WHEN engaged in the preparation of the Family Encyclopedia, the compiler had occasion to consult a numerous class of works, containing well written summaries of biography. In ancient and oriental biography the London Encyclopedia is particularly rich and valuable for popular use ; and, in American biography the Encyclopedia Americana is more deserving commendation than any other work of the kind with which he is acquainted. The treasures in this department of literature being thus daily spread before him, he was induced to examine different works on biography, with a view to ascertain how far they combined the advantages susceptible of being united in works of that character. The examination led to the belief, that a compilation might be made, better adapted to popular use than any one now known to exist. A determination was, therefore, formed to engage in such a labor, as soon as the Family Encyclopedia should be completed. That work being now finished, the one proposed follows of course. In accordance with well established usage, it is deemed expedient, in the form of a preface, to state some of the leading principles that will regulate him in the present undertaking. This will be an act of justice to himself, and of convenience to the reader.

A few years since one of the most intelligent Booksellers in the United States, attempted to supply the American public with an Epitome of biography, designed to occupy the place which the present volume is intended to fill. His was an edition of Lempriere's Universal Biography, with corresponding portions of American biography. No particular fault is known to have attended the execution of the plan he adopted ; but, the fault, if any existed, was in the plan itself, which was to print the entire work of Lempriere. This rendered his publication too large, and consequently too expensive for the rank it was designed to hold, without furnishing a just equivalent ; for every person acquainted with the compend alluded to will acknowledge, that from one third to one half of it consists of a mere catalogue of names and dates, in which the common reader can feel no interest. It may hence, be inferred, that the compiler, with that work before him, will endeavor to avoid an evil, in his opinion, so material. He is still aware, that a feeling exists, and that publishers and authors, have generally acted in reference to it, that the value of a work like the present is proportioned to the number of names contained in it. In disregarding this feeling he may possibly subject himself to animadversion.

The compiler, nevertheless, for reasons that will be apparent to the intelligent reader without a formal exposition of them, has been induced to avail himself of the labors of Lempriere so far as they were in agreement with his own views. That is, when an article, or a succession of articles, in that author's work was found to be as good as could be had from other sources, whether selected or original, it was resolved to adopt it. But when it could be abridged, or enlarged, or otherwise improved, it was subjected to a careful revision ; or, when its place could be better supplied, the compiler resorted to other sources. For the latter purpose he flatters himself that the means were abundantly ample ; and, his habits in this description of research and literary toil, he trusts, will be a sufficient guarantee, that those means were not neglected.

In the department of American biography the compiler found it exceedingly difficult to satisfy himself, in the selection of subjects. Who was to be taken, and who left ? Where was the line between the two parties to be drawn ? Was the same rule to be applied in reference to citizens of our own country that would be sanctioned in reference to those of other countries ? If so, the materials would have been scanty indeed ! For, as proud as we may justly be of our own country, and of the attainments made by American citizens in the arts, in literature, and in science, still how few of their names may be expected to survive the next century ?—But, if the same rule is not to be applied, is the name of every individual who has occupied a station of honor, or of distinguished influence, to be deemed fit for registry in a work like the present ? Probably not. A middle course, therefore, was to be pursued ; and, this course was not marked out by any authorised canons of literature; but, was left to the taste and judgment of the compiler. Whether it fell into competent hands would be indecorous in him to decide, or even to imagine, any farther than enabled to do it, under the influence of past kindness from the public.

It is not expected; nor, should the reader be so far satisfied with what is here given on American biography, as to neglect other sources of information. It would not have been possible to admit into a work, on the plan here adopted, all, or even a moiety of what may be found in other excellent works. The American Biographical Dictionary of Dr. Allen, president of Bowdoin college, should be in every family; and, the Encyclopedia Americana, for its valuable biographical sketches, as well as for its well written articles in the various departments of useful knowledge, should be the companion of every individual making pretension to literature. Of the latter work it would be impossible to speak in terms of sufficiently high commendation.

It has been judged advisable, to omit altogether Scripture biography, because that of itself is sufficient to make a small volume, even when treated in a summary manner. For a similar reason the fabulous personages of mythology and of ancient poetry have been excluded. Besides, the former of these classes, in a popular and judicious form, is extensively circulated among the citizens of our own country, which would render it comparatively useless in the present work. But, if this be thought a defect, there is added at the close of the volume, a catalogue of nearly two hundred works, in the Latin, English, French, Italian, and German languages, relating to Biography and literary history. This will prove of great value to the scholar. There is also added a long list of names of persons, not admitted into the body of the work, with the facts, in a tabular form, important to be known in connexion with them. And, lastly, in order, but not in value, are added, in a tabular form, the names of individuals connected with the colonial, state, and general government of our country, from its first settlement, so far as the same could be obtained from authentic sources.

If the compiler has availed himself so freely of the treasures found in the works named, or alluded to, he has still drawn much from the more miscellaneous sources; and, especially, has not failed to secure additions and corrections from American scholars, whose names would give a sanction to whatever might come from their pens. To name all the channels through which he has received aid would probably be deemed ostentation. And after all, he is too well acquainted with the nature of a labor like the present, and of the circumstances by which it will be estimated, to indulge the thought for a moment, that the public will be materially influenced by any considerations, aside from its own merits—or, at least, its adaptation to the end proposed.

It would be easy to descant upon the advantages resulting from the study of biography; but, on the present occasion, there is no convenient opportunity for indulging in such an exercise. The compiler, however will add one remark, upon its moral influence, adopted from one of the most popular writers of our day. If, says that author, we had no notices of those races of men that have lived before us, they would seem to be completely swept away; and we should no more think of inquiring what human beings filled our place upon the earth a thousand harvests ago, than we should think about the generations of cattle which at that time grazed the marshes of the Tiber, or the venerable ancestors of the goats that are browsing upon Mount Hymettus;—no vestige would remain of one any more than of the other, and we might more pardonably fall into the opinion that they both shared the same fate. But when we see illustrious characters continuing to live on in the eye of posterity, their memories still fresh, and their noble actions shining with all the vivid coloring of truth and reality, ages after the very dust of their tombs is scattered, high conceptions kindle within us; and feeling one immortality we are led to hope for another.

AA, Peter Vander, a bookseller of Leyden, who, under the title of Galerie du Monde, published in 66 vols. fol. an atlas of 200 charts, as explanatory of the various voyages made between the 13th, and the close of the 17th century. These, though accompanied with priuts to represent the customs, edifices, and curiosities of different nations, display rather the labor and perseverance of the compiler, than either his judgment or accuracy. Aa made a continuation of Grævius' Thesaurus of Italian writers in six other volumes. He carried on an extensive business from 1682 until his death in 1730.

AAGARD, Nicholas and Christian, two brothers, born at Wiburg in Denmark, in the beginning of the 18th century. The eldest, who was distinguished for the acuteness of his philosophical writings, died 1657, and the other, known for his poetical talents, died 1664.

AAGESEN, Suend, a Danish historian, better known by his Latin name of Sueno Agonis, flourished about the year 1186, and seems to have been secretary to Archbishop Absalom, the minister of state, who directed him to write a compendium of the history of Denmark. Aagesen is also the author of a history of the Military Laws of Canute the Great. His writings are much esteemed for their antiquity and accuracy.

AALST, Everard, a Dutch painter, born at Delft, 1602. His talents were displayed with peculiar success in the representation of shields and military accoutrements, of dead birds and inanimate subjects, and his paintings, few in number, are now highly valued for superiority of execution. He died in 1658. His nephew William became the rival of his uncle, and in his travels through France and Italy he deserved and obtained the friendship and patronage of the great, and particularly of the grand duke of Tuscany, who liberally rewarded his merit. His fruit and flower pieces were most admired. He died in Holland in 1679 aged 59.

AARON RASCHID, a caliph of the Abassides, distinguished by his conquests, and the eccentricity of his character. Valiant in battle, he showed himself inhuman and perfidious towards the conquered, and ever made the sacred duties of the sovereign subservient to caprice, intemperance, or resentment. At once master of the finest provinces of Asia and Africa, his power extended from Spain to the banks of the Ganges, and exacted a tribute from Nicophorus, the Roman emperor of the East. He deserves our admiration for the patronage which he afforded to literature and to the arts. He died, A. D. 809, in the 23d year of his reign.

AARON, a presbyter and physician of Alexandria in the eighth century, who wrote 30 books on medicine in the Syriac language, which he called, Pandects. He is the first author who makes mention of the small-pox and of the measles, diseases which were introduced into Egypt by the conquests of the Arabians about 640.

AARON, Isaac, an interpreter of languages at the court of Constantinople under the Commeni. He abused the confidence reposed in him, and with unparalleled inhumanity recommended to Andronicus, the usurper of his master's throne, to put out the eyes and cut off the tongue of his enemies, a punishment which was afterwards inflicted on himself by Isaac Angelus, 1203.

AARON BEN-ASER, a learned rabbi in the fifth century, to whom the invention of the Hebrew points and accents is attributed. He wrote a Hebrew grammar, printed 1515.

AARSENS, Francis, Lord of Someldyk and Spyeck, one of the ablest negotiators ever produced by the United Provinces. He was born at the Hague, in 1673, and died in 1741. Being early introduced into public life by his father, who was registrar of the States, he first became resident, and subsequently ambassador to the court of France, where he remained fifteen years. Profoundly skilled in the arts of diplomaey, he seems to have occasionally much annoyed the French cabinet by the depth of his penetration; but was, nevertheless, held in high esteem by Cardinal Richelieu. He was also employed in extraordinary embassies to England and Venice; that to England was to negotiate the marriage of William Prince of Orange with the daughter of Charles I—the commencement of a family connexion which led to the most important consequences. He took an active and dishonorable part in the proceedings against Barneveldt. Aarsens, at the time of his death, was esteemed the richest man in Holland. A volume of his negotiations has been printed.

AARSENS or AERTSEN, Peter, surnamed Longo from his tallness, was born at Amsterdam, 1519, where he also died in his 66th year. Though brought up like his father to the profession of a stocking maker, he was at last permitted, by the entreaties of his mother, to follow the bent of his genius, and at 18 he began to study painting, architecture, and perspective. At Antwerp, where he married, and where he was admitted a member of the academy of painters, he gave proofs of his superior talents, and in his first pieces particularly excelled in representing the utensils of a kitchen. A painting of the death of the Virgin, for an altar piece at Amsterdam, was highly esteemed, and another equally deserved the warmest admiration, in which he represented the crucifixion, with the executioner in the act of breaking, with an iron bar, the legs of the two thieves. This last was torn to pieces in a public insurrection, 1566, and so unguarded was the painter in his complaints and reproaches on the occasion, that the ferocious populace were with difficulty prevented from murdering him.

AARTGEN or AERTGEN, the son of a wool-comber at Leyden, who, after following his father's occupation, turned his thoughts to painting, in the prosecution of which he acquired reputation and consequence. Regardless of the conveniences of life he was visited by Floris of Antwerp, and rejected the patronage and society of this amiable and disinterested friend, declaring he found greater gratification in his mean cottage, than in the enjoyment of opulence. He was drowned in the canals of the city in the night as he amused himself, according to his usual custom, in playing through the streets on the German flute.

ABA, brother-in-law to Stephen the first Christian king of Hungary, defeated Peter who had succeeded his uncle on the throne, and after he had banished him to Bavaria he usurped the crown 1041 or 1042. He disgraced himself by his cruelties, and after being conquered in a battle by the emperor Henry III. he was sacrificed to the resentment of his offended subjects, 1044.

ABARIS, a Scythian philosopher, the history of whose adventures as mentioned by Herodotus and others appear more fabulous than authentic.

ABAS, Schah, was seventh king of Persia, of the race of the Sophis. He was brave and active, and enlarged the boundaries of his dominions. He took conjointly with the English forces, 1622, the island of Ormus, which had been in the possession of the Portuguese 122 years. He died 1629, in the 44th year of his reign, and obtained from his grateful and admiring subjects the surname of great, and of restorer of Persia. He had made Ispahan his capital.

ABAS, Schah, the great-grandson of the preceding, succeeded his father in 1642, in his 13th year. He took Candahar from the Moguls, and valiantly resisted the attacks of 300,000 besiegers. Blessed with an enlarged understanding he patronised the Christians, and promised by deeds of benevolence and liberality to rival the greatest heroes of antiquity, when he was cut off by death in his 37th year, Sept. 25, 1666.

ABASSA, an officer who revolted against Mustapha I. emperor of the Turks, and afterwards was employed against the Poles, 1634, at the head of 60,000 men. The cowardice of his troops robbed him of a victory which his courage, his abilities, and his ambition seemed to promise, and he was strangled by order of the Sultan.

ABASSA, or ABBASSA, a sister of Aaron Raschild, whose hand was bestowed by her brother on Giafar, on condition that she abstained from the marriage rights. The promise was forgotten: the birth of a son that was secretly sent to Mecca to be brought up incensed the emperor, and the husband's life was sacrificed by the tyrant, and Abassa reduced to poverty. The unhappy princess is said to have wandered about, reciting her own story in verse, and to have been relieved several years afterwards by a compassionate lady to whom she sang her misfortunes. There are still extant some Arabic verses which beautifully celebrate her love and her misfortunes.

ABATS, Andrew, a painter, born at Naples and engaged in the service of the Spanish king. He died 1732. His fruit pieces and landscapes were admired.

ABAUZIT, Firmin, a French writer, born at Uzès in 1679, and died at Geneva in 1767. Though he published very little, he acquired an extensive scientific reputation, and was esteemed for his genius, judgment, and profound learning, by the most eminent men of his age, many of whom consulted him upon difficult questions. "You," said Newton, "are a fit person to judge between Leibnitz and me." Rousseau has given a glowing panegyric upon him in his Nouvelle Héloïse. The modesty of Abauzit was not less conspicuous than his erudition. In his religious opinions, this learned man leaned towards Socinianism, or the modern Unitarian doctrine; but was not distinguished as a partisan.

ABBADIE, James, D. D. a celebrated protestant minister, born at Nay, in Berne, 1654, or according to others '58. After improving himself in France and Holland, he visited Prussia and settled at Berlin, at the solicitation of the elector of Brandenburg, where, as minister of the French church, he enforced the duties of religion and morality, and gained by persuasive eloquence, the favor of the prince and people. After his patron's death he accompanied the duke of Schomberg to Holland and to England, and after the battle of the Boyne, he was patronised by king William, whose cause he ably supported by his pen, and was made minister of the Savoy, and afterwards advanced to the deanery of Killaloe in Ireland. He died in London soon after his return from a tour to Holland, Sept. 23, 1727. Well informed as a writer, eloquent as a preacher, and as a man virtuous and charitable, he was universally respected and beloved. His writings were mostly on divinity, and they acquired unusual popularity, especially his treatise on the Christian religion. He also published a defence of the revolution, and, at the request of William, an account of the late conspiracy in England, compiled from the materials furnished by the earl of Portland and secretary Trumbull. All the writings of this active and zealous, yet occasionally fanciful, divine, are in the French language; but several of them have been translated.

ABBAS, Halli, a physician, and one of the Persian magi, who followed the doctrines of Zoroaster. He wrote, A. D. 980, a book called royal work, at the request of the caliph's son, to whom he has dedicated it, in the pompous and bombastic language of the East. It was translated into Latin by Stephen of Antioch, 1127, which is now extant.

ABBAS, an uncle of Mahomet, opposed the ambitious views of the impostor, but when defeated in the battle of Bedr, he was not only reconciled to his nephew but he warmly embraced his religion, and thanked heaven for the prosperity and the grace which he enjoyed as a mussulman. He acquired fame as the interpreter of the verses of the koran, and more powerfully served the cause of Mahomet at the battle of Honain by recalling his dismayed troops to the charge, and inciting them boldly to rally round their prophet, who was near expiring under the cimeters of the infidel Thakesites. His son, of the same name, became still more celebrated by his knowledge of the koran. Abbas was regarded with so much veneration, that the caliphs Omar and Othman never appeared before him without dismounting from their horses, and saluting him with the most profound humility. He died in the 32d year of the hegira; and 100 years after, Abulabbas Saffa, his grandson, investing himself with sovereign power, laid the foundation of the dynasty of the Abbassides, which continued to be transmitted in his family from father to son 524 years, during an uninterrupted succession of 37 caliphs, till they were dispossessed by the Tartars. Abbas Abdallah, the grand-son of Abbas, the uncle of the prophet, was also distinguished as a teacher of the sacred book: as, before he was 10 years of age, he was said to have received inspiration from the angel Gabriel, whose communications with Mahomet were frequent and numerous. He died in the 68th year of the hegira, and was universally lamented as the most learned doctor of mussulmanism.

ABBAS, Shah, the Great. This celebrated Persian sovereign was born about the year 1558, and ascended the throne on the murder of his brother Ishmael, in 1585. The character of Abbas was sanguinary, but politic and determined. When he assumed the sovereignty, Persia was divided into satrapcies or governments, the kahns or heads of which were nearly independent. These he reduced to a state of subserviency; and, in addition to the strength thus acquired he enlarged his dominions by successful expeditions on every side. In his family Shah Abbas displayed the same jealous rigor as elsewhere—having three sons by as many wives, the two youngest were deprived of sight, and he put the eldest to death, in consequence of a conspiracy in his favor, which the dutiful prince had himself assisted to put down. This murder produced a great tumult among the people, and even the Shah, who excused himself on the score of self-preservation, affected or felt great remorse, and never would wear the insignia of royalty afterwards. Notwithstanding the public and domestic rigor of Abbas, he was much esteemed by his subjects, and his memory is held by the Persians in great veneration. He died at the advanced age of seventy.

ABBON, de Fleury, an ecclesiastic of Orleans, who, after displaying his superior abilities in every branch of polite literature at Paris and Rheims, became abbot of Fleury, and supported with vehemence and energy the rights of the monastic order against the intrusions of the bishops. He was employed by king Robert to appease pope Gregory V., who wished to place the kingdom of France under an interdict, and he proved successful at Rome. He was killed in a quarrel between the French and Gascons, 1004, whilst he endeavored to introduce a reform in the abbey of Reole in Gascony. Besides canons, in which he explained the duty of kings and subjects, there is a volume of his letters extant, printed, 1687, in folio.

ABBOT, Abiel, D. D., born at Andover, Mass., Aug. 17, 1770, and was graduated at Harvard University, in 1787. In 1794, he was settled in Haverhill, as pastor of the congregational society, where he remained eight years. Immediately after leaving this place, he was settled in Beverly; and the remainder of his life, about 24 years, was here passed in the performance of ministerial duties, unless interrupted in his labors by sickness. In consequence of the decline of health, he spent some part of the winter previous to his death, which happened, June 7th, 1828, in the island of Cuba. This furnished occasion for a volume of interesting and valuable "Letters from Cuba," which were published at Boston, 1829. In 1802, he published an Artillery Election Sermon; in 1812, Sermons to Mariners; in 1815, an Address on Intemperance; in 1816, a Missionary Sermon; in 1817, a Sermon before the Salem Bible Society; and, in 1827, a Convention Sermon.

ABBOT, George, son of a clothworker, and archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Guildford, in Surrey, 29th Oct. 1562. He was educated at Oxford; and was successively master of University College, dean of Winchester, vice-chancellor of Oxford, Bishop of Litchfield and of London, and Archbishop of Canterbury. His learning was universally respected, as before his elevation to the episcopal chair, he was the second of the Oxford divines whom king James appointed to translate the New Testament, except the epistles; and as a negotiator he was employed to establish and cement an union between the churches of England and Scotland, where his address, his eloquence, and moderation were particularly conspicuous. In his zeal for the protestant faith, he promoted the union of the princess Elizabeth with the elector palatine, and he strenuously withstood the influence which James exerted, to make him declare in favor of the divorce between the daughter of the earl of Suffolk, and the royal favorite Robert earl of Essex. He refused to sanction the mandate by which James permitted sports and pastimes on the Lord's-day, and he forbade it to be publicly read at Croydon, where he then was. The evening of his life was darkened by a melancholy event, which his enemies wished to convert to his disgrace and degradation. As he amused himself with a crossbow in the grounds of lord Zouch at Braunsell in Hampshire, where he retired for recreation every summer, he accidentally killed the park keeper by an arrow which he aimed at a deer. This homicide was attended with a settled melancholy in the archbishop, who, as an atonement for the accident, granted an annuity of 20*l.* to the widow, and ever after once a month observed the fatal day, Tuesday, in penitence and prayer. In his general character Abbot was moderate and inoffensive; though a rigid Calvinist, he recommended to his clergy rather to gain the public esteem by morality, than claim it as a due to their office. He was benevolent and humane, and among other acts of charity he endowed, with an income of 300*l.* a year, a hospital at Guildford, for the support and maintenance of the poor. His publications were chiefly divinity, besides some treatises occasioned by the situation of the times. He died on the 5th of August, 1633, in the 71st year of his age.

ABBOT, Maurice, youngest brother of the archbishop, acquired consequence in commercial affairs, and was employed in the direction of the East India company's concerns, respecting the Molucca Islands, which were in the hands of the Dutch. He was employed in 1624, in establishing the settlement of Virginia, and he was the first person on whom Charles I. conferred the honor of knighthood. Raised by industry to opulence and distinction, he was elected representative for London, and in 1638, was raised to the mayoralty of the city, a high office, which he adorned by the amiableness of his manners, and the goodness of his heart. He died Jan. 10th, 1640.

ABBOT, Robert, D. D., eldest brother of the two preceding, was born at Guildford, and educated at Baliol college. He soon became a very popular preacher, and acquired the reputation of being one of the first polemic divines of the age. After having obtained several preferments, he was raised, in 1615, to be Bishop of Salisbury. The infirmities of a sedentary life, however, operated unfavorably upon his health; and, in a little more than two years from his consecration, his mortal labors were ended. His death took place, March 2d, 1617, being one of the five Bishops who in six successive years were installed at Salisbury.

ABBOT, Samuel, a distinguished benefactor of the Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass. He was born in that town, but became a merchant in Boston, where he accumulated a fortune, large portions of which he devoted to objects of charity. He gave twenty thousand dollars towards founding this seminary; and, he also, by will, bequeathed to it one hundred thousand dollars more. He was distinguished for prudence, sincerity, and uprightness; and, was amiable, pious, and charitable to the poor. Thus it will be seen that he was the friend of learning and religion. He died, April 30, 1812, at the advanced age of eighty.

ABBOT, Thomas, the German translator of Sallust, and the admired author of a treatise "on merit," and of another "of dying for one's country," was born at Ulm, and died at Buckeberg, 1766, aged 28. The works of Abbt abound in thought, fancy, and spirit; and it is believed that, had he lived, he would have become a leading German writer.

ABDALLAH, father of Mahomet, was a slave and a driver of camels, who, however, possessed such merit, according to the followers of the prophet, that his hand was solicited in marriage by the fairest and the most virtuous of the women of his tribe. He was then in his 75th or 85th year.

ABDAS, a bishop in Persia, who, by inconsiderately abolishing a Pagan temple of the sun, excited the public indignation against himself and his religion. He was the first victim of a persecution which called for the interference of Theodosius the younger, in favor of the Christians, and which, during thirty years, produced war, carnage, and desolation, between the Roman and Persian empires.

ABDULMUMEN, a man of obscure origin, but of superior talents, who seized the crown of Morocco, by destroying the royal family of the Almoravide race, and who extended his dominions by the conquest of Tunis, Fez, and Tremecen. He meditated the invasion of Spain, when death stopped his career, 1156. His son Joseph II. carried his views of ambition into effect.

ABEEL, John Nelson, D. D., a Presbyterian minister, of distinguished eloquence, who died in New York, Jan. 20, 1812, in the 43d year of his age. He graduated at Princeton college in 1787, and for sometime afterwards was engaged in the study of the law. Subsequently he pursued the study of divinity, and was licensed to preach in April, 1793. For a short time he officiated in Philadelphia; but, in 1795, was installed as pastor of the reformed Dutch Church, in the city where he died.

ABEILLE, Gaspard, a native of Riez, in Provence, 1648. His wit procured him the friendship of the marechal de Luxembourg, who at his death recommended him to the prince of Conti, and the duke de Vendome. His animated conversation proved agreeable to his patrons, and his witticisms were attended with peculiar effect when delivered with all the grimace of a wrinkled and deformed countenance, artfully distorted, to express the most ludicrous and comic ejaculations. He was at the head of a priory, and had a place in the French academy. Besides odes and epistles he wrote several tragedies, one comedy, and two operas, in a style languid, puerile, and uninteresting. He died at Paris, 21st May, 1718.

ABEILLE, Louis Paul, a French writer on commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, was born at Toulouse, in 1719, and died at Paris, in 1807. Before the revolution he was inspector-general of the manufactures of France. His works are—1. Corps d' Observations de la Societe d' Agriculture, de Commerce, et des Arts, etablie par les Etats de Bretagne, 8vo., 1761. 2. Principes sur la liberte du Commerce des Grains, 8vo., 1768.

ABEL, king of Denmark, and son of Valdimar II., quarrelled with his eldest brother Eric, and when he had invited him to a reconciliation he ferociously murdered him, and usurped his throne, 1250. He was killed in battle two years after, during an insurrection of the Frisons, occasioned by his extortions and the severity of his taxes.

ABEL, Frederick Gottfried, a native of Halberstadt, who abandoned divinity for the pursuit of medicine, and took his doctor's degree at Konigsberg, 1744. He published a poetical translation of Juvenal in German, 1788, and after practising with great success in his native town died there, 1794, aged eighty.

ABEL, Charles Frederick, an eminent musician whose performances on the viol digamba were much admired. He died 20th June, 1787.

ABELA, John Francis, a commander of the order of Malta, known by an excellent work called Malta illustrata in four books in folio, 1647, in which he gives an account of the island.

ABELARD, Peter, a native of Palais near Nantz in Brittany, born 1079, who became celebrated for his learning and his misfortunes. Blessed with a retentive memory and great acuteness of genius he made unusual progress in logic, and wielded the weapons of subtle disputation with admirable dexterity. After having studied under William de Champeaux, and other eminent masters, he opened a school of theology and rhetoric, which was soon attended by more than three thousand pupils of all nations. Naturally vain of his person, which was elegant, graceful, and engaging, and not unconscious of the reputation which his learning had acquired, he listened to the applauses of one sex, and received with avidity the admiration and the praises of the other. His success had rendered him opulent; but amongst those whose favors he boasted he could gain, he selected Heloise, whom her uncle Fulbert, a canon of Paris, was ambitious to render as superior to her sex in learning as she was in personal charms. With this view the artful Abelard was easily persuaded to board in the house, and he was now intrusted with the education of the object of his heart, whose improvement he was exhorted by the unthinking Fulbert to promote by compulsion and even by stripes. The moments intended for mental instruction were soon devoted to love, and, as he says himself, our studies now furnished us with that privacy and retirement which our passion desired. The passion of the lovers however was unveiled to the public eye, but Fulbert alone remained unconscious of the guilt of the preceptor until the situation of the unfortunate Heloise at last filled him with remorse and resentment. Abelard fled from the house, and persuaded soon after Heloise to retire to his sister's house in Brittany, where she gave birth to a son, whom she called Astrolabus. The indignation of the uncle was pacified by offers of marriage from Abelard, who wished probably to recover the public esteem rather than to regain the confidence of Fulbert; and Heloise, though actuated by the singular wish of being the mistress rather than the wife of the man she loved, with difficulty consented. The nuptial blessing was pronounced in private; but whilst Fulbert wished the union to be publicly known, Heloise disdained to acknowledge it, and even solemnly denied it with an oath. Her conduct irritated Fulbert, and Abelard removed her from his pursuit to the convent of Argenteuil, where she assumed the religious habit but not the veil. This however incensed the resentment of her family, who seemed to dread further treachery from the lovers, and ruffians were hired by their intrigues, who in the dead of night introduced themselves into the unsuspecting husband's chamber and inflicted an inhuman mutilation on his person. Abelard fled upon this to a cloister, where he concealed his confusion from the public eye by assuming the habit of St. Dennis. Here the immorality of the monks roused his indignation, and after he had wandered on the territories of the count of Champagne, and been exposed to the persecution of an ecclesiastical council at Soissons, he retired to a solitary place in the diocese of Troyes, where he built an oratory; to which he gave the name of the Paraclete. His reputation and his misfortunes here drew around him a number of papils, and by his eloquence the solitude of his residence was converted into a popular assemblage of theologians and philosophers. Still his subsequent life was by no means tranquil. His theological doctrines were censured as heterodox; he was condemned by a council; was driven from place to place; and was even imprisoned. But, at length, Peter, the venerable abbot of Clugni, received the melancholy wanderer with hospitality and compassion. In this peaceful retreat the husband of Heloise forgot his misfortunes, and in his intercourse with the monks he exemplified the virtues of humility and resignation, which he frequently enforced to them with the eloquence of youth. He died soon after at the abbey at St. Marcellus on the Saon near Chalons, April 21st, 1142, in the 63d year of his age, and his remains were claimed by the unfortunate Heloise, who deposited them in the Paraclete, and who, whilst she paid honor to his memory as the founder of her house, still remembered him with the keenness of anguish as the former object of her love. She survived him till the 17th May, 1163, and was buried in the same tomb, where her bones still repose. The loves of Abelard and Heloise have been immortalized by the pen of Pope; but the genius of the poet however brilliant cannot throw a veil over the failings of the man. If we execrate the conduct of Abelard to Heloise while in the house of Fulbert, we cannot but contemplate with increased indignation the coldness and indifference with which he treats in his letters the affections and the friendship of the abbess of the Paraclete. Whilst he languished during the decline of life under the unmanly vengeance of Fulbert, he forgot that Heloise once virtuous had sacrificed her name, her honor, and happiness to his passion. The writings of Abelard are mostly on divinity or logical subjects, but his letters excite interest from the sensibility, the animation, and the elegance which Heloise has infused into them. A voluminous life of these two lovers has been published in English by Berington.

ABELL, John, an English musician, known for a fine countertenor voice, and his skill on the lute. Charles II. in whose service he was, intended to send him to Venice, to convince the Italians of the musical powers of an Englishman, but the scheme was dropped, and Abell at the revolution was dismissed from the chapel royal for his attachment to popery. He quitted England, and after various adventures in Holland and Germany, in the midst of opulence and of poverty, he at last reached Warsaw, where he was invited to court. He evaded the invitation, till obliged to attend in consequence of a second order, he found himself in the midst of a large hall, seated in a chair which was suddenly drawn up opposite a gallery where the king appeared with his nobles. At the same instant a number of bears were let loose below, and the terrified musician was ordered by the king to choose either to sing or be let down among the ferocious animals. Abell chose to sing, and afterwards declared he never exerted himself with such successful powers before. He returned to England, where he published a collection of songs dedicated to king William, 1701. The time of his death is unknown. He is supposed to have had some secret by which he preserved the natural powers of his voice to his last moments.

ABELLI, Lewis, a native of Vexin Francois, who was made bishop of Rhodes. After three years' residence he abdicated his episcopal office, and chose rather to live in privacy at St. Lazare in Paris, in the bosom of literary ease. He died there 1691, in his 88th year. He published among other works Medulla theologica, and his works are often quoted by the protestants against the eloquence of Bossuet and of the catholics, in the support of their worship of the Virgini. The style of Abelli was harsh and inellegant.

ABENDANA, Jacob, a Spanish Jew, who died, 1685, prefect of the synagogue in London. He wrote a Specilegium, or Hebrew explanation of select passages in the scriptures, much esteemed, and published at Amsterdam.

ABENEZRA, Abraham, a Spanish rabbi, sur-named the wise, great and admirable, for the extent of his learning. Though skilled in geometry, astronomy, and poetry, he preferred the explanation of the scriptures, in which his zeal was often manifested by the boldness of his conjectures. His commentaries are highly valued, and also his Jesud mora, in which he recommends the study of the Talmud. He died, 1174, aged about 75, after having acquired and deserved the reputation of one of the greatest men of his age and nation.

ABENMELEK, a learned rabbi, who wrote in Hebrew a commentary on the bible, which he called the perfection of beauty. Amsterdam, 1661, in folio, translated into Latin in 4to. and 8vo.

ABERCROMBIE, Sir Ralph, an English general, celebrated for his bravery. As his ambition was to distinguish himself in the service of his country, he studied the duties of the military profession, and when he rose to the title of major-general, in 1787, the rank was due to his merits and to his experience. In the several stations to which he was appointed, he always conducted with the utmost bravery. He was ever foremost in feats of danger and of glory. So much valor did not pass unrewarded with the ministry; after supporting the honor of the British arms on the continent, and in the West Indies as commander in chief, and reducing several of the enemies colonies, he was made a knight of the bath, governor of the Isle of Wight and forts George and Augustus, and raised to the rank of lieutenant-general. After his return from the West Indies he commanded in Ireland and Scotland. In the attack made on Holland by the English, Sir Ralph bore a conspicuous part, and the landing at the Helder and the subsequent actions evinced not only the bravery of his troops, but the judicious arrangement and military skill of their heroic leader, whose abilities even the French themselves were eager to admire and commend. In the Egyptian expedition, the popularity of the veteran chief marked him as destined to gather fresh laurels for his country. After a long delay on the shores of the Mediterranean, which seemed to argue almost timidity, Sir Ralph soon convinced the enemy that every noble exertion in the field of honor and glory can be expected from a British army. He landed at Aboukir, in spite of the obstinate opposition of the French, 8th March, 1801, and advanced boldly towards Alexandria. On the 21st March a bloody battle was fought between the two armies; and the French, who had attempted to seize the English by surprise, found themselves unable to withstand the impetuosity of their opponents, and retired dismayed and conquered. This brilliant victory however was dearly bought; Sir Ralph, whilst animating his troops, received a musket ball in the hip, and died seven days after on board the fleet. His remains were conveyed to Malta, and there interred in the great church, where a noble monument with a becoming inscription records his meritorious services. Sir Ralph was descended from an ancient and respectable family in Scotland, and one of his brothers, likewise engaged in the military service of his country, fell at the melancholy affair of Bunker's hill in the American war. Another brother has also acquired high distinction in the army.

ABERNETHY, John, a Presbyterian minister, born at Coleraine in Ireland, October 19th, 1680. He was early removed to Scotland, where he escaped the miseries which his family endured at the siege of Derry; and after he had finished his studies at the university of Glasgow, and obtained the degree of M. A. he returned to Ireland, and was soon after appointed minister of the dissenting congregation of Antrim. Abernethy becoming unpopular, abandoned by his congregation and forsaken by his friends, retired to Dublin, where he became the pastor of a small society in Wood-street, and for ten years displayed moderation in opinions and exemplary manners. He died of the gout, December, 1740, in the 60th year of his age. He left several volumes of sermons much esteemed, which were published 1748, and to which an account of his life was prefixed.

ABGILLUS, son of the king of the Frisii, was surnamed Prester John. He was in the Holy land with Charlemagne, and afterwards it is said went to Abyssinia, where he made extensive conquests. He is the reputed author of a history of his journey and of that of Charlemagne into the East.

ABLE or ABEL, Thomas, a chaplain at the court of Henry VIII. His attachment to the cause of queen Catherine, whose innocence he ably supported, brought upon him the resentment of the tyrant. He was accused as concerned in the affair of the holy maid of Kent, and afterwards by the king's order he was sentenced to die on pretence of denying his supremacy. July 30th, 1540, he was first hanged and then drawn in quarters. His writings are now lost.

ABOU-HANIFAH, surnamed Al-nooman, a celebrated doctor among the mussulmans, born in the 80th year of the hegira. Though he was imprisoned at Bagdat by the violence of a caliph, and though he died in his confinement, yet his learning, his virtues, and moderation found partisans in the east, and 335 years after his decease the sultan Melikshah erected a noble mausoleum in the city where his remains were deposited; and there were not wanting enthusiasts who declared that his name was enrolled in the Old Testament, and that his birth had been foretold as well as that of the prophet. Whatever honors, however, Abou-hanifah received from this zeal of posterity and from his admirers who assumed the name of Hanifahites, they were due to his temperance, to his exemplary life and the mildness of his character.

ABOU-JOSEPH, a learned mussulman, appointed supreme judge of Bagdat by the caliph Hadi and Aaron Raschid. He supported the tenets of Abou-hanifah, and maintained the dignity of his office by impartiality. When he was one day reproached for his ignorance of one of the causes brought before him, for the decision of which he received an ample allowance, he jocosely replied, that he received in proportion as he knew; but, says he, if I was paid for all I do not know, the riches of the caliphat itself would not be sufficient to answer my demand.

ABOULAINA, a mussulman doctor, celebrated for his wit. When Moses, son of the caliph Abdalmalek, put to death one of his friends, and afterwards spread a report that he had escaped, Aboulaina, on hearing the circumstance, said in the words of the lawgiver of the Hebrews, Moses smote him and he died. The sentence was reported to the prince, and Aboulaina was summoned to appear. Instead of dreading the threats of the oppressor of his friend, he boldly replied in the words of the following verse in Exodus, Wilt thou kill me to-day as thou killedst the other man yesterday? The ingenuity of the expression disarmed the anger of Moses, who loaded him with presents.

ABOUFEDA, Ismael, prince of Hamah in Syria, one of the most celebrated of the Arabian geographers and historians. He was born at Damascus in 1273, and soon became distinguished by his learning. In 1321 he wrote an important geographical work, which Graevius published in London, 1660. He wrote also the lives of Mahomet and Saladin; the former was printed at Oxford in 1723, and the latter at Leyden in 1732. His annals of Mahometanism, a work in high estimation, was published with a Latin version at Copenhagen, in 5 vols. 4to. in 1789—1794. He was a soldier as well as a scholar, and served in several expeditions with his father; was present at the storming of Tripoli in 1289, and in 1291 at the capture of Aca, distinguished himself as well by his skill as his bravery. He died in 1331.

ABOU-LOLA, an Arabian poet, born at Maora in 973. Though he lost his sight in the 3d year of his age by the small-pox, yet his poetry was animated, and his descriptions beautiful and interesting. He became a brhamin, and devoted himself faithfully to the abstinence and mortifications of that sect, and died 1057.

ABRABANEL, Isaac, a Jew of Lisbon, who pretended to be descended from David king of Israel. He was employed in offices of importance by Alphonso V. king of Portugal; but on the accession of John II. he shared the disgrace of the ministry, and either, from the consciousness of guilt or the apprehension of persecution, he fled to Spain, where he applied himself to literature. His fame recommended him to Ferdinand and Isabel, but when the Jews were banished from Castille, he yielded to the storm which neither his intrigues nor his influence could avert. He found an asylum at the court of Ferdinand king of Naples, but upon the defeat of the next monarch Alphonso, by the French armies under Charles VIII. he retired to Corfu, and at last to Venice, where he died in 1508, in his 71st year. He was buried with great pomp at Padua without the walls of the city. Though engaged during the best part of his life in the tumult and the intrigues of courts, Abrabanel cultivated literature in his hours of privacy and retirement. Blessed with a strong mind, he wrote with facility, but the persecutions which his nation had suffered, and which he himself had shared in all their bitterness, envenomed his pen, and scarce any thing was composed which did not breathe the most violent invectives against Christianity, and the most vehement desire of revenge. His writings are chiefly commentaries or explanations of scripture.

ABRAHAM, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit, in the diocese of Toul in Lorraine, who was for seventeen years divinity professor at Pont a Mousson, where he died September 7th, 1655, in his 66th year. His writings were on the theological subjects, besides some commentaries on the classics.

ABRAHAM, Usque, a Jew of Portugal, though Arnaud considers him as a Christian. He undertook with Tobias Athias to translate the Bible into Spanish in the sixteenth century; but though accuracy seems to pervade the whole, yet it is justly viewed as a compilation from preceding Chaldee paraphrases and Spanish glossaries. Another edition was published for the use of the Spanish Christians, and the difference of the two translations is particularly observable in those passages which appeal to the faith and belief of the readers.

ABSALOM, archbishop of Lunden in Denmark, is celebrated as the minister, the favorite, and the friend of Waldenir. He displayed his abilities not only in the cabinet but in the field as a general, and at sea as the commander of the fleet. By the erection of Copenhagen castle he laid the foundation of that metropolis. To these great qualities he added the virtues of a most humane and benevolent heart. He died universally regretted 1202.

ABSTEMIUS, Laurentius, a native of Macerata, in the march of Ancona, who lived at the time of the revival of learning in Europe. His abilities recommended him to the duke of Urbino who patronised him. His writings were chiefly explanations of difficult passages, besides a collection of one hundred fables after the manner of Æsop, Phædrus, Avienus, &c. in which he frequently lashes the vices of his age, especially the immorality of the clergy.

ABUBEKER, father-in-law of Mahomet, was elected his successor, in opposition to Ali the son-in-law of the prophet. He supported with energy the fabric erected by the arts of the impostor, and reduced by conquest several of the Arabian tribes who wished to abandon the new doctrines to return to the religion of their fathers. Afterwards Abubeker turned his arms against foreign nations, and by the valor of his active general Khaled, at the head of thirty-six thousand men, he defeated an army of two hundred thousand men whom the Greek emperor Heraclius had sent to ravage the borders of Syria. His victories however were of short duration, a slow fever wasted his vigor, but before he died he appointed for his successor Omar, a valiant chieftain, and after a reign of two years and six months he expired in his sixty-third year. He was buried in the tomb of Mahomet.

ABUDHAHER, the father of the Carmatians in Arabia, spread his doctrines by his eloquence as well as by the sword. He not only opposed the religion of Mahomet, but plundered and insulted the temple of Mecca, and carried away the black stone which was superstitiously believed to have fallen from heaven. His violence was not checked by the Mussulmans, and he died in peaceful possession of his extensive dominions, 953.

ABULFARAGIUS, Gregory, son of a Christian physician, was born at Malatia, near the source of the Euphrates. He followed his father's profession, but afterwards applied himself to the study of the eastern languages and of divinity, and so great was his progress that he was ordained bishop of Guba in his twentieth year, from whence he was afterwards translated to Lacabena and Aleppo. Though he gave way to the superstitions of his time, he is to be remembered with gratitude for the Arabic history which he wrote, divided into dynasties. This excellent book, which is an epitome of universal history from the creation to his own time, has been published, two vols. 4to. with a Latin translation, 1663, by Dr. Pococke, who has added a short continuation on the history of the east. Abulfaragius died in his sixtieth year, 1284, and his memory was deservedly honored with the highest encomium which his nation could bestow.

ABULFEDA, Ismael, succeeded his brother as king of Hamath in Syria, 1342. When a private man he distinguished himself by his researches in geography, and published in Arabic an account of the regions beyond the Oxus, which was first edited by Grævius with a Latin translation, London, 1650, and more recently by Hudson, Oxford 1712. Abulfeda, who had passed some part of his life in England, died in 1345 in his seventy-second year.

ABULGASI-BAYATUR, khan of the Tartars, was descended from the great Zingis, and as his youth was spent in the school of adversity, misfortunes and experience fitted him for the government of a state. After a reign of twenty years, during which he was respected at home and abroad, he resigned the sovereignty to his son, and retired to devote himself to literature. He wrote a genealogical history of the Tartars, which, though occasionally disfigured by conceited terms, and various interpolations from the Koran, is truly valuable, as the only Tartar history known in Europe. It has been translated into German and French. He died 1663.

ABU-MESLEM, a mussulman governor of Khorasan, who in 746 transferred the dignity of caliph from the family of the Omniades to that of the Abbassides, and by that revolution occasioned the death of above six hundred thousand men. The caliph Almanzor, whom he had supported by his services, cruelly seized him and threw him into the Tigris, 754.

ACACIUS, a bishop of Amida on the Tigris, who sold the sacred vessels of his churches to ransom seven thousand Persian slaves, which generous action produced a peace between the Persian king and Theodosius the younger.

ACCIAIOLI, Donatus, a native of Florence, who distinguished himself by his learning, and by his political services to his country. Besides several treatises he wrote commentaries on the ethics of Aristotle, and translated some of the lives of Plutarch. He died, 1478, in his fiftieth year, at Milan, in his journey to France as ambassador from the Florentines to Lewis XI. to implore his assistance against the ambitious views of pope Sixtus IV. His fortune was discovered to be so small that his daughters were portioned for marriage at the public expense, as a mark of the gratitude of the country to the virtues of the father.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, a lawyer of Florence, but originally of Arezzo, secretary to the republic. Besides an account of the great men of his time, he has written an elegant account in three books of the war of the Christians against the Infidels, for the recovery of the Holy Land, from which Tasso has drawn the foundation of his Jerusalem delivered. His memory was so retentive that he repeated verbatim the Latin harangues of the Hungarian ambassador, on his introduction to the Florentine senate. He died 1466, aged fifty-one.

ACCOLTI, Francis, brother to Benedict, acquired an extensive reputation by the clearness of his judgment, the graces of his eloquence, and his knowledge of jurisprudence. He aspired to the purple, but Sixtus VI. in refusing it, flattered him with the compliment that such a promotion would deprive his pupils and the world of the advantages of his instruction. He died in 1470, leaving a large property accumulated by excessive parsimony. He wrote some ill digested law books, and incorrect translations of St. Chrysostom. As he was a native of Arezzo he is sometimes called Aretin.

ACCOLTI, Peter, a son of Benedict, patronised by the popes, and raised to the dignity of cardinal. He defended in his treatises the right of the pope over the crown of Naples, and died at Florence, 1549, in his fifty-second year. His brother Benedict, duke of Nepi, distinguished himself as a poet; and his Virginia, a comedy, and some small poems are mentioned as deserving celebrity.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, a man of violent passions, who conspired with five others to murder Pius IV. on pretence that he was not lawfully elected. The frequent audiances that he demanded of the pope rendered him suspected; he was seized, and with his companions suffered capital punishment, 1564.

ACESIUS, bishop of Constantinople, rigidly maintained at the council of Nice, that those who had committed any sin after being baptised, ought not to be again admitted into the church, though they might repent. Constantine felt the severity of the remark, and told the austere prelate, Aecsius, make a ladder for yourself and go to heaven alone.

ACHARD, Frederic Charles, born at Berlin, April 28, 1754, an eminent naturalist and chymist, principally known by his invention, in 1800, of a process for manufacturing sugar from beets, which since that time has been brought to greater perfection. He died at Kunern, April 20, 1821.

ACHARDS, Eleazar Francis des, a native of Avignon, distinguished as much by his learning as by his piety and great humanity to the poor during a plague. He was nominated bishop of Halicarnassus by Clement XII. and soon after sent to China as apostolic vicar to settle the disputes of the missionaries. After four years of labor and danger, he died at Cochín in 1741, aged sixty-two. A tedious account of his mission has been published in three vols. 12mo. by Fabre his secretary.

ACHALEN, a British sovereign in the sixth century. When driven from his dominions he took refuge in Wales. He is mentioned with some commendation by Owen in his Cambrian biography, for having with his brother Arthanad performed a difficult journey on horseback up the Maelwg hills in Cardiganshire to avenge their father's death.

ACHENWALL, Godfrey, a professor at Göttingen. He was born at Elbing, in Prussia, Oct. 20, 1719, and died May, 1792. He published several books on the history of the European states, the law of nations, and political economy. His chief merit consists in the settled character he has given to, and the new light which he has thrown on the science, which explains systematically the nature and amount of the active powers of a state, and hence deduces the sources of its physical and moral prosperity. He gave it the name of statistics.

ACHILLINI, Claude, grand nephew of Alexander, was distinguished for his knowledge of medicine, theology, and jurisprudence. As a professor of law he acquired reputation and honor at Parma, Ferrara, and Bologna, and gained the applauses of the sovereign pontif. In poetry he shone among the learned of his age, and his well known sonnet on the conquests of Lewis XIII. in Piedmont, procured from Richelieu the liberal present of a chain of gold worth one thousand crowns. He died at Bologna, 1640, in his sixty-sixth year.

ACHMET, I. emperor of Turkey, son and successor of Mahomet III. made war against the Hungarians, and afterwards was engaged in quelling the commotions of insurgents and of rivals. He died, 1617, in his thirtieth year, and 14th of his reign.

ACHMET II. succeeded his brother Solyman III. 1691, on the throne of Constantinople. He was unfortunate in his wars against the Venetians and the Austrians, but his private character was amiable. He died in 1695.

ACHMET III. son of Mahomet IV. was placed on the throne by the heads of a faction which had deposed his brother Mustapha II. After he had artfully destroyed those dangerous subjects, he endeavored to increase the revenues of his empire by new taxes and by an alteration of the value of the current coin. He granted a friendly asylum to Charles XII. of Sweden, after the battle of Pultowa, and the kindness and the hospitality which marked the whole of his intercourse with that unfortunate monarch are entitled to the highest encomiums.

Aehmet made war against the Russians and Persians, and conquered Morea from Venice, but his armies were less successful against Hungary; and he was defeated by prince Eugene at the battle of Peterwaradin. He was preparing another expedition against Persia, when an insurrection hurled him from his throne, and exalted his nephew Mahomet V. from a prison to assume the sovereign power. He died of an apoplexy, 23d June, 1736, in his seventy-fourth year.

ACONTIUS, a native of Trent, eminent as a philosopher, divine, and civilian. He became a convert to the protestant religion, and found an asylum in the court of England, which he repaid by fulsome adulation to queen Elizabeth. His books met with great popularity, especially his works of the Stratagems of Satan, in which he wished to reduce to a small compass the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, and introduced an universal toleration in religious tenets. He possessed extensive abilities and deep penetration, but as he carried his ideas on religion too near skepticism, he drew upon himself the odium of the clergy. The time of his death is unknown. He was still living in 1566. He wrote other works besides, but his best performance is a treatise on the method of studying, printed at Utrecht, 1658.

ACOSTA, Joseph, a provincial of the Jesuits in Peru, was born at Medina del Campo, and died at Salamanca, 1600, in his sixtieth year. Among his writings, his history natural and moral of the West Indies in Spanish and translated into French, is particularly celebrated. As a missionary he labored assiduously and successfully in the conversion of the Americans. Dr. Robertson, and other elaborate writers on America, frequently refer to this author, who died rector of the university of Salamanca in the year 1660.

ACOSTA, Uriel, a native of Oporto, educated in the Romish religion, which his family though of Jewish extraction had embraced by compulsion. He was a man of learning; but his life was rendered a burden, by the endless persecutions which the fickleness of his religious opinions brought upon him. He apostatised to Judaism, and at last became a deist. The disgraceful and cruel treatment which he received from his persecutors roused his passions to the highest pitch. In attempting to shoot one of his principal enemies, as he passed through the street, he missed in his aim, and then immediately shot himself in the head with another pistol, 1640, or according to others 1647.

ACROPOLITA, George, one of the Byzantine historians in the thirteenth century, celebrated for his knowledge of poetry, mathematics, and rhetoric. He was employed as ambassador and as governor at the court of Constantinople, and was the means of a reconciliation and reunion of religion between the two churches of the east and west, to which he gave his solemn sanction in the name of the emperor, at the second council of Lyons, 1274. His history was discovered in the east by Douza, and published, 1614. It is a faithful narrative of the public transactions from 1205 to 1265. Acropolita is generally called Logothete, the name of the place or chancellorship which he held. He died about the year 1283, aged 62. His son Constantine distinguished himself also by the public offices he filled at the court of the Palaeologi.

ACTUARIUS, a Jew physician, who practised at Constantinople in the thirteenth century. His treatises in Greek are chiefly drawn from Galen Paulus, and preceding medical writers. It is said that in honor of him the name of Actuarius is still given to the physicians of the court.

ACUNA, Christopher, a Jesuit of Burgos, employed as a missionary in America. He published an interesting account of the Amazon river, on his return to Madrid, 1641, and the work has been translated into French, in 4 vols. 12mo., 1682.

ADAIR, James, an English lawyer of eminence, son of an army agent. He was in parliament for Cockerinouth, in 1780, and afterwards for Higham Ferrers. He succeeded serjeant Glynn as recorder of London, and afterwards resigned that situation, in which he had displayed integrity as well as ability; but his expectations of superior preferment were disappointed. He was one of the lawyers employed in the prosecution of the persons accused of high treason, in 1794, and conducted himself with great candor and liberality. He died 1798. Two extracts were published by him, called thoughts on the dismissal of officers for their conduct in parliament, and observations on the power of alienations of the crown, before the first of queen Anne.

ADAIR, James, a trader and resident among the North American Indians, for more than forty years. He published a work entitled the History of the American Indians, particularly those nations adjoining the Mississippi, East, and West Florida, South Carolina, Georgia, and Virginia; London, 4to., 1775; in which he points out various customs of the Indians, having a striking resemblance to those of the Jews; and, thence infers that the former descended from the latter. At the time, this was esteemed a most visionary idea, but has since obtained some respectable advocates.

ADALARD, or ADELARD, son of count Bernard, and grandson of Charles Martel, was related to Charlemaigne. On the divorce of Ermengarda, by the emperor, Adalard left the court in disgust, and assumed the religious habit at Corbie. He was however still patronised by the great, and made prime minister of Pepin king of Italy; but he preferred solitude to the turbulence of an elevated station, and founded the abbey of New Corbie, or Corwey, in Saxony. He died, 2d Jan., 826, in his seventy-second year greatly lamented, as his virtues had procured him the respect of the world, and his learning the title of the Augustine of his age. Only fragments of his writings remain.

ADALBERON, archbishop of Rheims, and chancellor of France, was known for his great services as an ecclesiastic and as the minister of Lothaire. He died 988.

ADALBERON, Ascelin, bishop of Leon, meanly betrayed into the hand of Hugh Capet, Arnoul archbishop of Rheims, and Charles of Lorraine, the king's rival, who had taken refuge under his episcopal protection. He died 1030. He published a satirical poem, in four hundred and thirty verses, containing some curious historical facts.

ADALBERT, archbishop of Prague, preached the gospel among the Bohemians, and afterwards among the Poles, by whom he was murdered, 29th April, 997.—Another of the same name, bishop of Magdeburg, converted the Sclavonians, and penetrated far into Pomerania, as a Christian missionary. He died at Presburg, 20th June, 981.—Another archbishop of Breuen, who became very powerful in Denmark, and even obliged the king to divorce his wife Gutha, because she was somewhat allied to him. Though intriguing and violent, he possessed some good qualities, and in 1072, he formed some wise regulations for the conduct of the clergy and for the government of the kingdom in civil and ecclesiastical affairs.

ADAM, Alexandre, a schoolmaster and compiler, was born at Rufford, in the shire of Moray, in 1741, and died in 1809. He obtained the degree of LL. D., and was for many years head master of the High School at Edinburgh. He compiled Roman Antiquities, a Latin Lexicon, and other school books.

ADAM, Melchior, a protestant of Grotkaw, in Silesia, remarkable for his learning and his perseverance. After being appointed rector of a college at Heidelberg, he published in four volumes, the lives of illustrious men, who had flourished in Germany and Flanders, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Though the lives are not numerous, yet the execution was laborious. He is however accused of partiality by the Lutherans, who consider him as too insignificant to pass judgment on the merits and demerits of the literati of Germany. He died in 1622.

ADAM, Thomas, an English divine, born at Leeds, in Yorkshire, and educated in his native town, and at Wakefield school. He was of Christ college, Cambridge, but removed to Har-hall, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree. He afterwards obtained the living of Wintringham, Lincolnshire, where he resided for fifty-eight years, an active, pious, and benevolent parish priest, and where he died, 1784, aged eighty-three. He published lectures on the church catechism, sermons, a paraphrase of the eleven first chapters of the Romans, and after his death appeared a collection of thoughts, to which his life is prefixed.

ADAM, Robert, an architect, born at Kirkaldy, in Scotland, and educated at Edinburgh. He was possessed of a strong genius, and he improved himself by study and application, and acquired in Italy a taste for whatever is great, bold and magnificent. He was patronized by George III., but resigned his employment of royal architect in 1768, on being elected member for Kinross. The breaking of a blood vessel put a period to his labors, March 3d, 1792, and he was buried, in Westminster abbey. His talents had been happily called into action by the public voice, and not less than eight great public works, and twenty-five private buildings were designed the year preceding his death, to remain as monuments of his superior powers.

ADAM, Scotus, a monkish writer, born in Scotland and educated at the monastery of Lindisferna, now Holy Island, south of Berwick, at that time famous for the learning of its professors. He went to Paris and taught divinity at the Sorbonne, but afterwards became a resident monk at Melross and Durlam, where he wrote, besides an account of David I. of Scotland, the lives of Columbus and of some of the saints of the sixth century. He died 1180. His works were published at Antwerp, fol. 1659.

ADAMS, Andrew, LL. D., chief justice of Connecticut, was born at Stratford, January, 1736, and graduated at Yale College, in 1760. In 1764 he entered upon the practice of the law at Litchfield; in 1789 he was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court; and, in 1793 chief justice of the same. He died Nov. 26, 1799, aged sixty-three years.

ADAMS, Amos, a clergyman, favorably known in Massachusetts, at the time of his active labors. He was graduated at Harvard University in 1752; settled at Roxbury in 1753; and died Oct. 5, 1775, in the forty-eighth year of his age. No less than twelve of his occasional sermons were published, two of which were republished in London. He also delivered the Dudlean lecture of Harvard University in 1770, entitled Diocesan Episcopacy, the manuscript copy of which is preserved in the College library.

ADAMS, Eliphalet, a graduate of Harvard University and a minister at New London, Connecticut. He graduated in 1694; was ordained, Feb. 9, 1709; and died in April, 1753, in the 77th year of his age. He had a good reputation as a scholar, and published nine occasional sermons.

