, and fell a victim to the contagion, 14th June, 1631.

GARAT, Peter John, an eminent French composer, was born, about 1763, at Bordeaux, and died at Paris, in 1823. Like some other celebrated musicians, he displayed the natural bent of his genius even in infancy; as, before he was able to speak, he repeated the tunes which were sung by his nurse. He was music master to the queen of France.

The melodies of several of his songs are much admired.

GARCILASSO, or GARCIAS LASSO DE LA VEGA, a Spanish poet, born of a noble family at Toledo, 1500. He was educated under the eye of Charles V. who patronised and esteemed him, and he distinguished himself as much by his valor as by his poetry. After accompanying Charles in his campaigns in Germany, Africa, and Provence, he received a wound on the head from a stone thrown from a tower, when at the head of a battalion, and died three weeks after at Nice, in his 36th year. To his genius and his labors the poetry of the Spaniards is greatly indebted. His works are written not only in elegant language, but with true poetic fire, and his odes are said by Paul Jovius to equal those of Horace in sweetness. His works were published with learned notes by Franc. Sanchez, Naples, 1664, in 3vo. There was another Spaniard of the same name, born at Cusco, who wrote the History of Florida, of Peru, and of the Incas.

GARDEN, Alexander, an episcopal minister, was a native of Scotland, and came to America about 1720. He died 1756, aged 70. He was the commissary of the bishop of London for the Carolinas, Georgia and the Bahama islands. He published six letters to Mr. Whitefield 1740: doctrine of justification vindicated, two sermons, 1742.

GARDEN, Alexander, D.D., F.R.S., a physician. He came to America in 1750, and settled in Charleston South Carolina, and continued in practice there thirty years. In 1793, he returned to Europe, and died in London 1791, aged 63. He was much devoted to the study of natural history, particularly of botany, and during his residence in America made a number of communications on those subjects to his philosophical friends in Europe. In compliment to him the greatest botanist of the age gave the name of Gardenia to one of the most beautiful flowering shrubs in the world. He introduced into medical use the Virginia pink root as a vermifuge, and published in 1794, an account of its medical, with a botanical description; a second edition 1772.

GARDINER, Stephen, bishop of Winchester, was the illegitimate son of Lionel Woodville, bishop of Salisbury, and brother to Elizabeth the queen of the fourth Edward. He was born at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, 1483, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where his progress in classical literature, and in civil and canon law was very rapid. His introduction into the Norfolk family, and afterwards into the service of Wolsey, soon rendered him a favorite at court. In the business of the divorce he was sent in 1527, to Rome, where he warmly espoused the cause of his sovereign, and when he found that the pope was inexorable, he turned his attention to procure the dismissal of the virtuous Catherine, without paying any respect to the opinion of the papal court. For his services he was made secretary of state, and in 1531, raised to the see of Winchester. He went afterwards as ambassador to the French court, and when Henry broke off his dependence on the papal see, the new bishop evinced his acquiescence in the bold measure by defending it in his tract de Verâ Obedientiâ. After various employments of confidence and honor, he was at last directed by Henry to draw up articles on an accusation of heresy, against his last wife Catherine Parr, but the devoted queen had the art to avert the storm from her own head upon that of Gardiner, who ever after continued in disgrace with the king. Under Edward VI. he showed himself averse to the introduction of the reformation, and though threatened and imprisoned, he still persevered in his opposition. Under Mary he was restored to his bishopric from which he had been deprived, and he was raised to the high office of lord chancellor and of prime minister. He died 12th Nov. 1555, aged 72. In his private character he was not without some good qualities. He was learned and promoted the cause of learning. That he possessed ambition, the history of his life sufficiently proves, and that he was not unskilled in art and dissimulation is strongly evident from the greatness with which he supported his measures in the midst of jarring factions, and opposite religions.

GARDINER, Sylvester, an American physician, born, 1717, in Rhode Island. He studied his profession in France and England; and, then, on returning to his native country, established himself in Boston as a practitioner of medicine, and a druggist. His success was such, that he acquired great wealth, which enabled him to connect himself with the Plymouth land association, and to purchase large tracts of land in Maine. At the commencement of the revolution he left the country, taking with him only 400 pounds. His lands, amounting to about 100,000 acres, were confiscated under the new government, and sold at auction. It was, however, subsequently ascertained, that there had been in the transaction, some legal informality; and, his heirs, in consequence thereof, were re-invested with the property. Upon the close of the war he returned to Newport, where he resided till his death, which took place, Aug. 8, 1786, being 63 years of age. Dr. Gardiner sustained a good reputation through life, and was distinguished for his social virtues. In his will he bequeathed ten acres of land and a small sum of money for the support of an Episcopal church in the town of Gardiner, Me. His munificence, in this act, has been the means of sustaining one of the most respectable parishes belonging to that communion in the state.

GARDINER, John, a son of the preceding, was born in Boston, Mass. about the year 1791; was sent to England to complete his education; studied law at the Inner Temple; and was admitted to practice in the courts of Westminster Hall. He was an intimate associate at this time with Churchill, the poet, and John Wilkes, the reformer, in whose cause, at the time politics ran high, he appeared as junior counsel, and attracted the notice of Lord Mansfield, who expressed a high opinion of his natural endowments for eminence in his profession, although his political connections were not such as to secure his lordship's favor, or his own rapid advancement. He practised a short time in the Welch Circuit with success and then married a Miss Harris of respectable family in South Wales; but being impatient to get at once into lucrative practice he procured the appointment of Attorney General at the Island of St. Christophers in the West Indies, whither he removed with his family about the year 1765. He practised law with great success in the islands of St. Christophers and Jamaica, until the termination of the American Revolution by the peace of 1783, when he removed with his family to his native town. After practising law in Boston for two or three years with much celebrity, he removed in 1786, to an estate left by his father at Pownelborough in the then District of Maine, where he also practised law, and whence he was sent as representative to the Massachusetts legislature, from the year 1759, to his death, which happened by the loss of a packet in which he took passage for Boston for the purpose of attending the General court, in 1793—4. In the legislature he obtained the name of the Law Reformer, in consequence of the zeal and eloquence with which he advocated several important changes in our laws. One was the abolition of special pleading, in which he failed. Others, in which he was successful, were the repeal of the law of primogeniture, by which the eldest son used to inherit in Massachusetts a double portion; the enactment of the statutes, for the more easy breaking of entailments; and, the repeal of the laws against theatrical representations. On the latter subject he made a speech very celebrated for the learned account which it gave of the Grecian and Roman theatre, which he afterwards published in a small octavo volume. He was a thorough republican and a violent whig in politics; and in religion was an unitarian, in consequence of which he took a leading part in the alteration of the Liturgy of King's Chapel, Boston, and other changes by which that became a Unitarian Congregational Society. He had an astonishing memory, was an admirable belles lettres scholar, learned in his profession, and particularly distinguished for wit and eloquence.

GARDINER, John Sylvester John, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church Boston, Ms. was born at Haverford West, in South Wales, in June 1765, and was carried by his father soon after to the West Indies. Thence at about five years of age he was sent to his grand father, Dr. Sylvester Gardiner, in Boston, for education. There he was instructed in the first rudiments of classical learning by Master Lovell, a distinguished teacher in those days. But shortly before the commencement of the American revolutionary war he was removed to England, and placed under the care of the celebrated Dr. Parr, in whose family he lived, and by whom his education was wholly directed until he had attained the age of eighteen. He then rejoined his father in the West Indies, and removed with him to Boston in 1783. Then for a short time he pursued the study of law, which however he finally relinquished for divinity. Being strongly attached to the English church, he was ordained Deacon in 1783, and was soon after settled over the parish of St. Helena, near Beaufort, S. Carolina. Thence he removed in 1791, in consequence of the unhealthiness of the climate; took Priest's orders; and was settled assistant minister of Trinity Church, Boston. In 1804-5 he succeeded his late colleague, Bishop Parker, as Rector of that Church, in which he remained till his death. This happened at Harrowgate in England, to which country he had gone for the benefit of his health, in July 1830. While assistant minister he kept a school for the instruction of boys in classical learning, and he continued to take a few pupils for many years after he became rector. He received the honorary degree of A. M. from Harvard college in 1803, and that of D.D., from the University of Pennsylvania in 1813. His school was greatly celebrated for the accuracy with which he taught the rudiments of the Greek and Latin languages, and the love of the classics with which he inspired his pupils. He was distinguished for pulpit eloquence, and was much beloved by his people. His reading of the Church service was exceeding good, and by many considered superior to that of any American clergyman of his time. As a classical and belles lettres scholar he stood in the first rank; as he did also for the ease, spirit, and good taste of his literary compositions. He was president of the Literary club which for a number of years conducted the Boston Anthology and Monthly Review, to which he contributed much, chiefly in light literature and criticism. He had a happy talent in poetry, particularly of the humorous kind, and his powers of satire were often called out against bad taste in literature, and the extravagancy of the visionary. Adding to strong powers of mind and especially a remarkable memory, the advantages of a highly finished classical education under so able and learned an instructor as Dr. Parr, being a deep read scholar as well as divine, and coming to America at a time when so great a portion of her scholars and learned men had seceded to the mother country, and when education and literary taste were at their lowest ebb, perhaps no individual contributed more than he did, by his services as a schoolmaster, preacher, writer, and reviewer to revive the taste for classical learning, and letters. The Boston Anthology and Monthly Review long gave a tone to the literary taste of the day. Out of this periodical the North American Review may be said to have grown, and the splendid library of the Boston Athenæum, which originated in a collection of books by the Anthology club for its own use, to which Dr. Gardiner was the first, and one of the principal contributors. He left two daughters, and one son, William H. Gardiner, now fast rising in Boston to eminence in the legal profession.

GARDINER, George, a benefactor of Harvard college, was graduated in 1762, and was a merchant in Salem, where he died in 1773, bequeathing to the college 4,367 dollars for the education of poor scholars; he gave also $1466 to the poor of Salem, and $7,333 to the marine society for superannuated seamen. The legacies became due on the death of his brother Weld G. in Nov. 1801.

GARENGEOT, René, Jacques, Croissant de, a French surgeon, born at Vitri 1688. He was royal lecturer on surgery at Paris, and fellow of the London royal society, and he acquired great celebrity by the success of his operations, and the ingenious and valuable works which he wrote on his profession. He died at Paris 1759. His works are a Treatise on Surgical Operations, 2 vols. 8vo. —on Surgical Instruments, 2 vols. 12mo. and the Anatomy of the Viscera, 12mo.

GARLANDE, Jean de, a grammarian, born at Garlande en Brie in Normandy. The best known of his works are "a poem on the contempt of the World."—Floretus, on the Doctrines of faith;—Facetus on the duties of Men towards God.—Dictionarium Artis Alchymie 1571, Basle. He was living in 1581, and as he passed much of his time in England, with William of Normandy, some have imagined that he was an Englishman.

GARNET, Henry, known as one of the conspirators in the gunpowder plot, was born in England, and educated at Winchester school, from whence he went to Rome, and in 1575, took the habit of the Jesuits. In 1586, he returned home as the provincial of his order, and began by secret intrigues to plot the overthrow of the religion of the country. By impiously asserting that the innocent might be involved in the destruction of the guilty, to establish his plans, he encouraged his associates in the forwarding of that dreadful plot which was prevented by a happy discovery. He was in consequence sent to the Tower and hanged for high treason, at the west end of St. Paul's, May 3, 1606. Though deservedly punished for his meditated crimes, yet he passed as a martyr among the catholic enthusiasts.

GARNET, Thomas, a physician, was born, in 1766, at Casterton, in Westmoreland; took his degree at Edinburgh; and, after having practised in various parts of the country, was about to depart to America, when the success of a course of lectures at Liverpool induced him to remain in England. He became professor of chemistry of the Royal Institution; but died in 1802. He wrote A Tour through the Highlands; Outlines of Chemistry; and Zoonomia; and edited the Annals of Science.

GARNIER, John James, historiographer of France, and member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, was born, in 1729, at Goron, in the province of Maine, and died in 1805. Among other works, he produced the Man of Letters, two vols.; On the Origin of the French Government; a Treatise on Civil Education; and a Continuation of Volley's History of France.

GARNIER, Count Germain, a French statesman, was born, in 1721, at Auxerre; became prefect of the department of the Seine and Oise, and president of the Senate; and died in 1821. He translated various productions from the English, among which was Smith's Wealth of Nations; and wrote A History of Coinage, in two volumes; An Abridgment of the Elementary Principles of Political Economy; and other works.

GARRARD, James, governor of Kentucky from 1796 to 1804, was a native of Virginia, and an officer of the American revolution. He was among the first adventurous settlers of Kentucky. He died 1822, aged 78.

GARRICK, David, an illustrious English actor, born at Hereford, 20th February 1716. He was educated at Lichfield school, but was more attached to theatrical pursuits than learning, so that he acted with his fellow pupils the play of "the Recruiting Officer," and supported himself the character of sergeant Kite. He went afterwards to reside with his uncle, a wine merchant at Lisbon, but soon returned to Lichfield school, and after being six months the pupil and companion of Dr. Johnson, he accompanied him to London in 1735. The powers with which nature had endowed him were fostered and improved by the conversation and company of the most popular actors, but Garrick still diffident, flew from a London audience to Ipswich, where in 1741, he performed the part of Aboan in Oroonoko, under the assumed name of Eyddal. His efforts were received with repeated and increasing applause, and thus flushed with provincial approbation, he came to Goodman's fields, and acted Richard III., October 19th 1741. So superior were his abilities, and so powerful their display, that the other theatres were now left empty, and the house in Goodman's fields was daily crowded with all the beauty, the fashion, and the taste of the town. This success was viewed with envy by his rival heroes Quin and Cibber. By the influence of sir John Barnard, an act of parliament was obtained to shut up the theatre of Goodman's fields, so that Garrick, thus obliged to abandon a situation where he divided the profits with Giffard the manager, made an engagement with Fleetwood the patentee of Drury-lane for 500*l.* a year. Thus popular in England, Garrick passed to Dublin in the summer of 1742, and so prodigious were the numbers which assembled to view this theatrical phenomenon, that in consequence of the crowded houses and the intense heat of the weather, a contagious disorder fatally broke out in the town, which was called Garrick's fever. In 1747, he became joint patentee of Drury-lane with Lacy. In 1763, he went to Paris and Italy. While on the continent, Garrick was liberally condescending in exhibiting various characters, not only in the presence of the duke of Parma, but before his friends. He returned to London in April 1765, but so fearful was he of the public opinion, that with a timidity unworthy of his great character, he always endeavored to prevent censure, and on this occasion he caused, by means of a friend, to be published "The Sick Monkey," a poem in which, by drawing the censures of animals on himself and his travels, he attempted to blunt the edge of ridicule. In 1769, he projected and conducted the jubilee at Stratford, in honor of Shakspeare, which though admired on one side and ridiculed on the other, should be mentioned with commendation as the homage of a great man, to an immortal genius. By the death of Lacy in 1773, the whole management devolved on him, and now the fatigues of his situation were so great, and his infirmities were increasing so rapidly, that in June 1776, he left the stage, and disposed of his moiety to Sheridan, Linley, and Ford, for 35,000*l.* He died 20th Jan. 1779. Besides the display of his astonishing powers on the stage, Garrick merited the public approbation as a writer. The Biographia Dramatica mentions not less than 88 of his plays, some of which were original, and some translations, besides a great number of prologues, epilogues, songs, and elegies.

GARSAULT, Francis Alexander, a learned Frenchman, member of the academy of Sciences. He paid much attention to literature and the arts, and particularly to the history and character of the horse. He died at Paris of a paralytic stroke, November 1778, aged 85. He wrote the anatomy of the Horse, translated from the English of Snap, 4to.—le nouveau Parfait Marechal, a work of merit,—le Guide du Cavalier,—and Traité des Voitures.

GARTH, sir Samuel, an eminent physician and poet, born in Yorkshire, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.D., July 7th 1691. He settled in London, and was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1692. His assistance and influence were great in the dispute between the physicians and the apothecaries about the establishment of dispensaries, and he boldly supported the former, who with charitable zeal wished to administer to the relief of their fellow creatures gratis. Irritated at the obstinate conduct of the apothecaries, who violently opposed the benevolent plans of the college, he employed his pen to throw ridicule upon them, and in 1699, produced his "Dispensary," which in a few months went through three editions. The sixth edition of this popular piece appeared 1706, much improved with the episodes and inscriptions, but though it gained so much of the public attention, it wants something of poetical ardor, as Johnson has observed, and no longer supported by accidental and extrinsic popularity, it is now almost forgotten. In 1697, Dr. Garth spoke the annual Latin Speech on St. Luke's day; and in this he showed himself an elegant and refined scholar, and an able and eloquent orator. This high reputation recommended by polite manners, and agreeable conversation, soon placed Garth at the head of his profession. On the accession of George I., he was knighted with Marlborough's sword, and appointed king's physician in ordinary, and physician general to the army. This very humane and liberal minded physician died after a short illness 18th Jan. 1718-9. His death was universally lamented, and Pope, who loved and admired him, observed that if there ever was a good christian without knowing himself to be so, it was Dr. Garth. Besides his Dispensary he published "Claremont," on the villa of the duke of Newcastle, and other fugitive pieces, besides an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, a book to which he was very partial.

GARTHSHORE, Maxwell, a physician, was born, in 1732, at Kircudbright, in Scotland, of which place his father was the minister. At the age of fourteen he was placed with a surgeon and apothecary at Edinburgh, after which he entered into the medical service of the army. In 1756 he settled at Upingham in Rutlandshire, where he married. After continuing there seven years he removed to London, where he practised with great reputation near fifty years. He was physician to the British Lying-in-Hospital, and a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He died in 1812. Some of his papers are in the philosophical Transactions, and other Journals.

GASCOIGNE, sir William, chief justice under Henry IV., was born of a noble Norman family at Gawthorp in Yorkshire 1350. He was made king's sergeant 1398, and the next year judge of the common pleas, and in 1401 chief justice of the king's bench. He was commissioner to treat with those deluded subjects who had joined the rebellion of the earl of Northumberland, but when archbishop Scroop was taken in arms, he refused, at the repeated solicitations of Henry IV., to condemn him for treason, observing with undaunted firmness that neither the king nor his subjects could legally adjudge a bishop to death. His presence of mind and his great dignity were most nobly exhibited, when the prince of Wales, determined to rescue one of his servants who was arraigned before the king's bench, presumed to interrupt and even to strike the chief justice. Gascoigne supported the character of his station against the bold aggression, and committed the prince to the custody of the king's bench to await his father's pleasure. The king heard of the circumstance with becoming propriety, and thanked God "that he had given him a judge who knew how to administer, and a son who could obey justice." The venerable judge died soon after, 17th Dec. 1413.

GASSENDI, Peter, D.D., a justly celebrated French philosopher, was born, in 1592, at Chantersier, in Provence. So rapidly did he acquire knowledge, that at the age of sixteen he was capable of filling the professorship of rhetoric at Digne, and at twenty-one was chosen to fill the theological and philosophical chairs at the university of Aix. He resigned the latter in 1623, to give himself up wholly to his scientific pursuits. He travelled in France, Germany, and the Netherlands, to confer with men of science, and he carried on an extensive correspondence with the most learned and eminent of his contemporaries. In 1645 he was appointed regius professor of mathematics at Paris, and his lectures were exceedingly popular. He died in 1655. Gassendi was at once a theologian, metaphysician, philosopher, astronomer, naturalist, and mathematician; great in some of these sciences, and above mediocrity in all. His attacks on the philosophy of Aristotle gave it a severe shock, but raised up against him a host of bitter enemies. His works were collected, in six folio volumes, by Sorbriere.

GAST, John, D.D., a native of Dublin, descended from a French protestant family. He was educated at Dublin college, and from the curacy of St. John's church he became rector of Arklow, which he afterwards exchanged in 1775 for St. Nicholas without Dublin. He also obtained the archdeaconry of Glandelagh, and the living of Newcastle, and died 1788, aged 73. He published in 1753 the Rudiments of Grecian History, a work of merit.

GASTRELL, Francis, D.D., an English prelate, born at Slapton, in Northamptonshire, about 1662, and educated at Westminster school, and Christchurch, Oxford. He was preacher at Lincoln's inn, and Boyle's lecturer, and he distinguished himself not only by his eloquence in the pulpit, but by his writings in defence of the Christian religion. In 1700, he became chaplain to Harley, speaker of the Commons, and in 1702, was appointed canon of Christ's church, Oxford. In 1711, he was chaplain to the queen, and in 1714, he was raised to the see of Chester, with permission to retain his canonry. Though popular under the administration of queen Anne, Gastrell became obnoxious to the ministers of George the I.; but though he disliked the arbitrary manners and haughty temper of Atterbury, he boldly opposed the proceedings against him, and censured the conduct of his accusers, as too violent, acrimonious, and uncharitable. He died of the gout, 24th Nov. 1725. He is well known for his considerations concerning the Trinity, and "Remarks on the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, by Dr. Samuel Clarke," besides "the Christian Institutes, or the Sincere Word of God," a useful performance, first published 1707, and his defence of the Christian Religion, against the deists, preached at Boyle's lectures, and afterwards digested into a continued discourse, 1699.

GATAKER, Thomas, an English divine, born 1574. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. After being tutor, and chaplain to the families of Ayloff, and sir William Cook, he was appointed 1601, preacher of Lincoln's inn. In 1620, he travelled into the low countries, and every where distinguished himself as an able preacher, and an active opponent of the popish tenets. As a writer he excited the public attention by his "Discourse on the Nature and Use of Lots, a treatise historical and theological 1619, 4to." and by his defence of it 1623, and so high was his reputation that, on the removal of Dr. Comber, he was offered the mastership of Trinity college, Cambridge, which his infirm health did not permit him to accept. He was one of the assembly of divines who met at Westminster, concerning justification, and other theological subjects, and though he declared strongly in favor of episcopacy, he signed the covenant, in obedience to the sense of the majority of his brethren. He was a sufferer by the violence of the times, yet when his parishioners refused to pay him the composition which they had agreed in lieu of the tithes, he bore the disappointment with patience, and turned his attention to literary pursuits. He died 1654, aged 80. He was a man who, to extensive erudition, united great moderation, and benevolent principles. He opposed strongly in the reigns of James, and Charles I. the high notions of church-men, and deprecated the fatal consequences which he foresaw would fall on the government, and on the church. As a critic, and a writer, he was highly respected, and Salmasius, Axenius, Colomies and others, bear honorable testimony to his abilities. He was one of the divines who wrote Annotations on the Bible, especially Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Lamentations, and Calamy has observed that no commentator ancient or modern, is entitled to higher praise. He wrote besides "Marcus Antoninus's Meditations, with a discourse on the Philosophy of the Stoics, and a Commentary," 1697—"Opera Critica," Utrecht, fol. 1663, and he was besides engaged in a controversy with Lilly, the astrologer, in which more learning, and more animosity were shown than became the subject.

GATES, Horatio, a major general in the army of the United States during the American revolutionary war. In early life he entered the British army, and laid the foundation of his future military excellence. He was aid to gen. Monkton at the capture of Martinico; and after the peace of Aix la Chapelle, he was among the first troops which landed at Halifax under general Cornwallis. He was with Braddock at the time of his defeat in 1755, and was shot through the body. When peace was concluded, he purchased an estate in Virginia, where he resided till the commencement of the American war in 1775. He was appointed by congress adjutant general with the rank of brigadier general. He accompanied Washington to Cambridge. In June 1776, he was appointed to the command of the army of Canada. The success which attended his arms in the capture of Burgoyne filled America with joy. Congress passed a vote of thanks, and ordered a medal of gold to be presented to him by the president. His conduct towards his conquered enemy was marked by a delicacy, which does him the highest honor. He did not permit his own troops to witness the mortification of the British in depositing their arms. After general Lincoln was taken prisoner he was appointed to the command of the southern department. He was defeated by Cornwallis at Camden. He was superseded by gen. Greene, but was afterwards restored to his command. He died 1806, aged 77.

GATIMOSIN, the last of Mexican kings, was nephew to Montezuma. He was cruelly tortured in a fiery ordeal by Cortez and the Spaniards who wished to discover his treasures, and three years after, he was ignominiously hanged in his capital, with many of his caciques, in the sight of his subjects, 1526.

GAUBIL, Anthony, a French missionary in China, where he resided 30 years. He was born at Caillac, 1703, and died 1759. He was interpreter at the court of Peking, and astonished even the Chinese themselves for his knowledge of their language. He sent some curious anecdotes to Europe, and published a good history of Gengis Khan, 1739, 4to. and a translation of Chou-king 1771. His eulogium appears in the 31st volume of Lettres Curieuses, & Edifiantes.

GAUBIUS, Jerome David, a native of Heidelberg, who studied medicine under his uncle a physician at Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Handerwyck, and to Leyden. In 1731 he succeeded his illustrious friend and preceptor Boerhaave, as Lecturer of Botany, and chemistry at Leyden, and obtained the medical professorship three years after. He died 1730, aged 75. His works are a Thesis on the Solids, 1725, when he took his doctor's degree—another on the method of Prescribing, and Writing Recipes, a valuable work 1733—Institutiones Pathologicae Medicinal, 4to. 1753, and Adversaria de Variis Argumentis. He also edited Albinus de Præsigniâ Vitæ & Mortis, and Cramer's Elementa Artis Docimasticæ.

GAUDEN, John, D.D., a prelate born 1605, at Mayfield, Essex, where his father was vicar. He was educated at Bury St. Edmund's school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. He was chaplain to lord Warwick, and he preached before the House of Commons, in a style which procured, with their approbation, the present of a large silver tankard, with an appropriate inscription, and afterwards the rich deanery of Bocking in Essex, for the regular possession of which he obtained the collation of Laud, then a prisoner in the Tower. He submitted to the regulations of the parliament, upon the abolition of the hierarchy, and he was one of the assembly of divines, who met at Westminster, though Godwin was afterwards substituted in his room. When preparations were made to try the king, he was one of those divines who boldly petitioned against it, and after the king's death he published "a Just Invective against those who murdered king Charles I." His zeal was further manifested in printing the "Icon Basilice," with a copy of the MS. of which, written by the unfortunate Charles, he had been intrusted, and though diligent search was made by the parliament for the publisher of that popular book, Gauden had the good fortune to escape discovery. In 1659 he published "the Tears and Sighs of the Church of England, in 4 books folio," and so highly approved were his services that he was made, on the death of Brownrigg, preacher to the Temple, and bishop of Exeter. In 1662 he was removed to Worcester, but he died in September that same year. Gauden has been censured for his ambition, and he is described by Clarendon, Burnet, Kennet and others, as so inconstant, ambiguous, and covetous of preferment, that he would follow any party or subscribe to any opinions to gain his ends. He wrote several tracts on the politics, and theological disputes of the times.

GAUDENZIO, Paganin, a native of the Valte-line. He received his education at Rome where he acquired celebrity as Greek professor, and afterwards at Pisa where he filled the chair of belles lettres. He wrote Declamationes—Chartæ Palantes—Obstetrix Litteraria—Academ. Instaur.—de Philosophiæ apud Roman, Initio & Progressu, 4to. and died 1643, aged 52.

GAULTIER, Abbé Louis, was born in Italy, about 1745, of French parents, and went to France in his childhood. Devoting himself to the task of education, he formed the plan of rendering the acquisition of learning less repulsive to children, by the invention of a number of games, at once amusing and instructive. The revolution drove him from France, but he returned in 1802, and resumed his labors. Of the systems of Bell and Lancaster he was an active supporter. He died in 1818. Among his numerous and often printed works are, A Method of making Abridgments; Lessons of Chronology and History; Progressive Lessons for Children; and Notions of Practical Geometry.

GAUPP, John, a native of Lindau in Swabia, educated at Jena. He was the protestant pastor of his native town, where he died 1738, aged 71. He was an able mathematician, and wrote Gnomonica Mechanica Universalis, 4to., besides some tracts on Astronomy, Chronology, and sermons.

GAURICO, Luca, an Italian professor of astronomy at Ferrara. His prediction that John Bentivoglio would lose the supreme power of Bologna, exposed him to persecution, and he removed to Venice, and then to Rome. He was made bishop of Civita in Naples by pope Paul, who was a great follower of astrology, but he resigned the see in 1550, and came to Rome, where he died 1553, aged 83. His works on astrology and astronomy appeared at Basil, 3 vols. fol. 1575. His brother, Pomponio, wrote Latin poems, tracts on Physiognomy, and architecture, and died professor in Naples university.

GAUTHIER, Jean Baptiste, a French abbé, chaplain to de Langle, bishop of Boulogne, and to Colbert, bishop of Montpellier, was born at Louviers in the diocese of Evreux 1685. He died of a fall 1755. He wrote against Infidels. His chief works are "a Tract against Pope's Essay on Man" which he describes as impious,—Letters against Hardouin and Berruyer, 3 vols, 12mo.—an Attack upon the Jesuits, 3 vols, and other works mentioned in "France Litteraire" 1758.

GAY, John, an English poet, born 1683, near Barnstaple, Devon. When freed from the shackles of business, he cultivated the muses, and was introduced to the wits of the times. Flattered with the friendship of Swift and of Pope, he courted the public approbation by dedicating in 1711, his first piece, "Rural Sports, a Georgic," to the latter of these high poetical characters. But though successful as an author, his resources were scanty, but the patronage of the duchess of Monmouth, by appointing him her secretary, placed him above want, and called his muse to new exertions. In this sunshine of prosperity he wrote his "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets," and the next year he formed the plan of his "Pastorals." In espousing the cause of Pope, who had been insulted by Philips, he not only produced an excellent poem "the Shepherd's Week" which rivalled his antagonist's performance, but he fixed the friendship and gained the recommendation of his poetical patron. The death of queen Anne seemed to ruin his hopes, but he paid his court to the new ministry, and insured the patronage of the princess of Wales by a well-timed compliment. He was admitted into the company of the great and powerful, and the sweetness of his manners, and the sincerity of his heart, gained him friends wherever he appeared. In 1718, he was with Pope at lord Harcourt's, where he celebrated in beautiful verse the sad catastrophe of the two lovers destroyed by lightning. In 1724, he read his "Captives" before the princess of Wales, and at her request wrote his beautiful and elegant fables for the use of the duke of Cumberland. In 1727, he produced his "Beggars' Opera" which met with the most unusual success, and was acted 63 successive nights in London, 50 at Bath and Bristol, and with equal popularity in other places. This favorite play owed its celebrity to the unpopularity of the court, and the resentment of the poet, who was offered the place of gentleman usher to the young princess Louisa, which he rejected with marked indignation. To take advantage of his situation with the public, he produced a second part to the Beggars' Opera, by the title of "Polly" but the court forbid its appearance on the stage, and Gay had the satisfaction of obtaining an unusually large subscription for its publication. To make his triumph complete, the duke and duchess of Queensbury embraced his cause, resigned their places at court to patronize him, and ever after made him an inmate at their splendid table. He died 11th December 1732.

GAY, Ebenezer, D.D. congregational minister of Hingham, Massachusetts, was born in 1696, graduated at Harvard university in 1714, and was ordained to the work of the ministry in 1718. He died in 1787, at the advanced age of 91 years, and having been in the ministry 69 years. Dr. Gay was a man of strong mind, and extensive information; and stood in the first rank of the divines of New England in his day. He made a number of publications, which were honorable to his talents and piety.

GAZA, Theodore, an eminent scholar, born at Thessalonica, in Greece, 1398. Upon the invasion of his country by the Turks, in 1430, he came to Italy, and by his great assiduity became one of the brightest ornaments to whom Europe is indebted for the revival of learning. He soon gained a perfect knowledge of the Latin language, and was introduced to the patronage of cardinal Bessarion. In 1450 he came to Rome, and was, with several others, engaged by pope Nicholas V. in translating Greek authors into Latin, and after the death of that pontiff, in 1456, he went to the court of Alphonsus, king of Naples. Two years after he returned to Rome, and by the patronage of his friend Bessarion, he was presented to a small benefice in Calabria. In his old age he presented one of his performances, beautifully written in vellum, to pope Sixtus IV. and while he expected a liberal reward, he was asked by the pontiff what his expenses had been, and these were carefully repaid, which treatment so excited his indignation that he exclaimed, "It was high time to return home, since the over-fed asses of Rome had no relish but for thistles and weeds." The works of Gaza consisted of original pieces, and of translations,—Grammaticæ Græcæ Libri quatuor, written in Greek 1495, translated by Erasmus 1522—Liber de Atticis Mensibus—and translation of Cicero's de Senectute, & de Somnio Scipionis, into Greek—and Aristotle's History of Animals, translated into Latin, and other works. He is ranked among the best translators of Greek authors into Latin, though, indeed Erasmus objected to the elegance of his Latin idiom, and Huetius, in commending his fidelity and perspicuity, allows that some things might have been rendered better. He died at Rome 1478, aged 80.

GEBER, or GEABER, an Arabian alchemist and astronomer, whose real name was Abou Mousah Giasser al Sofi, is supposed by some to have been a native of Seville; but he is more generally believed to have been born at Hauran, in Mesopotamia, in the eighth century. His alchemical researches led him to the discovery of corrosive sublimate, red precipitate, aquafortis, and nitrate of quicksilver. There have been several editions of his works.

GED, William, an ingenious artist and goldsmith of Edinburgh, who invented a plate for printing whole pages, instead of using a type for every letter. This had first been practised by the Chinese and Japanese in blocks of wood, as pursued by Coster, the European inventor of this simple method. In the prosecution of his plan, Ged applied to the university of Cambridge, in conjunction with some others, to print bibles and prayer-books after the new method; but much money was sunk in the attempt, and by the villany of the pressmen and the ill conduct of his partners, the unfortunate adventurer was ruined in his hopes and fortunes. He returned to Scotland 1733, and gave a specimen of his plan by the publication of a Salust in 1744. He died 19th Oct. 1749.

GEDDES, James, a Scotch advocate, born 1710, in the shire of Tweeddale. He displayed great powers of application while at the university of Edinburgh, and was rapidly advancing to opulence and celebrity in the profession of the law when he was cut off by a lingering consumption before he reached his 40th year. To the dry labors of the law he added a very polished and elegant taste for classical literature. He wrote "an Essay on the Composition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly Plato," published Glasgow, 1748, 8vo.

GEDDES, Michael, L.L.D., a learned divine, for some years chaplain to the Lisbon factory, where the inquisition suspended his ecclesiastical labors, and obliged him to return to England. He died 1715, author of a History of the church of Malabar—the church History of Æthiopia—Miscellaneous Tracts against Popery, 3 vols. 8vo.

GEDDES, Alexander, L.L.D., a learned Roman catholic divine, was born, in 1737, at Ruthven, in Banffshire; was educated at the Scotch college at Paris; and officiated at various chapels till 1782, when he desisted entirely from the exercise of his clerical functions. For many years he was engaged on a new Translation of the Old and New Testament, of which he published only two volumes. This work raised a tempest of indignation against him from both protestants and catholics. He died in 1802. Besides the version of the Bible, he published a translation of Horace's Satires; Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures; and other works of less importance. He was in his character, irritable, petulant, and vindictive, though he possessed great learning and a capacious mind, and he is to be censured for the intemperate and licentious perversions which he wished to introduce in the holy scriptures.

GEDOYN, Nicolas, a French writer, born at Orleans. He studied at Paris, and was a Jesuit for 10 years; but he returned to the world, and as the friend and favorite of Ninon de l'Enclos, he figured as a man of wit and letters. He was member of the French academy, and of that of belles lettres, and in 1732 was made abbot of Notre-dame de Beaugeny. He wrote some ingenious essays and dissertations, published 1745, and is chiefly known for his elegant translations of Quintilian and of Pausanias. He died 1744, aged 77.

GEER, Charles de, a native of Sweden, descended from a noble Dutch family, and educated at Utrecht and at Upsal under Linnæus. He acquired much property by the introduction of new machines in the iron works of Dannemora, and by an apparatus for drying corn by smelting houses. He was, in 1761, made marshal of the court, and knight of the Polar star, and a baron. He died 1773, aged 58, much respected not only as a man of science, but as a benevolent man, who employed his great resources to the relief and the comfort of the poor. He was author of Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes, 7 vols. 4to.—on the Procreation of Insects—and papers on the Transactions of the Academies of Stockholm and Upsal.

GELDENHAUR, Gerard Eobanus, a German, born at Nimeguen 1482. He studied at Deventer and Louvain, and such was the reputation of his learning that he was invited to the court of Charles of Austria, which offer he declined for the office of secretary to the bishop of Utrecht. He visited by order of Maximilian of Burgundy, in whose service he afterwards was, the schools and the churches of Wirtemberg, and was so struck with the zeal and innocent manners of the protestants there, that he abjured for their tenets the popish faith. He afterwards married, and was engaged in the education of youth at Worms, at Augsburg, and lastly at Marburg, where he died of the plague 1542. He was a man well skilled in poetry, history, and rhetoric, but his change of religion, and the freedom with which he inveighed against the pope, offended his friends, and particularly Erasmus, who compared him to the traitor Judas, and spoke with contempt of his conduct and pretended sincerity. He wrote Historia Batavica—Historia suæ Ætatis—Germanie. Histori Illustratio de Viris Illustr. Inferior. Germaniæ.

GELENIUS, Sigismund, a learned man, born at Prague 1498. He travelled to improve his knowledge of modern languages, and during his residence at Basil, he became acquainted with Erasmus, who recommended him to John Frobenius as a corrector of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin works, in which his printing-house was engaged. He wrote some valuable works, and especially Latin translations of Dionysius of Halicarnassus of Appian, Philo, Josephus, Origen, and several others. He also published a dictionary in four languages, Greek, Latin, German, and Sclavonian, and showed himself to be a most able and indefatigable scholar. His talents have been deservedly commended by Henry Valesius, Erasmus, and others, and though Huëtius and others impeach his judgment in the great liberties which he took in altering the texts of some authors, especially Arnobias, yet he gave a new turn to whatever passages he did not seem to understand. His disregard for honors was very uncommon, he rejected the splendid offers of the court of Bohemia for the enjoyment of humble life, and though deserving the most affluent fortune, he struggled, says Thuanus, all his life with poverty. He died at Basil, 1555.

GELLERT, Christian Furehtegott, a German poet and writer on morals and elegant literature, the brother of the metallurgist, was born at Haynichen, in 1715, and studied theology at Leipsic. In 1751, he was chosen extraordinary professor of moral philosophy at Leipsic. After having gained applause by his share in two periodical publications, he brought out, in 1746, his first collection of Fables, and the romance of The Swedish Countess. They were soon followed by a second part of the Fables, and several Comedies. Among his still later productions may be mentioned Moral Didactic Poetry; Canteles; Dissertations on Literature and Morals; and Miscellaneous Works. Of all his writings, his Fables were the most popular. Their success was, indeed, complete; for all, from the peasant to the prince, were delighted with them. After suffering severely all his life from hypochondriacal affections, Gellert died in 1769. For the improvement of its literary taste, and the diffusion of good principles, Germany owes much to Gellert. Nor has it been ungrateful; for his memory is still cherished as that of a man who was a benefactor and an honor to his native land.

GELLI, John Baptist, an Italian writer, born at Florence 1498. Though of the humble occupation of a tailor, which he followed till his death, yet he possessed great powers of mind highly cultivated, and wrote some very valuable books. He was universally esteemed for his modesty, and his talents were so much respected that he was acquainted with all the men of genius and learning of his time, and was member of the academy of Florence, and a Burgess of the city. He died 1563, aged 65. He wrote besides translations from Latin, and Greek authors, dialogues after the manner of Lucian, which have been translated into Latin, French, and English, also dissertations, two comedies, la Sporta and l'Errore, and other things.

GELLIBRAND, Henry, professor of astronomy in Gresham college, was born 1597, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. He became curate of Chiddington, Kent, and afterwards devoted the whole of his attention to mathematical pursuits. He was intrusted by his dying friend, Briggs, the Savilian professor at Oxford, to complete his Trigonometria Britannica, which he did in 1632. He was called before the high commission court for permitting his servant William Beale, to publish an almanac for 1631, omitting the popish saints of the calendar, and substituting the names of the martyrs, for which he was acquitted, though Laud opposed it. Though of a strong enlightened mind, he had not sagacity enough to abandon the Ptolemaic for the Copernican system, and hence his treatises in explanation of plane and spherical triangles and on the improvement of navigation, are confused and unsatisfactory, especially when he treats of the variation of the needle. He died in his 40th year.

GEMINIANI, Francisco, an eminent performer on the violin, and composer, born at Lucca in Italy 1680. He studied under Scarlatti and Corelli, and came to England 1714, where he was introduced to George I. He refused to accept the place of master and composer of music in Ireland, because he was a Roman catholic, observing that he never would sacrifice his religion to private interest; and from his particular independence of mind, unwilling to submit to the caprices of the great, he led an unsettled life, and made several excursions into foreign countries. He was so fond of painting, that he injured his income by purchasing pictures, but he found in the earl of Essex a great friend and patron, who supported his necessities. He, however, rejected, as offensive to his independent spirit, the offer of a pension of 100*l.* a year from the prince of Wales. He had employed much time and labor on a treatise on music, which while on a visit at Dublin, a treacherous female servant conveyed away from his house, and this had such effect upon him that he died soon after, Sept. 17th 1762. He composed Corelli's solos into concertos, and published six concertos of his own, besides harpsichord pieces.

GENDRE, Lewis, a French historian, born of an obscure family at Rouen, and raised to notice by the kindness of Harlay archbishop of his province. He died 1733, aged 74. He wrote an History of France, from the commencement of the monarchy to the death of Louis XIII. 3 vols. folio, a valuable work—Manners and Customs of the French—the life of Francis Harlay his patron—an Essay on the reign of Louis the Great, and the Life of cardinal d'Amboise.

GENDRE, Gilbert Charles le, marquis of St. Aubin, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and master of requests, died at Paris 1746, aged 59. He wrote "a treatise on Opinion," a learned and elegant performance, 6 vols. 12mo.—Antiquities of the Royal Family of France, 4to.

GENDRE, Lewis le, a deputy in the national convention, who after being 10 years a sailor and then a butcher at Paris, displaying himself the fit instrument of the crimes and atrocities of Marat and Robespierre. He figured in all the horrors of the 10th of August, and of September, and the night before the execution of the unhappy Lewis, he proposed in the jacobin club that the body should be cut into 84 pieces, and sent to the 84 departments. In his missions into the provinces, at Lyons, Rouen, and Dieppe, he every where spread terror and dismay, but though the friend of Robespierre, he no sooner saw his fall, than he attacked him with virulence, and drove away, with a pistol in his hand, all the members of the jacobin club, and brought the key of their hall to the convention. He continued afterwards the enemy of the terrorists, and in his conduct showed deep art and dissimulation as he had the management to survive every faction. He was member of the council of ancients, and died at Paris, 13th Dec. 1797, aged 41, desiring in his will, that his body might be sent to the anatomical school for dissection, wishing as he expressed it, to be useful to mankind, even after death.

GENEBRARD, Gilbert, a benedictine monk born at Riom in Auvergne 1537. He espoused in his writings the cause of the league, and after being 13 years professor of Hebrew, at Paris, he was nominated to a bishopric, which however from his animosity in his pamphlets against Henry IV. he was not permitted to enjoy. By the interest of the duke of Mayence, he afterwards obtained the archbishopric of Aix, but he became there very unpopular by the publication of his treatise against the right of the king of appointing bishops, which was burned by the hands of the hangman. He died 1597, in exile at his priory of Semur, in Burgundy. Besides his acrimonious polemical works, he wrote "a Sacred Chronology" much esteemed—a commentary on the Psalms—and "a translation of Josephus.

GENEST, Charles Claude, a French poet, born at Paris 1636. In his attempt to go to India he was taken by the English, and supported himself by teaching French in England. He returned to France, and obtained an abbey, and became member of the Academy. He died 1719, aged 84. He wrote, among other tragedies, Penelope, much admired—some epistles—and a didactic poem on the Proof of the existence of a God, and the Immortality of the Soul.

GENGIS KHAN, son of a khan of the Moguls, was born 1193. At the age of 13 he began to reign, but the conspiracies of his subjects obliged him to fly for safety to Aveni-Khan, a Tartar prince, whom he supported on his throne, and whose daughter he married. But these ties of kindred were not binding. Aveni joined against Gengis, who took signal vengeance over his enemies, and then with a victorious army directed his power against the neighboring states, and in the space of 23 years conquered Corea, Cathay, part of China, and the noblest provinces of Asia. His further projects of extended dominion over China were stopped by death 1227, and his vast kingdom divided among his four sons.

GENLIS, Stephania Felicity, countess de, whose maiden name was Ducrest de St. Aubin, was born, in 1746, near Autun, in Burgundy. Though of a good family, she had no fortune; but her beauty, her accomplishments, and particularly her skill on the harp, introduced her into high circles, from which she derived pecuniary resources. Many offers of marriage were made to her, but she accepted the hand of the Count de Genlis, who had become enamored of her in consequence of reading one of her letters. The union was unproductive of happiness, and the tongue of scandal did not spare her character. By that union however, she became allied to Madame Montesson, who was privately married to the duke of Orleans; and this led to her being chosen by the duke of Chartres as the governess of his children. She now appeared as an author, and produced in rapid succession Adela and Theodore, The Evenings of the castle, the Theatre of Education, and Annals of Virtue; all of which were highly popular. Though she was a warm friend to the revolution, her connexion with the duke of Orleans rendered her obnoxious to the prevailing faction, and, in 1793, she was compelled to quit France. After having resided in Switzerland, at Altona, at Hamburg, and in Holsteine, she was allowed by the first consul to return to her native country. During her absence from France she wrote, besides some minor pieces, The Knights of the Swan, The Little Emigrants, The Rival Mothers, and Rash Vows. Napoleon gave her a pension, and apartments in the Arsenal, and carried on a correspondence with her; but, on the return of the Bourbons, she forgot the favors he had conferred, and the incense she had offered to him, and joined the band of his detractors. For the last thirty years her inexhaustible pen continued to pour forth a variety of works, of which space is here wanting to enumerate even the names. The whole of her literary progeny falls little short of a hundred volumes. She died, at Paris, December 31, 1830. Her productions are characterized by fertility of imagination, and purity of style.

GENNARO, Joseph Aurelius, a native of Naples, distinguished as an able civilian and as an upright magistrate. The best known of his learned works, which are chiefly on civil law, and written in an easy and pleasing style, is Respublica Jurisconsultorum, in which, in the fascinating form of a novel, he gives an account of the most intricate parts of the civil law. This respectable author died 1762, aged 61.

GENOVESI, Anthony, a native of Castiglione, who acquired great celebrity at Naples as lecturer in philosophy, but exposed himself to the severe censures of bigoted critics, by his metaphysics, in which he recommended the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. The popular odium was averted for a while by the protection of the king of Naples, who appointed him professor of ethics, but his application for the theological chair drew upon him from the clergy the ill founded charge of heresy. He was afterwards professor of political philosophy, and died 1769, aged 57. He wrote in Italian, a System of Logic,—Humorous Letters,—Philosophical Meditations on Religion and Morality,—Italian Morality, his best work.

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals in Spain, succeeded his father Godegisiles 428. He defeated the Suevi, conquered Africa, pillaged Rome, and became formidable to all the powers on the borders of the Mediterranean. He died 477.

GENSONNE, Armand, an advocate at Bourdeaux, born 10th Aug. 1758. At the revolution he warily attacked the government, and first gave currency to that horrible opinion that suspicion was a sufficient reason to condemn a person to death. He however wished to refer the sentence of the unhappy Louis to the primary assemblies, and he had boldness enough to demand in the convention the punishment of the Septembrizers. This proved so offensive to the assembly and to Robespierre, that he was marked for destruction with the Girondists, and was guillotined 31st Oct. 1793.

GENTILIS, John Valentine. He left his native country Naples, not to be burnt in consequence of his attachment to Arianism, and fled to Geneva, but nearly was condemned to the flames, by the influence of Calvin. He at last was condemned to lose his head at Berne, for the violence of his religious opinions, 1567.

GENTILIS, Alberico, a native of Ancona, son of a physician. He was a lawyer, and going to England as attached to protestantism, he was made professor of law at Oxford, and died 1608, aged 53. He wrote six dialogues on the Interpretation of the Law,—a Treatise de Jure Belli, commended by Grotius,—and other works.

GEOFFROI, Stephen Francis, a French physician and chemist, born at Paris 1672, son of an apothecary. He visited Italy, Holland, and England, to complete his medical studies, and became professor of chemistry and of medicine at the Royal college at Paris. He died 1731, much respected for his attention and humanity to his patients. His chief work is "Materia Medica" in Latin, 3 vols. 8vo. It was translated by Bergier, and continued by Nobleville, and extended to 17 vols. 12mo.

GEOFFROY, of Monmouth, a British historian, author of Chronicon, sive Historia Britonum, a curious book, but too full of legendary tales in the history of the first British kings. He was archdeacon of Monmouth, and bishop of St. Asaph, which he resigned to live at the monastery of Abingdon, where he was abbot. He flourished about 1150.

GEOFFROY, Julian Louis, a French critic of considerable celebrity, was born, in 1743, at Rennes, and died at Paris, in 1814. He was remarkable for the severity of his criticism, especially on theatrical subjects. He conducted the Literary Annals, after the death of Freron; and, from 1800, was the dramatic censor of the Journal of Debates. His contributions to the last of these periodicals were collected in five volumes, with the title of A Course of Dramatic Literature. He wrote a Commentary on Racine, in seven volumes, and translated Theocritus.

GEORGE of Trebizond, a native of Candia, who came to Rome under Eugenius. He was a popular professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Vicenza, and afterwards became secretary to pope Nicolas V. After residing some time at the court of Alphonso at Naples, he returned to Rome, where he died in a good old age, 1484. He wrote de Arte Rhetoricâ—Reflections on some of Cicero's Orations and Letters, and also translated into Latin Eusebius' Evangelical Preparations—some of the works of Aristotle—Plato de Legibus—& Ptolemy's Almagest, besides some controversial works.

GEORGE, surnamed Amira, a learned Maronite, who came to Rome in the pontificate of Clement VIII., and published a valuable Syriac and Chaldee grammar, 4to. 1596. He afterwards became bishop, and patriarch of the Maronites, but he suffered much during the wars between the Turks and the Emirs. He died about 1641.

GEORGE, duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV., of England, was condemned to death for conspiring against his brother. As he was permitted to choose his own death, he was, 1478, smothered in a vessel full of Malmsey wine, a liquor to which he was particularly partial. Some suppose that he suffered this cruel treatment from his brother, because it had been foretold by some soothsayer, that the king's children would be deprived of the throne by a man whose name was to begin with a G.; that monster was the duke of Gloucester, Richard III.

GEORGE LEWIS I., son of Ernest Augustus, of Brunswick, elector of Hanover, and Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and granddaughter of James I., was born 8th May 1660. He was at the head of the imperial armies in 1708 and 1709, and behaved with great intrepidity and judgment, and on the death of queen Anne, in 1714, he was called to the throne of England. By espousing the party of the whigs, who had contributed to his elevation, he highly offended the Tories, and instead of reconciling all parties to his administration, he thus sowed the seeds of animosity and rebellion. An insurrection took place in Scotland, in 1715, in favor of the Pretender, and the general tranquillity was restored only after much bloodshed. During his reign, the duration of parliament was extended from three to seven years, and the order of the bath was revived, but the partiality with which the south-sea scheme, was patronised in 1720, proved the ruin of several thousand families. George, whose reign was distinguished by firmness, and political sagacity, died suddenly at Osnaburg, 11th June 1727, in his way to Hanover.

GEORGE Augustus II., son of the preceding, was born 1683, and succeeded his father as elector of Hanover, and king of England 1727. He was engaged in war with the Spaniards, and sent against the American settlements admiral Vernon, who took Porto-bello, though he was unsuccessful in his attack on Carthage. In the continental wars he took an active share, and headed his troops at the battle of Dettingen, 1743, where he obtained a brilliant victory. The insurrection of the Scotch in favor of the Pretender, in 1745, was quelled by the rapidity and valor of the duke of Cumberland, who defeated the rebels at the battle of Culloden 1746. Though the peace of Aix-la-chapelle in 1748, restored tranquillity on the continent, fresh disputes soon arose, and a new war was kindled, in 1755, in North America. Braddock was defeated, and slain in his expedition in America, and Byng was shot, for not giving battle to the combined fleets, and relieving Minorca in the Mediterranean, but at last the disasters of the war were forgotten in the blaze of the glorious successes, which under the administration of Mr. Pitt, began now to adorn the annals of the country. The destruction of the French power in the East Indies, and the fall of Louisburg, Quebec, and Canada, were followed by the defeat of the French fleet under Conflans, and the triumphs of the English navy, all over the world. George died in the midst of the successes of his valiant subjects, 25th Oct. 1760, in his 77th year. The reign of this monarch was splendid more than useful, he supported the rights of the queen of Hungary in the war of 1741, and in that of 1756, he enlarged the power of his subjects by his conquests in America, and in the East, but luxury and corruption were permitted to flourish unchecked, and the conduct of the sovereign was not always consonant with the strictest principles of morality and virtue.

GEORGE III., king of Great Britain and Ireland, was the son of Frederic, prince of Wales, by the princess Augusta of Saxe Gotha, and was born May 24th, 1738. He ascended the throne on the death of his grandfather, October 25th, 1760; and was married in the following year to the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg Strelitz. The kingdom was at that period in a flourishing condition, the public debt amounting to only 122,000,000. The war with the colonies commenced in 1775, and terminated in 1783. In 1787 he was afflicted with the malady which obscured his reason, and an interregnum took place until the beginning of 1789, when he was restored. The malady again returned in 1810, and terminated his political life. His death took place January 29th, 1820, in the 82d year of his age, and 60th of his reign. The principal persons at the head of the administration during his reign were, the elder Mr. Pitt, the earl of Bute, lord North, the second Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Addington. His reign was marked by the loss of the colonies, the acquisition of India, the war with the continent arising from the French revolution, and the accumulation of a great national debt.

GEORGE Cadoudal, a celebrated royalist chief (whose surname was Cadoudal, but who is little known except by his christian name), was the son of a miller, and was born, in 1769, at Brech, in Brittany. In 1793, he raised a small troop of Breton peasants, joined the Vendéans, and was made a captain at the siege of Granville. In 1794 and 1795 he served under M. de Puisaye; and, after the retirement of that general, was the principal leader in the Morbihan. Till the beginning of 1800, he was almost constantly in arms, but was then forced to consent to a treaty. Bonaparte, however, in vain endeavored to win him over from the royal cause. Having been appointed lieutenant general by Count d'Artois, George renewed his efforts to restore the Bourbons, and he at length fell into the power of the French government, and was executed in June, 1804. On his trial, and at his execution, he displayed the same courage that had always distinguished him in the field.

GERARD, Balthazar, the assassin of William I., prince of Orange, was a native of Villefans, Franche Comté. He ingratiated himself into the society and the friendship of the unfortunate prince, by an affected air of devotion, and at last perpetrated the deed which he had for six years coolly meditated, by shooting him through the head with a pistol, as he was going out of his palace at Delft. He suffered the same punishment as Ravallac and Damien, and died a martyr to the church of Rome, July 1584. The prince of Orange was the head of the protestants, and thence this fanatic was incited by his bigoted clergy to seek, as he said, by his death, the expiation of his sins, and eternal glory.

GERARD, Alexander, D.D., a Scotch divine and writer, born, in 1728, at Garioch, in Aberdeenshire, was educated at Marischal College, at which, in 1752, he succeeded Fordeyce, as professor of moral philosophy, and, in 1760, was appointed divinity professor. In 1771, he obtained the theological professorship at King's College, Aberdeen. He died in 1795. He wrote an Essay on Taste; An Essay on Genius; Sermons; and Dissertations on the Genius and Evidences of Christianity.

GERARD, Gilbert, was born and educated at Aberdeen. On entering into the ministry he became pastor of the English church at Amsterdam, where he continued several years; and on his return was appointed professor of Greek in King's college, Aberdeen. He succeeded his father in the chair of divinity, was elected one of the ministers of Old Aberdeen, and made King's chaplain for Scotland. He died suddenly, September 23, 1815. Dr. Gerard published—1. On Indifference with respect to Religious Truths, a sermon, 8vo.—2. "Institutes of Biblical Criticism," 8vo. dedicated to Dr. Herbert Marsh, now bishop of Peterborough.

GERARD DE RAYNEVAL, Joseph Mathias, a French diplomatist, who died at Paris in 1812, aged seventy-six. He was employed as secretary of embassy in many political missions; and he subsequently acted as chief of the division in the office of foreign affairs during twenty years, in the course of which he took part in several important negotiations, particularly in the treaty of commerce with England in 1786. He published "Institution au Droit Public d'Allemagne," Leipsic, 1766, 8vo; "Institution au Droit de la Nature et des Gens," Paris, 1803, 8vo; and "De la Liberté des Mers," 1811, 8vo. He left in manuscript a commentary on Machiavel.

GERARD, John, a native of Nantwich, Cheshire, educated as a surgeon, and patronised by lord Burleigh in London, of whose garden he had the care. He was very eminent as a botanist, and published an account, in Latin, of the trees, shrubs, plants, foreign and domestic, in his own garden, 4to. 1591. His chief work is, Herbal, or General History of Plants, 1597, best edited by Johnson 1633. He died 1607, aged 62.

GERARDIN, Sebastian, a distinguished naturalist, born at Mirecourt in France in 1751, and died at Paris in 1816. He was the author of "Tableau Elémentaire d' Botanique," 1715, 8vo; "Tableau Elémentaire d' Ornithologie, ou Histoire Naturelle des Oiseaux que Pon rencontre communement en France;" together with "Traité sur la Manière de conserver leurs Dépouilles pour en former des Collections," 1806, 2 vols. 8vo. with a quarto Atlas; "Essai de Physiologia Végétale," 1810, 2 vols. 8vo; and "Dictionnaire Raisonné de Botanique," 1817, 8vo. This last work was completed by M. Desaux, who prefixed to it a short notice relative to the author.

GERBERON, Gabriel, a French ecclesiastic, priest of the oratory, and then a Benedictine of St. Maur, was born at Saint Calais, Maine, 1628. Long distinguished at St. Maur as a theological professor, he was ordered to be arrested by Louis XIV. for the freedom of his opinions on the Jansenist controversy, but he escaped to Holland, and in 1703, was seized by the bishop of Mechlin, and imprisoned at Amiens, and afterwards at V. rennes. He died at the prison of the abbey of S. Denis 1711, aged 82. His chief work is the Geog. His- tory of Jansenism, 3 vols. 12mo. Amsterdam. Though impetuous in his character, he was firm in his conduct, and exemplary in his piety.

GERBILLON, John Francis, a jesuit missionary in China. He was born in 1654, became a jesuit 1670, and was sent to China 1685, and died at Pekin 1707, superior of all the missions in China. He wrote an account of his travels inserted in du Halde's History. He was in great favor with the emperor of China, for whom he wrote Elements of Geometry, from Euclid and Archimedes, splendidly published at Pekin in the Chinese and Tartarian languages.

GERDIL, Hyacinth Sigismond, a cardinal, was born at Samocnis, in Piedmont, in 1713. He was of the Barnabite order; and in 1742 was chosen professor of philosophy at Macerata, from whence he removed to Turin, where he was appointed tutor to the prince royal of Sardinia. In 1777 he was made a cardinal. He treated the concordat proposed by Buonaparte as a hypocritical farce; and told the pope, that in signing it he had ruined religion. He died at Rome in 1802. The cardinal published—1. A Treatise on the Immortality of the Soul.—2. A Treatise on the Nature of Ideas.—3. Introduction to the Study of Religion.—4. Another against Duels.—5. Reflections on Education, in Confutation of Rousseau, 2 vols.—6. The Phenomena of Capillary Tubes.—All his works were printed together, in 6 vols. 4to. at Bologna.

GERMANICUS, Cæsar, son of Nero and Antonia, was adopted by Tiberius, and became a popular character at Rome in consequence of his valor in the field of battle, and particularly for the goodness of his disposition and his many private virtues. He died near Antioch, A. D. 19, it is supposed by poison, and was universally lamented.

GERMANIO, Anastasio, a native of Piedmont. Originally self-taught he acquired celebrity for his learning at Padua, and also at Turin, where he was elected professor of canon law. His abilities recommended him to the popes, and he was made bishop of Tarantasia. He died at Madrid, where he was an ambassador from the duke of Savoy, 1627, aged 76. He wrote De Sacrorum Imunitatibus, and other tracts.

GERMANUS, bishop of Cyzicum, was made patriarch of Constantinople 715, and died 740. He was degraded by a council for supporting image worship. He wrote a treatise de Sex Synodis Eucumanicis. Another of the same name was patriarch of Constantinople 1222, and deposed 1240, but restored 1254, soon after which he died. He was author of some homilies, and orations.

GERRY, Elbridge, vice-president of the United States of America, graduated at Harvard college 1762. He devoted himself for several years to commercial pursuits. Being a member of the legislature in 1773, he was appointed on the important committee of inquiry and correspondence. The provincial congress of 1775, appointed him on the committee of public safety and supplies. The committee had been in session at Menotomy, then a part of Cambridge. Mr. Gerry, and col. Orme were in bed when the approach of the British troops induced them to flee half dressed to a neighboring corn-field, where they remained, while the troops searched every apartment of the house in order to find them. In 1776, he was sent to the continental congress, and continued at times a member till 1785. He was a member of the convention which framed the present constitution of the United States. He was a member of congress four years. In 1797, he was appointed minister to the French republic. He was governor of Massachusetts 1810, and 1811, March 4, 1813, he was inaugurated vice president of the United States. He died 1814, aged 70.

GERSON, John, an illustrious Frenchman, canon and chancellor of the church of Paris. When Petit justified the murder of the duke of Orleans, by the duke of Burgundy, he boldly inveighed against it, and had the doctrine condemned by the doctors and bishops of the university. He was at the council of Constance as ambassador from France, and in his eloquent speeches he asserted the superiority of the synod over the pope. He retired to Germany from the persecution of the duke of Burgundy, and died 1429, aged 66. His writings have been published by Du Pin, 5 vols. fol. 1706, in Holland. Thuanus, Hoffman, Cave, and others speak highly of his erudition and universal knowledge.

GERVAIS, Armand Francis, a Carmelite ecclesiastic, superior of his order, and in 1695, abbot of la Trappe, which he soon after resigned. His attack on the Bernardines procured his confinement in an abbey at Troyes, where he died 1741. He wrote an History of the Cistercian Order—the Lives of Eloisa and Abelard, and other works in theology and biography.

GERVAISE, Nicholas, a French missionary in Siam, afterwards provost of Seuvre in the church of St. Martin of Tours. He was at Rome in 1724, and was made bishop of Horren, and soon after went as missionary to Guiana, where he and his attendants were cruelly murdered by the natives 1729. He wrote History of Boethius—Life of St. Martin of Tours—and the History of his Church—the Natural and Political History of Siam, 4to. 1688.

GESNER, Conrad, a man eminent in many branches of knowledge, but particularly so in botany, was born, in 1516, at Zurich; was left by his father in indigent circumstances, but acquired extensive learning, and celebrity, by dint of incessant exertion; was professor of philosophy at Zurich for twenty-four years, and practised there as a physician; and died of the plague, in 1565. Gesner was no less estimable as a man than as a philosopher; he was pious, benevolent, an ardent friend, and a general peacemaker. In his botanical researches he was indefatigable, and spared no expense. Botany, indeed, has been said to owe to him its very existence as a science. Among his productions are, a History of Animals, five vols. folio; Botanical Essays, two vols. folio; a Treatise on Fossils; and a translation of Elian.

GESNER, Solomon, bookseller of Zurich, was author of some elegant poems in the German language. He was member of the Senate of Zurich, and also obtained celebrity by his landscape paintings, many of which were sold in England. The most admired of his compositions is the Death of Abel, in poetic prose, which has been translated into English. He died 2d March 1783, aged 53. He wrote besides, "Night"—Daphnis, a pastoral—Idylls—a Letter on landscape painting—poems, and other small works. He also published 10 landscapes engraved by himself 1765.

GESNER, John Matthew, an able scholar and acute critic, of the family of Conrad Gesner, born near Newburg in Germany 1691. After studying eight years at Anspach, he was appointed by the recommendation of Budus to superintend the public school at Weinheim. Eleven years after he was removed to the same but more lucrative situation at Anspach, and lastly to Gottingen, where he became professor of humanity, public librarian, and inspector of public schools in the province of Luneburgh. He died at Gottingen universally respected in 1761. He is much known as the author of some valuable editions of the classics, of which the Horace and Claudian are the more popular. He also published a most excellent Thesaurus of the Latin tongue.

GESNER, John James, a native of Zurich. He was professor in the university, and died there 1787, aged 80. He wrote Thesaurus Universalis Omnium Numismatum Veterum Græcor. & Roman. 4 vols. fol.—Specimen Rei Nummariæ Numismata Regum Macedon ex Laboribus Crophii, & Lazii Golzii.

GESNER, Solomon, a native of Silesia, who studied at Breslau and Strasburg, and became divinity professor at Wittemberg, 1593, and afterwards dean and rector of the university. He wrote the Prophecy of Hosea from Jerome's version—Dissertation on Genesis, & Disquisition on the Psalter—sermons, essays. He died 1605, aged 46.

GEVARTIUS, John Gasper, L.L.D. an eminent critic, born at Antwerp 1593. He studied under the Jesuits at Antwerp, and then removed to Louvain and to Douay. He was at Paris in 1617, and became town clerk of Antwerp, an employment which he held till his death 1666. He published Lectionum Papinianarum Libri quinque in Statii Sylvas, 1621, 8vo. Leyden—Electorum Libri tres, 1619, 4to. Paris—a Latin poem on the death of Thuanus, 1618.

GEUSS, John Michael, a native of Holstein, professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and author of the Theory of the Art of constructing Mines, 1776—a voyage to Iceland, from the German, 2 vols. 4to.—an edition of Logarithmi Numerorum ab Unitate ad 10,000, &c. He died at Holstein 1786, aged 41.

CHILINI, Jerome, an Italian writer, born at Monza, in Milan, 1589. He was educated by the Jesuits at Milan, in philosophy and polite literature, and studied the civil and canon law at Parma. He married; but upon the death of his wife he became an ecclesiastic. He lived to the age of 80. He is chiefly known for his "Theatro d'Huomini Letterati," reprinted two vols. 4to. Venice, 1647. The work, though praised by Baillet, is considered in general as insipid, partial, and often incorrect. He wrote besides, Cases of Conscience—poems—Annals of Alessandria.

GIANNONI, Peter, a Neapolitan, author of an history of his country, which so offended the court of Rome that he fled from persecution to the king of Sardinia's dominions, and died at Piedmont 1749, aged 68. His history was translated into French by Desmancaux.

GIBBON, Edward, the celebrated author of the history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, was born, 8th May 1737. At the university he paid much attention to books of divinity, especially the works of Bossuet, and as he had never imbibed in his youth proper notions of religion, and decided tenets of faith, he at last, either from conviction, or the love of singularity, embraced the Roman Catholic principles. This conduct alarmed and displeased his father, who immediately sent him to Lausanne, where, under the friendly care, and by the sensible conversation of Pavilliard, a protestant divine, he was induced to change his opinions, and received as a pledge of his reconciliation, the sacrament, according to the rites of the reformed church. During his residence at Lausanne, he paid much attention to classical literature, and acquired such a perfect knowledge of the French language, that he both spoke and wrote it with the same facility as his own native tongue. In 1758 he returned to England, but though engaged in a military life, he continued his studies and found more pleasure in the company of his favorite authors, than in the society of gay and profligate associates. His Essai sur l'Étude de la Littérature, appeared in 1761, dedicated to his father, and was admired as an elegant and correct performance. At the peace of 1763 he quitted the militia, and travelled through Paris and Switzerland to Italy, and in the midst of the ruins of the capital, formed the plan of that great work which has immortalized his name. He contributed much to the completion of the "Memoires Literaires" of Great Britain by Deyverdun 1767, and in 1770, he attacked Warburton's hypothesis on the descent of Æneas to the infernal regions, in his critical observations on the sixth book of Virgil's Æneid. The first volume of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, appeared in 1776, and was continued and completed in five other quarto volumes. The book was received with universal applause, and his bookseller, Mr. Cadell, sensible of the merits of the performance, and of its rapid sale, liberally paid him on the completion of the history 8000*l.* Though the abilities of the historian were thus acknowledged of superior rank, and his powers of understanding extensive, yet he never ventured to speak in parliament, but during the eight years in which he held a seat, he gave a silent vote for the minister. His memoir on the War with France, in consequence of her espousing the cause of the Colonies, written in French, was much admired; and procured for him, from lord North, a seat at the board of Trade, till its abolition by Burke's bill. In 1783 Gibbon returned to Switzerland, to complete the three last volumes of his history, and he returned to England 1788, where the work was published complete on his birth-day. He afterwards returned to Lausanne, but the horrors of the French revolution, the origin of which he with many other virtues and sensible characters had falsely hailed as the regeneration of mankind, disturbed the tranquillity of his retirement and he hastened back to England. He died 16th Jan. 1794. His posthumous works, with his memoirs written by himself, and finished by the pen of his friend lord Sheffield, appeared in 2 vols. 4to. soon after his death.

GIBBS, James, an architect, born at Aberdeen 1685. Besides the design of St. Martin's church, London, which cost 32,000*l.* in the erection, the new church at Derby, the senate house, and the new buildings of King's college, Cambridge, and St. Mary's church in the Strand, are part of his works. He sold his designs in 1728 for 1500*l.* and the plates for 400*l.* He died 5th Aug. 1754.

GIBBS, Sir Vicary, chief justice of the Common Pleas, was the son of an apothecary at Exeter, and born there in 1752. He received his education at Eton, from whence he removed to King's college, Cambridge, where he was distinguished by his classical attainments, and in 1772 was elected to a Craven scholarship. While at college, he entered as a student of Lincoln's Inn, and in due course was called to the bar. Through the friendship of Dunning, he became a leading counsel on the western circuit; and on the death of Mr. Richard Burke, was chosen recorder of Bristol. The trials of Home Tooke, Hardy, and others, for high treason, brought the talents of Mr. Gibbs still more conspicuously before the public; and soon after he became king's counsel. He was also elected into parliament for the university of Cambridge; made chief justice of Chester; next solicitor, and afterwards attorney-general, with the honor of knighthood. In 1813 he was appointed a puisne judge of the common pleas; and the year following, chief of the same court. After discharging the duties of this office with the greatest reputation, he resigned it, at the end of 1813, on account of his increasing infirmities. He died Feb. 9th, 1820.

GIBERT, Balthasar, a native of Aix, who, after being four years professor of philosophy at Beauvais, was elected to the chair of rhetoric at the college of Mazarin, where he presided 50 years. Though highly respected at Paris he was banished to Auxerre by the court in 1740, because he opposed the revocation of an appeal which the university had made against the bull Unigenitus. He died at Regennes 23th Oct. 1741, aged 77. His works are Rhetorique, ou les Regles de l'Eloquence—Jugement des Savans sur les Auteurs qui ont traité de la Rhetorique, 3 vols.—and Observations sur le Traité des Etudes de Rollin. His nephew Joseph was also a man of literary fame, and wrote Memoire pour l'Historie des Gaules. He died at Paris 1771, aged 60.

GIBERT, John Peter, a native of Aix, professor of theology at Toulon and at Aix, from which he, in 1709, removed to Paris. He lived here in a very retired and abstemious manner, and though offered several benefices he refused them all with the most indifferent composure. As a canonist, learned and well informed, he was highly respected. He died poor at Paris 2d Dec. 1736, aged 76. He wrote Practical Cases concerning the Sacraments—Memoirs concerning the holy Scriptures—Institutions ecclesiastical and beneficial—Usage of the Gallican Church in Censures—Traditions, or History of the Church, on Marriage—Corpus Juris Canonici, 3 vols. fol.—and Notes on the Treatise of Abus.

GIBERTI, John Matthew, a native of Palermo, who obtained favor and consequence at the court of Leo X. and Clement VII. and became governor of Tivoli and bishop of Verona. He was, in 1527, one of the hostages whom Clement delivered to the Imperialists, and, according to the barbarous prejudices of those times, he was treated with great rudeness, and even cruelty. When set at liberty he retired to his diocese; but returned to Rome at the invitation of Paul II. and with a liberal mind he established in his own house a Greek press, and thus enabled the learned men whom he patronised to publish some editions of the writings of the fathers. His letters and directions to the clergy are valuable. He died 1543.

GIBSON, Edmund, an English prelate, born at Knipe, near Bampton, Westmoreland, 1669. From a school in the county he entered as servitor at Queen's college, Oxford, and soon evinced his proficiency by publishing 1691, William Drummond's "Polenio Middiana" and James V. of Scotland's Cantilena Rustica, 4to. with curious and interesting notes. In 1692, he published a Latin translation of the Chronicon Saxonium 4to. and soon after Librorum MSS. in duabus Insignibus Bibliothecis, Altera Tenison, Londini, Altera Dugdali, Oxonii, Catalogus, dedicated to Tenison bishop of Lincoln, who appointed him his chaplain. He took his master's degree in 1694, and the next year showed his abilities as an antiquarian by publishing Camden's Britannia, with great additions, also dedicated to Tenison, under whose patronage he rose to the rectory of Stisted, Essex, in 1700, the rectory of Lambeth, and the mastership of St. Mary's hospital 1703, and in 1710, the archdeaconry of Surrey. His Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani in fol. appeared in 1713, and while it commanded the applause of the friends of the church, excited the censures and the envy of its enemies. When Wake on Tenison's death succeeded to the primacy 1715, Gibson was raised to the see of Lincoln in his room, in 1723, he was translated to London. He died at Bath 6th Sep. 1743, leaving several children. As a prelate Gibson ranks high. Vigilant over the rights of the church, he warmly supported the test act, and was zealous that those who were admitted into holy orders should be persons of character, discretion, and learning. The establishment of preachers from Oxford and Cambridge, at Whitehall, alternately, took place at his suggestion.

GIBSON, William, a self-taught mathematician, born at Boulton near Appleby, Westmoreland, and died 1791, aged 71. Though he published nothing, his knowledge of mathematics, of navigation, of mechanics, optics, and experimental philosophy, was very great and very accurate.

GIBSON, Thomas, a physician, born at Morpeth in Northumberland. He was very eminent for his knowledge of botany, history, physic, and divinity, and he performed very popular cures. He favored the reformation, and fled during the persecution of Mary, but returned under Elizabeth, and died in London 1562. The titles of his writings are preserved in Tanner, and in Aikin's Memoirs of Medicine.

GIBSON, Richard, commonly called the dwarf, was an eminent painter in the time of sir Peter Lely. He was originally servant to a lady at Mortlake, who observed and encouraged his fondness for painting, and placed him under de Cleyn, master of the tapestry works at Mortlake, and the designer of the cuts for Ogilvy's works, and Sandys' Ovid. Gibson's pieces in water colors, but especially his copies of Lely's portraits, gained him great reputation. He was page of the back stairs to Charles I. he was also a favorite with Oliver Cromwell, and drew him several times, and he also instructed in drawing the princesses Mary and Anne afterwards queens. He married Mrs. Anne Shepherd who was likewise a dwarf, and the ceremony was honored by the presence of Charles I. who gave away the bride. Though only three feet ten inches, they had nine children, five of which reached maturity, and were well proportioned, and of the common size. Gibson died in Covent Garden in his 75th year, and his wife 20 years after, 1709, aged 89.

GIBSON, John, general, a soldier of the French war, and also of the American revolutionary war, was born in Lancaster Pennsylvania 1740, and was well educated. He early served under general Forbes in the expedition to fort du Quesne, which was occupied Nov. 25, 1753, and called Pittsburg. Here he remained as an Indian trader. In 1763 he was captured by the Indians, and adopted by a squaw, whose son he had slain in battle. He had thus an opportunity to acquire a knowledge of several Indian languages. On being released he again settled at Pittsburg. In 1774 he was an important agent in making the Indian treaty entered into by gov. Dunmore. On this occasion Logan's celebrated speech was delivered, of which col. Gibson was the interpreter. On the commencement of the revolutionary war he was appointed the colonel of a Virginia regiment, of which he was in command at the close of the war. Residing at Pittsburg he was in 1733 a member of the Penns. convention; he was also associate judge, and major general of militia. In 1800 he was appointed secretary of the territory of Indiana, and held the office till 1816, when the territory became a state. He died 1822, aged 81.

GIFANIUS, Hubertus or Obertus, a critic and civilian, born at Buren in Guelderland, 1534. He pursued his studies at Louvain and Paris, and first erected a library for the Germans at Orleans, where he took the degree of doctor of civil law, 1567. He was in Italy in the suite of the French ambassador, and afterwards was professor of philosophy at Strasburg, and then at Altdorf and Ingolstadt. He died at Prague 16th Aug. 1604, according to Thuanus. He wrote notes and commentaries on Homer, Aristotle's Ethics and Politics, Lucretius, and other authors, and some law tracts, but he is accused with dishonorably suppressing the publication of the MSS. of Fruterius, an extraordinary youth who died at the age of twenty-five at Paris, and which had been intrusted to his care. He was unfortunately engaged in quarrels with Lambin, Sciooppius, and others, which, in exhibiting the passions of human nature, too often show that the intellectual powers do not always exercise that authority over the heart which religion dictates.

GIFFORD, Richard, an English divine, educated at Balliol college, Oxford, which he left after taking his first degree in arts. He was for some time curate of Richard's castle, Herefordshire, and then morning preacher of St. Anne's Soho, and in 1753, he became chaplain to the marquis of Tweedale, and the next year obtained from bishop Cornwallis, Duffield vicarage in Derbyshire. He was presented, in 1772, to North Okendon rectory in Essex, where he was unable long to reside on account of the pestilential vapors of the fens. He was author of Remarks on Kennicott's Dissertation on the Tree of Life in Paradise,—Contemplation, a poem, 1753, quoted by Johnson in his dictionary, —Outlines of an Answer to Dr. Priestley's Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit. He died at Duffield much respected, 1st March 1807, aged 82.

GIFFORD, John, a political writer, whose real name was John Richard Green, was born in 1758. He was brought up by his grandfather, who left him some property, which enabled him to go to Oxford, where he became a commoner of St. John's college; but left the university without a degree. He now turned to the law as a profession; but having dissipated his little fortune, he was obliged to go abroad, under the assumed name, which he ever after retained. He returned in 1788, and, on the breaking out of the French revolution, devoted his pen to the defence of government in church and state. He contributed to the establishment of the British Critic, and afterwards of the Anti-jacobin Review, which last arose out of a newspaper of the same name. Besides these concerns, and a number of pamphlets, which he published, Mr. Gifford found time to compile some larger works; as—1. "The History of France," 5 vols. 4to. 2. The Reign of Louis XVI., and "History of the French Revolution," 4to. 3. History of the Political Life of the Right Hon. William Pitt, 3 vols. 4to. For these services he was rewarded with a pension, and made a police magistrate. He died at Bromley, in Kent, March 5th, 1818.

GIFFORD, William, a critic and poet, was born, in 1757, at Ashburton, in Devonshire. Left, at the age of thirteen, an orphan, in poverty, and with the scantiest education, he was exposed to many severe hardships till he reached his twentieth year. From being a shipboy in a coaster, he was taken to be apprenticed to a shoemaker; and as, to use his own words, he "hated his new profession with a perfect hatred, and made no progress in it, he sunk by degrees into the common drudge." Still, his mind thirsted after knowledge. Having acquired arithmetic, he began to study a treatise on algebra, and, as paper was out of his reach, he worked his problems with a blunted awl upon fragments of leather. He also began to compose verses, by repeating which he sometimes obtained small sums; and with the money he purchased books. In this state he languished on till he was twenty, when a helping hand was extended to him by Mr. Cookesley, a surgeon of Ashburton. That benevolent man raised a subscription to prepare Gifford for the university, and in 1780 the rescued youth was sent to Exeter College, Oxford. His progress there was rapid. While he was pursuing his studies, accident brought him to the notice of Lord Grosvenor, who took him into his family, and subsequently gave him the situation of travelling tutor to his heir Lord Belgrave. On his return to England Gifford commenced his literary career, and thenceforward his existence was cheered by the smiles of fortune and fame. In 1791, he published The Baviad; in 1794, The Mæviad; in 1798, he superintended the Anti-Jacobin Newspaper, which involved him in a quarrel with Peter Pindar, to whom he addressed a bitter poetical Epistle; in 1802 appeared his version of Juvenal (a work which he had begun in youth), to which he afterwards added a translation of Persius; and, in 1809, he became editor of The Quarterly Review, which work he conducted till declining health compelled him to relinquish it in 1824. He also produced excellent editions of Massinger, Ben Jonson, Ford, and Shirley. He died December 31, 1826. The satire of Gifford is caustic in the extreme; but two or three of his poems prove that he could also excel in the pathetic. His prose style is correct and vigorous, and, where politics do not bias him, his criticism is dictated by a sound judgment and a pure taste.

GILBERT, William, a learned physician, who first discovered some of the properties of the loadstone, was born 1540, at Colchester, where his father was recorder. He was educated at Cambridge, but he took his degree of M.D. abroad, and on his return to London, was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1573. He began to practise in London with such reputation, that Elizabeth appointed him her physician, with a liberal pension. In 1600, he published his book "de Magnete, Physiologia Nova," which contained the observations of former writers, and might be said to be the foundation of all future improvements. He died 30th November 1603, and was buried in Trinity church, Colchester. His reputation, in consequence of his discoveries on the magnet was very extensive, so that not only Carpenter, Barrow, sir Kenelm Digby, and others have compared him to Harvey, to Galileo, to Gassendus, and other great luminaries of philosophy, but foreigners have regarded him as a man of uncommon merit and of superior abilities.

GILBERT, sir Humphrey, an able navigator, born at Dartmouth. His mother, when a widow, married Mr. Raleigh, by whom she had the famous sir Walter Raleigh. He was educated at Eton, and Oxford, and afterwards followed the military profession, and was knighted in 1570, for his services in Ireland. He, in 1583, took possession of Newfoundland, in the name of his mistress Elizabeth, where his attempts to settle a colony on the American continent were unsuccessful. He wrote a book to prove a N. W. passage to Cathaia, and the Indies. On his return from Newfoundland, the ship in which he was, foundered, and every soul on board perished, 1584.

GILBERT, Jeffrey, chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland, and afterwards in England, abridged Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, published by Dodd, 1750, and translated the 12th ode of Horace's second book, in a very elegant style, which was inserted in the Wit's Horace, p. 67.

GILDAS, the most ancient of British historians, is known for his epistle written 560, twelve years after the evacuation of Britain by the Romans. He lived near the wall built by Severus, and Nicholson calls him a monk of Bangor. His epistle was translated into English in the reign of Charles II. There was also a poet of that name concerned in the writing of the prophecies of Merlin in Latin verse.

GILES, John, D.D., or ÆGIDIUS, was born at St. Alban's in the 13th century. He studied at Paris, and was physician to Philip, king of France, and professor of Medicine, at Montpellier, and Paris. He was the first Englishman on record entered among the Dominicans. He was an eloquent preacher, and as eminent for his physical recipes.

GILES, William Branch, governor of Virginia, and for many years a member of congress from that state, both in the senate, and house of representatives. He resigned his seat in the senate 1815. He was governor of Virginia from 1826 to 1829. He died 1830 at an advanced age. He published a speech on the embargo laws 1808; political letters to the people of Virginia 1813; a series of letters, signed a Constituent, in the Richmond Enquirer of Jan. 1818, against the plan for a general education; in April 1824, a singular letter of invective against president Monroe and Mr. Clay for their "hobbies," the South America cause, the Greek cause, Internal improvements, and the Tariff. In Nov. 1825 he addressed a letter to judge Marshall, disclaiming the expressions, not the general sentiments, in regard to Washington, ascribed to him in the life of Washington. He has also appeared before the public as the correspondent of John Quincy Adams.

GILBERT, John Emmanuel, an eminent French physician and naturalist, born at Lyons in 1741. He was invited to Poland in 1775, and he founded at Grodno a noble botanic garden, and drew a large concourse of auditors to his lectures on clinical medicine. His health obliging him to return to France, he settled at Lyons, where he was appointed physician to the Hôtel Dieu, chief physician for epidemic diseases, professor at the college of medicine, and member of the Academy, and of the Agricultural Society. In 1793 he was chosen mayor of Lyons; and after the capture of that city by the republicans he wandered from one asylum to another till the conclusion of the reign of terror, when he was enabled to return home. He was afterwards nominated professor of natural history at the central school, where he continued till his death in 1814. He published several valuable works.

GILIMER, or GELIMER, descended from Genseric, was the last of the Vandal kings of Africa. He deposed his relation Hilderic, 530, but fled into Numidia, when invaded by the superior force of the great Belisarius. He was at last taken prisoner after various defeats, and when led through the streets of Constantinople, he exclaimed, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity! He was honored by Justinian, but refused to be raised to the rank of senator, as it was offered on condition of his renouncing Arianism.

GILL, John, D.D., a distinguished divine, born at Kettering, Northamptonshire, 19th Nov. 1697. In 1716, he was admitted pastor of the anabaptists at Kettering, and two years after went in the same capacity to Higham Ferrers. In 1721, he was invited to Horsleydown meeting, in Southwark, and soon after removed to Tooley street, where he died Oct. 13th 1771. He ranked high as a good orientalist, and as an extensive scholar. His publications were numerous, and in his principles he was a rigid Calvinist. His works are, an Exposition of the Bible, 9 vols. fol. a valuable performance—the Cause of God and Truth, 3 vols. 8vo.—a Body of Divinity, 8 vols. 4to.—a dissertation on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language—tracts and sermons.

GILLES, Peter, a learned adventurer, born at Albi 1490. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of classical literature, and in 1533 he dedicated a book to Francis I. and invited him to send learned men into foreign countries to examine their manners and customs. He was accordingly sent by the monarch to the Levant, but as he was not supplied with money for his expenses as he expected, he was obliged in his distress to enrol himself in the army of Soliman II. for subsistence. He was afterwards engaged in another voyage, and carried by the pirates to Algiers, from which he extricated himself by the liberal assistance of cardinal d'Armagne. He died at Rome 1555. He was author of Tracts de Vi et Naturâ Animalium—de Bosphoro Thraëio—de Topographiâ Constantinopoleos.

GILLEY, John, died at Augusta Maine, July 9th, 1813, aged 124. He was a native of Ireland. When he came to fort Western about 1755 to enlist as a soldier, Capt. Howard deemed him too old. He had enjoyed fine health, and was singularly active and vigorous. In 1811 he could walk four miles.

GILMAN, John Taylor, governor of New Hampshire. The morning after the news of the battle of Lexington he marched as a volunteer with a hundred others to Cambridge. In October 1780, he was the delegate from New-Hampshire to the convention at Hartford to provide for the common defence. After being a member of congress in 1782, he succeeded his father as treasurer of New-Hampshire in 1783. When the confederated government appointed three commissioners to settle the accounts of the different states, he was joined with Irvine and Kean. On resigning this place in 1791 he was re-chosen treasurer. In 1794 he was chosen governor, and annually re-elected till 1805. He was again elected in 1813, 1814, and 1815, and declined being a candidate in 1816. He died 1828, aged 74.

GILPIN, Bernard, an eminent divine, born at Kentnure, Westmoreland, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards went to Christ church, and became a zealous supporter of the reformation in consequence of reading attentively the works of Erasmus, and of other German divines. He obtained in 1552 the living of Norton in Durham diocese, but with remarkable humility he resigned it, considering himself as yet unfit to preside over the spiritual concerns of a parish. He next visited the continent, where he printed a treatise on the sacraments, written by his uncle Tonstal, and returned to England in 1556. By the patronage of his uncle he now obtained the archdeaconry of Durham, and the rectory of Easington, and afterwards the rectory of Houghton le Spring. His influence as a pastor was considered as so great that Bonner, jealous of the increasing power of the reformers, marked him for destruction, and Gilpin, summoned to London before a bloody tribunal, already prepared himself to march to the stake with all the composure of those who had gone before him, when the death of Mary stopped the hand of his persecutors, and restored him to the wishes of his parishioners, and the duties of a benevolent pastor. This exemplary and hospitable man was offered the bishopric of Carlisle by Elizabeth, and also the headship of Queen's college, but he modestly refused these honors, satisfied to live and to die among his parishioners who regarded him as a friend and a father. He died 1583, aged 66.

GILPIN, William, an able divine, descendant from the famous Bernard Gilpin of whose life he wrote an account. He was born in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards distinguished himself at the head of a respectable school at Cheam, Surrey. He died 5th April 1804, aged 80, vicar of Boldre in Hampshire, and prebendary of Sarum. He published the Lives of Latimer, Wickliffe, Huss, and Crammer—Lectures on Church Catechism, 12mo.—Exposition of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo.—Observations on Picturesque Beauty, 8vo.—a Tour to the Lakes, 2 vols. 8vo.—Remarks on Forest Scenery 2 vols.—Essays on Picturesque Beauty—on Prints—on the River Wye—on the Western Parts of England, 8vo.—Moral Contrasts, 8vo., and Sermons to Country Congregations, 3 vols. 8vo.

GILRAY, James, an artist, who was for many years celebrated for his caricatures, which were drawn and etched by himself. For broad humor, keen satire, and fertility of invention, he was unrivalled in his branch of the art. He died in 1815.

GINGUENE, Peter Louis, a French writer, was born in 1748 at Rennes, and began his literary career by publishing The Confessions of Zuhna, a poem. Early in the revolution he edited, in concert with Cerutti, a paper intended to diffuse the principles of liberty among the lower classes, and particularly among the country people. He, however, narrowly escaped the scaffold during the reign of the jacobins. The Directory appointed him ambassador at Turin; and Bonaparte gave him a seat in the tribunate. His removal from the latter closed his political life, and he was thenceforth wholly occupied by literature. He died in 1816. Of his many works, the principal is The Literary History of Italy, in nine volumes, of which the last three were completed by M. Salfi.

GIOIA, Flavio, a Neapolitan, born at Amalfi, celebrated as being the inventor of the mariner's compass. As the sovereigns of Naples were at that time the younger branches of the royal family of France, he placed at the north of the compass a fleur de lis, a distinction adopted by every succeeding navigator. The principality of Principato, where he was born, also assumed a compass for its arms, no doubt as a monument of the celebrity of its citizen. Some have attributed the invention of the compass to the Chinese, and Dr. Wallis to the English. Gioia was born about 1300, but the time of his death is not mentioned.

GIORDANI, Vital, a Neapolitan mathematician. He was at first a soldier in the pope's galleys, then purser of a ship, afterwards keeper of St. Angelo's castle at Rome, and lastly professor of mathematics. He died 1711. He wrote Euclide Restituto, fol.—de Componentis Graviorum Momentis, fol.—Fundamentum Doctrinæ Motus Graviorum, et ad Hyac. Christophorum Epistol.

GIORGIANI, or Alseid Alscheref Abon Hassan, or Houssain Ali, a native of Georgia, and a Musulman doctor, author of an Explanation of Terms used in Theology and Philosophy, and a Commentary on Euclid. He died 1413, at Shiraz. Another of that name was eminent as a grammarian and mathematician.

GIORGIONE, an illustrious painter, so called from his noble and comely aspect, was born at Castel Franco in Trevisano, Venice, 1478. He devoted himself to music, in which he excelled, and afterwards directed his attention to painting, and was the first of the Lombards who found out the admirable effects of strong lights and shadows. He first studied under Giovanni Bellino, and improved himself by the imitation of the works of Leonardo da Vinci. Titian was his friend and fellow pupil, but his frequent visits alarmed him, and viewing him in the light of a rival and enemy, he excluded him from his house. Thus become hostile each to the other, Titian assiduously labored to copy nature, but while he surpassed Giorgione in the delicacies of natural objects, he was himself surpassed in greatness of conception, and sublimity of invention. The house where the German merchants assemble at Venice, had its front adorned by the pencil of these rival masters, and while Titian embellished one side, Giorgione labored on the other, but time unfortunately has defaced these once splendid monuments of human excellence. A Christ carrying the Cross, in St. Rovo's church, Venice, is considered as the best piece from Giorgione's pencil. The ingenious artist employed his talents to show that sculpture is not superior to painting, and he represented all the sides of the body in the same picture, by the aid of reflection from a fountain at his feet, from a looking glass at his side, and a shining armor. He died in his 33d year 1511, of the plague.

GIOTTO, an eminent painter, sculptor and architect, born near Florence 1276. He was found by Cimabue while he was employing himself in the fields in drawing upon the sand the figures of the sheep which he was tending, and under the guidance of this excellent friend and master, he soon rose to consequence and fame. When Benedict IX. wished to see designs from the Tuscan artists, Giotto, with the greatest quickness, drew with one stroke of his pencil, a circle so round and so perfectly equal, that round as Giotto's O afterwards became proverbial. The pope understood from this the genius of the painter, and employed him at Rome. His most admired piece was a ship of Mosaic work over the three gates of the portico at the entrance of St. Peter's Church, Giotto still favored by Clement V. Benedict's successor, returned in 1316 to Florence loaded with riches, and was afterwards honorably engaged in the service of the lord of Lucca, and of the king of Naples, and every where left specimens of his genius and of his art. His death of the Virgin, with the apostles about her, was greatly admired by Michael Angelo. He died 1336, and the city of Florence erected a marble statue over his tomb.

GIRALDI, Lilio Gregorio, an ingenious critic born at Ferrara 1479, and educated in Latin under Guarini, and in Greek under Demetrius Chalcondyles. He resided at Modena, and afterwards went to Rome, and saw the pillage of that ancient capital by the soldiers of Charles V. After losing there the whole of his little property, and attending his patron cardinal Rangoni to the grave, and losing his other patron Mirandula, he returned to Ferrara poor and enfeebled by disease. Though, however, terribly afflicted with the gout, he yet read, and composed several of his books, till he sunk under the heaviness of his complaint 1552, and was buried in the cathedral of Ferrara. He wrote 17 different things, afterwards collected into two vols. folio, Basil 1580, and Leyden 1696. The most valuable of his compositions are his Historia de Deis Gentium—Historiæ Poetarum tum Græcorum quam Latinorum Dialogi decem,—and the Dialogi de Pœtis Nostrorum. His erudition was very great, and the high encomiums of Scaliger, of Casaubon, and Thuanus upon his meritorious services to the republic of letters, are very just and honorable.

GIRALDI, John Baptist Cintio, an Italian of the family of the preceding, born at Ferrara 1504. After studying philosophy and the languages he applied to physic. Though only 21 years old he was appointed to read lectures on physic and polite literature at Ferrara, and in 1542 he became secretary to the duke of Ferrara. After teaching belles lettres at Mondovi three years he went to Turin, and thence to Pavia, where he was honorably made professor of rhetoric. He took the name of Cintio at Pavia, which he prefixed to his books. He was greatly afflicted with the gout, and retired to Ferrara where he died soon after 1573. He wrote 9 Italian tragedies, besides some orations in Latin, and Hecatonmichi, or 100 novels. His tragedies, which some critics esteem as excellent compositions, were edited by his son Celso, Venice, 1583, 8vo.

GIRALDUS, Sylvester, a learned Welchman, born at Mainarpir castle near Pembroke, South Wales, 1145. He was educated under his uncle, the bishop of St. David's, and studied theology at Paris for some time. He returned to England 1172, and four years after was named by Henry II., who knew his merit and his learning, to fill the vacant see of St. David's, which he disinterestedly refused. Afterwards he went to Paris and Bologna to study the civil law, and in 1185 he was sent by the king as secretary to his son John, in Ireland. In this office he applied to making collections of materials for the History of Ireland, and in 1186 returned to England. In 1193 he was a second time elected to the see of St. David's, but as he had a rich competitor, and as every thing was venal at Rome, he did not succeed. He died at the age of about 70. He wrote several works, in which he displayed great erudition and commanding eloquence, which was wonderful, as Tanner observes, in so dark and ignorant an age.

GIRARD, Stephen, a man of wealth, died at Philadelphia 1831, aged 83; leaving an immense estate, estimated from ten to fifteen millions of dollars. He was a native of Bordeaux in France; came to America before the revolution, and had lived in Philadelphia about fifty years. He was first a cabin boy; then the mate of a ship; then the keeper of a tap shop; afterwards a merchant down to the year 1811; and for the remainder of his life a banker. The notes of his bank were deemed as good as those of any incorporated institution. In 1811 he purchased the banking house and 1,200,000 dollars worth of the stock of the old bank of the United States, and commenced banking in 1812. At last his bank capital was increased to five millions. His other property was in real estate in the city, and stocks of various descriptions. The legacies named in his will amount to upwards of three millions of dollars, and the residue is given to the city of Philadelphia for certain specified objects. He gives to a brother two thousand dollars, to several nephews and nieces ten thousand each; to the orphan asylum 10,000; to purchase wood for the poor 10,000; to the society of ship masters 10,000; to the asylum for the deaf and dumb 20,000; to the grand lodge 20,000; to the Pennsylvania hospital 30,000; to the city 110,000; to various legacies to individuals 120,000; to the state of Pennsylvania 300,000 for internal improvements; for a college for poor white children 2,000,000. The building is to be three stories, 110 feet by 160, to be erected at Peel Hall on the ridge road, Penn. township; to be enclosed by a wall ten feet high, capped with marble and guarded with irons on the top. The scholars are to be orphans from Penns. New York, (the first port at which he arrived) and New Orleans, (the first port at which he landed as first officer), and must be between six and ten years of age; when between fourteen and eighteen years old they are to be bound out by the corporation of the city to mechanical trades, or agriculture. There is also the following provision,

"I enjoin and require, that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatever shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in the said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as visitor, within the premises, appropriated to the purposes of said college." This provision of the will is utterly inconsistent with another, in which he directs the teacher to inculcate, "the purest principles of morality," for the world is yet to learn, that there is any other source for such principles, than divine revelation, and by his interdict of almost every person, who professes a belief in such a revelation, he would exclude the revelation itself from his plan. The life of this man suggests reflections enough to fill a volume, upon the folly of devoting all the energies of the soul to the acquisition of wealth, to the exclusion of every other object. He died the richest man in the United States, and gave away his wealth, because he could not carry it with him.

GIRANDON, Francis, a native of Troyes. He studied sculpture and architecture under Anguier, and was sent to Rome by Louis XIV. to complete his knowledge of the arts. He succeeded Le Brun as inspector general of sculpture to the king, and died 1715, aged 87. His chief works are the Mansoleum of Richelieu in the church of the Sorbonne—the Equestrian Statue of Louis XIV. and the Rape of Proserpine in the garden of Versailles.

GIRODET-TRIOSON, Anne Louis, one of the most eminent of modern French painters, was born, in 1767, at Montargis; studied under David, and at Rome; and died in 1824. His genius was so early manifested, that when he was only thirteen he painted his father's portrait. Among his principal works are, Endymion sleeping; Hippocrates refusing the Presents of Artaxerxes; The Deluge (which gained the prize from David's Sabines); The Burial of Atala; The Revolt of Cairo; and Pygmalion and Galatea.

GIRTIN, John, an English painter of great excellence. His landscapes in water-colors, and in oil, were much admired. The views of London and Paris, exhibited in the Panorama in London, were by him, and are pleasing proofs of his genius and taste. Though laboring under the attacks of a dreadful asthma, he followed his profession till within a few days of his death, which happened Nov. 1802, in his 30th year.

GIRTIN, Thomas, an artist, was born, in 1773, in London; was a pupil of Dayes; studied the works of Canaletti and Rubens; and died in 1802. His works are full of spirit and effect. It was he who introduced the practice of drawing upon cart-ridge paper, by which means he avoided the spot-tiness and glaringness incident to drawings upon white paper. He also painted excellently in oil colors. Among his best productions are, Views in Paris; A View in Wales; and a Panoramic View of London.

GLAIN, N. Saint, a native of Limoges, 1620, who retired to Holland to profess the protestant faith. After serving with reputation in the armies of the republic, he wrote in the Holland gazette, and from a zealous protestant, he became, by reading Spinoza's book, a rank atheist. So devoted was he to his new opinions, that he translated Spinoza into French, and published it in three different editions, under three different titles, to attract the public attention.

GLANDORP, Matthias, a physician, born at Cologne 1595, where his father was a surgeon. After studying at Bremen, and improving himself at Padua and other Italian universities, he became physician to the archbishop of Bremen 1629. He died soon after 1652. His works, which exhibit the powers of an attentive and able man, were printed together at London 1729, 4to. with his life prefixed.

GLANVIL, Joseph, an English divine, born at Plymouth, Devonshire, 1636. He was of Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1656 removed to Lincoln college, and soon after entered into orders, and became chaplain to Rouse, provost of Eton college. The death of his patron soon after left him at liberty; and he returned to his college, where he continued during the turbulence of the times, till the restoration brought back peace, confidence, and security. Glanvil, who had showed strong partiality for Cromwell's usurpation, now became an active royalist, and he drew the attention of the learned by his popular treatise, called the Vanity of Dogmatizing, against the Aristotelians, so that when the Royal society was established, he was chosen one of that learned body, whose opinions and philosophy he had so ably defended. In 1666, by the interest of his friends, he obtained the rectory of the Abbey church, Bath, where he fixed his residence. In 1677 he engaged in a controversy with Crosse, vicar of Chew, Somersetshire, in defence of the Royal society, and against the Aristotelian philosophy; and the raillery used on both sides, brought a fresh antagonist, Dr. Stubbe, physician at Warwick, who treated our author with more vehemence and scurrility than propriety could countenance. Glanvil forgot his resentment in the attentive performance of his ministerial duty; and when Stubbe was unfortunately drowned near Bath, and his remains were brought to be interred into the Abbey church, he preached a very pathetic and eloquent sermon on the occasion, and paid very handsome and deserved compliments to the memory of his departed antagonist. He was presented, in 1678, to a prebendal stall of Worcester, by the patronage of the marquis of Worcester, to whom his wife was related, and with the approbation of the king, to whom he had been chaplain since 1672. He died 4th Nov. 1680, aged 44. Besides the works mentioned already, he wrote an "Essay concerning Preaching,—and a seasonable Defence of Preaching,"—a blow at modern Sadduceism—"Reflections on Drollery and Atheism"—Essays on important subjects in Philosophy and Religion, and sermons.

GLASS, John, a Scotch divine, born at Dundee 1698, and educated at Aberdeen. Upon his publication of a pamphlet on the inconsistency of a civil establishment with christianity, he was deposed from his church, near Dundee, and then became the founder of a new sect called the Glassites, in Scotland, and Sandemonians in England. As the discipline of his sect was very rigorous, few embraced his tenets, and the name is scarce known now. He wrote various controversial tracts, published at Edinburgh, 4 vols. 8vo. He died at Dundee 1773, aged 75.

GLASS, John, son of the preceding, was born at Dundee 1725, and went as surgeon to the West Indies. He afterwards quitted the medical profession; and as captain of a ship traded to the Brazils. After an absence of two years, he returned from the Brazils to London in 1765, with all his property; but, when in sight of Ireland, four of the seamen conspired against him; and after murdering him, his wife and daughter, the mate, one seaman and two boys, they loaded the boat with dollars, and sinking the ship, landed at Ross, and came to Dublin, where punishment overtook them. They were executed for the bloody deed, Oct. 1766.

GLASSIUS, Solomon, D.D., a German divine, professor of divinity in Jena university. He was afterwards superintendent of the schools and churches in Saxe Gotha, and died 1656, aged 63. He wrote Philologia Sacra, 4to.—Onomatologia Messiae Prophetica—Disputationes in Augustanam Confessionem—Exegesis Evangeliorum et Epistol.—Christologia Mosaica, et Davidica.

GLEDTTSCH, John Gottlieb, a native of Leipsic, who took his degree of M.D. at Frankfurt on the Oder, 1740, and there became lecturer in botany, physiology, and the Materia Medica. He was afterwards member of the Berlin academy of sciences, anatomical professor, and director of the botanical garden. He was author of treatises on the management of Trees—on the Means of destroying Locusts—on Fungusses—Miscellaneous Essays on Medicine, Botany, Economy—on Bees and on the System of Plants. He died 1786, aged 72.

GLEICHEN, Frederick William Von, a nobleman, born at Bayreuth, who, after serving his country with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, retired from public life in 1756, and, satisfied with the empty title of privy counsellor, devoted himself to the study of natural history. He was very ingenious in the delineation of plants, and well acquainted with chemistry, and he constructed a curious microscope, with which he made observations on seminal animalcules, and on the putrefaction of vegetables, of which he published an account. These, and other works on subjects of natural history, are written in German, and possess merit. He died 1783, aged 69.

GLEIM, John William Louis, a celebrated German poet, was born, in 1719, at Ermsleben, in Halberstadt, and studied at the university of Halle. After having been secretary to Prince William of Brandenburg (whose death he witnessed on the field of battle), and to Prince Leopold of Dessau, he was appointed secretary of the grand chapter of Halberstadt, and canon of that of Walbeck. He died in 1803. Gleim has obtained the appellation of the German Anacreon; but it is to his highly animated War Songs that he owes the largest portion of his fame. His poems form seven octavo volumes, and contain successful attempts in almost every species of poetry.

GLENBERVIE, Silvester Douglas, lord, was born, in 1743, at Teehil, in Aberdeenshire; and was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen. He was intended for the medical profession, but preferred the law. His marriage with a daughter of lord North opened to him the way to promotion, and he successively held various important offices, among which were those of chief secretary in Ireland, joint paymaster of the army, and vice-president of the board of trade. He was created a peer in 1819, and died in 1823. He published Cases of Controverted Elections, four vols.; Reports of Cases in the Court of King's Bench; a translation of the first canto of the Ricciardetto; and an edition of Major Mercer's Poems.

GLENIE, James, an eminent mathematician, was born in the south of Ireland, and educated at St. Andrew's. During the American war he distinguished himself as an officer of artillery, and was subsequently removed to the engineer corps. From that corps, however, he was compelled to retire, in consequence of his having, by a seasonable pamphlet, defeated and covered with ridicule the duke of Richmond's plan of fortification. After having experienced many vicissitudes, in America and England, he died, in embarrassed circumstances, Nov. 24, 1817, in the vicinity of Pimlico. He was a member of the Royal Society. Among his works are, A History of Gunnery; The Antecedential Calculus; Observations on Construction; and the Doctrine of Universal Comparison and General Proportion.

GLENN, James, governor of South Carolina, was appointed in 1739, but did not assume the administration until January, 1744. He was recalled in 1755, and was succeeded by governor Lyttleton. Although many years in office his name is seldom mentioned in the history of the colony. It was a season of quiet. In his message in January, 1749, he congratulated the assembly, that such was the peaceable condition of the colony, that there was not an Indian enemy within a thousand miles of Charleston. Towards the close of his administration he met the Cherokee warriors in their own country, and concluded a treaty with them, by which a large extent of territory was ceded to the king, greatly to the interests of the colony and the safety of the inhabitants. It was immediately followed by a great influx of population, and extension of settlement.

GLISSON, Francis, an English physician, born at Rampisham, Dorsetshire, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He took his degrees in physic, and became, in the room of Winterton, regius professor of physic to the university, an office which he held 40 years. He was elected fellow of the college of physicians 1634, and in his practice and studies he followed the plans of the great Harvey, and depended more upon anatomical dissection and minute observations than wild theories and vague conjectures. He distinguished himself by the great attention he paid to the progress of the rickets, a disorder which then first began to appear in the counties of Dorset and Somerset, and he communicated his observations and discoveries to the world in his "Anatomia Hepatis," 1654. He was for several years president of the college of physicians, and died 1677, in the parish of St. Bride, London. He was a man of great erudition, and universally esteemed. He contributed much to the advancement of true medical knowledge, and he discovered the capsula communis, or vagina portæ, and more clearly defined the vena cava porta, and vasa fellea of the liver. Of his many compositions on anatomical and medical subjects, his treatise on the liver is his best work.

GLOVER, Richard, an English poet, born in London, and educated at Cheam school, where his verses on the memory of Newton were deservedly applauded. He afterwards engaged with his father in the Hamburg trade, and in 1737 he married a woman of fortune, and produced his admired poem Leonidas. The powers of mind which he possessed were now displayed in political dissensions; he was a popular leader at elections, and when appointed one of the committee in an application to the house of Commons from the London merchants, he spoke with such boldness and energy at the bar that his address was printed, and excited universal attention. He sat in parliament for Weymouth at the election of 1761, and died 1785, aged 74, much and deservedly lamented. Besides his Leonidas, he published London, or the Progress of Commerce, a poem, 1739—Hosier's Ghost, a popular ballad to rouse the spirit of the nation against the insults of the Spanish Court—Boadicea, a tragedy, acted at Drury-lane, not with success, 1753—Medea, another tragedy, better received 1761—Athenaid, an epic poem of inferior merit, which appeared 1783, in 3 vols. 12mo. His great and immortal work Leonidas has been translated into French, and has passed through various editions.

GLYNN, Robert, a native of Cambridge, educated at Eton and King's college, of which he became fellow. He studied medicine, and took his doctor's degree in 1752; but he preferred the easy and indolent life of a college to the labors of an extensive practice, which his knowledge and information might have commanded. After being for 63 years, for his wit, his learning, and his interesting fund of anecdotes, the favorite of his society, he died 1800, aged 82. He is known as the author of the Day of Judgment, a poem of singular merit, which obtained the Setonian prize at Cambridge 1757, and which is much read and deservedly admired.

GMELIN, John George, a German physician and botanist, was born, in 1709, at Tubingen; settled in Russia in early life, and became member of the Academy of Sciences, and professor of chemistry and natural history; was employed on an exploratory mission in Siberia; returned to his own country in 1747, and obtained the chemical and botanical professorships; and died in 1755. He is the author of The Siberian Flora; Travels in Siberia; and a Life of Steller.

GMELIN, Samuel Theophilus, a nephew of the foregoing, was born, in 1745, at Tubingen; became, in 1766, professor of botany at St. Petersburg; was employed on a mission of discovery in the provinces bordering on the Caspian; and died, in 1774, a prisoner to a Tartar chief. He is the author of Travels in Russia, four volumes; and a History of the Fuci, with plates.

GMELIN, John Frederic, a physician and chemist, was born at Tubingen, in 1748. He received his education at his native place, and afterwards at Gottingen, where he became professor of chemistry and natural history. He published several works on chemistry, mineralogy, and natural history. One of the most celebrated is his edition of the "Systema Naturæ of Linnæus." He was also the author of "A History of Chemistry;" and the world is indebted to him for the discovery of several excellent dyes, extracted from mineral and vegetable substances. He died at Gottingen, in 1805.

GOBEL, John Baptist, a native of Hanne, bishop of Lydda. At the revolution he embraced the opinions of the popular party, and was appointed 1791, first constitutional archbishop of Paris. Soon after, however, he resigned his episcopal habit in the convention, declaring at the age of 70 that he abjured a religion in which he placed no faith, and which dishonored humanity. This hoary delinquent against truth and virtue did not pass unpunished, he was accused of atheism by Robespierre, and condemned as the accomplice of Chaumette. He was guillotined 14th April, 1793, regretted by none.

GOBELIN, Giles, a famous dyer in the reign of Francis I. known for the invention of the fine scarlet which still bears his name. The house where he lived in the Faubourg of St. Marcel, Paris, still preserves his name.

GOBIER, Charles, a jesuit of St. Maloes, born 1644. He wrote the "History of the Mariannes," and "Lettres Edifiantes," which contain the history, geography, and politics of those countries, subjected to the observations and discoveries of the jesuits. He wrote some other tracts, and warmly embraced the disputes about the worship of Confucius in China. He died at Paris 1703.

GODDARD, Jonathan, an English physician and chemist, born at Greenwich 1617, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. As he favored strongly the measures of parliament, he was taken under the protection of Cromwell, and accompanied him as physician to the army to Ireland, and afterwards to Scotland, and for his services he was nominated by the usurper, warden of Merton college, Oxford, 1651. During Cromwell's absence in Scotland, he was one of the five delegates, whom he appointed to settle all grants and dispensations, and in the short parliament of 1653, he sat as the sole representative of the university. At the restoration he was driven with disgrace from his wardenship, and he retired to Gresham college, where he had been in 1655, chosen professor of physic, and afterwards his services and talents were considered as so respectable, that in the establishment of the Royal society to which he had so much contributed, he was named one of the first council 1663. After being driven from the Exchange by the fire of London, he was enabled to return to the new lodgings in 1671, where he continued till his death, eagerly devoted to the advancement of medicine and of philosophy. He died 24th March, 1674. He was not only an able writer, but he was the liberal patron of learned men, and in consequence of his celebrity, had several books dedicated to him. His writings, which are chiefly on medical and philosophical subjects, are preserved in the philosophical transactions, in Birch's history of the Royal society, and in separate pamphlets.

GODEAU, Anthony, a French prelate, born at Dreux 1605. At the age of 24, he was one of those learned men who met at the house of Mr. Courart, on subjects of science and philosophy, and to their zeal in the cause of literature, the French academy of belles lettres owed its origin, and he became one of its first and brightest ornaments. In 1636, he was raised by Richelieu to the bishopric of Grasse, which he relinquished for that of Venice. He was an active prelate, attentive to the duties of his station, and exemplary in every part of his conduct. He died 21st April, 1671. His writings, both in prose and verse, are numerous. His Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. folio, 1653, is very valuable, the first of which only appeared in 1653. He translated also the psalms into French verse, which work, though abused by Vavassor and others, is preferred by some to Marot's version.

GODESCHALC, surnamed Fulgentius, a monk of Orbais in Saxony, in the ninth century, known for his controversy about predestination and grace. He was attacked by Rab. Maurus, archbishop of Mentz, and thrown into prison, where, after being degraded from his ecclesiastical offices, he died; but his doctrines as well as his sufferings gained him followers. Maguin published in 2 vols. 4to. an edition of all the treatises written on both sides of the agitated question. He died about 869.

GODFREY, of Bouillon, an illustrious and active chieftain during the crusades, son of Eustace count of Boulogne. He was, after the fall of Jerusalem, elected by the christians king of that city, and of the adjacent country, but, from motives of piety and humility, he declined the lofty title, and was satisfied with the appellation of duke of the holy sepulchre. He defeated the armies of the Egyptian sultan with great slaughter, and made himself master of all the holy land. He made an excellent code of laws for his subjects, and died after enjoying his dignity little more than a year, 1100. He is one of the heroes of Tasso's immortal poem.

GODFREY, Thomas, the inventor of Hadley's quadrant, was by trade a glazier in the city of Philadelphia. The extent of his education was only to read and write, and apply the common rules of arithmetic. Having met with a mathematical book, he was so delighted with the study, that without an instructor he soon made himself master of it, and of every book of the kind, which he could procure in English. Finding that the knowledge of the Latin would open to him new treasures of mathematical science, he applied himself to the study of the language, till he was enabled to read a Latin author on his favorite subject. He then borrowed Newton's principia of Mr. Logan, to whom about the year 1730, he communicated his invention of the quadrant. The royal society of London being made acquainted with it in 1732, by means of Mr. Logan, sent Mr. Godfrey as a reward, household furniture to the value of 200*l*. Money was not sent on account of a habit of intemperance, to which the artist was subject. The following is an account of the invention and of the method, by which he was deprived of the honor of the invention. While replacing a pane of glass on the north side of Arch street, opposite a pump, a girl after filling her pail, placed it in the path way. Turning round, Godfrey observed the rays of the sun reflected from his window into the bucket of water. He was thus led to conceive, that if by reflection he could draw the sun down to the horizon, he should have an instrument incomparably superior to the pig yoke, then in use. He formed his model in wood and carried pieces to Charles Ham, who completed for him an instrument in brass. This was committed to Godfrey's brother, a captain in the West Indian trade, who on arriving at Jamaica and exhibiting the quadrant to some officers of the British navy, was tempted by a captain Hadley to sell it to him for a large sum of money. Hadley carried the instrument to London and placed it in the hands of his brother, a mathematical instrument maker in the strand, and obtained a patent. According to another account, John Hadley, commanding a vessel in the Delaware, was allowed to see the instrument, and took a description of it. The royal society decided that both Hadley and Godfrey were entitled to the honor of the invention. He died 1749.

GODMAN, John D., an eminent anatomist and naturalist. After obtaining his medical degree, he entered with energy upon the active duties of his profession. He went to Baltimore, and afterwards removed to Philadelphia. Being invited to the professorship of anatomy in the college of Ohio, he spent a year at the west, and then returned to Philadelphia, where he willingly retired from the field of practice, and devoted himself to scientific pursuits. Determined to be a thorough teacher of anatomy, he opened a room for private demonstrations, and in the first winter had a class of seventy students. His incessant toils and exposure to the foul atmosphere of the dissecting room laid the foundation of the disease of which he died. After prosecuting his anatomical labors four or five years, he was chosen professor of anatomy in Rutgers' medical college in New York. With a broken constitution he was compelled, before the completion of his second course of lectures to retire from the school, and to seek a milder climate. After passing the winter in Santa Cruz, he settled in Germantown, near Philadelphia. He died 1830, aged 31. He wrote the articles on natural history for the American Encyclopædia to the end of the letter C., besides numerous papers in the periodical journals of the day. He published the western quarterly reporter of medical science Cincinnati, 1822; account of irregularities of structure and morbid anatomy; contributions to physiological and pathological anatomy; Bell's anatomy with notes; anatomical investigations, comprising descriptions of various fasciæ of the body, 1824; American natural history, with engravings, 3 vols. 1828; addresses on various public occasions 1829; rambles of a naturalist.

GODOLPHIN, John, L.L.D., a learned civilian, born at Godolphin, in the island of Sicily 1617. He was of Gloucester-hall, Oxford, and devoted himself attentively to civil law, and took his doctor's degree 1642-3. He favored the puritans, and under Cromwell he was appointed one of the three judges of the admiralty. So great was his reputation for integrity and knowledge, that at the restoration he was made king's advocate, and he asserted in his publications the king's supremacy. He died 1678. He published "a View of the Admiral's Jurisdiction," 8vo. 1661—"the Orphan's Legacy, 1674,"—"Repertorium Canonicum, 4to."—the Holy Limbec, and the Holy Arbour, fol.

GODWIN, earl, a powerful Saxon baron, who, in 1017, went with Canute against Sweden, and for his valor in that expedition received that monarch's daughter in marriage. On the king's death he supported Hardicanute against his brother Harold, but soon after changed sides. After Hardicanute's death he declared himself in favor of Edward, who had married his daughter, but, with a fickleness peculiar to his character, he afterwards conspired against him, and escaped to Flanders to avoid punishment. Bent, however, on revenge, he invaded the kingdom from the continent, and spread such terror by sailing up the Thames to London, that the king yielded to his wishes and received him again into his protection. He died at Winchester suddenly, while dining with the king 1053. It is said that he murdered Alfred, one of the sons of the second Ethelred, and that when accused of it he purified himself by the solemnity of an oath.

GODWIN, Thomas, an English prelate, born at Ockingham, Berks, 1517. Under the patronage of Dr. Layton he was sent to Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1544. He early embraced the tenets of the protestants, and as his fellow collegians were very zealous for the popish principles, he quitted Oxford, and took the grammar school at Brackley, Northamptonshire, where he married, and lived in comfortable independence in the reign of Edward VI. At the accession of Mary he was exposed to persecution, and leaving his school, he began to practice physic, and took his bachelor's degree at Oxford 1555. On Elizabeth's accession he took orders, and by the friendship of Bullingham bishop of Lincoln, he was introduced to the queen, who admired his eloquence in the pulpit, and rewarded him with the deanery of Christ church 1565, and that of Canterbury the next year. In 1584, he was made bishop of Bath and Wells, but he soon after fell under the queen's displeasure for taking a second wife, and this weighed much on his spirits, and increased his infirmities. He died of a quartan ague 1590.

GODWIN, Francis, D.D., son of the preceding, was born at Havington, Northamptonshire, 1561, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, of which he became student 1578. He devoted his time to literary pursuits, and accompanied Camden in his travels into Wales in search of antiquities, but while he left his friend to record the features of the country, he turned his thoughts to the history of some of the inhabitants, and produced in 1601, in 4to. "a Catalogue of the Bishops of England, since the first planting of Christianity in the Island, with an History of their Lives and memorable Actions." This valuable work gained him the friendship of lord Buckhurst, and the patronage of Elizabeth, who made him bishop of Landaff. He now devoted himself to the improvement of his book, and, in 1615, published another edition, which however was so erroneously printed, from his distance from the press, that he gave another edition in an elegant Latin dress, dedicated to James I. who was so pleased with it that he translated the bishop to the see of Hereford 1617. He died April 1633. After his death, in 1638, was published "the Man in the Moon, by Domingo Gonsales, 8vo." an entertaining piece on a philosophical subject, which he had written in 1593, but never published. He wrote also annals of the reigns of Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Mary, in Latin, the third edition of which was 1630, with an English translation by his son Morgan, and also a computation of the value of the Attic Talent, and Roman Sesterce.

GODWIN, Thomas, D.D., a learned Englishman, born in Somersetshire 1587. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1609, and that year he was elected master of Roysse's free school, in Abingdon, where his genius and abilities were soon distinguished by a respectable number of pupils. He wrote for the use of his school "Romane Historiæ Anthologia" 1613, 4to. and in 1616, published at Oxford his "Synopsis Antiquitatum Hebraicarum," dedicated to his patron Montague, bishop of Bath and Wells. Some time after he obtained from his patron the rectory of Brightwell, Berks, and resigned his school. He printed 1637 "Moses and Aaron," and died 1642-3. This worthy and learned man was, on account of his book, called Three Arguments to prove Election upon Foresight, by Faith, engaged in a controversy with Dr. Twisse of Newbury.

GODWIN, William, a voluminous author, as a novelist and a political and miscellaneous writer. He was the son of a Calvinistic dissenting minister; born at Wisbeach in Cambridgeshire, England, March 3, 1756; educated at the dissenting college, at Hoxton; was three or four years a minister of a dissenting congregation at Stowmarket in Suffolk; but in 1782 he gave up the office of a preacher, and repaired to London, resolving to gain a subsistence by literature. He soon became known as a freethinker and contemner of religion. Some of Mr. Godwin's principal works were "Political Justice," of which the first edition was published in 1793;—(in the subsequent editions, he recanted some of the most offensive doctrines of this work);—"Caleb Williams," the most popular of all his works, was published in 1794; "The Enquirer," published in 1797; "St. Leon," in 1799; "Life of Chaucer," in 1803; "Fleetwood," 1804; "The Lives of Edward and John Phillips," 1815; "History of the Commonwealth of England, from its commencement to the restoration of Charles II.," 1824 to 1828; "Cloudesley," 1830; "Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions and Discoveries," 1831; and "The Lives of the Necromancers," 1834.—In 1797 Mr. Godwin was married to the celebrated Mary Wollstoncraft, authoress of a "Vindication of the Rights of Woman," with whom he had lived sometime before their marriage. Thus she, in some degree, was enabled to atone for the insults she had offered to the good sense of her sex, to the sacred institution of matrimony, and to the precepts of a holy religion, in defending, as she had done a promiscuous intercourse among the sexes, as passion or inclination dictated. His wife died a few months after their marriage, in giving birth to a daughter, who became the wife of Schelley, the poet. The following year Mr. Godwin published the "Memoirs of Mary Wollstoncraft." Godwin died, April 7, 1836, aged 81.

GOERING, Jacob, a learned minister of the German Lutheran denomination in York, Penns. He commenced the labors of his profession when only twenty years of age, and died in 1807, aged 52 years. He was president of the synod of his denomination in the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. He was a distinguished scholar; and among the languages, with which he was acquainted, the Hebrew and Arabic were his favorites.

GOERTZ, John baron of, a memorable Swede, born in Holstein. He gained, by his intrepidity and valor, the good opinion of Charles XII. He endeavored to excite an insurrection in England, in favor of the pretender, and was at last sacrificed to the popular fury. He had been placed, by Charles, at the head of his finances, and the discontents which he caused by raising money for the schemes of his eccentric master, were such, that after the king's death he was beleagued 1719.

GOETHE, John Wolfgang von, an eminent author and romantic poet, born on the 28th of August, 1749, at Frankfort on the Maine. At the age of 15, he went to the University of Leipsic; and after passing four years there, he resided a while in Alesace, and then returned to his native city. About the year 1776, on the invitation of the Grand Duke, he went to Weimar, where he passed the remainder of his life, loaded by his patron, with honors, ennobled, made privy counsellor, and for many years prime minister. Owing in part to the patronage of the Grand Duke, the little court of Weimar was a distinguished focus of German literature; and in the early years of the present century, this place reckoned among its residents more than 20 writers of note, at the head of which were Goethe, Schiller, Wieland, Herder, and for some time Kotzebue. Some of the most celebrated of the productions of Goethe are the "Sorrows of Werther," "Faust," and "Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship." The edition of his works published at Stuttgart and Tubingen, in 1830, comprises 40 volumes; and an edition of his whole works now publishing, will make 50 volumes. Goethe has been styled the patriarch of German literature. He died March 22, 1832, aged 82 years.

GOEZ, John Augustus Ephraim, a native of Ascherleben, educated at Halle, and minister of Quedlinburgh, where he died 1786, aged 55. He was an eminent naturalist, and his various discoveries with the microscope entitle him to great praise. He published Entomological Collections, in four parts, 1771-1781 and History of Intestinal Worms, in German, 1782.

GOEZ, Damian de, a Portuguese writer, born at Alanquar, near Lisbon, of a noble family. He travelled much, and became acquainted with the learned of Europe, especially John, and Olaus Magnus, Erasmus, cardinal Bembo, and others. He married at Louvain, and hoped there to enjoy peace and security, after 14 years spent in travelling, but a war between Charles V. and Henry II. of France, drove him from his retirement. He was recalled home by John III. of Portugal, but the favors of the monarch were embittered by the jealousy and the persecution of the courtiers. By their influence he was confined within the walls of Lisbon on his parole, and he was soon after found dead in his house, with the appearance of having been strangled, or fallen a sacrifice to a violent apoplexy. He wrote "Fides, Religio, Moresque Æthiopum"—"de Imperio & Rebus Lusitanorum," and other works much esteemed.

GOFFE, William, one of the judges of king Charles I. and a major-general under Cromwell, left London before Charles II. was proclaimed, and arrived at Boston in July 1660. Governor Endicott gave him a friendly reception. But when the act of indemnity arrived in Nov. and his name was not found among those, to whom pardon was offered, the government of Massachusetts was alarmed. Perceiving his danger he with Whalley left Cambridge, where they had resided, and went to New Haven. They were here concealed by deputy governor Leet and Mr. Davenport. From New Haven they went to West Rock, a mountain 300 feet in height, at the distance of two or three miles from the town, where they were hid in a cave. They afterwards lived in concealment at Milford, Derby, and Branford, and in Oct. 1664, removed to Hadley in Massachusetts, and were concealed for 15 or 16 years in the house of Mr. Russell, the minister. On the first of Sept. 1675, the town of Hadley was alarmed by the Indians in the time of public worship, and the people were thrown into the utmost confusion. But suddenly an aged venerable man in an uncommon dress appeared in the midst of them, revived their courage, and putting himself at their head, led them to the attack, and repulsed the enemy. The deliverer of Hadley immediately disappeared, and the inhabitants overwhelmed with astonishment, supposed, that an angel had been sent for their protection. He died about the year 1679.

GOGUËT, Antony-Yves, a French writer, born 1716, at Paris, son of an advocate. Though dull in his younger years, his mind expanded, and produced that excellent work called "l'Origine des Loix, des Arts, des Sciences, et de leur Progrès chez les Anciens Peuples, 1753," 3 vols. 4to. The reputation of this celebrated performance he did not long enjoy, as he died of the small-pox the same year; and his friend, Conrad Fugere, to whom he left his MSS. and library, followed him through affliction to the grave in three days.

GOLDAST, Melchior Haimnsfeld, a learned civilian, born at Bisehofsel in Switzerland 1576. He was always poor, though his distress was relieved by his publications, and the liberality of his friends. He was of a very unsettled temper, and he passed from Sr. Gal to Geneva, from Geneva to Lausanne, and afterwards he was at Frankfort, Forstog, and other places. He was some time secretary to the duke of Bouillon, and he married a wife at Frankfort, with whom he lived nearly 30 years. He survived her five years, and died 1635. He was a most indefatigable man, and though his writings were not properly his own, but drawn from scarce books and old manuscripts, yet he displayed astonishing judgment and great erudition; and though abused by Scioppius, he probably deserved all the flattering things which Conringius has said in his praise. As to the knowledge of the public law of the empire, and a thorough acquaintance with the affairs of Germany, no man was better entitled to respect, and therefore it might be said, that had he lived in the age of Athens, he would have found an honorable asylum in her prytaneum. His works are Monarchia S. Romani Imperii, 3 vols. fol.—Alamaniae Scriptores, 3 vols. fol.—Commentarius de Bohemiae Regno, 4to.—Scriptores Rerum Suevicarum, 4to.—Collectio Consuetudinum Leg. Imperial. fol. and Politica Imperial. 2 vols. fol.

GOLDONI, Charles, a native of Venice, who early showed a decided partiality for theatrical representation, so that his father, to humor his taste, fitted up a play-house on his own premises. The genius, so kindly patronised, was most happily exerted, and the Italian stage was completely reformed by the labors and the judgment of Goldoni, whose plays were numerous and popular. After acquiring deserved celebrity at home by the humor and genuine wit of his comedies, he went in 1761 to Paris, where he became composer to the Italian theatre, and obtained apartments at court, and a pension. He died 1792, aged 85. His works were collected together at Leghorn, in thirty-one vols. 8vo.

GOLDSMITH, Oliver, a celebrated poet and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a clergyman; was born, in 1731, at Pallas, in the county of Longford, in Ireland; and was educated at the universities of Dublin, Edinburgh, and Leyden, with a view to his adopting the medical profession. Leyden, however, he quitted abruptly, with no money and a single shirt in his pocket, and wandered over a considerable part of Europe. During his peregrinations he was sometimes indebted to his German flute for procuring him a meal or a lodging from the peasants. Returning penniless to England in 1753, he was, for a short time, usher to a school at Peckham, but soon gave up that occupation to become an author. In 1759 appeared his first work, an Essay on the Present State of Polite Literature. His subsequent labors were multifarious; for he soon gained an honorable popularity, and seems never to have been unemployed, but his want of economy kept him always embarrassed. Among his friends he numbered Johnson, Burke, Garrick, and many other eminent characters. Between 1759 and 1774, he produced The Traveller, The Deserted Village, and Retaliation; the comedies of The Good-natured Man, and She stoops to conquer; The Vicar of Wakefield; Histories of England, Greece, Rome, and Animated Nature; The Citizen of the World, and The Bee; and several pieces of less consequence. He died in 1774. In his manners Goldsmith was eccentric, and in conversation he displayed such a lack of talent, that he was satirically said to have "talked like poor Poll." Though benevolent in his disposition, he was exceedingly jealous, not to say envious of competitors. As an author he stands high. His poetry, natural, melodious, affecting, and beautifully descriptive, finds an echo in every bosom; and his prose, often enlivened with humor, and always adorned with the graces of a pure style, is among the best in our language. The Traveller abounds with elegant and animated description, and as Dr. Johnson observed, no poem of greater excellence has appeared since the days of Pope. The Deserted Village exhibits beauties peculiarly its own, and while the simple tale of indigent nature, and of suffering humanity can interest and captivate the heart, so long will the lines of this correct poem continue to be read and admired. Besides the works already mentioned, many are enumerated as the composition of Goldsmith, though it is probable that, like Guthrie, Smollet, and others, he only lent his name to them to give them a temporary celebrity.

GOLIUS, James, a learned orientalist, born at the Hague 1596. He studied with unusual application at Leyden, and travelled afterwards to France with the duchess de la Tremouille, and was honorably invited to teach Greek at Rochelle, where he staid till that city was reduced by the French arms. He afterwards returned to Holland, and directed by the genius of his friend and preceptor the learned Arabic professor Erpenius, he accompanied the Dutch ambassador in 1622, to the court of Morocco, thus to enrich his mind with a more intimate knowledge of the Arabian tongue, and to advance the interests of literature. He carried with him a letter of recommendation from his master Erpenius, for the Moorish prince, with a present of a grand atlas, and of a New Testament in Arabic, which was received with great satisfaction by Mulcy Zidan the king of Morocco. During his residence here, Golius devoted himself assiduously to the Arabic, and in an audience which he had from the king, he was admired for the facility with which he understood the language, though on account of its guttural sounds he could not pronounce it fluently, and on his return to Holland he brought with him a most valuable collection of books and manuscripts, hitherto unknown to Europe, and among them the Annals of the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. On the death of his valued friend Erpenius, he was chosen as his successor in the Arabic chair, but so great was his thirst after knowledge, that he asked and obtained permission to travel into the east. He was 15 months at Aleppo, and made various excursions into Arabia and Mesopotamia, and then came by land to Constantinople, and at last in 1629, he returned to Leyden. He not only had thus become a perfect master of the Persian, Turkish, and Arabic languages, but he had made observations on their manners, and he brought with him such curious and valuable manuscripts, as have ever since been the pride and glory of the university of Leyden. With indefatigable zeal he now converted the treasures he possessed to the good of mankind, and nobly patronised by the states, he began and finished a New Testament in the Arabic language, with a translation into the vulgar Greek, besides the Confession of the Reformed Protestants, and a Catechism and Liturgy, assisted by an Armenian and an Archmandrite, to be dispersed among the Greeks and Mahometans in every part of the world. He died 28th Sept. 1667. Besides a valuable "Arabic Lexicon," and a new edition of Erpenius' Grammar, and a Persian Dictionary, printed in London, and the Life of Tamerlane, he engaged in a Geographical and Historical Dictionary of the East, which, however, he did not complete.

GOLIUS, Peter, brother of the preceding, was born at Leyden, and established a monastery of the bare-footed Carmelites on the summit of mount Libanus. He was an excellent orientalist, and published some books in Arabic and Latin, and assisted in the editions of the great Arabic Bible, printed at Rome 1671. He died at Surat, in the East Indies, 1673.

GOLTZIUS, Henry, an eminent painter and engraver, born 1658, at Mulbrec, in the duchy of Juliers. He travelled through Germany to Italy disguised in the habit of a servant, whilst his servant appeared in the character of a master, and pretended to keep him for his knowledge and skill in painting. After visiting Rome and Naples, and studying the works of the best masters, he returned to Haerlem, where he died 1617. As an engraver he has been highly commended by Evelyn, and his imitations of Leyden, in the Passion, the dead Christ, and other pieces, have been long and deservedly admired.

GOLTZIUS, Hubert, a German writer, born at Venloo, in the duchy of Gueldres, 1526. Though brought up a painter under his father, who was of the same profession, he devoted himself to the pursuits of antiquities, and particularly of medals, and travelled through France, Germany, and Italy, in the cultivation of his favorite study. His fame as an antiquary was so respectable that he was honored with the freedom of Rome, and the books he wrote were so curious and so valuable that they were deemed the ornaments of the first libraries in Europe. He died at Bruges 1583, aged 57. His chief publications were "Imperatorum fere omnium vivæ Imagines à J. Cæsare ad Carolum V. ex Veter. Numismatibus"—"Fasti Magistratum,"—"de Origine Populi R."—"Fasti Consulares"—"The-saurus Antiquit."

GOMARA, Francis Lopez de, a Spanish historian, was born in 1510 at Seville, and was professor of rhetoric at Alcalá. He took a voyage to America, and remained four years in that country, collecting materials for his General History of the Indies. His style is good, but the facts of his work are not to be relied upon. He wrote also a history of Barbarossa, and annals of Charles V.; but they remain in manuscript. The period of his death is uncertain.

GOMBAULD, John Ogier de, a French poet, born at St. Just de Lussac, in Saintonge, 1567. His sonnets and epigrams gained him applause, and the verses which he wrote on the king's assassination by Ravallac 1610, so pleased the queen regent, Mary de Medicis, that she made him her favorite, and granted him a pension of 1200 livres. Thus cherished by the great, and the respected friend and associate of those who frequented the house of that virtuous and amiable woman Mad. Raubouillet, he charmed every company with his wit and his elegant manners. He was one of those whose meetings gave rise to the academy of belles lettres, 1626, under the patronage of Richelieu, and he became one of its first members. Though a friend of the reformed religion, he conducted himself with such propriety that he offended no party, but on the contrary, he gained universal esteem, and lived respected. His income was increased by an additional pension from Seguier, chancellor of France, and, by prudent economy, his equipage and finances were always on the most respectable footing. He died 1666, aged 99. At the age of 90 he published a collection of epigrams, and some years after, the tragedy called Danaïdes. Among his chief productions are "Endymion," a romance, in prose—Amarintha, a pastoral—letters and poems. His posthumous works appeared in Holland 1678, and were chiefly religious, and in favor of protestant principles.

GONDEBAUD, third king of Burgundy, after his brother Chilperic 491. He attacked Italy, and endeavored in vain to reunite the catholics and Arians at a synod at Lyons 499, but he was afterwards defeated and made tributary to Clovis king of the Franks. He put to death his brother Godesil who had revolted against him, and afterwards devoted himself to the improvement of his subjects, whose morals and property he protected by the establishment of a system of laws still called la Loi Gombelle. He died 516.

GONDY, John Francis Paul, cardinal de Retz, was born at Montmirel in Brie, 1613, and died 1679. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, and coadjutor to his uncle the archbishop of Paris, and after many intrigues he obtained a cardinal's hat. Though a debauchee in his youth, he yet assumed the sanctity of the preacher, and with such eloquence and effect that he was adored by the people. He cabaled against Richelieu, and at last, after six years of exile, and after being imprisoned at Vincennes and Nantes, he was permitted to return, and by his good conduct and exemplary manners he made atonement for the vices of his youth. He was, says Voltaire, a Catiline in his youth, and an Atticus in his old age. He wrote, besides the Conspiracy of count Fiesco—Memoirs of his Life, which are very authentic and interesting. The best edition of this valuable performance is that of Amsterdam 1719, 4 vols. 12mo.

GONGORA Y ARGOTE, Louis, a Spanish poet, of a noble but poor family, was born, in 1561, at Cordova; studied at Salamanca; became a prebendary of Cordova, and almoner to the king; and died in 1627. Though some of his countrymen have called him the prince of lyric poets, and he undoubtedly was a man of talent, Gongora inflicted serious injury on the literature of Spain, by introducing, in his poems, a style distinguished for its bad taste and affectation. His works form one volume quarto.

GONNELLI, John, the blind man of Combassi, lost his sight at the age of 20. He afterwards became a sculptor, and by the touch acquired great excellence and even attempted portraits, and with some success. He gave a good likeness of pope Urban VIII. and of Cosmo the great duke of Florence. His works are much admired in France.

GONSALVA, Fernandez, the great captain of Cordova, was an illustrious Spaniard, distinguished against the Portuguese, and in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella in the conquest of Grenada, and in the wars of Italy, where he conquered Calabria, Apulia Naples. This great character, so respectable for his valor and his private virtues, became at last suspected to his sovereign, by the artifice of his enemies, and he died in retirement in Grenada 1515. Florian has made him the hero of his romance.

GONZAGA, Lucretia, a learned and illustrious woman of the 16th century. At the age of 14 she married Paul Monfrone, who conspired against the life of the duke of Ferrara, and was discovered and imprisoned. Lucretia, though he was not put to death, applied to every European power for his deliverance, and even solicited the grand Signior to seize the castle where he was confined, but her endeavors were fruitless, and her guilty husband died in prison. Though afterwards solicited in marriage, she lived in widowhood, and of her four children only two daughters survived, whom she placed in monasteries. She was so elegant a writer that her epistles were collected and published at Venice 1552. Though she did not profess to be learned, yet she infused spirit, and all the graces and flowers of erudition into her pieces, and she fully deserved all the praises and flattering compliments of Hortensio Landò, and of the wits of her time. She died at Milan 1576.

GOOCH, Sir William, governor of Virginia, succeeded Drysdale in 1727. He had formerly been an officer in the British service, and possessed superior military talents. On the death of general Spotwood, in 1740, he was appointed commander of the forces raised for the Spanish war, and accompanied them in the unsuccessful attack on Carthagena. In 1746 he was appointed a brigadier-general in the army raised for the invasion of Canada, but declined accepting the office. The same year he was created a baronet, and in 1747 major-general. He returned to England in 1749, and the government devolved on Robinson, president of the council. His administration was marked by great civility towards the legislature, and was extremely popular; and his private, as well as public character, was free from reproach.

GOOD, John Mason, a physician, poet, and philologist, the son of a dissenting minister, was born, 1764, at Epping, in Essex; practised for some years as a surgeon and apothecary at Coggeshal, and in the metropolis; took his degree, and began to practice as a physician, in 1820; and died January 2, 1827. Good was a man of diversified knowledge; was intimately acquainted with many of the oriental languages; and was no contemptible poet. He published translations of Solomon's Song, Job, and Lucretius; Memoirs of Alexander Geddes;

Medical Technology ; A Physiological System of Nasology ; and The Study of Medicine, four volumes, 8vo.

GOODALL, Walter, a writer, born in the shire of Angus, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He is known as a philologist, and as the author of a Vindication of Mary, in 2 vols. 1751, in which he shows himself very strongly attached to the house of Stuart. He died at Edinburgh 1758, aged 71. He has been censured for his excessive fondness of drinking.

GOODELL, Solomon, died 1815, aged 70. He was a farmer of Vermont, living on a rude spot in the neighborhood of the Green mountains ; all his property was gained by severe personal labor, and saved by strict frugality, and never probably exceeded in value five thousand dollars. From this small fund he was wonderfully liberal to the institutions he chose to patronise. He gave one hundred dollars a year to the Connecticut missionary society for several successive years. When the American board of foreign missions was established, he sent notice that he wished to subscribe five hundred dollars for immediate use, and one thousand for the fund, while yet it was not in his power to forward only fifty dollars as earnest money. He fulfilled his engagement, and paid interest on the proposed one thousand, until he made provision for its payment, just before his death, adding to it another thousand. The amount of his donations for missions to the heathen, besides other charities, was three thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars.

GOODRICH, Elizur, D.D., congregational minister of Durham, Connecticut, was born at Weathersfield in that State, October 26th, 1734, and educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1752, and afterwards served for some time as tutor. He was ordained to the care of the church at Durham, November 24th, 1756, and continued there till his death in November, 1797, aged 64. He was one of the most distinguished among his contemporaries in the ministry, in talents, literary, scientific, and theological acquirements, and in piety and usefulness ; and was for more than twenty years a member of the corporation of Yale college.