ADAMS, John, for sometime a minister at Newport, Rhode Island. He graduated at Harvard University in 1721, and was distinguished, at that period as a poet, and for his knowledge of ancient and foreign languages. He died in 1740, at the age of thirty-six years, deeply lamented by his acquaintance. A small volume of his poems was published in 1745.

ADAMS, John, the second president of the United States, was born at Braintree, Mass. Oct. 30, 1735. He graduated at Harvard University in 1755; and, while a member of that institution was distinguished by diligence in his studies, and by the most unequivocal evidence of genius. The three years next succeeding his graduation, he spent studying law, at Worcester; and, at the same time, as a means of subsistence, instructed a class of scholars in Latin and Greek. In Oct. 1758, Mr. Adams presented himself a stranger, poor, and without the influence of friends, to the superior court then sitting at Boston, for admission to practice as an attorney. He now commenced in the labors of his profession, at Quincy, then in the county of Suffolk, and soon obtained a competent portion of lucrative business. In 1764, Mr. Adams was married to Abigail Smith; and in the year following he removed to Boston, where he acquired an extensive legal practice. Although he was offered patronage from the officers of the British government, he was induced to decline all such aids to personal distinction and affluence, choosing rather to espouse the cause of his native country, hazardous as this course evidently was. His patriotism was duly appreciated by his fellow citizens, and he received numerous marks of public confidence and respect. He took a prominent part in every leading measure, and served on several committees which reported some of the most important state papers of the time. He was elected a member of the Congress, and was among the foremost in recommending the adoption of an independent government. It has been affirmed by Mr. Jefferson, himself, "that the great pillar of support to the declaration of independence, and its ablest advocate and champion on the floor of the house, was John Adams." In 1777, he was chosen commissioner to the court of Versailles, in the place of Mr. Dean, who was recalled. It is said, that at this time, he had been a member of ninety committees, and chairman of twenty-five. On his return from France, about a year afterwards, he was elected a member of the convention to prepare a form of government for the State of Massachusetts, and placed on the sub-committee chosen to draught the project of a constitution. The clause in regard to the patronage of literature was written by him. Sept. 29, 1779, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to negotiate a peace, and had authority to form a commercial treaty with Great Britain. In June, 1780, he was appointed in the place of Mr. Laurens ambassador to Holland, and in 1782 he went to Paris to engage in the negotiation for peace, having previously obtained assurance that Great Britain would recognise the independence of the United States. After serving on two or three commissions to form treaties of amity and commerce with foreign powers, in 1785 Mr. Adams was appointed first minister to London; and, in 1788, having been absent nine years, he returned to America, landing at Boston the 17th of June. In March, 1789, the new constitution of the United States went into operation, and Mr. Adams became the first Vice-President, which office he held during the whole of Washington's administration. On the resignation of Washington, John Adams became, March 4, 1797, President of the United States. He occupied this station four years, and then was succeeded by Mr. Jefferson, who was elected by a majority of one vote only. This was the termination of his public functions; and he spent the remainder of his days upon his farm in Quincy, occupying himself with agriculture, and obtaining amusement from the literature and politics of the day. He died on the fourth of July, 1826, with the same words on his lips, which fifty years before, on that day, he had uttered on the floor of Congress—"Independence for ever."—His principal publications are, Letters on the American Revolution—Defence of the American Constitutions—an Essay on Canon and Feudal Law—a Series of Letters under the signature of Novanglus—and Discourses on Davila.

ADAMS, Samuel, one of the most distinguished men connected with the American revolution. He was born at Boston, Mass., in 1722, and graduated at Harvard University in 1740. He was one of the first who organized measures of resistance to the mother country; and for the prominent part which he took in these measures, he was proscribed by the British government. In 1776 he signed the declaration of Independence with Franklin, Jefferson, Hancock, and the other illustrious men whose names adorn that instrument. He was a member of the convention of Massachusetts which accepted the constitution of the United States; and, on the adoption of the constitution of Massachusetts, was elected president of the Senate. From 1789 to 1794, he held the office of lieutenant-governor, and that of chief magistrate during the three succeeding years. He died Oct. 3, 1803, aged eighty-two.

ADAMS, Sir Thomas, a native of Wem, in Shropshire, who, after receiving his education in Cambridge, became a draper in London, and rose to the high honor of lord mayor of London, 1645. He was well acquainted with the privileges of the city, which he maintained with the spirit of independence. His partiality, however, to the royal cause, rendered him suspicious, and the republicans searched his house for the unfortunate Charles. His affection was afterwards transferred to the son, to whom during his exile he sent as a present ten thousand pounds. He accompanied Monk to Breda, to congratulate the monarch on his restoration, and for his loyalty he received the honor of knighthood and a baronetcy. His liberality in public and private life was unbounded; he erected and nobly endowed a school at his native place, founded the Arabic professorship at Cambridge, and at his sole expense printed the gospel in Persian, which he distributed in the east. He died, in his eighty-first year, 24th Feb. 1667, of the stone, and after death his body was opened and a calculus of the extraordinary weight of twenty-five ounces extracted, which is still preserved in the laboratory of Cambridge. His honors were enjoyed by his descendants till the late Sir Thomas, who died captain in the navy.

ADAMS, William, D. D., fellow and afterwards master of Pembroke College, Oxford, was the friend of Dr. Johnson, and distinguished no less for the urbanity of his manners than the extent of his learning. He wrote some tracts and sermons, and acquired celebrity by the manner in which he attacked the tenets of Hume. It was during this controversy that the historian observed, that he was the only opponent who maintained the dispute with the spirit and the manners of a gentleman. He died 1789, beloved and respected by the society over which he presided for fourteen years.

ADAMS, Hannah, a native of Massachusetts, whose literary labors have made her known in Europe as well as in her own country. She was a woman of great excellence and purity of character; and was possessed of rare modesty and simplicity of manners. She derived only a small pecuniary advantage from her publications; but, such was the estimation in which she was held, that without care she received ample means of subsistence. Among her works are the View of Religions, History of the Jews, and a History of New England. She died at Brookline, Dec. 15, 1831, aged seventy-six years.

ADAMSON, Patrick, a native of Perth, who, after studying at St. Andrews, travelled into France, as tutor, and with difficulty escaped the persecuting spirit which at the massacre of Paris, doomed to torture and to death the unfortunate Protestants of every age and of every station. He escaped the general slaughter by lying concealed in a public inn for seven months, the master of which was thrown from the roof of his own house, at the age of seventy, for harboring a heretic. On his return to Scotland, he was appointed minister of Paisley, and afterwards, by the favor and interest of lord Moreton, he was raised to the archbishopric of St. Andrews. In this elevated situation he was surrounded with dangers and difficulties; and the virulence of the presbyterians was successfully directed against him, as the firmest pillar of episcopacy. James VI., however, patronised him, and sent him as his ambassador to England, where his eloquence and his address gained him admirers, and raised such a tide of popularity in favor of the young king his master, that the jealousy of Elizabeth forbade him again to ascend the pulpit while at her court. In 1584 he was recalled home, and so violent was the irritation of the presbyterians against him, that, at a provincial synod, he was accused and excommunicated; and neither appeals to the king and to the states, nor the protestations of innocence, would have saved him from this disgraceful sentence, if he had not yielded to the storm, and implored for pardon by the most abject submission. His life continued a scene of persecution; even the monarch grew deaf to his petitions, and alienated the revenues of his See in favor of the duke of Lenox, so that Adamson had to add to the indignities offered to his office, the more poignant sufferings of indigence and wretchedness, in the midst of a forlorn, a deserted, and starving family. He died 1591, in his forty-eighth year. A quarto volume of his works was published, containing translations of some of the books of the Bible in Latin verse, frequently composed to alleviate his grief, and disarm the terrors of persecution.

ADDISON, Lancelot, D. D., son of a clergyman of the same name, born at Maulds Meaburne, in Westmoreland, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where his satirical reflections on the pride, ignorance, and hypocrisy of his superiors, in an oration, 1658, caused such irritation that he obtained forgiveness only by a public recantation on his knees. He was afterwards engaged as chaplain at Dunkirk, and at Tangier, and in consideration of his services, and of what he had suffered for his loyalty, he was deservedly preferred to the living of Milston and a Sarum prebend, and in 1683 to the deanery of Lichfield, and the archdeaconry of Coventry. He died April 20th, 1703, aged seventy-one, and was buried at Lichfield. He wrote several valuable treatises, among which were his historical observations, while resident in Africa, an account of the present state of the Jews, &c.

ADDISON, Joseph, son of Dr. Lancelot Addison, was born May 1st, 1672, at Milston, near Ambrosbury, Wiltshire, of which place his father was rector. The Charter House, at which he became acquainted with Steele, and the colleges of Queen's and Magdalen at Oxford, have the honor of his education. His acadenical hours were not here devoted to bacchanalian orgies, or disgraceful intrigues; but the powers of the mind were cultivated and improved, and the frequent composition of Latin verses produced such correctness of style and elegance of diction that the Muse Anglicanæ alone would give celebrity to the name of Addison. He next, in his 22d year, displayed his powers in English poetry, by some verses addressed to Dryden, and by a translation of part of Virgil's fourth Georgic on the Bees; and as the number of his friends increased with his popularity, the student was gradually converted into the courtier, and introduced by Congreve to Montague chancellor of the exchequer, a man who in discerning merit did not wish it to be forgotten that flattery is a tribute paid to power. By the advice of Montague, Addison laid aside his intention of taking orders; and, studying the temper of the times, he published a poem addressed to king William, and two years after celebrated the peace of Ryswick in Latin verses, which paved the way to a pension of three hundred pounds a year, and claimed the still more honorable merit of being, in the opinion of Smith, the best Latin poem since the Æneid. Raised now to easy circumstances, he travelled to Italy, and with the eyes and the genius of a classical poet, surveyed the monuments and the heroic deeds of ancient Rome, which he described in his famous epistle to lord Halifax, the most elegant if not the most sublime of his productions. He wrote here, also, his dialogues on medals, and according to Tickell, some acts of his Cato; and after a residence of two years returned to England, 1702, with a meanness of appearance, which proclaimed aloud that he labored under pecuniary distresses. He now published his travels, with a dedication to lord Somers, and so great was its popularity that the book rose to five times its original price before it could be reprinted. When the victory of Blenheim was obtained, Godolphin looked out for a poet equal to celebrate the glory of his country, and Addison was recommended by Halifax; and soon after, when he had read to his patron what he had written, as far as the simile of the angel, he was appointed commissioner of appeals. On the following year he accompanied Halifax to Hanover, and was the next year made under-secretary of state. When the duke of Wharton went as viceroy to Ireland, Addison accepted the place of his secretary, and with a salary of three hundred pounds a year as keeper of the records of Birmingham, he made a rule, as Swift observes, of never returning to his friends, out of politeness, the fees due to his office. During his residence in Ireland the first paper of the Tatler was published by Steele, April 22d, 1709, unknown to him, though he soon discovered by the insertion of a remark on Virgil, which had originated in himself, who the author was. The Tatler succeeded in about two months by the Spectator, a series of essays of the same nature, but written with less levity, and upon a more regular plan and published daily. In 1713, the Cato was produced on the stage, and was the grand climacteric of Addison's reputation. The last act was composed with haste, and a house was assembled by the intrigues of Steele to judge of the merits of his friend's performance. When the play was printed, the queen expressed a wish it might be dedicated to her, but as Addison had promised it elsewhere, as a man of honor he could not retract, and Cato appeared without a patron; but such was its popularity, that it was translated into several languages, and introduced upon some of the other theatres of Europe. During the representation of Cato, Steele published another daily paper called the Guardian, to which Addison contributed much of his assistance. In this publication his papers were distinguished by a hand; in the Spectator they are marked by one of the letters which compose the name of the muse Clio. Success in literature did not render Addison indolent or conceited, and Steele has attributed to him the comedy of the Drummer, which he said he carried for him to the play house, and of which afterwards he sold the copy for fifty guineas. These circumstances are denied by Tickell; but as no writer has claimed the Drummer, it is deservedly considered as the production of the author of Cato. Political discussions occasionally engaged the attention of Addison, and on temporary topics he wrote the present state of the war—the whig examiner—the trial of count Tariff; pamphlets which disappeared with the subjects which gave them birth. Some time after, an attempt was made to revive the Spectator, and eighty numbers were published, of which a fourth part was by Addison; and these papers, perhaps more valuable than the others, for the religious and moral topics which they discuss, were collected to form an octavo volume. On the death of queen Anne, Addison, who had been appointed secretary to the regency, was officially required to announce to the elector of Hanover his accession to the English throne. He was, however, so overpowered by the greatness of the event, that the Lords grew tired while waiting for the niceties of his expressions, and Southwell, one of the clerks of the office, was directed to close the despatches, which he immediately completed in the common style of business, not a little elated that he could do what seemed so difficult for the gigantic powers of Addison. Never losing sight however of his public character, he published the Freeholder twice a week, from December 23d, 1715, to the middle of the following year, in support of the government, full of the most convincing arguments, and with humor forcible, singular, and matchless. In August, 1716, he married the countess dowager of Warwick. In 1717 he was raised to his highest dignity, being made secretary of state, a place to which he was unequal, as he possessed not either boldness or eloquence to defend the measures of government in the house of Commons, but rather wasted away his time in his office in quest of fine expressions. He therefore soon solicited and obtained his dismissal with a pension of fifteen hundred pounds a year. In his retirement he now laid plans for literary labors: he wrote a defence of the Christian religion, part of which was published after his death, and he proposed a tragedy on the death of Socrates, besides an English Dictionary, and a version of the Psalms. He expired June 17, 1729, leaving only one daughter, who died unmarried, 1797. Of Addison's character as a poet and a moral writer little more can be added; he was not only the ornament of his age and country, but he reflects dignity on the nature of man. He has divested vice of its meretricious ornaments, and painted religion and virtue in the modest and graceful attire which charm and elevate the heart. In Dr. Johnson's and Dr. Anderson's lives, from which the above is extracted, a fuller account may be found.

ADELARD, an English monk, who, in the 12th century, visited Egypt and Arabia, and translated into Latin, Euclid's Elements, before the Greek manuscripts of the work were known in Europe. Several other translations by him from mathematical as well as medical writers, are still preserved in Corpus Christi and Trinity College libraries at Oxford.

ADELER, Curtius, called also Servisen, a native of Norway, who served in the Dutch navy, and then went to Venice, where he was raised to the rank of admiral, and made knight of St. Mark, with a pension for his meritorious services against the Turks. He married a woman of rank at Amsterdam, and spent the latter part of his life at Copenhagen, where he died, 1675, aged fifty-three, universally respected.

ADELUNG, John Christopher, an eminent German lexicographer and literary character, was born in 1734, at Spantekow, in Pomerania, became professor at the Erfurt gymnasium, removed thence to Leipsic, and was subsequently appointed librarian to the elector, at Dresden, where he died in 1806. He was never married; it was said of him that his writing desk was his wife, and the seventy volumes which he wrote were his children. Adelung was an agreeable companion, and loved good cheer; he was so fond of procuring a variety of foreign wines, that his cellar, which he used to call his Bibliotheca selectissima, contained forty kinds. He is best known abroad by his Grammatical and Critical Dictionary of the German Language, in five volumes, quarto. But, as an original writer, he is of no mean class.

ADELUNG, Frederic von, nephew of the preceding, a distinguished historian and linguist, born at Stettin, 1768. Since the year 1825 he has been president of the Asiatic Academy at St. Petersburg. Having made himself eminently qualified for the station, in 1803, he was appointed tutor of the grand princes Nicholas and Michael, and was honored with a title of nobility. Thus favored with patronage the most ample, he has been enabled to devote his inquisitive, ardent, and powerful mind, to researches the results of which will be highly beneficial to the cause of letters.

ADER, William, a learned physician of Toulouse, in the seventeenth century, who wrote a book to prove that the diseases and infirmities which our Saviour cured could not have been removed by human art. Vigneul Marville says, this book was written to disprove what the author had before asserted, when he maintained a contrary opinion.

ADHAB-EDDOULAT, an emperor of Persia, after his uncle Amad-Eddoulat. He was not only warlike but humane, and a great patron of letters and of arts. He embellished Bagdad and other places which he had conquered, by magnificent public edifices, and died 982, aged forty-seven.

ADHELM, or ADELM, was born in Wiltshire, in the seventh century. He was made bishop of Shireburn; and extraordinary tales are related of his miraculous powers, and his voluntary chastity. He was, for the times, an eminent scholar, being acquainted with Grecian and Roman literature, a good writer, a poet of some merit, and an excellent musician. His works, which were numerous, are mostly lost. He died in 709.

ADLERFELDT, Gustavus, a learned Swede, who was in the suit of Charles XII. of whose battles he has given a faithful and minute account. He was killed by a cannon ball at the battle of Pultowa, 1709, and on that fatal day his history concludes. The work was translated into French by his son, four volumes 12mo. 1740.

ADOLPHUS FREDERIC II. king of Sweden, showed himself the patron of learning and science, the dispenser of justice, and the friend of merit. He founded the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, at Torneo, and died 12th of Feb. 1771, in his 61st year, and in the 20th of his reign.

ADOLPHUS, duke of Sleswick, refused the crown of Denmark after the death of Christopher III., and placed it on the head of his nephew Christiern I. He died in 1459, after a life of benevolence and wisdom.

ADORNE, Antouy, a Genoese, of a plebeian family, raised to the dignity of doge in 1383. His reign was in the midst of tumults and insurrections, which the Genoese attempted to appease by resigning their independence into the hands of Charles VI., of France, in 1396. Adorne was appointed governor, but Genoa regained her liberty afterwards.

ADORNE, Prosper, a Genoese, made doge after the expulsion of the French in 1460. He afterwards betrayed his power into the hands of the duke of Milan, to avenge himself against his rivals in the state; but the love of independence prevailed, the Milanese were banished, and Prosper declared the defender of Genoese liberty. His enemies at last prevailed, and at the end of a life chequered by popularity and by misfortunes he fled to Naples, where he died, 1486.

ADORNE, Jerome, a Genoese of the same family, who opposed the party of the Fregoses, who aspired to the supreme power. His abilities were of great service to his country, and Genoa, placed by his means in 1522, under the protection and in the alliance of Charles V., enjoyed peace and prosperity. He was much respected as a negotiator, as an admiral, as a politician, and as a public magistrate.

ADRETS, Francis Beaumont des, a descendant of an ancient family in Dauphiné, possessed a bold enterprising spirit. He embraced the cause of the Huguenots in resentment to the duke of Guise, and glutted his vengeance by inflicting the most barbarous punishments and tortures on those who fell into his hands. It is said that he often compelled his prisoners to leap from the battlements on the pikes of his soldiers. One of these wretched victims, being severely reprov'd for having twice shrunk from the fatal leap, answered, As bold as you are, I defy your leaping in the third attempt. The reply saved the devoted man. Even his friends feared him, and Coligny palliated his licentiousness by comparing him to a lion whose fury was accidentally converted to the good of his party. He died despised and neglected, in 1587, leaving two sons and a daughter in whom the family became extinct. One of the sons was engaged in the murders of St. Bartholomew, and he showed himself as cruel and vindictive as his father. The life of Adrets was published by Guy Allard, Grenoble, 1675, in 12mo.

ADRIAN I., a Roman patrician raised to the pontificate in 772. He highly embellished St. Peter's church, and showed himself very benevolent and humane, during a famine occasioned by the inundations of the Tiber. He died 26th December, 795.

ADRIAN II. was raised to the popedom 867. He was in this character artful and intriguing, and was deeply engaged in making the patriarch of Constantinople bow before the chair of St. Peter, and in subjecting under the papal power the kings and princes of western Europe, by the threats of excommunication. He died 872.

ADRIAN III. was elected Pope 884, and enjoyed his dignity only one year. He died as he was going to the diet to be held at Worms.

ADRIAN IV., a native of Langley in Hertfordshire, the only Englishman raised to the papal chair. His name was Nicholas Brekespere. In his youth he was employed in mean offices in the abbey of St. Alban's, and after his being refused admission in a superior order, he travelled, though in obscure circumstances, into France, where his orderly behavior and his engaging appearance recommended him to the monks of Paris, and procured him an acquaintance with the most essential branches of literature. He afterwards retired to the abbey of St. Rufus in Provence, where he was made superior, but the turbulence of the monks carried accusations to Rome against him, and the pope, Eugenius III., who admired the eloquence of Adrian, removed him from his persecutors, and created him cardinal and bishop of Alba, 1146. Under this patronage he was sent as legate to Norway and Denmark, and his popular preaching and his influence were successful in spreading the light of the gospel in these uncivilized countries. On the death of Anastasius he was elected to the papal chair, November, 1154, and he received on his elevation by the embassy of three bishops and an abbot, the congratulations of Henry II. of England, who thus paid homage to a man who a few years before had left his kingdom as a mendicant. Henry was the favorite of the pope, and he received the papal permission and apostolic blessing, when he undertook the conquest of Ireland. In his government of Rome, Adrian was jealous of his power, he repressed the insurrections of the councils who aspired to the independence of ancient times, and by the terrors of excommunication he rendered the king of Sicily submissive to his temporal authority. The emperor of Germany likewise acknowledged his power, and after holding the stirrup whilst his spiritual master mounted on horseback, he owned his dependence on the see of Rome, and humbly received consecration in the church of St. Peter. Yet in the midst of prosperity, Adrian felt the oppressive weight of greatness, and in a familiar conversation with his friend and countryman, John of Salisbury, he bitterly complained that an elevated situation is not always the parent of happiness. He died September 1st, 1159, in the fourth year and tenth month of his pontificate, and was buried in St. Peter's church. He showed himself an able and prudent pontiff, and his short reign added much to the security and to the happiness of the Roman state.

ADRIAN V., a native of Genoa, raised to the pontificate in 1276. He died thirty-eight days after. He had been employed in 1254 and in 1265, as papal legate in England, to settle the disputes between the king and his rebellious barons.

ADRIAN VI., a native of Utrecht, of obscure birth. His abilities gradually raised him to consequence; he was preceptor to the emperor Charles V., and procured in the Spanish dominions the highest honors in church and state which could gratify his ambition. He was elected pope in 1522, and died after a short and turbulent reign of one year, in which like his predecessor Adrian IV., he lamented the misery of greatness.

ADRIAN DE CASTELLO, born at Cornetto in Tuscany of obscure parentage, was employed by the popes as legate in Scotland and England. His great abilities recommended him to the friendship of Morton the primate, and to the patronage of Henry VII., by whom he was raised to the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards of Bath and Wells. He chiefly resided at Rome, while the care of his diocese was intrusted to Wolsey, and in this place of intrigue and treachery he forgot the dignity of his character, by conspiring against pope Leo X., from the ambitious expectation of being raised to the pontificate, according to a prophecy which declared the name of the successor to be Adrian. He was fined twelve thousand five hundred ducats, and forbidden to leave Rome; but afterwards, upon the discovery of the plot, Adrian fled from the city, and in consequence was solemnly stripped of all his ecclesiastical honors, 1518. The place of his retreat, and the time of his death, are unknown, though some imagine that he concealed his disgrace among the Mahometans of Asia. Polydore Virgil, who shared his friendship and his liberality, has bestowed the highest encomium upon his character, as a man of taste and judgment, and as the first since the age of Cicero, who had revived the classical style of chaste latinity and pure diction. According to Polydore, he died at Riba in the bishopric of Trent.

ADRIANI, John Baptist, a noble of Florence, who was secretary to the republic, and distinguished himself as a statesman and a man of letters. He died 1579, in his 68th year. He wrote a history of his own times, which is a continuation of Guicciardini's, valuable for its candor and authenticity, and highly commended by the indefatigable Thuanus. He composed, besides, six funeral orations upon the first characters of the times, and was the author of a letter on ancient painters and sculptors prefixed to Vasari.

ADRICHIOMIUS, Christian, a native of Delft, who died at Cologne in 1585, in his 52d year. He was for some time director of the nuns of Barbara; and afterwards, when civil commotions drove him from his country, he presided in the same capacity over the canonesses of Nazareth. He published a description of Judæa, called Theatrum terræ sanctæ, with a chronicle of the old and new testament, fol. 1593, in which he depends too much on the authority of Annius of Viterbo.

ÆGIDIUS, Peter Albiensis, a writer sent by Francis I., to examine and to give an account of the most celebrated places of Asia, Greece, and Africa. He was seized by pirates, but made his escape, and died of a surfeit, in his 65th year, 1555. He published an account of his travels besides other works.

ÆGINETA, Paulus, a physician of Ægina in the seventh century, who first was acquainted with the cathartic powers of rhubarb. His works appeared at Paris in fol. 1532.

ÆGINHARD, a German, educated by Charlemagne, of whom he became the faithful secretary. He retired from the active scenes of life after the loss of Imma his beloved wife, whom some have falsely called daughter of the emperor, asserting that she conveyed her husband on her shoulders from her house through the snow, that his escape might not be traced by the jealousy of her father. Æginhard is the author of a valuable life of Charlemagne, besides annals from 741 to 839, and letters. He died 840. His works were first edited at Paris, 2 vols. fol. 1576.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, a native of Verona, invited into France by Lewis XII. by the advice of Ponce, bishop of Paris, and engaged to write a Latin history of the French monarchy. The work, which employed eighteen, or according to others, thirty years of his life, was left unfinished at his death, is divided into ten books, from the reign of Pharamond to the fifth year of Charles VIII. in 1488. The whole is written with judgment and precision, and though the author was delicate even to a fault in the choice and collocation of his words, yet his style is elegant and correct, if we except a studied affectation of antiquity in the names of men and of places. This history was continued by Arnoldus Ferronius, who completed it by the addition of nine books, to the death of Francis I. Æmilius died in 1529, and left behind him the amiable character of a man of learning, virtue, and integrity. He was buried in the cathedral at Paris.

ÆNEAS, Sylvius, a native of Corsigny in Siena, of the family of the Piccolomini. After struggling with poverty in his younger years, he rose to consequence by his abilities, and was employed as secretary to cardinal Capranica, at the council of Basil, in 1431. He came to Scotland to mediate a peace between that country and the English crown, and at his return was promoted to the dignity of secretary to the council of Basil, an assembly which he defended against the usurpation of Rome, by his eloquence as well as by his writings. He was afterwards engaged in several embassies to Trent, Frankfort, &c., and in one of these, at Strasburg, he had an intrigue with a lady, by whom he had a son; a circumstance which he endeavours to palliate and ridicule in a letter to his father, with more affectation than vivacity. About 1439, he was sent as ambassador to the imperial court, and so high was his reputation, that the emperor Frederic not only received him with kindness, but crowned him with the poetical laurel, promoted him to the highest dignities, and honored him with his friendship and confidence. During the schism which distracted Rome, he wished to stand neuter; but he at last followed the example of Frederic, and espoused the cause of Eugenius, to whom, after a recantation of his errors, he was reconciled. His elevation to the rank of cardinal as a reward for his services, was followed in 1458, by his election to the papal chair, on the death of Callixtus, and by the publication of a bull, which condemned and renounced all that he had said or written in the defence of the council of Basil, and exhorted the members of his church to reject Æneas Sylvius, and submissively to receive Pius II., the name which he assumed. The character of firmness and dignity which he had maintained in private life, he displayed at the head of the church. He expelled tyrants, supported the election of princes, and every where established and confirmed the temporal power of Rome over the Christian world. He died in his 59th year, 14th of August, 1464, after a reign of nearly seven years, during which he deserved the eulogium which was passed upon him in the conclave, by the cardinal of Pavia, by his zeal for religion, his integrity of manners, his solid judgment and profound learning. His works, which consist of letters, — of memoirs of the council of Basil — of two books on Cosmography — of Euryalus, and Lucretia, a romance — of a poem on the crucifixion — of a history of the Bohemians, — of memoirs of his own life, &c., were printed at Basil, in fol. 1551, and at Helmstadt, 1700. His life was published by Gobelin, his secretary, at Rome, 1584 and 1589, and at Frankfort, 1614.

ÆRIUS, a presbyter of Sebastia, who is supposed by some to be the founder of the presbyterians. He separated from the church, because Eustathius was raised to the bishopric of Sebastia in preference to himself, and in asserting that presbyters and bishops were the same in rank in the Christian church, he established a sect which was branded with the name of heresy, and his supporters expelled from towns and villages to the fields and woods, where their doctrines were propagated. He flourished about 385.

ÆRSENS, Peter, an eminent painter, whom the Italians called Pietro Longo, in consequence of his tallness, was born at Amsterdam in 1519. He became celebrated at the early age of eighteen for his bold and spirited handling. He commenced with very familiar life, but at length assumed the loftier department of historical painting. His principal pictures in the latter department were, "The death of the Holy Virgin," which he executed for the town of Amsterdam, and the "Crucifixion," which he painted for the grand altar piece of the new church of the same town. Unfortunately for his fame, the latter was destroyed in an insurrection, notwithstanding that a lady offered two hundred crowns to preserve it. Ærsens, with the genuine feelings of an artist, risked his life by his strong expression of resentment for this outrage. Delft also contains two of his pictures, one of the "Nativity," the other, "The Wise Men's Offering," which show his talents to considerable advantage. He died in 1573.

ÆSCHINES, a disciple of Socrates, author of some dialogues, of which only three are extant.

ÆSCHINES, a celebrated orator known particularly as the rival of Demosthenes. He flourished 342 B. C. and died at Samos or Rhodes.

ÆSCHYLUS, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, of whose plays only seven are extant. He died in the 69th year of his age, 456 B. C.

ÆSOP, the oldest Greek fabulist. He is said to have been a native of Phrygia, and a slave, till he was set free by his owner. He lived in the age of Solon and Cræsus, about six hundred years before Christ. He inculcated rules of practical morality, drawn from the habits of the inferior creation, and thus spread his fame through Greece and all the neighboring countries. Æsop is said to have been put to death at Delphos for the freedom with which he censured the manners of the inhabitants. His fables have been translated into all modern languages. Those of Croxall and Dodsley are deemed the best English versions. Such is the reputation of this writer that he has had numerous imitations.

ÆTION, a Grecian painter, celebrated for his pictures, and among others for one representing the nuptials of Alexander the Great and Roxana, which was exhibited at the Olympic Games, and obtained so much applause, that Proxenidas the president, bestowed his daughter upon the artist. Lucian saw this picture in Italy, and gave a very accurate description of it, from which Raphael sketched one of his finest compositions.

ÆTIUS, an able general under Valentinian III. He devoted himself to military affairs, and at one time weakened the Roman power by espousing the cause of the barbarians. His valor at last, however, was exerted nobly in the defence of the tottering empire, and he obliged the victorious Attila to retire beyond the Rhine. He was stabbed by Valentinian, 454, who was jealous of his military glory, and suspected that he aspired to the imperial throne.

ÆTIUS, a Syrian, who from a menial servant rose to consequence, and was made bishop by Eudoxus the patriarch of Constantinople. He was the founder of a sect called Ætians, which adopted the tenets of the Arians, and besides maintained that faith alone without good works was sufficient for salvation. He flourished 336.

AFFLITTO, Matthew, an able civilian, born at Naples, 1443; he wrote various books on the civil and canon law, and died 1553. His family produced other men of celebrity.

AFFRY, Lewis Augustinus Philip, first magistrate of Switzerland after Napoleon had proclaimed himself the protector of the Helvetic confederacy, was born at Freyburg, 1743. Napoleon distinguished him above the other deputies, and entrusted to him the formation of an administration, which was to ensure the peace and happiness of the ancient allies of France. He sought to promote the views of the first consul, and acted, in every thing with the ability, the intelligence and the experience of a thorough statesman. He died June 16, 1810.

AGARD, Arthur, an English antiquary, born at Toston in Derbyshire. He held the respectable employment of deputy chamberlain in the exchequer office, which afforded him the means of consulting valuable books and records, and his inquiries on political and constitutional subjects were afterwards made public by Mr. Hearne, among the papers of the antiquarian society, to the establishment of which he himself contributed. He died August 22d, 1615, in his 75th year, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. Some of his papers were bequeathed for the use of his successors in the exchequer, but twenty volumes of his excellent collections were left by his will to his friend Sir Robert Cotton.

AGATHION, a native of Palermo, elected to the papal chair, 679. In his time the Eutychians or Monothelites were condemned at the council of Constantinople. He died 682.

AGELNOTH, archbishop of Canterbury, refused to crown Harold king, though he had enjoyed the patronage of his father Canute. He died 1038, after being seventeen years in the see of Canterbury.

AGILULF, duke of Turin, was appointed on the death of Antharic, king of Lombardy, his successor, and married his widow Theudelinda. He abandoned arianism for the catholic faith, and displayed great abilities as a warrior and a statesman. He died 616, after a reign of twenty-five years, and was succeeded by his son Adahald.

AGIS, the name of some Spartan kings. The most famous are the second of that name, who was engaged in the Peloponnesian war, and died 427 B. C., and the fourth, who, in consequence of his attempts to restore Lacedæmon to her ancient discipline and glorious independence, was put to death, 241 B. C.

AGLIONBY, John, D. D., a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's College, Oxford, and known for his great learning and his knowledge of school divinity. He was head of St. Edmund's Hall, chaplain to James I., and one of those who translated the new testament. He died at Islip, where he was rector, 1610, February 6th, in his 43d year, and was buried in the chancel there. His son of the same name, was dean of Canterbury, an honor which he enjoyed but a few months, and died 1643.

AGNELLUS, an abbot of Ravenna, in the ninth century, often confounded with a bishop of Ravenna of the same name in the sixth century. Agnellus wrote a history of the lives of the prelates of Ravenna, which is often quoted by Jerome Rubens, and is full of uninteresting matter but deserved sarcasm upon the debauchery of the monks.

AGNESI, Maria Gaetana, a learned Italian lady, born at Milan, in 1718. In her ninth year she spoke the Latin with correctness, and also delivered an oration in this language, in which she maintained that the study of the ancient languages was proper for females. In her eleventh year, she is said to have spoken Greek as fluently as her mother tongue. She now proceeded to perfect herself in the oriental languages, so that she was usually called a living polyglot. She next studied geometry and speculative philosophy. Shortly subsequent to her twentieth year she devoted herself to mathematics, and composed a treatise on conic sections; besides which, in her thirtieth year, she published a work on the rudiments of analysis, which has been considered as the best introduction to Euler. This gained her so much reputation, that she was appointed, in her thirty-second year, professor of mathematics at the university of Bologna. But her deep study of this abstruse science seems to have cast a gloom over her spirits; and, secluding herself altogether from society, retired to the strict order of blue nuns, and died 1799, in her eighty-first year.

AGOBARD, archbishop of Lyons, supported the revolt of Lothaire against Lewis the debonnaire. In consequence of this violent opposition he was deposed at Thionville, but afterwards restored to his ecclesiastical honors, on being reconciled to Lewis. He died 840. His works were edited by Baluze, in 1666, 2 vols. 8vo. They contain able arguments against image worship, against witchcraft, and against duelling.

AGRICOLA, Cn. Julius, an illustrious Roman, known for his humanity when governor of Britain, and immortalized by the pen of his son-in-law the historian Tacitus. He died A. D. 93, aged fifty-six.

AGRICOLA, Rodolphus, a native of Groningen, who travelled into France and Italy, where he was honored with the patronage of Hercules d'Est duke of Ferrara. He died at Heidelberg, 1485. His works on historical subjects were published at Cologne, in 4to. 1539; but though flattered by the compliments of Erasmus, and called in prose and poetry the Polition and Virgil of his time, they are not possessed of superior merit. He had the singular merit of first introducing the study of Greek into Germany, and he himself gave lectures at Worms and Heidelberg.

AGRICOLA, Jolm, a German divine, born at Isleb. He was the friend and the disciple of Luther, but afterwards violently opposed him, and became the head of the Antinomians, a sect which regarded faith as the whole of the duties of man. He was also engaged in a dispute with Melancthon, but with the most laudable motives he endeavored to effect a reconciliation between the catholics and protestants. He died at Berlin, 1566, aged seventy-four. His commentaries on St. Luke, 8vo., his historia passionis J. C. fol. and his collection of German proverbs, have been printed, and possess merit.

AGRIPPA, Herod, grandson of Herod the Great, was noticed by the Roman emperors, and made king of all Judæa and some other neighboring provinces. He persecuted the Christians, and was the person represented in scripture as struck with death on his throne by an angel for his impious vanity, A. D. 44.

AGRIPPA II., son of the above, and his successor on the throne, and last king of Judæa, was the monarch before whom Paul appeared as a prisoner, and whom he persuaded almost to be a Christian. He died at Rome A. D. 94.

AGRIPPA, Henry Cornelius, a native of Cologne, descended from a noble family. He was in the armies of the emperor Maximilian, and distinguished himself so much by his courage and military abilities, that he was knighted after seven years' service in Italy. Eager to add to his laurels the honors of learning, he applied himself to the study of the more abstruse sciences, and took degrees in law and medicine. The fickleness of his temper, however, and his irritable passions, prevented him from acquiring that distinction which is due to superior genius and virtue. His writings, often severe, drew upon him the resentment of the monks, and though liberally patronised by the great, he led a fugitive and solitary life. After reading lectures in several places in France, and at Pavia, where his eloquence commanded admiration, he retired to Metz by the solicitations of his friends; and afterwards to Switzerland. Fortune here seemed to favor him. Francis I. granted him a pension, and he was made physician to the queen mother; but his unwillingness to apply his knowledge of astrology to foretell success to the arms of France, incensed the court, and he was dismissed in disgrace. He retired with difficulty to Antwerp, and after receiving invitations from Henry king of England and from other powerful princes, he preferred the protection of Margaret of Austria, governess of the low countries; and as historiographer to the emperor, he began the history of the government of Charles V. The death of his patroness occasioned a change in his affairs, and though he was permitted to pronounce her funeral oration, he found that his enemies were inveterate against him, and that from their malevolence the favors of the emperor were for ever forfeited. After being persecuted and imprisoned at Brussels, and at Lyons, he at last retired to Grenoble, where he died, 1535, in his forty-ninth year. He lived and died in the Romish church, according to Bayle, though others suppose that he favored the cause of Luther. Of this celebrated reformer he speaks with harshness, sometimes even with contempt, and only once with respect in the nineteenth chapter of his apology. He opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. from queen Catharine, and ridiculed the meanness of his contemporaries, whose religious opinions yielded to the gold and the lust of a tyrant. His great learning and extensive information probably procured him in these ages of darkness and barbarism the fame of magician and astrologer, and hence his enemies have been fond of recording his frequent intercourse with departed spirits, and with all the demons of the infernal regions. His works were published at Lyons, 1550, in 3 vols. 8vo.

AGRIPPINA, the virtuous wife of Germanicus Cæsar, was banished after her husband's death, by Tiberius, and died in exile, A. D. 33.

AGRIPPINA, daughter of the preceding, took as her third husband the emperor Claudius, whom she poisoned, to raise her son Nero to the throne. She perished by the order of that ungrateful son.

AGUESSEAU, Henry Francis d', the descendant of a noble family of Saintonge, was born at Limoges, 1668, and after completing his education, which was begun under the direction of his father, he cultivated poetry with taste and elegance, and acquired the esteem and friendship of men of letters, particularly of Boileau and Racine. In the office of advocate-general of Paris, in 1691, and, nine years after, of procurer-general, he displayed all the energies of his nature; he gave vigor and support to the laws, banished corruption from the tribunals, and distributed justice with an impartial hand. His attention was particularly directed to the management of the hospitals; and in the enlarged views of a benevolent heart, he often resisted with boldness and success the intrigues of favorites and even the prejudices of Lewis XIV. After this monarch's death he was appointed by the duke of Orleans, the regent, to succeed Voisin as chancellor, and by his eloquence and firmness he opposed and rejected the schemes of Law, which were afterwards too fatally adopted, and hurled the whole kingdom into ruin and despondency. The machinations of enemies were however too powerful against integrity of conduct, and Aguesseau was twice obliged to resign the seals, and retire in disgrace to his seat of Fresnes, and twice again he was solicited by the regent to resume a situation which he adorned and dignified. The wishes nearest to his heart were, to be useful to his country, to maintain her liberties, and not to accumulate wealth by oppression or dishonorable measures. On the tribunal his moderation and his equity were ever apparent, and in his retirement at Fresnes, where, as he says, he passed the fairest days of his life, the chancellor of France was employed in the education of his children, in literary pursuits, and often amused himself in digging the ground. Temperance and cheerfulness added to the pleasures of science, and contributed to the health of the body and vigor of the mind, and till his eightieth year he enjoyed a robust constitution. At this advanced age infirmities came upon him, he resigned the office of chancellor, and died soon after, on the ninth of February, 1751. D'Aguesseau was humane and religious from his childhood; he never spent a day without reading the scriptures, which he called the balm of his life. From the vast conceptions of his genius France derived new regulations, which tended to strengthen the liberties of the subject, check the rapacity of the nobles, and unite the whole kingdom in paying reverence to the laws, which he wished to see administered with impartiality and without unnecessary delay. His memory was quick and retentive, and besides a perfect knowledge of the dead languages, he spoke with ease the Arabic, Portuguese, English, Italian, and Spanish. His works have been published in nine vols. 4to.

AGUI, a king of Bantam in Java, at the end of the seventeenth century, who, after succeeding to the throne on the resignation of his father Agouin, extended his power by means of the Dutch, and imprisoned the old monarch, who wished to check the career of his ambition.

AGUILLON, Francis, a mathematician and linguist of Brussels, who published a treatise on optics, and another on spheric projections, and died, 1617, at Seville, in his fiftieth year.

AGUIRRE, Joseph, a learned Benedictine, a native of Spain, who was raised to the rank of Cardinal by Innocent XI. His writings were on theological subjects, besides a collection of the councils of Spain, six vols. fol. He died at Rome, 1699, in his sixty-ninth year.

AHLWARDT, Peter, a native of Griefswalde in Germany, who, though but the son of a shoemaker, rose by his abilities, and became an eminent professor of logic and metaphysics. He wrote some treatises on the human understanding, on the immortality of the soul, and thoughts on thunder and lightning, and died 1791, aged eighty-one.

AHMED KHAN, son of Hulagu, succeeded his brother Abaka on the throne of the Moguls, and was the first emperor who embraced the Mahometan religion. This change, so displeasing to his family, excited an insurrection against him, which proved victorious, and in dooming him to death placed his nephew Argoun on his throne, 1284.

AIGNAN, Stephen, a member of the French Academy, was born in 1773, at Beaugency sur Loire. He adopted the principles of the revolution, and when only nineteen, held a legal situation in the district of Orleans. Subsequently he filled various offices under Napoleon. He is the author of several dramas and poems, and of a translation of the Iliad. He also translated the vicar of Wakefield, and other works from the English. He died in 1824.

AJALA, Martin Perez d', a native of Carthagena, who, though of obscure birth, distinguished himself by his abilities, and served Charles V. at the council of Trent. He was promoted to two bishoprics, and was at last made archbishop of Valencia, where he died, universally respected, 1566, in his sixty-second year. He wrote a Latin treatise in ten books on apostolic traditions.

AIDAN, bishop of Lindisfarne or Holy Island in Northumberland, was a prelate, humane, mild, and benevolent, who by his exemplary zeal converted many of the northern heathens of Britain to Christianity. He died 651.

AIKIN, John, M. D., was born at Kibworth, in Leicestershire, in 1747, educated at Warrington and Edinburgh, and took his degree at Leyden, in 1784. He first settled as a surgeon at Chester, whence he removed to Warrington. It was at the latter place that he commenced his career as an author, by publishing, in conjunction with his sister, the celebrated Mrs. Barbauld, a volume of Miscellanies. After having taken his degree, he fixed his residence at Yarmouth, where he remained for some years. He then removed to the metropolis, in which, or its vicinity, he continued till his decease. He died in December, 1822, at Stoke Newington. Dr. Aikin was a man of erudition and an elegant writer. Besides producing a Life of Huet, a Medical Biography, and other original works, he edited the first twenty volumes of the Monthly Magazine; the Atheneum; and various other editions of poets; and was one of the writers of a General Biographical Dictionary, in ten volumes, 4to.

AIKMAN, William, son of an advocate of Scotland of the same name, was brought up to the profession of his father. A natural bias for the arts, however, prevailed upon the son to relinquish the honors of the Scotch bar for distinction in the cultivation of painting; and an absence of five years in visiting Italy and Constantinople and Smyrna, served to improve and adorn his mind, and enlarge and correct his taste. As his fortune was independent he did not court the patronage of the great by flattery, and to his merit alone he was indebted for the esteem of John duke of Argyle, and of the earl of Burlington, and for the affectionate friendship of Allan Ramsay, Thomson, Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, Gay, Somerville, and the other wits of the age. His genius was exerted in portrait painting, and many of those who then shone in rank and fashion will receive more celebrity from his pencil, than from the possession of beauty destroyed by incontinence, and of riches wasted in riot and effeminacy. A picture of the royal family of England, now in possession of the duke of Devonshire, and several portraits of the earl of Buckinghamshire's family, were among the last of his pieces. He died in Leicester Field, 1731, the seventh of June, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

AILLY, Peter d', born of an obscure family, rose by his merit to the highest honors in the service of Charles VI., and was made chancellor of the university of Paris, and afterwards bishop of Puy and Cambay. His eloquence was exerted to heal the wounds which existed in the Romish church, though he presided over the council of Constance, and shared their guilt when they condemned John Huss to the flames. He was rewarded by John XXIII. with a cardinal's hat, and the office of legate to the holy see. He died the 8th of August, 1419. His works on theological subjects were published at Strasburg.

AILRED, Ethelred, or Eabred, abbot of Revesby, Lincoushire, was born in the year 1109, and educated in Scotland. He was fond of study, and refused ecclesiastical preferment. Several of his historical labors in Latin remain — “A History of the War of the Standard in the reign of King Stephen” — “A Genealogy of English Kings” — “A History of the Life and Morals of Edward the Confessor” — and “A History of the Nun of Waltham,” are to be found in Twisden’s “Deum Scriptores,” London, 1652.

AINSWORTH, Henry, a nonconformist, known for his learning and for the commentaries which he wrote on the holy scriptures. As he embraced the tenets of the Brownists, he shared their persecutions and fled to Amsterdam, where, with Johnson, he erected a church, of which he became the minister. This union however was soon productive of a quarrel: Johnson was violent, and he was banished by the congregation; and Ainsworth afterwards shared his fate, and retired to Ireland. He soon after returned to Amsterdam, where he died, as it is supposed, a violent death. He had found a diamond of great value, and he asked of the Jew to whom it belonged, no other reward but a conference with the rabbi of his synagogue, concerning the prophecies relating to the Messiah. The Jew had not interest sufficient to fulfil his wishes, and in his disappointment he caused Ainsworth to be poisoned, in the beginning of the seventeenth century. His treatises were admired for their ingenuity as well as their profound learning, and so great was his name that Dr. Hall, bishop of Exeter, wrote against him and refuted his arguments in favor of the Brownists. Dr. Lightfoot is said to have derived much assistance from his writings.

AINSWORTH, Robert, was born at Woodyale, four miles from Manchester, in September, 1660, and educated at the grammar school in Bolton, founded by Robert Lever, of which he afterwards became master for a few years. From thence he retired to London, and opened a school at Bethnal Green, at Hackney, and other places, where his pupils were numerous and respectable. His great application procured him a comfortable competence, and he some time after retired from his laborious occupation to the enjoyment of literary ease. In 1714 a plan was proposed to the booksellers for the compilation of an English and Latin dictionary, after Faber’s plan, and Ainsworth was invited to the undertaking, as his abilities were known, and his judgment mature and correct. The task, however, was soon discovered to be more difficult than was expected; his labors were suspended for some years, but at last application succeeded, and the book was published in 4to. in 1736, dedicated to Dr. Mead. The second edition was improved by Patrick, and published ten years after. The other publications by Ainsworth, were a treatise on grammar, and other small classical compositions, besides some specimens of English and Latin poetry. He died at London on the fourth of April, 1743, in his eighty-third year, and was buried, according to his desire, in Poplar church-yard, under an inscription written by himself.

AIRAULT, Peter, an advocate of Paris, born at Angers, where he also died, 1601, July 21st, in his sixty-fifth year. As a magistrate he behaved with firmness and integrity, and was deservedly called the rock of the accused. He left ten children, the eldest of whom, René, was intrusted to the Jesuits for his education, and induced to enter into the order, from which he never could extricate himself, though his father procured the interest of the king of France and of the pope. René died at la Fleche, December 18, 1644, in his seventy-seventh year. His father wrote some treatises, especially on the power of fathers, &c.

AIRAY, Henry, a native of Westmoreland, patronised by Bernard Gilpin, who was named the northern apostle. He became member of St. Edmund Hall, and afterwards of Queen’s, Oxford, of which he was elected provost, 1598. He was vice chancellor of the university, and published some tracts and sermons. He died 10th of October, 1616, aged fifty-seven, and was buried in the college chapel. He was a strict Calvinist, and was author of some theological pieces.

AITON, William, a native of Lanarkshire, first recommended by the friendship of Philip Miller, and known as a botanist and gardener in the royal gardens at Kew, to which he was appointed 1759. The high patronage which he received was due to his merit and taste, for, under his attentive eye and directing hand, Kew soon exhibited the most curious and valuable plants, collected from every part of the world by the munificence of his patron. He published, in 1789, an useful catalogue of the plants of the gardens, called Hortus Kewensis, and died of that dreadful distemper a scirrhus liver, Feb. 1st, 1793, after enjoying the friendship and esteem of men of rank, of virtue, and literary eminence. The king appointed his son successor in the care of the gardens. The private character of Mr. Aiton was highly estimable for mildness, benevolence, piety, and every domestic and social virtue.

AITZEMA, Leovan, a noble of Dorcum in Friesland, employed as representative of the Hanseatic towns at the Hague. He wrote in Dutch, in seven volumes fol., a history of the United Provinces—and a history of the peace of Munster, valuable for the public acts and authentic records which it contains, but otherwise inelegant and injudicious. The work was continued by other hands to 1692. He died at the Hague, 1669, in his sixty-ninth year.

AKAKIA, Martin, a native of Chalons, professor of medicine at Paris. He was surnamed Harmless, which he altered to the Greek word Akakia. He published translations of Galen’s writings, and died 1551. His son of the same name was physician to Henry III. He wrote medical treatises de morbis mulieribus — consilia medica, &c. and died, 1588, in his eighty-ninth year. There were other persons of the family who gained distinctions by their talents in various professions.

AKBAR, a sultan of the Moguls, after his father Hemayun, 1556. He enlarged his dominions by the conquest of Bengal, Cashmere, and Scindi, and showed himself a wise and powerful monarch. Selim his son rebelled against him and was pardoned. He died by ignorantly taking poison which he had prepared for the destruction of a courtier who had lost his favor.

AKENSIDE, Mark, M. D., son of a butcher of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, was educated in his native town, and at the age of eighteen went to Edinburgh to study divinity, to qualify him for becoming a dissenting minister. Preferring, however, the medical profession, he went to Leyden, where, in 1744, he took his doctor’s degree. His genius unfolded itself early, and his greatest work, the Pleasures of the Imagination, was published in the same year. Dodsley, to whom it was offered for sale, at a high price, seemed reluctant till he had consulted Pope, who admired the composition, and advised the bookseller not to make a niggardly offer, as it was no every-day writer. The publication was attacked by Warburton, as a note on the third book maintained, after Shaftesbury, that ridicule is the test of truth, and though defended anonymously by Dyson, Akenside had the sense or timidity to omit the objectionable passage in another edition. He published some odes afterwards, and virulently attacked lord Bath under the title of Curio, as the betrayer of his country; but the philippic was afterwards expunged. He first practised as physician at Northampton, afterwards at Hampstead, and then at London, where his friend Dyson supported his appearance by an allowance of three hundred pounds a year. His abilities began now to recommend him; he published several medical treatises, read the Gultonian lectures, and was elected fellow of the college of physicians, and physician to the queen. His hopes however were cut short by a putrid fever, which terminated his life 23d June, 1770, in his 59th year. Akenside possessed great powers of mind; his poem was published before he was twenty-three years old, and afterwards altered and revised; but so excellent was the original considered, that it is printed separately with the corrections, to show that whatever comes from the hand of a master is never devoid of elegance or dignity.

AKIBA, a learned rabbi, who quitted the obscure life of a shepherd, and at the age of forty, through his love for his master's daughter, who esteemed learned men, devoted himself to literature. He joined himself to Barchonebas the false Messiah, and was, with his son Pappus and his family, flayed alive by the Romans, 135. He was one of the first who began the compilation of the cabalistic traditions of the Jews.

ALABASTER, William, a protestant, born at Hadleigh in Suffolk, and educated at Trinity, Cambridge. He went to Cadiz with Essex, and after embracing the Catholic doctrines, returned to the English church, and was canon of St. Paul's. He wrote a Hebrew lexicon Pentaglotton, folio, and some theological tracts, besides Roxana, a Latin tragedy performed at Cambridge. He died 1640.

ALAIN, Chartier, secretary to Charles VII., of France, was born 1386. He distinguished himself by his writings, particularly his chronicle of Charles VII., valuable for the elegance of the composition, and the important and interesting details which it contains. He has been compared to Seneca for the beauty of his sentences.

ALAMANNI, Lewis, a native of Florence, who opposed the power which Julius de Medici and his partisans exercised at Florence. The conspiracy into which he had entered was discovered; one of the accomplices was punished with death, and he himself saved his life by flight. The election of Julius to the popedom by the name of Clement VII. seemed to forbid his restoration to his country; but the success of Charles V. at Rome, and the confinement of the pontiff in the castle of St. Angelo, encouraged the Florentines to break their chains; the Medici were banished, and Alamanni recalled. The leader of a party, however, is always in danger, and whilst Alamanni wished to solicit the patronage and alliance of the emperor, he became unpopular, and he again fled before the general odium of the city. His good offices, in the meantime, were not wanting to his ungrateful countrymen; but in vain, as after a few struggles the power of the Medici was reestablished. Alamanni found an asylum in the French court, and was employed as ambassador by Francis I. to the emperor. Charles V. received him with coldness, and in answer to his fulsome but eloquent address, repeated the ludicrous verses which he had written against him. Alamanni vindicated himself, and by his firmness and the dexterity of his speech he changed the emperor's displeasure into admiration and esteem. After being employed in another embassy to Genoa, he died at Amboise, 18th April, 1566, in his 66th year. His poems and other compositions in Italian are highly commended.

ALAMOS, Bathazar, a Spanish writer in the service of Anthony Perez, the secretary of state under Philip II. He shared his master's disgrace, and was imprisoned for eleven years, till his abilities were called into action by Olivarez the favorite of Philip IV. He was made counsellor of the council of the Indies, and honored with knighthood. He died in his 88th year. He published an excellent translation of Tacitus, 1614, besides aphorisms much admired, written during his confinement.

ALAN, ALLEN, ALLYN, William, a native of Rossal in Lancashire, educated at Oriel College, and made principal of St. Mary Hall in his twenty-fourth year. As he was a warm defender of the pope, he left his preferment in England on the accession of Elizabeth, and retired to the English college of Louvaine, where he supported the tenets of his religion by his writings. The intenseness of his application, however, endangered his health, and his physicians advised his return to England. There, with more zeal than prudence, he publicly avowed his principles, and attempted to make converts; but neither Lancashire, nor Oxford, nor London could long conceal the author of virulent attacks against the established religion of his country, and he fled with difficulty to Douay. Here preferments were heaped upon him by the Guises, as he was considered the champion and martyr of the catholic cause, and he was soon after raised to the dignity of cardinal, and the archbishopric of Mechlin. His resentment kept pace with his elevation; in 1586 he published a book to explain the pope's bull, for the excommunication of Elizabeth, and to excite the people of England to revolt against their lawful sovereign, and espouse the cause of Philip of Spain, and of the invading catholics; and several thousand copies of this unnatural composition were sent on board the Armada, but were happily destroyed with the projects of the tyrant. Elizabeth indeed complained of the indignity, by Dr. Dale sent as ambassador to the Low Countries; but the duke of Parma received the messenger with supercilious indifference. Alan died at Rome, 26th Oct. 1594, in his sixty-third year.

ALAND, Sir John Fortescue, was descended from Sir John Fortescue, lord chancellor under Henry VI. Naturally endowed with strong powers of mind, he cultivated his understanding with successful industry, and after being honored with a degree at Oxford, and called to the bar, his abilities were further distinguished by being made solicitor to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to George I., and the next year, 1716-7, raised to the dignity of a baron of the exchequer. In his judicial capacity, he displayed integrity of heart and firmness of conduct; but his services were neglected, and either from private resentment, or the spirit of misrepresentation which too often poisons the ears of kings, he was the only judge whose patent was not renewed on the accession of George II. This apparent disgrace however was momentary; he was restored the following year to his profession, and he continued to dignify the bench and to benefit the public by his wisdom till 1746, when he resigned, and as a reward for his long and laborious services as a judge for thirty years, he was created a peer of Ireland. Sir John had assumed the surname of Aland, in compliment to the virtues of an amiable wife, of the Aland family at Waterford, and he maintained through life the dignity of character which had been so much admired in his great ancestor, and which received fresh lustre from the merits and eminent services of his descendant. He was remarkable for a small, short, flat nose, and this deformity exposed him once to the sarcasm of a barrister, whom he censured for treating his cause rather obscurely: — My lord, replied the undismayed lawyer, if you will have patience I will make it appear as plain as the nose in your lordship's face. He was born 7th of March, 1670, and died 1746.

ALARD, Francis, the son of a noble family in Brussels, a zealous convert from the Roman catholic religion, was born in that town, in the beginning of the sixteenth century. His father obliged him to enter into the Dominican order; but having privately obtained the works of Luther, he clandestinely forsook his convent, and studied divinity at Jena and Wittemberg. Destitute however of resources, he ventured to return to Brussels, and seek assistance from his father, but was discovered in the streets by his mother, a violent bigot, who denounced him to the Inquisition, and when no persuasions could induce him to recant, called for all the rigor of the law, and even offered to furnish wood to burn him. Sentence of death was accordingly pronounced; but by connivance, it is supposed, he contrived to escape, and arrived in safety at Oldenburgh, where he became almoner to the prince. He subsequently returned home to his native country, notwithstanding the persecutions of the duke of Alva, and in the end made a convert of his father. No longer safe in the Netherlands, he had a curacy given him in Holstein, where he died in 1578.

ALARIC I., a celebrated king of the Visigoths, who made war against Arcadius, and after spreading his devastations over Greece, entered Italy and laid siege to Rome. Though his retreat was repeatedly purchased with gold, he at last plundered the imperial city, 400, A. D., and extorted the heaviest contributions from the inhabitants of Italy. He died soon after at Cosenza.

ALASCO, John, a Roman Catholic bishop, uncle to the king of Poland. He became afterwards a convert to the protestant principles, and came to England under Edward VI. and took care of a Dutch congregation in London. His piety and his virtues rendered him popular, but the reign of Mary drove him to the continent, where he died, 1560. He was much esteemed by the learned of the times, and particularly by Erasmus, whose library he bought.

ALBAN, St., a native of Verulam, the protomartyr of England. He travelled in his youth to Rome, and served as a soldier in Dioclesian's army for seven years. On his return to England he renounced the Pagan religion by the advice and influence of his friend Amphibalus, a monk of Caerleon, and during the persecution of Dioclesian, he was martyred for the Christian faith, 286 or 296, or seven years later according to Usher. Nearly five hundred years after, his memory was honored by Offa king of the Mercians, who built a stately monastery over him, from which the modern town of St. Albans receives its name. In a repair of the church of St. Albans, in 1257, a tomb was opened, which, according to an inscription found therein, contained some relics of St. Alban.

ALBANI, Francis, son of a silk merchant at Bologna, forsook his father's profession for painting, in which nature had formed him to excel. He was the school-fellow and afterwards the pupil of Guido, by whom he was introduced to the Caracchis; and after he had studied amongst the monuments of Rome for some years he returned to Bologna. Albani particularly excelled in expressing the delineation of female and infantine beauty; in his imitation of men he was less fortunate; but into every thing which he drew he transfused the happiness and serenity of his disposition, and all the mild virtues of an amiable character. He died in his eighty-second year, October 4, 1660, and the whole city of Bologna testified their grief for the loss of a man who during life had been honored with the esteem not only of the most eminent of his fellow citizens but even of monarchs. Charles I. of England was one of those who invited him to his dominions. His pieces are highly esteemed, and are dispersed in the cabinets of Europe. His brother, John Baptist, was his pupil, and excelled as a landscape painter. He died 1668.

ALBANI, Alexander, a Roman cardinal, who died 2d December, 1779, aged eighty-seven. He was a man of great merit, well acquainted with the records and monuments of antiquity, and a liberal patron of men of letters. His house, known by the name of the Villa Albani, was famous for beautiful statues and other treasures of the fine arts. This prelate was librarian to the Vatican, and is author of some literary and political works which possess reputation.

ALBANI, John Francis, also cardinal and nephew and heir of the subject of the preceding article. He distinguished himself by his opposition to the suppression of the Jesuits, and to all concession on the part of the papacy, in favor of temporal innovation. In other respects he was chiefly distinguished by his taste for the fine arts and patronage of its professors. He also increased the valuable library of his uncle from twenty-five to thirty thousand volumes; and, in 1793, it was computed that the Villa Albani contained nearly two hundred thousand works of art and specimens of antiquity, all of which were dispersed or carried away when the French entered Rome. He died in 1803.

ALBANY, John duke of, a Scotch nobleman in the service of Francis I. king of France. He was intrusted by that monarch with an army of ten thousand men to attack Naples, but the fatal battle of Pavia obliged him to return to France, where he died, 1536.

ALBATEGNIUS, an Arabian astronomer, who died 929. He wrote a treatise on the knowledge and the obliquity of the zodiac of the stars, printed 4to. at Nuremberg, 1537, and at Bologna, 1545.

ALBEMARLE, Anne Clarges dutchess of, daughter of a blacksmith, was brought up as a milliner, and retained the vulgarity of her manners in her highest elevation. She was first the mistress of General Monk when confined in the tower, and afterwards his wife; but so clear was her understanding, that she was often consulted in the greatest emergencies; and there is little doubt, but that by favor and bribery, she filled up the list of privy counsellors which was presented to the second Charles on his landing. Her animosity was so great against Clarendon that she prevailed upon her husband to join in the ruin of his former friend; and as the virulence of her temper was unbounded, the general was often forced to comply under her threats, as he dreaded her invectives more than the cannon's mouth.

ALBEMARLE, Keppel Lord, a native of Guelders, one of the favorites of William III., by whom he was raised to an earldom. In the last of queen Anne's wars he was made commander of the Dutch forces, and was defeated by marshal Villars at Denian, 1712, and made prisoner. He died six years after.

ALBERGATI, Capacelli Marquis, a native of Bologna, who devoted the first years of his life to dissipation and licentiousness, and at the age of thirty-four began to make amends for ill spent hours, by the severest application to literary pursuits. Nature had endowed him with great talents, and the knowledge of the world had enriched his mind with salutary reflections, so that at the age of forty he burst upon the public not only as a dramatist, elegant, correct, and sublime, but as an actor lively, interesting, and judicious. Honored with the appellation of the Garriek of Italy, he displayed his abilities with effect, and acquired deserved reputation by the wit and facetiousness of his compositions. He died 1802. His works were published together, 1783, in 12 vols. 8vo.

ALBERGOTTI, Francis, an ancient civilian, born at Arezzo, where he practised till his removal to Florence. At Florence he was raised to the honor of nobility, and deserved for his abilities the name of "the teacher of solid truth." His treatises on the Digest and the Code were much read in his time, but are now little known. He died at Florence, 1376.

ALBERONI, Julius, cardinal, and minister of the King of Spain, was the son of a gardener. He was born in 1664, at Firenzuola, a village of Parma, and educated for the church. His first office was that of bell-ringer in the cathedral of Piacenza. He had risen to the dignity of canon, when the poet Campistron, the favorite of the duke of Vendome, was plundered in his way to Rome, and in his distress he found a hospitable asylum in the house of the new ecclesiastic, who supplied him with clothes and money for his journey. The kindness was not forgotten; Campistron mentioned the generous treatment to the duke, and Alberoni soon after gained his protection and confidence. He accompanied his patron to the army in Spain, where in the capacity of Secretary, his abilities were employed to negotiate between the duke and the prince of Ursino, whose wit and whose intrigues had gained an ascendancy over the Spanish monarch. He behaved with such dexterity, that he became the favorite of the princess; and to appear with greater dignity he assumed the character of agent of the duke of Parma to the court of Madrid, and employed his influence to fix a daughter of that house on the throne of Spain. Alberoni used all possible despatch in this delicate affair; the treaty was signed, and Philip V. received his new queen. The fortune of Alberoni was now made; for this princess, who obtained great ascendancy over the King, gave him all her confidence, and enabled him to become prime minister and grandee of Spain. His abilities deserved the honors he held; he gave vigor to the nation, and in a little time infused such a spirit of activity and enterprise into the indolent Spaniards, that after a lethargic repose of a century they rose to the hardihood and heroic deeds of their forefathers. Madrid became the centre of negotiation, and of intrigue, and the gigantic mind of the cardinal formed the design of seizing Sardinia and Sicily, of replacing the pretender on the English throne by the hands of Charles XII. and the czar of Russia, whilst in the east the Turks were to arm against Germany, whose sceptre in Italy was to be broken, whilst the duke of Orleans was to be deprived of the regency of France. These vast projects however were defeated by the arts of Orleans, who with George I. declared war against Spain, 1719, and made it one of the conditions of peace, that the cardinal should be banished from the court. Alberoni yielded to the storm, and retired to Italy, where he was basely accused of intrigues and correspondence with the infidel Turks, and confined for one year. He however still retained some share of influence at Madrid; but he died at Placentia, 26th June, 1752, in his eighty-ninth year, with the character of a great and ambitious statesman.

ALBERT I., son of the emperor Rodolphus, was chosen emperor of Germany, after the defeat of his competitor, Adolphus of Nassau. He was frequently guilty of injustice in his attempts to extend the power of his family, and to his oppressions the Swiss were indebted for the assertion of their independence. He was killed by his own nephew, John duke of Swabia, 1308, leaving five sons and six daughters.

ALBERT, archduke of Austria, sixth son of the emperor Maximilian, was at first a cardinal and archbishop of Toledo; but in 1583 he was made governor of Portugal, and sometime after governor of the Low Countries. He here distinguished himself by the reduction of Calais, Ardes, and other towns; and afterwards he undertook the siege of Ostend, which lasted three years, three months and three days, and which, when taken, 22d September, 1604, was only a heap of ashes, after the slaughter of more than one hundred thousand men. The archduke had resigned the purple in 1598, to marry Elizabeth daughter of Philip II. of Spain, and he obtained as her portion the sovereignty of the Netherlands. He made a peace with the Dutch in 1609, and the last years of his life were usefully devoted to the happiness of his people, and to the encouragement of the arts. He died 1621, in his sixty-second year.

ALBERT, Charles d', duke of Luynes, was the descendant of a noble family of Florence who settled in France. He was much noticed by Henry IV., and rose by degrees from inferior offices to be the favorite and the counsellor of Lewis XIII. His power over the monarch was so great that the kingdom obeyed him as their sovereign; but his tyranny became so odious that, when he died of a fever in the camp of Longueville, 1621, the soldiers plundered his tent, so that there could not be found a cloth to cover the remains of the royal favorite.

ALBERT, king of Sweden, succeeded to the throne on the deposition of Magnus II. by his rebellious nobles, 1363. Though for sometime he weathered the storms of opposition, he was at last taken prisoner, 1387, by Margaret queen of Norway and Denmark, who had listened to the intrigues of his disaffected barons; and though he recovered his liberty, it was to see his attempts to regain the sovereign power utterly fail, and himself an exile at Mecklenburg, where he ended his days, 1412.

ALBERT, of Brandenburg, surnamed the Alciades of Germany, was son of Casimir margrave of Culmbach, and he distinguished himself by his opposition to the views of Charles V., against whom he made war with other confederated states. A reconciliation at last was effected, but it was of short continuance, as he provoked the resentment of his late allies, even of his friend Maurice elector of Saxony, by retaining in his hands the plunder of the ecclesiastical states. A battle was fought by the rival powers, and Maurice was slain and Albert severely wounded. He was afterwards deprived of his possessions by the decree of the diet of the empire, and died 1558. To the intrepidity and maunliness of his character were united arrogance, violence, and licentiousness of manners.

ALBERT, Erasmus, a native of Frankfort, preacher to Joehim II. elector of Brandenburg. He was the pupil of Luther, and he assisted his cause by collecting the greatest absurdities of the conformities of Saint Francis with Jesus Christ, which he published in German and Latin under the name of the Alcoran of the Cordeliers. This satirical work, to which Luther wrote a preface, highly promoted the cause of the reformation. Albert was at Magdeburg during its siege, and died at New Brandenburg, 1551. The last edition of his work is that of Amsterdam, 2 vols. 12mo. 1734.

ALBERT, called the Great, was born at Lawingen in Swabia, and put on the Dominican habit after visiting Pavia, Cologne, and Paris, where he read lectures with credit and reputation. He was called to Rome by pope Alexander IV., and appointed master of the sacred palace, and afterwards raised to the archbishopric of Ratisbon. A life of ease was, however, his delight, and the crosier was soon resigned for the monastic habit. His studies were eagerly pursued in his retirement, and the great knowledge which he possessed in an age not famous for inquisitiveness or information, soon passed among the vulgar and illiterate for magic and enchantment. Albert not only labored in quest of the philosopher's stone, but he was said to have formed a human head of brass, which, like an oracle, guided all his actions. His works were voluminous, without containing much information. They were published at Lyons, 1615, in 21 vols. folio.

ALBERT, or ALBRET, Jane d', daughter of Margaret of Navarre, was married, at the age of eleven, to the duke of Cleves, but this union was annulled by the pope, and in 1548 she gave her hand to Antony duke of Vendome, and five years after gave birth to a son who became Henry IV. of France. A characteristic incident occurred on this occasion; her father, who was present at her labor, promised to deposit his will in her possession, if she would sing him a Bearnoise song, with which request she immediately complied, by singing an old popular air in her native dialect. On her delivery, the king performed his promise, by giving her a golden box, containing his will; and at the same time placing a chain of gold around her neck, he exclaimed, "These are for you; but this," taking away the infant, "is mine." In 1555 she was made queen of Navarre on her father's death, and she became zealous to promote the reformation there. She was present at Paris at the nuptials of her son with Margaret of Valois, and died there suddenly, as it is supposed, in consequence of poison, 1572, in her forty-fourth year. She had written some works which are still preserved.

ALBERTET, a mathematician and poet in the thirteenth century, whose amorous verses were perfidiously published after his death by one of his friends, to whom he had intrusted the care of committing them to the flames.

ALBERTI, Cherubino, an Italian painter and engraver of eminence, who died 1615, aged sixty-three.—Giovanni, brother of the preceding, was equally eminent in the perspective, and in historical pieces. He was born near Florence, and died 1601, aged forty-three.

ALBERTI, Dominico, a native of Venice, whose musical powers were displayed in London in the suite of the Spanish ambassador, and also at Rome, and other places on the continent. In 1737 he set to music Metastasio's Eudymion, and published other things. As a performer on the harpsichord he was particularly admired.

ALBERTI, John, a German lawyer, surnamed Widman Stadius. His knowledge of the oriental languages enabled him to abridge the Alcoran, and illustrate it with learned notes; a work which procured him the chancellorship of Austria. He also published a beautiful edition of the New Testament in Syriac, at the expense of the emperor, in which the Apocalypse was omitted and St. Peter's second epistle, Jude's, and St. James' second and third. Of this work one thousand copies were printed, half of which were kept by the emperor, and the others sent into the east.

ALBERTI, Leander, a Dominican of Bologna, who wrote some interesting works, especially a history of Italy, quarto—biographical memoirs—the history of Bologna—and that of illustrious Dominicans, &c. He died 1552, in his seventy-fourth year.

ALBERTI, Leon Baptista, a Florentine, author of a valuable work on architecture in ten books. He was well acquainted with painting and sculpture, and was employed with commendation by pope Nicholas V. in ornamenting the buildings which he erected. He died 1485.

ALBERTI-ARISTOTILE, called also Ridolfe Fioravente, a celebrated mechanic of Bologna in the sixteenth century, who is said to have removed one of the steeples of his native city, with all the bells, to the distance of thirty-five paces. He extended his fame in Hungary, where he built a remarkable bridge, and where he received the highest honors. He was also employed in erecting churches in Russia.

ALBERTINI, Francis, a Calabrian Jesuit, author of some theological works in two volumes folio, and a treatise, in which he asserts that brute animals have their guardian angels. He died 1619.

ALBERTUS, archbishop of Mentz, was known for a conspiracy which he formed against the emperor Henry V., whose favors and liberality he had repeatedly experienced. He was imprisoned for four years, but he was so popular that the inhabitants rose up in arms against the emperor and restored him to liberty. He died June 23d, 1137.

ALBERTUS, Magnus, whose epithet of great was given him for his extraordinary acquirements, was born of a noble family, at Lauingen in Swabia, either in 1193 or 1205, and studied at Pavia. After entering the Dominicans, he lectured on the philosophy of Aristotle with unprecedented success, was made, in 1254, provincial of his order in Germany, and settled at Cologne, where he died in 1280. Albertus constructed an automaton, said to be capable of moving and speaking, which was destroyed by his disciple Thomas Aquinas, who imagined it to be the work of the devil; and he performed many curious experiments, which in that age of darkness were attributed to magic. His philosophical and other compositions have been collected in twenty-one folio volumes; many of the pieces in this enormous mass are, however, erroneously ascribed to him.

ALBICUS, was made archbishop of Prague by Sigismund king of Bohemia. His partiality to John Huss, and the followers of Wickliff, have exposed him to the severe censures of the Catholics. He wrote three treatises on medicines, printed at Leipsic, 1484.

ALBINUS, in ancient history, an African, who, having entered into the Roman armies, was made governor of Britain by Commodus; after the murder of Pertinax he was elected emperor by the soldiers in Britain, amounting to about fifty thousand men; but Severus being elected by his own army, met him in Gaul with the same number, attacked and conquered him. His head was cut off by the order of Severus, and his body thrown into the Rhone.

ALBINUS, Bernard, a celebrated physician, born at Dessau in Anhalt. He studied at Leyden, and after travelling over the Low Countries and France for improvement, he was raised to a professor's chair, at Frankfort on Oder, and twenty-two years after enjoyed the same dignity at Leyden. He died 7th December, 1721, in his sixty-ninth year. He was a great favorite of the elector of Brandenburg, who gave him ecclesiastical preferment which he soon resigned. The list of his numerous medical treatises is in the Bibliothèque de M. Carrere.

ALBINUS, Bernard Sigfred, son of the preceding, was professor of medicine at Leyden, and surpassed all former masters in the knowledge of anatomy. He published three volumes folio, in 1744, 1749, and 1753, with elegant and accurate plates of the muscles, ligaments, and bones of the human body. He married in his seventy-third year a young girl, and died 1771, aged eighty-eight. His brother, Christian Bernard, who was professor at Utrecht, equally distinguished himself by his history of spiders and insects, with engravings.

ALBOIN, or ALBOVINUS, succeeded his father Audoin as king of Lombardy. From Pannonia, where he had first settled, he advanced towards Italy, and carried every thing before him, and caused himself to be proclaimed king of the country in 570, and made Pavia the capital of his new dominions. He had slain in battle Gunimond, who was king of a neighboring horde; but while he took his captive daughter for his wife, he wished to retain a monument of his victory by converting the head of her father into a drinking cup. The lady stifled her resentment for awhile; but receiving fresh provocation, by being, through her husband's orders, presented with wine in this cup, she headed a conspiracy against him, and succeeded in putting an end to his life by assassination in his own palace at Pavia, which he had rendered the capital of his dominions.

ALBORNOS, Giles Alvarez Carillo, a native of Suená, archbishop of Toledo. He resigned his preferment when raised to the rank of cardinal, and taking up arms, he reduced Italy to the obedience of the church, and recalled the pope from Avignon to Rome. When questioned about the money with which he had been supplied, he brought to the pope's palace a wagon loaded with locks, keys, and bars, and declared that the money had been expended in obtaining possession of the cities to which those belonged. This truly great man founded the splendid college of Barcelona, and retired to Viterbo, where he died 1367.

ALBRICUS, a native of London, known as a learned philosopher and physician. He studied at Oxford about 1217, and travelled for improvement. Bayle has given a catalogue of his writings, which however were never made public.

ALBUCASA, or ALBUCASSIS, an Arabian physician of the eleventh century, who wrote some valuable tracts on medicine, ornamented with cuts of surgical instruments in use at that time.

ALBUMAZAR, an Arabian physician of the ninth century, known also as an astrologer. His works—de magnis conjunctionibus, amorum, revolutionibus, ac eorum perfectionibus, appeared at Venice, 1526, octavo,—and his introducio ad astronomiam, 1489.

ALBUQUERQUE, Alfonso, a native of Lisbon, whose great genius laid the foundation of the Portuguese power in India. He was sent by Emmanuel king of Portugal, in 1503, with his brother Francis, to form an establishment in the east; and by his spirited bravery, he supported his allies, and maintained the superiority of his nation. He gained large possessions on the coast of Cochin, which was secured by strong and impregnable fortifications. His return to Europe was attended by the death of his brother, who perished in the voyage; but private sorrow gave way before public concerns, and Albuquerque in 1508, invested with new power by his sovereign, sailed back to India. In his way he plundered the coast of Arabia, and with unparalleled boldness, with a corps of only four hundred and seventy men, he undertook the siege of Ormuz, an island at the entrance of the Persian gulf, subject to a king of its own, and defended by numerous forces; and after some months' obstinate resistance, the place submitted to the conqueror, and the king in despair became tributary to Portugal. His arms were now directed against Goa, which he subdued; and his power was extended over the whole coast of Malabar, and therefore he sailed towards the east, and made the islands of Sumatra, Malacca, and the neighboring cities tributary to the Portuguese government. On his return to Goa he meditated fresh conquests, when he suddenly fell sick, and died 1515, in his sixty-third year. In him were happily united the valor of a hero, and the more amiable virtues of mildness and humanity; but this great, this illustrious character, whose genius reared the power of Portugal in the east, and whose memory was cherished even to adoration by the native Indians, felt the persecution of envy, and on his death-bed he had the mortification to learn, that the monarch whom he had so faithfully served had the ingratitude to recall him by the appointment of a successor.

ALBUQUERQUE, Blaise, son of Alfonso, was born in 1500. The merit of his father, and the regret of Emmanuel for the loss of the conqueror of the east, raised him to the first honors of the state, and to the rank of nobility. He published an account in Portuguese of his father's victories, Lisbon, 1576.

ALCIAT, Andrew, a native of Milan, who, after studying the law at Pavia and Bologna, was advanced to the professor's chair at Avignon. Francis I. knew his merit, and prevailed upon him to remove to Bourges, where his lectures on law were frequented and admired. His abilities however were too great to be lost in a distant country, and therefore the duke of Milan invited him back to his native town, and welcomed his return by the grant of a large salary and the dignity of senator. These honors were not bestowed in vain; Alciat labored with indefatigable zeal in the service of science, and at Pavia, at Bologna, and afterwards at Ferrara, his lectures were delivered to crowded and applauding auditors. The emperor raised him to the rank of count palatine and senator, and Philip king of Spain gave him a gold chain as a mark of his favor. He died at Pavia, 12th January, 1550, in his fifty-eighth year. It was his intention with his immense wealth, to found and endow a college; but the insolence of some students to his person irritated him, and he adopted for his heir his distant relation Francis Alciat. His publications were chiefly on law, besides notes on Tacitus, and some emblems which have been justly commended for their elegance, purity, and the flow of genius which they display. He was succeeded in his professional chair at Pavia, by his heir, whose law lectures were equally learned and equally admired. Francis was recommended to the patronage of pope Pius IV. by his pupil cardinal Barromeo, and he was raised to a bishopric, the chancellorship of Rome, and the dignity of cardinal. He died at Rome, April, 1580, in his fiftieth year.

ALCIBIADES, an illustrious Athenian, disciple of Socrates. He for awhile enjoyed popularity, and afterwards felt the oppressive hatred of his fickle countrymen, and was at last assassinated in Persia, about 404 B. C. in his forty-sixth year.

ALCIMUS, called also Jachim, was made high-priest of Judea by Antiochus Eupator. He rendered himself unpopular by his oppression and avarice, and died two or three years after his elevation, about 165 B. C.

ALCOCK, John, an English divine, born at Beverley, and raised in 1471 to the See of Rochester, and afterwards translated to Worcester and Ely. His great learning recommended him to the king's favor, by whom he was appointed president of Wales, and chancellor of England. He was the founder of Jesus College, Cambridge. He wrote several theological tracts, and died 1st Oct., 1500.

ALCUINUS, or ALBINUS, Flaccus, a native of Yorkshire, educated by venerable Bede and Egbert archbishop of York. He was made abbot of Canterbury, and afterwards passed to the continent on the invitation of Charlemagne, whose favors he experienced, and whose confidence and friendship he fully enjoyed. He instructed his royal patron in rhetoric, logic, divinity, and mathematics, and labored to diffuse through Europe the learning and the genius which he so eminently possessed. With difficulty he obtained permission from the fondness of the emperor to retire from court, to the abbey of St. Martin at Tours, where he devoted the rest of his life to study, and the duties of religion. He died on Whitsunday, 804, and was buried at Tours, and a Latin epitaph of twenty-four verses of his own composition was placed on his grave. His writings, most of which are extant, are numerous; his style is elegant and sprightly, and his language sufficiently pure for the age; and he may be considered as one of the learned few, whose genius dissipated the gloom of the eighth century. Andrew du Chesne published his works in one volume folio, 1617.

ALCYONIUS, Peter, an Italian, for some time corrector of the press for Aldus Manutius, and author of some learned publications. He translated some of Aristotle's treatises, and was severely censured by Sepulveda for inaccuracy. In his work on banishment he displayed such a mixture of elegant and barbarous words, that he was suspected of largely borrowing from Cicero's treatise de Gloria; and it is said that to avoid detection of this illiberal deed, he burnt the only extant manuscript of Cicero, which had been given by Bernard to the library of a nunnery, of which Alcyonius was physician. At Florence he was promoted to a professor's chair, but the ambition of rising to higher eminence drew him to Rome, where he lost all his property, during the insurrection of the Columnas. When the imperial troops took the city, 1527, he espoused the cause of the pope, and though wounded he joined him in the castle of St. Angelo, and afterwards in bold and elegant language he arraigned, in two orations, the injustice of Charles V. and the barbarity of his soldiers. Alcyonius has been in some instances highly applauded for his many accomplishments, though his vanity, self-conceit, and abusive language, have tarnished his private character.

ALDANA, Bernard, a Spaniard, governor of Lippa, on the confines of Turkey, which, in a fit of panic, he set on fire, 1552. He was pardoned for his cowardice by the interference of Mary queen of Bohemia, and afterwards behaved with great valor at Tripoli.

ALDEROTI, Thadeus, a Florentine, known for his great abilities as a physician. He set so high a value upon his skill, that only princes and prelates could be admitted as his patients. He died 1295, aged eighty. His life has been written by Villani.

ALDHÉLM, or ADELM, Saint, an English divine during the heptarchy. He was related to the king of the West Saxons, by whom he was raised to the bishopric of Shireburn, over the counties of Devon, Cornwall, Dorset, and Wilts. He travelled in France and Italy, and he is said to be the first Englishman who ever wrote in Latin, and introduced poetry into the island. He led a most exemplary life; and in those times of barbarism and ignorance, he often gained auditors by stopping on the bridges and in the highways, and commanding their attention to his religious discourses by mixing ballads and songs to grave and serious exhortations. He died May 25th, 709.

ALDHUN, a bishop of Holy Island, who left his habitation because infested by the Danes, and retired with the body of St. Cuthbert to Durham, where he became the first bishop of that See. He built the cathedral, and died 1018.

ALDRED, abbot of Tavistock, and afterwards bishop of Worcester, 1046. He was a great favorite of Edward the confessor, and his influence produced a reconciliation between that monarch and Griffith king of Wales, and also with Swaine son of Godwin, who had invaded the kingdom. He was the first English bishop who visited Jerusalem, and after his return he was raised to the See of York; an elevation which, when he appeared at Rome, the pope refused to ratify, on account of his ignorance and simony. Aldred's solicitations however prevailed, and he received the pallium from the pontiff. On the death of Edward he crowned Harold, and afterwards the conqueror, whose esteem he enjoyed, and whose power he made subservient to the views of the church. When he had received some indignities from a governor of York, he flew to London, and with all the indignation and haughtiness of an offended prelate, demanded vengeance, and pronounced a curse on the head of William. His wrath was with difficulty pacified by the entreaties of the sovereign and his nobles, and the curse was recalled, and changed into a blessing. It is said that he died with grief in seeing the north of England desolated by the ravages of Harold and Canute, sons of Swayne, 11th Sept. 1068.

ALDRICH, Henry, a native of Westminster, educated under Busby, and admitted at Christ Church, where he distinguished himself as a tutor. He was made D. D. and canon in 1681, and at the revolution he replaced Massey the popish dean of Christ Church. In this dignified situation he supported discipline, promoted religion, and encouraged learning. He published, with Dr. Sprat, Clarendon's history, not however without being charged by Oldmixon with improper interpolations; an accusation which Atterbury proved to be false and invidious. He was fond of music, and collected materials for the history of it, which are still preserved; but as an architect he gained deserved praise, and to his liberality as well as to his taste, Christ Church is indebted for the erection of three sides of Peckwater quadrangle, Trinity College for its elegant chapel, and the parish of All Saints for its beautiful church. Dr. Aldrich was author of a compendium of logic, and several other useful publications; but he particularly distinguished himself by editing several of the Greek classics, which generally appeared annually for the benefit of the students of his society. He also passes as the composer of those popular catches, "Hark the bonny Christ Church bells," and a smoking catch. He died Dec. 14th, 1710.

ALDROVANDUS, Ulysses, a native of Bologna, professor of physic and philosophy. His inquiries into the history of nature were so ardent that he visited the most distant countries in search of plants, minerals, metals, animals, and birds, and he spared no expense that he might procure exact figures taken from the life. It is to be lamented that so noble a spirit of liberality should have been checked; but the resources of Aldrovandus failed, and he ended his days in an hospital at Bologna, at the great age of eighty, and after surviving the loss of his sight, 1605. About six large volumes folio, containing the history of birds and insects, were published during his life, and the work was continued on the same scale after his death and under his name, as it certainly derived a high recommendation for the illustrious undertaker of the plan.

ALDRUDE, countess of Bertinoro, is celebrated in Italy for her courage and her eloquence. When Ancona was besieged by the arms of the Venetians, and of the emperor Frederic I. in 1172, she pitied the situation of the distressed inhabitants, and with heroic intrepidity flew to their relief, at the head of her dependants and friends, and supported by William Degli Adelardi, of Ferrara. Her troops were animated by her eloquence and her example, and the enemy fled at her approach; and though on her return home she was attacked by some parties of the enraged besiegers, she routed them in every encounter, and added fresh laurels to her fame. The history of that memorable siege has been published by Buon-Campagnono of Florence.

ALDUS, Manutius, a native of Bassano, illustrious as a correct printer, and as the restorer of the Greek and Latin languages to Europe. He is the inventor of the Italic letter, and was alone permitted by the pope the use of it. He died at Venice, 1516, in a good old age.

ALEANDER, Jerome, was born in a small village of Istria, and recommended himself by his great abilities and his learning to pope Alexander VI. and Lewis XII. under whose patronage he taught belles lettres at Paris. He was afterwards in the service of Leo X. at Rome, and as nuncio of the holy see he acquired great reputation by the eloquent harangue which he delivered in the diet of Worms, against the doctrines of Luther, the burning of whose books he procured, though he could not silence his preaching. On his return to Rome he was made archbishop of Brindisi by Clement VIII., and his services were again employed in Germany against the protestants, whose opinions he attacked with virulence, not however without being loaded in his turn with sarcastic reflections and invectives; but all his intrigues were unable to prevent the truce which Charles V. at last made with these persecuted men. His death in February, 1542, was occasioned by taking a medicine in which some poisonous ingredients had been mixed by mistake.

ALEANDER, Jerome, great nephew of the preceding, was born at Friuli. He distinguished himself as an antiquarian, a poet, and a lawyer, and died at Rome, 1631, in consequence of an excess of eating at the table of one of his friends. He was one of the original members of the academy of Humorists, and enjoyed the friendship of pope Urban VII., by whose means he passed from the family of the Bandini into that of the Barberini, who honored his remains with a most magnificent funeral.

ALEGAMBE, Philip, a native of Brussels, who attended the duke of Ossuna, when Spanish viceroy of Sicily, and entered into the society of the Jesuits at Palermo. After studying divinity at Rome, he retired to Gratz, where his good conduct and his abilities raised him to the professorial chair. He afterwards, as tutor to the prince of Eggenberg's son, travelled for five years through Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, and obtained offices of trust and respectability near his patron, and in the college of the Jesuits. He died at Rome of a dropsy, 6th Sept. 1652. The few books which he wrote were in high estimation.

ALEMAN, Lewis, archbishop of Arles, and a cardinal, was born at the castle of Arhent, 1390. His abilities were employed as legate to Sienna, to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to Sienna; but at the council of Basil, where he presided, his opposition to Eugenius IV. was followed by his degradation from the purple, and his excommunication. He was restored to his honors by Nicholas V. and sent as legate into Germany. He died 1450, and was canonized.

ALEMAN, Maeto, a Spaniard, born near Seville. He was nearly twenty years in the service of the court of Philip II. and then retired to privacy, and employed himself in writing the history of Guzman d'Alfarache, a romance, which has been through more than thirty editions in Spain, and has been translated into most of the languages of Europe.

ALEMAN, Matthew, author of the once popular history of "Guzman d'Alfarache, the Spanish rogue." He was born in the neighborhood of Seville, and during the reign of Philip II. was much about court. His novel, which was not composed till towards the latter period of his life, exhibits, with much humor, a curious picture of the manners and morals of the age and country in which he lived. There are few European languages into which it had not been translated.

ALEMBERT, John le Rond d', an illustrious philosopher, born at Paris, 16th Nov. 1717. He was the illegitimate son of Destouches Canon and Madame Tencin, the last of whom unfeelingly caused him to be exposed as a foundling near the church from which he was named John Le Rond. Informed of this discreditable fact, his father listened to the voice of nature, took measures for his instruction, and insured for him a suitable independency for life; and he had the satisfaction soon to learn that his abilities were brilliant, and his improvement unusually rapid. As the flashes of his genius were early displayed, he was encouraged by his friends to seek reputation and opulence in studying the law; but that pursuit as well as the study of medicine was quickly abandoned, and retirement and geometry seemed the only ambition of the young philosopher. In the house of his nurse, whose ignorance and poverty did not diminish the flow of his affections, he passed forty years, and refused to quit this humble and peaceful dwelling for the splendor of a palace. Frederic of Prussia, whose friendship he enjoyed through life, wished to invite him to Berlin, with the most liberal offers of patronage and literary ease, but he refused; and when the empress Catharine solicited him to take the care of the education of her son, with the promise of a pension of a hundred thousand livres, besides the most distinguished honors, he declined the princely offer in firm but respectful terms, and devoted the strong powers of his mind to the service of the country which gave him birth. His labors were usefully exerted on philosophical subjects. He examined the power of fluids on the motion of bodies, he wrote a discourse on the general theory of the winds, which obtained the prize medal at Berlin in 1746, he solved the problem of the procession of the equinoxes, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis; and in these and other numerous philosophical works, he enriched science with new facts, produced original ideas, and explained the various phenomena of nature in the most interesting and satisfactory point of view. Few but select were the friends to whom this great man was known; and it must be considered as not the least striking part of his character, that he who was flattered by the learned, courted by the great, and admired by princes, did not pay his adoration to power; but with a gratitude which deserves the highest encomiums, he dedicated his work to the count d'Argenson and his brother, two men who had been banished from the court, but who in their prosperity had seen and respected the philosopher, and rewarded his genius by the grant of a small pension. D'Alembert is to be considered also in a different light from that of a mathematician. Besides geometrical calculations, his mind was stored with all the powers of literature, and of a refined taste, and it has been said, with exactness and truth, that what he expressed on every subject, could by no other man have been expressed with greater elegance, more precision, or stricter propriety. To his gigantic powers, and those of Diderot and others, we are to ascribe the plan of the Encyclopedie; and he adorned this stupendous work, by writing the preliminary discourse prefixed to it, so deservedly admired for the masterly record which it unfolds, concerning the rise, progress, connexions, and affinities of all the branches of human knowledge, and the gradual improvement of the arts and sciences. Besides his contributions to the Encyclopedie, which were very large and numerous, d'Alembert published a dissertation on the fall of the Jesuits. His opuscules or memoirs, in nine volumes, contained among other things the solution of problems in astronomy, mathematics, and natural philosophy. After enjoying the highest honors in the French academy, and the friendship of the literati of the age, and the veneration of Europe, this great man died, 29th Oct. 1773, still in the full possession of all his faculties, leaving behind him a high character for learning and disinterestedness, in which however it must be confessed were united profound dissimulation, affected candor, and imposing moderation. His eulogium as an academician, and after the manner that he had honored seventy of his predecessors, has been drawn up by Condorcet, Hist. de l'Academie Roy des Sciences, 1783.

ALENIO, Julius, a Jesuit of Brescia, who went as a missionary to China, where, for thirty-six years, he preached the Christian religion and built several churches. He died August, 1649. He left several works in the Chinese language on theological subjects.

ALEOTTI, John Baptist, an Italian, who, from the mean occupation of carrying bricks and mortar to workmen, rose to eminence as an astrologer and geometrician, by the strength of his genius, and even wrote books on the subject. He was concerned in the hydrostatic controversies about the inundations so frequent at Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna. He died 1630.

ALES, Alexander, a native of Edinburgh, who warmly opposed the tenets of Luther, which he afterwards as eagerly embraced, when he had suffered persecution for his religion, and seen the firmness with which his countryman Patrick Hamilton was burnt to death by Beaton archbishop of Saint Andrews for protestantism. He came back to London from Germany, when Henry VIII. abolished the papal power in England, and he there enjoyed the friendship of Crammer, Cromwell, and Latimer. He afterwards retired to Germany, and was appointed to a professorial chair at Frankfort upon Oder, and afterwards, when persecuted by the court of Brandenburg, at Leipsic, where he died March 17th, 1565, in his sixty-fifth year. He wrote a commentary on the writings of St. John, on the epistle to Timothy, and on the Psalms.

ALEXANDER the Great, son of Philip of Macedonia, was born at Pella, 355 years B. C. After extending his power with unusual rapidity over Greece, and destroying Thebes, he invaded Asia. The defeat of the Persian forces at the three celebrated battles of the Granicus, of Isus, and of Arbelia, rendered him master of the country; and after he had laid the foundation of Alexandria in Egypt as the future capital of his extensive dominion, and after he had wandered over Asia in quest of more enemies, he returned to Babylon, where he died of intemperance, B. C. 323, in his thirty-third year. His vast empire, which his wisdom and the great energies of his mind, if not corrupted by flattery and success, might have consolidated, was divided at his death among his generals.

ALEXANDER, Severus, a Roman emperor, by birth a Phœnician. He was distinguished by great virtues in public and private life. He was cruelly murdered by his mutinous soldiers, A. D. 235, after a glorious reign of thirteen years.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Alexandria, who opposed the tenets of Arius, and displayed in his office the most exemplary piety, with every Christian virtue. He died about 325.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Jerusalem, known for his virtues and his sufferings. He was exposed to the persecutions of Severus and also of Decius, and died in prison, in consequence of ill treatment, about 251. He wrote some letters, now lost, and founded a library at Jerusalem.

ALEXANDER, Aphrodisæus, a Peripatetic philosopher, called also the commentator, in the second century. His work "de fato" appeared at London, 1688, and his commentaries on Aristotle were edited at Venice by Aldus.

ALEXANDER, the Paphlagonian, an impostor, who gained the respect of his credulous and ignorant countrymen, and thus acquired such celebrity that Marcus Aurelius himself, deceived by his artifice, honorably invited him to Rome, A. D. 174. He died at the age of seventy.

ALEXANDER succeeded his brother John Albert as king of Poland, 1501. He died five years after, aged forty-five, and left behind him the respectable character of a man of courage, virtue, piety and benevolence.

ALEXANDER I. king of Scotland, ascended the throne 1107, after his brother Edgar, and merited by his severity the appellation of "the fierce," though in private life he had been distinguished for meekness, benevolence, and moderation. He had the good fortune to suppress all the insurrections raised against his tyranny, and died 1124.

ALEXANDER II., king of Scotland, 1214, after his father William the Lion, was engaged in war with John of England, whose dominions he boldly invaded. Peace was restored to the two kingdoms in 1221, by the marriage of Alexander with the sister of Henry III. He died 1249, aged fifty-one.

ALEXANDER III., king of Scotland, son of the preceding by a second wife, succeeded his father 1249, when eight years old. He married Margaret, daughter of Henry III. He was successful in his defeat of the Norwegians, who had invaded his kingdom, and he assisted his father-in-law against his rebellious barons. He was killed in hunting, 1285, and left behind him a high character for courage, for benevolence, and magnanimity.

ALEXANDER I., bishop of Rome, 109, after Saint Evaristus, died 3d May, 119. He is mentioned as a saint and a martyr in the catholic calendar, and according to Platina, he first introduced the use of holy water in the Roman church. The epistles attributed to him are spurious.

ALEXANDER II., pope, succeeded 1061. His elevation was opposed by the imperial court, and Cadalous, bishop of Parma, was appointed, under the title of Honorius II. Alexander, however, though of dissolute manners, prevailed, and banished his rival from Rome, and then employed himself in securing his power, and in extending the papal authority over the neighboring princes. His humanity towards the Jews, whom he protected against their persecutors and murderers, is deservedly commended. He died 21st April, 1073.

ALEXANDER III., pope, was a native of Sienna, and was raised to the papal chair after Adrian IV., 1159. His election, though acknowledged by England and France, was disputed by the emperor Frederic, who caused Victor to be nominated in his room at Pavia. Alexander for awhile yielded to the storm; but after the death of Victor his imperial persecutor elected another successor, cardinal Guy, under the name of Paschal III. Alexander, who had fled into France, and who had hurled the thunders of excommunication against Frederic, and even absolved his subjects from their oaths of allegiance, now determined to maintain his cause by force, and to arm the Venetians in his favor. These bold measures might have succeeded, but Frederic either tired of the contest, or terrified by the preparations, acknowledged Alexander as the lawful pontiff, and was reconciled to him at an interview at Venice. Alexander died at Rome, 30th Aug., 1181, beloved by his subjects and respected by the world.

ALEXANDER IV., bishop of Ostia, was raised to the papal chair at the death of Innocent IV., 1254. He opposed the settlement of the emperor's natural son as king of Sicily, and bestowed the crown on Edmund, son of the king of England. He wished to re-unite the Greek and Latin churches, but did not seriously attempt it. He died at Viterbo, 25th May, 1261.

ALEXANDER V., pope, was born of mean parents at Candia near Milan. While begging his bread from door to door, an Italian monk noticed his engaging manners, and procured his admission into his order. Thus enabled to cultivate his mind, he devoted himself laboriously to study, and after distinguishing himself at Oxford and Paris, he obtained preferment by the patronage of the duke of Milan, was made bishop of Vicenza, and then archbishop of the Milanese, and raised by Innocent VII. to the purple, and named legate in Lombardy. He was elected pope at the council of Pisa, 1409, but he died the next year, 3d May, not without suspicions of poison administered by his favorite, cardinal Cossa. He was a man of great firmness, and in his character liberal and munificent.

ALEXANDER VI., pope, a native of Valencia in Spain, originally called Roderic Borgia. The elevation of his uncle Calixtus III. to the pontificate paved the way to his greatness; he was made cardinal, and afterwards archbishop of Valencia. On the death of Innocent VIII. his intrigues ensured him the papal chair, though he was then infamous for his debaucheries, and offensive to the purity of the holy conclave, as the adulterous father of four sons and one daughter, by a Roman lady of the name of Vanozia. These children followed the example of their dissolute father, and became monsters of profligacy. The two eldest, the duke of Candia and Cæsar, disputed about the incestuous favors of their sister Lucretia, and the hoary father himself is said to have increased the abomination by a horrid commerce with his own daughter.

Though thus devoted to the grossest licentiousness, Alexander found the time and the means to raise eabals, and to create intrigues in the courts of Europe, and to convert their dissensions to the advantage of the holy see, and the enriching of his favorite Cæsar. His death, which happened 8th Aug. 1503, was such as might be expected to conclude an infamous life. The great opulence of cardinal Corneto and others, were strong temptations to the avaricious pope and his profligate son Cæsar. These innocent victims were invited to a banquet, but by some mistake the poison intended for them was taken by the guilty pontiff and his son. The pope immediately expired, but Cæsar survived the accident some years to perish by the hands of an assassin. This account of the manner of his death is doubted by some. His life has been written in English by Alexander Gordon, 1729, folio, and by Burehard in Latin.

ALEXANDER VII., pope, a native of Sienna, whose name was Fabio Chigi. He gradually rose through the offices of inquisitor, legate, bishop, and cardinal, to the papal chair, 1655, on the death of Innocent X. Thus elevated by dissembled humility to the head of the church, he confirmed by a bull his predecessor's measures against the Jansenists, 1656. But while much was expected from him, he showed himself, as has been observed by a biographer, little in great things, and great in little ones. In his conduct towards men of letters he was liberal and munificent, and he embellished Rome with some splendid buildings. He died 22d May, 1667, aged 68.

ALEXANDER VIII., pope, Mark Ottoboni, was a native of Venice, and became bishop of Brescia and Frescati, and cardinal, and in 1689 succeeded to the papal chair, on the death of Innocent XI. He died two years after, 1st Feb. 1691, aged eighty-two.

ALEXANDER, ab Alexandro, a native of Naples, who applied himself to the law, but afterwards left it that he might more seriously devote his time to polite literature. He possessed genius and abilities, and his remarks on mankind are judicious and interesting. The particulars of his life are related in his Genialium Dierum, a work in the manner of Gellius' Attic nights, which was published with a learned commentary by Tiraqueau, 1587. Alexander died in the beginning of the sixteenth century.

ALEXANDER, Neckam, a native of St. Albans, who, after studying in England, France, and Italy, gave public lectures at Paris, which at that time was the most celebrated university in Europe. He returned to England, where his genius and learning recommended him to preferment. He died, 1227, abbot of Exeter. His works, which were written in elegant language for the time, have never been published, but remain in manuscript in public libraries.

ALEXANDER, Noel or Natalis, an eminent writer, born at Rouen in Normandy. For twelve years he taught philosophy at the great convent at Paris, and as a Dominican friar propagated the doctrines of his order from the pulpit, but as he did not possess in a high degree the fluency and eloquence required in a popular preacher, he afterwards devoted himself to ecclesiastical history, and was created a doctor of the Sorbonne in 1675. Colbert saw his abilities, and patronised them, by intrusting him with part of the education of his son. The life of Alexander spent in seclusion contains no particular events; his studies were laborious, and his works many. His ecclesiastical history is chiefly admired for its accuracy, moderation and fidelity. It was published in twenty-four volumes, octavo, or eight volumes folio. He bore with infinite resignation the loss of his sight in the latter part of his life, and died of a decay of nature, in his 86th year, 1724. A catalogue of his works was printed at Paris, 1716.

ALEXANDER, William, a poet and statesman of Scotland, born in 1580. Being flattered by the poets of the age, he became a regular attendant on the court, was knighted, and in 1621 received a grant of Nova Scotia, which he proposed to colonize at his own expense, and that of those who wished to embark in the enterprise. The death of James prevented the creation of baronets to the number of one hundred and fifty, who were to contribute to support the views of the favorite; though Charles I. in some degree pursued the intentions of his father by granting patents of knight baronet to the chief promoters of the settlement. The original scheme was defeated, and Sir William sold his property in Nova Scotia to the French. Sir William served Charles with fidelity as secretary for Scotland, and was created Lord Stirling. He died 12th February, 1640, in his 60th year. His poetical works appeared in one vol. fol., three years before his death.

ALEXANDER, de Medicis, first duke of Florence in 1530, was the natural son of Lorenzo de Medicis, and nephew to pope Clement VII. He owed his elevation to the arts of his uncle and the influence of Charles V., but his power, however weak, became odious by his cruelty, the debauchery of his manners, and his incontinence. He was at last murdered by his relation Lorenzo, who had gained his confidence by promising him an interview with a woman of whom he was enamored. He died in his 26th year, 1537, and the duchy passed into the hands of Cosmo de Medicis.

ALEXANDER, Farnese, duke of Parma, distinguished himself in the sixteenth century by his military valor. He was engaged in the wars of Flanders and of France, and died of a wound which he received at the siege of Rouen, 2d Dec., 1592.

ALEXANDER, Farnese, uncle to the preceding, was a cardinal, and the favorite of pope Clement VII. He was engaged in different embassies in France, Germany, and Flanders, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he lived in great splendor, the friend of the indigent, and the patron of the learned. He died 1589, aged 69.

ALEXANDER, a Norman, nephew to Roger bishop of Salisbury in the reign of Henry I., and Stephen. By the interest of his uncle he was made bishop of Lincoln, and he rebuilt his cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire, and added to its security by making the roof of stone. Like the barons in those turbulent times, he raised the castles of Babury, Sleaford, and Newark for his defence, and founded two monasteries which he liberally endowed. After visiting the pope three times on the continent, he returned to England, where he died, 1147, in the twenty-fourth year of his prelacy.

ALEXANDER, of Paris, a poet of the twelfth century, who introduced in a poem on Alexander the Great, verses of twelve syllables, which from him have been called Alexandrines.

ALEXANDER, Nicholas, a Benedictine of St. Maur, known for his charitable character, as well as his extensive knowledge of simples. He is author of two useful works, "Physic and Surgery for the poor," published 1738, and a "Botanical and Pharmaceutical Dictionary," octavo. He was born at Paris, and died at St. Denys, 1728, in an advanced age.

ALEXANDER, Neuskoi, grand duke of Russia, born 1218, signalized himself by a victory which he obtained over the northern powers on the banks of the Neva. His military and political character, which procured him the title of saint, was, five centuries after, more highly honored by the policy of Peter the Great. The spot where the victory had been won was consecrated for a monastery, where the bones of the saint were deposited with religious pomp, and which is become the mausoleum of the sovereigns of Russia. There is an order of knighthood instituted in honor of the saint, which consists now of about one hundred and thirty-five knights.

ALEXANDER, William, a major-general in the American army of the revolution. He was born in New York, 1726; received a classical education; and was distinguished for his knowledge of mathematics and astronomy. His father was a native of Scotland, and he was the reputed rightful heir to an earldom in that country; on which account he was usually called lord Stirling; but was unsuccessful in his efforts to obtain from the government the acknowledgment of his claim. At the commencement of the revolution he joined the American army, and in the battle on Long Island, August 27, 1776, was taken prisoner, after having, by attacking Cornwallis, secured to a large part of the detachment an opportunity to escape. He was always warmly attached to General Washington, and the cause which he had espoused. He died at Albany, Jan. 15, 1783, aged 57 years, leaving behind him a reputation of a brave, discerning and intrepid officer, and an honest and learned man.

ALEXANDER, William, an able artist, born at Maidstone, 1768. His father, who was a coach-maker, gave him a good education, and sent him at an early age to study the fine arts in London, which he did with so much success, that he was selected to accompany the embassy of lord Macartney to China. On his return, besides his drawings in illustration of the work of Sir George Staunton, he published a splendid one of his own, entitled, "The Costume of China," which obtained so much notice that he was induced to publish a second part. At the time of his death, in 1816, he was keeper of the antiquities at the British Museum.

ALEXANDER, James, a native of Scotland, who came to New York, in 1715. He was bred to the law, and became eminent in his profession. By honest practice and unwearied application to business he acquired a great estate. For many years he was a member of the legislature, and of the council. In 1721, he was appointed attorney-general; and afterwards was secretary of the province. His death took place in the beginning of 1756.

ALEXANDER, Nathaniel, a governor of North Carolina. He received his collegiate education at Princeton, N. J., obtained his first degree in 1776, and afterwards studied medicine. Subsequently he entered the army; but at the close of the war pursued his profession in the state of which he became the chief magistrate in 1806. In all his public stations he had the reputation of conducting with ability and firmness. He died, March 8, 1808, aged 52 years.

ALEXANDER, Caleb, D. D. was born in Northfield, Mass., and graduated at Yale College in 1777. He was first settled, as a congregational minister at New Marlborough; and, afterwards, at Mendon, in his native state. His continuance in each of these situations was less than two years. The remaining part of his life was spent in teaching, and in other kindred pursuits. He published a Latin Grammar, an English Grammar, and some other small works. His death took place in April, 1828.

ALEXANDER II., emperor and autocrat of all the Russias and king of Poland, was born Dec. 22, 1777, and in 1801, on the death of his father, Paul, ascended the throne. Nature had endowed this monarch with great talents, which were well cultivated by a course of early instruction; and, the circumstances of the age, in which he came before the public, were favorable to an exertion of them calculated to give their possessor a prominence, not often found among the most distinguished princes in ancient or modern times. During the first four years of his reign his attention was wholly confined to his own dominions; but, from 1805 to 1815, his name and his influence were connected with all the most important political transactions of Europe. In the year 1805, Alexander united with the emperor of Austria against France. This coalition, however, was of short continuance; it was broken up, in consequence of the success of Napoleon at Austerlitz. In the following year he joined with Prussia; but, in 1807, after having been defeated at Friedland, he signed, at Tilsit, a peace with the French emperor, very soon after which he became one of his closest allies. The interval between 1807 and 1812, was filled up with the seizure of Finland, and a war against Turkey. In the latter year hostilities were again commenced between France and Russia, and were actively continued till the downfall of Napoleon. During the campaigns of 1813 and 1814, Alexander bore a share in the dangers of the field. On the conclusion of peace, he visited England. As a reward of his military assistance, Poland was erected into a kingdom by the congress of Vienna, and he was crowned in 1815. He died at Taganrok, in November, 1825.

ALEXANDRINI, Julius de Neustain, a native of Trent, physician and favorite of Maximilian II. He died 1590, in his 84th year. He was author of some medical treatises in prose and verse, which display his genius, sense, and erudition. He was the first who endeavored to show the connexion between the passions of the mind and the diseases of the body.

ALEXIS, a Piedmontese, who applied himself to study, but with the determination of not revealing the discoveries he might make in philosophy. After fifty-seven years of travels, he saw a poor man die of a disorder which might have been removed, if he had imparted his knowledge to the surgeon, and with such remorse was he visited, that he retired from the world, and set in order for the benefit of mankind, the result of his researches, which were afterwards published under the name of his secrets, at Basil, 1536, and dispersed through Europe.

ALEXIS DEL ARCO, a Spanish painter, known also under the name of el Sordillo de Pereda, because he was deaf and dumb, and the pupil of Pereda. He was born at Madrid, in 1621, and in spite of his natural defects, acquired considerable reputation, especially in portraits. His drawings and coloring are good. Alexis died at Madrid, in 1700.

ALEXIUS, Michaelovitch, son of Michael, Czar of Russia, succeeded to the throne at the age of sixteen, and distinguished himself by his wars against the Turks, the Swedes, and Poles. Respected abroad, he was beloved at home, as the improvement of his barbarian subjects was the sole wish of his heart. The laws of the empire were printed for public information, and no longer trusted to the incorrectness of manuscripts; commerce was encouraged, and manufactures of silk and linen were introduced; and the munificence of the emperor was supported by economy, and by the prosperity of the state. Alexius died in his 46th year, 1677, and was succeeded by his son the famous Czar Peter.

ALEXIUS, Petrovitch, only son of Peter the Great and Endocia Lapukin, was born 1690. His early youth was neglected in the hands of women, and of ignorant priests; but when in his eleventh year, he was intrusted to the care of baron Huysen, the instructions of this able and meritorious man were counteracted by the intrigues and infernal policy of Mentshikof, one of the Czar's ministers. The young prince, permitted to indulge every passion by the example and encouragement of the meanest and most debauched of the vulgar, who were his constant associates, grew unprincipled and vicious, and soon converted the contempt he felt for restraint upon the conduct and the character of his father. This mutual hatred between the Czar and his son was fomented by the arts of enemies, and at last Alexius renounced all his rights to the succession, that he might spend in the retirement of a convent the remains of a life already shortened by drunkenness and intemperance. Persecution however attended him; though protected by the emperor of Germany, he was betrayed by his Finlandish mistress, whom he is said to have married, and conveyed to Petersburg, where he was tried by secret judges, and condemned to death, 1719. This cruel unfeeling conduct of the father, which not all the imprudences and provocations of a licentious son could justify, has been palliated by his panegyrists, who attribute the death of the prince to an apoplectic fit, brought on by his violent irregularities.

ALEXIUS or ALEXIS I., Comnenus, born at Constantinople, 1048, was nephew to the emperor Isaac Comnenus. He usurped the throne in 1081, after banishing Nicephorus, and distinguished himself by his wars against the Turks and other northern invaders. He received with coldness the crusaders; but, intimidated by their numbers and consequence, he signed a treaty of peace with them, and promised them support. He died in his 70th year, 1118. His daughter Anna Comnena, has written a Greek account of his reign; but her history is a panegyric on the virtues of her father, and not the record of truth.

ALEXIUS II., Comnenus, succeeded his father Michael on the throne of Constantinople, 1180, in his twelfth year. His tender age was the cause of dissension and tumult, and he was murdered with his mother Mary two years after by Andronicus, who usurped the throne.

ALEXIUS III., Angelus, dethroned his brother Isaac Angelus, 1195, and put out his eyes. An effeminate life rendered him despised at home and abroad; he was defeated by the Turks and Bulgarians, and his capital was soon besieged and taken, 1203, by an army of Venetians and French crusaders; headed by Alexius the son of the deposed monarch, who had fled to the court of Vienna. Alexius received from Theodore Lascaris the same cruel punishment which he had inflicted on his brother, and the young conqueror placed his blind father from the dungeon on the throne, and reigned with him as Alexius IV.; but his elevation was succeeded by a rebellion, because he wished to raise great contributions upon his subjects, and his life was sacrificed to the fury of the people, 1204.

ALEXIUS V., Ducas Murtzuphle or Mourzoufle, from his black eyebrows, an officer at the court of Isaac Angelus and Alexius IV., who dethroned and murdered his master, and usurped the throne of Constantinople. He was attacked by the crusaders, who took his capital, and after putting out his eyes threw him down from the top of Theodosius' pillar, one hundred and forty-seven feet high, and killed him, 1264, after a reign of only three months, of extortion, arrogance, and cruelty. The conquerors elected two emperors; Baldwin was appointed by the Latins, and Theodore Lascaris by the Greeks.