GOODRICH, Chauncey, lieutenant governor of Connecticut, was the son of the preceding, and was born at Durham, October 20th, 1759, and graduated at Yale college in 1779, with a high reputation for genius and acquirements. After having spent several years as a tutor in that seminary, he established himself as a lawyer at Hartford, Connecticut, and soon attained the first eminence in the profession. He was chosen a representative in the legislature of the state in 1793, and the following year was elected to a seat in congress, and continued there till 1800. In 1802 he became a councillor of the state, and retained the office till 1807, when he was appointed a senator of the United States. He received the office of mayor of Hartford in 1812, and lieutenant-governor of the state in 1813, when he resigned his seat in the United States senate. His death took place on the 13th of August, 1815. He possessed superior talents, was an accomplished lawyer and statesman, and was greatly distinguished for uprightness, benevolence, and piety.

GOODWIN, Thomas, a puritanical divine, born 5th Oct. 1600, at Rolsby, Norfolk, and educated at Christ church, Cambridge. He was fellow of Catherine hall, but in 1630, to avoid persecution, he went to Holland, and settled at Arnheim, as pastor of the English church there. During the civil wars he returned to London, and was one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and in 1649 was made by Cromwell president of Magdalen college, Oxford. He attended the protector in his last illness, and was ejected from Oxford, at the restoration. He afterwards preached to an assembly of independents in London till his death, 23d Feb. 1679. His works have been collected 5 vols. folio. He is supposed by Granger to be alluded to in No. 494 of the Spectator.

GOOKING, Daniel, author of the historical collections of the Indians in New England, and major-general of Massachusetts, came to America in 1621. He first lived in Virginia, but in 1644 removed to New England and settled in Cambridge in Massachusetts. He was soon appointed a captain in the militia, and in 1652 he was elected assistant or magistrate, and four years afterwards appointed by the general court superintendent of all the Indians, who had submitted to the government of Massachusetts, and held the office till his death. He stood forth as the friend and protector of the Indians in all the wars and difficulties between them and the whites. He was the only magistrate who endeavored to prevent the outrages of the populace. He was in consequence much abused, and even insulted as he passed the streets. He recovered the esteem and confidence, which he had lost, by firmly resisting the attempts which were made to destroy the charter of Massachusetts. In 1681 he was appointed major-general of the colony, and he continued in the magistracy till the dissolution of the charter in 1686. He died 1687, aged 75—Mr. Gooking's Indian manuscript was published by the Massachusetts historical society in 1792. It is said that he wrote a history of New England, but the manuscript cannot now be found.

GORDON, Thomas, a political writer, born at Kireudbright, Galloway. He went to London early, and distinguished himself in the Bangorian controversy, and other political subjects as the defender of lord Oxford. He was patronised by Mr. Trenehard, who with him began to publish under the name of "Cato" a number of letters on public affairs. He about this time published "the Independent Whig," in which he showed his violence against the hierarchy, but sir Robert Walpole, knowing his abilities, gained him over to his party, and made him commissioner of wine licenses. Thus devoted to the minister, he began ably to defend his measures in several pamphlets, and continued attached to him till his death, which happened 28th July, 1750, at the age of 66. His second wife was Trenehard's widow, by whom he had some children. Besides political tracts, he published English translations of Sallust and Tacitus, with additional discourses.

GORDON, James, a Jesuit, descended from a Scotch family. He taught philosophy and languages at Bourdeaux and Paris, and suffered much for the catholic religion. He died at Paris 1620, aged 77. He wrote Controversiarum Christiane Fidei Epitome, 2 vols. folio. There was another jesuit of that name, author of a Commentary on the Bible, 3 vols. fol. 1632, and other works.

GORDON, Andrew, a native of Aberdeen, who became professor of philosophy in the Scotch monastery of Benedictines at Erfurt, where he died 1751, aged 39. He wrote Phenomena Electricitatis Exposita, 8vo.—Philosophia Jucunda et Utilis, 3 vols. 8vo.—Origin of the Present War of Great Britain, 4to.—Physice Experimentalis Elementa, 8vo. He first substituted a cylinder instead of a globe in his electrical machine.

GORDON, lord George, son of Cosmo duke of Gordon, was originally in the navy, which a dispute with the first lord of the admiralty obliged him to quit. He afterwards obtained a seat in parliament for Ludgershall, and anxious to gain popularity he violently opposed the ministry, and attacked the bill which granted certain immunities to the Roman Catholics. Not satisfied with the opposition which he gave to the measures in the house, he had the imprudence to head the mob when they presented a petition to the commons, and thus by his artful and intemperate conduct, he occasioned those dreadful riots, which in 1780 nearly converted the capital into a heap of ruins. So gross a violation of duty did not pass unnoticed, he was sent to Newgate and tried, but acquitted. In 1786 he was excommunicated for refusing to appear as a witness in a cause, and two years after he was found guilty of publishing a gross libel against the queen of France. To avoid the punishment due to this offence he fled to Holland, but soon after returned in the habit of a Jew. His disguise, however, could not screen him from the pursuits of the officers of the law, he was sent to Newgate, and died there 1793, aged 43.

GORDON, Patrick, governor of Pennsylvania, under the proprietors, commenced his administration as the successor of Sir William Keith in June 1726. It was distinguished by prudence, moderation, and a regard to the interests of the province, and was highly popular. He was bred to arms, and served from his youth to near the close of queen Anne's reign, with a high reputation. He died at Philadelphia, August 5th, 1736, aged 72.

GORDON, William, D.D., minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, was a native of England. He had been settled in the ministry in England and came to America in 1770, and was ordained minister of the third church in Roxbury 1772. He took an active part in public measures during the war with Great Britain, and was chosen chaplain to the provincial congress of Massachusetts. In 1776 he formed the design of writing a history of the great events in America. Besides other sources of information, he had recourse to the records of congress, and to those of New England, and was indulged with the perusal of the papers of Washington, Gates, Greene, Lincoln, and Otho Williams. After the conclusion of the war, he returned to his native country in 1786, and in 1788 published the work, which had for a number of years occupied his attention. He died 1807, aged 77.

GORE, Christopher, governor of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780, graduated at Harvard College 1776. He settled in Boston as a lawyer, and in 1789 was appointed district attorney for the district of Massachusetts under the new constitution of the United States. In 1796 he was appointed a commissioner under the fourth article of Jay's treaty. This appointment carried him to London, where he remained eight years, during the last of which years he was left charge d'affaires. He was chosen governor in 1809, but was not re-elected. In 1814 he was chosen a senator of the United States, in which capacity he served about three years, and then withdrew into final retirement. He died 1827, aged 63. Having no children, Mr. Gore left valuable bequests to the American Academy, and the Historical Society, of which he was a member; and he made Harvard College, of which he had been a fellow or trustee, his residuary legatee.

GORGES, sir Ferdinando, proprietor of the province of Maine, was the governor of Plymouth, and an early member of the Plymouth company in England. In 1606 he and chief justice sent out Challons in a vessel of fifty tons for discovery, but the vessel was captured by the Spaniards. In the next year George Popham and Raleigh Gilbert were sent out to the Kennebec. In 1719 he sent Capt Dermer to Monhegan. Desirous of engaging the Scotch in the settlement of New England, he promoted the patent of Nova Scotia to sir William Alexander. In 1622 the council of Plymouth, established by new charter in 1620, made to him and J. Mason a grant of the lands between the Merrimac and Sagadahoc, reaching back to the lakes, called Laconia. The next year a settlement was commenced at Pascataqua. In 1639 he obtained from the crown a confirmatory grant of the land from Pascataqua to Sagadahoc, called the province of Maine, in compliment to queen Henrietta, who held as her estate the province of Maine in France. He was made lord palatine. He incorporated the village of Agamenticus or York into a city, called Gorgeana; but the colony did not prosper. He died 1647. His narrative of his proceedings relative to the settlement of New England is contained in the work of his grandson, Ferdinando 1659.

GORGES, Ferdinando, grandson of the preceding, succeeded to the rights of his father, John. On the restoration he petitioned the king against the usurpation of Massachusetts. Commissioners were sent out to adjust the affairs of government. But in 1677 he was induced to sell his rights to Massachusetts for 1250*l*. The territory thus acquired was first framed into the two counties of York and Cumberland. He published a description of New England, entitled, "America painted to the life," London 1659.

GORHAM, Nathaniel, president of congress, was born in Charlestown Massachusetts, in 1738, and died June 11th 1796, aged 58. He was often a member of the legislature, and in 1784 was elected to congress. As a member of the convention he assisted in forming the constitution of the United States.

GORHAM, John, M.D., a physician of Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1801, and finished his professional education at Edinburgh. In 1809 he was appointed adjunct professor of chemistry and materia medica at Cambridge; and in 1816 professor of chemistry and mineralogy. He died 1829, aged 46. He published inaugural address 1817; elements of chemical science, 2 vols. 8vo. 1819.

GOSNOLD, Bartholomew, an intrepid mariner of the west of England, sailed from Falmouth for the coast of America March 26, 1602. Instead of approaching this country by the way of the West Indies, he was the first Englishman, who directly crossed the ocean. He discovered land May 4th, and a cape on the 15th, near which he caught a great number of cod, from which circumstance he named the land Cape Cod. The Indians which he met at different places, wore ornaments of copper, and used the pipe and tobacco. He passed sandy point, and in a few days came to an island, which he named Martha's Vineyard, as there were many vines upon it. This is supposed to have been not the island, which now bears that name, but the small island which is called No man's land. He resided three weeks on the most western of the Elizabeth islands, on which he built a fort and store house. But finding that he had not a supply of provisions, he gave up the design of making a settlement. The cellar of his store house was discovered by Dr. Belknap in 1797. After his return to England, he embarked in an expedition to Virginia, where he was a member of the council. But he died soon after his arrival, 1607.

GOSSELINI, Julian, a writer born at Rome, 1525. At the age of 17, he was appointed secretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily, in whose service he continued 40 years. He published several things in Italian, in verse and prose, besides Latin poems, and died at Milan, 1587.

GOTH, Stephen, archbishop of Upsal, who by attempting in vain to restore the Roman catholic religion in Sweden, in conjunction with John the king, nearly kindled a civil war in the 16th century.

GOTHOFRED, Dennis, an able lawyer, born at Paris. He taught law in some of the German universities, but was not permitted to reside in France, on account of his attachment to the principles of Calvin. He died 1622, aged 73. He edited "Corpus Juris Civilis," and wrote some law treatises, published in Holland, in folio.

GOTHOFRED, Theodosius, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1580, and professed the catholic religion, which his father had abjured. He became counsellor of state, and assisted in the embassy for a general peace at Munster, where he died 1649. He wrote several works on the history, rights, and titles of the French monarchy.

GOTTIGNIES, Giles Francis, a native of Brussels, professor of mathematics at Roine, where he died 1689, aged 59. He was also a jesuit, and wrote Elementa Geometriæ Planæ—Arithmetica Introductio ad Logisticam Mathesi Universæ Servientem—Epistolæ Mathematicæ—Figura Cometa-rum, qui apparuerunt Annis 1664-5, and 8.

GOTTSCHED, John Christopher, a German writer, who is considered as one of the reformers of his native literature, was born in 1700, near Königsberg, in Prussia; was successively professor of the belles lettres, philosophy, and poetry, at the university of Leipsic, and died in 1766. Gottsched survived his popularity. His mistaken fondness for the French school of literature, and his dictatorial tone, drew upon him an abundance of bitter satire. He was a voluminous writer, in poetry, the drama, and philology. As a poet and dramatist he is below mediocrity.—His wife, LOUISA ALDEGONDA VICTORIA, who was born at Dantzick in 1709, and died in 1762, assisted him in his labors, and was more than his equal in learning and talent.

GOUGE, William, minister of Blackfriars, was born at Strafford le Bov. He was of King's college, Cambridge, and is remarkable for not being absent from morning and evening prayers for nine years, and for reading 15 chapters of the bible every day. He was one of the ministers of the assembly of Westminster, and was appointed one of the annotators of the bible. He died 16th Dec. 1653, and was buried at his own church, leaving an exemplary character for perseverance as a preacher, for humility, faith, and patience. He wrote "the whole Armour of God"—Exposition of the Lord's Prayer—"Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews," and other works in support of Calvinism.

GOUFFIER, Marie Gabriel Auguste Laurent, Count de Choiseul, was born in 1752. His family name was Choiseul, to which he added that of Gouffier, in compliment to his lady. At the age of twenty-two he travelled into the Levant, the result of which he published in a work, entitled "Voyage en Grèce," folio, 1782. This performance procured him admission into the academy of belles lettres, and also into the French academy. In 1734 he was appointed ambassador to the Porte, where he established a printing-office in his palace, and took several men of letters and artists into his service, for the purpose of illustrating the antiquities of Asia and Greece. The French revolution having disarranged his plans, he went to Russia, where he was made a privy counsellor, director of the academy of arts, and superintendent of the imperial libraries. In 1802, his name being erased from the list of emigrants, he returned to France; and the year following was chosen a member of the National Institute. He now published a continuation of his work upon Greece; but became involved in disputes with Le Chevalier and Cassas, who had, as he conceived, injured him, by sending to the press their works on the same subject, after having been employed in his service. On the return of Louis XVIII. our author was made a peer of France. He died at Aix, June 22, 1817. Several curious papers by him are in the memoirs of the French Academy.

GOUGES, Mary Olympe de, a native of Montauban. During the revolution, she espoused the violent measures of the times, and made Mirabeau the hero of her writings. Reflection, however, and the enormities of the times cooled her prejudices, and when Louis XVI. was dragged before the bloody tribunal, she had the courage to demand of the convention the privilege of defending an innocent monarch. This heroic conduct, and her attacks upon Marat and Robespierre, marked her out for death. She was guillotined 3d November 1792, aged 33. She wrote some dramatic pieces, which were collected in three vols. 8vo.

GOUJON, John, a sculptor, who has been stiled the French Phidias, and the Correggio of sculpture, was born at Paris in the sixteenth century, and was shot during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, while he was working on a scaffold at the old Louvre. Among his most celebrated works are, the Fountain of the Innocents; the Tribune of the Hall of the hundred Swiss; a bas-relief of Christ in the Tomb; and two groups of Diana hunting.

GOULART, Simon, an able writer, born near Paris 1543. He studied at Geneva, where he succeeded Calvin as minister; and died there 1623. He wrote an History of the League,—Notes on Plutarch's works, translated by Amiot,—and on Cyprian's works; and published besides some treatises on divinity,—and on moral subjects,—and a Translation of Seneca, and other authors. His works are enumerated in Niceron's Memoirs.

GOULSTON, Theodore, a physician, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and where he took his degree of M.D. 1610. He practised with great celebrity in London, and died 1632, and by his will left 200l. to purchase a rent-charge, to endow a pathological lecture in the college of physicians. He wrote a paraphrase of Aristotle, and of other Greek writers.

GOUPIL, James, a native of Lucon, who studied medicine at Paris, and succeeded there J. Sylvius as royal professor of physic 1555. Besides editing several Greek medical writers, he translated from the Italian, Piccolomini's treatise on the sphere of the world, and died 1564.

GOURNAY, Mary de Jars, lady of, a Frenchwoman, born in Gascony 1565, and allied to several illustrious families. She had a great partiality for literature, and she showed such respect for Montaigne upon reading his first essays, which were then published, that she solicited his friendship; and on the death of her father, adopted him as her own parent. Thus devoted to the muses, and the purest regards of this celebrated philosopher, she passed the best part of her life, rejecting every connexion which might destroy her friendship and her mental enjoyments. On Montaigne's death, she crossed the kingdom to mingle her tears with those of his widow and her much loved daughter, and as a proof of her great gratitude and immortal affection, she reprinted his Essay in 1634, with an elegant preface sacred to his memory. Her works, in prose and verse, were published in 1636, in one volume. She died 1645 at Paris, and her memory was honored with various epitaphs from the pens of Menage, Valois, Patin, la Mothe, Vayer, and others.

GOUSSET, James, a French protestant minister of Blois, who left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and became professor of Greek and theology at Groningen. He died there 1704, leaving several books as proofs of his great erudition, especially an Hebrew Dictionary, and Dissertations on Controversy with the Jews.

GOUVION, N., a French officer who served in America, and during the revolution was member of the national assembly, and afterwards general in the army of the North, where he was killed at the head of his troops, 11th June, 1793, near the village of Glisville.

GOUX DE LA BOULAYE, Francis le, a native of Anjou, who travelled through Asia and Africa in the character of a Mahometan, and through Europe as a catholic, of which he published an account in 4to. 1653. He went as ambassador to the great Mogul in 1668, and was carried off by a fever the next year in Persia.

GOWER, John, an old English poet, born in Yorkshire 1320. He was professor of law in the Inner Temple, and according to some was chief justice of the common pleas. He was a munificent benefactor to St. Mary's church, now St. Saviour's, Southwark, where his monument is still preserved. His works called Speculum Meditantis—Vox Clamantis—Confessio Amantis, were first printed by Caxton, 1483. They possess great spirit, and the author in bold and energetic language inveighs against the debaucheries of the times, the immorality of the clergy, the wickedness of corrupt judges, and the vices of an abandoned court.

GOZZI, count Gaspar, a Venetian noble who died 1786, aged 73, illustrious for his lyrical and satirical poems. He was also the author of a periodical paper "*P*Observer," in imitation of the Spectator. His works appeared together at Venice 1794, in 12 vols. 8vo.

GRAAF, Regnier de, a physician born at Schoonhaven in Holland, 13th July, 1641. He studied at Leyden, and with such success, that in 1663 he published a most respectable treatise "de Succo Pancreatico." He went to France, and settled at Delft, where he practised with great celebrity. He had a controversy with Swammerdam, on account of the three treatises which he published on the organs of generation in the human species. He died 17th August 1673, aged only 32. His works appeared at Leyden 1677, and 1705, and were translated into Flemish, 1686.

GRABE, John Ernest, D.D., a native of Konigsberg, in Prussia, who studied divinity with great attention, and then determined to go to Rome, to embrace popery, because he considered the Roman church as the true church of Christ. He published his opinions before his departure, but before he reached Rome, he met with three pamphlets which had been written by order of the elector of Brandenburg, in answer to his book, and these had such an effect upon him, that after conversing with Spener, the author of one of them, he resolved to come to England, as the only place which retained the regular succession of the Apostolic ministry, without the superstitions of Rome. He was liberally received in England, and in proof of his sincerity, and his adherence to the principles of the Anglican church, he took orders, and wrote some valuable works in divinity. He also published an edition of the Septuagint, from the Alexandrian M.S. preserved in the king's library. He died 1712, aged 46, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

GRACCHUS, Tiberius, and Caius, sons of Sempronius Gracchus by Cornelia, are celebrated for their intrigues and death. By attempting to revive the Agrarian law at Rome, they drew down upon themselves the vengeance of the senate. They were both killed, Tiberius 133 B.C. and Caius, some years after.

GRÆFE, or GRÆVIUS, John George, an erudite German writer, was born, in 1632, at Naumburg, in Saxony; studied at Leipsic and Deventer; was, in succession, professor at Duisburg, Deventer, and Utrecht; and died in 1703. To Græfe, who was a modest and worthy as well as a learned man, the literary world is indebted for editions of several classics; the Thesaurus of Roman Antiquities, in twelve folio volumes; and the Thesaurus of Italian Antiquities, in six folios.

GRÆME, John, a Scotch poet, born at Carnwarth, Lanarkshire, 1745. As the youngest of four sons and of a weakly constitution, he was intended for the ministry by his father, a farmer of the middling class, whose income arose chiefly from his industry. From the school of Lanark, he was removed to Edinburgh university, where his talents soon displayed themselves in the composition of elegant Latin, and in the acquisition of the more abstruse sciences of natural philosophy and metaphysics. He declined accepting an exhibition at the university of St. Andrew's, and satisfied with the friendship of Wilkie, the author of the Epigoniad, he devoted himself fully to the cultivation of the muses, in the ease and retirement of a college life, but his rising fame was cut short by the appearance of a rapid consumption, of which he died 26th July, 1772, aged 22. His poems consisting of elegies and miscellaneous pieces were printed at Edinburgh 1773, 8vo. and exhibited him in the character of a spirited author, and a benevolent man.

GRAFIGNY, Frances, a French lady, who wrote the "*P*eruvian Letters," an admired and elegant performance, translated into every European language. After her husband's death, who was chamberlain to the duke of Lorraine, and from whom, for his brutality, she was separated, she removed to Paris, to live with the wife of marshal Richelieu, where she died 1763, aged 65. She wrote also Genie—la Fille d'Aristide, two dramatic pieces.

GRAFTON, Augustus Henry Fitzroy, duke of, was born Sept. 23, 1736. He was educated under Dr. Newcombe, at Haekney, and next at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He succeeded his grandfather in the family honors in 1757; and in 1765, was appointed secretary of state; but the year following he relinquished that station, and soon after became first lord of the treasury, which he held till 1770. During his administration he was virulently attacked by Junius, who seems to have been actuated by personal enmity. In 1771, the duke was nominated lord privy seal, which office he resigned in 1775, and acted in opposition to the court till 1782, when he was again in place for a short time. After this he was uniformly an opponent of ministers till his death, March 11, 1811. Though his grace was an avowed Socinian, and regularly attended the meeting house in Essex-street, he was chancellor of the university of Cambridge, to which dignity he was elected in 1768. He was the author of—1. Hints submitted to the serious attention of the clergy, nobility, and gentry newly associated, 8vo. 1789.—2. Apuletherus, a volume of essays on theological subjects, 8vo. He was at the expense of reprinting an edition of Griesbach's Greek Testament.

GRAHAM, George, an eminent watch and clockmaker, born at Gratrix, Cumberland, 1675. In 1688, he came to London, and some time after lived in the family of Tompion, a clockmaker, who knew his merit, loved his person, and respected his abilities. To the most perfect knowledge of mechanics he added practical astronomy, and by his perseverance and accuracy, he not only improved but invented several astronomical and mathematical instruments, with a degree of perfection and dexterity hitherto unknown. The great mural arch in Greenwich observatory, was made for Dr. Halley under his inspection, and divided by his own hand; and with his sector Dr. Bradley first discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. But not only England was benefited by his genius, but the rest of Europe. The instruments with which the French academicians made observations to ascertain the figure of the earth, and those which enriched the collections and cabinets of the king of Spain, and other princes, were all constructed by this most ingenious and eminent artist. As a member of the Royal Society, he contributed some valuable discoveries, especially on the horary alteration of the magnetic needle, and a quick-silver pendulum, and other particulars respecting the simple pendulum. With all the powers of his genius, he was candid and modest, friendly and communicative, and more anxious to advance the happiness of mankind by the improvement of science, than to accumulate a private fortune. The remains of this most respectable man were carried Nov. 24, 1751, with great solemnity, to Westminster, and deposited in the same grave with his friend and master Tompion.

GRAHAME, James, a Scottish poet, was born in 1765, at Glasgow, and was educated at the university of that city. His first occupation was that of an attorney (which was his father's); in 1795, he was called to the bar; and, in 1809, he relinquished the bar for the church, and obtained the curacy of Shepton Marnay, whence he removed in May, 1811, to that of Sedgfield, in Durham. He died in little more than four months after he removed to Sedgfield. Grahame's chief works, are, The Sabbath; The Birds of Scotland; and The British Georgics, and he excels in description, and in the expression of tender, affecting, and devotional feelings.

GRAHAM, John, minister plenipotentiary to the court of Brazil, died at Washington August 6, 1820, aged 46. His ill health had induced him to return. While a member of the legislature of Virginia, he was appointed secretary to the American legation in Spain; afterwards secretary for the territory of Louisiana; then chief clerk in the department of state. In 1818, he went on a mission with Rodney and Bland for political information to Buenos Ayres. His long and valuable report was made Nov. 5, 1818, and is among the printed state papers. His worth was attested by letters of Madison and Monroe published in Nat. Intel.

GRAIN, John Baptiste le, a French historian born 1565. He was counsellor and master of the requests to queen Mary de Medicis, and became a great favorite with Henry IV. He wrote the Decades, containing the History of Henry IV. and the History of Louis XIII. to the death of marshal d'Ancre 1617. He was so censured, and so illiberally abused by the jesuits, who interpolated his works to make him appear ridiculous, that he ordered in his will that none of his descendants should be educated by the jesuits. He died at Paris 1643.

GRAMAYE, John Baptist, provost of Arnheim, and historiographer to the Low Countries, was taken during his voyage from Italy to Spain, and carried to Algiers. He returned home and died at Lubec 1635. He wrote an History of Africa—“Peregrinatio Belgica, a valuable work—Antiquitates Flandriae,” and some poetry.

GRAMONT, Antony duke of, marshal of France, is known as a warrior and as a writer. He was of the family of Gramont in Navarre, and by marriage was allied to cardinal Richelieu. He wrote two volumes of Memoirs, and after being the greatest ornament of the court of Louis XIV. he died 1679, aged 74.

GRAND, Antony le, a Cartesian philosopher of the 17th century, author of some historical treatises—of a Sacred History from the Creation till the Age of Constantine the Great, published in London 8vo.—and of Institutio Philosophiæ Descartes.

GRAND, Joachim le, a French political writer, much esteemed at the court of Louis XIV. He wrote some interesting tracts on the History of France, besides translations of Lobo's and of Ribeyro's Histories, and the History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon, 3 vols. He died 1733, aged 80.

GRANDI, Francis Lewis, a native of Cremona, professor of philosophy at Florence, afterwards at Pisa, and then abbot of St. Michael at Pisa, where he died 1742, aged 71. He wrote various mathematical works of merit.

GRANDIER, Urban, a Jesuit, native of Bouvere, near Sablé, curate and canon of St. Peter's Loudun, in France. He was an eloquent preacher, and as he recommended confession to the curate at Easter, he drew upon himself the envy and resentment of the monks at Loudun. He was accused of criminal conversation with maids and married women in his own church, and when honorably acquitted, his enemies inveighed against him, for causing the Ursuline nuns of Loudun to be possessed with the devil. The folly of this accusation would have appeared before impartial judges, but the monks persuaded cardinal Richelieu, that Grandier was the author of “la Cordonniere de Loudun” a severe satire upon himself, and consequently his fate was determined upon. He was ordered to be tried, and soon found guilty of magic, witchcraft, and possession, and condemned to be burnt alive, and to have his ashes dispersed in the air. The dreadful sentence was executed, and this innocent man perished in the flames, because his enemies were acrimonious against him, and their virulence was supported by the approbation of a gloomy tyrant in power.

GRANET, Francis, a learned French writer, intimate with the abbé de Fontaine, who speaks with great respect of his talents and amiable character. He translated Newton's Chronology, and wrote Remarks on Racine and Corneille, and was for some time engaged as a journalist at Paris, where he died 1741.

GRANGE, Joseph de Chancel, a French writer, who brought upon himself several difficulties, with imprisonment and exile, in consequence of a satirical work on Philip duke of Orleans. He died 1758, aged 82, leaving several works. His tragedies are much admired, as well as his miscellaneous pieces, and they display genius, judgment, and sublimity.

GRANGE, Nicholas, an able writer and critic. He translated Lucretius with notes, and edited the Greek antiquities of le Bos. His translation of Seneca appeared after his death, with an account of his life by his friend Diderot. He died at Paris 1775, aged 87.

GRANGER, or GRAINGER, James, M.D., a physician, known as the author of a poem on the Sugar Cane, of a translation of Tibullus, and of some medical tracts, was born at Dunse in the south of Scotland 1722. He was educated at Edinburgh, and was under lord Stair, as surgeon in the army, during the German campaign of 1749, and afterwards he practised in London, where his genius and learning procured him the friendship of Shenstone and other men of letters. Probably his success as a physician was not equal to his expectations, as he left London and embarked to settle at the Island of St. Christopher. He wrote his Sugar Cane, which he came to England to publish, and after a few years' residence, again returned to his favorite island, where he died of a contagious fever, 1746. His wife and one daughter survived his loss. In his character he was a man of pleasing manners, and of great benevolence of heart. His merits as a poet are well known. Besides the Sugar Cane, he wrote an Ode to Solitude,—a West Indian Ballad,—Historia Febris Anomalæ Batavæ, 1746,—a Treatise on the more common West India Diseases, 8vo.—a Translation of Tibullus' Elegies into English verse.

GRANGER, James, author of the Biographical History of England, 4 vols. 4to. a valuable work, was vicar of Shiplake, Oxon, and died 15th April 1776, in consequence of an apoplectic fit, with which he had been attacked on the preceding day, whilst administering the sacrament in his own church.

GRANGER, Gideon, post master general of the United States, graduated at Yale college 1787. He settled in Connecticut as a lawyer. In 1801, he was appointed postmaster general, and held the office till 1814. He then became an inhabitant of the state of New York. He was chosen into the senate, and did all in his power to promote internal improvements. He gave one thousand acres of land in aid of the great canal. He died 1822, aged 55.

GRANT, Francis, lord Cullen, an eminent lawyer and judge of Scotland, born of the ancient family of the Grants, about 1660. He was educated at Aberdeen, and finished his studies under Voet at Leyden, and displayed even in his younger years, such assiduity as promised the highest exertions. On his return to Scotland he became the friend of sir George Mackenzie, and distinguished himself by the able and constitutional character which he supported at the revolution. While in the Scotch convention of estates, some of the aged lawyers argued in favor of the house of Stuart, he boldly and manfully adopted the principles of the English nation, and asserted the right of the people to fill up the vacant throne. This decided conduct tended not a little to recommend the succession of William III. and Grant thus became a popular advocate, and a politician whose opinions were respected and universally approved. Without his solicitation he was created a baronet by queen Anne in 1705, and a year after he was nominated one of the judges of Scotland, when he assumed the title of lord Cullen. After 20 years of indefatigable and honorable labor devoted to the good of his country, and the impartial administration of her laws, this upright magistrate fell a sacrifice to an illness of three days, 16th of March 1726, in his 66th year. Respected as a judge in public, and as a man in private life, he was equally great as a writer. His essays on law, religion, education, and on several literary subjects, proved him to have been a man of solid sense, extensive erudition, and strongly fixed principles.

GRANT, Patrick, a Scotch judge, by the title of lord Preston-Grange, was born at Edinburgh 1698, and studied at Glasgow, Paris, and Leyden. He was member of the house of commons, and in 1746 was made lord advocate, and in 1754 advanced to the bench. He wrote some ingenious pieces against the rebellion of 1745, and greatly distinguished himself as a lawyer. He died at Edinburgh 1762, aged 64.

GRANVILLE, George, viscount Landsdowne, an English poet, second son of Barnard Granville esq. was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He had a strong passion for a military life; but his father checked his ambition when he expressed a wish, on the insurrection of the duke of Monmouth, to arm in defence of the king, and his ardor was renewed at the invasion of the prince of Orange, but he was equally rebuked, and he, with his family, remained quiet spectators of the revolution, and acquiesced in the measures of parliament. Unable to shine in the field he devoted himself to the cultivation of the muses, and soon told the world, in all the sweetness of amorous poetry, how much he was charmed with the beauty of Myra, a name under which he immortalized the charming, but inexorable countess of Newburgh. He wrote also some dramatic pieces, and his play of the "British Enchanters," introduced on the stage under the care of Betterton, called and obtained the public applause for 40 successive nights. Thus distinguished as a writer, and flattered by the muse of Addison and of Dryden, Granville, at the age of 35, was introduced to queen Anne after her accession, and found that polite reception which his character and his great veneration for his royal mistress deserved. After the death of his father, Granville was in parliament for Fowey, and by the death of his elder brother, who died governor of Barbadoes, he was now at the head of his family, and in possession of a very ample fortune. A change of administration, however, cut off his prospects of aggrandizement, till, at the trial of Sacheverell, in 1710, his friends were again replaced into the favor of the queen, and he became secretary at war in the room of Walpole. In 1711 he was created baron of Bideford, viscount Landsdowne, in Devonshire. In 1712 he was made privy counsellor, comptroller, and afterwards treasurer of the household. The death of the queen removed him from his offices; but he did not forget his friends, and therefore strongly protested against the attainting of Ormond and Bolingbroke. As he was suspected of violent attachment to the pretender's party, and was even suspected of planning an insurrection in the West, at the rebellion of 1715, he was arrested on the 26th Sept. and committed a close prisoner to the Tower, where he remained till 1717. As he continued to oppose the ministry his conduct was always suspected by the court, and therefore, on the breaking out of Atterbury's accusation, he retired to France to avoid the imputation of treason and the persecution of his enemies. After 10 years' residence at Paris he returned to England, and published, in 1732, his poems, corrected of their juvenile inelegancies, together with a vindication of his uncle sir Richard Granville, against the misrepresentations of Burnet, of Echard, and Clarendon, in 2 vols. 4to. He died 30th Jan. 1735, aged 68.

GRANVILLE, John Carteret, earl, a British statesman, the son of Lord Carteret, was born in 1690, and was educated at Westminster School, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where his acquirements gave an earnest of his future eminence. His attachment to the house of Hanover was rewarded by office and honors. In 1719 he was ambassador to Sweden; in 1721 he succeeded Craggs as secretary of state; and, between 1723, and 1730, he twice filled, and with public approval, the high station of lord lieutenant of Ireland. On his last return to England, he became a strenuous opponent of Sir Robert Walpole, and, on the expulsion of that minister, was appointed secretary of state. He, however, resigned in 1744. In all the subsequent political contests of the second George's reign, Earl Granville bore a part, and he died president of the council in 1763. Granville was a lover and patron of learning, but wished to confine it within a narrow circle, for he deemed it proper to retain the humbler classes of society in profound ignorance. "He was," says Horace Walpole, "an extensive scholar, master of classic criticism, and of all modern politics. He was precipitate in his manner and rash in his projects; but though there was nothing he would not attempt, he scarcely ever took any incasures necessary to the accomplishment. He would profess amply, provoke indiscriminately, oblige seldom. It is difficult to say whether he was oftener intoxicated by wine or ambition; in fits of the former he showed contempt for every body; in rants of the latter, for truth. His genius was magnificent and lofty, his heart without gall or friendship; for he never tried to be avenged on his enemies, or to serve his friends."

GRASSE, Francois Joseph Paul, count de, commander of the French fleet in the American service in the revolutionary war, died in France 1783, aged 65. His family were exiles in the revolution of France. His son in 1795 commanded a man of war in the British service.

GRASWINCKEL, Theodore, a native of Delft, who died at Mechlin 1666, aged 66. He was eminent not only as a lawyer, but as a man of letters, and he was made knight of St. Mark by the Venetians for vindicating them against the duke of Savoy in his work called Libertas Veneta. He was buried at the Hague, where a monument is erected to his memory. He wrote besides de Jure Majestatis against Buchanan, and other learned and valuable treatises.

GRATIAN, a Roman, emperor in conjunction with his father Valentinian. He was cruel in his government, but warlike in the field, and successful against the Goths, and the other barbarians who had invaded the Roman empire. He was killed in a revolt A.D. 383, aged 24.

GRATIAN, a Benedictine monk of Chiusy in Tuscany, in the 12th century, employed for 24 years in writing a book to reconcile the contradictory canons one to the other. This book called "Decretals," was in high repute for some centuries, and greatly contributed to advance the authority and supremacy of the papal see.

GRATTAN, Henry, a statesman, was born about 1750, in Dublin, of which city his father was recorder. He studied at Trinity-college, and next in one of the inns of court, where he was called to the bar, but relinquished that profession for the senate. He was elected into the Irish parliament in 1775; and by his powerful remonstrances obtained for his country a participation in the commerce of Britain, for which he was rewarded with a vote of fifty thousand pounds. In 1790, he was returned for the city of Dublin, and from that time was the active leader of the opposition till the union, which measure he resisted with all his eloquence; but when it was effected he accepted a seat in the imperial parliament for Malton. In the late war he supported government, with great ability; but his principal exertions were called forth in advocating the Catholic claims, to which cause he fell a martyr by leaving Ireland in an exhausted state to carry the petition with which he was intrusted to England. He died soon after his arrival, May 14th, 1820; and his remains were interred in Westminster abbey.

GRAVES, Richard, a popular English writer. He was born at Micleton, Gloucestershire, 1715, and after receiving his education at Abingdon school he removed to Pembroke college, Oxford. He studied physic for some time, but abandoned it for divinity, and entered into orders in 1740. He distinguished himself much as a popular and pleasing writer, and every where displayed that ease, that freedom, and that good humor which were so eminently visible in his character. The best known of his publications are, the Festoon, or Collection of Epigrams, 12mo.—Lucubrations, in prose and rhyme, published under the name of Peter Poinfret—the Spiritual Quixote, 3 vols. 8vo. a work of merit, in which he successfully exposed to ridicule the conduct and tenets of the methodist—Eugenius, or Anecdotes of the Golden Bull—Colunella, or the Distressed Anchorite—Plexippus, or the Aspiring Plebeian—political pieces, under the name of Euphrosyne—Recollections of some Particulars in the Life of his friend Shenstone—Life of Commodus, translated from the Greek of Herodian—Hiero, or Royalty, from Xenophon—Sermons on Various Subjects—Meditations of Antoninus from the Greek—the Reveries of Solitude—the Coalition, or Rehearsal of the Pastoral Opera of Echo and Narcissus—the Farmer's son, as a Companion to Anstey's Farmer's daughter—the Invalid, with the Means of enjoying Long Life and Senilities. This truly amiable man, long respected for his benevolence, and the urbanity of his manners, died 1804, in his 90th year.

GRAVESANDE, William James, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Delft in Holland, 1688. He was educated at Leyden, and intended for the law, and before the age of 19 he wrote an able treatise on perspective. He settled at the Hague 1707, and practised at the bar, but his acquaintance with learned men led him to the cultivation of literature, and he was one of those who united in the periodical review called "le Journal Litteraire," from 1713 to 1722. In 1715 he was one of the delegates sent to congratulate George I. on his accession to the English throne, and during his stay in England, he became the friend of the great Newton, whose sublime philosophy he afterwards taught when elected to the mathematical and philosophical chair of Leyden. This learned man died 1742, after long enjoying the respect of his countrymen by his patriotism, talents, and assiduity. He wrote among other things "an Introduction to Newton's Philosophy"—"a small treatise on the Elements of Algebra,"—a Course of Logic and Metaphysics.

GRAVINA, John Vincent, an illustrious lawyer, born at Roggiano, 18th Feb. 1664, and educated under his relation Gregory Caloprese, the well known philosopher. He afterwards studied at Naples, and so ardent was his attachment to literature and science, that each day he dedicated 10, often 12 hours to his improvement. He went to Rome 1696, and some time after was made professor of canon law in the Sapienzi college, by Innocent XI. He was invited by liberal promises and high patronage to settle in the universities of Germany, and also at Turin, but he preferred his residence, where he died of a mortification in his bowels, 6th Jan. 1713. Though learned, he was unhappily of a disagreeable temper, and spoke with such freedom and contempt of mankind, that he raised himself many enemies. He wrote various works, but that which entitles him to the praises of the learned, is his three books, "de Ortu et Progressu Juris Civilis," the best edition of which is that of Naples, 2 vols. 4to. with the addition of his treatise de Romano Imperio. He wrote also five tragedies besides philological treatises, orations, and other small works.

GRAUNT, John, the celebrated author of "Observations on the Bills of Mortality," was born in Birchlane, London, 24th April, 1620. He was brought up in the rigid principles of the puritans, and as he was intended for trade, he received no advantages from grammar education, but was barely qualified in writing and arithmetic, for the business of a haberdasher. In this employment he gained by his good sense, and strict probity, the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens; so that he rose to all the offices of his ward; was a common council-man, and a captain, and then a major of the train bands. His "Observations" first appeared in 1661, and with such success, that Louis XIV. of France adopted his plans for the regular register of births and burials, and Charles II. in proof of his general approbation, recommended him to the Royal society to be elected one of their members in 1661-2. In 1665, the third edition of his popular book was printed by the society's printer, and the author, flattered by the honors paid to his literary services, abandoned the business of shopkeeper, and in 1666, became a trustee for the management of the New river, for the countess of Clarendon. In this new office, it has been reported by Burnet, that he was guilty of a most diabolical crime, by stopping all the cocks which conveyed water from Islington to London, the night before the great fire began, which consumed the city. The accusation, however, is false, as he was admitted among the trustees 23 days after the conflagration happened; and the malevolent report arose only after his death, and probably owed its origin to his change of religious principles, as about 1667, he reconciled himself to the tenets of the church of Rome. He died 18th April 1674, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Fleet-street, attended by many respectable friends; and among them by sir William Petty, to whom he left his papers. A fifth edition of his book appeared in 1676, under the care of his friend; and it may be fairly inferred, that to this work, and the persevering powers and inquisitive mind of the author, we are indebted for the science of political arithmetic, so ably treated afterwards by sir William Petty, Daniel King, Dr. Davenant, and other learned men.

GRAY, Thomas, an English poet, son of a reputable citizen, was born in Cornhill 26th Dec. 1716. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Peter-house, Cambridge, and four years after, in 1733, he came to town to apply himself to the study of the law. His pursuits were for a while suspended, while he accompanied his friend Horace Walpole on the continent. Two months after his return, in 1741, his father died, and he then discovered that his income was inadequate to support him in the study of the law, therefore he returned to Cambridge, where he afterwards chiefly fixed his residence. Between the years 1759 and 1762, he had lodgings in Southampton-row, to be enabled to consult the Harleian and other MSS. in the British museum, from which he made some curious extracts. In 1768, he was appointed professor of modern history at Cambridge, but his health was such, that he never executed the duties of the office. He died July 30th 1771. As a scholar, Gray was profound, elegant, and well-informed; he had read all the historians of England, France, and Italy, and was well versed in antiquities, in criticism, in morals, and politics; and he possessed the most refined taste in painting, architecture, and gardening. His letters are correct, pleasing, and instructive. His poems, which are very few, but most elegant, nervous and sublime, were published in 1775, in 4to. by his friend Mason, who had lived with him in intimacy since 1747, and who, therefore, was well qualified to prefix to the edition "Memoirs of his Life and Writings."

GRAY, William, lieutenant governor of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780. Mr. Gray was one of the most successful of American merchants. He was born in Lynn of humble parentage, and served his apprenticeship in Salem. The stock, with which he commenced business, was the character he had acquired as an apprentice. And such it was, that after twenty-five years from the time he commenced, he was considered and taxed as the wealthiest man in the place. He removed from Salem to Boston, and in 1810, was chosen lieutenant governor. He died 1825, aged 74.

GRAYSON, William, a senator of the United States, was a native of Virginia, and was in 1784, elected a member of congress by that state. He was in 1788, a member of the convention of Virginia, which assembled to consider the constitution of the United States, and made himself conspicuous in that assembly, both by his talents, and his union with Mr. Henry in opposing the adoption of the constitution. The next year he was appointed a senator of the United States, and died at Dumfries, while on his way to the seat of government, March 12th, 1790.

GREAVES, John, an eminent mathematician and antiquary, born 1602, at Colmore near Alresford, Hants, where his father was rector. He devoted his time to mathematics and oriental learning, and in 1630, he was chosen geometry lecturer in Gresham college. Intimately acquainted with the works of the most celebrated astronomers of the age, he wished to extend his knowledge by travelling, and accordingly, in 1635, he went to Holland to attend the lectures of Golius at Leyden, and afterwards passed to Paris, and then visited Rome and other parts of Italy. In June 1637, he embarked for Leghorn, and from thence he proceeded to Constantinople, where by the kindness of sir Peter Wyche, the English ambassador, he was introduced to Cyril Lucaris the Greek patriarch, who enabled him to procure valuable MSS. but whose violent death, however, soon frustrated his design, and rendered his longer residence at the Porte dangerous. He then embarked for Alexandria, and after visiting Rhodes he reached Egypt, September, 1638. After twice penetrating into the desert, measuring the pyramids, and making various observations on the climate, monuments, and manners of the country, he left Alexandria, April, 1639. He returned through Italy, and after visiting Florence and Rome with the eye of a philosopher and an antiquarian, he embarked at Leghorn, and reached London before midsummer 1640, richly loaded with the classical spoils of the East, Arabic, Persian Greek MSS. besides gems, coins, and other valuable antiquities. The political state of the kingdom, however, promised little encouragement to his studious pursuits, and for his attachment to his patron and to his royal master, he suffered much from the virulence and persecution of the parliament. He was removed from his professorship at Gresham college, and though appointed to the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, and permitted by the king to retain his Merton fellowship, he found himself disturbed in his views of arranging his papers for the press. Devoting himself to studious pursuits, he shunned the politics of the times, and chose rather to enrich English literature by the translation of Arabic and Persian manuscripts with explanatory notes. He died 8th Oct. 1652. The best known of his works are, his "Pyramidographia," and his "Description of the Roman Foot and Denarius." He had formed a plan for adopting the Gregorian calendar by omitting the bissextile days for 40 years, which though approved by the king and council, was not adopted through the turbulence of the times.

GREEN, John, an English prelate, born at or near Hull in Yorkshire, 1706. He was of St John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards usher of Lichfield school, and then chaplain to the duke of Somerset, who became his friend and active patron, and gave him the rectory of Borough Green near Newmarket. In 1748 he was made regius professor of divinity, in 1750 master of Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and in 1756, he became dean of Lincoln, and vice chancellor of the university. On the translation of Dr. Thomas to Salisbury, he was raised to the see of Lincoln, and in 1764, he resigned the headship of his college. In 1771 his income was increased by the addition of the residentiaryship of St. Paul's. It is remarkable that on the debate concerning the dissenters in 1772, he favored the bill for their relief, and was the only bishop who voted with that side of the house. He died suddenly at Bath, 25th April 1779. He wrote the "Academic, or a Disputation on the State of the University of Cambridge," and some sermons.

GREEN, Matthew, an English poet. His parents were dissenters, but he afterwards abandoned their tenets for the church of England. He held an office at the custom house, where he attended to his duty with diligence and ability. His best poem is the "Spleen," containing wit, elegance, and originality. He was a very amiable man, and died at the age of 41, 1737. His works have been elegantly edited by Dr. Aikin.

GREEN, Joseph, a poet, graduated at Harvard college 1726. He devoted himself to commercial pursuits. He had a vein of humor and satire, which he freely indulged, associated with a club of wits, not sparing the measures of government. At the beginning of the American revolution he went to England, and died in 1780, aged 74. He wrote a burlesque on a psalm of Mather Byles; he ridiculed the freemasons in the entertainment for a winter's evening in 1750; he wrote also the land bank; account of the celebration of St. John; and lamentation on Mr. Old Tenor. Such was his reputation for readiness in the use of his pen, that he was applied to on all sorts of occasions; and among others, this story is told, that one day a countryman came into his store, and requested him to write an epitaph on a man who died in his service. Green told him that in order to write, he must know something about the character of the man; but all he could pump out of the applicant was, that the deceased beat every body but himself in raking hay. He immediately took his pen and after putting down the name wrote—

He could rake hay, none could rake faster,

Except that raking dog, his master.

GREENE, Dr. Maurice, a musician, son of a London clergyman. He was organist, before the age of 20, to St. Dunstan in the West, and afterwards in the year 1718, to St. Paul's, and in 1727, to the royal chapel. In 1780, he took his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and was also appointed professor of music to the university. He projected the plan of reforming church music, which had been corrupted by mutilated copies, and the inattention of transcribers, and the design, stopped by his ill health, was happily completed by his friend Dr. Boyce. He died 1st Sep. 1755. His performances are mentioned by sir John Hawkins.

GREEN, Samuel, the first printer in North America. The press he used was procured by the Rev. Joseph Glover, who died on his passage to Massachusetts in 1638. It soon fell into the hands of Mr. Green. The first thing printed was the freeman's oath in 1639, the next an Almanac for New England, made by Mr. Pierse, a mariner, and the next the New England version of the Psalms in 1640. He afterwards printed Eliot's Bible and the laws of Massachusetts, Plymouth, and Connecticut. The time of his death is unknown.

GREENE, Nathaniel, a major general of the army of the United States during the American revolutionary war. His parents were quakers, and he had never discovered any disposition to abandon their principles till after the battle of Lexington. He could not extinguish the martial ardor which had been excited in his own breast, partly by the spirit which that event had enkindled in Americans throughout the whole continent, and partly by the military histories he had read with great delight. Receiving the command of three regiments with the title of brigadier general, he led them to Cambridge; in consequence of which the quakers renounced all connexion with him as a member of their religious body. On the arrival of Washington at Cambridge, he was the first, who expressed to the commander in chief his satisfaction in his appointment, and he soon gained his entire confidence. He was appointed by congress major general in 1776. In the battles of Trenton and Princeton he was much distinguished. He commanded the left wing of the American army at the battle of Germantown. In March 1778 he was appointed quarter master general, which office he accepted on condition that his rank in the army should not be affected, and that he should retain his command in time of action. This right he exercised at the battle of Monmouth. His courage and skill were again displayed in Rhode Island. He resigned the office of quarter master. In 1780 he was appointed to the command of the southern department. But notwithstanding the victory of Cowpens, he had to encounter a number of successive disasters; he was defeated at Guilford, and again at Camden, but prevented lord Rawdon from improving his success, and obliged him at length to retire beyond the Santee. While he was in the neighborhood of Santee, Greene hung in one day eight soldiers, who had deserted from his army. For three months afterwards there was no instance of desertion. A number of forts and garrisons in South Carolina now fell into his hands. He commenced the siege of Ninety six, May 22, but he was obliged on the approach of lord Rawdon in June to raise the siege. The army which had been highly encouraged by the late success, was now reduced to the melancholy necessity of retreating to the extremity of the state. The American commander was advised to retire to Virginia; but to suggestions of this kind he replied; "I will recover South Carolina, or die in the attempt." Waiting till the British forces were divided, he faced about, and lord Rawdon was pursued in his turn, and was offered battle after he reached his encampment at Orangeburg, but he declined it. Sept. 8th Greene covered himself with glory by the victory at the Eutaw springs, in which the British, who fought with the utmost bravery, lost eleven hundred men, and the Americans about half that number. For his good conduct in this action congress presented him with a British standard, and a gold medal. This engagement may be considered as closing the revolutionary war in South Carolina. During the remainder of his command he had to struggle with the greatest difficulties from the want of supplies for his troops. Strong symptoms of mutiny appeared, but his firmness and decision completely quelled it. He died 1796, aged 46. Congress ordered a monument to be erected to his memory at the seat of the federal government.

GREENUP, Christopher, governor of Kentucky from 1804 to 1808. He was a patriot of the American revolution, and participated in the perils of the war. He was for years a member of the state and national legislature. He died 1818. In the public estimation he was the most useful man in Kentucky.

GREENVILLE, sir Richard, grandfather to the well known sir Bevil Greenville, was son of sir Roger, and was born in Cornwall 1540. He served in the imperial army against the Turks, and was knighted 1571. He was, in 1535, sent on an expedition to America, and in 1591, he was commissioned to intercept a rich Spanish fleet, in conjunction with lord Howard. He with only a few ships attacked the enemy's squadron of 62 sail, on the American coast; but when about to sink his own ship he was carried on board the Spanish fleet, and died three days after of the wounds which he had received.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, St., the son of the bishop of Nazianzum, in Cappadocia, was born A.D. 323, and studied at Cæsarea, Alexandria, and Athens. After having displayed great theological and other talents, he was raised by Theodosius, in 380, to the archiepiscopal throne of Constantinople. He, however, soon resigned his high office, and retired to Nazianzum, where he died in 389. His works, which form two folio volumes, consist of sermons, poems, and letters, and are pure in their style and highly eloquent.

GREGORY, St., surnamed the Great, was descended from an illustrious Roman family. He was made prefect at Rome 573, by Justin the younger, but he soon after quitted all secular employments to retire to a monastery. He was sent, by Pelagius, to Constantinople as nuncio, and on the death of that pontiff, he was elected in his room 590. He labored earnestly in his new dignity to heal differences, and to make proselytes; and in Sardinia, and also in England, by the preaching of Augustine, the monk, the blessings of the gospel were rapidly spread. This mild and benevolent pontiff died 12th March, 604, aged 60.

GREGORY I., Pope, who bears the surname of Great, and obtained the honors of sainthood, was born, about 544, at Rome; was raised to the papal throne in 590; and died in 604. It was by him that Augustin was commissioned to convert the Anglo-Saxons. Gregory was pious, charitable, and a reformer of the clerical discipline; but he had lofty notions of papal authority; could, for political purposes, flatter the vicious great; and was an inveterate enemy of classical literature. His works occupy four folio volumes.

GREGORY II., a native of Rome, elected pope after Constantine, 715. He was an enlightened and virtuous pontiff, and died 12th Feb. 731.

GREGORY III., a native of Syria, who succeeded the preceding, 731. He excommunicated the Iconoclastes, and solicited the assistance of Charles Martel, against the Lombards, who ravaged Italy, by means of a pompous embassy which is regarded by some authors as the origin of the apostolic nuncios in France. He was a charitable but magnificent pontiff, and the first who added temporal consequence and imposing splendor to the ecclesiastical power of the holy see. He died 23th Nov. 741.

GREGORY IV., a native of Rome, elected pope 827, or 828. He rebuilt Ostia, and visited France, to reconcile the jarring interests of the royal family, but returned without accomplishing his designs, and died at Rome, 25th Jan. 844.

GREGORY V., Brunon, a German, elected pope after John XVI. 996. He was opposed by Crescentius, the consul of Rome, who raised to the holy seat the anti-pope, John XVII. but the usurper was expelled by the influence of the emperor Otho, who was the relation of Gregory, and excommunicated in the council of Pavia. He died 18th Feb. 999, aged 27.

GREGORY VI., John Gratian, a Roman, elected pope 1044, after Benedict IX. He labored zealously to restore the revenues of the church to their former flourishing situation, and punished peculators and plunderers, but his anathemas offended those who reaped advantage from the public calamities, and a formidable party was raised against him. Gregory defeated them, and rendered travelling easy and safe, but the severity of his measures displeased again the Romans, who preferred public robbery to private industry, and Gregory, in disgust, abdicated the tiara, in the council of Sutri, near Rome, 1046, and was succeeded by Clement II.

GREGORY VII., Hildebrand, son of a carpenter of Soano, in Tuscany. He entered among the monks of Cluni, and obtained preferment at Rome, and in 1073 was elected successor to Alexander II. In his new dignity, the pope soon assumed extraordinary powers, and claiming superiority, not only in all spiritual but temporal affairs, he regarded the sovereigns of Europe as vassals whom he could depose and appoint at his pleasure. His presumption soon embroiled him with his ancient friend Henry IV. emperor of Germany, who had the weakness to submit to his power by the most mortifying penance. A reconciliation was followed by fresh disputes, and at last Henry elected another pontiff, in opposition to Gregory, while the offended Italian prevailed upon the German princes to appoint another emperor. At last Gregory, tired with the dissensions, which his inordinate ambition had raised around him, and disgusted with the murmurs of the Romans, retired to Salerno, where he died 24th May, 1085.

GREGORY VIII., Albert de Mora, of Benevento, succeeded Urban III. as pope 1187, and died two months after, 17th Dec. exhorting the Christian princes to undertake a crusade against the infidels. The anti-pope Bourdin assumed also the name of Gregory VIII.

GREGORY IX., Ugolin, of the family of the counts of Segni, and nephew to Innocent III. was elected pope 1227. He excited the Christian princes to undertake a crusade, and Frederic, emperor of Germany, though twice excommunicated for his disputes with the see of Rome, joined the expedition. He died 12th Aug. 1241.

GREGORY X., Theobald, of the noble family of the Visconti, at Placentia, was elected pope 1271, while he was in the Holy-land, with Edward king of England. He summoned a general council at Lyons, and labored earnestly to heal all schisms in religion, and to reconcile the Eastern and Western churches. He died 10th Jan. 1276, at Arezzo.

GREGORY XI., Peter Roger, nephew to Clement VI. and son of the count of Beaufort, of Limousin, was elected pope 1370. He was a zealous promoter of concord and reconciliation among the Christian princes, and distinguished himself by his benevolence, his charity, and his liberal patronage of letters. He quitted Avignon, where the popes had fixed their residence for several years, and transferred the see to Rome, where he died 28th March, 1378, aged 47.

GREGORY XII. Angelo Corario, a native of Venice, made a cardinal by Innocent VII. and elected pope 1406, during the schism in the West. He was opposed by Benedict XIII. the other pope, and at last a general council, held at Pisa, deposed both the competitors, and elected Alexander V. in their room. Gregory, who wished to oppose the proceeding of the council, at last fled before the storm to Gaeta and Rimini, and sent his abdication to the council of Constance. He died at Recanati, 13th October, 1417, aged 92.

GREGORY XIII. Hugh Buoncompagno, a Bolognese, elected pope after Pius V. 1572. He was an able civilian, and warmly opposed the protestants. He embellished Rome with churches, palaces, and porticos, and chiefly immortalized himself by the reformation of the calendar, and the adoption of the style which bears his name. He was assisted in this honorable and necessary alteration by the labors of Lilio, an able astronomer of Rome, but though the plan was acknowledged universally useful, it was pertinaciously rejected by the protestant princes of Europe. Gregory also published the Decretals of Gratian, which were enriched with valuable learned notes. He died 10th April, 1585, aged 83.

GREGORY XIV., Nicolas Sfondrate, son of a senator of Milan, was elected pope after Urban VII. 1590. He declared himself, at the suggestion of Philip II. of Spain, against Henry IV. of France, and levied an army to enforce his threats, but his troops were defeated, and his military plans disconcerted. He died of the stone, 15th Oct. 1591, aged 57.

GREGORY XV., Alexander Ludovisio, of an ancient family of Bologna, was archbishop of his native town, and made a cardinal by Paul V. He was elected pope 1621, and died 8th July, 1623, aged 69. He erected the see of Paris into an archbishopric, and assisted the emperor and the king of Poland in their wars. He wrote Epistola ad Regem Persarum Schah Abbas, cum Notis Hegalsoni, 8vo. — Decisions de la Rote.

GREGORY, James, a Scotch mathematician, born and educated at Aberdeen. His strong genius began early to display itself, and in 1663 at the age of 24 he invented the reflecting telescope, which still bears his name, but which the inexperience of the London artists could not then construct according to his approbation. He afterwards went to Italy, which at that time was considered as the cradle of mathematical knowledge, and applied the powers of his mind with such success that he discovered a new analytical method of summing up an infinite converging series, to calculate with exactness the area of the hyperbola, and of the circle. On his return to London in 1669 he was chosen a member of the Royal society, and soon after engaged in an unfortunate controversy with Huygens about the quadrature of the circle, in which his arguments were false. His reputation as a mathematician, and as the inventor of the reflecting telescope, and of the burning concave mirror, was now so well established, that the royal academy at Paris proposed him to the French king as deserving an honorable pension from him, a step which was not, however, adopted. In 1672 he had a dispute, but in amicable terms with sir Isaac Newton after his wonderful discoveries on the nature of light, about the various utility of his dioptric telescope against that of the catoptric instrument of his antagonist. The able philosopher, whose genius daily contributed to the improvement of mathematical science, was unhappily attacked by a fever which proved fatal Dec. 1675, in his 36th year. His works are Optica Promota seu Abditia Radiorum Reflexorum & Refractorum Mysteria, 1663, translated by Dr. Desaguliers into English—Vera Circuli & Hyperbole Quadratura, besides some papers in the philosophical transactions.

GREGORY, David, nephew to the preceding, was born at Aberdeen 24th June, 1661. The fame of his uncle and the perusal of his papers excited his attention in mathematical pursuits, and at the age of 23 he was deemed capable to fill the mathematical chair of Edinburgh. He published, in 1684, an ingenious treatise called "Exercitatio Geometrica de Dimensione Figurarum," 4to. and soon after, on the appearance of Newton's Principia, he applied himself to study the great truths of that immortal philosopher, and was the first to introduce them into the university schools. In 1691 he went to London with the intention of soliciting the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, upon Dr. Bernard's resignation, and by the friendship of sir Isaac Newton, and of Flamsteed, he succeeded in his wishes. He now devoted himself to his laborious studies, and displayed great powers in the elements of optics and physical and geometrical astronomy, improving the discoveries of others by new and elegant demonstrations. He proposed to publish the works of all the ancient mathematicians, and in the prosecution of this plan produced an edition of Euclid in Greek and Latin, and prepared with his friend Halley, an edition of the Conics of Apollonius. His labors however were stopped by death. He died 16th Oct. 1710.

GREGORY, Dr. John, a physician of respectability, born at Aberdeen. He studied at Edinburgh and Leyden, and became professor of philosophy and medicine at Aberdeen. He wrote several valuable medical tracts, but he is chiefly known for his "Comparative View of the State of Man, and other Animals,"—a Father's Legacy to his Daughter, and other moral pieces. He settled in London in 1751, but removed to Edinburgh as professor of physic, in 1766, and died there 1773, aged 49. His works have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo.

GREGORY, George, a divine and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a clergyman in Ireland, and born in 1754. He was educated at Liverpool for the counting-house, in which he spent some years; but at length applied for, and obtained orders in the established church. In 1782 he settled in London, where he became evening preacher at the Foundling, and lastly vicar of Westham in Essex, for which preferment he was indebted to Mr. Addington, who employed him to defend his administration. He died in 1808. Dr. Gregory, for he had obtained a degree from Scotland, published—1. Essays, historical and moral, 8vo.—2. A Translation of Lowth's Lectures, 2 vols.—3. Church History, 2 vols.—4. The Life of Chatterton, 8vo.—5. The Economy of Nature, 3 vols. 8vo.—6. Sermons, 8vo. He left for the press, "Letters on Philosophy," 2 vols.; and "Letters to his Son," 2 vols.

GREGORY, James, M.D., F.R.S., a native of Aberdeen, was born in 1753, and died in 1821. Among his works are, Philosophical and Literary Essays, in two vols.; Cullen's First Lines of the Practice of Physic, with notes, in two vols., which went through several editions; and Conspectus Medicinæ Theoretica, two vols.

GREGORIUS, Georgius Florentius, or Gregory of Tours, a learned bishop of Tours, in the 6th century. He was an able writer, as his History of France, Lives of the Saints, and other works fully prove, though Gibbon censures his style as devoid of elegance and simplicity. He died about 595.

GRENAN, Benignus, a Latin poet, professor of rhetoric at Harcourt. He was born at Noyers, and died at Paris 1723, aged 42. He was the friend and the poetical rival of professor Coffin. His verses contain great elegance, with many noble and delicate sentiments.

GRENVILLE, George, a celebrated statesman, known in parliamentary history for his two bills for the more regular payment of the navy, passed in 1757, and for the trial of contested elections, passed in 1770. He was distinguished for his eloquence in the senate, and possessed that extensive and enlightened knowledge which fitted him for the highest offices of the state. He was in 1754, made treasurer of the navy, and became first lord of the treasury in 1763, but resigned two years after to lord Rockingham. He died 13th November, 1770, aged 58. By Elizabeth, daughter of sir William Wyndham, he had four sons and five daughters, and of these, the present marquis of Buckingham, who inherited the family estates in Buckinghamshire; lord Grenville, and Mr. Thomas Grenville, have raised themselves high in the public estimation for their services to their country, in the important offices which they have filled with so much ability, firmness, and wisdom.

GRESHAM, sir Thomas, descended from an ancient family in Norfolk, was born in London 1519, and was bound apprentice to a mercer. That his mind might, however, be somewhat more cultivated, he became a member of Caius college, Cambridge, where his proficiency was such that he was called by Caius the founder, "Doctissimus Mercator." He was admitted into the mercers' company in 1543, and about that time married, and in 1551, he went to Antwerp to settle as agent to king Edward, for taking up money from the Flemish merchants. In this office he displayed great dexterity and wisdom, and made the balance of trade preponderate much in favor of England. On Mary's accession he was removed from his office, in consequence of which he presented a petition to the queen, and represented in modest terms the many services which he had rendered to her brother Edward, and to the kingdom, in consequence of which he was restored to favor, and continued in the same employment under Elizabeth. In 1559, he was knighted by the queen. In 1566, he planned, and began to execute, an Exchange for the merchants, which in 1570, was opened by the queen in person, who gave it the epithet of Royal. Besides, he was a very liberal benefactor to various charities and institutions, and, in every respect showed that riches in his hand could best be employed in acts of benevolence and humanity. This truly illustrious character did not long enjoy the satisfaction of conscious and dignified virtue: he fell down senseless on his return from the exchange to his house, Bishopsgate-street, and expired soon after, 21st November, 1579. The character of this generous and public spirited man has been drawn accurately by Mr. Ward, who observes that, to the knowledge of ancient and modern languages, and an eagerness to patronize literature and learned men, he united a very comprehensive knowledge of commercial affairs, foreign and domestic. He therefore deservedly acquired an immense fortune, which rendered him not only the highest commoner in the kingdom, with the appellation of the Royal merchant, but the most capable and the most willing to employ his opulence in such acts as dignify human nature.

GRESSET, John Baptist Lewis, a celebrated French poet, known chiefly for his elegant, lively, and interesting poem called Vert-vert. His Cœuvres Diverses were published 1748, 12mo. He was director of the French academy, and obtained the order of St. Michael, and letters of nobility. He died at his native town, Amiens, 16th June 1777, aged 68. His comedy of the Mechant was a very popular play.

GRETSEER, James, a learned Jesuit, born at Marcdorf 1561. He was twenty-four years professor of morality and school divinity at Ingoldstadt, and published a great number of books on theological subjects, and against the protestants. To great learning he united unusual modesty. He died at Ingoldstadt 1635. His works were published at Ratisbon, in 17 vols. folio, by Nicéron, 1739.

GREVILLE, Fulk, Lord Brooke, was born, in 1554, at Beauchamp's Court, in Warwickshire, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Oxford. He was much in favor with Elizabeth and James I.; was the intimate friend of Sir Philip Sidney; and was acquainted with Camden, Shakspeare, Jonson, and many other of his eminent contemporaries. He was himself learned, and was a patron of learning. At Cambridge he founded a professorship of history. He is the author of a Life of Sir Philip Sidney; Poems; and other works. Ralph Heywood, one of his domestics, considering his services too long unrewarded, upbraided him in his chamber with unusual freedom, and upon finding his application disregarded, stabbed him mortally in the back with a knife or sword, and then retiring to an adjoining chamber, destroyed himself with the same weapon. This bloody catastrophe happened 30th September, 1628.

GREVIUS, or GRÆVIUS, John George, a learned Latin Critic, born at Naumbourg in Saxony, 29th Jan. 1632. By the persuasion of D. Blondel, at Amsterdam, he quitted the tenets of Luther for those of Calvin. His reputation was so well established that his assistance as public professor was solicited by the elector of Brandenburg, but he finally settled at Deventer, where he succeeded his friend Gronovius. After adorning, by his eloquence and the great powers of his mind, successively, the chairs of eloquence, politics, and history; and after being honored with the particular attentions of the states of Utrecht, who as well as many students from Germany and England, paid homage to his superior abilities; this excellent scholar was suddenly carried off by an apoplexy, 11th Jan. 1703, aged 71. As an editor and annotator, Grævius has acquired great celebrity. Hesiod, Suetonius, Cicero, Florus, Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, Cæsar, and Lucian, were edited by him, besides Callimachus, which his son, who died in his 23d year, had nearly completed. His chief work is his "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum," 12 vols. fol. to which he added Thesaurus Antiq. et Histor. Italiae, printed after his death, 3 vols. fol.

GREW, Obadiah, D.D., an English divine, born at Atherston, Warwickshire, 1607. He entered at Baliol college, and after taking his degrees in arts, he entered into orders at the age of 28, and favoring the views of parliament, settled at Coventry as minister of St. Michael's there. Active and exemplary in his conduct, he was an indefatigable parish priest, and as he sided with the presbyterians against the hierarchy, so he opposed them in their views of cutting off the king; and even drew a promise from Cromwell, as he passed through Coventry, in 1647, that no violence should be offered to his royal master. In 1651, he took both his degrees in divinity, but at the restoration he refused to conform, for which he was ejected from his parish. He died 22d Oct. 1698. He published Meditations on the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and other theological tracts.

GREW, Nehemiah, son of the preceding, was eminent as a writer and a physician. He was educated abroad, and was admitted into the college of physicians 1680. His great merits and extensive practice, in London, recommended him to the Royal society, of which he became fellow; and in 1677, secretary. Besides the publication of the philosophical transactions in which he was engaged, he sent to press the Anatomy of Plants, fol.—Comparative Anatomy of the Stomach, fol.—Catalogue of the Rarities of the Royal society—Cosmologia Sacra. He died suddenly, 1711, in London.

GREY, lady Jane, celebrated for her virtues and her misfortunes, was daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by Frances Brandon, daughter of Mary, dowager of France, and sister to Henry VIII. She was born in 1537, and from her very infancy showed great quickness and comprehension of mind. Under Harding and Aylmer, her father's chaplains, she improved herself in the various branches of learning; and became such a proficient in languages, that she spoke and wrote, with astonishing facility, the French, Italian, Latin, and it is said the Greek; and was also well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee. To these high acquirements in literature, were united great beauty, the mildest manners, and the most captivating virtues of humility, benevolence, and modesty. The alliances of her family, and their ambition, were too powerful to suffer her to live in her beloved seclusion. No sooner was the declining health of the sixth Edward perceived by his courtiers, than Dudley, duke of Northumberland, prevailed upon the unsuspecting monarch, to settle the crown on his relation, lady Jane, whose attachment to the principles of the reformation was indubitable; and to pass over his sisters Mary and Elizabeth. When this was effected, the artful favorite married his son Guilford Dudley to the future queen, and thus paved the way to the elevation of his own family to the throne. But while others rejoiced in these plans of approaching greatness, Jane alone seemed unconcerned, and when, at last, on Edward's death, she was hailed as queen by her ambitious father-in-law, Northumberland, she refused the proffered dignity, till the authority of her father the duke of Suffolk, and the entreaties of a husband whom she tenderly loved, prevailed upon her reluctantly to consent. She was as usual, conveyed to the tower, preparatory to her coronation, and she was proclaimed queen in the city, and honored with all the marks of royalty. This sunshine of prosperity, was, however, but transitory; her rival Mary proved more powerful, and the kingdom seemed to espouse her cause with such loyalty, that Northumberland and Suffolk yielded to the popular voice, and lady Jane after being treated as queen for a few days, descended again, and with exultation, to privacy. But misfortunes accompanied her fall. She saw her father-in-law and his family, her own father and his numerous adherents brought to the Tower, and at last expire under the hand of the executioner, and she herself together with her husband were to complete the bloody tragedy. She and lord Guilford and Cranmer were carried to Guildhall from the Tower and attainted of high treason, and condemned. Three months after her condemnation she was ordered to prepare for death, and as her husband was dissuaded from increasing their mutual bitterness by taking leave of each other, she gave him her last farewell through the window as he passed to the place of execution, and soon after she saw his headless body wrapped in a linen cloth borne to the chapel. From the horrid sight she was soon summoned herself to the scaffold, where she suffered with the most christian resignation, exclaiming with fervency, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." This bloody catastrophe took place 12th Feb. 1554.

GREY, Dr. Zachary, LL.D., an English scholar, descended from a Yorkshire family. He was of Jesus college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Trinity hall. He was rector of Houghton-Conquest, Bedfordshire, and vicar of St. Giles' and St. Peters' in Cambridge, and died 25th Nov. 1766, aged 79. He was author of near 30 publications, the best known of which is his edition of Hudibras, with curious and interesting notes, 2 vols. which has been censured and ridiculed by Warburton and H. Fielding, but ably defended by Warton on Shakspeare. He also answered Neale's History of the Puritans, 3 vols. 8vo. Dr. Grey was twice married and left two daughters.

GREY, Richard, D.D., an English divine, born 1693. He was of Lincoln college, Oxford, and obtained the livings of Kilcote, Leicestershire, and afterwards Hinton in Northamptonshire, and a prebend in St. Paul's. He published in 1736 an anonymous pamphlet called "the Miserable and Distracted State of Religion in England, upon the Downfall of the Church Established," 8vo.—and also "a New Method of Learning Hebrew without Points,"—Liber Jobi.—the Last Words of David—and some sermons. He left some daughters, and died 28th Feb. 1771, aged 78.

GRIBALDUS, Matthew, a learned civilian of Padua, who left Italy to embrace the protestant faith, and became professor of civil law at Tübingen. He followed the errors of the anti-trinitarians, for which he was obliged to fly from Tübingen, and he was at last seized at Bern, where the plague carried him off in Sept. 1564, and thus prevented the ignominious death which his persecutors would have inflicted upon him. He wrote some valuable books on civil law, the best known of which is "Commentarii in Legem de Rerum Mixtura, et de Jure Fisci."

GRIDLEY, Jeremy, attorney general of the province of Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1725. He was editor of the weekly rehearsal, a newspaper which commenced in Boston Sept. 27, 1731, and continued only for one year. He soon became pre-eminent as a lawyer, and was appointed king's attorney. In this capacity he in 1761 defended the writs of assistance, which the custom house officers had applied for to the superior court, and by which they would be authorized to enter at their discretion suspected houses. He was opposed with great force of argument by his former pupil Mr. Otis. He died 1767.

GRIDLEY, Richard, major general, was born in Boston 1711. In 1746 he was engineer in the reduction of Louisbourg. In 1755 he again entered the army as chief engineer and colonel of infantry. Under Winslow he was concerned in the expedition to Crown point in 1756, and constructed the fortifications on lake George. He served under Amherst in 1758, and was with Wolfe on the plains of Abraham. For his services Magdalen island was given him, with half pay. At the commencement of the revolution he was appointed chief engineer. He skilfully laid out the works in fortification of Breed's hill, the day before the battle of June 17th 1775, in which he was wounded. He died 1796, aged 84.

GRIDLEY, Elnathan, a missionary at Smyrna, graduated at Yale college 1820, and studied theology at Andover. He also studied physic. He was ordained as a missionary 1825, and sailed with Mr. Brewer 1826. After his arrival at Smyrna, he studied modern Greek and Turkish. In 1827 he accompanied a friend to Endervook, a Greek village, six miles from Caesaria, in the interior of Asia Minor. There he died Sept. 27, 1827, aged 31. Proposing to ascend mount Argeus, which is about thirteen thousand feet high, covered with perpetual snows, he with much fatigue Sept. 13th approached within three or four hundred feet of the summit, when he was prevented from advancing by perpendicular rocks. The next day he suffered from the headache and soon fell a victim to a malignant fever, occasioned probably by his imprudence.

GRIERSON, Constantia, a woman of great respectability as a scholar in Greek and Roman literature. She was born in Kilkenny, Ireland, of poor and illiterate parents, but she proved her title to celebrity by her edition of Tacitus, dedicated to lord Carteret, and by that of Terence, inscribed to his son, and also by her poems, and a Greek epigram of great merit. In acknowledgment of her literary abilities, lord Carteret inserted her name in the patent which granted the office of king's printer to her husband for life. She died in 1733, aged only 27. She received, as she informed Mrs. Pilkington, some instruction from the clergymen of her parish, but for the best part of her learning, she was indebted to her own industry. To her learning and philosophical knowledge, she united great modesty, genuine piety, and every female virtue.

GRIESBACH, John Jacob, a learned critic and divine, was born Jan. 4, 1745, at Buzbach, in Hesse-Darmstadt, where his father was a minister. The son was educated at Frankfort, afterwards at Tubingen, next at Halle, and lastly at Leipsic. In 1773 he was appointed professor extraordinary of divinity at Halle, where, in 1775, he published his edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings. This inestimable edition passed through several impressions, one of which was taken off at the expense of the late duke of Grafton. Professor Griesbach was called to the divinity chair at Jena, where also he became rector of the university, and privy counsellor for ecclesiastical affairs to the duke of Saxe Weimar. His critical notes upon the Scriptures are very valuable; but his publications are too numerous to admit of a list in this place. He died at Jena, March 24, 1812.

GRIFFIN, Cyrus, president of congress, was a native of England; in 1778 he was elected a delegate to congress from Virginia, and again in 1787. Under the constitution of the United States of 1789, he was a judge of the district court from 1789 for twenty-one years. He died 1810, aged 62.

GRIFFIN, Edmund D., a distinguished writer. In 1823 at the age of eighteen he was graduated at Columbia college with the highest honors of his class. After prosecuting the study of law about two months, he determined to prepare for the ministry, and entered on his studies in the seminary of the episcopal church. In August 1826 he was admitted to deacon's orders, and soon became an assistant preacher in the church in Hamilton square, New York, and also associate with Dr. Lyell. In the hope of promoting his ultimate usefulness he visited Europe in 1828. He returned to New York in 1830. Being immediately invited, in the absence of the professor, to deliver in the college a course of lectures on the history of literature, he performed this service in May and June. The lectures which are published related to Roman and Italian, and English literature, and are "a noble monument of promptitude, diligence and knowledge." He died Sept. 1st. 1830, aged 26. Two volumes of his works have been published with the title, Remains of Rev. Edmund D. Griffin, compiled by Francis Griffin; with a biographical memoir of the deceased, by John McVickar, D.D., 2 vols. 8vo. 1831. Among the pieces in his remains are his lectures and a journal of his travels.

GRIFFITH, Michael, a native of London, who studied at Seville and in the Low Countries, and became a jesuit, and was sent as missionary of his order to England. He died at St. Omer's 1652, aged 65. He wrote Annales Ecclesie Britannicæ, 4 vols. fol.—Britannia Illustrata, 4to.

GRIFFITHS, Ralph, LL.D., a native of Shropshire, known in the republic of letters as the first editor and proprietor of the Monthly Review, a periodical work, begun, in 1749, and by his assiduity and the co-operation of men of talents and information raised to great celebrity. This useful work was so ably and so successfully conducted, that it procured him a comfortable independence, on which he retired to his residence at Turnham Green, some years before his death. He was honored for his services to literature with the degree of doctor of laws from one of our American universities, and he died 1803, aged 83.

GRIFFITHS, Samuel Powell, M.D., a physician in Philadelphia, was born in that city 1759. His medical education was completed during his residence of three years in Europe. After his return he practised more than forty years till his death in 1826, aged 67. During the prevalence of the yellow fever, in various years, he never deserted his post. Yet he believed the fever to be contagious. The establishment of the Dispensary and other charitable societies were promoted by his efforts. Of the Eclectic repertory he was one of the editors.

GRIGNAN, Frances Margaret de Sevigné, countess of, daughter of the celebrated madame de Sevigné, was born in 1646. She married in 1669, count Grignan, an officer of high rank at the court of Louis XIV. Her residence in Provence with her husband, and at a distance from her mother, was the cause of the writing of those excellent letters, which passed between the mother and daughter. She had two daughters and one son. She died 1705, one year after the death of her son, and her husband survived her till 1714, aged 85.

GRIGNON, Charles, an artist, was the son of a clock-maker in Russel-street, Covent-garden, and born there in 1754. He discovered his genius for drawing at an early age; and at fifteen gained the prize of the silver pallet from the Society of Arts. He was at this time a pupil of Cipriani's, with whom he was a favorite. In 1769 he became a student of the Royal Academy; and in 1780, gained the gold medal for the best Historical painting, on the choice of Hercules. After this he was sent by the academy to Rome, where he painted a picture of the death of captain Cook. He also undertook another of Prometheus, for lord Clive. When the French entered Rome he went to Naples, and thence to Sicily, where he painted a portrait of Nelson. He next removed to Leghorn, and died there of a malignant fever, Oct. 29, 1804.

GRIMALDI, John Francis, a painter, born at Bologna 1606. He studied under his relations the Caracci, an I was honorably employed by Innocent X. in adorning the Vatican, and the other edifices of Rome. He also was engaged by Mazarin at Paris for three years in embellishing his palace and the Louvre, but the troubles of the times, and the warmth with which he espoused the cause of his patron, obliged him to fly to the jesuits for protection. On his return to Rome he gained the patronage of Innocent's two successors, Alexander VII. and Clement IX. and devoted the labors of his pencil in their service. He was also skilled in architecture, and 42 of his engravings in aqua fortis, are mentioned with great commendation. In him the celebrity of the painter was united with great benevolence and the most charitable disposition. He died at Rome 1660.

GRIMANI, Domenico, son of the doge of Venice, was born there in 1460. He was a learned man and the correspondent of Erasmus, and translated some of Chrysostom's homilies into Latin. He was made a cardinal and died 1523.

GRIMM, Frederick Melchior, baron de, the son of poor parents, was born, in 1723, at Ratisbon, and received a good education. The first step of his literary career was not a fortunate one. He produced, in Germany, a tragedy, which was hissed on the stage, and condemned by the critics. Obtaining the situation of tutor to the children of the count de Schomberg, he went with them to Paris, where he subsequently became principal secretary to the duke of Orleans, and intimate with all the men of letters of that period. His wit, manners, and talents, procured for him admission among the highest class of society. In conjunction with Diderot, he was employed by the duke of Saxe Gotha, to give him an analysis of all that occurred within the sphere of French literature. To this voluminous and amusing Correspondence, which, after a lapse of thirty years, was published in sixteen volumes, Grimm is indebted for his fame. In 1776 the duke appointed him his envoy at Paris, and gave him the title of baron. The French revolution frightened him from Paris, and, after having acted as Russian plenipotentiary to the circle of Lower Saxony, he died, in 1807, at Gotha. His fugitive pieces have been printed, as a supplement to his Correspondence.

GRIMKE, John F., judge of the supreme court of South Carolina, was a colonel in the war of the American revolution. He died in 1819. He published a revised edition of the laws of S. C. to 1789; on the duty of justices of peace; a probate directory.

GRINDAL, Edmund, D.D., archbishop of Canterbury, was born 1519. He was chosen lady Margaret's public preacher, and distinguished himself so much that Ridley bishop of London made him his chaplain 1550. The next year he was appointed chaplain to the king, but the succession of Mary clouded all his prospects. He fled to Strasburg, and there remained till the death of the queen, when his services were employed in drawing up the new liturgy and in opposing in a public dispute with seven other protestants the popish prelates. In 1559, he was made master of Pembroke hall, in the room of Young, who refused the oaths of supremacy, and the same year he was nominated to succeed after Bonner's deposition as bishop of London. In 1570, he was translated to York, and succeeded Parker five years after in the see of Canterbury. His elevation was of short duration. Elizabeth saw with displeasure that the frequent meetings of the clergy for purposes of mutual improvement, and for the better understanding of the scripture, were often converted into faction instead of christian edification, and she therefore directed Grindal to exercise his authority to abolish these prophesyings, as they were called. The primate who acknowledged that the interference of the laity in these public meetings was often subversive of good order and decorum, yet saw consequences in the friendly meeting of the clergy so favorable to the cause of religion, that he ventured to dispute with the queen about the propriety of her measures. Elizabeth was preemptory, her commands were issued to the bishops to silence all prophesyings and exercises, all preachers not lawfully called; and Grindal, after being allowed a decent time to consider of his conduct, was, by order of the Star-chamber, confined to his house, and his see sequestered from him. Though in some degree afterwards restored to his metropolitan power, yet he chose to resign his see, and to receive a pension from the queen. With this he retired to Croydon, but died two months after, 6th July, 1583. This learned prelate, whose firmness was doubted whilst he held the see of London, and seemed to waver in his treatment of the papists, wrote little. The patrons of his early life, were besides Ridley, secretary Cecil and archbishop Parker.

GRISAUNT, William, an English physician, astronomer and mathematician, who studied at Merton college, Oxford, and to avoid the suspicion of magic which in those barbarous ages attended the possession of learning, fled over to France. He settled at Montpellier and afterwards at Marseilles, where he acquired eminence and fame by an inquisitive examination of the diseases and constitution of his patients. His son rose to the pontificate under the name of Urban V. His works are mentioned in Aikin's Biog. Memoirs. The time of his death is unknown, though he was an old man in 1350.

GRISWOLD, Roger, governor of Connecticut, graduated at Yale college 1780, and afterwards studied law. In 1794 he was elected a member of congress. In 1801 he declined the appointment of secretary of war, offered him by Mr. Adams. In 1807 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut. He was lieut. governor from 1809 to 1811, when he was elected governor. He died 1812, aged 50. An eulogium was pronounced on him before the general assembly at New Haven by D. Daggett.

GROCYN, William, a learned Englishman, born at Bristol 1442, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. In 1479 he obtained from his college the Rectory of Newton Longville, Bucks, and afterwards in consequence of holding in the ablest manner a disputation before Richard III. when he visited Oxford, he was made prebendary of Lincoln. He travelled to Italy, and improved himself in the Greek, then little understood, under Demetrius Chalcondylas, and Politian, and at his return 1491, settled at Exeter college, Oxford, where he became public professor of his favorite language. He was the correspondent and friend of Erasmus. When that illustrious scholar visited Oxford, Grocyn received him with affection, and introduced him to Warham the primate, and other great and learned men. In 1490, Grocyn exchanged his living for the mastership of All-hallows college, Maidstone, Kent, where he died 1522, of a stroke of the palsy, which the year before had greatly impaired his faculties. He had little respect for Plato, but paid great homage to the philosophy of Aristotle, whose works, he undertook with Latimer, Linaere, and More, to translate, but did not pursue. A Latin epistle from him to Aldus Manutius, is preserved in Linaere's translation of Pro-aus de Sphæra. Though Erasmus says this is all he wrote, yet some other writings of his are mentioned by Bale and Leland.

GRONOVIVS, John Frederick; a respectable civilian, critic, and historian, born at Hamburg, 1613. After making great progress in literature at home, he travelled through Germany, Italy, and France, further to increase the resources of his mind, and on his return through Deventer, he was stopped and honorably appointed professor of polite learning. In 1653 he removed to Leyden as successor in the professorial chair, to Dan. Heinsius, and there he died greatly regretted, 1672. He published a dissertation on Status Sylva—a treatise on the Sesterce—a work of Ecclesiastical Writers, besides valuable editions of Plautus, Seneca, Sallust, Livy, Quintilian, and Pliny.

GRONOVIVS, James, son of the preceding, was born at Deventer, 20th Oct. 1645, and educated under his father at Leyden. In 1670, he visited England, and not only examined the valuable libraries of the universities, but he gained the friendship of the learned, of Pocock, Pearson, and M. Casaubon, and after his return to Leyden, he extended his travels to France, where he was introduced to Chaplain, d'Herbelot, Thevenot, and other scholars. Though his father's death disconcerted his plans, he proceeded to Italy, where the grand duke of Tuscany, in respect to his merits, granted him a pension, and a professor's chair, at Pisa, where he had for his colleague Henry Norris, afterwards a cardinal. After some time he left Tuscany, and returning by the way of Venice and Padua, he came to Leyden, where, in 1679, a professorship awaited him. In this peaceful retreat, endeared to him by the residence of his father, and the partialities of youthful life, he determined to pass the remainder of his days, and therefore rejected the honorable offers of a chair at Padua, and also at Keil, in Holstein, under the duke of Sleswick. He died 21st Oct. 1716. Gronovius was inferior to his father in modesty and moderation, though superior in learning; but his virulence against his literary antagonists was such, that he was called a second Scioppius.

GROS, Nicholas, a theologian of Rheims, whose opposition to the bull unigenitus, obliged him to fly from France. He was for some time in England, and wrote several things on temporary subjects. He was theological professor at Amersfort, and in his writings ably supported the jansenists in Holland. He died 1751, aged 76.

GROSE, Francis, an English antiquary, and able writer. He illustrated "the Antiquity of England and Wales" in 4 vols. 4to. "and of Scotland," in two. His design, with respect to Ireland, was checked by death, which carried him off in Dublin, in 1791, aged 52. He published besides "a Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue,"—Military Antiquities, and a treatise on Ancient Armour. His talents were much admired as a draughtsman, and he was equally respectable as a pleasing and agreeable companion in private life.

GROSLEY, Peter John, member of the academy of belles lettres, and of Inscriptions, was born at Troyes, and died there 1785, aged 67. He wrote "Recherches pour l'Histoire du Droit Francois," and the Lives of the two Pithou's, besides large contributions to the Encyclopedia, and the Dictionnaire Historique.

GROSS, John Daniel, professor of moral philosophy in Columbia college, and minister in the city of New York, was a German. During the revolutionary conflict he was a minister of a Dutch reformed church on the frontier of the state, and was exposed to many perils. After the war he removed to New York. He died 1812, aged 75. He published natural principles of rectitude; a systematic treatise on moral philosophy, 8vo. 1795.

GROSSETESTE, Robert, an English prelate, born about 1175, at Stradbrook, Suffolk. Though obscurely born, he received a decent education, most ably assisted by indefatigable application, at Oxford and Paris, where he became a respectable proficient in Greek literature, little regarded at that time. On returning from Paris, he read lectures on philosophy and divinity at Oxford, and from the celebrity which he acquired was made archdeacon of Chester, afterwards of Wilts, and in 1234-5 elected bishop of Lincoln. He died at Buckden, 1253, highly respected for learning, integrity, and piety, even in the opinion of Matthew Paris, who often speaks of him with marked diffidence. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle, and other voluminous works, mentioned in Tanner's Bibliothecæ. He possessed great learning, a clear and vigorous intellect. Dr. Pegge has written his life.

GROTIUS, or GROOT, Hugo, L.L.D. a celebrated writer, son of John de Groot, a respectable burgo-master of Delft. He was born at Delft, 10th April 1583, and from his earliest years displayed strong powers of mind, great genius, sound judgment, and a most retentive memory. He studied at the Hague, and afterwards removed to Leyden under the care of Francis Junius, and here Joseph Scaliger saw and admired his promising abilities, and affectionately interested himself in his improvement. In 1598 he accompanied count Justin of Nassau, and the grand pensioner Barneveldt, in their embassy to France, and he was received with every mark of kindness by the court, and presented by Henry IV. with his picture and a gold chain. The university of Paris also paid its respects to this learned youth, and granted him a doctor of law's degree before his return to Holland. On his return home, he began to practise as an advocate. His legal avocations, however, did not prevent him from making an indefatigable and effective use of his pen. The honors conferred on him kept pace with the reputation which he acquired. He was successively appointed historiographer, advocate general of Holland and Zealand, pensionary of Rotterdam, a member of the States General, and envoy to England, to adjust some disputes between the two countries. But, in 1618, his fortune changed, and, along with Barneveldt, he was involved in the hateful proscription of the Armenian party by Prince Maurice. He narrowly escaped the fate of Barneveldt, but was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Louvestein. At the expiration of eighteen months, however, which he had employed in writing his Treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion, he was delivered by the contrivance of his wife, who sent him out of the castle concealed in a large chest. Grotius sought an asylum in France, and it was during his residence there that he composed his great work, De Jure Belli et Pacis. After an absence of twelve years he returned to Holland, but persecution still awaited him, and he quitted his native land for ever. In 1635 Christina of Sweden appointed him her ambassador at Paris, and this office he held nearly eleven years. He died at Rostock, on his way to Sweden, in August, 1645. Among his works may be mentioned, Mare Liberum; De Antiquitate Republicæ; Institutions of the Laws of Holland; A History of the Goths; Annals of Belgium; and three Latin tragedies. The religious opinions of Grotius were very favorable to the church of England, and it is no despicable testimony to the purity and authenticity of the doctrines of that communion, that its tenets and discipline were commended and applauded by a man whose judgment was so discriminating, and whose opinion is so respectable and so satisfactory, especially on the subject of religion, to which he devoted for a long time all the powers of a strong, vigorous, and unprejudiced mind.

GROVE, Henry, a learned teacher among the presbyterians, born at Taunton, Somersetshire, 4th January 1683. He was descended from very respectable families in Devonshire and Wiltshire, by his father and mother, and therefore his education was particularly attended to. After being under the care of Mr. Warren, who kept an academy at Taunton, he went to London, and studied under his relation, Mr. Rowe, and by his learning and abilities, recommended himself to the notice of some respectable divines, among whom was Dr. Watts. At the age of twenty-two he began to be a preacher, and soon after married; and undertook with Mr. James, the care of Taunton academy, in the room of his friend Warren, where he continued very successfully employed for 18 years. During that time he engaged in the theological disputes which agitated the dissenters and the clergy, and he published his "Essay on the Terms of Christian Communion," and other things. He died 1737. He wrote Miscellanies in prose and verse, besides a Discourse on Saving Faith,—an Essay on the Soul's Immortality—and the numbers 588, 601, 626, 635, in the Spectator. His posthumous works appeared in 1740, 4 vols. 8vo.

GRUE, Thomas, a Frenchman at the end of the seventeenth century, who translated several English works into French, and among them, Ross's history of all Religions, and Rogers's Gate opened to the knowledge of Paganism.

GRUNER, John Frederic, an able theologian and scholar, born at Cobourg. He wrote an introduction to Roman Antiquities,—Miscellanea Sacra,—Critical Remarks on the Classics, besides editions of Cælius Sedulius, Eutropius, Paterculus, and other valuable works. He died 1778, aged 55.

GRUTERUS, Janus, an eminent philologist, born 3d December 1560, at Antwerp. His father was burgomaster there, and he was obliged to fly in consequence of signing that petition to the duchess of Parma, which gave rise to the word Guex. He came to Norwich with his wife, who was an English woman, and with his infant son. Under the eye of his mother, who was an excellent scholar, and could read Galen in the original, young Gruter made a rapid progress, and at the proper age he was sent to Cambridge. On the return of his parents to the continent he followed them and completed his education at Leyden, where he took a doctor's degree in civil law. During the political agitation of Flanders, he travelled into foreign countries, and was some time professor of history at Wittenberg, but refused to continue there, as a confession of faith, contrary to his sentiments, was tendered to him. He was afterwards offered a professor's chair at Padua, but he preferred the invitation which he had received to settle at Heidelberg. In this situation he published his large collection of inscriptions, dedicated to the emperor Rodolphus II. who in approbation of his merit granted him the license of publishing his own works and those of others, and intended him the honors of nobility, the completing of which his death prevented. He died 1527. He was an able critic, a man of extensive erudition, and a very voluminous and respectable writer.

GRYNÆUS, Simon, a learned German, son of a peasant of Swabia, born at Veringen, in the county of Hohenzollern, 1493. He studied with great assiduity, and became Greek professor at Vienna, but his attachment to the protestants exposed him to many dangers and frequent persecution. He was imprisoned by the monks at Baden, and after his liberation had a conference with Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg. He was afterwards for six years Greek professor at Heidelberg, from whence he went to Basil, and, in 1531, visited England with strong recommendations from Erasmus to sir Thomas More, Montjoy and others. In 1534, he was employed in reforming the church and school of Tübingen, and two years after returned to Basil, and in 1540, assisted at the conferences of Worms. He died of the plague the next year at Basil. He was an excellent scholar, whose great erudition is usefully displayed in his editions of the Almagest of Ptolemy, of Euclid, Plato, and Proclus.

GRYPHIUS, Sebastian, a celebrated printer at Lyons, born at Reuthlingen in Swabia 1493. He was equally known as a scholar, and Conrad Gesner, in testimony of his merit, dedicated one of his books to him, and Julius Scaliger also spoke respectfully of his abilities. The books printed by Gryphius are much admired, especially his Hebrew, Greek, and Latin editions, and particularly his "Latin Bible," in 2 vols. fol. in the largest types then seen, 1550. He died 1556, and left his trade and reputation to his son and able successor Anthony Gryphius.

GUA DE MALVES, John Paul de, a French ecclesiastic, born in Languedoc. He first conceived the idea of an encyclopedia, which was so successfully executed by d' Alembert, Diderot, and others. He wrote Usage de l'Analyse de Descartes, and died at Paris 1786, aged 74.

GUADAGNOLO, Philip, a learned orientalist, born at Magliano. He chiefly devoted himself to the study of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldean, Syriac, Persian, and particularly Arabic, which he taught many years in the Sapienza college at Rome. He was so well versed in Arabic, that he spoke an oration in that language before queen Christina at Rome 1656. He also at the request of pope Urban VIII. undertook in 1622, and finished after 27 years' labor, a translation of the Bible into Arabic for the use of the Eastern churches, published at Rome 1671, 3 vols. fol. He wrote besides an Apology for the Christian Religion in Latin 1631, and in Arabic 1637, against a Mahometan, and with such effect that his antagonist embraced christianity—"a Methodical Arabic Grammar"—an Arabic Dictionary, not completed, the manuscript of which is preserved in the convent of San Lorenzo in Lucina. This accomplished scholar died 1656, aged 60.

GUALDUS, Prioratus, or Galeazzo, an Italian historian, born at Vicenza, where he died 1678. He was historiographer to the emperor, and wrote the History of Ferdinand II. and III. and also of Leopold, 3 vols. folio—the Troubles of France from 1648, to 1654.

GUARIN, Peter, a Benedictine of Rouen, who died at Paris 1729, aged 51. He was an excellent Hebrew scholar, and published a Hebrew Grammar, 2 vols. 4to. and also a Hebrew Lexicon.

GUARINI, an eminent scholar, of a noble Veronese family, who went to Constantinople to learn Greek, and was the first who taught it in Italy. He was professor of learned languages at Ferrara, and translated some of the ancient authors, especially Strabo and Plutarch's Lives, and died 1460, at Ferrara. His son Baptista was professor at Ferrara, and translated into Italian some of Plautus's comedies, and wrote besides some poems and other works.

GUARINI, John Baptist, a famous Italian poet, great-grandson of the preceding, born at Ferrara 1537. He was educated at Pisa and Padua, and afterwards introduced to the court of Alphonso II. His abilities were employed in frequent embassies to Venice and to Turin, where his "Pastor Fido," was first exhibited to the applauses of an admiring populace, at the nuptials of the duke of Savoy with the sister of Philip III. of Spain. In 1571, he went as ambassador to Rome, and four years after negotiated in Poland, to obtain for his master the crown, which Henry of Valois had resigned. Disgust, with the intrigues and ingratitude of the court, drove him, in 1582, into retirement; but he was prevailed upon again to become secretary of state, and ambassador, and again he abandoned, with dissatisfaction, the offices of elevated life for privacy. As the duke of Ferrara had favored his son in a law-suit against him, he offered his services to the duke of Savoy; but the loss of his wife, in 1539, produced a revolution in his sentiments, and for a while determined him to become an ecclesiastic. After, however, being in the service of the duke of Mantua, he was reconciled to Alphonso of Ferrara; but fresh quarrels arose, and Guarini quitted his country for the protection of the grand duke of Tuscany. He died at Venice, October 1612, aged 70.

GUDIUS, Marquard, an able critic of Holstein, educated at Rensburg and Jena. He early displayed a strong inclination for literature, and was recommended by Gronovius to D. Heinsius, as a person of great and promising talents; but his parents were anxious to advance him at court, and, therefore, earnestly desired to see him lay aside all studious pursuits. By the interest, however, of his friends Grevius and Gronovius, he obtained the office of tutor to a young man of family and fortune, named Samuel Schas, and with him he began to travel, in 1659, into France. His abilities, and the recommendation of his friends in Holland introduced him to the learned of Paris and of Toulouse, and after visiting the libraries and most curious collections of France and Italy, the tutor and the pupil returned, in 1664, to Germany. He was afterwards in England, and in the company and friendship of his pupil, who possessed great erudition, and employed much of his great property in the collection of rare and valuable manuscripts, he spent the whole of his time, and declined accepting a professorship which was offered him at the Hague. So great and sincere was the friendship between Gudius and Schas, that the pupil left his property to his preceptor in 1675; but such was the ungrateful conduct of Gudius, that on the acquisition of his riches he forgot and disregarded the friends in Holland, to whose interference he owed his elevation and his opulence. He was afterwards counsellor to the duke of Holstein, and to the king of Denmark, and died immaturely, as Burman observes, in 1689.

GUEDRIER DE ST. AUBIN, Henry Michael, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Gournai-en-bray, near Rouen. He died abbot of St. Vulner monastery, in Bayonne, 1742, aged 47. He distinguished himself as a casuist, and wrote the Sacred History of the two Covenants, 7 vols. 12mo.

GUERARD, Benjamin, governor of South Carolina, was a descendant from one of the families of protestant refugees who fled from France to Carolina after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was elected speaker of the house of representatives in 1733, and afterwards governor. He died at Charleston, Jan. 1789.

GUERARD, Robert, a Benedictine monk, born at Rouen, where he died 1715, aged 74. He wrote an Abridgment of the Bible in questions and answers, 2 vols. 12mo. and assisted Delfau in the editing of St. Austin's work, and was sent to exile, when his associate was disgraced for his book called P Abbé Commendataire.

GUERCINO, Francisco Barbieri da Cento, so called from a cast in one of his eyes, was a painter of eminence, born near Bologna, 1590. He began to practise his profession at the early age of eight, and by attending the lessons of Michael Angelo, and the Caraccis, he acquired great reputation for correctness, invention, and a becoming boldness in his figures. For two years he practised at Rome, by the desire of Gregory XV. but afterwards the liberal offers of the kings of England and France could not draw him away from his favorite retreat at Bologna. Christina queen of Sweden, paid her respects to him, and shook him by the hand, by that hand, said he, which had painted 106 altar pieces, 144 pictures for people of distinction, and besides composed 10 books of designs. He died 1666. His private character for piety and morality, was as eminent as his abilities as a painter.

GUERICK, Otho, a German philosopher, and physician, celebrated as the inventor of the Air-pump, and of the Weather glass. He was counsellor to the elector of Bradenburgh, burgo-master of Magdeburgh, and author of some treatises on experimental philosophy. He was counsellor to the king of Prussia, and a man of learning. This able man died at Hamburg, 1686, aged 84.

GUERRE, Martin, a Frenchman, whose history excited some interest in his country. After living about 10 years with Bertrande de Rols, his wife, he went from her and engaged in the Spanish service. Eight years after one of his friends, Arnaud du Thil, presented himself to the deserted Bertrande, and by imposing on her erudition, was received by her as her husband. The impostor was suspected by the uncle of Guerre, but du Thil, though prosecuted, and condemned to be hanged, asserted his innocence, and declaring himself the real Martin, appealed to the parliament of Toulouse. The cause seemed intricate, but before the decisive sentence was pronounced, Martin returned, and the impostor was for his treacherous and immoral conduct, hanged and burned, 1650.

GUETTARD, John Stephen, a French physician and botanist, whose extreme application in literary pursuits, brought on a premature death 1786. He wrote Observations on Plants, 2 vols. 12mo. and Memoirs of different parts of the Sciences and Arts, 3 vols. 4to.

GUEVARA, Antony de, a Spanish writer, born in the province of Alaba. He was brought up at court, and became known as a preacher, and historiographer to Charles V. He was made bishop of Gaudix in Granada, and of Mandedo in Galicia, and died 1544. The best known of his works is "Dial of Princes, or, the life of M. A. Antonius," which has been translated into all the languages of Europe. He is deservedly censured as an historian, not only for the ill taste, but the improbabilities, and distorted accounts, which he introduces as historical facts, more becoming the intricousness of romance than sober truth. He wrote besides Golden Epistles.

GUGLIELMINI, Dominic, a mathematician, born at Bologna. He was of the academy of Paris, and was patronised by Louis XIV. Of the valuable works which he wrote the treatise on the Nature of Rivers is the most esteemed. His works are printed at Geneva, 2 vols. 4to. 1719. He died 1710, aged 55.

GUIBERT, James Anthony Hippolite, a native of Montauban who early served in the German wars, and became a colonel in Corsica. He published in 1770, Essai general du Tactique, and afterwards quitted the military profession to devote himself to dramatic writings. He became member of the French academy, in the room of Thomas, and died 1790, aged 47. Besides tragedies, he wrote also the eulogy of the king of Prussia—of Catinat, and of P'Hopital.

GUICCIARDINI, Francisco, a celebrated historian, born at Florence, 1482, of a noble family. After receiving a most liberal education, he practised the law, and held some offices of dignity and importance, and then devoted himself to the public affairs of his native city. From Florence he went to Rome, and was highly honored by Leo X. and his two successors, who employed him in a high, civil, and military capacity, and trusted much to his integrity and talents. He died universally respected 1540. His history of Italy, in Italian, 4 vols. 4to. is a performance about which his countrymen deservedly pride themselves.

GUIDI, Alexander, an Italian poet, born at Pavia in Milan, 1650. He was patronised by the duke of Parma, and afterwards under the protection of Christina of Sweden, who resided at Rome, he not only became acquainted with the literary characters of that city, but read to great advantage the works of his favorite masters, Dante, Petrarch, and Chiabrara. After thus enjoying the friendship of the learned, and the good opinion of the popes, of Eugene of Savoy, and others, he was seized with an apoplexy which proved fatal at Frescati, in June, 1712. His works which consist of pastorals, operas, and other poems written in an easy, agreeable, but correct style, were published at Verona 1726, 12mo. with an account of his life. Though respectable as a poet, he was in his person very deformed, his head was disagreeably large, and he was blind of one eye.

GUIDO, Reni, a celebrated Italian painter, born at Bologna 1575. His father who was a musician designed him for his profession, but nature had given him a strong genius for painting, and by improving himself under the direction of Dennis Calvert, a Flemish painter, and afterwards of the Carracci, he acquired such excellence as rendered him superior to the artists of his age. His merits happily were not buried in oblivion, he was honored with the notice and esteem of pope Paul V. of the cardinals and princes of Italy, of Louis XIII. of Philip IV. of Spain, and of Udislaus king of Sweden and Poland. He lived in great splendor at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome, but a most invincible attachment to gaming ruined his fortune and rendered him indigent and discontented. From the most elevated affluence he sunk to poverty, and the reflection of his deplorable and ruined situation had such an effect upon him that it brought on a distemper of which he died 1642. His pictures are much valued, and they adorn the collections of the great. His best piece is what he painted with Domenicheno in the church of St. Gregory. Some of his designs were etched by himself.

GUIGNARD, John, a jesuit born at Chartres, and professor of divinity at Clermont college. He was executed at Paris 7th Jan. 1595, for high treason. During the affair of John Chastel, which so nearly concerned the life of Henry IV. some papers were seized at Clermont, in the hand-writing of Guignard, and as in these he maintained that the murder of Henry III. and of Henry IV. was lawful, and refused to retract his assertions, he was put to death.

GUIGNES, Joseph de, a native of Pontoise, who studied the oriental languages under Stephen Pomruot, and became interpreter to the French king, 1741, and member of the belles lettres academy 1753. The revolution, though it hurried him not to the guillotine, yet proved the source of his misery and reduced him to poverty. He died at Paris 1800, aged 79. He was well acquainted with the Chinese characters, and for 35 years was the principal conductor of the Journal des Savans. He wrote General History of the Huns, Turks, Moguls, and Tartars, 5 vols. 4to.—the Life of Fourmont—the Military Art of the Chinese—Memoir to prove the Chinese an Egyptian Colony—Essay on the Oriental and Greek Topography—Principles of Typographical Composition, and Memoirs in the Academy of Inscriptions.

GUILD, William, D.D., a Scotch divine born near Dundee, and educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he was successfully professor of philosophy, divinity, and church history. Though he opposed the covenant in 1638, he afterwards complied, and at the restoration went as one of the commissioners to Breda to congratulate Charles II. He wrote in 1657 an answer to a Roman catholic book on Innovations, and died 1662, much esteemed, aged 60.

GUILLANDIUS, Melchior, an eminent physician and botanist of Koningsberg in Prussia. He was taken by the Algerines when going on botanical pursuits to Africa. His commentary on the Papyrus is full of erudition. He wrote several works, and died at Padua 1589, where he was botanical professor.

GULLIM, John, author of the celebrated work, "display of Heraldry" in folio, was born in Herefordshire 1565, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was of the society of the college of arms, and in 1617, was made rouge-croix pursuivant of arms. He died 1621. The sixth edition of his valuable work appeared 1724, with many additions. Some have attributed the work to Dr. Barkham.

GUILLOTIN, a physician, born at Saintes, 29th March 1733. He studied at Paris, and at the revolution was sent as a deputy to the national assembly from Paris. In making a report on the penal code, he recommended an instrument of death which might be more expeditious, and create to the unhappy sufferers less pain than either the halter or the wheel, and this new machine so fatally used during the civil dissensions of the state, has immortalized the name of its author. Though it is reported that he perished under his guillotine, it is however certain that he died a natural death, and it is said of grief for the infamous abuse of what he intended for the more humane punishment of the guilty.

GUISCHARDT, Charles Theophilus, a writer on tactics, was born, in 1724, at Magdeburgh; and, after having acquired considerable reputation as a Lutheran preacher, he adopted the military profession, and served as an ensign in the Dutch troops. His Military Memoirs on the Greeks and Romans attracted the notice of Frederick of Prussia, who, in 1757, made him his aid-de-camp, and gave him the name of Quintus Icilius, who was one of Caesar's best officers. Guischardt distinguished himself in the Prussian service, but is said to have increased his fortune by exactions and pillage. In 1774 he published his Historical and Critical Me- moirs on several Points of Military Antiquity ; and, in the following year, he died at Berlin.

GUISE, Claude de Lorraine, duke of, fifth son of duke René II. of Lorraine, settled in France and became the founder of the family of Guise there. At the battle of Marignan he displayed such valor, that he received more than 20 wounds. He married Antoinette de Bourbon of the blood royal, in 1513, and died 1550.

GUISE, Francis, duke of, son of the preceding, was a man of great talents, and extensive influence in France. In him began the factions of Condé and Guise. He was at the head of the Catholic party, and was a most furious bigot. He died by a pistol shot from the hand of Poltrot de Meré, a protestant gentleman, 1563, aged 44.

GUISE, Henry, duke of, eldest son of Francis, was born in 1550. Brave and gallant as a soldier, he was turbulent, imperious, factious, and violent as a subject, and at the head of that party which were called the league, and formed by the intrigues of his brother the cardinal, under pretence of supporting the catholic religion and the state, he long overawed the king, Henry III. and prevented his appearance at Paris. After massacring the Huguenots, and filling the streets of Paris with blood, on the famous day called the day of Barricades, Guise considered his success secure, but Henry escaped his guards and fled to Blois where he called an assembly of the states. Guise appeared there, but a forced reconciliation with the king was followed by the assassination of the demagogues, 23d Dec. 1533, and on the morrow the cardinal shared the fate of his brother.

GUISE, Charles, duke of, eldest son of Henry, was arrested on his father's murder and confined in the castle of Tours, from which he escaped 1592. His partisans received him with open arms, but he afterwards had the good sense to be reconciled to the king, and might have lived in security, had not Richelieu's jealousy of him driven him from the kingdom. He fled to Italy, and died at Cuua 1640, aged 69.

GUISE, Henry of Lorraine, duke of, grandson of Henry, was remarkable for his intrigues with the duke of Bouillon, and the court of Soissons, which obliged him to fly from France to Rome. During his exile, the revolt of the Neapolitans from the Spanish power, called him into the field, but while flushed with victory he regarded the crown of Naples already within his reach, he was taken prisoner at Abruzzo and carried to Spain. After four years' imprisonment he was liberated. He died 1664, aged 50, author of Memoirs of his Neapolitan Enterprize, which appeared in one vol. 4to. after his death.

GUISE, William, an English divine, born at Abland's court, near Gloucester 1653. He entered at Oriel college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and he applied himself with indefatigable zeal to the study of oriental literature, and published a translation with a valuable commentary of "Misere Pars Ordinis Primi Zerain Tituli Septem." His learning was highly esteemed both at home and abroad. He died 1638. His son was general Guise of military memory.

GUITTON, John, a native of Rochelle, mayor of the town when it was besieged by Richelieu. He always had a dagger on the table, to stab the first man who talked of surrendering, and when told that many perished by famine, he said, it matters little if one only is left to shut the gates.

GUIZOT, Elizabeth Charlotte Paulina, a native of Paris, was born in 1773. Two novels, her first attempts were written for the pious purpose of providing for the wants of a mother and sister. In 1812 she married M. Guizot, an eminent literary man, and she subsequently acquired considerable reputation. Her Rodolph and Victor, and her Domestic Education, gained the prize of the French Academy, as works beneficial to morals.

GULDENSTAEDT, John Antony, a famous traveller, born at Riga. He visited during an absence of three years, Astracan, Caucasus, Georgia, Tartary, and the neighboring places, with the eyes of a politician and philosopher. His performances are enumerated by Coxe. He was honorably invited to Petersburg, where he became professor of languages, and where he died of a fever, 1781.

GUNDLING, Nicholas Jerome, a native of Nuremberg, professor of eloquence, civil law, and philosophy at Halle, on which subjects he wrote some valuable works. His reputation for sagacity and knowledge was such that he was often consulted at Berlin, by the court. His "Course of Philosophy," "of Literary history," and his History of moral Philosophy, are much esteemed. He died rector of Halle 1729.

GUNN, Alexander, D.D., minister of the reformed Dutch church at Bloomingdale, died 1329. He published memoirs of the late Dr. Livingston.

GUNNERUS, John Ernest, a native of Christiansa, made bishop of Drontheim 1758. He died at Christiansund 1773, aged 53. He was well skilled in botany, and published Flora Norwegiæ, and other works. He founded, for the encouragement of Natural history, the royal Norwegian society at Drontheim. Linnæus, in compliment to his merit, gave the name of Gunnera to a plant.

GUNNING, Peter, D.D., an English prelate, born at Hoo in Kent, 1613, and educated at Canterbury school, and Clare hall, Cambridge. He became fellow and tutor of his college, and distinguished himself as a preacher, but he exposed himself to the persecution of the parliament, on account of his zeal for the king's service ; and when ejected, he returned to Oxford. Here he was made chaplain of New college, and afterwards became tutor to lord Hatton, and sir Francis Compton, and chaplain to sir Robert Shirley, at whose death he obtained the chapel of Exeter-house, Strand. At the restoration, his services and sufferings were rewarded ; he was advanced to a prebend of Canterbury, and successively to the headships of Corpus Christi and St. John's college, Cambridge. He was one of the committee for the review of the liturgy, and he had a conference with the dissenters at the Savoy, in 1661. In 1669, he was made bishop of Chichester, and 1674, he was translated to Ely, where he died, 6th July 1684. He was buried in his cathedral. Opinions have varied with respect to his character, but it must be confessed, that, though some question, whether his head was as good as his heart, he was distinguished by erudition, piety, and exemplary manners. His charities to public use were great and numerous.

GUNTER, Edmund, a mathematician, of Welch extraction, born at Gunter's town, Brecknockshire, 1581. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and entered at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and was ordained. His genius led him to mathematical pursuits, and by the new projection of a sector, he acquired celebrity, and was in 1619, honorably appointed astronomy professor at Gresham college 1619. In this appointment he directed all the powers of his mind in the improvement of science. He invented a portable quadrant, observed a new variation in the magnetic needle, and contrived that valuable rule of proportion, the line of numbers, called from him, Gunter's scale. His merits gained him not only the friendship of the learned, of Oughtred, Henry Briggs, and others, but the patronage of the earl of Bridgewater, and the notice of his sovereign Charles I. This excellent philosopher was carried off in the prime of life 10th Dec. 1626.

GUNTHER, a German poet in the beginning of the 18th century, whose superior genius proved his destruction. As he was going to be presented to Augustus II. king of Poland, a rival poet mixed some poisonous drugs in his drink, in consequence of which the unhappy man, as he was addressing the monarch fell down, and he expired soon after, in his 28th year. He wrote some elegant poetry, an Ode on Eugene's victory over the Turks.

GUSTAVUS, king of Sweden, was son of Eric, duke of Gripsholm, is known by the name of Gustavus Vasa. He was born 1490. After the reduction of Sweden by Christian II. king of Denmark, Gustavus was kept a prisoner in the capital of the conqueror; but after many years of captivity, he escaped, and appeared among the Dalecarlians, whom he engaged to revolt. A great boldness of character, and an ardent love of military glory, together with capacious resources of mind, had calculated him for a leader in times of danger and difficulty. The conduct of the Danes, who had murdered his father and other Swedish nobles, roused him to revenge. He re-took Upsal; and though occasionally defeated, he acquired fresh vigor from disasters; and animated to desperation by the cruelties of Christian, who put his mother and his sister to death, by shocking tortures, he over-ran Gothland, and besieged Stockholm. The states of the kingdom were convened, and Gustavus was offered that kingdom, which his valor had recovered, and by his influence the crown was declared hereditary in his male issue. Invasion from abroad ceased, by the expulsion of the Danish monarch from the throne, and the succession of Frederick, duke of Holstein and Gustavus, secure in the love of his subjects, cultivated all the arts of peace and commerce, and made the Lutheran tenets the established religion of his country. This great and heroic monarch, died at Stockholm 1560, in his 70th year, and was succeeded by his son Eric.

GUSTAVUS, Adolphus, deservedly surnamed the Great, was born at Stockholm 1594. In 1611 he ascended the throne of Sweden, and though so young he evinced the sagacity of a great character in the choice of able ministers. He was fond of military glory, and soon acquired renown in his battles against the Danes, Muscovites, and Poles. By his heroic valor and judicious conduct, he made an honorable peace with the two first, and obliged the last to evacuate Livonia, and then forming an alliance with the protestants of Germany, he over-ran in two years and a half all the countries between the Vistula, the Rhine, and the Danube. The imperial general Tilly was twice defeated, and the pride of Austria was humbled, but the battle in the plains of Lutzen proved fatal to the life of the brave monarch, 1632. He fell it is said by the treacherous intrigues of Richelieu, or by the hand of Lauemburgh, one of his generals who had been dishonorably bribed by the emperor Ferdinand to take away his life. This warlike monarch possessed those virtues which in a reign of peace might have equally distinguished him. He patronised literature, he enriched the university of Upsal by his munificent donations, he founded the royal academy of Abo, and the university of Dorp, in Livonia. Before his time the Swedes were indifferent soldiers, but such was the enthusiasm which he inspired among his subjects, that he had always an army of 80,000 men well disciplined. He was succeeded by his only child the celebrated Christina, who succeeded, though only five years old.

GUSTAVUS III., king of Sweden, son of Frederick Adolphus, by Louisa Ulrica, the sister of Frederick II. king of Prussia, was born 24th January 1746, and succeeded to his father 1771. Disgusted with the influence of Russia at Stockholm, and with the usurpation of his senators who wished to abridge his liberty, he secretly formed the plan of a revolution, which was effected without bloodshed in 1772. The senate surrounded by the guards surrendered its authority, and the friends of Gustavus were afterwards distinguished by wearing a white handkerchief on the left arm, which was the signal of mutual attachment during the revolution. The wisest regulations followed this change of government, a new translation of the bible was made, torture was abolished, commerce, the arts and the sciences were liberally encouraged, agriculture and industry patronised, and the laws were administered with greater despatch and more impartiality. To put an end to the disputes which prevailed with Russia, he in 1777 paid a visit to Catherine at Petersburg, and was received with magnificent hospitality, and in 1783 he spent ten months in travelling over Italy and France, not only to improve his health, but to observe the manners, the political regulations, and the industrious exertions of foreign countries. The peace with Russia was disturbed in 1788, by the emissaries of Catherine, who wished to excite disturbances in Finland, and Gustavus declared war, and equipped a formidable fleet at Carlscrona. Though he had to contend with Denmark and Russia, he, encouraged by assurances of support from Turkey and Prussia, boldly attacked Fredericksham, where he destroyed several vessels, but he was repulsed in his attempt against Revel, and obliged to retreat. The attempt on Wyburg was equally unsuccessful, but a splendid victory was obtained July 9th 1790, by the monarch over the Russian fleet, who took and destroyed forty-five ships, and peace soon after was restored between the two countries. The abilities which Gustavus had displayed made him ambitious of acquiring greater glory in war, and therefore on the breaking out of the French revolution he zealously engaged in the coalition which Spain formed with the Northern powers for the invasion of France. But during the preparations for this distant war, the life of the monarch was cruelly sacrificed by the hand of an assassin. The Swedish nobles, dissatisfied with the events of the revolution of 1772, and with the changes which had been introduced into the government at the diet of Gefle in 1792, conspired against his life, and three of them drew lots who should give the fatal blow. Ankarstroom, a disbanded officer who had received favors from the monarch was the assassin, and during a mask ball in which the unfortunate king had been warned of his danger, the fatal blow was given by the discharge of a pistol. This was in the night of the 15th April, 1792, and the king languished till the 29th of the same month.

GUTHRIE, William, an indefatigable Scotch writer, was born, in 1708, at Brechin; was educated at King's College, Aberdeen; settled in London as an author, and was pensioned by the government; and died in 1770. Among his works are, A History of England, in three folio volumes; A History of Scotland, ten volumes; An Universal History, thirteen volumes. Of the last, however, he is known to have written only a part; and the Geographical Grammar, which bears his name, is believed to have been compiled by Knox the bookseller. Guthrie also translated Quintillian, and Cicero's Offices and Epistles.

GUTTEMBERG, John, a German, born at Mentz 1403, of a noble family. He disputes with Faust, Schœffer, and others, the honor of inventing printing. Boyer says, Laurentius of Haerlem is the real inventor, and that his types were stolen by a brother of Guttemberg. Guttemberg, however, claims the merit of regularly printing a book, and of inventing cut metal types, with which the earliest editions of the bible were printed. He died at Mentz, 1468.

GUY, Thomas, son of a lighterman and coal dealer of the same name, in Horsleydown, Southwark, was apprenticed in 1660 to a bookseller, and began trade with about 200*l.* stock, in the house which forms the angle between Cornhill and Lombard-street. He engaged with others in a scheme to print bibles in Holland to import into England; but when that was prohibited, he contracted with the university of Oxford for their privilege, and by this lucrative connexion, he began to amass a large fortune. His property, however, was immensely increased by purchasing seamen's tickets and south-sea stock in the year 1720. After being a great benefactor to St. Thomas' hospital, he at the age of seventy-six formed the noble design of erecting that stately pile which bears the name of Guy's hospital. The erection cost him 18,793*l.* and 219,499*l.* were left by him for its endowment, and he had the satisfaction to see the building roofed in before his death, which happened 17th December 1724, in his 81st year. He also founded an alms-house at Tamworth, which he represented in parliament, and which was his mother's native place, and he also gave 400*l.* a year to Christ's hospital, and left 80,000*l.* to his relations. This most extraordinary, and very benevolent man, who left more to charitable uses than any private man on record, was in his habits very parsimonious. He dined on his shop counter with an old newspaper for his table cloth, without dainties, and his dress and appearance were so mean that in some instances the alms of the humane were pressed upon him as upon an indigent and half starved beggar.

GUY, a monk of Arezzo, known as a musician, and as the first who produced a delightful harmony from several different voices singing together. He also invented the six syllables of the gamut, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. His inventions were received with applause by the world. He lived about the year 1026.

GUYET, Francis, an eminent critic, born at Angers 1575. He lost his parents in his infancy, but, though his property was squandered by the negligence of his guardian, he devoted himself assiduously to letters, and went to Paris, where he had the happiness to be introduced to the society of the two du Puys, Thuanus, and other learned men. In 1608 he visited Rome, and acquired a perfect knowledge of Italian. After his return through Germany to Paris, he became tutor in the house of the duke d'Epemnon to the abbot de Granselve, afterwards cardinal de la Valette. In this office he conducted himself with such judgment and prudence, that he gained the confidence of his patrons, and might have risen to eminence in the church, had he not preferred the retirement of Burgundy college, to the splendor of a palace. He employed himself here in a work to prove that the Latin is derived from the Greek, and that all the primitive words of the Greek are but of one syllable. Though learned, he published nothing, but his criticisms afterwards appeared very valuable in the hands of his friends, especially those on Hesiod, published by Grævius, and those on Terence by Bocclerus. He died 1655, aged 80.

GUYON, Johanna Mary Bouviers de la Mothe, a French lady of a noble family, born at Montargis, 1648, famous for her writings. She wished to take the veil, but her friends made her marry, and she became, at the age of twenty-eight, a widow. Abandoning the care of her family, she devoted herself to the mysteries of quietism, which Michael de Molinos, a Spanish Jesuit at Rome, had imposed upon the credulity of the world. Wavering in her opinions, and inconstant in her temper, she, however, endured persecution for her tenets, and when she declared herself the pregnant woman mentioned in the apocalypse, and threatened the peace of the kingdom by the number of her followers, she was imprisoned in the bastille by order of the king. Fenelon undertook her defence, but his enemy Bossuet had the art to procure the condemnation of his works on the subject. Her verses, after her death, which happened at Blois 1717, were published in five volumes, and also some of her Mystical Reveries.

GUYS, Peter Augustine, a native of Marseilles, eminent as a merchant, and as a man of letters. He travelled over various parts of the east, with the eye of a philosopher and an antiquarian, and published the result of his researches, in which he compared the different characters of the ancient and of the modern inhabitants of those classical countries. He died at Zante in the Ionian sea, in 1799, aged 79. His works are Essays on the Antiquities of Marseilles, 8vo.—Voyage Litteraire de la Grece, four vols. 8vo. 1783,—a Voyage in Italy and in the North, 8vo.

GUYSE, John, D.D., a native of Hereford, who became a dissenting minister there, and in 1727 removed to New Broad-street independent congregation, London. Though blind for some years before his death, he nevertheless continued his pastoral functions. He died 1761, aged 81. He wrote a paraphrase of the New-Testament, three vols. 4to.—the Standard Use of Scripture in the Purposes of Divine Revelation, 8vo.—Jesus Christ God-Man, &c. in several sermons,—the Holy Spirit in sermons,—Youth's Monitor in ten sermons to young persons, 12mo.

GWINNETT, Button, a member of congress, was a native of England; he came to America, and purchased a large tract of land in Georgia, and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits. Elected to congress in 1776, he signed the declaration of independence. At this period he was a competitor with col. Lackland McIntosh for the office of brigadier general, and formed a settled hostility to his successful rival. Being afterwards president of the council, he nominated a subordinate officer to the command of an expedition against Florida. The expedition failed, and by consequence Mr. Gwinnett failed to be elected governor in May 1777. In the mortification of his adversary McIntosh exulted. In the result Mr. Gwinnett challenged McIntosh. Fighting at the distance of twelve feet, both were wounded and Gwinnett died of his wounds May 27th 1777, aged 44.

GWYNNE, Matthew, an English physician, born in London, of an ancient Welch family. He was educated at Oxford, where in 1593, he took his degree of M.D. He went in 1595, as physician to sir Henry Unton, queen Elizabeth's ambassador to France. He obtained great reputation by his practice, as well as by his writings, which modern discoveries have rendered now of little value. He died after 1639, though what year is uncertain.

II.

HAAS, William, a printer and type-founder, born at Basil, and eminent for ingenious inventions. He was in the first part of life engaged in the military affairs of his country, and he established a school in which a new system of artillery was practised and recommended with great success. He afterwards devoted his time to printing, and was the first who engraved a French type in the style of Baskerville. He invented a new printing press, and introduced a new method of printing geographical charts with moveable characters. He died at St. Urban monastery in Lucerne, June 1800, aged 59. Many of his papers are preserved in the economical society of Basil.

HABERSHAM, Joseph, postmaster general of the United States. He served with reputation in the revolutionary war, and had the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1785 he was a member of congress; in 1795 he was appointed postmaster general, and resigned in 1800. He died 1815, aged 65.

HABERT, Henry Lewis, a member of the French academy, the friend of Gassendi, and the publisher of his works with an elegant Latin preface. He wrote some epigrams and other poetical pieces, and died 1679.

HABINGTON, William, an English writer, born at Hendlip, Worcestershire 1605. As a catholic, he was educated at St. Omer's and Paris, but he refused to embrace the order of the Jesuits, and returned to England. He died 30th Nov. 1654. He wrote the Queen of Arragon,—Observations on the History of Edward IV.—and some poems.

HACHETTE, Jane, a heroine of Beauvais in Picardy, who successfully headed a body of women in an assault against the Bourguignons who besieged her native place 1472. In commemoration of her intrepid conduct, an annual procession takes place at Beauvais on the 10th July, in which the women march at the head of the men.

HACKET, John, D.D., an English prelate, born in London, 1st Sept. 1592. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. His great merit recommended him to bishop Andrews, and to Williams, bishop of Lincoln, to whom he became chaplain, and afterwards to James I. He was promoted to a prebend in Lincoln, and the rectory of Cheam in Surrey, and St. Andrews, Holborn. The troubles of the times not only prevented his further advancement, but subjected him to persecution, though he concealed himself in retirement at Cheam. At the restoration he refused the bishopric of Gloucester, but soon after accepted that of Lichfield and Coventry. With great munificence he began the repairs of his cathedral, which had been nearly demolished by the civil wars, and after eight years' labor, and the expense of 20,000*l.* nearly all his own, he completed the building in a splendid and most elegant manner. He was equally liberal in his benefactions to Trinity college, Cambridge, and other foundations. He died Oct. 21, 1670. He was highly respected for learning, for piety, and every exemplary virtue.

HACKSPAN, Theodore, a Lutheran minister, first professor at Altorf, well skilled in oriental literature. His books on theological subjects were much esteemed in Germany. He died 1659.

HADDON, Walter, LL.D., an eminent English scholar, born in Buckinghamshire 1516, and educated at Eton school and King's college, Cambridge. In Edward's reign he was a zealous promoter of the reformation, and for his services he was made master of Trinity hall, Cambridge, in the room of Gardiner, and afterwards, though not qualified, made president of Magdalen college, Oxford, but in Mary's reign he resigned his honors to avoid the disgrace of expulsion, and lived in concealment. The accession of Elizabeth restored him to public notice; he was made master of the court of requests, judge of the prerogative court, and one of the commissioners who visited Cambridge. In 1566 he was employed at Bruges to settle the commercial intercourse between England and the Netherlands. He died Jan. 1571-2.

HADLEY, John, an English philosopher, who lived in the first half of the eighteenth century, was vice-president of the Royal Society; and wrote several papers in the Philosophical Transactions between 1723 and 1736. He invented, or rather, perhaps, brought into use, the quadrant which bears his name, and also a reflecting telescope.

HAFIZ, or HAFEZ, Mohamammed Shemseddin, a celebrated poet, the Anacreon of Persia, was born at Shiraz, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, and died there in 1389. The monument erected to him by his countrymen was destroyed by an earthquake in 1825. Love, wine, and luxurious indolence were the delights of Hafiz's life. Some of his Odes have been translated by Sir W. Jones, Richardson, Nott, and Hindley.

HAGEDORN, Frederic, a celebrated German poet, was born, in 1709, at Hamburg; was educated in the college of his native place; was private secretary to the Danish ambassador at London, from 1729 till 1731; and, in 1733, was appointed secretary to the British factory at Hamburg; which office he held till his decease in 1754. Hagedorn has been called the German Horace and Prior. He formed himself chiefly on the English school of poetry, and, consequently, was in a state of hostility with Gottsched. His style is pure and flowing. His fables, Moral Poems, Songs, and Tales, are his principal works.

HAGER, Joseph, an eminent Chinese scholar, was born, about 1750, at Milan; studied at Vienna; passed some time at London, where he published various works on the Chinese language, and a Prospectus of a Dictionary; was subsequently professor of the oriental languages at Pavia, and librarian at Milan; and died in the latter city in 1820. Among his works are, Elements of the Chinese Language; The Chinese Pantheon; and a Dissertation on the Babylonian Inscriptions. It was Hager who detected the historical forgery committed by Vella, in 1739.

HAILLAN, Bernard de Girard, lord of, a French historian, born at Bourdeaux about 1535. He first appeared before the public as a poet, in his piece called "the union of the princes," and afterwards as the translator of Eutropius, of Tully's offices, and Æmylius Probus. In 1574 he was named historiographer of France, in consequence of his valuable book on the state and success of the affairs of France. In 1576 appeared his history from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. the first history of France written in French. He did not continue this popular work beyond that time, though he promised it to Henry IV. as he considered himself too near the periods of which he was to treat, afraid that the sober truths of history might give offence. A continuation was added by the booksellers, as far as 1627. He died at Paris, Nov. 23, 1610.

HAINES, Joseph, better known by the name of count Haines, was a comedian of wit and great facetiousness. He was obscurely born, but the liberal subscription of a few friends, enabled him to enter at Queen's college, Oxford, where his talents and manners gained him the friendship of sir Joseph Williamson, afterwards secretary of state, and minister at Ryswick congress. He attended his friend as Latin secretary, but he betrayed the state secrets with which he was confidentially intrusted, and thus incapable of this office, he was recommended to Cambridge, which all at once he quitted to join a company of strolling players at Sürbridge fair. He gradually rose to some consequence, and was engaged at Drury lane, where his education, his wit, and his agreeable conversation made him the friend and the associate of the great and the opulent. He went afterwards as companion to the English ambassador to France, and on his return again appeared on the stage.

HAINES, Charles G., adjutant general of New York, graduated at Middlebury college 1816. In 1818, he removed to New York, and established himself as a lawyer in that city. He died 1825, aged 32. His writings were numerous. He published considerations on the canal 1813; memoirs of T. A. Emmet 1829.

HAKEWILL, George, an able divine, born 1579 at Exeter, son of a merchant. He was in 1616, made archdeacon of Surrey, and as chaplain to Charles prince of Wales, he might have risen to higher honors in the church, had he not written to oppose the union of his master with the infanta of Spain. The king resented the remarks of the chaplain, and he was for some time imprisoned, and dismissed from about the prince's person. He was afterwards chosen rector of Exeter college, but the rage of civil war drove him to his rectory of Heanton near Barnstaple, where he died 1649. Of his works the best known is his "apology or declaration of the power and providence of God in the government of the world, proving that it doth not decay," in four books, 1627, with two additional books in an edition, folio, 1635.

HAKLUYT, Richard, a native of Eyton, Herefordshire, educated at Westminster school and Christ church, Oxford. He took orders, and obtained the living of Wetheringset in Suffolk, and a prebend in Bristol cathedral, and afterwards at Westminster. He died 23d Nov. 1616, aged 61. He was not only an able divine but a learned cosmographer; and his collection of voyages in 3 vols. folio, is deservedly admired as a valuable performance. In honor of his services to geography, a promontory on the coast of Greenland was called by his name, by captain Hudson in 1608. His son was a student of Trinity college, Cambridge.

HALDE, John Baptist du, a learned Jesuit, born at Paris 1674. He is the author of a valuable work, "grande description de la Chine & de la Tartarie," 4 vols. folio; compiled from the curious and interesting observations of the missionaries of his fraternity. He collected also after Gobien, "lettres edifiantes," in 18 vols: besides Latin poems and orations. He died 1743.

HALE, sir Matthew, a learned lawyer, born at Aldersly in Gloucestershire, 1st Nov. 1600. Panting after distinction, he now bid adieu to the follies and levities of youth, and of idle company, and devoting daily 16 hours to study, he enriched the resources of his mind with all the treasures of law, of philosophy, of science, and of divinity. When called to the bar, the integrity of his conduct recommended him to the public notice, not less than his superior abilities; and in those times of civil discord, he became the friend of royalists and of republicans by not mixing with faction. His extensive knowledge of the law was called into action in the defence of Stafford, of Laud, and even of Charles himself; but though the advocate of royalty, he refused not to take the covenant, and to appear as one of the commissioners who treated with the king's officers about the reduction of Oxford. Though the death of Charles shocked his feelings, he however yielded to the strong invitations of Cromwell, who knew his merits, and he accepted under him the office of one of the judges of the Common-bench. Scruples however soon arose, and after going two or three circuits, he refused to act as judge on the crown side; and when on the death of the protector, higher powers were offered him under his son Richiard, he boldly rejected the new dignity, and refused to wear mourning. At the restoration he was marked out for the highest distinction as chief baron of the exchequer; and Clarendon in investing him with his office, declared that he knew no one more honest or more fit to preside in that court. For eleven years he endeared himself to the nation as an impartial judge, generous, diligent, and humane; and in 1671, he was promoted to the office of chief justice of England, where he displayed the same integrity, the same zeal, and the same unbiassed patient attention. He died, 25th Dec. 1676. He left his valuable MSS. to Lincoln's inn society. This great man, eminent not less for his learning, piety, and private virtues, than for his uprightness as a judge, wrote several valuable works on subjects of law, philosophy, and divinity; the best known of which are, the primitive origination of mankind considered and explained according to the light of nature, folio—the history of the pleas of the crown, folio—the original institution, power, and jurisdiction of parliaments—contemplations moral and divine, 3 vols. 8vo.—judgment of the nature of true religion, and an essay on the gravitation of fluid bodies.

HALE, Nathan, captain, an officer in the American revolutionary war, graduated at Yale college 1773. In the war he commanded a company in col. Knowlton's regiment, and was with the army in the retreat from Long Island in 1776. Washington having applied to Knowlton for a discreet and enterprising officer to penetrate the enemy's camp and procure intelligence. Hale passed in disguise to the British camp, but on his return was apprehended and carried before lord Wm. Howe, by whom he was ordered for execution the next morning. He was denied a bible and the aid of a clergyman. The letters, full of fortitude and resignation which he had written to his mother and sister, were destroyed. He was hung, regretting that he had but one life to lose for his country; though executed in a brutal manner as a spy, he was firm and composed.

HALES, John, called the ever-memorable, was born at Bath, 1584, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1605, he was chosen fellow of Merton; in 1612, made Greek professor of the university, and the next year admitted fellow of Eton college. In 1618, he went as chaplain with sir Dudley Carleton, the English ambassador to the Hague, and was present at the synod of Dordt, of the proceedings of which he wrote to his patron an impartial account, published in his golden remains. In 1638, he was by the friendship of Laud, made canon of Windsor, but the disorders of the times did not permit him to enjoy long these honors, and when he refused to take the engagement, he was stripped of his Eton fellowship, and of his other preferments, and reduced to the greatest distress, which he bore with christian fortitude. He died 19th May 1656. This worthy man, so much admired for his wit, his learning, and his politeness, wrote several works which appeared after his death in 3 vols. 12mo. or 8vo.

HALES, Stephen, a native of Kent, educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow 1703. He early devoted the great powers of his mind to botany, and experimental philosophy, and was the ingenious inventor of a machine which displayed the various motions of the heavens similar to a modern orrery. His learning and virtues recommended him to the great and the powerful; he enjoyed the esteem of Frederic prince of Wales, and was almoner to the princess, but satisfied with the rectory of Teddington near Hampton Court, he disregarded the higher preferments which the partiality and influence of friends might have procured. He died after a few days illness, 4th Jan. 1761, aged 84, universally respected. He published in 1741, his invention of ventilators; and wrote besides four volumes of statistical essays, and contributed some valuable papers to the philosophical transactions.

HALI-BEIGH, a native of Poland. His original name was Bobowski. He was when very young sold by the Tartars to the Turks, and educated in their religion. He was acquainted with 17 languages, and became dragoman or interpreter to the grand signior. He translated the English catechism into the Turkish language, and also the bible. His chief work is a treatise on the liturgy of the Turks, and their pilgrimages to Mecca, published in Latin by Thomas Smith, Oxford 1691. He had formed the design of returning to the Christian faith, when he died 1675.

HALL, Joseph, a divine and poet, was born, in 1574, at Ashby, de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, and was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. After having held the livings of Halsted, and Waltham, and the deanery of Worcester, and been chosen as one of the English divines deputed to the synod of Dordt, he was raised, in 1627, to the see of Exeter, whence, in 1641, he was translated to Norwich. Though he had refused to persecute the puritans, yet, having joined the other bishops in the celebrated protest against laws made during their absence from the upper house, he was committed to the Tower, and his estate was subsequently sequestrated. He died in 1656. His theological works gained for him the title of the English Seneca. His Satires, which appeared in 1597, and 1599, under the title of Virgidemiarium, are spirited in their sentiment and language, and often very musically versified.

HALL, Henry, an English divine, born in London 1716. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1738. In 1748 he was appointed librarian at Lambeth by Potter, and he was continued in his office by the next primate, Herring, who rewarded his merit by the rectory of Harbledown, the vicarage of Herne, and the sinecure of Orpington. In 1756 he exchanged Herne for East Peckham, and at the death of his patron in 1757, he resigned the place of librarian, and being appointed treasurer of Wells cathedral, he retired to Harbledown, where he died a bachelor 2d Nov. 1763, after a short illness. This respectable man, beloved as a pastor for his benevolence, meekness, and exemplary conduct, published some occasional sermons.

HALL, Richard, an English popish priest, who left England under Elizabeth to avoid the penal laws against his religion. He became divinity professor at Douay, and canon of St. Omer's, and wrote several theological books, especially the history of the troubles of his times, and died 1604.

HALL, Lyman, governor of Georgia, was a native of Connecticut and graduated at Yale college in 1747. Having studied medicine, he established himself at Sunbury, Georgia. He early and zealously espoused the cause of his country. His efforts were particularly useful in inducing the Georgians to join the American confederacy. In May 1775 he was a member of congress, and signed the declaration of independence, and continued in that body to the close of 1780. While the British had possession of Georgia they confiscated his property. In 1783 he was elected governor. He died 1791, aged 66.

HALL, Gordon, first American missionary at Bombay, graduated at Williams college in 1808. Having studied theology, he refused an invitation to settle in Connecticut, saying, "wo is me if I preach not the gospel to the heathen." Offering himself as a missionary to the American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions, he was ordained 1812, and sailed for Calcutta. He arrived at Bombay in Feb. 1813, and there spent thirteen years. He had just revised the New Testament in Mahratta, when as he was on a journey in the interior, he was seized with the cholera, which proved fatal in eight or nine hours. He died 1826 aged 36. His appeal to the American christians in behalf of the twelve millions, speaking the Mahratta language, was published in the Mis-Herald Oct. 1826. He wrote also with Newell, the conversion of the world, or the claims of six hundred millions. The New Testament in Mahratta was printed at the mission press in Bombay 1826.

HALLE, Peter, a French civilian and poet, born at Bayeux in Normandy, 8th Sept. 1611. He was educated at Bayeux and Caen, and by his merit was raised to the office of rhetorical professor in the latter university. His eloquence in the delivery of an oration so pleased Seguier the chancellor, that he presented him with a doctor's cap 1640, and carried him with him to Paris. Here his abilities were displayed to such advantage, that he was offered the headship of five colleges, and was at last appointed poet to the king, and in 1646 reader of the Greek and Latin tongues in the royal college. In 1655 he began as professor of canon law to raise the character of that much neglected science, and by his "canonical institutions," published 1685, and other treatises on law, acquired a high reputation for learning, application, and judgment. He published also 1655, a collection of Latin poems, and died Dec. 27, 1689.

HALLER, Albert, an eminent Swiss physician, professor of medicine, and chemistry, at Gottingen. Scarce inferior to Boerhaave, his abilities adorned the university and raised it to celebrity. Besides medical tracts, such as disputationes anatomicae, 8 vols. 4to.—disputationes de morbis, 7 vols. 4to. and elements physiologiae, 8 vols. 4to. he wrote moral essays, religious pieces, and a few odes much admired in Germany for poetry, elegance, and sublimity. In 1760 he retired to his native city Berne, where, after enjoying the respect of his country as a senator and magistrate, he died 12th Dec. 1777, aged 75. His son, who died 1785, was equally eminent as a man of merit, and wrote biographie litteraire de la Suisse.