AL-FARABIA, a musliman philosopher in the tenth century, remarkable for the generality and greatness of his talents. He was killed by robbers in Syria, in 954. His works on various subjects are said to be in the Leyden library.

ALFIERI, Victor, the most eminent of Italian tragic poets, was born at Asti in Piedmont, in 1749. His family was rich and noble. In his early youth he gave no promise of that talent which he finally displayed; he learned little or nothing, and the violence of his temper was a bar to his obtaining esteem. At the age of sixteen, he became his own master, and the seven succeeding years were spent in travelling, as fast as horses could carry him, over the greatest part of Europe, and in adventures which were marked only by dissipation and licentiousness. After his return to Turin, love inspired him with the spirit of poetry; and, in 1775, he produced his tragedy of Cleopatra, and a burlesque upon it. Thenceforth he continued constant to the muses and to study; and the result was no less than fourteen dramas in seven years, besides many compositions in verse and prose. He mastered Latin, French, and other languages, of which till then he had been utterly ignorant; and, even at the late age of forty-eight began Greek, and acquired such a knowledge of it as to translate several works. In France, where he next settled with the Pretender's widow the countess of Albany, whom he married, he composed five more tragedies. The fall of the throne, in 1792, drove him from France; his property there was unjustly confiscated; and Alfieri ever after entertained a deadly hatred of that country. Worn out by his incessant literary labors, he died at Florence, in 1803. In the following year came forth his posthumous works, in thirteen volumes, two of which are occupied by his autobiography. As a tragic writer, Alfieri has had many imitators in Italy, but his throne is still unshared by any rival—no one has yet equalled him in nervous dialogue, in grandeur of style, or in the delineation of strong passions and energetic characters.

ALFRED, the Great, fifth and youngest son of Ethelwolf, king of the west Saxons, was born at Wantage in Berkshire, 849. After the death of his brother, Alfred mounted the throne of England, in his twenty-second year, in 871, at a time when the kingdom was a prey to domestic dissensions, and to the invasion of the Danes. His valor was soon called into the field, battles were followed by battles: but the slaughter of thousands seemed not to heal the wounds of the country or to remove the rapacious foe from the coasts. After a dreadful overthrow Alfred concealed his misfortunes for a year, under the dress of a peasant, till the success of one of his chiefs, Odo the earl of Devon, in defeating a body of the Danes, drew him from his retirement. With unusual boldness he examined the false security of the enemy's camp, he was admitted into the presence of the chief under the disguise of a harper, and returned to his friends to inspire them with courage and lead them to victory. The Danes were totally routed at Eddington. From that period the kingdom became more settled, and though the Danes occasionally repeated their predatory attacks, the mind of Alfred was not shaken from its noble purpose of enlightening his subjects, and giving stability to their independence, and protection to their property. He published laws to the number of fifty-one, which were partly collected from those of his predecessor king Ina, and from the Trojan and Grecian codes. He not only divided his dominions into counties, and other smaller subdivisions, but he made each householder responsible for the behaviour of his family, and as the tythings consisted of ten families, each became a pledge for the peaceful conduct of the rest, so that the whole kingdom was but a large family eager to preserve the public security, while they ensured domestic concord. As a man of letters, Alfred gained reputation, he not only translated and wrote several books, particularly Boethius' Consolations of Philosophy: but that learning might find an asylum in England, he endowed several schools in the kingdom, and founded, or according to others restored, the university of Oxford, and filled the professorial chairs with men of taste, genius, and erudition. To his wisdom and foresight England may look back with gratitude for the first beginning of her naval greatness. Alfred not only built ships, and enured his subjects to the toils and dangers of the sea, but he had the boldness to attempt to discover the northeast passage. Though by profession and the circumstances of the times a soldier, the humane monarch, who had been personally engaged in fifty-six battles for the defence and independence of his country, viewed with detestation the scenes of carnage which ambition or the love of plunder might exhibit, and considered his glory as better cemented by the peaceful occupations of his subjects than by war, and by the promotion of industry and mutual confidence than by the use of arms. After a reign of above twenty-eight years, this magnanimous prince died on the 28th of Oct., 900. History does not present a man more amiable in his public and private character, or whose virtues entitled him to a throne more than this great and benevolent hero. He left by his queen Elswitha two sons and three daughters, and was succeeded by his second son, Edward, surnamed the Elder.

ALFRED, or ALURED, son of Ethelred, by Emma, daughter of Richard duke of Normandy, was sent by his father with his brother Edward to the Norman court, during the invasions of the Danes. After Canute's death he landed in England with a force, and might have succeeded in the expulsion of Harold, if not thwarted by the arts of Godwin. He fell into the hands of his enemies, who cruelly put out his eyes and confined him in Ely monastery, where he was murdered, as it is supposed, 1037, in his 34th year.

ALFRIDE, or ELFRID, the natural son of Oswy king of Northumberland, fled to Ireland, or as some suppose to Scotland, to avoid the persecution of his brother Egfrid, whom he had succeeded on the throne. In his exile he still felt the virulence of his enemies, and at last the two brothers met to decide their fate by arms. Egfrid was slain, and Alfride ascended the vacant throne, 686, and deserved the love and the applauses of his subjects by his benevolence and mildness, and the liberal patronage which he afforded to literature. He died 705.

ALGAROTTI, Francis, son of a Venetian merchant, who, after improving himself at Rome and Bologna, came to Paris, where he published his Newtonianism for the ladies, in Italian, a work which was translated into French by Du Perron, but was of inferior merit to Fontenelle's plurality of worlds. From thence Algarotti visited England and Germany, and received repeated marks of esteem and honor from the kings of Poland and Prussia. After some residence in the Polish court as privy counsellor for the affairs of war, he returned to Italy, and died unexpectedly at Pisa, 23d of May, 1764, in his fifty-second year. As a connoisseur in painting, sculpture, and architecture, he possessed taste and judgment, and his genius as a poet is fully proved in the elegant trifles which he wrote in Italian. His works were published in four volumes octavo, in 1765, and translated into French at Berlin, 1772, eight volumes octavo. They consist chiefly of historical and philosophical dissertations, essays and poetry.

ALHAZEN, an Arabian who wrote on optics, about the year 1000. Having vaunted that he could render regular the inundations of the Nile, the caliph Hakem employed him to accomplish that purpose, and rewarded him beforehand. Alhazen, however, having examined the course of the river, discovered the folly of his scheme, and feigned madness to avert the wrath of the caliph. He died at Cairo, in 1038.

ALI, cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, was opposed in his view to succeed the prophet, by Othman and Omar, and retired into Arabia, where his mild and enlarged interpretation of the Koran increased the number of his proselytes. After the death of Othman he was acknowledged caliph by the Egyptians and Arabians, but in less than five years after he was assassinated in a mosque, 660. Ali, after the decease of his beloved Fatima, claimed the privilege of polygamy, and left fifteen sons and eighteen daughters. His memory is still held in the highest veneration by the Persians, who pronounce with contempt the names of Othman and Omar, whilst the Turks despise him and pay adoration to his opponents.

ALI BEG, a Pole, born of Christian parents. When young he was made prisoner by the Tartars, and sold to the Turks, who educated him in the Mahometan faith. He rose to consequence in the Turkish court and was appointed interpreter to the grand signior. He employed himself in translating the Bible and the English catechism into the Turkish language; but his great work is on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, and other religious ceremonies. This work was translated into Latin by Dr. Smith. Ali died, 1675, at a time when he intended to abjure the Mahometan tenets for Christianity.

ALI BEY, a native of Natolia, son of a Greek priest. In his thirteenth year he was carried away by some robbers as he was hunting, and sold to Ibrahim, a lieutenant of the Janissaries, at Grand Cairo, who treated him with kindness, and from a slave raised him to power and consequence; became one of the twenty-four heirs who governed that country; and, in 1756, attained the supreme power, and threw off his obedience to the Porte. In conjunction with Shiek Daler, who had also revolted in Syria, he several times defeated the Turkish armies; but, at length, he was overthrown, by the treason of one of his own generals, and was either poisoned or died of his wounds. Among other plans, formed during his success, Ali meditated the revival of the ancient mode of carrying on the commerce of Europe with India, by way of the Red Sea. He left behind him a character unrivalled for excellence, for courage, and magnanimity. As governor of Egypt he behaved with the tenderness of a parent; and to the love of his country were united humanity, a generous heart, and an elevated genius.

ALI, Tepelini, Pacha of Jannina. This extraordinary man was descended from an illustrious Albanian family, and was born at Tepelini, in Albania, 1744. He lost his father when he was only sixteen, and made brave but fruitless efforts to defend his paternal inheritance against the neighboring pachas. After having sustained several defeats, he was taken prisoner; but, at length, recovered his liberty, and withdrew into a solitary retreat. This latter circumstance is said to have led to his subsequent greatness. While, lost in reverie, he was one day involuntarily pushing a stick backward and forward in the sand, his attention was roused by the stick meeting with resistance from a solid body. He looked, and saw in the sand a box, which proved to be filled with gold. With this treasure he was enabled to raise two thousand men, and take the field against his enemies. He was victorious, and entered triumphantly into his native place. From that period, during fifty years of constant warfare, he was uniformly successful, and he brought under his sway a wide extent of territory, which the Porte sanctioned his holding, with the title of pacha. He received agents from foreign powers, and alternately intrigued with England, France, and Russia. At length, in the spring of 1820, he threw off the mask, and declared himself king of Epyrus. After a brief struggle, however, he was deserted by the majority of his troops, and even by his sons, and was compelled to take refuge in a fort, which he had constructed in an island of the lake Jannina. From that retreat he was at last decoyed, by the Turkish general, under pretence that the Porte had pardoned him, and he was then assassinated; but not till he had slain two of his assailants, and dangerously wounded a third. He perished on the 5th of February, 1822. Ali was brave, intelligent, and active; but sanguinary and perfidious in the highest degree.

ALKMAAR, Henry D', an eminent German of the fifteenth century, author of the fable of Reynard, an ingenious poem, which lashes the vices and foibles of mankind in the character of beasts, especially the fox. Gutschied has given a magnificent edition of this valuable book. Some suppose that Alkmaar is the fictitious name assumed by Nicholas Baumaan of Friesland, who died 1503.

ALLATIUS, Leo, a native of the Island of Scio, who studied Belles lettres and the languages at Rome. After visiting Naples and his native country he returned to Rome, where he applied himself to physie, in which he took a degree, but literature was his favorite pursuit, and as his erudition was great, he distinguished himself as a teacher in the Greek college at Rome. He was afterwards employed by pope Gregory XV. to remove the elector Palatine's library from Germany to the Vatican, in reward for which services, though for awhile neglected, he was appointed librarian. Though bred and employed among ecclesiastics, he never entered into orders because, as he told the pope, he wished to retain the privilege of marrying if he pleased. His publications were numerous but chiefly on divinity, and, though full of learning and good sense, remarkable for unnecessary digressions. In the controversy of the gentlemen of the Port Royal with Claude concerning the eucharist, he greatly assisted the former, for which he was severely abused by their bold antagonist. It is said by Joannes Patricius that he wrote Greek for forty years with the same pen, and that when he lost it, he expressed his concern even to the shedding of tears. Allatius died at Rome in his eighty-third year, 1669.

ALLEGRI, Antonio, an illustrious painter, better known by the name of Corregio, from the place where he was born. As he was born to poverty, his education was neglected, and he was not able to see and to study the beautiful models of ancient times, or the productions of the Roman or Venetian schools. Nature however had formed him for a painter, and his genius burst through the shackles of ignorance and poverty. His most celebrated paintings were the Virgin and child, with Mary Magdalen, St. Jerome, and the Notte or Night, which is so well described by Lady Millar in her letters from Italy; but in every thing that he did there was superior execution, great judgment, and infinite taste. The encomiums of Annibal Caracci who, fifty years after his death, admired and imitated him, are strong but just. "Every thing," says he, "that I see astonishes me, particularly the coloring and the beauty of the children. They live—they breathe—they smile with so much grace and so much reality, that the beholder smiles and partakes of their enjoyments." Corregio was employed by the canons of Parma to paint the assumption of the Virgin on the cupola of the cathedral; but when the work, which will ever immortalize his name, was completed, the artist was indignantly treated by the proud and ignorant ecclesiastics, who abused his execution, and refused to fulfill their agreement. The painter was meanly forced to accept the small pittance of two hundred livres; and, to load him with greater indignity, it was paid in copper. Corregio hastened with the money to his starving family, but as he had six or eight miles to travel from Parma, the weight of his burden and the heat of the climate, added to the oppression of his breaking heart, he was attacked with a pleurisy which in three days terminated his existence and his sorrows, 1534, in his 40th year.

ALLEGRI, Gregorio, an eminent composer, whose works are still used in the pope's chapel at Rome. His "miserere" is always used on Good Friday, and is much admired. Clement XIV. sent a copy of this beautiful composition to George III. in 1773. To his extraordinary merit as a composer of church music, he is said to have joined a devout and benevolent disposition, and an excellent moral character. Allegri died 1672.

ALLEIN, Richard, a nonconformist divine, born in 1611, at Ditchet, in Somersetshire. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1641 obtained the living of Batecomb, in Somersetshire, from which he was ejected for non-conformity, and preached privately till his death in 1681.

ALLEIN, Joseph, son of Tobias Allein, was born at Devizes, 1623. He was a member of Lincoln and Corpus Christi colleges, in Oxford, and took orders, and afterwards went to Taunton in Somersetshire. At the restoration he was ejected as a nonconformist, but as he continued his ministry in private, he was committed to Ilchester gaol, and sentenced at the assizes by Judge Foster to pay a fine of one hundred marks, and to remain in prison till the payment. His confinement, which was extended to one year, ruined his constitution, and though the liberality of his friends enabled him to visit different places for the reestablishment of his health, all his care was ineffectual. He died in November, 1668, in his 36th year. Anthony Wood has severely lashed him as a nonconformist; but his learning, his piety, his inoffensive manners, cast an amiable light on his character. His alarm to unconverted sinners has often been republished.

ALLEN, John, archbishop of Dublin, took his degree of LL. D. at Cambridge, though educated at Oxford. He was nine years at Rome as commissioner from Wareham the primate, and at his return he entered into the service of Wolsey, who made him his chaplain, and the judge of his court as legate a lettere. In 1528 he was raised to the See of Dublin, and made chancellor of Ireland. He was murdered six years after by Thomas Fitzgerald, son of lord Kildare.

ALLEN, Sir Thomas, illustrious as an English admiral, made the first hostile attack on the Dutch, in 1665. Though with only eight ships he attacked their Smyrna fleet, killed their commander Brackel, took four prizes, and dispersed the rest into Cadiz. The next year he was at the memorable battle of the 25th July, when De Ruyter the Dutch commander, seeing his van defeated and three of his admirals killed, exclaimed, what a wretch I am, that, among so many thousand bullets, none can come and put an end to my misery.

ALLEN, Thomas, illustrious for his knowledge of mathematics and philosophy. He was fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, which he quitted 1590, for Gloucester hall, where he applied himself with greater assiduity to his favorite studies. His abilities not only procured him the friendship of the greatest mathematicians of the age, but gained him the esteem of the Earl of Northumberland. Robert earl of Leicester, was also particularly attached to him; he gave him his confidence, consulted him on affairs of state, but attempted in vain to withdraw him from his retirement by the offer of a bishopric. Allen, who was employed in collecting the most curious manuscripts on history and astronomy, did not escape the suspicions of the ignorant, who accused him of using magic and conjuration to produce a marriage between the queen and Leicester. He published in Latin the second and third books of Ptolemy concerning judicial astrology, besides notes on Lilly's books, and on Bale's work de Scriptoribus Britan. He died at an advanced age, at Gloucester hall, in 1632, universally respected for his great learning, his piety, and the affability of his manners.

ALLEN, Samuel, governor of New Hampshire, was a merchant of London. He became proprietor of New Hampshire by purchase from Mason's heirs in 1691, and was governor until the arrival of Lord Belamont, in 1699. His administration was attended with many vexations, and his purchase proved to him and his successors, as it had done to former proprietors, a fruitful source of contention and embarrassment. In private life he was upright and honorable, mild and charitable. He died May 5, 1705, aged 70 years.

ALLEN, William, chief justice of Pennsylvania before the revolution, and a noted friend of literature. He was born at Philadelphia, where his father was an eminent merchant. He was the patron of Benjamin West, the celebrated painter, and cooperated with Benjamin Franklin, in establishing the college of Philadelphia. His political principles were unfavorable to the liberties of the colonies; and, on the approach of the revolution, he retired to England, where he died, Sept. 1780.

ALLEN, James, born in Roxbury, Mass., and graduated at Harvard University, in 1710. He was the first minister of Brookline, where he was ordained, in 1718. He died Feb. 18, 1747, in the 56th year of his age. In 1722, he published a Thanksgiving Sermon; in 1727, a Discourse on Providence; in the same year, a Sermon on human merit and humility; in the same year, a Fast Sermon, occasioned by an earthquake; in 1731, a Sermon before a society of young men; in 1733, a Funeral Sermon on the death of Samuel Aspinwall; and in 1744, an Election Sermon.

ALLEN, Ethan, a brigadier-general in the American revolutionary army, was born in Salisbury, Connecticut, but was educated principally in Vermont, to which state his parents emigrated whilst he was yet young. His education was of a limited character; but, in the year 1770, he distinguished himself in a controversy between the inhabitants of that state, and the government of New York, and was declared by the latter an outlaw. In 1775, soon after the battle of Lexington, he collected a small party, and marched against the fortresses of Ticonderoga and Crown Point: and in each of these enterprises he was successful. In the autumn of that year, he went several times into Canada, to ascertain the disposition of the people, and endeavored to attach them to the cause of the colonies. In an attempt to take Montreal, at the head of a small body of troops, he was captured, after a severe battle, and sent to England. On his release from confinement he repaired to the head quarters of General Washington, where he was received with great respect. As his health was much impaired, he returned to Vermont, after having made an offer of his services to the commander-in-chief, in case he should recover. His arrival on the evening of the last of May, 1778, gave his friends great joy, and it was announced by the discharge of cannon. As an expression of confidence in his patriotism and military talents, he was very soon appointed to the command of the state militia. He died Feb. 13, 1789.

ALLEN, Ira, a brother of Ethan, was born about 1752. In early life he was removed to Vermont, where he became one of its distinguished citizens. He was actively employed in the controversy between the inhabitants of this state and New York, and subsequently in the war of the American revolution. He was a member of the Convention which formed the constitution of Vermont, and became the first secretary of the state. He also filled the office of treasurer, was a member of the council, and was appointed surveyor-general. When the claims of the neighboring states to the territory of Vermont, were under consideration in congress, he was appointed joint commissioner with Mr. Bradley, to oppose them. Having risen to the rank of major-general of the militia, in December, 1795, he proceeded to Europe to purchase arms, as a private speculation, for the supply of the state. In France he contracted for twenty thousand muskets and twenty-four brass cannon, with a part of which, on his return to New York, he was captured and carried to England, being charged with the purpose of supplying the Irish rebels with arms. This led to a litigation of eight years in the court of Admiralty; but the result was finally in his favor. He died, at Philadelphia, Jan. 7, 1814, aged sixty-two years.

ALLEN, Moses, a minister of Midway, Georgia, was born in Northampton, Mass., Sept. 14, 1748, and graduated at Princeton, N. J., in 1772. He was ardently devoted to the interests of his country, and was the personal friend of James Madison. In 1778, his society at Midway was dispersed by the British army under General Provost, who also burnt his meeting house. His animated exertions in the cause of liberty, made him particularly obnoxious to the British. On this account, when taken prisoner by them, he was refused parole. Wearied with confinement, on board a prison ship, he attempted the recovery of his liberty by throwing himself into the river and swimming to an adjacent point; but he was drowned in the attempt, on the evening of Feb. 8, 1779.

ALLEN, Thomas, a respectable minister of Pittsfield, Mass., where he remained from the time of his ordination, April 18, 1764, till his death, Feb. 11, 1810. He was born at Northampton, Jan. 7, 1743, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1762. Mr. Allen took a deep interest in the affairs of his country, during the revolutionary war; and contributed, by his own personal exertions, to some of the happy results of that war. He was with the American army at the capture of Burgoyne, and rendered himself conspicuous by the zeal which he manifested on the occasion. The publications of Mr. Allen were an election sermon in 1808, and four funeral sermons.

ALLEN, William Henry, a naval officer of the United States, distinguished for his courage, and his success, in the war of 1812, with Great Britain. He was born at Providence, R. I., Oct. 21, 1784. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1800, and sailed with Bainbridge to Algiers. Having had much active service, in 1813, he was promoted to be master commandant of the brig Argus, which carried Mr. Crawford, the American minister, to France. This part of his duty being effected, the Argus, agreeably to orders, proceeded to the Irish channel, for the purpose of destroying the English commerce. It has been estimated, that in this cruise, he captured property of the enemy, to the amount of two millions of dollars. But on the 13th of August, 1813, the Argus became a prize to the British brig Pelican; and her brave commander received a mortal wound, of which he died, the second day afterwards, lamented by all who knew him.

ALLESTRY or ALLESTREE, Richard, D. D., a native of Uppington in Shropshire, born in March, 1619. During the civil war he joined the king's party under Sir John Byron, and was at the battle of Keinton-field in Warwickshire. At the conclusion of the war he took orders, and was afterwards one of those expelled when the parliament in 1648 sent visitors to Oxford to demand the submission of the university. He found an asylum in the family of lord Newport, in Shropshire, and after the battle of Worcester, he was fixed upon by the royalists as a proper person to convey despatches, and have a conference with the king at Ronen. On his return from a second journey in 1639, he was seized at Dover by the parliament party, but he had the address to save his papers, and after six or eight weeks' confinement, he was restored to liberty. Soon after the return of Charles, he was made canon of Christ Church, king's chaplain, Regius professor of divinity, and in 1665 promoted to the provostship of Eton, which he resigned, 1678. He died of a dropsy in January, 1680.

ALLESTRY, Jacob, an English poet, nephew of the preceding, and son of James Allestry, a London bookseller, who was ruined by the fire of 1666. From Westminster school he passed to Christ Church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as the author of some verses and pastorals, which were repeated before the duke of York when he visited the university. He died October 15th, 1686.

ALLEY, William, a native of Wycomb, Bucks, who, after an Eton education, went to King's college, Cambridge. He afterwards studied at Oxford, but as he was a zealous advocate for the reformation, he retired during Mary's reign into the north, where he kept a school, and practised physic. Under Elizabeth he was made lecturer of St. Paul's, and in 1560, bishop of Exeter. He wrote the poor man's library, containing sermons, &c., besides a commentary on St. Peter's first epistle, and a translation of the Pentateuch, in the bishop's Bible. He died April 15th, 1570.

ALLEYN, Edward, an English actor in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., but principally known as the founder of Dulwich college, was born at St. Botolph, London, Sept. 1st, 1566. He was one of the original actors in Shakspeare's plays, and his popularity procured him not only friends, but opulence. He built at his own expense the Fortune playhouse, near Whitecross-street, Moorfields, and still added to his income by being keeper of the king's wild beasts, with a salary of five hundred pounds per annum. His erection of Dulwich college is attributed to a superstitious cause. Whilst with six others he was acting the part of a demon in one of Shakspeare's plays, he is said to have been terrified by the real appearance of the devil, and the power of imagination was so great, that a solemn vow was made, and the college in 1614 was begun under the direction of Inigo Jones, and in three years finished at the expense of ten thousand pounds. This noble edifice, which was to afford an asylum to indigence and infirmity, was nearly ruined by the opposition of Chancellor Bacon, who refused to grant the patent; but Alleyn's solicitations prevailed, and the hospital was solemnly appropriated on the 13th Sept. 1619, to the humane purposes of the founder, who appointed himself its first master. The original endowment was eight hundred pounds per annum, for the maintenance of one master, one warden, always to be unmarried and of the name of Alleyn, four fellows, three of whom are in orders, and the fourth an organist, besides six poor men, and six women, and twelve boys to be educated till the age of fourteen or sixteen, and then to be apprenticed. He died Nov. 25th, 1626, in his sixty-first year.

ALLIONI, Charles, a Piedmontese physician and botanist, was born in 1725, and died in 1804, a man of extensive knowledge, and a member of many learned societies. His works, chiefly botanical, are numerous, but the most prominent of them is his Piedmontese Flora, in three folio volumes, with plates. His name was given, by Leoffling, to a genus of plants.

ALLIX, Peter, D. D., a native of Alençon, who became minister of the protestant congregation of Rouen, and afterwards of Charenton near Paris. On the cancelling of the edict of Nantes, he left his country and came to England, where he soon acquired the knowledge of the language, and distinguished himself by his zeal and learning, in defence of the reformed church. His reflections on the holy scriptures were dedicated to king James II., and his remarks on the ecclesiastical history of the churches of Piedmont, to William. He died in London, Feb. 21st, 1717, in his 76th year. His works, which are numerous, and expressive of his piety and great erudition, are all on theological subjects, and consist of reflections on all the books of scripture, 1688, republished by bishop Watson, in his theological tracts, — the ancient Jewish church vindicated against the Unitarians, 1691, octavo, mentioned with high commendation by Horsley in his letters to Priestley, — Remarks on the ecclesiastical history of the Piedmontese churches, quarto, &c.

ALLORY, Alexander, a painter of Florence, famous for his skill in the representation of naked figures. As he was well acquainted with anatomy, his portraits are correct and graceful. He was nephew and disciple of Bronzino, and his pieces are preserved at Rome and Florence. He died 1607, in his seventy-second year.

ALLY, Vizier, ex-nabob of Oude. This unfortunate individual, a striking example of eastern vicissitude, was the adopted son of Ausuf ad Dowlah, late nabob of Oude. He was born 1781, being, as it is said, the son of a menial of the lowest description. His reputed father, a wealthy and eccentric prince, who had succeeded to the misnud or throne of Oude, under the protection of the East India Company, was in the habit, whenever he saw a pregnant woman whose appearance pleased him, to invite her to his palace to lie in. One of these women was the mother of Vizier Ally, who, being a sprightly child, engrossed the affections of the nabob, and, in conformity with Mahometan custom, was by him finally adopted as his successor. Vizier Ally succeeded accordingly, but was soon deposed by the English government in favor of the brother of the late nabob. A pension of two lacks of rupees, or twenty-five thousand pounds sterling was settled on the deposed prince, who was ordered to remove from Lucknow to the presidency. He accordingly proceeded to Benares, to which place Mr. Cherry the Company's agent was despatched, to make arrangements for his proceeding to his destination. Shortly after his arrival, Mr. Cherry having invited him to breakfast, he came attended with an armed retinue, and, after complaining bitterly of the treatment which he had received from the company, gave a signal, on which his followers rushed in and cut to pieces Mr. Cherry and his assistant Mr. Graham. They then proceeded to the house of Mr. Davis, another European resident, who found means to hold them at bay until succor arrived. On this, Vizier Ally made his escape into the territory of the rajah of Berar, who, being pressed by the East India Company, at length agreed to give him up, on condition that his life should be spared. This proposal was acceded to, and the unhappy man was for the remainder of his days, seventeen years and three months, confined in a kind of iron cage, his death taking place, in May, 1817, at the age of thirty-six.

ALMAGRO, Diego, one of the conquerors of Peru, was of so obscure an origin that he knew not his parents. He accompanied Pizarro in 1525, and everywhere showed the greatest valor mingled with the basest cruelty. He penetrated in 1525 to Chili, took Cuzco, and at last assassinated his friend Pizarro. His violent conduct armed the partisans of Pizarro against him, and he was, after experiencing some success, defeated, and condemned to be strangled, 1538, in his 75th year. His son rose up to vindicate his character, and to avenge his death, but he was defeated by Vaca de Castro, the viceroy of Peru, and with forty of his adherents was beheaded, 1542. Almagro's cruelty to the unfortunate Atahualpa, is deservedly censured as infamous.

ALMAMON or ABDALLAH III., son of Aaror al Raschid, caliph of the house of the Abbassides, after his brother Alanin, 813, was famous for his protection of learning and of learned men. He conquered part of Crete. He had the last Greek writers translated into Arabic, and made a collection of the best authors. He also calculated a set of astronomical tables, and founded an academy at Bagdad. He died 833.

ALMANSOR or ALMANZOR, succeeded Alhaca on the throne of Cordova in Spain, 976. He took Barcelona, and rendered himself very formidable to the Christians, whom he conquered in several battles. He died 1002.

ALMANZOR, the Victorious, second caliph of the race of the Abbassides, rose to the sovereignty, 753. He was opposed by his uncle Abdallah-ebn-Ali, whom he conquered by means of his brave general Abu Moslem, a man whose services he repaid by mean assassination. He died as he was going to Mecca on a pilgrimage, aged sixty-three.

ALMARUS, ELMERUS, or ELMARUS, was abbot of St. Augustin's monastery in Canterbury, when archbishop Alpheg was murdered by the Danes, 1011. He escaped, and eleven years after was made bishop of Sherborne, before the see was transferred to Sarum. After an active life he became blind, and resigned his episcopal dignity to resume the habit of a monk. His memory was held in the highest veneration.

ALMEIDA, Francis, a Portuguese, who distinguished himself in the wars of Grenada, and was sent out by Emanuel in 1505, as first viceroy of India. After a perilous voyage he crossed the Cape of Good Hope, and proceeded along the coast of Africa, where he spread conquest, terror, and desolation. He took Quiloa and Mombassa, and made their inhabitants as well as those of Onor, Cananor, and Narsinga, submit to the yoke of Portugal. With only seven hundred men he stormed the fort of Panaina, which was defended by a strong rampart and a garrison of four thousand men of tried and desperate valor, and instead of sharing a booty which might have rendered his soldiers inactive and checked the torrent of his ambition, he destroyed it by fire. When his son was killed in an engagement with the Arabians, the father declared that he had obtained a short but glorious life. The fame of Albuquerque, and the malice of enemies at home, however, soon stopped his career; but he refused to accept the orders of his recall, and on pretence of avenging his son's death, he sailed to Dabul in quest of fresh laurels, and in an engagement with the enemy's fleet, he killed four thousand men. The animosities between the rival governors were appeased by the friendship and interference of Coutigna; and Almeida, after resigning his power to Albuquerque, set sail for Europe. In his way he landed near the Cape of Good Hope, and in an unfortunate quarrel with the natives, he was wounded in the throat with a javelin, and immediately expired.

ALMEIDA, Lorenzo, son of the preceding, accompanied his father to India, and was employed by him in many bold and hazardous enterprises. He destroyed the ships of Caulan, and in visiting Ceylon he made it tributary to Portugal, and brought away two hundred and fifty thousand pounds of cinnamon as the first annual payment. He was sent with eight ships to attack the Arabians, who were supported by the sultan of Egypt; but the superiority of the enemy's vessels and the dangers of the coast proved fatal to his views. His ship ran aground, and whilst the other vessels attempted in vain to relieve him from the pressure of a more powerful adversary, he fought with undaunted courage, regardless of the wounds he had received. A ball at last struck him on the breast, and put a period to his brilliant career. His sailors, now reduced to twenty in number, unwilling to submit, were boarded and overpowered, and met from their conquerors that humanity and attention which their valor and fidelity deserved.

ALMODOVAR, the duke of, a native of Spain, was successively ambassador to the courts of Russia, Portugal and England. On his retirement from public life, he devoted himself to the cultivation of literature. He published, at Madrid, a species of literary journal, and translated Raynal's history of the Indies. He died at Madrid, in 1794.

ALMON, John, a political writer born in Liverpool, in 1738. After serving his apprenticeship to a bookseller, he went to sea, and in 1759 settled in London. On the death of George the Second, he published a Review of his reign, which went through two editions. His next piece was a review of the administration of Mr. Pitt, which gained him the patronage of Lord Temple. He died in 1805. His publications were — First, Anecdotes of Lord Chatham, three vols. 8vo. Second, Biographical Anecdotes of Eminent Persons, three vols. 8vo. Third, an edition of Junius, two vols. in which he attempted to prove, that Hugh Boyd was the author of those celebrated letters.

ALOADIN, a Mahometan, prince of the Arsasides or Assassins, was called the old man of the mountain. He lived in a castle between Damascus and Antioch, and was surrounded by a number of intrepid youths, whom he intoxicated with pleasures, and rendered subservient to his views, by promising still greater voluptuousness in the next world. As these were too successfully employed to stab his enemies, he was dreaded by the neighboring princes. From the name and character of his followers the word assassin is derived.

ALOMPRA, the founder of the Burman empire. He was of obscure birth, but being bold and enterprising, he raised himself to independence and sovereign power, having established a new dynasty about the middle of the eighteenth century. He founded the city and port of Rangoon, and made a treaty with the English. His death took place in 1769.

ALPAGO, Andrew, an Italian physician, who visited the East, and some time resided at Damascus. On his return he was made professor of medicine at Venice, and died there 1555. He translated Avicenna, Averroes, and Serapion, and enriched the work with notes, some of which now remain in manuscript.

ALPHANUS, Benedict, archbishop of Palermo, better known as a physician and a poet. He died 1086, author of the lives of some saints in verse, &c.

ALPHERY, Mekepper or Nicephorus, a native of Russia, descended from the imperial family. During the civil dissensions of his country he came to England with his two brothers, and by the care of Mr. Bidell, a Russian merchant, he studied at Oxford, where his brothers fell victims to the small-pox. In 1618 he succeeded to the living of Wooley in Huntingdonsire, and though he was twice invited to return to Russia with the certainty of being placed on the throne, he preferred the character of a parish priest in England to the splendor of the purple. He was ejected from his living during the civil wars, and ill treated by the republican soldiers, though his presbyterian successor behaved towards him with humanity. He saw the restoration, and was replaced in his living, but retired to Hammersmith, where his son had settled, and there died, aged above eighty. The last descendant of this fallen family married a Johnson, a cutler, at Huntingdon, by whom she had eight children. She was living in 1764.

ALPHONSO III. or the Great, king of Asturias, succeeded his father Ordogno, 866. He waged successful wars against the Moors, but the insurrections of his subjects, headed by Froila count of Galicia, drove him from his throne. The usurper's tyranny became soon so odious, that he was murdered by the people of Oviedo, and Alphonso was recalled. Alphonso afterwards abdicated the crown in favor of his eldest son Garcias, who had some time before ungratefully raised an insurrection against him, and then been pardoned; but when the Moors threatened the kingdom, he quitted his retirement, and, at the head of his brave countrymen, he obtained a most signal victory over the enemy. He died soon after at Zamora, 20th Dec. 912, universally respected for valor and benevolence. He wrote a chronicle of the Spanish monarchs.

ALPHONSO VIII. or IX., king of Leon and Castille, surnamed the good or noble, came to the throne when only four years old, 1158. When of age he waged war against the Moors, and retook the places lost during his minority. He defeated his enemies at the great battle of Muradat, where the Moors lost near two hundred thousand men. He died 1212, aged sixty, universally mourned by his affectionate subjects.

ALPHONSO X., king of Leon and Castille, surnamed the Wise, succeeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252. He married Iolante daughter of the king of Arragon, whom he was going to divorce for a Danish princess, because she was barren; but the queen at last brought him nine children. He was elected emperor of Germany in 1258, but as he delayed visiting the empire, Rodolphus was chosen in his room, and all opposition proved fruitless. Though respected for his eloquence and political knowledge, he was not free from domestic dissensions. His son conspired against him, and dethroned him; and though he fled among the Saracens for protection, and gained a victory over this unnatural child, yet he was not reinstated. He died of a broken heart, 1284. As an astronomer and a man of letters, Alphonsus obtained greater fame than as a monarch. He perceived the errors of Ptolemy's tables and under his direction at Toledo, those tables, called the Alphonsine tables, were drawn up by the skill of Hazan a Jew, and their epoch fixed on the 30th May, 1332, the day on which he began his reign. Alphonsus was the first Castilian king who had the public laws drawn in the vulgar tongue, and the scriptures translated into the same language.

ALPHONSO V., king of Arragon, surnamed the magnanimous, succeeded his father Ferdinand the Just, 1416. He extended the Spanish influence over Italy, and made himself master of Naples and of Sicily, where he was acknowledged king, 1442. He died 1458, aged seventy-four, leaving the kingdom of Naples to his natural son Ferdinand, and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily to Juan his brother, king of Navarre. He was not only a brave prince, but a man of learning, the patron of literature, and the father of his people. He gave a welcome asylum to the muses which persecution banished from Constantinople, and everywhere encouraged the cultivation of science. He walked with the greatest familiarity among his subjects, observing to his courtiers, who fancied dangers and conspiracies, that a father has nothing to fear among his children. Seeing once one of his vessels ready to perish, he hastened in a small boat to the assistance of the crew, exclaiming, I had rather die with you than see you perish. His most remarkable sayings have been published under the name of "Genie," by Meri de la Canorgue, 1765.

ALPHONSO V., king of Portugal, son of Henry of Burgundy of France, by Theresa daughter of Alphonso king of Leon, was only three years old at his father's death. He defeated five Moorish kings at the battle of Ourique, 25th July, 1139, though with a very inferior force; and thus he raised his country from a dependent state to a powerful monarchy, of which he was proclaimed the first sovereign by his victorious soldiers in the field of battle. He was afterwards defeated and taken prisoner by Ferdinand II. of Castille, who nobly set him at liberty. He died 6th December, 1185, aged seventy-six.

ALPHONSO II., king of Portugal, succeeded his father Sancho, 1211. He was engaged in war with the Moors, and his reign was unfortunately disturbed by a quarrel with his brothers. He died 25th March, 1223, aged thirty-eight.

ALPHONSO III., king of Portugal, brother of Sancho II. succeeded 1248. His reign was disturbed by dissensions with his clergy and with the pope. He died 16th February, 1279, aged sixty-nine.

ALPHONSO IV., king of Portugal, succeeded his father Denys, 1325. He was engaged in war with the king of Castille, but afterwards assisted him against the Moors. He was an able prince, popular and benevolent, and under him justice was administered with great impartiality. He died 28th May, 1357, aged sixty-six.

ALPHONSO V., king of Portugal, surnamed the African, succeeded his father Edward, though only six years old, 1438. He made war in Africa, and took Arzilla and Tangier from the Moors, and he was also engaged in a quarrel with Ferdinand and Isabella of Castille. He died of the plague at Sintra, 24th August, 1481, aged forty-nine. During his reign the Portuguese discovered Guinea, and began to spread Christianity in that part of Africa. Alphonso was a great patron of learning and in his character was very amiable.

ALPHONSO VI., king of Portugal, succeeded his father John IV. His intellects proved to be weak, and in his conduct he exhibited the tyrant and the madman. He abdicated the crown in favor of his brother Don Pedro, who presided over the state with the title of regent. He also married the queen, who asserted that her union with a madman was not legal. Alphonso died at Cintra, 12th September, 1683, aged forty-one.

ALPINI, Prospero, a native of Marostica in the Venetian territory, born 1553, November 23d. He left the profession of arms, and by the persuasion of his father applied himself to the study of botany and physic, and obtained preferment in the university of Padua. In 1580 he embarked for Egypt with his friend George Emo or Ilemi, the consul of the republic, and for three years he was employed along the banks of the Nile in learned researches, and in examining the nature of plants. On his return he was appointed physician to Andrew Doria prince of Meli, but his residence at Genoa was displeasing to his countrymen, who were unwilling to be deprived of his great services and abilities, and he was recalled in 1593, and honorably placed in the professorial chair of Padua, which he filled with dignity and credit. As his health had been injured by his travels he died at Padua, 5th of February, 1617, in his sixty-fourth year, and was buried in St. Anthony's church without pomp. His works, which are in Latin, are chiefly on botanical and medicinal subjects, valuable for the curious information which they contain. They are, de medicinâ Ægyptiorum, libri 4.—de plantis Ægypti.—de balsamo.—de presagiendâ vitâ and morte ægrotorum.—de medicinâ methodicâ.—de raphantico disputatio in gymnasio Patavino habita.—de plantis exoticis, and some others, all composed in Latin, which he wrote with great purity and elegance.

ALREDUS, ALFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, a native of Beverly in Yorkshire, who after studying at Cambridge became a secular priest and treasurer of St. John's church in his own town. He is styled the English Florus, from the Latin history which he wrote of the Britons from king Brutus, and which he afterwards brought down to his own times. This work is highly esteemed for its elegance and perspicuity, and for the accuracy of dates and authorities. It was published by Hearne, at Oxford, 1716, with a preface. Alredus wrote besides a history of Beverly, not printed, but preserved in the Cotton library. He died 1126, or according to others two or three years later.

ALSOP, Anthony, received his education at Westminster school and at Christ Church, where dean Aldrich noticed his superior abilities. After holding the offices of the college with credit, he was recommended to Trelawney bishop of Winchester.

who with a prebend promoted him to a tranquil retirement in the rectory of Brightwell in Berks. In 1717 he was sued by Mrs. Elizabeth Astrey of Oxford, for a breach of marriage, and damages for two thousand pounds were given against him; so that he retired abroad to avoid the sneers of the censorious, as well as to elude contributing with his purse to the triumph of his fair one. The time of his absence is not known. His death was occasioned by a fall into a ditch from near his garden door, June 10th, 1726. He possessed a poetical genius, which, however, was not frequently exerted. He published early Æsop's Greek fables, in the preface to which he attacked Bentley. Some of his poems are preserved in Dodsley's and Peach's collections, and in the Gentleman's Magazine.

ALSOP, Richard, a man of letters, born in Middletown, Connecticut, published a number of fugitive pieces in verse and prose, which had considerable success, besides several translations from the Italian and French. The principal one is the Natural and Civil History of Chili, from the Italian of the Abb Molina, in two volumes octavo, reprinted in London. In 1815, he prepared the Narrative of the Captivity and Adventures of J. R. Jewett among the savages of Nootka Sound. He died, Aug. 20, 1815, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

ALSTEDIUS, John Henry, a protestant, public professor of divinity at Nassau, and afterwards at Alba Julia in Transylvania, where he died 1638, in his fiftieth year. He is best known for his Encyclopediæ, which, though in many places not sufficiently accurate, yet obtained unusual popularity, and is become the foundation of all modern works of the same kind. His Thesaurus Theologicus and his treatise on arithmetic are equally esteemed, and show him to have possessed a mind well stored with all the treasures of literature. He defended the doctrine of the millennium, and fixed the beginning of Christ's reign on earth in 1694.

ALSTON, Charles, a Scotch physician, who studied at Glasgow, and after taking his degrees at Leyden, settled at Edinburgh, where he lectured on the Materia Medica and Botany. He is author of Tyrocinium Botanicum Edinburgense, in which he censured Linne's sexual system, 1753,—Lectures on the Materia Medica, two volumes quarto, 1770, besides some essays in the Edinburgh Medical Essays. He died 1760, aged seventy-seven.

ALSTON, Joseph, governor of South Carolina, after having been for several years a distinguished member of the legislature of that state, was elected chief magistrate in 1812. He married the daughter of Aaron Burr, and in consequence of that connexion was unjustly suspected of being concerned in the reputed treasonable enterprises of that individual. Mrs. Alston was lost on her passage from Charleston to New York in 1812. He died Sept. 10th, 1816, aged thirty-eight years.

ALSTROEMER, Jonas, a Swede, who deserves to be numbered among national benefactors, was born in 1685, of poor parents, in the province of Westrogothia, made a fortune in England, by commercial speculations, and then returned to his native land. He introduced into Sweden improved breeds of sheep, the use of potatoes, and the cultivation of dyeing drugs, established refineries of sugar, and contributed to the formation of the Levant and East India Companies. For these services he was enabled, and had a statue erected to him on the Exchange. He died in 1761.

ALTHUSEN, or ALTHUSIUS, John, a German civilian, was born about the middle of the sixteenth century, and died in the seventeenth. He was professor of law at Herborn, and Syndic of Bremen. In 1603, he published his Politica Methodice Digesta, in which he boldly taught that kings are nothing more than magistrates, that to the people belongs the sovereignty, and that, as a natural consequence, they may change and even punish their rulers. Althusen is author of several other works, the principal of which is a Latin Treatise on Roman Jurisprudence.

ALTILIUS, Gabriel, a Neapolitan poet, preceptor to Ferdinand son of the king of Naples. He was a favorite of the court, and his learning recommended him to the bishopric of Policastro, in 1471. Though some imagine that he forsook the muses when raised to the episcopal throne, it is certain that he wrote after that the first of his poems, his epithalamium on the marriage of Isabella of Arragon, found in the Deliciae Italor. Poet. Altilius died in 1484, or according to Bayle not before 1501.

ALTING, Henry, was born at Embden in 1583. He was the preceptor, the friend, and the minister of the elector palatine, and sat as one of the deputies of the palatinate at the synod of Dort. He nearly escaped being killed by a soldier at the taking of Heidelberg, in 1622. He filled the theological chair of Groningen from 1627 till his death in 1644. His works, which are on religious subjects, are numerous but little read.

ALTING, James, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg, 27th Sept. 1618. He studied at Groningen and Embden, and afterwards passed into England, where he was ordained by Prideaux bishop of Worcester. His determination to reside in England was altered by the offer of the Hebrew professorship at Groningen, which he accepted. In this new office it was his misfortune to quarrel with Samuel des Marets, divinity professor, who with obstinate zeal maintained the doctrines of the schoolmen, against the simpler method of teaching which his antagonist wished to introduce. Alting who followed the scriptures, acquired popularity by his lectures; but he was soon impeached by des Marets as an innovator, and the twenty-one articles of his accusation, were carried before the divines of Leyden, who acquitted the accused of heresy, though not of imprudence, and passed a censure upon his accuser for want of moderation. These differences which had embittered his life, were at last, after some little difficulties and objections settled by the kind interference of their friends, on the death-bed of des Marets, and though Alting saw some illiberal passages still preserved in the new editions of the works of his antagonist he might reflect with pleasure that he had obtained his reconciliation before he died. The three last years of his life were subject to constant pain and disease, and he died at last of a fever, in August, 1679. His works were printed in five volumes folio, Amsterdam, 1687, containing practical philosophical, and problematical tracts.

ALTON, Richard count d', an Austrian general, who had the command of the Low Countries in 1787. Though a strict disciplinarian and a man of bravery, he betrayed weakness during the insurrections in Brabant, 1789, for which he was sent for to Vienna, to clear his character. He died on the journey, 12th Dec. 1789. His brother distinguished himself against the Turks, and also against the French at the siege of Valenciennes. He was killed near Dunkirk, 24th of August, 1793, much regretted as a good soldier and an amiable man.

ALVA, Ferdinand Alvarez, duke of, a famous general descended from a noble and ancient family in Spain. He early followed the profession of arms, and was noticed by Charles V. for his intrepidity at the battle of Pavia and at the siege of Mentz. He was intrusted with the expedition against the holy See, and after he had obliged the pope to sue for peace, he repaired to Rome, and with superstitious mockery threw himself at the feet of the humbled pontiff, and implored his forgiveness. When the flame of liberty was kindled in the Low Countries, no general was considered as better calculated to repress the insurrection than Alva, and he was accordingly sent with full powers by Philip II., 1567. His measures were at first crowned with success, the undisciplined forces of his opponents sunk before his veterans, but the minds of the people, which mildness and humanity might have soothed and reconciled to a foreign yoke, were alienated by the carnage and devastation that spread over their fields, under the direction of the governor and of his council, deservedly denominated the bloody tribunal. Alva, hated for his cruelties, soon felt the tide of fortune and of unpopularity set against him, and after rendering his memory execrable in the Low Countries for his inhumanity, he solicited and obtained his recall, 1573. His abilities were afterwards employed against Portugal, and he had the good fortune to drive Don Antonio from the throne, 1581, and thus to add fresh laurels to his military fame. He died, 1582, aged seventy-four, respected for his valor and presence of mind as a general, but despised and detested for his atrocities as a civil governor.

ALVARADO, Don Pedro, one of the conquerors of Spanish America, was born at Badajoz. He accompanied Cortez in his Mexican expedition, produced an insurrection in Mexico, by his cruelty and rapacity, and narrowly escaped with life. He was subsequently appointed to the government of Guatimala; had violent contests with Pizarro; made discoveries on the Californian coast; and was, at length, killed in 1541.

ALVARES, Francis, a Portuguese priest at the court of Emanuel. He was sent as ambassador to David king of Abyssinia, and, after a residence of six years in that distant country, he returned to Europe, and published an account of his adventures, and of the country which he had visited. This history was translated into French, and abridged also by Ramusius. Alvares died in 1540.

ALVARES DE LUNA, or ALVARO, natural son of Don Alvaro de Luna, by a common prostitute, was born in 1388. He was in his twentieth year introduced at the court of John II. king of Castille, and so great was the power which he gained over the mind of the monarch, that the whole empire was at his disposal. The nobles rose indignant against the favorite, and he was banished one year and a half, but such was the king's partiality that he was recalled and loaded with greater honors. For thirty years out of the forty-five which he spent at court, he possessed such an ascendancy that the king could not change a minister, or even alter his diet or his clothes, without the approbation of the favorite. Acts of tyranny and extortion, however, hastened his ruin; he was artfully seized by his enemies, and though he tried by letter to soften the king to mercy, he was tried and sentenced to lose his head. His punishment was attended with every possible ignominy. On the scaffold, observing a hook on a pole, he asked the executioner what it meant; and being informed it was to suspend his head upon, you may, says he, do what you please with my body after I am dead; death can bring no disgrace to a man of courage, nor is it untimely to a man who has enjoyed so many honors. He bent his neck to the axe with the coolest intrepidity, 4th of June or 5th of July, 1453, exhibiting in his life and death the danger and the uncertainty of royal favor improperly bestowed, and unworthily enjoyed.

ALXINGER, John Baptist D', a German poet, born at Vienna, in 1755, of a rich family, early acquired a thorough knowledge of the classics. Though he became a doctor of laws, and held the title of court advocate, he availed himself of his legal station only to make up disputes, or plead for the poor. Poetry was his favorite pursuit. Besides minor pieces, he wrote Doolin of Mentz, and Blimberis, two chivalresque epics, in Wieland's style. Alxinger was liberal, and firmly attached to his friends. He died in 1797.

AMADEDDULAT, the son of a fisherman, rose by his abilities to the command of the armies of Makan, Sultan of Decan, and at last obtained possession of Persia, Iraqk and Caramania, which he divided with his two brothers. He fixed his residence at Shiraz, 933; and was the first of the dynasty of the Buides. He died 949, much regretted by his soldiers and his subjects.

AMAK, a Persian poet of the fifth century, at the court of the sultan Khedar Khan, who made him president of the academy of poets, which he had established. His poem on the loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah was much admired. He lived to a great age.

AMALARIC, or AMAURY, king of the Visigoths, son of Alaric II., succeeded his grandfather Theodoric in 526. He married Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis king of France, whom he attempted to convert to Arianism, at first by caresses, afterwards by threats and violence, but in vain. The injured queen at last conveyed, as a token of her misery, a handkerchief covered with her blood to her brothers, in consequence of which Childebert king of Paris marched against her oppressor, and defeated him near Narbonne. Amalaric was put to death, either as he fled from the battle, or afterwards, by the hand of one of his soldiers, 531.

AMALASANTHA, daughter of Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths, was mother of Athalaric, by Eutharic. She inherited her father's possessions as the guardian of her son, but while, with the most enlightened views, she wished to educate him in the manners and learning of her polished neighbors of Rome, she offended her nobles, who conspired against her, and obtained the government of the young prince. Athalaric was now no longer instructed in the arts and habits of polished life, but inured to debauchery, and he sunk under the fatal power of licentiousness in his seventeenth year, 534. The afflicted mother knew not how to support herself against her rebellious subjects, but by taking as her husband and her partner on the throne, her relation Theodatus; but such is the force of ingratitude, that this favored villain despatched his unsuspecting queen, by causing her to be strangled in a bath, 534. She was universally regretted; as for learning and humanity she had few equals.

AMALTHEUS, Jerome, a member of a family which produced many literary men, was born in Frinli, in 1506, and became eminent as a physician, philosopher, and Latin poet. For many years he taught medicine and moral philosophy at Padua. He died in 1574.

AMAMA, Sixtinus, a Hebrew professor at Francker, who refused the liberal offers of the university of Leyden, which wished him to succeed to the vacant chair of Erpenius. He was long employed in the great design of refuting and censuring the vulgar translation which had received the sanction of the council of Trent. This learned work called "Antibarbarus Biblicus" was to consist of two parts, but only one was published before Amama died, and so powerful were his arguments, that some synods refused to admit candidates to holy orders, except they perfectly understood Hebrew and Greek originals. His precepts and example were successfully employed in checking the dissolute and intemperate manners which prevailed in the university of Franeker, and after his death, in 1629, the gratitude of the people of Friesland for his memory was shown in their generous conduct towards his children, as his son Nicholas acknowledges in a dedication to his Dissertat. in arinarum decas. He was in 1613, at Oxford, and for some time taught Hebrew in Exeter College.

AMAURI, de Chartres, a professor of philosophy, born at Bonne near Chartres, in the thirteenth century. He formed a new system of religion on the metaphysics of Aristotle, and acknowledged three persons in the Godhead, which he considered as the primary cause of matter from which all beings are created. He supposed that there would be three epochs in the government of the world, as there were three persons in the trinity. The reign of God he limited to the extinction of the law of Moses; that of the Son was to last as long as the Christian religion, after which would succeed the empire of the Holy Ghost, when men would offer only a spiritual worship to the Supreme Being. These opinions were violently resisted, and Amauri having appealed to the Pope was condemned by him, and for fear of punishment retracted his pernicious doctrines, and soon after died at St. Martin des Champs of disappointment. His most zealous disciple was Dizant.

AMBOISE, Francois d', son of a surgeon of Charles IX. of France, rose to the rank of counselor of state by his learning and industry. He published the works of Abelard, and wrote several pieces for the theatre, which he refused to print. One of these, however, the Neapolitans, was published by the interference of his friends, and was most universally applauded. He died in the beginning of the 17th century.—His brother Adrian, author of the tragedy of Holofernes, was bishop of Tregulier, and died 1616.—James, another brother, studied medicine, and was rector of the university of Paris. Some of his orations are preserved. He died of the plague, 1606.

AMBOISE, George d', of the house of Amboise in France, was born in 1460, and educated for the church, and at the age of fourteen elected bishop of Montauban. After the death of Lewis XI., he favored the party of the duke of Orleans, and for awhile shared his disgrace, but his abilities were, however, rewarded by the archbishopric of Narbonne, which he exchanged for Rouen. As deputy of Orleans he restored tranquillity and confidence in the province of Rouen, and for his great services was promoted to the dangerous office of prime minister, when his parson, after the death of Charles the VIII., ascended the throne, under the name of Lewis XII. In this high situation he deservedly acquired popularity. Instead of raising the taxes, he diminished the burdens of the people, and, by mixing economy with prudence, he maintained the honor and glory of the French name. The Milanese was conquered, and added to the kingdom. Abuses were corrected, and the administration of justice was rendered more quick and impartial, so that no longer power or opulence, but equity, guided the decision of the judge. He died of the gout in his stomach, at Lyons, in his fiftieth year, 1510. He left behind him a popular character, and though his genius was not gigantic, nor his counsels guided by ambition, yet he possessed firmness and energy, and he exhibited disinterestedness which awed cabal and intrigue into admiration. His nephew George succeeded him in his archbishopric, and was raised also to the dignity of cardinal. He died 1550.

AMBOISE, Frances d', a lady celebrated for the improvement which she introduced in the manners and the sentiments of the Bretons. She was wife of Peter II, duke of Brittany, whose great inhumanity towards her she bore with Christian resignation. After his death, 1437, she refused to marry the duke of Savoy, and retired to the tranquillity of a convent, where she died 1485.

AMBROSE, Saint, archbishop of Milan, died 4th April, 397, aged fifty-seven. He is famous for his zeal in the cause of Christianity, for his learning, and for the noble severity with which he censured and corrected the emperor Theodosius, who had barbarously ordered several innocent persons to be put to death at Thessalonica. He is said to have composed that pious hymn "Te deum."

AMBROSE, deacon of Alexandria, was of an opulent family. He was the patron of Origen, by whose eloquence he had been converted to Christianity. He died 250, at Alexandria. His letters mentioned by Saint Jerome are lost.

AMBROSE, Isaac, descended of the Ambroses of Ambrose-hall, in Lancashire, was of Brazen Nose college, Oxford, 1621, and took orders, which however he renounced, to adopt the principles of the presbyterians in the civil wars. As he was in indigent circumstances he was often, says Ward, relieved by William earl of Bedford, and he became a preacher at Garstang and Preston, and distinguished himself by his vehement zeal in ejecting the ministers of the established church. He published a few tracts, one of which, "looking unto Jesus," was in high repute among Calvinists, and died of an apoplexy.

AMBROSIUS, Aurelianus, a prince of Armorica who came, 457, to assist the Britons in the expulsion of the Saxons, whom Vortigern had invited into the kingdom. After the death of Vortigern, he was placed on the throne of Britain, as the reward of his meritorious services, and he reigned with great popularity. He died at Winchester, 508. Arthur is said to have been his elevé.

AMEILHON, Hubert Pascal, a judicious French historian, and a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and of the Institute, was born at Paris, in 1730, and died in 1811. Besides many minor essays and dissertations, he wrote the History of the Commerce of the Egyptians under the Ptolemies, and a continuation of Le Beau's History of the Lower Empire.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE, Abraham Nicolas, a native of Orleans, 1634, sent as secretary to the French ambassador at Venice. His writings were numerous, but some of them gave such offence that he was confined in the Bastille. His most popular works were his translation of father Paul's history of the council of Trent, and his "Courtier," translated from Baltasar's Gratian's oraculo manual. He also translated Machiavel's Prince, and the six first books of Tacitus's annals, and wrote a preliminary discourse for the treaties of peace between the French kings and the princes of Europe, &c. He died at Paris, 1706, aged nearly seventy-three.