HALLEY, Edmund LL.D., a celebrated English philosopher, born 29th Oct. 1656. He was educated at Oxford, where he early devoted himself to those astronomical and geometrical studies which have rendered his name immortal. His first attempt was to correct the errors of Tycho Brahe, and to ascertain the place of the fixed stars; but finding that those of the northern hemisphere already engaged the attention of Flamsteed and Hevelius, he set out under the protection of Charles II. and of the East India Company to St. Helena, where he formed a catalogue of those bodies which never appear above the horizon of Greenwich or Dantzick. After two years' residence there, he returned in 1678 to England. In 1697 he visited Hevelius at Dantzick, at the request of the Royal Society, to adjust the dispute between that great philosopher and Hooke in England, concerning the preference of plain or glass lights in astroscopical instruments. On his return he went upon a tour in company with his school-fellow the learned Nelson, and in his way to Paris, he first observed that remarkable comet which at that time soon engaged the attention of the philosophers of Europe. Afterwards he passed to Lyons, and thence to Italy, where, upon his return to England in 1681, he left his friend Nelson. In 1683 appeared his theory of the variation of the magnetical compass, and by his acquaintance with the great Newton, whom he visited at Cambridge to consult him on philosophical subjects, he had the opportunity of recommending, by an elegant copy of verses, the principles of the illustrious astronomer which were then first presented to the world. In 1698 he obtained from king William the appointment of a vessel to enable him to improve and to mature his philosophical observations on the variations of the needle, and after proceeding as far as the line, he returned home with the intention of pursuing discoveries in another voyage. The next year with bold zeal in the cause of science, he crossed the Atlantic ocean, and penetrated towards the south pole till the ice stopped his progress, and returning to England in 1700, he published the following year his general chart, showing the variations of the compass in those seas frequented by European navigators. In 1703 he was employed by the emperor to survey the coast of Dalmatia; in the same year he was appointed Savilian professor at Oxford; in 1705 he made public his valuable researches on the orbits of comets; in 1713 he became secretary to the Royal Society; and, in 1719, he succeeded Flamsteed as astronomer royal. The remainder of his life was chiefly spent in sedulously performing the duties of the last-mentioned office, especially in completing the theory of the motion of the moon. He died in his chair, without a groan, in 1741. Besides numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions, he published A Theory of the Variation of the Compass; A History and Physical Cause of the Trade Winds; and Miscellanea Curiosa: translated Apollonius de Sectione Rationis into Latin; and assisted in bringing out Gregory's edition of the Conics of Apollonius. His Astronomical Tables were printed in 1752.

HALLIFAX, Samuel, LL.D. an English bishop, eldest son of an apothecary at Chesterfield. He was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Trinity hall. As professor of civil law in the university, he gained great reputation by his "analysis of the civil law." In 1776 he was created D.D. by mandate, and became afterwards chaplain to the king, rector of Worsop, Notts, master of the faculties in Doctor's Commons, and master of his college, which he resigned in 1781, when made bishop of Gloucester. In 1787 he was translated to St. Asaph, and died 1790, aged 60. He was a man of great erudition, commanding eloquence, and of amiable manners. His sermons at Warburton's lectures were much admired, and also his judicious analysis of Butler's Analogy. He was for some years Arabic professor at Cambridge.

HAMBERGER, George Albert, an eminent mathematician of Franconia, author of some valuable works on optics, hydraulics, and other philosophical subjects. He died at Jena 1726.

HAMBERGER, George Christopher, a learned German, of the university of Göttingen. Besides other voluminous works he published Orpheus with the assistance of Gesner. He died 1773, aged 47.

HAMEL, John Baptist du, a French divine, born 1614, at Vire, in Normandy, and educated at Caen and Paris. At 18 he published a tract on trigonometry with Theodosius' three books on spherics, and the next year he was admitted into the congregation of the oratory, where he continued 10 years, till he became curate of Neuilli on the Marne. In 1666 he was appointed secretary to the newly established academy of sciences, and he afterwards accompanied Colbert de Croissy, the French ambassador, at Aix la Chapelle and in England, where he gained the friendship of Boyle, Ray, and Willis. He returned to France through Holland, and in 1678 published his "philosophia vetus & nova," a valuable work, reprinted in 6 vols. 1681. In 1698 appeared his Regiæ scientiarum academiæ historia, 4to. in four books, to which two were afterwards added. He also published 1706, Biblia sacra vulgatæ editionis cum selectis notis, besides other theological works. He died 6th Aug. 1706, of old age. To the character of a scholar he united that of a pious and worthy man, esteemed not only by the great and powerful, but by the poor, especially at Neuilli, where his annual visit, after he had quitted the cure, was regarded as a day of festivity.

HAMILTON, Patrick, a Scotch divine, related to James V. by whom he was made abbot of Ferne. His further advancement in the church was prevented by his adherence to the tenets of Luther, which so offended the catholic clergy, that at the suggestion of cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, he was tried as a heretic, and condemned to the flames. He endured the cruel sentence with the most astonishing fortitude, 1527, aged only 23. His confession of faith was published by John Frith. He was not only pious, but learned and polite.

HAMILTON, Antony, count, a native of Ireland, of Scotch extraction. He followed the fate of the second Charles, and returned at the restoration, but was banished at the revolution. His genius, vivacity, and wit, rendered him the companion of the great, and the ornament of every society. His works consisted of poems,—fairly tales,—and "Memoirs of the Count de Grammont," which develope the licentious characters of the court of Charles II. He died at St. Germain's 1720, aged 74.

HAMILTON, James, first duke of, son of James marquis of Hamilton, was educated at Oxford, and succeeded to his father's titles, 1625. With a mind ardent after adventures he went in 1631, with an army to the assistance of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and returned the following year. Distinguished at the English court by the favor and good opinion of the monarch, he was named a commissioner to settle the disputes which the presbyterians excited in Scotland, on the subject of episcopacy, and for his services he was created duke of Hamilton and earl of Cambridge. After seeing the ruin of his master's armies in England, he still maintained his cause in the north, but the superior power of Cromwell prevailed against him, and he was unfortunately defeated at Preston.

Though promised that his life would be spared, the perfidious conqueror still treated him as an enemy and caused him to be tried and to be beheaded, 1649, in his 43d year.

HAMILTON, William Gerard, was born, in 1729, in Lincoln's Inn; received his education at Westminster School, and at Oriel College, Oxford; sat both in the English and Irish parliaments; was for several years chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland; and died in 1796. He obtained the appellation of Single Speech Hamilton, from his having delivered only a single, but excellent, speech in the British House of Commons: in the Irish House he was a frequent speaker. His Parliamentary Logic, and his Speeches, appeared after his decease. The Letters of Junius have idly been imputed to him.

HAMILTON, sir William, a Scotchman of the noble family of that name, sent as ambassador to the Neapolitan court in 1764, and continued in that capacity till the year 1800, during which time he devoted himself ardently to the cultivation of science, and to the improvement of the fine arts. With the eye of a philosopher, and the taste of a man of genius, he visited and examined the wonders of Etna and Vesuvius, and not only collected from their volcanic eruptions the most valuable curiosities, but composed an interesting and admired performance. He also published Campi Phlegreæ, 2 vols. folio, a curious and splendid work, and encouraged and contributed to the compilation of the Antiquités Etrusques, Grecques & Romaines, edited from his cabinet by D'Hancarville. The philosophical transactions were also enriched by his learned commentaries, and the British Musæum can boast of his valuable presents of antiquities and other curious donations. This active antiquarian whose researches were so much applauded by all men of science, was honored with the ribbon of the order of the Bath, while at Naples, and he received from the Sicilian king and his court every mark of attention and respect. He died in London in May 1803.

HAMILTON, Andrew, a native of Scotland, was appointed by William Penn deputy governor of Pennsylvania in 1701. He had previously been for several years governor of New-Jersey, of which colony he was one of the proprietors, and where he was succeeded by Andrew Bowne. He died December, 1702.

HAMILTON, James, governor of Pennsylvania, was a native of Philadelphia, and succeeded governor Thomas in 1748. He resigned in October, 1754, and was again appointed in 1759, and continued in the office till 1763, when John Penn arrived as governor. In 1771, the administration again devolved on him a short time. He had several other offices of distinction in the province, and enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the people. He died in New York, while that city was occupied by the British, August 14th, 1783, aged 73.

HAMILTON, Alexander, first secretary of the treasury of the United States. At the age of sixteen he accompanied his mother to New York and entered a student of Columbia college, in which he continued about three years. While a member of this institution the first buddings of his intellect gave presage of his future eminence. The contest with Great Britain called forth the first talents on each side, and his juvenile pen asserted the claims of the colonies against very respectable writers. At the age of eighteen he entered the army as an officer of artillery. In 1777, he was selected by Washington as one of his aids with the rank of lieutenant colonel. At the siege of York in 1781, when the second parallel was opened, two redoubts which flanked it, and were advanced three hundred yards in front of the British works, very much annoyed the men in the trenches. It was resolved to possess them, and to prevent jealousies the attack of the one was committed to the Americans, and of the other to the French. The detachment of the Americans was commanded by the marquis de la Fayette, and colonel Hamilton, at his own earnest request, led the advanced corps consisting of two battalions. The troops rushed to the charge without firing a single gun, and the works were carried with but little loss. After the return of peace he adopted the law as his profession, and settled in New York. In 1786, he was chosen a member of the New York assembly. In 1787, he was a member of the federal convention which formed the present constitution of the United States. By his pen, in the papers signed Publius, and by his voice in the convention of New York in the summer of 1788, he contributed much to its adoption. When the government was organized in 1789, Washington placed him at the head of the treasury. In his reports he proposed plans for funding the debt of the union, and for assuming the debts of the respective states, for establishing a bank, and mint, and for procuring a revenue. He wished to redeem the reputation of his country, by satisfying her creditors, and combine with the government, such a monied interest, as might facilitate its operations. In 1795, he resigned his office, and resumed the practice of his profession. In consequence of his connexion with the treasury, he was exposed to a malignant political persecution, and though he did not escape entirely free from all moral pollution, yet the charge of speculation, he triumphantly put down at once, and for ever. When a provisional army was raised in 1798, in consequence of the injuries and demands of France, Washington suspended his acceptance of the command of it, on the condition, that Hamilton should be his associate, and the second in command. This arrangement was accordingly made. After the adjustment of our dispute with the French republic, and the discharge of the army in the summer of 1800, he returned again to his profession in the city of New York. In 1804, he was drawn into a correspondence with Aaron Burr, then vice president of the United States, and his determined political and personal enemy, for the express purpose, of bringing about the catastrophe, which followed. Hamilton instead of returning upon Burr's hands, his impertinent and unauthorised letter, fell into the snare, put his life into Burr's hands, who shot him at Hoboken July 11th 1804. He died the next day, aged 47. Hamilton was the author of a great variety of political essays, and among others of the Federalist, to which he was a principal contributor, the numbers of which have been collected and published in two volumes, and is a work of high character. His other signatures were Publius Phocion, Pacificus, Camillus, and Titus Manlius. He put his name to a letter concerning the public conduct and character of John Adams. His writings were collected and published in three volumes 1810.

HAMILTON, Paul, secretary of the navy of the United States, was governor of South Carolina from 1804, to 1806. He was secretary of the navy from 1809, to 1813. He died 1816. He was a patriot of the American revolution.

HAMILTON, Hugh, a learned prelate, was born in Ireland in 1729. He received his education in Trinity college, Dublin, where, in 1751, he obtained a fellowship. In 1758, appeared his treatise

"De Sectionibus Conicis;" and the next year he was elected Erasmus Smith's professor of natural philosophy. In 1764, he accepted a college living, and thereby vacated his fellowship. After this he obtained the rectory of St. Anne's, Dublin; but relinquished it on being promoted to the deanery of Armagh. In 1796, he was consecrated bishop of Clonfert; from whence, in 1799, he was translated to Ossory, where he died Dec. 1, 1805. His works and life were published in 1809, in 2 vols. 8vo.

HAMILTON, William, a historical painter, was born in 1750. He went to Italy when very young, and was there placed under the instruction of Zuechi, the painter of arabesque ornaments at Rome. On his return to England he became a pupil at the Royal Academy, and afterwards acquired considerable employment. In 1789, he was admitted a royal academician. He died Dec. 2, 1801.

HAMILTON, Elizabeth, a female of great talents and acquirements, was born, in 1758, at Belfast; was brought up by an uncle who resided near Stirling, in Scotland; acquired reputation by her productions, and affection and respect by her disposition and character; and died, unmarried, at Harrogate, July 23, 1816. Among her works are, Letters of a Hindoo Rajah; Memoirs of modern philosophers (a satire on modern philosophism); The Life of Agrippina; The Cottagers of Glenburnie; Popular Essays; Letters on the Elementary Principles of Education; and Letters on the Formation of the Religious and Moral Principle.

HAMILTON, John, was appointed a member of the council of New-Jersey in 1713, and succeeded Mr. Anderson as commander-in-chief of the province as senior member in March, 1736. He continued at the head of the administration until 1738, and died in 1746.

HAMLET, prince of Denmark, is immortalized in English literature by the pen of Shakspeare, who drew his materials from the relation of Saxo Grammaticus the Danish historian.

HAMMOND, Henry, an English divine born 18th Aug. 1605. In 1633, he was presented to the living of Penshurst, Kent, by Robert earl of Leicester, who accidentally heard him in the pulpit, and thus nobly rewarded his eloquence and piety. He continued in this peaceful retirement, till 1643, when his zeal in the royal cause rendered him obnoxious to the parliament, and 100*l.* were set upon his head. He fled in disguise to Oxford, and in 1644, at the request of his friend Dr. Potter of Queen's college, he published his "practical catechism" which gave offence to those who in the business of salvation regarded faith alone without works. At the treaty of Uxbridge he was appointed on the part of Charles I. and he displayed to great advantage his learning and eloquence in a dispute with Richard Vines, a presbyterian minister delegated by the parliament to meet him. To the archdeaconry of Chichester to which Duppa had presented him in 1634, the king in 1645, added a canony of Christ church, and soon after he was chosen public orator to the university. He afterwards attended the king as chaplain during his confinement at Woborn, Caversham, Hampton Court, and the Isle of Wight, till he was dismissed in 1647 by the parliament and permitted to return to Oxford. He was in 1648, stripped of his honors, and with Dr. Sheldon, confined a prisoner in Oxford by the parliamentary delegates, and ten weeks after conveyed to the house of sir Philip Warwick at Clapham, Bedfordshire. When liberated in 1649, he retired to the seat of sir John Packwood Westwood, Worcestershire, where the second Charles saw and commended his loyalty, and his firm adherence to the religion of his country. In 1653, he published his "paraphrase and annotations on the new testament," which he had begun during his confinement at Oxford, a work of great merit, and general utility. He began afterwards a "paraphrase and commentary on all the books of the old testament," but his infirmities prevented his completing more than the psalms and the third part of proverbs. He died 25th April 1660, at a time when the king, restored to the throne of his ancestors, was meditating to reward his meritorious services by raising him to the bishopric of Worcester. His works are collected into 4 vols. folio.

HAMPDEN, John, the illustrious patriot, was born of a very ancient family in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. From the university he went to the inns of court in London, and was afterwards chosen in parliament. In 1636, he had the boldness alone and unsupported to resist the royal authority in levying ship money, and though he lost his cause he gained more admirers by the firmness and modesty of his conduct than the king obtained advantage by the successful issue of the trial. Thus proclaimed by the public voice a patriot, Hampden was now regarded as the leader of the popular party in the House of Commons against the king, and when the civil war broke out, he took up arms to defend what he considered as the rights of the people. In the field he showed himself courageous, intrepid, and active, but his career of glory was cut short by a fatal wound which he received in Chalgrave field, Oxfordshire, when fighting against prince Rupert 18th June 1643. This very extraordinary character, who, in every contest in the parliament and in the field, evinced such steadiness and perseverance in what he regarded as the cause of his country, is described by Clarendon as a great rather than a good man, and the noble historian applies to him what was applied to Cinna, that he had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute any mischief.

HANCOCK, Thomas, a benefactor of Harvard college, died 1764. He gave one thousand pounds sterling for founding a professorship of the Hebrew and other oriental languages in Harvard college. He also gave one thousand pounds to the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians in North America; and six hundred pounds to the town of Boston towards erecting a hospital for the reception of such persons as are deprived of their reason.

HANCOCK, John, LL.D., governor of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780, graduated at Harvard college 1754. He was a merchant in Boston. In 1766, he was chosen a member of the house of representatives from Boston. The seizure of his sloop Liberty in 1768, for evading the laws of trade, occasioned a riot, and several of the commissioners of the customs narrowly escaped with their lives. As the controversy with Great Britain assumed a more serious shape, and affairs were hastening to a crisis, he evinced his attachment to the rights of his country. He was president of the provincial congress in 1774. June 12th of the following year general Gage issued his proclamation, offering pardon to all the rebels, excepting Samuel Adams and John Hancock, "whose offences," it is declared, "are of too flagitious a nature to admit of any other consideration, than that of condign punishment." Mr. Hancock was at this time president of the continental congress, and remained so till after the declaration of independence, and his is the first signature to that instrument. He left congress in 1777. He was the first governor of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780, and was annually re-elected, excepting 1785, and 1786, during his life time. He died Oct. 8th 1793, aged 56. He was a generous benefactor of Harvard college. He published an oration, which he delivered on the Boston massacre, 1774.

HANDEL or HAENDEL, George Frederic, the son of an eminent physician, was born, in 1684, at Halle, in Saxony. His father intended him for the law, but as nothing could overcome the musical bent of the youthful Handel's mind, he reluctantly consented to his being instructed in music. His first master was Zachau, an organist, and he began to compose in the ninth year of his age. After having struggled through considerable difficulties, but still kept rising in reputation, he visited Italy in 1703; remained there, much admired, during two years; and then returned to Germany, and entered into the service of the elector of Hanover, who was afterwards George I. The accession of that prince to the British throne fixed Handel in England. In 1720 he was placed at the head of the Italian opera; but this event, which seemed to promise fame and riches, ended in such severe loss that his liberty was often endangered by angry creditors. After twenty years of vexation and unavailing efforts, he bad a final adieu to the opera. His Oratorios, however, saved him from ruin, and he ultimately accumulated a second fortune, of no despicable magnitude. Eight years previous to his death, he was wholly deprived of sight; and it was an affecting circumstance to see him led to the organ, and hear him perform his own pathetic composition of "Total eclipse, without all hope of day," from the Samson Agonistes of that immortal bard who may be considered as the Handel of poets. This in many respects matchless composer died April 13, 1758.

HANKINS, Martin, was born at Breslaw 1633, where he became professor of history, politics, and eloquence. His works evince the scholar and the critic. The best known of these is his book, "De Romanarum Rerum Scriptoribus," to which was added de Byzantin. Rerum Scriptor. Græcis. He died 1709.

HANMER, Meredith, D.D., a native of Flintshire, who became treasurer of Trinity church, Dublin, and died there of the plague 1604. He translated into English the ecclesiastical histories of Socrates, Eusebius, and Evagrius.

HANMER, sir Thomas, a statesman born 1676, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. He was for 30 years member of parliament as representative of either Suffolk, Flintshire, or Thetford, and in 1713, he was chosen speaker, an office which he adorned by dignity of deportment, commanding eloquence, and great impartiality. He retired from public life and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published an edition of Shakspeare, in an elegant and magnificent style, which he presented to the university of Oxford, in 6 vols. 4to. He died at his seat, Suffolk, 5th April 1746.

HANMER, Jonathan, a nonconformist divine, born at Barnstaple, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. He was ordained by bishop Field, and was made rector of Bishop's Tawton, and lecturer of Barnstaple, from which he was ejected 1662. He is the author of a view of ecclesiastical antiquity,—of a discourse on confirmation,—and other works. He died 1637.

HANNIBAL, a celebrated Carthaginian. At the age of nine he swore to his father eternal enmity to Rome, and through life he evinced how much he adhered to the solemnity of an oath. After taking Saguntum and thus beginning the second Punic war, he crossed the Alps, and defeated the Romans at the great battles of Trebia, Thrasymene lake, and Cannæ, with such terrible earnage that during 16 years no general had the boldness to face him in the field. By invading Africa, the Romans forced the victorious Hannibal to come to the defence of his country, and at the battle of Zama he was defeated by Scipio. He afterwards led a wandering life at the courts of Antiochus and Prusias in Asia, and at last destroyed himself by poison when he was going to be betrayed into the hands of the Romans, B. C. 182.

HANRIOT, Francis, a native of Nanterre who during the revolution obtained the confidence of Marat and Robespierre, by the atrocity of his character, and the active part which he performed in the murder of the priests at the Carnes in September, 1792. By surrounding the convention with armed men, he obtained the decree of accusation against the Girondists, but though thus triumphant, the fall of Robespierre was but the forerunner of his own. He was guillotined 23th July 1794, aged 33, execrated for his cruelty, rapine, and insolence.

HANSON, John, president of congress from 1781 to 1783, was a delegate from Maryland and a distinguished friend of his country. He died 1783.

HANWAY, Jonas, a benevolent character, born at Portsmouth 1712. He was early engaged with a merchant at Lisbon, and afterwards was connected with a house at Petersburg, in the business of which he travelled into Persia. On his return to London, in the retirement of private life he employed his large and honorably acquired opulence to the purposes of benevolence and humanity, and to his liberality and public spirit, among other institutions, the Marine society, and the Magdalen charity owe their origin. His services in the cause of philanthropy were such that several British merchants applied to lord Bute to distinguish him by some marks of public esteem, and he was accordingly made commissioner of the navy, and when after 20 years he resigned the office he was honorably permitted to retain the salary. His exertions to relieve the distresses of the chimney sweepers, deserve also the highest praise, and to his humane intentions the establishment of sunday schools is in some degree to be attributed. At his death, which happened 1786, a public subscription of several thousands was contributed to erect a monument to the memory of a man, who above all others had shone as a pattern of benevolence, virtue and philanthropy. His publications are said to have amounted to nearly 70, the best known of which are an account of his travels through Russia, Persia, Germany, and Holland, published 1753, 2 vols. 4to. and domestic happiness promoted. He is said to be the first who used an umbrella in the streets of London.

HARCOURT, Harriet Eusebia, a lady born at Richmond, Yorkshire. She travelled with her father over Europe, and at his death at Constantinople in 1733, she returned to England, and as she inherited a large property she began to establish a female monastery on her Yorkshire estate, and another in the western isles of Scotland. These institutions which were composed chiefly of foreign females, restrained by neither vows nor austere forms, were dissolved at the death of their patroness, which happened 1745, in her 39th year.

HARDENBERGH, Jacobus R., D.D., first pre

ident of Queen's college in New Jersey, was a native of the United States. He was not favored with many advantages in the early part of his education, yet with a powerful mind, and habits of persevering application, he made great progress in knowledge. He was ordained by that party in the Dutch churches, which was denominated the Coetus, and was its most distinguished and able supporter. He cheerfully exerted himself with Dr. Livingston in 1771, when he was minister of Raritan, to heal the division of the Dutch churches, and a union was completed in the following year. After the charter of Queen's college at New Brunswick was obtained in 1770, he was the first president, and died in that office 1790.

HARDING, Thomas, an English divine, born at Comb-Martin, Devonshire, 1512. He was educated at Winchester and New-college, Oxford, where he became fellow 1536. He was made Hebrew professor of the university by Henry VIII. and when chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, he was concerned in the education of his daughter the lady Jane Grey. From a protestant under Edward, he became a strong catholic under Mary, and at the accession of Elizabeth, he lost his preferment and retired to Louvain, where he became, says Wood, the target of popery. He entered the lists of controversy with bishop Jewel, against whom, during 13 years, he wrote seven pieces in support of the catholic faith. He died about 1570.

HARDINGE, George, son of Nicholas, was born in 1744. He received his education at Eton, and went from thence to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he had Dr., afterwards bishop, Watson for his tutor. In 1769, he was created M. A. by mandate, and the same year was called to the bar by the society of the Middle Temple. By the influence of his maternal uncle, lord Camden, he obtained a silk gown; and in 1782 was appointed solicitor-general to the queen. He also became counsel for the East India Company, and had a seat in parliament. In 1787, he was made senior justice of the counties of Brecon, Glamorgan, and Radnor, and two years afterwards attorney-general to her late majesty, who honored him with her confidence and conversation. He died at Presteigne, on the circuit, April 26, 1816. Mr. Justice Hardinge was a man of learning, a good lawyer, and of infinite pleasantry. Besides several speeches in parliament, and at the bar, which have been printed, he wrote—1. A Series of Letters to Burke on the impeachment of Hastings, 8vo.—2. The Essence of Malone; or the beauties of that fascinating writer, 8vo., an ironical attack on Malone's life of Dryden.—3. Another Essence of Malone, 8vo.—4. The Filial Tribute, on the death of his Mother, 12mo.—5. Three Sermons by a Layman.—6. An Essay on the Character of Jonathan.—7. The Russian Chiefs, an ode. His miscellaneous works and correspondence have been published by Mr. Nichols with the life of the author.

HARDOUIN, John, a French Jesuit, born at Quimper in Brittany 1647. He distinguished himself for his criticism and extensive erudition, as well as by the singularity of his opinions. He published in 1684, "nummi antiqui populorum & urbiium illustrati," and afterwards was engaged in the edition of the classics, for the use of the Dauphin, especially Pliny, 5 vols. 4to. He next attempted religious subjects, and in 1693, came out, in two vols. 4to. his "Chronologie prolusio," in which he maintains that the many authors which the moderns regard as ancient, are only impositions upon the credulity of the world by the artifice of the monks of the 13th century. Homer therefore, and a long list of literary heroes are hurled down from their height of antiquity, and Cicero alone, with Pliny's natural history and Virgil's Georgics, and Horace's satires and epistles, are permitted to retain the reverence paid to them through successive ages. His learning was thus lost in wild reveries, and while he wished to prove that the Æneas of Virgil is no other than Jesus Christ, and the Lalage of Horace, the christian religion, he imposed upon his own understanding, and gave way to the greatest absurdities, which public authority at last was called upon to repress. His opinions were ably opposed by La Croze, by Le Clerc, and others; but though he pretended to make a recantation of his errors, he yet continued to maintain them. With the approbation of some of the French clergy by whom he was assigned a pension, he prepared a new edition of the councils, in 12 vols. folio, which however, was prohibited by the parliament. This extraordinary character died at Paris 3d Sept. 1729, aged 83, and after his death appeared some of his posthumous works. De Boze wrote his epitaph, and after mentioning his learning he concludes by describing him as a man, "qui Scepticum p̄d̄ egit, credulitate puer, audacia juvenis, delirius senex."

HARDWICKE, Philip York, earl of, an eminent English lawyer, born at Dover, 1st December 1690, and educated under Mr. Samuel Morland of Bethnal green. His great abilities and the friendship of Parker the chancellor, raised him in 1720, to the office of solicitor general, and 4 years after he was appointed attorney-general. In the trials of Layer, of Kelley, and others, he displayed great eloquence, extensive knowledge of law, and honorable candor and lenity. Upright in his conduct and biassed by no influence of favor or of party, he acted up to the impartial dictates of his conscience, and in some cases even voted against those friends to whose favor or kindness he owed his elevation. In 1733 he was made chief justice of the King's bench, with a double salary of 4000*l.* and soon after a baron of the realm, and on the death of lord Talbot he was appointed lord chancellor, February 1736-7. In 1754 he was raised to the dignity of an earl, and two years after he resigned the high office which for twenty years he had supported with honor, with impartiality, and with general approbation. During these times of public danger and official embarrassment only three of his decrees were questioned, and on examination they were affirmed by the lords. To his great knowledge of law, he joined a high respect for the constitution of his country, and while he was eager to despatch the often protracted business of chancery, he applied his commanding talents to the relief and the comforts of the subject, in the planning, and improving the bills introduced to the legislature. This excellent character, pious as a christian, eloquent as an orator, dignified as a judge, well informed as a politician, as much beloved in private as he was honorably respected in public life, died 6th March 1764.

HARDY, Alexander, a French dramatic writer, whose plays it is said amounted to six hundred, of which, however only 41, in six volumes 8vo. were printed. With great facility of composition he often wrote 2000 lines in 24 hours, and completed his play in 3 days. He was the first French dramatist paid for his pieces. He died at Paris 1630.

HARDY, Sir Charles, was appointed governor of New-York in 1755, and continued two years in office. He was descended from a distinguished naval commander under Queen Anne; was an admiral in the British navy, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the grand western squadron in 1779, in which year he died at Spithead.

HARDY, Josiah, governor of New-Jersey, was appointed in 1761, and succeeded by Franklin the following year. He was previously an eminent merchant of London, and brother of Sir Charles.

HARIOT, Thomas, an English mathematician, born at Oxford 1560. He went over to America with sir Walter Raleigh, whom he instructed in mathematics, and at his return he gave to the public an account of Virginia, reprinted in Hackluyt's voyages. He was afterwards patronised by Henry earl of Northumberland, who liberally allowed him an annual pension of 120*l.* and who, when confined in the tower, forgot the horrors of imprisonment and persecution, in his interesting conversation. He lived for some time at Sion college, and died at London July 21st 1621, of a cancer on his lip. His "ephemeris chryometrica" is preserved in Sion college in MS. and from his "artis analyticae praxis," published after his death, it is said Descartes drew many of his improvements in algebra. Wood has impeached his character as to his religious principles; but while he describes him as a deist, others regard his attachment to the doctrines of the church, and his veneration for the holy scriptures, as incontrovertible.

HARLAY, Achille de, a learned president of the parliament of Paris, after De Thou. During the commotions of the league he maintained with firmness and dignity his attachment to the king, and without yielding to the intrigues of the factious and the disloyal, he supported with increasing reputation the upright conduct of the magistrate. He died universally respected, at Paris, 23d Oct. 1616, aged 80.

HARLAY, Francis de, archbishop of Rouen, and afterwards of Paris, was the favorite of Anne of Austria, and afterwards of Louis XIV. though little entitled by his private manners, say some historians, to the notice of the great. He died 6th Aug. 1695, aged 70. His life has been written by Le Gendre.

HARLAY, Achille de, first president of the parliament of Paris, was an upright magistrate, and a respectable subject. In his conversation he was particularly jocose, and often forgot the dignity of his rank or situation to indulge his inclination for a witty or severe allusion. He died 23d July, 1712, aged 73.

HARLEY, Robert, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, a celebrated statesman, the son of Sir Robert Harley, was born, in 1661, in London. His first entrance into public life was at the period of the Revolution, and for some years he acted with the whig party. At the accession of Anne, however, he enrolled himself among the tories. In 1702 he was chosen speaker of the House of Commons; and in 1704 was appointed one of the secretaries of state. The secretaryship he resigned in 1708; but in 1710 he again came into office, as a commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. In 1711 he narrowly escaped being assassinated at the council board by the marquis of Guiscard. He was shortly after raised to the peerage, and made lord high treasurer. The inveterate hostility which at length broke out between him and Bolingbroke induced him to resign in 1714. On the accession of George I. he was impeached, and committed to the Tower, and he remained in confinement till 1717, when he was acquitted. After his liberation, he retired wholly from public business, and employed himself in adding to his magnificent library. He died in 1724. Harley was fond of literature, and a friend to literary men. He wrote some political pamphlets, and a Letter to Swift on correcting and improving the English Language.

HARLOW, George Henry, a painter, was born in the parish of St. James, Westminster, in 1787. He was a posthumous child, but his mother took great care of his education, and allowed him to follow the bent of his inclination for the arts which he studied, first under Drummond, and next under Sir Thomas Lawrence, after which he went to Italy. Previous, however, to his going abroad he painted some historical pictures of great merit, particularly one of Henry VIII., queen Catherine, and cardinal Wolsey. During his residence at Rome, in 1819, he made a copy of Raphael's Transfiguration, and executed a composition of his own which was exhibited by Canova, and afterwards at the academy of St. Luke's. This promising artist died soon after his return to England, Jan. 28th, 1819.

HARMER, Thomas, a dissenting minister of Waterfield in Suffolk, born at Norwich. He is author of "observations on passages of scripture," 4 vols. 8vo. a valuable work often edited. He wrote also notes on Solomon's song, and other works, showing in the most respectable light his extensive learning and his perfect acquaintance with oriental literature. He died 1738, aged 73.

HAROLD I., king of England, was son of Canute. The interferences of Alnot archbishop of Canterbury, who considered him as illegitimate, and who would consecrate none but the son of queen Emma, proved the source of civil discord. Harold however possessed power and influence, and by seizing the throne, he became master of his half-brother Alfred, whom he confined in a monastery after putting out his eyes. He died the 5th year of his reign in 1039 and without issue.

HAROLD II., son of earl Godwin, took possession of the English crown on the death of Edward the confessor. His claims to the sovereignty were opposed by his brother, but after defeating him in the north with great slaughter, he found that another competitor William of Normandy, had invaded the kingdom. He marched bravely to repel this formidable invasion, and fell, nobly fighting at the head of his troops, 14th Oct. 1066, the first year of his reign. Though Harold must be considered in some degree as an usurper, yet his bravery, his wisdom, and his virtues, exhibit him to the view of history in the most amiable light. Had he defeated the Normans in the field of Hastings he might have adorned his reign by the arts of peace, and endeared to his people by the intrepidity with which he exposed his life in the defence of his native country, he might have given birth to a new era of national prosperity, political justice, and honorable industry, and prevented that tyranny, and that devastation which ever attends the steps of a foreign, arrogant, and suspicious usurper.

HARPE, John Francis de la, a French writer of great eminence. He was of Swiss parentage, and was born at Paris 20th Nov. 1739, and educated in the college of Harcourt. He began early the profession of writer, and his earl of Warwick, a tragedy, 1764, procured him great applause and some money. He published various other dramatic pieces, besides poems rewarded with prizes from different learned bodies, elegies of Fenelon, Catinat, and Charles V. highly and deservedly admired. His chief work is a complete course of literature 12 vols. 8vo. As a critic, his powers were advantageously displayed in his lectures at the Lyceum, and his abilities, his taste, and genius as a poet, a philosopher, and as a man, are sufficiently displayed in his writings. During the revolution he, like other literary characters, supported the principles of republicanism: but when he saw terror prevail, and religion degraded, his sentiments were seriously changed. Though condemned to be deported, he escaped from his persecutors, and died at Paris, 1803. His other works are very numerous.

HARPER, Robert Goodloe, major general, senator of the United States, graduated at Princeton college 1735. After leaving college he embarked for Charleston South Carolina, where he arrived a stranger with but a dollar or two in his pocket. A gentleman of whose son he had been the teacher, offered him his assistance and friendship, and introduced him to a lawyer, with whom he studied the profession of the law. In a year he began the practice. He settled in the interior, and soon entered upon public life, and was chosen member of congress, where he became very distinguished. In 1801 he retired from congress, and entered upon the practice of law at Baltimore. In 1819 and 1820 he visited England, France, and Italy with his family. After his return he engaged with zeal in promoting the interests of the American colonization society. After being engaged the preceding day in the circuit court, he died suddenly Jan. 15, 1825, aged 60. He had been subject to the angina pectoris; having breakfasted, he arose from the table and was standing with a newspaper in his hand, when he suddenly fell, and died before medical aid could be procured. One of the reports of the colonization society contains an able and long discussion, which he wrote. He published also an address on the British treaty, 1796; observations on the dispute between the United States and France 1797; letter on the proceedings of congress; letters to his constituents 1801; correspondence with Robert Walsh respecting Germany; address on the Russian victories; on the triumphs in Germany 1814. Some of his addresses and speeches were collected in a volume.

HARRINGTON, sir John, an English poet, born at Helston near Bath. As his father was imprisoned for holding conference with Elizabeth in Mary's reign, the princess stood godmother to his son in proof of her patronage, and his learning and acquirements proved him not unworthy of royal favor. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and before he was 30 he published a translation of Aristoo's Orlando Furioso. He was knighted on the field by the earl of Essex, and under James he was created a knight of the Bath. He drew upon himself the attack of the clergy, by writing, for the use of prince Henry, a tract against married bishops. His works were published by the Rev. H. Harrington under the title of "Nugæ antiquæ," and contain a miscellaneous collection of curious pieces in verse and prose. He had formed the plan for an history of his own times which he did not execute. He died 1612 aged 51.

HARRINGTON, James, an eminent political writer, born January 1611, at Upton, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he had Chillingworth for his tutor, and after three years' residence, on his father's death, 1622, he set out upon his travels. In Holland he served for some time in lord Craven's regiment, and afterwards travelled through Flanders, Germany, France, and Italy. After his return to England, Harrington sided with the parliament, but he never could obtain a seat in the house. His independent spirit, however, was admired and respected, and when the commissioners removed the captive king from Newcastle nearer London, he was selected to attend upon his person. The unfortunate monarch was pleased with his conversation; he parted with him at Hurst castle with bitter concern by the rude interference of the republicans, and when led to the scaffold he again distinguished his favorite, and rewarded him on that awful occasion with a token of his esteem. The death of Charles affected deeply Harrington, but while his friends attributed his retirement to melancholy or discontent, he silenced their reproaches by producing his celebrated work, "Oceana," which at first was regarded as a severe satire on Cromwell's usurpation, but was afterwards permitted to appear dedicated to the protector by the interference of lady Claypole his favorite daughter. Harrington was regarded as a secret enemy, and though living in retirement he was in December 1661 seized by order of the king and committed to the tower, as guilty of treasonable practices. These accusations, though supported by the authority of chancellor Hyde, may be considered as founded on imaginary grounds, while the criminality of Harrington may be viewed in his severe reflections against the royal family. With unfeeling bitterness he not only decried the character of Mary, queen of Scots, and treated her son James as a worthless impostor, but he loaded the memory of Charles with every foul epithet; and forgetful of his former attachment, he described him as a tyrant at last cut off by God's avenging hand. After some time he was removed from the tower to St. Nicolas's island, opposite Plymouth, and afterwards to Plymouth, where by the advice of his physician Dunstan he mixed improperly too much guaiacum with his coffee for the cure of the scurvy, and brought on a gradual delirium. As his relations had given bail for his appearance he was liberated from confinement, and as he had some intervals of reason, he was permitted to retire to Scotland.

HARRINGTON, Henry, a descendant of Sir John Harrington, was born at Kelston, the family seat, in Somersetshire, Sept. 29th, 1729. He had a private education, after which he went to Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered upon the study of physic. He proceeded to his doctor's degree in that faculty in 1762, and about the same time settled at Wells; from whence he removed to Bath, where he continued to practise with reputation, till his death, Jan. 15, 1816. Dr. Harrington was an excellent classical scholar, a good poet, and devotedly attached to music. He composed several admirable catches, and other pieces of a higher description in his favorite science. His other publications are—1. An Ode to Harmony. 2. An Ode to Discord. 3. The Witch of Wokey; a ballad in the old English style. 4. The Geometrical Analogy of the Doctrine of the Trinity. He was the father of the corporation of Bath, in which city he founded a musical club, called the Harmonic Society.

HARRIS, William, D.D. a dissenting minister, who resided at Honiton, where he died 4th Feb. 1770. He was an able scholar, and was honored in 1765 by the Glasgow university with the degree of doctor of divinity. He wrote, though not very accurately, an account of the lives of James I. Charles I. Oliver Cromwell, and Hugh Peters, in 5 vols. 8vo. He prepared also materials for an account of James II. which he did not complete.

HARRIS, John, secretary to the royal society, translated Pardie's elements of geometry, and died 1730. He was an able mathematician, and good divine, and first projected the plan of a Cyclopædia or dictionary of sciences, which appeared in 2 vols. folio, 1710, under the title of Lexicon Technicum, to which a supplement was added in 1736. The works of Chambers, and the improvements of Dr. Rees and others have superseded this now obsolete performance.

HARRIS, James, esq., an eminent English scholar, the author of the characteristics. He was born in 1709, and after an education at the grammar school there, he entered at Wadham college, Oxford, but took no degree. He was member for Christ church in several parliaments, and in 1763 was made one of the lords of the admiralty, and soon after removed to the treasury, and in 1774 he was appointed secretary, and comptroller to the queen, which office he retained during life. He died after a long illness 21st Dec. 1780. His works are three treatises concerning art, music, painting and poetry; and happiness, 8vo. 1745,—Hermes, or a philosophical inquiry concerning universal grammar, 1751, 8vo. an able composition, commended by many, and particularly by Lowth, philosophical arrangements, and philosophical inquiries, 2 vols. 8vo. published after his death. His works have been edited by his son lord Mahmsbury, with an elegantly written account of his life.

HARRIS, James, earl of Malmsbury, was the son of the author of "Hermes," and born at Salisbury, April 9th, 1746. He was educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he was created doctor of civil law in 1793. He began his diplomatic career at the court of Spain, and in 1772, went as envoy to Berlin. In 1776 he was appointed minister at Petersburg, and in 1779 received the order of the Bath. In 1784 he was sworn a member of the privy council, and the same year went as ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Hague. In 1788, he was created baron Malmsbury, and in 1795, he concluded the marriage of the prince of Wales, and the princess of Brunswick, whom he accompanied to England. The year following he was appointed to negotiate with the ministers of the French republic at Lisle, but without effect. He was raised to the earldom in 1800, and in 1807, was made lord lieutenant of Hampshire, and governor of the Isle of Wight. He died Nov. 21st, 1820. His lordship published—1. Introduction to the History of the Dutch Republic, 8vo. 2. The works of James Harris, esq., with Memoirs of his Life, 2 vols. 4to.

HARRISON, William, an ingenious youth, fellow of New college, Oxford. He was tutor to one of the duke of Queensbury's sons, and was recommended by his wit, genius and learning to dean Swift, who procured for him from St. John the respectable office of secretary to the English ambassador at the Hague, lord Raby, and afterwards lord Stafford. Under the expectation of higher appointments, he was unfortunately carried off by a short illness, in London, 14th Feb. 1712-13. He wrote some elegant poetical pieces, many of which are preserved in Nichols's and Dodsley's collections. Not only Swift, but Young, Tickel, and others, have spoken with great respect and affection for the amiable character which he supported.

HARRISON, John, an eminent and well known mechanic, born at Foulby near Pontefract, 1693. His father was a carpenter, and he was brought up to his business, but he was doomed to extend his reputation beyond the limits of an obscure village. He had early a strong propensity to wheel machinery, and as his father was occasionally employeu in repairing clocks, he improved in his knowledge of the power of movements. In 1700 his father removed to Barrow, Lincolnshire, and there he obtained from a neighboring clergyman a MS. copy of Sanderson's lectures, which he transcribed, and from which he drew a hitherto unknown fund of knowledge. He made some ingenious experiments, and in 1726, produced two clocks, chiefly of wood, with the compound pendulum, which were so accurately constructed that they varied scarce a second in one month. He visited London 1735, and by the kindness of Dr. Halley was recommended to that ingenious artist G. Graham, who admired and encouraged his great talents, and advised him to complete his machines to present to the board of longitude. In 1735 his first machine was approved by the board, and he was sent to Lisbon to try its accuracy and its properties. Thus patronized he produced another more simple machine in 1739, and again a 3d, in 1749, but while he considered his labors as arrived to the highest degree of perfection, he discovered that greater accuracy might still be obtained, and a 4th time his machine, six inches in diameter, and in the shape of a watch, was constructed. The correctness of this machine was ascertained by the author's son in a voyage to Jamaica, and in another to Barbadoes, and as his discovery came within the meaning of the act of the 12th of Anne, he claimed, and obtained, though with some trouble, the liberal reward of 20,000*l.* from parliament. These four curious machines were deposited in the observatory at Greenwich, where it is said they are now buried in oblivion. A time piece on the same principles was constructed by Mr. Kendal for Cooke's voyage, and was found extremely accurate. The last time-piece made by this ingenious artist erred only four seconds and a half in ten weeks. He died in 1776, aged 80 years.

HARRISON, John, colonel in the parliament army, was son of a butcher, and one of the judges of the unfortunate Charles. He was employed to lull into security the unsuspecting Fairfax, and was with him on his knees in the hypocritical semblance of prayer, till the execution was over. He was tried and executed for his perfidy after the restoration.

HARRISON, Robert Hanson, sustained the offices of chief justice of the general court of Maryland, and governor of the state. In 1789, he was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, but declined accepting the office, which was afterwards conferred on Mr. Iredel. He was a man of distinguished merit, and possessed the unbounded confidence of his fellow-citizens. He exerted himself in the prosecution of the revolutionary war, with great ardor, and in his station as judge and governor displayed very superior talents. He died at his residence on the Potomack, in Charles county, April 2d, 1790, aged 45.

HARRISON, Benjamin, governor of Virginia, was educated at the college of William and Mary. He went early into public life, commencing as a member of the legislature of his native province, Virginia. He was offered by the British government a seat in the executive council, which he declined, and remained true to his country. In 1774, he was a delegat  in congress from Virginia, and continued to be a member till 1777. On signing the declaration of independence, being quite corpulent, he said to Mr. Gerry, who was slender and thin, after putting his name to the instrument—"when the time of hanging shall come, I shall have the advantage of you; it will be over with me in a minute, but you will be kicking in the air half an hour after I am gone." From 1782 to 1784, he was governor of Virginia. He was a member of the Virginia convention for adopting the constitution of the United States. He died 1791.

HARRISON, Benjamin, a tall man, was a native of Virginia, and died in Georgia in April 1813, aged 44. He was by accurate measurement seven feet, two inches and a half in height.

HART, William, minister of Saybrook, Connecticut, was graduated at Yale college in 1732, and ordained in 1736. He first gave the name of Hopkintonian to certain doctrines which he opposed. Dr. Hopkins replied to his dialogue. He published nature of regeneration, 1742; with Jona. Todd, narrative of proceedings at Wallingford, in regard to the settlement of J. Dana, 1759; remarks on dangerous errors, against the Hopkinsians, 1770; a dialogue and a sermon against the same; remarks on Edwards' dissertation on the nature of virtue; a treatise of qualifications for the sacraments, 1772. We have seen no record of the time of his death, or age.

HART, John, a patriot of the American revolution, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence. He was a member of congress in 1774 from New Jersey. In the latter part of the year 1776 his farm was pillaged by the enemy, and his family dispersed. The alarm and distress of these occurrences caused the death of his wife. After the evacuation of New Jersey he again collected his family; but his health was now failing him, and he died 1780.

HART, Levi, D.D., a graduate of Yale college, and a congregational minister of Preston, Conn. He graduated in 1760, and was settled in the place of his ministry, Nov. 4, 1762. Here he continued to perform the various duties of his office until a short time before his death, Oct. 27, 1808, aged 69. Dr. Hart is described to have been an excellent man; amiable and unassuming in his manners; and prompt in the discharge of all social and professional duties. He published several occasional discourses.

HARTSOEKER, Nicolas, a native of Gonda, son of the minister of the place. He laboriously devoted himself to mathematics and natural philosophy, and became professor of philosophy at Heidelberg and mathematician to the elector palatine. He wrote besides some small pieces, a course of natural philosophy in 4to. and died 1725, aged 69.

HARVARD, John, the founder of Harvard college, died at Charlestown in 1638, soon after his arrival in this country. He had been a minister in England, and he preached a short time in Charlestown. He left a legacy of 779*l.* to the school at Newton or Cambridge. The next year the general court constituted it a college. The first president was Mr. Dunster. Precisely 190 years after his death a granite monument was erected to his memory, Sept. 26, 1828, on the top of the burying hill in Charlestown. On this occasion Edward Everett delivered an address to a large company, including the officers and students of the college. The expense was provided for by the payment of one dollar each by many graduates. The monument is a solid obelisk, 15 feet high, four feet square at the bottom, two at the top, weighing twelve or thirteen tons, brought from the quarry at Quincy. On the eastern face is the name of Harvard in high relief; beneath it is an inscription in English on a white marble tablet, and on the tablet of the west side, looking toward the college, an inscription in Latin.

HAVEN, Samuel, D.D., minister of Portsmouth New Hampshire, graduated at Harvard college, 1749. He was ordained 1752, and died 1806, aged 78. He published the following sermons; at the request of the ministers of New Hampshire, 1760; on the death of George II. and the accession of George III., 1761; on the conclusion of the war, and the declaration of peace, 1763; at the ordination of Jeremy Belknap, 1767; on the death of Henry Sherburne, 1767; of B. Stevens, 1791; at Cambridge, 1771; at Medfield, 1771; at the election, 1786; on the reasonableness and importance of practical religion, 1794; the Dudleian lecture, 1798; after the ordination of T. Alden, as his colleague, 1800.

HAVEN, Jason, minister of Dedham, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college, 1754. He was ordained 1756, and died 1803, aged 70. Besides several smaller works, he published the following sermons; on the thanksgiving, 1758; at the artillery election, 1761; at a private meeting, 1761; at the ordination of Edward Brooks, 1764; of E. Ward, 1771; of M. Everett, 1774; of S. Palmer, 1792; election sermon, 1769; on the death of Mrs. Hannah Richards, 1770; of Samuel Dunbar, 1783; a sermon to his own people forty years after his ordination, Feb. 7, 1796.

HAVEN, Nathaniel Appleton, editor of the Portsmouth journal, graduated at Harvard college, 1807. He settled as a lawyer at Portsmouth, and died 1826, aged 36. He wrote some pieces of poetry, and many valuable articles for the journal, which he edited from 1821 to 1825. He wrote also for the North American Review. His remains, with a memoir by Geo. Ticknor was published 1827.

HARVEY, William, an English physician, celebrated as the first discoverer of the circulation of the blood. He was born 2d April, 1573. At the age of 19 he travelled through France and Germany, to Padua, where he studied medicine under some eminent masters. On his return to England he settled in London. In 1604 he was admitted candidate of the college of physicians, three years after fellow, and in 1615 lecturer of anatomy and surgery. In 1616 he laid open his discovery of the circulation of the blood, in his lectures. It was published in 1628 and dedicated to Charles I. after the ingenious author had in his lectures for nine years confirmed and illustrated it, by reasons and arguments the most convincing and satisfactory. This curious and important discovery produced an astonishing revolution in the practice of physic, and it is not to be wondered that so many laid claims to the honors and celebrity which belonged to Harvey alone. Not only father Paul vindicated the merit of the discovery, but Hippocrates was asserted by his editor Vanderhinden, to be the original author of this newly revived opinion. In 1632 Harvey was made physician to the king, and he shared his dangers at the battle of Edge-hill, and in consequence of his loyalty, he was in 1645 made warden of Merton college, which the following year he resigned, on the surrender of the city to the parliament. In 1651 he published his "exercitationes de generatione animalium," which might have been rendered more valuable by some important additions and anatomical observations, had not the papers of the author been profanely plundered and destroyed in London by the republicans during the civil wars. In 1654 he was chosen president of the college of physicians, but his infirmities were so great that he recommended Dr. Prujean for his successor. This great man died 3d June, 1657. His works were edited by Dr. Lawrence, with a life prefixed, in 2 vols. 4to. 1766.

HARVEY, Sir John, governor of Virginia, was sent out to that colony as a commissioner in 1623. He was a member of the provisional government in 1625, and assumed the administration in 1629. He was one of the most rapacious, tyrannical, and unpopular of the royal governors, and was suspended by the assembly in 1635, and impeached, but restored by the king the next year, and continued in the office till 1639.

HARWOOD, Edward, a dissenting minister, born in Lancashire. He died 1794, aged 65. He wrote various works, but he is best known as the author of a "view of the various editions of the Greek and Roman classics," which has passed through several editions, and has appeared in almost every European language. After presiding over a congregation at Bristol he went to London where he lived by correcting the press, by teaching the classics, and by his various publications. It is said that he refused every liberal patronage to join the church of England.

HASSELQUIST, Frederic, a learned botanist, born 1722 at Tournalla in East Gothia. The early death of his father left him in indigent circumstances, but he maintained himself at the university of Upsal by instructing some of his fellow pupils, and he displayed so much diligence in the study of physic that he received a royal stipend. He published an "essay on the virtue of plants," and was encouraged by his friend and master Linnæus to undertake a voyage to Palestine to examine its natural history. He was conveyed by the Levant company to Smyrna, and for two years was engaged in making a most valuable collection of curiosities. When on his return in 1752 he was overpowered by the heat of the climate and by fatigue, and died near Smyrna. His curiosities were seized by his creditors, but the queen of Sweden discharged his debts, and Linnæus arranged the publication of his papers.

HASTED, Edward, a topographer and antiquary, was born at Hawley, the seat of his family, in Kent, in 1732. He devoted the greatest part of his life to the labor of compiling a History of his Native Country, which was published in 4 vols. folio 1799. Having reduced himself to narrow circumstances, he was presented by lord Radnor to the mastership of the hospital at Corsham, in Wiltshire, where he died in 1812.

HASTINGS, Elizabeth, daughter of Theophilus earl of Huntingdon, was celebrated for her personal accomplishments, but more for her private and public acts of charity. The distresses of the poor and unfortunate in every place and situation were her peculiar care, and a splendid fortune was appropriated solely to their relief far and near. This virtuous and amiable character is well depicted under the name of Aspasia by Congreve in the 49th number of the Tatler. She died 1740 most universally and deservedly lamented.

HASTINGS, Warren, was born in 1733, at or near Daylesford, in Worcestershire, the manor of which had been in his family for many generations, though at the time of his birth it had gone into other hands. His father was a clergyman in low circumstances. However, the son obtained a good education at Westminster school, from whence he was sent to India, as a writer in the company's service in 1750. On his arrival in the east, he applied with diligence to the duties of his station, and at his leisure studied the oriental languages. After fourteen years residence in Bengal he returned to England, but in 1769, he went out as second in council at Madras, where he remained about two years, and then removed to the presidency of Calcutta. This was a critical period, and the state of Hindostan soon became perilous from the increasing power of Hyder Ali, the sovereign of Mysore, and the intrigues of the French, who were taking advantage of the rupture between Great Britain and her colonies. In this exigency the governor general had to depend solely upon his own exertions; and he succeeded beyond all expectation, in saving British India from a combination of enemies. Notwithstanding this, party spirit at home turned the merit of Mr. Hastings into a crime, and charges were brought against him in parliament. He returned in 1786, and an impeachment followed which, in all its stages, lasted nine years, and ended in his acquittal. After this he led a retired life on the wreck of his fortune, and an annuity from the company. He lived, however, to see his plans for the security of India publicly applauded; but he received no other compensation for the injury he had sustained, than that of being sworn a member of the privy council. He died Aug. 22d, 1818. Mr. Hastings was a man of mild and unassuming manners, an elegant scholar and a good poet. He wrote—1. A Narrative of the Insurrection at Benares, 4to. 2. Memoirs relative to the state of India, 8vo. 3. A Treatise on the Means of guarding Houses against Fire, 8vo. 4. Fugitive Poetry.

HATTON, sir Christopher, chancellor under Elizabeth, was a man of learning and great integrity, but it is remarkable that though placed in so high a situation he had not been bred to the law. His decisions however were never impeached, as he was guided by justice and impartiality. It was by his advice that the unfortunate Mary submitted to her fatal trial. He was born at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, from an ancient Cheshire family, and died 1591.

HAUTEFEUILLE, John, a French mechanic, was born in 1647, and died in 1724. He invented the spiral spring which moderates the vibration of the balance-wheel in watches, and which was afterwards perfected by Huygens. He wrote various works, among which are, A New System of the Flux and Reflux of the Sea; The Art of Breathing under Water; The Perpetual Pendulum; and Horological Problems.

HAUY, Renatus Justus, a celebrated mineralogist, was born in 1742, at St. Just, in Picardy; and was originally professor of the dead languages in Cardinal Lemoine's college. Botany and mineralogy, however, became his favorite studies, particularly the latter. As early as 1783, he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences; he was one of the first forty members of the Institute; and was appointed by Napoleon professor of mineralogy at the Botanic Garden, and to the faculty of sciences at Paris. He died in 1822. Science is indebted to him for an admirable theory of crystallization. Among his works are, A Treatise on Mineralogy, four vols.; A Treatise on Crystallography, two vols.; An Elementary Treatise on Natural Philosophy; and An Essay on the Theory and Structure of Crystals.

HAUTETERRE, Anthony Dantine de, professor of law at Toulouse, was a native of Cahors, and died 1682, aged 80. He wrote Gesta regum et ducum Aquitanie, two vols. 4to.—a treatise on monastic life,—and various other works which display great erudition and a deep knowledge of jurisprudence.

HAWES, William, a physician, was born at Islington, Nov. 28th, 1736. He was brought up to the profession of an apothecary, which business he carried on in the Strand till 1780, when, having taken his degree, he commenced practice as a physician. Long before this he had acquired deserved popularity, by his zealous exertions in establishing the Royal Humane Society; to which institution he may be said to have devoted his whole life. He died at Islington, Dec. 5th, 1803. Dr Hawes published—1. "An Account of Dr. Goldsmith's last illness," 8vo., which he attributed to an improper use of Jame's powder. 2. An Address on Premature Death and Premature Interment. 3. An Examination of the Rev. John Wesley's Primitive Physic. 4. An Address to the Legislature on the Humane Society. 5. An Address to the King and Parliament, with Observations on the general Bills of Mortality. 6. Transactions of the Royal Humane Society.

HAWEIS, Thomas, an English divine, was born at Truro, in Cornwall, about 1736. He served his time to an apothecary, but afterwards went to Cambridge, where he took the degree of bachelor of laws. On entering into orders he became assistant to Mr. Madan at the Lock chapel, on whose recommendation he accepted the presentation to the rectory of All Saints, Aldwinkle, in Northamptonshire, upon an implied promise of resignation; but when the time expired, he refused to give up the living, which occasioned much censure on the Calvinistic methodists. At last the countess of Huntingdon compromised the affair, and her chaplain held the living to his death. That lady also intrusted him with the management of her chapels and the seminary which she had founded for the education of young students in divinity. When the missionary society was formed he also took the lead in its direction, and obtained a doctor's degree from Scotland. He died in 1820. His principal works are—1. A volume of Sermons. 2. A Commentary on the Bible, 2 vols. folio. 3. History of the Church, 3 vols. 8vo. 4. Life of the Rev William Pomaine, 8vo. 5. State of Evangelical Religion throughout the World, 8vo.

HAWKE, Edward, lord, son of a barrister, entered early in the naval service to which he was to add so much glory. In 1734, he was made captain of the Wolf, and he soon distinguished himself under the English admirals, Matthews, Lestock, and Rowley, off Toulon, and took a Spanish ship of superior force, the Pader of 60 guns. In 1747, he was made rear admiral of the white, and that year he defeated a French fleet, and took two 74, one 70, two 64, and one 50, for which he was honored with the ribbon of the Bath. In 1743, he was made vice-admiral of the blue, and two years after of the white, and in 1757, he assisted on the expedition against Rochfort. In 1759, he was sent off Brest, from which the French fleet escaped, but he pursued them and attacked them off Belleisle and totally defeated them, for which he received a pension of 2000*l.* from the king. In 1765, he was appointed vice admiral of Great-Britain, and first lord of the admiralty, and in 1776, raised to the peerage. This heroic commander who ranks so high in the annals of his country, died October 14th, 1781.

HAWKESWORTH, John, L.L.D., an eminent English writer. He was born 1715, at Bromley, in Kent, and bound to the business of a watch maker, which he early abandoned for public life, and literary pursuits. His wife it is said kept a boarding school at Bromley, and by the means of a lady of some influence and consequence in Indian affairs he became known to the commercial world, and was elected a director of the East-India company. His "adventurer," was so popular a performance that archbishop Herring conferred upon him, though a dissenter, the Lambeth degree of doctor of laws. He was appointed to digest the narrative of the South Sea expeditions, a labor for which say some critics, he was not adequate, as his talents tended more to influence the passions in animated descriptions, than interest the heart in the cold detail of a journal. Though he received the high sum of 6000*l.* for his trouble, it is asserted that he died of chagrin for the unfavorable reception of his narrative, though some say he died of high living. He died 16th Nov. 1773, aged 58, and in Bromley church, Kent, where he was buried, is an elegant monument which records his services, in appropriate language borrowed from the last adventurer.

HAWKINS, sir John, an English admiral, born at Plymouth. He was for seven years in the merchants' service, and signalized himself under Elizabeth, especially against the invincible armada, when he was rear-admiral, and in several expeditions to the West-Indies, where he died, 1595.

HAWKINS, sir John, a native of London, who acquired some eminence in the law as an attorney, and became known as the friend and companion of Dr. Johnson. He commenced author by publishing in 1760, an edition of Walton's angler, besides various communications to the gentleman's magazine, and other periodical works, and in 1761, he was made justice of peace for Middlesex, and in 1772, knighted for dispersing some rioters in Moorfields. The greatest of his works is his history of music in five vols. 4to. which contains very useful and curious particulars. His life of Johnson is not a very creditable performance, as it was hastily finished to gratify the wishes of the booksellers. Sir John died 1789, aged 70.

HAWKWOOD, sir John, an English general in the service of Edward III. He was born at Sible Hedingham in Essex, where his father was a tanner, and he was for some time apprentice to a tailor, but he soon, says Fuller, turned his needle into a sword, and his thimble into a shield, at the sound of Edward's wars. He signalized himself so much under the king and the black prince, that from a private soldier he became a captain, and was knighted; but at the peace of Bretigni in 1360, he found himself too poor to maintain his dignity, and therefore he associated with others into a corps called "les tard venus," whose employment was to gain support by plunder as a marauding party. With these desperate followers, whose numbers daily increased, sir John penetrated into Italy, and enriched himself by the plunder of the clergy. In 1364, he entered into the service of the Pisan republic in which he behaved with great bravery. In 1387, he armed in defence of the Florentines, and his masterly retreat from the superior forces of his able antagonist Venni, and a difficult and dangerous country, is celebrated as exhibiting the most heroic courage, with coolness, judgment, and perseverance. Though at the peace of 1391, the Florentines disbanded all their forces, yet they retained still Hawkwood at the head of 1000 men. He died in Florence 1393, 6th March, at an advanced age, and his funeral was celebrated with unusual magnificence, and his remains deposited in the church of St. Reparata. A cenotaph was erected in the church of his native town, which still perpetuates his memory, as an able and heroic general, whose character, if taxed with ferocity or with the unprincipled passions of a lawless free-booter, must be defended by the barbarity of the times, which regarded valor, however disgraced by bloodshed and rapine, as one of the noblest virtues of man. As a proof of his charity it may be mentioned, that he founded an English hospital at Rome for the entertainment of poor travellers.

HAY, James, came to England with the first James, and was the first Scotchman raised to the English peerage, successively by the titles of lord Hay, viscount Doncaster, and earl Carlisle. He was employed by his master in various embassies, and went to France to negotiate a marriage between the prince of Wales and Henrietta Maria of France. He died 1636.

HAY, William, a miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1695, at Glynbourn, in Sussex; was educated at Oxford; sat in parliament for Seaford; was a commissioner of the victualling office, and keeper of the records at the Tower; and died in 1755. He translated a part of Martial's Epigrams; and wrote various works in prose and verse, one of the most remarkable of which is an Essay on Deformity. Hay was himself deformed, and in this essay he descants upon the circumstance in a truly philosophical spirit.

HAY, George, judge of the United States court for the eastern district of Virginia, and for many years attorney of the U. S. in which capacity he was the prosecutor of Aaron Burr. He died 1830. His political writings signed, "Hortensius," gave him some celebrity. He wrote also a treatise against the usury laws, and the life of John Thompson: a treatise on emigration 1814.

HAWLEY, Joseph, distinguished as a statesman and a patriot, was born in Northampton, Massachusetts, and was graduated at Yale college in 1742. He engaged in the practice of the law in his native town. In this science he became a great proficient, and was one of the most distinguished counsellors in the province. Among his other studies he attained to such an eminence of knowledge in political history, and the principles of free government, that during the disputes between Great Britain and the colonies, he was regarded as one of the ablest advocates of American liberty. He was first elected a member of the legislature in 1764. In the latter part of 1776, major Hawley was afflicted with hypochondriacal disorders, to which he had been frequently subject in former periods of his life; and after this he declined public business. He died 1783, aged 64.

HAWLEY, Gideon, a native of Connecticut, and a distinguished Missionary among the Indians. He graduated at Yale College in 1749, and in 1752, commenced in those charitable labors to which he devoted a long life. For these labors he was peculiarly well qualified, having a dignity of manners, and a commanding tone of voice, which gave him great influence with that unfortunate people. As early as 1754, he commenced an establishment upon the Susquehanna river, but in consequence of the French war was soon compelled to abandon it. He then became a chaplain in the army destined to operate against Crown point. In 1758, he was settled with the Marshpee Indians, where he remained till the close of his life. He died Oct. 3, 1807, aged 80 years.

HAYDN, Joseph, a musical composer, was born of low parentage, at Rhorau, in Austria, in 1733. At an early age he was received into the choir of the cathedral at Vienna, where he was not only taught to sing, but to play on the harpsichord and violin. On the breaking of his voice he was dismissed from the cathedral, after which he subsisted by teaching music and composition. In 1761, he entered into the service of the prince Esterhazy, as the director of his music. In 1791, he went to England, and while there was created doctor of music at Oxford, and published several of his works. In 1796, he returned to Germany, after which he composed his sublime oratorio of the "Creation," and the "Seasons." He died in 1809. His works are very numerous, and highly valued.

HAYER, John Nicholas Hubert, a French ecclesiastic, born at Sare-Louis, 15th June 1703. He displayed his zeal and learning by his able works—on the immortality of the soul, three vols. 12mo.—on the existence of God. He died at Paris 16th July 1780.

HAYES, Charles, an ingenious author. He was of such a timid and modest disposition, that he prefixed his name to none of his many valuable publications, except to his treatise on fluxions, in folio, 1704. He was many years deputy-governor to the royal African company, and on its dissolution in 1752, he retired to solitude and study at Down in Kent. He died 18th Dec. 1760, at Gray's inn, where two years before he had taken chambers, in his 82d year. His works were "the moon, a philosophical dialogue,"—a new and easy method to find the longitude, and other works.

HAYLEY, William, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born, Nov. 9th, 1745, at Chichester, of which cathedral his grandfather was dean. He received his education, first at the school of Kingston upon Thames, and next at Eton, from whence he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge. On leaving the university, he retired to his estate of Eartham in Sussex, where he resided till the loss of his son, about 1800, so afflicted him that he removed to Felpham. He died November 12th, 1820. His principal poems are—1. An Essay on Painting, 2. An Essay on History. 3. An Essay on Epic Poetry. 4. The Triumphs of Temper. An Edition of these, with other poems and plays, was printed in 6 vols. 8vo. His principal prose works are—"An Essay on Old Maids," 3 vols. and the "Lives of Milton, Cowper, and Romney the Painter.

HAYNE, Isaac, a patriarch of the American revolution, was a native of South Carolina. In the beginning of the war he lived on his plantation, with an ample fortune; yet he served as a captain of artillery, being also a senator in the legislature. Disgusted with the promotion of a younger officer over him, he resigned his commission and served as a private soldier at the siege of Charleston. At its capitulation he was taken prisoner, but was allowed to return home on parole, under an engagement not to bear arms. In 1781 he was required by the British commander to bear arms on their side, or to return to Charleston; he refused to do either, but at length was induced to repair to the city on the assurance of being allowed to return, when he should engage to demean himself as a British subject, so long as the British army occupied the country. At Charleston he was threatened with close confinement, unless he subscribed a declaration of his allegiance to the British king with an engagement to bear arms in support of the royal government. He subscribed the declaration, but expressly objected to the clause, requiring him to bear arms, but was assured that this would not be required. Thus he was enabled to return to his sick family. He was afterwards summoned to repair to the British standard, in disregard of the assurance he had received. Deeming himself in consequence absolved from his engagement, he joined the American army in command of a regiment, and in July 1781 sent out a detachment, which captured gen. Williamson. For his recovery the whole British cavalry was ordered out, and col. Hayne fell into their hands. He was thrown into prison in Charleston; and soon ordered by lord Rawdon and col. Balfour to be hanged for taking arms against the British government, after he had become a subject. The sentence notwithstanding various petitions and the entreaties of his children on their knees was executed Aug. 4th, 1781. On the morning of his execution he delivered to his son of thirteen years some papers to be sent to congress; and added—"go then to the place of execution and receive my body." Thus fell in the bloom of life a brave officer and good citizen. Gen. Greene issued a proclamation Aug. 26th, saying he should make reprisals. Lord Rawdon's pamphlet in justification of his conduct was examined in the first number of the Southern Review. The minute history of his affair, given by Lee, particularly the letter of col. Hayne to lord Rawdon and col. Balfour, cannot fail to awaken strong feelings of indignation at the conduct of those officers, who ordered his execution. Col. Hayne was not a spy, who might be forthwith executed. He was either a prisoner of war, or a British subject. If a prisoner of war, he could not be executed for his lawful conduct in the exercise of arms; if a British subject, he had a right to a formal trial. The court of inquiry was not a court of trial. Besides as he returned to his home in the character of a British subject; when the country west of the Edisto, in which he lived, fell under the protection of the American arms, he could no longer be considered as a British subject. The effect of his execution was to sharpen by pity and revenge the swords of the Americans.

HAYNES, John, governor of Massachusetts and of Connecticut, was a native of England, and arrived at Boston in 1633. He was soon chosen an assistant, and in 1635 governor. In 1636 he removed to Connecticut, of which colony he was one of the principal founders. He was elected its first governor in April 1639, and was replaced in this office every second year, which was as often as the constitution would permit, till his death in 1654.

HAYWARD, sir John, an English historian, doctor of laws in the university of Cambridge. He is the author of "the lives of the three Normans, kings of England, William I. and II. and Henry I." dedicated to Charles prince of Wales, of the first part of "the life and reign of Henry IV." dedicated to Robert earl of Essex, for which he suffered imprisonment, on account of some offensive passages about hereditary right, of "the life and reign of Edward VI., with the beginning of Elizabeth's," and of other works, especially on divinity and pious subjects. He was made historiographer of Chelsea college 1610, and knighted by James 1619. He died 27th June 1627.

HAZARD, Ebenezer, postmaster general of the United States, was a native of Philadelphia, and graduated at Princeton college in 1762. In 1782 he succeeded Mr. Bache as postmaster, and continued in office until the adoption of the constitution in 1789. He died 1817, aged 72. He published a valuable work in reference to American history, which is often quoted, namely, Historical collections, 2 vols. 4to. 1792, 1794; also remarks on a report concerning the western Indians.

HAZLITT, William, the son of a dissenting minister, was brought up as an artist, and his early works gave promise of future excellence; but dissatisfied, it is said, with his own labors, he abandoned the pencil, and took up the pen. As an author he displayed great fertility, and acute powers of mind; and his style, though sometimes aiming too much at effect, is sparkling and elegant. He died September 13, 1830. Among his works are, The Round Table (in conjunction with Leigh Hunt); Characters of Shakspeare's Plays; A View of the English Stage; Lectures on the English Poets; Lectures on the English Comic Writers; Political Essays on Public Characters; Table Talk; and A Life of Napoleon. He also contributed to the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica; The Edinburgh Review; and a variety of periodicals.

HEADLEY, Henry, a native of Norwich, educated there under Dr. Parr, after which he went to Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree in arts. He married early, and fell a victim soon after to a rapid consumption 1788, aged only 23. He possessed genius and talents, which he displayed in his volume of poems. He wrote some of the papers of the Olla Podrida; and besides various communications to the Gentleman's and European magazines, under the signature of T. C. O. he published select beauties of ancient English poetry, with curious and interesting remarks, 2 vols. Svo.

HEARNE, Thomas, an antiquary, was born, in 1690, at White Waltham, in Berkshire; was educated at Edmund Hall, Oxford; obtained various college offices, which however he resigned, because he would not take the oaths to George I.; edited nearly forty works, some of them classics, but principally relative to ancient English history and antiquities; and died in 1735. Hearne possessed a far larger share of patient research than of taste and judgment.

HEARNE, Samuel, a traveller, was born in London, 1742, and, after having been for a short time a midshipman, he entered into the service of the Hudson's Bay Company. From 1769 to 1772 he was employed by the company to explore the north west coast of America; and he was the first European who succeeded in reaching the Arctic Ocean. He died in 1792, but the interesting narrative of his Journey was not published till 1795.

HEATH, Benjamin, LL.D., town clerk of Exeter, is known as an able scholar. He published an essay to prove the divine existence and attributes, 1740—the case of the county of Devon, with respect to the duty on cider and perry—a revival of Shakspeare's text, 1765—and notes, sive lectiones ad tragicorum Græcorum veterum, Æschyli, 4to. 1752, a work which displays great critical knowledge. The time of his death is not mentioned. His brother, Thomas, alderman of Exeter, wrote an essay towards a new version of Job, 1755.

HEATH, Nicholas, archbishop of York, and chancellor of England in Mary's reign, was born in London, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge. He was deprived of his offices for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, and died at Cobham 1560.

HEATH, Thomas, brother of the archbishop, was a jesuit, sent by his order as missionary to England in 1563. As he was disguised as a puritan, he was permitted to preach in Rochester cathedral, but whilst inveighing against the liturgy, he dropped by accident a letter from his pocket, which being carried to the bishop, proved him to be a Jesuit and occasioned his imprisonment and his exposure on the pillory. He died soon after in confinement.

HEATH, William, major general in the American revolutionary army, was a native of Roxbury, Massachusetts. In 1775 he was appointed provincial brigadier, and also brigadier of the United States, June 22, and Aug. 9, 1776 major general. When the army removed to New York, he commanded near king's bridge. In 1777 he was intrusted with the command of the eastern department near Boston, and the prisoners of Saratoga fell under his care. In June 1779 he returned to the main army, and commanded the troops on the Hudson, and in that station, for the most part, he remained until the close of the war. He was the last surviving American major general of the war. He died 1814, aged 77. He published a volume, which for a time, had great notoriety, entitled, Heath's Memoirs.

HEATHCOTE, Ralph, D.D., at Cambridge, was author of sylva—a sketch of Bolingbroke's philosophy—a tract against the Hutchinsonians, and other works. He died 1795, aged 74.

HEBER, Reginald, D.D., bishop of Calcutta, was the son of the Rev. Reginald Heber of Marton in Yorkshire, and was born, April 21, 1783. In 1802 he obtained a university prize for a copy of Latin Hexameters; and the following year he greatly distinguished himself by another prize poem, "Palestine," in English. He afterwards applied himself to mathematics with considerable success, and in 1805 he took his bachelor's degree. Having received a third prize for an English essay "On the Sense of Honor," he was elected to a fellowship in All Souls College soon after, when he went abroad. He travelled in Germany, Russia, and the Crimea, and made observations, from which many curious extracts were published in the travels of Dr. E. D. Clarke. Having returned home, he took Master's degree at Oxford, in 1803; and the next year he published a second English poem, entitled, "Europe, Lines on the present War." About the same time he was presented to the family living of Hodnet. For several years subsequently he devoted himself with great assiduity to his duties as a parochial priest. In 1815 he preached the Bampton Lecture, on the "Personality and Office of the Christian Comforter," a course of sermons on John xvi. 7. He also composed many articles for a Dictionary of the Bible, and published an ordination sermon, delivered before the bishop of Chester. In 1822 appeared his life of Jeremy Taylor, with a review of his writings; and the same year he was chosen preacher to the society of Lincoln's-inn. On the death of Bishop Middleton, he was offered the see of Calcutta, which, after some hesitation, arising from the most honorable motives he accepted, and on the 16th of June, 1823, embarked for the East Indies. On Ascension day, 1824, bishop Heber held his first visitation in the cathedral of Calcutta; and he subsequently made visitations through various parts of his very extensive diocese, consecrating churches, and taking the appropriate steps for extending the knowledge of christianity among the Hindoos. Having taken a journey in the discharge of his episcopal duty, he arrived at Tirutehinopoli, April 1, 1826; and on the next day, while bathing, he was seized with an apopleptic fit, which terminated his existence. Since the death of this prelate has been published, "A Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India, from Calcutta to Bombay," 2 vols. 4to. From the numerous tributes which have been paid to his memory, it appears that bishop Heber was an excellent and virtuous man, a conscientious performer of his ministerial duties, and a zealous advocate of the cause of christianity.

HEBER, Richard, the eldest son of the Rev. Reginald Heber, and half brother of the celebrated Reginald Heber, bishop of Calcutta, was born Jan. 5, 1773. He was a man of talents and learning, but was distinguished more especially for his zeal in collecting books, a business which he followed assiduously during the last thirty years of his life. His death took place, Oct. 4, 1833. He left immense collections of rare and valuable works in various languages. He had two large libraries in Westminster, one at Oxford, one at Hodnet in Yorkshire, one at Paris, one at Antwerp, one at Brussels, one at Ghent, and at other places on the continent of Europe.

HEBERDEN, William, a physician, was born in London in 1710. He received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a fellowship. In 1739 he proceeded to his degrees in physic, and practised with reputation in the university about ten years, during which time he read a course of lectures in his college. In 1746 he became a fellow of the college of physicians, and, in 1749, a member of the Royal Society. He now settled in London, and, in 1766, recommended to the college the plan of the "Medical Transactions," to which he was a contributor, as he also was to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1778 the Royal Society of Medicine at Paris chose him an associate. He died May 17, 1801. He published "Antitherica; an Essay on Mithridatium et "Theriaca," 8vo.; and after his death appeared "Gulielmi Heberden Commentarij de Morborum Historia et Curatione." He was one of the writers of the Athenian Letters, and communicated notes to Gray's Hudibras.

HEBERT, James Renc, a native of Alencon, whom the French revolution raised to consequence. As the writer of the Pere Duchesne, an abusive paper, he acquired popularity among the terrorists, and by bitterly inveighing against the unfortunate queen, he maintained the character of brutality, violence, and cruelty, which had encouraged and defended the horrors of the 10th of August, and the murders of September. By attempting to oppose the power of the commune of Paris to the authority of the convention, he drew upon himself the vengeance of Robespierre, and was guillotined 24th March 1794. This worthless character, who had organized the feasts of reason in contempt of religion and of another life, died like a coward.

HECHT, Christian, a native of Hall, minister of Essen, East Friesland, died 1748, aged 52. He wrote commentaria philologico-critico-exegitica—and antiquitas Haræorum inter Judæos in Poloniâ, besides some German tracts.

HECKEWELDER, John, a Moravian missionary, was a native of England. He was bred a cooper and joiner. In 1771 he commenced his benevolent labors amongst the Indians, and was devoted to their instruction for many years, amidst many perils and hardships. As he had acquired a perfect knowledge of the Delaware language, and was well acquainted with Indian affairs, he was repeatedly requested by Washington to accompany missions to the Indians for pacific purposes. In 1797 he went to Ohio in order to superintend the remnants of his Indian congregation, to whom congress had granted lands on the Muskingum. In 1810 he returned to Bethlehem, where he died in 1823, aged nearly 80. He published Correspondence with Mr. Du Ponceau concerning the languages of the Indians, 1819; account of the history and manners of the Indian nations; communications on the same subject; some papers for Barton's medical journal; a paper on the bird Nine Killer, and the big naked bear; on the beaver; narrative of the missions among the Delaware and Mohegan Indians, 1821; words and dialogues of Delaware Indians. He wrote also books and pamphlets in the German language, and left many manuscripts.

HECQUET, Philip, a French physician, born at Abbeville. He practised there, and at Portroyal, and afterwards at Paris, where he died in the Carmelites' convent, 13th April 1737, aged 76. He was a great friend to bleeding and to the good effects of warm water; and this opinion has tended to immortalize him in the page of Gil Blas under the name of doctor Sangrado. He was a man of great abstemiousness, and exemplary piety, and published some medical works, especially on the indecency of men-midwives—and in favor of mothers suckling their own children—on digestion and on the plague. Le Fevre de St. Marc has written a prolix account of his life.

HEDELIN, Francis, an advocate, afterwards abbé of Aubignac and Meimac, was born at Paris. The favor of Richelieu, two of whose nephews he educated, raised him to consequence, so that he aspired to the name of scholar, poet, antiquarian, and preacher. He was of such a haughty temper, that he was embroiled in various quarrels, especially with Corneille, Menage, Mad. Scuderi, &c. He died at Nemours, 1676, aged 72. His chief works are, "Pratique du Theatre," a book of no great merit, but censorious, and such as to have passed to a fourth edition,—“Zenobia,” a tragedy in prose, and a very dull performance, according to the prince of Conde's remark, and other works of little consequence.

HEDERICUS or HEDERICH, Benjamin, author of the well-known Greek lexicon, first published at Leipsic in Svo. 1722, and republished in England by Young and Patrick, was born at Grossenhayn in Misnia, 1675. He published besides an edition of Empedocles de sphaera, and “notitiâ auctorum.” Ernesti, who improved his lexicon 1767, speaks of him as not a profound Greek scholar. He died 1748.

HEDWIG, John, a German botanist and physician, was born, in 1730, at Cronstadt, in Transylvania, and was of a Saxon family. He pursued his studies at Presburg, Zittau, and Leipsic; practised as a physician, first at Chemnitz, and next at Leipsic; was appointed professor of physic and botany, and superintendant of the public garden at the latter place; and died in 1799. The branch of botany to which Hedwig especially directed his attention was the mosses; and on this subject he made many important discoveries, and published some excellent works, the principal of which, in four volumes folio, is generally called his Cryptogamia.

HEEMSKERK, James, a Dutch admiral, born at Amsterdam. He was sent in 1596 under Barentein, to discover a north-east passage to Asia, and brought back his ships safe, after the death of the commander of the squadron. He was in 1607 sent as vice-admiral against the Spaniards, but fell in the battle after defeating a superior force in the Mediterranean, and capturing the enemy's admiral John Alvarez Davila.

HEIDEGGER, John Henry, a protestant divine, born at Ursevellon near Zurich. He was professor at Heidelberg, afterwards at Steinfurt, and then at Zurich, where he died 1698, aged 65. He published “Exercitationes selectæ de historiâ sacrâ Patriarcharum”—“de ratione studiorum”—“tumulus Tridentini concilii”—“historia papatus,” &c.

HEIDEGGER, John James, a native of Zurich, son of a clergyman. He married in Switzerland, but in consequence of an intrigue left the country, and when 50 years old, went to England on a negotiation for the Swiss. His embassy failed and with it his resources, so that he engaged as a private soldier in the guards for protection and support. His conduct and address however were such, that he soon gained the attention of his superiors, and obtained the appellation of the Swiss court. By means of his friends who were numerous in the fashionable world, he raised a subscription in 1709 to furnish the opera of Thomyris, which was performed at the Haymarket, and with such success, that he not only gained 500 guineas, but recommended himself to the public notice by his taste and judgment in the management and decorations of the theatre. George II. who was fond of operas patronised him, and he soon obtained the management of the opera house in the Hay-market, and presided over the masquerades, and was made master of the revels. Thus patronised by the king, flattered by the nobility, and courted by all, he contributed to the amusement of the public, as the arbiter elegantiarum, but while he thus raised an annual income of 5000*l.* he did not accumulate property, but expended his money in the luxuries of his table, and in honorable acts of extensive charity. His memory was so retentive that he once walked from Charing-cross to Temple-bar, and back again, and at his return wrote down every sign on either side of the Strand. When discoursing on the most ingenious nation in Europe, he claimed the merit himself, and said, I was born a Swiss, and came to England without a farthing, where I have found means to gain 5000*l.* a-year and to spend it. Now I defy the most able Englishman to go to Switzerland and either to gain that income, or to spend it there. He died 4th Feb. 1749, aged 90.

HEIN, Peter, a Dutchman, who from obscurity rose to the command of the fleets of his country. He defeated the Spaniards on the coast of Brazil, 1626, and was killed off Dunkirk in a battle against the French, 1629. The state of Holland honored his memory with great respect, and condoled with his mother who coolly observed, I always said that Peter was an unlucky dog, and would come to an untimely end.

HEINECCIUS, John Gottlieb, a German lawyer, born at Eisenberg 1681. He was counsellor and professor of philosophy, and afterwards of law at Hall, from whence he removed to Franeker in 1724, and three years after, at the request of the king of Prussia, to Frankfort on Order. In 1733 he resumed his former engagements at Hall, where he died 1741. His works are numerous and respectable, on jurisprudence, logic, and morality. They were collected at Geneva in 8 vols. 4to. 1744.

HEINECKEN, Christian Henry, was born, in 1721, at Lubeck; and died, in 1725, at the age of four years and four months. So astonishing is the story told of this mental phenomenon that, were it not supported by powerful evidence, it might be well treated as a romance. He could talk at ten months old, at twelve could recite the leading facts in the Pentateuch, and at thirteen had acquired the rudiments of ancient history, geography, anatomy, and the use of maps; and knew eight thousand Latin words. At two years and a half he could answer any question in geography and history, and before his decease he had added to his acquisitions divinity, ecclesiastical history, and many other branches of knowledge; and spoke German, Latin, French, and Low Dutch. In his fourth year he harangued the king of Denmark, to whom he was presented. On his death bed he displayed the utmost firmness, and endeavored to console his afflicted parents.

HEINSIUS, Daniel, an eminent scholar born at Ghent, May 1580. After studying at the Hague, in Zeland, and at Franeker, where he displayed great abilities, he came to Leyden, and at the age of 18 he was seated in the chair of Greek professor, and afterwards succeeded his friend and instructor Joseph Scaliger in the professorship of politics and history. He died 25th Feb. 1655. He was distinguished as a man of extensive learning, and great application, and possessed of a correct taste and sound judgment. He was honored and respected not only by the learned but even by princes, and especially Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, the republic of Venice, and Pope Urban VIII.

HEINSIUS, Nicholas, son to the preceding, was born at Leyden 1620. He was eminent as a poet and critic, and deserved the flattering appellation of the “swan of Holland.” Though employed in the affairs of the state, he devoted much of his time to the muses, and edited several classical authors, Virgil, Ovid, Valerius Flaccus, Claudian, &c. His poems were often reprinted, but the best edition is that of Amsterdam 1666. He died at the Hague 1681, respected at home and abroad.

HELINSIUS, N. grand pensionary of Holland, died at the Hague 3d Aug. 1720, aged 87. He was in the service of William prince of Orange, and distinguished himself as a negotiator in France, against the destruction of whose power he afterwards directed all the energies of his country. During the 30 years in which he was grand pensionary, he displayed great vigor of mind, but in his views of humbling the pride of Louis XIV. he brought great difficulties and immense debts upon Holland, so that the people saw his retirement from power with pleasure and exultation.

HEISTER, Lawrence, a native of Frankfort on the Maine, professor of medicine at Altorf, and afterwards at Helmstadt where he died 1758, aged 73. He was the learned author of "Compendium anatomicum"—"institutiones chirurgicæ,"—"de medicamentis German, indigenis suffic," and "compendium institutum medicarum."—His son Elias Frederic published "Apologia pro Medicis Atheismo accusatis," and died at Leyden 1740.

HELENA, St. wife of Constantius Chlorus, and mother of the great Constantine, was born of obscure parents in Bithynia. When divorced by the marriage of her husband with Maximilian's daughter, she retired with resignation from the court, but the elevation of her son to the throne restored her to the dignity of her rank, which she adorned by devotion and christian charity. She was the founder of various churches, and in her travels into the Holy Land she is said to have discovered the true cross. She died in the arms of her son, 328, aged 80.

HELLOT, John, author of l'art de la teinture des laines & closses de laine, 12mo.—and other works of merit on philosophical and chemical subjects, was member of the Paris academy of sciences and of the London royal society. He also conducted for some time the Gazette of France, and was distinguished as an able chemist. He died at Paris 15th Feb. 1766, aged 80.

HELMONT, John Baptist Van, a learned scholar and physician, born at Brussels 1577. He studied at Louvain, but after refusing to devote himself to divinity, he turned his attention to medicine and took his degrees in that science. His application to chemical experiments, and to the investigation of the power of herbs and plants led him to superior practice, and so extraordinary were some of his cures considered that he was brought before the inquisition as a magician who removed human diseases by more than human art. He succeeded however in clearing himself from the imputation, and retired to the greater freedom of Holland, where he died Dec. 30, 1644. He was, says Lobkowitz his biographer, pious, learned, famous, a sworn enemy of Galen and Aristotle. The sick never languished long under his hands, being always killed or cured in two or three days. He was sent chiefly to those who were given up by other physicians, to whose great grief and indignation the patients were often unexpectedly restored to health. His works chiefly against the Peripatetics and Galenists were published in folio by his son, who acquired some fame as a physician and was falsely called in his epitaph, "nil patre inferior." He died 1699, aged 81.

HELVETIUS, Adrian, a physician, was born about 1661, in Holland, and settled at Paris. There he discovered the medical virtues of ipecacuanha in dysenteric cases, and having cured the dauphin with it, he received a reward of a thousand louis, and various appointments. He died 1727. His son, John Claude Adrian, was a physician of great skill and learning.

HELVETIUS, John Claude, son of the preceding, died 1755, aged 70. He was first physician to the French queen, counsellor of state, and member of several learned academies. He cured Louis XV. of a dangerous disorder, and gained the confidence and good opinion not only of the court but of the poor, by his skill, attention, and great humanity. He published "L'idée generale de l'economie animale" 1722, 8vo.—"Principia Physico-medica, in tironum medicinæ gratiam conscripta," 2 vols. 8vo.

HELVETIUS, Claude Adrian, son of John Claude Adrian, was born in 1715, at Paris; was educated at the college of Louis the Great; manifested early talents; and soon became intimate with most of the literary characters of the age. For some years he was one of the farmers general, and he made a noble use of the immense income which he drew from this source. He resigned this advantageous pursuit, however, and retired to his estate, in order to devote himself to literature. In 1758 he gave to the world his work On the Mind. It was immediately assailed by the clergy, the Sorbonne, and the parliament; it was condemned to the flames; and the author was obliged to sign a recantation, and give up a place which he held at court. That, in a moral point of view, many of his doctrines lead to dangerous consequences, must not be denied; but there is, perhaps, no want of charity in believing that his dislike of despotism, and not his defective morality, was his inexpiable crime in the eyes of his enemies. In 1764 and 1765 he visited England and Prussia, and was flatteringly received. The rest of his life was spent on his estate, in literary occupation, and in the practice of benevolence. He died 1771. He left a posthumous work, On Man, his Intellectual Faculties, and his Education. He is also the author of Happiness, a poem, in six cantos.

HELVICUS, Christopher, professor of Greek and eastern languages, and of divinity, at Giessen university, was born 1581, at Sprendlingen near Frankfort. He was educated at Marburg, and early displayed a poetical genius, and at 20 was capable of teaching Hebrew and Greek, two languages which he spoke with great fluency. He died in the flower of his age 1617, and his immature death was deplored with feeling and sorrow by all the German poets of the Augsburg persuasion. Besides poetry he published Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac grammars,—a Hebrew and Latin lexicon,—and some chronological tables.

HEMELAR, John, a learned man, born at the Hague, of so amiable a character for probity and disinterestedness as to deserve to be compared, says Gronovius, with the Roman Atticus. He resided six years at Rome, and preferred to the office of librarian of the Vatican, a canonry in the cathedral of Antwerp. He devoted himself much to polite literature and the science of medals, and he lived in friendly intimacy with Grotius, Lipsius, and other eminent men. He published valuable commentaries on the medals of the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to Justinian, from the cabinet of Arschot and Rocoxius. Besides this work which is now rare, though three times printed, he wrote poems and orations, and died 1640.

HEMMENWAY, Moses, D.D., minister of Wells, Maine, graduated at Harvard college 1755. He was ordained 1759 and died 1811, aged 75. He published seven sermons on the obligation of the unregenerate to strive for eternal life, 1767; a pamphlet on the same subject against Dr. Hopkins, 1772; remarks on Hopkins answer, 1774; at the election 1784; discourse concerning the church, 1792; at the ordination of M. Calef, 1795.

HEMSKIRK, or HEEMSKIRK, Martin, a peasant's son, born in a village of that name in Holland 1498, and distinguished as a painter. After studying three years at Rome he settled at Haerlem, where he died 1574, aged 76. His pieces were admired by Michael Angelo, by Vasari and others, but though he possessed great merit, his figures show that he did not understand the chiaro oscuro.

HEMSTERHUIS, or HEMSTERHUSIUS, Tiberius, a learned critic, born at Groningen, 1st Feb. 1685, son of a physician. He studied at Groningen and Leyden, and at the age of 19 was appointed professor of mathematics and philosophy at Amsterdam. In 1717 he removed to Franeker, where he succeeded Lambert Bos as Greek professor, and in 1740 he was appointed to the chairs of Greek and of history at Leyden, where he died 1766. He published the three last books of J. Polux's onomasticon 1706, for which he was complimented by Bentley, select colloquies of Lucian, and his Timon, 1708,—the Plutus of Aristophanes, with the scholia 1744,—part of an edition of Lucian,—notes and emendations on Xenophon Ephesus, and other equally learned works. He is praised by Ruhnkenius as a critic of very superior powers.

HENAULT, John d', a French poet, son of a Paris baker. He travelled into Holland and England, and was patronised by the superintendent Fonquet, by whose means he obtained the receivership of taxes at Fores, and other employments. He became a man of celebrity by his poetical pieces, and proud of his distinction he affected the fashionable debauchee and the impious atheist as the friend of Spinoza, but after a life of dissipation and profaneness, the approach of death seemed so terrible that he became a coward, and renounced with sorrow and deep contrition the follies and wickedness of his prosperous days. He died 1682. His best pieces are said to be his sonnet on the miscarriage of Mad. de Guerchi, and his satirical poem on Colbert, in consequence of the fall of his patron. He printed at Paris, his "œuvres diverses" in 12mo. 1670. He translated the three first books of Lucretius, but by the advice of his confessor he destroyed them.

HENAULT, Charles John Francis, a celebrated historian, born at Paris, 8th Feb. 1685. He early discovered a sprightly and benevolent disposition, but after being two years at the congregation of the oratory, he quitted it for the more gay society of the wits of the age. The dispute between Rousseau and De la Motte however gave him a disgust for the fallacious intimacies of the learned and the great; and devoting himself more particularly to his own improvement, he obtained the prize of eloquence in the French academy 1707, and another the following year. He became counsellor of parliament 1706, president of the first chamber of inquest 1710, and in 1718 he accompanied the French ambassador Morville to Holland, where his abilities were respected by the Dutch, and particularly by the pensionary Heinsius. In the midst of his political occupations, Henault paid deep and lasting attention to history, and at last published his history, the result of 40 years' laborious reading and study under the modest name of "an essay" in 1744. It met with astonishing success, and not only became popular in France in nine editions, but was translated into English, German, Italian, and even Chinese. This valuable work raised him to the honor of a seat in the academy of belles lettres at Paris, and other learned societies, and he was afterwards appointed superintendant of the queen's house. He was now courted by the wit and fashion of the court, and his house was the receptacle of whatever was innocently gay, pleasing and agreeable. For the entertainment of the queen and her court he wrote three lively comedies, one of which, "le Reveil d'Epimenides," who is said to have slept 27 years, proved particularly agreeable, and he produced at the queen's request, a fourth piece called Hebe. This most respectable character died 24th Dec. 1771, aged 86. In the midst of prosperity he practised benevolence and charity, he was pious and resigned under afflictions, grateful to providence for the blessings which he enjoyed, and his manners and devotion were truly exemplary.

HENDERSON, Alexander, a Scotchman, who acquired some celebrity at the head of the presbyterian party. He was one of the divines sent to meet Charles I. at Newcastle 1646, but though he possessed eloquence and abilities, it is said that in disputing with the monarch about episcopacy, he found his arguments too futile to resist the superior reasons of his unfortunate master. This it is said had such effect upon his spirits, that he died soon after, and in his last moments, expressed great contrition for the severity and rancor with which he had opposed the king's measures in Scotland.

HENDERSON, John, an extraordinary character, born at Ballegarance in Ireland 1757. He was educated in the principles of his father who was an itinerant preacher of Wesley's persuasion, and who for some time settled near Bristol as a schoolmaster, and under him he made such astonishing progress, that he taught Latin in Kingswood school at the age of eight, and Greek in lady Huntingdon's college in Wales, when he was no more than 12. These extraordinary powers were seen and encouraged by dean Tucker, who sent him to Pembroke college, Oxford, where he staid long enough to take his first degree, but was not admitted to orders though his friends wished to see his oratorical abilities exerted in the pulpit. These brilliant parts were unfortunately clouded by great and often offensive singularities. In his person, he affected great negligence, his long unpowdered hair gave him an air of religious melancholy, he never wore a neck-cloth, his buckles on his shoes were of the most diminutive size, and the rest of his dress exhibited him particularly hostile to the reigning fashions of the times. Though eagerly courted in the university for his great fund of knowledge, and the inexhaustible resources of his mental powers, he at length rendered himself disagreeable by the lateness to which he protracted his visits. Seldom in bed before the dawn of day, he rose late in the afternoon, and as if setting at defiance the powers of nature, he would often go half naked to the pump and desire the college servants to pump over him for several minutes, and then in that condition he retired to his bed. Those who frequented his company have often been astonished at the vastness of his powers, which adorned with all the flowers of oratory and elegant language the most abstruse and barren subjects. Though well skilled in general knowledge, he was particularly attached to physiognomy, alchymy, and the occult arts, and in some instances he has been known to prostitute his great talents in diving into futurity, and anticipating the mournful accidents of life. This eccentric genius died 2d Nov. 1788.

HENING, William Walker, clerk of the chancery court for the Richmond district, Virginia, died 1723. With great industry and research he collected the statutes of Virginia down to 1792. He published the new Virginia justice, called Hening's justice 1820; Statutes at large, being a collection of all the laws of Virginia from the first session in 1619, 13 vols. 8vo. 1823.; and with William Mumford reports in the supreme court of appeals, 4 vols. 1809-1811. He was also the editor of Francis' Maxims of equity.

HENLEY, Anthony, an English senator, born of a respectable family in Hampshire. In London he gained the friendship and familiarity of the great, and as the associate of Dorset and Sunderland he figured on the circles of fashion, and passed at Will's and Tom's as a man of wit and facetiousness. As his affections were benevolent and his heart generous, he was addressed by the poets and writers of the age as a patron and a guide, and the command of an independent fortune of upwards of 3000*l.* a year was in the midst of mirth and gallantry, liberally applied to the remuneration of the flattering muse. In 1698 he was elected member for Andover, and in succeeding parliaments for Weymouth. He was in his political career, a firm and eloquent whig, and he drew upon himself the persecution of the tories by moving the house to address the queen to confer some ecclesiastical dignity on Mr. Ben. Hoadly, whose attachment to the revolution was then publicly known. As a writer he distinguished himself by various anonymous publications, and in the Tatler and Medley, appeared many of his pieces, remarkable for their wit, ease and fluency, and for that genius and vivacity with which he assumed the character and language of masters and servants, peasants and tradesmen, parents and children. He died 1711, universally lamented.

HENLEY, John, well known by the appellation of "orator Henley," was born at Melton Mowbray, 3d Aug. 1692. When he had taken his bachelor's degree he was invited by the trustees of Melton school to take care of that foundation, and he raised it from a languishing to a flourishing state. He now courted the public approbation by the appearance of his Esther, a poem, and when he had entered into orders he left the country for fame and preferment in the capital. Followed as a preacher determined to create public notice, he introduced regular action into the pulpit, and courted popularity a thousand ways, but when disappointed of the ferment he expected, he formed a plan for lectures and orations. Every Sunday he discoursed on theological subjects, while Wednesday was reserved for political subjects, into which he poured much of the gall of satire against the great, the powerful, and the learned. To this acrimonious spirit he indeed owes the distinguished place which he holds in Pope's Dunciad, as "the zany of his age." Admission was procured to his oratorical theatre by the payment of a shilling, and as the lowest of the people formed the most numerous part of his audience, the daily advertiser generally announced the topics which were to be discussed on each day, by this artful and commanding preacher at his oratory near Lincoln's Inn fields. He died 14th Oct. 1756. He published an account of himself and his adventures, and it is easily discovered that to personal vanity he added effrontery, and obtained popularity by bold invectives and satirical censoriousness. Hogarth has immortalized his name by introducing him into two of his humorous pieces, in one of which he is christening a child, and in the other he appears on a scaffold with a monkey by his side with the motto "amen," and with other appropriate figures. On one occasion he filled his oratory with shoemakers, by announcing to them he would teach a new and short way of making shoes, which was by cutting off the tops of boots.

HENLEY, Samuel, a divine, who previous to the American war, was professor of moral philosophy in the college of Williamsburgh, in Virginia. On leaving that country he became an usher in Harrow school, and afterwards rector of Rendlesham, in Suffolk. In 1805 he was appointed principal of the East India college, at Hertford; on which occasion he obtained the degree of doctor in divinity. He died at Rendlesham in 1816. Dr. Henley published—1. Three Sermons preached in America.—2. Dissertation concerning the controverted Passages in St. Peter and St. Jude, on the Angels that sinned, 8vo.—3. Observations on the Fourth Eclogue, the Allegory in the Third Georgic, and the Design of the Æneid of Virgil, 8vo.—4. Essay toward a new Edition of the Elegies of Tibullus, with a Translation and Notes, 8vo. He has also some papers in the Archæologia; and was the editor of "the History of the Caliph Vathek."

HENNEPIN, Louis, a French missionary, was born in 1640; embarked for Quebec in 1675; and during six or seven years explored Canada and Louisiana. In 1680 he was taken prisoner one hundred and fifty leagues from the mouth of the Illinois and carried into the country of the Naudowessies and Issati. He gave the name of the falls of St. Anthony, and the river St. Francis. He published Description de la Louisiana, 12mo. 1683.; the same in Dutch 1688; New discovery of a vast country in America with a continuation, London, 1698; Nouveau voyage dans l'Amérique Sept. 12mo. 1711, et 1720.

HENNUYER, John, bishop of Lisieux, is justly celebrated for his great humanity at the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew. He boldly opposed the king's orders to assassinate the protestants, and instead of violating their persons, he openly protected them; yet from this opposition to tyranny, he was never censured by the monarch; so great was the respect paid to his persevering virtue and dignity. He died 1577, universally lamented, and revered for his mildness, humanity, and piety.

HENRION, Nicholas, a native of Troyes, in Champagne, member of the academy of inscriptions. He was engaged in composing a work on the weights and measures of the ancients, of which his death in 1720, at the age of 50 prevented the completion. With an extravagant imagination he described Adam as 182 feet 9 inches high, and Eve 118 feet 9 inches, but gradually reduced the size of his gigantic heroes, and made Abraham 27 feet, Moses 13, Hercules 10, and Alexander only 6.

HENRY I., surnamed the Fowler, emperor of Germany, was son of Otho duke of Saxony, and elected to the throne 919. He was a brave and politic prince, he exerted his influence among the princes of Germany to restore union; and to render the country more powerful, he built and fortified towns to withstand the attacks of the barbarians. He confirmed his regulations by the establishment of wise and salutary laws, and the introduction of the patrician order for the distinction and encouragement of merit. In war he was successful against the duke of Bavaria, he conquered the Bohemians, Slavonians, and Danes; and invaded the kingdom of Lorraine, and defeated the Hungarians at the famous battle of Mersburg. He died 2d July 936, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son Otho.

HENRY II., emperor of Germany, surnamed the Lame, was grand-son of the preceding, and ascended the imperial throne 1002. After defeating the duke of Bavaria, he re-established Benedict VIII. in the holy see, and was crowned by him at Rome 1014, with great solemnity. He also drove the Greeks and Saracens from Calabria, and after restoring tranquillity over Italy and Germany, and every where leaving marks of his great generosity, and extensive benevolence, he died 13th July 1024, aged 47.

HENRY III., emperor of Germany, succeeded his father Conrad in 1039. After making war in Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia, he passed into Italy, and expelled from the papal throne Benedict IX. Sylvester III. and Gregory VI. and in their room elected Clement II. by whom he was crowned. He died at Botfeld in Saxony, 5th Oct. 1056, aged 39, and was buried at Spire.

HENRY IV., the aged or great, emperor of Germany after his father Henry III. though only six years old, was governed during his minority by the wisdom of his mother Agnes. When grown up to manhood, Henry displayed ability in opposing the insurgents of Germany, and Saxony, but when he supplicated the interference of pope Gregory VII. to restore order by his spiritual authority among his rebellious subjects, he found himself accused of simony and other crimes before the holy pontiff. The charge was not unfounded, Henry had not scrupled to sell the highest dignities of the German church, and the pope, proud of his power as umpire, abolished by his decrees the investitures that had already taken place. Henry in revenge assembled a council at Worms 1076, and not only deposed the pope but ordered his person to be seized. Clement in consequence of this hurled his anathemas against Henry, and so formidable was the spiritual power that the princes of Germany prepared to execute the decree, when Henry, afraid of the influence of his enemies, repaired to the residence of the pope, and for three days of mortification and penance, solicited his forgiveness. This humility was superciliously contemned; but while Henry meditated vengeance, the pope appointed Rodolphus duke of Swabia, emperor in his place. Henry defeated and slew his antagonist at the battle of Vohleheim, and then formally deposing the pope, elevated in his room Guilbert archbishop of Ravenna, and supported him by besieging and reducing Rome under his power by force of arms. In the midst of his triumphs Henry found himself attacked by his children, his son Conrad revolted and obtained the crown of Italy, and Henry the other son, supported by Pascal II. and by the German rebels placed the imperial crown on his head 1106. While Henry wished to effect a reconciliation with these unnatural children, he found himself abandoned by his former friends, and rudely treated in his person by his son, and he retired to Cologne, and then to Liège where his misfortunes raised him a few adherents. His forces were however soon defeated, and the unfortunate monarch, indigent and persecuted, applied to the bishop of Spire for a lay prebend, which was refused. Thus a wanderer, without resources, and without friends, he at last intreated his ungrateful son to permit him to hide his misfortunes in the obscurity of Liège, where he soon after died 7th Aug. 1106, aged 56. He was a brave prince, and was present in 66 battles, but the greater part of his misfortunes arose from the blind confidence which he placed on worthless ministers and favorites.

HENRY V., or the young, was born 1081, and deposed his father Henry IV. 1106. Though he had opposed his father he pursued the same measures, and obliged the pope Pascal II. to restore to him the power of ecclesiastical investitures, of which Henry IV. had been deprived by Gregory VII. The papal power however was too great to be successfully resisted, and Henry already excommunicated, submitted to the pleasure of the new pope Gelasius II. though he had violently opposed his election. Henry died at Utrecht 23d May 1125, aged 44, leaving behind him the odious character of an unnatural son, an impious hypocrite, an insidious neighbor, and an oppressive master.

HENRY VI., surnamed the severe, succeeded his father Frederic Barbarossa on the throne of Germany 1190. He behaved with great cruelty towards the family of his wife Constance, daughter of Roger king of Naples, and had the meanness to detain Richard I. of England who when shipwrecked on the coast of Dalmatia, had been seized by Leopold duke of Austria, and sold into the power of the emperor. With the large sums of money obtained for the ransom of his illustrious captive, Henry made war against Sicily, where his arms plundered and desolated the country. He was at last poisoned by his wife Constance 28th Sep. 1197, aged 32.

HENRY VII., son of Henry count of Luxemburg, was elected emperor 1308, and was the first thus raised to the imperial dignity by the suffrages of the six electors. He visited Italy, where the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins had every where spread devastation and misfortune, and in the midst of these public disorders he was obliged to enter Rome sword in hand. He was crowned by the pope in the church of the Latran, and died the next year 25th Aug. 1313, aged 51, as he was preparing to subdue Italy by the power of his arms.

HENRY I., king of France, succeeded his brother Robert 1031. He was engaged in a civil war through the intrigues of his mother Constance, who wished to place her second son Robert on the throne, but by the assistance of Robert duke of Normandy the father of William the Conqueror, he defeated his enemies. He was afterwards reconciled to his brother, and granted him the dukedom of Burgundy. He died at Vitry en Brie, 4th Aug. 1060, aged 55, in consequence of taking an improper medicine, highly respected as a good warrior, and a benevolent man.

HENRY II., succeeded his father Francis I. as king of France 1547, and continuing the war which then raged between his country and the English, at length obtained an honorable peace, and the cession of Boulogne for a stipulated sum of money, 1550. The following year he engaged in a league with the elector of Saxony, and the Margrave of Brandenburg, against Charles V. and he had the good fortune of reducing Metz, Toul, and Verdun. When however his antagonist had reconciled himself to his German adversaries, Henry was alone left to maintain the war; but though in want of money he ably supported the glory of his arms, by the brave defence of Metz against an army of 100,000 men. The theatre of the war was removed to the Netherlands, and at last a truce was agreed upon for five years between the belligerent powers, but on the abdication of Charles V. his son Philip renewed the war with unusual vigor, supported by the English forces, and his army entering Picardy under the command of the brave duke of Savoy defeated the French at the famous battle of St. Quentin 1557. This fatal day was in some degree retrieved by the capture of Calais from the English, and the reduction of some other places, and at last peace was restored between the contending powers, but on terms not sufficiently advantageous to France. More fully to effect a reconciliation, Henry gave his daughter to the king of Spain, and his sister to the duke of Savoy, but the rejoicings which accompanied this union proved fatal to the monarch. Henry was accidentally wounded in a tournament by the count of Montgomery, and died in consequence of it, 10th July 1559, aged 41.

HENRY III., king of France, was the third son of Henry II. and was born 19th Sept. 1551. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother Catherine de Medicis, and when duke of Anjou, he was elected king of Poland on the death of Sigismund Augustus 1573, and he quitted this dignity three months after to succeed his brother Charles IX. on the French throne. In 1575, he gained the battle of Dormans, and made a peace at Blois with the Huguenots, to whom he granted religious toleration, and various privileges. These concessions displeased the catholics, and were at last revoked in 1585, and from this measure arose those civil dissensions which almost ruined the kingdom. France was then torn by the three parties of the three Henries, one of which, the royalists, was headed by the king, the other called the league, by Henry duke of Guise, and the third, called the Huguenots by Henry king of Navarre, presumptive heir to the French throne. After some time Henry was reconciled to the Guises, and supported by the pope he directed all the powers of his kingdom against the king of Navarre, and the protestants. The battle of Coutras, however, 1587, checked the hopes of the catholics, but the victorious king of Navarre found in offering honorable terms of peace, that his enemies, though defeated were not subdued, and though Henry might be desirous of accommodation, his new friend, the duke of Guise, was too proud, and too ambitious to consent. These jarring interests soon proved the views of party, the French king wishing to repress the power of Guise, in vain attempted to prevent his entrance into Paris, and when he summoned the states general to assist him with their counsel at Blois he found his powerful rival there ready to dispute his authority. Though a reconciliation was hastily effected between two men who in reality meditated each other's downfall, soon after Henry caused Guise to be assassinated, and by this perfidious deed found himself abhorred by his subjects, deposed by the ecclesiastics of the assembled Sorbonne, and excommunicated by the pope. Thus exposed to universal detestation, Henry could no longer find support among his subjects, he applied to the new head of the league for reconciliation, and to the pope for pardon, but when abandoned by all he implored the protection of the king of Navarre. The king of Navarre marched to his assistance, and forgetting their former animosities, the two monarchs employed all their resources to destroy the power of the league. Their united efforts might have proved successful, when Henry was stabbed in the belly by James Clement a fanatical priest, and died of the wound on the morrow, 2d Aug. 1589, aged 39. Though debauched, cruel, and revengeful, Henry possessed great courage, and often distinguished himself in the field. In his person the house of Valois, which had reigned over France 261 years, became extinct.

HENRY IV., deservedly surnamed the great, king of France and Navarre, was born 13th Dec. 1553. His father was Anthony of Bourbon, and his mother Jane d' Albret, daughter of the king of Navarre. As he had been brought up in the principles of the Calvinists he was declared head of the protestants, at Rochelle 1569, and he engaged warmly in the civil wars, which at that time distracted France. He distinguished himself at the battles of Jarnac, and of Moncontour, and after the peace of St. Gernain, he visited the court of France, and two years after, 1572, married Margaret de Valois sister of Charles IX. During the rejoicings which took place on this occasion, the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew was perpetrated, and Henry, oppressed by the violence of the times, was obliged to renounce his religion rather than perish by the hands of an assassin. He at last escaped from his persecutors 1576, and placed himself at the head of the Huguenots, and displayed his valor and the great resources of his mind at the siege of Cahors, and at the battle of Coutras. He had succeeded in 1572, to the kingdom of Navarre, and as the descendant of Louis IX. he succeeded to the throne of France on the death of Henry III. 1589. His elevation gave offence to the heads of the opposite factions, who suspected the sincerity of Henry's religious principles, but he confirmed his power by the victories of Arque and of Ivry, and at last to silence all opposition he pronounced his abjuration and his adherence to the catholic tenets at St. Denis before his coronation, and on the following year, 1594, Paris opened her gates to her heroic conqueror. By consulting the chief men of the nation at Rouen, Henry was enabled to secure the good will and the affection of his subjects, and in making peace with the Spaniards 1598, he restored tranquillity to the nation. Though now in his conduct and in his government entitled to the attachment of his people, Henry unfortunately found that the spirit of faction was not extinguished; by promulgating an edict of toleration at Nantes, he offended the bigoted catholics, and many secret measures were planned to sacrifice his life, by the offended jesuits. Barriere first attempted to destroy him, Chatel afterwards wounded him in the mouth 1595, and two others meditated his destruction, but the bloody deed was perpetrated by Ravallac 14th May 1610, who stabbed him to the heart in his coach in the streets of Paris. The civil dissensions which prevailed in the reign of Henry, did not permit his prejudiced subjects to appreciate his great qualities, but no sooner had he perished by the dagger of the assassin, than his merits were fully acknowledged by all parties.

HENRY I., king of England, and duke of Normandy, was the third son of William the Conqueror, and succeeded to the crown on the death of William Rufus 1100, during the absence of his elder brother Robert in Italy. This usurpation displeased the absent prince, who returned to England to claim his kingdom sword in hand, but Henry had the art to prevail on Robert to resign his pretensions for a stipulated sum of money. Jealousy thus excited between the brothers, and checked for a time, again was kindled into a war, but Robert was defeated in Normandy, and dragged a prisoner to England, where the last years of his life were passed in close confinement in Cardiff castle. In his government Henry was wise and moderate, though he exercised absolute power. He opposed the encroachments of the church of Rome; he not only patronised learning, and restored the university of Cambridge, but deserved the name of Beau Clerc from his intimate acquaintance with literature. He was severe against robbers, but he had the good sense to abolish the curfew bell so galling to the English, and he established an universal standard of weights and measures. While he watched over the prerogative of the crown, he had respect for the liberties of the people, and from the charters which he granted may be derived the freedom of which the nation is now so deservedly proud. Henry died in Normandy 1185, aged 68, and was buried in Reading abbey. As his only son had been drowned in crossing from Normandy, he left his possessions to his daughter Matilda, but Stephen usurped the crown at his death.

HENRY II., king of England, son of Geoffery Plantagenet, duke of Anjou, by Matilda, daughter of Henry I. was born 1132. In 1150, he was made duke of Normandy, and in 1153, on the death of Eustace, Stephen's son, he was acknowledged successor to the English throne, which he ascended the next year. To his extensive possessions in France he added Britany by conquest, and he afterwards conquered Ireland, which since that time has formed part of the British dominions. Though wise in his government, Henry had to struggle with the clergy, whose ambition, it was his wish to repress. The murder of Thomas à Becket, the primate, which was falsely attributed to the king, tended however to increase rather than diminish the power of the church, and the monarch could reconcile himself to the offended pope only by solemnly exculpating himself on oath of the alleged crime, and by submitting patiently with every mark of penance and contrition to the discipline inflicted on him by the monks of Canterbury. Though respected at home and abroad, and successful in his expeditions against France and against Scotland, Henry did not however find that happiness at the close of life which he might deserve. His children excited by the arts of the French king, rebelled against him, and their ingratitude proved so grievous that it is said he died of a broken heart, when he found his favorite son John in the number of his enemies. He expired at Chinon in Touraine 6th July 1189. The reign of Henry was marked by the striking character of firmness, wisdom, valor, genius and popularity. He reformed abuses, corrected the laws, repressed the power of the barons, and advanced the interests and the consequence of the people. Unfortunately however these high qualities were obscured by excessive pride, boundless ambition, and an unceasing propensity to sensual pleasures, which not only revolted the affections of his queen from him, but tended to embitter the close of his life.

HENRY III., was son and successor of John on the English throne 1216. He lost by his ill conduct the provinces of Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Maine and Touraine, which were conquered by the king of France, and after a disgraceful campaign he retired to England, where the barons, headed by Montfort made war against him and took him prisoner at the battle of Lewes. The valor of his son Edward again set him at liberty, at the battle of Evesham, but Henry was not become wiser by adversity, and instead of devoting himself to the prudent and impartial government of his people, he gave loose to every base and intemperate pleasure; and while he could levy money to satisfy his favorites and parasites, he permitted the pope to plunder the clergy, and to impoverish the kingdom. This worthless monarch, to whose weakness indeed the people of England may be said to owe the establishment of their democratic government, died after a long reign of 56 years, 15th Nov. 1272, aged 65.

HENRY IV., king of England, son of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, the third son of Edward III. ascended the throne after the deposition of Richard II. 1399. This usurpation excited the civil wars between the two roses, or the houses of York and Lancaster. Henry, after an useful rather than a splendid reign, died 20th March 1413, aged 46, and was succeeded by his son.

HENRY V., son and successor of Henry IV.

was remarkable in his youth for his debauchery, and the wildness of his conduct. Better reflection however produced the happiest reformation, and when raised to the throne, he bid adieu to the companions of his licentious hours, and displayed the great and virtuous monarch. He formed the resolution of conquering France, and after taking Harfleur, and ravaging Normandy, he fought the celebrated battle of Agincourt, in which his 15,000 men obtained the victory over 52,000 Frenchmen. Three years after he again visited France, and every where proved victorious, so that he was received at Paris, as the future master of the kingdom. He married Catherine of France, and was declared heir to the kingdom after the death of Charles VI. the reigning monarch: but whilst these successes promised stability and security to his power, the sudden attack of a fistula, at that time considered as incurable, proved fatal. Henry died at Vincennes 31st August, 1422, aged 36, highly respected for valor, prudence, benevolence, and the regular observance of every religious and moral duty.

HENRY VI., son of Henry V. was only 10 months old when he succeeded to his father on the English throne. The death of his grandfather Charles VI. soon after left him also the title of sovereign of France; but a rival arose in the duke of Orleans to dispute his title under the name of Charles VII. Though the young king was crowned with every appearance of popularity at Paris, and though his cause was ably supported by the valor of his uncle the duke of Bedford, yet the English affairs began to decline at the appearance of Joan of Arc. This famous heroine relieved Orleans, which the English were besieging, and inspiring courage in her countrymen, and superstitious terror in her enemies, she recovered with astonishing rapidity, the vast territories which had cost so much English blood to acquire. The death of Bedford hastened also the downfall of the English power in France, and Henry when come to years of manhood, did not display those powers of mind, and that decision of character, so necessary in times of danger and civil war. Though his wife Margaret of Anjou possessed great talents, and even the valor which distinguished the heroes of those days, he was nevertheless unsuccessful, in the battles between the two roses. He was taken prisoner, and led about as a captive; but though he recovered his liberty by the fall of Richard duke of York, his opponent, it was only to be exposed to fresh insults. The fallen duke's son Edward laid claim to the crown, and had abilities and troops to support those pretensions, and after various battles he at last prevailed in the fight of St. Alban's, and was proclaimed king. Henry, who had remained a passive spectator of the ambition and of the courage of his wife, and of the slaughter of his people, was sent to the tower, where he was soon after murdered, as it is supposed, by the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. 1471. There was such mildness and moderation in the character of the unfortunate Henry, that in private life he would have been a most amiable man.

HENRY VII., son of Edmund, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret, of the house of Lancaster, was enabled by the assistance of the duke of Brittany, and of Charles VIII. of France, to invade England, and to defeat the usurper Richard III. The battle of Bosworth field, and the death of Richard, 1485, left Henry in peaceful possession of the throne. He was crowned on the field of battle, and devoted himself to improve and to protect those dominions which his valor had acquired, and his prudence merited. His tranquillity, however, was disturbed by the arts of two impostors, one of whom, Lambert Simnel, son of a baker, assumed at the instigation of the lady Margaret, sister of Edward IV. the title of Richard the duke of York, who had been murdered in the tower by the duke of Gloucester. The imposition for a while succeeded, but Henry at last obtained possession of the person of his ignoble rival, whom in derision he made a scullion in his kitchen. The other impostor was Perkin Warbeck, the son of a Jew, who personated young Edward V. and after he had for some time alarmed the kingdom, he was taken and executed at Tyburn. The reign of Henry formed a new era in the English history. The happiness of his people was the guide of his conduct, and though he loved money, it is certain that no monarch ever contributed more to the establishment of commerce, to the encouragement of industry, and to the protection of arts. He had discovered how dangerous the overgrown power of the nobles is to the monarch, and to the people, and wise laws therefore were enacted to curb their ambition, and to treat them as subjects and no longer as petty sovereigns. This great and good king died 22d April 1509, aged 52. He had married Elizabeth the daughter of Edward IV. and he thus united the claims of the two rival houses, which had so long deluged England in blood.

HENRY VIII., son and successor to Henry VII. ascended the throne 1509, at the age of 18. The salutary instructions which he had imbibed under his father, for a while guided the young monarch, whose reign was wise, popular, and useful. Arbitrary in his conduct and capricious in his opinions, Henry soon, however, showed himself a tyrant. He was persuaded by the emperor Maximilian, and by pope Julius II. to make war against France, and his invasion of that kingdom was attended with success; but pleasure and not military glory, was the ambition of the monarch, and at the persuasion of his favorite, cardinal Wolsey, he soon made peace to be enabled to dissipate in licentious enjoyments the money which he had acquired by conquest and by treaty. When the reformation was begun in Germany by the preaching of Luther, Henry, who was well skilled in school divinity, defended the papal power against the reformer, and with such effect, that the pope in flattery called him defender of the faith. His attachment to Rome soon after vanished, when the pope refused to grant him a divorce, and empower him to marry Anne Boleyn, of whom he was enamored. Unable to prevail with the pope to separate him from his queen, with whom he had lived 18 years, but with whom he now scrupled to cohabit because she had been his brother's wife, he declared war against the church of Rome. He not only proclaimed himself head of the church, but he abolished all the monasteries over the kingdom, and seized the ecclesiastical funds, which were lavished wantonly on his favorites and parasites. Thus married to Anne Boleyn, he soon changed his affections to another object, and conducting the ill-fated queen to a scaffold, he took for his third wife Jane Seymour, who the next year died in childbed. His fourth wife was Anna of Cleves, whom he divorced as he found her more corpulent and less agreeable than he expected; and for his fifth he took Catherine Howard, who soon after expired on the scaffold on a charge of adultery. He afterwards married Catherine Parr, widow of lord Latimer, who survived him, and after a reign of turbulence, violence, and oppression, he expired 28th January 1547, aged 57. Though Henry was the unworthy instrument of the introduction of the reformation into England, he must be detested in his character as a capricious, unfeeling, and licentious tyrant; of whom it was truly said, that he never spared a man in his anger, nor a woman in his lust. During his reign, Fisher, sir Thomas More, Cromwell, and other illustrious characters were sacrificed to the passions of the monarch, and no minister could ever be either so virtuous or so favored as to escape the resentment of a changeful despotic master. Out of the dissolved monasteries Henry founded six new bishoprics, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, and Westminster, the last of which has since been incorporated with that of London.

HENRY, Matthew, an eminent dissenting divine, was born 1662. He was carefully instructed under the watchful eye of his father, and early initiated in classical literature; but though he entered at Gray's inn, and there for some time studied the law with zeal and assiduity, he had a strong predilection for divinity, and after his return into the country began to preach. He was invited to a congregation at Chester, where he was ordained, and where he lived twenty-five years. He was afterwards prevailed upon to remove to Hackney near London. He died 1714. His great worth was ascertained by the various funeral sermons which his death occasioned. As a writer his labors are highly valued, as the author of some sermons, and other theological pieces, and practical divinity, but especially his Expositions of the Bible, in 5 vols. folio, a valuable and most excellent performance.

HENRY, Robert, D.D., a Scotch divine, born February 18, 1718. After being at the school of St. Ninian, and of Stirling, he completed his studies at Edinburgh, and became master of Annan grammar school. In 1748 he was invited to Carlisle by the presbyterians there, and was ordained their minister, and after 12 years' residence among them, he removed to Berwick-on-Tweed, where he married the daughter of Mr. Balderston, a surgeon. In 1768, he was appointed minister of the New-Greyfriars at Edinburgh; and in 1776, he became colleague minister in the old church, where he continued till his death, November 1790. Dr. Henry is author of an history of England on a new plan, which he first conceived in 1763, but did not produce before the public till 1771. This laborious work, of which the second 4to. volume appeared in 1774, the third 1777, the fourth 1781, the fifth 1785, and the sixth, which is posthumous, 1793, has merited the public approbation by the large editions which have been printed in a 4to. and 8vo. form. The Scotch critics indeed at first censured the work, but the English regarded it with more propitious omens, and the author for 1000*l.* conveyed his property in his volumes to Messrs. Cadell and Strahan, and reflected with satisfaction that his history produced him altogether no less than 3300*l.* Dr. Henry in his private character, was an amiable man, fond of society, and in his clerical conduct, he was exemplary and devout.

HENRY, John, governor of Maryland, was one of the delegates from that state to congress in 1778, and for several succeeding years. In 1789 he was elected a senator of the United States. He was elected governor in 1797, and died at Easton, December, 1798.

HENRY, Patrick, governor of Virginia, and a most eloquent orator, took an early and decided part in support of the rights of his country against the tyranny of Great Britain. In the year 1765 he was a member of the assembly of Virginia, and he introduced some resolutions, which breathed a spirit of liberty, and which were accepted by a small majority. These were the first resolutions of any assembly occasioned by the stamp act. One of the resolutions declared, that the general assembly had the exclusive right and power to lay taxes and impositions upon the inhabitants of the colony. Such was the warmth, excited in the debate, that Mr. Henry, after declaiming against the arbitrary measures of Great Britain, added, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles the first his Cromwell, and George the third—" when the speaker of the house cried out "treason" and the cry was echoed from every part of the house. Mr. Henry finished the sentence with firm emphasis "may profit by the example. If this be treason make the most of it." He was elected in 1774 one of the deputies from Virginia to the first congress, and was in this year one of the committee which drew up the petition to the king. In May 1775, after lord Dunmore had conveyed on board a ship a part of the powder from the magazine of Williamsburg, Mr. Henry distinguished himself by assembling the independent companies of Hanover and King William counties, and directing them towards Williamsburg with the avowed design of obtaining payment for the powder, or of compelling to its restitution. The object was effected, for the king's receiver general gave a bill for the value of the property. The governor immediately fortified his palace, and issued a proclamation, charging those, who had procured the bill with rebellious practices. After the departure of lord Dunmore, he was chosen the first governor in June 1776, and he held this office several succeeding years, bending all his exertions to promote the freedom and independence of his country. In the beginning of 1778 an anonymous letter was addressed to him with the design of alienating his affections from the commander-in-chief. He enclosed it to Washington both to evince his friendship and to put him on his guard. In another letter, written a few days afterwards, when he had heard of a plan to effect the removal of Washington, he says to him, "while you face the armed enemies of our liberty in the field, and by the favor of God have been kept unhurt, I trust your country will never harbor in her bosom the miscreant, who would ruin her best supporter; but when arts, unworthy of honest men are used to defame and traduce you, I think not amiss, but a duty, to assure you of that estimation, in which the public hold you." He was a member of the Virginia convention which was appointed to consider the constitution of the United States. He was opposed to the adoption of the constitution, and had reason in after life to rejoice that his reasons for opposing it were overruled by the convention. In 1798 he was nominated by Washington secretary of state, but considerations of a private nature induced him to decline the appointment. In 1796 he was elected governor of Virginia, but he almost immediately resigned the office. In 1799 he was appointed an envoy to France, but severe indisposition, and his advanced age compelled him to refuse the trust. He died June 6th 1799, aged 63.

HENRY, Alexander, a traveller, was a native of New Jersey. In 1760, he accompanied the expedition of Amherst, and was present at the reduction of fort de Levi, near Ontario, and the surrender of Montreal. In descending the river he lost three boats of merchandize, and saved his life by clinging to the bottom of one of them. Immediately after the conquest of Canada, in his enterprising spirit, he engaged in the fur trade. He visited the upper lakes in 1760, and during sixteen years travelled in the north-western parts of America, and was in many scenes of hardship and peril. He died 1824 aged 84. He published travels in Canada and the Indian territories, between the years 1760 and 1776, 8vo. N. York, 1809.

HENRY, Charlton T., D.D., minister of the 2d presbyterian church in Charleston, S. C. He graduated at Middlebury college in 1814, and died Oct. 5, 1827, aged 37 years. He was distinguished for talents and learning no less than for a commendable zeal in the duties of his profession.

HERACLIUS, son of Heraclius governor of Africa, dethroned Phocas, and ascended the throne of Constantinople, 610. He defeated Chosroes the Persian king, who had laid waste Palestine, and he recovered the Cross, which he carried back to Jerusalem on his shoulders. In his reign there were severe theological disputes, and the Saracens began their hostilities against the Roman power in the east. He died 641, and was succeeded by his sons Heraclius, Constantine, and Heraeleonas. Heraclius was poisoned a few months after by his mother-in-law Martina.

HERBELOT, Bartholomew, a well-known French orientalist, born at Paris, 14th December 1625. He applied himself assiduously to the oriental languages, especially Hebrew, and after visiting Rome and Italy for eighteen months, he settled at Paris, where he became interpreter for Eastern languages. He again went to Rome in 1666, and was received every where with uncommon respect, not only by the learned, but by the duke of Tuscany, who liberally entertained him in his palace, and presented him with some valuable oriental manuscripts. The homage paid to his abilities abroad, rendered him more respected at home. Colbert recalled him to patronise him, and he quitted Florence to the great regret of the duke. While in Italy, he began his Bibliothèque Orientale, containing whatever related to the knowledge of the Eastern world, and he completed it in France. It was originally written in Arabic, but he translated it into French. He died 8th December 1695, before the printing of his work was finished, which was not indeed published before 1697, in a large folio. This learned man, respectable in the possession of all the virtues of private life, wrote also a Turkish, Arabian, Persian, and Latin dictionary, &c. which have never been published. The best edition of his Bibliothèque, is in six vols. 8vo. Paris 1732.

HERBERT, of Cherbury, Edward, lord, was born, in 1581, at Montgomery Castle; was sent at the early age of twelve years to University College, Oxford; was made a knight of the Bath soon after the accession of James I.; travelled on the continent in 1608, and attracted much attention by his manners and accomplishments; served in the Netherlands in 1610 and 1614, and displayed consummate bravery; was twice sent ambassador to France, where he distinguished himself by resenting the insolence of the worthless favorite de Luynes; was made an Irish peer, in 1625, and, soon after, an English baron; espoused the parliamentary cause, during the civil wars; and died in 1648. Herbert was one of the most chivalrous characters of his time, with considerable talents, and some vanity. He was a deist, and was one of the first who reduced deism into a system. His principles are expounded in his works De Veritate, and De Religione Laici. Lord Herbert also wrote his own Memoirs; a Life of Henry VIII.; and a treatise on the Religion of the Heathens.

HERBERT, George, a brother of the foregoing, was born, in 1593, at Montgomery Castle; was educated at Westminster School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge; was for eight years orator of the university; and, in 1630, became rector of Be-merton, in Wiltshire, where he died in 1632. Herbert was a man of such exemplary piety and benevolence that his brother says, "where he lived benefited, he was little less than sainted." He wrote The Priest to the Temple—a manual of clerical duties; and a volume of sacred poems, with the title of The Temple.

HERBERT, William, earl of Pembroke, was born at Wilton house, and educated at New college, Oxford, and in 1601 succeeded to his paternal titles and estates. He was in 1626 elected chancellor of Oxford, and made steward of the royal household, and he died suddenly four years after. His poems were published in 8vo. 1660.

HERBERT, Thomas, a native of York, related to the Pembroke family. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford, from which he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, and then went abroad. After four years' absence he returned, and in 1634 published his interesting travels in Asia and Africa, in folio. During the civil wars he joined the parliament, but afterwards deserted a cause which he began to regard as violent and unconstitutional, and he was reconciled to his royal master, whom he attended in his captivity. He was at the restoration created a baronet. He died at York 1st March 1682. He wrote besides Threnodia Carolina, or the Historical Account of the two last Years of the Life of Charles I. 8vo.

HERBIN, Augustus Francis Julian, an oriental scholar, was born in France in 1733. He composed an Arabic grammar, printed at Paris in 1803; also a treatise on Ancient Music, and an account of Hafiz, the Persian Poet, with specimens of his works. He died in 1806.

HERDER, John Gottfried, a German writer, was born in Prussia in 1741. He was educated for the church; and in 1774 became first preacher to the court of Saxe Weimar, ecclesiastical counsellor, and vice president of the consistory. He died in 1803. His best works are—1. Three Fragments on the New German Literature. 2. On the Writings of Thomas Abbt. 3. On the Origin of Language. After gaining a reputation by these productions, he published "Outlines of a Philosophy of the History of Man," of which an English translation appeared in 1800. Its obscurity, however, is an antidote to its infidel tendency.

HERISSANT, Lewis Anthony Prosper, son of a printer, was born at Paris, and died there 10th Aug. 1709, aged 24. He was eminent as a poet, and as a physician, and wrote PEloge de Gonthier d'Andernach, crowned by the faculty of medicine—PEloge de Ducange—poem on Printing—Bibliothèque physique de la France—Catalogue raisonné des Plantes.

HERITIER, Marie Jeanne P, de Villandon, was born at Paris 1664. She was member of the academy of Jeux Floraux, and of the Ricovrati at Padua, and deserved the distinction which she received for her genius and abilities. Her works are both prose and verse. She wrote la Tour Tenebreuse, a tale—les Caprices du Destin, a novel—l'Avare Puni, in verse, and other poems, besides a translation of 16 of Ovid's epistles. She died at Paris 1734.

HERITIER DE BRUTELLE, Charles Lewis P, a native of Paris, eminent for his botanical knowledge. He published in London the Flora of Peru, from the valuable collection of plants, &c. brought from Peru and Chili by Dombey, in 1756, and on his return to Paris, he printed another work, called Flore de la Place Vendome. This learned and ingenious man was assassinated on his return from the National Institute at Paris, 10th Aug. 1801, and his murderers were never discovered. He was then 56 years old. He wrote besides Stirpes Novæ, folio 1784—Cornus Sistens, folio 1789 & Serturn Anglicum.

HERKIMER, general of the militia of New York, was of German descent. When St. Leger, in 1777, invested fort Stanwix, afterwards called fort Schuyler, at the head of Mohawk river, Herkimer, with the militia of Tryon county, hastened to the relief of col. Gansevoort. On his approach he was ambuscaded in August, about six miles from the fort, near Oneida creek. Though mortally wounded, he heroically encouraged his men to the fight, but his party was defeated with the loss of four hundred men. Congress ordered a monument to his memory.

HERMAN, Paul, a botanist of Halle in Saxony, who was physician to the Dutch settlements at Ceylon, and afterwards became botanical professor at Leyden, where he died 1695. He wrote a catalogue of the plants in the public garden of Leyden, 8vo.—Cynosura Materiae medicae, 2 vols. 4to.—Lugduno-Batavi Flores—Paradisus Batavus—Museum Zeylanicum, 1717.

HERMANN, James, a mathematician of Basle. He was for three years mathematical professor at Padua, and afterwards assisted the Czar Peter in the establishment of his academy, and then was appointed morality professor at Basle, where he died 1733, aged 55. He wrote several works on mathematics:—Responsio ad Considerationes de Princip. Calculi Different.—de Phoronomia—de Nova Accelerationis Lege,—Disquis. de Vibrationibus Chodarum tensorum—Solutio Problematis de Trajector. curv.

HERMOGENES, a rhetorician, born at Tarsus, in Cilicia, flourished about the year 180, and is celebrated for the meteoric brilliancy and rapid extinction of his talents. At the age of fifteen he was famous for his power of extempore speaking; at seventeen he published his rhetoric; and, soon after, various treatises on oratory, which ranked him high among writers upon that subject; but in his twenty-fifth year he wholly lost his memory, and sank into stupidity; nor, though he lived to a great age, did he ever recover his intellectual faculties.

HERODIAN, a Greek historian, believed to have been a native of Alexandria, held various honorable offices at Rome, and flourished in the second and third centuries after Christ. He wrote a History of Rome, in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius to the accession of Gordian III. Isaac Cassaubon, La Mothe-Vayer, Gibbon, and others have borne testimony to its general merit.

HERODOTUS, the oldest of the Greek historians whose works are extant, and whom Cicero called the Father of History, was born 484 B. C., at Halicarnassus, in Caria. When his country was tyrannized over by Lygdamis, Herodotus abandoned it, and travelled over Greece, Egypt, and Italy. Returning to his native place, he assisted in overthrowing the tyranny; but, instead of gratifying the people by this conduct, he is said to have incurred their resentment. In his thirty-ninth year he recited his History, with universal applause, at the Olympic games. He is believed to have died at Thurium, in Italy, at an advanced age. A Life of Homer is erroneously ascribed to him.

HERON, Robert, a miscellaneous writer, born in Scotland, and educated for the church, was for some time assistant preacher to Dr. Blair, at Edinburgh. Lured to London by promises of patronage from the booksellers, he was indefatigable with his pen. He contributed to many periodicals; was, for a time, editor of the British Press, the Globe, the British Neptune, and other papers; translated many foreign productions; wrote several original works; and closed his career by dying, penniless, in the Fever Institution at Pancras, April 13, 1807. Among his labors are, A Tour in Scotland, two vols.; A History of Scotland, six vols.; A System of Chemistry; and the Comforts of Human Life.

HEROPHILUS, a celebrated physician, a native of Chalcedon, was a disciple of Praxagoras, and lived under Ptolemy Soter. He was one of the first who dissected human bodies. Herophilus also marked the distinction between the nerves and the tendons and ligaments; discriminated the variations in the state of the pulse; and partly discovered the lacteal absorbents.

HERRERA TORDESILLAS, Antonio de, a celebrated Spanish historian. He was at first secretary to Vespasian Gonzaga, viceroy of Naples, and afterwards historiographer of India, with a pension, in which honorable office he published his general history of India, from 1492 to 1544, in 4 vols. folio. He died 1625, aged 60; and a little before his death, he had been made by Philip IV. secretary of state. His Indian history is a most valuable performance, very accurate, though the style is now and then too inflated. He wrote also an history of Spain, three vols. folio, not equally esteemed.

HERRERA, Antonio de, a Spanish historian, was born in 1559 and died in 1625. He published in Spanish a general history of the West Indies, 1601, also 1615. The same has been published in various editions and languages. He gives an account of discoveries from 1492 to 1553. The history of America, tr. by J. Stevens, was published at London, 2d ed. 6 vols. 1740.

HERRGOTT, John James Marquard, a German historian, who was a native of Fribourg, in Brisgau, and became a benedictine monk. He was historiographer to the imperial house of Austria; and he published "Genealogia Diplomatica Gentis Habs purgicæ," 3 vols. folio; and "Monumenta Domus Austriacæ," 5 vols. folio. He died in 1762.

HERRING, Thomas, D.D. archbishop of Canterbury, was born 1696 at Walsoken, Norfolk, where his father was rector. He was educated at Wisbech school, and in 1710 entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was elected fellow of Corpus Christi in 1716, and became tutor there, and when in orders, minister of Great Shelford, &c. In 1722 he was made chaplain to Fleetwood, bishop of Ely, and four years after, chosen preacher at Lincoln's inn, and was nominated chaplain to the king. In 1731 he was made dean of Rochester, in 1737 consecrated bishop of Bangor, and in 1743 translated to York. At the breaking out of the rebellion, the archbishop exerted himself actively to rouse the people in his county and around him to a sense of their duty, and by his eloquent appeal, procured a subscription of 40,000*l.* for the defence of the country, which was immediately seconded by the kingdom. These high services were rewarded by his elevation to the see of Canterbury, on the death of Potter 1747. A violent fever in 1753, shattered his constitution so much, that he afterwards retired to the privacy of Croydon, where he saw none but his immediate friends. He died after a languishing illness of four years, 13th March 1757, and was privately buried in Croydon church, according to his desire. Herring was as amiable in private as he was respected in public life. In 1763 his sermons on public occasions, were published, and a volume of his letters has been presented to the world by the reverend Mr. Duncombe.

HERSCHEL, Sir William, one of the greatest astronomers of modern times, was born in 1738. He was the son of a musician, who brought him up to his own profession; and young Herschel was successively a player in the band of a Hanoverian regiment, and of the Durham militia, and organist at Halifax, and at the Octagon chapel at Bath. The study of astronomy was one of the occupations of his leisure hours, and finding the purchase of a powerful telescope too expensive, he tried to construct one for himself, and was successful. He subsequently made others of enormous magnitude. Relinquishing the profession of music, he gave himself up to astronomical inquiries, and, on the 13th of March, 1781, was so fortunate as to discover a new planet, which he named the Georgium Sidus. Thenceforth patronised by George the Third, and assisted by his sister Caroline, he continued his labors assiduously. In 1816 he received the Guelphic order of knighthood; and he died August 23, 1822. Among the discoveries made by Herschel are the lunar volcanos, the sixth and seventh satellites of Saturn, the sixth satellite of the Georgian planet, and the nature of the various nebulae. Herschel wrote many papers in the Philosophical Transactions; and drew up a Catalogue of Stars, taken from Flamsteed's Observations; and a Catalogue of Five Thousand new Nebulae.

HERSENT, Charles, or Hersan, a French divine, known by his severe satire against Richelieu, whom he accused, in his book called, "Optati Gallide cavendo Schismate," of intentions of separating the Galliean church, like the English, from the see of Rome. The book was answered by three or four writers at the suggestion of the cardinal, but the writer escaped his pursuit by flying to Rome, where he drew the vengeance of the inquisition upon him, by his opinions on the doctrine of grace. He was excommunicated for contumacy, and returned to France, where he died 1660.

HERSEY, Ezekiel, an eminent physician of Hingham, Massachusetts, and a benefactor of Harvard college, was graduated at that seminary in 1728, and died 1770, aged 62. His widow married capt. Derby of Salem, and in fulfilment of his wishes established an academy at Hingham, calling it Derby instead of Hersey academy. He bequeathed to the college 1000*l.* towards founding a professorship of anatomy and surgery. His widow also gave the same sum for the same purpose. Dr. Warren was the first, who was established, on this foundation.

HERSEY, Abner, an eminent physician of Barnstable, Massachusetts. He was as much distinguished for his oddity, as his skill. He wore a loose dress lined throughout with baize. He had a great coat made of seven calfskins to protect him from the rain. He was hypochondriacal, capricious, whimsical and churlish. He died 1787, aged 65. He bequeathed to Harvard college 500*l.* towards the establishment of a professorship of the theory and practice of physic. He also bequeathed about 500*l.* the interest of which he directed to be applied annually to the purchase of religious publications, which should be distributed in all the towns on Cape Cod. He directed what books should be selected for a hundred years; after the expiration of which time, the ministers and deacons of the thirteen parishes, to whose care his donation is intrusted, are authorized to select any religious books at their pleasure, excepting on every fourth year. On the petition of the parties the legislature authorised the division of the property among the churches interested.