AMELOT, Denis, a French writer, born at Sain-tonge, 1606. In his life of Charles de Gondren, one of the superiors of the Oratory founded by Philip of Neri, he spoke with severity of the abbé St. Cyran, and drew upon himself the hatred of the gentlemen of Port Royal. He however disregarded the sarcasms of their attack, and had influence enough in the Sorbonne, and with chancellor Seguier, to prevent their obtaining the royal license to print the translation of the New Testament, which they had just completed. Further, to thwart their views, he published a translation himself in four volumes octavo, which, though not free from error, had yet its admirers. In his old age, Amelot solicited his friends in power for a bishopric, but though he had supported their cause against the society of Port Royal he was refused in his application. He became member of the Oratory, 1650, and died there, 1678. He published besides a harmony of the gospels, 12mo. and an abridgment of theology, quarto.

AMERBACH, John, a native of Swabia, distinguished for his learning, and more as being one of the first printers, who, instead of the Gothic and Italian, recommended the round and perfect Roman letter. He settled with success at Basil with Froben, and died 1515. His son John was professor of law at Basil, and Syndic, and the friend of Erasmus. He died 1562, aged sixty-seven.

AMERICUS, Vesputius, a native of Florence, whose mind was early bent to mathematics and navigation. The fame of Columbus attracted his notice, and determined to rival his glory, he obtained from Ferdinand king of Spain a squadron of four ships, with which he sailed from Cadiz, 1497. During this voyage, which lasted eighteen months, he visited the coast of Paria and Terra Firma along the Mexican gulf, and in a subsequent enterprise the following year with six ships, he extended his discoveries to the Antilles and the shores of Guiana and Venezuela. On his return, in 1500, he was received by the Spanish court with a coolness which his services ill deserved; but his discontent was forgotten under the patronage of Emanuel of Portugal, who furnished him with three ships in May, 1501. In this third voyage, Americus discovered the Brazils from La Plata to the coast of Patagonia, and he returned to Lisbon, September, 1502. A fourth voyage was undertaken with six ships, with the intention of proceeding to the Molucca islands, in a southern direction along the American coast, but he was detained by contrary winds for five months near the river Curabado, and the want of provisions obliged him to return to Europe. Americus died in the island of Terceira, in 1514, aged sixty-three. He published an entertaining account of his voyages; but he is become illustrious, as he obtained the singular honor of giving his name to the new world, and thus monopolized the glory which was due to the genius and the enterprises of the great Columbus. He has been accused by the Spanish writers of giving false dates to his writings, that he might establish a priority of discovery before his rival. The remains of his ship, the Victory, were preserved by the king of Portugal in the cathedral of Lisbon.

AMES, William, a native of Norfolk, who, after being educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, left his country, where his Calvinistical tenets were becoming unpopular, and settled as professor in the university of Franeker in Holland. Here he enjoyed fame and independence, but as the air of the place was too sharp for his asthmatic constitution, he removed to Rotterdam, with the intention of passing into New England. He, however, died at Rotterdam, Nov. 1633, aged fifty-seven. He was a learned divine, and his writings were voluminous, and all on controversial subjects, the principal of which is Medulla Theologica.

AMES, Joseph, a ship-chandler of Wapping, who, in an advanced period of life, studied antiquities, and rose by his genius and application to consequence, and to the secretaryship of the society of Antiquaries. He published an account of the earliest printers, with a register of the books which they printed, in quarto, 1749, besides the list of English heads engraved and mezzotinto, &c. in 8vo. He also compiled the "parentalia," from Wren's papers. He died Oct. 7th., 1759, and the following year his curious collection of fossils, shells, medals, &c., were sold by public auction. His daughter married Captain Dampier in the East India sea service.

AMES, Fisher, L.L. D., one of the most eloquent of American statesmen and writers, was born at Dedham, in Massachusetts, April 9, 1758, of very respectable parents. He was educated at Harvard University, where he received his degree in 1774. He studied law in Boston, and commenced the practice of it in his native village. But the affairs of the revolution soon drew his attention to politics, and he became conspicuous by his speeches in public debate, and by his animated and beautiful style as an essay writer. He distinguished himself as a member of the Massachusetts convention for ratifying the Constitution, in 1788, and from this body passed to the house of representatives in the state legislature. Soon after he was elected the representative of the Suffolk district in the Congress of the United States, where he remained with the highest honor during the eight years of Washington's administration. On the retirement of Washington, Mr. A. returned to his residence at Dedham, where he occupied himself with the management of his farm and the practice of the law. The latter he relinquished, a few years afterwards, in consequence of his declining health; but, he felt too deep an interest in the welfare of his country to withdraw his mind and pen from politics. He wrote much in the public papers, relating to the contest between Great Britain and revolutionary France, as it might affect the liberty and prosperity of America. In 1804, he was chosen president of Harvard college—an honor which he declined. He died July 4th, 1808. His writings, in the following year, were published in one volume octavo, prefaced by a memoir of his life, from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Kirkland.

AMHERST, Jeffery lord, an English general of considerable celebrity, descended from an ancient family seated at Sevenoaks in Kent. He was born 1727, and at the age of fourteen embraced the military profession. In 1741 he was aid-de-camp to general Ligonier, at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux, and in 1756 he obtained the colonelcy of the 15th regiment of foot. His abilities and experience were now called into action; he was employed, 1758, at the siege of Louisbourg, and was made governor of Virginia, and commander-in-chief of the forces in America, and, in this part of the world, the fall of Niagara, Ticonderago, Quebec, and Montreal, with the submission of all Canada, marked the progress of his judicious and successful measures. His great services were honorably rewarded by the court; he was made a knight of the bath, in 1771, appointed governor of Guernsey, the next year lieutenant general of the ordnance, and in 1776, created baron Amherst of Holmsdale. In 1778 he was made commander in chief, and, though upon the change of ministry, these offices were withdrawn, he was again reinstated in 1793, when two years after, he resigned the command of the forces of the duke of York, and was raised to the rank of field marshal. He died Aug. 3, 1797, aged eighty years.

AMHURST, Nicholas, a native of Marden in Kent, educated at Oxford, from which last he was expelled on a charge of irregularity. This disgrace, which he attributed to the liberality and freedom of his opinions, and to his attachment to the Hanover succession, he severely resented, and all his powers of satire and abuse were exerted against the university and its members, in his "Oculus Britannicæ," and "Terræ filius," published in two volumes 12mo. 1726. After his expulsion he settled in London as a professional writer, but his most successful undertaking was the conducting of the "Craftsman," a paper of which ten or twelve thousand copies were daily dispersed, and which for a series of years guided the public taste in politics, and awed the administration into measures of popularity. When the act for licensing plays was passed, a letter in the name of Colley Cibber appeared in the Craftsman, July 2d, 1737, to ridicule the check which the law had placed upon the effusions of poetry, and this so offended the ministry that the printer was seized, but Amhurst surrendered himself, and after being imprisoned, and refusing to give bail for his good behavior, he obtained his release by bringing his habeas corpus, and the prosecution was dropped. On the reconciliation of the opposition to the court, his services, which for twenty years had been exerted in the cause of his parliamentary friends, were forgotten, and the neglect with which he was treated depressed his spirits, and probably hastened his dissolution. He died April 27th, 1742, and was buried at the expense of Richard Franklin, his printer.

AMILCAR, surnamed Barca, a Carthaginian general, sprung from a family anciently the kings of Tyre. He was early intrusted with military command, and for five years distinguished himself in Sicily, against those universal robbers the Romans. The defeat, however, of Hanno, by the consul Lutatius, induced Carthage to make peace. On Amilcar's return he quelled the formidable rebellion of the mercenary troops, defeated the Numidians, and restored tranquillity. Spain was the next scene of his services. There, he conquered several nations, and founded Barcelona. After having remained in that country nine years, he was slain in a battle against the Vettones. He was the father of Annibal.

AMIRAL, Henry, a native of Auzolet in Auvergne, known during the French revolution for his attempt to assassinate Collot d'Herbois and Robespierre, and thus to rid France of her tyrants. He was seized in the fact and condemned to die. He suffered with great intrepidity, 1792.

AMMAN, John Conrad, a Swiss physician, successfully employed in teaching the deaf to speak in France and Holland. He published a curious account of the method he pursued in two tracts called Surdus loquens, and died at Amsterdam about 1730.

AMMANATI, Bartholomew, a native of Florence, eminent as a sculptor and architect. Many of the Italian cities, especially Rome, contained specimens of his labors and genius. He wrote a work called Cita, with designs for all the public and ornamental buildings necessary in a capital. He died 1586, in his seventy-fifth year, or according to some in 1592.

AMMANATI, Laura Battiferri, wife to the preceding, was daughter of John Antony Battiferri, and born at Urbino. She became celebrated for her genius and learning. Her poems, which abound with excellent morality, are esteemed high among the productions of the Italian muse. She was one of the members of the Intronati academy at Sienna, and died at Florence, November, 1589, aged seventy-six.

AMMIRATO, Scipio, a native of Lucca in the kingdom of Naples. He was intended for the law, but he took orders, and, after a wandering and unsettled life through Italy, he fixed his residence at Florence, under the patronage of the grand duke, who gave him a canonry in the cathedral. He wrote the history of Florence in two volumes folio, besides numerous other tracts of Italian, both in prose and verse, and died there, the 30th January, 1660, in his sixty-ninth year.

AMMONIUS, a Peripatetic philosopher, preceptor to Plutarch.—Another philosopher in the sixth century, son of Herminas of Alexandria, disciple of Proclus, and author of commentaries on Aristotle and Porphyry, and also of a Lexicon of Greek synonyms, printed at Venice, 1497.

AMMONIUS, Saccus, a philosopher in the third century, founder of the Eclectic sect. He is said to have rejected the Christian religion, in which he was educated, and to have established a school at Alexandria, in which he attempted to reconcile the tenets of Aristotle and Plato. Longinus was in the number of his pupils. He died A. D. 243.

AMMONIUS, Andrew, a native of Lucca, who settled in England and lived for awhile under the patronage and in the house of Sir Thomas More. He was intimate with Erasmus and corresponded with him. He was made secretary to Henry VIII., and employed in a public character by pope Leo X. He died of that dreadful disease the sweating sickness, in 1517, in his fortieth year, and was greatly lamented by Erasmus. He wrote some poetical trifles in Latin of considerable merit.

AMO, Anthony William, a negro, born on the Gold Coast, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, was brought to Holland, 1707, and presented to the duke of Brunswick, who sent him to the University of Halle, whence he removed to Wittenberg. He had a perfect knowledge of astronomy, and spoke Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Dutch, and French. After his patron's death, he fell into a deep melancholy, and at length quitted Europe, to lead a solitary life in his own country. He died in one of the Dutch Company's forts.

AMONTONS, William, an eminent mechanic, born in Normandy, 31st August, 1663. When at school at Paris he was seized with such deafness that he gave up all pursuits of a public nature, and devoted himself to the study of geometry, and of the invariable laws which regulate the motion of the planets. He suggested some improvements in the structure of barometers and thermometers, on which he published a treatise, and he invented a method for the rapid communication of intelligence from one place to the other, which has lately been adopted under the appellation of telegraph. Much of his time was employed in constructing a new hour-glass for the use of the navy, which might not be subject to the irregularities of sudden and violent motion, and in his new theory of friction which he read to the royal academy in 1699, he evinced the penetration of his genius, the delicacy of his judgment, and the exactness of his experiments. He died of an inflammation in his bowels, 11th October, 1705, aged 42.

AMORY, Thomas, D. D. in the university of Edinburgh, was son of a grocer at Taunton in Somersetshire, and distinguished himself as a preacher among the dissenters. After passing the greatest part of his life near the place of his nativity, as public teacher, and as instructor of youth, he removed to London, where he formed an intimate acquaintance with the most respectable members of his persuasion. He was a bold asserter of toleration, and therefore, warmly espoused the cause of those who solicited the repeal of the test act. In his general conduct Dr. Amory was exemplary, his discourses from the pulpit were excellent, but perhaps too serious and philosophical for the vulgar apprehension. His writings, which were mostly on theological subjects, have been enumerated by Dr. Kippis, Biogr. Brit. 1. p. 178. He died on the 24th June, 1774, in his seventy-fourth year.

AMORY, Thomas, Esq., an eccentric character, son of counsellor Amory who went with king William to Ireland, and acquired considerable property in the county of Clare. Young Amory was not born in Ireland though he resided there, and frequently accompanied dean Swift in his walks and excursions round Dublin, without being known. He afterwards lived in Orchard-street, Westminster, about 1757, with his wife and a son who acquired reputation as a physician, during a residence of 27 years at Wakefield. The most remarkable of his publications are his "memoirs on the lives of several ladies," octavo, 1755, and in 12mo. two vols., and his life of John Bunce, Esq., four vols. 12mo. In this last he is supposed to give a description of himself. He is said by a person who knew him, to have had a peculiar look, though not without the deportment of the gentleman. His application to his studies was intense, and his walks through the most crowded streets exhibited him wrapped in the deepest meditation and inattentive to what surrounded him. He died at the advanced age of ninety-seven, in May, 1789.

AMSDORF, Nicholas, a spirited follower of Luther and bishop of Nuremberg. He died at Magdeburg, 1541, and the sect who adhered to his tenets, and supported in opposition to Malanethon, that good works are not necessary to salvation, were called Amsdorfians.

AMURATH I., an Ottoman emperor, who succeeded his father Orchan, and was known for his cruelties towards his son, and those who espoused his cause. He was a great warrior, and obtained thirty-seven victories, in the last of which he perished, 1389, aged seventy-one, by the hand of a soldier. He was the first who established the formidable force of the Janizaries.

AMURATH II., was son and successor of Mahomet, as Ottoman emperor, and his armies were directed against the falling empire of the east. He was the first Turk who used cannon in the field of battle. He resigned the crown in favor of his son Mahomet, 1443, and retired to the seclusion of the dervises; but the invasion of the Hungarians roused him from his solitude to conquer at the dreadful battle of Varna. He afterwards reduced the rebellious Janizaries to obedience, and defeated the famous Scanderbeg, and finding his son incapable to hold the reigns of a turbulent empire, he abandoned his retirement again for the throne and again routed the Hungarians. He died 1451, aged seventy-five.

AMURATH III., succeeded his father Selim II., 1575, and to secure himself in the possession of the throne, he caused his five brothers to be assassinated. This act of cruelty so affected his mother that she destroyed herself. Amurath, like the race of Mahomet, was valiant, and he added several of the Persian provinces to his dominions. He died 18th Jan. 1595, aged fifty.

AMURATH I., succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1622, and was like his predecessors given to cruelty, and engaged in war. He took Bagdad, thirty thousand of whose inhabitants he put to the sword, though he had promised them protection. He died in 1640, aged 31, of excessive intoxication.

AMYOT, James, was born at Milan, 1513, of an obscure family, but though of a dull understanding, he improved himself by indefatigable application, and after studying at Paris, he acquired independence and reputation, as tutor to the children of persons of respectability. His merit recommended him to Margaret of Berry, sister to Francis I., and he was promoted to a public professorship in the university of Bourges. His time was here usefully devoted to literature, and he published translations of the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, besides Plutarch's lives and morals. He visited Venice and Rome, and in his return to France he was, at the recommendation of cardinal de Tourmon, intrusted with the care of the king's two younger sons, and for his meritorious services he was raised by Charles to the bishopric of Auxerre, the abbey of Cornelius de Compiègne, the high office of great almoner and curator of the university of Paris, and commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. He died 6th February, 1593, in his seventy-ninth year. Among his various works, chiefly translations, the most celebrated is his version of Plutarch, which remains unsurpassed in the French language.

AMYRAULT, Moses, a French protestant divine, born at Bourguil in Tourraïne, 1596. He studied the law, but afterwards entered the church and was divinity professor at Saumur, and distinguished himself by his zeal and activity so much, that he was deputed by the national council of Charenton to present an address to the French king, concerning the inspection of edicts in favor of the protestants, without however paying homage upon his knees. Richelieu, who was present at this interview, saw and admired the bold character of Amyrault, and he wished to use his abilities to procure a reconciliation between the Romish church and the protestants, but in vain. His life was passed in the midst of theological disputes, in which he displayed much firmness and composure, and as he enforced by his writings as well as his discourses the obedience due to a lawful sovereign, and the impropriety of resisting the constituted authorities in matters not of conscience, he was esteemed by persons of different persuasions, and by the ministers of the king themselves. This humane, virtuous, and charitable man died the 8th Feb., 1664, leaving one son, who distinguished himself as an advocate at Paris, but retired to the Hague, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. His works, which are very numerous, are chiefly theological.

AMYRUTZES, a philosopher of Trebizond, who was carried to Constantinople with David, emperor of Trebizond, when that city was reduced, 1461. He renounced the Christian faith for Mahometanism, and assumed the name of Mahomet Beg. He translated several books into Arabic, at the desire of Mahomet II., whose favor he enjoyed.

ANACHARSIS, a Scythian philosopher, who visited Athens in the age of Solon. On his return to Scythia he wished to introduce the laws and customs of the more polished Greeks into his country, but was thwarted in his views by the king, and at last perished by the hand of this cruel sovereign.

ANACREON, a lyric poet of Teos, who flourished about 532 years B. C. His morals were licentious, and his odes, therefore, exhibit the character of a man basely devoted to every intemperate indulgence, and who considers life as best spent in riot and debauchery.

ANASTASIUS, Bibliothecarius, a learned Greek of the ninth century, librarian of the church of Rome, and abbot of St. Mary, beyond the Tiber. He wrote Liber Pontificalis, four vols. folio, 718, containing the lives of some of the popes; and assisted at the eighth general council of Constantinople, whose canons he translated from Greek into Latin. Bishop Pearson places him in the sixth century.

ANASTASIUS, Theopolitanus, bishop of Antioch, was banished from his See, 570, for supporting, against the sentiments of Justinian, the opinion of the incorruptibles, which asserted that the body of our Saviour was incapable of corruption, even before his resurrection. He was restored 593, and died six years after. His successor was of the same name, and was author of some religious discourses.

ANATOLIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, yielded, after some dispute, with respect to the equality of the two metropolitan churches, superiority in ecclesiastical affairs, to Leo pope of Rome, and died 458.

ANATOLIUS, a bishop of Laodicea, about 269, eminent for his knowledge of arithmetic, geometry, and literature. His tract on the time of celebrating Easter, is in the Doctrina Temporum, printed at Antwerp, 1634.

ANAXAGORAS, a Grecian philosopher, born at Clazomene, in Ionia, B. C. 500, became a disciple of Anaximenes, at Miletus, and next settled at Athens, where he taught philosophy, and numbered the most eminent men of the age among his pupils. Being falsely accused of impiety, he was condemned to death; but the sentence was commuted for banishment, and he retired to Lampsacus, where he died 428 years B. C. His philosophical doctrines, though in some points erroneous, were far superior to those of his contemporaries. It was he who first assigned the creation of all things to a purely spiritual cause.

ANAXARCHUS, a philosopher of Abdera, accompanied Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition, and, on various occasions, reproved the pride and presumption of that conqueror. Yet his enemies have not failed to accuse him of adulation. It is, however, not probable that he could be a sycophant, who is acknowledged to have sometimes spoken the honest truth; and who taught that virtue is the sovereign good, and that the happiness of a real sage is independent of external objects. Nicocreon, tyrant of Cyprus, whom he had offended, is said to have pounded him to death in a mortar, after the death of Alexander; but the truth of this story is doubtful.

ANAXIMANDER, a Grecian philosopher, born at Miletus, 610 years B. C., was the disciple and successor of Thales, the founder of the Ionic sect. He is said to have discovered the obliquity of the ecliptic, fixed the epoch of the equinoxes and solstices, invented the sphere and the gnomon, and taught that the earth revolves, and that the sun is a globe of fire. Some of his philosophical opinions, however, are grossly absurd. He died 547 years B. C.

ANAXIMENES, a native of Lampsacus, was a philosopher, orator, and historian, and one of the preceptors of Alexander the Great. He wrote the lives of Philip and Alexander, and a History of Greece, all of which are lost. By a stratagem he saved his natal city from ruin. Lampsacus having sustained a long siege against Alexander, he resolved on its destruction, and foreseeing that Anaximenes would plead for it, he positively swore to do the contrary of what his preceptor should desire. Aware of this Anaximenes requested him to destroy it; and the necessary consequence was, that Lampsacus was saved.

ANAXIMENES, a philosopher of Miletus, was the disciple and successor of Anaximander. According to his system, all things originated from the air; the sun, the moon, and the stars, were formed from detached parts of the earth; the earth was a plain figure; and the heavens were a solid concave one, in which the stars were fixed like nails. He died 504 years B. C.

ANCILLON, David, a protestant divine, born at Metz, who in his youth refused to sacrifice his religion to the solicitations of the Jesuits. He studied divinity and philosophy at Geneva, under Du Pin, Spanheim, the Deodati, &c., and deserved to be recommended by the synod of Charenton to the church of Meaux. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired to Frankfort, and settled at Hanau, where his discourses were heard and admired by the most crowded audiences. His colleagues in the ministry, however, were jealous of his popularity, and their little intrigues forced him to abandon the place. He came to settle at Berlin, where he was received with kindness by the court, and had the satisfaction to see his family promoted to places of honor and trust. He died in his 75th year, 3d Sept., 1692. As his learning was very extensive, he published several useful works, and from the affluence of his circumstances, he made so judicious a collection of books, that it was frequently visited as a curiosity by foreigners who travelled through Metz. The best known of his works are, a relation of the controversy concerning traditions, 4to., 1657,—an apology for Luther, Zuingle, and Beza, 1666,—the life of William Parel,—Conversations, two volumes 12mo. published by his son.

ANCILLON, Charles, eldest son of the foregoing, was born at Metz, July 29th, 1659, and was made inspector of the French courts of justice, in Berlin, and historiographer to the king. He wrote on the edict of Nantes, and the persecution of the protestants, &c., and died at Berlin, July 5th, 1751.

ANCKWITZ, a Pole of considerable abilities. After being employed by his country as ambassador at the court of Denmark, and negotiating a treaty with the Russians, he was, at the insurrection of Warsaw in 1794, seized and imprisoned. His enemies accused him of attempts to betray his country to the Russians, and they endeavored to prove the assertion by the papers which they found in his possession. He was in consequence condemned and hanged at Warsaw with the greatest ignominy.

ANCOURT, Florent carton d', a French actor and dramatic writer, born at Fontainebleau, October, 1661. The Jesuits tried in vain to gain him into their society, but he preferred the study of philosophy and law to divinity, and at last turned his thoughts to the stage by marrying in his nineteenth year, an actress. Not satisfied with the unbounded applause given to his popular exertions, he commenced writing for the stage, and obtained by his pieces credit to himself and wealth to the actor. His conversation was so agreeable that he was universally courted, and Lewis XIV. bestowed many marks of his favor upon him, as also the duke of Bavaria, whose arrival at Paris was celebrated by the poet, by a particular entertainment written on the occasion. Ancourt, after being the hero of the stage, retired, in 1713, to his estate at Courcelles le Roy, in Berry, that he might devote himself to religion. He there translated the psalms into verse, and wrote a sacred tragedy, never printed. He died 6th December, 1726, in his sixty-fifth year. His plays were fifty-two in number. His works appeared in 9 vols. 12mo., 1729.

ANCUS MARTIUS, fourth king of Rome, gained victories over the neighboring states, and extended the confines of his kingdom to the sea shore, and built Ostia. He died after a reign of twenty-four years, B. C. 646.

ANDERSON, Alexander, professor of mathematics at Paris, and author in the 16th century of a book called Supplementum Apollonii Redivivi, dedicated to cardinal Perron, 1592.

ANDERSON, Andrew, a Glasgow printer, who obtained by clandestine means a patent from Charles II., to print every thing in Scotland for forty-one years. After his death, his patent was disputed, and though restricted to the printing of Bibles and acts of Parliament, it sunk into contempt.

ANDERSON, Adam, a Scotchman, for forty years employed as clerk to the South-sea house, and also trustee for the colonization in America, &c. He is known as the author of an historical and chronological deduction of trade and commerce, a most valuable book, published in 1762, and since republished, four volumes quarto. He died Jan. 10th, 1775.

ANDERSON, James, D. D., brother to Adam, was minister of the Scots presbyterian church in Swallow-street, London, and editor of the Diplomata Scotiae, and Royal genealogies. He was a thoughtless imprudent man.

ANDERSON, James, Esq., an advocate at the Scotch bar, and clerk of the Scotch parliament, 1700. He was author of a masterly vindication of the independence of the Scotch parliament, for which he was publicly thanked by that body, and rewarded with a pension of four hundred pounds per annum. He made a collection of records from king Duncan to Robert Bruce, which were beautifully engraved and published in one volume folio, by Ruddiman. He died at Edinburgh, 1712, aged forty-two.

ANDERSON, Edmund, a native of Lincolnshire, descended from a Scotch family. He studied at Lincoln college, Oxford, and afterwards at the Inner Temple, and was promoted to the dignity of judge under Elizabeth, 1578. He was advanced to the office of chief justice of the common pleas in 1582, and knighted, and four years after he sat in judgment upon the unfortunate Mary of Scotland, whose life was sacrificed to the jealousy and ambition of her rival. He afterwards presided at the trial of Davison, who had issued the warrant for the execution of that wretched queen. During the time that he served his country in the capacity of judge, he was esteemed for his firmness and impartiality. He maintained the dignity of the throne, and the rights of the people; but he never sacrificed his private feelings to influence and cabal, and he resisted Elizabeth herself, when she was advised to act contrary to the laws of the land. He was continued in his office under James, and died 1st August, 1605. His works, which are all on law, and which fully evince the integrity of his heart, and the depth of his judgment, were published by I. Goldesborough, Esq., 1653, in quarto.

ANDERSON, John, the son of a rich merchant at Hamburg, of which city he himself became the principal magistrate in 1725. He was distinguished for literary attainments, as well as for skill in diplomacy, which was called into action at different European courts. His principal works are a Glossary of the Ancient Teutonic and German Languages, a Commentary on the Bible, and the Natural History of Greenland, Iceland, and other parts of the Arctic regions. He died 1743.

ANDERSON, George, a native of Weston, Buckinghamshire, who, though for some time engaged in the humble occupations of a day laborer, distinguished himself by the powers of his genius, and his self-taught knowledge of mathematics. A neighboring clergyman saw and noticed the powers of his mind, and with friendly humanity enabled him to receive instructions at a grammar school, and to enter at New College, Oxford, where he took his master's degree, and took deacon's orders. From Oxford he came to London, and obtained the appointment of clerk in the board of control, under Lord Melville; but so indefatigable was his application, that he brought on a disorder which proved fatal, 30th April, 1796, in his thirty-sixth year. His widow received a pension, as the reward due to the merits of her husband. He was author of a general view of the variations in the affairs of the East India Company, since the conclusion of the war of 1784, and he also translated Archimedes' treatise on measuring the sand.

ANDERSON, Larz, a minister of Gustavus Vasa, whose abilities and intrigues raised him from obscurity to the dignity of chancellor of Sweden. He was the means of the introduction of Lutheranism into Sweden.

ANDERSON, James, a native of Scotland, and formerly of Monk's Hill, Aberdeenshire. Distinguished by superior talents for experimental husbandry, he was employed by government to examine into the state of the western coasts and islands of Scotland, and confirmed by his relations the accounts which had been given of the melancholy poverty and depression of the inhabitants. In 1780, the university of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of LL. D. Dr. A. was the author of numerous works on agriculture and political economy; and was conductor of the Bee, a periodical publication, consisting of essays, philosophical, philological, and miscellaneous, published some years ago at Edinburgh, and discontinued upon the completion of eighteen small octavo volumes. He was also the author of several articles for the Encyclop. Brit. 1st. vol. Edin. which are, under the heads dictionary, winds and monsoons, language, sound. He contributed numerous essays, in the early part of the Edinburgh Weekly Magazine, the principal of which were, Agricula, Timoleon, Germanicus, Cimon, Scoto Britannus, E. Aberdeen, Henry Plain, Impartial, a Scot. He reviewed the subject of agriculture for the Monthly Review for several years. He was born about the year 1739, at Hernton, a village about six miles from Edinburgh, and died in 1808.

ANDERSON, Walter, a Scottish clergyman and historian, who died in 1801, at his living of Chur-side, which he had held for half a century. In 1769, he published a History of France, during the reigns of Francis I. and Charles IX., which, in 1773 and 1783, he continued down to the peace of Munster. He is also the author of the philosophy of ancient Greece investigated; and of a Life of Cæsus.

ANDERSON, Rufus, born in Londonderry, N. H., in 1765, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1791. In 1794, he was settled as a congregational minister in North Yarmouth. After a ministry of ten years in this place, he was dismissed; and, in the year following, was installed at Wenham, where he died in 1814. He published two Fast Sermons, and Seven Letters against the close communion of the Baptists.

ANDERSON, Richard, a native of the state of Kentucky, was for some years a member of Congress, and afterwards minister of the United States to Colombia. Being appointed envoy extraordinary to the assembly of American nations at Panama, while on his way to that place he died at Carthage, July 24, 1826.

ANDERSON, John Wallace, M. D., a native of Hagerstown, Maryland. He was born, in 1802; received his medical education at Philadelphia; and, on the completion of it, in 1823, he returned to his native town, and settled as a practicing physician. Soon, however, he resolved to devote himself to the colonists of Liberia. His object was in a high degree philanthropic—not only to benefit them by his medical skill, but to promote, in Africa, the cause of temperance. He sailed Jan. 17, 1830, and arrived at the colony, on the 17th of Feb. Honorable and short was his career. He died, April 12, of the same year, aged 27.

ANDIER DES ROCHERS, John, a French engraver born at Lyons, known for his engravings after Corregio, and particularly for his portraits in busts of persons distinguished by birth or talents, amounting to upwards of 700, with descriptive verses at the bottom by Gaçon. He was rewarded with a fine gold medal by the Emperor Charles VI. for a portrait of his majesty. He died 1741, very advanced in years.

ANDRADA, Diego de Payva d', a Portuguese, born at Coniubria. He was sent by king Sebastian to the council of Trent, 1562, and there in defending the canons against Chemnitius, he distinguished himself by his eloquence as a preacher, and his vivacity in reasoning as an author. Though a warm catholic he is universally quoted by the protestants, and deservedly admired for his great erudition, deep penetration, and uncorrupted judgment.

ANDRE, John, a British officer, who from the counting house, entered the army, and embarked for the new continent under general Clinton, during the American troubles. He rose by his merits to the rank of major, and when general Arnold made an offer of surrendering a strong position to the British forces, André was intrusted with the delicate negotiation. When challenged by the American out-posts, he offered the sentinel his watch and money if permitted to return. The offer was indignantly rejected, and André examined before the American officers, and discovered by the papers which he had in his pocket, was regarded as a spy, and tried by a court-martial by order of general Washington. He was found guilty, and agreeably to the law and usage of nations was sentenced to suffer death. Though he requested to die like a soldier, the ignominious sentence of being hung was executed upon him 2d October 1780, and he fell with great intrepidity at the age of 29. A monument was erected to his memory by the king, in Westminster Abbey, with every mark of respect which could honor his virtues and commiserate his misfortunes.

ANDREAS, James, an eminent Lutheran, born 1523, in the duchy of Wirtemberg. His parents, who were poor, had bound him to a carpenter, but he was relieved from this humble situation by some persons of distinction, who had observed his promising genius, and in two years of close application he made himself master of Latin, Greek, and logic. He took his degrees at Tubingen, and was in 1540 made minister of Stutgard, which soon after he resigned. In those turbulent times of theological contention he took a bold and active part. In 1561 he was made chancellor and rector of the university of Tubingen, and from his learning and eloquence he acquired the friendship of the Dukes of Wirtemberg and Brunswiek, and of the emperor Maximilian II. His works are numerous, and all on polemical divinity, the most famous of which is that on Concord. He died 7th January, 1590.

ANDREAS, John, a native of Mugello near Florenee, who studied the canon law at Bologna, and by his application obtained there a professor's chair. He gained great popularity by his learning, as well as by the austerity of his life, as much of his time was devoted to prayer and fasting, and he lay upon the ground for 20 years, covered only with a bear skin. His daughter, called Novella, was carefully instructed in the learning of the times, and when her father was employed, she was introduced in his room to read lectures to his scholars; but that her great beauty might not draw off the attention of her audience, a curtain was placed before her. Novella married John Calderinus, a learned canonist. The works of Andreas were numerous and all on law. He died of the plague at Bologna in 1348, after enjoying his professorship 45 years. In his epitaph he was styled "Rabbi doctorum, lux, censor, normaque morum;" and pope Boniface called him "lumen mundi."

ANDREAS, John, a Mahometan of Xativa in Valencia, converted to Christianity on hearing a sermon in the great church of Valencia. He was instantly baptized and called John Andreas, from the calling of St. John and St. Andrew. He was afterwards admitted into holy orders, and exerted his abilities and his zeal in the conversion of the Moors, with wonderful success. He translated from the Arabic into Spanish the laws of the Moors, but his most valuable work was the "Confusion of the sect of Mahommed" in 12 chapters, in which he throws into view all the stories, fables, absurdities, and contradictions which the impostor has used as weapons to propagate his religion among the credulous Arabians. This work has been translated into several languages, and is frequently quoted by Christian writers.

ANDREÆ, John Gerhard Reinhard, a native of Hanover, son of an apothecary. He was brought up to his father's profession and followed the bent of his inclination in travelling over different countries to ascertain their natural history and their productions, thus to enlarge his knowledge of chemistry and botany. He died 1793, aged 69. He wrote various works on his favorite studies, the best known of which are his Tour in Switzerland, 4to, 1776—a treatise on the several kinds of earth found in Hanover, 1769.

ANDREINI, Isabella, a famous actress born at Padua 1562. She distinguished herself not only on the stage but also as a poetess, and the eulogiums passed upon her as well as her writings shew that she possessed, with great personal beauty, wit and genius in a superior degree. She visited France, where she was received by the court with particular attention. She died at Lyons, 10th of June 1604, in her 42d year.

ANDREOSSI, Count Anthony Francis, eminent as a soldier, diplomatist, and writer, was born at Castlenaudary, in Languedoc, in 1761, was a lieutenant of artillery at twenty, and served with distinction in Italy and Egypt. Napoleon raised him to the ranks of general and count. He was successively ambassador to London, Vienna, and Constantinople. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, Andreossi espoused his cause; and he was one of the commissioners chosen to treat with the allies by the provisional government. He died in 1827.

ANDREW, a native of Damascus, bishop of Aleria in Crete, and thence called of Crete, and of Jerusalem, because he retired there and died 720, or 723. He wrote commentaries on some books of scriptures, besides sermons, published at Paris 1644, folio.

ANDREW, a native of Pisa, known as a sculptor, architect, painter, and musician. He was highly honored by the Florentines, many of whose edifices were built on his plans, as also the arsenal of Venice. He died at Florence 1330, aged 60.

ANDREW DEL SARTO, a painter born at Florence 1433, son of a taylor. He was a great favorite of Francis I. of France, who wished to retain him, but in vain, as his wife insisted upon his residence in Italy. He is particularly commended for the coloring of his pictures, and the correctness and elegance of his figures, though there is a coldness and uniformity in all. He possessed the happy talent of copying pictures to such perfection, that Julio Romano, who had finished the draperies of Raphael's Leo Xth, took a copy of that celebrated piece by Del Sarto for the original. He died 1530.

ANDREW, Ives Mary, a native of Chateaulin in Cornouailles, professor of mathematics at Caen for 33 years. He was a man of great learning and genuine vivacity. His poetry is admired, but his chief work is his essay sur le beau, as also his traité sur l'homme. He retired from his laborious office 1759, and died 1764, February 26th, in his 89th year. His works were published together 1766, five vols. 12mo.

ANDREW I. king of Hungary, eldest son of Ladislaus the bald, left his native country with Bela his brother 1044, when Peter was raised to the throne. He was afterwards invited back by the people, who wished to restore the Pagan religion, but when invested with the royal power he violated his promise, and obliged his barbarous subjects to embrace Christianity. He was attacked by his brother and slain in battle, 1059.

ANDREW II. king of Hungary, succeeded his nephew Ladislaus 1204. He was in the crusades, and behaved with such valor that he obtained the surname of Ierosolymitan. He was successful in the wars in which he was engaged, and he endeavored to meliorate the situation of the middle ranks of his kingdom. He died 1235.

ANDREW III. king of Hungary, grandson of the preceding, succeeded on the death of Ladislaus, 1299. His elevation was opposed by Charles of Sicily, son of Ladislaus' sister, and a civil war and all its terrors were the consequence. The troubles continued till the death of both the rivals, who died the same year 1305.

ANDREW, son of king Charobert of Hungary, king of Naples, was called by the Neapolitans Andreasso. He married Joan II. queen of Naples his cousin, but such was the dislike which was kindled between these youthful sovereigns, that the queen was at last persuaded by her favorites to consent to the assassination of her husband in his 19th year, 1345.

ANDREWS or ANDREWE, Eusebius, a barrister of good family in Middlesex, secretary to lord Capel, and on the breaking out of the civil wars, a colonel in Charles' service. After the loss of Worcester, he attempted the recovery of the island of Ely, and being taken prisoner by the republican army he was prosecuted before Bradshaw and the high court of justice. He was condemned to be hanged and quartered, but on his petition the sentence was changed to beheading, which he suffered with great fortitude on Tower Hill, 22d August 1650.

ANDREWS, Lancelot, an English divine, born in London 1565. After being educated at Merchant Taylors', he entered on one of Dr. Watts' scholarships at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a public lecturer in divinity. His abilities were made known to Walsingham, secretary to Elizabeth, who procured for him, on the death of Fulke, St. Giles Cripplegate in London, and a prebend and residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He was afterwards chosen master of his college, and on the decease of Elizabeth he gained the favor of James so much by his pulpit eloquence, that the monarch employed him to defend his knightly right against the attack of cardinal Bellarmine, under the name of Matthew Tortus. Andrews supported his cause with firmness and spirit in his Tortura torti, and the king rewarded his zeal with the rank of privy counsellor, and the place of almoner, the deanery of the Royal chapel, and the bishopric of Chichester 1605. He was afterwards advanced to Ely, and then to Winchester; but though he enjoyed in the highest degree the favors of the monarch, he did not forget the dignity of his character, or his independence as an Englishman; and when James wished to know the sentiments of his courtiers with respect to raising money without parliamentary authority, he found Andrews decidedly severe against the unconstitutional measure. He died September 27, 1626. Milton has written an elegant elegy on him. Besides the Tortura torti, he wrote a manual of devotions in Greek translated by Stanhope into English, a volume of sermons printed after his decease by Laud and Buckeridge, and he had a share in translating the Pentateuch and the books from Joshua to 1st Chronieles.

ANDREWS, Henry, a self-taught mathematician, was born in 1744, at Frieston near Grant-ham, of poor parents. At an early age, he was placed as a servant to a shop-keeper, and next with a lady of Lincoln, where he amused himself at leisure hours in making weather glasses. The gentleman, with whom he afterwards lived, encouraged him in his pursuits, by which means he was enabled to open a school, first at Basingthorpe, and lastly at Royston, where he also carried on the bookselling business, and died January 26th, 1820. For more than forty years he was the computer of the Nautical Ephemeris; and calculator of Moore's Almanac.

ANDREWS, James Pettit, was born in 1737, and died in 1797. In his youth, he was an officer in the Berks militia, England, and was a police magistrate at the time of his decease. He is the author of a History of Great Britain, connected with the Chronology of Europe; a continuation of Henry's English History; and other works of merit.

ANDREWS, Miles Peter, was the second son of an eminent London merchant, and became principal proprietor of the lucrative Dartford Powder Mills, on the death of his brother. On receiving this accession of fortune, he mingled with the circles of fashion, and devoted his leisure hours to writing for the stage; theatricals being his favorite amusement. He died in 1814.

ANDREWS, John, D. D. a native of Maryland, He was born, April 4, 1746; received his education at Philadelphia; and, was admitted to holy orders, in the Episcopal church, at London, Feb. 1767. After having officiated, as a clergyman, at different stations, in 1785 he was appointed principal of the Episcopal academy, Philadelphia. In 1789 he was made professor of moral philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania; and, in 1810, became provost of the same institution. He died March 29, 1813, aged 67 years.

ANDRIEU, Bertrand, was born at Bordeaux in 1761, and died at Paris in 1822; he distinguished himself greatly as an engraver of medals, of which art he is considered as the restorer in France. A large part of the medals in the royal cabinet and library, which are looked upon as master-pieces, are the work of Andrieu.

ANDRONICUS I. son of Isaac Commenus, was imprisoned for his rebellious conduct against the emperor Manuel, but after 12 years confinement, he escaped into Russia, and on the elevation of young Alexis II. he had the art to cause himself to be received as a protector, and as partner of the throne. Thus armed with power he strangled the unsuspecting youth, and seated himself sole emperor on the throne of Constantinople 1183, in his 71st year. His cruelties, however, rendered him odious, and he was two years after seized in an insurrection, and put to death in the most ignominious manner, and Isaac Angelus placed in his room.

ANDRONICUS, Livius, the oldest of the Roman dramatists. His first piece was presented before the Roman people about 240 B. C.

ANDRONICUS, Cyrestes, an Athenian, said to be the inventor of weather-cocks, and the architect of the famous octagon temple built at Athens in honor of the winds.

ANDRONICUS, a Rhodian philosopher, who published the collected works of Aristotle. He flourished in the age of Sylla, about 63 B. C.

ANDROUET DU CERCEAU, James, an architect, at the end of the 16th century, who furnished the designs for the grand gallery of the Louvre, the Pont-neuf, &c. He published some works on his profession, and died abroad, whither he had retired as a zealous disciple of Calvin.

ANDRUS, Joseph R., a graduate of Middlebury College. He took his degree in 1812, and after a due course of theological study, received ordination in the Episcopal church. For several years he was strongly impressed with the idea of devoting himself to the benefit of the degraded and oppressed Africans. Being appointed agent of the American Colonization Society, early in 1821, he sailed for Sierra Leone, which place he safely reached; but, at which, in July following, death terminated his pious labors.

ANDRY, Nicholas, a professor of philosophy, and dean of the faculty of medicine at Paris, was a native of Lyons, and author of several treatises now little known, except those on medicine, which preserve his fame, especially a treatise on the generation of worms in the human body—on phlebotomy—on orthopædia, or the method of correcting deformities in children. He died 1742, aged 84.

ANELLO, Thomas, called commonly Massanello, a fisherman of Naples, born 1623. He felt for the wrongs of his country, when the Austrian government, to which Naples was subject, laid a fresh tax upon fruits which the already oppressed people were unable to bear. Stimulated by Anello, the multitude rose, destroyed the toll houses, and rifled the palace of the viceroy, who with difficulty made his escape. Anello possessed firmness and popularity, and he was invested with the supreme power, and saw himself suddenly at the head of 150,000 people, who with the most implicit obedience bowed to his very nod. In his elevation he did not forget the right of the nation, he signed a solemn convention with the terrified government, and after he had secured the freedom of the subject, he nobly determined to lay aside his power, and to retire to a private station. The thought was heroic, but the solicitations of his wife and kindred, or the more powerful calls of ambition, forbid it; and he still continued his authority, lost in debauchery and intemperance, till the dagger of four assassins rid the world of a man whom the intoxication of splendor began to render cruel and vindictive, 1647.

ANEURIN, a British poet, celebrated as the king of bards, and also as the heroic leader of the Oldian Britons at the battle of Cattraeth. The valor displayed on this bloody day was celebrated by the warlike bard in a poem which is still preserved among the records of Welch literature, as also his odes of the months. He died about 570. Some suppose that this famed poet was the same as the venerable historian Gildas.

ANGE DE ST. JOSEPH, le Pere, a Carmelite of Toulouse, whose real name was la Brosse. He travelled into Persia as missionary, and translated the Persian pharmacopœia into Latin, printed 1631, 8vo. Paris, besides a treatise on the language of the country, a useful and very valuable performance, edited Amsterdam, 1684, folio. He died at Perpignan, 1697.

ANGELI, Bonaventure, a native of Ferrara, and professor of the law, author of the history of Parma, printed 1591. He died 1576, at Parma, where he had settled.

ANGELI, Peter, a Latin poet of Barga in Tuscany. After teaching the learned languages at Reggio in Lombardy, he came to Pisa, where Cosmo I. patronized him, and seated him on a professorial chair. When the town was suddenly besieged by Strozzi in 1554, Angeli animated the students by his example, and withstood the enemy till succours came from Florence. He wrote two poems, Cynegeticon or of the Chase, in six books, printed in 8vo. 1568, which cost him 20 years labor, and Syrius or the expedition of Godfrey de Bouillon, in 12 books, 1591, 4to. He died 1596, aged 79.

ANGELIS, Dominico de, a native of Lecce in Otranto, whose learning procured him admission into the most celebrated academies, when he travelled through France and Spain. When Philip V. of Spain was master of Naples, he was appointed historiographer, and afterwards was made secretary to the duke of Gravina. He deserved every distinction, as his services in literature show. His compositions are 14 in number, mostly upon historical, biographical, or critical subjects, in Italian. He died at Lecce, 9th August 1719, in his 44th year.

ANGELO BUONAROTI, Michael, a great painter, sculptor, and architect. He was born 1474, at the castle of Chiusi in Tuscany, and was nursed by a woman of Settinianno, whose husband was eminent as a sculptor, so that he was said to have sucked sculptor with his very milk. His genius was early displayed, and it raised such jealousy among his youthful rivals, that one of them, Torrigianno, struck him with such violence on the nose, that he carried the mark to his grave. The protection of Lorenzo de Medicis raised him to consequence. An academy was erected, but the painter fled with his patron during the troubles of Florence, and retired to Bologna. It is said that, about this time, he made and buried an image of Cupid at Rome, which was soon after dug up, and considered by cardinal Gregory as a most valuable antique, till Michael Angelo proved it to be his own, by fitting to it the broken arm which it had lost, and which he had kept on purpose. The most celebrated of his pieces is his last judgment, painted for Paul III. though it is perhaps to be lamented, that the artist's revenge had been cruelly immortalized, by his representation of a cardinal, who was his enemy, in the number of the damned. His architectural abilities are best displayed in the public buildings of Florence, and particularly of Rome, where he completed the building of St. Peter's church, in the execution of which he spent 17 laborious years without salary. He was also an elegant poet, as his sonnets and canzonets fully show. He died 1564, aged 90.

ANGELONI, Francis, born at Terni in Spolatto, was author of an history of his native town, and of a valuable Augustan history by medals, from J. Cæsar to Constantine the great, the best edition of which is Rome 1685, fol. He wrote also the history of Terni, and died 1652.

ANGELUS, Christopher, a learned Greek, driven from Peloponnesus by the Turks. He came to England, and studied at Cambridge under the patronage of the bishop of Norwich. He afterwards went to Balliol college, Oxford, where he proved very useful in instructing the students in Greek. He died 1638. He was author of several works, the most valuable of which is his account of his sufferings, printed 1617, in Greek and English.

ANGHIERA, Peter Martyr D^r, better known by the name of Peter Martyr only, an Italian scholar of a noble Milanese family. He was born in 1455, and early patronized by the archbishop of Milan. In 1487, he visited Spain, and was presented to Ferdinand and Isabella, who employed him, after his taking orders, in an errand of considerable delicacy to the sultan of Egypt, during which mission he visited the pyramids. On his return he received various valuable appointments in the church; and on the accession of Charles V., that monarch also presented him with a rich abbey. He died at Grenada in 1526, leaving several historical works which are usually quoted under the name of Peter Martyr.

ANGILBERT, St. descended from a noble family of Neustria, studied under Alcuinus with Charlemagne, and not only became his minister and favorite, but married his daughter Bertha. He was made governor of the coast from the Scheld to the Seine, but he resigned his honors and the company of his wife for the monastery of Centula or St. Requier of which he became the abbot. He was often drawn from his religious retirement to affairs of state; he went three times to Rome, and saw Charlemagne crowned emperor of the West. Of his works few remain. He was so elegant a poet that Charlemagne called him his Homer. He died the 18th of February 814.

ANGIOLELLO, born at Vicenza, wrote in the Italian and Turkish tongue an history of Mahomet I. which he inscribed to him. He had been slave to Mustapha in an expedition to Persia 1473, and therefore his history is that of an eye witness. He wrote also the history of Usson Casson.

ANGLUS, Thomas, an English priest, the friend of Sir Kenelm Digby, known by the several names of Albins Candidus, Bianchi, Richworth, White, and Vitus, which he assumed in the different countries of Europe, where he spent the greatest part of his life. He distinguished himself by his learning and genius, but his fondness for the Peripatetic philosophy, and his attempts to apply the principles of Aristotle to explain the mysteries of religion, created him many enemies, who procured the condemnation of his writings, both at Donay and at Rome. He died after the restoration of Charles II. but the year is unknown.

ANGUILLARA, John Andrew Dell^r, one of the most celebrated Italian poets of the sixteenth century, was born at Sutri, in Tuscany, about 1517; the period of his death is unknown, but must have been subsequent to 1564. His principal work is his Translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, which, though often unfaithful, and sinning against good taste, has great merit. For the representation of his tragedy of Œdipus, a theatre was built at Vincenza by the celebrated Palladio. Anguillara, however, lived and died in poverty.

ANGUSCIOLA, Sophonisba, a native of Almona in Italy, eminent for her historical and portrait paintings. She bestowed such attention to her profession that she became blind. She died 1626, aged 93. Her sister Lucia and Europa, also excelled in the execution of the pencil.

ANICH, Peter, son of a turner, was born at Obersperfus near Inspruck 1723, and after being employed as a laborer and a shepherd, his genius for mechanics burst forth, and was improved and corrected by the friendly assistance of father Hill a Jesuit. He was admired for his knowledge of astronomy, for the elegance and accuracy of the maps and charts which he drew; and the pair of globes which he made for the university of Inspruck were justly considered as of superior beauty and value. He died early in life 1766, seriously lamented, and the empress queen honored his memory by bestowing a pension of 50 florins on his sister.

ANICHINI, Lewis, a Venetian engraver, much celebrated for the delicacy and precision with which he engraved even the minutest objects. It was at the sight of his pieces that Michael Angelo exclaimed, that the art of engraving under his hand had reached the summit of perfection. His best pieces was a medal of Alexander the great, prostrating himself before the high-priest at Jerusalem, the head of pope Paul III. and Henry III. of France on the reverse.

ANKERSTROOM, John James, a Swedish officer who, in the war carried on by Sweden against Russia, suffered himself to be gained over against the interests of his country. He was discovered and sentenced to death, but the pardon of his king, instead of producing gratitude and loyalty, rendered his hatred more inveterate. He conspired against Gustavus, and as the unsuspecting monarch entered a room where a masked ball was assembled, the assassin discharged at him a pistol containing two balls and some nails. The wound was mortal and the king expired, 29th March 1792. The 27th of April following the bloody murderer was led to execution, but instead of contrition he gloried in his deed. His right hand and his head were cut off.

ANNA COMMENA, daughter of Alexis Commenus emperor of Constantinople, and celebrated for the Greek history which she has written, in which, with great elegance and spirit, though often with partiality, she records the events which distinguished her father's reign.

ANNA IVANOVNA, daughter of Ivan Alexiovitch, emperor of Russia, married in 1710 Frederic William duke of Courland, and succeeded Peter II. on the throne 1730. At the death of her husband, 1719, she took for her favorite Biren, a person of low birth, but great duplicity; and when raised to the throne her subjects were ruled by this capricious and cruel minion, who it is said banished no less than 20,000 persons to Siberia through pique, malice and revenge. Anna died 1740, aged 47. She was succeeded by her grand-nephew Ivan, whose minority was intrusted to the care of the guilty Biren, now raised to the dignity of duke of Courland.

ANNAND, William, A. M. a native of Edinburgh, who was chosen one of the ministers and became a popular preacher there. He behaved with great kindness towards the persecuted presbyterians, and opposed James when he wished to dispense with the penal laws. At the revolution he was made dean of Raphoe in Ireland, where he died 1710, aged 64. He wrote a volume of valuable sermons, little known.

ANNAT, Francis, a native of Rouergue, of the order of the Jesuits, teacher of philosophy at Toulouse, and afterwards employed at Rome and in France, in the service of the pope. He was made confessor to the French king 1654, which office he held 16 years, and then solicited his dismissal from increasing infirmities. He is known for his great zeal in opposing the Jansenists, and for his uncon-mon modesty and disinterestedness which never employed the influence he possessed at court to promote his family. His writings, which are controversial, are admired for great judgment, learning, and moderation. He died at Paris 1670, aged 80.

ANNE, of Austria, daughter of Philip II. of Spain married Lewis XIII. 1615, and was mother of Lewis XIV. of France. The intrigues of Richelieu rendered her marriage state unhappy, but during the minority of her son, she was permitted to govern the kingdom by means of Mazarine; but though she offended the nation by means of this favorite, her power was rendered popular by the victories of the great Condé. When Lewis XIV. succeeded to the government in 1660, she retired to a convent, and died 1666, aged 64.

ANNE, of Beaujen, daughter of Lewis XII. of France, married the duke of Bourbon, and was regent during the minority of her brother Charles VIII. Her government was marked by prudence, firmness, and wisdom, though in her private character she was vindictive and violent. She died at Chantelle 1522, aged 60.

ANNE, of Britany, was daughter and heiress of the last duke of that dutchy. She was wife of Maximilian of Austria, and next married Charles VIII. of France, and after his death Lewis XII. She was celebrated for her beauty, her modesty, and her patronage of the learned and the indigent. She died 1514 in her 38th year.

ANNE, of Cleves, a daughter of John III. duke of Cleves. Her picture by Holbein was shown by lord Cromwell to Henry VIII. and he demanded her for his queen. The painter had flattered the princess, and Henry, soon disgusted with this ill treated woman, obtained a divorce from his obsequious parliament. Anne, without struggle, and indeed with unconcern, left England, and retired to Cleves, where she died 1557.

ANNE, daughter of James II. succeeded William III. as queen of England. Her reign forms a brilliant epoch in the English history from the victories of Marlborough; but she possessed not the firmness required to distinguish the merits and virtues of her subjects; and while she suffered herself to be ruled by a cabal, she lost the power of destroying the dissensions which agitated her courtiers. Under her administration, Scotland was united to England. The queen possessed the peculiar felicity of having for her ministers the ablest statesman that ever lived, and among her subjects the most learned, sublime, and eloquent writers in the walks of poetry, science, and general literature; and therefore with truth her reign has been denominated the Augustan age of England. In 1683 she married prince George of Denmark, by whom she had several children who all died young. She died August 1714 aged 50.

ANNESLEY, Samuel, LL.D. a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards chaplain of a man of war, and then minister of Blisse in Kent, where his services as a pastor were of the most benevolent nature. He afterwards, in consequence of his violent sermons against the monarchy, obtained St. Giles Cripplegate, London, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity 1662. He died 1696, Dec. 31, aged 77, author of several sermons. It is said John Wesley was his grandson by the mother's side.

ANNESLEY, Arthur, earl of Anglesey, a native of Dublin 1614, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, which he left to study the law at Lincoln's Inn. In the beginning of the civil wars he favored the royal cause, and sat in the parliament held at Oxford in 1643; but he afterwards espoused the republican side, and was employed with success as a commissioner in quelling the disturbances of Ulster, and in withdrawing the command of Dublin from the hands of the duke of Ormond. The violence of his party, however, displeased him, and, after the death of Cromwell, he began to favor the re-establishment of regal authority, and on Charles's return he was made a peer for his signal services, as his patent mentions, in effecting the restoration. He was made treasurer of the navy 1667, and 1672 commissioner to examine the affairs of Ireland, and the next year privy seal; but his political quarrel with Lord Castlehaven and the duke of Ormond, with respect to the insurrections in Ireland, rendered him unpopular with the king, to whom, in 1682, he ventured to present a petition against the succession of the duke of York, and he resigned, and retired to his seat at Bleachingdon, Oxfordshire. He was marked out by James II. for the office of chancellor, but his death prevented his elevation to this dignity, April 6th, 1686, in his 73d year. He was a man of abilities, and great sagacity and learning. He wrote, besides political pamphlets, a valuable history of the troubles of Ireland, from 1641 to 1660, said to have been destroyed. He was the first of those spirited nobles, who considered a choice library as an ornament to their splendid equipage, and he made a valuable but expensive collection. His interesting memoirs were published 1603, 8vo.

ANNET, PETER, a deistical writer, was a native of the town of Liverpool and educated for a dissenting minister. He first distinguished himself as an opponent to Christianity, by an attack on Bishop Sherlock's tract on the resurrection; but his best known production is "the History of the Man after God's own Heart," occasioned by a comparison made by Dr. Chandler between George II, then just deceased, and king David. In 1762 he published a paper, entitled "The Free Inquirer," for which he was prosecuted and sentenced to the pillory and imprisonment. He died in 1778.

ANNIUS, de Viterbo, a Dominican, whose real name was John Nanni, master of the sacred palace of Alexander VI. He wrote commentaries, &c. besides 17 books of antiquities, a foolish and injudicious collection of the spurious works attributed to Xenophon, Archilochus, Philo, Fabius Pictor, Berosus, &c. a mean artifice, which for some time succeeded upon the unsuspecting judgment of the learned. He died 1502 at Rome, aged 70.