HERTZBERG, Ewald Frederichon, a native of Pomerania, raised by his abilities to a high situation in the office of secretary of foreign affairs at Berlin, and afterwards employed as ambassador at Vienna. His knowledge of political affairs was eminently displayed in his essay on the Population of the Marche of Brandenburg, which was in 1752, rewarded with the prize of the Berlin academy of sciences, and in consequence of his experience in diplomatic affairs, and his deep acquaintance with the interests of states, every paper of importance, and every memorial of communication with foreign powers was submitted to his enlightened mind. He was thus raised to the highest offices in the kingdom, and ennobled. He died 1795, aged 70.

HERVEY, James, an eminent divine, born at Hardingsstone, Northamptonshire, and educated at Northampton grammar school, and Lincoln college, Oxford. In 1736 he served the curacy of Weston Favel for his father, and afterwards removed to Biddeford, and in 1750 succeeded on his father's death to the livings of Weston and Collingtree. In the discharge of his pastoral duties, he was zealously active and vigilant, in his conduct exemplary, and in his manners pious, humane, and charitable. His heart was so warmly actuated by benevolent motives, that he expressed a wish to die "even with the world," and therefore his income and the profits which he derived from his popular and valuable publications were carefully devoted to the comfort and support of the poor and wretched in his neighborhood. This good and benevolent character, whose constitution was undermined by a slow consumption, died on Christmas-day 1758, aged 44. As a scholar, his abilities were respectable, he was well skilled in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and in his compositions he aimed not so much to be polished and sublime, as to be plain and useful. His Meditations among the Tombs, and Reflections in a Flower Garden, were first published 1746, and as they were well received by the public, he added another volume, and Theron and Aspasio, or Dialogues and Letters on the most important subjects, 3 vols. 8vo. appeared 1755, a work strongly supporting the doctrines of Calvin.—He wrote besides sermons—letters to J. Wesley—letters to lady Frances Shirley, and an edition of Jenk's Meditations. His works have been edited in 7 vols. 8vo. 1796, with his life prefixed.

HESIOD, a celebrated Greek poet of Ascra in Bœotia, wrote, the Works and the Days, a poem on agriculture—Theogony, an interesting account of ancient mythology—the shield of Hercules, a fragment. He lived according to the best account in Homer's age, B. C. 907.

HESSE, William, prince of, was illustrious for the patronage which he extended to learning, and for the judgment and success with which he cultivated literature. He built an observatory at Cassel, and was assisted in his observations on the heavenly bodies by Juste Byrge and Christopher Rothman. He died 1597. His observations were published at Leyden, 1618.

HESSELS, John, or Hesselius, theological professor at Louvain, was born 1522. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, by his eloquence and erudition, and by a perfect knowledge of the works of Austin and Jerome. He died of an apoplexy 1566, and was buried in St. Peter's church, Louvain, where he was a canon. He wrote various controversial works against the protestants.

HEURNIUS, John, a physician, born at Utrecht 1543. After studying in foreign universities, he became medical professor at Leyden, where he died of the stone 1601. He is said to have been the first who lectured at Leyden on human bodies. He published Hippocrates in Greek and Latin, and wrote several works, the best known of which is his treatise on the Disorders of the Head. His works were published in folio, Leyden 1658. His son Otto became eminent as a medical man.

HEUSINGER, John Michael, a Saxon divine, born at Sunderhausen, Thuringia, Sept. 1690. He studied at Gotha, Halle and Jena, and in 1715 he settled at Giessen, where he took pupils. In 1722 he went to Laubach, and in 1730 was made professor at Gotha, and in 1738, he removed to the same but more lucrative situation at Eisenach, where he died March 1751. He is eminent for his piety, good temper, and sound judgment; and of his learning the best proofs are, his valuable editions of some of the classics, and various philological treatises.

HEVELIUS, John, or Hevelke, a celebrated astronomer, born at Dantzic, 23th Jan. 1611. He spent four years in travelling over Holland, England, France and Germany, and at his return home he was engaged in civil affairs, till Crugerus, who knew his abilities, prevailed upon him to devote himself fully to astronomy, as a science by which he might obtain distinction and fame. The more conveniently to pursue this study he built an observatory at the top of his house, and as he had learned to work in wood and metals, he constructed his own mathematical instruments. His observations were first directed towards the moon, and in 1647, he published at Dantzic his Selenographia, sive Lunæ Descriptio, in which he gave an accurate account of its appearance and spots, and also of the phases of the other planets. Flattered with the applause of the learned on his labors, he continued his astronomical observations, and published various tracts, on the heavenly bodies. In 1668 appeared his "Cometographia." In 1673 the first part of his "Machina Cœlestis" appeared, which, as it supported his former assertions, was attacked by Hooke with such virulence, that in 1679 Dr. Halley, at the request of the royal society, examined the instruments of both the disputants, and made a favorable report of both, though later experiments have given the preference to Hooke. The second part of the Machina Cœlestis was published 1679. This learned man died on his birth day, 1687. To the reputation of a great astronomer he added the character of an upright magistrate, as he was raised by the voice of his fellow citizens to the office of burgomaster of Dantzic, which he discharged with fidelity and applause. Many of the letters which he received from learned men, and also from princes and potentates, were published after his death 1682, all expressive of the high respect in which he was held in the republic of letters.

HEWES, Joseph, one of the signers of the American declaration of independence 1776, was a native of New Jersey, and graduated at Princeton college. He became a merchant, and when about thirty years of age removed to North Carolina. In 1774 he was sent as a delegate to congress, and continued to be a member till his death, 1779, aged 50. His parents were Quakers, and he had always been considered as belonging to the sect, but when the Quakers held a general convention in 1778 of the members of their sect, residing in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and put forth a "testimony," denouncing the congress, and all its proceedings, he broke off all communion with them.

HEWSON, William, an able anatomist, assistant and afterwards partner to Dr. William Hunter. An unfortunate dispute separated these able men, and Hewson read anatomical lectures in his own house. He died 1774, aged 35. He wrote Inquiries into the Properties of the Blood, and the Lymphatic System, two vols. 8vo.—He maintained also for some time, a literary dispute with Dr. Abraham Monro, about the discovery of the Lymphatics in the vessels of oviparous animals.

HEY, John, a learned divine, was born in 1734, and educated at Catharine-hall, Cambridge, from whence he removed in 1753 to a fellowship in Sidney college, where he proceeded through all the degrees to that of doctor in divinity, in 1780, when he became the first professor of divinity on the Norrisian foundation, which chair he resigned in 1795. He was for many years rector of Passenham, in Northamptonshire, and of Calverton, in Buckinghamshire, but resigned both, in 1814, to settle in London, where he died in 1815. His works are, 1. Redemption, a Seatonian prize poem. 2. Lectures on Divinity, 4 vols. 8vo. 3. Seven Sermons on several occasions, 8vo. 4. Discourses on the malevolent Sentiments, 8vo. 5. Observations on the Writings of St. Paul.

HEYLIN, Peter, D.D., a native of Burford, Oxfordshire, born 29th November 1600. He published, in 1621, his Microcosmus, or description of the world, which became very popular, and procured him great celebrity. In 1629, he was made chaplain to the king, by the recommendation of Laud, and of lord Danby, and in 1631 he was promoted to the rectory of Henningford, a prebend of Westminster, and the living of Houghton, Durham. In 1687 he was made rector of Islip, Oxfordshire, which the next year he exchanged for South-Warborough, Hants; but while he expected higher preferments, he found his hopes shattered by the violence of civil war, and he was, therefore, not only stripped of his benefices and property, but declared a delinquent by parliament. He fled from the fury of his persecutors, and concealed himself for some time at Winchester, then at Minster-Lovel, Oxfordshire, and afterwards at Abingdon, where he devoted himself to literature. At the restoration he was reinstated in all his ecclesiastical honors, but while he expected in higher dignities the reward of his faithful services in favor of royalty, he sunk under a severe disease, 8th May, 1662, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. This able and indefatigable writer, whom Wood declares to have been endowed with singular gifts, of a sharp and pregnant wit, solid and clear judgment, published besides, a history of the reformation in England,—history of the Presbyterians, folio,—and Life of archbishop Laud, folio. His description of the world from a small 8vo. originally, was swelled in subsequent editions, under the name of Cosmography, to a large folio.

HEYWARD, Thomas, one of the signers of the American declaration of independence July 4th 1776, judge. He studied law at the temple in London, and spent some years in a tour on the continent of Europe. On his return he practised law. He was a member of congress in 1775 and 1776 from South Carolina. In 1778 he was appointed judge of the civil and criminal courts of South Carolina. At the capture of Charleston in 1780 he bore arms, and fell into the hands of the enemy, and was sent to St. Augustine. His plantation was plundered, and he lost 130 slaves. Having at last permission to sail to Philadelphia, he narrowly escaped drowning, having fallen overboard. In 1798 he relinquished his judicial duties. He died 1809 aged 63.

HEYWOOD, John, an English poet and jester, born in London, and educated at Oxford. He was one of the first who wrote English plays, but the brilliancy of his wit, and the liveliness of his disposition, rendered him better known to his cotemporaries than the effusions of his pen. He was particularly noticed by sir Thomas More, and by Henry VIII. and he was equally the favorite of queen Mary, whom it is said he entertained and amused even upon her death bed. As he was a bigoted papist, he left England on the accession of Elizabeth, and retired to Mechlin, where he died 1565. Besides his plays, he wrote 500 epigrams, the Spider and Fly, a parable, in 77 chapters, at the beginning of each of which appears the figure of the author near a window hung with cobwebs, flies, and spiders.

HEYWOOD, Thomas, an actor and writer, lived in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., and is supposed to have been a native of Lincolnshire. His fertility was astonishing; for he tells us that he "had either an entire hand, or at least a main finger," in two hundred and twenty plays, of which only twenty-three are extant. Writing so much, it is wonderful that he wrote so well. "He is," says Charles Lamb, "a sort of prose Shakspeare; his scenes are to the full as natural and affecting." Heywood did not confine himself to the drama; he wrote various works, among which are, The Hierarchy of Angels; A Life of Queen Elizabeth; and a General History of Women.

HIACOOMES, the first Indian in New England, who was converted to christianity, and a minister at Martha's Vineyard, lived upon this island, when a few English families first settled there in 1642. In 1670, an Indian church was regularly formed on Martha's Vineyard, and Hiacoomes and Tackanash were ordained its pastor and teacher by Elliot and Cotton. Hiacoomes survived his colleague, and died about the year 1690, aged near 80.

HICKES, George, D.D., an eminent English divine, born 20th June 1642, and educated at North Allerton school, and in 1659, admitted at St. John's college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Magdalen college, and Magdalen hall, and in 1664, was chosen fellow of Lincoln college, where he became an able and active tutor for seven years. In 1676, he was made chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, whom he accompanied the next year to Scotland, where his grace was high commissioner for the king. After obtaining various pieces of preferment, he was made dean of Worcester 1683, and the next year the vacant bishopric of Bristol was marked for him, but the king's death prevented his elevation, as his zeal against popery was far from recommending him to the favor of the successor on the throne, James II. He afterwards accepted from the bishop of Worcester the rectory of Allchurch near that city, but at the revolution he was ejected from all his ecclesiastical honors, as he refused to take the oaths of allegiance. When Talbot, afterwards bishop of Oxford and of Durham, was nominated in the gazette, dean in his room, he boldly claimed his right, and affixed a paper to that purpose on the entrance into the choir of the cathedral. This step of course exposed him to the resentment of government, and therefore to avoid persecution he left the kingdom, till some years after, in 1699, the chancellor, lord Somers, out of respect for his great abilities obtained an act of council to stop all proceedings against him. After his deprivation, Hickes was sent by his fellow sufferers to James into France, and in 1694, he was on his return, with the approbation of the exiled monarch, consecrated suffragan bishop of Thetford, by the bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. After being grievously afflicted with the stone, he died 15th Dec. 1715, in his 74th year. Dr. Hickes was a man of very extensive erudition, well acquainted with the fathers, and with the doctrines of the primitive church, but it is to be lamented that his great powers were engaged chiefly, only in controversial pamphlets which are forgotten as soon as read.

HIDALGO Y COSTILLA, Don Michael, one of the first assertors of Mexican liberty, was rector of Dolores, in the province of Guanaxuato, and was a man of education and talents, who possessed great influence with the natives. In conjunction with several others, he formed a plan for throwing off the Spanish Yoke. It was betrayed to the viceroy, and Hidalgo was driven to the necessity of taking the field prematurely. The insurrection began on the night of the tenth of September, 1810. At first he obtained great success; but at length, the archbishop of Mexico having excommunicated him and his followers, superstition thinned his ranks, and he sustained three severe defeats. He ultimately fell into the hands of the Spaniards, and was executed in July, 1811.

HIFFERMAN, Paul, an author, born in the county of Dublin 1719, and educated for a popish priest at Dublin and in France. He however preferred the study of physic, and for some time practised in Dublin, but his indolence was such that he relinquished the profession for the laborious life of an author, and came to London 1753. He recommended himself by some of his pieces to the learned and witty of the times, and by the effusions of his pen, and the contributions of his friends, he contrived to live. Though acquainted with Foote, Garrick, Goldsmith, Murphy, Bickerstaff, and others, he yet seldom appeared decently respectable. His resources indeed were not always very honorable, and so great were his eccentricities, that he never would mention where his lodgings were. He died June 1777, and it was then discovered that he lodged in one of the obscure courts near St. Martin's lane. Dr. Hifferman, as he was called, wrote the "Ticklers" a set of political papers in Dublin 1750—"the Tuner" another political paper, London 1753—Miscellanies in prose and verse—the earl of Warwick, a tragedy from La Harpe—and other trifles neither elegant nor popular.

HIGGINS, or HIGINS, John, an English divine educated at Oxford, and engaged in the instruction of youth at Winsham and Ilminster in Somersetshire. He published "Flosculi of Terence"—Holcot's dictionary—and other school books, besides controversial tracts concerning Christ's descent into Hell, and an edition in 1587, of the Mirror for Magistrates. He died it is supposed after 1604.

HIGGINSON, Francis, first minister of Salem, Massachusetts, after receiving his education at Emanuel college in Cambridge, became the minister of a church at Leicester in England. Here he remained in the quiet performance of his duty, (and probably might have remained through life) till his repeated acts of non-conformity caused at length his exclusion from his pulpit. He obtained afterwards liberty to lecture in Leicester; but at last an information was lodged against him, and he was daily expecting to be dragged before the high commission court. One day two messengers came to his house, and with loud knocks cried out, where is Mr. Higginson? We must speak with Mr. Higginson? His wife ran to his chamber and entreated him to conceal himself; but he replied, that he should acquiesce in the will of God. He went down, and as the messengers entered the hall they presented him with some papers, saying in a rough manner, "sir, we came from London, and our business is to convey you to London, as you may see by those papers." "I thought so," exclaimed Mrs. Higginson weeping; but a woman's tears could have little effect upon hard hearted pursuivants. Mr. Higginson opened the packet to read the form of his arrest, but instead of an order from bishop Laud for his seizure, he found a copy of the charter of Massachusetts, and letters from the governor and company, inviting him to embark with them for New England. He accepted the invitation and sailed from Gravesend in 1629. He arrived at Cape Ann, and the next day entered the harbor of Salem. Within a month after his arrival the church chose him their teacher, but his connexion with the church was a short one, as he died in the following year, aged 42. Mr. Higginson wrote an account of his voyage, which is preserved in Hutchinson's collection of papers. He wrote also a short account of that part of Massachusetts which was now settling, and of the Indians entitled, New England's plantation, or a short and true description of the commodities and discommodities of that country 1630. It has been reprinted in the collections of the hist. society.

HIGGINSON, John, minister of Salem, was a native of England. He was the instructor of a school at Hartford before he became a preacher. He was chaplain at Saybrook fort for a number of years. In 1641, he went to Guilford, and preached about two years as an assistant to Mr. Whitefield, whose daughter he married. In 1643, he was chosen one of the seven pillars of Guilford. The practice of choosing from among the brethren seven persons, who were called pillars, to whom the other church members were gathered, had before been adopted in New Haven and Milford. After the church was completely organized in Guilford in 1643, Mr. Higginson was elected teacher to assist Mr. Whitefield; but he was not ordained. About the year 1650, Mr. Whitefield returned to England, and Mr. Higginson remained as teacher of the church. But in 1659, he left that town with the intention of revisiting his native country. On his arrival at Salem he was persuaded to preach one year in the church, where his father had been settled, and was ordained in 1660. Here he continued near half a century till his death Dec. 9, 1708, aged 92. He published an election sermon, entitled, the cause of God and his people in New England, 1663; our dying Saviour's legacy of peace to his disciples in a troublesome world, with a discourse on the duty of christians to be witnesses unto Christ, unto which is added some help to self examination 1686; an attestation to Dr. Mather's magnalia, or church history of New England, prefixed to that work, and dated 1697; a testimony to the order of the gospel in the churches of New England with Mr. Hubbard, 1701; an epistle to the reader, prefixed to Hale's inquiry into the nature of witchcraft, 1702; a preface to Thomas Allen's invitation to thirsty sinners; the deplorable state of New England, 1708.

HIGHMORE, Joseph, an eminent painter, born 13th June 1692 in the parish of St. James Garlick-lithe, London. He early showed a strong inclination for painting, but his father bound him as clerk to an attorney, and for a while he was withdrawn from his favorite pursuits. In 1732, he visited Holland, and examined the valuable picture gallery of Dusseldorff, and in 1734, he made another excursion to Paris, where he saw, by the favor of cardinal de Polignac, the famous group of the court of Lycopedes, which was afterwards destroyed by the Russians at Charlottenburgh in Prussia. In 1744, he painted a set of paintings on the history of Pamela, just published, and thus became acquainted with the excellent author Samuel Richardson. In 1753, at the institution of the academy of painting, he was appointed one of the professors, and he deserved the honor not only as an artist, but as an elegant writer. He published "an Examination of Reubens' two paintings in the banqueting house" in 4to—Practice of Perspective on the principles of Dr. Brook Taylor, 1763,—essays moral and religious, with a translation of Browne's Latin poem on the immortality of the soul, 1766, 12mo. and Observations on Dodwell's Christianity not founded on argument. His paintings during a practice of 46 years are numerous, the best known of which are Hager and Ishmael, now in the Foundling Hospital, the good Samaritan, the finding of Moses, the Harlowe family from Clarissa, and the Graces unveiling Nature, on memory, from Reubens. An even temper, and a most benevolent disposition lent their aid to support a constitution naturally strong and vigorous, and he lived to his 83th year.

HIGHMORE, Nathaniel, an eminent anatomist born at Fording-bridge, Hants. He is the first Englishman who wrote a systematical treatise on the structure of the human body, and he was indefatigable in the pursuit and improvement of anatomical science. He died 21st March 1684, aged 71. His works are "Corporis Humani Disquisitio Anatomica, folio 1651—the History of Generation—de Passione Hysterica, 8vo. 1660.

HILARIUSE, Joseph, a native of Enzesfeld, educated among the Jesuits, and made teacher of grammar and rhetoric at Vienna, where he was appointed præfectus rei nummaria. He renounced the order of the Jesuits 1770, and became director of the imperial cabinet of medals, and dean of philosophy. As a medalist and antiquarian he was particularly eminent. He died 1798, aged 61.

HILARY, St. a native of Poitiers in France, who was late in life converted to christianity, and was in 355 made bishop of his native town. He ably defended Athanasius at the council of Beziers against Saturninus, and for his zeal was banished by the emperor Constantius into Phrygia. He died 367. His works have been edited Paris 1693.

HILDEBERT, bishop of Mans, and then archbishop of Tours, was born at Lavardin. Though according to Bayle, he is accused by Yvo, bishop of Chartres, with licentiousness and intemperance before he was admitted into the church, yet he became one of its brightest ornaments for piety, learning and holiness. He was very severe against the vices and the corruptions of the court of Rome, in a letter which he published in lively, elegant, and animated language. He also wrote a Description of Rome in Latin verse. He died before the middle of the 12th century.

HILDESLEY, Mark, an English bishop, born at Marston, Kent, 1699, and educated at the Charter house, London, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1723. In 1731 he obtained the college living of Hitchin, and four years after that of Holwell in Bedfordshire, where he zealously devoted himself to the spiritual care and instruction of his parishioners. On the death of that amiable prelate Dr. Wilson, bishop of Sodor and Man, the duke of Athol fixed upon Hildesley as a successor, and for piety, goodness and exemplary morals, a better choice could not be made. The new prelate took leave of his Hitchin congregation with affectionate tenderness, and when he revisited them afterwards with friendly humility, he was greeted with the respect and homage of crowded multitudes. In his diocese he was enabled to see the completion of his worthy predecessor's translation of the bible into the Manx language, in 1755. He died Dec. 7th, 1772.

HILL, Joseph, an English divine born at Leeds 1624, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and Magdalen, of which he became a fellow. As he was strongly attached to the doctrines of the puritans, he was ejected at the restoration for non-conformity, and went over to Holland. He was in 1667 pastor of the English church at Middleburg, and at last settled at Rotterdam where he died 1707. He is chiefly known for his edition of Schrevelius' Greek Lexicon improved with 8000 new words 1676. He wrote also dissertations on the antiquity of temples, and churches.

HILL, Aaron, a poet, born 10th Feb. 1685, in Beaufort Buildings, London. He was educated at Westminster school, but being left fatherless he determined to go to Constantinople, to see his relation lord Paget the English ambassador there. The visit was not unwelcome to lord Paget; by his friendship young Hill was enabled to travel over Egypt and part of the east, and on his return to England with him he was presented to many of the courts on the continent. Some time after he accompanied sir William Wentworth in the tour of Europe, and was absent for three years. On his return he claimed the public notice by the publication of his "Camillus" a poem on lord Peterborough the general in Spain; and about that time, 1709, being made manager of Drury lane theatre, he wrote his first tragedy, "Elfrid or the Fair Inconstant" finished at the request of Booth in little more than a week. In 1710 he wrote the opera of "Rinaldo" the first piece set to music by Handel in England. He afterwards wrote for the stage "the Fatal Vision, or the Fall of Siam," and in 1718 published "the Northern Star" a poem on the Czar Peter, which was some time after handsomely rewarded with a gold medal from the empress Catharine. Subsequently he published "the Progress of Wit" against Pope's Dunciad. He survived till 1750. Four volumes of his poems have appeared since his death, in which is Merope, a tragedy borrowed from Voltaire, and introduced at Drury-lane, by Garrick. Though possessed of good natural talents, he never rose to great celebrity as a writer. His thoughts were always expressed with affectation, and by attempting too much, he never effected any thing with complete success. He is now known as a writer cotemporary with Pope, but his poetical effusions have sunk into oblivion.

HILL, sir John, an indefatigable English writer born 1716, son of a clergyman at Spalding or Peterborough. By the friendship of Folkes, and Baker, respectable members of the royal society, he was introduced to the notice of literary men, and in 1746 he published by subscription a translation of Theophrastus' treatise "on gems" which increased his fame, his friends and his resources. Flushed with his literary labors, he began to compile a general natural history in 3 vols. folio, and next undertook with G. L. Scott, a supplement to Chambers' Dictionary. Besides these his attention was engaged in the publication of the "British Magazine" and of "the Inspector" a periodical pamphlet, which he rendered palatable to the public by the little anecdotes, the private scandal, and the public intrigues with which his attendance at different places of general amusement made him acquainted. As his publications were numerous, he acquired a large and regular income, but the freedom with which he treated public and private characters, often exposed him to personal violence, so that in one instance he was caned at Ranelagh by an Irish gentleman who considered himself as ridiculed by him. Thus by degrees he exposed himself to the contempt of the world, and by a paper war with Woodward, with Fielding, and others, he rendered himself obnoxious to the malevolence of all, and sunk in the general estimation. From a writer he became an empiric; and by the preparation of the essence of water-dock; of tincture of valerian; of the pectoral balsam of honey, and other simple medicines, he again procured a comfortable income. The patronage of the earl of Bute also was extended to him, and with his approbation he undertook that pompous and voluminous work, called "a System of Botany," and by presenting a copy of it and of some of his other works to the king of Sweden, he was in return invested with one of the orders of knighthood, and assumed the title of sir John. This extraordinary character died Nov. 1775. He possessed great natural talents, but the rapidity with which he wrote, and the wish of obtaining popularity, prevented that elegant polish, and highly finished diction, which entitle the labors of genius and perseverance to more than temporary fame. It is said, though scarcely credible, that from the variety of subjects which his prolific pen treated, he gained an income of 1500*l.* a year, an enormous sum for compositions which were mostly compilations, and depended chiefly on the fashions, the prejudices, or the frailties of the times.

HILL, Robert, an extraordinary character, born 11th Jan. 1699, at Miswell near Tring, Herts, by profession a tailor and staymaker. In the midst of his obscurity and poverty, he aspired after fame, and by great labor and perseverance, he made himself a perfect master of several languages by books only. He became known to the public by means of Mr. Spence, who in 1757, published a comparison between him and Magliabecchi, and endeavored to raise a subscription in his favor. He was seven years in acquiring a knowledge of Latin, and 14 in learning Greek, but he made himself master of Hebrew in a little time. He wrote Remarks on Berkeley's Essay on Spirit—the Character of a Jew—a Criticism on Job. He died after a confinement of 18 months to his bed, July 1777, at Buckingham.

HILL, Rowland, the celebrated minister of Surrey Chapel, London. He was the son of sir Rowland Hill. Although he was admitted to deacon's orders in the established church; and, although he regarded himself as an Episcopal clergyman, he yet maintained an independent and ambiguous position, being theoretically a churchman, but practically a dissenter. He was distinguished for zeal and eccentricity, and had long to contend against religious animosity; but his warm hearted philanthropy, generous benevolence, and blameless character overcame opposition and gained him general respect and esteem. He usually spent a considerable part of the summer in visiting various parts of Great Britain, preaching in places of worship of almost every denomination that would admit of his services, and occasionally to large assemblies in the open air. He died, April 11, 1833, in the 89th year of his age.

HILLHOUSE, James, a distinguished citizen of the United States, born at Montville Conn. Oct. 21, 1754, and was graduated at Yale College in 1773. After a due preparation he entered upon the practice of law; took an active part in the revolutionary struggle, and when New Haven was invaded by the British under General Tryon, was commander of the governor's guards; and, in 1791, became a member of the House of Representatives in Congress. Three years after this he was chosen to the Senate, of which he continued to be a conspicuous member for 16 years. In 1810 he resigned his seat in the senate of the United States to undertake the office of Commissioner of the School Fund of Connecticut, which he continued to manage with great fidelity and ability for 15 years. He was chosen treasurer of Yale College in 1792, and continued to hold the office till his death, a little more than 50 years; and he did much to promote the interests of that institution. Mr. Hillhouse died at New Haven, Dec. 29, 1832, in the 79th year of his age. He was highly respected for his private virtues, as well as for his great and long continued public services.

HILLIARD, Nicholas, a native of Exeter, goldsmith, carver, and portrait painter to queen Elizabeth. He drew the queen's whole length sitting on her throne, and acquired also much celebrity by a highly finished portrait, in water colors, of Mary queen of Scots, in her 18th year. His pieces were so much admired, that Donne said in his "Storm," a hand, an eye, by Hilliard drawn, is worth an history. He died 1619, aged 72.

HILLIARD, Timothy, minister of Cambridge, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1764. In 1768 he was appointed chaplain of castle William, and after officiating a few months, was elected a tutor of the college in which he was educated. He was ordained the minister of Barnstable 1771, and remained there twelve years, when on account of his health, he was compelled to ask a dismissal. On the 27th of October 1783 he was installed as colleague with Dr. Appleton at Cambridge. He died 1790, aged 43. He published two fast sermons, 1774; a sermon at the execution of three persons 1785; at the ordination of Henry Ware 1783; of Bezaleel Howard; of John Andrews, 1789; and a Dudleian lecture, 1788.

HINCKLEY, John, D.D. a native of Warwickshire, educated at St. Alban's hall, Oxford. He was vicar of Coleshill, Berks, and rector of Drayton, Leicestershire, by the patronage of his friends the Purefoy family, and afterwards became rector of Northfield, Worcestershire. He died April 13th 1691. He published some assize sermons, preached at Reading and Abingdon—a Persuasive to Conformity, in a Letter to his Dissenting Brethren & Fasciculus Literarum, or Letters on several Occasions, 8vo. 1680.

HINCKLEY, Thomas, the last governor of Plymouth, colony was chosen to office in 1680, and continued therein except when interrupted by Andros, till the union of the old colony with Massachusetts in 1692. He died at Barnstable in 1705 aged 85. Among the manuscripts of the N. England or old south church library, which were deposited in 1817 in the historical library are 3 vols. folio of papers collected by gov. Hinckley.

HINCMAR or HINCMARUS, archbishop of Rheims, 685, was a zealous supporter of the Gallican church, but too severe against a monk called Godescalcus. He was driven from his bishopric by the incursions of the Normans, and died at Epernay 832. His works were published 1645, by Sirmond, in 2 vols. He wrote on theology and history with great spirit, though in barbarous language.

HIPPOCRATES, the most eminent of ancient physicians, who is considered as the father of medical science, was born, about 460 B. C. in the island of Cos; is said to have been the eighteenth lineal descendant of Æsculapius; and studied medicine under Herodiceus, and philosophy and eloquence under Gorgias. Little certain is known of his life, except that he spent much of it in travelling. He is believed to have died at Larissa, in Thessaly, at a very advanced age. Of his works several are extant.

HIRE, Philip de la, a celebrated French mathematician, born at Paris 18th March 1640. After his father's death, he resided four years in Italy for the benefit of his health, and soon after his return to Paris he was elected member of the academy of sciences 1673. He was employed with Picard and Cassini, under the liberal patronage of Colbert, to make observations for the improvement of the map of France; and for this important purpose he visited with the eye of a philosopher, Bretagne, Guienne, Calais, Dunkirk, and Provence in 1679, and the three following years. He was after Colbert's death engaged in taking levels for the grand aqueducts projected by the munificence of Lewis XIV. but besides these public employments, and the labors which devolved upon him as professor of the royal college, and of the academy of architecture, he devoted himself to other scientific pursuits. While the day was employed in study, the night was frequently passed on astronomical observations, and painting occasionally amused a vacant hour. This great and good man died April 21st 1718, aged 78. Fontenelle wrote an eulogium upon him. His works are numerous, the most valuable of which are Nouvelle Methode en Geometrie, 4to.—De la Cycloide, 12mo.—Nouveaux Elements des Sections Coniques,—La Gnomonique, 12mo.—Sectiones Conice, in IX. libros, folio, a most valuable work—Tabule Astronomicæ, 4to.—Veterum Mathematicorum Opera, Gr. and Lat. folio, 1693. Besides several pieces in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

HITCHCOCK, Gad, D.D. minister of Pembroke Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college in 1743, and after a ministry of fifty-five years died Aug. 8, 1803, aged 85. He published a sermon to a military company 1757; at the ordination of E. Hitchcock, 1771; at the election 1774; anniversary at Plymouth 1774; Duddlein lecture 1779.

HITCHCOCK, Enos, D. D., minister of Providence, Rhode Island, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1767. He was ordained in 1771 a colleague of the aged Mr. Chipman pastor of the second church in Beverly. At the commencement of the war his zeal for his country's rights induced him to become a chaplain in the American army. Believing that his duty to the public, and to his family, required that his connexion with the church in Beverly should be dissolved, he was dismissed in 1780. In intervals of leisure, from duty in the camp, he preached at Providence, and was installed Oct. 1st 1783. He died 1803, aged 58. Distinguished by active habitual benevolence through life, at his death he bequeathed 2500 dollars for the establishment of a fund for the support of the ministry in his society. He paid great attention to the education of youth, and while he wrote upon the subject, he projected and promoted the establishment of free schools. He published a book of catechetical instructions and forms of devotion for children and youth; memoirs of the Blooms Grove family, a work on education 2 vols. 12mo. 1790, a sermon at the dedication of his meeting house, 1795; an essay on the Lord's supper; at the ordination of Jonathan Gould, 1793; of E. Fiske, 1799; on the death of Washington; of Mrs. S. Bowen 1800.

HOADLY, Benjamin, a learned prelate, born Nov. 14th 1676, at Westerham in Kent. In 1706 he began his literary career by an attack on Atterbury's sermon at Mr. Bennet's funeral, and two years after he attacked another sermon of the same author, on the Power of Charity to cover Sin.

His "Measures of Obedience," on the doctrine of non resistance, so pleased the Commons in 1709, that they petitioned the queen to reward his services in the cause of civil and religious liberty, by some honorary preferment. He was however neglected, though made rector of Streatham, Surrey, by Mrs. Howland, till the reign of George I. when he was in 1715 raised to the see of Bangor. At this time his sermon on the words "my kingdom is not of this world," produced a violent dispute for many years, known by the name of the Bangorian controversy, which, though at first it attacked the temporal power only of the clergy, soon extended to the rights of princes. In this controversy he had for opponents, Dr. Snape, and the still more formidable William Law, who in some points triumphed in the general opinion over him. He afterwards opposed Hare on the nature of prayer, and asserted that a calm, dispassionate, and rational address was the most acceptable to heaven, while his opponent recommended a warm, enthusiastic zeal. From Bangor he was translated to Hereford, and afterwards to Salisbury, and lastly to Winchester, where he continued 26 years. He died 17th April 1761, aged 85. As a writer he possessed great abilities; he was a keen disputant, but his style was inelegant, and his periods, as Pope observes, "were of a mile." In his religious opinions he was a great latitudinarian, so that it has been wondered on what principles he continued through life to profess conformity, as on several occasions he seemed far from strictly adhering to the tenets of the Anglican church, and regarded reason more as the guide of the Christian than the pure precepts of the gospel. His writings, which are numerous, are enumerated in the Biographia Britannica, on the authority of his son. They have appeared in 4 vols. folio. Akenside, among other poets, has paid a handsome tribute to his memory.

HOADLY, Benjamin, M.D. eldest son of the bishop of Winchester, was born 10th Feb. 1705-6, in Broad-street, and educated at Newcome's school, Hackney. He entered at Benet college, Cambridge, 1722, under Herring, afterwards primate. He studied mathematics under the blind professor Saunderson, and then took his degree in medicine. He was made registrar of Hereford by his father, and appointed physician to the king's household in 1742, and to the prince of Wales 1746. He died 10th Aug. 1757. He distinguished himself as the author of three letters on the organs of Respiration, read at the college of physicians 1740—Oratio Anniversaria, 1742—Observations on Electrical Experiments, 1756, 4to. and the Suspicious Husband, a comedy of great merit and popularity.

HOADLY, John, L.L.D. youngest son of bishop Hoadly, was born in Broad street, 8th Oct. 1711, and educated at Hackney school, where he acted with great applause Phocyas in the Siege of Damascus. He entered in 1730 at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and soon after at the temple but he abandoned the profession of the law, and in 1735, was appointed chancellor of Winchester by his father, and admitted into orders. He was then made chaplain to the prince of Wales' household, and held the same office with the princess dowager 1751. Preferments crowded afterwards thick upon him, the most valuable of which were a prebend of Winchester, the rectory of St. Mary, near Southampton 1743, that of Overton 1746, and the mastership of St. Cross in 1760. He died 16th May 1776, and with him the name of Hoadly became extinct. He wrote five dramas, the Contract, a comedy—Love's Revenge and Phoebe, two pastorals—Jephtha, and the farce of Truth, two oratorios,—besides some other dramatic works, left in MSS. among which was a tragedy on lord Cronwell. He also wrote some poems, preserved in Dodsley's collection, and at all times showed himself so fond of a theatrical life, that he seldom had any friends in his house, whom he did not solicit to undertake a character in some interlude at his own private theatre. He published also his father's works in 3 vols. folio.

HOADLY, John, D.D. a prelate of Ireland, was a younger brother of the bishop of Winchester, and born near London, 1678. He was chaplain to Bishop Burnet, and received some valuable preferences in the church from him, and from the lord chancellor, King. In 1727 he was made bishop of Leighlin and Fernes in Ireland, in 1730 he became archbishop of Dublin, and in 1742, archbishop of Armagh, primate and metropolitan. He died in 1746. He published some sermons and controversial tracts.

HOBBES, Thomas, an eminent philosopher, born 5th April 1588, at Malmesbury, Wilts. He entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, in 1603, and five years after he went to reside in the family of the earl of Devonshire as tutor to his son, with whom he made the tour of Europe. By the friendship and kindness of this illustrious family, he was introduced to persons of rank and literary fame; he was noticed by the great lord Bacon, by lord Herbert of Cheshire; and Ben Jonson with fond partiality, revised his translation of Thucydides, which he published to warn his countrymen against the dangers of civil dissensions. In 1626, he lost his patron the earl of Devonshire, and two years after his pupil, and so severely did he feel the affliction, that to disperse his grief, he travelled with sir G. Clifton's son over the continent. His abilities and his character were so well known, that lady Devonshire insisted on his superintending the education of the young earl, and in the confidence of this illustrious family, he visited again the continent with his pupil, and at Paris was introduced to the society of Mersenne, and other learned men, and at Pisa he had frequent intercourse with the celebrated Galileo. On his return to England, he published his book called de Cive, and he afterwards made his political and moral opinions public in his Leviathan, but the tumults of civil war were too violent for him, so that he retired to Paris to live in the society of the learned. In his controversy with Cavendish about the quadrature of the circle, Hobbes showed such abilities that he was recommended to instruct the prince of Wales, afterwards the second Charles, in mathematical knowledge, and so zealous and so important were his services considered, that at the restoration the monarch treated his preceptor with marked respect. The public opinion, however, soon after represented Hobbes as a dangerous man; and when the House of Commons censured his treatise de Cive, and his Leviathan, as intended to subvert religion and civil government, Charles reluctantly withdrew his patronage from him. He died in 1680, aged 92 years. In his character Hobbes exhibited the profound reasoner, the erudite philosopher, and the refined writer. His abilities were of a superior order, and therefore it is to be lamented that such powers of mind should be directed to unworthy purposes. The principles of Hobbes were confuted by many able and learned opponents, especially by Harrington, Tenison, Filmer, Parker, Henry Moore, Cumberland, Cudworth, and others. His other works were, a treatise on Human Nature—de Corpore Politico, or the Elements of Law—de Mirabilibus Pecci, or the Wonders of the Peak, a poem—Homer translated into English verse—Letter on Liberty and Necessity—Elements of Philosophy—six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematics and Marks of absurd Geometry.

HOAR, Leonard, M.D., president of Harvard college, was graduated at that seminary in 1650, and in 1653, went to England and took the degree of doctor of medicine at the university of Cambridge. He was afterwards settled as a minister of Winstead in Sussex, from which parish he was ejected for his non-conformity in 1662. He returned to this country in 1672, and preached a short time as an assistant to Thomas Thacher, at the south church in Boston. In July 1672, he was chosen president, and was inducted into office in September. He resigned in 1675, and died the same year aged 45. A valuable letter of Dr. Hoar to Josiah Flint giving him direction in his studies, is published in the collections of the Mass. Historical Society.

HOBART, Noah, minister of Fairfield Connecticut, graduated at Harvard college 1724, and was ordained 1733. A number of persons in Fairfield county adopting the episcopalian worship, separated themselves from the congregational churches, and at the same time some of the episcopal missionaries represented the ministers of the country, as not the true ministers of christ. In consequence of this Mr. Hobart was induced to write upon the subject of presbyterian ordination, and to vindicate its validity in a sermon, which he preached at the close of the year 1746. In answer to him Mr. Wetmore wrote his vindication of the professors of the church of England. A controversy now commenced, in which Mr. Hobart had for his opponents Dr. Johnson, Mr. Wetmore, Mr. Beach, and Mr. Caner. He contended that the inhabitants of the American plantations were not obliged by any laws of God or man to conform to the prelatic church, as established in the south part of Great Britain; that it was not prudent to embrace the episcopal communion; and that it was not lawful for members of the New England churches to separate from them, and produce a schism. He also animadverted upon the conduct of the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts, and upon the misrepresentations of its missionaries. This controversy lasted a number of years. He died 1773, aged 67. He published a sermon at the ordination of Noah Welles, 1747; a serious address to the members of the episcopal separation in New England, 1748; election sermon 1750, a second address to the members of the episcopal separation in New England 1751; a vindication of the piece entitled, the principles of congregational churches, applied to the case of the late ordination at Wallingford, occasioned by remarks made thereon by Mr. Hart, 1761.

HOBART, John Sloss, judge of the district court of New York, died 1805, aged 66. During the American revolutionary war he was placed in some of the most important, and confidential stations in New York. He was appointed one of the three judges of the supreme court after the revolution. In 1789, he was chosen a senator of the United States.

HOBART, John Henry, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in New York, was born at Philadelphia, Sept. 14, 1775, and graduated at Princeton college in 1793. In 1796, he became a tutor in that institution, where he remained two years. In 1798, he was admitted to the order of Deacon; and in 1800, he became an Assistant Minister of Trinity Church in the city of New York. Within a short time of entering upon the duties of this office he was ordained Priest by Bishop Provost, the Diocesan in New York at that period. Such was the reputation acquired by him, both as a preacher and an author, that he received, when only thirty-two years of age, the degree of doctor of divinity from Union College. In 1811, he became Assistant Bishop of the Diocese of New York; and, on the death of Dr. Moore, the year following, became the Diocesan of that state. He had now an ample range for the exertion of those pre-eminent talents with which he was endowed. A scene of action more enlarged, and a sway of public sentiment more powerful, have seldom fallen to the lot of any one in the sacred profession. This distinguished prelate was called from his earthly labors, in the midst of his usefulness, Sept. 12th 1830. But short, as was the period of his episcopate, he admitted more than one hundred persons to the first order; and more than ninety to the second order of the ministry. He also consecrated seventy churches; confirmed not less than twelve thousand persons; and assisted in the consecration of nine Bishops. Among his publications were—The Companion for the Altar—The Companion for the Festivals and Fasts—The Companion for the Book of Common Prayer—The Clergyman's Companion—A Collection of Essays on the subject of Episcopacy—An Apology for Apostolic Order and its Advocates—an improved Edition of Mant and D' Oyl's Commentary on the Bible—two volumes of Sermons—and single Sermons, Addresses, Catechisms, and Tracts too numerous to be named.

HOICHE, Lazarus, a native of Versailles, son of a hostler, made, upon the early death of his father, a chorister in the church of St. Germain-en-laye, by the kindness of the rector. He was afterwards a helper in the royal stables, and at the age of 16 he enlisted in the army, and became a corporal. The revolution came to raise him from obscurity; he was by courage and coolness distinguished in several engagements, and soon rose to the highest rank in the army. Though imprisoned for some time under the tyranny of Robespierre, he was restored to liberty, and passed a glorious campaign against the Austrians in Alsace, and afterwards went to La Vendée, and to Quiberon, where he behaved with great cruelty towards the emigrants, and put to death the heroic Charette. He was intrusted with the command of the troops which were to invade Ireland at the end of 1795, but the expedition failed after attempting to land in Bantry bay, and Hoiche, though for a while regarded with coolness, was sent to the armies of the Sombre and Meuse. In this new scene he displayed great bravery and address against the Austrians on the Rhine, but died suddenly at Wetzlar in 1797, aged 30, in consequence of a cold caught in the midst of his military exertions. His life has been published by Rousselin, 2 vols. 8vo.

HODGES, Nathaniel, an English physician, son of the dean of Hereford. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered as student at Christ church 1643. In 1659, he settled in London, where he remained during the prevalence of the plague, and thus acquired an extensive practice and a great reputation. Misfortunes however succeeded prosperity, and he was thrown for debt into Ludgate prison, where he died 1634. He wrote Vindiciæ Medicinæ & Medicorum, 1660,—Loimologia, or a Latin account of the plague of London 1665, printed 1672, and translated into English by Dr. John Quincy, 1720. This account is considered as very valuable from the diligence and accuracy of the author.

HODY, Humphrey, an English divine, born 1st

January 1659. At the age of twenty-one he published his Dissertation against Aristeas' History of the seventy-two Interpreters, which was received with general applause by the learned world, though Vossius alone who had embraced a different opinion, loaded it with abuse, and ridiculed the author, contemptuously calling him Juvenis Oxoniensis. To this attack from Vossius, inserted in an appendix to his Pomponius Mela, Hody did not deign to give an answer till more than 20 years after. In 1704, therefore, he published his book, "de Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus," in which he refuted the objections of Vossius, and proves that the Ptolemies, though in their reign, but by the Hellenist Jews, for the use of their countrymen. In 1689, he published his Prolegomena to Malela's Chronicle, and the next year he was made chaplain to bishop Stillingfleet. In consequence of the deprivation of the bishop for refusing allegiance to king William, he was engaged in a controversy with his friend Dodwell. The spirit and abilities which he displayed in this war of pamphlets, so pleased Tillotson that he made him his domestic chaplain 1694. He was equally patronised by the next primate Tenison, at whose request he wrote Animadversions on Collier's Pamphlets, who had with two others pronounced absolution in a solemn manner, on Perkins and Friend when executed for the assassination plot. In 1693, he was made regius professor of Greek at Oxford, and 1704, was nominated archdeacon of Oxford. He died 20th January 1706. He left a M.S. account of the learned Greeks who had fled into Italy by the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, which appeared in 1742, under the care of Dr. S. Jebb. He had published in 1701, a History of English Councils and Convocations, and of the English clergy's sitting in Parliament.

HOESCHELIUS, David, a learned German, born at Augsburg, 1556. After teaching long in the college there, he was appointed principal of the society, and also librarian. He was a judicious and indefatigable collector of Mss. and he evinced his learning by his publication of some of the fathers, of Origen, Basil, and Philo Judeus,—besides Appian, Procopius, and Anna Commena. He died at Augsburg 1617, universally lamented. As a proof of his attention and discipline at the head of his college, it is mentioned that he furnished to the bar 1000 of his pupils, and 2000 to the church.

HOFER, Andrew, a Tyrolian, celebrated for his patriotism, was born, in 1765, at Passeyer, in the Tyrol, and was a rich innkeeper and corn merchant in that town. In 1809, he was placed at their head by the Tyrolese, who had thrown off the yoke of Bavaria, and he justified their choice. After making a glorious struggle, however, and obtaining many splendid victories, the Tyrolese were subjugated, and Hofer was tried and shot, at Mantua, in February, 1810.

HOFFMAN, Maurice, a physician, born at Furstenwalde Brandenburg 20th Sept. 1621. His fondness for literature, and his indefatigable application surmounted all the opposition which his parents made against his studious pursuits, and in 1637 he was permitted by his father to improve himself in the college of Cologne. The death of his father now left him his own master, and he came to Aلدorf the next year, where his mother's brother was professor of physic, and after profiting by his advice and instruction he went to Padua, where by the dissection of a turkey-cock he discovered the pancreatic duct, from which his friend Ver-sungus ascertained the same vessel in the human body. Hoffinan after three years' residence at Padua, returned to Altdorf, where he began to practise as physician. In 1648 he was made professor of anatomy and surgery, the next year of physic, and 1653 of botany, and director of the physic garden. His abilities and reputation were such, that many of the German princes appointed him their physician. He died 1693, aged 76. He wrote Altdorfii Deliciæ Hortenses, 4to.—Appendix ad Catalogum Plantarum Hortens. 4to.—Deliciæ Sylvestres, 4to.—Florilegium Altdorsinum, 4to.

HOFFMAN, John Mauricc, son of the preceding by his first wife, was born 1653 at Altdorf. After studying at Hertzpruck, Altdorf, and Frankfort on the Oder, he went to Padua for two years, and then making the tour of Italy he returned home. In 1677 he was made professor extraordinary in physic, and increased so much in reputation that the margrave of Anspach in 1695 appointed him his physician. He travelled with his illustrious patron into Italy, and after his death in 1703 he held the same honorable rank with his successor at whose strong invitations he removed to Anspach 1713, and died 1727. He had succeeded his father as botanic professor and director of the physic garden at Altdorf 1698. He published some valuable botanical works, and de Differentiis Alimentorum, 4to. 1677.

HOFFMAN, Frederic, an eminent physician, born at Hall near Magdeburgh 1760, where he became professor of physic 1793, and where he continued till his death 1742. He visited Holland and England, where he became acquainted with the learned men of the times, especially Paul Herman, and Robert Boyle. He took no fees, but was supported by an annual stipend. His works in six large folios, Geneva, 1748-54, contain much valuable matter, with some frivolous, and puerile conjectures.

HOFFMAN, Daniel, a Lutheran divine, professor at Helmstadt, at the end of the 16th century. He engaged in the popular and theological controversies of the times, and opposed Beza on the subject of the Eucharist. He was censured by an assembly of divines 1593, and threatened with excommunication if he did not subscribe to the opinions of his persecutors, against whom he published a labored apology.

HOFFMAN, John James, a laborious compiler, born at Basle. Few particulars are known of this indefatigable man. He published at Geneva 1677, in 2 vols. folio, his great work, "Lexicon Universale, Historico-geographico-poetico-philosophico-politico-philologicum," to which he was induced by success to add a supplement. The Leyden booksellers in 1698, having been favored with all the improvements and corrections of the author, published the work in 4 vols. folio, with a new preface by the author. He died, Greek professor at Basle 1706, aged 71.

HOGARTH, William, one of the most original of painters, was born, in 1697, in London, and from his childhood was fond of drawing. He served his apprenticeship to a silver plate engraver, and, when out of his time, began to work as a copper-plate engraver for the booksellers. He soon aspired to become a painter, and one of his first efforts in the art appears to have been a series of pictures, from which he engraved plates for Hudibras. It was to portraits, however, that, at the outset, he looked for the means of subsistence, and he was not unsuccessful. In 1730, he married, without her father's consent, the daughter of Sir James Thornhill; and it was not till 1733, when Hogarth produced The Harlot's Progress, that Sir James was reconciled to the match. The artist at once became popular, and he sustained his popularity by a fertile succession of admirable pictures in the same spirit, and engravings from them, which are so well known as to render it unnecessary to enumerate them. He also tried his powers in what is considered as a nobler branch of art, but he was not fortunate. His Paul before Felix, Danae, The Fool of Bethesda, and Sigismunda weeping over the Heart of Guiscardo, are failures. In 1753, with some assistance from Dr. Hoadly, he produced his ingenious work The Analysis of Beauty; and, in 1757, he became serjeant painter to the king. His last days were embittered by a virulent contest with Wilkes and Churchill, in which their pens proved an overmatch even for the pencil of Hogarth. He died in 1764. Great as an artist, Hogarth was respectable as a private man; he was liberal, generous and hospitable; and had education, and an earlier acquaintance with the polite world worn away some of the asperities of his character he might have been regarded as an amiable man. A very entertaining account of the life and labors of Hogarth has appeared by the pen of John Ireland, called "Hogarth illustrated," 1792, and "Graphic Illustrations," an additional work has been published by Samuel Ireland.

HOHENLOHE, Prince de, general of artillery in the imperial army, distinguished himself against the Turks in Transylvania in 1788, and against the French in the battles of Famars and Mermal in 1792. He was intrusted with the command of the army on the Rhine, and died whilst in that office, Aug. 1796.

HOLBACH, Paul Thierry, baron de, a German writer, was born, in 1723, at Heidesheim, in the Palatinate, and was educated at Paris, where he spent the greatest part of his life. He was a man of great and varied talents, generous, and kind hearted. With mineralogy he was particularly conversant. It was at his suppers that the philosophers of that period met, for the purpose, as some have asserted, of concerting measures to undermine religion, and subvert all established government. He died in 1789. His works, original and translated, but chiefly the latter, are numerous, and were all published anonymously.

HOLBEIN, John, better known by the German name of Hans, a celebrated painter born at Basle, Switzerland, 1498, or three years earlier according to Charles Patin. He painted our Saviour's passion in the town house at Basle, and in the fish-market, a dance of peasants, and death's dance. These pieces gained him much celebrity, and also the friendship of the great Erasmus. He was invited by an English nobleman who saw him at Basle to visit England, and at last in his eagerness after fame, and in his wish to avoid the ill humor of a termagant wife, and by the advice of Erasmus, he began to travel towards England, and almost begged his way on his journey. He was received with great friendship by the lord chancellor, sir Thomas More, in whose house he resided nearly three years while employing his pencil in drawing the portrait of his patron and of his friends. When asked the name of the nobleman who had accidentally promised him protection in England, he said he had forgotten it, but added that he remembered his features, and immediately drew a likeness so correct, and so accurate that the noble stranger became known to the chancellor and his friends. Some time after sir Thomas exhibited the productions of Holbein accidentally to Henry VIII. who was so pleased with them that he took the illustrious painter under his immediate patronage, and sent him to draw the picture of the duchess dowager of Milan, whom he designed for his fourth wife, after the death of Jane Seymour. He was afterwards employed to draw the portrait of Anne of Cleves, which proved too flattering to engage the fastidious affections of Henry. Holbein after giving the world a great number of valuable portraits of the personages of the court, and of various noblemen, unfortunately died of the plague at his lodgings in Whitehall 1554. This excellent artist, says Du Fresnoy, "was wonderfully knowing and had certainly been of the first form of painters, had he travelled into Italy, since nothing can be laid to his charge but only that he had a Gothic gusto." He performed indeed better than Raphael, and with some of his portraits, none of Titian's could come into competition.

HOLBERG, Ludwig, or Louis, baron de, a Danish writer, was born, in 1685, of parents in humble life, at Bergen, in Norway; had to struggle with great difficulties in acquiring learning; travelled in England, Holland, France, and Italy; and, after his return to his native country, raised himself to fame, fortune, and rank, by his literary talents. Holberg was, in fact, the founder of the drama, and, in a great measure, of literature itself, in Denmark. He died in 1754. Among his works are, comedies; Peter Pors, an epiconic poem; Poems; The Subterraneous Travels of Nicholas Klimm; A History of Denmark, an Universal History; and Parallel Lives of Illustrious Men; and of Illustrious Women.

HOLCROFT, Thomas, a miscellaneous writer, was born in Orange-court, Leicesterfields, Dec. 22, 1744. His father was a shoemaker in low circumstances, and the son, early in life, was employed in the stables of the honorable Mr. Vernon. He also worked at his father's business, but left it, and tried his fortune on the stage without success. He then turned dramatic writer, in which he had better luck; and some of his plays were very popular at the time. Besides these productions, he wrote several novels, and translated a number of books from the French and German languages. At the commencement of the revolution he espoused the cause of the republicans, and was committed for high treason; but when Hardy, Tooke, and Thelwall were acquitted, he was discharged without trial. His last speculation was a publication of his travels in Germany and France, in two vols. 4to. He died in 1809.

HOLDEN, Henry, an English divine, of great erudition, and strict integrity. He was a Roman catholic, and settled at Paris, where he died 1662. His works are, Analysis Fidei, reprinted by Barbou 1766—Marginal Notes on the New Testament, 2 vols. 12mo. 1660.—A Letter concerning White's Treatise de Medio Animarum Statu, 4to. 1661.

HOLDEN, Samuel, a benefactor of the province of Massachusetts, died in London 1740. A sermon on his death was preached in Boston by Dr. Colman before the general court. Mr. Holden was at the head of the dissenters in England, and at the head of the bank of England. Such was his benevolence and regard to religion, that he sent to Dr. Colman thirty nine sets of Baxter's practical works in four massy folios, to be distributed among our churches. The amount of his charities for promoting the gospel and other useful purposes was 4,847*l*. After his death his widow and daughters gave in the same liberal and benevolent spirit 5,585*l*. Holden chapel for the college at Cambridge was built by their donation.

HOLDER, William, D.D. an English divine born in Nottinghamshire, and educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. In 1642 he was made rector of Blechingdon, Oxfordshire, and was afterwards canon of Ely and St. Paul's, fellow of the royal society, subdean of the royal chapel, and subalmoner to the king. He died at Amen Corner, London, 24th Jan. 1696-7. He was well skilled in music, and wrote a treatise on the principles of harmony, and also a discourse concerning time, with application to the natural day, lunar month and solar year. He gained some credit by teaching Popham, a man of some distinction, who was deaf and dumb, to speak, but as the pupil forgot what he had been taught, and again recovered it by the instruction of Dr. Wallis of Oxford, a controversy on the subject between these two learned men arose, and was conducted in some pamphlets with more acrimony than moderation.

HOLDSWORTH, Edward, an elegant scholar, educated at Winchester school, and admitted of Magdalen college, Oxford 1705. After being some time tutor, he refused, when elected fellow in 1715, to take the oath of allegiance to the Hanoverian succession, and returning from Oxford, spent the rest of his days in travelling with pupils of distinction. He died of a fever at lord Digby's at Coleshill, Warwickshire, 30th Dec. 1747. He was author of that elegant poem "Muscipula," translated by Dr. J. Hoadly in Dodsley's Miscellanies, and wrote also a dissertation on the Pharsalia and Philippi mentioned in the Georgics, besides remarks on Virgil, published by Mr. Spence 1768. He understood Virgil, says Mr. Spence, "better than any man I ever knew."

HOLE, Richard, a native of Exeter, educated there and at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1792 he succeeded to the living of Farringdon, Devonshire, on the presentation of the bishop of Exeter, besides which he afterwards obtained Inwardleigh vicarage. He published Ossian in a poetical dress,—Ode to Imagination,—Homer's hymn to Ceres, translated 1781.—Arthur an Epic Romance, with notes,—Remarks on the Arabian Nights entertainments, 1797, 12mo.—besides odes in the Devonshire collection of poems, and Essays in the Exeter society publications, &c. He died 1803.

HOLINGSHEAD, Raphael, an English chronicler descended from a family which lived at Boseley, Cheshire. Few particulars are known respecting him, but he appears before the public as author of "Chronicles" first published 1577, 2 vols. folio, and in 1587 in three. The second edition contained some passages offensive to Elizabeth, and therefore they were cancelled in the second and third vol. though afterwards printed separately. In these chronicles, which gave an interesting account of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland, Holingshead had for coadjutors, Hooker, Harrison, Stanihurst, Boteville, and others, who at that time were respectable writers, and like himself well versed in antiquarian history. The work was afterwards continued by Stow, Thin, Fleming, and others, from 1577 to 1586. The time of his death is uncertain, but from his will, prefixed by Hearne to Camden's Annals, he died between 1578 and 1582.

HOLLAND, Philemon, a native of Chelmsford, educated at Cambridge under Dr. Whitgift. He was elected master of Coventry free school, but besides the duties of this station, he practised physic, and with some degree of success and celebrity. He was a good scholar, and increased his reputation by his translations of Livy, of Xenophon's Cyropædia, of Pliny's Natural History, and of Camden's Britannia. He died at Coventry 1636, aged 85.

HOLLAR, or HOLLARD, Wentzel or Wentzelus an eminent engraver, born at Prague, Bohe-

nia, 1607. He was intended for the law, but the ruin of his family by the sacking of Prague in 1619, rendered his subsistence precarious, and he left home in 1627, determined to support himself by his own exertions. In several towns of Germany, he devoted himself attentively to drawing and design, and in taking geometrical and perspective views of fortresses and buildings, so that he acquired early eminence, and at the age of 18 was known as an able artist. He chiefly employed his powers in copying heads and portraits from the best painters, and in delineating with great beauty and accuracy small and delicate views of some of the cities on the banks of the Rhine. His reputation, acknowledged by his countrymen, became known to lord Arundel, the English ambassador at the court of Ferdinand II. who in 1636 noticed him by every mark of kindness, and took him in his retinue. Hollar accompanied his noble patron to England, and soon engaged in the service of the print-sellers. His first work in England was a view of Greenwich, published 1637. His abilities were afterwards engaged in taking different views, and in 1640, he was introduced to the royal family, to instruct the prince of Wales in the art of designing. That same year appeared his "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus," representing the dress of English women of various ranks, a work greatly esteemed among connoisseurs. The breaking out of the civil wars proved unfortunate to his labors, and after his patron lord Arundel had returned to the continent, he grew obnoxious to the parliament as the friend of the royal family, and chiefly for employing his graver to preserve the portraits of so many of the loyalists. He was taken prisoner at the surrender of Basing-house 1645, but afterwards escaped and went over to Antwerp, where lord Arundel had fixed his residence. In 1652 he was persuaded to return to England, where with fresh assiduity he devoted himself to labor, and with such perseverance that he never would be interrupted till his hour glass was exhausted. It is said that he suffered greatly in his property by the fire and the plague of London 1665. This illustrious artist, whose labors were so numerous and so varied, was never free from the persecutions of creditors, so that after exerting himself to give celebrity to others, he found that independence could never be in his power, either for want of economy, or more probably the illiberality of his employers. He had, it is said, in his 70th year an execution in his house in Gardener's lane, Westminster, and begged only the liberty of dying on his bed, without being conveyed to any prison but the grave. He died 28th March 1677.

HOLLEY, Horace, LL.D. president of Transylvania university, Kentucky, graduated at Yale college 1803. Having finished his collegiate course he began the study of the law, which he soon after abandoned for that of divinity. In 1805 he was ordained to the pastoral charge of Greenfield Hill, Fairfield, Connecticut, where he continued three years when his connexion was amicably dissolved. In 1809 he was installed over the society in Hollis street Boston, where he continued ten years. In 1819 he accepted an invitation to become president of Transylvania university in Kentucky. Here he remained until 1827, when he resigned his office. A plan had been formed of erecting a seminary in Louisiana, and placing it under his direction; but he was taken sick while at New Orleans in the summer of 1827, and having embarked for New York died on the passage, aged 46. He published a discourse on the death of col. James Morrison, 1823. His memoirs were written by his widow.

HOLLIS, Denzil, lord, one of the five members whom Charles I. went to the house of commons personally to accuse, and to arrest. This weakness on the part of the king, greatly increased his popularity, but he was not successful in his opposition to the independents, and to the ambitious views of Cromwell. Though he favored the cause of the Presbyterians, he was deemed worthy to be noticed by the second Charles, and to be raised to the peerage. He died 1680, aged 83.

HOLLIS, Thomas, an English gentleman, born in London 14th April 1720. At the age of 14 he was sent to Amsterdam, to acquire the French and Dutch languages, and after 15 months' residence, he returned to England, and after his father's death in 1735, he was placed by his guardian under the tuition of professor Ward. In 1740 he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and became a law student, but he never made the law his profession. In 1748 he travelled with his friend Mr. Brand, through Holland, the Netherlands, part of France, of Switzerland and Italy, and again in 1750 he made another tour and visited the chief places in the north of Germany, with the rest of Italy, Sicily, Malta and France, of which travels the journal is said to be extant in MS. He attempted at his return to get into parliament, but his views were disappointed, and he went to reside on his estate of Corcombe, Dorsetshire. He was in his principles a dissenter, and a warm advocate for the liberty of the subject, so that he not only made a collection of books and medals to illustrate and uphold his favorite system, but he presented anonymously, as an Englishman, two large and choice collections of books to the public library of Bern, as a lover of liberty, of his country, and of its excellent constitution as established at the revolution. His liberality was extended to other countries, to Genoa, Venice, Sweden, Leyden, and Russia, as well as to his own countrymen. He died suddenly of an apoplexy on new year's day 1774. He is described by his contemporaries as a man of large fortune, above half of which he devoted to charitable purposes. His property he left to his friend Brand, who consequently took the name of Hollis, and was as zealous a friend of liberty, as his departed benefactor. Mr. Hollis, to spread more widely his principles, published at his own expense, new editions of Toland's life of Milton, of Algernon Sydney's discourses on government, and meditated an edition of Andrew Marvell's works.

HOLLIS, Thomas, a most liberal benefactor of Harvard college, was a native of England, and died in London 1731, aged 72. He was for many years an eminent merchant, and while success attended his exertions, he was inclined to charitable and benevolent deeds in proportion to his wealth. He founded two professorships in Harvard college, that of divinity, and mathematics. He also presented a valuable apparatus for mathematical and philosophical experiments, and at different times augmented the library with valuable books. In 1727 the net produce of his donation, exclusive of gifts not vendible, amounted to 4,900*l.* the interest of which he directed to be appropriated to the support of the two professors, to the treasurer of the college, and to ten poor students in divinity. Being a Calvinist in his sentiments, he required his professor of divinity to be "of sound or orthodox principles." Still he was not governed by a sectarian spirit; he did not require the preference of his own baptist denomination; but the professorship was open to every one, who, in his view, embraced the important and fundamental doctrines of the gospel. His nephew Thomas Hollis, who died in London in 1774, had a most ardent attachment to liberty, and endeavored to promote it by the publication, and distribution of books, which vindicate the rights of man. His benefactions to the library of Harvard college amounted to about 1400*l*.

HOLMES, Robert, D.D., a native of Hampshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He devoted himself early to biblical criticism, and in the beginning of the French revolution went to Paris, to examine the manuscripts and versions of the scriptures preserved in the public libraries of France. His services to sacred literature were honorably rewarded, and he became successively canon of Salisbury, of Christ-church, and then dean of Winchester, which last preferment he enjoyed not two years. He died at Oxford 12th Nov. 1805, aged 56. He published the Bampton Lectures in 1782.—Divinity Tracts, 8vo. 1788—Alfred, an ode, with six sonnets, 1778—An Ode for the Duke of Portland's Installation, 1793—a Latin Letter to the Bishop of Durham respecting his Collation of the Septuagint, fol.—The prophecy of Daniel according to Theodotian, and the LXX, 4to.—besides single sermons on the resurrection, and another preached before the house of commons. Of his Collation of the Septuagint MSS. 5 vols. in folio, have appeared, and reflect highly on his industry, great perseverance, and solid judgment.

HOLSTENIUS, or HOLSTEIN, Lucas, a German divine born at Hamburg, 1596, and converted from protestantism to the catholic religion by the jesuit Sirmond. He studied at home and Paris, and went afterwards to Rome, where he was patronised by cardinal Barberini, and Urban VIII. and his two successors. He was made a canon of St. Peter's, and librarian of the Vatican, and in 1665, went as ambassador from the pope to Christina queen of Sweden, whose profession of catholic faith he received at Inspruck. He died at Rome 1661, aged 65. Though very learned he published only a dissertation on the life and writings of Porphyry, besides some notes on the Argonautica of Apollonius—on the Fragments of Demophilus, &c.

HOLT, sir John, lord chief justice of the king's bench, was born at Thame, Oxfordshire 1642. In 1658, he entered at Gray's Inn, and when called to the bar, he distinguished himself as an able counsellor. In the reign of James II. he was elected recorder of London, from which, 18 months after, he was removed for opposing the abolition of the test act. In 1686, he was made serjeant at law, and at the revolution he was elected to the convention parliament, and soon after his services in the cause of loyalty were rewarded with the first seat in the court of king's bench, and a place in the privy council. In 1700, he declined succeeding lord Somers as chancellor, and remained in the king's bench, where he presided with firmness, patience, and dignity, and maintained the honor of this situation even in opposition to the two houses of parliament. Impartial and unbiassed as a judge, he watched with jealous care over the privileges of the people, and deserved by his uprightness and integrity, the high character of Verus, applied to him in the 14th number of the Tatler. While in office he was solicited to support with his officers, a party of the military, which were sent to disperse a riot, occasioned in Holborn by the frequent and violent practice of decoying young men for the plantations. Suppose, said the judge to the messenger, that the populace should not disperse at your appearance, what are you to do then? Sir, replied the officer, we have orders to fire on them.

Have you, sir, said the judge, then take notice of this, if there be one man killed, and you are tried before me, I will take care, you, and every soldier of your party shall be hanged. Sir, added he, go back to those who sent you, and tell them that no officer of mine shall attend soldiers, and let them know at the same time, that the laws of this kingdom are not to be executed by the sword, these matters belong to the civil power, and you have nothing to do with them. The chief justice immediately, with his tipstaves and a few constables repaired to the spot, and after addressing the populace, and promising the punishment of those who had excited the public indignation, he dispersed the mob quietly. This great, and upright judge, died March 1709.

HOLTON, Samuel, president of congress, was born in Danvers Massachusetts, June 9th 1738, and settled in that town as a physician. In the revolution he zealously espoused the cause of his country. In 1778, he was elected a member of congress, and continued in that body five years. He was again elected in 1793; and in 1796, was appointed judge of probate for the county of Essex, which office he resigned in 1815, after having been in public stations forty-seven years. He died 1816, aged 77.

HOLYDA, Barten, D.D., an English divine, born at Oxford 1593. He was educated at Christ-church, where he was student, and in 1615, he took orders. In 1618, he went as chaplain with sir Francis Stewart to Spain, and on his return was made chaplain to the king, and archdeacon of Oxford. At the restoration he came to settle at Ilsley, Berks, and was restored to his former preferments. He died at Ilsley 2d Oct. 1661. It is said his temporizing manners prevented his elevation to a bishopric. He published twenty sermons, besides some poems, and "The Survey of the World," a poem in 10 books, 1661, and also a Translation of Juvenal and Persius, not very poetical, says Dryden, but very faithful, and accompanied with valuable notes.

HOLYOAKE, Francis, a learned scholar, born at Nether Whitacre, Warwickshire, about 1567. He studied at Oxford, and in 1604, became rector of Southam, Warwickshire. He suffered greatly during the civil wars, for his attachment to the royal cause, and died 1653, and was buried at Warwick. He published an etymological dictionary of Latin words, first printed 1606, 4to. and edited the fourth time 1633.

HOLYOAKE, Thomas, D.D., son of the preceding, was born at Southam 1616, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. For some time he practised physic, and then took orders, and had some valuable livings. He died 1675, leaving a dictionary English and Latin, and Latin and English, published 1677, and borrowed from his father's labors.

HOLYOKE, Edward, president of Harvard college, was graduated in that seminary in 1705, and after being a tutor a few years, was ordained the minister of a new society in Marblehead 1716. He continued in this place until 1737, when he was elected president, and was inducted into office Sept. 27th. He died 1769, aged 79.—He published an election sermon; at the ordination of J. Diman 1737; at a convention of ministers, 1741; answer to Mr. Whitfield, 1744.

HOLYOKE, Edward Augustus, M.D. L.L.D., a physician of Salem, Massachusetts, was born in Marblehead Aug. 13, 1728, graduated at Harvard college in 1746, and died at Salem March 31, 1829, aged 100 years. He was born just one hundred years after the settlement of Salem. He had been a practising physician in Salem seventy-nine years; for two years he had no case excepting a whitlow; for many years he had almost all the practice of the town; on some days he made one hundred visits, and at one period, as he said, there was not a dwelling house in Salem, which he had not visited professionally. He enjoyed during his long life almost uninterrupted health. On his centennial anniversary, Aug. 13, 1823, about fifty medical gentlemen of Boston and Salem gave him a public dinner, when he appeared among them with a firm step and cheerful look. He smoked his pipe with them at the table, and gave an appropriate toast relating to the medical society and its members. A memoir of his life and character has been published.

HOMBERG, William, an eminent chemist, born at Batavia in Java, 3d Jan. 1652, where his father was arsenal governor. Returning with his father to Europe, he entered into the army, and afterwards studied at the universities of Jena and Leipsic, but the sciences had greater attraction for him than the law, for which he was intended. Botany, chemistry, and medicine, were his favorite pursuits, and he was encouraged in his designs by the friendship of Otto de Guericke. To improve himself he travelled to Italy, Hungary, Bohemia, Sweden and France, and under the patronage of Colbert, determined to settle at Paris, where he renounced the protestant for the catholic religion in 1692. The death of Colbert, altered his resolution, and he retired to Rome, where he began to practise physic. In 1690, he again returned to Paris, and had the good fortune to be appointed chemist, and then physician to the duke of Orleans the regent. He died Sept. 1715, at Paris. The writings of Homberg are chiefly preserved in the memoirs of the academy. He is known for his successful experiments, and for his discoveries in chemistry, especially that of the Bologna stone, and its phosphoric appearances after calcination. He was a frequent correspondent on scientific subjects with Boyle, and other learned men.

HOME, David, a Scotch divine, educated in France. He was employed by James I. to reconcile the differences between Tilenus and Du Moulin, on the subject of Justification, and thus to introduce an amity of sentiments on religion throughout Europe. The time of his death is not recorded. He wrote Apologia Basilica, seu Machiavelli Ingenium examinatum, 4to.—L'Assassinat du Roi, ou Maximes du Vieil de la Montagne pratiquees par le defunt Henri le Grand 1617—and some pieces in the Deticie poetarum Scotorum.

HOME, Henry, lord Kaimes, a learned Scotch judge, known also as an elegant writer. After being long eminent as a lawyer, he was in 1752, raised to a seat among the lords of session, and while he faithfully discharged his duty to the public, he devoted usefully his time to literature. He died 26th Dec. 1782, after having been several years senior lord of session. His writings are, essays on several subjects, concerning British Antiquities, &c. 1746—Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion 1751, 8vo.—Historical Law, 1759—The Principles of Equity, folio, 1760—Elements of Criticism, 3 vols. 8vo. 1762, a valuable book often re-edited—The Gentleman Farmer, 1777—Loose Hints upon Education, 1781—The History of Man, or Sketches, 4 vols. 8vo. 1782.

HOME, John, a Scotch writer, was born in Roxburghshire, in 1724. He was educated at Edinburgh for the church; but, in the rebellion of 1745, he entered into the royal army, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Falkirk. He contrived, however, to make his escape, and in 1750, was ordained as minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian. His tragedy of "Douglas" was performed at Edinburgh in 1756, which gave such offence to the presbytery, that the author, to avoid ecclesiastical censure, resigned his living. In 1763, he was appointed a commissioner for sick and wounded seamen, and the exchange of prisoners. He was also named a conservator of the Scotch privileges at Campvere, in Zealand. In 1778, he obtained a captain's commission in the duke of Buccleugh's fencibles. He died Sept. 4, 1808. Besides the play of Douglas he wrote four others, which are sunk in oblivion; as also is the last work which he published, "The History of the Rebellion," 4to.

HOMER. Respecting the life of this greatest of poets we must be content to remain in ignorance, no memorials of it having been preserved; for the biography of him, which is ascribed to Herodotus, is undoubtedly fabulous. Some, rather too sceptically, have been disposed to deny even his existence. The time in which he flourished has been variously stated, but is generally supposed to have been between 880 and 950 B. C. Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, and Athens, contended for the honor of his birth: the probability is, that he was an Asiatic Greek.

HONDIUS, Jesse, a native of Wackerne in Flanders, who died 1611, aged 48. He was eminent as an engraver on copper and ivory, in which he was self-taught, and as a letter founder. In 1607 he published Descriptio Geographica Orbis Terrarum, folio, besides, Theatrum Artis Scribendi—Gerhardi Mercatoris Atlas—& Italiae Hodiernae Descriptio. He constructed two globes in London, remarkable for beauty and size, and settled in Amsterdam.

HONESTIS, Petrus de, or Petrus Damiani, an Italian, born at Ravenna 1006. His great piety recommended him to pope Stephen, by whom he was made bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1059 he was employed by pope Nicolas II. to reduce the church of Milan to the observations of celibacy, which he effected with difficulty. In 1061, he abdicated his bishopric and retired to a cell, but the next year the pope called him away, and sent him as his ambassador to France. In 1072 he reconciled the see of Ravenna to the pope, and died the same year, aged 66. His works are numerous, chiefly consisting of epistles addressed to the clergy little esteemed now.

HONORIAS, second son of the great Theodosius, was emperor of the west, while his brother Arcadius sat on the throne of Constantinople. He disregarded the ravages of Alaric the Goth in the indolence of his palace at Ravenna, where he died 423, aged 39.

HONTHEIM, John Nicholas de, author of Historia Trevisensis Diplomatica & Pragmatica, 5 vols. folio—De presentis Statu Ecclesiae, 5 vols. 4to. a work which excited some controversy, was suffragan to the archbishop of Treves, and died 1790, aged 90.

HOOD, Samuel, viscount, son of the vicar of Thorncombe, in Devonshire, was born at that place in 1724, and went into the naval service at the age of sixteen. By his bravery in the capture of a fifty gun ship, in 1759, he acquired the rank of post captain. In 1780 he was made rear-admiral, and foiled the French in their attempt upon St. Kitts, and, in 1782, he bore a conspicuous part in the victory of the twelfth of April, over de Grasse. An Irish peerage was the reward of his exertions. He sat in parliament for Westminster, but vacated his seat, in 1788, on becoming a lord of the admiralty. In 1793 he was sent to the Mediterranean, as commander-in-chief, and remained there till 1796, during which period he took possession of Toulon, and reduced Corsica. On his return home, he received the title of viscount, and the governorship of Greenwich Hospital. He died January 27, 1816.

HOOF'T, Petrus Cornelius Van, a poet and historian, born at Amsterdam 1581. He was made knight of St. Michael by Louis XIII. and died after a short illness, as he was going to attend the funeral of Fred. Henry prince of Orange 1647. He wrote epigrams, comedies, and other poems—A History of the Low Countries from Charles V.'s Abdication, to 1593, 2 vols. folio—A Latin History of Henry IV. of France—A Dutch translation of Tacitus, highly esteemed, as the author read the original 52 times, to understand more perfectly his meaning.

HOOGEVEEN, Henry, a Dutch philologer, born at Leyden, Jan. 1712. Though his parents were poor, yet his education was liberal, and at the age of 15, he began to teach others to support himself, and his parents. In 1732 he was elected under-master of the school of Gorcum, and nine months after went to settle at Woerden, where he married. In 1738, he removed to the school of Culemburg, where he took a second wife. In 1745, he was invited to Breda, but for a while the fears of invasion, and of a French army, disturbed his residence, though at last he lived there 16 years, and in 1761 he removed to Dort, and three years after to Delft, where he died Nov. 1, 1794. His works were, an edition of Vigerus de Idiotis suis Linguae Græcæ—An inaugural speech at Culemburg—An elegiac poem and other poetical pieces— and Doctrina Particularum Linguae Græcæ, 2 vols. 4to. 1769, a work of great learning, and universally applauded, besides a posthumous work, Dictionarium Analogicum Græcum, printed at Cambridge, with an account of his life, by his son, his successor at the school of Delft.

HOOKE, Robert, an eminent mathematician, son of the minister of Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, was born at that place, in 1635, and was educated at Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxford. Almost in his childhood he displayed an extraordinary talent for mechanics and for drawing. He was, successively, assistant to Boyle, curator of experiments for the Royal Society, professor of mechanics to that body, and Gresham professor of geometry. In 1666, he offered to the mayor and aldermen a plan for rebuilding the city. It was not adopted, but it caused him to obtain a lucrative appointment of one of the city surveyors. He died in 1702. He is the author of Micrographia; A Theory of the Variation of the Compass; A Description of Helioscopes; and many other works; and his scientific and mechanical inventions and discoveries were numerous and valuable. Hooke was engaged in frequent disputes with his fellow philosophers; and made a fruitless attempt to snatch from Newton the honor of having been the first to make known the force and action of gravity.

HOOKE, Nathanael, an English historian, of whom few particulars are known. As he was a mystic and quietest, and strongly attached to the tenets of Fenelon, he was the friend of the catholics, and it is said that he introduced one of his priests to Pope's bed-side to receive the confession of the dying poet, a circumstance which highly offended Bolingbroke. Hooke is particularly known as the historian of Rome, in 4 vols. 4to. from the foundation of the city to the end of the republic.

The first volume appeared in 1733, the second 1745, the third 1764, and the fourth 1771. He wrote besides Observations on the Roman Senate, and a translation of Ramsay's Travels of Cyrus. He died 1764.

HOOKE, William, minister of New Haven, after he came to this country was a preacher at Taunton; was settled at New Haven in 1644 the colleague of Davenport; returned to England in 1656, and was Cromwell's chaplain, and died March 21, 1677, aged 76. He published among other works, New England's tears for old England's fears; a fast sermon at Taunton, July 23, 1640. His description in this sermon of the horrors of a civil war, and of the battle field is very striking. "Here ride some dead men, swagging in their deep saddles; there fall others alive upon their dead horses; death sends a message to those from the mouth of the muskets.—In yonder file is a man that hath his arm struck off from his shoulder, another by him hath lost a leg; here stands a soldier with half a face, there fights another upon his stumps. A day of battle is a day of harvest for the devil."

HOOKE, Richard, was a celebrated divine, born at Heavitree, near Exeter, 1553. His great abilities were early observed by the school-master under whom he studied at Exeter, and by the kindness of his uncle he was introduced to bishop Jewell, who with uncommon liberality sent him as clerk to Corpus Christi, Oxford, and settled a pension upon him. The death of his patron for a while obscured his prospects, but he found a friend in Dr. Cole, the president of his college, and in Sandys, bishop of London; and in 1577, his merits recommended him to a fellowship in his college. He took orders in 1581, and soon after formed an imprudent marriage with a woman who without personal accomplishments and without fortune, rendered his life, by her peevish manners, painful and uncomfortable. In 1584, he obtained the living of Drayton Beauchamp, Bucks, where the following year two of his pupils, Sandys, the son of his patron, and Cranmer, the nephew of the great Cranmer, visited him with marks of sincere respect, and heartfelt commiseration. Sandys reported to his father the indigent circumstances of his learned tutor, and the bishop, in return for the attention paid to his son, procured for this neglected man the mastership of the Temple, 1585. In this new situation Hooker had to struggle with Travers, the afternoon lecturer, who through disappointment so far forgot his duty, as to attack his coadjutor in the pulpit, and it was pleasantly observed by some of the congregation, that the forenoon sermon spake Canterbury, and the afternoon, Geneva, alluding to the principles to which the two rivals were attached. After defending himself with vigor and dignity against his opponent, Hooker obtained permission from Whitgift to exchange his preferment, and in 1591, he removed to the rectory of Boscomb, Wiltshire, to which was added the prebend of Nether-haven in Sarum church. In 1595, he was presented by the queen to Bishop's Bourne rectory in Kent, and here he passed the rest of his life, and completed his great work, Ecclesiastical Polity, which he had begun at Boscomb. He died 2d Nov. 1600, in his 47th year. The fame of Hooker rests upon that incomparable work the Ecclesiastical Polity, in eight books, a work admired not only in England, but on the continent of Europe and in America. It is said that the pope, Clement VIII. who declared that he knew no English writer who deserved the name of author, no sooner heard the contents of this immortal work, than he exclaimed, there is no learning that this man hath not searched into. His books will get reverence by age, for there is in them such seeds of eternity, that they will continue till the last fire shall devour all learning. Besides his answer to Travers' Supplication, Hooker published some sermons.

HOOKER, Thomas, the first minister of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and one of the founders of the colony of Connecticut, was a native of England, and educated at Emanuel college Cambridge. After preaching for some time in London he was chosen lecturer and assistant to Mr. Mitchell at Chelmsford in 1626. He was remarkably successful in his labors; but in about four years was silenced for his non-conformity. In 1630, he was obliged to flee to Holland, and there he preached sometimes at Delft, and sometimes at Rotterdam, being an assistant to the celebrated Dr. Ames. In 1633, he came to New England in company with Mr. Cotton and Mr. Stone, and was settled with the latter at Newton, or Cambridge, October 11, being ordained by the imposition of the hands of the brethren of the church. In June 1636, he removed with a hundred others to a fertile spot on the banks of the Connecticut river, which they called Hartford, having travelled through the wilderness with no other guide than a compass. In this new colony he had great influence in establishing the order of the churches. He died 1647, aged 61. His most celebrated work entitled, a survey of the sum of church discipline, was published in England in 4to, 1648. Mr. John Higginson transcribed from his manuscripts about two hundred sermons, and sent them to England; and near one half of them were published.

HOOLE, Charles, a native of Wakefield, Yorkshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford. He was elected master of Rotheram school, but during the civil wars he came to London, and acquired some celebrity as a public teacher. His services to literature and to education, were acknowledged by the gratitude of bishop Saunderson, who gave him the rectory of Stock in Essex, and a prebend in Lincoln cathedral. Besides a translation of Terence's plays, he published a good edition of the Greek Testament, and wrote also various useful school books. He died 1666.

HOOLE, John, a native of London, son of a watch maker, whose mechanical genius was much admired in the construction of the machinery of the scenes in Covent-garden. The son received a good education under Mr. Bennet, known to the public by his edition of Ascham's works; but when admitted clerk at the India house, at the age of 18, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and to the study of modern languages, especially Italian. Besides three tragedies, Cyrus, acted at Covent-garden 1768, Timanthes, acted 1769, and Cleonice, acted 1775, he published spirited and much admired translations, in English metre, of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, and Tasso's Jerusalem. He wrote besides some original poems, and published the life of Mr. Scott of Amwell. This ingenious poet died 1803, aged 76.

HOOPER, George, D.D., an English prelate, born at Grimley, Worcestershire, about 1640, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he went to Christ church as student, 1656. Highly distinguished as a scholar, he in 1672, was made chaplain to Morley, bishop of Winchester, and soon after to Sheldon, the primate, who gave him the rectory of Lambeth, and the precentorship of Exeter. In 1677, he was made almoner to the princess of Orange, whom he attended in Holland. He refused in 1630, the divinity professorship at Oxford, and in 1691, was made dean of Canterbury. In 1701, he was offered the primacy of Ireland by lord Rochester, the viceroy; and soon after Anne's accession, he was nominated bishop of St. Asaph, and half a-year after, removed to Bath and Wells, where he continued to preside for 24 years. He died 1727. Besides three sermons, he published various tracts on theological and other subjects,—a Latin tract on Divorce,—an Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures, the Attic, Roman, and especially the Jewish, with an Appendix concerning our old English Money and Measures of Content, 1721. A beautiful edition of his works appeared at Oxford in 1757, folio.

HOOPER, or HOPER, John, an English bishop and martyr, born in Somersetshire, and educated at Oxford. He was for some time of the fraternity of the Cistercian monks, but disliking their principles he returned to Oxford, and became a convert to the tenets of Luther. Upon the enacting of the statute of the six articles, he fled for safety, and after various escapes in France, in England, and in Ireland, he settled in Switzerland, and married, and then devoted himself to the study of Hebrew. On the death of Henry VIII. he returned to London, where he became a popular preacher, and distinguished himself as the accuser of Bonner. By the interest of his friend lord Warwick, he was nominated bishop of Gloucester 1550, and he was consecrated, though he refused to wear the canonical habits as approaching too near to popish forms, and two years after he obtained besides the see of Worcester in commendam. This worthy prelate, under the bloody reign of Mary, was marked for destruction. Neither his popularity as a preacher, his hospitality and benevolence as a prelate, nor his exemplary manners as a man, could save him from the flames. He was condemned to be burned, and he suffered the execution of the sentence at Gloucester, with becoming fortitude 1555, in his 60th year. His writings, and especially his letters preserved in Fox's monuments of the church, are excellent specimens of his learning, and of his mental abilities.

HOOPER, William, a patriot of the American revolution, graduated at Harvard college 1760. He studied law with James Otis in Boston, and settled in Wilmington North Carolina. In 1774, he was elected a member of congress, and drew up in 1775, the address to the inhabitants of Jamaica. In 1776, he signed the declaration of independence. His embarrassed private affairs induced him to resign his place in 1777. He died 1790, aged 48.

HOORNBECK, John, a Dutch divine, born at Haerlem 1617. After studying in his native city, and at Leyden and Utrecht, he entered into the ministry at Cologne 1652, and eleven years after returned to Holland. In 1644, he was raised to the chair of divinity professor at Utrecht, and appointed minister in ordinary in the church there, and after filling those two important offices with great ability and universal approbation, he was invited to similar employments at Leyden, 1654. He died 1666, aged 49. His works are various, on polemical, practical, historical, and other subjects; and throughout life he displayed, says Bayle, the complete model of a good pastor, and divinity professor. He married 1650, at Utrecht, and left two sons.

HOPKINS, Ezekiel, a learned prelate, born at Sandford, Devonshire, where his father was curate. He was chorister of Magdalen college, Oxford, and at the age of sixteen was made usher of the college school, and some time after its chaplain. He became a popular preacher among the presbyterians and independents, and therefore the bishop of London refused to admit him to one of the city churches, in consequence of which he went to settle at Exeter. Here he was seen and admired by lord Robartes, afterwards earl of Truro, who gave him his daughter Araminta in marriage, and when lord-tenant of Ireland, presented him to the deanery of Raphoe. The earl besides so strongly recommended him to lord Berkeley, the next viceroy, that he was in 1671, made bishop of Raphoe, and in 1681, translated to Londonderry. He left his diocese in 1688, when persecuted by lord Tyrconnel, and came to England, where he was elected minister of Aldermanbury, 1689, where he died 19th June 1690. He was an able and interesting writer. He published five sermons, besides an Exposition of the ten Commandments, and an Exposition of the Lord's prayer.

HOPKINS, Charles, son of the preceding, was born at Exeter, and educated at Dublin, and afterwards at Cambridge. During the Irish rebellion of 1688, he was a zealous partisan in favor of William, and at the end of the troubles he returned to England, and became the associate of men of wit and fashion. In 1694, he published some epistolary poems and translations, and in 1695, produced "Pyrrhus," a tragedy, with an epilogue by Congreve. He was also the friend of Dryden, and by his "Art of Love," gained the acquaintance of the earl of Dorset; but his intemperance and debauchery soon proved fatal. He died 1699, in consequence of his excesses, aged 36. He wrote besides a translation of Ovid's History of Love, 2 tragedies, Boadicea, and the Female Warrior.

HOPKINS, Edward, governor of Connecticut, and a benefactor of Harvard college, was an eminent merchant in London, and arrived at Boston with Mr. Davenport in the summer of 1637. He soon removed to Connecticut, where he was chosen a magistrate in 1639, and governor every other year from 1640, to 1654. He afterwards went to England where he was chosen warden of the English fleet, commissioner of the admiralty and navy, and a member of parliament. He died in London 1657, aged 57. He bequeathed most of his estate in New England estimated at about 1000*l.* to trustees in Connecticut for the support of grammar schools in New Haven and Hartford; and 500*l.* out of his estate in England for promoting the kingdom of the Lord Jesus, which donation was considered as made to Harvard college, and the grammar school in Cambridge, and by virtue of a decree in chancery was paid in 1710. With this money real estate was purchased in a township, named Hopkinton, in honor of the donor, and the legislature of the state has made such additions to the fund, that six bachelors may now reside at Harvard college, and seven boys at the grammar school.

HOPKINS, Samuel, D.D., an eminent theologian, from whom the christians called Hopkinsians derive their name, graduated at Yale college 1741. He was ordained the minister of Housatonnuc, now Great Barrington in 1743. He was dismissed from this place by an ecclesiastical council in 1769. He settled in the ministry at Newport Rhode Island 1770. There were some circumstances, attending his establishment in this place, which were remarkable. After he had been with this people some time, a meeting was called, and it was voted not to give him an invitation to settle among them. Many were dissatisfied with his sentiments. He accordingly made his preparations to leave them, and on the sabbath preached a farewell discourse. This sermon was so impressive and interesting, that a different vote was immediately, and almost unanimously passed, and he consented to remain. The war of the American revolution interrupted his labors in this society. During the summer of 1777, he preached at Newburyport to Mr. Parsons' congregation, who were left destitute by his death a short time before. He preached also in Canterbury and Stamford. In the spring of 1780, he returned to Newport, which had been evacuated by the British in the fall of the preceding year. He found his church and congregation much diminished. The meeting house had been made a barrack for soldiers. That portion of his former society, which had remained in the town, had become so impoverished, that he had no prospect of a maintenance. He however preached to them a year, supported entirely by a few generous friends, and when he received a pressing invitation to settle at Middleborough, the request of his people induced him to decline it. From this time till his death his maintenance was derived entirely from a weekly contribution, and the donations of his friends. In 1799, a paralytic affection deprived him of the use of his limbs, although his mental powers were uninjured. He afterwards recovered from this attack, so as to be able to preach. He died 1802, aged 82. He published three sermons entitled, sin through divine interposition an advantage to the universe, yet it is no excuse for sin or encouragement to it, 1759; an inquiry concerning the promises of the gospel, whether any of them are made to the exercises and doings of persons in an unregenerate state, containing remarks on two sermons by Dr. Mayhew, 1765; on the divinity of Christ, preached in Boston, 1768; the true state and character of the unregenerate, being an answer to Mr. Mills, 1769; animadversions on Mr. Hart's dialogue 1770, an inquiry into the nature of true holiness, with an answer to Dr. Hemmenway and Mather, 1773; of this a second edition was published in 1791; a dialogue, showing it to be the duty and interest of the American states to emancipate all their African slaves, 1776; an inquiry concerning the future state of those, who die in their sins, 1788; a system of doctrines contained in divine revelation, to which is added a treatise on the millennium, 2 vols. 8vo. 1793; it is on this system of divinity, that the reputation of the author principally rests; two sermons on Romans vii. 7. and John 1. 13, republished, 1793; the life of Susannah Anthony, 1796; the life of Mrs. Osborn, 1798; and a volume of sermons. He left behind him sketches of his life written by himself, a dialogue on the nature and extent of true Christian submission, and an address to professing Christians, all of which, were published by Dr. West of Stockbridge, 1805.

HOPKINS, Stephen, governor of Rhode Island, was a native of Massachusetts, and bred a farmer. In 1742, he removed to Providence and engaged in mercantile business. He was from 1751, to 1754, chief justice of the superior court. In 1755, he was elected governor and remained in office, excepting four years, till 1768. In 1774, he was a member of congress. His signature to the declaration of independence indicates a trembling hand, this was owing to a nervous affection. He retired from congress in 1779, and died 1785, aged 78. He published at the order of the assembly, Rights of the colonies examined, 1765; and an account of Providence in 2 Hist. col. ix. 166-203.

HOPKINS, Lemuel, a physician of Litchfield Connecticut, where he practised from 1776 to 1784, with celebrity, and the singularity of his appearance, manners and opinions, attracted general notice. In 1784, he removed to Hartford, where he had a high reputation, and extensive practice, till his death, in 1801, aged 50. As a physician he was remarkable for his unceasing attentions to his patients, sometimes devoting to one patient whole days and nights. Once on being called to a child sick with the scarlet fever in a family, to which he was a stranger, he entered the room without saying a word, and seeing the child loaded with bed clothes, in a heated room, he seized the child in his arms, and rushed out of the house, followed with cries and broomsticks, for his appearance was uncouth and ugly. But resting in a cool shade, he called for wine, and had the pleasure of seeing the child restored to health. He was a man of learning and a poet. He wrote for Barton, the beautiful version of psalm 137, beginning with the words, "Along the banks where Babel's current flows." Associated with Trumbull, Barton, Alsop, and others, he wrote parts of the Anarchiad, the Echo, Political Green House, the Guillotine, and other essays. Three of his productions were published in the American poems,—the Hypocrite's hope, the cancer quack, and a poem on Ethan Allen. The Anarchiad was a satirical, political poem in 24 numbers; and these writings appeared in the newspapers from 1786, to 1793.

HOPKINSON, Francis, district judge of the United States for Pennsylvania, was born in that state in 1738. After passing two years in England he settled at Bordenton New Jersey. He was a member of congress in 1776, in which year he signed the declaration of independence. He held an appointment in the loan office for several years, and afterwards was appointed judge of the admiralty for the state of Pennsylvania. In this station he continued till 1796, when he was appointed judge of the district court. He died 1791, aged 53. He contributed not a little towards promoting the independence of America, not however by labored discussions but by his inimitable humor and satire. He began in 1775, with a small tract, entitled a pretty story, in which in an allegorical manner he exposed the tyranny of Great Britain towards America, and he concluded his contributions to his country, in this way, with the history of the new roof, which ought to be read with interest, while the citizens of the United States are sheltered under their present form of national government. His battle of the kegs has been much admired for its wit. A few years before his death, in consequence of an act of the assembly for cutting down the trees of Philadelphia, in order to guard against fire, and the evils of stagnant air, he wrote a humorous speech of a standing member of the assembly against the act, and rescued the devoted trees from the impending destruction. His satires on newspaper scandal had the effect to restrain for a number of months the licentiousness of the press. His specimen of modern learning, in an examination of a salt box, is a piece of exquisite humor. Besides the above works, he published science, a poem, 1762. After his death his miscellaneous essays and occasional writings were published in three volumes 8vo. 1792.

HOPPNER, John, an English artist, of German descent, was born in 1759, and died in 1810. He excelled as a portrait painter, especially in females and children; but, though he confined himself to the more lucrative branch of his art, he had still considerable talents for landscape. Hoppner could wield the pen as well as the pencil. He published a volume of Oriental Tales, which are versified with spirit and elegance.

HOPTON, Arthur, an able mathematician, son of sir Arthur Hopton. He was born in Somersetshire, and educated as a gentleman commoner at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he took his first degree, and then removed to the Temple, London. Though he died at the early age of 26, 1614, he wrote some valuable treatises on the Geodetical Staff for Surveying, 4to.—the Topographical Glass, with the uses of that Instrument, the Theodolite, Plain Table, and Circumferenter, 4to.—a Concordance of Years according to the English Account, 8vo.—Prognostications from 1607, to 1641. He was the intimate friend of the great Scelden.

HORACE, or HORATIUS, Quintus Flaccus, one of the most eminent of the Roman poets, was born, 65 B. C., at Venusium; received a good education; fought under Brutus at Philippi, on which occasion he threw away his shield and fled; and was reduced to indigence by the confiscation of his estate. Mecenas, however, to whom he was introduced by Virgil, obtained for him the restoration of his property, and brought him into favour with Augustus. Horace died 8 years B. C.

HORNE, George, D.D., a venerable prelate, born November 1, 1730, at Otham near Maidstone, where his father was rector. On taking his bachelor's degree he removed to Magdalen college, where he was elected Kentish fellow. Here he devoted himself with unusual attention to Hebrew and sacred literature, and while he warmly embraced the principles of Hutchinson, and the philosophy of nature, as he regarded them deducible from the truths of scripture, he laid the foundation for controversy and metaphysical disputations. In 1758 he took orders, and soon distinguished himself as an able and eloquent preacher. In 1768 he was elected president of his college, and was made chaplain to the king, and in 1776 he was made vice-chancellor, and for four years supported that office with great dignity. In 1781 he was made dean of Canterbury by lord North, and in 1789 succeeded Bagot in the see of Norwich. His elevation, unhappily for the church and for posterity, was of short duration. His health had gradually been declining, and a paralytic stroke on his journey to Bath gave such a shock to his constitution that he never recovered, and died soon after, 17th January 1792, aged 62. Though censured by some writers for his philosophical sentiments as the friend of Hutchinson and the opponent of Newton, bishop Horne must rank very high as a sincere and exemplary christian, as a good scholar, an able divine, and a most benevolent and amiable man. His works, which are very valuable and display the man of information, judgment, and erudition, were the Theology and Philosophy of Cicero's Sonnum Scipionis, explained, 8vo.—a fair and impartial State of the Case between sir Isaac Newton and Mr. Hutchinson, 8vo.—Spicilegium Shuckfordianum, or a Nosegay for the critics, 12mo.—Christ and the Holy Ghost, Supporters of the Spiritual Life,—and two sermons before the university, an Apology for certain Gentlemen in Oxford, aspersed in a late pamphlet, 8vo.—a View of Mr. Kennicott's Method of Correcting the Hebrew Text, 8vo.—Considerations on the Projected Reformation of the Church of England, to lord North,—Considerations of the life and death of St. John the Baptist, 8vo. in sermons preached annually at Magdalen college, 8vo.—Commentary on the Book of Psalms, 4to. 2 vols.—Letter to Adam Smith, on the life, death and philosophy of David Hume, 12mo.—Discourses on several subjects and occasions, 2 vols. 8vo.—Letters on Infidelity, 12mo.—Letters to Dr. Priestley, 8vo.—Observations on the Case of Protestant dissenters, 8vo. and some volumes of sermons.

HORNECK, Anthony, D.D. a divine born at Baccharack, in the lower Palatinate 1641, and educated in divinity at Heidelberg, under Spanhelm. At the age of nineteen he went over to England, and entered at Queen's college 1663. He was made chaplain of his college and vicar of All Saints, Oxford, and 2 years after he went as tutor to the eldest son of the duke of Albemarle, by whom he was made rector of Doulton, in Devonshire, and prebendary of Exeter. After a visit of two years in Germany he was in 1671 made preacher of the Savoy, and afterwards he was very disinterestedly recommended by Russel, lord Orford, to the queen, and had the promise of a Westminster prebend which he obtained 1693. He became afterwards chaplain to William and Mary, and in 1694 obtained a prebend in the church of Wells. He died, January 1696, in his 56th year. Bishop Kidder who wrote his life describes him as a man of very extensive learning, well skilled in the learned languages, especially Hebrew, and in his duties of pastor unusually exemplary, so that he knew him sacrifice his hopes of preferment to the conscientious discharge of his duty. He published some sermons, and various other works, chiefly on theological subjects, much admired.

HORNEMANN, Frederick Conrad, a German traveller, was born, 1772, at Hildesheim, and was originally a clergyman in Hanover. In 1797 he was employed by the African association, in London, to explore the interior of Africa. After having visited the Oasis of the temple of Ammon, he penetrated to Morzouk, and thence proceeded to Tripoli. In 1800 he set out with the intention of penetrating into central Africa, and is supposed to have perished in that inhospitable region. The Journal of his Travels has been published.

HORNER, Francis, barrister-at-law, was born at Edinburgh in 1778, and educated first at the High-school, and next at the university of his native city, where he contracted an intimacy with lord Henry Petty, now marquis of Lansdown. After studying the law and becoming an advocate, Mr. Horner repaired to London, and in 1806 was returned to parliament, though he did not distinguish himself as a senator till 1810, when he became chairman of the "Bullion Committee," to which subject he paid uncommon attention, and illustrated it in a very luminous report. His application to business, however, proved too much for his constitution, and he was obliged to seek the climate of Italy, where he died at Pisa, Feb. 8, 1817. He was one of the first writers in the Edinburgh Review.

HORNIUS, George, historical professor at Leyden, where he died 1670, was born in the Palatinate. The loss of some property, it is said, in his old age, disordered his senses. He wrote Historia Ecclesiastica ad ann. 1666,—de Originibus Americae,—Geographia vetus & nova,—Orbis Politicus, Historia Philosophiæ, 4to.

HORREBOW, Peter, professor of astronomy, mathematics, and philosophy at Copenhagen, and particularly known as the first who discovered the aberration of the light of the fixed stars. He published Copernicus Triumphant, and died 1764, aged 85.

HORROX, Jeremiah, an English astronomer born about 1619. He settled at Hoole, near Liverpool, and had the good fortune of being the first person who observed a transit of Venus over the sun's disc 24th Nov. 1639. He was assisted in his astronomical observations and inquiries by his friend Crabtree of Broughton near Manchester, and he derived much information from the writings of Tycho Brahe, Kepler and others. This able and ingenious man was cut off by a sudden death, in the midst of his observations, 3d Jan. 1640–1, and the value of the few things which he wrote, proves the irreparable loss which science suffered in his death. His "Venus in Sole visa" was preserved in MS. and published by Hevellus at Dantzick, 1662. He had undertaken some other works which he left incomplete. His "Opera Posthuma" appeared under the care of Dr. Wallis, 1673, but several of his papers were destroyed while in the hands of private persons, at the great fire of London, and from others Shakerly formed his "British Tables."

HORSLEY, John, author of Britannia Romana, was a native of Northumberland. He was educated at Newcastle, and then passed to Scotland where he took the degree of M.A. and then settled at Morpeth, as teacher of a dissenting congregation. He died 12th Dec. 1731, a short time before the publication of the book on which his literary fame depends. His Britannia, divided into three books, is a most valuable composition, and gives a very accurate account of the different stations of the Roman legions and governments in the island, of the inscriptions and sculptures still preserved, and of the geographical divisions and names, with other particulars of the country. He was a fellow of the Royal society, and some of his letters to R. Gale are preserved in Hutchinson. His accuracy and learning are as much admired as the excellence of the plan of his great work.

HORSLEY, Samuel, LL.D. a learned prelate, born in St. Martin's in the fields, where his father was clerk in orders, and educated at Trinity hall, Cambridge. In 1778 he succeeded on the death of his father to the living of Thorley, Herts, in the gift of the bishop of London, to whom he was chaplain, and he held also the rectory of St. Mary, Newington, which he exchanged for that of South Weald, Essex, in 1782. He was for some years an active member of the Royal society and also their secretary, but after contributing much to their transactions, he retired in consequence of the dissensions which prevailed in that learned body, and in which he took a zealous part. When archdeacon of St. Alban's he directed his attention to the tenets of Dr. Priestley, and in his charge, and in some pamphlets he displayed so much ability, and refuted in so dextrous a manner and with such unanswerable arguments this bold champion of materialism and philosophical necessity, as to gain the respect and the admiration of every friend of true christianity. He was afterwards presented to Aldbury rectory in Surrey by lord Aylesford, and Thurlow the chancellor was so pleased with his zeal and conduct in his late controversy, that he gave him a prebend of Gloucester, and in 1798 procured his elevation to the see of St. David's. In 1793, he was translated to Rochester, with the deanery of Westminster, and in 1802 passed to the see of St. Asaph. He died after a few days' illness, 4th Oct. 1806. Besides single sermons preached on public occasions, and controversial tracts in defence of the church establishment, and of the true principles of christianity, the bishop published editions of the Inclinations of Apollonius—of sir Isaac Newton's works, 5 vols. 4to.—treatises on Virgil's two Seasons of Honey,—on the Properties of the Greek and Latin Languages, and critical Disquisition on the 13th Chapter of Isaiah. As a speaker in the senate the bishop was eloquent, clear and argumentative, and on all important national discussions, and especially when the hierarchical establishment of the country was mentioned, he generally delivered his sentiments, and was listened to with deference and admiration. As a preacher Dr. Horsley was impressive, and though he was in his manner rather enuclatatorial, yet his delivery was pleasing and his enunciation distinct. His mind it may be said grasped all the learning of the ancient and the modern world, his heart was warm and generous, his feelings noble and patriotic, and his head capable and willing to serve the cause of virtue, morality, and religion.

HORSMANDER, Daniel, chief justice of New York, a native of Great Britain, came to the province about 1730, and was recorder of the city and president of the council. He died in Sept. 1778, and was buried in Trinity churchyard. He published the New York conspiracy, or the history of the negro plot, 1742; republished 1810. Of the conspirators to burn the city, 14 were burnt, and 18 hanged, with 10 whites.

HORTE, John, an English divine. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters under Thomas Rowe, where he had Dr. Watts among his fellow students, but after officiating for some time at Marshfield in Gloucestershire, he conformed to the church and was regularly ordained. He preached a visitation sermon at Aylesbury, in 1708, and was made by the lord lieutenant of Ireland, to whom he was chaplain, bishop of Leighlin and Ferns. He was afterwards translated to Kilmore, and in 1742 to Tuam, where he died 1751. Besides a charge to the clergy of Tuam in 1742, he wrote a volume of sermons of great merit, 1738, Dublin, 8vo. and London 1757.

HORTENSIUS, Quintus, a Roman orator of great abilities and equal celebrity. He died very rich B. C. 49, and his daughter Hortensia it is said inherited all his oratorical powers.

HORTENSIUS, Lambert, a philologist, poet, and historian, who it is said assumed that name because his father was a gardener. He was born at Montfort, Utrecht, and studied at Louvain, and was for many years rector of the grammar school of Naarden, where he died 1577, aged 76. He wrote, besides satires, and other poems, seven books, De Bello Germanico, under Charles V.—de Tumultu Anabaplist.—Commentaries on the six first books of the Æneid—Notes on four Comedies of Aristophanes.

HOSIUS, Stanislaus, a cardinal born of poor parents at Craeow in Poland. By his abilities he gradually rose to distinction and became secretary to the king of Poland, bishop of Culm, of Warmia, and at last a cardinal. He was employed by Pius IV. to procure the continuance of the council of Trent, in which he presided with great eloquence and dignity. He died 1579, aged 76. He left by his will a library to Cracow. His works in 2 vols. folio, were popular, and in them he showed himself an able and zealous advocate of the see of Rome.

HOSPINIAN, Rodolphus, a Swiss writer, born at Aldorf near Zurich 1547. He studied at Zurich, and after visiting the universities of Marburg, and Heidelberg, he was admitted into the ministry 1568, and the next year married. In 1571 he was made provisor of the abbey school of Zurich, and in consequence of his services as a writer he was made in 1583, archdeacon of the Caroline church, and 1594 minister of the abbey church. After being blind in consequence of a cataract for about a year, he recovered his sight by couching 1613. For the last three years of his life he grew childish. He died 1626, aged 79. His abilities were so universally acknowledged that he was considered as the only scholar capable of refuting Baronius' Annals. He undertook a very celebrated and important work, "an History of the Errors of Popery" which he published at various times in different portions, and with universal applause. These and other works were re-published together at Geneva 1681 in seven thin vols. folio.

HOSPITAL, Michael de P', chancellor of France, son of a physician, was born at Aigueperse, Auvergne 1505. After studying at the most celebrated universities of France and Italy, he was raised to distinction for his abilities, and successively became auditor of the Rota at Rome, counsellor of the parliament at Paris, ambassador to the council of Trent, and superintendent of the French provinces. In this last and difficult office he labored earnestly to restore the ruined finances of his country, but while he raised again the national affairs to prosperity he paid no regard to his own domestic concerns, so that after continuing six years at the head of a department where he might have appropriated millions to his use, he was found incapable of portioning out his daughter, and was therefore indebted on that occasion to the king's liberality. On the death of Henry II. he was introduced into the council of state, and in the midst of turbulence and faction he was raised to the high office of chancellor of the kingdom, to which his firmness, his integrity, and his virtues intitled him. He proved himself a determined friend in the cause of toleration, and in consequence of the mildness of his conduct he was suspected of favoring the cause of the protestants, so that the seals were taken from him, by the influence of Catharine de Medicis, and on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew he was marked for the general slaughter. A party of horse advanced against him, but while with unconcern he would not even shut his castle gates, or fly for safety, an order was sent, at the moment, from the king to spare his life. This great man and most upright magistrate died 1573, aged 68.

HOSPITAL, William Francis Antony, Marquis de P', an eminent French mathematician, born 1661. He was for some time in the army, but he left the military profession in consequence of his being very short sighted, and then applied himself with redoubled ardor to his favorite mathematical pursuits. At the age of 32 he gave a public solution of some difficult problems, proposed to mathematicians in the city of Leipsic. In 1693 he was made honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and distinguished himself by his work on Newton's Calculations, called "L'Analyse des Infiniment Petits." He wrote also Les Sections Coniques—les Lieux Geometriques—la Construction des Equations—& une Theorie des Courbes Mechaniques. This amiable man died of a fever 2d Feb. 1704, aged 49.

HOSTE, Paul P', a French jesuit, professor of mathematics at Toulon, where he died 1700, aged 48. He was author of Traité des Evolutions Navales, folio, 1727.—Traité des Mathematiques les plus necessaires a un Officier, 3 vols. 12mo. translated into English by W. Webster.—Another mathematician of that name was author of treatises on the Artificial Sphere,—Practical Geometry,—Description and Use of Geometrical Instruments, &c. and died 1634.

HOTMAN, Francis, a French civilian, born at Paris 1524. He studied the civil law at Orleans, and at the age of 18 he became a doctor in that faculty, but the chicanery of the law disgusted him, and he applied himself to polite literature, and began to read lectures in the public school at Paris. By embracing the precepts of Luther, he disoblged his father and retired to Geneva, and afterwards was made professor of belles lettres at Bern. He afterwards was invited to Strasburg to fill the chair of civil law, and so high was his reputation that he received very liberal offers from Prussia, Hesse, Saxony, and the queen of England to settle in their dominions. He next was professor at Bourges, by the invitation of Margaret of France, but after escaping with difficulty from the massacre of 1572, he left France, determined never to return, and went to Geneva and Basil, where he read lectures on civil law. He died at Basil of the dropsy 1590. During the six years of illness which preceded his death he revised his works which were edited, 3 vols. folio, 1599. His writings were chiefly on civil law, on the government of France, on Roman Antiquities, besides a treatise de Consolatione. He has been admired for his piety and firmness, though some have accused him of avarice.

HOTTINGER, John Henry, D.D., a learned Orientalist, born at Zurich, 1620. He displayed such abilities in his younger years that his education was considered as a general concern, and therefore he was sent at the public expense to visit foreign countries, for the improvement of his mind. He studied at Geneva under Spanheim, at Groningen under Gomarus and Alting, and at Leyden under Golius, and after visiting England he returned to Zurich, where he was honorably appointed in 1643 to the chair of divinity and of the oriental languages. By the permission of the magistrates of Zurich, he answered the invitation of the elector Palatine, to assist him for three years in restoring to its ancient fame the university of Heidelberg. Thus honored with the friendship and confidence of the elector, he engaged in the important work, and afterwards accompanied his patron to Frankfurt, where he had a conference with Job Ludoff the celebrated Orientalist, and concerted with him measures for sending missionaries to explore the state of Ethiopia, and the progress of christianity in those remote countries. In 1661 he was recalled back to Zurich, and he obeyed the summons of his fellow citizens, honored with the title of ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector. The breaking out of a war in 1664 called his abilities into action, and he was sent as a negotiator to Holland; but while many universities solicited the honor of granting him a professor's chair, his countrymen refused to permit him to quit Switzerland. The entreaties of the Dutch at last however prevailed, but while Hottinger was preparing for this honorable appointment, he unfortunately was drowned in the river which passes through Zurich, 5th June 1667. It has been properly a matter of surprise that among his many avocations as public professor in various situations, and as the active correspondent of the learned of Europe, he could possibly find time to write so much. His works best known are Exercitationes Anti-moriniane de Pentateucho Samaritano, 1644, 4to. against Morin a cotemporary critic.—Thesaurus Philologicus, seu Clavis Scripturæ, 1649, 4to.—Historia Orientalis quæ ex variis Orientalium Monumentis collecta agit, 1651, 4to.—Promptuarium, sive Bibliotheca Orientalis, 1658, 4to.—Etymologicum Orientale sive Lexicon Harmonicum Heptaglotton, 1661, 4to the seven languages were Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, Ethiopic and Rabbinical, with which the author was most perfectly acquainted. Other works less important were published by Hottinger, mentioned in Bibliotheca Tigurina, and in Heidegger's life of him 1667.

HOUBIGOUT, Charles Francis, a papist of the congregation of the Oratory, was born at Paris 1686. As he was deaf he had recourse for consolation to study, and so great was his progress and his fame, that he was honored with the most flattering marks of approbation not only by his countrymen, but by pope Benedict XIV. This worthy man, who added to his extensive learning the most amiable character of private life, died 1783, aged 98. His works best known are an edition of the Hebrew Bible with a Latin version and notes, Paris 1753, 4 vols. folio, a most valuable work—a Latin Translation of the Psalter from the Hebrew 1746, 12mo. another of the Old Testament, 8 vols. 8vo. Racines Hebraïques, 8vo.—Examen du Psautier des Capuchins, 12mo.—Sherlock's Sermons translated, and Leslie's Work against the Deists and Jews translated.

HOUBRAKEN, Jacob, an eminent engraver, the son of Arnold Houbraken, a painter and engraver, was born, in 1698, at Dort, in Holland; and died, in 1790, at Amsterdam. He executed more than six hundred portraits; many of which were for Birch's Lives of Illustrious Men. He also engraved a few historical pieces.

HOUCARD, John Nicholas, a French general, born at Forbach. He raised him to the highest ranks of the army, and after serving under Custines with credit, he accused him of losing Mayence by his misconduct. The accusation was believed, Custines was disgraced, and Houchard placed at the head of the army, displayed his abilities in the victories of Dunkirk, of Hondscoot, of Furnes, and Menin. His services however did not protect him, as he was treated by Hoche as he had treated Custines, and being arrested at Lisle on a charge of treason he was hurried to Paris and guillotined 15th Nov. 1793.

HOUDON, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Versailles in 1746; studied at Rome, where he produced excellent statues of St. John and St. Bruno; became celebrated on his return to France, especially for his female figures; was chosen by the American government to execute the statue of Franklin, and died, in 1828, a member of the Institute, and a knight of the Legion of Honour.

HOUDRY, Vincent, a jesuit, born at Tours 22d Jan. 1631. He was eloquent as a preacher, and possessed some merit as a writer. He published la Bibliothéque des Predicateurs, 22 vols. 4to.—la Morale, 8 vols. &c. He died at Paris 29th March 1730, expressing sorrow in his last moments that he was not permitted to reach his 100th year.

HOUEL, John, a French painter and engraver, was born, at Rouen, in 1735; studied painting under Descamps and Casanova, and engraving under Le More; and died in 1813. He is the author as well as artist, of Picturesque Travels in Sicily, Malta, and Lipari, four folio volumes, with 264 plates; and also of a Natural History, with 18 plates, of the two elephants in the Paris Museum.

HOUGH, John, bishop of Worcester, is celebrated for his opposition when president of Magdalen college, Oxford, to the arbitrary proceedings of James II. He was born in Middlesex 1650, and after receiving his education at Birmingham, entered at Magdalen college, 1669, where he became fellow. At the breaking of the popish plot, he was improperly suspected, and his papers were examined, but he did not lose his popularity, and he attended his patron the duke of Ormond to Ireland, and at his return in 1685, he obtained a prebend at Worcester. In 1687 he was elected president of his college by the fellows, who thus rejected the arbitrary mandamus of James in favor of Anthony Farmer, but he was soon after expelled by the king's commissioners, and Parker bishop of Oxford placed in his room. During this struggle with the court and with a popish party, Hough behaved with great spirit but becoming moderation and dignity, and at the approach of William of Orange, the college was restored to its rights, and the president to his office. In 1690 William nominated this faithful champion of protestantism to the see of Oxford, and in 1699 he was translated to Lichfield. On Tenison's death he through modesty declined the primacy, but two years after, 1717, accepted the see of Worcester, where he continued upwards of 26 years. This worthy, and venerable prelate, died 8th March 1743, in his 93d year, and the 53d of his episcopate.

HOUSTON, William, an English physician. He was a surgeon in the West Indies, and took the degree of M. D. at Leyden under Boerhaave. He was assisted at Leyden by Van Swieten in making some curious experiments on brutes, which were published in the philosophical transactions, vol. 39. He was fellow of the royal society, and died 1733 in the West Indies. His MS. catalogue of plants was published by sir J. Banks. Another tract of his is inserted in the philosophical transactions, 37th vol.

HOUTEVILLE, Claude Francis, member of the congregation of the Oratory, was born at Paris, and died there 1742, aged 54. He was secretary to the French academy, and also to cardinal Dubois, who greatly esteemed his character and abilities. His chief work is, the Truth of the Christian Religion proved by Facts, 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 12mo.

HOVEDEN, Roger de, an English historian in the age of Henry II. born at York. Like the clergy of his times he united the professions of divine and lawyer, and was as it is supposed, engaged in the family of the king; but the time of neither his birth nor his death can be ascertained. He wrote annals which began 731 where Bede left off, and continued to the third year of king John. These annals were first published 1595, and reprinted at Frankfort, folio, 1601. He is deservedly praised by Leland, and by Saville his editor, for fidelity. According to Vossius he wrote an History of Northumbrian kings, and a Life of Becket.

HOVEY, Ivory, minister of Plymouth, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college in 1735. He was ordained minister of Metapoiset, the second parish of Rochester 1740. Having devoted much attention to the study of physic, he in 1744 commenced the practice, and was the principal physician of Metapoiset till his dismissal in 1768. He was afterwards installed 1770 at Monument ponds in Plymouth, where he passed the remainder of his life. He died 1803, aged 89. He had preached about 65 years, and during that time kept a journal designed to promote his improvement in Christian excellence, which he left behind him in about 7,000 pages of short hand. Extracts from it are preserved in the Piscataqua magazine. He published a sermon on leaving Metapoiset, and one on the subject of mortality.

HOW, William, a physician and botanist. He was born in London, and after being at Merchant taylor's school, he was elected to St. John's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He was captain of a troop of horse in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined, he came to London, where he practised physic, and died 1656, aged 37. He wrote Phytologia Britannica Natales exhibens Indigenarum stirpium sponte emergentium, 12mo. and he edited also Lobel's Illustrations of Plants.

HOWARD, Thomas, earl of Surrey, and duke of Norfolk, distinguished himself by his bravery in the service of his country. He assisted his brother sir Edward, in his attack against sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate, who in 1511 spread terror and devastation on the English coast, and after killing the leader and capturing the ships, he embarked for Guienne with the marquis of Dorset, and ably contributed in the conquest of Navarre by the arms of Ferdinand. Raised to the honor of high admiral after his brother's death, he next displayed his valor in the field, and insured the defeat of the Scotch in the battle of Floddenfield, which proved fatal to James IV. He afterwards went to Ireland as vice-roy, and after an absence of two years, during which he suppressed a rebellion, he returned to lead a fleet against the French. These high services were rewarded by the king, who created him earl of Surrey, and restored his father to the dukedom of Norfolk, but popularity was transitory under a capricious government, and the English admiral was accused of treason. He saw his son beheaded upon the false accusation, and escaped the same fatal blow, only by the previous death of the king. He died 1554, aged 66.

HOWARD, Henry, earl of Surrey, son of Thomas Duke of Norfolk above mentioned, was born about 1520. His valor was displayed and with the greatest effect at the famous battle of Floddenfield, but all his virtues and services were of no avail against the gloomy suspicions of Henry VIII. The capricious monarch, either jealous of Howard's prowess and popularity, or pretending that he aspired to the crown by soliciting the hand of the princess Mary, arraigned him as guilty of treason, and caused him to be beheaded on Tower-hill 1547. As a poet this unfortunate nobleman is very respectable, the harmony of his numbers, and the purity of his language have been deservedly commended by Pope, Warton and others; and he had the singular merit of being the first of the English nobility who courted the muses.

HOWARD, sir Robert, youngest son of Thomas, earl of Berkshire, was eminent for his learning. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and after the restoration was elected member for Stockbridge, and afterwards for Castle Rising, and was made auditor of the Exchequer. Though the favorite of the second Charles he showed himself a violent enemy to James II. and a firm supporter of the revolution. He died about 1700. He was author of the History of the reigns of Edward, and Richard II. 8vo.—a letter to Johnson.—Virgil's fourth Eneid translated—History of Religion, 8vo.—Statius' Achilleis translated, and various poems and plays.

HOWARD, Charles, earl of Nottingham, son of lord William Howard, was born 1536. He early devoted himself to a military life, and served under his father, and afterwards became general of horse, and distinguished himself against the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland and their rebel forces. In 1569 he escorted in an English fleet Anne of Austria, daughter of Maximilian from Zealand to Spain, where she was married to king Philip. He succeeded his father in the title of Effingham in 1572, and soon after commanded the English fleet, which with such persevering bravery attacked and completely defeated the Spanish armada. For these services he was raised to the earldom of Nottingham by the queen; but in the next reign, though for a while ambassador at the court of Spain, he was dismissed from his offices and succeeded by the greater favorite Villiers duke of Buckingham. He died 1624.

HOWARD, John, a celebrated philanthropist, born at Hackney 1726. When very young he lost his father, who was a carpet warehouse keeper in Long lane, Smithfield, in consequence of which his guardians bound him apprentice to a grocer ; but as his constitution was delicate and his property above mediocrity he purchased his indentures, and travelled over France and Italy. He returned to England and spent a few years ; but, in 1756 he set out for Lisbon to view the dreadful consequences of the earthquake. The frigate, however, in which he had set out was captured by a French privateer, and the severities of confinement which he endured in France exerted that sympathy for suffering captives which have rendered his name so illustrious. After his release he visited Italy, and on his return he settled near Lynnington. Afterwards he purchased an estate at Carlington near Bedford, and there employed himself in acts of benevolence among the poor and industrious cottagers who surrounded him. In 1773 he served the office of sheriff, and this as he says brought the distress of prisoners more immediately under his notice, and led him to the humane design of visiting the gaols of England to administer relief and to suggest improvement. In 1774, he stood candidate to represent Bedford, but notwithstanding his popularity he was unsuccessful ; he had however the pleasing gratification of being examined before the House of Commons, and of receiving their thanks for his attention to the state of prisons. Encouraged by this honourable testimony, after visiting the prisons of England, he travelled on the continent with the same humane zeal, and three times passed through France, four through Germany, five through Holland, twice through Italy, once through Spain and Portugal, between 1775 and 1787. His account of the principal lazarettos in Europe appeared in 1789, 4to. and in this work he intimated his intention of penetrating through Russia and Turkey, far into the East. On this occasion he observed that he was fully sensible of the dangers which must attend such a journey. This unabated zeal in the cause of humanity proved at last unhappily fatal. While at Cherson he visited a patient who labored under a malignant epidemic fever, and catching the disorder he fell a victim to compassion 20th Jan. 1790. In his manners Howard was simple and unaffected, temperate even to abstemiousness, and unwilling to mix in the crowds of convivial life. His modesty was equal to his merits. A statue by Bacon, erected in St. Paul's, represents him in a Roman dress, with a countenance of christian mildness, holding in one hand a scroll of writings for the improvement of prisons, and in the other a key, whilst he tramples on chains and fetters. Thus he trod, says the simple but energetic inscription, an open, but unfrequented path to immortality. In his religious sentiments Howard was a dissenter. It is remarkable that with all the benevolence of his character he was too rigid a father, and while he endeavored to educate his only son in the paths of duty and rectitude he enforced his precepts with too much austerity, and rather terrified the mind, than drew it by gentle means to the admiration and to the practice of virtue.

HOWARD, Francis, earl of Effingham, governor of Virginia, was the son and heir of Sir Charles Howard, and succeeded Charles, earl of Effingham, in 1681. He was appointed governor of Virginia, and succeeded lord Culpeper in that office in 1684. He was instructed not to suffer the use of a printing press in the colony on any occasion whatever. His administration was excessively rapacious and tyrannical. During the early part of it, the colony suffered much from the depredations of the Indians. He repaired to Albany, and there concluded a treaty with them, which was ratified in 1685. He was succeeded by Nicholson in 1689, and died in England in 1700.

HOWARD, Simcon, D.D., minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1758. In 1767 he was ordained pastor of the west church in Boston, where he continued till his death Aug. 13, 1804, aged 71. He heartily engaged in promoting the American revolution, and participated in the joy, experienced on the acknowledgment of our independence. He published a sermon at the artillery election, 1773 ; on the death of his wife, 1777 ; to freemasons, 1778 ; on not being ashamed of the gospel, occasioned by the death of Dr. Winthrop, 1779 ; at the election 1780 ; at the ordination of T. Adams, 1791.

HOWARD, John Eager, governor of Maryland, was born June 4, 1752, in Baltimore county, Maryland. He entered the army in 1776 as a captain in the regiment of col. J. C. Hall ; in the following year he was promoted, till finally he succeeded lieut. col. Ford in the command of the second Maryland regiment. He was an efficient coadjutor of Greene during the campaign in the south, distinguishing himself at the battle of Cowpens, when says Lee, " he seized the critical moment, and turned the fortune of the day ;" also at Guilford and the Eutaws. He was in the engagement of White Plains, Germantown, Monmouth, Camden, and Hobkirk's hill. Having been trained to the infantry service, he was remarkable for pushing into close battle with fixed bayonet. At Cowpens this mode of fighting was resorted to for the first time in the war ; but afterwards the Maryland line was often put to this service. In this battle, he had in his hands at one time, the swords of seven officers, who had surrendered to him personally. On this occasion he saved the life of the British general O'Hara, whom he found clinging to his stirrup, and asking quarter. When the army was disbanded he retired to his patrimonial estate near Baltimore. In 1788 he was chosen governor of Maryland and held the office three years. He was a senator of the United States from Maryland, from 1796, to 1803. He died Oct. 12, 1827, aged 75.

HOWARD, Benjamin, a representative in Congress from Kentucky, and afterwards governor of Upper Louisiana. In 1813 he was appointed a brigadier-general in the army of the United States. He died at St. Louis, Missouri, Sept. 13th, 1814.

HOWE, John, a nonconformist divine, born at Loughborough 1630. He was originally of Cambridge, but afterwards came to Oxford, and was elected fellow of Magdalen college. He was made by the presbyterians minister of Torrington, Devonshire, but was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He had been for some time chaplain to Cromwell, and after the restoration, he went over to Ireland, as chaplain to lord Massarene, and obtained the bishop's permission to preach while in the country. He returned to London where he died 1705. He was universally esteemed for his learning, moderation, and great virtues. His best known work is the Living Temple, 2 vols. 8vo. His works have appeared in 2 vols. folio.

HOWE, John, an English statesman, born of a good family in Nottinghamshire. He was member for Cirencester, and sat in the three last parliaments of William, and the three first of Anne. He was considered as a man of great integrity and firmness, and by the weight of his representations the commons were induced to allow half pay to disbanded officers. During the agitation of the partition treaty he expressed himself against it with such virulent opposition that king William declared, that if it were not for the disparity of their situation he would fight him. Though he warmly espoused the revolution, he soon after was disgusted with William, and boldly opposed him the whole of his reign. On Anne's accession he was made a privy counsellor, pay-master of the forces, and vice-admiral of the county of Gloucester. On George's accession he was succeeded as pay-master by Walpole. He died in 1721.

HOWE, Richard, earl, an able English admiral. He early devoted himself to the sea service, and at the age of 20, as commander of a small sloop of war, he behaved with such bravery in beating off two French frigates, that he was made post captain. He afterwards took a 64 gun ship, with the Dunkirk of 60 guns, off Newfoundland, and in 1758 he was actively employed under the orders of lord Hawke to destroy some of the ships and magazines at St. Maloes, which he effected with great success and little loss. The next year on the 6th of August, he made an attack on Cherbourg and destroyed the bason, and afterwards in the affair of St. Cas, he exhibited all the coolness and humanity of true heroism in protecting the retreat of his men, at his own personal danger. In the engagement with the fleet of Conflans he took an active part, and contributed greatly to the victory. In 1763 he was made one of the commissioners of the admiralty, which he resigned two years after, and in 1770 he was appointed commander in chief in the Mediterranean. During the American war he had the command of the vessels employed on the American station, and as far as his assistance could co-operate in that contest, his judicious and masterly dispositions were of great service to the king's troops. His relief of Gibraltar in 1782, in sight of the combined fleets of France and Spain, was considered as a very bold manœuvre. In 1783 he was made first lord of the admiralty, where after a short resignation he continued for some time. He took the command of the fleet in 1793, and after endeavoring for some time to find the French fleet, he had the good fortune to bring them to action and to obtain a most complete victory 1st June 1794. Lord Howe who had succeeded in 1759 to the title of lord Howe on his brother's death, and had been created an English earl in 1783, was further honored with the rank of general of marines in 1795, and two years after made a knight of the garter. He died Aug. 1799, universally respected by the nation, and sincerely lamented by the navy, where he was regarded with all the gratitude and devotion due to a father and a friend.

HOWE, George, lord viscount, was the eldest son of sir E. Scrope, second lord viscount in Ireland. He commanded 5000 British troops, which arrived at Halifax in July 1757. In the next year, when Abercrombi proceeded against Ticonderoga, in an attack on the advanced guard of the French in the woods, lord Howe fell on the first fire, in July 1778, aged 33. In him says Manto, "the soul of the army seemed to expire." By his military talents and many virtues he had acquired esteem and affection. Massachusetts erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey at the expense of 250*l*.

HOWE, Joseph, a graduate of Yale College, in 1765, who was ordained May 19th, 1773, pastor of the New South Church, Boston, Massachusetts. His constitution, however, was not sufficient to sustain the intellectual labor that had given him in the dawn of his professional career so bright a prospect of an enduring fame. He soon sank under the wasting of a consumption, August 25, 1775, aged only twenty-eight years. Mr. Howe is the individual alluded to under the name of Haley, in the popular work entitled the Coquette, or the History of Eliza Whorton. Although there is some truth in this work, the most of it is fiction.

HOWE, Sir William, general, was the successor of Gage in the command of the British forces in America, arriving at Boston, in May 1775, with Burgoyne. He commanded in the battle of Bunker Hill. In Sept. 1776 he took possession of New York. With his brother he was a commissioner for peace. In July 1777 he sailed for the Chesapeake; entered Philadelphia Sept. 27; and defeated the Americans at Germantown Oct. 4th. In May 1778 he was succeeded by Clinton. He died 1814. He published a narrative as to his command in North America, 1780.

HOWELL, James, an English writer, born in Caernarthenshire, about 1596. He was sent in 1632 as secretary to Robert earl of Leicester to Denmark, and was afterwards employed in several respectable offices, till 1640, when he was appointed clerk to the privy council. In 1643 his papers were seized by the commons, and he himself imprisoned in the Fleet, and though some attribute this violence to his attachment to the king, it is more probable that to his own extravagance and imprudent conduct he was indebted for his confinement. The tediousness of a long imprisonment was relieved by the employment of his pen, while he remained in prison, which was even after the king's death. He wrote several things to maintain himself, and though composed through necessity, they possess merit. Though attached strongly to the king, he yet disapproved of the measures recommended by Laud, Buckingham, and Strafford, but he was so great an enemy to republican oppression that he rejoiced at the monarchical power assumed by Cromwell, and even complimented him in a speech, which was published. At the restoration Howell was in reward of his services appointed historiographer royal, an honorable office, first erected in his person. He died Nov. 1666. His publications are very numerous, amounting to nearly 50. They are chiefly on temporary and political subjects. The best known of these are his letters, which, as they contain an interesting account of the public affairs of the time, have gone through eleven editions.

HOWELL, Richard, governor of New Jersey, was a native of Delaware, but commanded a New Jersey regiment from 1776 till 1779, when in consequence of a new arrangement of the army, he resumed the profession of the law. In 1778 he was appointed clerk of the supreme court, which office he held till June 1793, when he was chosen governor of the state. To this place he was eight years successively elected. He died 1802 aged 47.

HOWELL, David, LL.D, judge, was born in New Jersey, and graduated at Princeton college, 1766. Removing to Rhode Island, he was appointed professor of mathematics, and afterwards of law in the university. Devoting himself to the practice of the law at Providence, he was chosen judge of the supreme court. He was also a member of the old congress; and in 1812 was appointed district judge for Rhode Island, which office he sustained till his death in 1824, aged 77.

HOYT, Ard, missionary to the Cherokees, was a settled minister of Wilkesbarre, Pa. when he offered his services to the American board. In Nov. 1817 he proceeded with his family to Brainerd, and in 1824 to Willstown, where he died Feb. 18, 1823, aged 57. The Cherokees were strongly attached to him. His journals were read with great interest.

HUARTE, John, a native of French Navarre in the 17th century. He is the author of a curious and interesting book in Spanish, called, an Examination of such Geniuses as are fit for acquiring the Sciences, with directions to discover the properties of each genius. The work has been translated into Latin, Italian, French, and other languages, and also, into English, under the title of Trial of Wits. Though commended, however, by many, Bayle censures him, and among other things, for publishing as genuine, the pretended Letter of Lentullus, from Jerusalem to the Roman senate, in which he describes the Saviour, his very hair, beard, shape, and stature.

HUBBARD, William, minister of Ipswich, Massachusetts, and a historian, was born in the year 1621, and was graduated at Harvard college in the first class in 1642. The time of his ordination is not known, but it is supposed to be about the year 1657, as colleague with Mr. Cobbet. In his old age John Rogers was settled with him in 1692. He died 1704, aged 82. He wrote a valuable history of New England, for which the state paid him fifty pounds. It was published in the Mass. hist. collections 2d series. vols. v. and vi. He published an election sermon, entitled the happiness of a people in the wisdom of their rulers directing, and in the obedience of their brethren, 1676: the present state of New England, being a narrative of the troubles with the Indians from the first planting thereof in 1607 to 1677, but chiefly of the two last years, 1675 and 1676, to which is added a discourse about the war with the Pequots, 4to. 1677; a fast sermon, 1682; a funeral discourse on Gen. Denison, 1694; a testimony to the order of the gospel in the churches of N. E. with Mr. Higginson, 1701.

HUBER, Mary, a female writer. She was born at Geneva, and died at Lyons 1753, aged 43. She wrote an Abridgment of the Spectator—Letters on Religion essential to Man—The System of ancient and modern Theologians, on the State of the Soul after Death.—She was a protestant, and some of her works were violently attacked by the catholic divines.

HUBERT, Matthew, a priest of the oratory of Paris. He was distinguished as an eloquent preacher, and inferior only to Bourdaloue. He died 22d March 1717, aged 77. His sermons which had pleased the congregations of the capital and of the provinces, were published 1725 in 6 vols. 12mo. and are highly esteemed.

HUBNER, John, a native of Lusatia or Torgau, in Saxony, who wrote some popular works in history and geography, in the form of question and answer. He was professor of geography at Leipsic, and rector of the school of Hamburg, where he died 1731, aged 63. The chief of his works which have been translated into various languages, are Genealogical Tables—Bibliotheca Historica Hamburgensis—Museum Geographicum—and a Genealogical Lexicon.

HUDSON, Henry, an eminent navigator, was an Englishman, who explored a part of the coast of Greenland in the years 1607 and 1608, while seeking a passage to Japan and China. After his return to England from his second voyage, he went over to Holland, and the Dutch East India company gave him the command of a ship for discovery. He sailed March 25, 1609, and after passing along the coast of Lapland, crossed the Atlantic, and discovered Cape Cod, at which place he landed. He then pursued his course to the Chesapeake, and on his return along the coast, entered the river in the state of New York, which bears his name, and as-ended as far as where the city of Albany now stands. A settlement was soon after made upon this river by the Dutch. In 1610 he was again fitted out, by some gentlemen, to discover a passage to the south sea, and in this voyage he discovered the extensive bay to the north, which bears his name. He drew his ship into a small creek Nov. 3, and it was frozen up during the winter. Uncommon flights of wild fowl furnished provision, without which supply the crew must have perished. In the spring of 1611 he made several efforts to complete his discoveries, but was obliged to abandon his enterprise, and make the best of his way home. He distributed to his men with tears in his eyes, all the bread he had left, which was only a pound to each; though it is said that other provisions were afterwards found in the ship. In his uneasiness and despair he let fall threatening words of setting some of his men on shore; upon which a few of the sturdiest, who had been very mutinous, entered the cabin in the night, tied his arms behind him, and set him adrift in the shallop, at the west end of the straits, with his son, and seven of the most sick, and infirm of his men. He was never heard of again. The crew proceeded with his ship for England. Four of them were killed by the savages, as they went on shore near the straits' mouth, and the rest, ready to die for want, arrived at Plymouth in Sept. 1611. He published divers voyages and northern discoveries, 1607; a second voyage for finding a passage to the East Indies by the northeast, 1608. Accounts of his other voyages were published; but they were not written by himself. Some of them are preserved in the third volume of Purchas' Pilgrims.

HUDSON, John, D.D., an English critic, born 1662, and entered at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. In 1686 he was chosen fellow of University college, and became a most able and active tutor, and in 1701 he was elected keeper of the Bodleian library. In 1712 he was appointed principal of St. Mary-hall, through the interest of Dr. Radcliffe; and to his influence with that celebrated physician, Oxford, it is said, is indebted for the many noble benefactions which she received. A sedentary life brought on at last a dropsy, of which Dr. Hudson died Nov. 27, 1719, leaving one daughter by the daughter of sir Richard Harrison, an alderman and mercer of Oxford. The labors of Dr. Hudson were employed in the publication of Velleius Paterculus—Thucydides—Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores—Dionysius of Halicarnassus—Longinus and Æsop, with short and valuable notes. His beautiful edition of Josephus, left unfinished, was completed and published 1720, in 2 vols. folio, by his friend Antony Hall, who also married his widow. It was his intention to publish a catalogue of the Bodleian library, which he had already transcribed in 6 vols. fol. He was the frequent and respected correspondent of the most learned men of Europe.

HUET, Peter Daniel, a learned French prelate, born at Caen in Normandy, Feb. 8, 1630. When of age he visited Paris to purchase books, and there became known to the politest scholars of France; and in 1652 he accompanied his friend Bochart, to the court of Christina, queen of Sweden. The queen wished Huet to settle at Stockholm, but after three months' stay, he took his leave of the fickle princess, and returned to Paris. In 1661 he published his well known book, De Interpretatione Libri duo, which drew upon him the applauses, and the thanks of the learned. His Origines Commentaria, of which he had obtained a copy from a MS. while at Stockholm, appeared in 1688 at Rouen, with a Latin translation and notes. In 1659 he was invited by Christina to Rome, where she had, after her abdication, retired, but he declined her liberal offers. He was afterwards appointed, with Bossuet, sub-preceptor to the Dauphin, an honorable situation to which his literary fame entitled him. In 1678 he was nominated by the king, to the abbey of Anun in Normandy, and in 1685 he was raised to the see of Soissons, which soon after he exchanged for that of Avranche. In 1699 he resigned his bishopric, and received in its stead the abbey of Fontenay, near his native place, Caen, but afterwards removed to the maison professé of the jesuits at Paris, where he spent the last 20 years of his life in devotion and in literary pursuits. He died 26th Jan. 1721, in his 91st year. The other works of this learned and amiable bishop were Demonstratio Evangelica 1679, folio, often reprinted—Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ, 1689, a book in which he ably attacked the doctrines of Des Cartes, which in his younger and more inexperienced years he had warmly embraced—Quæstiones Alnetanæ de Concordiâ Rationis & Fidei, 1690, an excellent and elegantly written work. He also wrote notes on the vulgate translation of the bible, for which purpose he read over the Hebrew text 24 times with great attention, and in 1718 he published an account of his life, the title page of which drew down the censures of critics, as he used the words, Ad eum pertinentibus, for ad se. Besides these, he wrote several other things less known, but equally admired for elegance of style and vivacity of expression. He was, says his biographer Olivet, the most learned man that any age has produced.

HUFNAGEL, George, a native of Antwerp, whose abilities were noticed and rewarded by some of the German princes, and by the emperor Rodolphus. Besides some poetical works in Latin and German, he wrote four books for the use of the emperor, containing an accurate description and elegant representation of quadrupeds, insects, birds, and fishes. He died 1600, aged 55.

HUGH-CAPET, Count of Paris and Orleans, was raised by his merits and courage at Noyon to the throne of France 987, and thus became the head of the third race of the French monarchy. He died 996, aged 57.

HUGHES, John, a poet and dramatist, was born, in 1677, at Marlborough; was privately educated in London; obtained a place in the ordnance office; and died, in 1715-20, much respected and beloved for his integrity and his amiable disposition. He wrote various poems, of much merit, and The Siege of Damascus, a tragedy; contributed to the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian; and edited an edition of Spenser.—His younger brother, Jabez, was also a man of poetical talent.

HUGO, of Cluni, a saint of the Romish calendar, born in Burgundy 1023. At the age of 15, he abandoned the world for the abbey of Cluni, of which he was chosen abbot 1048. He was pious and exemplary, and introduced great reformation among the monks, 10,000 of whom he is said to have had under his direction at Cluni, and other places. He died 1608, or 9. Some of his epistles are preserved in Dacherius's Spicilegium.

HUGO, Herman, a Jesuit, born at Brussels. He died of the plague at Rhimberg, 1629, aged 41. He wrote de Prima Scribendi Origine, 8vo.—Universæ Rei Literariæ Antiquitates, republished by Trotzius 1738—Obsidio Bredana, Antwerp 1629, folio—Militia equestris antiqua & nova—Pia Desideria, a poem of which the versification though good, wants simplicity and sublimity.

HUGO, Charles Lewis, a French and Latin writer, abbe of Etival, and titular bishop of Ptolemais, died at an advanced age, 1735. He wrote Annales Præmonstratensium, 2 vols. folio, a curious work on his own order—Vie de Norbert Fondateur des Premoûtrés, 4to. 1704—Sacræ Antiquitatis Monumenta historica, dogmatica, &c. 2 vols. fol. 1725—Traité historique & critique de la Maison de Lorraine, 8vo. 1711 :—a bold work censured by the parliament of Paris, in defence of which he wrote Reflections sur les deux Ouvrages concernant la maison de Lorraine.

HULDRIC, John James, a native of Zurich, law professor there. He died at Zurich 1731, aged 48, deservedly esteemed as an able divine, and a benevolent man. He wrote a commentary on Puffendorf's Duty of Man—Miscellanea Tigurina, 3 vols. and published an edition of Sephor Toledot Jeschu, 1705.

HULL, William, general, governor of Michigan territory, was an officer in the American revolutionary army. In 1796, he was chosen a major general in the Massachusetts militia. In 1805, he was appointed governor of the Michigan territory. At the beginning of the war of 1812, he was appointed to the command of the north western army. He surrendered with 2000 men at Detroit to the British general Brock Aug. 15, 1812. A court martial was ordered to try him on several charges, and in 1814, he was sentenced to be shot, but for his revolutionary services and his age recommended to mercy. The president approved the sentence, and remitted the execution. He died 1825, aged 72. He published defence of himself 1814; memoirs of the campaign, of 1812, with a sketch of his revolutionary services, 1824.

HULME, Nathaniel, a physician, was born at Holme Thorp, in Yorkshire, in 1732. He studied under his brother, Dr. Joseph Hulme, a physician, at Halifax, after which he became a pupil at Guy's hospital. He next went as surgeon in the navy; and, in 1765, took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh. After this he settled in London, and became a physician to the General Dispensary, and to the City of London Lying-in-Hospital. About 1774, he was appointed physician to the Charter-house, where he died in 1807. He was the author of—1. Dissertatio Medica Inauguratis de Scorbuto. 2. A Treatise on Puerperal Fever. 3. An Oration, "De Re Medica cognoscenda et promovenda." 4. A Safe and Easy Remedy for the Relief of the Stone and Gravel, Senry, Gout, &c. He has also some papers in the Transactions of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, of both of which bodies he was a member. In 1787, he obtained a gold medal from the royal Medical Society at Paris, for an answer to a prize question, concerning the cellular skin of new-born infants.

HULSIUS, Anthony, a native of Hida, who studied at Wesel, and Deventer, and afterwards visited the various universities of Europe to improve himself in oriental knowledge. He was for 25 years settled as minister at Breda, and then removed to fill the divinity chair at Leyden, where he died 1685, aged 70. He wrote Theologia Judaica—Opus Catecheticum Didactico polemicum—Non ens Præadamiticum, and other works.

HUME, David, a celebrated English writer born at Edinburgh, 26th April 1711. He was intended by his family for the profession of the law, but he had greater regard for Virgil and Cicero, than for Voet and Vinnius. At last however he was forced from the narrowness of his fortune, to embark in a mercantile concern at Bristol 1734; but in a few months he quitted the place in disgust, and retired to France, determined with the most rigid economy to guide his expenditure by his income while he devoted himself to literary pursuits. Here, at Rheims, and at La Fleche in Anjou he wrote his treatise of Human Nature which he published in London 1738; but the work met with no success. In 1742, the first part of his Essays appeared with a little more success, but to support himself he was obliged to enter into the service of the marquis of Annandale, as an attendant, during the weak intervals of his lordship's intellects. His Political Discourses, and his Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals appeared in 1752, but though he considered these works as highly finished compositions, they met little notice from the public. In 1754, he published his portion of English history from the accession of James I. to the revolution, and though the work was disregarded by the nation, he continued his labors, and in 1756, published another volume, which attracted some public attention and served, as he said, to buoy up its unfortunate brother. His Natural History of Religion about this time had appeared, and though it met with few readers, yet it was attacked by Warburton. In 1759, the history of the house of Tudor was published, and in 1761, the more early part of English history, and thus the plan was completed, and the author, though he found cavillers and opponents in consequence of the partiality of his opinions and the licentious tendency of his principles, had the satisfaction to see his work grow popular, and thus insure him a handsome reward from the booksellers. While forming the plan of a literary seclusion from the busy world, in 1763, he was invited by lord Hertford to accompany him as secretary to his embassy at Paris, and the offer was too flattering not to be accepted. In the summer 1765, he was left there as charge d'affaires, and soon after on his return to Scotland he was persuaded to become under secretary of State to general Conway. In 1769, he returned to Edinburgh. He died 25th August 1776. He has written an account of his life to the 18th April, 1776, prefixed to his works. His Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, appeared after his death, in 8vo. His works were corrected by himself, and were printed in 4to. and in 8vo. and they are now become universally popular. Though Hume possesses the deep research of the historian, the patience of the philosopher, and the subtleties of the metaphysician, he is to be read with caution, as his principles on religion and morality, are insidiously clothed in fallacious language, and would tend to undermine the salutary doctrines which teach mankind to reverence the divinity as a beneficent creator, an omniscient governor and a just and impartial judge.

HUMPHREY, Lawrence, an English writer, born at Newport Pagnell, Bucks, about 1527. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he was elected fellow of Magdalen college. He took his master's degree 1552, and was then made Greek lecturer of his college, and soon after took orders, and in 1555, left England to travel into foreign countries. On Elizabeth's accession he returned to Oxford and was restored to his fellowship from which he had been expelled for being absent more than the limited time of one year, and in 1560, he was made queen's professor of divinity, and the next year elected president of his college. In 1570, he was made dean of Gloucester, and 10 years after removed to the deanery of Winchester, and he might have been raised to a bishopric, had he not have been too much attached to the calvinists, and therefore inimical to the doctrines of the English church. He died Feb. 1590, leaving a wife by whom he had 12 children. He wrote Epistola de Græcis Literis, and Homeri Lectione & Imitatione, Basil 1558—De Religione Conservatione & Reformatione deque Primatu Regum,—de Ratione Interpretandi Auctores—Optimates, sive de Nobilitate, ejusque antiquâ Origine—Life of Bishop Jewel,—sermons, and pieces against papists.

HUMPHREYS, David, L.L.D., colonel, graduated at Yale college 1771. During the American revolutionary war he entered the army as a captain; in 1778, he was a major and aid to gen. Putnam; in 1780, he was selected as one of Washington's aids, with the rank of colonel, and remained in his family to the end of the war, enjoying his confidence and friendship. For his valor at the siege of York congress honored him with a sword. In 1784, he accompanied Mr. Jefferson to Paris as secretary of legation. He returned in 1786, and was chosen a member of the legislature of Connecticut. Being appointed to command a regiment raised for the western service, he resided for some time at Hartford, and was a contributor to the Anarchiad. In 1788, he went to reside with Washington, and continued with him, till he was appointed in 1790, minister to Portugal. He sailed in 1791, and soon after his return in 1794, was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Spain. He concluded treaties with Tripoli and Algiers. In 1812, he took the command of the militia of Connecticut. He died 1818, aged 65. He published in 1782, a poetical address to the armies of the United States, which was much celebrated. His other works are poems on the happiness of America: on the future glory of the United States; on the industry of the United States; on the love of country; on the death of Washington. He wrote also the life of Putnam, 1783; the widow of Malabar, a tragedy, from the French 1790; and several political tracts and orations. A collection of his poems and tracts, including most of his writings was published in N. Y. 8vo. 1790, and 1804.

HUNNERIC, king of the African Vandals after his father Genseric, is known for his severe persecution of the Christians. He was an Ariian in principle, and died 484, after a reign of seven years.

HUNNIANES, John Corvinus, waivode of Transylvania, and general of the armies of Ladislaus king of Hungary, is famous for his defeat of the Turks under Amurath 1442, and 3. He obliged his enemies to raise the siege of Belgrade, but though unusually brave and fortunate he was yet defeated by the Turks 1443. He afterwards recovered his victorious fame, and again raised the siege of Belgrade against Mahomet II.; but unfortunately died the same year, 10th Sep. 1456. His loss was universally lamented, not only by the Christians, and by the pope, who is said to have shed tears at the intelligence, but the infidels and Mahomet himself to whom he was become so dreadful a scourge.

HUNTER, Robert, an English gentleman, author of the famous "Letter on Enthusiasm," attributed by some to Swift, and by others to Shaftesbury. He was made governor of Virginia 1703, but taken by the French on his voyage, and in 1710, he was sent as governor to New-York and the Jerseys, at the head of a colony of Palatines. He was in 1728, appointed governor of Jamaica, and died there 31st March 1734. His epitaph, in Elegant Latin, was written by the Rev. Mr. Fleeming. Hunter wrote also a farce, called Androboros, according to Coxeter.

HUNTER, Henry, a native of Culross, Perthshire, educated at Edinburgh, and made minister of Dumfermline 1764. Two years after he removed to South Leith, and in 1771, was invited to the care of the Scotch church, London wall. In this new appointment he continued till his death, and was respected for his learning, his piety, his eloquence, the mildness of his manners, and the liberality of his principles. A consumptive habit obliged him to retire to Bristol for the benefit of the air and the waters, and he died there November 1802, aged 61. He published Sacred Biography, or the Characters of Scripture, six vols. 8vo.—Miscellaneous Sermons, two vols. 8vo.—and translated besides various authors from the French, Lavater's Physiognomy.—Saurin's Sermons, and—St. Pierre's Studies of Nature.

HUNTER, William, M.D. a famous physician and anatomist, born 23d May, 1713, at Kilbride, Lanarkshire. He was for five years at Glasgow, and became acquainted with Dr. Cullen. In 1740, he went to Edinburgh, and the next year visited London, where he was recommended to the notice of his countryman Dr. James Douglas. The zeal and knowledge which he showed in anatomical studies, soon endeared him to this new friend, who took him into his house, made him tutor to his son, and enabled him to improve himself by attending various lectures on philosophy and medicine. In 1743, he presented to the Royal society his essay on the Structure and Diseases of articulating Cartilages, and now acquired such reputation that he succeeded Mr. Sharpe as lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent-garden in 1746. In 1750, he obtained his doctor's degree from Glasgow, and in 1764, in consequence of his high celebrity, he was appointed physician extraordinary to the queen. In 1767, he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and the next year he was admitted into the Antiquarian society, and appointed by the king anatomical professor. In 1781, he succeeded Doctor J. Fothergill as president of the London college of physicians, and was complimented with the honor of being elected member of several foreign societies. Thus distinguished, and thus respected as a medical man, he soon acquired an ample fortune, but with a commendable ambition he wished to apply it to the noblest and most beneficial purposes, the establishment of an anatomical school in London. Here not merely private conveniences were the object of his wishes, but a spacious amphitheatre was built for the delivering of lectures, and a magnificent room was set apart for a museum. This museum was soon enriched not only with his own valuable preparations, but the presents of his friends and pupils, and all other curiosities in the animal and fossil kingdoms, which either favor or money could procure. Dr. Hunter, besides the labors which he bestowed in the collection and arrangement of his museum, and in his lectures, and extensive practice, devoted much of his time in making observations, which he communicated to those learned societies of which he was a member. His great and immortal work, the Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus, however, must remain a striking monument of his labor and application. It was begun 1751, but was not made public till 1775, that accuracy and truth might be displayed in every page. Rich in fame and in fortune, Dr. Hunter formed the plan of retiring to Scotland about ten years before his death; but his wish to purchase an estate in his native country, was retarded and finally prevented by the defective titles of the proprietor, and he determined never to remove from London. In the last part of his life he was afflicted with the gout, but a paralytic stroke came at last to shorten his days; and he expired 30th March, 1783, exhibiting to his friend Dr. Combe the greatest resignation. If I had strength enough, said he, to hold a pen, I would write how easy and pleasant it is to die.

HUNTER, John, younger brother of Dr. Hunter, was born at Long Calderwood, 14th July 1723. The reputation of his brother excited him to surgical pursuits, and he joined him in London, 1753, and the next year he attended Mr. Cheselden at Chelsea hospital. In 1756, he was appointed house surgeon to St. George's hospital, and about that time was admitted by his brother as an assistant in his lectures. With the most zealous application he devoted himself to anatomical studies for ten long years, and was thus enabled not only to understand, but to explain and improve the art of comparative anatomy. The ramification of the olfactory nerves in the nose, the arteries of the gravid uterus, and the lymphatic vessels of birds, were among other important subjects, accurately ascertained and satisfactorily described. The excessive attention which he bestowed on his anatomical studies, had such an effect on his health, that to re-establish it he went abroad, and was surgeon on the staff with the army at Belleisle. At the end of the war in 1763, he returned to London, and devoted himself with increased activity to his favorite pursuits. In 1767, he was elected fellow of the Royal society. In 1776, he was appointed surgeon extraordinary to the king, and began to find that from his experience and knowledge, he derived not only reputation, but honor and opulence. Besides the appointment of surgeon to St. George's hospital, he was in 1786, nominated deputy surgeon-general to the army, and in 1790, he succeeded Mr. Adair as inspector-general of hospitals, and as surgeon-general to the army, in which year he resigned to his brother-in-law, Everard Home, his surgical lectures, which he found too laborious and inconvenient for the great avocations of his respectable and extensive practice. He died suddenly, 16th October 1793. As an able experimentalist, John Hunter will long be remembered with respect and gratitude: the dexterity of his operations was equalled only by his patience and perseverance; and while he considered surgery only in its infancy, he directed all the powers of his mind to the investigation, and to the elucidation of truth in this most important science. His works are a treatise on the Natural History of the Human Teeth, 4to. 1771, with a second part 1778,—a Treatise on the Venereal Disease, 4to.—Observations on certain Parts of the Animal Economy, 4to.—a Treatise on the Blood, Inflammation, and Gunshot Wounds, 4to. published after his death.

HUNTER, Anne, the widow of the eminent anatomist, Mr. John Hunter, died, at the age of seventy-nine, in Holles street, Cavendish square, Jan. 7, 1821. She was the intimate friend of the learned Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, and wrote several beautiful poems, chiefly of the lyric kind, some of which were composed by Haydn. A volume of her productions was printed in 1802.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, countess of, second daughter of Washington earl Ferrers, was born 1707, and married lord Huntingdon, by whom she had four sons and three daughters. From habits of gaiety and scenes of dissipation, she became all at once, after a serious illness, grave, reserved and melancholy. Her thoughts were wholly absorbed by religion, and she employed the ample resources which she possessed in disseminating her principles by the popular arts of Whitfield, Romaine, and others. Not only her house in Park street was thrown open for the frequent assembling of these pious reformers, but chapels were built in various parts of the kingdom, and a college erected in Wales for the education of young persons in the future labors of the ministry. After many acts of extensive charity, and with the best intentions, this enthusiastic lady died in 1791.

HUNTINGTON, Robert, D.D. an English divine, born at Deorhyrst, Gloucestershire, 1636. He was educated at Bristol, and then entered at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He left England 1670, as chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, and during 11 years' residence, he assiduously employed himself in the procuring of MSS. and in exploring the neighboring countries. He visited Galilee, Jerusalem, Samaria, Cyprus, Palmyra, and Egypt. In 1682 he returned to England, and by the recommendation of bishop Fell, he was appointed to the mastership of Trinity college, Dublin; but the troubles of the revolution drove him back to England, and in 1691 he resigned his office. In 1692 he was made rector of Great Hallingbury, Essex, and refused the bishopric of Kilmore in Ireland. In 1701 he however accepted that of Raphoe, and was consecrated the 20th of August; but he survived his honors but a few days, as he died 2d Sept. 1701. He published in the Philosophical Transactions, an Account of the porphyry pillars in Egypt, and it is his only work, besides some Observations in a Collection of Travels by Ray.

HUNTINGTON, Samuel, governor of Connecticut, was born in 1732. Without the advantages of a collegiate education, he acquired a competent knowledge of the law, and was early admitted to the bar; soon after which he settled in Norwich in 1760, and in a few years became eminent in his profession. In 1764 he was a representative in the general assembly, and the following year was appointed king's attorney. In 1774 he was made an assistant judge of the superior court. In 1775 he was elected into the council, and in the same year chosen a delegate to congress. In 1779 he was president of congress, and was re-chosen the following year. In 1781 he resumed his seat in the council, and on the bench. In 1783 he was again a member of congress. In 1784 he was appointed chief-justice. He was chosen governor in 1786 and was annually re-elected till his death. He died 1796, aged 63.

HUNTINGTON, Joseph, D.D. minister of Coventry, Connecticut, graduated at Yale college 1762, and died 1795. He is well known as the author of a work entitled, Calvinism improved, or the gospel illustrated as a system of real grace, issuing in the salvation of all men, which was published after his death in 1796. He also published a sermon on the vanity and mischief of presuming on things beyond our measure 1774; at the installation of John Ellis, 1785; a plea before the ecclesiastical council at Stockbridge in the cause of Mrs. Fisk, excommunicated for marrying a profane man, 1779; an address to his anabaptist brethren 1783.

HUNTINGTON, Jeddiah, general, was a native of Connecticut, and graduated at Harvard college 1763. He pronounced the first English oration ever delivered at commencement. He soon engaged in commercial pursuits in Norwich. In 1775 he entered the American army in command of a regiment, and in May 1777 congress appointed him a brigadier general. In 1789 he was appointed collector of the port of New London, and held the office till 1815. He died 1818, aged 75.

HUNTINGTON, Joshua, minister of Boston, graduated at Yale college 1804, and died 1819, aged 33. He was ordained colleague with Dr. Eckley of the Old South church 1808. He published memoirs of the life of Abigail Waters, 1817.

HUNTINGTON, Samuel, governor of Ohio, graduated at Yale college 1785. Removing in 1801 to Ohio, he was there appointed chief-justice. In 1808 he was elected governor, and re-elected the next year. He died 1817, aged 49.

HUNTINGTON, Ebenezer, a distinguished citizen of Connecticut, died at Norwich in that state, at the advanced age of ninety seven, June, 1834. He graduated at Yale college in 1775; joined the army near Boston the same year as a volunteer; in Sept. was commissioned as a lieutenant; in 1776, he was appointed a captain and also deputy adjutant-general, in 1777, a major, and in 1799, a lieutenant colonel; and he was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. He was elected a member of Congress. In 1799, he was, at the recommendation of Washington, appointed a brigadier-general in the army raised by congress, when expectations were entertained of a war with France. Besides the above marks of respect and confidence, he held the office of major-general of militia in his own state. Gen. Huntington maintained an unblemished character, and was active in the various public charities which characterized the age in which he lived.

HURE, Charles, a French divine, born 1639, at Champigny-sur-Yonne, son of a laborer. He applied himself sedulously to letters, and to the Oriental languages, and was member of the Port-royal society, professor of languages in the university of Paris, and at last principal of the college of Bencourt. In his religious opinions he was considered a Jansenist. He died 1717. He wrote a Dictionary of the Bible, 2 vols. folio, inferior to that of Calmet—an edition of the Latin Testament—a French translation of the Testament, with notes—and a Sacred Grammar.

HUSS, John, a famous divine and martyr, born in Bohemia 1376, and educated at Prague, where he took his degrees, and entered into the ministry. The writings of Wickliff converted him from the superstitions of Rome, and with eloquent zeal he began to preach against the power and influence of the pope. His efforts proved successful, the papal authority began to be slighted in Bohemia, but the archbishop of Prague issued two mandates against the heresies of Wickliff, and the labors of Huss and his followers; and this exertion of power was soon seconded by a bull from Rome, for the suppression of all tenets offensive to the holy see. Huss exclaimed against these proceedings, and though summoned to Rome to answer for his conduct, he, supported by the favor of Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, disregarded the pope's authority, and was excommunicated, and soon after his friends and adherents were included in the same interdict. After causing by his opposition to the papal decrees, various tumults in Prague and Bohemia, Huss was prevailed upon to appear at the council of Constance, to give an account of his doctrines. The emperor Sigismund granted him his protection, and insured security to his person; but when soon after he reached Constance 1414, he was seized as a heretic and imprisoned, and after a confinement of severe hardships, for six months, he was condemned without a hearing, and when he refused to recant his errors, he was tumultuously sentenced to be burnt. The emperor indeed complained of the contempt shown to his authority, and of the perfidy used towards the delinquent, but all in vain. Huss was inhumanly dragged to execution, he was stripped of his sacerdotal habit, deprived of his degrees, and with a paper crown on his head, with pictures of devils round, and the inscription of Heresiarch, he was burned alive, July 1415. He endured his torments with uncommon fortitude, and truly christian resignation. His ashes were collected and then sprinkled in the Rhine. His writings, which were numerous but violent, were afterwards, when printing was invented, published at Nuremberg 1558, and read with avidity.

HUTCHESON, Francis, an ingenious writer, born 8th Aug. 1694, in Ireland, son of a dissenting minister. After an excellent education, he removed in 1710 to Glasgow, where for some years he earnestly applied to philosophy, the learned languages, and divinity. On his return to Ireland, he took care of a small dissenting congregation in Dublin, and intended to remove into the north, when he was invited to settle in the capital, and to open an academy. He met here with great success, and the publication of his Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, in which he was assisted by lord Moldsworth, and bishop Syngue, soon recommended him to the notice of the great and learned, of lord Granville, the viceroy, of archbishop King, the primate Boulter, and others. In 1729 he left Ireland for Glasgow, where he became professor of philosophy. He died there highly respected in private life, as well as a public teacher, 1747, though his constitution seemed to promise a more extended life than 53 years. His System of Moral Philosophy, in three books, was published by his only son Francis, M.D. 1755, 2 vols. 4to. with an Account of his Life by Dr. Leecham. He wrote also a treatise on the Passions, and some philosophical papers, printed in Hibernicus' Letters.

HUTCHINS, Thomas, geographer-general of the United States, was a native of New Jersey. He was in London at the commencement of the war in 1775, and his zeal in the cause of his country, induced him to refuse some excellent offers, which were made him in England. Being suspected of holding a correspondence with Franklin, then in France, he was thrown into a dungeon and lost 12,000*l.* in one day; this was in 1779. After being confined six weeks, he was examined and liberated. He went to France and then came to Charleston South Carolina, and joined the army under general Greene. It was not long before he was appointed geographer-general of the United States. He died 1789. Dr. Morse was much indebted to him in the compilation of his American gazetteer. He published an account of Bouquet's expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764, with a map and plates 1765; a description of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina with maps, London, 1778; and an historical narrative and topographical description of Louisiana and West Florida, 1784.

HUTCHINSON, John, the well known founder of a philosophical sect, was born at Spennythorn, Yorkshire, 1674. Having acquired an independence he began to devote himself laboriously to studious pursuits, and in 1724 he published his first part of Moses' Principia, in which he severely ridiculed Woodward's Natural History of the Earth, and by attacking the doctrine of gravitation he thus attempted to undermine the great fabric on which Newton's fame is built. In 1727 the second part of Moses' Principia appeared, in which he asserted against Newton's doctrines that a plenum and the air are the principles of the scripture philosophy. With a fanciful hypothesis he supported that the mysteries of the trinity may be drawn from the three grand agents in the system of nature, spirit, fire, and light; and so fascinating were his arguments, that among others Dr. Samuel Clarke, declared himself a warm admirer of his doctrines. Hutchinson died 28th Aug. 1737, aged 63. In his temper he is described as violent; the mental powers which he derived from nature were great, and had they been early and properly cultivated he might have enriched his works with more judicious observations, and to learning have added the graces of elegant language. In his opinions Hutchinson was singular. He imagined that all knowledge is contained in the Hebrew scriptures, and therefore rejecting the points, he regarded every Hebrew root as containing some important meaning, and conveying the signification of some mental or spiritual thing. Though this fanciful and mysterious system was for a time defended with violence by the author, and supported zealously by his adherents, by the learned Bishop Home, by Jones, Spearman, and other pious divines, it gradually fell into disrepute, and is now no longer dreaded as the source of innovation and scepticism in the theological opinions long accepted and deservedly revered by the general bulk of mankind. All his works were collected in 12 vols. 8vo. 1748.

HUTCHINSON, Ann, a woman who occasioned much difficulty in New England, soon after its first settlement, came from Lincolnshire to Boston, 1635, and was the wife of one of the representatives of Boston. The members of Mr. Cotton's church used to meet every week to repeat his sermons, and discourse on doctrines. She set up meetings for women, and soon had a numerous audience. After repeating the sermons of Mr. Cotton, she added reflections of her own; she advocated her own sentiments, and warped the discourses of her minister to coincide with them. She soon threw the whole colony into a flame. The progress of her sentiments occasioned the synod of 1637, the first synod in America. This convention of ministers condemned 82 erroneous opinions, then propagated in the country. Mrs. Hutchinson, after this sentence of her opinions, was herself called before the court in Nov. of the same year, and being convicted of traducing the ministers, and advancing errors, was banished the colony. She went with her husband to Rhode Island. In the year 1742, after her husband's death, she removed into the Dutch country beyond New Haven, and the next year, she, her son Francis, and most of her family of sixteen persons, were killed by the Indians.

HUTCHINSON, Thomas, LL.D., governor of Massachusetts while a province of England, graduated at Harvard college, 1727. He applied himself first to mercantile business, but soon engaged in the study of the common law of England, and the principles of the British constitution, with reference to his employment in public life. For ten years he was a representative from Boston in the general court, and was three times chosen speaker. In 1752 he was appointed judge of probate. He was a member of the council from 1749 to 1766, and lieutenant governor from 1758 to 1771. In 1760 he was appointed chief justice. At one time he held the offices of counsellor, judge of probate, chief justice, and lieutenant governor. He sided with the mother country in her attempts to raise a revenue from the colonies, and of course became extremely obnoxious to the other side, who claimed to be the people. The first measure was the stamp act, and a brother-in-law of Mr. Hutchinson was appointed distributor of stamps. The people, or rather the mob, after compelling a resignation of his office, by his brother-in-law, paid a visit to his house, in consequence of a report, that he had written letters in favor of the act, but the chief damage, on this occasion, was the breaking of his windows. In a few evenings there was a more formidable assault. The merchants being displeased with the officers of the customs and the admiralty, a mob was collected in the evening of August 26, 1765, in King street, and well supplied with strong drink. Having first plundered the cellar of the comptroller of the customs of the wine, and spirits, the rioters proceeded, with intoxicated rage, to the house of Mr. Hutchinson, and splitting the doors to pieces with broad axes, they destroyed, or cast into the street every thing, which was in the house, and kept possession until daylight. The damage was estimated at 2500*l.* besides the loss of a great collection of public and private papers. He received a grant for his losses. The governor was that night at the castle. The town, the next day voted their abhorrence of the riot; but no person was punished; even six or eight persons, who were imprisoned for this affair, were released by a company, who by threats obtained the keys of the prison from the prison-keeper. When appointed lieut. governor he claimed the right of a seat at the council board, by virtue of his office, but a clamor being excited, against him, he abandoned the claim. By the present constitution of Massachusetts, (1834) the lieut. governor is ex officio a member of the council, and the claim of Mr. Hutchinson does not appear therefore to have been very preposterous. In 1763 the arrival of the troops at Boston increased the popular excitement against the lieut. governor. When governor Bernard left the province in 1769 the administration devolved on the lieut. governor. In the next year, the Boston massacre, as it was called, occurred, and inflamed the public mind. He had a long controversy with the general court, on his proroguing it to Cambridge by order from the king. At this period, in meditating on the future, he concluded, that it would be prudent for him to remain chief justice, and to pass his days in peace; and his wishes he communicated to the British government. In the mean time, however, his commission as governor was received in March 1771. Unhappily for himself, he accepted the appointment, for from this time, till his departure for England, in 1774, he was in constant dispute, with the assembly, and council. The affair of his confidential letters caused him not a little trouble, and uneasiness. The last public difficulty, was the affair of the tea. A part of it had been consigned to two of his sons. On the arrival of the first ship with tea, a "body meeting," of the town and neighborhood was called at the Old South church on Tuesday Nov. 30, 1773, and it was resolved that the tea should be sent back; Mr. Rotch, the owner, being required not to enter the tea, and captain Hall the master not to land it. By order of the town the ship was brought from below the castle to a wharf, and a watch of twenty-five men was appointed for securing the ship. The governor sent a sheriff, who read a proclamation for the dispersion of the public, but a general hiss followed, and it was unanimously voted to proceed in defiance of the governor, and compel the owner and master to engage to send the tea back in the same vessel. When two other vessels arrived, the committee of safety required them to be brought to the same wharf. A compliance with the conditions imposed was impossible, therefore another body meeting was summoned Dec. 14, of the people of Boston, and the adjacent towns. When the governor's answer was returned to the "body," refusing to grant permission for the ships to leave the port, the meeting was dissolved, with an understanding that it was again immediately to re-assemble on the wharf. About fifty men covered with blankets, and appearing like Indians had previously marched by the Old South church, and gone on board the vessels. On the arrival of the "body," the Indians in two or three hours hoisted out of the holds of the ships 342 chests of tea, and emptied them into the sea. At this time the sons of liberty, as they were called, had annihilated all the powers of government. No officer dared to issue, or serve a precept. Feb. 24, 1774, he informed the legislature by message, that he had obtained his majesty's leave to go to England, and that he should soon avail himself of it. He sailed for England the first of June. After the publication of the letters in 1773, the council and house voted an address for the removal of the governor. A hearing on the petition was had before the privy council. The decision was in favor of "the honor, integrity and conduct," of the governor, and was approved by the king. He was deprived of all his offices in America, but received a pension from the British government. He died 1780, aged 69. He published, a brief state of the claim of the colonies, 1764; the history of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, from the first settlement thereof in 1623, until the year 1750, in 2 vols. 8vo. the first in 1760, and the second in 1767; a collection of original papers relative to the history of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, 8vo. 1769. These works are held in high estimation, by those, who are searching into the history of America. A third volume of the history of Massachusetts, from 1749, to 1774, has been published, from his manuscripts by his grandson, 8vo. London, 1828.

HUTTEN, Ulric de, a singular character, born 1488, of a respectable family at Steckenburg in Franconia. His inclination led him to literary pursuits, but his father considered such employment as beneath the character of a gentleman, and therefore to please him he went in 1511, to Pavia to study the law. The siege and plunder of that city by the Swiss disturbed his plans, and he returned to Germany, and contrary to his father's wishes applied again to literature. He travelled through Bohemia and Moravia, often without money or resources except what charity bestowed; but on his introduction to the emperor, 1516, he was received with kindness, and in consequence of the popularity of his compositions he received from his hand the poetical crown. He was a warm advocate for Luther's doctrines, and he published the pope's bull against that reformer with such sarcastic remarks and well directed raillery that the sovereign pontiff commanded the elector of Mentz to send him the satirist bound hand and foot. He escaped however from the storm to the castle of Ebernberg, and implored the protection of the emperor and of the electors of Saxony and Mentz; but though persecuted he did not manifest less zeal against the see of Rome. He was afterwards at Basil, where he was refused an asylum in the house of Erasmus, an affront which he satirically resented. He died at last in an island of the lake of Zurich, where he had taken refuge, Aug. 1523; but though he was such an advocate for the reformed religion, and inveighed so bitterly against the corruptions and irregularities of the Romish church, he exhibited in his own life the most profligate manners. Though admired for his genius and learning, Hutten was violent and passionate in his temper, and what was said of Demosthenes was applied to him by Camerarius, that he would have turned the world upside down, had his power been equal to his will. His works are numerous, but chiefly satirical, so that he has been compared by Thuanus to Lucian. His Latin poems were published 1539, 12mo. and have been since reprinted. He had also a share in the "Epistolæ Virorum Obscurorum," and printed editions of Pliny, Quintilian and Marcellinus, and of Livy, a manuscript copy of which he discovered 1518.

HUTTER, Leonard, a learned divine, born at Uhn 1563. He studied at Strasburg, Leipsic, Jena, &c. and was theological professor at Wittenberg, and lastly rector of the university. He died of a fever 1616. He wrote Compendium Theologicæ—Libri Christianæ Concordiæ—Collegium Theologicum—and other theological works. He was a strenuous adherent to Luther's principles.

HUTTON, Matthew, an English bishop. He was born of poor parents in Lancashire, but he had the advantage of a tolerable education, and was sent to Cambridge, where he became fellow of Trinity college, and lady Margaret's professor of divinity. He afterwards obtained a prebend of St. Paul's, was made master of Pembroke hall, and in 1567, preferred to the deanery of York. In 1589, he was made bishop of Durham, and five years after translated to York. He died 1605, aged 59.

HUTTON, William, an ingenious writer, was born at Derby, in 1723. From the age of seven to fourteen he worked at the silk-mill; on leaving which he was apprenticed to a stocking weaver. On the expiration of his time he labored as a journeyman, and employed his leisure hours in book-binding, by which he earned a little money. In 1750, he opened a shop for the sale of old books, to which he added a circulating library, at Birmingham, where he succeeded so well as to embark in the paper-business. Thus, by frugality and industry he arrived at opulence; but in 1791, his house at Birmingham, and seat near the town, were destroyed by the rioters; for which he obtained an inadequate compensation from the county. He died at the extraordinary age of ninety-two, Sept. 20, 1815. Mr. Hutton was the architect of his own fortune, as well as the cultivator of his own mind. His works are—1. The History of Birmingham, 8vo. 2. Journey to London. 3. History of the Court of Requests, and of the Hundred Court at Birmingham. 4. History of Blackpool. 5. History of the Battle of Bosworth Field. 6. History of Derby. 7. Description of the Roman Wall. 8. Remarks upon North Wales. 9. Tour to Scarborough. 10. Poems. 11. Trip to Coatham.

HUYGENS, Christian, a celebrated mathematician, son of Constantine, was born at the Hague 14th April 1629. From his very youth he discovered a strong genius for mathematics, and paid also great attention to music, arithmetic, geography, and mechanics. He for some time studied law at Leyden and Breda, but without relinquishing his favorite sciences, so that in 1651, he gave the world a specimen of his mathematical abilities, by the publication of his Theoremata de Quadraturâ Hyperbolæ Ellipsis et Circuli ex dato Portionum Gravitatis Centro. In 1649, he went to Holstein, and in 1655, to France, where he took the degree of doctor of laws at Angiers. In 1653, he published at the Hague his Horologium with a model of a new invented pendulum, and the following year appeared his system of Saturn in which he discovered a satellite attending that planet, and ascertained the existence of its permanent ring. In 1660, he again went to France, and the next year went to England, where he was made fellow of the Royal society. His improvements in polishing glasses, and in the air pump lately invented increased his fame; but he had a dispute with Wren and Wallis about the priority of discovering the laws of the collision of elastic bodies. In 1666, he went to reside at Paris in consequence of the flattering invitations of Colbert, and the honorable grant of a handsome pension. Here, constantly devoted to mathematical and scientific pursuits, he found his health gradually decline from excessive application, and in 1681, he left France for his native country, where he spent the remainder of life. He died at the Hague, 8th June 1695, in his 67th year, while his Cosmotheoros, a Latin treatise on the plurality of worlds was printing. This work appeared 1693, his Opuscula Posthuma, 1703, 4to.—and the next year his Opera Varia, in 4 vols. 4to. under the care of Gravesande. The same editor in 1728, published his Opera Reliqua, in 2 vols. 4to.—the first of which contains his treatises on Light and Gravity, and the second the Opuscula Posthuma. His works have been collected in 6 vols. 4to. Huygens was a great as well as a learned character, in virtue, in cheerfulness, and private worth equalled by few.

HYDE, Edward, earl of Clarendon, and lord chancellor of England, was descended from an ancient Cheshire family, and born at Dinton, Wilts, 16th Feb. 1608. In the parliament of 1640, he sat for Wooten Bassett, and distinguished himself as a speaker. He was elected for Saltash in the long parliament, and so well established was his reputation as an orator, and a man of influence, that when the commons presented articles of impeachment against the judges Davenport, Weston, and Trevor, he was commissioned to carry them to the lords, and he introduced them in a most excellent and energetic speech. He was not however so fully devoted to party as to forget his duties, the respect he had for the integrity of the church and the honor of the crown, would not permit him to assent to the measures which banished the bishops from parliament, and though one of the committee against the persecuted Strafford, he soon abandoned the office, and opposed the attainder when he perceived the violence and vindictive animosity of his accusers. With an equal spirit of virtue and patriotism he inveighed against the ordinance for raising the militia against the king, and when he saw his moderation suspected, he left the parliament, and in 1642, withdrew to the king at York. His abilities were well known to the unfortunate monarch, who soon after knighted him, and appointed him chancellor of the exchequer, and a privy councillor. In 1643, he attended the parliament at Oxford, and the next year he was one of the commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge, and afterwards went as secretary and assistant counsellor to the prince of Wales in his excursion into Wales. On the ruin of the royal cause, he passed into the Scilly islands, and in 1645, to Jersey, where he began to write his history of the rebellion. In 1648, on the king's death, he went to join his new master at Paris, and the next year he was sent with lord Cottington as ambassador extraordinary to Spain. He afterwards was made secretary of state, and in 1657, raised to the office of lord chancellor, which he continued to hold at the restoration. On his return to England with the king in 1660, he was made chancellor of Oxford, and created a peer, and the following year raised to the dignity of an earl. At length his integrity was suspected, and the king in 1667, dismissed him from the office of chancellor. His dismissal was immediately followed by his impeachment, but he avoided the impending storm, by flying into France, and consequently an act of banishment was passed against him. From Rouen he retired to Evreux in 1668, where one night he was attacked by a body of English seamen, who dragged him from his bed into the yard, and were going to despatch him, had not in the violent scuffle, their lieutenant opportunely come to disarm them and save his life. He afterwards went to Montpellier, and then returned to Moulins 1672, and the next year settled at Rouen, where he died 9th Dec. Besides his most valuable history of the rebellion, which was completed about 1673, and which was best edited at Oxford both in folio and 8vo. lord Clarendon wrote animadversions on Mr. Cressy's book, called Fanaticism, fanatically imputed to the catholic church by Dr. Stillingfleet, 8vo. 1672—A Survey of Hobbes's Leviathan, 4to. —Miscellaneous Tracts, collected and printed in one vol. fol.—an Account of his own Life to his Banishment, printed 1759.

HYDE, Henry, earl of Clarendon, son of the chancellor, was born 1638. He was early employed in the correspondence carried on by his father, as secrecy was very requisite in the management of the king's affairs. At the restoration he was made M. A. at Oxford, and afterwards appointed chamberlain to the queen. He was so much dissatisfied with the illiberal treatment which his father had met with from the court, that he opposed the measures of ministers in parliament, and distinguished himself among the most eloquent speakers. On his father's death he took his seat in the house of lords, still in the ranks of opposition; but his zealous exertions against the bill of exclusion restored him to favor, and in 1680 he was made a privy councillor, and on James' accession sent as viceroy to Ireland. His attachment to the protestants however was displeasing to a popish ministry; he was removed from Ireland, to make room for Tyrconnel, but on the abdication of the king, he refused to take the oaths of allegiance to William, and was therefore sent to the tower. After some months' confinement he retired into the country, and spent the remainder of his days in peace and privacy. He died 1709, aged 71. His State Letters, and his Diary for 1637, 1638 and 1690, were published 2 vols. 4to. 1763, at Oxford.

HYDE, Lawrence, second son of the chancellor, was, from the consequence of his family, early engaged about the court. He was made in 1661 master of the robes to the king, and in 1676 he was sent as ambassador to Poland, and was present as plenipotentiary at the congress of Nimueguen. He was made first lord of the treasury in 1679, and warmly opposed the bill which was brought into parliament to exclude the duke of York from the succession, and for his services he was raised to the peerage in 1681, by the title of viscount Hyde, and afterwards earl of Rochester. He was in 1684 appointed president of the council, lord treasurer, and in 1685 made knight of the garter, but though thus favored by the court, he refused to change his religion at the pressing solicitation of his new sovereign, the second James, and thus sacrificed his place to his principles. At the revolution he was one of the ecclesiastical commissioners, and was sent in 1700 to Ireland as lord lieutenant. His abilities recommended him equally to the next reign, as under Anne he was made president of the council. He died 1711, deservedly respected as an able statesman. The dedication of lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion was by him.

HYDE, Thomas, D.D., a learned writer, born 29th June 1636, at Billingsley, near Bridgenorth, Salop, where his father was minister. After studying the oriental languages under his father, he went to King's college, Cambridge, and was soon after recommended by Wheelock, an able linguist, to Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, whom he assisted in the completion of his polyglot bible. His services were such in the transcribing of the characters, in the correction and also in the setting forth of the Persian Pentateuch, that the learned editor acknowledged in the handsomest terms his abilities, and his meritorious assistance. In 1658 he entered at Queen's college, Oxford, and the year after by the direction of Richard Cromwell, the chancellor of the university, he was with every mark of respect, admitted M.A. He was afterwards elected under-librarian, and then head-librarian to the Bodleian, and in 1665 he published a Latin translation of Ueigh Beig's Observations on the Longitude and Latitude of the Stars. In 1666 he was made prebendary of Sarum, in 1678 archdeacon of Gloucester, and in 1691 he was elected Arabic professor on Dr. Pocock's death. In 1697 he was made regius professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christ-church, and in 1701 resigned the Bodleian. He died 13th Feb. 1703 at Christ-church. He was interpreter and secretary for oriental languages to Charles II. and his two successors, and for learning, judgment, and extensive information he was deservedly esteemed. The best known and most valuable of his works is, Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum, eorumque, Magorum, &c. published 1700, in 4to. dedicated to lord Somers, and abounding in most interesting and curious particulars, concerning the theology, history, and learning of Eastern nations.

HYDE, Edward, was appointed deputy-governor of North Carolina, in the place of Cary, and arrived in the colony August, 1710. In 1712 he received a new commission, constituting him governor. His short administration was conducted with prudence. It was remarkable for the rebellion instigated by Cary, and the commencement of the Indian war. The former was quelled by the assistance of the governor of Virginia. Both events were greatly prejudicial to the colony. Governor Hyde died Sept. 8th, 1812, and was succeeded by Eden.

HYDER-ALLY-KHAN, an Asiatic prince, born at Dinavelli, in the Mysore. He served under his father, and after his death 1751, he joined his brother, who was in alliance with France. His intrepidity in the field, and a series of successful enterprises against the Mahrattas and against the English power in the East, raised him not only to the rank of generalissimo of the king of Mysore's forces, but to the independent power of Suba of Servia. The sovereignty which his valor had acquired, he maintained by wisdom and sound policy, and only regarding the Europeans as intruders in the country, he formed the most artful and formidable plans for the complete expulsion of the English from Asia: the treaty which he had made in 1769 was violated in 1780; but the forces of Hyder, were unable, though very numerous, to withstand the bravery of the English troops, and the military skill of sir Eyre Coote. Hyder died in 1782, and was succeeded in his possessions by his son Tippoo Saib, who possessed equal valor, and was animated with the same hatred against the English name.

HYPERIUS, Andrew Gerard, a divine, born at Ypres. He studied in France, which he left upon embracing the reformation. He came to England, and was afterwards divinity professor at Marburg, where he died 1564, having published 7 vols. folio, on divinity and other subjects.

I.

IARCHAS, a learned Indian philosopher, who is reported, according to Jerome, to have given Apollonius Tyaneus several magical rings of very great power, bearing the name of the seven planets.

IARCHI, Solomon Ben Isaac, a Jewish rabbi, born at Troyes in Champagne, 1104. At the age of thirty, he travelled abroad; and not only visited Italy and Greece, but penetrated to Egypt, Palestine, Persia, Tartary, and Muscovy, and returned through Germany. He died at Troyes, 1180, and his body was carried to be buried at Prague. His learning was very extensive, and consequently he is considered as one of the most illustrious rabbies. Among other valuable works he wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, &c. which have been translated by Fred. Breithaupt, at Gotha, 1710, 4to. His authority and his interpretations of scripture, are much respected by the Jews. He had three daughters who married learned rabbies.

IBARRA, Joachim, a native of Saragossa, eminent as a printer to the king of Spain. His Bible—the Mozarabic Missal,—Mariana's History of Spain—Don Quixote—Gabriel's translation of Sallust—and other works, are excellent specimens of his correctness and the elegance of his printing. He invented a valuable sort of printing-ink, and died 1785, aged 60.

IBAS, bishop of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, in the fifth century, noted in ecclesiastical history on account of the opposite decisions of different councils, relative to the orthodoxy of his sentiments. He was a native of Syria, and was promoted to the see of Edessa, about 436. He was accused before the patriarch of Constantinople of favoring the Nestorian heresy, and abusing Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. After being acquitted, the same accusation of Nestorianism was brought against him the following year, and he was condemned and deposed by the council of Ephesus. In 451 he was declared an orthodox divine, and reinstated in his see by the council of Chalcedon. Several years after his death he was again condemned, as a Nestorian, in the general council held at Constantinople, in 553. A letter concerning the doctrine of Nestorius, written by Ibas, while he was a presbyter, formed a part of the celebrated "Three Chapters," condemned by the latter council as heretical, but received as orthodox by the churches of Africa and Illyria; whence originated a schism which lasted 150 years.

IBBOT, Benjamin, D.D. a learned divine, born 1690, at Beachamwell, Norfolk, where his father was rector. He was of Clare hall, Cambridge, and in 1700 removed to Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became a fellow, 1706. He soon after resigned on obtaining the patronage of Tenison the primate, who made him treasurer of Wells cathedral, and rector of St. Vedast and St. Michael le Querne in London. In 1716 he was made chaplain to the king. In 1713 and 15, he preached Bayle's lectures, and some time after was appointed assistant preacher to Dr. Samuel Clarke, and in 1724, was installed prebendary of Westminster. He died the next year, 5th April. His friend Clarke published, in 2 vols. 8vo. 36 of his sermons, after his death, for the benefit of his widow, and it was liberally patronised and supported by the great and opulent, who had often admired the eloquence and animation of his preaching.

IBRAHIM MANSOUR EFFENDI, an adventurer, whose real name was Cerfbere, was born at Strasburg, of a Jewish family. After having served in the republican hussars, he became so violent a royalist that he was imprisoned. In 1802 he went to Constantinople, turned Mahometan, and was employed to discipline the Turkish troops. He subsequently wandered through Russia, Sweden, and Denmark; held, under the name of Medelsheim, a government office in Westphalia; fought against the Servians; was for three years engineer to Ali Pacha; recommenced his wanderings, and extended them to various parts of Asia, Africa, and America; and at last, being in a starving state, shot himself at Paris, in 1826. He wrote a Memoir of Greece and Albania during the Government of Ali Pacha.

IBYCUS, a Greek lyric poet, a native of Rhegium, was born in the sixth century B. C. He wrote seven books of Odes, of which only a few fragments are extant. He was killed in a solitary spot by robbers, whose crime is said to have been discovered in a singular manner. While dying, he saw a flight of cranes passing, and called upon them to avenge him. As the murderers were walking in Rhegium, one of them saw some cranes overhead, and said to his companions, "Here are the avengers of Ibycus." This speech excited suspicion, and the truth was wrung from the criminals by torture.

IDACIUS, a Spanish prelate, author of a chronicle from the beginning of the reign of Theodosius to the 11th of Leo. His works were published by Sirmond, Paris, 1619, 8vo. He lived in the fifth century.

IDRIS, Gawr, a Welsh astronomer of such merit that one of the highest mountains of Wales still bears his name. He ranked as one of the three greatest astronomers of Britain. His age is unknown.

IFFLAND, Augustus William, a popular actor and dramatist, was born at Hanover in 1759, and from his childhood had a propensity to the stage, which his father vainly endeavored to repress. In 1770 he absconded from his home, and made his appearance at the Gotha theatre. He soon rose to the first rank among German actors. As a writer he was almost equally successful. He died, in 1814, at Berlin, where he was the court theatrical manager. In 1798 he published an edition of his works, which contained forty-seven comedies and tragedies; and he subsequently wrote many others.

IGNARRA, Nicholas, a learned Neapolitan antiquary, born in 1723. He was educated at the college of Urbano, at Naples, and at the age of twenty he taught Greek in that seminary. When Charles III. founded the Herculanean academy in 1755, Ignarra was appointed one of the first members. In 1763 he succeeded Mazzochias professor of sacred literature in the royal university, and in 1771 he became principal professor. In 1782 he was nominated director of the royal printing-office; and two years after, tutor to the hereditary prince Francis of Bourbon. He was made a canon of the cathedral of Naples 1794, and died in 1808. His principal work is entitled, "De Palaestra Neapolitana Commentarium," 1770, a very learned production. He also published the life of Mazzochi, and other pieces.

IGNATIUS, St. a father of the church, made bishop of Antioch by St. John the evangelist. After exhibiting many virtues in his province, he was seized by Adrian, and exposed to the fury of wild beasts in the Roman amphitheatre. Seven of his epistles are preserved.

IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the emperor Michael Curopalata, by Procopia, and when his father was deposed by Leo, he retired to a monastery, and took the ecclesiastical habit. He was made patriarch 847, but his severe reprimand of Bardas, an incestuous courtier, procured his disgrace, and Photius was, after some time, placed in his room. He was restored under Basil, and presided at the eighth general council held at Constantinople. He died 878.

IGNATIUS DE LOYOLA, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was born, in 1491, of a noble family, in the Spanish province of Guipuscoa. In 1521 he was severely wounded at the siege of Pampluna. The result of his meditations on a bed of pain was, sorrow for his debauched life, and a determination to devote himself to works of piety. He began by a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; after which he studied at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Paris; and began to preach and to make disciples. At first he was opposed, and even imprisoned; but at length the pope, in 1540, gave his sanction to the new order which Loyola had established, and appointed him its first general. He died in 1556, and was canonized in 1622.

IGOR, sovereign prince of Russia, after his father Rurick, invaded the east, and spread desolation over Pontus and Asia Minor. He died 945, and his widow Alga, who succeeded him, was converted to christianity.

IHRE, John, an erudite Swede, was born at Upsal, in 1707; was educated at the university there; was professor of poetry, rhetoric, and politics; was ennobled, and made a knight of the Polar star; and died in 1780. He is the author of Lexicon Dialectorum; Glossarium Sueco-Gothicum; A Dissertation on Runic Antiquities; and other works.

IKEN, Conrad, a learned German divine and Oriental scholar, who was a native of Bremen. He studied at Utrecht, and in 1714 became preacher at Lopik, and afterwards at Zutphen. In 1719 he removed to Bremen, and the same year obtained the degree of doctor of theology from the university of Utrecht. He was appointed public professor of theology in the gymnasium of Bremen in 1723; and he was also preacher in St. Stephen's church, and president of the German society in that city; as likewise a member of the academy of sciences at Berlin. He died in 1753, aged sixty-four. His principal works are, "Hebrew Antiquities," 8vo. of which there are several editions; "Dissertations on remarkable Passages in the Old and New Testaments," 2 vols. folio; and "A Treatise on the Daily Worship of the Temple, from the Talmud, with notes," 4to. All his works are written in Latin.

ILIVE, Jacob, an English printer, who in 1751 published a pretended translation of the "book of Jasher," a work full of absurdities. He also printed an oration, in which he maintained that this earth is hell, that the souls of men are apostate angels, and that the fire which will punish those consumed in this world will be immaterial. He also wrote other curious and eccentric pieces, which originated in a disordered imagination. He died 1768.

ILLESCAS, Consalvo, a Spanish ecclesiastic, author of an history of the Catholic Pontifical, with the Lives of the Popes, 2 vols. fol. 1570, continued by Lewis de Babia, to 1605, and afterwards by Mark de Gaudalaxara. He died 1580.

ILLYRIUS, Matthias Flaccus, or Francowitz, a learned divine, born 1520, at Albona, in Istria. He studied at Venice, and after acquiring a very extensive knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, he came to Wittenberg to complete his education under Luther and Melancthon, whose principles he warmly embraced. He was one of the writers of the "Centuriæ Magdeburgenses," but the learning, the application, zeal, and abilities which he possessed, were far overbalanced by a restless, passionate, and unyielding temper, which created much dissension among the protestants. He wrote several learned works, and died 1575, little lamented.

IMBERT, Bartholomew, a poet of Nismes, member of the academy of that city. He fell a sacrifice to a violent fever, 1790, aged 43. He wrote a poem on the judgment of Paris, a work of merit—a volume of fables, inferior to those of La Fontaine—Les Egaremens de l'Amour, a novel, and other compositions of considerable eminence.

IMBERT, Joseph Gabriel, a painter of Marseilles, the pupil of Vander-Meulen and Le Brun. Disgusted with the world, he, at the age of 34, embraced the austere order of St. Bruns, yet, in the midst of his fervent devotions, he employed some portion of time in painting. He died at Avignon, 1749, aged 83. His best piece is a view of Calvary, at the high altar of the Chartreux, Marseilles.

IMHOFF, James William, a famous genealogist, lawyer, and senator of Nuremberg, where he died 1723, aged 77. He was deeply versed in the history of states. He published "Historia Genealogica Regum Magnæ Britanniæ," and other works, containing the genealogies of princes, and of illustrious houses in Spain, Italy, France and Portugal, much esteemed.

IMPERIALI, John Baptist, a physician, born 1568, at Vicenza, and one of the 24 nobles of Genoa. He studied at Verona and Bologna, and taught philosophy at Padua. He practised afterwards with great success at Vicenza, where he died May 1623. He wrote verses in the elegant style of Catullus. He published a 4to. vol. "Exercitationum Exoticarum," Venice, 1603.

IMPERIALI, Giuseppe Renato, a cardinal, born at Genoa 1651. He is known for a magnificent and valuable library, which still adorns the city of Rome, and of which the catalogue was published 1711 folio, by Fontanini. In 1730, he was proposed to the conclave, to fill the vacant chair of St. Peter, and lost it by a single voice. He died 1737, aged 86.

INCHBALD, Elizabeth, a dramatist and novelist, whose maiden name was Simpson, was born, in 1756, at Stanningfield, near Bury, in Suffolk. At the age of sixteen she secretly quitted her family, being prompted by an irrepressible desire of visiting the metropolis. After escaping many dangers in her rash adventure, she married Mr. Inchbald, of Drury Lane Theatre, and was for several years upon the stage. In 1789, however, she quitted it, and thenceforth depended upon her literary labors. She died in 1821. She wrote nineteen dramas, some of which were deservedly successful; and two novels, the Simple Story, and Nature and Art, which rank among the standard works in that class of literature; and she edited the British Theatre, the Modern Theatre, and a Collection of Fares.

INCHOFER, Melchior, a German jesuit, born at Vienna, 1584. He studied the law with great success, but at the age of twenty-eight he went to Rome, and entered among the jesuits. He taught mathematics and divinity for some time at Messina, and published in 1630, in Latin, the blessed Virgin's Letter to the People of Messina, folio, which for a while gave offence; but upon his explanation, was deemed satisfactory to his fraternity. He was afterwards so displeased with the jesuits, that he wrote against them a severe satire, which appeared after his death, in Holland. He died at Milan 1648. He wrote an ecclesiastical History of Hungary, and several other works, which prove him to have been a very learned but credulous man.

INDULPHUS, a Scotch king, said to be the 77th since the foundation of that monarchy. When his kingdom was invaded by the Danes, he marched at the head of his forces to repel them, but unfortunately was shot by an arrow as he pressed them too closely in their flight to their ships.

INGENHOUS, John, a native of Breda, who became eminent as a chemist, and a physician. He learned in England the Suttonian method of inoculation, and then went by sir John Pringle's recommendation, to Vienna, where he inoculated the daughter of Joseph II. He was fellow of the royal society, and died 1799, aged 69. He is author of Experiments on Vegetables, 8vo.—Hulme's Treatise on the Gout, Scurvy, and Stone, translated into Latin, and Chemical Treatises on impregnating Waters, with fixed Air,—besides papers in the philosophical transactions.

INGERSOLL, Jared, a judge of the admiralty court, Connecticut, graduated at Yale college 1742. He settled at New Haven as a lawyer, and was agent of the colony in England in 1757; but being appointed distributor of the stamps in Con. under the stamp act, he lost his popularity. The people of New Haven compelled him to resign. Not deeming this resignation explicit, a large company from the eastern part of Connecticut set out on a journey to New Haven. They met Mr. Ingersoll at Wethersfield, when they compelled him to resign, and cry out three times, Liberty and Property. The next day 500 men escorted him to Hartford. He was afterwards judge of the admiralty. He died 1781.

INGERSOLL, Jared, L.L.D., judge of the district court of Philadelphia, graduated at Yale college in 1766, and attained a high rank as a lawyer in Philadelphia. He was a member of congress, and of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. The office of attorney general of Pennsylvania he resigned in 1816. At the time of his death he was judge. In 1812, he was the federal candidate for the office of vice-president of the United States. He died 1822, aged 73.

INGERSOLL, Jonathan, L.L.D., one of the distinguished men of Connecticut. He received his classical education at Yale college, renowned among the literary institutions of our country. In 1798, having practised law with much success, he was appointed judge, but in 1801, resigned that office. In 1816, he was chosen lieut. governor of the state. During many years of the latter part of his life, he was employed in various public trusts, and enjoyed through life the confidence of his fellow citizens. His character, as a member of society, and a christian, was free from reproach. He died Jan. 12, 1823, aged 76.

INGLIS, James, D.D., Bishop of the established church, in Nova Scotia. From 1777, to 1783, he was rector of Trinity church in the city of New York. Bishop Inglis died in 1816, aged 82 years.

INGLIS, James, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian denomination in Baltimore. He was distinguished for his eloquence. Dr. Inglis died Aug. 15, 1820; and soon afterwards a volume of his sermons was published.

INGOLDSBY, Richard, governor of New-York, succeeded Slaughter by appointment of the council in 1691. The following year governor Fletcher assumed the administration. The chief command again devolved on him on the death of Lovelace, in 1709. His short administration is remarkable for a second fruitless attempt against Canada. He was succeeded by Beckman in 1710.

INGOULT, Nicholas Lewis, a native of Gisors, eloquent as a preacher among the jesuits, and author of some sermons, and of the 8th vol. of the memoirs of the jesuit missionaries in the Levant. He died 1753, aged 64.

INGRAM, Robert, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Beverley school, and Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He obtained the perpetual curacy of Bridhurst, Kent, and afterwards Orston vicarage, Notts, and then Wormington and Boxted in Essex. He wrote a View of the Great Events of the seventh Plague, &c. concluding the Explanation of the Seven last Plagues, &c. 1735,—Account of the ten Tribes of Israel being in America, by Manasseh, Ben Israel, with Observations, 1792—Explanation of the Prophecy of the seven Phials of Wrath, 1804. He died 1804.

INGUIMBERTI, Dominic Joseph Marie d', a learned divine, born at Carpentras, of which city he became bishop. He was originally a Dominican, but afterwards devoted himself to the more austere order of the Cistercians, and by his learning and virtues, recommended himself to the notice of Clement XII. by whom he was made bishop, 1733. He died of an apoplexy, 1757, aged 75. He was a munificent as well as a pious prelate. His large revenues were applied to relieve the necessities of the poor, to the building of an hospital, the erecting of a large library, and other public and charitable uses. He published some treatises on Monastic Life,—on Theological Subjects,—besides the Lives of some Catholic Divines.

INGULPHUS, abbot of Croyland, was born in London, 1030, and educated at Westminster and Oxford. He was secretary to William of Normandy, before he invaded England, and in 1064, went to the Holy Land. He was made abbot by William, and died 1109. He was a great benefactor to his monastery which he rebuilt, and for which he obtained some important privileges. He wrote an History of the Abbey from 664, to 1091, published among the "quinque Scriptores," by H. Saville, London, 1596, folio, Frankfort, 1601, and Oxford 1684.

INNOCENT I., a native of Albano, elected pope after Anastasius the first, 402. He defended Chrysostom, and condemned the Novations and Pelagians. He died at Ravenna, 14th Feb. 417. Some of his letters have been published by Constant.

INNOCENT II., was elected pope after Honorius II., though part of the cardinals protested against his elevation to the papal chair, by appointing the son of a Jew, of the name of Peter de Leo, who assumed the appellation of Anacletus II. Innocent, though supported by the princes of Europe, except the kings of Scotland and Sicily, who acknowledged the authority of his rival, was at last driven from Rome by the tumults of Arnould de Bresse, and retired to France, where he held several councils at Clermont, Rheims, Puy, and other places. After the death of Anacletus, and the abdication of his successor, Victor IV. he returned to Rome, where he held the second Lateran council in 1139, attended by 1000 bishops, and crowned Lothaire as emperor. He afterwards made war against Roger, king of Sicily, and died at Rome 24th Sept. 1143.

INNOCENT III., Lothaire Conti, a native of Anagni, raised to the popedom, 1198, after Celestine tinus III. though only thirty-seven years old. To unite the christian princes in the recovery of the Holy Land, he preached a crusade against the Albigenses of Languedoc, and afterwards put Philip Augustus of France under an interdict, and excommunicated John, king of England, and Raymond, count of Toulouse. He raised the papal authority to such a height, that the Roman republic in its brightest days, was never more powerful, so that the pope was no longer the vassal of the neighboring princes, but the temporal master of all sovereigns, whom he could depose or restore agreeably to his absolute will. Under Innocent, the Dominicans, Franciscans, Trinitarians, and other orders arose, which were still to spread farther, and to confirm the power of Rome. This pope, thus distinguished by political sagacity and courtly intrigue, died at Perouse, 20th July, 1216. His works were published at Cologne 1515.

INNOCENT IV. Simibaldi de Fiesque, chancellor of the Roman church, and cardinal, was elected pope, 1243, after the death of Celestinus IV. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Frederic, emperor of Germany, who wished to invade the rights of the church, and he held a council at Lyons, in which he excommunicated and deposed the imperial delinquent. This severe measure was displeasing to several princes; but Louis king of France, interfered in vain with the inexorable pontiff, and the dispute was terminated only by the death of the emperor. Innocent died soon after his return from France, at Naples, 13th December 1254. He wrote Apparatus super Decretales, folio, and was the first who invested the cardinals with a red hat, as a mark of their dignity.

INNOCENT V., Peter de Tarantaise, a Dominican, archbishop of Lyons, and a cardinal, made pope 21st February 1276. He died the 26th June following. He wrote Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul,—Commentaries, and other works.

INNOCENT VI., Stephen Albert, a native of Pompadour in Limoges, was bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1352, elected pope after Clemeut VI. He was of a peaceful disposition, and labored earnestly to reconcile the kings of England and France. He is blamed for bestowing too many honors on his family, though their good conduct deserved the highest dignities. He died 12th September 1362. Some of his letters are extant.

INNOCENT VII., Come de Meliorati, a native of Sulmone in Abruzzo, was elected pope 1404, but opposed by the arms of Ladislaus, king of Naples, who drove him from Rome. He died 6th Nov. 1406.

INNOCENT VIII., John Baptist Cibo, a noble Genoese, of Greek extraction, bishop of Melfi, elected pope 1484. He labored much to re-establish union among Christian princes, and showed himself particularly attentive to the interests of his family, and of his children, whom he had had before he was admitted into the church. He was a benevolent pontiff, and died of an apoplectic fit, 23th July 1492, aged 60.

INNOCENT IX., John Anthony Facchinetti, a native of Bologna, made a cardinal by Gregory XIII. for his services at the council of Trent. He was elected pope 29th October 1591, and died two months after. He had formed the plan of clearing the port of Ancona, and other magnificent improvements.

INNOCENT X., John Baptist Pamphili, a native of Rome, who succeeded Urban VIII. 1644, at the age of 72. He persecuted the Barberinis, to whom he was indebted for his elevation; and he published his bull against the five propositions of the Jansenists. He died 6th January 1655, re-spected for many excellent qualities, though censured for some foibles.

INNOCENT XI., Benedict Odescalchi, a native of Como, in the Milanese, was made a bishop and a cardinal by pope Innocent X. and elected pope 1676. He reformed several abuses in the ecclesiastical states, and opposed with great firmness Louis XIV. by refusing to admit to bishoprics those persons who were recommended to him by the monarch, so that at his death not less than 30 dioceses were vacant. He condemned the errors of the Molinists and the Quietists, and effected a strong coalition between Germany, Poland, and Venice, against the Turks. He died 12th Aug. 1689, aged 78.

INNOCENT XII. Anthony Pignatelli, a noble Neapolitan, raised to the papal chair 1691, after Alexander VIII. He issued a bull against the system adopted by his predecessors, of paying particular honors to the relations of popes, and condemned the Maxims of the Saints, written by Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. He died 27th Sept. 1700, universally regretted by the Romans, who mourned him as a beneficent father.

INNOCENT XIII. Michael Angelo Conti, a native of Rome, the eighth pope of his family. He was elected 1721, and died 7th March 1724, aged 69. His infirmities prevented the execution of several plans of improvement which he had formed, and it is said that he died of grief for having bestowed a cardinal's hat on Dubois.

INSTITOR, Henry, a Dominican, inquisitor general of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and author, with James Springer, of Malleus Maleficorum, Lyons, 1484, often reprinted. He wrote besides, a treatise against Errors in the Sacrament, and a book on Monarchy.

INVEGES, Augustino, a Sicilian historian and antiquary, of the society of the Jesuits. He died 1677, aged 84. He wrote, besides an History of Palermo, in Italian, 3 vols. fol. 1649—Historia Paradisi Terrestris, 4to. 1641,—la Cartagine Siciliana, 4to. 1651.

IRELAND, John, was born at Trench farm, near Wem, in Shropshire; was brought up as a watchmaker; became a dealer in paintings and prints; and died, near Birmingham, in 1789. He is the author of Illustrations of Hogarth; and the Life and Letters of John Henderson.

IRELAND, Samuel, an ingenious mechanic in Spitalfields. His skill in drawing and engraving became to him the source of distinction and comfortable independence. He published a picturesque tour through Holland, France, and Brabant, 1790.—Picturesque Views of the Thames, 8vo. 1792.—Picturesque Views of the Medway, 1793.—Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth, 1794.—Picturesque Views and Account of the Inns of Court. He died 1800. He has been deservedly censured for his attempt to impose upon the world a folio volume which he called a Collection of Letters, and other Papers, written by Shakspeare. The forgery for some time excited much of the public attention, and afterwards his son published a declaration in which he acknowledged himself alone guilty of this attempt to impose upon the good sense of the public.

IRETON, Henry, a republican general in the civil wars. He possessed great abilities, and uncommon valor, and deserved the friendship of Cromwell, whose eldest daughter, Bridget, he married. He was sent to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and died at the siege of Limerick, 26th Nov. 1651, much lamented. His body was buried with great pomp in Westminster abbey, but at the restoration it was dug up and exposed on Tyburn gibbet, with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw. His daughter Bridget married Thomas Bendish.

IRNERIUS, called also Wernerus or Guarnerus, a German lawyer of the 12th century. He studied at Constantinople and Ravenna, and taught at Bologna. He was properly the restorer of the Roman law, and therefore deserved from his numerous pupils the name of "Lucerna Juris." He was the father of the Glossators, and prevailed upon the Emperor Lotharius, whose chancellor he was, to introduce the creation of doctors in the universities, an honor which spread from Bologna, where it first had its rise, to the other learned bodies of Europe. He died 1150, and was buried at Bologna.

IRONSIDE, Gilbert, a native of Hawkesbury, England, educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and made rector of Winterbourn, Dorsetshire. He was author of a Sermon 1660, and of seven questions of the Sabbath, 4to. and at the restoration he was made bishop of Bristol, where he died 1671, aged 83.

IRVING, William, a merchant of the city of New York. He was also distinguished as a gentleman of literary taste, and in 1812 became a member of congress. Mr. I. was a brother of Washington Irving; and it is said furnished several papers for the noted work under the name of Salmagundi. He died in 1821.

IRVINE, William, major-general, was a native of Ireland. Educated for the medical profession, he served as a surgeon on board of a British ship in the war which began in 1754, and after the peace of 1763 settled at Carlisle, Pennsylvania. In 1774 he was a member of the state convention. In 1776 he served in Canada, and accompanied col. Thompson, who was despatched by gen. Sullivan from Sorelle to dislodge the enemy from Trois Rivieres, but was taken prisoner, and remained as such at Quebec nearly two years, until he was exchanged. On his release he was promoted to the command of the second Pennsylvania regiment. In 1781 the defence of the north western frontier, threatened by the British and Indians was intrusted to him. After the war he was elected a member of congress. During the whiskey insurrection of 1794 he was a commissioner to the insurgents on the part of the state, and his peaceful mission having failed, he was more successful at the head of the militia. Removing about this time from Carlisle to Philadelphia, he was appointed intendant of military stores. He died 1804, aged 63.

IRWIN, Jared, general, governor of Georgia, was a soldier of the American revolution. He was a member of the convention, which adopted the constitution in 1789; and was governor from 1796 to 1798, and from 1806 to 1809. He died 1818, aged 68.

ISAAC COMMENUS, Greek emperor in the room of Michael Stratoticus, 1057. After a prudent but turbulent reign he retired to the solitude of a monastery, leaving the crown to Ducas Constantine, and died two years after, 1061.

ISAAC, Angelus, Greek emperor after Andronicus Comnenus, 1185. He was imprisoned and deprived of his sight by his brother Alexius, after whose death he was restored to the throne. He died 1204.

ISAAC, Caro, a rabbi who left Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand, which in 1492 banished the Jews from his dominions, within four months, except they became Christians. He went first to Portugal, and then retired to Jerusalem, where he devoted himself to study and solitude. He wrote "the Generations of Isaac" which is a commentary on the Pentateuch of Moses. The book is esteemed, and has passed through several editions, the last of which is at Amsterdam, 1708.

ISABELLA, daughter of Philip the Fair, king of France, was born 1292. She married 1308. Edward, afterwards the second of England, but her licentiousness disgraced her character, and embittered the latter part of her life; and her partiality to her favorite, Mortimer, proved so offensive to her son Edward III. that he ordered her to be confined in the castle of Rising, where she languished 28 years of captivity, and died at the age of 75.

ISABELLA, of Bavaria, married Charles VI. king of France, 1385. She was a woman of licentious manners, of an intriguing disposition, and of a most vindictive temper. She dishonorably sacrificed her only son to her partiality for the English, and wished for the triumph of Henry V. of England, who had married her sixth daughter Catharine, rather than the prosperity of her country under the government of their natural sovereign. She died little lamented, at Paris, 30th Sept. 1435, aged 64.

ISABELLA, daughter of John II. of Castille, was born 1451, and married 1469 Ferdinand V. king of Arragon. She succeeded to the kingdom of Castille 1474, and though opposed by the pretensions of her niece, she crushed all opposition, and by the union of Castille and Arragon she was with her husband proclaimed sovereign of Spain. She possessed great powers of mind, and was distinguished by her integrity, her justice, and her public and private virtues. Her reign is remarkable for the conquest of Grenada from the Moors, and the discovery of America, by the bold genius of Columbus, but it was disgraced by the introduction of the sanguinary tribunal of the inquisition. Isabella died of a dropsy 1504, aged 54, leaving only one daughter, Jane, who married Philip of Austria and became mother of Charles V.

ISABELLA, daughter of Alphonso, duke of Calabria, married by proxy in 1489, John Galeazzo Sforza, a minor. The union of these lovers was put off by the intrigues of Lewis Sforza, the uncle and the guardian of the bridegroom, who had himself fallen in love with Isabella; but when his guilty addresses were received with the contempt which they merited, he determined on revenge. By marrying Alphonsina the daughter of the duke of Ferrara, he gained an active accomplice in his criminal intentions, the unfortunate Galeazzo was poisoned, and the disconsolate Isabella fled to Naples, and after seeing the destruction of all her family, she retired to a small town in the neighborhood, where she died 1524. Her daughter married Sigismund king of Poland.

ISABELLA, sister of Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, married in 1539, John Zopolita, wai-vode of Transylvania, afterwards king of Hungary. The birth of a son so pleased the father, who was engaged in the siege of Fogarra, that he communicated his joy to his army, and in a feast which he gave his soldiers he unfortunately fell a victim to his great intemperance 1540. Thus left unprotected and unable to resist the arms of Ferdinand of Austria, against whom her husband had made war, she in an evil hour called to her aid Solymán the Turkish sultan, who instead of protecting her, seized her capital, and obliged her to fly to Transylvania, of which she was soon after stripped by the great successes of her enemies. She recovered

Transylvania in 1556, and died two years after, respected for her magnanimity and courage.

ISEUS, a Greek orator, was born about 418 B. C. at Chalcis, in Syria, and was a disciple of Lysias and Isocrates. He established a school of eloquence at Athens, and Demosthenes was one of his pupils. Of his many orations only eleven are now extant; ten of which have been translated by Sir William Jones. He is said to have been the first who gave names to the figures of rhetoric.

ISELIN, James Christopher, a learned German, born at Basil 1681. He was professor of history and eloquence at Marburg, 1704, and was advanced to the chair of divinity at Basil, 1711. He died at Basil 1737. Of his numerous writings the chief are "De Gallis Rhenum transeuntibus, Carmen Heroicum—de Historicis Latinis Melioris Ævi Dissertatio—Dissertations and orations on various subjects.

ISELIN, Isaac, an eminent philosopher and ingenious writer, born at Basil, in 1723. He was educated at Göttingen, where he studied jurisprudence and statistics, and on taking the degree of LL.D. he published a thesis, entitled "Tentamen Juris publici Helvetici." He afterwards visited Paris, and returning home, became a candidate for the professorship of history, in 1754, but he was disappointed of the situation. He was however elected a member of the grand council of Basil, and in 1756 obtained the important office of secretary. He then published a tract entitled "The Dream of a Friend to Mankind," of which there were several editions. He also wrote "Free Thoughts on the Depopulation of my Native City," 1758, 8vo; "The History of Mankind," 2 vols. 8vo, the most important of all his productions, and a periodical work called "Ephemerides of Mankind." In conjunction with Solomon Gesner and Hirzel, he founded the Helvetic Society; and in 1777 he assisted in the establishment of a similar society at Basil, on a plan which he had himself elaborated. He carried on an extensive correspondence, both in Switzerland and in foreign countries, and wrote many articles in a periodical journal called the "German Library," "Deutsche Bibliothek." Iselin died in 1782.

ISHMAEL I., sophy of Persia, was descended from Ali the son-in-law of Mahomet, and distinguished himself by his valor, prudence and wisdom, on the throne. He died 1523 in the 18th year of his reign.

ISHMAEL II. sophy of Persia after Thomas, 1575, was the murderer of his eight brothers, and at last was poisoned, 1579, by his own sister, who resented his embracing the tenets of a different sect of Mahometans.

ISIDORE of Seville, a bishop of Seville, called the doctor of his age, and the ornament of his church, from his learning and humanity, died 636, after presiding 40 years over his see. He was author of Commentaries on the Scripture—a Chronicle from Adam to 626—a treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers, and other works.

ISINGRINIUS, Michael, an eminent printer of Basil, who printed in Greek the works of Aristotle in a style and manner much superior to those of former editors, even of Aldus Manutius. His edition of the history of plants by Fuchs was equally admired. He lived in the 16th century.

ISLA, John, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in 1714, at Segovia. After the expulsion of his order from Spain, he settled at Bologna, in Italy, where he died in 1783. His principal work is The Life of Friar Gerund, a pleasant satire upon monkish ignorance, and upon the prevailing faults of pulpit eloquence. He also wrote A Compendium of Spanish History, from Duchesne; Familiar Letters; The Great Day of Navarre; and Gil Blas restored to his Country.

ISOCRATES, one of the ten great Attic orators, was born B. C. 436 at Athens, and was the son of a musical instrument maker. Prodicus, Gorgias, and Theramenes were his preceptors in eloquence. His timidity, and the weakness of his voice, prevented him from taking a part in public business; but he composed pleadings for others, and opened a school of oratory, in which he formed many illustrious speakers and statesmen. Warmly attached to the liberties of his country, he starved himself to death in consequence of the fatal issue of the battle of Cheronea. Twenty-one of his harangues are extant.

ITTIGIUS, Thomas, a German divine, born at Leipsic 1644. He was educated at Leipsic, Rostock and Strasburg, and rose by his merit to the professorship of divinity at Leipsic in 1691. He died April 1710. He wrote besides dissertations in the Leipsic acts—Dissertatio de Hæresiarchis Ævi Apostolice eique Proximi—Prolegomena ad Josephi Opera—Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ primi & secundi Seculi Selecta Capita,—Exhortationes Theologicæ & Historia Synodorum.

ITURBIDE, Augustin, emperor of Mexico, was born, in 1784, at Valladolid, in New Spain, of a distinguished family, and entered the military service at the age of seventeen. During the first Mexican revolution, Iturbide fought against the insurgents; but in 1820 he took up arms on the side of liberty. His splendid successes were successively rewarded by the rank of generalissimo, president of the congress, and finally, in May, 1822, of emperor, with the title of Augustin the First. In 1823, however, he was deposed and banished. He returned in 1824, but was immediately arrested and was shot on the 19th of July.

IVANOF, Feodor Feodorovitch, a Russian dramatist, was born in 1777; served in the army, from which he was removed to the commissariat department; and died at Moscow in 1816. He wrote the tragedy of Martha, or the Conquest of Novgorod; and the comedies of Virtue Rewarded, The Old Family, the New-married Couple, and All is not Gold that glistens.

IVES, or YVES, bishop of Chartres 1093, was born at Beauvais, 1035. He died after a life of great piety 1115, and was canonized. There are extant of his compiling "a Collection of Decrees"—Exceptiones Ecclesiasticarum Regularum—Sermons—and a Chronicon.

IVES, John, an eminent antiquarian, born at Yarmouth England, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge. He was raised to the revived office of Suffolk herald, but without any emolument, and he was also fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He died of a deep consumption 9th June, 1776, aged 25 years. His library and collection of coins, medals, and paintings, were sold by auction. He published "three select papers" from his own collection, besides remarks upon the Garianonum of the Romans, the scite and remains fixed and described, 12mo. 1774.

IVES, Edward, an English traveller of the 18th century. He was a surgeon by profession, and sailed for the East Indies in that capacity, in 1754, with admiral Watson. After the death of that officer in 1757, he left the service, and returned to England. Part of his passage was overland, as he went up the Tigris and visited Mosul, Aleppo, and other places, previously to embarking again at Latakia, for the island of Cyprus, whence he sailed to Leghorn and then took his route through Italy, Germany, and Holland, to England, where he arrived in March 1759. He published an account of his voyage to India, and the events which occurred there in 1755, 56, and 57, and travels from Persia to England, by an unfrequented route, containing much interesting information. He died September 25, 1786.

IVES, Levi, M.D., a physician, was born in 1750, and died 1826, aged 76. He was one of the founders of the New Haven medical society, and one of the conductors of the "Cases and Observations," a medical journal at New Haven, the first in America. With professional skill he acquired only a competence.

IVETEAUX, Nicholas Vauquelin, seigneur de, a French poet, born at Fresnaye. He was made preceptor to the duke of Vendome, the son of Gabrielle d'Estrées, and afterwards to Louis XIII. when dauphin. The licentiousness of his manners rendered him incapable of holding the benefices which the court intended for him, and when reproached by Richelieu for his dissolute conduct, he retired to his house in St. Germain, where he spent the rest of his life in epicurian ease and voluptuous indulgence. As he considered the pastoral life the most agreeable, he dressed himself in the habit of a shepherd, and attended by his mistress disguised as a nymph playing on the harp, he wasted away his time in the grossest sensuality, regardless of the opinions of the world, or the calls of religion. He died 1649, aged 90, at a country seat near Germigny. He wrote Institution d'un Prince, a poem of merit,—Sonnets, and Songs, in the Delices de la Poesie Francoise, 1620, 8vo.

IWAN V., John Alexiowitz, second son of Michaelowitz, succeeded his brother, Feodor Alexiowitz, 1682, on the throne of Russia. As his powers of mind, however, were very weak, he was declared incapable of reigning, and sent to a monastery, and the sceptre was placed in the hands of his brother Peter. This change displeased his sister, Sophia, who wished to obtain the supreme power, and by her intrigues, Iwan was drawn from his confinement, and seated on the throne with her and with Peter. This divided sovereignty continued for six years; but the design of Sophia to sacrifice her brother Peter to her ambition, proved abortive, and the proscribed prince confined his guilty sister in a convent, and seized the reigns of government alone. Iwan died 1696, aged 35, leaving five daughters.

IWAN VI., of Brunswick Bevern, succeeded, when three months old, his great aunt, Anne Ivanova, as emperor of Russia, 1740. The guardianship of his minority was intrusted, by the dying empress, to her favorite, Ernest, duke of Biren; but soon after the regent was removed, and the emperor's mother, Anne of Mecklenburg, was placed at the head of the government as guardian. The next year the unfortunate child was dethroned, and confined in a fortress, from which a monk had the art to remove him, and to carry him to Germany. The attempt did not, however, succeed, and Iwan was again immured in a monastery, where he was at last put to death, 16th July, 1764, by order of Catherine, the wife of Peter III. who ascended the throne, 1762.

IZARD, Ralph, a distinguished citizen of South Carolina. From 1789, to 1795, he was a member of the Senate of the United States. In this situation he was characterised for eloquence; and, in the opinion of those who knew him, his honesty and patriotism, were unquestionable. He lived to the age of sixty-six years, his death taking place in 1804.

IZARD, George, a native of South Carolina, who rose to honorable distinction. Having received a classical education, he spent some time travelling in the different parts of Europe. On his return he entered the army as a captain of artillery, and rose to the rank of major-general. In the late American war he was at one time stationed on the northwestern frontier. Upon the close of the war he took up his residence in Philadelphia, where he remained till appointed governor of Arkansas. His death took place at Little Rock, Nov. 22, 1823.

J.

JAAPHAN, Ebn Tophail, an Arabian philosopher at the end of the twelfth century, author of a romance, called the History of Hai Ebn Yokdhan, in which he asserts that by the light of nature, a man may acquire a knowledge of things, and of God. It was published with a Latin translation 1671, by E. Pococke, and in 1703 appeared in English by Simon Ockley.

JABLONSKI, Daniel Ernest, a popish divine, born 20th Nov. 1660, at Dantzic. He studied in Germany, and afterwards visited Holland and England. He was afterwards minister of Magdeburg, Lessa, Koningsberg, and Berlin, and he zealously opposed infidelity, and endeavored in his ecclesiastical capacity, but in vain, to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists. He translated into Latin, Bentley's Sermons and Boyle's Lectures, and wrote some Dissertations on the Land of Gessen, and other works highly esteemed. He died May 1741.

JABLONSKI, Theodore, counsellor of the court of Prussia, and secretary to the royal society of sciences at Berlin, was a man of extensive erudition, and highly esteemed for his private virtues. He was so modest that he did not prefix his name to his works. He wrote Dictionnaire Francois et Allemand, & Allemand Francois 1711—a Course of Morality in German 1713—Dictionnaire Universel des Arts & des Sciences 1721—and a Translation of Tacitus de Mor. Germ. 1724.

JABLONSKI, Paul Ernest, son of Daniel Ernest, was born 1693, at Berlin, and became theology professor at Frankfort on the Oder. He wrote Disquisitio de Linguâ Lycaonicâ de Memnone Græcorum—Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—e, Pantheon Ægyptiorum, a learned work, 3 vols. 8vo. He died 1757.

JACETIUS, Francis de Cataneis, an Italian writer, born at Florence 1466. He was the disciple and successor of Marsilius Ficinus, as professor of Platonic philosophy at Florence, and died 1552. He wrote a treatise of beauty, and another of love, according to Plato, and other works, printed together at Basil 1563.

JACKSON, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, born 1579 at Willowing, county of Durham. He entered at Queen's college, Oxford, 1595, and the year after removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was elected fellow in 1606. He became D.D. 1622, and two years after took a living, and also the vicarage of Newcastle, which he resigned in 1630, when elected president of his college. In 1635, he was made prebend of Winchester by the friendship of Neil, bishop of Durham and of Laud, and in 1638, he was raised to the deanery of Peterborough. He died 1640, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He was a man of great learning, singular piety, and of an exemplary character. He was well acquainted with the fathers, and his works, which are numerous, display great knowledge of scripture. They were published in 3 vols. folio, consisting of sermons, besides commentaries on the apostles' creed. They were much admired by bishop Horne, as well as by Mr. Merrick of Trinity college, Oxford.

JACKSON, John, an English divine, born 4th April 1686, at Lensey, Yorkshire, where his father was minister. He was educated at Doncaster school, and afterwards entered at Jesus', Cambridge, where he studied Hebrew under Ockley. In 1710, he was presented to the living of Rossington by the corporation of Doncaster, and married 1712. He was refused the degree of M.A. at Cambridge, in consequence it is said of his heretical opinions; and by embracing tenets opposite to the church, he embroiled himself greatly at Leicester, where he went to reside as confrator of Wigston hospital. As he refused to subscribe to the articles, he lost in 1724, a prebend in Salisbury church, though on the death of his friend Dr. Clarke, in 1729, he succeeded to the mastership of Wigston hospital by the presentation of the duke of Rutland. As he was fond of controversy, his works are numerous on theological subjects, and display labor, judgment and learning. It is to be lamented, that he showed such virulence in his conduct, which drew upon him the resentment of the clergy, so that he was at Bath, refused the sacrament, and in Leicester forcibly denied the use of the pulpit. He opposed the doctrine of the trinity, and attacked Warburton and others, even some of his friends, in his pamphlets. His last, and by far his best work, is "Chronological Antiquities" 3 vols. 4to. 1752. He prepared materials for an edition of the Greek testament, of which, however, his infirmities prevented the publication. He died 12th May 1763, leaving four children only, out of the 12 whom his wife bore him. Memoirs of him were published by Dr. Sutton of Leicester, 1764.

JACKSON, Arthur, a divine ejected from his living of St. Faith, in London, 1662, for nonconformity. He was afterwards imprisoned, and fined 500*l.* for refusing to give evidence against Christopher Love. He was chosen at the restoration to present, in the name of the assembly of divines, a bible to Charles II. and was also, one of the ministers who attended the Savoy conference. He wrote a commentary on the bible, 3 vols. 4to. and died 1666.

JACKSON, William, a native of Exeter, eminent as a musical composer, and as a writer. He first studied music at Exeter, and afterwards removed to London under the care of Mr. Travers, and in 1777, was chosen organist of St. Peter's church in his native town, where he died 1803, aged 73. Besides books of songs, hymns, sonatas, and canzonets, of merit, he wrote thirty letters on various subjects lately edited, a third time,—the four Ages 8vo.—Treatise on the present State of Music, 12mo.—Papers in the essays of the Exeter society, &c. One of his sons was ambassador at the court of Sardinia, afterwards in France, and at Berlin, and another accompanied lord Macartney, as his secretary to China.

JACKSON, James, governor of Georgia, was a native of England, and came to America in 1772.

Early in the American revolutionary war he joined the army; in 1778, he was brigade major; in 1781, he commanded the legionary corps of the state. When the British evacuated Savannah, July 12, 1782, he received the keys. For his various services the Assembly of the state presented him with a house and lot in Savannah. On the return of peace he engaged with success in the practice of the law. In 1789, he was chosen a member of congress, and soon afterwards a senator, which office he resigned in 1795. He was major general of the militia; and governor from 1798, till his election as senator in 1801. He died 1806, aged 43.

JACKSON, Dr. Cyril, an eminent divine, was born in 1746, at Stamford, where his father was a medical practitioner. He received his education at Westminster-school, from whence he removed to a studentship at Christ-church, Oxford, where he proceeded to his master's degree in 1771, to that of B.D. in 1777, and that of D.D., in 1781. He became sub-preceptor to King George, IV. for which he was made canon of Christ-church, and on the elevation of Dr. Bagot to a bishopric, he succeeded him in the deanery, which he resigned in 1809. Dr. Jackson was an excellent governor of his college and an elegant scholar, but he as studiously avoided the press as he did the mitre, though the primacy of Ireland was offered to him, as well as an English bishopric. He died at Felpham, in Sussex, in 1819. His brother Dr. William Jackson, born at Stamford, in 1750, became prebendary of York, regius professor of Greek at Oxford, preacher to the society of Lincoln's inn, canon of Christ-church, and in 1811, bishop of Oxford. He died in 1815. The bishop was a sound mathematician, and a learned divine. He translated a tract on the Sieve of Eratosthenes into Latin, and published some sermons.

JACOB, Henry, a native of Kent, educated at Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards retired to his living, and died 1621, aged 60. He is author of some treatises against the Brownists, and of a work on our Saviour's sufferings.

JACOB, Henry, son of the preceding, became an able Orientalist under Erpenius. He was fellow of Merton college, Oxford, but was ejected during the civil wars, and died at Canterbury 1652, aged 44. He wrote, according to Wood, Delphi Phœnicizantes, edited by Dickenson—and other works, still in MS.

JACOB, a Cistercian monk in Hungary, who assembled a number of peasants in France and Germany, on pretence of going with this fanatical multitude to deliver the Holy Land from the infidels. He pretended also to be commissioned by the Virgin to set Louis king of France at liberty, who had been made prisoner by the Saracens, and for this purpose he preached a crusade; but the government at last refused to countenance the measure; and therefore the enthusiastic zealots were dispersed, and Jacob soon after murdered by a butcher in the beginning of the 13th century.

JACOB, Ben Naphthali, a rabbi of the 5th century, of the sect of the Masorites, educated at Tiberias in Palestine. The invention of points in the Hebrew letters instead of vowels, is attributed to him, and to his friend Ben Asser, in the year 476.

JACOBÆUS, Oliger, professor of philosophy and physick at Copenhagen, was born July 1650, at Arhusen, Jutland, where his father was bishop. After studying at Copenhagen, he travelled over France, Italy, Germany, Hungary, England, and the Netherlands, and on his return was honorably received by his university, who appointed him professor, and by the Danish king, who gave him the management of his cabinet of curiosities, and made him counsellor of his court of justice. The loss of his wife in 1698, robbed him of all his happiness, and though he attempted to avert his grief by a second marriage, he fell a sacrifice to his melancholy 1701. He wrote de Ranis & Lacertis Dissertation—Oratio in Obitu T. Bartholini, his father in law and Gaudia Arctoi Orbis, besides some elegant Latin poems.

JACOBI, John George, a German poet, who was a native of Dusseldorf. In 1758, he became a student of theology at Gottingen, whence he removed to Helmstadt, but finished his education at the former university. He was made professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Halle; and having formed an acquaintance with the poet Gleim, through his interest he obtained a prebend in the church of St. Boniface at Halberstadt. The emperor Joseph II. in 1784, gave him the chair of belles lettres at Fribourg, which he retained during the remainder of his life, the termination of which occurred January 4, 1814. Jacobi was an imitator of the French poets Chapelle, Chaulieu, and Gresset. His "Journey in Winter," and "Journey in Summer," are light and amusing compositions, consisting of verse and prose, which have been translated into French, and published at Hamburgh, and at Lausanne. He also wrote "Epistles," in verse and prose; "Songs," "Cantatas;" "Operas;" "Comedies;" "Romances;" "Fables;" "Dissertations;" and "Sermons." Jacobi was likewise engaged as editor of the "Iris," a periodical journal, which contributed much to spread among the Germans a taste for polite literature; and he enriched with his productions the "German Library of the Fine Arts," published by professor Klotz; "The German Mercury," of Wieland, &c.

JACOMB, Thomas, D.D. a native of Leicestershire, educated Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Cambridge, to become fellow of Trinity college. In 1647, he obtained the living of St. Martin, Ludgate, from which he was ejected for non-conformity in 1662. He died 1687, in the family of lady Exeter, where he had found protection and maintenance. He wrote a treatise of Holy Dedication—Sermons—a Commentary on the eighth of Romans—and contributed also to the continuation of Pool's Annotations.

JACOPONE, da Todi, an Italian poet, cotemporary with Dante. On becoming a widower, he distributed his property to the poor, and entered into the order of Minors, and acquired the surname of the Happy, in consequence of his character of sanctity. He wrote several canticles, full of fire and zeal, besides Stabat Mater, a Latin poem. He died very old, 1306. The best edition of his Canticles is that of Venice, 1617, 4to. with notes.

JACQUELOT, Isaac, a protestant minister of Vassy, born 1647. He retired to Heidelberg and the Hague at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and then became chaplain to the king of Prussia, who had accidentally heard him preach. He died at Berlin 1709. He wrote Dissertations on the Messiah—2 vols. of Sermons—letters to the French Bishops—and some controversial tracts.

JACQUET, Lewis, a native of Lyons, who died 1793, aged 61. It is said that he resembled in his manners, the famous J. J. Rousseau, and therefore he was his warm admirer and imitator. His parallel between Greek and French tragic poets, possessed great merit, and some of his essays were honored with the laurel by the Besancon academy.

JACQUIER, Francis, a native of Vitry, who died at Rome 1788, aged 77. He was eminent as a divine and mathematician, and wrote, assisted by Le Sueur, Newton's Philos. Natur. Principia Mathem. 4 vols. 4to.—Institutiones Philos. ad Studia Theol. accomm. 5 vols. 12mo. He published besides a treatise of Algebra, and other works in Italian.

JACQUIN, Nicholas Joseph, a celebrated botanist, who was a native of Leyden. He was born in 1727, and was educated for the medical profession. His countryman Van Swieten, induced him to visit Vienna, where his botanical science procured him the notice of the emperor Francis I, who sent him to the West Indies, to collect curious plants for the gardens of Schoenbrun. He commenced his voyage in 1754, and returned to Germany, after an absence of six years, with a rich store of plants from the Antilles, Jamaica, St. Domingo, and Curassoa. He published in 1760, an account of his researches and collections, with which he had enriched the gardens of Schoenbrun, and of the university of Vienna, which were under his direction. Two years after appeared his catalogues of plants growing in the neighborhood of Vienna; and in 1773, a magnificent work, entitled "Floræ Austriacæ," folio. with five hundred colored engravings. He engaged in the practice of medicine in the Austrian metropolis; and also occupied the professorships of chemistry and botany in the university of that city. His numerous and useful labors were rewarded by a patent of nobility; he was created a baron in 1806, decorated with the cross of the order of St. Stephen, and made a counsellor of mines and coinage. He was also a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of many other learned associations. He died October 24th, 1817. His scientific publications are numerous, and they are held in high estimation.

JADDUS, was high priest of Judæa when Alexander approached Jerusalem, determined to destroy it, and by meeting the monarch in his pontifical robes, he converted his resentment into reverence, and to the offering of sacrifices to the God of Israel.

JAEGER, John Wolfgang, a Lutheran divine, born at Stuttgart, where the duke of Wirtemberg, whose son he had educated, made him his counsellor, and also preacher of the cathedral, and abbot of the monastery of Adelberg. In 1702, he was made divinity professor, chancellor of the university, and provost of Tubingen, and died 1720. He wrote, Ecclesiastical History compared with profane—a Compendium of Divinity—Observations on Puffendorf and Grotius—a treatise of Laws—Spinoza's Life and Doctrines examined, and other Latin works.

JAGO, Richard, an English poet, born 11th Oct. 1715, at Beaudesert, Henley, Warwickshire, where his father was rector. From Solihul school, where he had among his fellow pupils, Shenstone, he went in 1732 as servitor to University college. In 1737 he took orders. He obtained the livings of Harbury and Chesterton, 1746, and in 1754 lord Clare obtained for him the vicarage of Snitterfield, and in 1771, his patron Lord Willoughby de Broke, gave him instead of Harbury, Kilmcote in Leicestershire, worth 300*l.* a year. His elegy on the Blackbirds appeared in 1752, in Hawkesworth's Adventurer, and as it was anonymous, it was attributed to various authors, and especially to Gilbert West. He died after a short illness, 8th May, 1781, aged 66. His most admired performance is Edgell, a descriptive poem, in blank verse, 1767. His life has been written by his friend Hylton.

JAHN, John, a learned Orientalist, who was canon of the metropolitan church of St. Stephen, at Vienna. After having been professor of biblical archæology and theology in the university of that capital, he obtained the chair of Oriental literature, which he held till 1806, when he was obliged to relinquish it on account of his heterodoxy. He died in 1817. Besides Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee grammars, he published "Biblical Archæology," 1797-1802, 3 vols. 8vo.; a Hebrew bible, 1806, 4 vols. 8vo.; "Enchiridion Hermeneuticæ generalis Tabularum veteris et novi Foederis," 1812, 8vo.; "Appendix ad Hermeneuticam sacram, sive Fasciculus Vaticanorum de Messia," 1815, 8vo.; "Lexicon Arabico-Latinum," with a collection of pieces in the Arabic language, many of which had never before been published. His works are said to be the most valuable extant, on the philology of the sacred writings; but he has hazarded some singular and bold sentiments on point of doctrine, which may excite the prejudices of some readers, and consequently detract from the utility of his observations and criticisms.

JALLABERT, John, an ingenious philosopher of the last century. He was born at Geneva in 1712, and having lost his parents when young, he was persuaded by professor Purretin to apply himself to the study of divinity. Having previously distinguished himself by his application to the exact sciences, he followed the professor's advice, and became a minister of the church in 1737. The magistrates of Geneva founded for him the professorship of experimental philosophy. After having taken possession of his office, he travelled for improvement in Switzerland, Holland, England, and France; and returning to Geneva in 1759, published an inaugural discourse, "On the Utility of Experimental Philosophy, and its connexion with mathematics." Some time after he was nominated keeper of the public library of Geneva. The state of his health obliged him to resign his ministerial office in 1744, and for a while suspend his lectures. In 1750 he was appointed professor of mathematics; and two years after he succeeded to the chair of philosophy, on the death of Gabriel Cramer. In 1756 he became a member of the lesser council of Geneva; and in 1765 was made syndic of the republic. He died in 1763. Besides some essays and papers on natural philosophy, he was the author of "Experiences sur l'Electricité," 1748, 8vo. containing an account of all the experiments which he had made or proposed; and he was the first who demonstrated the utility of electricity in the cure of diseases.

JAMBlichus, a philosopher, who flourished about the beginning of the fourth century, and is supposed to have died about 333, was a native of Chalsis in Cælo Syria. He was a pupil of Anaxagoras, and afterwards of Porphyry; and himself established a school, to which, by his knowledge, and still more by his pretension to an intercourse with the invisible beings, he attracted numerous disciples. Several of his writings are extant.

JAMES, St., a bishop of Nisibis, distinguished for his patriotism, his zeal, and unbounded benevolence, when his country was besieged by the Persians. He died about 350. His works were printed, Rome, 1786, folio.

JAMES I. king of Scotland, after his father Robert III. was taken by the English as he was crossing over to France. After a severe imprisonment of 18 years, he was set at liberty on condition of marrying Jane, daughter of the earl of Somerset, 1424. He severely punished those who had governed his kingdom in his absence; and in consequence of these harsh measures, he was assassinated in his bed by their relations, and died pierced with thirty-six wounds, 1437.

JAMES II. king of Scotland, succeeded at the age of seven to his father, James I. and ably supported Charles VII. of France in his war against the English. He punished some of his barons, who had revolted against him, and he was killed at the siege of Roxburgh, 3d Aug. 1460, aged 29, by a cannon shot, and after his death, his queen, Mary of Guelders, continued the attack, and took the town.

JAMES III. succeeded his father James II. on the throne of Scotland, and rendered himself odious by his cruelties. He put to death his brother John, but Alexander his other brother escaped the last fatal blow aimed against him, and levied war against the tyrant. James, defeated in a battle by his rebellious subjects, fell from his horse, and was at last put to death in a mill by the pursuing enemy, 11th June, 1488.

JAMES IV. succeeded his father James III. at the age of 16, and showed himself religious, active, and patriotic. He defeated some of his rebellious barons, and assisted Lewis XII. of France against the English, but was unfortunately slain in the fatal battle of Flodden field, 1513. He instituted the order of the Thistle, or of St. Andrew.

JAMES V. of Scotland, succeeded at the death of his father, James IV. though only 18 months old. His minority was governed by his mother, Margaret of England, but at the age of 17 he assumed the reins of government, and assisted Francis I. against Charles V. and in consequence of his services, he received, 1535, Magdalen, the French king's daughter, who died two years after. He afterwards married Mary of Lorraine, the widow of Lewis of Orleans, and died 18th Dec. 1542, leaving his dominions to his only child, Mary Stuart, who was born only eight days before his death. He was a prince admired for his virtues, and the firmness with which he supported the religious establishment of his country.

JAMES, VI. of Scotland, and the first of England, was son of Henry earl of Darnley, and Mary the daughter of James V. and was born 1566. The conduct of his mother had so irritated the nobles that she was obliged by her rebellious subjects to resign the crown to her son in 1566; and James, who had displayed great moderation and prudence in Scotland, was called, on the death of Elizabeth to fill the English throne 1603. His accession was attended with dissatisfaction on the part of some of the English nobles, and lords Cobham, and Grey, and sir Walter Raleigh were arrested on pretence of a conspiracy to destroy the king and his son prince Henry. A more dreadful catastrophe awaited him from the catholics whom he had rendered his enemies, by the severity of his treatment toward them; but when the parliament house was doomed to be blown up by gun-powder, with the king, the lords and commons, the plot was happily discovered by the sagacity of the monarch, and the ringleaders were seized and executed. James was naturally fond of peace, and during 20 years of his reign, his subjects enjoyed perfect tranquillity. The interests and the dignity of the nation perhaps might have required more vigorous measures, especially in supporting the rights of the protestants and of the elector Palatine who had married the king's daughter; but the cultivation of commerce, and a friendly intercourse with the rest of the world, were more congenial to the sentiments of the monarch. In the extension of his prerogative James rendered himself not only oppressive, but often ridiculous, and while he argued with his parliament, and enlarged on the divine and absolute rights of kings, he taught the factious to dispute his authority, and to prepare that opposition which proved so fatal to his successor. Though learned and intelligent, he chose for his favorites the most ignorant and worthless, and the partiality which he showed to Carr, earl of Somerset, and to Villiers, duke of Buckingham, reflect little honor on his judgment or his heart. In his fondness for controversial learning he founded Chelsea college for the support of a number of polemical divines whose abilities and labors might be directed to oppose and refute the Roman catholics. James died at Theobalds, 8th April 1625, aged 59, after a reign of 22 years, and he was buried in Westminster abbey. By his wife Anne of Denmark, whom he married 1590, he had Henry and Robert, who died young, Charles his successor, and Elizabeth who married Frederick V. elector Palatine. His works, which consisted of a Commentary on the Revelations, in which he terms the Pope Antichrist—Basilicon Doron, or Advice to his Son—Dæmonology, or Discourse on Witchcraft and a Counterblast against Tobacco, were published in 1 vol. folio, 1619. Though James deserved to be commended for his love of peace, and for his moderation, yet his character must descend to posterity with every mark of detestation for his cruel conduct towards the virtuous and patriotic Raleigh whom he wantonly caused to be beheaded 15 years after his sentence, and after he had granted him his protection, and employed him in the service of his country.

JAMES II. of England, succeeded his brother the second Charles 1684. He was born at London 14th Oct. 1683, and at his birth proclaimed duke of York. On the death of his father, he escaped to France, and distinguished himself in the French service by his courage and military skill. At the restoration he was declared admiral of England, and obtained in 1665, a celebrated victory over Opdam, the Dutch admiral; but in 1672, he was defeated by Ruyter, though supported by the French fleet. His valor had endeared him to the English, and though his principles, which were strongly attached to the popish religion, were censured by the parliament, he ascended the throne on the death of his brother; but the virtues of the private man unfortunately disappeared in the king. James became arbitrary, cruel, and oppressive, and in his wish to establish the Roman catholic religion in the kingdom, he rudely invaded the rights and privileges of his subjects, and paid no regard to the opinions and prejudices of a people, who had a few years before conducted his father to the scaffold. The murmurs of the English were not uttered in vain. William, prince of Orange, who had married the king's daughter, was persuaded to invade the kingdom, and James, terrified at the success of his enemy, and the ingratitude of his courtiers, fled to France, 1688. He afterwards attacked Ireland, but this effort for the recovery of his lost dominions, and the intrigues of his catholic adherents, were unable to shake the popularity of William. James died at St. Germain's, a pensioner on the bounty of the French king 16th Sept. 1701, aged 68. By his first wife, Anne, daughter of lord Clarendon, he had two daughters, Mary and Anne, who were successively queens of England; and by his second wife the princess of Modena, he had a son, called the Pretender, acknowledged by the Roman catholic princes, under the name of James III. This son died at Rome, 2d Jan. 1766, and his son, Charles Edward, the pretender so well known by his invasion of Scotland in 1745, died at Florence, 31st Jan. 1788, aged 68. Henry Benedict, cardinal of York, brother to Charles Edward, died lately at Rome, and thus that branch of the Stuart family is become extinct.

JAMES I. king of Arragon, surnamed the warrior, succeeded his father, Peter the catholic, 1213. He defeated some of his nobles who had raised an insurrection against him, and afterwards he conquered the kingdoms of Majorca, Minorca, Valentia, and other places from the Moors. He also supported himself against the encroachments of the papal power, and died at Xativa, 27th of July 1276, aged 70. Before he expired, he resigned the crown into the hands of his successor, and put on the habit of a Cistercian monk, with the superstitious hope of thus reconciling heaven, and obtaining forgiveness for the irregularities and the licentiousness of his life.

JAMES II., king of Arragon, son of Peter III. succeeded his brother, Alphonso III. 1291. He conquered Sicily, and waged a long war against the Moors, and the people of Navarre. He had the good fortune to unite Valentia and Catalonia to his crown, and he died at Barcelona, 3d Nov. 1327, aged 66, deservedly respected for his moderation, his courage, benevolence, and magnanimity.

JAMES, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, born at Newport, Isle of Wight, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1593. He distinguished himself as a collector of curious MSS. and published a catalogue of such as were in the colleges of the university, and was the first librarian appointed by sir Thomas Bodley, in his newly established library. He was made by the bishop sub-dean of Wells, and was afterwards presented by the archbishop to Mongeham, in Kent. These and other pieces of preferment, were not undeserved. He showed himself a most active divine against the papists, and proposed various plans for the collating of the MSS. of the fathers, which might not only advance the cause of science, but defeat the forgeries and the views of the catholics, which however failed for want of encouragement. He died at Oxford 1632, aged about 51. His works are all respectable, the best known of which is, a treatise of the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, published 1611, 4to. and reprinted 1688, 8vo. He was the correspondent, among others, of Usher.

JAMES, Richard, nephew of the preceding, was of Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was made fellow 1615. In 1619 he travelled through Wales and Scotland, and then passed into Russia, on which he published some observations. He was well skilled in the learned languages, as well as in Italian, French, and Spanish, and so extensive was his information, that he was of great assistance to Selden in the drawing up of his Marmora Arundeliana, and to sir Robert Cotton and his son, in the arrangement of their noble library. His abilities as a scholar and a critic, were said to be superior to those of his uncle. He died 1638. When confined through suspicion, by the House of Lords, 1629, he wrote a copy of English verses, prefixed to his works, afterwards presented to the Bodleian library.

JAMES, Robert, M.D. an English physician, best known by his preparation of a very useful fever powder, was born at Kinverston, Staffordshire, 1703. He took his first degree in arts at St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards practised as a physician at Sheffield, Lichfield, and Birning-

ham. He then removed to London, and published there, in 1743, his valuable Medicinal Dictionary, 3 vols. folio, in the composition of which he was assisted by his friend Dr. Johnson. He wrote also the Practice of Physic, 1746, 2 vols. 8vo.—on Canine Madness,—and in 1773, a Dissertation on Fevers. He died 23d March 1776. His powder, of which the invention is attributed by some to a German physician of the name of Schawanberg, has acquired great and deserved celebrity, and though at first opposed by some of the faculty, who either through prejudice or rivalry, considered it as a worthless nostrum, it has procured to his family an inexhaustible source of opulence. Dr. James was coarse in his manners as well as person, but he was intelligent, and as a companion, agreeable and cheerful.

JAMES, Thomas, D.D., a native of St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, which he left in 1776 for the headship of Rugby school. He resigned in 1793, and in reward for his honorable services at the head of the school, he obtained a Worcester prebend, and Harrington rectory, Worcestershire. He wrote a Compendium of Geography for Rugby school—two Sermons—the fifth book of Euclid explained by Algebra. He died at Harrington 1804.

JAMET, Peter Charles, a French writer, born 1701, in the diocese of Sens. He wrote, Metaphysical Essays—Letters on Taste, and the Doctrine of Bayle—Dissertation on the Creation—the Mogul Philosopher, Daneche Menkan,—and also contributed some notes to the dictionary of Trevoux.

JAMYN, Amadis, a French poet, the friend and rival of Ronsard. He travelled in the early part of life in Greece and Asia Minor, and afterwards became secretary and chamber reader to Charles IX. He died 1535. Besides his poetical works in 2 vols. he published seven academical discourses in prose, and finished Homer's Iliad in verse, began by Hugh Salel, to which he added the three first books of the Odyssey.

JANEWAY, James, a native of Hertfordshire, educated at Christ-church, Oxford, and ejected for nonconformity 1662. He afterwards opened a meetinghouse at Rotherhithe, and died there 1674. He is author of Heaven on Earth, 8vo.—a Token for Children, 12mo.—often edited—the Saint's Encouragement to Diligence, 8vo.—a Legacy to his Friends, 8vo. a posthumous work.

JANICON, Francis Michael, a French writer, born at Paris, and educated in Holland. He was at first in the army, but became a writer in the gazettes of Amsterdam, Rotterdam and Utrecht, where his political sagacity, and the elegance of his style were much admired. He died of an apoplexy 1730, aged 56. Besides his "gazettes" he wrote Steel's Ladies Library translated—Gavin's Satire against Monks, 4 vols. 12 mo.—the Present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and Dependencies, 2 vols. 1729, a valuable work.

JANSENIUS, Cornelius, a divine who distinguished himself as the envoy of Philip II. of Spain, at the council of Trent, and was rewarded on his return by the bishopric of Ghent, where he died 1576, aged 66. He was a native of Hulst, in Flanders. He published, among other works, a Harmony of the Gospel.

JANSENIUS or JANSEN, Cornelius, a celebrated Roman catholic bishop, the author of Jansenism. He was born at Accoy, near Leerdam, in Holland, 1535, and after studying at Utrecht, he in 1604, went to Paris, where he became acquainted with St. Cyran. He returned to Louvain in 1617, and two years after, took his doctor's degree, and soon after was placed at the head of St. Pulcheria college, with a theological professorship. His abilities were so universally popular that he was twice sent by the university of Louvain as a deputy to the Spanish king, to whom he rendered himself acceptable by writing a severe book against the French, called Mars Gallicus, for their alliance with the protestant princes. Though this work possessed little merit, it procured him the bishopric of Ypres, and with it the hatred and persecution of Richelieu. He died of the plague, 8th May, 1633, aged 53. He wrote commentaries on the gospels, proverbs, and some controversial books. But his most celebrated composition, the labor of 20 years, is his Augustinus, published after his death. In this book he explained and illustrated the doctrine of Augustine concerning man's natural corruption, and the nature and efficacy of the divine grace; but as this directly militated against the opinions of the Jesuits, it drew upon his memory the severest opposition. The pope at last was prevailed upon to exert his authority, and accordingly the use of the book was forbidden in 1641, and the next year, Urban VIII. issued his bull for its final suppression.—These measures excited violent animosities, but to give greater solemnity to the condemnation, the French bishops drew up five propositions from the doctrine of Jansen, which were submitted to pope Innocent X. and pronounced heretical. These propositions asserted, 1st. That there are divine precepts which good men, though desirous, are unable to obey. 2d. That no man can resist the influence of divine grace operating on his mind. 3d. That to render human actions meritorious, it is not necessary that they be exempt from necessity, but only that they be free from constraint. 4th. That the Semipelagians err in maintaining that the human will is endowed with the power of either receiving or resisting the influences of preventing grace. 5th. That whoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation by his death for the sins of all mankind, is a Semipelagian.

These measures of the holy see were productive of great dissension in the French church, and when the next pope, Alexander VII. declared that none should be admitted into the church without subscribing to a renunciation of the doctrines of Jansen, the Jansenists ventured to dispute the infallibility of the pontiff, and to regard him as of inferior power to a general council. Opposition in this as in all controversies produced irritation and not conviction, and instead of suppressing the Jansenists, the efforts of the Jesuits and of the see of Rome tended to render them more numerous and more violent, not only in France, but in the Low Countries and in Germany.

JANUARIUS, St. bishop of Benevento, beheaded at Puzzuoli in the persecution of Dioclesian. His body was buried at Naples, where a noble chapel in the cathedral is dedicated to his memory. His blood is supposed to be preserved in a phial, and annually, on particular occasions, and when Vesuvius threatens an eruption, the holy vessel is produced, when, at the presence of the saint's head, which is then exhibited, the blood, which before was congealed, immediately liquifies. The mountain, as the superstitious Neapolitans believe, respects the solemnity, and earthquakes are very frequently thus prevented.

JARDINS, Mary Catherine des, a French lady, born 1640, at Alencon, in Normandy, where her father was provost. She left home early in consequence of an intrigue, and retired to Paris, where she determined to subsist by her pen. While engaged in the publication of novels, she gave a loose to her passions, and assumed the name of Villedieu, one of her favorites, with whom however she soon quarrelled. A fit of devotion on the death of a female friend, restored her for a while to her senses, in the seclusion of her convent, but when returned to the world, she again became dissipated, and after the death of Villedieu, who died in battle, she married the marquis de la Chasse, who was only separated from his wife, by whom she had a son. After his death she attached herself to one of her consins, and died at Clinchemare, on the Maine, 1633. Her works, consisting of dramas, poems, romances, and fables, were published in 10 vols. 12mo. 1702, to which two more were added in 1721. Her style is animated, though her stories and catastrophes are not always interesting, her verses however are feeble.

JAROSLAW, grand duke of Russia, in the 10th century, is celebrated for the liberal patronage which he extended to learned men. He framed a code of laws for the benefit of his subjects, and to encourage learning he founded a school, and caused various useful books to be translated from the Greek into the Russian language.

JARVIS, Abraham, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in the state of Connecticut, was born at Norwalk in that state, May 5, 1739. He graduated at Yale college in 1761; and in November, 1763, he sailed for England in order to obtain episcopal ordination. Shortly after his arrival in that country, he was ordained Deacon by the Bishop of Exeter, and Priest by the bishop of Carlisle. On the 20th of April following he left England, and arrived at Boston in June. In the autumn he became the Rector of christ church, Middletown, in his native state. In 1797, he became the Bishop of the church in that state. At the commencement of Yale college this year, he received from that institution the degree of doctor of divinity. This degree had been previously conferred on him by Bishop Seabury, who claimed the right of conferring degrees in Divinity as inherent in the episcopal office. In 1799, Bishop Jarvis removed from Middletown, to Cheshire; and from thence, in 1803, to New Haven. Here he remained till his death, which took place in 1813. The principal characteristics of Bishop Jarvis were integrity and sincerity of purpose, and firmness and inflexibility of conduct. He left one son, the Rev. Samuel Farnar Jarvis, D.D.

JARVIS, Charles, a physician of Boston, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1766. He completed his medical education in Europe, and on his return settled in Boston. In the American revolution he engaged zealously in the cause of his country. He was for many years a representative from Boston in the legislature. He had the reputation of being a great orator. He was a leader of the democratic party, and received from Jefferson the appointment of surgeon of the marine hospital at Charlestown, and held the office till his death. He died 1807, aged 58.

JARRY, Laurence Juillard du, a French poet and divine, born at Jarry near Xantes, 1653. He came young to Paris, and was patronised by Bossuet, Bourdaloue and others, and obtained the poetical prize of the French academy 1679, and also in 1714, when Voltaire was his competitor. He was made prior of Notre-dame du Jarry, in Xantes, where he died 1730. He excelled as a preacher, and published le Ministère Evangelique, Sermons, Ouvrages de Pieté, & des Poesies Chrétiennes.

JARS, Gabriel, a native of Lyons, who with Duhamel visited the mines of Bohemia, Saxony, Hungary, Austria, Carinthia, England and other countries, and with the skill and genius of a true mineralogist, prepared his observations, which death, however, prevented him to publish. He was in 1768, made member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and died the next year, aged 37. His Voyages Metallurgiques were published by his brother, 3 vols. 4to.

JAUCOURT, Lewis de, a Frenchman, who disregarded the advantages of his birth and rank for the pleasures of study. His knowledge was very extensive, and in antiquities, morals, medicine and general literature, his assistance was very valuable to the French encyclopedie. He conducted the Bibliotheque Raisonnée, from its commencement in 1740, and assisted Gaubius and others in the publication of the Museum Sebæanum, in 1734. He wrote also Lexicon Medicum Universale, in 6 vols. folio, but the MS. was lost in the vessel which conveyed it to Holland. He was member of the royal society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Stockholm, but refused the liberal invitations of the Stadtholder, to settle in Holland, observing that he had no necessities nor ambition, but only wished for studious obscurity. He died Feb. 1780.

JAULT, Augustus Francis, professor of Syriac in the royal college at Paris, translated into French, Sharp's Surgery, Ockley's History of the Saracens, Floyer on the Asthma, a treatise on the venereal disease, and other works. He ranked high as a physician, and died at Paris 1757, aged 50.

JAUREGUI Y AGUILAR, John, a Spanish poet and painter, was born at Toledo, in 1566, and died in 1650. As a poet he was of the school of Garcilaso and Boscan, and labored strenuously to reform the taste of his countrymen, which had been vitiated by Gongora. He wrote Orpheus, in five cantos; Miscellaneous Poems; and an Apology for Painting; and translated the Pharsalia, and the Aminta. As a painter he was distinguished by his management of light and shade, expression, coloring, and the tone of the flesh.

JAY, Guy Michel le, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who ruined himself by printing at his own expense a polyglot bible. This beautiful work in 10 vols. folio, containing the Syriac and Arabic versions, which are not inserted in the polyglot of Ximenes, was begun 1628, and was completed 1645. In his honorable poverty, he became an ecclesiastic, and was made dean of Vezelai, and counsellor of state. He died 1675.

JAY, John, L.L.D., first chief justice of the United States under the constitution of 1789, graduated at King's college 1764; and in 1768, was admitted to the bar. He was appointed to the first American congress in 1774. Being on the committee with Lee and Livingston to draft an address to the people of Great Britain, he was the writer of that eloquent production. In the congress of 1775, he was on various important committees, performing more services perhaps, than any member, excepting Franklin and J. Adams. In May 1776, he was recalled to assist in forming the government of New York, and in consequence his name is not attached to the declaration of independence; but July 9th he reported resolutions in the provincial convention in favor of the declaration. After the fall of New York, and the removal of the provincial assembly to Poughkeepsie, Mr. Jay retained his resolute patriotism. The very eloquent address of the convention to the people of New York, dated Fishkill Dec. 23, 1776, and signed by A. Ten Broeck as president, was written by him, March 12, 1777, he reported to the convention of New York, the draft of a form of government, which was adopted, and many of the provisions of which, were introduced into the constitution of other states. From May 3, 1777, to Aug 13, 1779, he was chief justice of the state; but resigned that office in consequence of his duties as president of congress. The glowing address of that body to their constituents, dated Sept. 8, 1779, was prepared by him. On the 29th of Sept. he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the court of Spain. He was one of the commissioners to negotiate peace with Great Britain, and signed the definitive treaty at Paris, Sept. 3, 1783. He returned to America in 1784. Congress had previously appointed him secretary of state for foreign affairs. In the difficult circumstances of the country, the secretary was in effect the head of the government. Mr. Jay's services were of great importance. He drew up, Oct. 13, 1786, an elaborate report on the relations between the United States and Great Britain. Though not a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, he was present at Annapolis and aided by his advice. He also assisted Hamilton and Madison in writing the Federalist. In the convention of New York he contributed to the adoption of the constitution. He was appointed chief justice by Washington, Sept. 26, 1789. In 1794, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, and succeeded in negotiating the treaty which still goes by his name. He was governor of the state of New York from 1795, to 1801. The remainder of his life he passed in retirement. He died 1829, aged 84.

JEACOCKE, Caleb, author of the Vindication of the moral character of the apostle Paul, against the charges of hypocrisy and insincerity, brought by lord Bolingbroke, Dr. Middleton and others 1765, 8vo. was a baker of the High-street, St. Giles, who by his great application and merit was distinguished in the world, and became director of the Hand-in-hand fire office. He was a frequent attendant of the Robin Hood speaking society, Butcher-row, Temple-bar, where it is said his oratory proved often more powerful and convincing than that of Edmund Burke and other members who afterwards acquired celebrity in the House of Commons. He died 1786, much respected.

JEANES, Henry, a native of Albersey, Somersetshire, educated at Hart-hall, Oxford. He afterwards obtained the rectory of Beer-crocomb and Capland, Somersetshire, and also Chedzoy, after Dr. Walter Raleigh's expulsion. He favored the presbyterians, but died before his adherence to the tenets of the church was called in question 1662. He wrote a treatise on Abstinence from Evil, 8vo.—On the Indifference of Human Actions, 4to—on Original Righteousness, 4to—Polemical Tracts against Dr. Hammond, Jer. Taylor, John Goodwin, and Want of Church Government.

JEANNIN, Peter, a Burgundian, advocate in the parliament of Dijon. He rose to consequence by his merit, and when the orders for the murder of St. Bartholomew were issued at Dijon, he opposed it with all his authority, and for his services was made president of the parliament there. After the destruction of the league he became a favorite with Henry IV. who employed him in negotiations with the Spaniards and Dutch, and after the king's death, he continued a faithful servant in the court of the queen mother. He died 1622, aged 82, after seeing seven successive kings on the throne of France. He published a collection of negotiations and memoirs in folio 1659, and 4 vols. 12mo. 1695, much esteemed.

JEURAT, Sebastian, a native of Paris, member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the National Institute, was distinguished as an able mathematician. He founded an observatory in the military school, and wrote new tables of Jupiter, 4to.—a Treatise on Perspective, 4to—Observations on the Comet of 1759—Observations on the Solar Eclipse of 1793—Graphical Method of dissecting the Angle, and Memoires sur les Lunettes Diplantidennes. He died 1803, aged 99.

JEBB, Samuel, M.D. a physician born at Nottingham, and educated at Peter-house Cambridge. He favored the non-jurors, and was for some time librarian to Jeremy Collier; but upon his marrying a relation of Dillingham, the eminent apothecary of Red-lion square, he applied himself to pharmacy, and soon began to practise as physician at Stratford le Bow, where he continued the best part of his life. He afterwards retired with a moderate income to Derbyshire, where he died 9th March 1772, leaving several children, one of whom was sir Rich. Jebb, one of the physicians extraordinary to the king. He published a translation of Martin's Answers to Emlyn 1718, 8vo.—Justini Martyris cum Tryphone Dialogus, 1719—de Vita & Rebus gestis Mariæ Scotorum Reginae, 1725,—an edition of Aristides, with notes, 1728, 2 vols. 4to.—J. C. Britanni de Canibus Britannicis,—Bacon's Opus Majus. and H. Hodii de Græcis illust.

JEBB, John, son of the dean of Cashel, was born in London 1736. Part of his education was received in Ireland, and afterwards he entered at Peter-house, Cambridge, and took orders, and obtained some preferment. He for some years delivered theological lectures in Cambridge, but he was prohibited in 1770, as he professedly embraced the tenets of the Socinians. In 1775, he resigned his gown and applied himself to the study of physic, and obtained a degree at St. Andrew's, and became a licentiate in London. He died March 1786, of a decline. He was a very warm controversialist. He had when at the university been a very strenuous advocate for yearly examinations; and in his political life, he showed himself a zealous friend of annual parliaments, of universal suffrage, of the abolition of subscription, and of the cause of America against the mother country. Besides physic and classical literature he was well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Saxon. He joined two friends in publishing a 4to. called Excerpta quedam e Newtonii Principiis. His works were published in 1787, in 3 vols. 8vo. by his friend Dr. Disney, with an account of his life.

JEBB, John, D.D., Bishop of Limerick, was born Sept. 27, 1775, and died, Dec. 9, 1833, aged 58. He was educated at the university of Dublin, where he gained a high reputation as a scholar. He was greatly esteemed as a man of a most amiable and gentle spirit; had the reputation of an accomplished orator and a learned and able theologian; and as a clergyman and a bishop he was truly exemplary. His original publications are not numerous, but are of high merit. Some of them are a volume of "Sermons on Subjects chiefly practical," Essay on Sacred Literature, and "Practical Theology."

JEFFERSON, Thomas, L.L.D., third president of the United States of America, under the constitution of 1789. He passed two years at the college of William and Mary, but his education was principally conducted by private tutors. He adopted the law as his profession. He was a member of the legislature of Virginia from 1769, to the commencement of the American revolution. In 1775, he was a delegate in congress from Virginia. May 15, 1776, the convention of Virginia instructed their delegates to propose to congress a declaration of independence. In June Mr. Lee made the motion for such a declaration in congress, and it was voted that a committee be appointed to prepare one. The committee was elected by ballot, and consisted of Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, and Robert R. Livingston. The declaration was exclusively the work of Mr. Jefferson, to whom the right of drafting it belonged as chairman of the committee, though amendments and alterations were made in it, by Adams, Franklin, and other members of the committee, and afterwards by congress. Mr. Jefferson retired from congress in Sept. 1776, and took a seat in the legislature of Virginia in October. In 1779, he was chosen governor of Virginia, and held the office two years. He declined a foreign appointment in 1776, and again in 1781. He accepted the appointment of one of the commissioners for negotiating peace, but before he sailed, news was received of the signing the provisional treaty, and he was excused from proceeding on the mission. He returned to congress. In 1784, he wrote notes on the establishment of a money-unit, and of a coinage for the United States. He proposed the money-system now in use. In May 1784, he was appointed, with Adams and Franklin, a minister plenipotentiary to negotiate treaties of commerce with foreign nations. In 1785, he was appointed minister to the French court. In 1789, he returned to America, and received from Washington the appointment of secretary of state, which he held till Dec. 1793, and then resigned. On some appointment being offered him by Washington in Sept. 1794, he replied to the secretary, "no circumstances will ever more tempt me to engage in anything public." Notwithstanding this determination, he suffered himself to be a candidate for president, and was chosen vice president in 1796. At the election in 1801, he and Aaron Burr having an equal number of the electoral votes, the house of representatives, after a severe struggle, finally decided in his favor. He was re-elected in 1805. At the end of his second term, he retired from office. He died July 4, 1826, at one o'clock in the afternoon, just fifty years from the date of the declaration of independence, aged 83. Preparations had been made throughout the United States to celebrate this day, as a jubilee, and it is a most remarkable fact, that on the same day, John Adams, a signer with Jefferson of the declaration, and the second on the committee for drafting it, and his immediate predecessor in the office of president, also died. Mr. Jefferson's publications were, Summary view of the rights of British America, 1774; Declaration of independence, 1776; notes on Virginia, 1781; manual of parliamentary practice for the use of the senate; life of Capt. Lewis, 1814; some papers in Am. phil. trans. IV. His works, chiefly letters, were published by his grandson Thomas Jefferson Randolph, 4 vols. 8vo. 1829.

JEFFERY, Thomas, a native of Exeter, educated among the dissenters. He became assistant to Mr. Hallett, and in 1726 settled at Little Bad-dow, Essex, where he had a congregation, but two years after returned to Exeter, where he died soon after, aged about 30. He was author of True Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, against Collins the deist, 8vo.—the Divinity of Christianity proved from Scripture, and Christianity the Perfection of all Religion, 8vo.—a review of his Controversy with Collins.

JEFFERY, John, a divine, born 1647, at Ipswich, where he was educated, and at Catherine hall, Cambridge. On taking orders he returned to the curacy of Dennington, Suffolk, and in 1678, he was elected minister of a church at Norwich, where his eloquence as a preacher, his learning and his exemplary manners rendered him a popular and esteemed character. He was introduced by sir E. Atkyns the chief baron, to Tillotson, who when raised to the primacy, made him archdeacon of Norwich. He died 1720, aged 72. He published sir T. Browne's Christian Morals—Whichcote's Moral and Religious Aphorisms. He wrote also some sermons, &c. which appeared, 2 vols. 8vo. 1751. Dr. Jeffery was an enemy to controversy, and observed that it produced more heat than light.

JEFFERY, of Monmouth, ap Arthur, a British historian in the reign of Henry I. born and educated at Monmouth. He was made archdeacon of Monmouth and bishop of St. Asaph, 1152. He is known for an history of Britain, in which he gives a long and fabulous account of the first settlements in that country under Brutus the grandson of Ascanius. The work is written in a plain simple style, but the puerile stories and trifling incidents which it contains, render its authority very dubious, though Usher, Leland, Sheringham, sir John Rice, and others defend its authenticity against Polydore Virgil, Buchanan and others who regard it as fiction and forgery. The work was published in Latin at Paris 1517, 4to. and at Heidelberg, in folio, 1587. A translation of it into English by Aaron Thompson of Queen's college, appeared 1718, 8vo.

JEFFREYS, George lord, better known as judge Jeffreys, was born at Acton, Denbighshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and then removed to the Inner-temple. When called to the bar, he recommended himself by his application and zeal, and when introduced to the city of London by his relative, alderman Jeffreys, he was elected recorder of the city. He afterwards became a favorite of the court, was made solicitor to the duke of York, and in 1680, knighted, and appointed chief justice of Chester. His next appointment was the place of chief justice of the king's bench, and on James the second's accession he was raised to the office of lord chancellor. He was a violent promoter of all the oppressive measures of that short reign, and his cruelty on the circuit, after Monmouth's rebellion, upon the deluded adherents of this unfortunate nobleman will always be remembered to his disgrace and ignominy. Though abusive in his language, he had at times a becoming sense of his dignity when on the bench; and it is said that, in the name of common humanity he threatened his severest vengeance against the mayor and corporation of Bristol, who had been long in the habit of selling culprits in their town for exportation to the American plantations. At the revolution the chancellor dreaded the public indignation, and in the habit of a sailor endeavored to escape to the continent. He was in this disguise at Wapping, drinking in a cellar, when a scrivener whom when in authority he had severely chastised, recognised his once dreaded features. The chancellor in vain attempted to elude the discovery by coughing and turning to the wall, with the pot in his hand; the alarm was given, he was seized by the mob, and conveyed to the lord mayor, and thence sent to the tower. He died there 18th April 1689, and was privately buried the Sunday night following.

JEFFREYS, George, an English writer born at Weldron, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow 1701. He refused to take orders, and applied himself to the law, and was called to the bar, but did not practise. He passed the latter part of his life in the family of the dukes of Chandos, his relations, and died 1755, aged 77. In 1754, he published by subscription a 4to. volume of Miscellanies in prose and verse, among which are two tragedies, Edwin and Merope, both acted at the theatre Lincoln's Inn fields, and the Triumph of Truth, an oratorio.

JEFFRIES, sir Herbert, was appointed lieutenant-governor of Virginia, and one of the commissioners for inquiring into the state of the colony in 1676, and assumed the administration on the return of Sir William Berkeley to England. He died in 1673, when the government devolved on Sir H. Chicheley.

JEFFRIES, John, M.D. a physician, graduated at Harvard college 1763. He first studied physic in Boston, and afterwards attended the medical schools of Great Britain. From 1771, to 1774, he was the surgeon of a ship of the line lying in Boston harbor. His services were required by the British commander for the wounded at the battle of Bunker Hill. Having accompanied the British garrison to Halifax in 1776, he was appointed surgeon general to the forces of Nova Scotia, and also apothecary general. He went to England in 1779, and being appointed surgeon major to the forces in America, he repaired to Charleston and New York. At the close of 1780, he resigned, and commenced the practice of his profession in London. Jan. 7, 1785, he crossed the British channel from Dover to the forest of Guines in a balloon. This exploit procured him many friends in Paris and London. In 1790, he returned to America, and recommenced the practice of his profession in Boston. He died 1819, aged 75. He published a narrative of his two aerial voyages, London, 1786.

JEHAN GHIR, or JEHANGUIRE, Abul Muzaffer Nouredin Mohammed, emperor of Hindostan, the son of Akbar, was originally named Selim. He succeeded to the throne of Delhi in 1605, and died in 1627. Jehanguire was liberal, affable, and accessible to his subjects, and a patron of literature and arts. He wrote Memoirs of the first Seventeen Years of his Reign; and added to the historical commentaries of Sultan Baber.

JEKYL, sir Joseph, son of a clergyman in Northamptonshire, became known as an able lawyer, and an eloquent statesman. As the friend of the whigs he was one of the managers of Sacheverel's trial, and after maintaining his principles and popularity undiminished, he was made in the reign of George I. Master of the Rolls, privy counsellor, and was also knighted. In his pamphlet, called the Judicial Authority of the Master of the Rolls stated and vindicated, he ably supported the power and independence of his office against the chancellor King. This great man died 1738, aged 75.

JEKYL, Thomas, D.D., brother of the preceding, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and obtained the vicarage of Rowd, Wilts, the lectureship of Newland, Gloucestershire, and the office of St. Margaret's minister, Westminster. He was author of Love and Peace recommended, in two sermons at Bristol, 1674, 4to.—Popery, a great Mystery of Iniquity, 1690, 4to.—True Religion the best Loyalty, 1682—Exposition of the Church Catechism, and some other sermons.

JELLINGER, Christopher, a German, who studied at Basil, and Leyden, and after being some time a private soldier, came from Geneva to England. He found patrons and obtained the living of Brent in Devonshire, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He wrote Disputatio Theologica de Sacra Cena—a New and Living Way of Dying—The Spiritual Merchant—and 15 Conferences with Christ. He died at Knightsbridge, aged 83.

JENKIN, Robert, a divine, born at Minster, isle of Thanet, Jan. 1656. He was educated at the King's school, Canterbury, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow 1680. In 1710, he was elected master of his college, and also held the Margaret professorship of divinity. He refused to take the oaths at the revolution, but as the bishop of Ely could not visit the college without the invitation of the fellows, he remained with many others undisturbed, though at the accession of George I. a compulsory act was made which obliged all those who held preferment worth 5*l.* a year to swear allegiance. Dr. Jenkin, in compliance with the law, saw several of his fellows expelled, but the uneasiness which he suffered, joined to the infirmities of age hastened his dissolution. He retired to his brother's house, Norfolk, and died there 7th April 1727, and was buried in Holme chapel, where his brother was rector. His theological tracts were much esteemed, and among them an Examination of the Authority of General Councils,—a Defence of Bishop Leke's Profession—Remarks on four Books, Basnage's History of the Jews,—the Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion, of which the fifth edition appeared 1721.

JENKIN, William, a puritan, born at Sudbury, Suffolk, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was in 1641, made minister of Christchurch, Newgate, but was deprived for nonconformity, 1662. He was concerned in Love's Plot, and therefore was sent to the tower, but procured his liberty by petitioning Cromwell. He was in 1684, sent to Newgate on the conventicle act, and died there four months after. He is author of Exposition on the Epistle of Jude, fol.—Ceuigma ad Clamor ad Theologos Hierarchiæ Anglicanæ—and some Sermons.

JENKINS, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, who lived to the extraordinary age of 169 years. His faculties remained strong to the last, and at an assize he appeared to give evidence of what had passed within his knowledge 140 years before. He remembered the battle of Flodden-field. As he was born before registers were kept, no place would acknowledge him as a native, so that much to the disgrace of his opulent neighbors, he was compelled to beg his bread in the last part of his life. He died 1670, and there is erected to his memory a monument in Bolton church, Yorkshire, where he was buried.

JENKINS, sir Leoline, LL.D., an English statesman and civilian, born at Lantrisant, Glamorganshire, 1623. He was educated at Cowbridge school, and in 1641 removed to Jesus college, Oxford, but soon after with many other students, he took up arms in the royal cause. He however remained in Oxford till the king's death, and then retired to Wales to the seat of sir John Aubrey, the education of whose eldest son he undertook. He was afterwards tutor to other young men of family and consequence, but became obnoxious to the government, from whose resentment however he was saved by the interference of his friend Dr. Wilkins, warden of Wadham college. For some time he resided at Oxford, but being still considered as a dangerous man, he fled to the continent in company with some of his pupils, and travelled with them over France, Holland, and Germany. He returned home about 1658, and at the restoration was chosen one of the fellows of Jesus college. In 1661 he was, on the resignation of his friend Dr. Mansell, elected principal of his college. He was in 1663 appointed commissary of Canterbury by his patron Sheldon, the primate; and then removed to Doctors' Commons as advocate of that court. In 1664 he was engaged with other civilians in reviewing the maritime laws, and the same year was made judge assistant, and soon after principal of the Admiralty court; and in 1668 judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury. In 1669-70, he was knighted for his services in recovering the property of the deceased queen mother, against the claims of her nephew Louis XIV. and afterwards became one of the commissioners to negotiate the union with Scotland. In 1671 he was elected member for Hythe, in Kent, and in 1673, after resigning his office of principal of Jesus, he went to Cologne as plenipotentiary to settle a treaty of peace with the Dutch, which did not succeed. The next year he was again deputed as a mediator of the treaty of Nimeguen, with sir William Temple, the chief burden of which rested upon him. His labors however were unsuccessful, and on leaving the place 1679, he was nominated ambassador to the Hague in the room of his associate Temple, but soon after was again invited to renew his application for the treaty, which at last was that same year concluded. He returned home Aug. 1679, and was soon after elected representative of the university of Oxford. He ably opposed in parliament, the bill for the exclusion of the duke of York, and his services were rewarded by admission into the privy council, and the appointment of secretary for the northern provinces in 1680, and next year for the southern. He was again elected for Oxford university and still opposed the exclusion of the duke of York; but the firmness with which he attacked and reprobated the violent measures of the court, exposed him to obloquy, so that at last he retired from office, 1684, to the privacy and literary solitude of his house at Hammersmith. On James's accession he was sworn one of the privy council, and elected again for the university, but his infirmities increased and he found himself unable to attend his duty in parliament. He died, Sept. 1, 1685. His letters and papers were printed, two vols. folio, 1724, by W. Wynne, with an account of his life.

JENKINS, John, a teacher of the art of penmanship, died 1823 at Wilmington, Delaware. He was formerly of Boston. He published the art of writing reduced to a plain and easy system on a plan entirely new, 1808.

JENKINS, Charles, an American clergyman, born at Barre, Mass. in 1786, and graduated at Williams College, in 1813. He was for some time employed as a tutor in that institution; and, in 1820, was settled as a congregational minister at Greenfield of his native state. Five years afterwards he became the pastor of the third congregational church in Portland, Me. Here he remained till his death, which took place, Dec. 29, 1831. He ranked high as a man of talents, and was esteemed for his piety and zeal in his profession. He published four occasional sermons; and, after his death a volume of his sermons was published.

JENKS, Benjamin, a native of Shropshire, who took orders and obtained the living of Harley in his native county, where he was minister 56 years, and died 1724, aged 78. He was also chaplain to lord Bradford, and wrote Submission to the Righteousness of God, 12mo.—Meditations, 2 vols.—Devotions, 12mo.—and other works of devotion of great simplicity and merit.

JENKS, Joseph, governor of Rhode Island, was born in 1656, and governor from 1727 to 1732. He died 1740, aged 83.

JENKYN, David, a native of Pendoylen, Glamorganshire, educated at Ednund hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Gray's inn to study the law. His abilities recommended him to Charles I. who made him a Welch judge, but his exertions were so great in the royal cause that he was arrested at Hereford 1645 by the parliament, and sent to the tower. This severity did not terrify him; when brought before the commons he boldly refused to kneel, and would not acknowledge their authority, for which he was fined 1000*l.* and sent back to prison. The republicans were so violent against him that they passed an act to try him, in 1650, but that was prevented it is said by a singular speech of Harry Martin. At last Jenkyns, who expected daily to be led to execution, and who meant to die with the bible under one arm, and the Magna Charta under the other, was set at liberty 1656, and died seven years after, aged 66. His legal and political tracts appeared together 1681, 12mo.

JENNENS, Charles, a gentleman of dissenting principles, who in his youth displayed with such splendor the riches acquired by the industry of his family at Birmingham, that he was called Solyman the magnificent. He composed the words of some of Handel's Oratorios, and published the Lear, Hamlet, Othello, and Macbeth of Shakspeare, as the specimen of an intended edition of the poet, of which death prevented the completion. He died 20th Nov. 1773, and was buried at Gopsal, Leicestershire.

JENNER, Edward, the celebrated introducer into Great Britain of vaccine inoculation, was born, May 17, 1749, in Gloucestershire, was apprenticed to a surgeon; and subsequently settled at Berkeley, as a general medical practitioner. About 1776 his attention was turned to the cow pox, by the circumstance of his finding that those who had been affected by it had become incapable of receiving the variolous infection. Vaccination was introduced into the British capital, in 1796, by Mr. Cline, and a violent controversy was long maintained with respect to its merits. Its ultimate triumph was complete. It was extended to every part of the globe; and plaudits and honors were showered upon the discoverer from all quarters. Oxford presented him with a diploma, the Royal Society admitted him as a member, and parliament voted him £20,000. He died January 26, 1823. Besides two works on the Cow Pox, and scattered papers and letters on the same subject, he wrote Observations on the Natural History of the Cuckoo.

JENNINGS, David, D.D., in Scotland, was minister of Old Gravel-lane Meeting-house, Wapping, 44 years, and also presided over Coward's dissenting school. He wrote Introduction to the Use of the Globes, and the Orrery, 8vo.—Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals, 12mo.—Jewish Antiquities, 2 vols. 8vo. and Sermons, and died 1762, aged 71.

JENSON, Nicolas, or Jansonius, an eminent printer and letter founder of Venice, by birth a Frenchman. He was commissioned, it is said, by the French king, to gain information with respect to the art of printing, lately invented at Mentz, and upon the death of his patron he retired to Venice, where he soon distinguished himself. His types are still admired for their neatness and beauty. He was the first who determined the form and proportion of the present Roman characters. The first books which issued from his press were, "Decor Puellarum," 1471, and the same year in Italian, "Gloria Mulierum," and afterwards various Classics. He died as is supposed about 1481, as none of his editions appear after that period.