ANSCHARIUS, a Frenchman, bishop of Hamburg and Bremen, celebrated for the success of his preaching in the conversion of the Danes to Christianity. He died 865, aged 64.

ANSELM, a native of Aost in Savoy, who came over to England in 1092, and was with difficulty prevailed upon by king Rufus to fill the vacant see of Canterbury. Though gratitude might have influenced the conduct of a subject, Anselm looked with indifference upon the monarch, and refused to receive the metropolitan pall from his hands. A quarrel thus begun, was more strongly fomented, while the one wished to abridge, and the other wished to enlarge, the powers of the church, and therefore, Anselm had no sooner left the kingdom to repair to Rome, than the king seized the revenues and privileges of the archbishop. The prelate complained to Urban II. who, while he wished to defend the rights of his office, did not fail to listen to the more powerful arguments of his rival, accompanied by presents and promises, and the dispute remained undecided till the death of the monarch, and the pope. On the accession of Henry I. Anselm, who had resided at Lyons, received an invitation to return, and his arrival was marked with the most extraordinary respect, both from the king and the people; but when re-investiture was demanded, and the homage generally paid to a new monarch, the haughty prelate refused, and found his conduct applauded at Rome. The king was firm in his determination, and Anselm was bound to obey the commands of the pope, who regarded the claims of the king as intrusive. The bishops, who had before espoused the cause of the king, now changed their sentiments, and Anselm, who had retired into Normandy, at last had the gratification to see the king come to solicit a reconciliation. Anselm returned to England before the final settlement of this dispute, and died 21st of April 1109 in his 76th year. He was author of several theological treatises. He was the first prelate who insisted upon the celibacy of his clergy, in the synod of Westminster 1102. In his time, it is remarkable, that the archbishop of York attempted to throw off the dependency on the see of Canterbury, in which, however, he failed. Anselm was canonized under Henry VII. at the instance of his successor cardinal Morton. His works were published at Cologne 1612, and at Lyons 1630.

ANSELM, an Augustine monk, author of a chronological history of France, &c. 1694, continued afterwards and swelled, by Ange and Simplicien, to nine vols. folio 1726. He died at Paris 1694, aged 69.

ANSELM, Anthony, son of a surgeon of Armagnac, distinguished himself as a preacher and poet. His panegyrics and funeral orations were much admired. He died 1737, aged 86.

ANSON, George, Lord, was born, in 1697, at his father's seat in Staffordshire, and manifested early an inclination to the sea. He first obtained a command in 1722, but did not acquire celebrity till he was placed at the head of an expedition to the South Sea, in 1740. After losing all his ships but one, and encountering many difficulties, but not without having severely harassed the Spanish settlements, he was so fortunate as to capture a rich galleon, on her passage from Acapulco to Manilla, and to reach England in safety, after an absence of nearly four years. He was successively made rear-admiral of the blue, a lord of the admiralty, rear-admiral of the white, and vice-admiral of the blue. In 1747, he defeated a French squadron, and captured six men of war, and four East Indianen. He was rewarded with a barony, and rose through all the intermediate ranks of the navy till he became admiral, and commander in chief of the British fleet. Lord Anson died in 1762. He was a brave and skilful seaman, but had little knowledge of the world, and his love of play made him the dupe of sharpers.

ANSTEY, Christopher, a poet, born in 1721, was educated at Bury St. Edward's Eton, and King's College, Cambridge. At college he obtained a fellowship, which he resigned in 1754, on his succeeding to his patrimonial property. For some time he blended the occupations of a country gentleman with literary pursuits; but, afterwards, resided principally at Bath. In 1766 appeared his New Bath Guide, which obtained rapid and deserved popularity. It has been often imitated, but its wit, humour, and playfulness, have not yet been equalled. Anstey produced several other poems, all of considerable merit, but inferior to the New Bath Guide. He died in 1805.

ANSTIS, John, a native of St. Neots in Cornwall, born 28th Sept. 1669, and educated at Exeter college Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. He was in 1702 member for St. Germain's, and opposed the bill for occasional conformity, for which he was ridiculed among the Tackers. He was commissioner of prizes under queen Anne, and was garter king at arms from 1714 to his death, which happened March 4th, 1744. He was buried at Dulo in Cornwall. He was distinguished by his great knowledge of heraldry, a science which he enriched by many learned publications. The best known of his publications were a letter on the honor of the earl marshal, 8vo. 1706—the form of the garter installation, 8vo. 1720—the register of the noble order of the garter, 2 vols. folio, 1724—observation introductory and an historical essay on the knighthood of the Bath, 4to. 1725. He died a bachelor Dec. 5th, 1744.

ANTHEMIUS, Procopius, of the family of the tyrant Procopius, married Flavia Euphemia, daughter of Marcian. His alliance as well as his valor procured him the title of Augustus 467. He gave his daughter in marriage to Ricimer, a general, who soon after attacked Rome and inbrued his hands in the blood of his father-in-law 472.

ANTHONY, Saint, the founder of monastic life, was born at Cona in Egypt, 251. He sold his possessions, which he distributed to the poor, and retired into the desert, where, for 20 years, say the catholics, his virtue was exposed to the greatest temptations from the wiles of Satan, till he prevailed, and saw himself at last surrounded by a crowd of followers, zealous to merit his blessings and to imitate his piety. He twice visited Alexandria to give assistance to the suffering Christians under the persecution of Arius. He died 356, in the 105th year of his age.

ANTHONY, Francis, was born in London April 16th 1550, and studied at Cambridge, where he laid the foundation of that chemical knowledge which enabled him to impose upon the credulous and the unwary, by selling his panacea of potable gold, on which a treatise was printed at Hanburgh 1598. His success as an empiric was great, but he was violently opposed by Drs. Gwinne and Cotta, and it was confidently asserted that his nostrum was poisonous, and many on their death bed attributed their death to it. The inoffensiveness of his manners, his learning and his private virtues, however, stemmed the torrent of unpopularity, and though he was fined and imprisoned for practising without a license, his reputation and his fortune increased. He died in Bartholomew Close, May 26th, 1623, aged 74.

ANTHONY, king of Navarre, was son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, and married Joan d' Albert 1548, who brought him the principality of Bearne and the kingdom of Navarre. He was a weak and irresolute prince. He abandoned the protestant tenets for the catholic faith, and then formed, with the duke of Guise and the constable Montmorency, the famous league called triumvirate. During the civil wars, in 1562, he took the command of the army, and Blois, Tours and Rouen surrendered to his arms. He was wounded on the shoulder at the siege of this last place, and died 35 days after at Andeli, 17th Nov. 1562. His son was afterwards the celebrated Henry IV. of France.

ANTHONY, titular king of Portugal, was son of Lewis the second son of king Emanuel. His pretensions to the throne were opposed by Philip II. of Spain, who sent the duke of Alva against him 1580, and obliged him to fly from his dominions. Anthony was a wretched fugitive in Holland, France and England, and died at Paris, 2d May 1595, aged 64.

ANTIGONUS, son of Aristobulus II. king of Judea, was led in the procession when Pompey triumphed over Jerusalem. He attempted in vain to recover the kingdom by soliciting the favors of Caesar, and then had recourse to Pacorus king of Parthia, who placed him on the throne of Jerusalem. He was afterwards driven from his power by the generals of M. Antony, and ignominiously put to death 37 B. C.

ANTIMACHO, Mark Anthony, a native of Mantua, author of some Latin poems, and of some Italian translations from the Greek. He died 1552 at Ferrara, where he was much respected as a Greek professor.

ANTINE, Maur Francois d', a Benedictine who was born at Gouvieux in Liege, and died 1746, aged 58. He was highly admired for his piety, and the mildness of his manners. He published the first 5 vols. of Du Cange besides other valuable historical works, especially the art of verifying dates, 1750 in 4to. re-printed folio 1770.

ANTIOCHUS, Grypus, son of Sidetes, caused his mother Cleopatra to drink a cup of poison which she had prepared for him. He fell by the hand of one of his subjects B. C. 97.

ANTIPATER, a native of Macedonia, the able minister both of Philip and of his son Alexander the Great. The great political talents of Antipater seem to have been unalloyed, from first to last, with mere personal ambition; and in consequence his services were as steady and faithful as they were able. Of this truth Philip was so sensible, that on one occasion coming late to a levee, he said, "I have slept soundly this morning, but I knew that Antipater was awake."

ANTIPATER, a Jew, minister to Hyrcanus, the brother of Aristobulus the high priest. By the friendship of the Romans he obtained the sovereign power over his country, but his conduct rendered him unpopular, and he died by poison B. C.

ANTONIA, daughter of Mark Antony and Octavia, married Drusus, by whom she had three children, and proved a virtuous wife in the midst of a dissipated city. She died in the reign of her grandson Caligula.

ANTONIANO, Silvio, a man of extensive learning, born of obscure parents at Rome 1540. When he was but ten years old, he could compose verses with uncommon facility, and as a proof of this, he was produced at the table of the cardinal of Pisa, where Alexander Farnese gave him a nosegay, and desired him to give it with an appropriate address to the man whom he considered as likely to be pope, which he immediately did to the cardinal of Medici, afterwards Pius IV. with a delicate poetical eulogium. These uncommon talents were improved by the patronage of the duke of Ferrara; and when Pius IV. was seated in St. Peter's chair, he remembered the youthful poet, and gave him an honorable situation in his palace. Antoniano was professor of belles lettres at Rome, and saw not less than 25 cardinals among his auditors; and afterwards as rector, and under Pius V. secretary to the sacred college for 25 years, he preserved the same dignity of character and the same popularity. He was at last made cardinal by Clement VIII. but he refused the honors of a bishopric, satisfied with literary ease and retirement. He died through excessive application 1603, in his 63d year, leaving several admired pieces both in prose and verse.

ANTONIDES, VANDER GOES, John, a poet born at Goes in Zealand, April 3d, 1547. The early part of his life was passed at Amsterdam, and he was bred up as an apothecary; but the fondness which he had for the classics proved more powerful than the pestle and mortar, and though he pursued his medical studies, and took a degree at Leyden, he applied himself to cultivate poetry.

His first attempt was a tragedy called Trazil or the invasion of China. His modesty would not permit him to make it public; but Vondel, who was engaged on a similar play, read it with raptures, and as it was to be devoted to the flames, obtained the permission to adopt as his own some of the most striking and beautiful passages. On the conclusion of the war with England, in 1697, the poet wrote his Bellona chained, and afterwards his beautiful poem called the river Y, in four books. In this he has displayed his genius as a poet. The river on which Amsterdam is built, is a fertile subject for superior talents, and as such it has been treated. The first books give a description of every thing worthy of admiration on the banks of the Y, on which the city stands. In the 2d, he contemplates the navies which repose on its bosom, and spread commerce and knowledge through the world. In the third, in a masterly episode, he transports himself to the bottom of the river, and sees the divinities of the ocean going to celebrate the anniversary of Thetis's marriage with Peleus; and in the last, he paints the wonders of the other side of the river; and concludes with a delicate compliment to the magistrates of the city. He died of a consumption 18th Sept. 1684. His works were edited at Amsterdam 1714 in 4to.

ANTONINUS PIUS, a celebrated Roman emperor, who succeeded Adrian 138, and died universally lamented 161.

ANTONINUS, Marcus Aurelius, surnamed the Philosopher, succeeded the preceding, and married his daughter Faustina. His conduct on the throne was so universally popular that the gratitude of Rome placed him at his death among the number of the gods, 180. He was succeeded by his worthless son Commodus.

ANTONIO, Nicolas, a native of Seville, who, after studying at Salamanca, retired to his native town, where he composed his useful Bibliotheca Hispanica, in four vols. folio 1672, containing an account of all the Spanish writers. As he was an ecclesiastic, he was happily patronised both in Spain and at Rome, and the whole of his income was spent either in acts of charity, or in the purchase of books, which at last swelled his collection to 30,000 volumes. Besides his Bibliothèque he projected other works, and wrote a treatise on exile, &c. He died 1634 aged 67, leaving nothing behind him besides his valuable collection of books.

ANTONIUS, Marcus, a Roman orator of great celebrity, and much commended by Cicero. He was killed in the civil wars of Marius and Cinna, B. C. 67.

ANTONIUS, Marcus, a celebrated Roman, grandson of the orator. He distinguished himself in war, and, as the friend of Julius Cæsar, he obtained consequence at Rome and in the armies. On the death of Cæsar he conducted himself with great art, and by his dissimulation obtained a share of the Roman empire, in the triumvirate which he formed with Augustus and Lepidus. He had married Octavia the sister of Augustus, but his partiality for Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, occasioned a civil war, and Antony, crushed at the battle of Actium, fled to Egypt, there to perish by his own hands B. C. 30.

ANVARI, called king of Khorassan, from the superiority of his poetical talents, was the favorite of the sultan Sangiar, and the rival of the poet Raschidi, who had espoused the cause of Alsitz. Whilst the two princes were engaged in war, the two poets assailed one another by rhymes sent on the point of arrows; but this amusement was of short duration. Anvari was accused for his predictions as an astrologer and fled to Balke, where he died 1200. He possessed genius, and to his correct judgment the Persians owed the repression of licentiousness among their poets.

ANVILLE, John Baptiste Bourguignon d^s, a celebrated geographer, whose early genius tended to that superiority which he has so justly acquired. While at school he drew charts and globes for his amusement; he traced with indefatigable zeal the march of generals, and in his riper age he applied himself daily for 15 hours during 50 years to give correctness, accuracy, and perfection to his labors. His maps are highly and deservedly esteemed, as modern discoveries are carefully marked out. He is author of several very valuable works on geography and history, besides learned papers in the academy of inscriptions. The best known of his works are—a dissertation on the extent of ancient Jerusalem—some particulars of ancient Gaul from the remains of the Romans—an abridgment of ancient geography, 3 vols.—on ancient and modern Egypt, with a description of the Arabian gulf—the governments established in Europe after the fall of the Roman empire in the west—a treatise on itinerary measures ancient and modern—geographical analysis of Italy, &c.—He died at Paris 23th Jan. 1782, aged 80.

ANYTUS, a rhetorician of Athens, who caused the condemnation and death of Socrates. He was afterwards stoned to death at Heraclea.

APELLES, the prince of painters, was born at Cos. He was patronized by Alexander the Great, and the genius of the painter was equal to the greatness of the hero.

APER, Marcus, a Roman orator, said to be author of the dialogues of orators, printed generally with Tacitus and Quintilian. He died A.D. 85.

APIAN, Peter, a mathematician and astronomer of eminence, was born in Misnia, in 1495, and became professor of mathematics at Ingolstadt. Charles V. esteemed his talents so highly that he knighted him, and made him a present of three thousand pieces of gold. He died in 1552, and his son, Philip, succeeded him as mathematical professor. Apian was the first to make known that the tails of comets are always projected in an opposite direction from the sun, and to propose the discovery of the longitude by lunar observations.

APION, an ancient grammarian of Oasis in Egypt, who proved a great enemy to Josephus, and also to the Jewish nation.

APOCAUCHUS, a Greek of mean origin, who became the favorite and the master of the emperor Andronicus. He built prisons to confine his enemies, and he was at last cut off by some of those whom his cruelty had incensed, 1345. His son, who was governor of Thessalonica, perished in a sedition. There was a man of the same name of some consequence in letters in the 13th century, to whom Actuarius dedicated his works on medicine.

APOLLODORUS, an Athenian painter, flourished about 408 years B. C. He was the first who blended and harmonized the colors, and made a proper distribution of the shadows. He considered himself as the prince of painters; but, in his latter days, his glory was eclipsed by that of Zeuxis.

APOLLODORUS, a native of Damascus, was celebrated as an architect, in the reigns of Trajan and Adrian. He constructed Trajan's forum, the gigantic bridge over the Danube, and many other admirable structures. His plain speaking cost him his life. A temple of Venus having been erected, from a faulty design by Adrian, Apollodorus criticised it, and exclaimed, that if the goddess should wish to go out, she could not do it without breaking her head against the door frame. To avenge himself for this sarcasm, the despot put him to death, about the year 130.

APOLLONIA, St. a martyr of Alexandria, who in her old age was threatened with death if she did not renounce the Christian religion. She threw herself upon the funeral pile, which was prepared to destroy her 248.

APOLLOS, a Jew of Alexandria, who became a convert to Christianity, and employed his eloquence with such effect, especially at Corinth, that his powers of preaching were more regarded and admired than those of Paul. Though a schism was almost formed by the adherents of these two holy men, they were themselves united by the firmest bonds of charity and friendship.

APONO, Peter d^s, was born near Padua, and studied at Paris, where he took his degrees in medicine and philosophy. As his abilities were great, his advice was eagerly solicited; but he was high in his demands for attendance, and he refused to go to pope Honorius IV. without receiving 400 ducats for each day's visit. His learning and success in his profession procured him enemies, he was suspected of magic, and was said to possess the power of calling back to his pocket the money which he had spent, and to have enclosed in a crystal bottle the spirits of seven familiar demons, who were devoted to his wishes. These were serious crimes in a barbarous age, and before a sanguinary inquisition; but he died before the prosecution was completed, in his 80th year, 1316. His body was, however, ordered to be burnt, in Padua, but as it was removed by his friends, only his effigy was thrown into the fire.

APPIAN, a Greek historian, born at Alexandria, lived under the emperors Trajan, Adrian, and Antoninus, and was a pleader at Rome. He is the author of a Roman History, originally consisting of twenty-four books, a work of great merit, but of which, unfortunately, only a part has escaped the ravages of time.

APPIANI, Andrew, a celebrated Italian painter, was born in the Upper Milanese, in 1754. He died in 1818, while executing an immense work in the palace of Milan. Appiani often proved himself no unworthy rival of Correggio, and particularly excelled in fresco paintings. He was a member of the Italian Institute, and was patronised by Napoleon, who gave him the cross of the legion of honor and nominated him his painter.

APPLETON, Nathaniel, congregational minister of Cambridge, Ms. He was born Dec. 9, 1693, at Ipswich; graduated, in 1712, at Harvard University; and was ordained, Oct. 9, 1717. He was much distinguished, in his time, for learning and moral worth. In 1771, his alma mater conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, an honor, which had been conferred upon but one person, Increase Mather, about eighty years before. He died Feb. 9, 1784, in the 91st year of his age. During his ministry 2138 persons were baptized, and 784 admitted members of his church. Dr. Appleton published eight funeral sermons; six ordination sermons; two election sermons; four fast sermons; a thanksgiving sermon; a Duddleian lecture; and nine other occasional discourses.

APPLETON, Jesse, D. D. graduated at Dartmouth College in 1792. He was ordained pastor of the congregational church at Hampton, N. H. in Feb. 1797. In 1807 he was chosen president of Bowdoin College, the duties of which station he faithfully performed for about ten years, when his health became impaired, and at the age of 47 years, Nov. 12, 1819, were terminated his earthly labors.

Few men have been more amiable, or beloved, than president Appleton. His publications were five ordination sermons; two funeral sermons; a dedication sermon; an election sermon; a thanksgiving sermon; a sermon on the perpetuity and importance of the Sabbath; a sermon on the suppression of public vices; an address on the suppression of intemperance; a sermon on foreign missions; one on education; one before a female asylum; and one on unity. In 1820, a volume of addresses was published, containing his inaugural address and eleven annual addresses to the graduates of Bowdoin College. In 1822 his Lectures and Occasional Sermons were published in one volume. The lectures, 27 in number, were mostly on subjects of a polemical character; and the sermons were of a more practical tendency.

APROSIO, Angelico, an Augustine, born at Ventiniglia in the Genoese, 1607, a place which he greatly adorned by a beautiful and valuable collection of books, of which he published an account. He had disguised himself under various appellations in that book, from an excessive delicacy for his character as an ecclesiastic. After travelling through Italy, he settled at Venice, and was honored with a place in several academies, in reward for his learning and his services to literature. He has been greatly praised by authors, and his life is written in the Bibliotheca Aprosiana, which he printed 1673. He died about 1632.

APTHORP, East, D. D. was the son of Charles Apthorp of Boston. The subject of this paragraph was born in 1732, and received his education at Cambridge, England, where he graduated in 1758. Having taken orders, he was appointed in 1761, by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, a Missionary at Cambridge, Mass.; in which place he continued four or five years; but, not finding his situation altogether agreeable, he returned to England, and through the favor of archbishop Secker, obtained, in 1765, the living of Croydon in Surry. In 1773 he received the degree of doctor in divinity, and obtained the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow in London. Both of these places he gave up in 1790, on being made prebend of Finsbury, in St. Paul's cathedral. He died at Cambridge, England, April 16, 1816, aged 83 years. Dr. Apthorp was distinguished as a writer. His publications were Discourses on the Prophecies, an Answer to Gibbon's statement of the causes of the spread of Christianity, and several occasion sermons and other small works.

APULEIUS, Lucius, a Platonic philosopher of the 2nd century, who settled at Rome, and was author, among other things, of the "Golden Ass."

AQUAVIVA, Octavio, cardinal, legate, and archbishop of Naples, was descended from an illustrious family. He is eminent as the friend and patron of science and learned men, and he was particularly attached to the famous Peiresc. He obtained from Clement VIII. the legation of Avignon, where his government was guided by justice, wisdom and moderation. He died 5th December, 1612, aged 52.

AQUAVIVA, Andrew Matth. d', duke of Atri, and prince of Teramo, a Neapolitan nobleman, who patronized literature. He was also fond of military glory, and served under Ferdinand of Aragon with great credit. He wrote an imperfect encyclopedia, besides commentaries on Plutarch's Morals, and died 1528, in his 72d year.

AQUAVIVA, Claude, son of Andrew, was governor of the Jesuits, and was eminent for his moderation and meekness. He wrote several letters and lectures on his religion, and also a tract on the cure of mental diseases. He died 1615, aged 72 years.

AQUILA, a mathematician of Pontus, employed by Adrian to rebuild Jerusalem. He embraced Christianity, and afterwards became a Jew, and was circumcised. He was engaged in translating the bible from Hebrew into Greek; and though he was in some instances very incorrect and partial, the work was generally approved by the Jews. Only a few fragments of it remain.

AQUILANUS, Sebastian, an Italian physician, whose real name is unknown. He was born at Aquila of Abruzzo, and was professor at Padua. He was a follower of Galen, and obtained reputation and success in his profession. Among his treatises is one de Galico morbo. He died 1543 at Padua.

AQUINAS, St. Thomas, called the angelical doctor, was of the noble family of Aquine, descended from the kings of Arragon and Sicily. He was educated by the monks of Mount Cassino, and removed to Naples; but the inclination which he had to embrace an ecclesiastical life was opposed by his mother, who, after great difficulties, obtained him from the power of the monks, and confined him in her castle for two years. He however escaped, and fled to Naples, and afterwards to Rome; and when improved by study, and the famous lectures of Albertus Magnus at Cologne, he appeared at Paris, and read public lectures to an applauding audience. On his return to Italy, he became divinity professor to several universities, and at last settled at Naples, where he led an exemplary life of chastity and devotion, and refused the archbishopric of the city, in the most disinterested manner, when offered by Clement IV. Gregory X. invited him to the council of Lyons, to read the book which he had written against the Greeks; and he died on his way to join the pontiff at the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, 7th March 1274, in his 50th year. He was canonized 1323. His writings, which are numerous, and mostly upon theological subjects, prove him to have been a man of great learning, and extensive knowledge. They have often been published, in 17 vols. folio. It was in defence of Thomas Aquinas that Henry VIII. composed the book which procured him from the pope the title of Defender of the Faith.

AQUINO, Philip, a Jew of Carpentras, converted to Christianity, and professor of Hebrew at Paris. He wrote a Hebrew talmudical, &c. dictionary, and corrected Le Jay's polyglot Bible. He died 1650. His son, Lewis d'Aquino, was author of several valuable books in Oriental literature. Antoine, son of Lewis, was physician to Lewis XIV. and died 1696.

ARAM, Eugene, a native of Rainsgill, Yorkshire, son of a gardener. His genius displayed itself whilst he followed the humble occupation of his father; mathematical calculations and geometrical knowledge were quickly acquired, and, with the most indefatigable zeal, Lilly's grammar, though in unintelligible language, was learnt by heart, and afterwards Camden's Greek, till this self-taught classic unfolded the meaning of a few Latin lines, and then with rapid steps advanced to the comprehension of more difficult authors, till the whole stores of Latin and Greek literature were familiarized to his understanding. He also studied and made himself perfect in Hebrew, and with these great acquirements he gained his livelihood, by engaging in several schools in the south of England. In 1757 he came to the free school at Lynn, a perfect master of the most abstruse studies, and acquainted with heraldry and botany. He had begun to make collections for radical comparisons between the modern languages and ancient tongues, and already more than 3000 words were selected to establish this surprising affinity in a comparative lexicon, when his labors were arrested by the hands of justice. He was taken up at Lynn, 1758, for the murder of Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker of Knaresborough, who had been murdered thirteen years before; and, after a trial, in which he defended himself with coolness and ability, he was found guilty of the crime, and after attempting to commit suicide, he suffered death at York, August, 1759. He acknowledged the justice of his sentence, and attributed the crime to a suspicion of adultery between his wife and Clarke.

ARANTIUS, Julius, an Italian physician and anatomist of eminence, the pupil of Vesalius and Bart. Magus, known by a learned treatise on the human fœtus, printed Venice 1595. He was born at Bologna, and died there 1581, aged 61.

ARBUTHNOT, Alexander, son of lord Arbuthnot, was eminent for his learning as a scholar, and his piety as a divine. He was a zealous defender of the reformation, and published Buchanan's history of Scotland, besides some poetical trifles, and orations on the origin of law, printed 1572. He died at Aberdeen, 1538.

ARBUTHNOT, John, M. D. son of an episcopal clergyman, was descended from the noble family of the same name, and born at Arbuthnot, near Montrose. After finishing his education at Aberdeen, he came to London, where he acquired reputation by attacking "Woodward's essay towards a natural history of the earth;" and he soon rose in the medical profession, when he had successfully attended prince George of Denmark, who was taken suddenly ill at Epsom. He was made physician to queen Anne, 1709; and, soon after, his acquaintance was formed with the most celebrated wits of the age, with two of whom, Swift and Pope, he engaged, in 1714, to compose, in the true Cervantic style, a satire on degenerated taste and the abuse of learning. Of this plan only the first book was published, under the name of "memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus." The queen's death in some degree overturned the hopes and fortunes of Arbuthnot. He felt the blow, and passed some time with his brother, the banker, at Paris. In 1727, he published in 4to. his tables of ancient coins, &c. and afterwards employed his pen in medical tracts, one of which, "effects of air on human bodies," was unhappily suggested by the asthmatic complaint under which he labored. He died under this dreadful disorder, at his house, Cook-street, February 1735. In praise of Arbuthnot, too much cannot be said. His benevolence was equal to his wit, and it is admitted that he was inferior to none in learning, vivacity, and genuine humor. The letter which he wrote to Pope on his death bed is a strong instance of the goodness of his heart, the purity of his principles, and the constancy of his religious faith.

ARCADIUS, an African bishop, put to death by order of Genseric, the Vandal king, 437, because he opposed with great violence the Arians.

ARCHDALE, John, governor of North Carolina. He arrived in the summer of 1695, and rendered himself highly popular with the settlers. The colony, under his administration, became prosperous. The planting of rice, which has since become so valuable in this state, was introduced by him. He continued in the country but five or six years, and then returned to London.

ARCERE, Anthony, a native of Marseilles, who was a priest of the oratory. As he was skilled in the Oriental languages, he travelled into the east, where he made a valuable collection of manuscripts. He began a French and Turkish dictionary, the compilation of which was unfortunately prevented by a fever, which proved fatal, 1699, in his 55th year.

ARCERE, Lewis Etienne, a priest of the oratory of Marseilles, known as a poet, but more as the historian of Rochelle and of Amiens, in a work published, 2 vols. 4to. in 1756. He died 1781, in extreme old age.

ARCHIMEDES, a celebrated mathematician of Syracuse. He defended his country against the besieging Romans, and at last perished by the hand of a soldier, who would not respect his literary retirement and peaceful occupation, B. C. 203.

ARCHYTAS, of Tarentum, a soldier, and a philosopher of the Pythagorean school, eminent alike for his valor and his wisdom. He was repeatedly chosen general of the Tarentines, and was Plato's instructor in geometry. He was one of the first who applied the theory of mathematics to practical purposes; and many marvellous stories are related of his skill in mechanics. He flourished about 400 years before the birth of Christ, and is said to have been shipwrecked in the Adriatic, and thrown upon the Apulian coast.

ARCHON, Lewis, a chaplain of Lewis XIV. born at Riom in Auvergne. He was patronised by the cardinal of Bouillon, and made himself known by his entertaining history of the French king's chapel, in 2 vols. 4to. 1711. He died at the abbey of St. Gilbert-neuf-fontaines, of which he was the head, 1717, in his 72d year.

ARCON, Lemicaud d', a French general and engineer, was born at Pontarlier, in 1733, and died in 1800. He was intended for the church; but, from an early age, the time that he should have dedicated to languages and theology, he spent in drawing plans of fortifications. His picture having been painted as an abbé, he obliterated the clerical dress, and replaced it by that of an engineer; and this silent hint induced his parent to comply with his wishes. D'Arçon distinguished himself, during the seven years war, in the defence of Cassel. In 1780, he invented the floating batteries, which were intended to reduce Gibraltar. They failed; not, however, by his fault; and became an object of ridicule with those who measure merit by success: they, nevertheless, did honor to the genius of the projector. D'Arçon is the author of several works on his profession, which, though faulty in style, display talent and skill.

ARDEN, Edward, a native of Warwickshire, of a respectable family, who married Mary, daughter of Sir George Throgmorton, and lived a retired life on his estate, both from inclination and from his attachment to the catholic religion. He had frequent quarrels with his neighbor, the great earl of Leicester, whose pride looked down with contempt on the independence of a country gentleman, and his ruin was determined. Somerville, a rash, thoughtless young man, who had married one of his daughters, was drawn into a supposed conspiracy against the queen's life; and though no evidence appeared against him, except the report of a letter which had been thrown into the fire by his father-in-law, not only he, but Arden, his wife, his daughter, wife of Somerville, and Somerville's sister, were conveyed to the Tower, and after torture had been barbarously used to draw confessions from Arden, and from Hale a priest, who was supposed to have been concerned, this unhappy family were condemned to suffer death. Somerville was found strangled the night before his execution, as was supposed, that he might not accuse his persecutors, and Arden expired by the hand of the executioner in Smithfield, December 20, 1583, in his 52d year, amidst the tears of pitying thousands. The rest were pardoned, but the mangled heads of the father and of the son-in-law were exposed on London bridge. The dignity of this respectable family was restored by the prudence and good fortune of the two next heirs, and became nearly allied to the Fiellings, earls of Denbigh.

ARDERN, John, an early medical writer, settled at Newark from 1343 to 1370, after which he came to London. He was eminent in his profession, and thence his cures were attributed to magic and superstition.

ARENA, Anthony de, a native of Soliers near Tonlon, author of some inferior treatises on jurisprudence. He also wrote macaronic verses, a farago of barbarous language, partly French, and partly Latin, and partly provincial, first brought into fashion by Merlin Coccaio. His chief work is his war of Charles V. in Provence, reprinted in 1747. He was judge of St. Remi, near Arles, and died 1544. His other pieces appeared 1670, 12mo.

ARETIN, Leonard, a native of Arezzo, from whence his name, better known than his family appellation of Bruni. He was one of the most learned men of the 15th century, and he may be considered as the restorer of the Greek language to Italy. He was employed as secretary of the briefs under five popes, after which he became secretary to the republic of Florence. He translated some of Plutarch's Lives, and wrote some historical pieces, admired for their elegance and accuracy. His history of the Goths acquired him also fame and patronage; but his reputation suffered, when Christopher Perrona discovered it to be nothing but a compilation or translation of Procopius. He died at Florence, 1443, in his 74th year.

ARETIN, Francis, a man eminent for his learning, and his knowledge in Greek. He studied at Vienna, and afterwards taught there with such success that he was called prince of subtleties, and his wit became proverbial. In law, his opinion was considered of such weight, that whatever cause he previously condemned was generally lost. He read lectures also at Pisa and Ferrara; but he was disappointed in his expectations at Rome, though Sixtus IV. declared he would have honored him with a cardinal's hat, which was due to his merits, were he not afraid that by so doing he should rob the public of a most incomparable professor. He was parsimonious, and as he lived in celibacy, his fortune became immense and was divided among his relations. He died about 1470.

ARETIN, Peter, natural son of Lewis Boccio of Arezzo, became so celebrated for his satire, that he was called the scourge of princes. His friendship was courted by Charles V. and Francis I. who no doubt dreaded the venom of his pen more than they esteemed his merits; and he grew so arrogant, that he represented himself on a medal as a god, and on the reverse received the presents of obsequious monarchs. His lampoons, as it was observed, sibilud more princes than the most powerful conqueror ever had done. It is to be lamented, that a genius, which so strongly possessed the powers of satire and genuine humor, was not fully employed in lashing the vices of men. The name of Aretin will be execrated by the modest and the virtuous, for the obscenities, the profane, and immoral writings with which he has insulted the world. His comedies were highly applauded, his letters are valuable, and his works of devotion may be read with satisfaction and surprise. Some have said, but falsely, that he abandoned his lascivious principles. He ridiculed Peter Strozzi, who threatened revenge, not that of the pen, but that of superior manual strength, which so terrified the poet, that he confined himself whilst his antagonist remained at Venice. He died 1556, aged 65.

ARGALL, Samuel, Deputy governor of Virginia in 1609. It appears that his object in accepting the appointment was to engage in trade, and of course in his transactions, he entirely disregarded the laws, which it was his duty faithfully to administer. His conduct was connived at for the benefits it conferred. In 1612 he carried off Pocahontas to James Town. In 1613 he visited Mount Desert, an island now in the State of Maine. Finding a French settlement there, he broke it up, and made most of the settlers prisoners. He thus began a war between the French and English colonists. He soon afterwards destroyed the French settlements of St. Croix and Port Royal, under the pretext that the French had encroached on the rights of the English as founded on the prior discovery of the Cabots. On his return from this expedition he subdued the Dutch settlement at Hudson's river. In 1614 he visited England, and returned in 1617, still retaining his office.

The settlement at James Town, during his absence, had undergone great changes for the worse; which he immediately attempted to remedy by establishing some severe sumptuary, and other laws. These laws were enforced by very severe penalties, extending even to the punishment of death. The making and enforcing of these laws, soon made him odious in the colony, and caused him to be recalled to answer for his conduct. Owing to the death of Lord Delaware, the letter of recall fell into the hands of Argall. He made such use of this information, that he was enabled to leave the colony, with all his effects, before the arrival of the new governor in 1619. Being a partner in trade with the Earl of Warwick, this connexion saved him from being called to account either to the government, or the company. In 1620 he was employed as a captain in an expedition against the Algovines; in 1623 he was knighted by King James; in 1625 he was engaged in the expedition against the Spanish under Cecil. An account of his voyage from James Town 1610, and his letter respecting his voyage to Virginia in 1613 are preserved.

ARGENS, John Baptist de Boyer, Marquis d', born at Aix, in Provence, in 1704, was the son of the solicitor general to the parliament, and was intended for the law, but entered the army against the wish of his father, and, after many curious adventures, was disinherited. A fall from his horse having incapacitated him for military service, he settled in Holland, took up the pen for his livelihood, and produced his Jewish, Chinese, and Cabalistic Letters. Frederic the Great invited him to Potsdam, made him his chamberlain, and gave him his friendship and a pension. He died at Aix, in 1771, while on a visit to his family. His numerous works, once popular, are fallen into greater neglect than they deserve, considering the talent and erudition which they display.

ARGENSOLA, Lupercio Leonardo d', a Spanish historian and poet, born at Balbastro, in Aragon, about 1565, was secretary of war and state at Naples, under the viceroy count de Lemos. He died, in 1613, in the Neapolitan capital. He is the author of poems, and of three tragedies, Isabella, Philip, and Alexander.

ARGENSOLA, Bartholomew, brother of Lupercio, born in 1566, was canon of Saragossa and chaplain of the Empress Maria of Austria, accompanied his brother to Naples, was appointed, after his return, historiographer of Aragon, and died at Saragossa, in 1631. He is the author of a History of the Conquest of the Moluccas, and a Continuation of Zurita's History of Aragon. It was said of the two brothers, that the perfect resemblance of their talents made their countrymen believe them to be twins of Apollo and a Muse.

ARGENSON, Mark Rene le Voyer, Marquis d', celebrated as the first who introduced lettres de cachet, during his administration of the Police at Paris, 1697, was born at Venice, where his father was ambassador from the French court. He was highly respected for his abilities, and the firmness of his character. He succeeded d' Aguesseau in the office of chancellor, 1719, but was disgraced the following year, and died of a broken heart in 1721, aged 69.

ARGOLI, John, the son of a celebrated mathematician, was born in 1609, at Tagliacozzo, in the Neapolitan territory, and died about the year 1660. Several philological and archeological works proceeded from his pen, but he is best known as a poet. When only fifteen, he wrote his Idyl on the silkworm, and two years subsequently his Endymion, in twelve cantos, which he completed in seven months, during which period he shut himself up, and suffered no one to enter his room, except to bring his food.

ARGONNE, Don Bonaventure d', a native of Paris, author of some useful works, especially miscellanies of history and literature, replete with entertaining anecdotes, and valuable reflections, published under the name of Vigneul de Marville, reprinted, 3 vols. 12mo. 1725. He died a Carthusian monk at Gaillon, near Rouen, 1704, aged 64. He wrote also a method of reading the church fathers, 12mo. 1697.

ARGYROPYLUS, Joannes, a learned man who fled from Constantinople when taken by Mahomet II. and contributed to the revival of Greek literature in Europe. He was received with kindness by Cosmo de Medicis, duke of Tuscany, placed in the professor's chair at Florence, and made tutor in the prince's family. He retired from thence, during the plague, to Rome, where he lectured on Aristotle. He died of a fever occasioned by eating melons, in his 70th year, about 1478. He translated several of Aristotle's works, in a manner which proved him to be an able Grecian, and a scholar of the most comprehensive erudition. He was said to be an intemperate epicure, so that the whole of his fortune was squandered in supplying the delicacies of his table. He treated the character of Cicero with contempt, because he had said of his favourite Greek, that it is a language verborum inops. He left some sons equally learned. His commentary on Aristotle's ethics was printed 1541, folio.

ARIADNE, daughter of Leo I. married to Zeno, who succeeded as emperor, 474. She was so disgusted with the intemperance of her husband, and so eager to enjoy the company of her favourite Anastasius, that she forgot her dignity and character in barbarity. Zeno, when intoxicated, was shut up in a sepulchre, where he was suffered to die; and Anastasius, though of obscure origin, was placed on the throne. She died 515.

ARIAS MONTANUS, Benedict, a native of Seville, eminent for his knowledge of modern and ancient literature. He was engaged by Philip II. of Spain, to publish an edition of the polyglot Bible, which he completed, and published at Antwerp, 1569-72, in 8 vol. folio. The monarch liberally offered the author a bishopric, but it was modestly refused, and only a pension of 2000 ducats accepted, and the honor of being chaplain to the king. Arias wrote some biblical and historical treatises, besides translating the Psalter into Latin verse. He died 1598, in his 71st year.

ARIOSTI, Attilio, a musician, born at Bologna.

He was at first of the order of the Dominicans, but quitted the society with the permission of the pope, and distinguished himself as a composer at Bologna, and Venice, and in Germany. He afterwards came to England, where his abilities, especially his masterly execution on the viol d'amore, a new instrument, gained him applause and opulence. He published by subscription, a book of cantatas, 1725; but how soon after he died is not ascertained.

ARIOSTO, Lodovico, or Lewis, an illustrious poet, born at Reggio, 1474, of a family allied to the dukes of Ferrara. His early genius displayed itself in the composition of the play of Pyramus and Thisbe, which he acted with his brothers and sisters; but his father, like the father of Ovid, viewed his studies with a jealous eye, and bade him forsake the muses for the bar. After his father's decease, he returned to his favorite pursuits, and, under the friendly patronage of Hippolito, cardinal d'Este, he began the plan of a poem, which was to immortalize the Italian muse. He was invited to write in Latin by cardinal Bembo; but with the ardor of a poet he replied, that he aspired to the first rank of Italian composition, and knew he must be placed only second as the votary of the Latin muse. He read with attention the works of Homer and Virgil, and, with a mind stored with all the learning of ancient times, he borrowed a subject from Bojardo's Orlando Inamorato, and produced his incomparable poem of Orlando Furioso. Though peculiarly devoted to poetry, Ariosto however, was employed in negotiations; and when, on the death of Hippolito, Alphonso, duke of Ferrara succeeded as patron of the poet, he showed his regard for him by appointing him governor of Gaffagnana, a post which he discharged with honor and fidelity. For his retirement, he built a house at Ferrara; and when questioned why he, who shone in the description of magnificent halls, and splendid palaces, had made it so small, he replied, that words were cheaper placed together than stones. He read his poems with so sweet a voice, that his friends were enraptured to hear him; and he possessed so delicate an ear, with so coleric a temper, that he once entered into a potter's shop, who had been repeating some of his verses, with an improper accent, and broke a great number of the pots exposed to sale. The man expostulated in vain at the violence of the stranger. I have not sufficiently revenged myself on thee, exclaimed Ariosto; I have broke only a few pots, and you have spoiled the most beautiful of compositions to my face. He died at Ferrara, 8th July, 1533, in his 59th year. Orlando Furioso has been deservedly extolled, and it ranks high after Homer. Ariosto possesses all the fire of poetry; he passes with incredible rapidity and ease from the terrible to the tender, from the soft to the sublime; every character is interesting; his heroes are valiant without rashness; and his heroines are feminine without vulgarity; and nature appears in all her native majesty, adorned by all the graces of art, and recommended by the most enchanting language of poetry. Besides the Orlando, Ariosto wrote satires, comedies, and miscellaneous poems.

ARISTARCHUS, a native of Samos, supposed to have flourished about 280 years B. C. was the first who asserted the double motion of the earth, round its axis and round the sun. He also invented a particular kind of sun dial. A treatise of his is extant, on the dimensions and distance of the sun and moon.

ARISTARCHUS, the grammarian and critic, was a native of Samothrace, born 160 years B. C., resided at Alexandria, and was tutor to the children of Ptolemy Philometor.

much esteemed. He revised Homer's poems, and scrutinized each verse with such critical rigor, that his name has ever since been applied to all very rigid censors. Finding himself attacked by a cureless dropsy, he starved himself to death, in the isle of Cyprus, at the age of seventy-two.

ARISTIDES, an Athenian, whose equity and integrity gained for him the glorious appellation of the Just, was the son of Lysimachus. Being an admirer of the laws of Lycurgus, he preferred an oligarchy to a democracy, and was, consequently, the great opponent of Themistocles, the head of the democratical party. The dissensions between these two eminent men were so prejudicial to the common weal, that Aristides himself once exclaimed, that "the Athenians would never prosper till he and Themistocles were consigned to the dungeon for condemned criminals." The selfless and patriotism of Aristides were strongly manifested by his giving up his share of the command to Miltiades, before the battle of Marathon; and his conduct after the battle, when entrusted to divide the spoils, was equally praiseworthy. In the year 491 B. C. he was archon, or chief magistrate; an office which he filled with high reputation. Themistocles, however, succeeded in having him sentenced to banishment by ostracism. On this occasion, a voter who could not write, and did not know him, met him, and asked him to inscribe the name of Aristides on the shell for him. "Did Aristides ever injure you?" said the patriot. "No," replied the man, "but I am weary of hearing him called the Just." Aristides wrote his own name, and returned the shell. Being recalled from banishment, when Xerxes was preparing to invade Greece, he laid all private differences aside, and acted in perfect concert with Themistocles. At the battle of Plataea he commanded the Athenian forces, and fought bravely, and, subsequent to the battle, his wisdom put an end to a dangerous quarrel which arose between the confederates. He died of old age about 467 years B. C., and did not leave sufficient property to defray the expense of his funeral. He was buried at the public cost, a pension and an estate were given to his son and suitable portions to his daughters.

ARISTIDES, Ælius, a celebrated orator born in Mysia, A. D. 129. He travelled four times through the whole of Egypt, penetrated into Ethiopia, and at last settled in Smyrna, where his eloquence gained him high reputation. Smyrna having been destroyed by an earthquake, he so pathetically described the calamity to Antoninus, that the emperor instantly ordered the city to be rebuilt. For this service the grateful inhabitants erected a statue to Aristides, in the temple of Esculapius.

ARISTIPPUS, a native of Cyrene in Lybia, a philosopher who flourished about 400 years before Christ. The great reputation of Socrates induced him to remove to Athens that he might become his disciple; but, he soon found the doctrines of his master too rigid, and soon deviated widely from them. His extravagance having injured his fortune, he opened a school of rhetoric, and was the first of the disciples of that philosopher who took money for teaching. After several adventures at Ægina, Corinth, and Rhodes, he visited the court of Dionysius at Syracuse, and appears to have resided there for a considerable time. He, however, returned to Athens. The time of his death is unknown, but must have been subsequent to 366 before Christ. Aristippus was a man of wit and elegant manners, but is charged with having been too much addicted to pleasure.

ARISTOGITON, an Athenian, who, in conjunction with his friend Harmodius, formed a conspiracy against the tyrants Hipparchus and Hippias, B. C. 516. Hipparchus was slain, but Hippias escaped, and caused them to be put to death. The Athenians, afterwards, paid almost divine honors to their memory.

ARISTOMENES, a Greek warrior and patriot, was the son of Nicomedes, a descendant of the ancient Messenian kings. Indignant at the subjection in which his countrymen were held by the Spartans, he raised the banner of freedom, B. C. 685, and, by acts, of almost romantic valour, long made head against the oppressors. He died at Rhodes, while on a visit to his son-in-law.

ARISTOPHANES, an Athenian comic dramatist, lived about the middle of the fifth century B. C. and was contemporary with Euripides, Plato, and Socrates. Aristophanes was the author of fifty-four comedies, of which only eleven have descended to us. His style has always been admired for its Attic elegance; his wit for its poignancy; and his delineation of manners for its perfect fidelity.

ARISTOTLE, a celebrated philosopher of Stagira. He was employed as the tutor of Alexander the Great; but his fame is built on the works which he composed on ethics, poetry, politics, physic, and logic. He died about 323 B. C. and it is said that he threw himself into the Euripus, because he could not explain satisfactorily the causes of the flux and reflux.

ARIUS, founder of the sect of the Arians, was an African by birth. Disappointment made him a sectary. He propagated the opinion, that the word was not a divine person; and the heresy, though condemned by various councils, gained followers, and excited schisms in the Roman empire. The Nicene creed was drawn up to combat his errors. He was the violent enemy of Athanasius. He died at Alexandria 336.

ARKWRIGHT, Sir Richard, a man who rose to opulence and reputation from the humble station of penny barber, in Bolton, Lancashire. He was the inventor of the spinning jenny, a system of machinery which, by his genius and perseverance, and by the assistance of Kay, a watch maker of Warrington, and Atherton of Liverpool, was made to shorten and facilitate the labor of spinning cotton, and which has introduced plenty and independence among the lower orders of the community, by giving employment to the industry of many thousand families. He received the order of knighthood for his invention, and at his death, 8d August 1792, he left property to the amount of nearly half a million.

ARLAUD, James Antony, a native of Geneva, eminent as a painter. He came to Paris, where he was patronised by the duke of Orleans, regent of the kingdom, and afterwards passed to London. His most celebrated piece was a copy of Leda, which at last, in a moment of superstitious devotion, he himself destroyed, by cutting it in an anatomical style, and dividing the limbs among his friends. A copy of this celebrated picture was sold in London for 600*l*. He died at Geneva, May 25, 1748, aged 75.

ARLOTTO, a native of Magello, in Tuscany, 1385, whose right name was Mainardi, though he is better known as Arlotto. He was early brought up in the trade of the woollen manufacture, which formed the employment and the consequence of the Florentines; but he left it for the church; and he had the good fortune to obtain the rural deanery of St. Cresci in the diocese of Fiesole. The income of this was sufficiently large to maintain him in ease and independence; and as residence was not required, he indulged his partiality for foreign countries by travelling. As he possessed an inexhaustible fund of genuine humour, he was the companion of the gay and the dissipated, and he frequently forgot the dignity of his ecclesiastical character, by descending during the most solemn services, to the low buffoonery of a mimic, or the broad jest of a debauchee. Among the patrons and friends of Arlotto were Lorenzo Medici, and his brother Giuliano, who loved him for his levity and the witticisms of his conversation. He died at Florence, 1433, in his 93th year.

ARMINIUS, a brave chief of the Catti, called the deliverer of Germany. Though noticed and honored by Augustus, he determined to avenge the wrongs of his enslaved country. The Romans were defeated under Varus, and Arminius at last, after various encounters with the enemy, was assassinated, A. D. 21.

ARMINIUS, James a native of Oude-water, in Holland, 1560, founder of the sect of the Arminians. As he lost his father early, he was supported at the university of Utrecht, and of Marburg, by the liberality of his friends; but when he returned home, in the midst of the ravages caused by the Spanish arms, instead of being received by his mother, he found that she, as well as her daughters, and all her family, had been sacrificed to the wantonness of the ferocious enemy. His distress was for a while inconsolable, but the thirst after distinction called him to the newly founded university of Leyden, where his industry acquired him the protection of the magistrates of Amsterdam, at whose expense he travelled to Geneva and Italy, to hear the lectures of Theodore Beza and James Zabarella. On his return to Holland, he was ordained minister of Amsterdam, 1588. As professor of divinity at Leyden, to which office he was called 1603, he distinguished himself by three valuable orations on the object of theology—on the author and end of it—and on the certainty of it—and he afterwards explained the prophet Jonah. In his public and private life, Arminius has been admired for his moderation; and though many gross insinuations have been thrown against him, yet his memory has been fully vindicated by the ablest pens, and he seemed entitled to the motto which he assumed,—a good conscience is a paradise. A life of perpetual labor and vexation of mind at last brought on a sickness of which he died, October 19, 1619. His writings were all on controversial and theological subjects, and were published in 1 vol. 4to. Frankfort, 1661.

ARMSTRONG, Dr. John, a celebrated poet, born at Castleton, Edinburghshire, where his father and brother were ministers. He took his degrees of M. D. in the university of Edinburgh, 1732, but he did not meet with the success in his profession which his merits deserved. His first exertions for the amusement of the public, were some small medical tracts, which were followed by the Economy of Love, a poem after the manner of Ovid, objectionable for its licentiousness, though admired for the spirit of its lines, corrected and purged in the edition of 1763. In 1744, the art of preserving health was published, and on this great and highly finished performance, the fame of Armstrong totally depends. By means of his friends, the poet was recommended to the notice of the great. He was appointed physician to the lame and sick soldiers, behind Buckingham-house, and in 1760, he was made physician to the army in Germany. It was at this time that he wrote his poem called "Day," inscribed to John Wilkes; and the freedom of remark which he used in one passage upon Churchill not only drew the vengeance of the satirist upon him, but dissolved the friendship which had before cordially existed with Wilkes. He collected his scattered pieces which he published in 1770, and the following year he wrote a short ramble through France and Italy by Lancelot Temple. He died in September, 1779, leaving behind him about 3000*l.* a sum which surprised his friends, as they knew that his income was small.

ARMYNE, Lady Mary, daughter of Henry Talbot, the fourth son of George, earl of Shrewsbury, married Sir William Armyne, and rendered herself distinguished by her piety and benevolence, as well as her knowledge of history, of divinity, and of the languages. She was very liberal to the poor, and contributed largely towards the encouragement and support of the missionaries sent to instruct the Indians in North America. She also endowed three hospitals; and died 1675.

ARNALD, Richard, B. D. a native of London, educated at Benet's and Emanuel College, and presented to the rectory of Thureaston in Leicestershire. He published several sermons, but his best known performance is his Commentary on the Apocrypha. He died 1756.

ARNALL, William, an attorney's clerk, who became a political writer in the pay of sir Robert Walpole. It appears from the report of a secret committee, that, in four years, he received 10,997*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for his pamphlets; and though so liberally rewarded, he died of a broken heart and in debt, 1741, aged 26.

ARNAUD DE VILLA NOVA, a physician, who improved himself by travelling through Europe, and created himself enemies by having recourse to astrology. He enjoyed some reputation at Paris, and afterwards retired to Sicily, to Frederic king of Arragon. He was shipwrecked on the coast of Genoa as he was returning to attend pope Clement, who labored under a severe illness, 1510 or 1513. His works appeared at Lyons, 2 vols. folio, 1520, and Basil, 1535.

ARNAULD, Henry, a French ecclesiastic, the son of an eminent advocate, was born in 1597, and, after having been entrusted with important missions to Rome, and other Italian courts, was made bishop of Angers, in 1649, and thenceforth devoted himself strictly to the performance of his episcopal duties. His piety and charity were exemplary, and the only time, during nearly half a century, that he quitted his diocese, was to reconcile the prince of Tarento with his father. Angers having revolted, the queen mother threatened that city with severe vengeance, and was long inflexible. Arnauld at length saved it, by saying, when he administered to her the sacrament, "Receive, madam, your God, who pardoned his enemies, even when he was dying on the cross." To a friend, who told him that he ought to take one day in the week for recreation, he replied, "I will readily do so, if you will point out any day on which I am not a bishop." This worthy prelate died in 1692, deeply lamented by his flock, who considered him as a saint, and eagerly sought to obtain even the merest trifles that had once belonged to him. His Negotiations in Italy were published, in 1748, in five volumes.

ARNAULD, Anthony, brother of Henry, was born at Paris, in 1612, studied in the colleges of Calvi and the Sorbonne, and took his doctor's degree in 1641. The publishing, in 1643, of his work on Frequent Communion, which was virulently attacked by the Jesuits, was his first appearance on the arena of controversy, where, during the remainder of his life, he made so conspicuous a figure. He next espoused the cause of Jansenius, for which he was expelled from the Sorbonne. The result of this was, that he was compelled to live in retirement till the year 1663, and, while thus secluded, he produced many treatises. The Calvinists were the next objects of his attack; after which he had a contest with Malebranche. The intrigues of his enemies having rendered it necessary for him to quit France, he withdrew to the Netherlands, where he continued hostilities against the Jesuits and Protestants. He died at Brussels, in 1694. Arnauld was a man of extensive erudition, and an indefatigable and excellent writer on a variety of subjects, literary and philosophical as well as theological. His works extend to no less than forty-five quarto volumes. Though in social life his manners were mild and simple, he was of an impetuous disposition. Nicole, his fellow laborer in some of his controversies, having declared to him that he was tired of ceaseless warfare, and wished to rest, "Rest!" exclaimed Arnauld, "will you not have all eternity to rest in?"

ARNAUD, de Brescie, a bold and independent ecclesiastic, the disciple of Peter Abelard, in the 12th century, who maintained, that it was unlawful for the clergy to hold a temporal estate. On the death of Innocent II. by whom he had been condemned, and obliged to fly to Switzerland, he attacked the papal power, drove the pontiff from Roine, and reformed the government of the city. He was afterwards seized, and by order of Adrian IV. he was burnt alive, in 1115, and his ashes thrown into the Tiber. Some of his followers came to England, 1160; but were all put to death, as persons dangerous and hostile to the happiness of the state.

ARNDT, John, a native of Bellenstadt in Anhalt, known as minister of Quedlinburg, and afterwards of Brunswick, where his abilities as preacher were obstinately opposed by the envy of his ecclesiastical brethren. As he lived in times when controversial points were disputed upon with acrimony, he felt the rancor of opposite opinions. He was for eleven years minister of Kell, on the presentation of the duke of Lunenburg, where he died 1621. His chief work is his treatise of true Christianity, in 4 books, in German, which, on account of its excellence, has been translated into several languages, and, among others, into English, by Boehm, and dedicated to queen Anne, 1712, in Svo. in 3 vols.

ARNE, Thomas Augustine, son of an upholsterer in Covent Garden, whom Addison characterized in the Tatler, No. 155 & 160. He was educated at Eton and bound to an attorney: but he possessed a strong inclination for music, and soon rose to be leader of the band at Drury Lane. He composed in 1733, the music for Addison's opera of Rosamond, in 1733, that for Milton's Comus, and in 1740 that of Mallet's Masque of Alfred, in which Rule Britannia was first introduced: and, in consequence of his high reputation, he was created Doctor of Music at Oxford, in 1759. He died of a spasm in the lungs, March 5, 1773; author of the favorite opera of Artaxerxes, the Guardian outwitted, and the Rose. Mrs. Cibber, the famous actress, was his sister. Though apparently little attached to religion, he was a catholic, and died a penitent son of Rome.

ARNGRIM, Jonas, a learned ecclesiastic of Ireland, who wrote a piece on the Runic letters, found in Olaus Wormius' collection, besides other tracts illustrative of the history of his country. He died about 1649.

ARNISÆUS, Kenningus, a German professor of physic at Helmstadt. He is known for his able political treatises in defence of the authority of princes. He travelled through France and England, and was honored with the place of counsellor and physician to the king of Denmark. He died November 1635.

- ARNOBIUS, rhetorical professor at Sicca in Numidia, at the end of the third century, was a violent enemy to Christianity, and afterwards its steadfast friend.