JENYNS, Soame, an eminent English writer, born in London 1704. He was privately educated, and then entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he devoted himself to laborious study, but took no degree. In 1729 he published his "Art of Dancing," and in 1741 was elected member for Cambridge, which place, with the exception of two others he represented till 1730. He assisted Moore in the publication of the "World," in 1753, and in 1755 he was made one of the lords of Trade, and continued so till the abolition of the board 1780. He died Dec. 18, 1787, aged 83. As a writer he distinguished himself by the purity of his language, and the elegance of his diction, by critical knowledge, and a delicate and lively humor. It is remarkable that from a serious believer in revelation he became a deist, and again, after wandering in the labyrinth of scepticism, he returned a devout convert to christianity, and on his death bed, gloried in the reflection that his "View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion," had proved useful. His publications were poems, collected in a third edition 1778—a Free Enquiry into the Origin of Evil—a View of the Internal Evidence, and Political Tracts,—all republished together in 4 vols. 8vo. by Nelson Cole, Esq. 1790.

JEROME, St. a father of the church, who died 420, aged 80. He is famous for his eloquence, his virtues, and his extensive learning. His works, which are all on theological subjects, were edited by Erasmus, 1526, and at Paris, 1693.

JEROME of Prague, D.D. so called from the place of his birth, was a martyr to protestantism. He studied at the universities of Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and it is said, Oxford. He warmly embraced the doctrines of his friend and master Huss, and with him, was summoned to answer for his opinions before the council of Constance. He seemed inclined to answer the citation, but seeing Huss thrown into prison, he privately withdrew to Uberlingen, and in vain applied to the emperor for protection. Though he promised to confront his persecutors, if guarded against violence, his fair claims were disregarded, he was seized as he attempted to return home, and dragged in chains to Constance. After being exposed to various insults, and artfully tempted to make a recantation of his opinions, he boldly declared himself the supporter of the tenets of Wickliffe and Huss, and thus triumphant in constancy over his enemies, he was condemned to the flames. On May 30, 1416, he suffered at the stake: he endured his torments with great fortitude and resignation, and thus obtained the crown of martyrdom.

JEROME of St. Faith, or Joshua Larchi, a Spanish Jew, physician to Peter de Luna, afterwards pope Benedict XIII. He disputed in the presence of this pope and of several cardinals at Tortosa, with the Jewish rabbies 1414, and by becoming a convert to christianity, he had such influence over his countrymen, and also by his treatise on the Errors of the Talmud, that 5000 Jews followed his example. His book appeared at Frankfurt, 1602.

JERVAS, Charles, a painter, born in Ireland. He studied under sir Godfrey Kneller, and by the patronage of Dr. G. Clark, of Oxford, he visited France and Italy, for the improvement of his abilities. On his return to England he acquired some celebrity, more from the praises and friendship of Pope, than from his own merit. It has been observed, that the lines which the poet wrote in his praise, are more languid and less happy than any other of his verses. Horace Walpole, whose judgment should be decisive, says of him, that he was defective in drawing, coloring, and composition, and in likeness. In general, his pictures are a light, flimsy kind of fan-painting, as large as life. He was however vain of his art, and after censuring the ear as the only faulty part of the beautiful face of lady Bridgewater, with whom he pretended to be in love, he produced his own as a perfect model. He published a translation of Don Quixote, without understanding Spanish, says Pope, and the work was honored with a supplement on the origin of romances of chivalry, by Warburton. He died about 1740.

JESSEY, Henry, a native of West Rowton, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge. He favored the independents, for which he was imprisoned in 1641, but afterwards set at liberty by the parliament. He was afterwards minister of St. George's, Southwark, but was ejected 1662, and died the next year.

JESTYN, ap Gwrgant, prince of Glamorgan, was deprived of his right to the sovereignty on his father's death, 1030, in consequence of his violent and ungovernable temper, but succeeded the next king, his uncle Howell, 1043. By his dissension with the neighboring princes, the English were invited to support the weaker party, and thus the country became the property of the artful invaders.

JESUA, Levita, a Spanish rabbi of the 15th century, author of a book called "Halichot Olam," the ways of eternity, of which Bashuysen printed an edition in Hebrew and Latin at Hanover, 1714, in 4to.

JESUS, a jew, who foretold the calamities which were to fall on his nation, before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. During the siege he cried out, on seeing his prophecy fulfilled, Wo to the temple, to the nation, and to me! and at that moment, says Josephus, he was killed with a dart.

JEUFFROY, R. V., a gem and medal engraver, was born, in 1739, at Rouen, in a very humble condition. When he was young, he, without any assistance, succeeded in imitating an engraved precious stone which had come into his hands. He went to Italy to study, and for some years resided at Rome, and worked for Pichler, who sold his productions as antiques. On his return to France, he was placed at the head of the school of gem engraving. He died in 1786.

JEUNE, Jean le, a French divine, of such piety and humility, that he refused a canonry to enter the rigid society of the Oratory. He was highly esteemed as a preacher, and as a man. He lost his sight at 35, and was twice cut for the stone, but he endured all these sufferings with great resignation. He died 1672, aged 80. His sermons, published in 10 vols. 8vo. were much esteemed by Massillon, and have been translated into Latin.

JEWEL, John, D.D., an English bishop, born at Buden, in Devonshire, 1522. He was educated at Barnstaple school, and at the age of 13 entered at Merton college, Oxford, and in 1530 was chosen scholar of Corpus Christi. By great application he acquired extensive knowledge, and became a respectable tutor in his college, and an able and popular preacher in the university, and in his parish of Sunningwell, near Oxford, of which he was rector. He was in his principles a zealous protestant, and he proved it upon the accession of Edward VI. but after that king's death, he was expelled from his college by the fellows, upon which he retired to Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, where many of his pupils followed him. The abettors of popery did not long suffer him in the enjoyment of retirement and security; he was compelled to subscribe to the popish doctrines, but his sincerity was doubted, and he escaped with difficulty from the emissaries of Bonner, and passed to the continent. He resided for some time at Strasburgh, in the house of his old friend, Peter Martyr, once divinity professor at Oxford. On Mary's death he returned to England, and was selected as one of the sixteen protestants who were to dispute with the same number of catholics in the presence of Elizabeth. In 1559, he was one of the commissioners for the extirpation of popery in the west of England, and a few months after was raised to the see of Salisbury. In his episcopal character he displayed that activity and vigilance so necessary in the establishment of order and regularity, after emancipation from catholic tyranny, and he personally inspected the conduct of all his officers, and completed the triumph of reformation in his diocese, by the impartial and exemplary conduct which, emanating from himself, pervaded his courts and his clergy. His indefatigable application however undermined his constitution, and the regular habit of rising at four in the morning, and continuing engaged in prayer, in study, and in business, till near twelve at night, proved at last unhappily injurious to health. He contracted a disorder which carried him off at Monkton Farley, in September 1571, in his 50th year. This worthy man, so eminent for integrity, for liberality, for meekness, modesty, and every amiable virtue, was blessed with a most happy memory, and was well skilled in the learned languages, and also in German and Italian. His works were numerous and respectable, the best known of which, are his "Apologia Ecclesie Anglicanæ," several times printed in England, and abroad, and translated into Greek at Oxford, 1614, and into English, 1652, by lady Bacon. This valuable work, which merited and obtained the approbation of the queen and her two successors, and was recommended from the bench of bishops to be placed in all parish churches in England and Wales, was attacked by Hardyng, and defended by the author in the most masterly and unanswerable manner. His life has been written by Dr. Lawrence Hunfrey and by Featly.

JEZZAR, or the Butcher, the familiar appellation of the famous pacha of Seide and Aere, who defended the latter place against Buonaparte, during his Syrian expedition. He was born in Bosnia, in the early part of the eighteenth century, and was originally named Ahmed. In his youth he sold himself to a slave-merchant, who took him to Egypt, where he was purchased by the noted Ali Bey, then master of that country. From the situation of a common mameluc, Ahmed, in a few years, was promoted to the office of governor of Cairo. In 1778, when Ali Bey became unfortunate, the emir Yusef confided to the cidevant slave of that prince, the government of Berout, in Syria, in which post he betrayed the trust reposed in him by his benefactor, who, assisted by the sheik Dhaher and a Russian squadron, laid siege to Berout both by sea and land. Unable to resist the double attack, Jezzar surrendered himself into the hands of Dhaher, and went with him to Aere, where he made his escape. After the death of Dhaher, the captain pacha Hassan appointed Jezzar pacha of Aere and Syria, and employed him against the partisans of the redoubtable Sheik, who had so long defied the power of the grand seignor. His zeal in this service was recompensed with new marks of favor, and he was made a pacha of three tails, with the title of visir. He took advantage of his situation to extend the boundaries of his government, and in spite of the efforts of the Turkish court to displace him, he retained his authority as long as he lived. This ferocious chief was absolute master of a part of Syria at the period of the French invasion of Egypt. Buonaparte, after having vanquished the mamelucs, endeavored to make a friend of Jezzar, but the pacha rejected his overtures; and with the aid of a naval force, under sir Sydney Smith, and of M. Phelippeaux, a French engineer, he valiantly defended the city of St. Jean d'Acre against the reiterated attempts of Buonaparte to make himself master of it. After a siege of sixty-one days, the conqueror of Egypt was obliged to relinquish his enterprise, and leave Jezzar in full possession of his power. Two years after, general Sebastiani was sent on a mission to the pacha, who received him with civility, and in the intercourse between them he expressed the utmost contempt for the sublime porte, whose defence he had previously undertaken only to serve his own interest. He died at an advanced age, in 1804, leaving behind him immense treasures. He gloried in the sanguinary title by which he is best known, and numerous are the well-attested facts on record, which prove that it was not unmerited.

JEZED I. fifth caliph, or successor of Mahomet, began his reign 680. He assassinated Hussein, son of Ali, whom the Arabs had raised to the throne in opposition to him, and he showed himself cruel and revengeful against his rivals and enemies. He had a taste for literature, and died 683.

JOACHIM, abbot of Corazzo, and afterwards of Flora in Calabria, was born at Celico near Cosenza, 1130. He was of the Cistercian order, and travelled on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. It is said that he founded several monasteries, which he governed with great prudence, wisdom, and moderation. He pretended also to be a prophet, and his prophecies have appeared in a book called, "the Everlasting Gospel," which however is supposed by Mosheim, to have been written by some other missionary. Joachim died 1202, leaving a numerous sect behind, called Joachimites. The pope refused to canonize him, because some of his tenets were erroneous and profane. His works were published folio, Venice, 1516. His life has been written by Gervaise, a Dominican, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo.

JOACHIM, George, a native of the Grison's country, appointed mathematical professor at Wittenberg, where he ably defended the Copernican system. He wrote, Éphémérides—de Doctrina Triangulorum—& Orationes de Astronomia, and died 1576, aged 62.

JOAN of Arc, or the maid of Orleans, a celebrated French heroine, born at Domremy in Lorraine, 1412, of obscure parents. When she was servant at an inn, she pretended that she saw in a vision St. Michael, the tutelary saint of France, who ordered her to raise the siege of Orleans, which the English were then besieging, and to preside at the coronation of Charles VII. at Rheims. This was no sooner noised abroad, than she was introduced by Baudricourt, the governor of the neighboring town of Vaucouleurs to the king, whom she found out in the midst of his courtiers, though dressed in the plainest apparel. Charles, whose affairs were reduced to the greatest extremity, determined to employ this extraordinary woman, though her professions were ridiculed by the parliament; and Joan appearing among the soldiers, arrayed in the arms and the dress of a man, inspired them with such enthusiastic ardor that the siege of Orleans was raised, the English were defeated, and the monarch advanced to Rheims, where his coronation took place in the presence of the victorious heroine. For these services Joan was ennobled by the king, she assumed the name of Lys, and received a large grant of lands; but while she promised herself fresh victories, she was wounded at the siege of Paris, and she was taken prisoner at Compiègne. This event was regarded by the English as a great victory, but instead of receiving her with the humanity which a captive and a female required, they treated her not only with harshness, but accused her of witchcraft, and condemned her by the sentence of the university of Paris to be burnt. She suffered 30th May 1431, at Rouen, and as she walked to the fatal stake, she displayed the same courage and intrepidity which she had evinced under the walls of Orleans. By her death, Joan gained perhaps more friends to her master than her services and her triumphs had procured; and in thus cruelly putting to death a person whom the fortune of war had placed in their hands, not as a rebellious subject, but as a captive, whom the superstition of the times had exalted to extraordinary consequence, the English fixed an indelible stigma upon their character, and rendered their cause odious in the eyes even of their adherents in conquered France.

JOAN, queen of Naples, daughter of Charles, king of Sicily, murdered her first husband, Andrew of Hungary, and married another. The death of the murdered prince was avenged by his brother Lewis; but though Joan fled to Provence for a while, she recovered her kingdom, and destroyed her husband to marry a third, after whose death, she took a fourth. As she had no issue, she adopted her relation, Charles de Duras, who however revolted against her by the intrigues of the king of Hungary, in consequence of which she named for her successor Lewis of France, duke of Anjou. This was productive of a dreadful civil war, but Charles obtaining Naples, seized the queen, and put her to death 1381, in her 55th year.

JOAN II. queen of Naples after her brother, Ladislaus, 1414, disgraced herself by her debaucheries. Her second husband, John count of March, offended with her conduct, destroyed her favorite, Pandolfus, and imprisoned her; but an insurrection restored her to liberty, and thrust her husband into a dungeon, from which he escaped to France, to lead a monastic life. Joan adopted for her heir, Alphonsus, king of Arragon, and died 1434.

JOBERT, Lewis, a Jesuit of Paris, distinguished as a preacher and a medallist. He died at Paris 1719, aged 72. He wrote theological tracts, and "la Science des Medailles," a valuable work, best edited, 1739, 2 vols. 12mo.

JOELLE, Stephen, lord of Linodlin, was born at Paris 1532. He was one of the Pleiades or seven French poets mentioned by Ronsard. He was the first Frenchman who wrote plays in his own language, and with choruses in imitation of the Greek. His Cleopatra was acted with great applause before the king, but in general his plays were long and tedious. He was also an orator, and well skilled in architecture, sculpture and painting. He at one time embraced the opinions of the protestants, but after ridiculing the mass in a Latin satirical poem of 100 lines, he returned to the profession of that religion, and probably thus escaped the murder of St. Bartholomew. He died 1573, aged 41, very poor, though he might have been independent in fortune, if he had cultivated his interest at court. A volume of his works was published 1574, containing besides Cleopatra and Dido, tragedies, Eugene a comedy, and Songs, Sonnets, Elegies and Odes.

JOHN I. surnamed Zimisces, was of an illustrious family, and he seized on the throne of Constantinople by the assassination of Nicephoras Phocas, at the instigation of the empress Theophanon 969. Though he thus owed his elevation to murder, he governed with great moderation, and displayed unusual valor against the Russians, Bulgarians and Saracens, whom he repeatedly defeated. He banished the empress Theophanon at the command of the patriarch, and he was poisoned by a cup-bearer at the instigation of the eunuch Basil, and he died 10th Jan. 976.

JOHN II. Comnenus, succeeded his father Alexis Comnenus, on the throne of Constantinople 1118. He married Irene princess of Hungary, and was successful in his wars against the Mahometans, Servians, and other barbarians. He was a virtuous prince and banished luxury and effeminacy from his court. He died 3d April 1143, aged 55, in consequence of a wound received from a poisoned arrow in the chase.

JOHN III. Ducas, was emperor of Nice, whilst the Latins were masters of Constantinople. Though successful against the neighboring princes, whose dominions he conquered, he failed in his attempts to take Constantinople, and was obliged to make a treaty of peace with Baldwin the usurper. He afterwards waged war against the Bulgarians, and died 1255, aged 62.

JOHN IV. Lascaris, succeeded at the age of six, his father Theodore the younger on the throne of Constantinople, 1259. His youth exposed him to dangers, and his sceptre was seized by Michael Paleologus, who put out his eyes, and confined him for the rest of his life in a prison. He died under Andronicus II.

JOHN V. Under this title, Cantacuzenus, a celebrated Byzantine historian, was emperor. He was born at Constantinople about the year 1295 of an ancient and noble family, his father being governor of Peloponnesus, and his mother of the royal blood. He was prefect of the bedchamber to the emperor Andronicus the elder, whose favor he lost by attaching himself to the interest of his grandson. On the usurpation of the latter he was created generalissimo of his forces, and first minister of state. On the death of Andronicus, Cantacuzenus was left guardian to his son, John Paleologus, which trust he faithfully performed until the empress dowager becoming jealous, formed a party against him, upon which the nobility and the army declared him emperor, and crowned him at Adrianopolis, May 1342. A civil war waged for five years, in which Cantacuzenus was victorious; but in 1355, on John Paleologus becoming master of Constantinople, he abdicated the throne and retired into a monastery, where he wrote a history of his own times in four books, a splendid edition of which was published at Paris in 1645. He lived to the extraordinary age of an hundred, and died in 1411.

JOHN VI. Paleologus, succeeded his father Andronicus the younger on the throne of Constantinople 1341, and had the good fortune to free himself from the power of John Cantacuzenus his father-in-law, who had usurped his sceptre. He afterwards defended himself against the Turks, but bought their peace with money. A more formidable opposition awaited him in the rebellion of his son Andronicus, who imprisoned him and his sons, and during these civil commotions, the Turks renewed their attacks against Constantinople and imposed upon the emperor very disgraceful terms. This weak and unfortunate monarch died of chagrin 1390, aged 60.

JOHN VII. Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople after his father Emanuel 1425, was unfortunate in his opposition against his Turkish invaders, solicited in his defence the assistance of the Latins. More effectually to secure the support of the Princes of the West, he meditated an union between the two churches, and the Pope, Eugenius IV. favoring the plan called a council at Ferrara where the emperor attended in person, and where a reconciliation took place 1489, but not to continue long. John died 31st Oct. 1448, after a reign of 29 years.

JOHN VIII. a Roman, pope after Adrian II. 872, crowned Charles the Bald emperor 875. He held a counsel at Troyes 878, but was called back to Italy by the invasion of the Saracens, who proved so successful that they obliged him to pay an annual tribute. He was prevailed upon by Basil emperor of the East, to acknowledge as patriarch Photius who had artfully banished the legal possessor Ignatius, but he afterwards saw the impropriety of his concessions, and therefore excommunicated the usurper. He died 15th Dec. 882. About 300 of his letters are preserved.

JOHN XII. a Roman noble, son of Alberic, was elected pope 956, at the age of 18, and was the first who changed his name of Octavian by assuming that of John. He solicited the assistance of the emperor Otho, against the tyranny of Berenger who had established his power over Italy, and when he had succeeded in driving away his enemy, he crowned his illustrious ally, and swore to him inviolable fidelity, over the body of St. Peter. This alliance was of short duration, the pope became the friend of the son of Berenger, and united himself against his ancient ally and benefactor, in consequence of which Otho invaded Italy, and in a general council in 963, accused the pope of various crimes. John, convicted of adultery, violence and oppression, was deposed, and Leo VIII. placed in his room; but no sooner was the emperor returned to his dominions than the exiled pontiff entered Rome, and with the most barbarous cruelty mutilated his enemies. He was in 964 killed by an insulted husband, whose bed he had defiled.

JOHN XIII. a Roman, elected Pope 965, by the power of the emperor, against the wishes of the Roman people. This violent step was productive of dissension, and the new pontiff was banished the next year by Peter, prefect of Rome; but the emperor reinstated him, and sent into exile his opponent in disgrace. John died 6th Sept. 972.

JOHN XXII. James d' Euse, a native of Cahors, who by the patronage of Charles II. of Naples, to whose son he was preceptor, rose to high ecclesiastical dignities, and in 1316 was elected to the papedom. He was an active pontiff, and founded several abbeys, and established some bishoprics in central towns. His pontificate however was disturbed by various quarrels, especially with the cardinals whose order he intended to suppress. He died 4th Dec. 1334, respected for his frugality, prudence and sanctity. He was well skilled in medicine, and wrote the Thesaurus Pauperum—treatise on the Disorders of the Eyes—on the Gout—on the Formation of the Fœtus—Advice for preserving Health, printed at Lyons.

JOHN XXIII. Balthasar Cossa, a Neapolitan, who was legate at Bologna, and chamberlain to Boniface IX. and on the death of Alexander V. was raised to the papedom 1410. His elevation was not without opposition; but to pacify faction he promised to resign the tiara, if Gregory XII. and Peter de Lune, or Benedict XIII. would also abandon their pretensions. Though these conditions were accepted and ratified with due formality in the council of Constance, he had the art to withdraw himself, and to re-assume the office and insignia of sovereign pontiff; but he was soon after deposed, and imprisoned. Three years after, 1418, he was restored to liberty and compelled to acknowledge the election of Martin V. by whom he was treated with great kindness. He died soon after at Florence, 22d Nov. 1419.

JOHN, king of England, surnamed Lackland, was the fourth son of Henry II. He unjustly deprived his nephew Arthur of his possessions in Brittany, and confined him in the tower of Rouen, where he was cruelly put to death, and having thus cut off the right heir of the English crown he was declared king. The states of Brittany, and Constance the mother of the murdered Arthur complained of the cruelties of the usurper before Augustus Philip of France, and the tyrant was condemned for the murder, and his dominions in France confiscated. He retired to England, derided and despised by his subjects, and to complete his disgrace he quarrelled with the pope and the barons. The pope excommunicated him, but he reconciled himself to him by acknowledging himself the vassal of Rome, and when he found the barons opposing force to his measures and threatening his deposition, he consented to their request, and signed the Magna Charta, the glorious basis of British freedom. As this was extorted from him, John showed little inclination to observe it; and the barons to punish and dethrone him called over Lewis the son of the French king, and swore allegiance to him. Deserted by his subjects, and harassed by an army of foreigners, John at last found relief in death. His misfortunes pressed so heavily upon his spirits that he fell a victim to a fever at Newark, 19th Oct. 1216. He was buried in Worcester cathedral. His son Henry III. succeeded him.

JOHN, king of France, surnamed the Good, succeeded his father Philip Valois 1350. The beginning of his reign was marked by measures of severity, and in consequence of this, dissatisfaction and insurrection prevailed over the kingdom and favored the invasion of the country by the English. John opposed his enemies, but was defeated in a dreadful battle near Poitiers by the black prince Edward, and taken prisoner 1356. The imprisonment of John in England was the signal for civil dissension. France was torn to pieces by her rebellious chiefs, and the king, unable to procure his liberty by the payment of 300 millions of golden crowns, and by the cession of eight provinces for his ransom according to the treaty of Bretigni, returned from France, which he had visited on his parole, and died soon after in the Savoy, London, 8th April 1364, aged 54. Though impolitic, violent and imprudent in his character, John possessed bravery and generosity.

JOHN, son of the emperor Henry VII. was, at the age of 14, elected to the kingdom of Bohemia 1309, against the intrigues of the duke of Carinthia. He displayed great valor, and after conquering Silesia he was declared king of Poland. In his expedition against the Lithuanians he had the misfortune to lose one of his eyes, and a Jew doctor to whom he applied at Montpellier for a cure, deprived him of the other. This misfortune did not however disarm him of his courage, he assisted Philip of Valois against the English, and in the battle of Crecy with his horse led by the bridle by two brave knights, he displayed singular acts of valor, and was mortally wounded 26th Aug. 1346.

JOHN I. king of Portugal, was raised to the throne 1384, though but the natural son of Peter the Severe, against the rights of Beatrix, daughter of his brother Ferdinand I. His elevation was opposed by John, king of Castile, who had married Beatrix; but the usurper established himself in his power by the defeat of his opponents at the battle of Alinbarota; afterwards John turned his arms against the Moors of Africa and took Ceuta and other places, and died 14th Aug. 1433, aged 76. Under his reign the Portuguese began their famous discoveries.

JOHN II. king of Portugal, was surnamed the Great, and succeeded his father Alphonsus V. 1481. He was successful in his suppression of some insurrections, the leaders of which he punished with death, and afterwards he carried his arms into Africa, and was at the taking of Arzile and Tangiers. He afterwards defeated the Castilians at the battle of Toro, 1476, and with wise policy encouraged the maritime excursions of his subjects, and favored their settlements on the coasts of Africa, and in the Indies.—He died of a dropsy 22d Oct. 1495, aged 41.

JOHN III. king of Portugal, succeeded his father Emanuel, 1521. The beginning of his reign was marked by dreadful earthquakes which destroyed his cities and swallowed up the inhabitants; but John with benevolence and wisdom relieved the miseries of his subjects, and encouraged commerce and navigation. His fleets penetrated far into the east, and discovered Japan, and to insure the tranquillity of his Indian settlements he sent among them the celebrated Francis Xavier. He died of an apoplexy 1557, aged 55, deservedly respected as an humane and enlightened monarch.

JOHN IV. surnamed the Fortunate, was son of Theodore duke of Braganza, and was born 1604. He employed all the powers of his mind and of his situation, to the emancipation of his country, which the Spaniards after the death of Sebastian, had conquered, and since held as a tributary province, and by the assistance of his brave countrymen he shook off the odious yoke, and was proclaimed king 1630. He died at Lisbon, 6th Nov. 1636, aged 32.

JOHN V. succeeded Peter II. on the throne of Portugal, 1707. He espoused the cause of the allies in the wars of the Spanish succession, and when the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, restored tranquillity to Europe, he devoted himself to the encouragement of commerce, of literature, and of industry among his subjects. He died 1750, aged 61, universally regretted.

JOHN, of Gaunt or Ghent, duke of Lancaster, was the third son of Edward III. He was born at Ghent, 1340, and distinguished himself by his valor in the field. In consequence of his marriage with Constance, the natural daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile and Leon, he laid claim to the throne on the death of his father-in-law, but was opposed by Henry of Transtamare, and enjoyed nothing but the empty title of king. In the wars of the black prince his brother in France, he supported him by his intrepidity, and after his death succeeded to the management of affairs. On the accession of Richard II. he was dragged from the retirement which he loved, to clear himself against the accusations of the courtiers, who charged him with attempts to seize the crown because he countenanced the doctrines of Wickliffe, against the overbearing power of the pope. He afterwards resigned his claims to the throne of Castile to his only daughter by Constance, who in 1386 married the heir apparent of that kingdom, and he received in return an honorable pension. John had for his third wife, Catherine Swinford, the governess of his children, and the sister of Chaucer's wife, and from his patronage of that poet he received pleasure, honor, and fame. John died 1399, highly respected for his valor and prudence. His son Henry succeeded to the English throne after the deposition of the second Richard.

JOHN of Austria, Don, was the natural son of Charles V. of Germany. He was unacquainted with his birth, till his father on his death-bed revealed the secret to his son Philip II. who honorably called him to court, and in 1570 placed him at the head of his army against the Moors of Grenada, whom he defeated. In 1571, he commanded the naval armament against the Turks and gained the celebrated battle of Lepanto, and two years after took Tunis. He was made governor of the Netherlands in 1576, and after taking Namur, Charlemont, and other towns, he completed his triumphs over the prince of Orange and the archduke Matthias, by the famous battle of Gemblours 1478. This celebrated warrior died 1578, at the early age of 32, in consequence of poison as it is supposed, administered by his enemies.

JOHN, Fearless, count of Nevers and duke of Burgundy, distinguished himself at Nicopolis against Bajazet, who sold him his liberty for an exorbitant ransom. Restored to France he employed his influence in promoting sedition and civil war in the kingdom against the dauphin, afterwards Charles VII. and the Partisans of the duke of Orleans. He murdered the duke of Orleans, and afterwards being reconciled to the dauphin, he was assassinated in his presence by one of his courtiers, 10th Sept. 1419, aged 48.

JOHN, of Salisbury, a learned Englishman who in his youth was in the service of the abbot of Rheims, and then studied at Paris, where he took his degrees. He visited Rome, and at his return to Paris, opened a school there. He afterwards was in England and lived with Theobald, the primate, and with Thomas-a-Becket, and in 1177 was chosen bishop of Chartres by the clergy of that diocese, at the recommendation of Louis the young king of France. He was an able prelate, and distinguished himself at the council of Lateran, and died 1181. His writings are lost, except Becket's Life—a Collection of Letters—and "Polycraticon."

JOHNES, Thomas, an ingenious gentleman, was born at Ludlow in Shropshire, in 1748. From Shrewsbury school he went to Eton, and afterwards to Jesus College, Oxford, where he took his degree of master of arts, in 1783. Previous to this he had made the tour of Europe, and was elected into parliament for the borough of Cardigan. He was also appointed auditor for the principality of Wales, and colonel of the Caermarthenshire militia. In 1795 he was returned knight of the shire for the county of Radnor. He devoted much attention to the improvement of his estates at Hafod, in Cardiganshire, where he planted an immense number of trees, and built an elegant house, which was enriched by a most valuable library; and he had also a printing-press from whence issued several elegant productions. In 1807 this mansion was destroyed by fire, while the owner was in London. In 1811 Mr. Johnes experienced a more severe loss in the death of his favorite daughter, from the effects of which shock he never recovered. He died April 24, 1776. His publications are—1. A Cardiganshire Landlord's Advice to his Tenants. 2. Palaye's Memoirs of Froissart translated from the French, 4 vols. 4to. 3. The Chronicles of Sir John Froissart 4 vols. 4to. and 10 vols. 8vo. 4. Translation of De Joinville's Memoirs of St. Louis, 2 vols. 4to. 5. Travels of Bertrand de la Brocquiere in Palestine, 8vo. 6. The Chronicles of Monstrelet, with notes, 4 vols. 4to.

JOHNSON, Samuel, an English divine, born 1649. When settled in London he plunged into the vortex of politics, and soon distinguished himself, and became the friend of lord Essex, and of lord William Russel, who made him his chaplain. He inveighed severely in his discourses from the pulpit, against the horrors of popery, and spoke with warmth against the succession of the duke of York to the throne. While his political friends wielded the weapons of eloquence in parliament, he himself attacked Dr. Hickes, the bold champion of passive obedience, in a pamphlet called, "Julian the Apostate." The work was quickly answered by Dr. Hickes, in a pamphlet called, "Jovian," and Johnson had already prepared a severe reply, which the seizure and imprisonment of his patron, lord William Russel, prevented him from publishing. His abilities, however, and his zeal were too conspicuous to be disregarded: after Russel's death, he was summoned before the privy council, and questioned about the answer he had written to Dr. Hickes, called, "Julian's Arts and Methods to undermine and extirpate Christianity;" but when he declared that he had suppressed it, and when his persecutors could procure no copy of it, though it was entered at Stationers'-hall, he was dismissed. But soon after he was prosecuted for the publication of Julian the Apostate, and though ably defended by counsellor Wallop, he was condemned before Jeffries, and sentenced to pay 500 marks, and to be imprisoned till it was paid. Though thus confined, his spirit was not subdued: he still wrote against popery; and when the army was drawn up on Hounslow heath in 1686, he drew up "an Address to the Protestants of the Army," which, after the dispersion of 1000 copies, was seized, and exposed the author to fresh persecution. He was in consequence of this condemned to stand in the Pillory, in Palace yard, at Charing cross, and the Exchange, to pay a fine of 500 marks, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, after being degraded from the priesthood. The degradation took place by the hands of bishops Crew, Sprat, and White; and on December 1, 1686, the sentence was executed. The stripes which he received were 317, from a whip of nine cords knotted, which he endured with great firmness and even alacrity. At the revolution, the parliament, 1689, resolved that the proceedings in the King's bench against Johnson, were cruel and illegal; and therefore they recommended him to the king for some ecclesiastical preferment suitable to his services and sufferings. The deanery of Durham in consequence of this was offered to him, which he refused as a reward inadequate to his merits; but at the solicitation of lady Russel, and the influence of Tillotson, a pension of 300*l.* a-year was obtained from the king, for his own and his son's life, besides a gratuity of 1000*l.* He died May 1703. All his treatises were published in 1 vol. folio, 1710; a second edition of which appeared 1713. Johnson in his character, was firm, undaunted, and enthusiastic; but his temper was violent, overbearing, and unsubmissive; and probably to the furious zeal with which he attacked those who differed from him, and, to the abusive language which he indiscriminately used against his opponents, he might attribute the virulence and persevering spirit of his persecutors.

JOHNSON, John, a nonjuror divine, born at Frindsbury, near Rochester in England, 1662, and educated at Canterbury school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge. He afterwards entered at Corpus Christi, of which he became fellow 1685. He was in 1686 presented to the vicarages of Baston and Heron Hill, near Canterbury, by Sancroft, the primate; and in 1697 he was further promoted by Tenison to the living of Margate, and afterwards to Apuldré. His abilities as a scholar and divine were very great, and therefore he was twice chosen procurator in convocation for Canterbury. But though protected by government, he manifested some opposition to the establishment, and not only expressed a mean opinion of the articles and liturgy of the church, but even refused to take the oaths of allegiance to George I. This threatened dangers, which however he prudently avoided by timely submission, though he afterwards continued restless, dissatisfied and disloyal. He died 15th Dec. 1725. He wrote the "Clergyman's Vade-mecum," an excellent book, 2 vols. 12mo.—collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar Unveiled and Supported, 8vo. and a paraphrase on the Psalms.

JOHNSON, Charles, a member of the Middle Temple, who left the profession of the law for the muses. He wrote some plays, which, by the friendship of Wilks, were acted on the stage, and received some applause. He died about 1744. Though he is not ranked among the greatest of dramatic writers, yet he possessed merit, and deserved popularity. His dramatic pieces are 19 in number. He is immortalized in Pope's Dunciad, because, says the note, he was famous for writing a play every year, and for being at Button's coffee-house, every day, and for falling a martyr to obesity, and the roundness of his parts.

JOHNSON, Maurice, an eminent antiquary, born of an ancient and respectable family at Spalding, where he established a Gentleman's literary society. He was of the Middle Temple, and was bred to the bar. By his wife, daughter of Mr. Ambler, he had 26 children, 16 of whom sat down together at his table. He was one of the last founders of the Antiquarian society; and by his benevolence, and the liberality of his various communications, he fully deserved the handsome eulogium written on him by Dr. Stukeley, and inserted in the minutes of the society, to whose memoirs he contributed so much. He made a curious collection for the history of Carausius. He died, after suffering much from a vertiginous disorder, 6th Feb. 1755.

JOHNSON, Thomas, a native of Selby, Yorkshire, brought up to the business of an apothecary in London. He became, according to Wood, the best herbalist of his time; and wrote, Iter in agrum Cantuarium 1629—Eriectum Hamstedianum, 1632, the first catalogue of plants published in England—Gerard's Herbal improved, a valuable work, and Essay on the Bath Waters. He was an officer in the royal army, and was made M.D. by the university of Oxford for his services. He died in consequence of a wound which he had received in the shoulder at the siege of Basinghouse, 1644.

JOHNSON, Samuel, LL.D. a celebrated English writer, born at Lichfield, 7th Sept. 1709. He was the son of a bookseller, and was educated at Lichfield school, and at Oxford. His exercises in the university displayed, as they had done at school, superior powers; and his translation of Pope's Messiah into Latin verse, appeared so highly finished, that the poet spoke with the highest respect of his translator, and declared, that posterity would doubt which poem was the original. Unhappily Johnson had to struggle with poverty at college, and in consequence of the insolvency of his father, he left the university in 1731, without a degree. In 1735 he married Mrs. Porter, a widow of Birmingham, a lady much older than himself, and not possessed of the most engaging manners, or the most fascinating person. As she brought him 800*l.* he began to fit up a house at Edial, near Lichfield, for the reception of pupils; but as he had only three scholars, among whom was David Garrick, the plan was dropped as utterly impracticable and ruinous. About this time, under the patronage of Mr. Walmsley, his earliest friend, he began his Irene; and in March 1737, he first visited London in company with his pupil, Garrick, like himself in quest of employment, and equally doomed to rise to celebrity in his profession. In London he formed an acquaintance with Cave, the printer of the Gentleman's Magazine; and his first performance in that work was a Latin alcaic ode, inserted in March 1738. Thus encouraged, he returned to Lichfield to fetch his wife; and from 1740 to 1743, he was laboriously employed in the service of this periodical work, and during that period, wrote the parliamentary debates, valuable not as the effusions of orators, but as the bold composition of a man of genius on such subjects as were supposed to engage the legislators of the age. In 1738 he published his London, a poem, in imitation of Juvenal's third satire, which was well received, and honored with the commendation of Pope, and passed to a second edition in one week. Besides his valuable contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine, he in 1744 published the Life of Savage, a work of great merit, which, in the elegant language of pathetic narration, exhibited the sufferings and the poverty of a friend, whose calamities he himself had shared and bewailed. He began in 1747, his edition of Shakspeare, and published the plan of his English dictionary. This gigantic work was undertaken under the patronage of the booksellers; and the lexicographer engaged a house in Gough-square, where, with the assistance of six amanuenses, he proceeded rapidly in the execution of his plan. This great work, so honorable to the talents of the author, appeared, May, 1755, in 2 vols. without a patron. Lord Chesterfield, who had at first favored the undertaking, but had afterwards neglected the author, endeavored, by a flattering recommendation of the work in "the World," to reconcile himself to his good opinion; but Johnson, with noble indignation, spurned at the mean artifice of his courtly patron; and his celebrated letter reflected, with independent spirit and in severe language, against his selfish and ambitious views. In 1749 the Irene had been brought forward on the stage, by the friendship of Garrick, but with no success. The Rambler was undertaken 20th March, 1750, and till the 17th March, 1752, when it ceased, a paper had regularly appeared every Tuesday and Saturday; and it is remarkable that, during the whole of that time, only five numbers were contributed by other authors. But these publications, popular as they were, still left Johnson in distressed circumstances; and in 1756, the year after the publishing of his dictionary, he was arrested for a debt of five guineas, from which the kindness of Richardson relieved him. In 1758 he began the Idler, and continued it for two years with little assistance; and on the death of his mother in 1759, that he might pay some decent respect to her funeral, and discharge her debts, he wrote his Rasselas, and obtained for it, from the booksellers, the sum of 100*l.* Happily, however, these high services to literature, were not to pass unrewarded: in 1762 he was honorably presented by the king, on the representation of Mr. Wedderburne, with a pension of 300*l.* per annum, without a stipulation of future exertions, but merely, as the grant expressed it, for the moral tendency of his writings, a character to which his Rambler was most fully entitled. In 1777 he began his Lives of the Poets, which he finished in 1781, a work of great merit, and which exhibits, in the most pleasing manner, the soundness of the critic, the information of the biographer, and the benevolent views of the man. In a few years after this he found his health gradually declining, from the united attacks of the dropsy and of an asthma. During the progressive increase of his complaints, he divided his time in acts of devotion, and in classical recreations; and during his sleepless nights, he translated several of the Greek epigrams of the Anthologia into Latin verse. It is remarkable, that Johnson, whose pen was ever employed in recommending piety, and all the offices of the purest morality; and whose conduct and example in life exhibited the most perfect pattern of the christian virtues; should, in the close of life, betray dreadful apprehensions of death. By degrees, indeed, the terrors which his imagination had painted to itself, disappeared. Johnson expired on the 13th Dec. 1784, full of resignation, strong in faith, and joyful in hope of a happy resurrection. His works are very numerous, and all respectable. Some of his smaller pieces were published by sir J. Hawkins in 1787, with his life in 11 vols. 8vo. and of these an edition, by Murphy, appeared in 1792, in 12 vols. 8vo. As a literary character, his name stands on very high ground; correctness, elegance, and variety every where clothed under a strong and nervous style, captivate, enliven, and edify. The powers of a sound and matured judgment, of a vigorous imagination, and a most retentive memory, were happily united to illustrate what was obscure, to render pleasing what was harsh and unseemly, to explain what was difficult, and to embellish what was devoid of grace, of beauty or of attraction.

JOHNSON, Sir Nathaniel, governor of South Carolina, succeeded James Moore in 1703, and continued in office till 1709. He was a military man, and when the colony was invaded by the French and Spaniards in 1706, displayed great judgment and skill in the measures which he adopted for its defence. Its enemies were defeated and driven from its shores with the loss of their commander and three hundred men, while that of the provincials was exceeding small. The proprietors rewarded his fidelity by the grant of an extensive tract of land. To him the merit is ascribed of having first introduced the cultivation of silk in South Carolina, in 1703. It was chiefly owing to his influence that the first establishment of the episcopal church was carried there, when the majority of the inhabitants were dissenters. He died in 1713. Before his arrival in Carolina, he had been for some time a member of the house of commons, and from 1696, to 1699, governor of Nevis, St. Christophers, Montserrat, and Antigua.

JOHNSTON, Charles, a novel writer, was born in Ireland, and bred to the bar; but being excessively deaf he was compelled to relinquish that profession. In 1760, he published "Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea;" a political romance, in which all the characters and scenes were drawn from real life. This was followed by some others of a similar description, as "The Reverie, or a Flight to the Paradise of Fools," 2 vols.; "The History of Arbaces, Prince of Betlis," 2 vols.; the Pilgrim, or a Picture of Life; 2 vols.; and the "History of John Juniper, Esq. alias Juniper Jack," 3 vols. In 1782, the author went to India, and died there about 1800.

JOHNSTON, Gabriel, governor of North Carolina, entered on his administration in November, 1734, and continued in the office till his death, in 1752. He was in most respects an excellent magistrate. He did much to establish order, and encourage learning and religion, and the colony advanced greatly in numbers and wealth during his government.

JOHNSTONE, James, a physician, was born at Annan, in 1730. He studied at Edinburgh; and in 1750, took his doctor's degree, after which he settled at Kidderminster, where he became known by his treatment of a malignant fever that raged there some years, and of which he published an account. In this he first made known the power of mineral acid vapour to destroy febrile contagion. From Kidderminster he removed to Worcester, where he died in 1802. Dr. Johnstone in some papers communicated to the Royal Society, stated a peculiar doctrine concerning the ganglions of the nerves.

JOHNSON, Isaac, one of the founders of Massachusetts, was a native of England and arrived at Salem 1630 with gov. Winthrop in the chief ship of the fleet formerly the Eagle, but now named the Arabella in honor of his wife. In July he with the governor and other gentlemen proceeded to Charlestown. July 30 was a day of fasting, and the church of Boston was founded at Charlestown. The want of good water at Charlestown induced Mr. Johnson and others to remove to Shawmut or Boston, where was an excellent spring. At the second court of assistants in Charlestown Sept. 7. Mr. Johnson was present. Boston was settled under his conduct. He died 1630, Sept. 30. He had the largest estate of any of the settlers, and was the greatest furtherer of this plantation. His lot in Boston was the square between Tremont, School, Court, and Washington streets; and he was buried at the upper end of his lot, which gave occasion for the first burying place to be laid out around his grave. This is now called the Stone Chapel graveyard. His house was on a hill near Tremont street.

JOHNSON, Edward, captain, an early historian of New England, was a native of England, and came to America in 1630. His usual residence was in Charlestown, but in 1632 he went to Merrimac with a license to trade. In 1643 he was chosen representative and was annually reelected excepting 1648 till 1671. He was speaker of the house in 1655. In 1665 he was appointed on the committee with Bradstreet, Danforth and others to meet Nicolls, Carr, Cartwright, and Maverick, who had been sent from England. He died April 23, 1672. Capt. Johnson was the author of a history of Massachusetts from 1628 to 1652, which is of great value, notwithstanding the imperfections of its style. Its title is, History of New England from the English planting in 1628 till 1652; or Wonder Working Providence of Zion's Saviour, 4to. London, 1654. It has been reprinted in the historical collections.

JOHNSON, Robert, governor of South Carolina, died at Charleston 1735. He was governor in 1719, and again from 1730 till the period of his death. In 1731 he negotiated a treaty with the Cherokees. He proved himself an efficient friend of Mr. Oglethorpe, and the first settler of Georgia; on their arrival at Charleston, the assembly, at his suggestion, furnishing them with 104 head of cattle, 25 hogs, 20 barrels of rice, and ten horsemen rangers for their protection. The settlement of Parrysburgh, by 600 Swiss under col. Parry, was made in his administration.

JOHNSON, Samuel, D.D., first president of King's college, New York, was a native of Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college 1714, where he was a tutor from 1716 till he was ordained minister of West Haven 1720. Having become a convert to the worship and government of the Episcopal church, he resigned his charge, and went to England in 1722 for ordination. After his return in Nov. 1723, he officiated as a missionary in Stratford. In 1754 he was elected president of the college, which had been lately instituted at New York. He went to that place in April and soon commenced his labors. He resigned this office in 1763, and resumed his former charge at Stratford, where he remained, till his death, in 1772, aged 75. An account of his life, written by Dr. Chandler, was given to the public in 1805. He published plain reasons for conforming to the church, 1733; two tracts in the controversy with Mr. Graham; a letter from Aristocles to Anthades; a defence of it in a letter to Mr. Dickinson; a system of morality, 1746, designed to check the progress of enthusiasm; a compendium of logic, 1752; a demonstration of the reasonableness of prayer, 1761; a sermon on the beauties of holiness in the worship of the church of England; a short vindication of the society for propagating the gospel; an English grammar and a catechism 1765; a Hebrew grammar, 1767, this evinced an accurate acquaintance with that language, and it was reprinted with improvements in 1771.

JOHNSON, William Samuel, LL.D., president of Columbia college New York, graduated at Yale college in 1744; and afterward became a lawyer. In 1765 he was a delegate to the congress at New York; and in 1766 he was an agent of Connecticut in England. While there he formed an acquaintance with illustrious men; with Dr. S. Johnson he corresponded for many years. He returned in 1771, and in 1772 was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, an office which he relinquished in 1774. In 1785 he was a delegate to congress; and in 1787 he was a member of the convention, which framed the constitution of the United States. He was one of the first senators from Connecticut, and with Mr. Ellsworth drew up the bill for the judiciary system. From 1792 to 1800 he was the president of Columbia college. After 1800 he lived in his native village till his death 1819, aged 92.

JOHNSON, Thomas, governor of Maryland. In 1774 he was appointed a member of congress, and was for several years in that body. After the revolution he was the first governor from 1777 to 1779. He was an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, from 1791 till his resignation, from ill health, in 1793. He died 1819, aged 87.

JOHNSON, sir William, a major-general of the militia of New York, and remarkable for the ascendancy, which he gained over the Indians, was a native of Ireland. In 1734 he came to America, to take charge of the affairs of his uncle, sir Peter Warren, who had purchased large tracts of land upon the Mohawk river, and also in the interior parts of the country. Young Johnson accordingly took up his residence, upon a certain tract, upon the Mohawk, about 30 miles from Albany, and cultivated an acquaintance with the Indians. He learned their language, he studied their manners, that he might be able to conciliate their regard; his situation upon the river between Albany and Oswego presented a fine opportunity for trade, and he carried on a large traffic with them, supplying them with such goods as they needed, and receiving in return beaver and other skins; at length he acquired an influence over them, which no other man ever possessed. In 1735 he was intrusted with the command of the provincial troops of New York in the expedition against Crown Point. He was attacked in his camp on lake George, but succeeded in repulsing the French, and taking their general baron Dieskau prisoner. He did not pursue the advantage he had thus gained, by proceeding against Crown Point. For his conduct in this affair, in which he was wounded, the house of commons bestowed on him 5,000*l.* and the king conferred on him the title of baronet. In 1759 he commanded the expedition against Niagara. The fort was taken, and about 600 men made prisoners. This event broke off the communication, which the French intended to establish between Canada and Louisiana. When Amherst embarked at Oswego in June 1760 to proceed on the expedition to Canada, sir William brought to him, at that place, 1,000 Indians of the Iroquois, or five nations, which was the largest number that had ever been seen in arms at one time in the cause of England. He died 1774, aged 60. There is one anecdote told of Johnson, which shows, that in his intercourse with the Indians, he had not failed to learn their cunning. Having sent to England for clothes finely laced, on their arrival, Hendrick, the chief of the Mohawks, was dazzled with their splendor, and began to think how finely he should look, dressed in a similar manner. His vanity could not be resisted, and to gratify it he hit upon the following expedient. He went to sir William one morning, and told him, very demurely, that in the preceding night he had dreamed, that the baronet had generously presented him with a suit of his laced clothes. The solemn hint could not be mistaken or avoided, and the Indian monarch went away pleased with his successful ingenuity. In a few days, however, sir William accosted his majesty, and made known his dream, which was that Hendrick had given him a tract of land containing several thousand acres. "The land is yours," said Hendrick, "but now, sir William, I never dream with you again; you dream too hard for me." He published a piece on the customs and language of the Indians in phil. transact. vol. 63.

JOHNSON, sir John, son of the preceding, succeeded his father in his title, and was appointed major-general in his place Nov. 1774. At the commencement of the war he joined the British, and about the year 1776 persuaded the Mohawks to retire into Canada, from whence he repeatedly ravaged different parts of New York, and in one expedition, in which he destroyed the very settlement where he formerly lived, he proved himself not very dissimilar in character to his savage companions. In Aug. 1777 he invested fort Stanwix, and defeated Herkimer. In Oct. 1780, gen. Van Rensselaar defeated him at Fox's mills. In 1796 he was appointed governor of Upper Canada. He died 1798.

JOHNSON, Samuel, LL.D. governor of North Carolina, from 1787 to 1789, was president of the convention of that state which ratified the federal constitution, and had been a member of congress previous to 1789, when he was appointed a senator from North Carolina, and afterwards a judge of the supreme court of law and equity. He was a native of Edenton, and died at Sherwark, August 18th, 1816, aged 83.

JOHNSTON, Arthur, a physician, born at Caskeben, near Aberdeen. After studying at Aberdeen, he went to Rome, and to Padua, where he took the degree of M.D. 1610. He next travelled through Italy, Germany, Denmark, England and Holland, and at last settled in France, where he had by two wives, 13 children. After distinguishing himself as a Latin poet at Paris, he returned after 24 years' absence, to Scotland, in 1632, and was then introduced to Laud, who at that time was in the north with Charles I. He dedicated his poetical paraphrase of David's psalms, to his patron, by whose interest he was made physician to the king. He visited in 1641, one of his daughters, who was married at Oxford, and being seized with a violent diarrhœa, died there in the course of a few days, aged 54.

JOHNSTONE, George, known as one of the commissioners, sent with lord Carlisle and Mr. Eden, to treat with the Americans during the war, was the son of a Scotch baronet. He was brought up to the sea service, and was made master and commander 1760, and two years after, post captain, and in 1763 appointed governor of West Florida. He after his return to England, sat in parliament for Cokermonth and Appleby, and fought a duel with lord George Germaine, in consequence of some reflections which he had made in parliament on his conduct. He also distinguished himself for his zeal in the affairs of the East India company, and for his violent attacks on the conduct of lord Clive. He was author of Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies, particularly in Bengal, 8vo. 1771, and he died 1787.

JOHNSON, or JOHNSTON, Charles, a novel writer, was born in Ireland, in the first half of the eighteenth century, and was called to the bar, but his deafness confined him to chamber practice. In 1782 he went to Calcutta, where he became joint proprietor of a newspaper, and died about 1800. His novels, the principal of which are, Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea, and its continuation, The Reverie, are spirited, and full of pungent satire, and the characters are mostly copied, and often caricatured, from real life.

JOINVILLE, John Sire de, a French statesman, born of a noble family in Champagne. He became one of the favorite lords in the court of Louis IX. and was consulted on all occasions with confidence by the monarch. He wrote the History of St. Louis, an interesting work, best edited by Ducauge, 1668, folio, and also in 1761, by Melot. He died about 1318, aged nearly 90 years.

JOMELLI, Nicholas, a celebrated composer, was born, in 1714, at Aversa, in the kingdom of Naples, and was a pupil of Leo and Durantè. After having resided for some years in Germany, in the service of the duke of Wirtemberg, he returned to his native country, and died at Naples, 1774. He composed more than forty operas; oratorios; and several excellent pieces of church music; besides smaller works.

JONAS, Anagrimus, a learned Icelander, the astronomical coadjutor of Gundeband, bishop of Holm, in Iceland, the pupil of Tycho Brahe. On the death of his friend, he refused to succeed him in his diocese, but remained in the humble but peaceful situation of minister of Melstadt. In his 86th year he took for his second wife, a young girl, and died about nine years after, 1640. His works were Idea Veri Magistratus, 1589, 8vo.—Brevis Commentarius de Islandiæ, 1593, 8vo.—Anatome Bleskeniana, &c. 1612—Epistola pro Patria Defensoria, 1618—Vita Gundebandi, 1630, 4to.—Crymogœa, &c. 1630, 4to. and Specimen Islandiæ, 1634, 4to.

JONAS, Justus, a learned divine, born at Northausen, in Thuringia. He was the friend, and the able defender of Luther and of his doctrines. He was principal of the college of Wittemberg, for some time, and died 1555, aged 62.

JONATHAN, a general of the Jews, son of Matthias, and brother to Judas Maccabeus, after defeating Bacchides, the Syrian chief, and Demetrius Soter, and his general Apollonius, was at last treacherously seized by Tryphon, and cruelly put to death, though a large ransom had been paid for his liberation, B. C. 144.

JONES, Inigo, a celebrated architect, born 1572, in the vicinity of St. Paul's, London, where his father was a cloth-worker. He was apprenticed to a joiner, and his attention to his business, and his improvement in the art of designing, gradually recommended him, and the earl of Pembroke, sensible of his great natural genius, generously enabled him to travel over Italy, and the best part of Europe. While on his travels he was noticed at Venice by Christian IV. king of Denmark, and he returned to England in the train of that monarch. He soon gained the protection of the English court, he was made architect to the queen, and to prince Henry, but when he succeeded to the reversion of surveyor-general of the king's works, he with unusual generosity, refused to accept any salary, till the heavy debts contracted under his predecessor, had been totally liquidated. In 1620, he was directed by the king, when at lord Pembroke's at Wilton, to examine the group of stones, called Stone Henge, and after deep research, and exact measurement he concluded, that this venerable pile is nothing but a Roman temple, dedicated to Cœlus, and erected between the times of Agricola and Constantine. He was also that same year, appointed one of the commissioners for repairing St. Paul's cathedral, and he continued in the same honorable appointments under Charles I. He was also made manager of the masques and interludes in fashion in those times of pomp and pageantry, and it was in this office, that he unfortunately quarrelled with Ben Jonson, who with all the virulence of an enraged poet, ridiculed his friend in the character of Lantern Leather-head, in the comedy of Bartholomew fair, and in other pieces. Notwithstanding these attacks of private malevolence, which were disgusting not only to the friends of both parties, but even to the king, Jones increased in fame, in popularity, and in opulence. The troubles of the nation, however, affected him deeply, he was not only grieved for the misfortunes of a kind master, but his property was plundered on account of his loyalty, and after the king's death, he was obliged to pay 400*l.* as a composition to Cromwell. Worn out with years, and with grief at the public calamities, he died 1652. Though sprung from a low origin, Jones so improved the native powers of his mind, that he became an excellent mathematician, a tolerable scholar in Greek and Latin, a decent poet, and to the highest celebrity in architecture, added an extensive knowledge of all human sciences. His "Stone Henge restored," was published 1655, in folio, by Mr. Webb, his friend and heir, and in 1665, appeared "a Vindication" of the work, reprinted in 1725. Several designs of his buildings are preserved in Campbell's Vitruvius Britannicus. The principal part of his designs were published by Kent, 1727, folio, and other inferior designs in 1744. He left in MS. some valuable notes on Palladio's architecture, published 1714, by Leoni.

JONES, William, a learned mathematician, born 1675, in the isle of Anglesey. He taught mathematics in London, and had in the number of his pupils, lords Hardwicke and Macclesfield. By the friendship and influence of lord Hardwicke, he obtained a sinecure of 200*l.* a year, and afterwards succeeded to the more lucrative office of deputy teller in the exchequer. His abilities mean time recommended him to the notice of the learned. He was the friend of Newton, and the correspondent of the greatest mathematicians of Europe. He died in easy circumstances, in 1749, but it is to be lamented, that the work which he had completed with great and intense labor, as an introduction to the mathematical and philosophical compositions of Newton, has been lost. The author had just completed it when attacked by illness, and he had just time before he expired, to send it fairly written, by an amanuensis to his friend, lord Macclesfield, recommending the publication for the benefit of his family. The work, however, was forgotten, and at lord Macclesfield's death, the manuscript could no where be found. The works of Mr. Jones were a compendium of the Art of Navigation, 8vo. 1702—Synopsis Palmariorum Matheseos, 8vo. 1706, several papers in the philosophical transactions, and other works to support the doctrines of his friend Newton, against the attacks of Leibnitz, and other philosophers.

JONES, sir William, a learned judge, son of the preceding, was born in London, 1748. He entered at University college, Oxford, in 1764, and devoted himself laboriously to the study of the oriental languages. He visited the continent in 1769, and in 1770, entered at the temple to study the law. Deservedly distinguished as an able scholar, he now proved to the world, how usefully he had devoted himself to literature, and he published in 1774, his Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, dedicated to the university of Oxford. His translation of Iseus, with learned notes, appeared in 1779, and the next year he felt for the safety of the empire, and in consequence of the London riots, published an inquiry into the legal mode of suppressing riots. In 1793, his legal knowledge, and his acquaintance with the literature of the east, recommended him to the ministry, as a fit person to preside in the supreme court of Calcutta, and on that occasion, he received the honor of knighthood. He left England in April 1793, and on his arrival in India, he was enabled to establish an Asiatic society, for the purpose of illustrating the history, learning, and antiquities of the east. To the memoirs of this learned body, the formation of which his active mind had planned, in his voyage from Europe, he made most valuable contributions. When disengaged from the occupations of his judicial office, he unbent all the powers of his comprehensive mind, to the literature of the east, and he acquired such an acquaintance with the Sanscrit language, and the code of the Bramins, that he was courted and admired by the most learned and intelligent of the native Indians. In one of his discourses to the Asiatic society, he has evinced his attachment to the religion of his country, and his belief in her sacred tenets, by supporting the validity of the Mosaic history of the creation, in a manner more satisfactory and more convincing than any other writer. This great and good man, from whom so much was expected still, in the paths of oriental science and literature, who deserved so well of his country, and of her Asiatic colonies, by his firmness, his legal knowledge, and his unshaken integrity, was snatched away after a short illness at Calcutta, 27th April 1794, aged 48. The works of sir William have been published in 6 vols. 4to. 1799, and proved him not only an elegant scholar, but a good poet, an able critic, and an indefatigable historian, whose name must be revered wherever virtue and literature are cultivated. His life has been written by his friend, lord Teignmouth, 4to 1804.

JONES, William, an English divine, born 1726. After entering into orders he took the curacy of Finedon, Northamptonshire, where he wrote his answer to bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit. In 1754, he became curate at Wadenhoe, where he wrote his catholic Doctrine of the Trinity, a work of merit. In 1764, he was presented by Secker to Bethersden vicarage, Kent, and afterwards he went to reside at Nayland, Suffolk, till on the elevation of Dr. Horne, to the see of Norwich, he became domestic chaplain to his old and venerable friend. He afterwards was invited by lord Kenyon to undertake the tuition of his two sons, and in 1793, he was presented by the archbishop to the living of Hollingbourne, in Kent. As a divine, Mr. Jones was a pious and exemplary character. He espoused the tenets of the Hutchinsonian system, as he evinced in his Essay on the first principles of Natural Philosophy, published in 1762, and completed in his Physiological disquisitions, or Discourses on the Natural philosophy of the Elements, 1781. During the French revolution, he ably supported the government of the country, by some seasonable and well written pamphlets, particularly an excellent collection of tracts, called the Scholar Armed, 2 vols. 8vo. He also published 2 vols. of sermons in 1790. This worthy man died 6th Jan. 1801. His works have been collected together and published in 12 vols. 8vo. with a full account of his life. For some time he held Pluckley rectory, in Kent, which he exchanged for Paston, in Northamptonshire. His memoirs of his pious friend bishop Horne, is an interesting performance, and does honor to his head and heart.

JONES, Henry, a poet, born at Drogheda, in Ireland. He was bred a bricklayer, but nature formed him for a poet, and after he had distinguished himself by his productions in the midst of his humble mechanical employment; he was introduced to lord Chesterfield, when lord lieutenant, in 1745. That nobleman, pleased with his poetical effusions, brought him over to London on his return from Ireland, and by his influence, procured a liberal subscription to the poems of his humble friend. He also recommended him strongly to Colley Cibber, he prevailed upon the managers of Covent garden to introduce his plays on the stage, and nearly secured the reversion of the laurel for his brow; but while the patron was kind and generous, the poet was fickle, violent, prodigal, and capricious. After various vicissitudes of fortune, the consequence of imprudence and folly, he died in great want, April 1770, in a garret of the Bedford coffee-house. Though not a poet of superior reputation, he possessed merit. His "Earl of Essex;" by no means a contemptible performance, appeared in 1753.

JONES, John, D.D. a Benedictine monk, born in London, and educated at Merchant Taylor's, and St. John's college, Oxford. As he was inclined to the Roman catholic faith, he went to Spain, and took the name of Leander de Santo Martino. He was afterwards made Hebrew and divinity professor, and vicar-general of his order, and died in London, 1636. He wrote Sacra Ars Memoire ad Scripturas, divinas in promptu habendas, &c. accommodata, 8vo.—Conciliatio Locorum Communium totius Scripturæ,—and the Bible with a glossary, 6 vols. fol.

JONES, Griffith, an English writer, editor of the London Chronicle, and connected with Johnson, in the literary magazine, and with Smollett and Goldsmith in the British Magazine. He was a very amiable character, and projected with his brother, those various and entertaining books which are now become so fashionable, as well as valuable for the improvement of young minds. He died 1786, aged 65.

JONES, sir Thomas, a judge of the king's bench, under Charles II. and James II. author of some reports. When James wished to assert the dispensing power, and said he could soon have 12 judges of his opinion; True, answered sir Thomas, you may have 12 judges, but not 12 lawyers.

JONES, Richard, a Welshman, the ingenious author of "Gemma Cambrium," in Welch, which contained in clear brevity, all the books and chapters of the bible, published 1652. He was admitted at Jesus college, Oxford, 1621, and died in Ireland; but when is unknown.

JONES, John, M.D., a physician. After studying physic at Philadelphia, he completed his medical education in Europe, at London, Paris, Leyden and Edinburgh. On his return he settled in New-York, and was particularly eminent as a surgeon. In the war of 1755, he served as a surgeon in the army. On the establishment of a medical school in New York, he was appointed professor of surgery. Soon after he settled in the city, the physicians agreed for their own dignity to wear their hair in a particular bob, and, as he refused to concur in the project, they refused to consult with him. But he soon triumphed, and the power of ridicule compelled the medical men to wear their hair like other gentlemen. In the revolutionary war he left the city, when it was occupied by the enemy. In 1780, he settled in Philadelphia where he was the physician of Franklin and Washington. He died 1791, aged 62. In his religious views he was a quaker. He published plain remarks upon wounds and fractures, 1775. After his death his pupil, J. Mease, published his surgical works with an account of his life, 8vo. 1795.

JONES, John Paul, a naval commander, was a native of Scotland. His father was a gardener of the name of Paul; for some reason the son, when he lived in Virginia, assumed the name of Jones. He early went to sea. After being for some time in command of a vessel, he engaged in commercial pursuits in the West Indies. In 1773, on the death of his brother, he resided in Virginia to settle his affairs. Soon after the beginning of the American revolutionary war, he commanded the Providence of 12 guns and 70 men, in which he cruised, and took 16 prizes. In May 1777, he was ordered to proceed to Paris to arrange some naval operations with the American commissioners. April 10, 1778, he sailed on a cruise in the Ranger, and alarmed the whole coast of Scotland. He landed at Whitehaven and captured two forts with 30 cannon; he carried off also the plate from the house of the earl of Selkirk, at St. Mary's Isle, but he afterwards restored it. He returned to Brest with 200 prisoners of war. He sailed again with a squadron of seven sail, Aug. 14, 1779. His own ship was the Bon Homme Richard, in which after a desperate engagement off Flamborough head, he captured the British ship of war, Serapis, of superior force, Sept. 24, 1779. His own vessel however soon went down. For this exploit the French king presented him with a golden sword. Feb. 18, 1781, he arrived at Philadelphia. Congress passed a complimentary resolution, and voted him a golden medal. He afterwards superintended at Portsmouth, N. H., the building of a ship of war. After the restoration of peace he went to Paris as agent for prize money. He was soon invited to enter the Russian service with the rank of rear admiral. But after serving a short time in the Black sea, he was dissatisfied, was calumniated at court, and had liberty from the empress to retire. Returning to Paris, he died in that city in neglect, July 18, 1792. Though most enterprising and brave, he was irritable, vain, and of an impetuous temper. An account of his life was published in 1823, by J. H. Sherburne.

JONES, William, governor of Rhode Island, was born in Newport in 1754, and during the war was a captain of marines. At the capture of Charleston he was made a prisoner. After being some years speaker of the house, he was chosen governor in 1810, and remained in office till 1817. He died 1822, aged 68.

JONSIUS, John, a native of Holstein, who distinguished himself as an elegant writer at Frankfort, on the Maine. He died young, 1659. His Latin treatise, De Scriptoribus Historiæ Philosophiæ, edited, Jena, 1716, in 4to. is much admired.

JONSON, Benjamin, a celebrated English poet, born at Westminster, 1574. The narrowness of his circumstances cut short his residence in the university, and destitute of resources, he applied for support to the stage. His first appearance was at the Curtain, one of those mean and obscure theatres which then were built in the skirts of the town, but his efforts were ridiculed, and in the most common characters he was unable to perform with credit. Since he could not shine as an actor, he attempted to write plays, but his efforts at first were unsuccessful, till Shakspeare, who like himself had felt the severities of fortune, extended his friendship to him, and not only interested himself in his behalf, but supported his claims to public applause, by acting himself in some of his characters. His first play printed, was, every Man in his Humor, a comedy, which was generally followed by another every year; but when his enemies ridiculed the tardy efforts of his muse, he produced his "Volpone," in five weeks. By joining with Chapman and Marston in writing "Eastward-hoe," a comedy, he was accused of reflecting on the Scotch nation, and with his two poetical companions was thrown into prison, but upon making due submission they escaped the loss of their ears and noses, and obtained a pardon. As the exhibition of masques was then very popular, the genius and abilities of Jonson were employed for the diversion of the court; he composed in 1603 part of the device, which was to entertain James as he passed from the tower to Westminster abbey on his coronation, and continued during that reign and the beginning of the next, to preside over all the amusements and the pageantry of the royal household. Thus favored by the court, Jonson became a popular character, and by his merit deserved and obtained the friendship of men of taste and literature, of Shakspeare, Beaumont, Fletcher, Donne, Camden, Selden, Corbet and others. He visited France in 1613, and in 1619 was honorably presented with the degree of M.D., by the university of Oxford. That year he succeeded on the death of Daniel to the place of poet laureat, of which the king, two years before had granted him the reversion, and on his petition his salary of 100 marks was in 1630, augmented to as many pounds. About this time he visited his friend and correspondent Drummond of Hawthornden in Scotland, and celebrated his adventures in a poem which was afterwards unfortunately burnt. Yet though liberally patronised by the king, and handsomely rewarded for his plays and masques, Jonson through carelessness or extravagance was poor. He died of the palsy 6th Aug. 1637, in his 63d year. His works were edited in 1716, in 6 vols. 8vo. and more completely in 7 vols. 8vo. with notes by Mr. Whalley 1756.

JONSTON, John, a Polish naturalist, born at Sambter 1603. He travelled over Europe and died on his estate at Lignitz, Silesia, 1675. He published a natural History of Birds, Fishes, Quadrupeds, Insects, Serpents and Dragons, folio, 1653—a treatise on Hebrew and Greek Festivals, 1660—and Thaumatography, 1661.

JORDAN, Charles Stephen, a Prussian writer, vice-president of the academy of sciences at Berlin.

He died at Berlin his native city 1746, aged 46, and the king, Frederic the great, not only erected a monument to him with this inscription, "here lies Jordan, the friend of the muses and of the king," but wrote an eulogy in his praise. Jordan wrote Literary Travels in France, England, and Holland, with Satirical Anecdotes, 8vo.—a Miscellany of Literature, Philosophy, History,—the life of De la Croze; works which some critics do not esteem so highly as his royal friend did.

JORDAN, John Christopher, privy counsellor to the king of Bohemia, was eminent as an antiquary. His notes on the Chronology of Dionysius Hal. Polybius, Diodorous Sie. and Livy are excellent. He died about 1740.

JORDAN, Camille, a French revolutionary statesman, favorably distinguished for his opposition to the tyranny of the Jacobins. He was born at Lyons in 1771. Becoming a member of the convention, he defended his native city when it was denounced as a focus of counter-revolution, and receptacle of assassins and banditti. His zeal only served to endanger his own safety; and he was obliged to retire to Switzerland, and afterwards to England. Returning subsequently to France, he was, in March 1797, elected a deputy from the department of the Rhone to the Council of Five Hundred. The change of measures which took place a few months after, called the revolution of the 8th of Fructidor, rendered him again an exile. He went to Switzerland, and thence to Weimar. When Buonaparte had subverted the power of the directory, Camille Jordan returned home. In 1802, he published a tract, entitled "Vrai sens du Vole Nationale sur le Consulat a vie," and under the empire of Napoleon he remained a private citizen. After the restoration of the royal family, he displayed his attachment to the government under the charter; and in 1814, he received letters of nobility, and was decorated with the order of the legion of honor. He was a member of the chamber of deputies, and died at Paris, May 19, 1821. He possessed considerable talents for literature, and besides many political pieces, he was the author of some biographical eulogies.

JORDANO, Luca, a celebrated painter, born at Naples 1632. He early studied under his neighbor Joseph Ribera, and displayed such abilities that at the age of seven his pieces were highly respectable. He visited Rome and the other cities of Italy, where he studied and copied the works of the greatest masters, but especially those of Pietro da Cortona, Paul Veronese, L. da Vinci, M. Angelo, and A. del Sarto. He improved upon the beauties of other masters with such effect that he was called by Bellori the ingenious bee who extracted his honey from the flowers of the best artists. His reputation gradually spread not only over Italy, but the rest of Europe, and Charles II. of Spain, was so pleased with his productions, that he invited him in 1692, to adorn the Escurial and the churches and palaces of some of the Spanish cities. Jordano by the excellence and the variety of his pieces, which exceeded in number those of every other painter, even Tintoret, acquired great opulence. He died at Naples, 1705. In his private character he was very amiable, he was benevolent in his conduct, friendly to his pupils, and to great affability united a remarkable flow of wit and humor.

JORDANS, James, a painter born at Antwerp 1594. In his pieces he displayed great judgment and correctness: his manner was bold, yet graceful; striking, yet natural. His works adorned the public buildings of some of the cities of Flanders, and he also labored for the kings of Sweden and Denmark. He was a pleasant and agreeable companion, easy in his manners, and lively in his conversation. He died at Antwerp 1678, aged 84.

JORDEN, Edward, an English physician, born 1569, at High Halden, Kent, and educated at Hart hall, Oxford. He studied in foreign universities, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. On his return he practised in London, and was member of the college of physicians, but his attempts to manufacture alum proved injurious to his fortune. The latter part of his life was spent at Bath, where he died of the gout and stone, Jan. 1682. He wrote a Discourse on the Disease called the Suffocation of the Mother, 4to.—Discourse on Natural Baths and Mineral Waters, 4to. 1631.

JORTIN, John, D.D., an English divine, born in London, 23d Oct. 1698. His father was of French origin, and went to England when toleration was not allowed to the protestants of France. Young Jortin was educated at the Charter-house, and in 1715, he entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was engaged two years after at the recommendation of his tutor, Dr. Thirlby, in making extracts from Eustathius for Pope's Homer, but though his services were approved, he never was introduced to the poet. In 1722, he published "Lusus Poetici," some Latin poems which were well received by his friends, and in 1726-7, as being fellow of his society he was presented to the college living of Swavesey, near Cambridge, which he resigned in 1728, and went to settle in London, where he resided for 25 years. He at first officiated at a chapel in Bloomsbury, and in 1737, obtained the living of Eastwell, Kent, which he soon resigned on account of the insalubrious air of the place. In 1746, he was made afternoon preacher to Oxendon chapel, and the next year he became assistant to Dr. Warburton at Lincoln's Inn. In 1749, he was appointed to preach Boyle's lectures, and in 1751, he was made rector of St. Dunstan in the East by Herring the primate. In 1762, he became chaplain to Osbaldiston bishop of London, who gave him a prebend in St. Paul's, the living of Kensington, and in 1764, the archdeaconry of London. He died after a short illness, Sept. 5, 1770. Dr. Jortin, respectable as a divine and as a man, was deservedly esteemed as a polite scholar and an able orator. His publications were numerous and highly valuable. He published in 1730, four sermons on the Truth of the Christian Religion, afterwards incorporated in his Discourses on the Truth of the Christian Religion, 8vo. 1746—Miscellaneous observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern, 2 vols. 8vo. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, 8vo. 1751, continued in four succeeding volumes down to 1517—the era of the reformation—Six Dissertations on Different Subjects, 8vo. 1755—Life of Erasmus, 4to. 1758,—Remarks on the works of Erasmus, 4to. 1760, besides other inferior works. In 1771, four volumes of his sermons were published by his son, and inscribed to his parishioners of St. Dunstan's, republished with 3 vols. more, 1772.

JOSEPH I. 15th emperor of the house of Austria, was born at Vienna 29th July, 1678. He was crowned king of Hungary 1687, elected king of the Romans 1690, and in 1705 on the death of his father Leopold he succeeded to the empire of Germany. Pursuing the same political measures as his father, he engaged England, Savoy, and Holland in his war against France, to raise the archduke Charles to the throne of Spain, and then exerting his power as head of the Germanic empire he deprived the electors of Bavaria and of Cologne of their dominions for assisting his enemies, and in the most despotic manner he divided their possessions among his friends and relations. Thus absolute in Germany, he turned his arms against Italy, and not only Mantua, Parma, Modena, Lunca, and Genoa, but even Etruria, Sicily, and Naples became obedient to his dictates. From Italy he marched against the Hungarian insurgents headed by the brave prince Ragotzki, whom he defeated and obliged to fly into Turkey. His successes were stopped by the attack of the small-pox which proved fatal 17th April, 1711, in his 33d year.

JOSEPH II. emperor of Germany son of Leopold and Maria Theresa, was born 15th March, 1741, elected king of the Romans 1764, and crowned emperor the following year on the decease of his father. He was in his conduct actuated by the most benevolent motives to improve the prosperity of his country; and to be acquainted with the wants and situation of his subjects he travelled over the greatest part of his dominions. In Croatia he facilitated the commercial intercourse of his Hungarian subjects by the forming of a high road between Zing and Carlstadt; at Venice, he settled in an amicable manner the boundaries of his kingdom and those of the republic, and in Bohemia he administered to the wants of his people and checked the ravages of the famine which the troubles of Poland had caused. He afterwards had two interviews with the king of Prussia, whose great military character he highly admired, but unfortunately these visits ended in a mutual plan for the violent seizure of part of the Polish provinces. In 1781 he passed into France, but he disregarded the pompous ceremonies with which the court wished to receive him, and found greater pleasure and more sincere satisfaction in examining the curiosities of Paris, the manufactures of Lyons, and the canals of Picardy. Anxious to listen to the complaints of the unfortunate, he often disguised himself to converse with obscure individuals and to relieve their distresses; and that every opportunity might be indulged of displaying his humanity he appointed one day in the week in which he would receive petitions even from the meanest beggars. In 1780 he succeeded by the death of the empress queen, to the crowns of Hungary and Bohemia, and soon after published decrees in favor of the liberty of the press and of toleration. With his usual humanity Joseph saw and pitied the state of the peasants through his states, and therefore slavery was abolished in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia; and with equal boldness in favor of spiritual freedom he published an edict to disclaim the secular submission of his subjects to the see of Rome, and to suppress some of the monasteries. This severe attack excited the alarm of the pope; but the journey of Pius VI. to Vienna could not reconcile the emperor, or abolish his decree, and soon after, in 1786, the ecclesiastical princes at Ratisbon determined to withdraw from the temporal jurisdiction of Rome. His visit to the empress of Russia at Cherson in the mean time did not only tend to insure the partition of Poland, but aimed at the expulsion of the Turks from Europe. But though a humane prince, Joseph was not a warrior; he indeed reduced Sehabatz in person, but his troops were defeated under prince Lichtenstein, and the dreadful battle of Rohadin which lasted four days proved fatal to his views, and the siege of Belgrade was abandoned. Laudohn indeed by his valor and great experience restored confidence among the imperialists, and by the taking of Darbieza, Novi, and Belgrade, contributed to the glory of his master's arms, which ill success hitherto had tarnished. The war, however, was unpopular, and a peace hastily concluded left the emperor the opportunity of attending to the discontents and tumults which had now been excited in the Netherlands. Before these could be checked, Joseph fell a sacrifice to a lingering disease, and died 20th February 1790. He was succeeded by his brother Leopold.

JOSEPH, king of Portugal, of the family of Braganza, ascended the throne 1750, and died 24th Feb. 1777, aged 62 years and eight months. His reign was turbulent and unfortunate. Lisbon was swallowed in 1755 by an earthquake, and in 1758 a violent conspiracy was formed against the monarch whose life was saved by the personal courage of his coachman, and in consequence of this, the Jesuits who had meditated the assassination, were expelled from the kingdom and their property confiscated. Afterwards the king quarrelled with the court of Rome, and in 1761 a war was kindled against Spain, in which he was assisted by the English. In the latter part of his reign he resigned the reins of government into the hands of his queen, Mary Anne of Spain.

JOSEPH, Ben Gorion, a Jewish historian, who abridged the history of Josephus, with whom he is often confounded by the rabbins. He flourished in the tenth century. His works appeared with a Latin version by Gagnier, Oxford, 1706, 8vo.—and in Hebrew and Latin, Gotha, 1707, 4to.

JOSEPH, of Paris, a capuchin, the friend and confidant of Richelieu. His services were such in the employment of emissaries, that Lewis XIII. procured him a cardinal's hat, which he did not live to receive. He died of an apoplexy at Ruel, 1638. His life has been frequently written and contains curious particulars.

JOSEPH, Father, an apostate monk, who under the assumed name of Joshua and at the head of 6000 banditti attempted in 1678 to extirpate the catholic religion in Hungary. After committing the greatest enormities, his followers were dispersed upon the sudden death of their leader.

JOSEPHUS, Flavius, a celebrated Jewish historian, who studied at Rome, and afterwards bravely defended a small town of Judæa against Vespasian for seven weeks. He was taken into the favor of the emperor, and was with him at the siege of Jerusalem, where he alleviated the misfortunes of his country, and obtained all the sacred books in the booty. He wrote the History of the wars of the Jews in Greek—the Antiquities of the Jews—a Defence of the Jews—books of very great merit and best edited by Havercamp, Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1725. He died A. D. 93, aged 56.

JOSSSELYN, John, an author, arrived in Boston in 1633, and resided in New England a number of years. The following is the title of his principal work.—New England's varieties discovered in birds, fishes, serpents, and plants of that country; together with the physical and chirurgical remedies, wherewith the natives constantly use to cure their distempers, wounds and sores; also a perfect description of an Indian squaw in all her bravery, with a poem not improperly conferred upon her; lastly a chronological table of the most remarkable passages in that country amongst the English; illustrated with cuts, 1672. His account of the natural history of the country is amusing—"Some frogs, when they sit upon their breech, are a foot high;" "barley frequently degenerates into oats." He published also an account of two voyages to New England, wherein you have the setting out of a ship with the charges, and a description of the country 1674.

JOUBERT, Laurence, a physician, born at Valence in Dauphny 1530. He studied at Paris and at Rome, and afterwards settled at Montpellier, where he became, after Rondelet's death, Regius professor 1567. His reputation was so great that nothing was considered as too difficult for his art, so that Henry III. sent for him to consult him how he might render his marriage prolific, which however was unavailing. He died 1582. His writings are in French, and in Latin, and all on his profession; the best edition of which is 1645, 2 vols. folio.

JOUBERT, Francis, a priest of Montpellier who was confined in the bastile for his attachment to the doctrines of the Jansenists. He died 1763, aged 74. He is author of a commentary on revelations, and other works.

JOUBERT, Bartholomew Catharine, a native of Pont-de-Vaux, in the department of Ain, born 14th April, 1769, and bred up to the law. The revolution altered his pursuits, and panting for military glory, he entered into the army, and from a grenadier rose to the rank of general. He was second in command under Bonaparte in the conquest of Italy, and signalized himself at the battles of Millesimo, Ceva, Montebaldo, Rivoli, and in the Tyrol. His valor and presence of mind were such that Bonaparte going to Egypt emphatically told the directory, I leave you Joubert. He was afterwards opposed to the Russians under Suwarrow, at the battle of Novi, but was killed at the beginning of the engagement 1799, leaving behind him the character, not only of a great general, but of an amiable man.

JOVIANUS, Flavius Claudius, a native of Pannonia, made emperor after Julian's death, an honor which he accepted upon the promise of the army to become christians. He made a dishonorable peace with the Persians, and was accidentally suffocated by charcoal which had been placed in his room, seven months after his elevation to the throne, 364 A. D.

JOVINIAN, a monk of Milan who became the head of a sect, who maintained that our Savior's body was not real flesh, but a phantom. He enlarged the number of his followers by offering violence to women, and by permitting the indulgence of every sensuality, till at last Honorius ordered him to be whipped and sent into banishment. He died in Dalmatia in consequence of his debauchery, 406. A. D. His works were attacked by Jerome.

JOVIUS, Paul, an eminent historian, born at Como in Italy 1483. After studying in his native place, he went to Rome for the advantages of the Vatican library in his literary pursuits, and here he wrote his first piece 'de Piscibus Romanis,' which he dedicated to cardinal de Bourbon. He also attached himself by the meanest flattery to Francis I. king of France, who granted him a pension, which however was discontinued in the reign of the next monarch, through the influence of Montmorency, constable of the kingdom, whom Jovius had offended. The favorable manner in which he had spoken of the house of Medicis in his historical compositions, induced him to hope he might obtain a bishopric from Clement VII.; he made the request, and gained the see of Nocera, but under the next pontiff he attempted in vain to obtain the vacant bishopric of his native place, and upon the refusal he retired in discontent to Florence, where he employed himself in the completion of his history. He died 1552. His history, containing the events of his own times from 1494 to 1544, was printed 3 vols. folio, Florence 1552, and at Strasburg 1556; but though valuable and interesting, it is to be read with great caution. To great learning Jovius united wit and liveliness, his style was elegant and polished, and his judgment solid. In his private character he was dissolute and licentious, and to a reprehensible degree credulous.

JOURDAIN, Amable Brechillet, an oriental scholar, was born in 1738. He was placed with a notary, but being related to Anquetil Duperron, he quitted the law to study the eastern languages, in which he made such progress that Langles obtained for him the place of assistant secretary in that department. He died in 1818. He enriched the Moniteur with curious dissertations, assisted Michaud in the "History of the Crusades," and obtained a prize from the academy of belles lettres for a dissertation on those works of Aristotle and the other Greek philosophers, for which we are indebted to the Arabs. At the time of his death he was engaged on a history of the rise and fall of the Barneceles.

JOURDAN, Jean Baptiste, Marshal, was born at Limoges, in France, April 29, 1762. He entered the army in 1778. In June 1794, he gained the victory of Fleurus, by which he became conqueror of Belgium. In 1796, he subdued Franconia, but was soon after totally defeated by the archduke Charles. In 1806 he commanded under Joseph Bonaparte in Naples, and in 1808, he followed him to Spain; but after the loss of the battle Vittoria, he remained in retirement at Rouen. He was one of the first to declare in favor of Louis XVIII, in 1814, and he passed his latter days as governor of the Hospital of Invalids. "Jourdan" said Bonaparte, at St. Helena, "is a poor general; but he possessed the virtues rare among his competitors, of honor, integrity, and humanity." He died, at Paris, Nov. 23, 1833.

JOUVENCY, Joseph, a French jesuit, professor of belles lettres at Caen and afterwards at Paris. He died at Rome 1719, aged 76. He defended in his writings the Jesuit Guignard whose works had inflamed Castal to attempt the life of Henry IV. and did not scruple to compare this assassin to our Savior, and the judge who condemned him to Pontius Pilate. He continued the History of the Jesuits from the year 1591 to 1616, but the work was condemned by the parliament of Paris, 1713. He wrote besides "Latin orations" an Appendix De Diis & Heroibus Poeticis, and valuable notes on Persius, Juvenal, Ovid, and Martial.

JOUVENET, John, a French painter, born at Rouen 1641. His family, who were distinguished as painters, were of Italian origin. After studying under his father, he went to Paris, and improved himself under Le Brun, and gained the approbation of the academy of painting by presenting them his Esther fainting before Ahasuerus. After passing through all the offices of the academy he was made one of the four perpetual rectors, on the death of Mignard. His paintings are numerous and very valuable, especially his sacred pieces. In his old age he was struck with the palsy in his right side, and then began to use his left hand, with astonishing dexterity and success in the completion of some of his pieces. He died at Paris 1717.

JOYCE, Jeremiah, a dissenting minister, and an industrious author, was born in 1764, and died in 1816. In 1794, he was one of the persons accused of high treason, but was not brought to trial. He was the principal compiler of Gregory's and Nicholson's Encyclopædias; and published, among other works, Elements of Arithmetic; Scientific Dialogues; Dialogues on Chemistry; and Letters on Natural Philosophy.

JOYNER, William, or Lyde, an English writer born in St. Giles's parish, Oxford, April 1622. He was educated in the schools of Thame and Coventry, and then entered as demy at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. At the time of the rebellion, he embraced the popish religion and went abroad, and afterwards returned to London. In 1678 he returned to live at Horspath near Oxford, but was arrested by the vice-chancellor as a Jesuit; but upon his appearance at the sessions he was discharged and then retired to the obscurity of the village of Ickford in Buckinghamshire. On James' accession he was restored to his fellowship, but was expelled the year after, and died at Ickford, 14th Sept. 1706. He wrote the Roman Empress, a comedy, 1670, 4to.—Observations on Cardinal Pole's life, 1686, 8vo.—Latin and English poems.

JUAN, George, a Spaniard, knight of Malta, and known as an able mathematician. He went with Don Anthony de Ulloa, and the French mathematicians to Beru, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He published, on his return, Observations on the Voyage, in Spanish, translated with the remarks of Ulloa, into French, and published 2 vols. 4to. Amsterdam. He wrote besides a treatise on the Construction and Management of Vessels. He died at Madrid 1773.

JUDA, Leo, son of a priest of Alsace, was well skilled in Hebrew, and died minister of Zurich 1542, aged 60. Besides a translation of the bible from the original, he wrote against Erasmus who had reflected on him for changing his religion.

JUDA, Hakhadish, a learned rabbi, the friend of Antonius. He collected, 26 years after the destruction of the Temple, "the Misna" or Constitutions and Traditions of the Jewish Magistrates. This book is the text of the Talmud which has been well edited by Surenhusius, 3 vols. folio.

JUANYSANTICILIA, Don George, an eminent Spanish mathematician and naval officer, was born, in 1712, at Orihucla. A considerable part of his life was spent in successful exertions to improve and increase the Spanish naval force. He died in 1774. Among his works are, Observations on Astronomy and Natural Philosophy, made in Peru; and a Treatise on Mechanics applied to the construction of Vessels.

JUDEX, Matthew, a learned German, born at Tuposwald in Misnia, 1528. He studied at Dresden, Wittenberg, and Magdeburg, and afterwards became divinity professor at Jena, a place from which he was soon driven. His learning was great, and his private character highly respectable, yet he unfortunately had many enemies, and the persecution to which he was exposed shortened, it is said, his life. He died 1564, aged 36, leaving five children by his wife, whom he had ten years before married at Magdeburg. He was concerned in the composition of the two first Centuries of Magdeburg, and he had proposed to write an ecclesiastical history.

JUEL, Nicholas, a celebrated Danish admiral, was born in 1629, and learned his profession under Tromp and Ruyter, in the Dutch service; after which he returned to Denmark, to serve his country. In 1659, he distinguished himself during the siege of Copenhagen; for which he was one of the first who received the order of Danebrog. In 1676, and 1677, he made himself master of Gothland, and defeated the Swedes in several desperate engagements. He died in 1697. Juel was no less modest than brave.

JUDSON, Ann, missionary to Burmah, was the daughter of John Hasseltine of Bradford, Massachusetts, and was born Dec. 22, 1789. She married Adoniran Judson jun. Feb. 5, 1812. She was the first American female, who made up her mind to go to India as a missionary. She sailed from Salem Feb. 19, and arrived in June at Calcutta.

While residing there she and her husband adopted the principles of the baptists, and were baptised. When the missionaries were ordered to quit India she went to the Isle of France. She proceeded in July to Rangoon in Burmah. A few English missionaries had been there since 1807. In consequence of alarming illness Mrs. Judson left Rangoon in Aug. 1821, and repaired to Calcutta, and thence to England. In Sept. 1822, she arrived at New York. After visiting her friends at Bradford for a few weeks, she was induced, on account of her health, to pass the winter in the milder climate of Baltimore, where Dr. Elnathan Judson, an only brother of her husband, resided. Here she lived in retirement and wrote an interesting work, a history of the Burman mission, in a series of letters to Mr. Butterworth, a member of the British parliament, in whose house she was received while in England. She sailed on her return June 22, 1823, from Boston, and arrived at Calcutta in Oct., and in Dec. proceeded to Rangoon. In the same month she accompanied her husband to Ava, the capital. The Bengal government invaded Burmah 1824. Mr. Judson was seized and imprisoned with Dr. Price, and others. During his imprisonment of more than a year and a half, nine months in three pair of fetters, two months in five pair, amidst indescribable sufferings,—Mrs. Judson repaired every day, two miles to the prison, prepared food for her husband, and administered to the wants of the prisoners, and made constant application to the government for their lives, and their deliverance, until at last, on the approach of the British army she had the happiness to announce to them their freedom. In March 1826, she passed down the Irrawaddy to the British camp, when gen. Archibald Campbell received her with the kindness which she deserved for the eloquent appeals to the proud Burman government, of which she was the author, and which contributed to the peace. Mr. and Mrs. Judson now settled in the new town of Amherst on the Salween river. But after a few months, in the absence of Mr. Judson, she died there of a fever Oct. 24, 1826, aged 36. This fatal event is to be ascribed to her sufferings at Ava.

JUGLARIS, Aloysius, an Italian Jesuit, born at Nice. He taught rhetoric in his society, and was then preceptor to prince Charles Emanuel at the court of Savoy, and died at Messina, 15th Nov. 1653. He wrote 100 panegyrics on Jesus Christ, 40 in honor of Louis XIII. some on several learned bishops, besides epitaphs, &c. His works were together published at Lucca 1710.

JUGURTHA, natural son of Manastabal, and grandson of Masinissa king of Numidia, served with credit in the Roman armies in Spain, and afterwards instead of dividing the kingdom with Adherbal and Hjempsal, the two sons of his uncle Micipsa, he destroyed them and seized upon the whole sovereignty. The Romans interfered, but Jugurtha possessed courage, and opposed their armies. After various successes he was defeated by Metellus, and by Marius, and at last betrayed into the hands of the Romans by Bocchus. He died at Rome 106, B.C. six days after his arrival.

JUIGNE BROSSINIÈRE, D. Seigneur de Moliere, author of Dictionnaire Theologique, Historique, Poetique, Cosmographique & Chronologique, Paris, 4to. 1644, and Rouen 1688, was an advocate of the French parliaments. His work is considered as incorrect by Moreri.

JULIA, daughter of Augustus, was the wife of Metellus, afterwards of Agrippa, and lastly of Tiberius. She disgraced herself by her debaucheries, for which she was banished, and died of want in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius. Her daughter, of the same name, was equally licentious.

JULIA DÓMNA, the wife of the emperor Severus, was well skilled in philosophy, and the sciences. Her son, Caracalla, killed his brother Geta in her arms. It is said, that she starved herself to death because Maerinus was elected emperor in her son Caracalla's room.

JULIAN, emperor of Rome, was son of Jul. Constantius, the brother of the great Constantine. Under Constantius, the son of Constantine, he displayed great bravery, and was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers, and became sole sovereign soon after by the death of Constantius. On his elevation to the throne, he declared himself a pagan, regardless of the Christian tenets which he had embraced; and on that account, he received the name of apostate. He was mortally wounded in a battle against Sapor, king of Persia, whose dominions he had invaded, and died soon after, A.D. 363, aged 32. In his private character he was respectable, and he possessed a great share of learning. The best of his works is his History of the Cæsars. His works were edited by Spanheim, Leipsic, 1696, folio.

JULIANA, a female who possessed great influence at the court of the Mogul emperors of Hindostan in the earlier part of the last century. She was born in Bengal, in 1658, and was the daughter of a Portuguese named Augustin Dias d'Acosta. After having suffered shipwreck, she went to the court of the great Mogul Aurengzeb, whose favor she conciliated by presenting him with some curiosities which she had preserved. Being appointed superintendant of the harem of that prince, and governess of his son, Behadur Shah, she had an opportunity of rendering some important services to the latter, who succeeded to the crown in 1707, under the title of Shah Aulum. He was under the necessity of defending his newly acquired authority against his brothers by force of arms; and in a battle which took place, Juliana, mounted on an elephant by the side of the emperor, animated him by her advice, when his troops began to give way; and to her exhortations he was indebted for the complete victory which he obtained. Her services were rewarded with the title of princess, the rank of the wife of an omrah, and a profusion of riches and honors. Shah Aulum had such an opinion of her talents, that he was accustomed to say, "If Juliana were a man, I would make him my vizier." Jehander Shah, who became emperor of Hindostan in 1712, was equally sensible of her merit; and though she experienced some persecution when that prince was deposed by his nephew in 1713, she speedily recovered her influence, and retained it till her death in 1733.

JULIEN, Peter, a French sculptor, was born at Paulien in 1731. After gaining a prize at the academy of Lyons, he settled in Paris, where he studied under William Coustou, and obtained another prize for a bas relief, representing Sabinus offering his chariot to the vestals. In 1768, he went to Rome, where he executed several fine works. On his return to France he became assistant to Coustou, and, in 1779, gained a place in the academy, by his "Dying Gladiator." He died in 1804.

JULIO, Romano, an Italian painter, the disciple and favorite of Raphael. He distinguished himself not only by his pencil, but also by his knowledge of architecture. He built a palace for his patron, Clement VII. and adorned the churches and public buildings of Rome, with his highly finished paintings. He afterwards went to Mantua, which his genius was employed to improve and to beautify.

He died at Mantua, 1546, leaving two children behind him. De Piles, who has given a judicious critique of his works, says, that his genius took wing all at once, or like a torrent, broke over its banks. His compositions, therefore, were all expressive of beauty, fire and dignity; sublime in the conception, grand and correct in the execution.

JULIUS I., pope and saint, succeeded Mark, 337, and died 352. He possessed learning, piety, and benevolence. He ably supported Athanasius against the Arians, and wrote various things. Some of his letters are still extant.

JULIUS II., Julian de le Rovere, born at Albizola, near Savona, was successively bishop of Carpentras, Albano, Ostia, Bologna, and Avignon, and was raised to the purple in 1471, by his uncle, Sixtus IV. and made commander-in-chief of the papal troops against the revolted Umbrians. On the death of Alexander VI. he had the art and influence to prevent the election of cardinal d'Amboise, and to place Pius III. in the vacant chair, which he himself was called to fill 22 days after, 1st Nov. 1503, by the sudden death of the new pontiff. Thus raised by bribery to the height of his ambition, he, after laying the foundation of St. Peter's church, 1506, meditated the temporal aggrandizement of his court. He wished to recover from the Venetians, Faenza and Rimini, and the other conquests made by Alexander VI. which, after his death, they had recovered; and by signing the league of Cambrai with the emperor, and the kings of France and Arragon, and by laying the whole Venetian states under an interdict, he triumphed over his enemies. Thus victorious against the Venetians, he now intrigued against the French, whom he regarded with envy, for having opposed his elevation to the pontificate; and his artful insinuations procured for him the support of the Swiss republic, and of the kings of England and Arragon. At the head of his troops, Julius marched to meet the enemy, he besieged Mirandola, and soon entered its gates as a conqueror; but fortune soon changed, and Trivulce, the French general, seized Bologna, and made the papal troops and their allies of Venice, fly before him. Julius retired in disgrace to Rome, and soon saw the general council of Pisa pronounce his suspension for contumacy, a step which he opposed by laying the French kingdom under an interdict. The violence of his enemies, however, and the chagrin which corroded him from pique and disappointment, proved too powerful for his constitution. He was carried off by a fever, 21st Feb. 1513, aged 70. Great as a statesman and as a warrior, Julius had little claim to the meekness, benevolence, and humility, which should belong to the ecclesiastical character. To the aggrandizement of his temporal power, he scrupled not to sacrifice every principle of honor and of virtue. He was, however, a liberal patron of literature and of the arts. He was the first who introduced the custom of wearing the beard long, which was soon after imitated by Charles V. Francis I. and their courtiers.

JULIUS III., John Marie du Mont, a native of Arezzo, made archbishop of Sipontum, a cardinal, and in 1550, pope. He joined the emperor against Octavius Farnese, duke of Parma; but the expedition was attended with disgrace. He is blamed for dissolving the council of Trent, where he had presided in the name of Paul III. and for the treaty of Passaw. He was a weak and narrow-minded pontiff, little calculated to uphold, with dignity, the power of the holy see. He died 23d March 1556, aged 68.

JUNCTIN, or GUINTINO, Francis, a native of Florence, who though a Carmelite, quitted the catholic religion for the protestant when settled in France. He amassed a large fortune by being a corrector of the press, a manufacturer of paper, and a banker; and died 1580. He possessed merit as a mathematician, and published arithmetical works, —Commentaries on Sacrobosco's Sphere—a Discourse on the Age of the Love of Petrarch—and a treatise on the reformation of the Calendar.

JUNGE, or JUNGIUS, Joachim, a German philosopher, whom Leibnitz characterizes as being inferior only to Descartes, and equal to Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler, was born, in 1587, at Lubeck; and died, in 1657, rector of St. John's School, at Hamburgh. He was a formidable antagonist of the Aristotelian philosophy. Among his works are, Geometria Empirica; Doxoscopie Physicæ Minores; and Isagoge Phytoscopia; from the last of which hints appear to have been borrowed by Ray and Linnæus.

JUNIUS, Adrian, a learned Dutchman, born 1511, at Hoorn, where his father was burgoinaster. After studying at Haerlem and Louvaine, he went to Paris, and then to Bologna, where he applied himself to medical pursuits. He came to England about 1543, and was physician to the duke of Norfolk. He published, among other works, a Greek and Latin lexicon, which he dedicated, 1548, to king Edward, for which he was severely censured by the pope, who had not acknowledged the accession of the young monarch. He afterwards returned to Holland; but on the accession of Mary, he again settled in England, and made himself known to the new queen by his epithalamium on her marriage with Philip of Spain. The difficulties of the times drove him again to the continent, and some years after he was invited to become physician to the king of Denmark; but as the air and climate proved insalubrious to his constitution, he declined the honorable appointment, and settled at Haerlem, as principal of the college there. The siege of this city by the Spaniards, 1573, and the loss of his library on that melancholy occasion, affected him greatly, so that his disorders increased, and he died at Middleburg, 1575. His works, which are numerous, prove him to have been an able scholar.

JUNIUS, or DU JON, Francis, professor of divinity at Leyden, was born at Bourges, 1545. He studied at Geneva, and afterwards taught a school there for his support; but at the age of 20 he was made minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp. The violent contests between the papists and protestants, however, proved disagreeable to him; he left Antwerp, and afterwards became chaplain to the prince of Orange, and attended him in various expeditions. Afterwards he read public lectures at Neustadt, and Heidelberg, and then visited France, and was kindly received by Henry IV. after which he settled at Leyden, 1592, and was cut off by the plague 10 years after. His publications were 64 in number, the best known of which is his Latin version of the Hebrew bible, in which he was assisted by Tremellius. He has been commended by Bayle and Scaliger, though Du Pin says he was no great divine.

JUNIUS, Francis, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg, 1539. He was first educated at Leyden, but at his father's death, he studied mathematics to follow a military life. The conclusion of the war, however, altered his plans; he devoted himself to literature, published some of his father's works, and then travelled to France and England. For thirty years he was in England in the family of the earl of Arundel; and taking advantage of frequent visits to Oxford, he laboriously applied himself to the acquisition of the ancient languages of the Cimbric, Goths, Franks, Frisones, and other northern nations, from whose obsolete idioms he deduced the derivation of many German and English words. Though thus engaged in insipid and perhaps unprofitable studies, he enjoyed a great flow of spirits and an excellent constitution, and attained a good old age, though fondly attached to the labors of a sedentary life. In 1677, he visited his nephew, Dr. Is. Vossius, at Windsor, and was there attacked by a fever, which carried him off, Nov. 19th that year. He was interred in St. George's chapel. He left by his will, all his MSS. and collections to the public library of his favorite Oxford. His chief works were, Glossarium Gothicum—de Picturâ Veterum, 4to. printed also in English, 1638—Observationes in Willeramii Franciscani Paraphrasin Cantici Canticozum, 1655, 8vo.—several letters in G. I. Vossius' collection.

JUNOT, Andoche, duke of Abrantes, a French general, was born, in 1771, at Bussy le Grand; entered the army in 1791, as a volunteer; attracted by his coolness and courage the attention of Bonaparte at the siege of Toulon; and was promoted by that general, and distinguished himself under him throughout the Italian and Egyptian campaigns. In 1807, he was placed at the head of the army which occupied Portugal; but, being defeated at Vimeira by Sir Arthur Wellesley, he was compelled to capitulate. He subsequently served in Spain and in Russia; and was governor of the Illyrian provinces; and died in 1813.

JURIEU, Peter, called by the papists the Goliath of the protestants, was born 24th Dec. 1637, at Mer, in the diocese of Blois, where his father, Daniel J. was minister of the reformed religion. He was educated partly under Peter de Moulins, his mother's brother, who was in England, and when of age, he was ordained minister in that church; but after his return, to succeed his father at Mer, he was re-ordained according to the form of the foreign protestants. He afterwards officiated at Vitri, and then became professor of Hebrew and divinity in the university of Sedan. In 1681 he retired to Holland, and there was appointed divinity professor at Rotterdam, and minister of the Walloon Church. Already distinguished by his writings, he now applied himself to the study of the revelations, and liberally explained the striking passages of that mysterious book, by application to the events then passing under his eye. The revolution in England enabled him to consider William III. as the instrument of God raised up against antichrist. While with enthusiastic zeal he attempted to convince the world of the truth of his explanations, and of the fulfilling of the prophecies, he excited, by his violence, a host of enemies against him. Bayle, who had long been his friend, took up the arms of controversy against him, and so unpopular were his principles, that in several of the churches of Holland, his opinions on baptism, justification, and other ecclesiastical topics, were publicly condemned, though his name was omitted in the censure. These troubles, and the popular discontent which his accusation of heterodoxy, against Saurin, pastor of Utrecht, excited, produced a dejection of spirits, which, after continuing some years, carried him off, 1713, at Rotterdam, in his 76th year. He was a man of great learning, and vast information; but unfortunately he was violent in his temper, intolerant in his principles, and unwilling to yield, or even to listen, to the candid representations of his opponents. His chief works are, Histoire du Calvinisme & du Papisme mise en Parellele, 1693—

Lettres Pastorales, 3 vols.—le Vrai Systeme de l'Eglise, &c.—l'Esprit de M. Arnauld, 1684—les Prejuzes Legitimes contre le Papisme—le Janseniste Convaincu,—traité Historique contenant le Jugement d'un Protestant sur la Theologie Mystique, 1700—Traité de la Nature & de la Grace—Apologie pour l'Accomplissement des Propheties, 1687,—& sermons.

JURIN, Dr. James, secretary of the Royal society, and president of the college of physicians, London, was eminent as a physician and as a writer. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and had a dispute with Michelloti on the momentum of running waters, with Keill and Senac on the action of the heart, with Robins on distinct vision, and with the followers of Leibnitz on moving bodies. His treatise on vision is printed with Smith's optics. He died 1750.

JUSSIEU, Anthony de, an eminent botanist, born at Lyons, 1686. He travelled over various parts of Europe to improve the science of botany and natural history; and he was, for his great abilities, admitted into the academy of sciences at Paris, and made botany professor in the Royal garden, and professor to the king. Besides several valuable communications to the learned societies of Paris, he abridged Barrelier's work on the plants of France, Spain, and Italy—and made an Appendix to Tournefort's—and wrote a discourse on the Progress of Botany. He died 1758.

JUSSIEU, Bernard de, brother to the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1699. He was equally eminent as a botanist and physician, and was member of the learned societies of Europe. He was a great favorite with the king, over whose plants he was appointed curator, and whose botanical garden at Trianon he adorned with great skill. He wrote the Friend of Humanity,—and edited Tournefort's plants near Paris, 2 vols. 12mo. He died 1777, universally esteemed, aged 79.

JUSTEL, Christopher, counsellor and secretary to the French king, was born at Paris, 1580. He wrote Code of Canons of the Church Universal—and the Councils of Africa, with notes—and the Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne—and Collections of Greek and Latin Canons. He died at Paris 1649.

JUSTEL, Henry, LL.D., son and successor of the above in his offices about the king, was born in Paris, 1620. He was highly respected for his learning, and he was particularly attached to England, and to her literary characters, such as Locke, Dr. Hickee, and others. He gave to the university of Oxford the Greek MSS. of his father's Canones Ecclesiæ Universalis, for which he was in return complimented with the degree of doctor of laws, 1675. He had long foreseen the persecution of the protestants, and on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he migrated to London, and was made keeper of the king's library, St. James's, with a salary of 200*l.* per annum. This he held till his death, Sept. 1693, and was succeeded by Dr. R. Bentley. He wrote several learned works.

JUSTI, N. de, a German mineralogist, who studied at Jena, 1720, supported by the liberal contributions of those friends who foresaw his future celebrity. Under the direction of professor Zink, he acquired an extensive knowledge of mineralogy and became known by his treatise on political economy. He examined, with philosophic eye, the various mines of Schemnitz, Hanneberg, Hungary, and Austria, and for his services was made a member of the council of mines; and some time after he was nominated professor of political economy and natural history at Gottingen university. He was meditating the plan of a German Encyclopedia, after the French, when he was carried off by a sudden disease. His works were, a treatise on Mineralogy, 1757—a treatise on Money, a work of great merit, for which, by the misinterpretation of some passages, he was for a little time imprisoned, with severe treatment, at Breslaw, by order of the king of Prussia, and the elector of Wirtemberg—and Miscellanies on Chemistry and Mineralogy, 2 vols. 4to.

JUSTIN I. from a swine-herd and soldier, rose to the rank of general, and was proclaimed emperor of the east by his army, on the death of Anastasius, 518. He opposed the Arians, and with great munificence rebuilt Antioch, and other towns, which had been destroyed by an earthquake, and died A. D. 527, aged 77, respected for his piety, wisdom, and humanity.

JUSTIN II. was nephew and successor of Justinian, 565. He caused his relative, Justin, the last emperor's grand nephew, to be assassinated, and treated some of his subjects with cruelty on suspicion of treachery. His indolence and weakness gave way to the superior arts of his wife, Sophia, niece of the empress Theodora, who managed the empire with great ability, with the assistance of Tiberius. Justin made war against Chosroes, king of Persia, and obtained some advantage over his enemy. He died 5th Oct. 578.

JUSTIN, St. a native of Sichar in Samaria, who from a heathen philosopher, became a zealous supporter of Christianity. During the persecution of Antonius, he appeared before the emperor, and pleaded the cause of the injured Christians with success. He suffered martyrdom 166. He wrote two apologies for the Christians, besides a Dialogue with Trypho, best edited 1636, folio.

JUSTINIAN I. emperor of Rome after his uncle, Justin I. 527, is celebrated more from the fame of his general Belisarius, than his own personal exertions. The Roman laws were under him reduced into a code, which was called the Digests or Pandects, and the more modern laws were likewise collected under the name of Novellæ. He firmly opposed the popes, Sylvester and Vigilius, and abolished the Roman consulate. He built St. Sophia's church at Constantinople, and died 565, aged 88.

JUSTINIAN II., succeeded his father Pogonatus Constantine, 685. He was successful against the Saracens; but his infamous intention of destroying all the inhabitants of Constantinople, procured his deposition and banishment, 694. He, 10 years after, regained his throne with the assistance of the Bulgarians; but he was at last assassinated, with his son Tiberius, by Philippicus Bardanes, who ascended the throne, 711.

JUSTINIANI, St. Lawrence, a noble of Venice, general of the monastery of St. George, in Alba. He was made the first patriarch of Venice, 1451, by pope Eugenius IV. He died four years after, aged 74, and was canonized by Alexander VIII. 1690. His works, consisting of Lignum Vitæ—de Casto Connubio—Fasciculus Amoris—and other pious treatises, were published at Lyons, 1568, folio, and Venice, 1755, with an account of his life.

JUSTINIANI, Bernard, nephew of the preceding, was born 1407-8, at Venice. He studied at Verona and Padua, and was employed by the pope.

In 1461 he went as ambassador from Venice to Louis XI. of France, who knighted him. After being 20 times raised to the office of Sage grand, he was, in 1474, made procurator of St. Mark, an honor inferior only to the doge. He died 1489. He left de Origine Urbis Venet. printed, 1492, folio—the Life of his Uncle—and other historical works.

JUSTINIANI, Augustin, bishop of Nebo, in Corsica, was born at Genoa, 1470. Francis I. of France, patronised him on account of his learning, and made him his almoner, with a liberal pension. After being professor of Hebrew for five years at Paris, he returned to Genoa, and passed over to his diocese, 1522. He perished, together with the vessel which conveyed him from Genoa to Nebo, 1536. He wrote, Psalterium Hebræum, Græcum, Arabicum, & Chaldaicum, cum tribus Latinis Interpretationibus & Glossis—besides other works.

JUSTINIANI, Fabio, a native of Genoa, who became bishop of Ajaccio, and died there 1627, aged 59. He is author of Index Universalis Materiarum Biblicarum, and a Commentary on the book of Tobit.

JUVARA, Philip, a Sicilian architect, born at Messina. He was the pupil of Fontana, and distinguished himself by the beautiful edifices which he erected at Turin. He went to Spain on the invitation of Philip V. but the model which he proposed for the construction of a magnificent palace, on the ruins of that which had been destroyed by fire, though approved, was not carried into execution, through the intrigues of the queen; and Juvara, disappointed and chagrined, died of grief at Madrid, 1735, aged 50.

JUVENAL, de Carlenas Felix, a French writer, born at Pezenas, where he also died, 1760, aged 81, highly respected as an amiable private character. He wrote, Principles of History—Essays, on the History of the Sciences—Belles Lettres—the Arts.

JUVENALIS, Decius Junius, a Roman poet, celebrated for the spirit, boldness, and elegance of his satires, not unmix'd, however, with licentious expressions and indecent remarks. He was sent in honorable exile as governor of Egypt, and died at Rome under Trajan, 128.

JUXON, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Chichester, and educated at Merchant Taylor's, and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1593, and president 1621. His intimacy with Laud, who was of the same college, raised him to high stations: in 1627 he was made dean of Worcester, in 1633 clerk of the king's closet, the next year bishop of Hereford, and before consecration, translated to London. He was, in 1635, made lord treasurer; but whilst these high appointments offended the puritans, and drew their indignation against the ministry, and particularly against Laud, Juxon was exemplary in his conduct, and irreproachable in the discharge of his duties. He suffered severely during the rebellion; and after attending his royal master to the scaffold, he was imprisoned by the suspicious parliament, who wished him to disclose the private conversation which he had held with the king, but without effect. At the restoration, Juxon was raised to the see of Canterbury. He died 4th June 1663, aged 81, and was buried in St. John's chapel, Oxford.

K.

KAAB, a celebrated Arabian poet, author of one of the seven poems which were suspended in the temple of Mecca, was originally a strenuous opponent of Mahomet, whose doctrines and person he satirised. He, however, recanted, by writing a poem in honor of the prophet. As a reward, the prophet gave him his green mantle, which one of the descendants of Kaab sold for ten thousand pieces of silver. He died in 662.

KABRIS, Joseph, a Frenchman, the peculiarity of whose adventures entitles him to some notice. He was born at Bordeaux, and having entered into the naval service of his country, he was taken prisoner during the last war, and conveyed to England. He obtained permission to become a sailor on board a South Sea whaler, and the vessel being wrecked on the coast of the island of Noukahiwa, in the Pacific ocean, Kabris fell into the hands of the inhabitants, who are cannibals. They were on the point of slaying him, to feast on his carcass, when he was saved by the intercession of the king's daughter, a young girl, who shortly after became his wife. He was then invested with the marks of distinction peculiar to the royal family, and installed in the office of chief justice of the island. He administered the laws, according to his own account, much to the satisfaction of the people, a task rendered comparatively easy by the simplicity of their institutions. A thief is punished by tying him to a tree for several days; an assassin is killed by the family of the victim, and his body divided among the different tribes; while the traitor is flayed alive, and thrown into the sea, as not worthy even of being eaten. Kabris had for nine years been in the enjoyment of domestic happiness and legal reputation among the Noukahiwans, when he was carried away, as he stated, while asleep, by the Russian navigator, captain Krusenstern. When he arrived at Petersburg, he was appointed professor of swimming, in the imperial school for the navy. He returned to France in 1817, intending, after visiting Bordeaux, to go back to his wife and family at Noukahiwa. To raise funds for his expenses on his journey, he exhibited himself to the public at Paris, and elsewhere, his face being tattooed in the New Zealand style of decoration. While on his travels for this purpose, he died suddenly at Valenciennes, in 1822.

KAHTER, John, professor of poetry, mathematics, and theology at Rinletz, and member of the society at Gottingen, was born at Wolmar, Hesse Cassel, 1649. He died 1729, author of Dissertations on Theology, Philosophy, &c. in 2 vols. 12mo.

KAIN, Henry Louis le, a celebrated actor born at Paris, 14th April, 1728. He was originally engaged in the making of surgical instruments, and was introduced to Voltaire, who observed and cultivated his talents, and enabled him to appear on the French theatre, and to acquire there such celebrity as to be called the Garrick of France. Louis XV. though prejudiced against him, acknowledged his merit, and all France followed the monarch's example. In the expression of grief, despair, sensibility, and all the strong emotions of the mind, Kain had no superior. His first appearance on the stage was in 1750, and he died at Paris of an inflammatory fever, 8th Feb. 1778. It is remarkable, that Voltaire, who foresaw his greatness, was never present at his representations, as he left France for Prussia a few days before the appearance of his friend on the public theatre; and after an absence of 27 years, he heard, on his return to Paris, that Kain was no more. Kain left two children.

KALB, Baron de, major general in the army of the United States of America in the revolutionary war, was a German by birth, and had long been in the French service. In the battle near Camden, Aug. 1780, he fell after receiving eleven wounds, in his vigorous exertions to prevent the defeat of the Americans. He died Aug. 19, aged 47, having served three years with high reputation. His last moments were spent in dictating a letter, which expressed his warm affection for the men and officers of his division, and his admiration of their firmness and courage, in withstanding a superior force. An ornamental tree was planted at the head of his grave in the neighborhood of Camden, and Congress resolved, that a monument should be erected to his memory, at Annapolis, with a very honorable inscription.

KALM, Peter, a naturalist, was a Swede, and was sent to America in 1748 to collect information concerning its botany. In two or three years he travelled through Canada, N. York, and Pennsylvania. He was afterwards professor of economy in Swedish Finland, where he died, Nov. 16, 1779. In honor of him the beautiful Kalmia received its name. His travels in America were published at Gottingen, 1754; the same in English, 3 vols. 1770; 2 vols. 8vo. 1772. He published also an account of the cataract of Niagara, 1751.

KALUBKO, Vincent, a Polish historian, elected bishop of Cracow by the chapter. He retired to a monastery of the Cistercians, when his cathedral was burnt, 1218, by lightning, and there he died, 1223. He wrote Chronicon Regni Poloniæ, in the form of a dialogue.

KAMES, Henry Home, lord, a Scotch judge, and fertile writer, was born, in 1696, at Kames, in Berwickshire; and, after having been successful at the bar, was appointed, in 1752, a judge of session, on which occasion he took the title by which he is generally known. In 1763 he was raised to be one of the lords of justiciary. He died in 1782. Many of his works are on Scotch law. Of those which are wholly literary the principal are, Elements of Criticism; Sketches of the History of Man; Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion; and Essays upon several subjects connected with British Antiquities.

KAM-HI, emperor of China, succeeded to the throne 1661. He was the grandson of a Tartar prince, who had in 1644 invaded and conquered China, and he showed himself a liberal patron of the literature, and of the arts of Europe, and of the labors of christian missionaries. Though well acquainted with geography, he never would suffer a map to appear before him, except China was placed in the midst of the earth. He died 1722, aged 71.

KANDLER, John Joachim, an ingenious artist, employed in the porcelain manufactory of Meissen. His figures were much admired for execution and grace, especially his St. Paul, the scourging of Christ, the death of St. Xavier, and the 12 apostles. The group which he completed at the desire of Augustus, of Poland, for Louis XV. was deservedly commended, and procured a very handsome reward from the French monarch. Kandler was a native of Selingstadt, in Saxony, and died 1776, aged 70.

KANOLD, John, author of some works on the plague—of Memoirs on Nature and Art, in German—a periodical work, and other things,—was a German physician, and died at Breslaw, 1729, aged 50.

KANT, Immanuel, a native of Königsberg, son of a saddler, descended from a Scotch family, of the name of Cant, settled in Prussia. From the charity school of his village, he removed to Fredericianum college, and then in 1740 to the university. To maintain himself he now became a private tutor in a clergyman's family, afterwards in a nobleman's, and then returned to the university, where he took the degree of M. A. in 1755, and became a public tutor of celebrity. His knowledge was very extensive, and his publications were equally numerous, but he paid particular attention to metaphysics, and though his labors were sometimes obscure, his principles and opinions were popular, but while followed by numbers, he found himself attacked by some severe opponents. He died 12th Feb. 1804, aged 80. His works are on the theory of the winds—physical Geography—Principles of Motion and Rest—Volcanoes in the Moon, and the Rotation of the Earth on its Axis, and what alterations had taken place.

KARAMSIN, Nicholas Michælovitch, a Russian historian and miscellaneous writer, historiographer of the Russian empire, was born, in 1765, in the government of Simbirsk; served for a while in the imperial guards; and, after his return from travelling, devoted himself to literature. He died, at Moscow, June 3, 1826. He is the author of a History of Russia, in eleven volumes; Letters of a Russian Traveller; Tales; and various other works.

KASTNER, Abraham Gotthelf, a mathematician, was born at Leipsic in 1719. He became professor of mathematics and moral philosophy at Gottingen; also secretary to the Royal Society at that place, and keeper of the observatory. He died in 1800. Among other works he wrote "A History of the Mathematics, 2 vols. 1797.

KAUFFMAN, Mary Angelica, a female artist, was born in 1740, at Loire, in Switzerland. She was instructed in painting by her father, who next took her for farther improvement to Rome; from whence she removed to Venice, where she found a friend in Lady Wentworth, and accompanied her to England. In this country she experienced the most liberal patronage, and became a member of the Royal Academy. She married Sir A. Zucchi, a Venetian artist, with whom she returned to Italy, and died at Rome in 1807. Bartolozzi engraved a number of prints from her designs.

KAUNITZ RITBERG, prince of a celebrated statesman, for 40 years chancellor and prime minister of Austria. He was first ambassador in France, and by negotiating the marriage of Antoinette, with Louis XVI. he acquired great consequence. He served with fidelity, Maria Theresa, Joseph II. and Leopold, and by his abilities and intrigues, gained a great ascendancy in the European courts. He died at Vienna, 1794, aged 84.

KEACH, Benjamin, author of Travels of True Godliness, in the style of Bunyan, and of scripture Metaphors, in folio, reprinted 1777, works of great merit; was a baptist teacher, who died at the beginning of the 18th century.

KEARSLEY, John, a physician of Philadelphia, was a native of England and came to America about 1711. As a member of the assembly his speeches for the rights of the colony were so acceptable, that he was sometimes carried home on the shoulders of the people. He died 1772 aged 82. He contributed much for the building of Christ church, and the hospital of that church for widows, he endowed with a valuable estate.

KEATE, George a native of Trowbridge, Wilts, educated at Kingston school. After visiting Geneva, and Voltaire, and making the tour of Europe, he entered at the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar. Promotion and honors, however, followed not so rapidly as he expected, and he quitted the profession to become an author. Among other things, he wrote, Ancient and Modern Rome, a poem, 1760—an Account of the Pelew Islands, from captain Wilson's papers, and other works. He died 1797, aged 68.

KEATING, Jeffrey, D.D. a clergyman of Tipperary, author of the history of the poets of his own country, printed in London, with the genealogies of some Irish families. He died 1650.

KEATS, Sir Richard Goodwin, an English Admiral, was born Jan. 16, 1757, and died April 5, 1834, aged 77. He was the son of the Rev. Richard Keats; entered the navy in 1770; was appointed Rear Admiral in 1807; Major-general of the Royal Marines in 1818; and governor of the Royal Hospital at Greenwich in 1821. He gained a high reputation by the manner in which he performed the various offices which he sustained, and was exemplary in all the relations of life.

KEBLE, Joseph, an English lawyer, son of Richard Keble, serjeant at law under Cromwell's usurpation, was born in London, 1632. He was of Jesus college, Oxford, and was made fellow of All-Souls, by the parliamentary visitors, 1648. He settled afterwards at Gray's Inn, and when a barrister, was remarkable for his regular and constant attendance at the court of king's bench, though employed in no cause. He died suddenly, Aug. 1710. He published an explanation of the laws against recusants, 8vo. 1681—an Assistance to Justices of the peace, &c. folio—Reports from the King's Bench, Westminster, 3 vols. folio—two Essays on Human nature, or the Creation of Mankind, and on Human Actions. He left besides in MS. above 100 large folios, and 50 thick quartos.

KECKERMAN, Bartholomew, a native of Dantzic, who studied at Wittemberg, Leipsic, and Heidelberg. After being professor of Hebrew at Heidelberg, he was honorably invited by his fellow-citizens of Dantzic, to come and settle amongst them. He obeyed their summons, 1601, but he fell a sacrifice to his intense application in the education of youth, and in the pursuits of literature, and died 1609, aged only 38. His works, which are learned, though, says G. Vossius, full of plagiarism, were collected and published at Geneva, 1614, 2 vols. folio.

KEENE, Edmund, an English bishop, born at Lynn, Norfolk, where his father was an Alderman. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, and in 1740, by the interference of his brother, the English ambassador in Spain, with Walpole, he was made rector of Stanhope, Durham, in the room of bishop Butler. In 1748 he succeeded Dr. Whalley, at the head of St. Peter's college, and in 1750 he served the office of vice chancellor, and showed himself a warm and judicious advocate for the improvement of university discipline. His efforts, however, were not without opposition and obloquy; he was ridiculed in the prose pamphlet, "Fragment," and in the poem called, "Capitale." In 1752 he was made bishop of Chester, and on the death of Dr. Mawson, 1770, he was translated to Ely. In this new appointment he obtained an act of Parliament, to alienate the old palace of Holborn, belonging to his see, and for building a new one in Dover street, and thus he not only got rid of a great incumbrance, but added an annual revenue of 5000*l.* to repair and maintain his palace. He died 1781.

KEILL, John, an eminent mathematician, born at Edinburgh, Dec. 1st, 1671. After studying, and taking the degree of M.A. in his native city, he followed his friend and tutor David Gregory, to Oxford, and in 1694 entered at Baliol as a Scotch exhibitor. Here he soon acquired celebrity, as being the first who taught Newton's principles by proper experiments, and soon became better known by his "Examination of Burnet's Theory of the Earth," to which were subjoined "Remarks on Whiston's new Theory." In 1700 he was appointed deputy professor of natural philosophy at Oxford, by Dr. Millington, and the next year he published his famous treatise, called "Introductio ad Veram Physicam," which has been considered as a most able introduction to Newton's Principia. He was next elected member of the royal society, to whose transactions he was a respectable contributor. In 1709 he was made treasurer to the Palatines going to settle in New England, and after his return, the next year, he was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy, at Oxford. In 1711 he was engaged in a controversy with Leibnitz, and ably defended the claim of sir Isaac Newton to the invention of fluxions, in which his efforts were seconded and approved by the royal society, against the violent attacks of the foreign philosopher. His edition of Commandinus' Euclid, appeared 1715, and 1718 his Introductio ad Veram Astronomiam, translated by himself into English, at the request of the duchess of Chandos. He was carried off by a fever, 1st Sept. 1721, in his 50th year, highly respected.

✓ KEILL, James, younger brother to the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, 27th March, 1678. He applied himself to medical studies, and particularly to anatomy. He settled at Northampton, 1703, as a physician, and he died there from that painful disorder, a cancer in the roof of his mouth, 16th July 1719, and was buried in St. Giles's church, where a monument was erected by his brother. He published an account of Animal Secretion—the Quantity of blood in the Human Heart, and Muscular Motion—Medicina Statica—Anatomy of the Human Body, 8vo.—an Account of the Dissection of John Bayles, aged 130—a Translation of Lennery's Chemistry, and papers in the philosophical transactions.

KEITH, James, field-marshal of Prussia, the younger son of William Keith, earl marshal of Scotland, was born 1696. He was educated under Ruddiman, and intended for the law, but the breaking out of the rebellion showed the military bent of his genius. He joined the pretender, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and then fled to France, where he applied himself to mathematics, and the studies of a military life. After travelling through Italy, he became in 1717, acquainted with the Czar Peter, but he refused to enter into the Russian service, and went to Madrid, where he obtained a commission in the Irish brigade. He afterwards accompanied his friend and patron, the duke of Lyria, in his embassy to Russia, and there he engaged in the service of the Czarina, was made lieutenant-general, and honored with the black eagle. Here he distinguished himself in the wars against the Turks and the Swedes, as well as in negotiations; but dissatisfied with the politics of the Court, and the servility which attended his situation, he left Russia, and came to Berlin, where the king of Prussia raised him to great honors, and made him governor of his capital, and field-marshal of his armies. He gained so strongly the confidence of that monarch, that he was his counsellor in the cabinet, and his companion in his relaxations, and he attended him in his travels through Germany, Poland, and Hungary. After distinguishing himself as a warrior and a politician in the service of his new master, he was unfortunately killed at the battle of Hohenkerken, 1758.

KEITH, George, a quaker, was born at Aberdeen, and was well educated. He came in 1682 to East Jersey, where he was surveyor general. In 1689 he taught a school in Philadelphia. After various exertions, writing and travelling for the propagation of the sentiments of his sect, he at first seceded, and at length entirely deserted the society. In England he became an episcopalian, and was consecrated as an episcopal missionary, and in that capacity officiated for a short time in New York and Boston. Returning to England in 1706, he was a rector at Edminton, in Sussex, where he died. His publications were numerous, but almost exclusively controversial. Those not of this character are, account of his travels, 1699; journal of travels from New Hampshire to Cavatuck, 1706; new theory of the longitude, 1709.

KEITH, Sir William, governor of Pennsylvania from 1717 to 1726. He had been before surveyor general of the customs in America. He died 1749, aged 80. He published the history of the British plantations in America, part 1, containing the history of Virginia, 4to. 1738; collection of papers and tracts, 1749; on the subject of taxing the colonies, 1767.

KEITH, Isaac Stockton, D. D., minister of Charleston South Carolina, was a native of Pennsylvania, and graduated at Princeton college in 1775. He was the minister of Alexandria in Virginia ten years, before he was settled in Charleston. He went to Charleston in 1788, and died 1819, aged 58. To his church he bequeathed 5000 dollars, and half that sum to the general assembly. A collection of his sermons and addresses, with an account of his life by Dr. Flinn, was published 1816.

KELLER, James, a learned jesuit, born at Sckingen, 1568. He was counsellor to Albert of Bavaria, and the confidential friend of the emperor Maximilian. He died at Munich, 1631. He wrote various books under fictitious names; but his Mysteria Politica, 1635, in 4to. from its contents, was exposed to the censures of the Sorbonne, and burnt publicly.

KELLERMAN, Francis Christopher, duke of Valmy, a French marshal, was born, in 1735, at Strasburgh; entered the army as a hussar when he was only seventeen; was made an officer for his conduct in the seven years' war; rose to the rank of major general in 1788; was appointed commander in chief of the army of the Moselle in 1792, and contributed greatly to save France from her invaders by his gallant repulse of the Prussians at Valmy; was, nevertheless, imprisoned during the reign of terror; held, subsequently, the command of the armies of the Alps and of Italy, and the posts of inspector general of cavalry, and president of the senate; was loaded with honors by Napoleon, yet voted for his deposition; and died in 1820.

KELLY, Hugh, an Irishman, who from a stay maker, became a hackney writer to a lawyer, in London, and then turned author. He possessed great application, and wrote with fluency and success. He died 1777. His works are Thespis, a poem, after Churchill's manner—False Delicacy—a Word to the Wise—School for Wives, comedies—Clementina, a tragedy—the Romance of an Hour, a comic entertainment—the Memoirs of a Magdalen, a novel, and some periodical works.

KELLY, John, a learned English clergyman, a native of Douglas in the isle of Man, where his ancestors had from time immemorial possessed a small freehold. He was born 1750, and was educated at the free grammar school of Douglas, and was led by his early sympathies to pay a particular attention to the vernacular dialect of the Celtic tongue, which was spoken in the island. His skill in the Manks language, at which at the age of seventeen he sought to compile a grammar and dictionary, introduced him to bishop Hildesley, who employed him in translating the Bible into the Manks tongue, and ordained him a minister of the episcopal congregation of Ayr in Scotland. Here he was engaged by the duke of Gordon to attend the studies of the marquis of Huntley, and through the same patronage he obtained the rectory of Copford in Essex. On the attainment of this preferment he entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, and attained the degree of L.L.D. In 1803 he published "A Practical Grammar of the Ancient Gaelic, or Language of the Isle of Man," and in 1805 issued proposals for "A Triglot Dictionary of the Celtic Tongue, as spoken in the Highlands of Scotland, Ireland, and the Isle of Man," which last was nearly completed when the sheets were destroyed by the fire on the premises of Mr. Nichols the printer. Doctor Kelly died in 1809.

KELLY, Michael, a composer and singer, was born, in 1762, at Dublin; received lessons from Rauzzini; and was afterwards sent to Naples, where he studied under Finaroli and Aprilì. He was well received as a singer in the Italian theatres; was for some time in the service of the emperor Joseph; and at length returned to London, where he made his first appearance, in 1787, at Drury Lane theatre, in Lionel and Clarissa. As a composer he set between sixty and seventy pieces; among which are, the Castle Spectre, and Blue Beard. He died in 1826. He published his Reminiscences.

KEMBLE, John Philip, one of the most perfect of modern tragedians, was born, in 1757, at Prescot, in Lancashire; and studied at the Roman catholic seminary of Sedgley Park, and at the college of Douay. He was destined for one of the learned professions, but, on his return to England, he immediately became an actor. After having undergone a probation at various provincial theatres, he made his appearance, on the 30th of September, 1783, at Drury Lane, in the character of Hamlet. He soon rose to the highest histrionic eminence, and retained it to the last. For some years he was manager of the Drury Lane establishment. In 1802, he purchased a sixth part of Covent Garden theatre, at which house also he had the management. His fortune, however, was seriously injured by the conflagration of the house, and by the ensuing riots. In 1817 he retired from the stage, and he died, at Lausanne, February 26, 1823. In characters which require dignity of action and of person Kemble was unrivalled; he was also a man of learning, accomplishments, and taste. Early in his career he produced a volume of poems, with the title of Fugitive Pieces, which he suppressed the day after it was published. He also altered several plays, and wrote the musical entertainment of Lodoiska.

KEMP, John, L.L.D. professor of mathematics in Columbia college, New-York, was born at Achlossan, North Britain, April 10th, 1763, and obtained the degree of Master of Arts at Aberdeen, in 1761, with great reputation for mathematical talents and knowledge. About the close of the war of the revolution he came to Virginia, and not long after, removed to New-York, where, in 1785 he was appointed teacher of mathematics in the college, and the next year professor of that department. He also instructed in Natural Philosophy. In 1795, he was appointed professor likewise of Geography, History, and Chronology; and discharged the duties of those appointments with distinguished talents and fidelity. He died November 15th, 1812, in his 51st year.

KEMPIS, Thomas, a famous theologian, born at Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, 1380. He was educated at Deventer, and afterwards entered among the members of the monastery of mount St. Agnes. He here displayed great piety, patience, and self-mortification, and besides transcribing books of devotion, as the rest of his brethren, he composed several works of divinity, much admired by the papists. He died 1471, in his 92d year. The largest edition of his works, consisting of sermons, and pious treatises, is in 3 vols. folio, Cologne, 1680. His famous book, De Imitatione Christi, which has been translated into all languages, has been by some writers ascribed to Gerson, a Benedictine monk. This has consequently occasioned not a little controversy.

KEN, Thomas, an English prelate, descended from an ancient Somersetshire family, was born at Berkhamstead, Herts, July, 1637. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1657. He was patronised by bishop Morley, and afterwards went to Holland, as chaplain to the princess of Orange. In 1683 he went with lord Dartmouth, against Tangier, and on his return, was made chaplain to the king. In his character he displayed great firmness and consistency of conduct, and far from offending his royal master, by refusing admittance into his house, to Eleanor Gwyn, the favorite mistress, he received higher marks of esteem, and was nominated to the vacant see of Bath and Wells. Before he was, however, admitted, Charles was taken ill, and was attended by his faithful chaplain, whose devout services were much interrupted by the interference of Popish priests. On James's accession Ken was settled in his see, but though attempts were made to render him favorable to the projected alteration of the national religion, he remained steady to his principles, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower. At the revolution he was unwilling to take the oaths of allegiance to the new monarch, and therefore retired, and was deprived of his bishopric. He devoted the rest of his life to literary and pious pursuits, and was so much respected for his steady principles, that queen Anne granted him a pension of 200*l.* per annum. He died 19th March, 1710—11. His works were published 4 vols. 1721, and consist of hymns, pious manuals, an epic poem in 13 books, called Edmund, sermons, &c. His nephew, Hawkins, prefixed an account of his life. Though accused of popish principles, he died in the faith of the church of England.

KENDAL, George, D.D., a native of Dawlish, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and made by bishop Brownrigg, prebendary of Exeter, and in 1647, rector of Blissland, Cornwall. He afterwards removed to a benefice in London. Though he recovered his prebend at the restoration, he lost it and all his preferment in 1662 for non-conformity. He was author of a Vindication of the Doctrine of Grace and Special favor to the Elect, fol. and the Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints, against John Goodwin, fol.

KENDAL, Samuel, D.D., minister of Weston, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college 1782, was ordained 1785, and died 1815, aged 60. He published a sermon at the ordination of T.

M. Harris, 1794; at the election, 1804; seven sermons for the young, making 8th number of the Christian Monitor, 1808; on the death of S. Dexter 1810; century sermon, 1813; A volume of his sermons was published after his death.

KENNEDY, John, M.D. a Scotch physician who resided for some years at Smyrna, and died 26th Jan. 1760. His valuable collections of Greek and Latin coins and pictures, were sold by auction, and afterwards came into the possession of Dr. Hunter. In his dissertation on the coins of Carausius Dr. Kennedy asserted that Oriuna was the emperor's guardian goddess, an opinion which excited a violent controversy between him and Dr. Stukeley, who supported that Oriuna was the wife of Carausius.

KENNEDY, James, second son of sir W. Kennedy by Margaret, daughter of Robert III. king of Scotland, was educated at Paris and Rome, and became regent during the minority of James II. He was archbishop of St. Andrew's, and the founder of St. Mary's college there. He died chancellor of Scotland 1472, aged 68.

KENNET, White, D.D., an English prelate, born 10th Aug. 1660. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he applied himself with unusual perseverance to study, and published his letter from a student, concerning the approaching parliament, a political pamphlet which highly offended the whig party. He also published at this time his "Ballad," a poetical poem, and in 1684 appeared his translation of Erasmus' Moriæ Encomium. That year he was presented to the living of Ambrosden, Oxfordshire. In 1689 whilst shooting, his gun burst, and wounded his skull so severely that he was trepanned, and was ever after obliged to wear a black patch on the injured part. He distinguished himself at Oxford as an eloquent and popular preacher, and as an active tutor in his hall, and in 1693 he was presented to the rectory of Shottesbrook in Berkshire. In 1701 he became archdeacon of Huntingdon, and that year engaged with Dr. Atterbury in a controversy about the rights of convocation. In 1705 he preached Dr. Wake's consecration sermon which was much applauded, particularly by judge Holt, and sometime after was appointed chaplain to the queen. His sermon at the funeral of the duke of Devonshire in 1707, notwithstanding the censure of some wits, proved very agreeable to the next duke, who recommended him to the deanery of Peterborough. The opposition which he showed to Sacheverell for some time exposed him to obloquy, and when the ministry were changed he was represented as an enemy to the queen and her government. His popularity however was not diminished, he was some time after promoted to the see of Peterborough, which he enjoyed ten years. He died in London, 19th Dec. 1728. He wrote the third volume of "A Complete History of England" published by the booksellers 1706, besides a Vindication of the Church—a Letter to the Editors of Somner's treatise of the Roman Posts, and Sermons.

KENNET, Basil, D.D. younger brother of the bishop, was born 21st Oct. 1674, at Postling. He was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1697. In 1706 by his brother's interest he was made chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, but so violent was the opposition which he met from the papists when he reached Italy, that he escaped with difficulty the horrors of the inquisition. On his return to Oxford, 1714, he took the degree of doctor of divinity, but died very soon after of a slow fever, the seeds of which he had brought with him from Italy. Basil Kennet was distinguished in private life as an amiable and benevolent man, and as an author his works are sufficient proof of his great abilities. He published in 1696 Romæ Antiquæ Notitia, in two parts, a valuable book addressed to the duke of Gloucester—the Lives and Characters of the Ancient Greek Poets, 8vo. 1697, also inscribed to the duke to whom it was expected he was to be appointed sub-preceptor—an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed after Dr. Pearson, 1705—an Essay towards a Paraphrase on the Psalms, &c. 8vo. 1706—Sermons, &c. on various occasions, 1715, 8vo.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, a celebrated Hebrew scholar, born at Totness, Devonshire, 1718, where his father was parish clerk. His talents were displayed at school with such success that by the liberal contributions of some gentlemen, friendly to infant merit, he was sent to Exeter college, Oxford. Here he devoted himself to study with so much assiduity that by the publication of two popular dissertations—on the Tree of Life—and on the Oblations of Cain and Abel—he obtained the degree of B.A. from the university, gratis, and before the statutable term. His excellent sermons next recommended him to public notice, but about 1753, he began to digest the plan of his great and national labor, the publication of the Hebrew text of the bible collated from various MSS. In this arduous undertaking, too expensive for the resources of a private man, he was nobly supported by the munificence of learned bodies, and even of sovereign princes; and to accelerate, and indeed remunerate his labors, he was made canon of Christ Church, and keeper of the Radcliffe library. After indefatigable patience and the most laudable perseverance he completed his great undertaking. The compendious history of the Hebrew text from the closing of the canon to the invention of printing, with an account of 103 MSS. appeared first; in 1760, the proposals for collecting the MSS. at home and abroad, were laid before the public; in 1776 the first volume was published, and in 1780 his labors were brought to a conclusion in the 8th volume. After thus contributing largely to the improvement of Hebrew literature and sacred criticism, this worthy man began to publish some remarks on select passages of the Old Testament, but died before the completion, at Oxford, in 1783. He left a widow, but no children. He was vicar of Culham, Oxfordshire.

KENRICK, William, a native of Watford Herts, who from the humble occupation of a rule maker, became a popular writer. He went to Leyden to improve himself, and at his return in 1759 he published his epistles philosophical and moral in verse. In 1766 appeared his "Falstaff's Wedding," a comedy, an admirable imitation of Shakspeare, and which he at first intended to impose on the world as the production of that great bard. For some time he wrote in the Monthly Review, but in consequence of a dispute with the principal, he set up the London Review, which did not much answer. He was equally unsuccessful in the news paper which he began in opposition to the Morning Chronicle, which after conducting some years he abandoned, from a similar quarrel. He translated Rousseau's Emilius and Eloisa—Milot's History of England—and other works, and produced besides various dramatic pieces, which if not all successful yet possessed merit. He died 1779.

KENT, William, a native of Yorkshire, who abandoned the business of coach painter for the superior branches of the profession. By the liberality of some friends he was enabled in 1710 to go to Rome, and improve himself; but the patronage and confidence of lord Burlington raised him to consequence and independence. On his return to London, he was employed in various works, but he possessed little genius as a painter. His talents however displayed themselves soon as an ingenious and able architect, and his temple of Venus in Stowe gardens, Holkham house, Norfolk, and other buildings are monuments of his genius. By the influence of Lord Burlington and other friends he obtained the place of master carpenter, architect, painter and keeper of the pictures, to the king, with a salary altogether worth 600*l.* per ann. He died of an inflammation in his bowels, at Burlington-house, 12th April 1748, aged 63. He may be deservedly considered, as Walpole observes, the father of modern gardening in England.

KENYON, Lloyd, lord, an English judge, eldest son of Lloyd Kenyon of Briyo, Esq. was born 1733 at Gredington, Flintshire, and on leaving Ruthin school Denbighshire, he became an articulated clerk to Tomlinson, attorney at Nantwich, Cheshire. On leaving Cheshire he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1761. Though known as an able lawyer and a good conveyancer, and much employed in chancery, he did not rapidly rise to eminence, till in 1780 he was called upon with Erskine to defend lord George Gordon. Distinguished on this memorable occasion, he was in 1782 made attorney general and chief justice of Chester, and elected member of parliament for Hindon, Wilts. He was in March 1784 made master of the rolls, and on lord Mansfield's resignation in 1783, he was by the recommendation of lord Thurlow raised to succeed him as chief justice of the King's bench, with the dignity of the peerage. In this elevated office lord Kenyon endeared himself to the people of England, as an upright and impartial judge, as the friend of his country, the supporter of her constitution, the advocate of virtue, and the unshaken punisher of vice, however great or powerful the offender. Though warm in his temper he never suffered justice to yield to prejudice or passion, but regarded the strict execution of the law as the firmest bulwark of national honor. The death of his eldest son, a young man of promising abilities, in a decline, is supposed to have hastened his dissolution, by producing, in consequence of his broken spirits, the black jaundice of which he died at Bath, 2d April 1802, aged 69. He left two sons, George his successor in the title, and Thomas.

KEPLER, John, a celebrated astronomer, born Dec. 27, 1571, at Wiel, in the duchy of Wirtemberg. His earliest years were not improved by education, but on his father's death he went to Tubingen university, where he studied philosophy and mathematics with great attention, and made such progress that in 1593 he was invited to a mathematical chair at Gratz in Styria. In 1597 he married, and three years after in consequence of the confusion which prevailed in religion and politics, he left Styria and went to settle in Bohemia, where the friendship of Tycho Brahe had invited him. Tycho introduced his friend to the emperor Rodolphus, but the intimacy which it was fondly expected was calculated to contribute not only to the advancement of science, but to mutual comfort, proved the source of dissatisfaction and distrust. Kepler was offended with the reserve of his friend, and Tycho did not communicate all the knowledge which honor and promise would have dictated. These rising dissensions however were stopped by the death of Tycho, and Kepler left to the exertion of his own powers was directed to finish the tables begun by his friend, which he dedicated to his imperial patron under the title of Rodolphine tables. But though appointed mathematician to the emperor for life, and though respected for his learning and abilities, Kepler had to struggle with the horrors of poverty through the jealousy or malice of the imperial ministers who paid him his pension with a very sparing hand, so that he removed from Prague to Linz, and in 1613 assisted at the assembly at Ratisbon, and was particularly consulted in the reformation of the calendar. He went in 1630 to Ratisbon to solicit the payment of the arrears of his pension, and whilst there he was seized with a fever, occasioned it is said by hard riding, and fell a victim to the disease in Nov. of the same year. His works were besides Ephemerides—Physica Cœlestis Tradita Commentariis de Motibus Stellæ Martis—Epitome Astronomicæ Copernicæ—Somnium Astronomicum de Astronomia Lunari—& Prodrromus Dissertationum Cosmographicarum, a work which the author considered as his best performance, and which he valued so much that he declared he would not exchange the glory of the discoveries which he had made, to become elector of Saxony. As an astronomer Kepler was a man of high celebrity, whose genius and discoveries have been deservedly commended by Des Cartes, Newton, Gregory, Horrox, and other astronomers. He first proved that the planets do not move in circles, but in ellipses, and that in their motions they describe equal areas in equal times, and that the squares of their periodical times are equal to the cubes of their distances. Yet though thus the worthy precursor of the great Newton, he maintains puerile absurdities, and foolishly imagines that the earth has a sympathy with the heavens, and that the globe is a huge animal which breathes out the winds through the holes of the mountains, as through its mouth and nostrils.

KEPPEL, Augustus Viscout, second son of the earl of Albemarle, was distinguished as an able admiral. He accompanied Anson round the world, and when raised to the highest honors of his profession he was placed at the head of the English Channel fleet, and on the 12th July 1778, he engaged the French fleet under d'Orvilliers off Ushant, but the action was partial, and the next day when the admiral wished to renew the engagement he found it impossible. This encounter spread great discontent through the nation, and the admiral was tried at Portsmouth on the accusation of sir Hugh Palliser, the second in command, and honorably acquitted. The charge was retorted by the admiral, and sir Hugh Palliser was censured by the sentence of a court-martial. In 1782 the admiral was made a peer, and under two administrations was twice made first lord of the admiralty. He was an able officer, and a man of great respectability in private life, and it is much to be lamented that a political difference between him and the second in command prevented that exertion of British valor which might have ensured a most brilliant victory to the fleet. He died 1786.

KERCKRING, Thomas, a physician, who lived at Hamburgh, as the grand duke of Tuscany's resident. He was member of the London royal society, and obtained some celebrity in his profession. He died at Hamburgh 1693. His chief works are Spicelegium Anatomicum, 4to.—and Anthropogeniæ Ichnographia, in which he supported the doctrine of an ovary in the human female.

KERI, Francis Borgia, a learned Jesuit of Hungary, author of an history of the emperors of the East, from Constantine to the fall of Constantino-ple, and of the Ottoman princes their successors. He was also an able astronomer, and made some improvements in the telescope. He died at Buda 1769.

KERKHERDERE, John Gerard, historiographer to the emperor Joseph I. was born near Maestricht 1678, and died 1738. He published some Latin poems, besides a Commentary on Daniel, and a Treatise on the Situation of the Earthly Paradise, which he placed above Babylon.

KERSAINT, Armand Guy Simon, count of, a native of Paris, who served with credit in the French navy, and on the breaking out of the revolution took an active part in the measures of the national assembly. He was attached to the party of the Girondists, and therefore in the convention he opposed boldly the violent measures of the sanguinary terrorists. On the day of the condemnation of Louis XVI. he had the magnanimity to resign his seat in the bloody assembly, and when called to their bar, he with undaunted countenance defended his conduct. So much virtue could not pass unpunished in those days of slaughter. He was discovered in his retreat and dragged before the revolutionary tribunal and condemned to die, 5th Dec. 1793. He was then aged 52.

KESSEL, John Van, a native of Antwerp, born 1626. His flowers, birds and insects, executed according to the seasons of the year, possessed great merit, and are now very scarce. His portraits were after the manner of Vandyk. His son Ferdinand, who was also eminent, though inferior to his father in the execution of his pieces, was patronised by John Sobieski at Warsaw.

KETT, William, a tanner of Norfolk, who raised and headed an insurrection in the reign of Edward VI. His followers amounted to above 20,000 men, and by inveighing against inclosures, and the oppression of the nobility, he increased his influence among the deluded multitude. He took Norwich, and defeated lord Northampton, but was afterwards routed by lord Warwick, and hanged with some of his associates on the tree which he had called the tree of reformation, and where he administered justice and issued orders to his followers, 1549.

KETTELWELL, John, an English divine born at North Allerton, Yorkshire, 10th March, 1653. After an education in his native town, he entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, and five years after was elected fellow of Lincoln, where he became an able tutor. By his publication of "Measures of Christian Obedience," 1681, he acquired great reputation, and was patronised by the duchess of Bedford and by lord Digby, who gave him the living of Coleshill, Warwickshire. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths of allegiance, in consequence of which he was deprived of his living and went to settle in London, where he was respected as an able writer, and good divine. He died of a consumption April 12, 1695. He is represented by Nelson, who knew him well, as an amiable man in private life, benevolent, learned, and humble. His works, which consisted of Religious tracts, besides tracts upon "New Oaths," and the duty of Allegiance, were collected into 2 vols. folio, 1718, with his life prefixed.

KEULEN, Janssen Van, a portrait painter of Dutch extraction, born in London, and for some time the favorite of Charles I. and of the English court before the introduction of Vandyk. Though he fell in the public estimation by the celebrity of his rival, he yet had the good sense of living with him on the most intimate terms, and died 1665.

KEYSLER, John George, a German antiquary, fellow of the London royal society, was born at Thournau 1639. He was carefully educated at the university of Hall and then travelled as tutor to the two sons of count Giech-Buchau, and visited the chief cities of Germany, France, and the Netherlands with the eyes and the judgment of a philosopher. He afterwards undertook the care of the two grandsons of baron Bernstorff, minister of state to the elector of Hanover, and after viewing in their company the chief places on the continent, he came to England, where he was received with all the respect due to learning, and eminent virtue. He was admitted fellow of the London royal society, and deserved it by his explication of Stonehenge, which he called an Anglo-Saxon monument, and by a dissertation on the misletoe of the Druids. He spent the rest of life in tranquil and honorable retirement under the patronage of his pupils, and died 20th June, 1743, aged 54, of an asthma. As he was an able antiquarian he published Antiquitates Selectæ Septentrionales & Celtae, Hanover, 12mo. 1720—besides Travels through Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, translated into English, 1756.

KHERASKOF, Michael, a Russian poet of the 18th century, made vice-president of the college of mines, counsellor of state, and curator of Moscow university. He wrote a poem on the Utility of Science—some tragedies—Pindaric odes, fables, idyls, satires—Ariadne and Theseus, a romance—Numa Pompilius, a poem, in four cantos, besides "Rossiada," an epic poem in 12 cantos, which celebrates in animated and sublime, though occasionally in unharmonious verse, the conquest of Casan by Ivan Vassilevitch II.

KHILHOF, Prince, a Russian nobleman, ambassador to Charles XII. of Sweden, and ungenerously thrown into prison when that monarch undertook war against Russia. After 18 years' confinement he died in the prison of Westeras, just as he was going to be restored to liberty 1718. During his imprisonment he wrote the Kernel of the Russian History, in seven books, to his own times, which though an abridgment possesses considerable merit, and was published in 1770, by Muller, in 8vo.

KIDDER, Richard, a learned prelate, born in Suffolk, or as Wood says in Sussex. In 1649 he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and obtained from that society the living of Stanground, Huntingdonshire, from which he was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity. He however, afterwards, conformed and obtained from lord Essex the rectory of Raine in Essex, and in 1674 the living of St. Martin Outwich, London. In 1681 he was made prebendary of Norwich, and in 1698 dean of Peterborough. On the deprivation of Ken for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to William and Mary, 1691, he was appointed in his place to the see of Bath and Wells. He was unfortunately killed in his bed with his lady by the fall of a stack of chimnies in his palace at Wells in the great storm which happened in the night between the 26th and 27th Nov. 1703. He was privately buried in the cathedral. Dr. Kidder was an elegant and learned writer, and a most able divine. His publications were sermons preached at Boyle's lectures, and inserted in "Demonstration of the Messiah," in three parts—a commentary on the five books of Moses, 2 vols. 8vo. besides some controversial tracts.

KIEN-LONG, emperor of China, died at the end of the 18th century after a reign of 60 years, at the age of 90. When lord Macartney appeared at his court, he gave him some of his verses to be presented to the English king. In his character he appeared to be a popular, sensible, and benevolent monarch.

KILBYE, Richard, a native of Radcliffe, Leicestershire, was fellow of Lincoln college, Oxford, 1577, and was elected rector in 1590. He was afterwards Hebrew professor in the university and obtained a prebend in Lincoln cathedral, and was one of the translators of the present bible. He was also author of some sermons, and died 1620.

KILLIGREW, Catherine, daughter of sir Anthony Cook, was born about 1550 at Giddy-hall, Essex, and married Mr. Henry Killigrew, who for his services as ambassador was knighted. To a great genius she joined an extensive knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, and wrote verses with elegance. She died about 1600.

KILLIGREW, William, son of sir Robert Killigrew, was born at Hanworth, Middlesex, 1605, and after three years' residence at St. John's college, Oxford, he travelled abroad. At his return he was appointed governor of Pendenis castle and Falmouth haven, Cornwall, and gentleman-usher of the privy chamber to Charles I. He suffered severely during the civil wars, for his attachment to the royal cause, but at the restoration he was again taken into favor and made vice-chamberlain to the king, an office in which he continued 22 years. He died 1693 and was buried in Westminster-abbey. He wrote four plays, the Siege of Urbin, Selindra, Ormasdes, or Love and Friendship, Pandora, published at Oxford 1666, in folio, besides Midnight and Daily Thoughts in prose and verse, 8vo.—The Artless Midnight Thoughts of a Gentleman at Court, 8vo.

KILLIGREW, Thomas, brother to the preceding, page to Charles I. and groom of the chamber to Charles II. was born 1611. He visited Spain, France and Italy, and for some time was English resident at Venice. He wrote 11 plays, collected into one folio volume, 1664, besides other things. He was twice married, and died 1682, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. He was a man of great wit, and in his facetious company Charles II. passed many a vacant hour, in the highest familiarity. Though remarkably jocular in conversation, his writings display little of that vein of humor.

KILLIGREW, Henry, D.D., brother to the preceding, was born 1612. He was of Christ church, Oxford, and then became chaplain in the king's army, and in 1642 was made chaplain to the duke of York and prebendary of Westminster. After suffering during the civil war he was at the restoration reinstated in his prebend, and made master of the Savoy hospital, and rector of Wheatthorpe, Hertfordshire. He wrote at the age of 17 the Conspiracy, a tragedy, afterwards altered into Pallantus and Eudora 1652. He also published some sermons, and died about 1690.

KILLIGREW, Anne, called by Wood "a grace for beauty, and a muse for wit," was daughter of Henry just mentioned. To a highly finished education she added great skill in painting, and drew the picture of the duke of York and of the duchess to whom she was maid of honor. This excellent woman, admired for piety and benevolence as well as learning, died of the small pox, June 1685, and she had the felicity of having her merits celebrated by the energetic muse of Dryden. In 1686 appeared her "poems" in 4to.

KILWARDEN, Arthur Wolfe, lord, an Irish judge. Though born of an obscure family, he received a liberal education, and after some residence at Trinity college, Dublin, he was called to the bar 1766. His abilities gradually recommended him, he became king's counsel, was chosen member of parliament, and in 1737 made solicitor general, and in 1789 attorney general. The death of lord Clonmel opened his way to the dignity of chief justice of the king's bench in which high office all his measures were conducted with wisdom, integrity and justice. The moderation and impartiality of his public life, and his private virtues, however were not proof against the violence of a blood-thirsty mob. During a popular insurrection in the streets of Dublin, he was met by an armed multitude, as he returned from the country, and his carriage was immediately surrounded by the ferocious rabble, and he and his nephew the Rev. Richard Wolfe were dragged away and piked to death in Thomas street, Dublin, 23d July, 1803. His daughter who was with him in the coach was spared by the murderers, one of whom courteously protected her and conveyed her to a place of safety. The last words of the expiring judge were that no violent punishment should be inflicted on his murderers, but that they might be impartially tried by the law.

KIMBER, Isaac, a native of Wantage, Berks, known as a dissenting divine, and eminent as the author of the Life of Oliver Cromwell, 8vo.—History of England, 4 vols. 8vo.—Life of Bishop Beveridge, prefixed to his works—Twenty posthumous sermons, &c. He was also for some years engaged in the London Magazine, and died in London 1758, aged 66.

KIMCHI, David, a Jewish Rabbi at the beginning of the 15th century, born in Spain. His commentary on the Old Testament is much valued, as well as his Hebrew dictionary, best edited 1506, folio—and Grammar, 1545. He was in consequence of his learning and eloquence, appointed 1232 to settle the disputes between the synagogues of France and Spain, about the works of Maimonides. His brothers Joseph and Moses were likewise eminent in literature.

KINASTON, Francis, son of sir Edward, was born in Shropshire, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford. He took his master's degree at Cambridge, and when introduced at court was knighted. He translated into Latin Chaucer's Troilus and Cressida, and also published in 1636 the constitutions of the Museum Minervæ, a learned society, of which he was the first president. He died 1642.

KING, John, an English prelate, born at Wornall, Bucks, 1559, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. He became chaplain to queen Elizabeth, dean of his college 1605, and bishop of London 1611. He died 30th March 1621. He was an eloquent speaker in the star chamber, according to Coke, and so eminent as a preacher, that king James called him the king of preachers. He published lectures on Jonah, besides sermons.

KING, Henry, son of the preceding, was born at Wornall, Jan. 1591, and educated partly at Thame school, and Westminster, and admitted student of Christ church 1608. He was chaplain to James I. and was made archdeacon of Colchester, eanon of Christ church, and in 1638 dean of Rochester, and 1641 bishop of Chichester. Though suspected with truth of puritanical principles, he was treated with great harshness during the civil wars. At the restoration he recovered his bishopric, and died Oct. 1669, universally esteemed as the epitome of all honors and virtues. He published sermons—Exposition of the Lord's Prayer—the Psalms of David turned into metre—poems, elegies, sonnets, &c.—Latin and Greek poems.

KING, Edward, a promising young man, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge, 1633. He was soon after drowned as he was passing from Chester to Ireland, a melancholy circumstance, which gave birth to the beautiful poem of Lycidas, by his friend Milton. A collection of his poems has been published, which does credit to his abilities as a favorite of Apollo.

KING, William, L.L.D., a humorous English writer, born in London, 1663, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, where he was student. In 1688, he appeared before the public as the defender of Wickliffe against the calumnies of Varillas, in a manner strongly expressive of his wit and learning; and at the same time he determined to follow the law as his profession. In 1694, his Animadversion on Molesworth's pretended Account of Denmark, which had offended the Danes, was so much approved, that he was appointed secretary to the princess Anne of Denmark. In 1697, the literary world was engaged in the controversy about the epistles of Phalaris, and Dr. King published on the occasion, two letters, addressed to Mr. Boyle, for which he was severely handled by Dr. Bently. Though fully qualified to shine as an advocate, as he evinced in the case of lord Anglesea's divorce, yet he shrunk from the laborious fatigues of active business, better pleased with the character of a polite writer, whose powers were occasionally called into action by a spirit of satire, or the wish to amuse by facetious sallies. By degrees, however, a comfortable independence was dissipated in pleasure and indolence; and Dr. King was, by the interest of his friends, lords Rochester and Pembroke, appointed, about 1702, judge of the high court of the admiralty in Ireland, sole commissioner of prizes, keeper of the records in Birmingham tower, and vicar-general to the primate. These honorable and lucrative offices, however, could not fix the giddy attention of Dr. King; he preferred wit and the muses to active life and independence, and resigned all his employments, and returned to London about 1708. In 1710, he was engaged with Swift, Oldsworth, Mrs. Manley, and others, in the publication of the Examiner, in vindication of the queen's measures, and of the new ministry; and at the trial of Sacheverell, he employed his pen in the happiest vein of satire against the Whigs. He died 25th Dec. 1712. This singular man, though apparently chargeable with levity, was in his real character, virtuous and religious, in his dealings conscientious, and though fond of trifles, entertaining in his conversation, sincere and benevolent in his disposition, and so tender hearted that tears would often flow profusely on the least moving occasion. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote, Historical Account of Heathen Gods and Heroes, for the use of Westminster school—the Life of M. A. Antoninus, from Madame Dacier—Dialogues of the Dead—a Journey to London, after the manner of Lister—the Transactioneer—the Art of Love—the Art of Cookery—Rufinus,—Britain's Palladium. His original works in verse and prose were published, 3 vols. 8vo. 1776.

KING, Edward, a learned antiquary, was born in Norfolk, in 1735. He was educated at Clarehall, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar, and became recorder of Lynn. In 1767, he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1770, a member of that of Antiquaries, of which last he became president, on the death of dean Milles, in 1784; but being set aside at the next election, he withdrew from the society. He died April 16, 1807. Mr. King published—1. An Essay on the English Constitution. 2. Hymns to the Supreme Being. 3. Proposals for a Marine school. 4. Morsels of Criticism, 4to. and 3 vols. 8vo. 5. Considerations on the National Debt. 6. Remarks concerning Stones said to have fallen from the Clouds, 4to. 7.

Vestiges of Oxford Castle, fol. 8. Munimenta Antiqua, 3 vols. fol. 9. Remarks on the Signs of the Times, 4to. This was answered by bishop Horsley.

KING, William, archbishop of Dublin, was born at Antrim, 1st Dec. 1650, and educated at the school of Dungannon, after which he entered at Trinity college, Dublin. He was patronised by archbishop Parker, of Tuam, and soon distinguished himself by his abilities as a writer in defence of the protestant cause in Ireland. He entered the lists against Manly, dean of Londonderry, who had lately become a convert to the catholic faith, and who vindicated his conduct in a pamphlet. His exertions in this controversy appeared so meritorious, that he was made dean of St. Patrick, and became a most active and indefatigable supporter of the revolution, though exposed to personal danger and constant persecution in consequence of the temporary success of the catholics, and of the cause of James II. in Ireland. After the battle of the Boyne, he was promoted to the see of Derry. In 1691, he published, "the State of the Protestants in Ireland, under James II." and afterwards applied himself sedulously to promote union and concord in his diocese. In 1702, appeared, in 4to. his celebrated work, "De Origine Mali," in which he supports that the evils which exist in the world, are not inconsistent with the goodness of God. This able performance, though well received at home, excited the censure of foreign critics, and among others was opposed by Bayle and Leibnitz. The work was translated into English by Edm. Law, afterwards bishop of Carlisle, with notes, and a refutation of the several opinions which militated against the doctrine of the author. The third edition of the translation, 2 vols. 8vo. appeared 1739. In 1702, he was translated to the see of Dublin, and at three different times was one of the lords justices of Ireland. He died at Dublin, 8th May, 1729. His other works were, a Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God, 1694, which engaged him in a controversy with Boyce, one of the dissenters of his diocese, and sermons.

KING, Peter, chancellor of England, was born at Exeter, 1669. His father, who was a grocer and salter, intended him for an assistant in his business; but the son, after being engaged some years in the shop, at last broke from the obscurity of an humble trade. He had devoted his leisure hours to laborious study, and he was advised by his maternal uncle, Mr. Locke, who left him half his library at his death, to improve himself further by studying at Leyden, and afterwards he entered at the Inner Temple. Here his superior abilities and his unceasing application raised him soon to eminence, and after distinguishing himself at the bar, he obtained a seat in the House of Commons in 1699, for Beeralston, Devon. But though raised to consequence by the practice of the law, he did not forget literary pursuits; his "Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, and Unity, of the Primitive Church," appeared in 1692; and in 1702, he published the History of the Apostles' Creed, with critical observations on its several articles, two works of great merit and extensive popularity. In 1708, he was made recorder of London, and knighted by queen Anne: the next year he was one of the managers of the House of Commons in the affair of Sacheverell; and at the accession of George I. he was raised to the office of chief justice of the Common Pleas. In 1725, he was created a peer, and immediately succeeded lord Macclesfield as lord chancellor. Though his abilities were great, yet it is said, the public expectation was disappointed by his conduct in chancery, as more of his decrees were repealed by the lords than had been known for the short time he presided in the court of equity. He resigned the seals in 1733; and, weakened by a paralytic disorder, died July 22, 1734.

KING, William, an English writer, son of the Rev. Peregrine King, was born at Stepney, Middlesex, 1685. He was educated at Salisbury, and Balliol college, Oxford; and in 1713, was made principal of St. Mary hall, by lord Arran, the chancellor to whom he was secretary. In 1722, he resigned his headship upon becoming candidate to represent the university, but was defeated by Dr. Clarke, and then went to Ireland. While in that kingdom, he wrote his "Toast," an epic poem, conveying much satire, which he did not publish, but dispersed among his friends. At the dedication of the Radcliffe library in 1749, he spoke a Latin oration in the Oxford theatre, and was universally applauded, and deserved the high encomiums of T. Warton, in his Triumphs of Isis. Dr. King, in his political principles, was a strenuous tory, and not much affected to the Hanoverian succession; and in those times of violent party, he did not escape the abuse of the hirelings of ministry. He published about 1754, an "Apology," in 4to. in which he boldly attacked his adversaries, and refuted their frivolous and malevolent accusations. He published the first five volumes of South's sermons, and was esteemed for his wit and learning, and for great independence of spirit. He died 1763.

KING, sir Edmund, a surgeon and chemist, esteemed by Charles II. who is said to have spent much time in his laboratory. He attended the king in his last illness, and was ordered 1000*l.* by the privy council, which he never received. Some of his papers on ants, on the transfusing of blood from a calf to a sheep, and on animalcules in pepper, are found in the philosophical transactions. The time of his death is unknown.

KING, John Glen, D.D., a native of Norfolk, educated at Cains college, Cambridge. He was chaplain to the English factory at Petersburg, and was appointed medalist to the empress of Russia, at whose request he undertook a work on medals, but died 1737, before its completion. He published, the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church, with an account of its Doctrines, Worship, and Discipline—Observations on the Climate of Russia, with a View of the Flying Mountains, near Petersburg—Observations on the Barberini Vase.

KING, Rufus, minister of the United States to Great Britain, graduated at Harvard college, 1777. In 1778, he was an aid to Sullivan in an expedition against the British in Rhode Island. He studied law with Mr. Parsons at Newburyport, and was admitted to practice in 1780. He was a representative from Newburyport in the legislature. In 1784, the legislature appointed him a delegate in congress. In 1787, he was selected as a delegate from Massachusetts to the convention called for devising a constitution for the United States. He was afterwards a member of the convention of Massachusetts for adopting the constitution. Having removed to New York he was elected a senator from that state in 1789. During the violent discussions, respecting the British treaty in 1794, he co-operated with others in its defence. Of the papers concerning this treaty, with the signature of Camillus, usually ascribed to Hamilton, all the numbers, excepting the ten first, were written by him. He was one of those who opposed with success Mr. Gallatin's right to a seat in the senate.

In 1796, he was appointed by Washington minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain. He returned to America in 1803, and lived in retirement till 1812, when he completely changed sides in politics, that is abandoned his old friends and joined his old enemies, and those last have made it a matter of record, that he now came forward in support of his country. In consequence of his patriotic spirit, thus manifested, the democratic legislature of New York appointed him in 1813, a senator of the United States. His speech concerning the conduct of the enemy, in the destruction of the city of Washington, gained him great honor with his new friends. In 1825, he was again appointed minister to England. During his passage he was attacked by a disease, often the consequence of a voyage, which prevented him from entering upon the active discharge of his duties. After remaining abroad a year without amendment, he returned to America. He died 1827, aged 72.

KINSEY, James, LL.D., was a delegate from New-Jersey to the first congress in 1774, but resigned his seat in November of the following year. He was active in the cause of the revolution, and a member of the committee of correspondence for Burlington county. In November, 1789, he was appointed chief justice of New-Jersey, and died at Burlington, January 4th, 1802, aged 70.

KIPPIS, Andrew, D.D., eminent as a biographer, was born in 1725, at Nottingham, and educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. He first settled as a dissenting teacher at Boston, Lincolnshire, 1746, and four years after removed to Dorking, Surrey, and in 1753, became the minister of the congregation of Princes street, Westminster. In 1763, he engaged as philological tutor in Coward's academy, for the education of dissenting ministers, and afterwards acquired such eminence as a writer, that he was admitted fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies in London. Dr. Kippis died 1795. The best known of his works is the Biographia Britannica, of which he began to publish a new edition in 1777, and of which five volumes appeared, and a sixth was nearly ready for the press before his death. He published, besides, a Vindication of Protestant Dissenting Ministers in their Application to Parliament, 1773, which created a controversy, though in amicable terms, between him and Dean Tucker—the Life of Captain Cook, 4to. 1788—the Life of Dr. Lardner prefixed to the edition of his works, 1788—several sermons, and tracts: and he was also concerned for some years in the Monthly Review, and afterwards in the Library, a periodical work in 1761, which did not succeed; and he also wrote the History of Knowledge, &c. which so much recommended the sale of the new Annual Register. The style of Dr. Kippis was clear, elegant, and pleasing, and from his great application and extensive reading, he was a man of intelligence, learning, and judgment.

KIRCH, Mary Margaret, a native of Leipsic, daughter of Matthias Winkelman a Lutheran divine. She married in 1692 Godfrey Kirch, an astronomer of eminence of Luben in Lower Lusatia, who when appointed royal astronomer in 1700 in the newly established academy of sciences at Berlin, found in his wife an intelligent assistant, and an able calculator. She discovered in 1702 a comet, on which she and her husband published some observations, and in 1707 she observed that remarkable aurora borealis which the astronomers of Europe, and particularly the Paris academy of sciences noticed in their memoirs. The husband died 1710, and the following year his wife published a Dis- course on the approaching conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn. This respectable woman equally eminent for her private virtues died at Berlin 1720, aged 50. Her son Christian Frederic acquired some celebrity by his writings, and as astronomer to the Berlin academy of sciences, and died there 1740, aged 46.

KIRCHER, Athanasius, a Jesuit, born 1601, at Fulda, in Germany, taught at Wirtzburg, in Franconia, and then went to settle in the Jesuits' college at Avignon, 1635, and from thence passed to Rome, where he was professor of mathematics and Hebrew. He died at Rome 1680. His works are very numerous, but rather curious than useful, amounting to 22 vols. folio. 11 in 4to. and 3 in 8vo. He is described as ridiculously fond of hieroglyphical characters and inscriptions. The chief of his works are Œdipus Ægyptiacus, 4 vols. fol.—Ars Magnesia—Lingua Ægyptiaca Restituta—Mundus Subterraneus,—Organon Mathematicum,—and Ars Magna Sciendi.

KIRCHER, Conrad, of Augsburg, is known by his Greek Concordance of the Old Testament, Frankfurt 1602, containing the Hebrew words in alphabetical order, with the corresponding Greek words placed under.

KIRCHMAN, N. an eminent professor of philosophy at Petersburg, who was unfortunately killed by a ball of fire, while he was making experiments on electricity, and endeavoring to draw down the electric fluid from the clouds, 6th Aug. 1758.

KIRCHMAYER, John Gaspar, professor of logic at Wittenberg, was born at Uffenheim in Franconia, and died 1700, aged 65. He was a learned man, and published some valuable commentaries on Corn. Nepos, Tacitus, Cicero, Sallust, and Pliny—Orations and Poems—and a treatise de Balsamo.

KIRKLAND, Thomas, a physician of eminence, who died at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, 1798, aged 77. He was member of the medical societies of Edinburgh and London, and acquired some celebrity as an intelligent writer and a popular practitioner. He wrote an inquiry into the State of Medical Surgery, 2 vols. 8vo.—Observations on Pott's Remarks on Fractures—Commentary on Apoplectic and Paralytic Affections, 8vo.—treatise on Child-bed Fevers, 8vo.—Thoughts on Amputation.

KIRSTENIUS, Peter, professor of physic at Upsal, and in the service of queen Christina, was born at Breslaw in Silesia, 25th Dec. 1577. He applied himself assiduously to literature, and to botany and philosophy, and after studying for 14 years at Leipsic, Wittemberg, and Jena, he visited the Low Countries and France, and afterwards extended his travels to Italy, Greece, and Asia. He had for some time the management of the school, and of the university of Breslaw, but he resigned it for the practice of physic, and the study of Arabic. He accompanied Oxenstiern to Sweden, and was in 1636 chosen professor of physic at Upsal, but he died 18th April 1640. He was, according to his epitaph, well acquainted with 26 languages. His principal works are Grammatica Arabica—Tria Specimina, Decas, Sacra,—Vite quatuor Evangelicarum ex antiquissimo Codice M. S. Arabicoeru tæ folio.—Note in S. Matthæum.

KIRWAN, Richard, a distinguished modern writer on chemistry, geology and the kindred sciences. He was a native of the county of Galway in Ireland, and was educated at the university of Dublin, where he took the degree of LL.D. He devoted himself with great ardor to chemical and mineralogical researches, and became a member of the Royal Irish academy, and also a fellow of the Royal Society.

He published in the philosophical Transactions for 1781, 1782, and 1783, "Experiments and Observations on the Specific Gravities and Attractive Powers of various Saline Substances;" which important subject he farther prosecuted in the Philosophical Transactions for 1785. In 1784 appeared his "Elements of Mineralogy," 2 vols. 8vo, which was translated into German by Crell, and subsequently republished with additions and improvements. In 1787 he published an "Essay on Phlogiston and the constitution of Acids," designed as a defence of the theory of chemistry advanced by Dr. Priestley. This very ingenious production was translated into French by the advocates for the anti-phlogistic hypothesis, and published with animadversions on the rival system, which made a convert of Dr. Kirwan, whose rejection of the principles he had so ably supported, had a considerable influence in producing the revolution which took place in chemicl science. He produced, besides the foregoing works, "An Estimate of the Temperature of different Latitudes," 1787, 8vo; a treatise on the Analysis of Mineral Waters, 8vo; and another on Logic, 2 vols 8vo; to which, may be added, various communications to the learned societies to which he belonged. At Dublin he founded an association for the express purpose of cultivating mineralogy; and as a geologist he distinguished himself by advocating what has been called the Neptunian theory of the earth, in opposition to that of Dr. James Hutton. His death occurred in 1812.

KIRWAN, Walter Blake, an Irish divine, eminent for his popularity as a preacher. He was born at Galway in 1754, and educated at the English Catholic college of St. Omers, whence he removed to Louvain, where he took priest's orders, and became professor of philosophy. In 1778 he was appointed chaplain to the Neapolitan embassy in London, and attained some fame by his exertions in the pulpit. In 1787 he resolved to conform to the establishment, and preached to his first protestant congregation in St. Peter's church, Dublin. His skill in the delivery of charity sermons was so great, that in 1788 the governors of the general daily schools of several parishes in Dublin entered into a resolution, "That from the effects produced by the sermons of the Rev. Walter Blake Kirwan, from the pulpit, his officiating in this metropolis was considered a peculiar national advantage, and that vestries should be called to consider the most effectual method to secure to the city an instrument, under providence, of so much public benefit." In the same year he was preferred to the prebendary of Howth, and to the rectory of St. Nicholas, Dublin, and finally presented to the deanery of Killala. Wonders are told of his attraction as a preacher, and it was often necessary to keep off the crowds from the churches in which he preached by guards and palisadoes. He died exhausted by his labors, October 27, 1805, leaving a widow with two sons and two daughters, to the first and last of whom was granted a pension of 300*l.* per annum. In 1814 a volume of his sermons was published, which is the only work of his which reached the press.

KITCHENER, William, a physician, but more celebrated as a gastronomist and author, was born, between 1770 and 1780, in Beaufort Buildings, and was the son of a coal-merchant, who left him a large fortune. His education he received at Eton. He died February 26, 1827. Kitchener was not a little eccentric, but was amiable and kind-hearted. Of his works 'The Cook's Oracle is the most popular. Among his other productions are, 'The Art of Invigorating and Prolonging Life; 'The Traveller's Oracle; 'The Theory of the Eyes; Observations on Vocal Music; and The Loyal and National Songs of England.

KLAPROTH, Martin Henry Von, professor of chemistry at Berlin, died there Jan. 1, 1817, at a very advanced age, having been a distinguished writer on that science above forty years. He was the discoverer of uranium, the zirconia, and Mellitic acid. He also made interesting experiments on copal, and completed the discovery of tellurium and titanium. His works in German make six volumes octavo.

KLEBER, I. B. a celebrated French general, born at Strasburg 1750. He was early devoted to architecture, and to improve his talents he was sent to Paris to refine his taste by the instruction of the well-known Chalgrin. Here by accident he saw some foreigners insulted in a coffee-house, and with noble indignation he defended them against their opponents, and thus secure in their gratitude and friendship he was prevailed to accompany them to Munich. In this new situation he obtained from Kaunitz, the son of the imperial prime minister, a lieutenancy in his regiment, but after eight years of honorable service in the Austrian army, he returned to France. He was now appointed inspector of the public buildings of Upper Alsace by Galaisiere, and for six years devoted himself to the peaceful labors of his profession. The French revolution recalled him to a military life and he obtained from Wimpfen the place of adjutant major in Custine's army. For his great and meritorious services at the taking of Mayence he was raised to the rank of general of brigade; but when faction solicited enemies to Custine, whom the revolutionary tyrants already doomed to the scaffold, Kleber had the courage not only not to accuse him, but to speak favorably of his conduct. In la Vendee he directed the attack of the island of Noirmontier, but the cruelties exercised on the innocent royalists were too shocking for his benevolent mind; he solicited his recall, and was permitted to go to the army of the North. The defeat of the Austrians at Merber-le-Chateau, and at Marehennes, was rapidly followed by the fall of Mons, the evacuation of Louvaine, and the siege of Maestricht, which in 10 days opened its gates to the conqueror. These victories, followed by the submission of Dusseldorf, of Frankfort, and the battle of Butzbach, instead, however, of serving the gallant Kleber, rendered him suspected to the directory, and he retired in discontent to the solitude of a country house near Paris. Here he employed himself in digesting memoirs of his military life, when Bonaparte going to Egypt called him away to follow his standard and share his glories. At the siege of Alexandria, as he was scaling the walls, he was wounded on the head, but did not retire from the field of danger. When Bonaparte advanced against Cairo he left his faithful friend commander in Alexandria, and when he afterwards quitted Egypt to return to Europe he appointed him his successor with full powers. Though victorious on all sides, Kleber listened to a proposal of peace, and he signed the treaty of El-Arisch with sir Sidney Smith, which permitted the French to return with their arms and baggage to Europe. This armistice was not approved by the English government, and after he had delivered some of his fortresses into the hands of the Turks, Kleber was informed by lord Keith that the treaty of El-Arisch was void. Undismayed at his situation, the general with great presence of mind provided against every imminent danger; he recovered the strong holds which had been given up, and he marched at last to the attack of a Turkish army at the obelisk of Heliopolis, and defeated them with great slaughter, though ten times more numerous than his own soldiers. After this victory he subdued the spirit of insurrection which had burst forth at Cairo, and in other places, and he now formed plans for the peaceful government of the country, and for a regular intercourse between the various towns of Egypt, when he was suddenly attacked, while walking in his garden, by Solyma, a Turk, who despatched him with four blows with a dagger, 1800. In his appearance Kleber was pleasing and comely, his stature was six feet, well proportioned; his features were mild, but his eyes were expressive, and in the field of battle his voice, otherwise soft and melodious, spoke with the terror of thunder.

KLEIST, Ewald Christian de, a native of Zeblin in Pomerania, distinguished as an officer in the Prussian service, and as a poet. The battle of Kunnersdorff between the Russians and Prussians, Aug. 1759, proved fatal to him as he was, as major, leading his men of Haussen's regiment into the thickest of the fight. His idyls, after the manner of Gesner, are much admired for their elegance and simplicity, and his moral treatises also possess merit. He wrote besides reflections on the Military Art, 1759.

KLINT, Adrian, a Dutch historian and juridical writer. He was born at Dort in 1735, and studied at Utrecht, where he became a proficient in ancient literature. He was employed as a teacher in several schools, and at length was made rector of that of Middlebury, where he obtained a professorship in 1776. Three years after he was nominated professor of archæology, and Dutch history and diplomacy at Leyden. His political opinions occasioned his removal from the chair in 1795, notwithstanding which he continued his lectures and literary labors till 1802, when he was restored to his office. In 1826 he was constituted professor of statistics under the regal government. His death took place January 12, 1807, owing to the destruction of his house from the explosion of a boat laden with gunpowder, which was moored to the quay near which he resided. Among his principal productions is his history of the political affairs of Holland to 1795, 5 vols. 8vo.

KLOPSTOCK, Frederic Theophilus, was born at Quedlenburg in 1724. After a liberal education at his native place, he was sent to study theology at Jena, where he wrote a great part of his "Messiah," which he published in 1747 at Leipsic. Though this poem was censured by some, it was admired by more; and Bodmer, with the Swiss in general, were loud in its praises. Klopstock was invited into that country, from whence he was called to Copenhagen by the most flattering promises, which were amply fulfilled. In 1771 he went to reside at Hamburg, as Danish legate, and counsellor of the Margrave of Baden, who allowed him a pension. He died there March 14, 1803. The character of Klopstock as a writer is that of a poet of fervid imagination; but though rich in imagery, and lofty in sentiment, he is frequently obscure, perplexed, and turgid. His wife was an amiable and very ingenious woman. She corresponded in English with Richardson the novelist.

KNAPP, Francis, a poet, was educated at Oxford, and in America lived in Watertown Massachusetts. In 1717 he wrote a poetical address, congratulating Pope on his Windsor forest, in the best style, then exhibited in our country. He was born in 1672.

KNELLER, Sir Godfrey, LL.D. an eminent painter, born at Lubec 1648. He was educated at Leyden and was intended for the military profession, but his genius directed him to the drawing of figures; and after making a rapid progress in the art, under the instruction of Rembrandt at Amsterdam, he went to Rome. Here he studied under Carlo Marat and Bernini, and then went to Venice, and afterwards came to England, where his reputation quickly recommended him to the notice of Charles II. and of the court. He continued in favor with the succeeding monarchs, and acquired such celebrity that he drew no less than 10 crowned heads besides electors and princes. William III. was particularly sensible of his abilities, he knighted him, and made him a gentleman of his privy chamber, and George I. honored him with the title of baronet. He was also created a nobleman and knight of the holy Roman empire by Leopold. Kneller deserved these honors: no painter surpassed him in the outline and graceful disposal of his figures, and his likenesses were always considered as remarkably striking, though expressed in a flattering manner. Kneller honored by princes, and flattered by poets and wits, was not a little ostentatious of his consequence, he lived in great splendor at his house at Whitten near Hampton court, but though accused of vanity, his manners are represented as blameless. He died Oct. 27th, 1723.

KNIGHT, Richard Payne, a man of fortune, talent, and taste, was born in 1748; represented Ludlow in parliament during several sessions; and died in 1824. He left his Collection of bronzes, medals, pictures, and drawings, worth £ 50,000, to the British Museum. Among his works are, An Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus; Analytical Essay on the Greek Alphabet; Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste; The Landscape, a didactic poem; and The Progress of Civil Society, a poem; the last of which was ridiculed in the Anti-Jacobin.

KNIGHT, Samuel, a native of London, educated at St. Paul's school and Trinity college, Cambridge. He held two livings, and was prebendary of Ely, and arch-deacon of Berks, and also chaplain to George II. He published the lives of Colet, and of Erasmus, 8vo. and died 16th Dec. 1746, aged 72, and was buried in his church at Bluntisham, Huntingdonshire.

KNOLLES, Richard, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Oxford. After being some time fellow of Lincoln college, he was elected master of Sandwich school, where he became celebrated as a public teacher, and where he died 1610. He wrote Grammaticæ Latinæ, Græcæ, & Hebraicæ Compendium—History of the Turks, 1610, folio, a valuable book, often reprinted and improved, especially by Ricaut, 1680, folio—the Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings and Emperors, to 1610, and a brief Discourse of the Greatness of the Turkish empire.

KNOLLIS, Francis, an English statesman. He was born at Grays, Oxfordshire, and educated at Oxford, and when introduced at the court of Edward VI. he was distinguished for his zeal in the cause of reformation. During Mary's reign, he retired to the continent, but on Elizabeth's accession, he obtained the office of vice-chamberlain of the household, and of privy counsellor, and afterwards was made treasurer of the household, and knight of the garter. His abilities were employed on various occasions by the court, and he was one of those commissioners who sat at the trial of the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots. He was author of a treatise against the Usurpation of Papal Bishops, 1608, 8vo. and a General Survey of the Isle of Wight, never printed, and he died 1596.

KNOTT, Edward, a jesuit, born at Pegsworth, near Morpeth, Northumberland. His real name was Matthias Wilson, and he entered among the jesuits, 1606, and was professor of divinity in the English college at Rome. He was afterwards provincial of England, and died in London, 4th Jan. 1655-6, aged 75, and was buried at St. Pancras. He was a great disciplinarian, and possessed of extensive learning. His writings against the protestants, gave rise to Chillingworth's famous book, called the Religion of Protestants.

KNOWLES, Thomas, D.D., a native of Ely, educated at Ely school, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was made lecturer of Bury St. Edmund's, and prebendary of Ely cathedral, and died at Bury, 1802. He was an able divine, and wrote the Scripture Doctrine of the Existence and Attributes of a God, 12 sermons, 8vo.—Answer to Bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit—Lord Hervey's, and Dr. Middleton's Letters on the Roman Senate—Dialogue on the Test Act—Observations on the Tithe Bill—Primitive Christianity, in Defence of the Trinity—Advice to a young Divine, in six Letters—the Passion, a sermon—Observations on the divine Mission of Moses—On Charity and Sunday Schools—A discourse on Confirmation.

KNOWLTON, Thomas, an English botanist. He was in the service of Dr. Sherrard, and afterwards of lord Burlington, at Lanesborough, Yorkshire, and died 1782, aged 90. His observations on the situation of the ancient Delgovicia, and on two men of extraordinary size, and on large deers' horns found in Yorkshire, appeared in the philosophical transactions, in letters to Mr. Catesby. He also discovered in Wallingfemere, the moor balls, or globe conferva, called by Linnæus, Conferva Ægagrophila.

KNOX, John, the famous reformer of Scotland, was born 1505, at Giffard, East Lothian, and educated at the university of St. Andrews, under the celebrated John Major. He applied himself sedulously to the study of divinity, but the conversation of Wishart, the English commissioner in Scotland, as well as the writings of Jerome and Austin, opened his mind to the gross impositions of popery. He embraced publicly the tenets of the protestants, and then retired from persecution, into Germany, but some time after returned to St. Andrew's. Here he boldly began to preach against the pope, and afterwards passed over to England, where he became chaplain to Edward VI. and might have obtained a bishopric, had he not been an enemy to the liturgy and the established form of episcopacy. At the accession of Mary, he went over to the continent, and after visiting Frankfort and Geneva, and profiting by the counsels of Calvin, he determined to return to Scotland, 1555. The reformation was already gaining ground, even in the absence of her able supporter, and Knox by his eloquence, and his manly undaunted appeals to the leading men of the country, increased the number of his converts. In 1556 he again visited Geneva, but in his absence his enemies accused him of heresy, pronounced sentence of death against him, and burnt him in effigy at Edinburgh. He heard of the violence of his persecutors, and wrote from Geneva, "An Appellation against the unjust sentence pronounced against him," and also the "First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women," directed against the tyrannical measures of Mary of England, and of Mary of Lorraine, queen regent of Scotland. In 1559, he again returned to Scotland, and began effectually to establish the reformation. The kingdom was divided into 12 districts, and Edinburgh as the most important was intrusted to Knox. Regardless of the power of the queen, he publicly declared from the pulpit, that the mass established in her chapel was more frightful than 10,000 enemies, and when honored with a conference with his royal mistress, he offended her with the freedom and boldness of his address, and violently inveighed against her marrying the popish earl of Darnley. Notwithstanding these measures so hostile to the government, Knox was respected in his person, and in 1567 he preached the sermon at the coronation of James VI. He met however with some opposition from his followers, who wished to establish in his church a sort of episcopacy, which proved very repugnant to his feelings, and was rejected with great indignation. He died Nov. 24, 1572. His publications are not numerous, though it is to be lamented that he appeared as the defender of the violent and atrocious measures pursued at Edinburgh, and especially of the murder of cardinal Beaton, once his persecutor. His History of the Reformation in Scotland was published after his death, and the fourth edition of it in folio, 1732, contains all his other pieces.

KNOX, Hugh, D.D., was a native of Ireland, and born about the year 1730. He came to America in early life, and was employed for several years in Pennsylvania, and Maryland, in the instruction of youth; after which he entered the college of New-Jersey, then located at Newark, under the presidency of Mr. Burr, and received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1754. He was a popular minister in the presbyterian church, and early in life settled in the Island of St. Croix, where he spent the remainder of his days, honored and useful, and died at a very advanced age. He was a man of excellent talents, and of distinguished literary and theological attainments, as a testimony of which, he received from the university of Glasgow the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He made a number of publications, which are exceedingly creditable to his memory. They are chiefly "Sermons on Select Subjects."

KNOX, Henry, a major general in the army of the United States, was born in Boston, 1750. Before hostilities between America and Great Britain commenced in the revolutionary war, he discovered an uncommon zeal in the cause of liberty. Being placed at the head of an independent company in Boston, he exhibited in this station a skill in discipline, which presaged his future eminence. It was with the unanimous request of all the officers of artillery, that he was intrusted with the command in that department. When the corps of artillery in 1776 was increased to three regiments, the command was given to Knox, who was promoted to the rank of brigadier general. He was actively engaged during the whole contest. After the capture of Cornwallis in 1781, he received the commission of major general, having distinguished himself in the siege, at the head of the artillery. Previously to the adoption of the present constitution of the United States, he succeeded general Lincoln as secretary at war in March 1785; and after its adoption, Washington appointed him to the same office. He continued to fill this department till the close of the year 1794, when he resigned it. In his letter to the president he says, "after having served my country near twenty years, the greater portion of the time under your immediate auspices, it is with extreme reluctance, I find myself constrained to withdraw from so honorable a situation. But the natural and powerful claims of a numerous family will no longer permit me to neglect their essential interests. In whatever situation I shall be, I shall recollect your confidence and kindness with all the fervor and purity of affection, of which a grateful heart is susceptible." Washington in reply assured him of his sincerest friendship, and declared him to have "deserved well of his country." During the last years of his life general Knox lived at Thomastown, Maine. He died 1806, aged 56.

KNOX, Vicesimus, D.D., an eminent divine, author of a variety of works both in theology and polite literature. He was born December 8, 1752, and educated at Merchant Tailor's school, whence he proceeded in due course upon a fellowship to St. John's college, Oxford. On the death of his father, he was chosen his successor in the head-mastership of Tunbridge grammar-school, over which he presided thirty-three years, till, retiring in 1812, he was himself in turn succeeded by his son. He held the livings of Rienwell and Rausden Crays in Essex, and the chapelry of Shipbourne in Kent. His works, many of which have been translated into various European languages, are, "Essays Moral and Literary," 3 vols. 8vo. and 12mo; "Liberal Education," 2 vols. ditto; "Winter Evenings," 3 vols. ditto; "Personal Nobility, or Letters to a Young Nobleman," 1 vol. 12mo; "Christian Philosophy," 2 vols. 12mo; "Considerations on the Nature and Efficacy of the Lord's Supper," 1 vol. 8vo; and a pamphlet "On the National Importance of Classical Education;" with a variety of sermons on different occasions. He also published for the use of his school, expurgated editions of Horace and Juvenal, and a series of selections from the works of the best English authors, generally known as "Elegant Extracts," and "Elegant Epistles." On the commencement of the war consequent on the breaking out of the French Revolution, several pamphlets in opposition to the belligerent councils which prevailed, were generally attributed to him, as well as a translation of Erasmus's "Bellum dulce inexpertis," printed with the signature "Antipolemus." He is also regarded as the author of a searching tract, entitled, "The Spirit of Despotism," published anonymously in 1794, and since reprinted. Dr. Knox wrote the Latin language with great purity and elegance both in prose and verse, paying the greatest attention to the harmony and rhythm of his sentences. His death took place at Tunbridge, September 6, 1821.

KNUZEN, Matthias, a celebrated atheist, born at Holsteiu. He was very zealous in making proselytes, and his followers, who were numerous in some of the cities of the continent, and even in England, were called conscienciarics, as they regarded conscience, learning, and reason, as the only guides of man. They maintained that there was no god, no after-life, and they rejected religion, priests, and magistrates as impositions on the world. This wild enthusiast died at the end of the 17th century. His Latin letter, and his two dialogues in defence of his opinions, were refuted by Musæus, a Lutheran professor.

KNYPHAUSEN, Baron, lieutenant general, commanded the Hessian troops in the British service in the American revolutionary war. In June 1780 he made an incursion into New Jersey with 5000 men. Landing at Elizabethtown he proceeded to Connecticut Farms, where he burned 13 houses and the church. Being reinforced he repulsed the Americans near Springfield and burned the town, consisting of about 30 houses. He died at Berlin 1789, aged 59.

KOCH, Christopher William, a publicist and historian, was born, 1737, at Bouxweiler, in Alsace; was educated at Strasburgh, under Schoepflin; succeeded him as professor of public law; and died, in 1813, rector of the university of Strasburgh.

Among his numerous and learned works are, A View of the Revolutions of Europe; An Abridged History of Treaties of Peace; and Genealogical Tables of the Sovereign Families of Europe.

KOEMPFER, Engelbert, a German physician, born at Lengow, in Westphalia, 16th Sept. 1651. After improving himself in the universities of Dantzic, Thorn, Cracow, and Königsberg, he visited Upsal, and recommended himself to the notice of Charles XI. of Sweden, and accepted the place of secretary to the embassy, sent in 1683 to the sopher of Persia. During this employment, he had various opportunities, which he gladly improved, of visiting the curiosities natural and artificial, in passing through Russia, in Georgia, and on the banks of the Caspian sea. For two years he resided at Ispahan, but when the ambassador prepared to return, he obtained permission to go further into the east, and he engaged himself as surgeon to the Dutch East India fleet. In his way he examined the ruins of Persepolis, and afterwards visited Gamron, Arabia Felix, the coast of Malabar, Ceylon, Bengal, and Batavia. In 1690 he accompanied the annual embassy of the Dutch to the court of Japan, and after staying two years in that distant country, he prepared to return to Europe. He quitted Batavia, Feb. 1693, and after touching at the Cape of Good Hope, reached Amsterdam in October. In 1694 he took the degree of M.D. at Leyden, but the popularity which he acquired as physician, prevented the immediate arrangement of his valuable papers and observations on subjects of natural history, botany, and mineralogy. Whilst he promised himself length of life, he found that his constitution was shattered by fatigues, in distant climates, and some family difficulties hastened his dissolution. He died 2d Nov. 1716. His MSS. and drawings were purchased of his executors, by sir Hans Sloane, and his history of Japan appeared in London, 2 vols. fol. 1727. His Amœnitates Exoticæ, a valuable work, was published 1712.

KOENIG, Daniel, a Swiss, who translated into Latin, Arbuthnot's Tables of Ancient Coins, published at Utrecht, by professor Reitz, 1756. He died at Rotterdam, in consequence of the severe treatment which he received from the mob at Franeker, who mistook him for a spy, because he spoke French. He was only 22.

KOENIG, Samuel, brother to the preceding, was professor of philosophy and natural law, at Franeker, and afterwards became librarian to the prince of Orange, at the Hague. He was an able mathematician, and was engaged in a quarrel with Maupertuis, and in consequence of his "Appeal" written on the subject, he enlarged his reputation, and the number of his friends. He wrote various works, and died 1757.

KOERNER, Theodore, a German poet, was born, in 1788, at Dresden; was educated at Leipsic; became a dramatist, and secretary to the management of the court theatre at Vienna; entered as a volunteer into the Prussian army, in 1812; signalized himself equally by his bravery and his martial songs; obtained a lieutenancy as his reward; and fell gloriously at the battle of Leipsic, in 1813. His works were published, after his death, with the title of the Lyre and the Sword.

KOERTEN, Joanna, a native of Amsterdam, whose great ingenuity and refined taste in embroidery, in drawing, in water colors, in wax models, and in artificial ornaments, was universally admired, and drew strangers to behold and commend the effects of her singular genius. Peter the great, of Russia, was one of those who complimented her on her abilities. The figures and landscapes which she cut with scissors, out of paper, were much celebrated, and the fine exhibition of groups of trees, arns, eagles, and crowns, which she presented to the consort of Leopold, was liberally rewarded with 4000 guilders. She also executed the portrait of the emperor in the same style. She died 1715, aged 65.

KOLLOCK, Henry, D.D., minister of Savannah, graduated at Princeton college 1794. In 1800, he was ordained at Elizabeth town, and in 1803, was appointed professor of theology in the college at which he graduated. In 1806, he removed to Savannah, where he was minister about thirteen years. He died 1819, aged 41. After his death his sermons were published in four volumes.

KONIG, George Matthias, a learned German, born at Altdorf, in Franconia, where he became professor of poetry, and of Greek, and also librarian. He was an able scholar, and was author of a biographical dictionary, called Bibliotheca Vetus & Nova, 4to. 1678, which though censured by some, is yet possessed of merit. He died Dec. 29, 1699, aged 83.

KORTHOLT, Christian, professor of divinity at Keil, was born 15th Jan. 1633, at Burg, in the island of Femern. He studied at Burg, Sleswick, Stettin, and Rostock, Jena, Leipsic, and Wittenberg. In 1662, he was made Greek professor at Rostock, and in 1665, removed to Keil, where he enjoyed the favor and the patronage of the duke of Holstein, and became vice-chancellor of the university. He died, 31st March, 1694, greatly lamented. He wrote various works, De Veracitate. — De Naturâ Philosophiæ, and a valuable work on Christ, as God and Man.

KOSCIUSKO, Thaddeus, an officer in the American Revolutionary war, was born in Lithuania in 1756, of an ancient and noble family, and educated at the military school of Warsaw. He afterwards studied in France. He came to America, recommended by Franklin to gen. Washington, by whom he was appointed an aid. He was also appointed an engineer, with the rank of colonel in Oct. 1776. He fortified the camp of general Gates, in his campaign against Burgoyne, and was afterwards sent to West Point, to erect the works there. He was highly esteemed by both American and French officers. He was admitted a member of the Cincinnati; and received the thanks of Congress for his services. At the close of the revolutionary war he returned to his native country, and was made a major general under Poniatowski. He fought several battles with great bravery, but all his efforts were destroyed by the miserable conduct of the Polish diet. In the month of April, 1794, on the breaking out of a new revolution, he was made generalissimo, with the power of a dictator. He managed with great address and bravery, until the 10th of October, when being overpowered and wounded he was made prisoner, and carried to St. Petersburg. He was kept in confinement till the death of Catharine, when he was relieved by Paul, loaded with honors, and offered employment in the Russian service, which he declined. It is said that when the emperor presented him his own sword, Kosciusko told him, "I no longer need a sword, since I have no longer a country." In 1797, he visited the United States, and received a grant from congress for his services. In the latter part of his life he retired to Switzerland, where he died Oct. 16, 1817. His remains were taken to Cracow, and a public funeral made for him at Warsaw, where almost divine honors were paid him. The cadets at West Point have raised an elegant monument to his memory, within the works which he erected.

KOSTER, Henry, an ingenious writer, born in Portugal of English parents. He made a voyage to Brazil, where he resided six years, and having acquired an intimate knowledge of the country, he published in London, in 1816, an interesting account of his travels, reprinted in 2 vols. 8vo, in 1817. He died at Pernambuco in South America, in 1820, at the age of 26.

KOTZEBUE, Augustus Von, was born at Weimar, May 30, 1761. At the age of sixteen he was sent to the college of Jena, and from thence to Duisburg, where he organized a company of juvenile performers. In 1779, he returned to Jena, to study the law, instead of which most of his time was devoted to the play house. In 1781, he became secretary to general Bauer, whom he accompanied to Petersburg, where he produced a tragedy, called "Demetrius, Czar of Muscovy." Here he married a Russian lady, and was appointed president of the civil government at Revel. After this he wrote a number of Dramas; some of which obtained great popularity on the continent and in England. In 1789, he lost his wife, on which he went to Paris, and next to Vienna, where he became superintendent of the imperial theatre; but resigned that place, and returned to Russia. He had scarcely entered that country, before he was arrested by the orders of Paul, and sent to Liberia, but did not remain long in exile, and on his arrival at Petersburg, was taken into the emperor's favor. In 1813, he was appointed consul-general at Königsberg; but the climate disagreeing with him, he resigned the situation, and went to Mannheim, where he was assassinated, March 23, 1819, by a fanatical student of Jena, named Sand, who then stabbed himself; but recovered from his wound, and was beheaded. The works of Kotzebue are too numerous to be specified.

KOULI KHAN, Thamas, or Nadir, a celebrated warrior, born 1637, in a village, in the province of Cherasan, in Persia. He was the son of a shepherd, but he quitted the humble occupation of his youth, and by selling some of his father's sheep, he collected a number of desperate followers, who, attached to him, shared his dangers and his booties in plundering caravans, and attacking defenceless travellers. By degrees he saw himself at the head of 6000 brave adherents, and became so formidable, that his assistance was solicited by the Schah Thamas, whose throne was usurped by Eschref, the chief of the Aghwans. With the most impetuous valor, Kouli attacked the enemy, and soon routed them, and then seated his master on the throne of his ancestors at Ispahan. Thus victorious he pursued the flying Aghwans, to Candahar, and after carrying terror and desolation before him, and obtaining an immense booty, he returned to Ispahan. Instead, however, of finding Thamas engaged in a Turkish war, as he had recommended, he saw him lulled into effeminate security, and therefore, displeased with his conduct, he boldly seized his person, and proclaiming his son, an infant, six months old, Soplhi of Persia, he declared himself regent of the kingdom. Eager after military fame, Kouli immediately made war against the Turks, with the most astonishing success, displaying every where in his conduct, valor, prudence, and heroism. On the death of the young king, 1737, he signified his intention of resigning his honors; but the nobles, excited by his private intrigues, interfered, and invested him with the sovereign power, and seated him on the throne of Persia. Now elevated to the height of his ambition, he wisely saw that war was the only support of his greatness, and therefore with a numerous army, devoted to him by his liberality, and by his personal valor, he marched against India. The Mogul empire was rapidly conquered, 200,000 men were put to the sword, and a booty of 145 millions rewarded the victor at the taking of Delhi. To the possession of the Mogul dominions, was soon added the conquest of the Usbec Tartars, and the capture of Buchara, their chief city; and on all sides, wherever he turned his arms, he found no power able to withstand his attacks. Such astonishing successes required wisdom and decision to cement them, but unfortunately, when his abilities were wanted to give stability to his immense dominions, Kouli became capricious, proud, and tyrannical. With injudicious violence he attempted to introduce the religion of Omar, among his subjects, and to render his decrees more terrible, he put to a cruel death the priests who opposed his measures, and even sacrificed his own son to his ferocious measures. This conduct revolted the attachment of the Persians, and the nobles who foresaw in the capricious cruelty of their master their own destruction, conspired against him, and assassinated him, 8th June, 1747, after he had reigned 20 years over one of the most extensive and powerful empires of the world.

KRACHENINNIKOW, Stephen, a Russian naturalist, educated at Petersburg. He was engaged 10 years in making observations on the natural productions of Kamschatka, and the neighboring country, and on his return, in 1743, he was made associate of the academy, and in 1753, professor of botany and natural history. His travels were published in Chappe d' Auroche's Account of Siberia. He died 1755, aged 42.

KRANTZ, Albert, a famous historian and divine, born at Hamburg. He became professor of philosophy and divinity at Rostock, 1482, and in 1493, was elected dean of the chapter of Hamburg, where he died 1517. The best known of his learned works, are Chronica Regnorum, Aquiloniorum Danicæ, Suevicæ, Saxonie sive de Saxonie Gentis Origine, lib. 13. ad ann. 1501—Vandalia, sive de Vandalorum Origine,—Metropolis, sive Historia Ecclesiastica Saxonie, and other works.

KRAY, baron, an Austrian general, embraced the military service at an early period. He distinguished himself first against the Turks, and rose to the rank of major-general. In the campaigns in the Netherlands, and on the Rhine, from 1793, to 1797, he was one of the most active of the Imperial commanders. In 1799, he opened the campaign in Italy, as commander-in-chief, by decisive successes against the French; and in 1800, he replaced the archduke Charles, as leader of the army of the Rhine. He died in 1801.

KRUDENER, baroness Valeria, a religious enthusiast, daughter of Count Witenkoff, was born, in 1766, at Riga; married baron Krudener when she was only fourteen; and was for a considerable period one of the gayest of the gay in the Parisian circles. At length she became a fanatical devotee, announced herself as an envoy from Heaven, and wandered from state to state preaching, and surrounded by thousands of people. In many places she was driven out by the magistrates. She died, in the Crimea, in 1824. Alexander of Russia was among those who listened to her doctrines. She wrote Valeria, a novel, which is believed to depict some of her early adventures.

KRIMMEL, John Lewis, a distinguished painter, was drowned, while bathing near Germantown, July 15, 1821, aged 35. He was president of the society of American artists, having resided about ten years in Philadelphia. At the time of his death he was engaged to paint a large historical picture of the landing of William Penn. His genius and amiable manners secured to him respect and esteem.

KUHLMAN, Quirinus, a famous fanatic, born at Breslau in Silesia, 1651. While his learning promised the fairest fruits, he was attacked at the age of 18, by a violent illness, from which he recovered with difficulty. But with returning health, he displayed the wildest manners, and pretending to have held converse with departed spirits and aerial beings, he set up for a prophet. He went to Holland, where the reading of Behmen's works increased the extravagance of his reveries. Though seemingly devoted to spiritual affairs exclusively, he had some respect for the things of the world; he kept some concubines, and extorted money from the credulous, by threatening terrible and approaching vengeance if they did not satisfy his wants. After wandering over England, France, and the east, he was at last stopped at Moscow, and burnt, 3d Oct. 1639, on account of some prophecies which were interpreted as improper and seditious. He published Prodromus Quinquennis Mirabilis, 1674, and other things.

KUH, Ephraim Moses, a German poet, born of a Jewish family at Breslau, in 1731. His early disposition for study induced his father to propose making him a rabbin; but he had no taste for the subtilties of the Talmud and wished to devote his time to the belles lettres. He was placed in a financial situation at Berlin under his uncle, where he cultivated the society of Mendelssohn, Lessing, Ramler, and other men of letters, and so entirely neglected the care of his fortune, that at length he was allowed to follow his inclinations, and his father allowed him a pension for his support. He travelled in Holland, France, and Italy, carrying with him his library. On his return to Germany he was attacked with hypochondria, which degenerated into insanity. It was in the lucid intervals of his unfortunate malady that he composed his best poetical pieces. Medical means removed his mental disease; and 1735, he was seized with palsy, and died at Breslau, April 3, 1790. He is said to have left in manuscript more than five thousand poems, from which a selection was made by Ramler, printed at Zurich in 1792, 2 vols.

KUHNIUS, Joachim, a learned native of Gripswalde, Pomerania, who after studying at Stade, and Jena, became principal of the college of Oettingen, in Swabia, and three years after, in 1676, was elected Greek professor of the university of Strasburg. The professorship of Hebrew was afterwards added to his other appointments, and he acquired great celebrity by his publications, and in the number of his pupils. He died 11th Dec. 1697, aged 50. He published excellent editions with notes, of Ælian, Diogenes, Pausanias, besides other works.

KUNCKET, John, an able chemist, and ingenious philosopher, born in the duchy of Sleswic, 1630. He died 1702. He published at London, Observationes Chemicæ, 1678, 12mo. and discovered the phosphorus of urine, and introduced several useful improvements in the arts, and philosophy.

KUNZE, John Christopher, D.D., an American clergyman of distinction. He was born in 1740; and, for the period of fourteen years was the minister of the German Lutheran Church in Philadelphia. At the same time he was a professor of the college in that city, now the University of Pennsylvania. In 1784, he removed to the city of New York, where he resided till his death, which took place July 24, 1807, at the age of 78 years. When in the latter place he performed the double duty of professor and parish minister, as in Philadelphia.

KUSTER, Ludolf, a learned critic, born at Blomberg, in Westphalia, 1670. The abilities which he early displayed, recommended him as tutor to the sons of the Prussian prime minister, and his services were rewarded by the promise of a professorship in the university of Berlin. In the meantime he travelled over Holland, Germany, France and England, where at last he produced, after four years' laborious investigation, his edition of Suidas, in 3 vols. folio, at Cambridge. The work was honorably received by the university, the editor was complimented with the degree of doctor, and advantageous offers were made to him to settle there. He, however, declined them all, to take possession of his Berlin professorship, which, together with the place of king's librarian, he soon after relinquished with capricious indifference, and went to Amsterdam, where he published his Aristophanes, in 1710, and an edition of Mills' Greek Testament. From Amsterdam he went to Rotterdam, and then to Antwerp, where he was prevailed upon by the jesuits to renounce the protestant tenets for the catholic faith, in 1713. This dereliction of his religion, or his services to literature, recommended him to the French king, who granted him a pension of 2000 livres, and appointed him associate of the academy of inscriptions. Kuster did not long enjoy his honors at Paris. He died the 12th Oct. 1716, of an abscess in the pancreas, aged only 46. His other works were an edition of Jamblicus's Life of Pythagoras—Historia Critica Homeri—Bibliotheca Novorum Librorum ab 1697, usque 1699, 5 vols. & De Vero Usu Verborum Medicorum apud Græcos, a valuable book.

KUTUSOFF-SMOLENSKOI, Michael Lavri-onovitch Golenitcheff, a Russian field-marshal, was born in 1745, and was sent to France to complete his education at Strasburgh. He entered the army at the age of sixteen. Between 1764 and 1790 he distinguished himself in several campaigns against the Turks, particularly at Oczakoff and Ismailoff, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general. In 1805 he commanded the Russian army at Austerlitz, but protested against the measures which were adopted. In 1810 and 1811 he obtained several advantages over the Turks, and in 1812 was placed at the head of the army destined to oppose Napoleon. He was, however, defeated at Borodino, in spite of his skill and the bravery of his troops. He died in 1813.

KUYP, Jacob, a landscape painter of eminence, who founded the academy of painting at Dordt, 1643. His son, Albert, rose superior to his father in fame, and excelled him in the delicacy of his coloring, and the variety and correctness of his pieces.

KYDERMYNSTER, Richard, abbot and historian of the Benedictine convent of Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, was born at Worcester. Besides the History of his Convent in 5 books, he wrote some pieces against the Reformation, &c. and died at his abbey, 1531.

KYNASTON, John, an English divine, born at Chester, 5th Dec. 1723, and educated at Brazen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1751. He gained great reputation in the university, by his oration, "De Impietate C. Corn. Tacito, falso objectatâ," on the foundation of sir Francis Bridgman, delivered in the chapel of his college, 1761, and published. He wrote some other things, and died in consequence of breaking his left arm very near the shoulder, June 1783.

KYNWELMARSH, Francis, a native of Essex, who studied the law at Gray's Inn, and assisted Gaseoigne in his translation of Euripides's tragedy of Jocasta. He wrote some poetry of considerable merit, which, together with the poetical trifles of his brother Anthony, are preserved in the Paradise of Dainty Devices, 1576.

KYRLE, John, the celebrated man of Ross, immortalized by the muse of Pope, and more by his own beneficent actions. With an estate of only 500*l.* a year, he was the blessing of his native county of Hereford; he built a church, endowed hospitals, and had the good fortune to be seconded in his charitable works by the liberality of his opulent neighbors. He died 1724, aged 90, but "no monument, inscription, stone," as the poet observes, mark his remains.

L.

LABAT, John Baptist, a Dominican of Paris, professor of philosophy at Nancy. He went in 1693 as missionary to America, and returned in 1705 to France. He was for some time at Boulogne, and died at Paris 6th Jan. 1738. He published, Nouveau Voyage aux Isles de l'Amérique, 6 vols. 8vo.—Voyages en Espagne & Italie, 8 vols. 12mo.—Nouvelle Relation de l'Afrique Occidentale, 5 vols. 12mo. compiled from others.—Voyage du Chevalier Marchais en Guinée, 4 vols. 12mo.—Relation Historique de l'Éthiopie Occidentale, from Cavazzi's Latin works, 4 vols. 12mo.

LABBE, Philip, a Jesuit of Bourges, of great learning, prodigious memory, and indefatigable application. He died at Paris 1667, aged 60, highly respected as an able critic, and an excellent private character. His works are, de Byzantine Historiæ Scriptoribus, folio.—Nova Bibliotheca MS. 2 vols. fol.—Bibliotheca Biblicarum, fol.—Concordia Chronologica, 5 vols. fol.—Concordia Sacræ et Profanæ Chronologiæ 12mo.—Le Chronologie Francois, 6 vols. 12mo.—Bibliotheca Antejanseniana, 4to.—Notitia Dignitatum Imperii Rom. 12mo.—De Scriptoribus Eccles. Dissertatio, 2 vols. 8vo.—Conciliorum Collectio Maxima, 17 vols. fol.—Lives of learned Jesuits, and some valuable works on grammar, and Greek poetry.

LABEO, Antistius, a Roman lawyer who opposed the government of Augustus, and refused the consulship, when offered to him by the emperor. His father was one of Cæsar's murderers, and patriotism and opposition to tyranny were hereditary in the family. A tribune of that name caused the condemnation of Metellus, B. C. 149.

LABERIUS, Decimus, a Roman knight, who excelled as a writer of satirical productions or mimes, for the stage. Cæsar to disgrace him obliged him to repeat one of his pieces on the stage, and the poet with great presence of mind, spoke with censorious humor against the oppressor of his country. He died 44 B. C.

LABOUREUR, John le, a native of Montmorency, who from the humble occupation of a gentleman's servant, rose to some consideration, and became an abbé prior of Juvigné, and almoner to the king, and commander of the order of Saint Michael. He died 1675, aged 52. He published the Collection of Monuments of illustrious Persons buried in the Celestines' Church at Paris, 4to. 1642—the History of Marshal Guebriant with the Genealogy of Budos, and other families in Brittany—the Memoirs of Michael Castelnau, and other works. His brother Lewis wrote some poetry, and died 1679, and his uncle Claude, who was an ecclesiastic, published in 1643, notes and corrections on the Breviary of Lyons.

LACARRY, Giles, a French Jesuit, who died 1684, aged 79. Though much employed as a professor of philosophy and theology, he wrote some useful works, Historia Galliarum sub Præfectis Prætoris Galliarum, 4to.—Historia Coloniarum a Gallis in Externas Nationes Missarum, 4to.—de Regibus Franciæ & Legè Salica—Historia Romana, 4to.—Notitia Provinciarum Imperii Utriusque cum notis, 4to.—besides editions of Vell Parterculus & Tacitus de Germ.

LACEPEDE, Bernard Germain Stephen de la Ville, count de, a celebrated naturalist, son of count de la Ville, was born, in 1756, at Agen, and in his youth studied natural history and music with equal enthusiasm. Buffon, his friend, obtained for him the post of keeper of the cabinets in the king's garden, at Paris; a post which greatly facilitated his scientific studies. He was returned to the legislative assembly as one of the members for the capital, and was raised to the office of president. During the reign of terror he was unmolested, and in 1796 he became a member of the Institute. Under the sway of Napoleon honors were heaped upon him. He was successively made a member and president of the conservative senate, grand chancellor of the legion of honor, and senator of Paris, and decorated with the grand eagle of the legion. He died in 1825. Lacepede holds a high station among modern naturalists. He wrote a Natural History of Oviparous Quadrupeds and Serpents—of Reptiles—of Fish—and of Cetaceous Animals; A General Physical and Civil History of Europe from the last years of the fifth century to the middle of the eighteenth; two Romances; and many other works.

LA COLONIE, John Martin de, a native of Perigord, who died at Bourdeaux 1759, aged 85. He served in the Austrian army, and obtained the rank of marshal. He wrote military memoirs, published Frankfort 1730, and Brussels 1739, 2vols. 12mo. and also an History of Bourdeaux, 3 vols. 12mo.

LACOMBE, James, a French historian, born at Paris 1724. He is author of some popular works, Abregé Chronologique de l'Histoire Ancienne—de l'Histoire du Nord—Revolutions de la Russie—Histoire de Christine, Reine de Suede.

LACOMBE de Prezel, Honoré, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris 1725.—He is author of several Dictionaries—de Jurisprudence—de Citoyen—de Portraits et d'Anecdotes des Hommes Celebres.—Another of the same name wrote a useful dictionary of old French, 7 vols. 8vo. 1765.

LACRETELLE, Peter Louis, the elder, was born, in 1751, at Metz; distinguished himself greatly at the bar; sat in the legislative assemblies of 1791 and 1801; defended the principles of liberty against the ministers of Louis XVIII.; and died in 1824. Among his works are, Judicial Eloquence and Legislative Philosophy; Portraits and Pictures; Theatrical Romance; Studies on the Revolution; and My Evenings at Malesherbes.

LACT, John de, a historian, and director of the Dutch East India company, died at Antwerp in 1649. Among other works he published Novus Orbis fol. 1633.

LACTANTIUS, Lucius Cælius Firmianus, a Latin father of the church, said to have been born in Africa, or according to some at Fermo in Italy. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Constantine, who made him tutor to his son Crispus. His style is much in the manner of Cicero, possessing force, elegance, and purity. Of his works, the best edition is that of Paris, 2 vols. 4to. 1748.

LACYDAS, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, successor to Arcesilaus in the second academy. His grief at the loss of a favorite goose was ridiculous. He died B.C. 212.

LADISLAUS I. son of Bela I. succeeded to the Hungarian throne after his brother Geisa 1077. He was an able politician and a warlike general, and after defeating the Bohemians, Russians, Tartars and Bulgarians, and driving away the Huns from Hungary he marched against Dalmatia and Croatia, where his sister was cruelly treated by her husband Zuonimir, and he added those provinces to his empire. To valor in the field he also added piety at home, and deserved for his great sanctity to be canonized by Celestinus III. in 1198. He died 30th July, 1095.

LADISLAUS IV. grand duke of Lithuania, and king of Poland since 1434, was made king of Hungary in 1440, on the death of Albert of Austria. He made war against the Turks and defeated their sultan Amurath II. by the valor of his general Huniades; but after making a solemn peace with his enemy he was prevailed upon by the pope's ambassador to violate it. In consequence of this, Amurath hastened to give his aggressor battle, and proved victorious in the dreadful fight near Vannes, 11th Nov. 1444. Ladislaus was slain, but though his head was carried in triumph through the Turkish camp, the conqueror honored his remains with a most magnificent funeral.

LADISLAUS VI. son of Casimir king of Poland was raised to the throne of Hungary after Matthias Corvinus, 1490, in preference to his own brother Albert, to Maximilian of Austria, and to John the natural son of the late king. He made war against the Turks and other nations, and died after a very turbulent reign 1516.

LADISLAUS, or LAUNCELOT, the liberal and victorious, was count of Provence and succeeded his father Charles Duras asking of Naples 1386. His elevation was opposed by Lewis II. duke of Anjou, and by pope John XXIII. and this excited dreadful civil wars. In 1403 he seized the crown of Hungary, during the imprisonment of king Sigismund, who soon after obliged him to retire into Italy, and afterwards he was defeated by his rival Lewis on the banks of the Garigliano in 1411. In the mean time though defeated he had the art to reconcile the pope to his interest; but at the moment that the pontiff promised himself tranquillity, Ladislaus marched against him and seized Rome, and afterwards turned his victorious arms against the Florentines, to whom he dictated terms of peace, 1418. Whilst promising himself greater successes, Ladislaus died suddenly at Naples, 16th Aug. 1414, aged 38. It is said that his mistress, the daughter of a physician, had been prevailed on by the vindictive Florentines to administer poison to him, so that he expired in the greatest agonies. He had been three times married, but left no issue.

LADISLAUS I. king of Poland, son of Casimir I. succeeded his brother Boleslaus II. 1081. He was fond of peace, but yet brave in war, as he defeated in three battles the Prussians and Pomeranians who wished to invade his kingdom. He died 26th July, 1102.

LADISLAUS II. king of Poland, after his father Boleslaus III. 1139, made war against his brothers, and was at last, after various successes, banished from his throne. His brother Boleslaus IV. succeeded him, and granted him Silesia at the request of Frederick Barbarossa. He died at Oldenburg, 1159.

LADISLAUS III. king of Poland in 1296, proved so oppressive in his conduct towards the clergy and the people, that his subjects revolted and placed Wenceslaus on the throne. Now a fugitive, Ladislaus learned wisdom in adversity, and on the death of his successor, by the influence of the pope, he was again placed on the throne, and showed his gratitude by the mildness, justice and popularity of his government. He defeated the revolted Pomeranians with the assistance of the Teutonic knights; but when these warriors had seized Dantzic as the reward of their exertions, the offended king marched against them and cut to pieces their army consisting of 20,000 men. He died soon after, 10th March, 1333, highly and deservedly respected.

LADISLAUS V. surnamed Jagelon, grand duke of Lithuania, obtained the crown of Poland 1386, by his marriage with Hedwige, daughter of Lewis king of Hungary. Hedwige had been placed on the throne of Poland, provided she took for her husband the person whom her subjects approved, and consequently Ladislaus, honored with the affection of the queen, left the superstitions of paganism, and was baptised and raised to the sovereignty. His reign was mild but vigorous, he defeated the Teutonic knights in frequent battles, and added Lithuania to his Polish dominions, but refused the crown of Bohemia which was offered to him by the Hussites. He died 31st May, 1434, aged 80, universally and deservedly respected for his probity, his integrity, and all those virtues which should grace a throne.

LADISLAUS, Sigismund VII., king of Poland and Sweden after the death of his father Sigismund III. 1632, had displayed great bravery before his elevation, in his wars against the Turks, 150,000 of whom he had slain in various battles. When raised to the throne he governed with great moderation, but without forgetting the interests of his people, as he attacked the Russians who threatened him, and obliged them to make peace. He died without issue 1648, aged 52.

L'ADVOCAT, John Baptist, a jesuit, Hebrew professor, doctor and librarian of the Sorbonne, was born in the diocese of Toul 1709. He died at Paris 1765. He wrote a Geographical Dictionary, 8vo.—an Historical Dictionary, 2 vols. 8vo. abridged from Moreri, but since much enlarged—an Hebrew Grammar—a Tract on Councils—a Dissertation on the 67th Psalm and a Critique on some new Translations of Scripture.

LÆLIUS, Caius, a Roman consul, distinguished for his abilities as an orator and a man of learning. He was the friend of young Scipio, and is said to have assisted Terence in his plays. Another of the same name was the friend of the elder Africanus, and assisted in his victories over Asdrubal and Syphax.

LAËT, John de, a native of Antwerp, director of the Dutch East India company. He died at Antwerp 1640, and was author of some useful works—Historia Naturalis Brasiliae, folio—Novus Orbis, folio, 1633—de Regis Hispaniæ Regnis & opibus, 8vo.—Respublica Belgarum—Gallia—Turcici Imperii Status—Perfici Imperii Status—Vitruvius, printed by Elzivir, fol. 1649.

LÆVINUS, Torrentinus, commonly called Vander Beken, or Torrentin, was a native of Ghent, and studied at Louvaine. He made the tour of Italy, and on his return was appointed canon of Liege. He went as ambassador to Philip II. of Spain, who rewarded his services by making him bishop of Antwerp. From Antwerp he was translated to the archbishopric of Mechlin, where he died 1595. He founded the college of Jesuits at Louvaine, and by the elegance of his Latin poetry deserved to be called the prince of Lyric poets. He also edited Suetonius with notes.

LAFITAU, Joseph Francis, a French jesuit, missionary among the Iroquois. He published a Comparison of the Manners of the Americans, with those of Ancient Times, 2 vols. 4to.—the Discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World, 4 vols. 4to.—Remarks on Ginseng, 12mo. He died 1755.

LAFITAU, Peter Francis, brother to the preceding, was born at Bourdeaux. He distinguished himself as a preacher and a negotiator, and became such a favorite by his wit and facetiousness with pope Clement IX. that he made him bishop of Sisteron. He died 1764, aged 79. He was author of History of the Constitution Unigenitus, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of Clement II. 2 vols.—Sermons, 4 vols.—Spiritual Letters.

LAGALLA, Julius Cæsar, a native of Padulla, in the kingdom of Naples. He studied at Naples, and when only 18 was made physician to the pope, and professor of logic at Rome, where he died 1623, aged 47. He was a very learned man, and wrote Disputatio de Cælo Animato.

LAGERLOOF, Peter, professor of eloquence at Upsal, was employed by the king of Sweden to write the Histories, ancient and modern, of northern Europe. His Latin is considered as very correct and elegant. He died 1599, aged 51.

LAGNY, Thomas Fantet sieur de, a native of Lyons, brought up to the bar, a profession which he relinquished for his favorite study of mathematics and philosophy. By the liberal support of the duke de Noailles he studied at Paris, and was made member of the academy of sciences. After a residence of 16 years as hydrographer to the king at Rochefort, he was invited to Paris, to become librarian to Louis XIV. with a liberal pension. He was author of New Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots, 4to.—la Cubature de la Sphere—Elements of Arithmetic and Algebra, 12mo.—Analysis of Problems, 4to.—besides several papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died 1734, aged 74.

LAGRANGE, Joseph Louis, one of the most consummate mathematicians of modern times, was born, in 1736, at Turin, and at the age of nineteen became teacher of mathematics at the royal artillery school of that city. He was the founder of the Academy of Sciences in the Sardinian capital. In 1766 he removed to Berlin, and thence, in 1787, to Paris. In the French metropolis he was received with merited respect; a pension was granted to him; he was at a later period made professor of the normal and polytechnic schools; and, lastly, Napoleon created him a count and a senator, and invested him with other honors and dignities. He died in 1813. Of his well known works the Mécanique Analytique is one of the most celebrated.

LAFON, Bartholemy, a geographer, died at N. Orleans, where he had long been a citizen, Sept. 29, 1820. He published a map of lower Louisiana and New Orleans. About 1814 he proposed for publication a work, entitled, Urane geography, designed to prove, that America was known to the ancients, and was the native place of Orphias.

LA FAYETTE, Gilbert Mottier, marquis, was a native of France, but an adopted and distinguished son of the United States of America. The ardor with which he engaged in the cause of the colonies, in their struggle for independence, and the unvaried constancy with which he adhered to it, leaves no room to doubt the purity, and disinterested character of his motives, and places him side by side with Washington in the affection and respect of the American people. The character of our work precludes us from giving more than a brief summary of his life. The future historians and biographers of the United States of America, when they bestow the just award on the father of his country, will not forget his compatriot in arms, La Fayette. In April 1777 he came to the United States and engaged in their cause, with his personal services, and his ample fortune. In July he was appointed by congress a major general. In 1779 he returned to France, but principally for the purpose of aiding the cause he had so ardently embraced. He returned to America in season to take a distinguished part in the battle, which terminated the revolutionary war, the capture of Cornwallis. He again visited France, and was preparing to return to the United States at the head of a numerous army, raised by his own exertions, when peace was proclaimed, and of course rendered his coming unnecessary. He soon after however, accepted the invitation given him by congress to visit the country of his adoption, and which he had helped to make free, and was received with the attention due to his distinguished merits. He was assured by congress, "that these United States regard him with particular affection, and will not cease to feel an interest in whatever may concern his honor and prosperity, and that their best and kindest wishes will always attend him." He was a distinguished, and in many respects an unfortunate agent in the revolutionary events in France, and for some years previous to 1814 passed his life in retirement. The downfall of Bonaparte brought him again before the public. In 1815 he was a member of the chamber of deputies and made the motion for the appointment of a committee to demand the abdication of the emperor. The committee was not appointed, as the voluntary resignation of Bonaparte rendered it unnecessary. He was again a member of the chamber of deputies in 1818. In 1824 he accepted the invitation of the president of the United States to visit again that country. He arrived at New York, and until the period of his departure, he was every where received with all the demonstrations of affection and respect that man can pay to man. After his return to France he again engaged in public affairs, and had a distinguished part in the revolution of 1830, which placed the present king on the throne. He died 1834, aged 77.

LAGUNA, Andrew, a physician, born at Segovia, 1499. He was about the person of Charles V. with whom he was a favorite, and died 1560. He wrote, Annotations on Dioscorides—Epitome of the works of Galen—a treatise of Weights and Measures.

LA HARPE, John Francis de, a French dramatist, poet, critic, and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1739, at Paris, and is said to have been the son of a Swiss officer who died in poverty. He was left an orphan at the age of nine years, and was for some time supported by the Sisters of Charity of the parish to which he belonged. They also recommended him to M. Asselin, of Harcourt College, by whom he was gratuitously educated. He began his literary career, in 1763, by the tragedy of Warwick, which was successful. It was followed by Pharamond, Gustavus, and several others, some of which were failures. In 1776 he became a member of the French Academy. La Harpe was a warm partisan of the revolution; but in 1793 he was incarcerated by the Jacobins. While he was imprisoned he was converted to Christianity, and he was ever after an ardent enemy of republicanism, and a friend of the catholic faith. Among his numerous works are, The Lyceum, or a Course of Literature, by which he has gained the appellation of the French Quintilian; Eulogies; Private Correspondence with the Czar Paul I.; Poems; A Commentary on Racine; and Translations of Suetonius and Camoens.

LA HIRE, Philip de, an eminent French mathematician, was born, in 1660, at Paris, and was intended to be a painter, but was drawn from the arts by his love of the sciences. Louvois and Colbert employed him in various public works. At once an astronomer, mechanician, geometer, and hydrographer, he was, said Fontenelle, "a whole scientific academy in a single individual." He died in 1719, professor of mathematics and astronomy at the college of France. Among his numerous works are, Astronomical Tables; The Surveyor's Guide; and a Treatise on Mechanics.

LAILDIE, Archibald, D.D. was born at Kelso, Scotland, in 1720, and was educated at the university of Edinburgh. He was settled, in 1760, in a church at Flushing, Zealand, and in 1763 was called to the care of the reformed Dutch church in New York, where he arrived in 1764, and was the first who officiated in English in that church. He died at Redbook in 1773, during an exile from the city occasioned by the war. He was an able theologian, a powerful speaker, and was eminently useful in his ministry.

LAINEZ, Alexander, a French poet, born 1650, at Chimay, in Hainault, and educated at Rheims. He travelled over Greece, the Archipelago, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Palestine, Egypt, Malta, Sicily, Italy, Switzerland, and France; but on his return to his native town, he found himself reduced to poverty. Two years after the Abbe Faultrier, after suspecting him improperly of seditious measures, extended his protection towards him, and enabled him to settle at Paris, in possession of a comfortable competence. In this situation he was the soul of company, courted by the learned, the gay, and the opulent, but though given much to the pleasures of the table, yet fond of learning. He died April 18th, 1710, at Paris. His poetical pieces, which possess great vivacity and elegance, are all short, as the effusions of the moment and not of laborious study. They were collected and published 1753, in 8vo.

LAINEZ, James, a Spaniard, the friend and successor of Loyola, as general of the jesuits, in 1558, was at the council of Trent, where he distinguished himself as the zealous supporter of papal power. His services were warmly acknowledged by pope Paul IV. who not only granted him power of altering and modifying the laws of his society, and of making contracts and agreements without their knowledge, but permitted him to have prisons independent of the secular power. Though ambitious, he refused a cardinal's hat, and died at Rome 1565, aged 53.

LAING, Malcolm, a historian, was born in 1762, at Stryorey, in Orkney, and educated at Kirkwall, from whence he removed to Edinburgh, after which he studied the law, and was called to the bar, but had little practice. On the death of Dr. Henry he was employed to complete an unfinished volume of that writer's history of England; in which he gave little satisfaction to the public. After this he published "A History of Scotland," 4 vols. remarkable only for its partiality, and attack upon the character of the unfortunate Mary. During the Foxite administration, to which he was attached, he was elected into parliament for the county of Orkney. His last literary undertaking was an edition of Ossian's or Macpherson's poems, the authority of which he demolished by a preliminary dissertation. He died in 1819.

LAIRE, Francis Xavier, a native of Vadans, near Gray, distinguished for his learning, and knowledge of bibliography. He wrote, Memoirs for the history of some great men of the 15th century, with a Supplement to Mattaire's Annals of Typography, 4to.—Specimen Historicum Typographiæ Romanæ, &c. 8vo.—Epistola ab Abbate Ugolini, 8vo.—The Origin and Progress of Printing in Franche Comté, 12mo.—Index Libror. ab Inventa Typographia ad 1500, 2 vols. 8vo.—the edition of Aldini, 12mo. He died at Sens 1800, aged 61.

LAIRESSE, Gerard, a Flemish painter, born at Liege 1640. He studied under his father, who was also a painter; but he soon surpassed him in execution, and acquired fame by painting some historical pieces for the electors of Cologne and Brandenburg. His gallantries reduced him to indigence; but one of his pictures falling into the hands of a Dutch merchant, he was persuaded to go and settle at Amsterdam, where his merits were soon known and rewarded. His pictures were so highly finished, that the Hollanders called him their best history painter, and their second Raphael. In his old age he lost his sight, and died at Amsterdam 1711, aged 71. His best piece is said to be a Moses, when a child, trampling on Pharaoh's crown. He was also eminent as a musician, and an engraver, and wrote a work on the Principles of Painting, translated into English. He left three sons, two of whom were painters. Of his three brothers, Ernest and John were eminent for painting animals, and James excelled as a flower painter.

LAKE, Arthur, a native of Southampton, educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow. He was in 1608 made dean of Worcester, and in 1616 raised to the see of Bath and Wells. He died 1626, respected as an amiable man, and an exemplary prelate. A folio volume of his sermons appeared after his death.

LALANDE, Joseph Jerome Francis, was born at Bourg, in the department of L'Ain, July 11, 1732. He was intended for the law, but relinquished that pursuit to study mathematics; and so great was his progress, that at the age of eighteen, he was deputed by the Academy of Sciences to go to Berlin, to make observations for determining the parallax of the moon, and its distance from the earth. In 1759 he published an edition of Halley's Tables; and the year following he began the "Connaissance des Temps." In 1764 appeared his "Traite Astronomique;" and his reputation being now established, he was employed in the Encyclopedie. He was also appointed professor of astronomy in the college of France; and it is only to be lamented that with so much science he should have taken a decided part in the sanguinary revolution, and more so that he should have avowed atheistical sentiments. He died April 4, 1807. Besides the works already mentioned, he published—1. "Voyage d'Italie." 2. Traite des Cieux. 3. Bibliographie Astronomique. 4. Abrege de Navigation. 5. An edition of Montcla's History of Mathematics.

LALLEMAND, Baron Henry, general of artillery in the Imperial guard of France, espoused the side of Napoleon on his return from Elba, for which he was condemned to death for contumacy. He escaped to America and died at Bordentown, New Jersey, 1823. He published a valuable work on artillery.

LALLI, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Orsia. He was employed in civil affairs under the pope, and the duke of Parma, and died 1637, aged 64. He wrote, Domiziano Moscheida—il Mal Francese—besides the Destruction of Jerusalem—the Æneid travestied, and other miscellaneous poems.

LALLY, Thomas Arthur, count, an Irishman in the service of France. His family had followed the fortunes of James II. He distinguished himself at the battle of Fontenoy; and in 1756 was sent as governor-general to the French possessions in the East Indies. After taking Gondalore and Fort St. David, he was defeated before Madras, and obliged to retreat to Pondicherry, which he surrendered after an obstinate siege, to the English 1761. On his return to Europe, he was accused of selling Pondicherry to the English, and was condemned by the Parliament to lose his head. The sentence was executed in 1766, but his son, Lally de Tollendal, obtained, in 1783, a reversion of the cruel sentence, and was restored to his father's possessions and honors.

LAMBALLE, Marie Therese Louise of Savoy Carignan, princess of, was born at Turin, 8th Sept. 1749, and married the duke of Bourbon Penthièvre, by whom she was left a widow, young, beautiful, and amiable. When appointed intendant of the royal household of Marie Antoinette, she gained and deserved, by her good conduct, the confidence and friendship of her mistress. On the flight to Varennes, Madame Lamballe, by another road, quitted France, and from Dieppe came to England, where she might have lived happy; but she no sooner heard of the imprisonment of her royal friend, than she hastened back to Paris to share her sorrows and sooth her miseries in the Temple. This attachment was too noble to escape the notice of her tyrants. She was dragged to the prison of la Force, and on the fatal 3d of Sept. 1792, she was summoned to appear before a self-erected and bloody tribunal. When questioned about the queen by these ferocious murderers, she answered with firmness and dignity; but when some seemed to express pity for her misfortunes, and to applaud her innocence, the others stabbed her with their sabres, and after cutting off the head and the breasts, they tore out her still palpitating heart. Not satisfied with this, the diabolical monsters went in procession with the bleeding head and the heart, at the top of a pike, to expose them to the view of the unfortunate queen and her wretched family; while the mangled body, with fresh insults, was dragged triumphantly through the streets. This illustrious female was one of the most innocent victims of the revolution; her name was never attacked with revolutionary sarcasms or libellous invectives; and though her tyrants cut her off by a horrid assassination, they never dared to asperse her character.

LAMBECIUS, Peter, a learned German, born at Hamburg 1623. He studied in Holland and Paris, and at the age of 19 obtained great reputation by his essay on Aulus Gellius, published 1647. In 1652 he was appointed history professor of Hamburg, and in 1660 rector of the university. In this situation he found himself exposed to great vexation from the censures of critics, and from the disobedience of his students; and when he attempted to repair his shattered fortune by marrying an old but rich woman, he found himself more bitterly exposed to persecution. His wife's temper was so intolerable, that within a fortnight of the celebration of his nuptials, he left Hamburg, determined never to return to it. He repaired to Rome, where he renounced protestantism, by publicly professing the catholic faith, and afterwards returned to Vienna, where he was appointed librarian to the emperor, and also counsellor, and historiographer. He died of a dropsy at Vienna 1680. He wrote Origines Hamburgenses, from the year 808 to 1292, 2 vols. 4to.—a catalogue of the MSS. of the Vienna Library, 3 vols. folio.

LAMBERT, Anne Therese, marquise de, an ingenious lady, born at Paris 1647. She married Henry Lambert, marquis of St. Bris, in 1666, and he died 20 years after. Her house became the general rendezvous of the learned, the polite, and the elegant. She died 1733, aged 86, universally respected. Her works have been collected into 2 vols. 12mo. and display an elegant taste, great sense, and the effusions of a virtuous heart. Her advice of a Mother to a Son and Daughter—Reflections on Women—treatise on Old Age—and the Female Hermits, are much admired.

LAMBERT, John, a lawyer, who during the civil wars, distinguished himself at the battles of Naseby and Fife, and was made a major-general. He favored the elevation of Cromwell to the protectorate, but opposed his assuming the title of king. At the restoration, he was excluded from the indemnity act, and was therefore tried and condemned to death. He was, however, reprieved, and sent in exile to Guernsey, where he died.

LAMBERT, Claude Francis, a French ecclesiastic, who became a writer for the booksellers, and died 1765 at Paris. He was author of New Telemachus, 3 vols.—Memoirs of a woman of Quality, 3 vols.—History of all Nations, 14 vols.—Literary History of Lewis XIV.

LAMBERT, John Henry, a mathematician and astronomer, was born, in 1723, at Mulhausen, in Alsace; and died, in 1777, one of the most eminent of the Berlin academicians. Lambert, who was the son of a poor tailor, was one of the most extensively learned men of his time, and was indebted to his own unaided exertions for his knowledge. Among his works, besides innumerable memoirs and dissertations, are, The System of the World; Photometry; Pyrometry; and A New Key to the Sciences.

LAMBERT of Schawemburg, a German Benedictine, who went to Jerusalem in 1053, and published on his return, a dry chronicle from Adam to the year 1077, printed, Basil 1669, folio. The work is little else but a compendious history of Germany.

LAMBIN, Denys, professor of belles lettres at Paris, was born at Montreuil, in Picardy. His commentaries on Plautus, Lucretius, Cicero, and Horace, and his Latin translations of Aristotle's Morals and Politics, and some of the orations of Demosthenes and Æschines, do credit to his abilities as a critic and a scholar. He died 1672, of grief for the death of his friend, Peter Ramus, who had been murdered at the massacre of Bartholomew, a melancholy fate, which he dreaded for himself.

LAMBRUN, Margaret, a Scotch heroine. The tragic fate of Mary, queen of Scots, so affected her husband, who was in her confidential service, that he died of a broken heart; and Margaret therefore determined to avenge, by one fatal blow, the death of her beloved mistress, and of her affectionate husband. Thus roused to revenge, she assumed a man's dress, and went to England, and appeared in the presence of Elizabeth. Her eagerness, however, to reach the queen, made her drop one of her pistols, and this circumstance immediately occasioned her arrest. When brought before the queen and interrogated, she, with undaunted countenance, declared herself to be not a man but a woman, and that she was determined to avenge the deaths of her mistress who had been so iniquitously murdered, and of her husband, who had fallen a sacrifice to his sorrow. Neither reason nor force, added she, can hinder a woman from vengeance, when she is impelled by love. Elizabeth heard this with calm dignity, and replied, "you then persuade yourself that in assassinating me you have done your duty in satisfying your love for your mistress and your husband; what think you now to be my duty towards you?" On her asking whether she made this question as a judge, or as a queen, Elizabeth replied, as a queen, then, rejoined Margaret, you ought to grant me a pardon. What assurance have I, answered Elizabeth, you will not repeat the attempt? Madam, replied Margaret, a favor granted under restraints is no longer a favor, and in so doing you would act against me as a judge. The address and the unyielding firmness of the assassin, had due weight with the magnanimous queen. Margaret received an unconditional pardon, and at her request she was conducted out of the kingdom, and landed on the coast of France.

LAMI, Bernard, a philosopher, born of a noble family at Mons, 1645. He was so warm an admirer of the principles of Descartes, that he was in consequence exposed to persecution, and deprived of his professorship at Saumur, and of all his ecclesiastical preferments. He died at Rouen 1715. His writings were esteemed. They were, Elements of Geometry, 2 vols. 12mo.—Discourses on the Sciences, treatise on Perspective—Demonstration of the Holiness and truth of the Christian Morality, 5 vols. 12mo.—Apparatus Biblicus, a valuable book, 4to.—de Tabernaculo Fœderis, folio—Harmonia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to.—the Art of Speaking, with reflections on Poetry, 12mo.

LAMI, Dom Francis, a writer, born at Montyreaux, in the diocese of Chartres. From a soldier he became an ecclesiastic, and distinguished himself against Spinoza. He died at St. Denys, much regretted, 1711, aged 75. His book on Self Knowledge, 6 vols. 12mo. is greatly esteemed. He wrote besides, Philosophical Letters—a treatise on the Effects of thunder—and other pieces, in a pure and elegant style.

LAMI, John, ecclesiastical professor at Florence, is well known as the careful editor of the works of Meursius, in 12 vols. folio. His book on the Trinity was censured by the jesuits, and defended by himself. He was a very facetious and agreeable companion. He died at Florence 1774.

LAMOIGNON, Christian Francis de, an able lawyer, son of the marquis de Basville, born at Paris 1644. His learning, intelligence, and great powers of oratory, recommended him to the notice and partiality of Louis XIV. and he became advocate-general, and president of the parliament of Paris. He died in 1709, highly respected not only by the court, but by the people, by whom his virtues and abilities were deservedly admired. He was author of, le Plaidoyer and a Letter on the Death of Bourdaloue. His father, who was a man of great literary merit, and president of the parliament of Paris, died 1677.

LAMPE, Frederic Adolphus, professor of theology, and rector of the university of Bremen, died there, 1729, aged 46. He wrote an admired treatise, de Cymbalis Veterum, 12mo.—besides History, Sacred and Ecclesiastical, 4to.—Commentary on St. John's Gospel.

LAMPLUGH, Thomas, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he was fellow 1642. He followed the torrent during the civil wars, but at the restoration conformed, and was made head of Alban hall, and rector of St. Martin in the fields. In 1672, he was raised to the deanery of Rochester, and four years after to the see of Exeter. On William's landing, he exhorted the people to adhere to the fortunes of James, but soon after fled to London, and reconciled himself to the conqueror, on whose head he placed the crown, and by whom he was made archbishop of York. He died at Thorp castle 1691, aged 76.

LAMPRIIDIUS, Benedict, a Latin poet of Cremona, who taught Greek and Latin at Rome under Leo X. in 1521, he went to Padua, and some time after to Mantua, where he became tutor to the son of Frederick Gonzaga. His Greek and Latin epigrams, and his lyric verses are elegant, but far inferior to the style of Pindar, which he imitated. He died 1540.

LANA, Francis de, a jesuit, born at Brescia 1637. From his Magisterium Nature & Artis, published, Brescia 3 vols. folio, it appears, that he first had an idea of aërostation, and in support of his prior claim, before Montgolfier, the inventor of air balloons, a work called, Navis Volans, extracted from his works, was published at Naples 1784.

LANCASTER, James, an English navigator. He went, in 1591, with a squadron to the East Indies, where he visited Ceylon and Sumatra, and after destroying some of the enemy's ships not without loss, he sailed back to England. Unfavorable winds drove him on the African coast, and while on shore, his crew cut the cables and set sail, leaving him on an island, from which he escaped by means of a French ship, and landed at Rye, 1594. In another expedition he coasted along the Brazils, and took the town of Pernambuco, and returned 1595, loaded with immense booty. He was afterwards sent to the East Indies by the East India company, and he obtained advantageous settlements at Achen, and at Bantam from the native princes, and soon after returned to England, where he spent the remainder of life in ease and independence. He died about 1620.

LANCASTER, Nathaniel, D.D., a native of Cheshire, patronised by lord Cholmondeley. He became rector of Stamford Rivers, near Ongar, Essex, and died 20th June, 1775, aged 75, leaving two daughters. His Essay on Delicacy, published 1748, was much admired. He wrote also, Public Virtue, or the Love of our Country, a sermon—The Old Serpent, or Methodism Triumphant, a long poem.

LANCELOT, Claude, a native of Paris, tutor to the prince of Conti, and afterwards a Benedictine monk, in the abbey of St. Cyran, from which he was banished, in consequence of some private quarrels, to Ruimperlay, Lower Brittany, where he died 1659, aged 79. He was the able author of Nouvelle Methode pour apprendre la Langue Latine, 1644—& le Grec, 1656, translated into English by Nugent, under the title of Port-royal Grammars. He published also, Delectus Epigrammatum, 2 vols. 12mo.—Life of St. Cyran—Observations on Sacred Theology.

LANCELOTTI, John Paul, a native of Perugia, eminent as a canonist, whose abilities were employed by pope Paul IV. in compiling the institutions of canon law, in imitation of Justinian's civil institutions. He wrote some other things, and died 1591, aged 80.

LANCISI, John Marca, a physician, born at Rome, 26th Oct. 1654. He distinguished himself early for his abilities as a medical man and a philosopher, and in 1683, was made physician to pope Innocent XI. He was in the same office with his successor Clement XI. and gained universal reputation by his writings, and the excellence of his private character. He died 21st Jan. 1720. He gave in his lifetime, his noble library, of more than 20,000 volumes, to the hospital of the holy ghost, for the use of students. He wrote several books on his profession.

LANCRINCK, Prosper Henricus, a German painter, born at Antwerp about 1623. He lost his father when very young, but having a strong genius for painting, he improved himself by studying the manner of the most eminent masters of Europe in the collection of Van Lyan. He came over into England, where he was liberally patronised by the nobility; but unfortunately the most finished of his pictures were burnt in the house of his friend, sir William Williams. His landscapes were much admired. He fell a sacrifice to his intemperance, and died in August 1692. There still remains a valuable collection of pictures, drawings, prints, and antique heads, most of which he brought from abroad.

LANDEN, John, a self-taught mathematician, born in Northamptonshire. He obtained the patronage of lord Fitz-William, to whom he was agent; and in 1766, he was chosen fellow of the Royal society. He died 1790, aged 71. Besides interesting papers in the philosophical transactions, he published, Mathematical Lucubrations, 1755—Mathematical Memoirs, in 2 vols. very abstruse, but very curious and valuable.

LANDINI, Christopher, a learned Venetian of the 15th century, author of a translation of Pliny's Natural History into Italian—of some notes on Dante—and of Commentaries on Horace.

LANDO, Hortensio, a physician of the 16th century, born a Milan. He is author of several works under fictitious names. He wrote, Philoctetes, a dialogue, reflecting on Erasmus—and two others, called Cicero Relegatus—and Cicero Revocatus, ascribed falsely to cardinal Alexander.

LANDON, C. P., a French artist, who died in 1826, was keeper of the French Museum. He painted several pictures of merit; but he is more extensively known as the projector and editor of several works connected with his profession; among which are, The Annals of the Museum, and of the Modern School of the Fine Arts, thirty-three vols. 8vo.; Lives and works of the most celebrated Painters, twenty-two vols. 4to.; and Historical Gallery of the most celebrated Characters, thirteen vols. 12mo.

LANE, Jane, an English woman, to whose great heroism and presence of mind Charles II. was indebted for his escape. The royal fugitive, after his concealment in Boscobel tree, rode before her in the livery of her servant, from her father's house, Bentley hall, Staffordshire, to the house of Mr. Norton, near Bristol, from whence he proceeded to Brighton, and escaped to France. At the restoration she was amply rewarded, and married sir Clement Lister, bart. of Packington hall, Warwickshire.

LANFRANC, archbishop of Canterbury, was a native of Pavia. After studying at Bologna, he came to France, and taught at Avranches, from whence he came to Bec abbey, where he was elected prior 1044. He afterwards visited Rome, and complained to the pope of the doctrines of Berenger, and soon after his return, he was made abbot of St. Stephen at Caen, by William of Normandy. When that prince had conquered England, he raised Lanfranc to the see of Canterbury, vacant by the deposition of Stigand. The new primate repaired to Rome to obtain the pall from the hands of the pope, who treated him with great respect; but he showed throughout a firm and becoming opposition against the encroachments of the holy see. He died 23th May 1089. He rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded some hospitals, and repaired several churches and religious houses. In his character he was esteemed as an able politician. His writings, including his piece against Berenger, were published in 1643, by Dom d' Acheri, a Benedictine monk of St. Maur.

LANFRANC, John, an Italian painter, born at Panna, 1531. As he was poor, he was placed in the service of count Horatio Scotti, who observing his genius by his various drawings in coal on the walls, placed him under the care of Augustus Carracci. He afterwards studied under Annibale, whom he assisted in the execution of some of his finest pieces. He assisted also in the adorning of St. Peter's church at Rome, with such taste and success, that Urban VIII. knighted him. He was a great imitator of the manner of Corregio, but such was the impetuosity of his genius, that he frequently forgot the rules of his art, and substituted boldness for correctness. He chiefly excelled in painting domes, and in painting in fresco, and in drawing figures above the natural proportion. He died at Rome, 1647, aged 66.

LANFRANC, a physician of Milan. His abilities, and the success which he displayed in restoring surgery to a regular and respectable system, procured him enemies in his profession, and he removed to France, where he died 1300. His Chirurgia Magna & Parva, appeared at Venice, fol. 1490, and Lyons, 1553.

LANG, John Michael, author of Philologia Barbaro-Graeca, 1708, Nuriimb. 4to.—Dissertationes Botanicae-Theologicae, 1705, Altorf, 4to.—De Fabulis Mohammedicis, 1697, 4to. was professor of divinity at Altorf, and died 1731, aged 67.

LANGALIERE, Philip de Gentils, marquis de, first baron of Saintonge, distinguished himself in the service of France, during 20 years, and in 32 campaigns, but his merits did not prevent his disgrace by the intrigues of his enemy, Chamillar the minister. He was afterwards in the service of the emperor, and of the king of Poland, but at last he was suspected of secret intrigues with the Turks, and was arrested by the direction of the emperor, as he was going to Hanburgh. He died of a broken heart in prison; at Vienna, June 1717, aged 66.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, an English writer, born at Bartonkirke, Westmoreland, educated at Blencow school, and removed to Queen's college, Oxford. He became fellow of his house, and acquired literary celebrity by his edition of Longinus, and by other publications, so that he was elected keeper of the archives in 1644, and the next year, provost of the college. He died 10th Feb. 1657-8. During the civil wars he remained unmolested in the cultivation of literature in his college, and in familiar correspondence with Usher, Selden, and other learned men.

LANGDALE, Marmaduke, an Englishman of great courage. In the civil wars he warmly espoused the royal cause, and raising a troop, he defeated Fairfax, raised the siege of Pontefract castle, and seized Berwick and Carlisle. On the final triumph of the republicans, he retired to Flanders, and was, in reward of his gallant services, created a baron by Charles II. He died 1681.

LANGDON, Samuel, D.D. president of Harvard college, where he graduated 1740. He was ordained minister at Portsmouth New Hampshire 1747. In 1774 he was inducted into the office of president of Harvard college. In 1780 he resigned the office. He was installed at Hampton Falls N. H. 1781. He died 1797, aged 74. He published numerous sermons; observations on the revelations of Jesus Christ to saint John, 1791; corrections of some great mistakes committed by J. C. Ogden; remarks on the leading sentiments of Dr. Hopkins' system of doctrines, 1794.

LANGDON, John, L.L.D., governor of New Hampshire. He was educated for mercantile pursuits, and afterwards prosecuted business upon the sea until the commencement of the controversy with Great Britain. He was one of the party, which removed the powder and the military stores from fort William and Mary at Newcastle in 1774. In 1775 and 1776 he was chosen a delegate to congress. Commanding a company of volunteers, he served for a while in Vermont and Rhode Island. In his own state he was in 1776 and 1777, speaker of the house, and judge of the court of common pleas. In 1779 he was continental agent in New Hampshire, and contracted for the building of several public ships of war. In 1783 he was again appointed delegate to congress. He was afterwards repeatedly a member of the legislature, and speaker. In March 1788 he was chosen president of the state, and in Nov. was elected senator of the United States. From 1805 to 1808 and in 1810 and 1811 he was governor of the state. He died 1819, aged 78.

LANGELANDE, Robert, an old English poet, one of the first disciples of Wickliffe. He is the author of "the Visions of Pierce Plowman," a poem in 20 parts, replete with spirit and humor, and severely satirical against the various occupations of life, but particularly against the clergy. To the obscurity of an obsolete style in this once admired poem, is to be added an ungrateful alliteration, so harassing to the ear of the reader, and so inimical to the freedom of the poet.

LANGHAM, Simon, an English bishop, and a cardinal, successively abbot of Westminster, bishop of Ely, and in 1366, archbishop of Canterbury. He was made treasurer of England by Edward III. and cardinal legate by Urban VIII. He died at Avignon, 1376.

LANGHORNE, John, D.D. an English poet and divine, born at Kirby Stephen, Westmorland, son of a clergyman. When in orders he became tutor to the sons of Mr. Cracroft, of Lincolnshire, whose daughter he married, and whose early death he lamented pathetically with his friend Mr. Cartwright, in his poem called Constantia. Besides the living of Blagden, Somersetshire, he was prebendary of Wells, and justice of the peace. He died 1st April, 1779. He wrote sermons, 2 vols.—Plutarch's Lives translated—Poems, 2 vols. 12mo.—Letters of Theodosius and Constantia, 2 vols. 12mo.—Solyman and Almena, a tale—Frederic and Pharamond—Effusions of Fancy, 2 vols.—Fables of Flora, in verse, besides critiques in the Monthly Review.

LANGLAND, John, a native of Henley, Oxon, educated at Magdalen college. He successively became principal of Magdalen hall, dean of Salisbury, canon of Windsor, bishop of Lincoln, and in 1532 chancellor of Oxford. He was a popular and benevolent man, and favored strongly the king's divorce from Catharine of Arragon. He died May 7th, 1547, and had his body buried at Eton college, his heart at Lincoln, and his bowels at Woburn. His works were published in folio, 1532, London.

LANGLE, John Maximilian, a native of Evreux, for 25 years the minister of the reformed church of Rouen. He wrote a Defence of Charles I. of England—2 vols. of sermons—the Whole Duty of Man, translated from the English, and died 1674, aged 84.

LANGLE, Samuel de, D.D. son of the preceding, was born in London, but carried to France when only one year old. From the ministry of Rouen reformed church he removed to Charenton; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went over to England, where he obtained a Westminster prebend, and the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Oxford university. He died 1699. His Letter on the Differences between the church of England and the dissenters, was published by Stillingfleet.

LANGLES, Lewis Matthew, a celebrated Oriental scholar of France, was born in 1763. His father, who was a knight of the order of St. Lewis, destined him for his own profession, that of arms; but being partial to literature, he requested permission to study the Eastern languages, that he might be qualified for service in India. His education was commenced at Montdidier, and finished at Paris, whither he was brought by his parents. After having studied Arabic and Persian, by the advice of the ministers Bertin and de Breteuil, he engaged in the study of Mantchou, and published an alphabet of that language in 1787, with a dedication to the academy of Inscriptions. This work was followed in 1788 by a "Dictionnaire Mantchou-Francais," after which he printed various pieces translated from the Arabic and Persian. He had formed the design to go to the French transmarine settlements, but the political commotions at home induced him rather to remain at Paris, and devote himself to the cultivation of the living Oriental languages. In 1790 he presented to the Constituent assembly an address, developing the numerous advantages which would result from the protection and encouragement of the species of literature which he cultivated. The same year he published Indian Fables and Tales, newly translated, with a preliminary discourse and notes on the religion, manners, and literature of the Hindoos; and also the second volume of his Mantchou Dictionary. To his zeal and influence was owing the creation and organization of a particular school for the oriental living languages, in which he was professor of Russian. He wrote notes for a new edition of Travels by Pallas, which he published in 1795, 8 vols. 8vo. with an atlas. He also was the author of valuable additions to the Travels of Thunberg, Norden, and others. After the executive directory had suppressed the temporary commission of arts, and dispersed, in various establishments, the objects which had been collected at the Capuchin convent, M. Langles devoted himself entirely to the duties of his professorship, and to those which devolved on him as conservator of the Oriental manuscripts in the national library. On the formation of the Institute he became a member, and belonged to the commission of literature, to which he presented many memoirs and notices of manuscripts. He also assisted in many periodical works. The "Magazin Encyclopedique," especially, contains a great number of notices and dissertations from M. Langles. His death took place in January, 1824.

LANGTON, Stephen, an Englishman, educated at Paris. He became chancellor of Paris, and a cardinal of Rome, and afterwards was made archbishop of Canterbury, by the pope, who refused to admit the candidate nominated by the monks of that city. King John resisted this appointment; but the pope, armed with the spiritual power, put the monarch and his people under an interdict, if they refused to obey. The timid monarch, alarmed by the preparations of France to invade his kingdom, submitted at last to the papal decrees, received Langton as archbishop, and accepted absolution from his hands. Langton afterwards became obnoxious to the pope's displeasure at Rome, for resisting the extension of his power in England, and for refusing to excommunicate the rebellious barons; but was reconciled to the holy see, and died in peace in England, 9th July, 1228, after being 22 years at the head of the church. He was a man of great abilities as a writer, and as a politician. His works are mentioned by Bayle and Tanner.

LANGUET, Hubert, a learned Frenchman, born at Viteaux, 1518. He was minister of state to the elector of Saxony, and from a catholic became a strong protestant, by reading the works, and frequenting the company, of Melancthon. After making the tour of Italy, of Livonia, and Lapponia, and enjoying the confidence of Gustavus, king of Sweden, Languet was employed as envoy to France, by Augustus, elector of Saxony, 1565. He was afterwards engaged in negotiations at Heidelberg, Cologne, Spire, and Stettin, and in his second embassy to France he was nearly sacrificed in the horrid massacres of St. Bartholomew, though he had the good fortune to save the life of his friend, Philip de Mornay, and of the learned Wechelius, in whose house he lodged. In 1574 he was envoy at Vienna; but in the controversy which took place in Saxony, between the Lutherans and the Zuiglians, about the eucharist, he was violently suspected of favoring the latter, upon which he retired from the court of the elector of Prague, where he entered into the service of John Casimir, count Palatine. He next was employed by the prince of Orange, at Antwerp, but his health did not permit him to display those active services which he had shown in the affairs of other princes. He died at Antwerp, 20th Sept. 1581. He was a man of great political knowledge, and deservedly esteemed by the wisest and most eminent men of his age. Mornay says of him, with feeling and truth, Is fuit qualis multi videri volunt, is vixit qualis optimi mori cupiunt. His letters in Latin to the elector of Saxony, were printed, Halle, 4to. 1699. Besides letters to sir Philip Sidney, 12mo. 1646, and other things.

LANGUET, John Baptist Joseph, a relation of the above, born at Dijon, June 6th, 1675. He studied at Paris, became vicar of St. Sulpice, after being curate of the place for some years. He rebuilt his church, and rendered it one of the finest in the world for architecture and ornaments. He began the work with little money, but his zeal, and the emulation which he excited among his parishioners, whose number amounted to 150,000, surmounted every obstacle, and the consecration in 1745, was attended with such splendor, that the king of Prussia with his own hand, thanked the public spirited vicar for the success and popularity of his great exertions. He also founded the house of the infant Jesus, divided into two parts, one of which was for the support of 35 poor ladies, and the other of more than 400 poor women, who are usefully employed in spinning, and in the working of cloths and linens. This noble institution in 1741, contained more than 1400 women and girls, engaged in industrious labors, and encouraged in habits of virtue, by example and precept. The whole life of this truly great man was spent, in deeds of humanity, so that it is said, he expended annually little less than a million of livres in charity. His popularity commanded not only the public esteem, but the favor of the great; but he refused all the high ecclesiastical promotions, and bishoprics, to which cardinal Fleury, the duke of Orleans, Louis XIV. and XV. wished to raise him. He died 11th Oct. 1750, aged 75, at the abbey de Bernay.

LANGUET, John Joseph, brother to the preceding, was bishop of Soissons, and in 1731 archbishop of Sens, where he died 1753. He was a polemical divine, and translated the psalms, and was esteemed for his benevolence and piety.

LANJUINAIS, count John Denis, a French statesman and man of letters, born at Rennes in 1753. He was educated for the bar, and became professor of law at his native place. In 1779 he was chosen one of the counsellors of the states of Brittany, and in 1789 he was a deputy from the Tiers Etat to the States General. He took an active part in the deliberations of the legislative assembly, and after the session was over, he resumed his chair at Rennes. In September 1792 he entered the National Convention, in which he acted as the friend of rational liberty; and on the trial of the king he voted for his reclusion, and banishment on the restoration of peace. He was afterwards proscribed by the jacobins, and having remained in concealment during the reign of terror, he returned to his seat in the Convention in 1795. On the creation of the two legislative councils, he became a member of that of the Ancients; and he was admitted into the senate on the double presentation of the legislative body, March, 22, 1800. Lanjuinais opposed the establishment of the consulship for life; notwithstanding which he was made a count of the empire, and a commandant of the legion of honor. He voted in the senate for the abdication of Napoleon, and on the restoration of the king he was comprised in the first organization of the chamber of peers, where he continued after the second restoration. He died January 13, 1827, leaving the character of an enlightened patriot and independent man. Among his numerous works, chiefly relating to politics, is a treatise entitled, "Constitutions de la Nation Française, précédées d'un Essai Historique et Politique sur la Charte," Paris, 1819, 2 vols. 8vo.

LANNOY, or LAUNOY, Charles de, an able general in the service of the emperor, Charles V. He took Francis I. prisoner, at the battle of Pavia, and conducted himself with great humanity, and becoming respect towards the captive monarch. When Francis was restored to liberty, Lannoy was commissioned by the emperor, to conduct him back in safety to his dominions. He died at Gazette, 1527.

LANSBERGHE, Philip, a learned mathematician, born at Ghent, 1561, and minister of Antwerp, which he left for Holland when that city was taken by the Spaniards. He died at Middleburg, 1632, leaving behind him, Sacred Chronology, published 1626—Essays on Astronomy, on Geometrical Triangles, on Measuring the Heavens, and on the Motion of the Earth. His son James was also an able mathematician, and defended his father against the attacks of Fromond, of Louvain, who pretended that the earth stood still. He died 1657.

LANSDOWN, George Granville, Viscount, was born in 1667; was educated at Westminster, and at Trinity College, Cambridge; sat in the Commons, as member for Fowey; was appointed secretary of war in 1710; was raised to the peerage in 1711; was arrested and sent to the Tower in 1715, on suspicion of being disaffected to the house of Hanover, and remained twelve months a captive; and died in 1735. His poetical and prose works form two quarto volumes.

LANSDOWN, William Petty, marquis of, was born in 1737; and succeeded to the title of earl of Shelburne in 1761. After having twice held a post under government, in 1763 and 1766, he was displaced in 1768, and remained in opposition till 1782, when he was appointed secretary of state for the foreign department. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham, he succeeded him as premier, but was soon ousted by the coalesced influence of Fox and North. In 1784 he was created a marquis. He died in 1805. The marquis of Lansdown is one of the many persons to whom the Letters of Junius have been ascribed.

LANTIER, E. F. de, a poet and miscellaneous writer, who, from his age, was denominated the Nestor of literary France, was born, in 1736, at Marseilles; and died there in 1826. His chief works are, The Travels of Antenor in Greece (which has been called the Anacharsis of the bon-dois); A Journey in Spain; Tales; Comedies; Poems; and Geoffrey Rudel, or the Troubadour, in eight cantos.

LANZI, Louis, a learned Italian Jesuit, was born in 1732, at Monte di Olmo, and died, in 1810, at Florence, of the gallery of which city he was sub-director. He was considered as one of the most able of Italian philologists and archaeologists. Two of his best works are, An Essay on the Tuscan Language; and A History of Painting in Italy.

LANZONI, Joseph, a native of Ferrara, who restored the academy there, of which he became secretary, and medical professor. Eminent as a physician, he was equally great as a man of letters, and an antiquarian. He published various works collected into 3 vols. 4to. in Latin, 1738. He died 1730, aged 67.

LAPARELLI, Francis, a native of Cortona, eminent as an architect, a mechanic, and an engineer. His abilities recommended him to Cosmo I. duke of Tuscany, and he was employed by Pius IV. in the fortifications and defence of Civita Vecchia. He was in 1565 employed in the fortification of Malta, against the power of Solyman and his Turkish army, and under his judicious eye the city of Valette was planned. He afterwards was in the service of the Venetians, and died of the plague while before Candia 1570, aged 49. He assisted Michael Angelo in the completion of his designs for the erection of St. Peter's church at Rome.

LAPLACE, Marquis Peter Simon, a celebrated French astronomer and geometrician, was born, in 1749, at Beaumont en Auge. After having been professor of mathematics at his native place, he went to Paris, where he succeeded Bezout, as examiner of the royal artillery corps. His scientific reputation was soon widely extended by his valuable productions. After the establishment of the consulship, he was for a short time minister of the home department. In 1799 he was placed in the senate, and in 1803 became vice-president of that body. Napoleon made him a count; Louis XVIII. raised him to the rank of marquis. He died March 6, 1827. His two greatest works, which alone would suffice to immortalize his name, are, An Exposition of the System of the World, two vols. 8vo.; and A Treatise on Celestial Mechanism, five vols. 4to.

LARCHER, Peter Henry, an ingenious writer, was born at Dijon in 1726. He studied in the college of Laon, at Paris; and, in 1750, published his translation of the Electra of Euripides, which met with indifferent success. In 1758 appeared his translation of "Chereas, and Callirrhoe," from the Greek; after which he had a violent quarrel with Voltaire, who was, however, the aggressor. Larcher now undertook a translation of Herodotus, which did not come out till 1736. The best edition is in nine volumes octavo. His other works are, "Memoire sur Venus;" and a translation of Xenophon. He died Dec. 22, 1812.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, D.D. a dissenting minister, born at Hawkhurst in Kent, 1684. He was educated in London, and then went to Utrecht, where he improved himself under Grævius and Burman, and afterwards he studied at Leyden. In 1713 he was engaged as tutor to the younger son of lady Treby, widow of the chief justice of common pleas, with whom he travelled over France, Holland, and the Netherlands. In 1723 he was employed with others in a course of lectures at the old Bailey; but though his abilities were great and universally acknowledged, he did not obtain a settlement among the dissenters till the 45th year of his age, when in 1729, he became assistant minister at Crutched Friars. His literary labors had now so distinguished him, that the college of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. This learned man, so well skilled in scriptural erudition and ecclesiastical history, died at Hawkhurst, where he had a small estate, in 1768, of a decline. The best known of his works are his "Credibility of the Gospel History" in five volumes completed in 1743, a work of great merit, and so highly respected abroad that it was translated into Dutch and Latin—Letters on the Logos—a Vindication of three of our Saviour's Miracles, against the petulant cavils of Woolston and Supplement to the Credibility. All his works were collected by Dr. Kippis in 11 large vols. 8vo. to which his life is prefixed.

LARGILLIERE, Nicholas de, a French painter, born at Paris, 1656. He studied under Gobeau, and then went to England, where he was noticed by Lely, and recommended to the patronage of Charles II. He returned to Paris, where he enjoyed the friendship of Vander Mulen and Le Brun, and was made historical painter to the French academy. On the accession of James II. he again visited England, and painted that monarch and his queen; but he soon after returned to France, where he was made director of the academy as a reward for his great merit. He died 1705. His best piece is the crucifixion of Christ.

LARREY, Isaac de, a Calvinist born at Lintot near Bolbec. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he fled to Holland, and became historiographer to the States. He died 1719. His works are a History of England, 4 vols. fol. valuable for its intrinsic merit, as well as its excellent portraits—History of Louis XIV. 3 vols. 4to.—a History of Augustus, 8vo.—a History of the Seven Wise Men, 2 vols. 8vo.

LARROQUE, Matthew de, a French protestant, born at Leirac, in Germany, 1619. His popularity was such, that after being 27 years minister of Vitré in Brittany, by the favor of the duchess of Tremouille, he was invited by the churches of Montaubin, Bourdeaux, and Rouen, and in consequence of the honorable testimonies accepted the offers of the last. He died at Rouen 1684. His works are, a History of the Eucharist, 4to.—an Answer to Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux on the Communion of two Kinds, 12mo.—and a treatise on the Regale.

LARROQUE, Daniel de, son of the preceding, was born at Vitré, and in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, went to England, and afterwards visited Copenhagen and Amsterdam. He went to Paris, determined to become a catholic; but the satire which he wrote on Louis XIV. on account of the famine of 1693, threw him into the prison of the Chatelet for five years. At his release he obtained a pension from the ministry, and died 1731. He wrote the Life of the historian Mezeray—and translated Echard's Roman History—and Prideaux's Life of Mahomet.

LASCARIS, Constantine, one of the learned Greeks, who upon the sacking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, fled to Italy. He taught Greek and polite literature at Milan, and afterwards at Messina, where his great abilities and high reputation drew crowds of respectful disciples, and among them Bembo. He died at Messina, when very old, at the close of the 15th century, and left his library to the senate. He published a Greek grammar at Milan 1476, 4to. and other things.

LASCARIS, John, surnamed Rhyndacenus, was of the imperial family. He was employed by Laurence de Medicis to make a collection of books in Greece, and he was so fortunate as to be permitted by the grand signior to examine all the libraries of Constantinople and Greece, in consequence of which he greatly enriched the collections of Italy. He was afterwards ambassador from Louis XII. of France to Venice, and on the election of Leo X. he went to Rome, where he became director of the Greek college. He was an admirable scholar, and brought again into use the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, and wrote some epigrams and moral sentences in that language. He died 1535.

LASCI, or LASKO, John de, a learned Pole, made provost of Gresna, and bishop of Vesprim in Hungary. He had shown such partiality for Zuiniglius at Zurich, that he now boldly declared in favor of the reformation; in consequence of which he was dismissed from his bishopric, and retired in 1542, to East Friesland, where he became minister of the church of Embden. He afterwards went to England, and was held in great esteem by the clergy, though he ventured to write a pamphlet against the habits and ceremonies of the English church; but in the reign of Mary he was obliged to fly from the country. He afterwards was reconciled to Sigismund, king of Poland, and employed by him in affairs of trust and importance. He died 13th Jan. 1560.

LATHROP, Joseph, D.D., minister of West Springfield Mass. graduated at Yale college 1750. He was ordained at Springfield, 1756, and died 1820, aged 89. At the time of his death he stood as the patriarch of the congregational churches; no minister was more respected and venerated. As a writer he was remarkably perspicuous, plain and useful. His publications were numerous and more extensively known, than those of any contemporary theologian of North America. They consisted of sermons, six volumes of which were published during his life, on various subjects, chiefly practical. After his death an additional volume was published accompanied by a memoir of his life written by himself. He published also a great number of occasional sermons.

LATHROP, John, D.D., minister of Boston, graduated at Princeton college 1763. He was ordained minister of the Old North Church Boston 1768. In 1779 his society having united with Dr. Pemberton's of the New Brick church, their own church being demolished by the enemy, he became the pastor of the united society, called the second church. He died 1816, aged 75. He was an officer of various literary and charitable societies, and for a long time a member of the corporation of Harvard college. He published a great number of occasional sermons.

LATHROP, John, graduated at Harvard college 1789. Having studied law he settled in Dedham, Massachusetts, but soon left the place and abandoned the profession. He afterwards embarked for India and lived at Calcutta ten years, teaching a school, and writing for the journals. In 1809 he returned, and engaged in the business of teaching, and gave lectures on natural philosophy. In 1819 he proposed to publish a work on the manners and customs of India. He went to the south and delivered lectures. At last he obtained a place in the post office. He died 1820, aged 48. He published an oration July 4, 1796; speech of Canonius, a poem, Calcutta, 1802; the same, Boston 1803; pocket register and free-mason's anthology, 1813.

LATIMER, Hugh, an illustrious prelate, born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire 1470. His father, who was rather an industrious than rich farmer, educated him at a grammar school, and as his abilities were of superior order he sent him to Cambridge, where he took his degrees. Young Latimer, when admitted into the church, was a warm supporter of the established religion, against the innovations of Luther and Melancthon; but by degrees his prejudices in favor of the pope disappeared in the conversation of his friend Bilney, a man of pious character and of deep learning, who even laid down his life in the support of the doctrines of the reformation. With his usual warmth the new convert zealously devoted himself to propagate those tenets which lately he had censured as impious and heretical, and so great was his influence, and so powerful his eloquence, that he was regarded as the head of his party. His severe trials, and successful efforts against the papists, at last recommended him to the notice of lord Cromwell and of Henry VIII. during the time of his intended divorce; and in reward for his services in the cause of the king and of the reformation, Latimer was nominated to the see of Worcester. In this new office he behaved with his usual spirit, yet not without moderation. In the convocation of 1536 he ably opposed the measures of the popish party, and was happily instrumental in the recommendation of the English translation of the bible to general perusal. But while he expected the final triumph of his party, he found the influence of Gardiner too powerful, and the enactment of the famous act called the six articles in the parliament of 1539, proved so disagreeable to his feelings that he refused any longer to hold his bishopric, but preferred a life of retirement and privacy. His enemies, however, were not inactive, and not satisfied to see him stripped of his honors, they procured his imprisonment in the tower for the last six years of Henry's reign. The accession of Edward VI. restored Latimer to favor and to liberty; but while his friends solicited him to resume his episcopal functions, he repeatedly refused, and retired to Lambeth palace, where he lived on the bounty and in the friendship of Cranmer. Here his abilities were called into action; he assisted his learned friend in the composition of the Homilies, and frequently preached before the king, and displayed those powers of eloquence, and that strong vein of humor which the manners of the time allowed to be used in the pulpit. On the restoration of popery in the reign of Mary, the venerable Latimer was marked for destruction by the sanguinary Gardiner. He was seized, and from the tower was sent to Oxford, where he with Cranmer and Ridley disappointed to hold a dispute with some attended to vines. This disputation was artful."

expose these champions of the reformation to the severest punishments of a partial and prejudiced tribunal, and therefore when Latimer and his revered associates rejected all the popish doctrines, except they rested on the clear authority of scripture, sentence of death was passed upon them. Latimer and Ridley were consequently burned at Oxford 1554, in the midst of the insults of the monks, and as they recommended their souls to God, while the fatal flames spread around them, the venerable Latimer comforted his fellow sufferer, exclaiming, We shall this day, my lord, light such a candle in England as shall never be extinguished. His sermons have often been printed.

LAUD, William, D. D., archbishop of Canterbury, was born 7th Oct. 1578. He was educated at St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1593. He afterwards took orders; but his chapel exercises against the puritans, whose doctrines he censured, drew upon him the displeasure of Abbot the primate, then chancellor of the university. Though virulently attacked by the puritan party in the university, his learning and his abilities procured him friends; he in 1607 obtained the vicarage of Stanford, Northamptonshire, and the next year the living of North Kilworth, Leicestershire. In 1608 he became chaplain to bishop Neile, and exchanged Kilworth for Tilbury rectory in Essex, in 1609. In 1610 he succeeded to the living of Cuckstone, Kent, and resigned his Oxford fellowship; but the next year he was elected president of his college, by the assistance of his patron Neile, who exerted all his influence to counteract the partial misrepresentation of Abbot, and of chancellor Ellesmere, with the king. He was next appointed chaplain to the king, and in 1616 made dean of Gloucester, and the next year he accompanied the king to Scotland, to endeavor to persuade the Scotch clergy to conform with the rites and the liturgy of the English church. In 1622 he held his famous conference with Fisher, the jesuit, in the presence of the duke of Buckingham and his mother, who were wavering in the protestant faith, and he had the good fortune not only to fix his opinions, but to obtain his future friendship. He officiated as dean of Westminster in 1626, at the coronation of the first Charles, and the same year he was translated to Bath and Wells, and two years after to London. In 1630 he was elected chancellor of Oxford, and in this dignified situation he contributed most liberally, during the whole of life, to adorn and improve his favorite university. The death of Buckingham raised him to the dangerous situation of prime minister, and in 1633 he succeeded Abbot as primate. In these high offices he labored strenuously to repress the fanatical spirit of the times, but his attempts to produce an uniformity between the churches of England and Scotland, not only proved unavailing, but exposed him to great obloquy. His attention to the independence of the Irish clergy was highly commendable, as he obtained from the king, in their favor, a grant of all the impropriations remaining in the crown. But the purest of his motives in these turbulent times were unfortunately misrepresented because he was connected with the court, and had a share in the prosecutions of the Star chamber against the obstinate puritans. The fate of Stafford was the forerunner of his own, and on the accusation of sir Henry Vane, he was seized and conveyed to the tower, 1st March, 1640-1. During the three years which preceded his trial he was exposed to every indignity, his revenues were confiscated, he was fined 20,000*l.* for his connection with the Star chamber, and every article of comfort which might cheer his hours of solitude was carefully removed, and even the papers which he had prepared for his defence were rudely seized, and never returned. His trial began 12th, and finished July 29th, 1644; but though nothing treasonable could be proved, such was the virulence of the commons, that a bill of attainder was passed the following November against him, and the peers in the next January were forced by the threats of the mob to pronounce against him. His defence, firm, eloquent, undaunted and pathetic, could not avail before a prejudiced tribunal, and he was sentenced to be beheaded. He suffered on Tower hill, 10th Jan. aged 71, maintaining to the last the composure of innocence, and the resignation of piety. In his character, Laud was a man of integrity, zealously attached to the rites of the church, sincere and ardent, but too often indiscreet and obstinate, and eager to sacrifice his fame and the interests of his master even for the sake of trifles. Though unhappily tinged with too high notions of divine right and of unlimited prerogative for times of turbulence and civil dissention, it does not appear that he was inclined to favor the tenets of the church of Rome, though they might more powerfully have supported the measures of an arbitrary court. He was a man of extensive knowledge, and as Clarendon observes, his learning, piety and virtue, have been attained by very few, and the greatest of his infirmities are common to all, even the best of men. He wrote "seven Sermons" on several occasions—Annotations on the Death of king James—Answer to the Remonstrance of the House of Commons—Diary published by Wharton, with other pieces—Summary of Devotions—Remains, fol.—Private Devotions—and Letters.

LAUDER, William, a native of Scotland, who studied in the university of Edinburgh, and taught Latin there. He published in 1739 an edition of Jobuston's psalms, and in 1742 was appointed master of Dundee school. He afterwards went to London, and 1747 began to publish in the Gentleman's Magazine his forgeries on Milton, which in 1751 he collected together under the name of an Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost, 8vo. His quotations, though for some time supposed to be genuine, were soon after proved to be forgeries from Grotius and others, by Dr. Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and the wretched plagiarist, overwhelmed with confusion, subscribed a confession of his offence, dictated by Dr. Johnson, and acknowledged the baseness of his conduct. Thus lost in the public opinion he went to Barbadoes, where he kept a school, but with little reputation. He died at Barbadoes, 1771.

LAUDHON, or LOUDON, Gideon Ernest, a celebrated Austrian general, descended from a Scotch family, and born at Tootzan, 1716. He was in 1731 engaged in the Russian service, but despairing of preferment he entered into the Austrian army, and obtained the rank of captain in 1742. After the peace of 1748 he rose to the rank of major, and was afterwards made lieutenant-colonel of Croats; but his genius and abilities displayed in the seven years war against the brilliant evolutions of the great Frederic, soon called him to higher honors. He was made major-general and a knight of the military order of Maria Theresa in 1757, and the confidence placed in his valor and judgment was soon evinced in the great victory of Hochkerchen, and that of Kunnersdorff. The Prussians were afterwards defeated at Landshut, and the gates of Glatz opened to the victorious general. At the peace of 1763 his services were rewarded with the dignity of a baron, and a pension, and three years after he was appointed member of the Aulic council, and in 1778 made field-marshal of the empire. In the war which took place between Turkey and Austria, he had fresh opportunities of distinguishing himself, the Turks were routed, and Belgrade was taken 1739. This illustrious chief died 14th July, 1790.

LAUNOI, John de, a learned French writer, well skilled in the discipline, rights and privileges of the Gallican church, which he ably defended against the encroachments of the see of Rome. He was also a violent and determined enemy against legends, traditions, and saints, and showed himself so disinterested, that he refused benefices, satisfied with the independence of an humble situation. He died at Paris 1678, aged 75. His writings, which are very numerous, are enumerated by Niceron.

LAUR, Philippo, an eminent painter, born at Rome 1623. He studied under his elder brother Balthasar, who died at the early age of 25, and under Angelo Coroselli, and soon acquired some celebrity. His large pictures for churches were admired, but particularly his historical subjects, with excellent landscapes in the back ground. His chief pieces were metamorphoses and bacchanals, in which he displayed great taste and judgment. He was of a cheerful disposition, and died at Rome 1694, aged 71.

LAURATI, Peter, a native of Sienna, celebrated as a painter. He was the disciple of Giotto, and particularly excelled in his draperies, which were finished in such exquisite taste that the delicate proportions of the human limbs became visible through them. He flourished in the 15th century, and chiefly resided at Sienna and at Arezzo.

LAURENS, Henry, president of congress, was a native of South Carolina, and took an early part in opposing the arbitrary claims of Great Britain at the commencement of the American revolution. When the provincial congress of Carolina met in June 1775, he was appointed its president, in which capacity he drew up a form of association to be signed by all the friends of liberty, which indicated a most determined spirit. After the establishment of the temporary constitution in 1776, he was elected vice president. Being a member of the general congress, after the resignation of Hancock, he was appointed president in Nov. 1777. In 1780 he was deputed to solicit a loan from Holland and to negotiate a treaty with the United Netherlands. But on his passage he was captured by a British vessel on the banks of Newfoundland. He threw his papers overboard, but they were recovered by a sailor. Being sent to England, he was committed to the tower Oct. 6, as a state prisoner upon a charge of high treason. Here he was confined more than a year and was treated with great severity, being denied for the most part all intercourse with his friends, and forbidden the use of pen, ink, and paper. His capture occasioned no small embarrassment to the ministry. They dared not condemn him as a rebel through fear of retaliation, and they were unwilling to release him, lest he should accomplish the object of his mission. The discoveries made by his papers led to war between Great Britain and Holland, and Mr. Adams was appointed in his place to carry on the negotiation with the United provinces. During his imprisonment, it was intimated to Mr. Laurens, that it might be of advantage to him if he could induce his son, then on a mission to France, to withdraw from that country. He replied, "that it such was the filial regard of his son, that he knew he would not hesitate to forfeit his life for his father; but that no consideration would induce colonel Laurens to relinquish his honor, even were it possible for any circumstance to prevail on his father to make the improper request." At length, in Dec. 1781, enfeebled in health, and apparently sinking into the grave if continued in confinement, he sent a petition to the house of commons for release, stating that he had labored to preserve the friendship between Great Britain and the colonies, and had extended acts of kindness to British prisoners of war. At the close of the year, he was released. Proceeding to Paris he signed the preliminaries of peace Nov. 30, 1782, having been appointed by congress one of the commissioners. He returned to America in 1783, and died at Charleston 1792, aged 69. He directed his son to burn his body on the third day after his death, as the sole condition of inheriting an estate of 60,000*l.* sterling.

LAURENS, John, a brave officer in the American revolutionary war, was the son of the preceding, and was sent to England for his education. He joined the army in the beginning of 1777, from which time he was foremost in danger. At Germantown he was wounded. He was present, and distinguished himself in every action of the army under general Washington, and was among the first, who entered the British lines at Yorktown. Early in 1781, while he held the rank of lieutenant colonel, he was selected as the most suitable person to depute on a special mission to France to solicit a loan of money, and to procure military stores. He reached France in March, and returned in August, having been so successful in the execution of his commission, that congress passed a vote of thanks for his services. Such was his despatch, that in three days after he repaired to Philadelphia, he finished his business with congress, and immediately afterward rejoined the American army. In conjunction with Dr. Franklin, count de Vergennes, and marquis de Castries, he arranged the plan of the campaign for 1781. August 27, in 1782, in opposing a foraging party of the British, near Combahee river in South Carolina, he was mortally wounded, and died at the age of 29.