ARNOLD, Samuel, an eminent musical composer, educated under Gates and Nares, at St. James's chapel. His cure of Saul, and his prodigal son, obtained him great applause and celebrity, so that, in 1778, he was honored with the degree of Doctor of Music by the university of Oxford. After leaving Covent Garden, where he first appeared, 1760, he became proprietor of the fashionable Marybone Gardens; and, in 1783, succeeded Dr. Nares as organist of the royal chapel. He was also organist of Westminster Abbey, in which his remains are deposited. He died 13th Oct. 1802. Besides musical compositions, he began a splendid edition of Handel's works, in 1786.

ARNOLD, Nicolas, a protestant of Lesna, who improved himself by travelling, and afterwards succeeded to the professor's chair of theology at Franeker in Friesland, where he acquired reputation by his sermons and polemical works, printed, Leipsic, 1598. He died 1680, aged 62.

ARNOLD, Jeffery, author of a history of mystical theology, and of a history of the church and of heretics, printed, Leipsic, 1700, besides other tracts, was a zealous minister of Perleberg, and a strong advocate of the pietists. He died 1714.

ARNOLD, Benedict, the American traitor, though he escaped the punishment due to his crime, his name will be forever branded with infamy. At the commencement of the American revolution, Arnold commanded a volunteer company at New Haven in Connecticut. Immediately after the battle of Lexington he marched his company to the American head quarters, and reached Cambridge, April 29, 1775. The Massachusetts committee of safety appointed him a colonel, and authorized him to raise four hundred men for the purpose of taking Ticonderoga. That fortress was taken by him and Col. Allen on the tenth of May. He commanded in 1775 the expedition undertaken against Canada. He commenced his march on the 16th of Sept. through the wilderness of Maine with about one thousand men, and quitted Canada on the 18th of June following. After this period he commanded the American fleet on Lake Champlain. In the northern campaign of 1777, he acted a conspicuous part in the army under the command of Gen. Gates, and which resulted in the capture of Burgoyne's army. Being rendered unfit for actual service by a severe wound in the leg, after the recovery of Philadelphia, he was appointed to the command of the American garrison. The thoughtless extravagance of his living, reduced him to the necessity of resorting to every and any means to support it. He was guilty of every species of artifice by which property both public and private might be obtained, and converted to his own use. More than half of the amount of his accounts against the public were rejected, first by the commissioners, and afterwards by Congress. He was soon obliged to abide the decision of a Court Martial upon charges preferred against him by the Executive of the State of Pennsylvania, and he was subjected to the mortification of receiving a reprimand from the Commander in Chief. His trial commenced in June 1778 and ended Jan. 26, 1779. The sentence of reprimand was approved by Congress, and soon afterwards carried into execution. It is probable that this was the moment, when, smarting under the inflictions of supposed injuries, he resolved to obtain revenge by the sacrifice of his country. By artifice he obtained command of the important part of West Point. He had previously, in a letter addressed to Col. Beverly Robinson, signified his change of principles and his wish to restore himself to the favor of his Prince by some signal proof of his repentance. A correspondence now commenced between him and Sir Henry Clinton, the object of which was to concert the means of putting West Point into the hands of the British. The plan was well laid, and the execution certain, but an overruling Providence interposed, and thwarted the design. The arrangement was effected through the agency of Major John Andre, Aid de Camp to Sir Henry and Adjutant General of the British Army. Andre, who had effected all the arrangements with Arnold, was proceeding by virtue of a pass from Arnold, authorizing him, under the feigned name of John Anderson, to proceed on the public service to the White plains, or lower, if he thought proper. He had passed all the guards and posts on the road without suspicion, and was proceeding to New York in perfect security, when the reins of his bridle were seized and his horse stopped. Andre, instead of producing his pass, asked the man hastily, where he belonged, and being answered, 'to below,' replied immediately, "and so do I." He then declared himself to be a British officer on urgent business, and begged that he might not be detained. The man who stopped him was a militia man, and being instantly joined by two others, Andre discovered his mistake, but it was too late to repair it. The militia men could neither be coaxed nor bribed from doing their duty. Andre contrived to apprise Arnold of his danger, and he effected his escape. Arnold received from the British government the stipulated reward of his treachery, and remained in their service during the war. He died in London, in June 1801.

ARNTZENIUS, John Henry, a learned Dutchman, law professor at Utrecht, where he died, 1799. He wrote academical discourses and dissertations—miscellanies—institutiones juris Belgici, 2 vols. 8vo—Sedulius and Arator—panegyrici veteres, &c.

ARNU, Nicholas, a Dominican, born at Meran-court near Verdun. He was professor of metaphysics at Padua, where he died, 1692, aged 63. His works, in 10 vols. were chiefly on the theology and philosophy of Aquinas, and curious for the extravagance of his ideas, and the denunciations which he pronounced against the Turkish empire.

ARNULPH or ERNULPH, a monk of St. Lucian de Beauvais, made bishop of Rochester under Henry I. He wrote an history of the church of his diocese, which is still preserved at Rochester, and which has been published by Dr. Thorpe. He was also author of some theological treatises, and died in March 1124, aged 84, after being nine years bishop of the see of Rochester.

ARNULPH, natural son of Carloman, king of Bavaria, was elected emperor of Germany 888, and crowned at Rome 896, by pope Formosus. He died, as is supposed, by poison, 899, and was succeeded by his son, Lewis IV.

ARNWAY, John, a native of Shropshire, who studied at St. Edmund hall, Oxford, and became rector of Hodret and Ightfield, in his native country. In the civil wars he lost his estates, and retired to Oxford, 1640, where he served the king, and was made archdeacon of Coventry; but on the success of Cromwell, he left the kingdom, and went to the Hague, where he published two pamphlets on the moderation of Charles I.—and an alarm to the English. He afterwards went to Virginia, where he died, of a broken heart, 1653.

ARPINO, Joseph d', a celebrated painter, born at Arpino, 1560. In his 13th year he was in the humble situation of waiter on the painters who were adorning the Vatican; and it was from this time that his genius burst forth. The pope was made acquainted with his merit, and favors were heaped upon him, and he was created knight of St. Michael. He possessed spirit; but when his rival Caravagio attacked him, he refused to fight him before he was a knight like himself. Against Annibal Carachi he likewise meditated revenge; but the painter showing him his pencil, added, with this weapon I defy you. The best pieces of Arpino, who is known among painters by the name of Josephin, are from the history of Rome, the most capital of which is the battle of Romulus with the Sabines. He died at Rome, 1640 aged 80.

ARRAN, James Hamilton, earl of, a Scotch nobleman, who was highly favored by Henry II. of France, in 1555, and made captain of his Scotch life guards. He was distinguished for his virtues and abilities, and at one time aspired to the hand of queen Elizabeth of England, which, however, he did not disclose, to pay his adoration to her more beautiful rival, the widowed queen of Scots. Mary received his proposals with indifference and contempt, and Arran sunk into despair and insanity. He died 1609.

ARRIA, a Roman lady, the wife of Cæcina Pætus, whose fortitude and conjugal affection have immortalized her name. Several acts of noble firmness were crowned by that which terminated her existence. Her husband, having rebelled against Claudius, was ordered to destroy himself. Seeing him hesitate, Arria plunged the poinard into her own breast, and then presented it to him, saying, at the same time, "Pætus, it is not painful!"

ARRIAGA, Roderic d', a Spanish Jesuit, professor of theology at Salamanca and Prague. His works were on metaphysics, printed, Antwerp 1632, and on divinity 8 vols. fol. 1643. He died 1667, aged 75, at Prague.

ARSENIUS, bishop of Constantinople, excommunicated Michael Palæologus, for dispossessing John Lascaris of the crown. The emperor demanded absolution, but the prelate refused without resignation, and in consequence of his firmness, he was banished to an island, where he died in the thirteenth century.

ARSENIUS, a Roman deacon appointed by pope Damasus, preceptor to Accadius, son of Theodosius. The virtues of the master were unable to correct the haughtiness of the pupil. One day Theodosius found his son sitting and the preceptor standing before him, upon which he ordered him to sit down and his pupil to rise, but this did not avail. It is even said that the licentious prince ordered his master to be dispatched, and that Arsenius, discovering the perfidy, fled from the court to Egypt, and passed the rest of his life among the anchorites of Scetis, where he died, aged 95. His tract for the rule of the monks is preserved.

ARSENIUS, archbishop of Malvasia in the Morea, was excommunicated by the patriarch for submitting to the pope. He was author of a collection of apophthegms, and some scholia on Euripides, and died at Venice, 1435.

ARTALI, Joseph, a native of Mazara in Sicily, who in his youth fought a duel and killed his adversary, and fled to Candia when it was besieged by the Turks. In this place he highly distinguished himself, and was knighted, and on his return to Europe, he was patronized by several princes, especially the duke of Brunswic, and the emperor Leopold. He was so skilful as a duellist, that he was called the chevalier du Sang. He cultivated poetry with success, and wrote several pieces, and died 1679, at Naples, in his 51st year.

ARTAUD, archbishop of Rheims, was besieged in his palace by Hubert and Hugues, counts of Paris, assisted by William of Normandy. His enemies prevailed, and Hugues was named his successor. Afterwards he was restored to his diocese, where he died 943.

ARTAXERXES I. king of Persia, son of Xerxes, is supposed to be the Ahasuerus of scripture. He died 424, B. C. and was succeeded by Xerxes.

ARTAXERXES II. surnamed Mneimon, defeated his brother Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa, 401 B. C. He died aet 94, after a reign of 62 years.

ARTAXERXES III. succeeded the second, and slew all his brothers, and the whole of his family. He made war against Egypt, and was murdered by Bigoas the eunuch, who made handles for knives with his bones, B. C. 333.

ARTAXERXES BEBEGAN, son of a shepherd, first king of Persia, of the race of the Sassanides. He defeated Ardavan and married his daughter, whom he ordered to be put to death, because she attempted to poison him. Her life was preserved as she was pregnant, and the child she brought forth was received with gratitude by the father, and became his successor by the name of Sapor, A. D. 240.

ARTEAGA, Don Stephano, a Spanish Jesuit, who died at Paris, 1800, aged 55. He is author of a treatise on ideal beauty in Spanish, an edition of which appeared in Italian—the revolutions of the Italian theatre to the present time, in Italian, 3 vols. 8vo. 1735. He left in MS. another learned work in Italian called Ritmo Sonoro, e del ritmo muto degli Antichi.

ARTEDI, Peter, a physician of Sweden, so intimate with Linnæus, that they made each other heirs of their manuscripts, and literary property. He is known for his diligence in the history of fossils and quadrupels. He was accidentally drowned in a canal at Leyden, 1735, in his 30th year, and the works which he intended to publish were completed for him by his friends, under the title of Bibliotheca ichthyologica, and Philosophia ichthyologica.

ARTHINGTON, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, who joined with Edmund Copping and Hacket, and, under the pretence of being inspired, attempted to introduce a reformation in the kingdom, by the most violent and the wildest schemes. Hacket was hanged for his conduct, and Arthington obtained his pardon by recantation.

ARTHUR, a British prince, whose existence some historians regard as fabulous. He is said to have succeeded his father as king of Britain 516. He attacked the Saxons, whom he defeated, and afterwards carried his victorious army against the Picts, and against Ireland and the western Isles of Scotland. Returning from the field he devoted himself to cultivate the arts of peace, and became a most popular governor. He established the order of the knights of the round table at Winchester, and died about 542.

ARTIGAS, Don John, was born at Monte Video, in 1760, and was originally in the Spanish service, but quitted it to fight for the independence of his country. After having greatly contributed to establish the republic of Buenos Ayres, he became an object of suspicion to the government of that state, was declared a traitor, and compelled to take up arms. For some years he kept possession of the territory called the Banda oriental. At length, however, he was defeated, and compelled to seek refuge in Paragnay, where he died in 1826.

ARVIEUX, Laurent d', a native of Marseillus, who, during 12 years residence in Palestine, acquired the oriental languages, and was employed as a useful negociator for the French court. His name deserves to be mentioned with every mark of respect, for his deliverance of 380 captives from the dungeon of Tunis, who, in mark of their gratitude, presented him with a purse of 600 pistoles, which he generously refused. He also redeemed 240 slaves at Algiers, and after serving his country at Constantinople, Aleppo, and other places, died 1702, aged 67.

ARUNDEL, Thomas, son of the earl of Arundel, was made bishop of Ely, though only 21 years old, under Edward III. and afterwards translated to York, and from thence to Canterbury. He also held with the primacy the office of lord chancellor. His quarrel with Richard II. obliged him to leave the kingdom, and to fly to Rome, and to his resentment may in some degree be attributed the success with which Henry IV. invaded England, and seized the crown. He was a zealous defender of the temporal power of the church, and he persecuted the followers of Wickliff with great severity, and forbade the translation of the Bible into the vulgar tongue. He died 1414.

ARUNDEL, Thomas Howard earl of, is famous for the discovery of the Parian marbles which bear his name, and which he gave to the university of Oxford. Prideaux, Chandler, and Mattaire, are in the number of those who published an account of these valuable relics of antiquity.

ARUNDEL, Blanche, daughter of lord Worcester, and wife of lord Arundel, is celebrated for her brave defence of Wardour Castle, against the parliamentary forces. Though assisted only by 25 men, she resisted the attack of 1800 men, and at last capitulated on honourable terms, which the conquerors basely violated. She died 1669, aged 66, and was buried in Wardour Castle chapel.

ASAPH, St., a native of North Wales, who was a monk of Llanely under Kentigern, the bishop of that see. He succeeded to the bishopric, and so great was his sanctity, that Llanely exchanged its name for St. Asaph. The bishop wrote the ordinances of his church, the life of his predecessor, &c. and died about 600. The see was vacant nearly 500 years after his death.

ASBURY, Francis, senior bishop of the Methodist episcopal church in the United States. He came to this country as a preacher in 1771. He was ordained bishop by Dr. Coke in 1784. He travelled yearly through the U. S. ordaining preachers and delivering sermons. He died suddenly at Spotsylvania, Va. in 1816, aged 70 years.

ASCHAM, Roger, a native of Kerby-Wiske, near Northallerton, Yorkshire, known for his learning, and more for the respectable share he bore in the education of the family of Henry VIII. Under the liberal and early patronage of Sir Anthony Wingfield, he was brought up at St John's college, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by his application, and a superior knowledge of the Greek language. He was introduced to Henry VIII. to whom he inscribed his treatise on archery, and he not only received a pension, but as he wrote a beautiful hand, he was appointed to instruct in writing prince Edward, the lady Elizabeth, and the two brothers, Henry and Charles, dukes of Suffolk. Elizabeth was indebted to him also for her knowledge of Greek and Latin, as he read with her the best part of Livy, Cicero, Isocrates, Sophocles, and other works. He afterwards returned to Cambridge as public orator of the university, and was invited 1550, to attend Sir Richard Morysine in an embassy to Charles V. and it was on his way to London he visited lady Jane Grey at Bradgate-hall. in Leicestershire, in whose hands he found a Greek edition of Plato's Phædo, a book from which this amiable woman said she received more real pleasure than from sharing the diversion of her attendants and family who were hunting in the park. His time was not unpleasantly spent in Germany, as he assisted the ambassador, and applied himself to politics so successfully that he wrote a book on the affairs of the empire. He was appointed, when returned to England, Latin secretary to king Edward, an office which was still continued to him under Mary and Elizabeth; but though a favorite at court and universally respected, he did not use his influence to raise himself to preferment, as a prebend in the church of York was the only favor he received, and unasked, from the crown. He died in London, 4th January, 1568, aged 53, and was interred in St. Sepulchre.

ASCHAM, Anthony, a friend of Cromwell, and a member of the long parliament. He was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He was assassinated with his interpreter by six exiled royalists in Spain, where he had been sent as envoy from England, 6th June, 1650. He wrote a discourse on the revolutions and confusions of governments, 8vo. 1648.

ASCHARI, a mussulman doctor, founder of a sect which bears his name. He supposed that the Supreme Being follows only general established laws; but the Hanbalites, at the head of which was his father-in-law Hanbalite, supported that providence acted differently in particular circumstances. Aschari died at Bagdad, 940.

ASCOLI, Cecco di, or Francisco de Stabili, professor of mathematics at Bologna, wrote an Italian poem on the system of Empedocles, for which he was burnt as a heretic at Florence, 1323, aged 70. He was also author of a commentary on the sphere of John Holy Wood, or Sacrobosco.

ASCOUGH, William, L. L. D. made bishop of Saram 1433, was murdered at the altar by Jack Cade and his followers 1450. He was descended from a very ancient Lincolnshire family.

ASDRUBAL, founder of New Carthage in Spain, was brother-in-law of the great Annibal. He was assassinated by a Gaul.

ASDRUBAL BARCA, brother of Annibal, was killed at the battle of the Metaurus as he was advancing into Italy with reinforcements.

ASELLI, Gaspar, a physician of Cremona, known as the discoverer of the lacteal veins in the mesentery. He was professor of anatomy at Paris, where he died 1626, and he published a valuable account of his discoveries, printed Milan, 4to. 1627.

ASGILE, John, a lawyer of eminence, known for his wit and his misfortunes. He was brought up at Lincoln's inn under the patronage of judge Eyre in king William's reign, and his abilities were such that he rose to consequence and employment. Two treatises replete with humor and sarcasm had already given him popularity, when he published another on the possibility of avoiding death, which drew down upon him the odium of the friends of the church, and particularly of Dr. Sacheverell; so that, when he afterwards went to Ireland, and by success in the law purchased an estate and procured a seat in the house of commons, he was ignominiously expelled for the contents of his pamphlet. On his return to England, he was returned for Bramber in Sussex; but here the morality of his writings was also called in question, and though he made an eloquent defence in favor of his opinions, which he refused to retract, he was expelled as a disgraced and unworthy member.

This blow hastened the ruin of his fortunes, he became a prisoner of the King's bench and afterwards of the Fleet, where he continued to subsist by writing political pamphlets, and by transacting some professional business. After 30 years thus spent in confinement and poverty he expired in November 1733, aged upwards of 80.

ASH, John, L. L. D. a baptist divine, born in 1724. He was at one period coadjutor with Dr. Caleb Evans in the management of an academy at Bristol, for the education of theological students of his own persuasion; and subsequently became pastor of a congregation at Pershore, where he died in 1779. Besides some religious publications, he was the author of a Dictionary of the English language; and he also wrote an Introduction to Lowth's Grammar, which has passed through a vast number of editions.

ASHE, Simeon, a nonconformist, chaplain to lord Warwick during the civil wars. He was a man of property, and of great influence among his persuasion. He was educated at Emanuel college, and settled in Staffordshire, where he became acquainted with Dod, Ball, Hildersham, Langley, and others. His principles were obnoxious to Cromwell's party, and it is said, that he was greatly instrumental in the restoration of Charles II. He died 1662. He published sermons, and edited Ball's works.

ASHLEY, Robert, a native of Nashhill in Wilts, educated at Harthall Oxford and the Middle Temple London. He was called to the bar, and distinguished himself as an eminent writer, as a collector of books, in Holland, France, &c. and as a benefactor to the society to which he belonged. He published a relation of the kingdom of Cochin China, and the life of Almanzor, &c. and died October 1641, in an advanced old age, and was buried in the Temple church.

ASHMUN, John Hooker, a distinguished American scholar, was born at Blanford, Mass. on the third of July, 1800. He graduated at Harvard University in 1818, and was appointed professor of law in the same institution, in 1829. Although he did not reach the age of thirty three years he acquired an enviable reputation. He died, April 1st, 1833. "The honors of the University," says Judge Story, in his funeral discourse, "were never more worthily bestowed, never more meekly worn, and never more steadily brightened. He gathered about him all the honors, which are usually the harvest of the ripest life."

ASHMOLE, or Asmole, Elias, was born at Lichfield, 23d May 1617, and is known as an antiquarian of much celebrity. He was educated at the grammar-school in his native town, and at the age of 16 was admitted into the family and under the patronage of James Paget, baron of the exchequer, by whose means he rose to be solicitor and attorney in the common pleas. At the beginning of the disputes which preceded the civil war, he retired to Oxford, where he labored with great assiduity in mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy. Ever employed in advancing science, his labors were indefatigable in procuring a collection of the manuscript works of English chemists, and in tracing the Roman roads mentioned in the itinerary of Antoninus. His greatest work was the history of the order of the garter, which procured him not only fame and additional respectability, but the patronage of Charles II. The valuable collection of coins to the number of 9000, besides books and other curiosities which he had made, was unfortunately destroyed at the Middle Temple by fire in 1679; but his most precious gold medals, and manuscripts were then at Lambeth, and thus escaped the dreadful conflagration. So much public merit did not pass unrewarded by the learned body to which he belonged; the University of Oxford granted him the degree of doctor in physic by diploma, and in 1633 they completed a handsome building for the reception of the valuable collection of manuscripts, books, medals, and curiosities, which he intended to deposit within its precincts as a token of his gratitude, and as the memorial of his zeal in the cause of science. Ashmole died at Lambeth, May 18th, 1692, aged 75.

ASHTON, Charles, a learned critic, elected master of Jesus College, Cambridge 1701. He lived to a great age, distinguished for his erudition and for the delicacy and correctness of his criticisms. His works were all critical. It was said of the university of Cambridge that, among those whom the fellows appointed to the headship of a college, there were not three equal to those only three whom the privilege of visitors selected to preside over societies to which before they did not probably belong; that is, Bentley of Trinity by the king; Ashton of Jesus by the bishop of Ely; and Waterland of Magdalen, by the Earl of Suffolk; a circumstance highly honorable to the elector as well as to the elected.

ASHTON, Thomas, D. D. a learned divine, educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and afterwards promoted to the rectory of Aldingham in Lancashire, and St. Botolph in London. He was also fellow of Eton, and, as preacher at Lincoln's inn, he acquired great popularity by the elegance of his language and the persuasive eloquence of his delivery. He published some sermons on various occasions, besides controversial pamphlets against Jones a methodist, and upon filling the Eton fellowships with persons who are or have been fellows of King's College. He died March 1st, 1775, in his 59th year.

ASHWELL, George, was born in Ludgate street, and educated at Harrow, and Wadham College, Oxford, of which he became fellow. During the civil war he preached frequently before the king, but he submitted to the authority of the parliamentary visitors, and was afterwards rector of Hanwell near Bunbury, where he died 1693, aged 66. His writings were on divinity, but not in high esteem. The best known was a treatise on the Apostolic, Athanasian, and Nicene creeds, 8vo. 1613.

ASHWORTH, Caleb, a native of Northamptonshire, who, from the humble employment of carpenter, rose, by the instruction and patronage of Dr. Doddridge, to the respectability of minister of a dissenting congregation, and at last successor in the school of his able master. He wrote the paradigms of Hebrew verbs, and other works, and died at Daventry 1774, aged 65, respected as a man and as a scholar. He was created D. D. by a Scotch university.

ASKEW, Anthony, a native of Kendall in Westmorland, eminent as a physician and as a man of letters. He was educated at Sedburgh school, and Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his first degree 1745. He afterwards studied one year at Leyden, and then accompanied the English ambassador to Constantinople. On his return to England he took his degree of M. D. at Cambridge, and began to practise. He was also made fellow of the royal society, and of the college of physicians; but his celebrity arises more from his fondness for literature than his success in the medical profession. He collected a most valuable library, which was disposed of by public auction for above 5,000*l*. He died at Hampstead 1784.

ASKEW, Anne, daughter of sir William Askew of Kelsay, Lincolnshire, was eminent for her virtues and misfortunes. She married when young Mr. Kyne, against her inclination, and the treatment which she received from her husband was so inhuman, that she came to the court of Henry VIII. in person to solicit a divorce. Her story interested the ladies of the court; but as it was suspected that she was attached to the reformation, her person was seized and confined in Newgate, and afterwards cruelly tortured in the Tower; and in 1546 she was burnt in Smithfield with her tutor and two other persons, like herself, more attached to her faith than to life. Some of her letters, preserved by Fox and Strype, prove her to have been amiable, accomplished, and virtuous. She was about 26 when she suffered.

ASPASIA, a celebrated Grecian courtesan, was a native of Miletus, in Ionia, who settled at Athens, where she acquired great influence, by her beauty and talents. Her skill in politics, philosophy, and rhetoric was extensive, and her eloquence was of a superior order. Socrates was her friend, or, as some say, her lover; and Pericles was so fondly attached to her, that, in order to marry her, he divorced his wife. After the death of Pericles, she was united to Lysicles, an obscure man, whom she raised to importance in the state. Cyrus gave the name of Aspasia to his favorite mistress Milto, in complement to her charms.

ASPELT, Peter d', a native of Treves, who studied medicine at Paris, and was in consequence of his curing the pope in a dangerous disorder, raised to an archbishopric by the grateful pontiff. He died 1320.

ASPINWALL, William, an eminent physician was born in Brookline, Mass. 1743. In the war of the revolution he acted as a surgeon in the army. He engaged in the business of inoculating for the small pox, and erected hospitals for the purpose. He became celebrated both for the numbers who were his patients, and the skill with which he treated the disease. Upon being convinced of the efficacy of vaccination he shut up his hospitals. He died in April, 1823, in his 80th year.

ASSELYN, John, a pupil of Vandenvelde, who after visiting Italy settled at Amsterdam, where he acquired celebrity as an historical and landscape painter. He died 1650, aged 40.

ASSER, of St. David's, a learned author in the reign of Alfred, raised to the see of Sherborne by that prince, of whose life he wrote an account. There is a chronicle or annals ascribed also to him, printed at Oxford 1691, fol. It is said that he persuaded Alfred to found Oxford, and to maintain professors there. He died 909.

ASSHETON, Dr. William, born in 1641. He distinguished himself as the projector of that most charitable scheme of providing a maintenance for the widows of clergymen and others, by a jointure payable by the mercer's company. This scheme was the labor of many years, and before it was completed, he had addressed himself to the corporation of the clergy and to the bank of England, who showed an unwillingness to adopt his plan. He died in his 69th year in September 1711. He wrote, besides devotional tracts, some pieces against the dissenters and papists.

ASTELL, Mary, a learned woman, daughter of a merchant of Newcastle upon Tyne. She was educated by her uncle, a clergyman, not only in logic and philosophy, but in the learned languages, so that the most difficult authors, Plato, Epictetus, Cicero, and Antoninus, were as familiar to her as the writings of her own countrymen. She lived at Chelsea, where she employed herself in acts of devotion and charity; and she became acquainted with the most learned men of the age, Atterbury, Dodwell, Norris, Hickes, &c. and like them advanced the cause of Science and piety, by useful publications on religion and morality. She did not long survive the amputation of one of her breasts for a cancer; but after she had directed her shroud and coffin for some time to be placed by her bedside, she expired, 1731, in her 63d year.

ASTLE, Thomas, an English antiquary, born in Staffordshire, where his father was a farmer. He was engaged, in 1763, under the patronage of Mr. Grenville, in examining the records of Westminster with Sir Joseph Ayloffe and Dr. Ducarel; and, in 1766, he superintended the printing of the ancient Parliamentary records. He was, in 1775, made chief clerk of the record office in the Tower, and succeeded Sir John Shelley as keeper. He died December 1803. He wrote a curious work on the origin and progress of writing, as well hieroglyphic as elementary, first printed 1794, in 4to. and again edited 1803. He also contributed some valuable papers to the Archæologia, and other publications.

ASTLE, John, was born at Whem in Shropshire, and apprenticed to Hudson the portrait painter, known as the master of Sir Joshua Reynolds. After improving his talents at Rome, under the patronage of lord Chesterfield, and copying some of the finest works of Titian and Beutivoglio, he returned to England, and from thence passed to Ireland, where he rapidly gained reputation, and increased his fortune with 3000*l*. On his return to London, he passed through Knutsford, where, at an assembly, he gained the heart of lady Daniel, who, with her hand, gave him soon after the whole Duckenfield estate in fee, worth 5000*l*. a year. A fondness for extravagance and dissipation seemed to be his only passion; but while he squandered with one hand, Fortune seemed, in the most profuse manner, to replenish the other. The death of his brother brought him 10,000*l*. and his success in painting, and other contingencies, increased his property so much, that at one time he was worth upwards of 100,000*l*.

ASTORGAS, Marchioness of, a lady, in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, who killed with her own hands a beautiful mistress to whom her husband was criminally attached. She afterwards prepared the heart of this unfortunate victim, and when her husband had eat it, she rolled the bleeding head of his murdered mistress before him on the table. This wretched guilty woman escaped into a convent, where she became insane through rage and jealousy.

ASTRUC, John, a celebrated French physician, was born at Sauve, in 1684, and studied medicine at Montpellier, where he subsequently became professor. In 1743, he was appointed king's physician, and professor of the royal college of Paris. For awhile he resided at Warsaw, as first physician to the Polish monarch; but he returned to Paris, where he died in 1766. His medical works are numerous, and have considerable merit; but he is said to "have contributed nothing to the fortunate revolution by which medicine was brought back to the safe and good principles of Hippocrates."

ATABALIPA, or ATAHUALPA, the last king of Peru, of the race of the incas. He was made king of Quito on his father's death, 1529; but he aspired to the whole kingdom, and defeated his brother Huascar, who sat on the throne of Peru. When Pizarro with the Spaniards invaded the kingdom of Peru, the unhappy monarch was invited to a parley, and treacherously seized, and soon after barbarously strangled, or burnt at the stake, 1533, though he had paid for his ransom all the gold which a room pointed out by the Spaniards could contain. Some of the Spanish authors have endeavored to represent him as an usurper, and as faithless in the first treaty which he had made with Pizarro; but little credit is to be given to their assertions.

ATHA, a celebrated impostor of the eighth century, was a native of Meron, and originally a fuller. He entered as a soldier in the army of Abu Moslem, the leader of a sect, the head of which he became on the death of Abu. He pretended that the divine spirit, after having inspired Adam, Noah, the great prophets, and Abu, had been transmitted to him. Being besieged in the castle of Kech, by the army of the caliph, he set fire to the place, and destroyed himself, his wives and all his followers willingly sharing his fate; some say they all took poison. Having lost an eye in battle, he wore a golden veil, whence he had the name of Mokanna. He is the hero of Moore's Veiled Prophet in the poem of Lalla Rookh.

ATHANASIUS, St. a native of Alexandria, raised, in consequence of his abilities and great eloquence, to the see of his native town, A. D. 326. He was a violent opposer of the Arians, and suffered great persecution for his firmness. He died 371.

ATHELING, Edgar, son of Edward, and grandson of Edmund Ironside, king of England, was regarded as the future monarch; but the intrigues of Harold prevailed against him. The battle of Hastings, 1066, in destroying his rival, cut off his hopes of success; and, after making some resistance at York to little purpose, he fled to Scotland and afterwards to Normandy. He was reconciled to the conqueror, and was at the first crusade with Baldwin II. where he behaved with great intrepidity. He passed the last years of his life at Mahmsbury.

ATHELSTAN, though but natural son of Edward the elder, was made king of England after his father's death, 925. He was successful against the Danes, whom he defeated in Northumberland; and afterwards he devoted himself to the arts of peace. He encouraged commerce, by bestowing the title ofthane on such of his merchants as had performed three voyages. He died 941.

ATHERTON, Joshua, a lawyer of New-Hampshire, was born at Harvard, Massachusetts, 29 June 1737, and graduated at Harvard college in 1762. He commenced practice in Petersham of his native state, in 1765; removed to New Hampshire in 1768; and, in 1772, established himself at Amherst, where he resided till his death. He was a member of the Convention for revising the State Constitution in 1792, and in 1793 was elected Senator in the legislature. The same year he was appointed Attorney General of N. H. and filled that office until 1801. He died, 3d April, 1809, aged 71 years, leaving an only son, the Hon. Charles H. Atherton of Amherst, N. H.

ATHIAS, Joseph, a learned printer of Amsterdam, who published an edition of the Hebrew Bible, 2 vols. 1677, highly esteemed, besides editions in Spanish, English, and German. His services were rewarded with a gold chain and medal by the states. He died 1700.

ATKINS, James, D. D. a learned Scotchman, of Kirkwall in Orkney, educated at Edinburgh and Oxford, and patronised by the marquis of Hamilton. He was made bishop of Moray in 1677, and afterwards translated to Galloway. He died at Edinburgh, October 28, 1687. He wrote against the presbyterians; but his treatises are now unknown.

ATKINS, Sir Robert, was descended from the ancient family of the same name in Gloucestershire. He was educated at Baliol college, and after being made a knight of the Bath, and taking his degrees in law, he was made a judge of the court of Common Pleas, 1672, which he resigned, in 1679, through disgust at the conduct of the government. He showed his impartiality on the bench, though his mind was occasionally tintured by superstition; and at the revolution, which he favored with all the ardor of a patriot, he was made Lord chief baron by William. In June 1695 he resigned his high office, and spent the last fourteen years of his life in peaceful and dignified retirement at Saperton Hall in Gloucestershire. He died in the beginning of 1709, aged 83. He was twice married, and his only son, Sir Robert Atkins, inherited his virtues, and was for a long time representative of the county. He published, in folio, the history of Gloucestershire, from the materials collected by Dr. Parsons; and died 1711, aged 64. The writings of Judge Atkins are all on constitutional and juridical subjects, and are highly valued.

ATKINSON, Theodore, graduated at Harvard college in 1718. He sustained many public offices in New Hampshire; was secretary in 1741; was a delegate to the congress at Albany; and subsequently was appointed chief justice of the colony. The revolution deprived him of the offices of judge and secretary. He died in 1779, bequeathing £200 to the episcopal church, the interest to be expended in bread for the poor, distributed on the sabbath.

ATRATUS, Hugh, or Black, called the phœnix of his age, from the great powers of his mind, and his unwearied application, was born at Evesham in Worcestershire, and was made a cardinal by Martin II. 1281. He died of the plague, six years after, author of genealogia humana—problemata—canones medicinales, &c.

ATTENDULI, Margaret, a sister of Sforza, grand constable of Naples. When her brother was perfidiously seized, she armed her friends and domestics, and at their head made reprisals, and thus obtained the liberation of the captive.

ATTERBURY, Lewis, son of Dr. Atterbury, rector of Milton, Northamptonshire, was educated at Christ Church, and submitted to the republican visitors. He was, in 1654, made rector of Great Rissington, Gloucestershire, and three years after, obtained the living of Milton Bucks. After the restoration, he took his degree of D. D. at Oxford. He was, on his return from London, drowned, near his house, December 7, 1693. He published three sermons.

ATTERBURY, Lewis, LL. D. eldest son of the preceding, was educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church, Oxford. He was chaplain, in 1633, to the lord mayor, sir William Pritchard, and the next year became rector of Symel, in Northamptonshire, which he afterwards resigned, upon greater promotion. He succeeded as preacher at Highgate chapel, where he had officiated for the late incumbent, Daniel Lathom, and, by being one of the chaplains of the princess Anne, he recommended himself to favor, and was afterwards, 1707, presented to the living of Chepperton by the queen, and by the bishop of London to that of Hornsey, 1719, in which parish his own chapel was situated. His charitable disposition was strongly displayed in his studying physic for the benefit of the poor at Highgate, and distributing advice and drugs gratis. On the death of Dr. Sprat, the archdeacon of Rochester, he made application for the office, and as his brother was bishop of the see and patron, he expected no refusal; but he was disappointed and Dr.

Brydges was nominated. He died at Bath, October 29, 1731, in his 75th year.

ATTERBURY, Francis, bishop of Rochester, was born March 6, 1662; and after finishing his education at Westminster, he entered at Christ Church, where he became known by his wit and his learning. His poetical abilities were early displayed; and as a defender of the protestant religion, he also acquired celebrity. On leaving Oxford, he was elected lecturer of St. Bride's London, 1691, and soon after made chaplain to William and Mary. With the eloquence of a popular preacher, he possessed the obstinacy of a controversialist, and therefore his sermons and works when published, drew upon him the animadversions of Hoadly, of Bentley, of Wake, and others. His zeal, however, in the service of the church, and in support of the rights of convocations, was rewarded by the thanks of the Lower House of Convocation, and by a diploma of the degree of D. D. from the university of Oxford. Preferment and distinction were now heaped upon him in quick succession; and in 1713 he attained the height of his ecclesiastical dignity, by being made bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster. When George succeeded to the throne, the bishop was treated with coolness and indifference; and he resented the affront, and displayed his attachment to the house of Stuart, by refusing to sign the declaration of the bishops, and by opposing in the parliament, with vigor and eloquence, the measures of the government. This decided and hostile behaviour proved the beginning of his misfortunes. He was suspected of favoring the pretender, and August 24, 1722, he was arrested as a traitor, and confined in the Tower. March 23, 1723, a bill was brought in the house of commons to inflict penalties on Francis, bishop of Rochester, and he was ordered to prepare his defence. He declined using his influence among the commons, but, as he wrote to the speaker, he reserved the vindication of his conduct in that house, of which he had the honor to be a member. The trial lasted above a week. The bishop was supported by all the learning and the eloquence of the bar, and he spoke in his own cause with all the energy of the persuasive powers which he was known to possess; but he was condemned by a majority of 83 to 43 votes; and the king, on the 27th May, confirmed the decision of parliament. The bishop met the disgrace of banishment with unusual firmness and dignity; he took an affectionate leave of his friends; and, June 18, 1723, he embarked in the Aldborough man of war, and was landed at Calais, where he met lord Bolingbroke, whom the royal pardon recalled to England, upon which he observed with his usual facetiousness, "then his lordship and I are exchanged." It is to be lamented that persecution is not softened by the fall of an enemy. Atterbury, in his exile, was pursued with more vindictive rage than when in England. Worn out by the unkindness of mankind, and domestic sorrow, he died at Paris, February 15, 1732. His private character as a man was most amiable and exemplary; as a preacher, he was great and eloquent; and as a writer, his sermons, his letters, and other tracts, prove most decidedly, that he possessed piety, genius, flow of language, and erudition.

ATTICUS, Titus Pomponius, a Roman, of the most amiable manners, who in the midst of civil wars and party animosities, maintained his independence, his character, and his possessions. He was respected by all parties, and his virtues and moderation deserved the general esteem. He died aged 77, B. C. 54.

ATWOOD, George, a mathematician, born in London, in 1745, was educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge, and early manifested eminent mathematical talents. In 1784, he published the Lectures on Experimental Philosophy, which he had delivered before the whole university, and also a Treatise on the Rectilinear Motion and Rotation of Bodies. Mr. Pitt, who was his friend at college, gave him a sinecure office, that he might devote the major part of his time to financial calculations; in which he proved exceedingly useful to the minister. Atwood died, unmarried, in 1807. Besides the works already mentioned, he published Treatises on the Construction of Arches, and on the Stability of Ships.

AUBERT, Peter, a French lawyer, who died 1733, aged 91. He left to his native city, Lyons, where he had exercised various civil offices, his valuable library. He was author of retour d'isle d'amour, a romance—2 vols. of factums, in 1710—an edition of Richelet's dictionary, 3 vols. folio, 1728, and other works of less note.

AUBERT DU BAYET, N. a French officer engaged in the American war. At the revolution he distinguished himself in favor of the popular cause, in the national assembly, at the defence of Mentz, in 1793, and in the war of la Vendée. He was afterwards ambassador at Constantinople, and died of a fever, brought on by excess and intemperance, 17th December 1797.

AUBERT, John Louis, Abbé, professor of literature in the royal college, was born at Paris, in 1731, and died in 1814. His poetry, in general, is characterized by ease and elegance; but he particularly excelled in the apologue. For some of his efforts in the latter species of composition he was warmly applauded by Voltaire, and his countrymen considered him as no unworthy follower of La Fontaine.

AUBERTIN, Edme, minister of the reformed church at Charenton, and afterwards at Paris, 1631, died at Paris, 1652. He was author of a work on the eucharist of the ancient church, fol. 1633, which was attacked by Arnault and others.

AUBERY, or Aubry, John, a physician of Bourbonois, author, among other things, of a curious and learned work called Pantidote de Painour, 1599, in 12mo. and of an apology for physic, Latin, printed, Paris, 1603, 8vo.

AUBERY, Anthony, a lawyer, of Paris, remarkable for his uncommon application to study, from 5 in the morning till 6 in the evening. His works, the principal of which are, his history of Richelieu, 2 vols. folio, 1660, and Mazarin, 4 vols. 12mo. 1651, and of the cardinals, 5 vols. 4to. 1642, are not possessed of superior merit, though they contain historical anecdotes and judicious remarks. He wrote besides a treatise on the pre-eminence of the Kings of France, 4to. 1649, and on the French king's pretensions to the empire, 4to. 1667. He died of a fall, 1695, aged upwards of 73.

AUBERY, Louis, sieur du Maurier, travelled with his father, who was ambassador to Holland, and visited Poland, Berlin, and Rome. After a few years passed at court, he retired to lead a life of literary and philosophical ease at his country seat, where he died, 1637. His memoirs on the history of Holland, 2 vols. 12mo. 1632, are often quoted, and are truly valuable. His grandson published, in 1737, his memoirs of Hamburgh, Lubec, Holstein, Denmark, and Sweden.

AUBESPINE, Claude de l', was descended of a noble family in Burgundy. He was usefully employed in the service of Francis I. Henry II. and his two successors, so that his advice often guided the measures adopted in the cabinet. He died in 1567, the very day after being consulted by Catherine de Medicis.

AUBESPINE, Charles de, marquis of Chateaufort, chancellor of France, was an able statesman, but proud and haughty in his demeanor. He excited the jealousy of Richelieu and Mazarin, and though the favorite of the court, was imprisoned for ten years; and died 1653, aged 73.

AUBIGNE, Theodore Agrippa d', a learned Frenchman, grandfather to madame Maintenon. He is said to have translated the Crito of Plato into French when he was only eight years old; but the improvement of his mind was checked by the death of his father, when he had attained his 13th year, so that he forsook letters for the court, and became the favorite of Henry IV. An uncourteous behaviour, however, rendered him soon unwelcome; and he retired to Geneva, where his abilities were courted and admired. His principal work is an historie universelle, 3 vols. fol. which merited to be publicly burnt by the parliament of Paris, because he treats the name of king with unbecoming harshness and studied contempt. He died at Geneva, 1630, in his 80th year. He wrote an account of his own life, which was printed 1731, besides two satirical pieces, the confession of Saney, and the baron de Fæneste.

AUBREY, John, an English antiquary, born, in 1625 or 1626, at Easton Piercy, in Wiltshire, was educated at Oxford and the Inner Temple. By lawsuits he was unfortunately reduced to indigence, but he bore his ill fate with a fortitude that does honor to his character. Lady Long, of Draycot, in Wilts, supported him in his latter years. He died in 1700. Aubrey was one of the first members of the Royal Society; wrote several antiquarian works, and contributed to the Monasticon Anglicanum; and possessed considerable abilities, but was exceedingly credulous and superstitious.

AUBRIOT, Hugo, a native of Burgundy, famous as the builder of the Bastille by order of Charles V. of France, in 1569. He was accused of heresy, and became the founder of the sect which were called after him Auzerots, but for his error he was condemned to be confined for life between two bare walls, for which, however, he was set at liberty by the Maillotins, who rebelled against the power of the inquisition, and wished him to be their leader. He died in Burgundy, 1382.

AUCHMUTY, Robert, an eminent lawyer. He came to Boston in early life, and was appointed judge of the Court of Admiralty in 1708. In 1740 he was one of the directors of the land bank. He was sent to England as agent for the colony on the boundary question with Rhode Island. He projected the expedition to cape Breton, and published a pamphlet entitled, "the importance of cape Breton to the British nation, and a plan for taking the place. In 1733 he was again appointed judge of the Court of Admiralty. He died 1750.

AUDEBERT, John Baptist, a French naturalist, born at Rochefort, 1759. As an engraver his merit was very great, and his application in the cause of science was indefatigable. He died 1800. His first performance was l'Histoire des Singes, des makis, and des galeopithecques, 1 vol. fol. 1802, and such was the execution of the work that he was introduced to the ablest artists and the most eminent persons of Paris.

AUDIUS, the founder of a sect in the 4th century, was banished into Scythia, where his disciples became numerous. He celebrated Easter like the Jewish passover, and considered the Deity as having a human form.

AUDLEY, James, lord, of Heleigh, Staffordshire, is distinguished for his valor in the wars of France under Edward III. at the battle of Poitiers. After deeds of heroism, he was so severely wounded that his attendants bore him with difficulty from the field. These high services were rewarded by the Black Prince, who bestowed on him a pension, and made him constable of Gloucester castle, governor of Aquitaine, and Seneschal of Poitou. He was one of the first knights of the garter, and died about 1336.

AUDLEY, Edmund, a descendant of the above, educated at Oxford, and successively made bishop of Rochester, Hereford, and Salisbury. He died 1524; and the honor of being chancellor of the garter, which he held, has passed, by the interest of bishop Seth Ward, to his successors at Salisbury.

AUDRAN, Girard, son of an engraver of Lyons, perfected at Rome what he had learned at home, and at his return to Paris, engaged to finish the battles of Alexander by Le Brun. He gained great reputation by his art, as he was esteemed the most correct historical engraver that ever lived. Besides Alexander's battles he finished six sheets of the Cupola of Val-de-grace, from the designs of Mignard. He died 1703, aged 63. His uncle Charles was also an eminent artist, born at Paris, 1594. His works are marked with a K.

AUDRAN, Claude, brother to Girard, an historical painter employed by Le Brun. He died at Paris, 1684, aged 42, professor of the academy of painting. His nephew, of the same name, excelled as a painter of ornaments. His best work is the 12 months of the year with the presiding deities. He died 1734, aged 49. This family has been particularly distinguished by painters and engravers. There were one or two still living in 1789, and still worthy of the reputation of their ancestors.

AUGER, Athanasius, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Paris in 1734, and died there in 1792. He translated Demosthenes, and other Greek orators, but his versions, though correct, are deficient in spirit. His best work is the Constitution of the Romans under the Kings, and during the Period of the Republic, on which he was occupied more than thirty years.

AUGER, Edmund, a Jesuit, whose eloquence is found to have converted 40,000 protestants to the catholic faith. His disinterestedness was such that he refused promotion in the church and even a bishopric. He died 1591, aged 61.

AUGER, Louis Simon, a member of the French Academy, was born at Paris, in 1772, and put an end to his existence in 1829. He was a man of much erudition and talent. He conducted several Journals; was one of the principal authors of the Universal Biography; wrote Eulogies on Boileau and Corneille; and edited and commented upon a variety of standard works.

AUGUSTIN, Antony, a native of Saragossa, distinguished by his abilities, and employed by the pope as ambassador to England 1554, and afterwards as his agent at the council of Trent. In 1574 he was made archbishop of Tarragona, and so charitable was his deportment in this high station, that he did not leave enough wherewith to be buried, 1536. He was author of some treatises and of dialogues on medals, in Spanish 1537.

AUGUSTINE, Saint, a father of the church, born at Tagaste in Africa. He became, from a debauched youth, a steady and zealous Christian, and was made bishop of Hippo. He died 430, aged 76. His works, which are much esteemed, were edited 10 vols. fol. 1579 and 1690 Paris.

AUGUSTINE or AUSTIN, Saint, first archbishop of Canterbury, was sent with 40 others by pope Gregory I. from Rome to convert the Britons to Christianity, and he landed in the isle of Thanet about the year 596. He met with a kind reception from king Ethelbert, and after making a number of proselytes he returned to Arles in France, where he was consecrated metropolitan of the English church. He fixed his seat at Canterbury, and by the directions of the pope he used with tenderness and moderation his new converts, by permitting them still to assemble in the temples which were now converted into Christian churches, and by only destroying the idols to which they paid the most solemn worship. The conversion of the whole nation however was a work of difficulty. Austin found adversaries unwilling to yield to reason and argument, and probably the disrespect which he showed to the Britons in receiving their deputies sitting, and without the common forms of civility, irritated against his doctrines a people naturally superstitious, and strongly attached to the religious tenets of their forefathers. With too much haughtiness he insisted on their celebrating easter like the Romish church, and though he was lenient in some particulars, he was too sanguine in establishing the pope's supremacy among independent barbarians. Austin died at Canterbury 604, and superstition has ascribed miracles to his ashes.

AUGUSTINE, Leonard, commonly called Agostini, a learned antiquarian of Sienna in the 17th century. His valuable work called Le gemme antiche figurate, first published 1657, 2 vols. 4to. and 1707, four vols. 4to. has been universally admired, and was translated by Gronovius into Latin, printed at Amsterdam 1685, and Franeker 1694.

AUGUSTULUS, Romulus, the last emperor of Rome, was son of Orestes who had deposed Julius Nepos. Young and unexperienced, he was unable to withstand the attacks of Odoacer king of Italy, and after the death of his father Orestes and the ruin of his country, he retired to Campania, where he spent the rest of his life in obscurity, maintained by a small pension.

AUGUSTUS, C. Jul. Cæs. Octavianus, the first Roman Emperor, was born B. C. 62. He was educated under the care of his uncle Jul. Cæsar, and after his death, he had the artifice to conclude a treaty with Antony and Lepidus, and by thus establishing a triumvirate, he made himself absolute at Rome. His associates Antony and Lepidus were removed in consequence of quarrels and intrigues, and the young Cæsar, now sole master of Rome, was in the 36th year of his age called Augustus by the obsequious senate, and invested with the sovereign power. Thus raised to the highest elevation, he used his power with moderation and prudence, and all his measures tended to increase the glory and the triumphs, the comforts and the prosperity, of Rome. Augustus died at Nola A. D. 14, aged 76, and his memory was embalmed by the panegyrics of the poets and historians, whom with a lavish hand he protected and patronised.

AUHADI-MARAGAH, a mussulman poet who put into Persian verse the Gian-gian, a book full of Mahometan spirituality. He was poor, but he was enriched by the presents of the emperor of the Tartars in 1319. His tomb is held in great veneration at Ispahan.

AUNGERVILLE, Richard, a native of St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, educated at Oxford. He was tutor to Edward III. and for his services was raised to the see of Durham, 1333, and in 1334 made lord chancellor, and two years after treasurer. He was not only learned, but the munificent patron of learned men, and founded a library at Oxford. He wrote Philobiblos or the right use of books, printed Oxford 1599, and died at Durham, 1345, aged 74.

AUNOY, Marie Catharine Jumelle de Bernville

Countess d', widow of count d' Aunoy, and niece of madame Desloges, is known as a voluminous writer of romances in a careless style, and with much affectation of the supernatural and marvellous. Her adventures of Hippolytus, earl of Douglas, and tales of the Fairies, are her best pieces. Her husband was accused of treason, and with difficulty cleared himself. One of his three accusers afterwards through remorse of conscience confessed the charge to be false. She died 1705.

AURELLI or ARELLI, John Mutio, a Latin poet, who closely imitated Catullus, but without following his feeble or indecent parts. He was made by Pope Leo X. governor of a place, where he was found dead soon after with his mule at the bottom of a well, 1520, and it is supposed that his oppression had drawn upon him this violent punishment from the inhabitants.

AURENG-ZEB, great mogul, conspired with Morad one of his brothers against his father Shah-Gehen at Agra, and kept him in confinement till he caused him to be poisoned by one of his physicians. His brothers Morad and Dara were destroyed with equal cruelty, and he became master of a large dominion, which he extended by the conquest of Decan, Visapour, Golconda, and nearly the whole Indian peninsula. A power acquired by perfidy and bloodshed, was maintained with vigor and equity, and though Aureng-Zeb did not escape the tortures of a reproaching conscience, he was mild in his manners, and consulted the good of his subjects. As he had been cruel to his father, he dreaded retaliation from his sons, and lived himself constantly in his camp, in the midst of his soldiers. He died at Ahmednager, 1707, aged 89.

AUREOLUS, Manius, Acilius, a Dacian, who from a shepherd became a general, and had the meanness to cause his patron, Gallienus the emperor, to be assassinated. He was put to death at Milan 267, by the second Claudius.

AURIA, Vincent, a native of Palermo, distinguished as a man of letters. He wrote several works in Latin and in Italian. The most esteemed of his writings are his history of the great men of Sicily, in 4to. 1704, and his history of the viceroys of Sicily, fol. 1697. He died 1710, aged 85. He was born poor, but indigence is the mother of industry, and of distinction.

AURILLON, Jean Baptiste Elie, a native of Paris, admired for his eloquence in the pulpit, his piety and his learning. He was author of some divinity tracts, and died 1729, aged 78.

AURIOL, Blaise d', professor of the canon law at Toulouse, known by some poetical pieces, and treatises on jurisprudence. He was so terrified at the prediction of an approaching deluge, by a pretended prophet of his time, that he built himself a large ark in which, like another Noah, he hoped to survive the general calamity. He died 1540.

AUSONIUS, Decimus Magnus, a Latin poet of the fourth century, born at Bourdeaux. He was preceptor to Gratian, Valentinian's son, and wrote some admired poems.

AUSTIN, William, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, author of hæc homo, or the excellency of women, partly extracted from Agrippa's book de nobilitate et præcellent. feminei sexus. He wrote also meditations on the fasts and feasts of the church, published after his death, folio, 1637.

AUSTIN, Benjamin, a political writer, early espoused the democratic or republican side in the political controversies which raged during the administration of the first Adams. After the triumph of Mr. Jefferson he was appointed commissioner of loans for Mass. He died in 1820, aged 68 years.

His political writings with the signature of "Old South" have been published in a volume.

AUTEROCHE, Jean Chappe d', was born at Mauriac, in Upper Auvergne, son of the lord Auteroche, and he early distinguished himself by his rapid progress in the acquisition of learning, which was aided by the advantages of rank and of opulence. His superior abilities, especially in drawing and mathematics, soon recommended him to public notice. The principal of his college, de la Tour, mentioned him to Cassini, and the philosopher found him equal to his great expectations. Anteroche was employed to survey the royal buildings, and he advanced his reputation by translating Dr. Halley's works, and displayed the acuracy of his calculations in his assiduons observations on the two comets which appeared in 1760. The transit of Venus over the sun's disk, on the 6th of June 1761, added still to his popularity. While Pinge was sent to the isle of Roderigo, the abbé Anteroche braved the rigors of the north, and fixed upon Tobolsk, the capital of Siberia, as the place for his observations. The appearance of the philosopher with his mathematical apparatus was viewed by the barbarian natives with astonishment and terror, so that the governor was obliged to protect his person with a guard; but the cause of science triumphed, and though the clouded skies seemed not to promise a favorable day, yet the transit became visible, and the exulting astronomer, who made his observations in the presence of the archbishop of Tobolsk, and other men of science, immediately dispatched a courier to Paris with the result of his observations. In 1769, he prepared to view another transit of Venus, and crossed in a small vessel the Atlantic, eager to reach the coast of California, which was the place most favorable for the observation of the phenomenon. A pestilential disease had spread devastation over the country, but the abbé fearless of danger landed at St. Joseph, determined there to make his astronomical remarks against the advice of his friends. The 3d of June, the wished for day arrived, the observations were completed, and the disorder seemed to respect the person of the abbé; but, however, three days after he was attacked. Yet he might have struggled against the violence of the disease, and survived the dreadful shock, had he not imprudently exposed himself to the air, and to the fatigue of observing an eclipse of the moon, on the very day that he took physic. His fate was now decided, he grew worse, and died August 1st, 1769, in his 49th year, a remarkable instance of indefatigable application unfortunately sacrificed to a too eager pursuit after knowledge. His papers were preserved by M. Pauli who accompanied him, and were presented to the world by young Cassini.

AUTREAU, Jacques d', a painter of Paris, who, at the age of 60, began to write for the stage. His pieces were favorably received, and though they were deficient in intricacy of plot and action, yet they were admired for vivacity, ease, and comic spirit. His works were published 1749, in 4 vols. 12mo. with a preface by Pelessier. The best known of his pictures was his Diogenes with a lantern in his hand in search of an honest man, which he finds in a representation of cardinal de Fleury. Autreau lived in retirement, an enemy to the parade, bustle, and follies of life, and happy in his poverty. He died at Paris 1745, in the hospital of incurables.

AUVERGNE, Anthony d', a native of Clermont, director of the opera at Paris, and known as a very eminent composer, whose works are held in the highest admiration. He died at Lyons, 12th February 1797, aged 84.

AUVERGNE, Theophilus Malo De La Tour d', a French republican, distinguished by his learning and his heroic qualities, was descended from an illegitimate branch of the house of Bouillon, and was born in 1743, at Carhaix, in Lower Brittany. He served with honor in the army during the American war, and was living in retirement, on his half pay, when the revolution called him again into the field. Though he refused any higher rank than that of captain, he was entrusted with the command of a corps of eight thousand grenadiers, at the head of which he signalized himself on the Spanish frontier. The peace with Spain, in 1795, allowed him to return to his studies; but he once more quitted them, in 1799, for the benevolent purpose of taking the place of a friend's only son, who had been drawn for the conscription. In the following year, Bonaparte conferred on him the honorable title of First Grenadier of France. He fell, universally lamented, at the battle of Neuburg, in 1800. La Tour d'Auvergne was humane, singularly disinterested, knew all the European languages, and was thoroughly versed in ancient history. He is the author of a Franco-Celtic Dictionary; a Glossary of Forty-five Languages; and other philological works.

AUVIGNY, N. Castres d', a man of great genius, born in the Hainaut, and intimate with Pabbé des Fontaines, who nurtured and directed his taste. He was an officer in the light-horse guards, and was killed at the battle of Dettingen, 1743, in his 31st year. His writings were numerous for his age, and all on historical subjects, the most admired of which are his lives of illustrious Frenchmen, 8vols. 12mo.—his history of Paris, 4 vols. 12mo.—besides memoirs of madame Barnevald, 2 vols. 12mo.—and histories of Rome and France abridged. He is authentic, though his style is occasionally too declamatory and romantic.