LAURENCE, Sir Thomas, a celebrated artist, was born, in 1769, at Bristol. Before he was five years old, he was remarkable for drawing likenesses and reciting poetry. Of education he received very little, but he acquired a large portion of knowledge by reading. He was not more than ten years old when his talents became the sole resource of his father and the rest of the family. For eight years he continued to draw portraits at Oxford and Bath; but in 1787 he took up his residence in the metropolis, and soon became a popular painter. In 1791 he was admitted an associate, and soon after, an academician, of the Royal Academy. Every year now added to his fame and fortune. In 1814 the Prince Regent employed him to take portraits of the sovereigns and warriors who visited England; in 1815 he was knighted; in 1818 he was sent to Aix la Chapelle, to paint the members of the congress; in 1819 he visited Italy; and, in the following year, he was elected president of the Academy. He died January 7, 1830.

LAURENT, Peter Joseph, a native of Flanders, famous for his astonishing mechanical powers. When only eight years old, he constructed a hydraulic machine of great ingenuity, and when matured by time and by education, he was, at the age of 21, appointed superintendent of various public works, and of the canals of the Low Countries, and of Hainault. The junction of the Scheldt with the Somme, though presenting great difficulties, was effected by his persevering genius, by the means of a subterranean canal of three leagues extent; and other works were effected in Flanders, which, by removing the obstacles of nature, secured comfort and communication to the inhabitants of Valenciennes, and Lisle. This ingenious man was honored with the order of St. Michael by the French king, and died 1775, respected in private life.

LAURENTIO, Nicholas, a remarkable character, in the history of modern Rome. Though but the son of a vintner and a laundress, he rose by his intrigues and eloquence to notice, and prevailed upon the Roman populace to expel their nobles, and intrust the sovereign power into his hands. His usurpation was the cause of war, and at last he was defeated; but a second time he rose to the supreme authority, and might have long continued absolute, had he not been cruel in his punishments. The populace irritated against him, set his palace on fire, and he was run through the body in his attempts to escape, and stabbed by a thousand wounds. His body hung by the heels in public derision, was at last taken down and buried by the Jews.

LAVAT, Francois de, first bishop of Canada, arrived in June 1659. He was also the pope's apostolic vicar. In 1662 he procured the establishment of the Seminary at Quebec. He sent out various missionaries amongst the Indians. He made great and commendable exertions to prevent the supply to the Indians of strong liquors, for all his promising Christians were becoming drunkards. But he struggled in vain against the covetousness of the traders, who were not opposed by the government. He therefore in 1662 repaired to France, and presented his complaint to the king, and obtained an order for the suppression of the detestable traffic. It was afterwards resumed, and representations were made of the indispensable necessity of it, in order to secure the friendship of the Indians. The bishop was for some time engaged in another struggle; but in 1678 he procured another order for the suppression of the traffic under severe penalties to offenders.

LAVATER, John Gaspar Christian, a celebrated writer, born at Zurich 1741. He was pastor of the church of St. Peter's at Zurich, and as a minister he acquired great reputation both by his eloquent discourses and his exemplary life. He was wounded by a French soldier when Zurich was taken by storm under Massena in 1799, and died there in consequence of it 12th Jan. 1801. He acquired deserved celebrity as a physiognomist, and his writings on the subject, possessing great merit, ingenious remarks, and truly original ideas have been translated into all the languages of Europe. His works are Poems—Solomon—Jesus Messiah, 4 vols.—Nathaniel, 8vo.—Letters Paternelles—treatise on Physiognomy—Journal of a Self Observer, 8vo.—Prose works, and Letters supposed to be written by Paul before his conversion.

LAVEAUX, John Charles Thibault de, a philological writer, born at Troyes, in France, in 1749. He became professor of literature at Berlin, whence he removed to Strasburgh, where he edited a political journal. In August 1792 he went to Paris, and became chief conductor of the "Journal de la Montagne," which he at length relinquished to devote himself to the belles lettres. He died at Paris, March 15, 1827. Among many useful works which he published, are "Nouveau Dictionnaire de la Langue Françoise," 1820, 2 vols. 8vo.

LAVINGTON, George, LL.D., a native of Heavitree, Devonshire, England, and educated at Exeter college. He afterwards obtained a prebend at Worcester, a canon residentiaryship at St. Paul's, and the see of Exeter. He wrote the Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared, a curious work—a Tract on the Moravians—Single Sermons, and died 1762, aged 79.

LAVIROTTE, Lewis Anne, a native of Nolay in the diocese of Autun, eminent as a physician and as the translator of Maclaurin's Account of Newton's Discoveries; he wrote also Observations on the Hydrophobia and other medical works, and died 1759, aged 34.

LAVOISIER, Antony Laurence, a celebrated chemist, born at Paris, 26th Aug. 1743. At the age of 23 he obtained from the academy of sciences a golden medal for a memoir on the best method of lighting the streets with economy and efficacy. In 1768 he was chosen member of the academy, and enriched its memoirs by above forty valuable dissertations on subjects of chemistry and political economy, the result of deep and laborious experiments. His new system of chemistry was received with great applause in France and over the continent, though it militated against the prevalent doctrine of phlogiston adopted and supported by the experiments of Dr. Priestley. He was treasurer of the academy after Buffon and Tillet, and successively was appointed farmer-general, register of powder and saltpetre, and commissary of the national treasury, and in these offices he labored assiduously with the most conscientious integrity, to advance the interests of the nation as well as to promote the improvement of science and natural history. These services deserved the highest rewards of national gratitude; but the revolution came to shorten his days. His abilities and virtues were too conspicuous to escape the notice of the sanguinary tyrants of France. He was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, but when he demanded the suspension of his sentence for 14 days, that he might finish some experiments serviceable to the public, the blood-thirsty judge replied that France was not in want either of learned men or chemists, and immediately Lavoisier walked with composure to the fatal spot, and was guillotined, 6th April, 1794. He wrote Chemical and Physical works, 2 vols. 8vo. 1773—Nouvelles Recherches sur le Fluide Elastique, a valuable work, 1775—Report on Annual Magnetism, 8vo.—Methode de Nomenclature Chimique—Elementary treatise on Chemistry, 2 vols. 8vo. 1789—Instruction on the making of Saltpetre, 8vo.—de la Reproduction & de la Consommation comparees à la Population, 8vo. Fourcroy pronounced his eulogy at the Lycæum, and la Lande has painted his character in the liveliest colors, and represented him as he was, a man of great virtue and benevolence, endued with all the amiable qualities of the heart, and the amplest resources of the mind.

LAW, John, a celebrated projector, born at Edinburgh, 16th April, 1671. He early applied himself to the study of arithmetic, geography, mathematics and algebra, but his prospects were all at once clouded by his unfortunate conduct. He debauched the daughter of a gentleman in London, and killed her brother who interferred in vindication of her character, and in consequence of this he was condemned to be hanged, but escaped from the hands of justice and fled to Holland, and then to Italy. He returned to his country in 1700, under the protection of the duke of Argyle, and proposed to the parliament various plans of finance, which were disapproved, in consequence of which he left the kingdom to seek encouragement and protection in foreign courts. He visited Brussels, Venice and Genoa, and at last he gained the confidence of the duke of Orleans the regent of France, and settled at Paris. He there established a bank in 1716, and soon it became the general bank of the kingdom, to which were united the interests of the Mississippi company. The hopes of immense gain, and the love of novelty gradually brought all the specie of the kingdom under his control, and his paper rose to full twenty times its original value, and in 1719 was calculated as worth more than 80 times the circulating coin of the whole nation. Thus while France considered itself as rapidly rising into opulence and power, and while the infatuated projector purchased vast possessions, and united in his person the offices of comptroller and financier, the real sources of the kingdom were gradually diminishing, extravagance took place of economy, and the love of glory and distinction was disregarded for the sudden acquisition of riches. At last the bank was found incapable of answering the demands made upon it, and of paying for its paper, and though the decrees of the regent for a while supported its tottering credit, soon the eyes of the nation were opened, and each individual discovered that in parting with his gold and silver, he had received in return only paper which was of no value. The dissatisfaction became general, the people without bread and without money, besieged in vain the avenues of the bank, and afterwards carrying before the gates of the regent the bodies of three men who had unhappily been trampled to death in the tumultuous crowd, they exclaimed, behold the fruit of your system. At last the unfortunate Law, now become odious in the eyes of suffering France, fled in disgrace from a country which he had promised to raise to affluence and prosperity, and after wandering over Germany, Denmark, Holland and England, he settled at Venice, where he died 1729. He wrote a small treatise on money and paper credit.

LAW, Edmund, a native of Westmoreland, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards fellow of Christ's college, and was one of the members of that society, in the university, for a time celebrated under the name of Zodiac. In 1739 he obtained the living of Graystock, and soon after Salkeld, and in 1755 was made head of Peterhouse. In 1767 he was presented to a prebendal stall at Durham, and two years after raised to the see of Carlisle, over which he presided with great dignity, and with truly pastoral care. He was author of the Theory of Religion, 8vo.—Archbishop King's Origin of Evil, with notes, 8vo.—A View of the Controversy concerning an Intermediate State, 12mo.—Sermons, and he died 1737, aged 84.

LAW, William, an able divine, born at King's Cliff, Northamptonshire, 1686. He was educated at Oxford, where he took his degrees, but did not enter into orders, as he had some scruples with respect to the necessary oaths, and thus could not obtain some valuable preferment which was intended for him. He wrote a Serious Call to a devout and holy Life—a treatise on Christian Perfection,—besides some tracts against Bishop Hoadly, and the works of Jacob Behmen whose extravagant opinions he adopted in the latter part of life. He died 1761 in Northamptonshire, at the house of Mrs. Hesther Gibbon, the aunt of the famous historian, where he had for several years found a hospitable asylum. As a preacher among the dissenters he possessed influence, and his doctrines were powerfully enforced by the meekness and sanctity of his life, and by his inoffensive manners.

LAW, Jonathan, governor of Connecticut, graduated at Harvard college 1695; and from 1715 to 1725, excepting one year, was a judge of the Supreme court. In 1725 he was appointed chief justice and lieutenant governor, which offices he held till he was chosen governor in 1741. He died 1750, aged 76.

LAW, Richard, LL.D. judge of the district court of the United States, was the son of the preceding, and born at Milford, March 17th, 1733. He was educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1751. He established himself in the practice of law at New London, Connecticut, and soon rose to the highest eminence in the profession. After a lucrative practice of several years, the decline of his health, induced him to accept a seat as chief judge on the bench of the county court, which he continued to occupy till 1784, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in 1786 chief judge, in which office he continued until the adoption of the federal constitution in 1789, when he received his appointment as United States district judge. He continued in that office till his death January 26, 1806, in his 73d year.

LAW, Andrew, a teacher of music for forty years, died at Cheshire Connecticut, July 1821, aged 73. He invented four characters to express always the four syllables of music. He published rudiments of music, 1793; Musical primer on a new plan, with the four characters 1803; musical magazine, 1804, collection of hymn tunes.

LAWES, Henry, an English musician, born at Salisbury about 1600. He was in the service of Charles I. and in 1653 published his "Ayres and Dialogues," in folio, with commendatory verses by the poets, Milton, Philips, and Waller. He set to music the Comus of Milton, and performed in it, when it was represented at Ludlow castle 1634. He was long patronized by the family of the earl of Bridgewater, and was the friend of Milton and other learned men. He died Oct. 21, 1662, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

LAWES, William, brother to the preceding, was also an excellent musician. He was commissary to general Gerard, and was killed at the siege of Chester. Two large MS. volumes of his works are preserved at Oxford.

LAWRENCE, James, a naval commander, was a native of New Jersey. He had early a predilection for a sea faring life, which his friends could not conquer. At the age of 16, he received a midshipman's warrant. In the war against Tripoli he accompanied Decatur as his first lieutenant in the hazardous exploit of destroying the frigate Philadelphia. He remained several years in the Mediterranean and commanded successively the Vixen, Wasp, Argus, and Hornet. While cruising in the latter off Delaware, he fell in with the British brig, Peacock, and after an action of fifteen minutes captured it, Feb. 24, 1813. On his return he was received with distinction. Being promoted to the rank of post captain he was intrusted with the command of the frigate Chesapeake. While in Boston roads nearly ready for sea, the British frigate Shannon, Captain Broke, appeared off the harbor, and made signals expressive of a challenge. He put to sea on the morning of June 1; the Shannon bore away till the Chesapeake hauled up and fired a gun, the Shannon then hove to. Soon after the action commenced captain L. was wounded in the leg. The anchor of the Chesapeake catching in one of the ports of the Shannon, she could not in consequence thereof bring her guns to bear. As captain L. was carried below, having been again, and mortally wounded, he cried out, "Don't give up the ship." After the action had continued eleven minutes, the enemy boarded and captured the Chesapeake.

The loss of killed and wounded was 146; that of the Shannon 36. Captain Lawrence lingered in extreme pain four days, and then died June 6, 1813, aged 31. He was honorably buried at Halifax. His body and that of Lieutenant Ludlow were brought to the United States by captain George Crowinshield of Salem at his own expense. In this affair captain Lawrence was acting under every disadvantage, and no other result than the one just stated could reasonably have been anticipated. His situation as a new officer in a new situation was awkward enough, but in addition to this, the crew of the Chesapeake were nearly in a state of mutiny, but he took council of his courage, and not of his prudence.

LAWSON, John, a traveller, was surveyor general of North Carolina. While exploring lands on the river Neus, accompanied by the baron Graffenreid, the Indians seized him, and solemnly tried him for encroaching on their territory before a large council, and condemned and executed him in the autumn of 1712. This was the commencement of an Indian war. The baron escaped by representing, that he was not of the English party, but king of the Palatines. Lawson published a journal of one thousand miles travels amongst the Indians, with a description of North Carolina, 4to. London 1700; the same 1711; also the same at Hamburg, 1712; history of Carolina, 4to. London, 2d, edition, 1714; the same 1718.

LAY, Benjamin, a benevolent quaker of great singularity, was a native of England, and brought up to the sea. About the year 1710, he settled in Barbadoes. Bearing his open testimony in all companies against the conduct of the owners of slaves, he became so obnoxious to the inhabitants, that he left the island in disgust, and settled in Pennsylvania. He fixed his residence at Abington, ten miles from Philadelphia. On his arrival he found many quakers, who kept slaves. He remonstrated against the practice with zeal both in public and private. To express his indignation at the practice of slave keeping, he once carried a bladder filled with blood into a public meeting, and in the presence of the whole congregation thrust a sword into it, which he had concealed under his coat, exclaiming, "thus shall God shed the blood of those persons, who enslave their fellow creatures." Calling upon a friend in Philadelphia, he was asked to sit down to breakfast. He first inquired, "dost thou keep slaves in thy house?" On being answered in the affirmative, he said, "then I will not partake with thee of the fruits of thy unrighteousness." After an ineffectual attempt to convince a farmer and his wife in Chester county of the iniquity of keeping slaves, he seized their only child, a little girl of three years of age under the pretence of carrying her away; and when the cries of the child, and his singular expedient alarmed them, he said, "you see and feel now a little of the distress, which you occasion by the inhuman practice of slave keeping. In 1737, he wrote a treatise entitled, All slave holders that keep the innocent in bondage are apostates. It was printed by Dr. Franklin, who told the author, when the manuscript was brought to him, that it was deficient in arrangement. "It is no matter," said Mr. Lay, "print any part thou pleasest, first." He died 1760, aged 79. He was temperate in his diet, living chiefly upon vegetables, and his drink was pure water. When tea was introduced into Pennsylvania, his wife brought home a small quantity with a set of cups and saucers. In his zeal he seized them, and carrying them back to the city, he scattered the tea from the balcony of the court house, in the presence of a multitude of spectators, and broke to pieces the instruments of luxury, delivering at the same time a striking lecture upon the folly of introducing a pernicious herb in the place of the wholesome diet of the country. He often visited schools, carrying a basket of religious books with him and distributing them as prizes among the scholars, imparting also frequently some advice and instruction. He once attempted to imitate our Saviour by fasting forty days, but he was obliged to desist.

LAYARD, Charles Peter, an English divine, son of a physician of Greenwich, was educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. He obtained in 1773, and 1775, the Sea-tonian prize, and was by the strong recommendation of his friends, appointed minister of Oxendon chapel, and librarian to Tenison's library, St. Martin's parish. He was promoted in 1800, to the deanery of Bristol, and died 1803. He published some single sermons, and since his death a subscription has been raised, by the publication of a volume of his sermons, for the benefit of his family.

LEAKE, Richard, master gunner of England, was born at Harwich 1629. He distinguished himself in various engagements, especially against Van Trump, 1673, when the Royal Prince, the ship in which he was, after the loss of her masts, and of 400 of her crew killed and wounded, was attacked by a man of war and two fire ships. In this distressing situation the English admiral Rooke, made a signal for the ship to strike her colors, but Leake animating his companions, declared the Royal Prince should never be given up while he lived, and thus boldly seconded by his two sons and an obedient crew, he brought off the ship safe to Chatham, though he had the misfortune to see his son Henry fall by his side. In consequence of this bravery he was made master-gunner of all England, and store-keeper of Woolwich ordnance. He first contrived to fire off a mortar by the blast of a piece, a method still used, and he displayed great ingenuity in the composition of fire works. He died 1696.

LEAKE, sir John, son of the above, was born at Rotherhithe, Surrey, 1656. He was educated in naval knowledge under his father, and was with him at the memorable fight of 1673. He was afterwards in the merchants' service, but at last preferred advancement in the navy. He was made master gunner of the Neptune, 1675, and continued in that situation till 1683, when he was appointed to the Drake fire ship, against the intended invasion from Holland. He afterwards joined the party of the prince of Orange, and was very serviceable in rescuing Londonderry from the power of James II. In 1692, he was one of the heroes of the battle off Cape la Hogue, and till the peace of Ryswick in 1697, he continued to distinguish himself as an active and enterprising officer. In 1702, he was sent on the Newfoundland station, and he drove the French totally from the place, and thus acquired both reputation for the celerity of his measures, and opulence from the value of the prizes which he made. On his return he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and soon after knighted, and he then assisted sir George Rooke in the reduction of Gibraltar, and afterwards relieved that fortress, 1705, when besieged by the French by sea, and the Spaniards by land. That same year he again, a second time, relieved the fortress, with the co-operation of the prince of Hesse, and defeated the French fleet, and reduced Barcelona. In 1706, he again appeared before Barcelona, and relieved it so effectually that King

Philip abandoned the siege, rendered memorable at the moment by a total eclipse of the sun which spread consternation among the enemy, whose device was a sun. From Barcelona, sir John proceeded to the reduction of Alicant and Ivica, and the island of Majorca, and then returned to England to receive the rewards of the queen and the congratulations of the people. On Shovel's death he was made admiral of the white, and commander of the fleet, in which high office, he convoyed the new queen of Spain to her consort Charles, and then reduced Sardinia and Minorca to the obedience of the allied monarchs. In 1708, he was elected member for Rochester, and the next year became one of the lords of the admiralty, but refused, on the resignation of lord Orford, to accept the place of first lord. In 1712, he was at the head of the expedition to take Dunkirk, and his various services were acknowledged by his being appointed a fifth time admiral of the fleet. The change of ministry, at the accession of George I. reduced him to a private station, and he spent the rest of his life in retirement between Greenwich and Beddington, in Surrey, where he had two seats. This brave man died 1st. Aug. 1720, aged 65.

LEAKE, Walter, governor of Mississippi, was a soldier in the American revolutionary war, died 1825.

LEAMING, Jeremiah, D.D., an episcopal minister, was born in Middletown, Conn., in 1719, and graduated at Yale college in 1745. He preached in Newport, R. Island, eight years; at Norwalk Connecticut, twenty-one years; and at Stratford eight or nine years. He died at New Haven in September, 1804, aged 86. In the episcopal controversy, he wrote with great ability on the subject. He published a defence of the episcopal government of the church, containing remarks on some noted sermons on presbyterian ordination, 1776; a second defence of the episcopal government of the church in answer to Noah Welles, 1770; evidences of the truth of Christianity 1785; dissertations on various subjects.

LEAPOR, Mary, an ingenious woman, obscurely born, and educated as the daughter of a gardener, in the house of judge Blencowe, at Marston, Northamptonshire. In her 24th year she was seized with the measles, and after a short life of unaffected modesty, and practical piety, she fell a victim to the disease, 1735, a few days after her mother. On her death bed she gave her father some papers, which were published in 2 vols. 8vo. and contained original poems of great merit, especially the Temple of Love, a dream, and the Unhappy Father, a tragedy.

LEAR, Tobias, colonel, was consul general at St. Domingo in 1802: he was afterwards consul general at Tripoli, and in 1804, commissioner with Baron to negotiate a peace, which he effected much to the dissatisfaction of Gen. Eaton, then at the head of the army of Derne, agreeing to pay for 200 prisoners 60,000 dollars. At the time of his death Mr. Lear was accountant of the war department. He died 1816.

LEBID, an Arabian poet, whose abilities were employed by Mahomet, to answer the satirical works written against him. He died at the age of 140, and his poems were so much esteemed, that they were affixed on the gates of the Temple of Mecca.

LEBRUN, Charles Francis, duke of Placentia, was born 1739, near Coutances, in Normandy; studied the law; was secretary to the chancellor Maupeou, and shared the odium which that minister incurred; sat in the states general and the council of five hundred; was chosen by Bonaparte as third consul; and was successively governor of Liguria and administrator general of Holland. He died in 1824. Lebrun translated the Iliad and Odyssey, and Tasso's Jerusalem.

LECHFORD, Thomas, a lawyer from London, lived in Boston from 1638 to 1640. Being dissatisfied with the country, he returned to England. He published Plain dealing, or news from N. England's present government, ecclesiastical and civil, compared, London 1642.

LECLERC, Victor Emanuel, a French general, born at Pontoise in 1772. He entered into the army in 1791, as a volunteer, and passing with the rank of sub-lieutenant into a regiment of cavalry, he became aid-de-camp to general Lapoype. At the siege of Toulon, in 1793, he was made a captain; and on the surrender of that place, promoted to be chief of a battalion in reward of his services. After having been employed in the army of the Alps and at Marseilles, he was removed in 1796, to the army of Italy, under the command of Buonaparte; and he subsequently occupied the post of sub-chief of the staff. Promoted to the rank of general of a brigade in 1797, and married the same year to one of the sisters of Buonaparte, he became chief of the staff of general Berthier, who commanded the army of Italy after the treaty of Campo Formio, and who being succeeded by general Brune, Leclerc retained his station. In 1799, Buonaparte, having become the head of the government, made him general of a division, and gave him the command of the army of the Rhine. He held other employments previously to his being appointed chief of the expedition intended for the conquests of St. Domingo. He sailed from Brest in December 1801, and arrived with his forces at cape Français, in February 1802; but being seized with the yellow fever a few months afterwards, he died at his head-quarters, November 1, 1802.

LECLERC, John, an eminent critic, was born, in 1657, at Geneva; and died, in 1736, in a state of childishness, at Amsterdam, where he was a clergyman, and professor of philosophy, belles lettres, and Hebrew. Leclerc was impatient of contradiction, acrimonious and satirical in debate, irascible, and fond of singularity. He has been called the self constituted inquisitor of the republic of literature. Among his works are, Ars Critica; Harmonia Evangelica; and the three Bibliothèques, or Libraries in twenty-five, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine volumes.

LECTIUS, James, a learned Genevese, four times syndic of his native city. He is known as the editor of "Poetæ Græci Veteres," 2 vols. folio. He was also a poet and critic, and died 1611, aged 53.

LEDYARD, John, was born at Groton, in the state of Connecticut, in the year 1751. He early discovered propensities wholly inconsistent with devotion to any of the ordinary pursuits of life; it is not therefore to be wondered at, that after a few months trial, he abandoned the study of the law, and became a member of the new institution of Dartmouth college, for the purpose of qualifying himself to become a missionary among the Indians. In the short period of four months from entering college he disappeared, without the knowledge of any one, and after a lapse of about an equal period, returned, and resumed his studies, but never after mentioned his missionary project. He soon became weary of a college life, as his habits and temper rendered his residence there as irksome and uncomfortable to him, as his conduct, made him, to the officers of the institution. The unpleasant collisions, which took place between him and the government, he determined to put an end to, by taking French leave. The mode of effecting this object was most singular, and characteristic of the man. With the aid of some of his fellow students he contrived to make a canoe fifty feet long out of a log, which he launched upon the Connecticut river, near which the college stands, in which alone, and without any knowledge of the navigation, he reached in safety the place of his destination, one hundred and forty miles from the place of his departure, and the sight of him was the first knowledge his friends had that he had left college. He next commenced the study of divinity, but pursued it a very short time, and it is not probable, that it would have been otherwise, had the obstacles, which he thought opposed his entry into this profession been removed, for a character can hardly be imagined, more averse than his, to the regular and quiet duties of a clergyman. He endeavored without success to obtain a school. He next shipped at the port of New London as a common sailor on a voyage to Gibraltar. Ledyard being one day missing, while at Gibraltar, he was at length found, in the garrison, in the character of a British soldier; from which new engagement the captain of the vessel obtained his discharge. Within a year he returned again to New London, having lost all inclination of following a sea-faring life. Being now without means, and without a disposition to engage in any of the common pursuits of life, hankering for an opportunity to do something out of the common course of things, and tread a path never before trod by man, the thought struck his fancy, that the necessary aid, for his indefinite projects, might be obtained, by going to England, and making himself known to the wealthy connexions of the family, of whom, he had heard his grandfather talk. This freak no sooner took possession of his mind, than he reduced it to practice, and shipped on board the first vessel he found bound to Great Britain. He arrived at Plymouth in utter destitution, and literally begged his way to London, where the relatives, whose assistance he came to solicit, lived. The result was exactly what might have been anticipated. He indeed found the relatives he sought, but they at first disowned and rejected him. When, upon further inquiry, they had reason to believe, that he was no impostor, and learning also, that he was in distress, an invitation, to call again, was first given, and afterwards money was sent to him by one of those relatives, he declined the invitation, and refused to receive the money, and ordered the person, who brought it to carry it back, and tell his master, that he belonged not to the race of the Ledyards. He received no assistance from these relatives, but it is apparent that the fault was not altogether theirs. When he was thus unpleasantly situated, it happened that Captain Cook was preparing, for what proved to be his last voyage. Nothing could be more accordant with the views and feelings of Ledyard, than the course pursued by Captain Cook, and with the intention of becoming a partaker of his fate and fortune, he first enlisted into the marine service, and succeeded in gaining an introduction to Captain Cook, and was immediately taken into his service, and made a corporal of marines. The events of this voyage are now the subject of history, and it is only our purpose, at present, to record the fact, that Ledyard was one of those who sailed with Cook. For two years after his discharge from Cook's expedition he remained in the navy, and in December 1782 the ship in which he served arrived in Huntington Bay, Long Island Sound. He obtained leave of absence for seven days to visit his mother, but with the intention of quitting the service. He goes to his mother's house without making himself known to her, she at this time kept a boarding house, and a scene, similar in some respects, to the one told of Franklin and his mother takes place; without knowing who he is, she is strongly attracted to him, by the resemblance he bears to an absent son, who she had not seen for eight years. The scene which followed need not be described. He remained four months in Hartford at the house of his uncle, writing a journal of Cook's voyage, and forming a plan of a trading voyage to the North West coast. He failed in all his endeavors to engage American merchants to favor his project. A like success attended all his efforts in Europe, though he spent one winter in Paris at the expense of a company, who appeared at one time to have entered heartily into his views. The same fate attended an arrangement, he entered into with the celebrated Paul Jones. While in Paris he had notice by a friend, that a ship, in the Thames, was in complete readiness to sail for the Pacific Ocean. He immediately went to London, and upon being introduced to the owners, they offer him a free passage. Ledyard embarks, and feels completely happy, as fortune has at length smiled upon him. His joy is of short duration, as before the vessel is out sight of land, she is seized by the government, brought back, and the voyage given up. Every purpose for which he last visited Europe appears, at this moment, to be completely at an end. It was not long however, before he had another expedition in view, more extravagant, and more hopeless than any he had ever yet attempted; he describes it thus: "I am going in a few days to make the tour of the globe from London east on foot." He had the address to obtain a subscription to aid this project, under the patronage of no less names, than sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Hunter, sir James Hall and colonel Smith. It is believed however that the amount he received in this way was not great. He left London in December on this mad enterprise, and arrived in safety at St. Petersburg. By the assistance of professor Pallas and others, and the agency of the French ambassador, he procured a passport from the empress of Russia to travel through her dominions. At Irkutsk however Ledyard was seized by order of the empress and hurried out of her dominions into Poland, and the guard that conducted him, told him, he was then at liberty to go where he pleased, but if he returned again into Russia, he would be hanged. By the good fortune of disposing of a draft for five guineas on sir Joseph Banks, he was enabled to reach London, after an absence of one year and five months. It would be thought, that by this time, experience would have taught Ledyard the folly and uselessness of his former pursuits, and induce him to turn his attention to something more likely to be advantageous to himself and beneficial to others. This time however he was not left to find a path for himself, but one was pointed out to him by others. The association for discovering the inland countries of Africa was then in search of a suitable person to engage in their business. Through the kindness of sir Joseph Banks an interview was obtained for Ledyard with the secretary of the association. Upon its being proposed to him, he said he should think himself singularly fortunate to be trusted with the adventure; being asked when he would set out—tomorrow morning—was the answer. In the employment of the African association he reached Grand Cairo, and there ended his life in November 1788, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. It is due to the author, and the subjects of it, that the following passage from Ledyard's pen, should be had in perpetual remembrance. "I have observed among all nations, that the women ornament themselves more than the men, that wherever found, they are the same kind, civil, obliging, humane, tender beings, that they are ever inclined to be gay and cheerful, timorous and modest. They do not hesitate like man to perform a hospitable or generous action; not haughtily, nor arrogant nor supercilious, but full of courtesy and fond of society; industrious, economical, ingenious; more liable in general to err than man, but in general also more virtuous, and performing more good actions than he. I never addressed myself in the language of decency and friendship to a woman, whether civilized or savage, without receiving a decent and friendly answer. With man it has often been otherwise. In wandering over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark, through honest Sweden, frozen Lapland, rude and churlish Finland, unprincipled Russia, and the wide spread regions of the wandering Tartar, if hungry, dry, cold, wet or sick, woman has ever been friendly to me and uniformly so; and to add to this virtue so worthy the appellation of benevolence, these actions have been performed in so free, and kind a manner, that if I was dry, I drank the sweet draught, and if hungry, ate the coarse morsel with a double relish."

LEDYARD, colonel, commanded in 1781 fort Griswold in Groton, Con. on the Thames, exactly opposite to New London, when Sept. 7th he was attacked by col. Eyre with a large force. With 150 men he fought bravely: col. Eyre and maj. Montgomery being killed, the command of the British devolved on maj. Broomfield. When the fort was carried by assault with the bayonet, Broomfield inquired, who commanded. Ledyard replied, "I did command, Sir, but you do now;" and presented to him his sword. Broomfield instantly run him through the body; and between 60 and 70 Americans were slaughtered after they had surrendered.

LEE, Ezra, an officer in the army of the American revolution, who, for his intrepidity, was selected to navigate the marine Turtle constructed in the harbor of New-York for the purpose of destroying the British ship Asia. He was prevented from attaching the instrument to the ship by her copper—but by exploding it in the vicinity, alarmed the enemy so that they immediately removed the fleet to the Hook. He fought in several of the most important battles of the war, and enjoyed, in a high degree, the respect of his superior officers. In private life he was distinguished for amiableness, integrity and benevolence. His death took place at Lyme, Connecticut, in 1821, in his 73d year.

LEE, Samuel, first minister of Bristol, Rhode Island, was a native of England, and educated at Oxford. He was preferred by Cromwell to a church near Bishopsgate in London, but was ejected in 1662. In 1673, he removed to Newington green near London, where he was for several years minister of an independent church. In 1696, he removed to New England, and preached in the town of Bristol. When a church was formed he was chosen minister. After the revolution in his native country, he was eagerly desirous of returning. In 1691, he sailed for England, but was captured by a French privateer, and carried into St. Maloe, in France; in the course of the year he died there, aged 64, and was buried without the city as a heretic. He published chronicon Cestrense, an exact chronology of all the rulers of Cheshire and Chester in church and state from the foundation of the city, 1686; orbis miraculum, or the temple of Solomon portrayed by scripture light, folio, 1699; this was printed at the charge of the university; de excidio anti-christi folio, 1659; a dissertation on the ancient and successive state of the Jews, with scripture evidence of their future conversion, and establishment in our own land, 1679; this is printed with Fletehr's Israel recluse: the joy of faith, 1699; answer to many queries relative to America, 1690; preface to John Rowe's Immanuel, with his life; and numerous sermons.

LEE, Charles, a major general in the army of the United States in the revolutionary war, was a native of England. He was an officer in the army at eleven years of age. He served early in America, where he commanded a company of grenadiers, at the unsuccessful assault of Ticonderoga, by general Abercrombie, and was wounded. He distinguished himself in 1762, under general Burgoyne in Portugal. The following years of his life, till 1773, were spent partly in the Polish service, and in rambling over Europe, but in the last year, an affair of honor with an officer in Italy whom he killed, obliged him to flee, and he sailed from London to New York. The quarrel between Great Britain and her colonies had now assumed a serious aspect, and Lee formed the resolution to espouse the cause of the latter in person, as he had previously defended it, in England, with his pen. Travelling through the colonies he became acquainted with the most conspicuous friends of colonial emancipation, and, though yet a British officer on half-pay, was active in encouraging the Americans to resistance, and in censuring the measures of the ministry. In 1775, Lee received a commission from congress, and immediately resigned the one he held in the British service; at the same time declaring to the secretary of war his readiness to engage in any honorable service for the king; but reprobating the present measures, as inconsistent with the liberty of the subject. In the quality of major-general in the continental service, Lee accompanied general Washington to the camp before Boston. In 1776, he was directed by the commander-in-chief to occupy New York, and to defend that city and the North river against the enemy. On his arrival there, Lee set about strengthening the defences of the city, disarming and securing those who were inimical to the American cause, and checking the intercourse subsisting between the British and the townsmen. He was afterwards invested with the chief command in the southern department. His presence in the south inspired a happy ardor and confidence in soldiers and people, while his conduct on the memorable attack of the British upon Sullivan island raised his military reputation. After the discomfiture of the enemy at this fortress, Lee passed into Georgia, where he remained some weeks, employing himself in fortifying the colony, and chastising the frontier Indians. Congress anticipating a concentration of the British forces, for the purpose of making a powerful effort at New York, Lee was ordered to Philadelphia, and was despatched to the camp at Haerlem, with permission to visit the ports in New Jersey. He reached the army just in time to recommend its extrication from a situation, where, had the enemy used proper diligence in his operations it would have been completely destroyed. The opinion of Lee induced the council of war to make a precipitate movement during the night, by which they escaped the toils, into which, they would otherwise have fallen. While marching through the Jerseys to join general Washington, Lee was made prisoner by the English, as he lay carelessly guarded, at a considerable distance from the main body, and carried to New York. Washington proposed to exchange for him six field officers; but general Howe affected to consider Lee as a deserter from the British army, and refused to release him on those terms. Several British officers were confined, and held answerable for the treatment of general Lee. The latter however was treated in a manner unworthy of a generous enemy, until the surrender of Burgoyne. After that event he was exchanged. The battle of Monmouth concluded the military course of general Lee. Being directed by Washington to advance, and attack the enemy's rear, he approached very near, but instead of obeying his instructions, suffered his troops to make a disorderly retreat. The commander-in-chief met him in the flight, and reprimanded him for his conduct. Lee replied in improper language, but executed the subsequent orders of general Washington with courage and ability. Stung with the indignity which he conceived to have been offered him, he wrote two letters to the commander-in-chief, after the action, of a disrespectful tenor, challenging him to substantiate the charges implied in his expressions on the field. General Lee was arrested, and arraigned before a court-martial, for disobedience of orders, misbehavior before the enemy, and disrespect to the commander-in-chief. August 12, 1778, he was found guilty of the charges, and sentenced to be suspended from any commission in the armies of the United States for the period of one year. The concurrence of congress in this sentence was thought necessary; and, while yet in suspense as to their determination, he published a defence of his conduct. His abuse of general Washington's character in this pamphlet, led to a duel with Col. Laurens one of the aids of the commander-in-chief, in which Lee was wounded. Congress confirmed the sentence of the court-martial in this case, though not without previous discussion. Lee retired to an estate he had purchased in Virginia, where he lived, secluded in a small hovel, destitute of glass windows or plastering, amusing himself with his books and dogs. While in this situation, he composed a set of political and military queries, in which his bitter feelings were freely vented, and which were afterwards published in Baltimore, where they created considerable disturbance. In 1792, he went to Philadelphia, where he engaged lodgings in a tavern, and a few days after his arrival, was seized with a fever, of which he died in October.

LEE, Richard Henry, president of congress, was a native of Virginia, and educated in England. His public life was distinguished by some remarkable circumstances. He had the honor of originating the first resistance to British oppression in the time of the stamp act in 1765. He proposed in the Virginia house of burgesses in 1773, the formation of a committee of correspondence, whose object was to disseminate information, and to kindle the flame of liberty, throughout the continents. He was a member of the first congress in 1774, and it was he, who made and ably supported the declaration of independence, June 7, 1776. From June 10th till August he was absent from congress on account of the sickness of his family. The second eloquent address to the people of Great Britain was drawn up by him as chairman of the committee. After the adoption of the articles of the confederation he was under the necessity of withdrawing from congress, as no representative was allowed to continue in congress, more than three years, in any term of six years; but he was re-elected in 1784, and continued till 1787. It was in Nov. 1784 that he was chosen president of congress. When the constitution of 1789 was submitted to the consideration of the people, he contended for the necessity of amendments previously to its adoption. He was a senator from Virginia in the first congress under it. He resigned this office in 1792, and died in 1794, aged 62. He was the author of a number of political pamphlets. His life with his correspondence was published by R. H. Lee, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1828.

LEE, Francis Lightfoot, one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was a native of Virginia. In 1765 he became a member of the house of burgesses of Virginia, and continued in that body till 1775, when the convention of Virginia chose him a member of the continental congress, in which he remained till 1779, when he entered the legislature of Virginia. He died 1797, aged 63.

LEE, William, a native of Virginia. Before the American revolution he was sent to London as the agent of Virginia. Being a zealous whig, and a favorite of the livery of London, he was elected one of the sheriffs in 1773. During the revolution he was the agent of congress at Vienna and Berlin.

LEE, Henry, general, governor of Virginia, graduated at Princeton college in 1773. In 1776, he was appointed a captain of cavalry under col. Bland; in Sept. 1777, he joined the main army. His skill in discipline and gallant bearing soon attracted the notice of Washington. He was soon promoted to the rank of major, with the command of a separate corps of cavalry, and then advanced to the rank of lieutenant colonel. From 1780, to the end of the war he served under Greene. The services of Lee's legion in various actions were very important. He particularly distinguished himself in the battle of Guildford; afterwards he succeeded in capturing fort Cornwallis, and other forts; he was also conspicuous at Ninety-Six, and at the Eutaw Springs. In 1786, he was appointed a delegate in congress from Virginia, in which body he remained till the constitution was adopted. In the convention of Virginia he advocated its adoption. In 1791, he was chosen governor of Virginia, and remained in office three years. By appointment of Washington he commanded the forces, sent to suppress the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania. He was a member of congress at the period of Washington's death in 1799; and was appointed by congress to deliver an eulogy on the occasion. He died 1818, aged 62. He published the eulogy on Washington 1800; memoirs of the war in the south, 2 vols. 8vo. 1812.

LEE, Sophia, the daughter of an able actor, was born in London, in 1750. Her first literary attempt, which, however, was not published till many years after it was written, was The Life of a Lover. In 1780, her comedy of the Chapter of Accidents was so successful that the profits of it enabled her to establish, at Bath, an academy for young ladies, which was conducted by herself and her sisters. Her novel of The Recess established her fame. In 1803, she retired from her toils of tuition; and she died March 13, 1824. She wrote, besides the above works, Almeyda, a tragedy; the Assignment, a comedy; A Hermit's Tale, a poem; and two of the stories in her sister's Canterbury Tales.

LEE, Arthur, M.D., minister of the United States of America at the court of Versailles. He was born in Virginia, and educated at the university of Edinburgh, where he also pursued for some time the study of medicine. He afterwards went to London, and studied law in the Temple. During his residence in England he kept his eye upon the measures of government and rendered the most important services to his country, by sending to America, the earliest intelligence of the plans of the ministry. When the instructions of governor Bernard were sent over, he at the same time communicated information to the town of Boston respecting the nature of them. In 1775, he was the agent of Virginia in London, and he presented in August the second petition of congress to the king. In 1776, he was appointed minister to France, and assisted in negotiating the treaty with that power. In 1779, he and Mr. Adams were recalled, and Dr. Franklin was appointed sole minister to France. When Mr. Lee returned to America in 1780, such was his integrity that he did not find it difficult to reinstate himself fully in the good opinion of the public, notwithstanding the attacks made upon his character by Silas Deane. During his mission to France, congress appointed him sole commissioner to Spain in December 1777. The British ambassador remonstrated against his reception, in consequence of which he was detained at Burgos, on his way to Madrid; but upon sending a spirited reply to the remonstrance, no further interruption was attempted, and he proceeded to the capital. He succeeded in procuring a large pecuniary loan. He afterwards went to Berlin in the same capacity. He was not officially recognized in Prussia, but allowed to reside in Berlin in a private character and to correspond with the court. He succeeded in obtaining from Frederic an assurance that he would afford no facilities to Great Britain in procuring additional German auxiliaries, and that he would prohibit the passage through any part of his dominions of any troops, which that court should thence forward engage in Germany. He obtained, also, permission for the citizens of the United States to carry on a direct commerce with the subjects of Prussia, and for himself to purchase for the use of the United States, arms from the armories from which the king supplied his forces. While in Berlin his papers were stolen from his chamber; but, upon an order from the king to investigate the affair, they were secretly returned. The blame of this act he cast upon the British envoy, who on the representation of the Prussian monarch, was recalled. When Mr. Lee left Berlin, it was with an understanding, that a correspondence should be carried on between Schulerburg and himself on the affairs of the United States, and that he should keep the king constantly informed of the events of the war with Great Britain, which he did during his residence in Paris. He was also assured that Prussia "would not be the last power to acknowledge the independence of his country." He prepared an elaborate report of his official proceedings, and answers to all the charges, which had been circulated to his prejudice; but upon requesting leave to vindicate himself with these in congress, that body expressed their full confidence in his patriotism, asserting that they had no accusation to make, and requested him to communicate his views and information acquired during his residence abroad. In 1781, he was elected to the assembly of Virginia, and by it returned to congress, where he continued to represent the state until 1785. In 1784, he was sent on a delegation to make treaties with the Indians on the northern frontier. He was next called to the treasury board, where he continued till 1789. He died 1792, aged 52. His life was published in 2 vols. 8vo. 1829, by R. H. Lec. This work contains many of his letters. His public letters are published in Spark's Diplom. corres.

LEE, Thomas Sim, governor of Maryland from 1779, to 1783, was afterwards a member of congress, and of the convention which formed the constitution. He was again chosen governor in 1792. He died 1819, aged 75.

LEET, William, governor of Connecticut, came to New England in 1637, in company with Eaton and Hopkins. Sept. 29, 1639, he, Mr. Whitfield, and others purchased Menunkatuck, or Guilford, of the sachem squaw, the owner. The agreement was made at N. Haven and was confirmed by the general court, Jan. 31, 1640. When the church of Guilford was formed in 1643, he was one of the seven pillars, or first members. Whitfield and Higginson were two others. For many years he was the clerk of the town. He was an assistant, of N. Haven colony from 1643, to 1657, and governor from 1661, to 1665, and after the union of N. Haven and Connecticut was deputy-governor from 1669, to 1675, and governor after Winthrop from 1676, to 1680. Having removed to Hartford, he died there 1683.

LEFEBVRE, Joseph Francis, duke of Dantzic, a French marshal, was born, in 1755, at Rufack, in Alsace; and died in 1820. He entered early into the army. In 1794, he attained the rank of general. From that year till 1799, he distinguished himself greatly in all the campaigns in Flanders and on the Rhine. When Bonaparte subverted the directorial government, Lefebvre seconded him efficaciously, and his services were rewarded with multiplied honors. Between 1805, and 1815, he bore a conspicuous part at Jena, Eylau, Wagram, and many other battles; and his Conquest of Dantzic won for him the ducal title. Lefebvre was modest, disinterested, and of unaffected manners.

LEECHMAN, William, D.D., principal of Glasgow university, was author of 2 vols. of sermons, and an essay on prayer, which possess great merit. He died 1785, aged 78.

LEGG, George, Lord Dartmouth, an able naval officer, brought up under admiral Spragge. He displayed such gallantry, that at the age of 21, he was made, in 1667, by Charles II. captain of a ship. In 1672, he distinguished himself in a battle against the Dutch, and the next year, was appointed governor of Portsmouth, master of the horse, and gentleman to the duke of York. In 1682, he was raised to the peerage, and the next year was sent to Africa, as governor of Tangier, with orders to destroy the works of that fortress, and bring off the English garrison, whose situation had been rendered perilous by the frequent attacks of the Moors. He successfully effected this, and was rewarded by the king, with ten thousand pounds. On James's accession, he was master of the horse, general of the ordnance, and constable of the tower, and when the prince of Orange meditated the invasion of the country, he sailed against him as admiral of the fleet, but the failure of the wind prevented the meeting of the two squadrons. As he was strongly attached to James, he became suspected at the revolution, and was in consequence sent a prisoner to the tower, where he died, 25th Oct. 1691, aged 44.

LEGOUVE, Gabriel Mary John Baptist, a French dramatist and poet, was born, in 1764, at Paris; was admitted a member of the Institute in 1793; held, as substitute for Delille, the professorship of Latin poetry at the college of France; and died insane in 1813. Legouvé was an exceedingly elegant writer, but was deficient in imagination and poetical fire. He wrote six tragedies, and several poems. Among the latter are, The Recollections; Melancholy; and The Merit of Women.

LEGUANO, Stefano Maria, an historical painter, the pupil of Cignani, and Carlo Maratti. His pieces are masterly, and in the judicious diffusion of light and shade, and in the display of a correct taste, and strong genius, he is particularly eminent. He was born near Bologna, and died 1715, aged 55.

LEIBNITZ, William Godfrey, baron of, a celebrated philosopher, born 23d June, 1646, at Leipsic, where his father was professor of moral philosophy, and secretary to the university. Though he lost his father at the early age of six, his education was not neglected, but the strong powers of his mind were assiduously cultivated at his native university, where at the age of 20, he took his degree of master of arts. Not only here, and at Jena, his studies were directed to the acquisition of whatever could be reaped in mathematics and literature, from learned professors, but the contents of his father's valuable library were perused with avidity and success. The law was the profession to which he particularly directed his attention, but when he was refused the degree of doctor in that faculty, at Leipsic, because he spoke with disrespect of the principles of Aristotle, he repaired to Altorf, where his thesis de Casibus Perplexis, insured him not only the academical honors he solicited, but the applauses of the learned students, and the liberal offer of a professor's chair. Declining this honorable offer, he went to Nuremberg, where he became acquainted with the minister of the elector of Mentz, who prevailed upon him to enter into the service of his master. Leibnitz accepted the offer with joy, and to prove his attachment to his new sovereign, he wrote a treatise to recommend the elevation of the elector to the vacant throne of Poland. He afterwards went to Paris in 1672, on the affairs of his friend, the prime minister, and in this journey, he not only formed a connexion with the most learned men of France, but he applied himself more particularly to mathematical knowledge. In 1673 he visited London, and there received from John Collins, the secretary of the royal society, some hints about the invention of fluxions, by Newton, to which he afterwards laid claim, but on very slight and doubtful grounds. The death of his patrons, the elector and his minister, left him in narrow circumstances, but he found in the duke of Brunswiek Lunenburg, a new friend, who not only favored his views in his literary pursuits, but settled a pension on him, with the appointment of counsellor. The next duke, afterwards George I. proved an equally favorable patron, and prevailed upon him to write the History of the House of Brunswiek. In 1700 he was elected member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and on the erection of the Berlin academy that year, he was liberally nominated by the king of Prussia, perpetual president, and though not resident there, he largely contributed, by his papers, to enrich the memoirs of that learned body. He about this time devoted much of his attention to invent "an universal language," which might become the common language of the whole world. The plan had once been undertaken by d'Algarne, and by Dr. Wilkins, but not on so broad a foundation. Leibnitz proposed characters, which like those in algebra, might be not only simple, but expressive, and enable men of all nations to converse familiarly together, but though above 13 years were employed in this extraordinary design, the death of the philosopher prevented its final completion. In 1711 Leibnitz was made Aulic counsellor to the emperor, and privy counsellor to the Prussian court, with a salary; but the multiplicity of his engagements prevented him from finishing his History of Hanover. He was employed by Caroline, afterwards queen of England, to undertake a controversy against Dr. Clarke, on the subject of free-will, the reality of space, and other philosophical subjects. He died 14th Nov. 1716, aged 70. He had in his life the singular felicity of being esteemed as the greatest and most learned man in Europe, and he did not belie the public opinion. His works are Scriptores Rerum Brunsw. 3 vols. fol.—De Jure Suprematus et Legationis Principum German. under the fictitious name of Furstener—Codex Gentium Diplomaticus, 2 vols. fol.—Miscellanea Berolinens.—Notitia Opticæ Promotæ—De Arte Combinatoria—Essays of Theodeia, on the Goodness of God and Liberty of Man, 2 vols. 12mo.—Metaphysical Tracts—Questions of Philosophy and Mathematics—Theoria Motus Abstracti & Motus Concreti—Accessiones Historicæ, 2 vols. 4to.—De Origine Francorum Disquisitio—Poems, Latin, French,—Collectanea,—Recueil. His mathematical works have been published by Dutens, 6 vols. 4to. 1767.

LEIGH, sir Edward, a learned Englishman, born at Shawell, Leicestershire, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He was member of the long parliament, and of the assembly of divines, and also a parliamentary general. He was imprisoned in 1648, as being a violent presbyterian, and afterwards employed himself totally in literary pursuits. He died June 2d, 1671. He wrote Critica Sacra—Annotations on the New Testament—Observations on the 12 Cæsars—Treatises of Religion,—and a Body of Divinity.

LEIGHTON, Alexander, a native of Edinburgh, educated at the university there, where he became professor of moral philosophy. In 1613 he went to London, and by his two books called "Zion's Plea," and the "Looking Glass of the Holy War," against the government, he drew upon himself the notice of the star chamber, who ordered him to have his nose slit, and his ears cut, and to be whipped from Newgate to Aldgate, and then to Tyburn. This dreadful sentence was executed with barbarity, but after 11 years of confinement, he was set at liberty by the parliament, 1640, and made keeper of Lambeth palace, now a state prison. He died insane, 1644, aged 57.

LEIGHTON, Robert, a Scotch divine, born at Edinburgh, son of the preceding. He was minister of a small church near Edinburgh, and conducted himself with such moderation, as offended the violent partisans of his times. His amiable character, however, was seen and admired by the magistrates of Edinburgh, who unanimously appointed him to preside over their college, where for 10 years he displayed all the abilities of a learned and popular preceptor. He was afterwards made bishop of Dunblane by Charles I. but finding his moderation and humility unable to stem the torrent of persecuting presbyterianism, he went to London, to resign his holy office. Instead, however, of accepting his abdication, Charles prevailed upon him to become archbishop of Glasgow, at a time when he hoped that exemplary piety, and the most unaffected manners, might recommend the measures of the court. But the virulence of party was so deeply rooted, that Leighton, about a year after, resigned the dangerous dignity which he could not support with comfort to himself, or advantage to his sovereign. He retired to Sussex, and by a sudden death, closed a life of literary labors, and of genuine goodness in 1684. He wrote a Commentary on St. Peter's Epistles, besides sermons and divinity tracts.

LEISTER, Jacob, who headed the insurrection in New York in 1689, had previously enjoyed some influence among the people, but was totally unqualified for such an enterprise. After he had dispersed the party in the city of New York favorable to King James, and assumed the administration, he proceeded to Albany, took the fort, and confiscated the property of those who opposed his authority. On the arrival of Sloughter with the commission of governor 1691, he for some time refused to surrender the fort at New York to him, but at length abandoned it, and was soon after seized and condemned for treason. Sloughter disapproved of the sentence, but in a moment of intoxication into which he was betrayed for the purpose, was induced to sign the death warrant, and it was immediately executed.

LELAND, John, the first and last antiquary royal of England, so called by Henry VIII. and deservedly named the father of antiquaries, was born in Leland, and educated at St. Paul's, under Lilly. By the friendship of Thomas Myles, he on the death of his parents, was maintained at Christ college, Cambridge, from which he removed to All-Soul's Oxford. He improved himself afterwards by studying at Paris, and became, in ancient and modern languages, and in literature, the most accomplished writer of the age. His zeal for antiquarian research was happily patronised by the king, and he was empowered in 1533, by his master, to peruse the records of all libraries, and collections private and public, in the kingdom, for the elucidation of English history. Six years were thus laboriously employed in travelling through England and Wales, and that his income might be adequate to the expenses of his journey, he was liberally presented by the king to the living of Popeling, near Calais, and afterwards made, in 1542, rector of Hasely, Oxfordshire, canon of Christ-church, and prebendary of Sarum. In 1545 he had digested four books, as the beginning of his labors, which he presented to the king, under the title of a New Year's Gift. To complete his further works he retired to his house in the parish of St. Michael le Querne, London; but such is the uncertainty and misery of human hopes, after six years' study, he was suddenly deprived of his reason, probably in consequence of his intense application; and so violent was the phrenzy, that he never recovered. He died two years after, 18th April, 1552. As to his character, England, says one of his contemporaries, never saw, and perhaps never will see again, a man equally skilled in the antiquities of his country. His itinerary, and Collectanea, were published by Hearne, and so extensive are his resources, that he is as it were the common spring from which his successors and imitators, the Bayles, the Camdens, the Burtons, the Dugdales, the Gibsons, and others, have copiously drawn.

LELAND, John, a native of Wigan, in Lancashire. At the age of six he was deprived of the powers of his understanding and memory by the small-pox, and for twelve months continued in that deplorable situation. His recollection afterwards gradually recovered, and when his parents removed to Dublin, he there applied himself with unusual diligence and success to literary pursuits. In 1716 he became assistant to Mr. Nathanael Weld, over a dissenting congregation; but he acquired greater popularity as a writer than as a preacher, respectable as he was. His view of the deistical writers that have appeared in England, 2 vols 8vo.—and his Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, 2 vols. 4to. are the works of an able divine, by the most solid and convincing arguments, employing all his powers to refute atheism and infidelity. He wrote besides, a Defence of the Christian Religion against Tindal, 8vo.—a volume of Family Devotions, 12mo. and died 16th Jan. 1766, universally respected. His funeral sermon was preached by Nathanael Weld, his condjutor.

LELAND, Thomas, D.D. a native of Dublin, senior fellow of Trinity college there, died 1785, aged 83. He was a man of learning, and strong powers of mind, and wrote, a History of Ireland, 4to.—The Life of Philip of Macedon—Principles of Human Eloquence, attacked by Warburton, and translation of Demosthenes' Orations.

LELY, sir Peter, an eminent painter, born in Westphalia, Germany, 1617. He studied his art at the Hague, and under de Crebber; and in 1641 came to England, where his landscapes and historical compositions recommended him to notice. He, however, soon discovered that portrait painting was a more lucrative employment, and therefore all his powers were directed to that branch of the art in which he acquired such celebrity. Though unable to travel to Italy, he procured the best pieces of that famous school, and uniting all their beauties to the suggestions of his own genius, he became a pattern of excellence to all other artists. In the graceful air of his heads, the variety and interest of his postures, and the easy management of his draperies, he was said to be inimitable. He was deservedly a favorite with Charles I. and with Charles II. who knighted him, and made him his chief painter. He died of an apoplexy, at London, 1680.

LE MERCIER, Andrew, minister in Boston, had for many years the care of the protestant French church, which was founded by protestants, driven from France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1686. The society being very much diminished, he at length desisted from his public labors, and the house was in 1748 occupied by Mr. Croswell's church. He died in 1762, having sustained a reputable character. He published a church history of Geneva, 12mo. 1732, and a treatise on detraction.

LEMERY, Nicolas, a French chemist, born 17th Nov. 1645, at Rouen, and placed there as apprentice to an apothecary. Anxious to study chemistry he left Rouen, and came to Paris, and soon after went to Montpellier, where he soon acquired reputation under the instruction of Vernant, and became an able and interesting lecturer on chemistry. In 1672 he returned to Paris, and there began to dissipate those clouds of ignorance and prejudice which enveloped the science and language of chemistry: he provided himself a laboratory, and saw his lectures attended by numerous and respectable classes. As he was a protestant, his religion exposed him to persecution: therefore, after refusing to accept the invitations of the court of Berlin, he passed over to England in 1683, where Charles II. received him with great condescension. He, however, soon after returned to France, and yielding to the pressure of the times, he became a Roman catholic, that he might pursue his chemical studies without fear of persecution. On the revival of the academy of sciences 1699, he was made associate chemist and became a pensionary. He died of an apoplexy, 19th June 1715, aged 70. His works are, a Course of Chemistry, often edited—an Universal Pharmacopœia—an Universal treatise of Drugs—a treatise of Antimony.

LEMERY, Lewis, son of the above, was born at Paris 1677, and became physician to the king, and member of the academy of sciences. He wrote, an useful treatise on Food, 2 vols.—another on the Worms of the Human Body—besides several papers in the memoirs of the academy, and died 1743.

LEMIERRE, Anthony Morin, a French poet and dramatist, was born, in 1733, or, according to some, in 1721, at Paris. He was successively a writer of MS. sermons, under master of rhetoric at Harcourt College, and secretary to Dupin, one of the farmers general, who had the liberality to give him a pension, to enable him to give himself up to literature. In 1781 he became a member of the French Academy. He died in 1793. He produced several poems, and nine tragedies; of the latter, William Tell, Hypermestra, and the Widow of Malabar, are still acted.

LEMNIUS, Lævinius, a physician, born at Zirc-zee, Zealand, 1504. On the death of his wife, he took orders, and became canon of Zirc-zee, where he died 1563. He wrote, de occultis Naturæ Miraculis—a treatise on Astrology—an Account of the Plants mentioned in Scripture.

LE MONNIER, Peter Charles, a native of Paris, who went with Maupertuis to measure a degree of the meridian towards the north pole. He wrote, Astronomical Institutions—Tables of the Sun—Corrections for those of the Moon—Lunar Nautical Astronomy. He was member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the national institute, and died 1799.

LE MONNIER, Lewis William, brother to the preceding, was member of the academy of sciences, of the national institute, and of the London Royal society. He distinguished himself as an able physician, and as an experimental philosopher, and he contributed several valuable articles to the French Encyclopedie, especially on electricity. He died 1799.—There was an ecclesiastic of that name, who, besides fables, tales, and epistles, translated Terence and Persius into French.

LEMONTEY, Peter Edward, a member of the French Institute, and of the academy of Lyons, where he was born in 1762. He adopted the profession of an advocate, and after having been attorney of the commune of Lyons, he was chosen a deputy to the first Legislative assembly, in which he distinguished himself by his moderation and the wisdom of his views, as well as by his legal knowledge. Returning to his native place, he took arms in its defence when besieged by the troops of the Convention, and he was afterwards obliged to flee into Switzerland. In 1795 he was made administrator of his district, and was also employed in various missions. After having consecrated several years to the cultivation of literature, Lemontey was, in 1804, nominated chief of the commission for the censure of pieces for the theatre, which delicate office he filled with great ability. In 1819 he succeeded the abbé Morellet as a member of the French Academy or Institute, and he died June 27, 1826. Among his works are "Palma, ou le Voyage en Grèce," an opera; "Raison, Folie, chacun son Mot, petit Cours de Morale à la Portée des Vieux Enfants," 1801, 8vo. reprinted in 1816, 2 vols. 8vo.; "Thibault, ou la Naissana d'un Comte de Champagne," 1811, 12mo.; "Essai sur l'Établissement Monarchique de Louis XIV.," 1818, 8vo.; "Eloge Historique de Vicq d'Azyr," 1825, 4to. He also left in MS. "Histoire Critique de la France depuis la Mort de Louis XIV."

LEMOT, Francis Frederick, a French statuary, who was a knight of the legion of honor, and of the order of St. Michael. He was born at Lyons in 1773, and died at Paris, May 3, 1827. He studied the elements of architecture at the academy of Besançon, and going to Paris about 1786, he became a pupil of Dejoux, a sculptor. At the age of seventeen he obtained a prize for a bas-relief, representing "The Judgment of Solomon," and he was then sent to Rome, where he remained two years. Returning to Paris to solicit assistance from the government for the French students in Italy, he was drawn as a military conscript; and being sent to the army of the Rhine, he served for some time in the artillery, under general Pichegru. In 1795 he was ordered to Paris, to assist in the execution of a statue of Henry IV, to be placed on the Pont Neuf. Among the numerous works which he subsequently produced, may be particularized the bas-relief of the tribune of the chamber of deputies; a statue of Lycurgus; that of Leonidas, placed in the Hall of Deliberations of the Chamber of Peers; that of Cicero, in the old hall of the tribunate; the colossal bust of Jean Bart, in the arsenal of Dunkerque; a figure of Hebe; a statue of Murat; the grand front of the colonnade of the Louvre; and equestrian statues, in bronze, of Henry IV. at Paris, and Louis XIV. at Lyons. Lemot also published "Voyage Pittoresque dans le Bocage de la Vendée, ou Vues de Clisson et de ses Environs, dessinées par Thiénon, avec une Notice sur le Chateau et la Ville de Clisson," Paris, 1817, 4to.

LEMPRIERE, John, D.D. a native of Jersey, was educated at Winchester, and at Pembroke college, Oxford; was head master of Abingdon grammar school, and afterwards of the school at Exeter; and, on resigning the latter, was presented to the livings of Meeth and Newton Petrock, in Devonshire, which he held till his decease, in 1824. He compiled the Bibliotheca Classica; and Universal Biography; and printed the first volume of a translation of Herodotus.

LENCLOS, Ninon de, a celebrated beauty, born 1615, at Paris, of a respectable family. Her mother wished to devote her to the seclusion of a convent, but her father, who was a man of wit and gallantry, prevented it; and the daughter, losing both her parents at the age of 15, soon showed how attached she was to the pleasures of the world. Courted for her polished understanding, and the vivacity of her wit, but more for her beauty, she rejected the honorable offers of matrimony; and as she possessed opulence, managed by economy, she determined to enjoy her liberty, and therefore yielded her person to those, who for greatness of talents, of birth, or of rank, were most pleasing to her licentious imagination. Yet in these voluptuous enjoyments, she affected to preserve the manners of a woman of virtue, and so captivating was her conversation, and dignified her personal deportment, that ladies of character and respectability became her friends and constant associates. Sensible of the charms of virtue, and well skilled in the works of Montaigne and Charron, she talked as a philosopher; but while she reasoned like Socrates, she unfortunately acted the part of Lais. Thus long flattered by the gay, the learned, and the opulent, she preserved her beauty almost to the last, and died 1706, aged 90. She left some children behind her. One of her sons, ignorant of her relationship to him, became enamored of her; and when she, to check his passion, declared herself, by infallible proofs, to be his mother, the unfortunate youth, in despair, stabbed himself in her presence. Some of her letters are preserved in the works of St. Evremont, but the letters to the marquis de Sevigné, published as her own, though entertaining, are spurious.

LENFANT, James, a protestant divine, born 1661. He distinguished himself at Saumur and Geneva, and became minister of the French church at Heidelberg, 1683; but when the palatinate was invaded by the French, he retired to Berlin, where he died of a palsy 1723, aged 67. This respectable man was author of three capital works, the History of the Council of Constance—of Basil—of Pisa, each 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides, the History of pope Joan—Poggeana—sermons—the New Testament translated into Latin with Beausobre.

LENGLLET, Nicolas du Fresnoy, a French writer, born at Beauvais 1674. He was engaged in embassies, first as secretary to the French minister at the court of Cologne, and was afterwards engaged in the correspondence between Brussels and Holland. After reaching his 82d year, he fell asleep while reading by the fire, and then dropped into it, so that his head was nearly burnt off before he was discovered, 1756. His "Methode pour etudier l'Histoire," has been admired and translated into English. He was a voluminous but incorrect writer.

LENNOX, Charlotte, a native of New-York, known as the learned author of Shakspeare illustrated, 3 vols. 12mo. containing an account of the histories from which the great bard is supposed to have drawn his plays,—the Female Quixote, a novel of merit—Memoirs of Harriet Stuart,—and of countess Berce,—Henrietta, a novel,—Philander, a dramatic pastoral,—Sophia,—Euphemia, novels,—Sister,—Old City Manners, two comedies,—translations of Burmoy's Greek Theatre,—and of Sully's Memoirs. She was intimate with Johnson, Richardson, and other men of learning and wit, and died in low circumstances, 1804.

LENTHAL, William, speaker of the long parliament, was born at Henley on Thames, Oxfordshire, 1591, and educated at Alban hall, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Lincoln's inn, and was regularly called to the bar, where he became known as an able counsellor. He was elected in 1639 member for Woodstock, and the next year, when the government were not popular enough to elect Gardiner, the recorder of London, speaker of the Commons, Lenthal, whom Clarendon represents as scarce equal to the high office, was seated in the chair. In this new and honorable situation, Lenthal consulted his interest and his fortunes by siding with the republican party, and while he affected respect towards the unfortunate Charles when he seated himself in the chair of the house, and inquired for the members who had offended him, his measures tended to secure the attachment of the Commons, and the good opinion of the people. Though dismissed from office by Cromwell in 1653, Lenthal was re-elected speaker the next year, and continued in office in the rump parliament. His dubious character, and the partiality which he had shown to the usurpation, exempted him, at the restoration, from the general bill of indemnity; but he afterwards obtained pardon from the king. The support, however, which he had given to the violent measures of the civil war, and the influence which he had exercised to prevent the restitution of royalty, embittered, it is said, his moments of reflection; and at his death in 1663, he expressed sincere contrition for his conduct.

LEO I. or ancient, succeeded Marcian on the throne of Constantinople, 457. He was a Thracian, though the particulars of his early history are unknown. He confirmed, in the beginning of his reign, the decrees of the council of Chalcedon against the Eutycheans, and obtained signal victories against the barbarians; but his expedition against the Vandals was unsuccessful through the treachery of Aspar, his general. Leo punished this powerful offender, and destroyed him and all his family 471; but the Goths resented the severities exercised against their countrymen, and laid waste the provinces of the empire, even to the gates of Constantinople. Leo died soon after, 26th January 474, praised by some historians, but severely censured by others.

LEO II. or younger son of Zeno the Isaurian, and Ariadne, daughter of Leo succeeded his grandfather, 474. Leo, who had ruined his constitution by his debaucheries, died soon after, aged 16, and his father Zeno, who had governed the empire for him, declared himself his successor.

LEO III. or Isaurian, was the son of a cobbler. He served first in the army, and was made by Justinian II. one of his body guards, and raised by Anastasius II. to the rank of general, and in 717 he became emperor. He signalized himself against the Saracens, who had ravaged Thrace, and attacked Constantinople itself, and he destroyed their fleet by means of the Greek fire. Proud of his victory, he banished Germanus from the see of Constantinople, and placed Anastasius in his room, and waging war against learned men and literature, he impiously set on fire the valuable library of his capital. Above 30,000 volumes, besides the choicest paintings and curious medals, perished in this dreadful conflagration. The popes, Gregory II. and Gregory III. excommunicated this uncivilized barbarian; but while he prepared to revenge himself against the anathemas of Rome, he saw his invading fleet wrecked by a storm on the coast of the Adriatic; and he died soon after, 18th June 741, detested as a tyrant.

LEO IV. succeeded in 775, his father, Constantine Copronymus. His reign was marked by the violent disputes between the Iconoclastes, or image breakers, and their religious opponents, whose cause he capriciously espoused by turns. He was successful in his attack against the Saracens in Asia, and died soon after, 780, aged thirty. He was the husband of the famous Irene.

LEO V. the Armenian, became a general by his valor in the Roman armies, but he was disgraced and scourged as a slave by Nicophorus. Michael Rhangabus recalled him from exile to command the army, and so great was his popularity, that he prevailed on his troops to proclaim him emperor 813, and to depose his master. He afterwards obtained a signal victory over the Bulgarians, but disgraced himself by his cruelty. He was assassinated on Christmas day, 820.

LEO VI. or the philosopher, succeeded his father, Basil, the Macedonian, 886. He made war against the Bulgarians, Hungarians, and Saracens, and when he found himself unequal to the contest, he called to his assistance the Turks, who laid waste the country, and after plundering their enemies, sold their booty and their prisoners to their ally. Leo deposed the patriarch Photius, and afterwards his successor Nicolas, because he presumed to excommunicate him for marrying a fourth time. He died of a dysentery, 9th June 911, in the 26th year of his reign. He was surnamed the wise, from the protection which he extended to men of letters. He wrote some books of merit, the best known of which is, a treatise on Tactics, published by Meursius, Leyden, 1612.

LEO I. pope, surnamed the great, was employed in affairs of moment and difficulty by popes Celestinus I. and Sixtus III. the last of whom he succeeded in 440. He pursued vigorous measures to repress heresy, and was severe against the Manicheans, the Pelagians, the Priscillianists, and the Eutycheans. He sent four legates to the council which Marcian had assembled at Chalcedon, and afterwards he was commissioned as the most powerful ambassador, by Valentinian, to meet Attila, who was ravaging Italy, and marching to the gates of Rome. His eloquence prevailed with the fierce barbarian, who was induced to make peace, and to march back his forces across the Rhine. Four years after, however, he was less successful against Genseric, who ferociously entered the capital of Italy 455, and for 14 days abandoned it to the pillage and lust of his uncivilized soldiers. After an useful reign, Leo died, 3d November 461. His works are preserved, printed in 2 vols. 4to. and also in folio, and they contain 96 sermons, and 141 letters.

LEO II. a native of Sicily, who succeeded Agatho in the popedom, 682. He was an able and resolute pontiff, and attempted to extend his power over the ecclesiastical bodies of the east. He first established the kiss of peace at the mass, and also the use of holy water. He died 3d July, 683.

LEO III. a Roman, who succeeded Adrian I. as pope, 795. In 799 a conspiracy was formed against him by the nephews of his predecessor, who were jealous of his elevation, and after the murderers had attempted to stab him, and to tear out his eyes and his tongue, they confined him in a monastery, from which he escaped to Charlemagne. Charlemagne espoused his cause, and reinstated him in the pontifical chair, and in 800 went himself to Rome, and received the imperial crown from his hands. In another conspiracy, after the emperor's decease, Leo behaved with greater severity, and put some of the accomplices to death. He died 11th June, 816. He was an eloquent and popular pontiff, respected abroad, and beloved by his subjects. Thirteen of his epistles are preserved.

LEO IV. a Roman, made pope after Sergius II. 847. He was a wise and courageous pontiff, and when the Saracens approached Rome, to pillage it, he boldly marched out to meet them, and though unsupported by the emperors of the east and the west, he gave them battle, and defeated them with great slaughter, and afterwards employed the captives to adorn and fortify that city, which they intended to destroy. He died 17th July 855.

LEO IX. Brunon, bishop of Toul, was elected pope, 1043, and deserved the name of Saint, in the Romish calendar. He exerted all his authority in the councils of Italy, France, and Germany, to repress the debaucheries of the clergy, and the licentious morals of the laity, and to check the influence of heresy, particularly that of Photius. He visited Germany in 1053, to solicit the assistance of the emperor against the Normans, but in his attack upon these barbarous invaders, he was defeated near Beneventum, and taken prisoner. He was conducted in triumph to Rome, by the conquerors, and died there, 19th April 1054. His sermons, and other works are extant.

LEO X. John de Medicis, son of Lorenzo de Medicis, was born 1475, at Florence, and at the age of 11 was made an archbishop by Louis XI. of France, and cardinal at 14, by Innocent VIII. He was employed as legate by Julius II. and was at the battle of Ravenna, where the French obtained the victory, 1512; but though taken prisoner, he was treated with great respect, and even veneration by the soldiers, as the representative of the holy pontiff. On the death of Julius he had the good fortune, by artifice and intrigue, to secure his elevation to the papal chair, 1513, and his coronation was conducted with the most unusual magnificence. Educated by the most learned men of the times, and allied to a family particularly dear to literature, he evinced his respect for learning, by the liberal patronage which he extended to its votaries. The affairs of the church were intrusted to Bembo, Sadoleto, and other men of enlightened minds, and Leo considered that his throne was best supported, and his fame most surely extended by patronising genius and literary talents, and encouraging the fine arts. Notwithstanding his popularity, Leo found enemies about his person, two of the cardinals, Petrucci and Sauli, prevailed upon his surgeon to poison a wound which he was to cure, but the conspiracy was timely discovered, and the accomplices punished. Petrucci was strangled in the prison, and Sauli purchased his life by the sacrifice of his immense possessions. Ambitious to distinguish himself, Leo formed two projects of great importance and glory; he meditated the union of all the christian princes, for the expulsion of the Turks from Europe, and he wished to complete the stupendous building of St. Peter's church, begun by his predecessor. To effect this, he in 1518, published the granting of indulgencies, by which the purchasers, for a sum of money, might free themselves from their sins. This extraordinary measure produced a schism between the Dominican and Augustine monks in Germany, and at last excited Martin Luther to preach first against the efficacy of these popish pardons, and next against the corruptions of the Roman church. The opposition of Luther at last drew down upon him the thunders of the Vatican, but the reformer, secure in his popularity, and in the protection of some of the German princes, prevailed against the pope, and severed the fairest part of the north from the dominion of Rome. In the war between Charles V. and Francis I. the support of the sovereign pontiff was solicited by both parties, but Leo in pretending to oblige both, sought only the aggrandizement of his family, and the extension of his power in Italy. He died 1st Dec. 1521. Besides his protection of poets and of learned men, he showed his attention to literature, by enriching the public libraries with collections of curiosities, and with valuable MSS.

LEO, Pilatus, Greek professor at Florence, about 1360, first gave lectures on Homer and other Greek authors. He perished in a shipwreck, as he returned from Constantinople to Italy.

LEO, of Modena, a celebrated rabbi of Venice, author of an Italian history of the rites and customs of the Jews—a dictionary, Hebrew and Italian, published Venice, 4to. 1612, and Padua 1640. He flourished in the 17th century.

LEO, John, a native of Grenada, eminent as a geographer. After the ruin of his country, 1492, he went to Africa, in consequence of which he is sometimes called the African. He renounced the religion of Mahomet, and was esteemed by Leo X. He was author of the Lives of Arabian Philosophers—a Description of Africa in Arabic, and died about 1526.

LEO, Peter Cieca de, a Spaniard who travelled in America, and published an interesting account of Peru, finished at Lima 1550. It is a work of merit.

LEONICENUS, Nicholas, professor of physic at Ferrara, was the first who translated Galen's works, which he enriched with commentaries. He also translated the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, and besides Lucian and Dio Cassius. He died 1524, at the great age of 96.

LEONICUS THOMÆUS, Nicholas, a learned Venetian. He studied Greek under Demetrius Chalcondyles, at Florence, and read lectures on Aristotle, at Padua, with great reputation. He translated Proclus's Commentary on the Timæus of Plato, besides other works, and died at Padua 1531, aged 75.

LEONIDAS I., king of Sparta, famous for his heroic patriotism, succeeded his half brother Cleomenes, B. C. 491. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Leonidas, at the head of four thousand men, defended the pass of Thermopylae. Threats and promises were tried in vain, to induce the valiant Spartan to retire from his post. In an attack, which lasted two days, the Persians were not more successful; they were defeated with the slaughter of twenty thousand men. Xerxes was on the point of abandoning his enterprise, when Ephialtes, a traitorous Greek, made known to him a path by which the Persians were enabled to penetrate to the Grecian rear. Leonidas was now surrounded, and, after a severe contest, he perished with his brave companions.

LEOPOLD I. second son of the emperor Ferdinand III. and Mary Anne of Spain, was born 1640, and was made king of Hungary 1655, of Bohemia 1656, and elected emperor 1658. He waged war against the Turks, and though he proved successful by the valor of his general Montecuculi, he made a disadvantageous peace with them. Afterwards when engaged to check the insurrections of his nobles in Hungary, Leopold found himself attacked by the Turkish forces, which penetrated with great rapidity into the heart of the empire, and laid siege to Vienna. While panic and terror prevailed, and the emperor saved himself by flight to Passau, the celebrated John Sobieski came to the assistance of his ally, the siege of Vienna was raised and the Turks defeated. Leopold was also engaged in war with Louis XIV. and lost Alsace, and saw his frontier towns pillaged and destroyed. The glory of his arms was, however, well supported by the valor of his generals, especially of Prince Eugene, of Savoy; but though he had the art to persuade the various princes of the Germanic constitution, to espouse his cause in his quarrels with neighboring princes, he did not display that moderation towards his Hungarian subjects, which wisdom and interest might have dictated. The nobles were so dissatisfied with the severity of his measures, that in an assembly they meditated resistance against their sovereign, and declared the kingdom hereditary; but the death of the emperor prevented the fatal consequences of civil discord. He died 5th May, 1705.

LEOPOLD II. Peter Joseph, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, was born 1747. He was for 25 years grand duke of Tuscany, and in this principality, though perhaps too much attached to trifling forms, he governed with wisdom and moderation. On the death of his brother Joseph II. in 1790, he was elected emperor of Germany, and in this high dignity he evinced great abilities, and enlightened conceptions. By his influence, a reconciliation took place between the Turks and Catharine of Russia, a treaty was made with Prussia, and the connection with England was cemented by every liberal mark of attachment and sound policy. The encroachments of French ambition had already irritated him, and he prepared to declare war against these lawless republicans, but death carried him off in the midst of his preparations, 1st March 1792. He was succeeded by his son, Francis II.

LEOPOLD, duke of Lorraine, son of Charles, the fifth duke, and of Eleanora of Austria, was celebrated for his military valor. At the peace of Ryswick he recovered Lorraine, of which a war with France had dispossessed his father, but though he was not permitted by the treaty to fortify his capital, he devoted himself to the happiness and prosperity of his country, and by the mildness of his government, raised around him an impregnable bulwark in the love and devotion of his people. He was a liberal patron of arts and sciences, and founded the university of Luneville, where he invited, by the most liberal promises, professors of merit and distinction. He died at Luneville, 27th March 1729, aged 50, universally regretted. His son Francis, by Elizabeth, daughter of the duke of Orleans, was afterwards emperor of Germany.

LEOWICQ, Cyprian, or LEOVITIUS, a noble Bohemian, born 1524. His "Ephemerides" was a collection of astrological productions, and incoherent reveries, by which he amused and terrified the superstitious. His prophecy that the world would be at an end in 1584, for a while drew the attention of his countrymen from their pleasures and pursuits, to acts of devotion and piety. He held a conference with Tycho Brahe in 1569, and died 1574.

LEPRINCE, John, a French musician and painter, who in his way to Petersburg, was taken by an English privateer, whose crew plundered him of all his property, except his violin. The musician trusting to his powers, seized the despised instrument, and played upon it with such skill and effect that the astonished sailors restored him all his property. During his residence at Petersburg, he was employed in adorning the palaces and public buildings, but on Catharine's accession he returned to France, where he died, 1781, aged 48, member of the academy. His pieces, which are finished in the style of Teniers and Wouvermans, are much admired.

LE QUIEN, Michael, a learned Dominican, who wrote against Courayer, on the validity of ordination by English bishops. He was well skilled in ecclesiastical history, and died 1703, aged 42.

LESAGE, Alain Rene, eminent as a novelist and a dramatist, was born, in 1668, at Sarzeau, in Brittany; and studied at the Jesuits' College at Vannes. After having, it is believed, for some years held a situation under the farmers general in his native province, he went to Paris in 1692, tried the bar for a short time, and then adopted the profession of an author. His scanty means were enlarged by the generosity of the abbé de Lyonne, his friend, who allowed him a pension of six hundred livres, and made him many valuable presents. De Lyonne did him another essential service, by directing his attention to Spanish literature, and teaching him the language. For some years he continued to be little known as a writer; but, in 1707, he rose at once into popularity by his comedy of Crispin the Rival of his Master, and his romance of Le Diable Boiteux. The comedy of Turcaret, in 1709, added to his fame, and that fame was, in the course of a few years, rendered imperishable by his admirable Gil Blas, which placed him in the first rank of novelists. Lesage was endowed with great literary fertility. Among his novels are, The Adventures of Gusman d'Alfarache; The Adventures of the Chevalier Beauchesne; The History of Estevanille Gonzales; and The Bachelor of Salamanca. Of dramatic pieces he composed twenty-four, and had a share in the composition of seventy-six others. Several miscellaneous works and translations also dropped from his pen. He died, in retirement, at Boulogne, November 17, 1747.

LESAGE, George Lewis, a philosopher, was born, in 1724, at Geneva; and died there in 1803. He was educated for the medical profession, but never practised it. Lesage is principally known by his inquiries into the phenomena of gravitation. Most of his works remain unpublished. Among those which have been printed are, Fragments on Final Causes; and a Treatise on Mechanical Physics.

LESCAILLE, Catherine, a native of Holland, for the sweetness of her poetry called the Dutch Sappho, and the tenth muse. Her poems, which display great genius, though often irregularities, consist of tragedies, published 1723. She died 1711, aged 62.

LESLEY, John, bishop of Ross in Scotland, was born 1527, of a very ancient family. He was educated at Aberdeen, and obtained a canonry in the cathedral there 1547. He afterwards studied in the universities of Toulouse, Poitiers, and Paris, and in 1554 he was recalled home by the queen regent, and made vicar general of Aberdeen, and ordained priest of the parish of Une. In the dissensions which the reformation introduced in Scotland, Lesley, who was a zealous papist, was commissioned by his party, to go and hasten the recall of queen Mary, who had lately lost her husband, Francis II. of France, and after meeting her at Vitri, he returned with her, 1561. His services to the queen recommended him, soon after, to the see of Ross, and he laboriously employed himself, with 15 others, to make a collection of all the laws of the kingdom, which were published at Edinburgh 1566, and called the black acts of Parliament, because printed in black letter. Upon Mary's flight to England, he appeared at York, 1568, and ably and zealously defended her cause against her accusers, and afterwards went to London as her ambassador. His measures to procure her liberty, by a marriage with the duke of Norfolk, proved offensive to Elizabeth, who regardless of the sanctity of his rank, sent him a prisoner to the isle of Ely, and then to the tower. In 1573 he obtained his release, and then retired to the Netherlands, anxiously soliciting the interference of the kings of Spain and France, the princes of Germany and the pope, in the favor of his injured and captive mistress. In 1579 he was made suffragan to the see of Rouen, but in one of his visitations he was rudely seized by the Huguenots, who threatened to deliver him to the English, but he purchased his ransom for 3000 pistoles. Under the reign of Henry III. and of his successor in France, he was again exposed to persecution; but in 1593 he was nominated bishop of Constance. Yet grandeur did not add to his happiness, and when he found it impossible to return to his diocese of Ross, by the prevalence of the protestant religion, he retired to the monastery of Guirtenburg, near Brussels, where he died 1596. His abilities were acknowledged by friends and enemies to be very great, his integrity most exemplary, and his attachment to his unhappy mistress unshaken. Besides several pieces in favor of Mary, and other treatises, he published an excellent work, "De Origine, Moribus, & Rebus Gestis Scotorum, 1578, 4to.

LESLIE, John, a native of Scotland, educated at Aberdeen and Oxford. He travelled abroad, and acquired such a knowledge of the French, Spanish, Italian, and Latin, that he spoke those languages not only with fluency, but with remarkable elegance. After 22 years' residence abroad, he returned to England and was patronised by Charles I. and the second. He was made bishop of Orkneys in Scotland, and in 1633 translated to Raphoe in Ireland, where he built a palace, so strongly fortified, that he was the last who surrendered to the arms of Cromwell. At the restoration he returned to England, and in 1661 was translated to Clogher. He died 1671, aged above 100, being the oldest bishop in the world.

LESLIE, Charles, second son of the preceding, was born in Ireland, and educated at Dublin. He afterwards studied the law at the Temple, London, which he relinquished for divinity. In 1630 he took orders, and in 1637 he was made chancellor of the cathedral of Connor. He afterwards rendered himself very obnoxious to the papists of Ireland, he publicly entered the lists of theological disputation against them, and made converts to his own cause. Respected as a magistrate, and as a divine, he remained attached to the king's government; and though he opposed tyranny, he was zealous to support legal authority. In consequence, therefore, of his loyalty to James, he lost all his preferments at the revolution, and in 1689 he came over to England to avoid the civil commotions which began to distract his native country. In his retirement he usefully employed the powers of his mind in combating the errors of the enemies of the church, both Jews and deists, Socinians and papists, quakers and infidels. He was, however, suspected of too familiar an intercourse with the abdicated monarch, and therefore was obliged to retire to France, where he joined the pretender at Bar le Duc. He here exerted himself by his writings in favor of that unhappy family, and when their schemes of insurrection, in 1715, had failed, he attended them to Italy; but finding his adherence to protestant principles disagreeable to the pretender, he returned to Ireland in 1721, and died in his own house at Glaslough, county of Monaghan, 13th April, 1722. As a friend of the church of England, and as a man of principle, virtue, and integrity, Leslie was inferior to no man. His abilities as a writer, were of a superior cast, and whatever he sent into the world was read with avidity, and received with deference. His tracts, both theological and political, are very numerous, amounting to near 50. He left besides two folio volumes of theological works, in which he discussed the controversies which too much disturb the christian church.

LESLIE, Sir John, one of the first scholars of the age, was born of parents in humble life, in April, 1766, at Largo in Fifeshire, Scotland, and died, Nov. 3, 1832. He became Professor of Natural Philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, was an eminent chemist, mathematician, and natural philosopher, the inventor of the differential thermometer, and author of various scientific works. He was knighted the 27th June, 1832.

LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, a German poet, whose father, a man of literary talents, was minister of the congregation at Kametz. The son inherited the talents, and the application of the father; for five years he studied at Meissen, and after obtaining from his instructors, Klemm and Grabner, the character of an able and indefatigable scholar, he went to Leipsic, where he learned to excel in horsemanship, leaping, and fencing, and began to write for the stage. The liveliness of his temper, however, exposed him to calumny, and gave uneasiness to his father. With his friend Weisse he translated Marivaux's tragedy of Annibal, and here he finished his "Young Scholar," a comedy. Afterwards he went to Wittemberg, and also to Berlin, where he became acquainted with Voltaire, and published various things, often more in haste than with judgment. During the seven years' war he was, for a little time, secretary to general Tauenzien at Breslaw, and to other irregularities, added gaming, in the indulgence of which he forgot his character, and his literary pursuits. The abilities which he possessed, he unfortunately frequently misapplied, and in his wish to do something useful, he often promised more than he performed. His friend Mendelsohn, observed of him after his death, that he was advanced at least a century before the age in which he lived.

LESSIUS, Leonard, a jesuit, born near Antwerp. He was professor of philosophy at Douay, and afterwards filled the divinity chair at Louvaine, where his propositions on some scholastic subjects were exposed to ecclesiastical censure, which, however, the pope Sixtus V. in consequence of an appeal, fully reversed. He wrote De Justitia & Jure, fol.—*De Potestate summi Pontificis—Hygiasticon, seu Vera Ratio Valetudinis—*a Treatise on the Existence of a Deity, and on the Soul's Immortality, which have appeared in an English dress. He died 1623, aged 69.

L'ESTRANGE, sir Roger, descended from an ancient family, was born 17th Dec. 1616, at Hunstanton hall, Norfolk. He was educated at Cambridge, and then attended Charles I. to Scotland in 1639, and during the ensuing civil wars, adhered most firmly to the royal cause. In 1646, however, he was betrayed by two villains, and tried and condemned as a spy by the parliamentary rebels, but his execution was delayed at first for 14 days, and then put off, till he took an opportunity of escaping in 1648, and saving himself, into France. In 1653 he took advantage of Cromwell's indemnity bill, and came back to England, and was, by application to the usurper, discharged. At the restoration, he was for a while neglected, till he was appointed licenser of the press. In 1663 he published the Public Intelligencer, a newspaper, which was laid aside when the London Gazette, first published at Oxford, made its appearance 1665. He again in 1679 set up another paper, called the Observer, in defence of the ministry, and of the character of the king; but while he ridiculed the popish plot, and the other secret machinations of the enemies of all order, he exposed himself to the calumny of some interested persons, who wished to represent him as a dangerous man to government. When James II. came to the throne he knighted him, as he said, in consequence of his services and unshaken loyalty to the crown. In 1687 his Observer ceased, as he refused, though a loyal man, to espouse the cause of toleration recommended by the king. Yet some failed not to accuse him of being a papist, especially when his daughter became a convert to that communion. At the revolution sir Roger was neglected by the ruling powers, and even treated with contempt by the queen. He died 11th Sept. 1704. His political tracts are very numerous, and besides these he translated Josephus, from D'Andilly's French—Cicero's Offices—Seneca's Morals—Esop's Fables—Erasmus's Colloquies—Quevedo's Visions—Bona's Guide.

LETI, Gregorio, an Italian writer, born at Milan, 1630, and educated among the jesuits. He travelled, and embraced the protestant religion at Lausanne, and for 20 years lived at Geneva. He afterwards came to London, but though patronised by Charles II. he settled at Amsterdam, where he died 1701, with the title of historiographer of the town. His daughter married John le Clerc, and died 1734. As an historian he was esteemed, though often incorrect. He wrote the *History of Louis XIV.—of Philip II. of Spain—of Charles V.—of Queen Elizabeth—of Oliver Cromwell—of Pope Sixtus VI.—*of Geneva.

LETTSON, John Coakley, a physician, was born on a small island, called Little Vandyke, near Tortola, in 1744. His father was a planter, and his mother was descended from a respectable Irish family. They were of the society of quakers; and young Letson, being sent to England, was placed under the care of Samuel Fothergill, a celebrated preacher of that sect, who sent him to an academy at Warrington. On arriving at a proper age he was bound apprentice to an apothecary of Settle, in Yorkshire, after which he became a pupil of St. Thomas's hospital. The death of his elder brother induced him to visit his native island, to look after his property; but finding that it chiefly consisted of slaves, he emancipated them all, and settled at Tortola. His stay there was not long, and, on his return to Europe, he took his doctor's degree at Leydon. He then fixed his residence in London, where, by the friendship of Dr. Fothergill, and his connexion with the Quakers, he attained a most extensive practice. Dr. Letson, however, quitted the society, some years before his death, which happened Nov. 1, 1815. He was a zealous philanthropist, and a member of most of the literary and scientific societies in Europe and America. His works are numerous and well known.

LEUSDEN, John, eminent for biblical knowledge, was born at Utrecht, where he became professor of Hebrew, and where he died 1699, aged 75. He was author of Onomasticon Sacrum—Clavis Hebraica & Philologica Vet. Testamenti—Novi Test.—Clavis Græca—Compendium Biblic. Vet. Testam.—Compendium Græcum Novi Testam.—Philologia Hebræus—et Hebræo Græcus—Notes on Jonah, Joel and Hosea.

LEUWENHOEK, Anthony de, an eminent physician, born at Delft, in Holland, 1632. He acquired great celebrity by his curious and astonishing discoveries by the microscope. His letters to the royal society of London, of which he was member, printed 1722, 4to. and his Arcana Naturæ Detecta, 1714, 4 vols. 4to. are valuable. He died 26th Aug. 1723, aged 91.

LEVAILLANT, Francis, a traveller, was born at Paramaribo, in Guiana, and died, in 1824, at Sezanne, in France. Besides his two narratives of his Travels into the interior of Southern Africa, he published a *Natural History of African Birds—*of a part of the new and rare Birds of America and the West Indies—of Parrots—and of Birds of Paradise. The travels of Levaillant are amusing, and afford considerable information; but the veracity of some parts of them has been doubted.

LEVER, sir Ashton, son of sir d'Arcy Lever, knight of Alkington near Manchester, was celebrated as a judicious collector of rare and valuable curiosities. From Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where as a gentleman commoner, he was admired for his skill in horsemanship, he went to reside with his mother, and then settled on his estate, where he employed himself in collecting birds, and forming the most valuable aviary in the kingdom. Strongly attached to whatever was rare and astonishing in natural history, he devoted himself to the improvement of his collection, and by the favor of his friends, and his own indefatigable exertions, he soon found himself master of the most admired private museum in the nation. This curious collection, which was formed at great expense, was for some time exhibited in London, to the admiration of the public, and in 1795 was disposed of by way of lottery, and fell to the share of Mr. Parkinson, though it did not repay the proprietor the fourth part of his original expenses.

LEVERETT, John, governor of Massachusetts, was a native of England, and came to America in 1633, and was admitted a freeman in 1640. He signalized himself by his bravery in the early periods of his life. He was long employed in public affairs and places of great trust. He was in England at the restoration, and appeared an advocate for the colony. Upon his return to America he was chosen a member of the general court for Boston. In 1664 he was chosen major general, and in 1665 an assistant. He was elected governor in 1673, and continued in the office till his death in 1679, aged about 60.

LEVERETT, John, president of Harvard college, where he graduated in 1680. After taking his degree he was appointed a tutor in the college. Though it is probable that he studied divinity as his profession, yet he was chosen a member of the house of representatives, and also speaker. He was afterwards a member of his majesty's council, a justice of the superior court, and judge of probate. He was chosen president of Harvard college and inducted into office in 1708. He died in office in 1724, aged 62.

LEVESQUE, Peter Charles, a French writer, was born at Paris in 1736, and died there in 1812. He wrote 1. Le Reves d'Aristobule, philosophe Grec, suivis d'un abr  de la vie de Fornose, philosophe Francais. 2. L'Homme Moral. 3. L'Homme Pensant. 4. Histoire de Russie, 5 vols. 12mo. 5. Histoire des differens peuples soumis   la domination des Russes, 2 vols. 6. Eloge historique de Pabb  Mably. 7. La France sous les cinq premiers Valois, 4 vols. 8. Dictionnaire des arts, de peinture, sculpture, et gravure, 5 vols. 9. L'etude de l'histoire de la Grece, 4 vols. 8vo. He also translated Thucydides from the Greek, and Plutarch from the Italian.

LEVESQUE DE PONILLI, Lewis, a member of the French academy of inscriptions, and governor of Rheims, which he improved by the establishment of mathematical schools, and other valuable institutions. He wrote the Theory of agreeable sensations, a curious book, translated into English, and died 1746.

LEVINGSTON, James, a brave Scotchman, who distinguished himself in the wars of Bohemia, Holland, Sweden, and Germany, and afterwards became gentleman of the bed chamber to Charles I. who created him lord Levingston, and in 1641, earl of Calendar. At the beginning of the civil wars he sided with the parliament, but soon after he was reconciled to the king, whose forces he assisted in reducing York. He also attempted to rescue his master from the Isle of Wight, and took Carlisle, where he found a large supply of ammunition and arms. He died October, 1672.

LEVIZAC, John Pons Victor Lecoutz de, a grammarian, was born at Alby, in Languedoc; emigrated at the commencement of the revolution; and died, in 1813, in London. His chief works are, A Philosophical and literary French Grammar; an Abridgment of it; a French and English Dictionary; a Dictionary of Synonymes; and a Portable Library of French Writers. In his youth he gained some applause as a poet.

LEWIS, John, a native of Bristol, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He obtained from Tenison, the primate, Minister vicarage in the Isle of Thanet, and the mastership of Eastbridge hospital, Canterbury, and died at Margate, 1746, aged 71. He published the Life of Wickliffe, 8vo.—the Life of Caxton, 8vo.—the History of Faversham Abbey, 4to.—the History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet, 4to.—History of the Various Translations of the Old and New Testaments into English, 8vo.—Wickliffe's Translation of the New Testament, folio.

LEWIS, Francis, one of the signers of the American declaration of independence, was a native of England. He was educated at Westminster. In 1735 he came to America, and did business as a merchant at New York. His commercial transactions induced him to visit Russia and other parts of Europe. As agent for supplying the British troops, he was at fort Oswego, when it surrendered to Montcalm, and was carried a prisoner to Montreal, and thence to France. After his liberation, in the revolutionary movements of the country, he was among the first of "the sons of liberty." In April 1775 he was elected a member of congress; the next year he signed the declaration of independence. He was employed in the importation of military stores, and other secret services. He died 1803, aged 90.

LEWIS, Meriwether, governor of upper Louisiana, was a native of Virginia. From 1801 to 1803 he was the private secretary of president Jefferson, who appointed him in 1803 to the command of the exploring party, directed to cross the continent to the pacific ocean. He returned from this expedition in about three years. Soon after his return in 1806, he was made governor of Louisiana. Some difficulty as to his accounts, which distressed him, induced him to set out on a journey to Washington. Landing at Chickasaw bluffs, he thence proceeded by land. On the borders of Tennessee about 40 miles from Nashville he committed suicide, Oct. 11, 1809, aged 35. This event was ascribed to the protest of some bills, which he drew on the public account. He had written an account of his expedition up the Missouri and to the Pacific, which was published, under the care of Paul Allen, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1814; in which appeared his life, written by Mr. Jefferson.

LEY, sir James, sixth son of Henry Ley of Jessent, Wilts, was raised by merit, to the office of chief justice in Ireland, and afterwards in England, and afterwards created baron Ley, and earl of Malborough, and lord high treasurer, by James I. Some of his pieces on antiquity have been published by Hearne, and also his Reports, 1659.

LEYDECKER, Melchior, a native of Middleburg, professor of theology at Utrecht, where he died 1721, aged 69. He is author of a curious treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews, 2 vols. fol.—History of Jansenism—Analysis of Scripture—Continuation of Hornier's Ecclesiastical History, and History of the Church of Africa.

LEYDEN, John, a poet, orientalist, and physician, was born, in 1775, at Denholm, in Roxburghshire, and was the son of a shepherd. After having picked up a little learning at his native place, he studied at Edinburgh. The church was his destination, but he relinquished it for surgery, obtained a doctor's degree, and was appointed assistant surgeon on the Madras establishment. In India, his profound knowledge of the native dialects occasioned his being made professor of them in the Bengal College; from which situation, however, he was soon removed, to be judge of the twenty-four Pergunnahs of Calcutta. In 1811 he accompanied Lord Minto to Batavia, where he fell a victim to the climate, on the 27th of August. Leyden had a wonderful power of acquiring languages. As a linguist he exceeded even Sir William Jones. His poems, including the Scenes of Infancy, have been collected in two volumes. He wrote A History of Discoveries in Africa; and edited The Complaynt of Scotland, and Scottish Descriptive poems.

LHUYD, Edward, a learned Welchman, born at Llanvyrde, Carmarthenshire, and educated at Jesus college, Oxford. He succeeded Dr. Plot, his tutor, as keeper of the Ashmolean museum, and zealously devoted himself to study the antiquities of his native country. For this purpose he travelled with the observation of an active antiquarian, over Wales, Cornwall, Scotland, Ireland, and Bretagne, but before he had completed the digestion of his valuable materials he unfortunately died, July 1709. He published Archæologia Britannica, or an Account of the Languages, Histories and Customs of the Ancient Britons, vol. 1. fol. 1707, and left in MS. a Scottish or Irish English dictionary, which Malcolm a Scotch divine proposed to publish by subscription in 1732. His MSS. amounted to 40 vols. folio, 10 4to. and above 100 smaller ones.

LHWYD, or LHUYD, Humphrey, an antiquarian, born at Denbigh. He studied physic at Oxford, and took his degrees at Brazen-nose college, and then removed to practise physic in his native town. He died 1570, leaving behind him the character of an excellent rhetorician, sound philosopher, and indefatigable and accurate antiquarian. His publications were "an Almanack, &c.—Commentarioli Britannicæ Descriptionis Fragmentum 1572, published again by Moses Williams 1671, 4to. and translated into English by Th. Twyne, under the title of the Breviary of Britain 1753, 8vo.—De Monâ Druidum Insulâ, Antiquitati sue Restitutâ 1568,—de Armamentario Romano—Chronicon Walliæ a Rege Cadwalladero ad A.D. 1294,—the History of Cambria, left unfinished, but afterwards edited by Dr. Powell 1584, in 4to.

LIBAVIUS, Andrew, a native of Hall in Saxony, who died at Cobourg in Franconia 1616. He was an able physician and wrote Syntagma Selectorum Alchemiæ Arcanorum, 2 vols. folio.—Epistolæ Chemicæ. 1595, besides tracts against Paracelsus.

LICHTENBERG, George Christopher, a German philosopher and writer, was born, in 1742, at Ober Ramstaedt, near Darmstadt, and was educated at Darmstadt and Göttingen; at which latter place he became professor of mathematics, and, subsequently, of experimental philosophy. He died in 1799. His scientific and miscellaneous works have been published in nine volumes. Among the contents of the second class are, An Explanation of Hogarth's Prints; some severe Satires on Lavater's System of Physiognomy; and an Autobiographical Journal. Lichtenberg, says Stapfer, "is sportive, and never grotesque; novel, without effort; gay, without the slightest levity; various and profound, without ceasing to be solid and clear."

LICINIUS, C. Flavius Valerianus, son of a Dalmatian Peasant, rose to the rank of a general in the Roman armies, and was made assistant emperor by Galerius. Constantine, who knew his merit, gave him his sister in marriage, but afterwards so great an enmity arose between them that only the death of Licinius in battle A.D. 324, ended the contest.

LICINIUS, Caius, a Roman plebeian, tribune of the people, author of a law to forbid the possession of more than 500 acres of land in any single individual. He also made a law to make the plebeians eligible to the consulship, and he was himself the first plebeian consul.

LIDDEL, Duncan, a native of Aberdeen. After studying in his native town he went at the age of 18 to Frankfort, where he applied to the mathematics, and then to Helmstadt where he took the degree of M.D., 1596, and became professor of mathematics and medicine. After travelling through Germany and Italy, he returned to his native country, where in gratitude for the honors and the success he had met in the world he founded six scholarships in Aberdeen university. He was author of Disputationes Medicinales, Helmstadt 1603, 4to.—Ars Medica succintè & perspicuè Explicata, Hamburg, 1607, 8vo. and he died on his estate near Aberdeen, 1613, aged 52.

LIEUTAUD, Joseph, physician to Louis XVI.

and member of the academy of sciences in 1752, was born at Aix in Provence. His chief works are "Anatomical Essays—Elements of Physiology—Synopsis of the Practice of Medicine—Historia Anatomico-Medica, 2 vols. 4to.—besides papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died highly respected 1780.

LIGARIUS, Quintus, a proconsul of Africa, who opposed the ambitious views of Cæsar, but afterwards was reconciled to him. When accused by Tubero he was ably defended by Cicero. He was afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers.

LIGHTFOOT, John, D.D., a most eminent divine, born 29th March, 1602, at Stoke on Trent, Staffordshire. He was educated at Morton Green school, Cheshire, and in 1617, entered at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he soon became distinguished as an able scholar and an eloquent orator. After being some time assistant at Repton school, Derbyshire, he took orders, and from the curacy of Norton, Shropshire, was admitted as chaplain into the family of sir Rowland Cotton, of Bellapont, a great Hebraist in those days. Under the patronage of this hospitable man he devoted himself to the study of the oriental languages, and in 1629, published his "Erubhim, or Miscellanies Christian and Judaical," dedicated to his friend sir Rowland, who two years after gave him the rectory of Ashley, Staffordshire. Before this time Lightfoot had wandered in quest of settlement from London to Stone, and again to Hornsey near London, but now being in possession of a comfortable independence he devoted himself totally to literary pursuits, till, in the troubles of the times, his abilities made him known to the ruling powers, and in 1642, he departed for London, after resigning his living to his younger brother. He was now nominated one of the assembly of divines for settling the administration of the church, and in their meetings he distinguished himself as an eloquent, manly, and independent speaker. He was afterwards chosen minister of St. Bartholomew, behind the Royal Exchange, and in 1653, was, on the expulsion of Dr. Spurstow, made master of Catherine hall, Cambridge, and presented to the living of Much-Munden, Herts. At the restoration he offered to resign to his predecessor Spurstow, but as his compliance with the measures of the usurpation was considered more as a matter of quiet resignation to superior authority, than of disloyalty to the exiled monarch, he was, by the interference of Sheldon the primate, and of others, permitted to retain his preferment. In 1661, he was one of the divines who had a conference at the Savoy about the liturgy; but disgusted with the violence of his associates he retired to his peaceful studies. He died 6th Dec. 1675. Lightfoot in the acknowledgment both of Englishmen and of foreigners, was one of the most eminent men in rabbinical learning that country ever produced, and his researches and commentaries were the grand store-house of succeeding annotators. Upon his "Harmony," he bestowed great and long labor. His works were collected together and first published in 1684, 2 vols. folio, of which a second edition appeared at Amsterdam, 1686, to which a third volume was added in a third edition by J. Leusden, Utrecht, 1699, folio.

LIGNAC, Joseph Adrian de, a priest of the Oratory, author of Letters to an American on Buffon's Natural History, 2 vols. 12mo. and other learned works. He was a native of Poitiers, and died 1762.

LIGNE, Charles Joseph, prince de, was born, in 1735, at Brussels; entered the Austrian army at the age of seventeen ; and acquired reputation in the seven years' war, and the short war of 1773. Being sent on a mission to Russia, his wit and talent, and his personal accomplishments, rendered him a favorite of Catherine, who made him a field marshal, and gave him an estate in the Crimea. He assisted Potemkin in the reduction of Oczakoff, and Laudohn in that of Belgrade. Subsequently he was not employed in the Austrian army. He died in 1814. His works, military and miscellaneous, from nearly forty volumes. The pretended Autobiography of Prince Eugene was written by the prince de Ligne.

LILBURNÉ, John, an English enthusiast, born in 1618, at Thickney-Purcharden, Durham, the ancient seat of his family. At the age of 12 he was bound apprentice to a wholesale clothier, in London ; but here he manifested the independent spirit of the times, and paid more attention to puritanical books than to business. In 1636 he was prevailed upon by Bastwick, a prisoner of the Star chamber, to go to Holland, and to print there his "Merry Liturgy," a violent pamphlet against the bishops, and in consequence of this, he was on his return taken up while distributing that and other obnoxious books, and for the offence he was whipt at the cart's tail, pilloried, fined 500*l.* and imprisoned. These punishments he underwent with such firmness and triumph that he was called by his party the saint, but at last the parliament interfered, though he had published some virulent papers, and headed a mob, clamoring for justice against Strafford. His sentence under the Star chamber was deemed tyrannical by the commons, and 2000*l.* were voted to him by the lords out of the estates of the royalists, which sum was afterwards increased, though he never received the whole. In the civil wars he gradually rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel, and behaved with great bravery, especially at the battles of Edge-hill, Brentford, and Marston-moor ; but his temper was so violent that he quarrelled even with his friend and patron the earl of Manchester, and wrote some virulent papers against him, for which he was sent by the lords to the tower. He petitioned the commons, but finding them slow in listening to his complaints he vented his abuse against the house, and declared in his "Oppressed Man's Oppression," that they were tyrants and ought to be pulled down. He at last, however, procured his enlargement, by means chiefly of Cromwell, whom he soon after abused, but his intemperance of language and conduct was such at last, that the parliament ordered him to be fined 7000*l.* and banished out of the kingdom. He escaped beforehand, and went to Amsterdam where he began to intrigue for the restoration of the royal family, which he promised to effect for the reward of 10,000*l.* His offers, however, were regarded as the measures of a disappointed man, so that at the dissolution of the long parliament he again returned to England 1657, and was acquitted by a jury. After this he escaped Cromwell's resentment, by the interference of his friends, and retired to Eltham, where he turned preacher among the quakers. He died at Eltham, 29th Aug. 1657, aged 49.

LILLO, George, a dramatic writer, born near Moorgate, London, 4th Feb. 1693. Though a jeweller by profession and a man of business, he cultivated the muses and acquired great celebrity. His subjects were the common incidents of private life, but they were wrought in so masterly a manner, and delineated in such pathetic characters as touched the heart more forcibly than the misfortunes of kings and heroes. His "George Barnwell," Fatal Curiosity, "and Arden of Feversham," have long been and continue to be the admiration of crowded audiences, when the tears that are shed by sympathizing nature bear a stronger testimony to the merits of the author than the most pompous descriptions of language. This worthy advocate of virtue was a dissenter in his religious opinions. He died Sept. 3, 1739. His works were edited, 2 vols. 12mo. 1775, by Th. Davies ; and Henry Fielding, who knew him well, said in "his Champion," after his decease, that he had the spirit of an old Roman, with the innocence of a primitive christian.

LILY, or LYLIE, John, a dramatist and miscellaneous writer, was born, about 1533, in the weald of Kent ; was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford ; was long an unsuccessful suitor for court favor ; and died, in poverty, towards the close of Elizabeth's reign. He wrote nine plays, which are not without merit. He is most remarkable, however, for two works, entitled Euphues and his England, and Euphues, the Anatomy of wit, written with a view to reform the English language ; "the strange and barbarous jargon" of which, as Ellis justly calls it, was actually popular among the courtiers. Sir Walter Scott has put this Babylonish dialect into the mouth of Sir Piercie Shafton in The Monastery.

LILLY, William, an English astrologer, born 1602. He engaged himself first as servant to a mantuanaker, and four years after as book-keeper to a master of the Salters' company, and after his death he married his widow with a fortune of 1000*l.* Thus become his own master he began to frequent the puritanical meetings, and in 1632 applied himself to the study of astrology under Evans, a Welchman of debauched character. In this new character he acted with great precaution, his predictions were generally ambiguous, and if they failed, the deception was ascribed to untoward circumstances or false representations. He was frequently consulted by the parliamentary generals, and his assurances of success were productive of great animation in the soldiers.—Though attached to the republicans, his services were solicited also for the king, and Mrs. Whorwood consulted him on the part of his majesty, and he informed her he might conceal himself in Essex, about 20 miles from London, and when he was confined in Carisbrook castle, he provided him with a saw and aquafortis, by which he might effect his escape. The parliament in the mean time patronized him by a salary of 100*l.* a year, which he resigned in two years, and in 1648 and the next year, he greatly improved his property by delivering lectures on his art. At the restoration he was examined by the commons about the beheading of Charles which he declared was done by cornet Joyce. After obtaining his pardon, under the broad seal of England, he returned to Horsham where he practised physic, as he had, through the friendship of Elias Ashmole, obtained a license from archbishop Sheldon. He died 1631. He acquired property by his publications, and especially by his almanacs, and in 1659 was complimented with a gold chain and medal by the king of Sweden, whose name he had mentioned with particular respect. His chief works are Christian Astrology, 4to. 1647—A Collection of Nativities—Observations on the Life of Charles I.—Anus Tenebrosus, or the Black Year.

LILY, William, an English grammarian, born at Odiham, Hants, 1466. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and after taking his bachelor's degree he went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. On his return he stopped at Rhodes, where he studied Greek, and also at Rome, where he still more fully improved himself. In 1510 the year after his arrival in England, he was in consequence of his great reputation for learning, made first master of St. Paul's school, then founded by dean Colet. For 12 years he presided with high celebrity over this foundation, and had among his pupils many persons who afterwards distinguished themselves in the state. He died of the plague in London 1522, aged 54.—Lily is the author of a valuable grammar, in which it is said he was assisted by his friends, Erasmus, Colet, and Wolsey; but though it has been recommended by royal authority for general use, Roger Ascham and some others have ventured to censure it as very imperfect and incorrect. He wrote besides, "Poemata Varia," and other pieces.

LILY, George, eldest son of the grammarian, was born in London, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, after which he went to Rome, and was patronised there by cardinal Pole. On his return to England, he was made canon of St. Paul's, and prebendary of Canterbury. He wrote some historical books, and was the first who published a correct map of Britain. He died 1559.

LIMBORCH, Philip, a learned divine, born at Amsterdam, 19th June 1633. His education was completed under the first masters, and after studying divinity for some time at Utrecht, he embraced the tenets of the remonstrants, and first appeared as a public probationary preacher at Haerlem, 1655. From Haerlem he went to Gonda; and in 1667 he was invited to Amsterdam, where he became deputy, and the next year successor, to Pontanus, the divinity professor. But he acquired popularity not only as a preacher, but as a writer, and as the editor of the letters of his uncle Episcopius, which contained the regular history of Arminianism. In 1636 he published his popular work, Theologia Christiana ad Praxim Pietatis, in folio, which was well received, and quickly passed through four editions. In 1636 he had also a dispute with Isaac Orobio, a learned Jew, who had escaped from the Spanish inquisition at Seville, and practised physic at Amsterdam, and the result of this controversy appeared under the title of Collatio Amica de Veritate Christianæ Religionis cum Erudito Judæo. In this and other performances he displayed great abilities, but in the management of his arguments he was modest and candid. He was employed in 1694 to recover from Judaism a young lady of Amsterdam, of the age of 22, who had, at the persuasion of the Jews, embraced their religion, and he succeeded, by the strength and solidity of his arguments, to remove all her doubts. This good, pious, and active man, was seized with St. Anthony's fire in the autumn of 1711, and died in consequence of it the following 30th of April. He was greatly esteemed by Locke and Tillotson, and was the correspondent of several learned men in Europe. His History of the Inquisition, published 1692, folio, was translated into English by Sam. Chandler, 2 vols. 4to. 1731.

LINACRE, Dr. Thomas, a learned physician, descended from an ancient Derbyshire family, was born at Canterbury 1460. From the king's school in his native town he passed to Oxford, and was elected fellow of All Souls 1484, after which he travelled on the continent, and improved himself at Florence and at Rome, by the instruction of those eminent scholars, Demetr. Chalcondylas, Ang. Politian, and Herm. Barbarus. On his return home he was made professor of physic at Oxford, and afterwards became preceptor to prince Arthur and physician to Henry VII. and afterwards to Henry VIII. In 1500, he abandoned physic for divinity, and obtained a prebend in Wells, and another in York cathedral, besides other preferment by the friendship of Wareham, the primate. He was also rector of Wigan, Lancashire, and prebendary of Westminster. He was not only the best Grecian and Latinist of his age, but he proved himself one of the most zealous promoters of the revival of learning in the kingdom; and by his means the college of physicians was founded, and of this excellent institution he became the first president. This good and worthy man died 20th Oct. 1524. He published a Latin translation of Proclus' Sphere, 1499—the rudiments of Grammar, for the Use of the Princess Mary—de Emendatâ Structurâ Latini Sermonis, Libri sex, a valuable work—and translations of Galen's works, in truly classical language.

LINCOLN, Benjamin, an eminent American revolutionary general, was a native of Massachusetts. Until the age of forty, he was engaged in agricultural pursuits, and at the commencement of the American revolutionary war in 1775, he held the office of lieutenant colonel of Militia. He was elected a member of the provincial congress, one of the secretaries of that body, and also a member of the committee of correspondence. The council of Massachusetts appointed him a brigadier in 1776, and soon after a major general, when he employed himself industriously in arranging and disciplining the militia, at the head of a body of whom, he joined the main army at New York in October. By the recommendation of general Washington congress appointed him a major general in the continental forces. In July 1777, general Lincoln was despatched to the northern army, under Gates, to assist in opposing Burgoyne. Stationed at Manchester, in Vermont, Lincoln received and organized the New England militia as they joined him. A detachment of 500 men from his troops, under colonel Brown surprised the English at the landing at lake George, took 200 batteaux, with 293 men, and released 100 American prisoners. He then joined general Gates' army of which he was second in command. Here he was wounded in the leg, and his wound confined him at Albany for several months. After suffering the removal of a part of the main bone, he was conveyed to his residence at Hingham. In the following August, he repaired to the head quarters of general Washington, and was designated by congress to conduct the war in the southern department. He arrived at Charleston in December 1778, when he found his duties on that station to be of the most difficult nature. An army was to be formed, organized and supplied, that he might be enabled to contend with a veteran enemy. With the design of protecting the upper part of Georgia, Lincoln proceeded to Augusta in April; but the British commander, Prevost, marched upon Charleston, general Lincoln pursued the same route, and on arriving at that city found that the enemy had retired from before it the preceding night. June 19, he attacked about 600 of the enemy entrenched at Stone ferry, but was repulsed. French forces arrived with the fleet under count D'Estaing in the early part of September 1779. Prevost having possessed himself of Savannah, an expedition was projected against that place, in conjunction with the French commander. For this purpose, nearly 8000 of the foreign auxiliaries were landed, to which general Lincoln added 1000 men from his own troops. The enemy however used every exertion to strengthen the defences, and was reinforced, while the commander was preparing the articles of capitulation to D'Estaing. A regular siege was then attempted ; but various considerations urging the necessity of speedy operations, a general assault was made by the combined French and American forces, under D'Estaing and Lincoln on the morning of the 9th of October. Occurrences entirely accidental frustrated their hopes, and after planting two standards on the parapets, the allies were repulsed, the French having lost 700, and the Americans 240 in killed and wounded. After this unfortunate but bold assault, general Lincoln entered Charleston, and in order to put it in a proper posture of defence, importuned congress for a reinforcement of regular troops with additional supplies, but his requisitions were but partially granted. General sir Henry Clinton arrived in February, 1780, and having debarked a strong force in the neighborhood, encamped before the American lines, March 30. Notwithstanding the great superiority of the enemy, general Lincoln determined to attempt the defence of his post, and accordingly to a demand of unconditional surrender, returned an immediate refusal, but was obliged to capitulate, May 12, by the discontent of the troops, and the inhabitants, the great superiority of numbers on the part of the enemy, and the expenditure of his provisions and ammunition, after a constant cannonade had been kept up for a month. For a fortnight previous to the surrender he had not undressed to sleep. His reputation was too firmly established to be shaken by the disastrous termination of his southern campaign, and credit was given him for having for three months withstood the power of the British commanders, and so effectually retarded the execution of their future plans. Owing to the delay, North Carolina was saved for the rest of the year 1780. In November following general Lincoln was exchanged for general Phillips, who had been taken prisoner at Saratoga. In the campaign of 1781, Lincoln commanded a division, and at Yorktown performed a conspicuous part. At that place the army of Cornwallis capitulated to the combined forces of France and America, on similar terms to those which had been granted to general Lincoln at Charleston. On the latter was conferred the office of receiving the submission, and directing the distribution of the conquered troops ; and the day succeeding the surrender his services were commended in the general order of the commander-in-chief. In October 1781, he was appointed by congress secretary of war, still retaining his military rank. He tendered his resignation of this office three years afterwards, which was received by congress with an expression of their approbation of his conduct, both in the field and cabinet. He was appointed by the governor of Massachusetts, commander of a body of militia, despatched to suppress an insurrection in that state in the years 1786, and 1787. His dexterity and vigor in this transaction happily effected the object in view, with very little bloodshed, a few persons only being killed in a slight skirmish. In May 1787, he was elected lieutenant governor of his native state. He was a member of the convention for ratifying the federal constitution ; and in the summer of 1789, was appointed by president Washington, collector of the port of Boston. He died 1810, aged 77.

LINCOLN, Levi, attorney general of the United States, graduated at Harvard college 1772. He settled as a lawyer in the town of Worcester in the state of Massachusetts. In 1801, he was appointed by Mr. Jefferson attorney general, and held the office till Dec. 1805. In 1807, and 1808, he was chosen lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, and on the death of Sullivan in Dec. 1808, acted as governor, during the remainder of the political year. He died 1820, aged 71.

LINCOLN, Enoch, governor of Maine. After studying law, he settled in Fryeburg, Maine, and afterwards in Paris. He was a member of congress from 1819 to 1826. He was chosen governor of Maine 1827, and 1828. He died 1829, aged 41.

LINDANUS, William, a Dutchman, made the first bishop of Ruremonde, by Philip II. of Spain. He was in 1598, removed to Ghent, and died there that year. He was a native of Dordt, and wrote some Latin works on Theological subjects, and in defence of the catholic religion.

LINDSAY, John, a learned divine, educated at St. Mary-hall, Oxford. For some years he was the minister of a dissenting congregation in Aldersgate street, and was also a corrector of the press to Mr. Bowyer. He died June 21st, 1768, aged 82, and was buried in Islington church-yard. He wrote, "the Short History of the Regal Succession"—Remarks on Whiston's Scripture Politics, 8vo.—and translated Mason's Vindication of the Church of England, reprinted 1727.

LINDSAY, sir David, a Scotch poet, born at the Mount, Fifeshire, 1496, and educated at St. Andrew's. After the fatal day of Flodden-field, he went over to France, and distinguished himself at the battle of Pavia ; and on his return home, was made by James V. master of the heralds' office. He was also employed in several embassies, and wrote some admired poems. His Satires on the Vices of the Clergy were much admired. He wrote also an History of Scotland, three vols. now in MS. in the advocates' library Edinburgh. He died 1557, aged 61.

LINDWOOD, William, divinity professor at Oxford in the reign of Henry V. was ambassador in Spain 1422, and for his services was made bishop of St. David's 1434. He wrote the Constitutions of the archbishops of Canterbury from Langton to Chichely, printed Paris 1505, and Oxford 1663 ; and he died 1446.

LINGAN, James Maccubin, general, a victim to a mob, was a native of Maryland, and an officer of the American revolutionary army ; he fought in the battle of Long Island. At the surrender of fort Washington he was taken prisoner, and shared in the sufferings of the horrid prison ship. At the close of the war he returned to Georgetown, of which port he was appointed by Washington the collector. For several years before his death, he lived retired in the country, happy in domestic life. He was murdered by a mob at Baltimore, his brains being beat out with clubs, July 28, 1812, aged about 60. The following is a brief history of the event. The war had just been declared against Great Britain. In June Mr. Hanson had published something in his Federal Republican, which so irritated the populace, that they destroyed the printing office. Mr. H. resolving to issue his paper anew, took possession of a house on Sunday, July 26th, supported by a number of his zealous political friends well armed. The next morning the paper was issued, containing animadversions on the police, and people of Baltimore ; in the evening the house was attacked, but assisted by generals Lingan and Lee, and about 20 others, he repelled the assault, by firing upon the assailants, killing Dr. Gale, and wounding others. In the morning of the 28th the gentlemen in the house found it necessary for their security to surrender to the civil authority, and were conducted to jail. In the evening of the same day a blood thirsty mob forced the jail, and killed gen. Lingan, and dreadfully mangled eleven others. A few escaped in the crowd. Eight of the wounded were thrown together in front of the jail, supposed to be dead. Of this number were Mr. Hanson and gen. Lee. Dr. Hall preserved them by persuading the mob to intrust the supposed dead bodies to his care. He removed them first to the jail room, and then to places of safety.

LINGELBACK, John, a German painter, born at Frankfort on the Maine 1625. He travelled over Holland, France, and Italy, to improve himself by studying foreign models; and on his return he exhibited a highly polished style of painting. His pictures were adorned with ruins of antiquity, his landscapes were rich and beautiful, and his genius proved so fertile, that the same subjects never appeared twice in his pieces. He returned to Amsterdam 1650, but the time of his death is not ascertained.

LINGUET, Simon Nicolas Henry, a French writer, born 14th July, 1736, at Rheims. He went, when young, into the suite of the French general who led an army against Portugal; and during his residence in Spain, he applied himself to the language, and translated some dramatic pieces into French. On his return to France, he devoted himself to the labors of the bar, and by his application and the brilliant powers of his eloquence, he acquired great celebrity, especially in his masterly defence of the duke of Aiguillon, and of Morangies. His high reputation excited the jealousy of his oratorical rivals, and by an unmanly combination they obtained a decree from the parliament that he should no longer be permitted to exercise his profession of pleader. Thus cruelly robbed of his honors, the disappointed orator had recourse to his pen, and produced several political pamphlets, a periodical journal, and his celebrated Theory of the laws. The freedom of his observations excited against him the persecution of the prime minister, Maurepas, but upon the arbitrary suppression of his journal he fled to Switzerland, and then to Holland and to London. From England he passed to Brussels, and from thence wrote a petition to Vergennes to be permitted to return to France in security. His request was granted; but in 1779, some political delinquency threw him into the Bastille, where he remained two years, and was at last liberated on the promise of being moderate and prudent in his writings and in his conversation. He soon after passed to England, where he wrote his Memoirs on the Bastille, and then retired to Brussels, where he began his Political Annals. His observations on the Freedom of the Navigation of the Scheldt, were read with admiration by the people of Brabant; and Joseph II. was so pleased with his arguments, that he permitted him to come to Vienna, where he complimented him with a present of 1000 ducats. The liberality of the monarch ought to have roused the gratitude of Linguet, but regardless of the kindness of his patron, he scrupled not to defend the violent measures which Vandernoot and the rebellious Brabanters were meditating against the authority of their monarch. Deservedly banished from Germany, Linguet came to Paris, to share in the dangers of the revolution, and in 1791, he appeared at the bar of the national assembly to plead the cause of the negroes of St. Domingo, and to inveigh against the tyranny of their white masters. During the reign of terror, he fled from the capital, but his retreat was discovered, and he was dragged from the country before that bloody tribunal which paid no respect either to age, to virtue, or to misfortunes. He was condemned to death, 27th June 1794, on pretence of having disgraced his nation by paying the tribute of respect to the governments of London and Vienna. He walked to the scaffold with great composure, and fell with the resignation of a good christian. He wrote various works, 35 in number, the best known of which, besides those already mentioned, are, the History of the Age of Alexander—the Fanaticism of Philosophers—the History of the Revolutions of the Roman Empire, 2 vols.—Reflections on Light—History of the Jesuits—a Critique on Voltaire—Socrates, a tragedy.

LINING, John, M.D., an eminent physician and philosopher of South Carolina was a native of Scotland. He came to America about the year 1730. He corresponded with Dr. Franklin on the subject of electricity, and was the first person, who introduced an electrical apparatus into Charleston. He practised physic in Charleston nearly thirty years, and was reckoned one of its most skillful physicians. He died in 1760. He published a series of judicious statical experiments, which were conducted from 1738, to 1742. In 1753, he published a history of the yellow fever, which was the first account of that disease, that was given to the world from the American continent.

LINN, John Blair, a minister in Philadelphia, was a native of Pennsylvania, and educated at Columbia college New York. After leaving college he studied law one year in the office of Alexander Hamilton. During this time, he was the author of a tragedy, called Bourville castle, which was received on the stage with encouraging success. But he at once abandoned both law, and the stage, and commenced the study of divinity with Dr. Romaine. He was ordained June 13, 1799, as the colleague of the Rev. Dr. Ewing of Philadelphia. The two succeeding years of his life were passed in diligent and successful application to the duties of the pastoral office, which were rendered more arduous by the increasing infirmities of his venerable colleague. In the summer of 1802, his constitution suffered irreparable mischief from a fever. His brain afterwards was frequently seized with a dizziness, which was followed by a heavy depression of mind. He struggled manfully with his infirmity, but his strength was wasting, and he was sinking into the earth. In the summer of 1804, he was induced to take a journey to the eastern states. He returned to Philadelphia in July, and died in August, aged 27. He prepared for the press, and published soon after he left college, without his name, two volumes of miscellanies in prose and verse, 12mo. His poem on the death of Washington was written in imitation of the manner of Ossian, and published in 1800; and his powers of genius in 1801; a funeral Sermon on Dr. Ewing, 1802; his two tracts in the controversy with Dr. Priestley, 1802. After his death there was published from his manuscripts, Valerian, a narrative poem, intended in part to describe the early persecutions of the Christians, and rapidly to illustrate the influence of Christianity on the manners of nations, 4to. 1805.

LINN, William, D.D., was born in Pennsylvania in 1752, and graduated at the college of Princeton, New-Jersey, in 1772. He was first pastor of a presbyterian church in the neighborhood of his native place, after serving in the revolutionary army as a chaplain for some time. In 1784, he was appointed to the care of a respectable academy in Somerset county, Maryland. In 1787, he accepted a call to the pastoral charge of the presbyterian church in Elizabethtown, New-Jersey; and shortly afterwards was invited to the city of New-York, as a collegiate pastor in the Dutch presbyterian church, where he resided nearly twenty years, highly popular and useful. A short time before his death he was induced by ill health to resign his pastoral charge, and retire from the active services of his profession. He died at Albany, in January, 1808, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He possessed a vigorous mind, and was distinguished for his natural impressive eloquence. His social qualities were peculiarly amiable and attractive. His chief publications were two volumes of sermons.

LINNÆUS, Charles Von, or Linné, the father of modern botany, son of a Swedish clergyman, was born at Roeskult, in the province of Smaland, Sweden, 24th May, 1707. He was educated at Lund in Scania, and at the university of Upsal, and he afterwards studied at Leyden, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1735. On his return to Stockholm, he practised physic with such popularity and success, that at the age of 34 he was nominated professor of physic and botany in the university of Upsal. He was also appointed physician to king Adolphus, who in 1753, created him a knight of the polar star, and in 1757, raised him to the honor of nobility; and his services were further acknowledged by the succeeding monarch, who in 1776, doubled his pension, and settled on him and his family a valuable portion of land. With an unparalleled ardor after knowledge, Linnæus undertook to explore the barren and inhospitable deserts of Lapland, and through 10 degrees of latitude he exposed himself, generally on foot, to every sort of fatigue. He afterwards visited the mines of Sweden, and extended his researches to the natural productions of Dalecarlia. In 1735, he visited Denmark, Germany, and Holland, and the following year he came to England. He was received in the latter country with distinction, recommended by a flattering letter from Boerhaave; but it has been observed that sir Hans Sloane, to whom the introduction was made, did not pay him that respect and attention which his merits deserved, and this probably prevented the intended settlement of this immortal philosopher there. The return of Linnæus to Stockholm was a glorious era in the Swedish annals of literature. He promoted the establishment of the royal academy of sciences, and became its first president. This great man was seized in 1776, with an apoplexy, but it did not prove fatal, as he survived till 1778, 11th Jan. in his 71st year. To his sagacious discernment, science is indebted for the useful and familiar division of plants, of animals, and of herbs, into classes. To the most extensive knowledge he united the most indefatigable industry; and before the publication of his Genera Plantarum, he most minutely examined the characters of more than 8000 plants. His works are, Systema Naturæ, sistens tria regna Naturæ, 1735, fol. and 2 vols. 8vo. 1756—Bibliotheca Botanica, 8vo.—Hortus Cliffortianus, folio.—Critica Botanica, 8vo.—Flora Laponica, 8vo.—Genera Plantarum, earumque Characteres Naturæ, 8vo.—Flora Suecica—Fauna Suecica, 8vo.—Flora Zeylanica, 4to.—Hortus Upsaliensis, 8vo.—Amœnitates Academicæ, 5 vols. 8vo.—Materia Medica, 8vo.—Animalium Specierum in Classibus, 8vo.—Oratio de Incrementis Telluris Habitabilis, 8vo.—Nemesis divina—Plantæ Surinamenses.

LINT, Peter Van, a native of Antwerp, 1609, known as an historical and portrait painter. He studied in Italy, and painted there with great reputation, and afterwards returned to Antwerp.—His relation, Henderick Van, was also a good painter. His landscapes near Rome were much admired. Two of his pieces are in lord Moira's collection.

LIOTARD, John Stephen, a crayon painter, born at Geneva 1702. He studied at Paris, and afterwards at Rome, and for a short time visited England in the reign of George I. He then made a journey to the Levant, and adopted the manners and habits of the east, which he relinquished upon marrying. He was in England in 1772, where he disposed of a large collection of pictures by auction. He was very correct in his paintings, but stiffness and formality were too visible. A fine head of him is preserved in Walpole's anecdotes. He died about 1780.

LIOTARD, Peter, a French botanist, born at Dauphiny. From an obscure peasant he became a soldier, but retired from the profession in consequence of a wound received at the siege of Mahon, and settled with his uncle, who was an herbalist at Grenoble. In this place the particular powers of his mind unfolded themselves. Though 40 he applied himself with such zeal and attention to botany, that he was made director of the public garden of Grenoble. He was the friend of Rousseau, and other learned men; and was so partial to Linnæus, that he knew the whole of his system of plants by heart. He died 1796.

LIPPI, Lawrence, a native of Florence. He excelled as a painter in historical pieces and in portraits, and as a poet he possessed merit. His Malmantile Raquistato, under the assumed name of Pernoli Ziploli, is a burlesque performance, printed at Florence, 4to. 1698, and again edited 1731, with notes 4to. and Paris 1763, 12mo. He died 1664, aged 58.

LIPSIUS, Justus, a learned critic, born at Iscanum, between Brussels and Louvaine, 13th Oct. 1547. In his earliest years he displayed great powers of memory while at school at Brussels, at Aeth, at Cologne, and at the university of Louvaine, where he devoted himself assiduously to the cultivation of belles lettres and ancient literature. At the age of 19 he published his "Variarum Lectionum Libri tres," which he dedicated to the general patron of letters, cardinal Granvellan; and therefore when he visited Rome in 1567, he was made secretary to that distinguished ecclesiastic, and for two years treated with the greatest respect and hospitality. After viewing the classical remains of ancient Rome, and exploring the contents of her rich libraries, he in 1569 returned to Louvaine. He afterwards went to Vienna, and being prevented from settling in his country, he stopped at Jena, where he was honored with a professorship. From Jena he determined to retire to solitude and study in his own native seat of Iscanum; but the tumults of war drove him away again to Louvaine, and from Louvaine he came to Leyden, where he lived 13 years till 1590. The remainder of life was spent at Louvaine, notwithstanding the flattering invitations and offers of patronage which he received from the pope, from the cardinals, and from the kings of France and Spain, and there he died 23d March, 1606, in his 59th year. Celebrated as a scholar, and respected as a critic, Lipsius was, in his conversation, his dress, and his appearance, far from prepossessing, but rather disagreeable and mean. His works were published at Antwerp, 6 vols. folio, 1637, the most esteemed of which are a Commentary on Tacitus, much admired—His Orations, De Concordiâ, and on the Death of the Duke of Saxony—Electæ—Saturnalia—De Militiâ Romanâ—Satira Menippæa—De Amphitheatris—De Rectâ Pronunciatione Lingvæ Latine.

LIRON, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Chartres, and died at Mans, 1749, aged 84. He was author of Biblio- theque des Auteurs Chartrains—Les Annales de la Critique—Les Singularités Historiques & Littéraires, 4 vols. 12mo. works of great merit.

LISLE, Claude de, a native of Vancouleurs, in Lorraine, bred to the law, which he quitted to study geography. He excelled as a teacher of geographical knowledge, and had among his pupils, Orleans, afterwards regent of France. He wrote Historical Relation of Siam, 12mo.—Introduction to Geography, with a treatise on the Sphere, 2 vols. 12mo.—an Abridgment of Universal History, 7 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1720, aged 76.

LISLE, William de, a French geographer, son of Claude, was born at Paris, 1675. His map of the world, published in 1699, recommended him so strongly, that he was elected into the academy of sciences. He was afterwards appointed geographer to the king, and instructed Louis XV. himself in geography, and wrote several works for his use. Scarce any respectable publication appeared without being decorated with his maps. He died of an apoplexy, 1726, when preparing a map of Malta for Vertot's History.

LISLE, Joseph Nicholas de, an able astronomer, brother to William. He was born at Paris, and became by his celebrity, member of all the learned academies in Europe. He was in England 1724, and obtained, as he deserved, the friendship and admiration of Newton and Halley. In 1726 he was invited to Russia, and there he contributed greatly to the advancement of astronomy and geography, at the head of the observatory. At the age of 13 he made valuable observations on a total eclipse of the sun, but his greatest work is his Memoirs of the History of Astronomy, 2 vols. 4to. He returned from Petersburg in 1747, and died at Paris, 1768, aged 80.

LISLE, sir George, son of a London bookseller, learnt the art of war in Flanders, and distinguished himself in the civil wars. At the last battle of Newbury, when it grew dark, he fought in his shirt, to render his person more conspicuous to his men, and in consequence of his valor he was knighted by the king in the field of battle. He bravely defended Colchester, in 1643, and when the town surrendered he was inhumanly ordered to be shot by the victorious republicans. He suffered with great intrepidity, 23th Aug. 1643.

LISTER, Matthew, president of the college of physicians, was born at Thornton, Yorkshire, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Oriol college. He studied physic abroad, and took his degree of M. D. at Basil, and afterwards became physician to Anne, James's queen, and to Charles I. who knighted him. He was a great sufferer during the civil wars, and died near Louth, Lincolnshire, 1657, aged 92.

LISTER, Martin, nephew of sir Matthew, was born in Buckinghamshire, about 1638, and educated under his uncle, who sent him to St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow, 1660. He studied physic, and travelled abroad, and at his return home, 1670, he settled at York, where he acquired great reputation. He also devoted much of his time to the study of antiquities and natural history, and for his many valuable communications he was elected fellow of the royal society. In 1684 he removed to London, and in 1698 attended the earl of Portland, when ambassador to the court of France. He published an account of his journey to Paris, which was ridiculed by Dr. King's Journey to London. He was made physician to queen Anne, 1709, and died Feb. 1711-12. His other publications are about eight in number, on natural history, LITHGOW, William, a Scotchman, who travelled on foot over Europe, Asia, and Africa, where he met various adventures, of which he has given a curious but inartificial relation. At Malaga he was tortured by the inquisition, and on his return was presented to king James and his court, so mangled that he was carried on a feather bed into the royal presence. He applied to the Spanish ambassador Gondamar, and when deceived by him, he insulted him, and even struck him in the king's chamber, for which he was sent a prisoner for nine months, to the Marshalsea. His travels are now a scarce book. He informs his reader, that he has walked on foot, more than 86,000 miles. The better part of his travels appears in Morgan's "Phoenix Britannicus."

LITTLE, William, an English historian, born at Bridlington, Yorkshire, 1136. He is often called Naubrigensis, as he was a monk of Newborough abbey. His History of England, from the invasion of William the Conqueror to 1197, in five books, is highly esteemed for accuracy, judicious arrangement, and veracity. There is preserved in Christ church hospital, Abingdon, Berks, a MS. by John Little, which records various interesting and curious particulars, concerning the abbey and the history of that town.

LITTLEBURY, Isaac, an English divine, who published a translation of Herodotus. The work is well and faithfully executed, but without notes. The second edition, in 2 vols. 8vo. appeared in 1720.

LITTLEPAGE, Lewis, an adventurer, was born at South Wales, Hanover County, Virginia, Dec. 19, 1762, and lost his father when he was young. At the request of his uncle, Benjamin Lewis, Mr. Jay, minister at Madrid, was induced to patronise him, and received him into his family in Sept. 1780, and soon advanced for him, as his uncle failed to make him a remittance, about 1000 dollars in cash. He volunteered under the duke De Crillon in the expedition against Minorca in 1791; and afterwards accompanied the count Nassau to the siege of Gibraltar, and thence to Constantinople and Warsaw. The king of Poland made him his confidential secretary in 1786, and sent him as his agent or ambassador to Russia. On the revolution in Poland he returned to Virginia; and died at Fredericksburg July 19, 1802, aged 39. When he was at New York in Nov. 1785, Mr. Jay arrested him for the debt of 1000 dollars without interest, which was still unpaid. For this he challenged Mr. Jay. The correspondence between him and Mr. Jay was published in 1786. Mr. Jay had reason to complain, not only of the pecuniary imposition, but also of other abuse, as he expresses himself, from the young man, "with my money in his pocket, and my meat still sticking in his teeth."

LITTLETON, or LYTTLETON, Thomas, an English judge, born at Frankley, Worcester. After a liberal education, he entered at the Inner Temple, and so ably distinguished himself, that Henry VI. appointed him steward of the court of the palace, and in 1455, king's serjeant, and a judge on the northern circuit. The troubles of the time did not lessen the public opinion of his integrity, Edward IV. granted him a pardon, and continued him in his offices, and afterwards made him one of the judges of the common pleas. In 1745 he was created knight of the bath, and died in a good old age, 23d Aug. 1481. He left three sons, William, Richard and Thomas. The eldest son lived in splendor at Frankley, and died 1508. From him the present ennobled family are descended.

LITTLETON, John, a descendant of the Worcestershire Littletons, was known as an active member of parliament for his native county, in the 27th year of Elizabeth, but his attachment to Essex proved unfortunate. He was seized when that favorite was discarded from the protection of the queen, and being fined and condemned as a conspirator, he was saved with difficulty by the interference of sir Walter Raleigh, to whom he wrote an excellent letter. He died in prison, 1600. Several of his letters appear in the Biographia Britannica.

LITTLETON, Edward, a native of Shropshire, related to the Worcestershire family. He removed from Christ-church, Oxford, to the Inner Temple, and in 1623, distinguished himself in parliament as one of the members that appeared before the lords with the bill of rights. He was afterwards one of the managers in the impeachment of Buckingham, but notwithstanding his opposition to the court, he was made in 1639, chief justice of the common pleas, and the following year, lord keeper of the great seal, and a peer by the title of lord Littleton. He died at Oxford, 1645.

LITTLETON, Adam, D.D. a learned divine, born at Hales Owen, Shropshire, 8th Nov. 1627. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and in 1647 went as student to Christ-church, from which he was ejected the next year. Soon after he was usher at Westminster, and in 1658 was elected second master. In 1670 he was honored with the degree of doctor of divinity by the university, in consequence of his merit, and four years after was made rector of Chelsea, and about that time obtained a grant from Charles II. to succeed Dr. Busby in Westminster school, to which, however, he did not succeed. He died 30th June, 1694, aged 67. He was in his private character a worthy and amiable man, and as a philologist and grammarian, he had few equals. He published "A Latin Dictionary"—Elementa Religionis,—Sixty-one sermons—Seldon's Jani Anglorum, translated, and other works. He began, but did not live to complete, a Greek Lexicon.

LITTLETON, Edward, LL.D. an amiable divine and poet, educated at Eton, under Dr. Suape. In 1716 he went to king's college, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a scholar, and a man of genius. In 1720 he was made assistant at Eton, and seven years after was elected one of the fellows of the college, and presented to the living of Maple Durham, Oxfordshire. In 1730 he became chaplain to the king. He died 1734. He was not ambitious of appearing as an author. His "Discourses," 2 vols. were published for the benefit of his family, and his poems have occasionally been printed in miscellanies, particularly in Dodsley's. His poem on the spider is much admired.