AUXENTIUS, a native of Cappadocia, made bishop of Milan by Constantine, but excommunicated by a council at Rome. He was an Arian by principle. He died 374.—Another of the same name was so violent in his tenets that he challenged St. Ambrose to a public disputation which he as prudently rejected.

AUZONT, Adrian, a native of Rouen, known as a mathematician. He is said to be the inventor of the micrometer in 1667, the merit of which, however, is claimed also by the English. He first suggested the idea of applying the telescope to the astronomical quadrant, though some attribute it to Picard. He died 1691. He wrote a treatise of the micrometer, printed 1693, folio.

AVALOS, Ferdinand Francis, d', marquis of Pescara, in the kingdom of Naples, was distinguished for his valor in the service of Charles V. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and employed the hours of his captivity in writing a dialogue of love, addressed to his wife, the virtuous Victoria Colonna. His abilities contributed much to the battle of Bicoque, the recovery of the Milanese, and the victory of Pavia. It is said that the pope wished to gain him to his cause by the promise of the kingdom of Naples. He died without issue, at Milan, 4th November 1525, aged 36.

AVENTIN, John, was born of obscure parents, 1460, at Abensperg, in Bavaria, and after studying at Ingolstadt and Paris, he became professor of the learned languages at Vienna and Cracow. He was made tutor to the duke of Bavaria's children, and increased his reputation by writing the annals of Bavaria, which were first published in 1554, by Jerome Zieglerus. In 1529, Aventin was violently seized and imprisoned, it is supposed, on a complaint of heresy, but as no charge was made against him, he was released from his captivity by his patron, and, though now 64, he began to think of marriage. In the effervescence of a heated brain, he consulted his Bible, and determined to take the first woman he met, which proved to be his own maid, deformed, poor, and ill tempered. He died 1534, aged 68.

AVENZOAR, an Arabian physician of the 12th century, author of a treatise for the proper use of medicine. He was a follower of Galen. He died at Morocco, at the advanced age of 135. Dr. Freind speaks of his practice and of his abilities with great commendation.

AVERANIUS, Joseph, a native of Florence, possessed of strong powers of mind. He acquired very rapidly an intimate knowledge of the learned languages, of mathematics and philosophy, and of law. Besides translating the works of Archimedes, in his leisure hours, he ascertained the momentum of bodies on inclined planes, defended Galileo's philosophy, and inquired into the swiftness and propagation of sound. He died 22d Sept. 1738, aged 76. There are four volumes of his dissertations on the Florentine academy.

AVERANIUS, Benedict, eldest brother of the preceding, was born at Florence, 1645, and early distinguished himself by his advancement in literature, and his familiar acquaintance with the obscure parts of Plato and Aristotle. He also cultivated poetry, but, by the direction of his father, he studied jurisprudence at Pisa, and in 1676, he was made Greek professor there. He was universally respected for his learning, so that he was solicited by the university of Pavia to accept a professor's chair, and also by pope Innocent XI. who admired his genius. To improve and facilitate his style, he translated Sallust, Celsus, and other Latin authors into Greek, and wrote Greek elegies. In 1688, he published his orations, and died 1707. His dissertations delivered at Pisa, his orations, his poetry, and other works, were printed after his death, in 3 vols. fol. at Florence, 1717.

AVERDY, Clement Charles de P, a native of Paris, minister and comptroller of the finances under Louis XV. was at one time the favorite of the people. Though he introduced the reform of abuses, and encouraged commerce and industry through the nation, his endeavors proved abortive in the midst of a luxurious court and of an unprincipled ministry; and in 1764, the measures which he was forced to recommend proved so unpopular, that he solicited and obtained his dismissal. He retired to his country seat, where the revolution found him engaged in agricultural pursuits, and regardless of the politics and the prejudices of party. The recollection of his services and of his abilities was too powerful to suffer him to end his days in privacy; he was suspected, and consequently condemned and guillotined Oct. 1794, aged 74.

AVERROES, an Arabian philosopher born at Corduba, where his father was judge, under the emperor of Morocco. His knowledge of law, divinity, mathematics, and astrology was very extensive, and to this was added the theory rather than the practice of medicine. After being professor in the university of Morocco he was called away to succeed his father in the important office of judge, in Corduba, and soon after he was invested with the same powers in Morocco and Mauritania. So extensive an authority did not fail to raise enemies, jealous of merit and detractors of eminent talents; but the genius of Averroes rose superior to private envy. He possessed a firmness and patience of mind, which could distinguish and investigate the bias of human passions, and he was every where humane and liberal, so that the opulence which he derived from his marriage and from his posts was not heaped up, but generously dispersed for the relief of indigence and starving merit. The repeated attacks of malice however have too often prevailed, and Averroes is in the number of those whom superior virtues have not always shielded. He was at last represented by the nobility and doctors of Corduba, to Mansor king of Morocco, as a profane philosopher and a heretic, and the judge upon this accusation was insulted and imprisoned. Many of his enemies urged the necessity of capital punishment on so great an offender; but it was at last agreed by the doctors whom the monarch consulted that Averroes should retract. He was accordingly conducted to the gate of the mosque, bareheaded, where every one who entered indignantly spit into his face; after which he was asked by the doctors if he repented of his heresy, to which he replied Yes, and was discharged. He continued under disgrace, though permitted to read lectures at Fez, till the king discovered that his successor did not possess the same uprightness and virtue, and that the dignity of the law could be supported by none better than by Averroes. He was therefore restored to all his honors, though unwilling to leave the tranquillity of retirement, yet glad to find his innocence acknowledged by the people and the monarch. He died at Morocco 1206. The best edition of his works is that of Venice, 1608.

AVICENNA, a famous Mahometan physician and philosopher, who early applied himself to the study of literature, to botany, arithmetic, and mathematics. At the age of 16 he was so far acquainted with physic that he visited patients with great reputation and success, and that he might still more improve his understanding, he applied himself to Aristotle's metaphysics, which, after reading 40 times, he gave up in despair as unintelligible, till by accident he met a beggar that offered him to sale a treatise of Al Farabius on metaphysics, which clearly opened to him the sense and the meaning of the Grecian philosopher, which he had so long studied in vain. He now acquired credit as a physician by curing the king of Khorassan, but his enemies raised a persecution against him, when the monarch's library was destroyed by fire, as he was foolishly accused of the mischief, that he might arrogate to himself all the learning which he had received from books. There have not been wanting persons to assert that all his celebrity arose from the superior talents of his master, to whom his mother had bound him as a servant on pretence of being deaf. The old man, as it is said, admired his fidelity and services, and left his papers open to his view, which the crafty pupil copied and sent to his mother, and after his master's death published as the result of his own knowledge and experience. In the opinion of Dr. Freind, who must be considered as a judge, Avicenna had few merits, his writings are extracts from Galen, from Rhazes, and from Halyabbas; and he often confuses the nature or description of a disease by an affected display of learned terms. Avicenna died 1036, in his 56th year, with the character of a learned man.

AYILA, Louis d', a native of Placentia, general of cavalry under Charles V. at the siege of Metz 1552, of which the defence was conducted by the duke of Guise. He wrote memoirs of the African war, and of the wars of Charles V. against the protestants of Germany, printed 1546, and is censured by De Thon for his partiality.

AVILER, Augustin Charles d', a native of Paris, taken by the Algerine pirates as he was sailing from Marseilles to Rome with the view of enlarging his ideas of architecture. During his two years of captivity at Tunis he merited the thanks of the dey by producing the much admired plan of the mosque there and on regaining his liberty he visited Rome, and afterwards beautified Montpellier by the erection of a magnificent gate in honor of Louis XIV. He died at Montpellier, 1700, aged 47. He wrote a course of architecture in two vols. 4to. highly esteemed.

AVITUS, Mark Mæcilius, a native of Auvergne, emperor of the West on the death of Maximus 455. His elevation was not attended by popularity and by virtuous actions; on the contrary he devoted himself to pleasure, and soon offended the senate, so that at the end of 14 months he was marked for disgrace and death. He fled from the hands of his persecutors towards the Alps, and died on the road. His daughter married Apollinaris Sidonius, an historian who embalmed the memory of his father-in-law.

AXTEL, Daniel, a colonel in the parliamentary army, of whose private character few circumstances are known. He was so firmly convinced of the justice of the cause of the Parliament, that from a grocer he became a soldier, and by his good conduct rose to the place of colonel. He was one of the officers employed at the trial of the king, and his behaviour showed that he had not preserved much reverence for fallen majesty. He afterwards went to Ireland, but being dissatisfied with the conduct of Henry Cromwell, the lord lieutenant, he gave in his resignation, till the expulsion of the second protector and the restoration of the old parliament called him again to action. He was however opposed by Monk and dispossessed of his command, and after supporting general Lambert against Ingoldsby, he was obliged to fly, but was soon taken and committed to the tower. He was the 50th of the 52 excepted from the bill of indemnity, and he was accordingly tried as being concerned in the king's murder. It was sufficiently evident that he had acted with unusual severity against the king, and that he had been concerned in his execution, and therefore he was sentenced to be hanged at Tyburn, which sentence was executed on the 19th October 1660. His head was set up at the end of Westminster-hall, and the limbs exposed in other places. He left a widow and seven children, for whom he had provided in the days of his prosperity a sufficient subsistence.

AYESHA, daughter of Abubeker, was the most beloved of the wives of Mahomet, though she bore him no child. After his death she opposed the succession of Ali, but, though violent and revengeful, her character was respected, and when taken prisoner, she was dismissed without injury. She died 677, aged 67.

AYLESBURY, Sir Thomas, a native of London, educated at Westminster school and Christ Church, where he took his master's degree. His abilities as a mathematician and man of science recommended him to the duke of Buckingham, by whose influence he was made a baronet, and master of the mint. During the civil wars he suffered much from the virulence of the persecution of the parliament, and on the king's death he retired to Flanders, where he died 1657. In his public character he was a great patron of literature; and among his friends particularly was Thomas Harriot, and also Thomas Allen who intrusted his MSS. to his confidential care. His daughter married lord Clarendon.

AYLESBURY, William, son of the preceding, was born at Westminster, and like his father, educated at Westminster school and Christ Church. Charles I. who knew his merits, appointed him tutor to the young duke of Buckingham, and his brother lord Francis Villiers, with whom he travelled, and on his return he was made groom of the royal chamber, and encouraged to translate d'Avilla's history of the civil wars of France, which appeared in London, folio, 1647, and 1673. The civil wars reduced him from comfortable independence to poverty, and he passed to Jamaica, where he died about 1657. While in Italy it is said that he was nearly murdered by two assassins, who mistook him for another person against whom their weapons were directed.

AYLETT, Robert, an English author of the seventeenth century. He was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL. D. in 1614, and afterwards became master in Chancery. He wrote Susanna, or the arraignment of the two elders, in 8vo. 1622, and divine and moral speculations in verse—the Britannia antiqua illustrata, though ascribed to him, was supposed to be written by his nephew, Aylett Sammes.

AYLMER, John, an English Prelate, was born at Aylmer Hall, in Norfolk, 1521, and was educated at Cambridge. Lady Jane Grey was subsequently under his tuition. He warmly espoused the cause of the reformation, so that his pulpit eloquence was instrumental in converting many of the people in Leicestershire; but when Mary came to the throne, he had shown himself too zealous against popery to be safe in England, and therefore he fled to Strasburg and Zurich till the elevation of Elizabeth recalled him home. He was one of the eight divines appointed to dispute with the same number of Catholics; but though his learning was great, and his zeal unceasing, he received little preferment, because it is said he had with some asperity reflected upon the indolence of the bishops and their excessive incomes. His abilities, however, were at last rewarded, and he was made bishop of London when Sandys was translated from that see to Canterbury. His attention as a bishop was exemplary, he watched with a jealous eye over the dignity of the clergy, and none but deserving characters were admitted candidates for orders. During the plague the bishop's humanity was eminently conspicuous. By his orders the sick were visited by his clergy, every possible comfort was liberally administered, and books with directions to prevent the spreading of the contagion were freely circulated at his expense. In his last years he wished to exchange his diocese for Ely or Winchester, but when this could not be effected, he hoped to resign in favor of Dr. Bancroft, which the latter rejected. He died at Fulham, 3d of June, 1594, aged 73.

AYLOFFE, Sir Joseph, was born about the year 1703, was educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Oxford, and became eminent for his learning and his knowledge of the history and antiquities of his country. Sir Joseph was elected vice-president of the antiquarian society, and his various publications on the antiquities of England, and on local history, and on different monuments, proved how well he deserved the public favor. He married, in 1734, Mrs. Margaret Raiton, widow, by whom he had an only son who died of the small pox, at Cambridge, in his 21st year, December 19th, 1756, and the father died at Lambeth, April 1781, aged 72, and was buried with his father and son in the vault of Hendon church. His manuscripts were sold after his death. Besides various papers in the Archæologia, he published calendars of the ancient charters in the Tower of London, 1772, 4to.—addition of Leland's collectanea, 9 vols. 8vo.—liber niger Scaccarii, 2 vols. 8vo.—Hearne's curious discourses, 2 vols. 8vo. and some works of less note.

AYMON, John, a Piedmontese who embraced the tenets of Calvin in Holland, and afterwards returned to the Romish church under the patronage of the cardinal de Noailles, who procured for him a pension. He was permitted access to the king's library at Paris, but he dishonorably abused the confidence reposed in him by conveying away some of the books, and among others the manuscript original of the synod of Jerusalem, held 1672. This he printed in Holland with other pieces, under the name of monumens de la religion des Grecs, et de la fausseté de plusieurs confessions de foi, 1718, in 4to.

AYOLAS, John De, a Spaniard, governor of Buenos Ayres, in 1536, obtained great advantages over the Indians, and founded the city of Assumption; but in an attempt to open a communication by land with Peru, he and his troops were destroyed by the savages.

AYRES, John, an English penman of considerable eminence, of whose life few particulars are known. He was in the household of Sir William Ashurst, lord mayor of London, 1694, to whom he dedicated his arithmetic made easy, a popular work of which a 12th edition appeared 1714. His tutor to penmanship, engraved by John Strut, was published 1695, and inscribed to king William; and in 1700 appeared his Paul's school round hand. He lived at the hand and pen in St. Paul's church yard, where he published several other works on penmanship.

AYRMIN or AYERMIN, William, a native of Lincolnshire, made chancellor of England by Edward III. and afterwards treasurer. He was also sent as ambassador to Rome, where, by his intrigues, he obtained the nomination to the vacant bishopric of Norwich from the pope, which so offended the king, that he refused for a long time to admit him to his see. He died about 1387.

AYSA, a Moorish female, taken prisoner by the Spaniards under Charles V. at the siege of Tunis. She rejected with noble indignation the offers of Muley-Haseen who wished to redeem her from captivity, and observed that as he had been stripped of his kingdom, she disdained to owe her liberty to so great a coward.

AYSCOUGH, George Edward, son of Dr. Ayscough dean of Bristol, and of Anne, fifth sister of lord Lyttleton, was an officer in the foot guards, and distinguished by his literary accomplishments. He wrote Semiramis a tragedy, 1777, and on his return from the continent, which he visited for the benefit of his health, he published letters from an officer of the guards to his friend in England, with some account of France and Italy 1778, 8vo. He fell a victim to a rapid consumption 14th Oct. 1779.

AYSCOUGH, Samuel, an indefatigable compiler. He was born at Nottingham, where his education was begun under the care of Mr. Johnson, till the misfortunes of his father rendered his further progress in learning impossible. From the mean occupation of servant in a mill, young Ayscough was drawn by the friendship of a school-fellow who knew his merit and his industry, and he was in 1770 admitted into the British Museum, where he displayed so much diligence, and desire of gaining knowledge, that he was raised to be assistant librarian. He afterwards took orders, and had respectable church preferment. A variety of laborious indexes and catalogues were compiled by him, of which the most important are an Index to Shakespeare, and a Catalogue of the British Museum. He died in 1804, at the age of fifty-nine.

AYSCOUGH, George Edward, a military officer, was the son of the dean of Bristol, and nephew of Lord Lyttleton. He is the author of Semiramis. a tragedy, for which Sheridan wrote a prologue, and of Letters from an officer in the Guards, giving an account of France and Italy. Ayscough died, in 1779, of a consumption.

AYSCUE, Sir George, a gallant English admiral descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire. He was knighted by Charles I. but in the civil wars he declared for the commonwealth; and when the fleet revolted to prince Rupert, he brought his ship, the Lion, into the Thames, and was rewarded for his attachment to the parliament with a command on the Irish station, where his valour and experience greatly contributed to the reduction of Ireland. In 1651 he reduced Barbadoes, and the next year he defeated a Dutch fleet, and soon after, in consequence of his dispute with Blake, he retired from the service to command the fleet of Charles Gustavus king of Sweden. After the restoration he was promoted in the English navy, and in 1666 commanded the Royal Prince, the largest ship in the world; when, during a desperate fight of four days with the Dutch fleet, he unfortunately, after performing repeated acts of heroism, struck on the Galloper Sand, and was, against his will, obliged by his crew to surrender. The Dutch, proud of their captive, carried him from town to town as a spectacle to the people. Sir George after this never went again to sea, but lived and died in retirement.

AZARA, Don Joseph Nicholas d', a native of Arragon, was born in 1731, and studied at Salamanca, where he highly distinguished himself. He manifested also a taste for the fine arts, and contracted a friendship with Mengs, the painter. In 1765 he entered on the diplomatic career, and was sent to Rome, as agent for ecclesiastical affairs. On the death of the ambassador there, Azara was appointed to succeed him. He continued at Rome till he was driven from thence by the French invasion. Subsequently, he was named ambassador to Paris. Azara died in 1804. He wrote a Life of Mengs, and a Funeral Eulogium on Charles III., and translated Middleton's Life of Cicero, and various other works.

AZARIAS, a rabbi, author of a Hebrew work called the light of the eyes, containing various historical miscellaneous subjects, besides Aristeas' letter on the Septuagint translated into Hebrew. The work was printed at Mantua 1574.

AZEVEDO, Ignatius, a Portuguese Jesuit born 1527. He relinquished the independence of a large fortune to embark as a missionary to India. The vessel in which he was attacked by pirates, and he and his nineteen companions were massacred by the barbarous enemy 15th July 1570, near Palma. This cruel event was felt and lamented through Europe, and Azevedo was proclaimed a martyr by a papal bull.

AZAICUETA, Martin, surnamed Navarre, a lawyer, born 1494 at Verasoa, near Pampeluna, distinguished as a professor in various universities. He died at Rome 1586. His works appeared at Lyons, 6 vols. folio, 1597.

AZNAR, Count of Gascony, was sent, in 824, by Pepin, king of Aquitaine, to put down a revolt of the Navarrese Gascons, a task which he accomplished. Pepin, however, having subsequently given him cause for discontent, Aznar put himself at the head of the same Gascons, passed the Pyrenees, in 831, seized on a part of Navarre, and became the founder of the kingdom of that name. He died in 836.

AZUNI, Dominic Albert, an Italian civilian, was born in Sardinia in 1760, and died in that island in 1827. Among his works, all of which are much esteemed, are a History of Sardinia; a Dictionary of Mercantile Jurisprudence; and a System of the Principles of the Maritime Law of Europe.

AZZOGUIDI, Valerius Flaccus, a learned antiquarian of Bologna. He wrote on the origin of the town of Bologna, and the chronology of the first king of Etruria, and on the age of the patriarchs mentioned in Genesis. He died at Bologna, 1728, aged 77. There were two other authors of that name, of no great celebrity.

AZZOLINI, Lawrence, secretary to pope Urban VIII. and bishop of Narni, died 1532. He wrote an admired satire against debauchery, Svo. His relation, Decio, was raised to the dignity of cardinal by Innocent X. He wrote political aphorisms, and was the favorite of Christina queen of Sweden, who left to him all her property. He died 1689, aged 67.

B.

BAAN, John de, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem 1633. He studied under Beker, and acquired so much celebrity, that Charles II. and all the royal family were painted by him. After some residence in England, he went to Italy, where he was patronised by the grand duke of Tuscany. This ingenious man, whom his pencil had rendered rich and independent, died at Amsterdam 1702.

BAART, Peter, a Latin and Flemish poet and physician, author of the Flemish Georgics, a poem in imitation of Virgil, and highly commended by his countrymen, but with undiscerning partiality. He wrote also another poem, called le Triton de Frise. The year of his death is unknown.

BABA, a Turkish impostor. He announced himself in 1260, in the town of Amasia as the messenger of God; and when opposed by the Turks, he collected a number of adherents, at whose head he laid waste the fairest portion of Natolia. He was at last overpowered, and his sect totally dispersed.

BABEK, a Persian, who in 823 assembled a multitude of fanatical followers, with whom he defeated the troops of the caliph Almamoon. He was conquered by the next caliph, and after being led about on an elephant through the streets of Samara, his hands and legs were cut off, and he expired in the midst of the greatest agonies. One of the ten executioners who followed him declared that he had himself put to death not less than 20,000 men.

BABEUF, Francis Noel, a native of St. Quintin. He was at first a menial servant in the family of a benevolent master near Roye, whose kindness in instructing him in reading and writing, he repaid by distressing him in an iniquitous lawsuit. He next became an attorney, and in the beginning of the French revolution, he escaped from the prison of Arras, where his dishonesty had immured him, to come to Paris, where, assuming the name of Gracchus, he published a paper called the Tribune of the people. By disseminating the most pernicious principles, and recommending the division of all property, he continued popular, and on the fall of Robespierre, he was regarded as a proper person, to succeed the tyrant, and to guide the destinies of France, by shedding the blood of her virtuous citizens. This profligate character was at last denounced by some of his accomplices, and condemned to the guillotine. He suffered with great composure, 1797, aged 37. An account of his trial, in which he displayed great eloquence and astonishing firmness of mind, has been published in 3 vols. 8vo.

BABINGTON, Gervase, D. D. a native of Nottinghamshire, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. By the interest of Henry earl of Pembroke, to whom he was chaplain, he obtained preferment, and was at last raised to the see of Llandaff, and from thence translated to Hereford; and in 1597 to Worcester. He was a great benefactor to the cathedral library at Worcester. He died of the jaundice May 17th, 1610. He wrote notes on the five books of Moses, expositions of the creed, and sermons, published in folio, 1615 and 1637.

BABINGTON, Anthony, a native of Derbyshire, known in English history for his conspiracy to assassinate, with other Roman catholic associates, queen Elizabeth, and thus to procure the release of the unfortunate Mary of Scots. This diabolical scheme was zealously undertaken in the hope that Mary would reward her deliverer by taking him to share her throne. The plot was discovered by Walsingham, and the conspirators suffered death, 1536.

BABUR, grandson of Tamerlane, disputed with his elder brother Aly Doulat for the sovereignty, and in consequence of a treaty obtained the province of Georgia. He was afterwards engaged in bloody wars with his relations, and after a terrible battle he ordered the head of his brother Mohammed, who had fallen into his hands, to be cut off in his presence. He died 1471, in consequence of a violent fit of passion.

BACCHINI, Benedict, a Benedictine of Parma, author of a literary journal which gave offence to his superiors. He retired to Modena, where he became librarian and historiographer to the duke, and afterwards he filled the chair of ecclesiastical history with ability. He published several very learned works, and made a collection for the history of the house of Este, which he left in the hands of Muratori. He died 1721, aged 70.

BACH, John Sebastian, a German musician, born at Eisenach. He was in the service of the duke of Saxe Weimar, and was eminent for his skill in playing on the organ. His compositions are much admired. He died at Leipsic, 1754, aged 69. His sons, Charles and John, were equally eminent as musicians and composers.

BACHE, Richard, Postmaster General of the United States from 1776 to 1782. He probably obtained the appointment from his connexion with Dr. Franklin, whose only daughter he married in 1767. He died in 1811.

BACHE, Benjamin Franklin, a printer, and perhaps entitled to remembrance as the editor of the most influential opposition print, during the administrations of Washington and Adams, the Aurora. He died in 1799.

BACHELIER, Nicholas, an architect and sculptor, who, after studying at Rome under Michael Angelo, introduced at Toulouse and Lucca, the graceful and easy manner of his master instead of the heavy gothic which then prevailed. He adorned several churches by his sculpture, and was universally admired for the power of his chisel. He died after 1553.

BACKHOUSE, William, a Berkshire gentleman, educated at Christ Church. He left Oxford without a degree, and retired to his seat, where he devoted himself to alchemy and astrology, and had among his pupils and friends Elias Ashmole, who called him father. He died 1662. He was author of the pleasant fountain of knowledge, from the French, 8vo. 1644—The complaint of nature—The golden fleece, &c.—and he also invented the instrument called the Way-wiser.

BACKHUYSEN, Ludolph, a painter of Embden. He was intended for mercantile pursuits, at Amsterdam, but his time was more occupied in the company of painters than in the counting-house. His fondness for shipping led him frequently to copy the vessels in the port, which he executed so admirably with a pen, that collectors were eager to purchase them at liberal prices. From this beginning he rose to eminence in the profession. He died 1709, aged 78.

BACKUS, Isaae, a distinguished Baptist Minister of Massachusetts. He was born at Norwich, Con. in 1724, and commenced preaching in 1746. He was ordained as a congregationalist in 1748; but in 1751, was baptised by immersion. He was settled in Middleborough, both previous to, and subsequent to his change of sentiments. To his exertions the Baptist denomination in America is much indebted for the prosperity now experienced. He died Nov. 20, 1806, aged 82 years. His publications were numerous; among others a History of the Baptists in three volumes.

BACKUS, Charles, D. D. a graduate of Yale College, in 1769. He was born in Norwich, Con. 1749, and was ordained to the pastoral care of the Congregational church in Somers of that state, 1774. Here he remained till his death, which took place, Dec. 30, 1803. Dr. Backus became eminent in his profession, and published the following works—a sermon at the ordination of Freegrace Reynolds, 1795; of Tim. M. Cooley and Joseph Russell, 1796; of Thomas Snell, 1798; five discourses on the truth of the Bible, 1797; a century sermon, 1801; and a volume on regeneration.

BACKUS, Azel, D. D. President of Hamilton college in the state of New York. He was a son of Jabez Backus of Norwich, Con. and graduated at Yale College in 1787. When in college he was a deist; but, was reclaimed to Christianity, by the kind agency of his uncle, the Rev. Dr. Chas. Backus. In early life he was ordained successor of Dr. Bellamy at Bethlem. Upon the establishment of Hamilton college, he was appointed the first president. He died, Dec. 1816, aged 51 years. Dr. Backus published a sermon on the death of gov. Wolcott, 1797; an election sermon, 1798; and an ordination sermon, 1813.

BACON, Robert, an English friar, known at Oxford as divinity professor as well as by his opposition to Peter de Rupibus bishop of Winton, the favorite of Henry III. He visited Paris, and in 1233 was made treasurer of Salisbury cathedral. He wrote among other things the life of St. Edmund the primate, and died 1248, and was buried at Oxford.

BACON, Roger, was born near Ilchester, of a respectable family, 1214. He was educated at Oxford, and visited Paris, the common resort of the learned of the times, and after taking the degree of doctor, and becoming monk of the Franciscan order 1240, he returned to his native country. A strong inquisitive mind soon raised him to consequence, and he made the most rapid strides in the advancement of science and philosophy. His experiments and his calculations were so far above the comprehensions of his age, that he was accused of magic ; and the eagerness with which he studied astrology strongly supported the suspicion. The monks of his order grew jealous of his reputation, his works were rejected from their library, and the principals of the order was prevailed upon to imprison him. After ten years of painful solitude, he was set at liberty by the interference of his friends. The remainder of his life was spent in academical repose at Oxford, where he died 11th June, 1294. Bacon is universally allowed to have been a man of superior merit, and his example and the vast acquirements of his mind in a barbarous age strongly evince with what success industry and perseverance may labor in the road of learning. The discoveries and the more accurate experiments of the moderns pay daily tributes of gratitude and reverence to this father of philosophy, and it is now manifest that to his comprehensive mind were known many of the secrets which the toil and repeated efforts of succeeding ages have scarce brought to light. He was acquainted with the structure of an air pump and with the laws of optics, and the power of glasses ; he knew the preparation of phosphorus, and he clothed in unintelligible language, the name of gunpowder, which he said was formed with sulphur, nitre and charcoal, as if he anticipated the devastation which its discovery by Schwart, some ages after, was to bring upon mankind. In his writings, which amounted to above 80 treatises, he used an elegant and nervous style, and was always accurate in his observations on nature.

BACON, Sir Nicholas, keeper of the great seal under Elizabeth, was born 1510. He was employed under Henry VIII. to whom he proposed a plan, which however was never adopted, for the erecting of a college to instruct young statesmen in all the branches of political knowledge. He was knighted by Elizabeth, and made keeper of the seals in the room of Heath archbishop of York ; but as he favored the Suffolk succession he was treated with coldness, and suspected of assisting Hales in writing a tract to favor the claims of the duchess of Suffolk against the rights of the queen of Scotland. He was, however, soon after reinstated in the queen's good opinion by the interference of sir William Cecil, and he died 20th February 1579.

BACON, Anne, second daughter of sir Anthony Cook, preceptor to King Edward VI. and wife of the preceding, was eminent for her learning, piety, and virtue. She translated from the Italian into English Ochine's sermons, and Jewel's apology for the church of England, from the Latin ; and died about the beginning of the reign of James I. at Gorbambury, near St. Albans.

BACON, Nathaniel, general, a Virginia rebel, was educated at the Inns of Court in England, and after his arrival in this country was chosen a member of the council. The murder of six Indian chiefs induced the savages to take terrible vengeance, inhumanly slaughtering sixty for the six. Their incursions caused the frontier plantations to be abandoned. Governor Berkeley built a few forts on the frontiers, but this was a wretched expedient, and produced no beneficial effect, for the savages quickly found out, as an old history expresses it, "where the mouse traps were set." The people were for wiser and more active measures. They chose Bacon for their general, he sent to the governor for a commission, which was refused ; he then marched without one at the head of 80 or 90 men and defeated the Indians. For this act Bacon was proclaimed a rebel. He was taken, tried, and acquitted, restored to the council, and promised also in two days a commission as general for the Indian war, agreeably to the passionate wishes of the people. As the governor refused to sign the promised commission, Bacon soon appeared at the head of 500 men and obtained it by force. The people had not misjudged in his capacity to serve them : by the wise and energetic measures he adopted, he restored the dispersed people to their plantations. While he was thus honorably employed, the governor again proclaimed him a rebel. This measure induced him to countermarch to Williamsburg, whence he issued his declaration against the Governor, and soon drove him across the bay to Accomac. He also exacted of the people an oath to support him against the forces employed by the governor. He then prosecuted the Indian war. He again put the governor to flight and burned Jamestown. At this period he adopted a singular expedient to prevent an attack by the governor, besieged by him. He seized the wives of several of the governor's adherents, and brought them into camp; then sent word to their husbands, that they would be placed in the fore front of his men. Entirely successful on the western shore, Bacon was about to cross the bay to attack the governor at Accomac, when he was arrested by death Oct. 1st 1676.

BACON, Sir Francis, Viscount of St. Albans, whom Pope, in one emphatic line, has truly characterized as "the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind," was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and was born January 22, 1561. The promise of his future talents was so early displayed, that Queen Elizabeth was accustomed to call him her "young lord keeper." Trinity College, Cambridge, had the honor of his education ; and, while there, before he was sixteen, he began to dissent from the Aristotelian philosophy. On his return to England, after having accompanied Sir Amias Paulet to France, he entered of Gray's Inn, and, at the age of eight and twenty, became one of the queen's counsellors. Being the friend of Essex, to whom Cecil was hostile, Bacon was shut out from preferment. For this, however, Essex generously compensated him, by the gift of a considerable estate. The reward which Essex received was, that Bacon pleaded against him on his trial, and, afterwards, wrote a pamphlet to blast the memory of his benefactor. Having, previously to the accession of James I., contrived to obtain the good graces of the Scottish party, that monarch, as soon as he ascended the throne, knighted him, and gave him pensions to the amount of one hundred pounds per annum. But it was not till 1607 that he obtained the long coveted post of solicitor general. In 1611, he was appointed a judge of the marshal's court ; and in 1613, attorney general. As a crown lawyer, he was slavishly obsequious to the sovereign, and a dangerous enemy of freedom. At length he attained the summit of his ambition. In 1617, he was made lord keeper ; in 1619, lord high chancellor, with the title of Baron Verulam ; and, in 1620, he was created Viscount St. Albans.

Fortunately for posterity, the mind of Bacon was not wholly engrossed by ambition ; philosophy and science held a large place in it. His great labor, the Novum Organon, was given to the world in 1620. He had already published his Essays ; the Advancement of Learning ; the treatise on the Wisdom of the Ancients ; and some other works.

But, at the very moment when the triumph of his genius was completed, his political downfall was near at hand. In 1621, he was accused in parliament of gross bribery and corruption. He pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to pay a fine of forty thousand pounds ; to be imprisoned during the royal pleasure ; and to be rendered incapable of filling any office, sitting among the peers, and coming within the verge of the court. The fine and imprisonment, however, were soon remitted, and a pension was even granted to him. The remainder of his life was spent in retirement, and in the ardent pursuit of literature and science; often embittered by the embarrassments which arose from his habits of lavish expenditure. He died at Highgate, on the 9th of April, 1626. As a courtier and a politician, he merits no small severity of censure; as a man of genius and a philosopher, no language can be too lofty for his praise.

BACON, Thomas, an Episcopal minister at Fredericktown, Maryland, died in 1768. He compiled "a complete system of the revenue of Ireland," published in 1737; also a complete body of the laws of Maryland, fol. 1765. He also wrote other valuable pieces.

BACON, Anthony, elder brother to the chancellor, distinguished himself for his great knowledge of politics, which, however, he did not display in the public service, as he was satisfied with the tranquillity of a more private station. He was very intimate with Essex, and he assisted him with his advice, in the midst of his distresses, and even resided for some time in his house, as he was unable from lameness to visit him frequently. He left his estate to his brother, the chancellor.

BACON, Phaniel, D. D. an Oxford divine celebrated for his wit and humor. In 1735 he became rector of Baldon, Oxfordshire, where he died, January 2, 1783. He wrote, besides five plays, published in 1757, an elegant poem called "the artificial kite," first printed in 1719, and inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine 1755.

BACON, John, an English sculptor, born at Southwark, 24th November, 1740. At the age of 15, he was bound to a china manufacturer at Lambeth; and in this employment he so distinguished himself by his assiduity, that in a little time the improvements of the manufactory were all the efforts of his genius. From the various models which were presented to his view, he laid the foundations of his future fame; and in his execution displayed such taste and correctness, that he obtained not less than nine premiums from the society for the encouragement of arts. He formed and carried into perfection the designs of making statues of artificial stone, and in 1763, he began first to use the instrument, since improved, by which he transferred the form of the model to the marble. His figure of Mars much increased his reputation. The statues of Judge Blackstone, Johnson, and Howard; a bust of George III; and the monuments of Lord Chatham, Mrs. Draper, and Guy, the founder of the hospital, are among his principal works. An inflammation in the bowels proved fatal to this most ingenious artist, 4th August, 1799.

BADAKSCHI, a Persian poet under the caliph Moctafi. His divan, or collection of poems, is written upon the fortunes which attended the great men of the court; and he says, that the varied scene in human affairs ought not to create surprise, as we see that life is measured by an hour-glass, and that an hour is always above and the other below in alternate succession.

BADCOCK, Samuel, an English divine and writer, was born, in 1747, at South Moulton, in Devonshire, and was, for some years, a dissenting minister, but at length conformed to the church, and became assistant preacher at the Octagon Chapel, Bath. He died in London, in 1788. As a pulpit orator, he was much admired; and as a literary man, he displayed talents far above mediocrity. He was one of the best writers in the Monthly Review; and was a correspondent of several magazines; and contributed largely to Dr. White's Bampton Lectures: but published nothing separately, except a Sermon, and a pamphlet on Dr. Priestley.

BADEN, James, a Dane, born in 1735, is considered as one of the founders of Danish literature. In 1760, on his return from his travels, he gave, at Copenhagen, the first course of lectures on the belles lettres that had ever been delivered in the language of the country. He was professor of eloquence and Latin in the university of Copenhagen, and held other offices connected with public instruction. His Critical Journal, from 1768 to 1779, contributed much to improve the Danish taste. He translated Tacitus, and other classics, and published a Latin and Danish Dictionary, and several grammars.

BADÉW, Richard de, a native of Badow Essex. He was chancellor of Cambridge 1326, and laid the foundation of a college called University hall, which was destroyed accidentally by fire; and when rebuilt by the daughter of Robert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, was called Clare-hall.

BADGER, Louis, a native of Lyons, has immortalized his memory by an heroic instance of fraternal affection. To save his brother, who had assisted in defending Lyons against the republicans, and who was consequently exposed to the penalty of death after the surrender, he assumed his name, and cheerfully suffered for him.

BADIA Y LEBLICH, Domingo, a Spaniard, was born in 1766, and educated at Valencia. Being well skilled in Arabic, he resolved to travel in the East; and, accordingly, after having been personally qualified to pass as a Mahometan, he assumed the name of Ali Bey. Under his disguise he visited Tripoli, Egypt, Mecca, and Syria undiscovered, and was every where received with favour, as a true believer. On his return to Spain, he espoused the cause of Joseph Bonaparte, and, after the battle of Vittoria, he took refuge in France. He died 1824. His Travels in Africa and Asia were published in two quarto volumes.

BAFFIN, William, an able English navigator, was born in 1584, and acted as pilot to several of the voyagers to the arctic regions. Geographers have given his name to the vast bay which he explored, and which commences at Davis's Straits. Its existence has been doubted, but has recently been verified. Baffin proposed to attempt a passage round Northern and Eastern Asia, but could not obtain support. He was killed at the siege of Ormuz, in 1622.

BAGGESEN, Jens, a Danish poet, who also wrote much in German, was born, at Corsor, Feb. 15, 1764. In 1785, he displayed, in his Comic Tales, his power and humor as an author. The prince of Holstein, Augustenburg, enabled him to travel through Germany, France, and Switzerland. In 1793, he visited Italy. He afterwards received from the Danish government an appointment in Copenhagen. In 1800, he went with his wife, a niece of the famous Haller, to reside at Paris. In 1811, he was appointed professor of the Danish language at Keil, and, in 1814, resigned his office, and went to reside in Copenhagen. At this time, his poetical fame reached its highest point. He again left Denmark, and died suddenly at Dresden, Oct. 3, 1826.

BAGFORD, John, a native of London, originally a shoemaker, and afterwards a bookseller and an antiquarian, and a collector of old English books, curious prints, &c. He enriched the famous library of Moore, bishop of Ely, for which he was admitted into the Charter-house by the prelate. He died at Islington, May 15th, 1716, aged 65, and was buried at the Charter-house. His very valuable collection of books and antiquities, procured not only at home but abroad, was purchased by the earl of Oxford, and added to his library. He published proposals, 1707, in the Philosophical Transactions, for a general history of printing; and his manuscripts, though badly written, and worse spelled, may be consulted with advantage. Some of his letters and collections are preserved in the British Museum and in the public library of Cambridge. There was a print engraved of him, 1728, by George Vertue.

BAGGER, John, made bishop of Copenhagen at the age of 29, in consequence of his extensive knowledge of oriental learning and of theology, was a native of Lunden, and died 1693, aged 47. He published some learned discourses in Danish and Latin.

BAGLIONI, John Paul, a native of Perugia, who usurped the sovereignty of his country, of which he was dispossessed by Ctesar Borgia. He afterwards served in the Italian armies, especially in the pay of Venice, and was at last treacherously invited to Rome by the pope, Leo X. who dreaded his intrigues, and cruelly beheaded, 1520.

BAGLIVI, George, a native of Apulia, who, after studying at Padua, settled as professor of anatomy at Rome, where he died, 1706, in his 38th year. He possessed superior abilities in his profession, as is fully evinced by his compositions, all written in Latin, and first published in 1710, in 4to.

BAGRATION, a Russian prince, senator, and imperial counsellor. He distinguished himself by his military services in the campaigns in Poland in 1792 and in 1794; and in those in Italy, under Suwarrow in 1799, and particularly at the battle of Austerlitz. He was afterwards appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Moldavia; and he continued to add to his reputation by the display of skill and courage on several occasions, till at length he was mortally wounded at the battle of Moscow, during the invasion of Russia by Bonaparte in 1812.

BAGSHAW, William, a native of Tidswell, educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, and minister of Glessop, which he resigned in 1662, for not submitting to the act for uniformity. He continued to preach privately, as he was eloquent and popular, and a large meeting-house was erected for him at the revolution. He wrote several valuable treatises; and died 1703, aged 75.

BAGSHAW, Edward, M. A. a student of Christ Church, Oxford, for some time assistant at Westminster, under Busby. He was ordained by Brownrigg bishop of Exeter, but proved so violent in his principles that he was imprisoned for nonconformity, and died in Newgate, 1671.

BAHALI, a Mussulman, author of a book on the derivation of Arabic names. He died in the 220th year of the hegira.—Another, who abridged a treatise on the diversity of opinions of Mahometan doctors. He died the 321st year of the hegira.

BAHRDT, Charles Frederic, M. A., a native of Bisschosswerda, who studied at Leipsic, and assisted his father, who was there divinity professor. He soon removed from Leipsic to Erfurt, where he gave lectures on biblical antiquities; and he then removed to Giessen, and afterwards to Durkheim. Here, as preacher to count Von Leiningen Dachsburg, he opened a house for the instruction of youth, which he called Philanthropinum; but his plans failing, he went to Holland, and then to England, where he obtained four pupils. On his return to the continent, he found that his conduct had given offence at Vienna, and therefore he retired to Prussia, and next settled at Halle, as an inn-keeper and farmer. His sentiments were deistical, and his life was licentious. So suspicious was his character, that he was condemned, and imprisoned at Magdeburg. He died 1792, aged 51.

BAIAN, or BAION, a native of Goa, who embraced Christianity, and came to Rome, where he was ordained priest, about 1630. He was author of some ingenious works, besides a translation of the Æneid into Greek verse, and the Lusiad of Camoens into Latin.

BAJAZET I. emperor of Turkey, succeeded his father Amurat I. 1389. He conquered, with unusual rapidity, the provinces of Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Thessaly; and after he had made the emperor of Constantinople tributary to his power, and defeated the army of Sigi-smund, king of Hungary, 1396, he marched to attack Tamerlane, in the east, whom he treated with such contempt, that he caused his ambassadors to be shaved in derision. He was, however, totally defeated near Angoury, 1402, and taken prisoner; and when the proud conqueror asked him what he would have done with him if he had obtained the victory, Bajazet answered, I would have confined you in an iron cage. Such, then, shall be thy fate, rejoined Tamerlane. In his cage, Bajazet behaved with his native fierceness, expecting that his sons would rescue him; but when he was disappointed, he dashed his head against the bars of the cage, and died, 1403, at Antioch in Pisidia. Some, however, say, that he was honorably treated by Tamerlane.

BAJAZET II. succeeded his father Mahomet II. 1481, and caused his brother Zizim, who opposed him, to be assassinated. He extended the boundaries of his kingdom; and though checked in his attacks on Syria, he made himself master of the strongest places of the Peloponnesus, and obliged the Venetians to sue for peace. His reign was distracted by intestine discord, and he fell by the perfidy of his son Selim, who not only dethroned him, but caused him to be poisoned, 1512, in his 60th year.

BAILLET, Adrian, a learned Frenchman, born of poor parents at Neuville, near Beauvais, in Picardy, and educated by the humanity of the fathers of a neighboring convent. He early distinguished himself by his great application; and when in orders, and possessed of the small living of Lardieres, which produced not more than 50*l.* a year, he maintained himself and his brother respectably. In 1680, he became library keeper to M. de Lamignon, and began to form an index of every subject which was treated in the books which he possessed; and so voluminous were his labors, that they were contained in 35 folio volumes, and all written with his own hand. His next work was "Jugemens des savaus," which had a very rapid sale, and which he totally gave to the bookseller, requesting only a few copies for his friends. As in this work he mentioned not only the praises but the censures passed on different authors, he met with violent opposition from those who suffered under the severity of his criticism. The Jesuits were particularly severe against him, because he had spoken disrespectfully of their society; and, on the other hand, expressed himself in handsome terms of the gentlemen of the Port Royal. Besides these, his indefatigable labors produced a prolix life of Descartes, 2 vols. 4to.—an history of Holland—the lives of saints, 4 vols. fol.—and several theological works; and he formed the plan of "an universal ecclesiastical dictionary," which was to contain a perfect system of divinity, supported by authorities from scripture and from the fathers of the church, in 3 vols. folio, when he died of a lingering illness, 21st January 1706, in his 57th year.

BAILLIE, William, an English amateur artist, was born about 1736, and was originally a captain of cavalry; but quitted the army, in order to devote himself to engraving. He displayed much talent, and produced about a hundred plates, several of which are from Rembrandt. He died at the beginning of the nineteenth century.

BAILLIE, Matthew, the son of a divinity professor at Glasgow, was born in 1760, and was educated at his native city and at Oxford, at which latter place he took his degree of M. D. Being a nephew of Dr. William Hunter, he was so fortunate as to receive the valuable instructions of that celebrated man. Aided by this advantage, and his own great talents, he soon obtained an extensive medical practice in the metropolis, and accumulated a large fortune. Dr. Baillie died in 1824. He is the author of the Morbid Anatomy of the Human Body: a work of superior excellence.

BAILLY, John Sylvain, a famous astronomer, born at Paris, 15th September 1736. The accidental friendship of the abbé de la Caille directed him in the pursuit of science; and, in 1763, he introduced to the academy his observations on the moon, and the next year his treatise on the zodiacal stars. In 1766, he published his essay on the satellites of Jupiter, and in other treatises enlarged further on the important subject. In 1775, the first volume of his history of ancient and modern astronomy appeared, and the third and last in 1779; and, in 1787, that of Indian and oriental astronomy, in 3 vols. 4to. He was drawn from his literary retirement to public view as a deputy to the first national assembly; and such was his popularity, that he was, on July 14th, 1789, nominated mayor of Paris. In this dangerous office, he conducted himself in a very becoming manner, eager to check violence, and to enforce respect for the laws; but his impartiality was considered soon as a crime; and when he spoke with reverence of the royal family, on the trial of the queen, he was regarded as unfit to preside over the destinies of a rebellious city. He descended, in 1791, from his elevation, and retired to Melun, determined to devote the rest of his life to literature and science; but the sanguinary tribunal of Robespierre, who knew his merit, and would not protect it, dragged him to execution. He lost his head by the guillotine, 12th November, 1793, exhibiting, in death, heroism, resignation, and dignity.

BAINBRIDGE, John, a physician and astronomer of Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire. After taking his degrees at E manual college, Cambridge, under the tuition of Dr. Joseph Hall, afterwards bishop of Norwich, he settled in his native county, where he practised physic, and undertook the care of a grammar-school; and from thence he was invited by his friends to London, where his application to astronomy and mathematics, and his scientific description of the comet of 1618, published in 4to. raised him to fame and consequence. In 1619, he was made, by his friend, Sir Henry Saville, first astronomical professor at Oxford; and he entered at Merton college, where he was appointed reader of Linacer's lecture. He died in 1643, aged 61. Bainbridge was indefatigable after literature; and he began at the age of 40 to study the Arabic, that he might give a more correct edition of all the ancient astronomers, agreeable to the statutes of his founder. Several of his works have been published. His Proeli spheræ, Ptolemæi de hypothesisibus planetarum liber singularis, with Ptolemy's canon regnorum, appeared in 1620, in 4to.

BAINBRIDGE, William, of the American navy, was born at Princeton, N. J. May 7th 1774. He was apprenticed to the sea-service at an early period of his life, and at the age of 19, rose to the command of a merchant vessel. In 1793, he entered the naval service with the rank of lieutenant. In 1800, he sailed for Algiers as commander of the frigate George Washington; and in 1803, he sailed for Tripoli as commander of the frigate Philadelphia, in consequence of the grounding of which he was captured. On the 29th of December, 1812, having the frigate Constitution under his command, he captured, after a severe action, the British frigate Java; and his generosity to the prisoners gained for him a strong expression of their gratitude. Since the close of the war Commodore Bainbridge has commanded, with great reputation and popularity, at several naval stations; and for several years has filled the office of a Commissioner of the Navy Board. He died, at Philadelphia, July 27th 1833, in his 60th year.

BAIUS, or DE BAY, Michael, a native of Melin, made divinity professor of Louvain by Charles V. His abilities were so respectable, that he was sent as deputy to the council of Trent; but his wish to bring back the followers of Luther and Calvin to the bosom of the church, induced him to adopt some of the tenets with respect to justification, which drew upon him the clamors of the Franciscans and other catholics, so that his writings were not only denounced by the Inquisition of Louvain and the Sorbonne, but the pope, Pius V. condemned 76 of the points which he advanced. He was obliged, therefore, to acknowledge his errors and his submission to the holy see; and a second time the papal power interfered between his followers and those of the Jesuit Lessius, who filled Louvain and the Low Countries with their clamor and alteration. Baius died 16th September 1589, aged 76. His works, which are written in a correct and close style, far superior to the learning of the times, were published 1696, in 4to. at Cologne.

BAKER, David, an English Benedictine, who studied at Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, Oxford, and was converted from Atheism to Christianity. He travelled in Italy, and resided in England in the time of Charles I. as missionary; after which, he settled as director and confessor of the English nuns at Cambay. He died in London, 1641. He was remarkable for his religious zeal. His writings were mostly on theological subjects, and said by Wood to be preserved in the monastery at Cambay. His collections for an ecclesiastical history of England, in six folio volumes, are lost. Though none of his works were ever printed, they were judiciously drawn up, and have proved, according to Hugh Cressy, very serviceable to succeeding writers.

BAKER, Sir Richard, author of the chronicles of the kings of England, was born at Sissinghurst, in Kent, and after studying three years at Hart-hall, Oxford, he went abroad to complete his education. He was knighted at Theobalds by James I. 1603; and as he possessed Middle Aston, and other property in Oxfordshire, he was made sheriff 1620. He died February 13, 1645. He was a man of extensive learning, as his miscellaneous works sufficiently prove. The last edition of his chronicle was 1730, fol.

BAKER, Thomas, a native of Ilton, Somersetshire, who, after studying at Magdalen-hall and Wadham college, Oxford, obtained the vicarage of Bishop's Nymmet, in Devonshire, where he lived a retired and literary life, and died 1690, aged 65. He distinguished himself by his general knowledge, and particularly by his acquaintance with the mathematics, as he showed by his useful book called geometrical key, 1634, in 4to. and by the answers he sent to the queries proposed to him by the royal society, for which he received their medal.

BAKER, Thomas, a learned antiquary, born of a very respectable family. He was born September 14th, 1656, and educated at Durham grammar-school, and afterwards at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1630. He entered into orders, and was presented to Long Newton rectory by bishop Crew, to whom he was chaplain; but he was soon after disgraced, for refusing to read James II.'s declaration for liberty of conscience; and he resigned his living, 1690, and returned to college, where he enjoyed his fellowship till, with twenty-one others, he was dispossessed, in 1717. He might have continued in this, but he refused to subscribe to what his conscience disapproved, and he expressed greater indignation against the unprincipled time-serving conduct of his immediate friends than against the severity of his persecutors. Though deprived of all offices, he still continued to reside in the college a commoner master till the day of his death, supported, it is said, by Mathew Prior, who retained his fellowship to supply the income to his friend. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke, which in three days terminated his existence, July 2d, 1740. In private life, Baker was distinguished by his affability, his easy and mild manners, and as a scholar he was equally known. Besides his "reflections on learning," which passed through eight editions, and his preface to bishop Fisher's funeral sermon for the countess of Richmond and Derby, nothing has been published of his works; but his labors were indefatigable in making collections for the history of St. John's college and the antiquity of Cambridge university, so that not less than 39 volumes in folio and three in 4to. of these valuable manuscripts are preserved both in the British museum and the public library of Cambridge.

BAKER, Henry, an ingenious naturalist, born in Fleet-street, London. He was brought up under an eminent bookseller; an employment which, however, he early resigned for philosophical pursuits. His chief employment was to correct the stammering of grown up persons, and to teach the deaf and dumb to speak; and so successful were his exertions, that he acquired an ample fortune by this most honorable profession. He was an active and useful member of the royal and antiquarian societies, to whose high reputation he contributed by frequent and sensible communications. He wrote poetry in the younger part of his life, and maintained throughout a character respectable for urbanity of manners, and a conciliating deportment. He died in the Strand, 25th November, 1774, in his 71st year. His microscopical experiments were very valuable, and have been published. His name must be mentioned as the first who introduced into England the large Alpine strawberry, the seed of which was transmitted to him in a letter by professor Bruns, of Turin. He likewise introduced the seeds of the true rhubarb, rheum palmatum, sent over to him by Dr. Mounsey, the physician of the empress of Russia.

BAKEWELL, Robert, eminent as the improver of British cattle, was born, 1726, at Dishley, Leicestershire, where his father had a farm. His attention was directed to the improvement of the breed of cattle, and so successful were his labors, that the Dishley sheep became celebrated over the country, and one of his rams was let for the extraordinary price of 400 guineas, and his bulls at 50 guineas each a season. He died much respected, 1798.

BALAMIO, Ferdinand, a native of Sicily, physician to pope Leo X. about 1555. He was eminent in literature as well as medicine, and translated some of Galen's works into Latin, published 1586, in Latin, at Venice.

BALBOA, Vasco Nugues de, a Castilian, known by his enterprising genius and his misfortunes. He acquired reputation as one of the American adventurers, and in 1513 he left Spain, to discover the South Sea, and in one month after his departure he gained the wished for ocean. Fame, and not the accumulation of wealth, was the object of his heart. Though he could possess pearls and gold, he preferred the love of his fellow adventurers. He was found at Santa Maria, on the coast of Darien, where he had built a town, and crossed the isthmus, in the meanest habit, building a hut for his dwelling, by the governor of the Spanish king, who became jealous of his popularity, and falsely accused him of felony. The charge was easily proved before a corrupted tribunal; and the unfortunate Balboa lost his head by a tyrannical sentence, 1517, at the age of 42.

BALBUENA, Bernard de, a Spanish poet of eminence, born at Toledo, and educated at Salamanca, where he took his doctor's degrees. He settled in America, and died there 1627, after being seven years bishop of Porto Rico.

BALCANQUAL, Walter, a Scotsman, who attended James I. when he came to England, and became his chaplain. He took the degrees of D. D. at Oxford, and appeared at the synod of Dort as representative for the church of Scotland. He was successively master of the Savoy, in 1624 dean of Rochester, and in 1639 dean of Durham. He was a great sufferer during the rebellion, and with difficulty escaped his persecutors. He died at Chirk castle, Denbighshire, Christmas day, 1695.

BALDE, James, a native of Upper Alsatia, very highly applauded in Germany for his poetry, and surnamed the Horace of his country. He died at Neuburg, 1668, in his 65th year; and so honored was his memory, that the senators of the place eagerly solicited to obtain his pen, which was, as a most precious relict, carefully kept in a silver case. The labors of Balde are miscellaneous, partly dramatic, partly odes, exhibiting strong flashes of genius, but without the correctness and judgment of mature taste. His Uranie victorieuse was rewarded by Alexander VII. with a gold medal. The best editions of his works are, Cologne, 4to. and 12mo. 1645.

BALDI, Bernardin, an Italian, of almost universal genius, was born at Urbino, in 1553, and was made abbot of Guastalla, by the sovereign of that state. He was at once theologian, mathematician, philosopher, historian, geographer, antiquary, orator, and poet; understood the ancient and oriental languages, and almost all the European; had a prodigious memory, a sound judgment, and indefatigable application. Baldi is the author of several poems and scientific works. He died in 1617.

BALDI, Lazarro, a disciple of Peter da Cortona, born in Tuscany, and distinguished as a painter. He was employed by Alexander VII. in the painting of the gallery at Monte Cavallo. He died 1703.

BALDINI, John Anthony, a nobleman of Placentia, engaged as ambassador at various courts of Europe, and at the congress of Utrecht. He died 1735, aged 71. He made a valuable collection of curiosities and of books, a catalogue of which appeared in the Italian literary journal.

BALDINUCCI, Philip, a Florentine of the academy of la Crusca, well acquainted with painting and sculpture, of which he began the history, at the request of cardinal Leopold of Tuscany. His death, in 1696, in his 72d year, prevented the execution of a plan accurately and ably conducted. He wrote the general history of painters, 6 vols.—an account of the progress of engraving on copper—a vocabulary of designs.

BALDOCK, Ralphe de, was educated at Merton, Oxford, and made bishop of London on the death of Gravesend, 1304. His election was disputed; but he was confirmed by the pope, and consecrated at Lyons by the cardinal of Alba, 1306; and on his return to England he was made chancellor of the realm by Edward I. which he resigned on the king's death. He was a virtuous and charitable prelate; and his history of the British affairs, now unfortunately lost, though seen by Leland, proves that he possessed learning and great judgment. He died at Stepney, July 24th 1313.

BALDWIN I. count of Flanders, was engaged in the crusades, and behaved with such bravery, that when Constantinople was taken, 1204, by the united forces of the French and Venetians, he was appointed emperor of the East. His virtues deserved the high elevation; but, in those turbulent times, he was unfortunate in a battle which he fought against the Greeks and Bulgarians, 15th April, 1205. He was taken prisoner by his ferocious enemies, and, after a confinement of sixteen months, barbarously put to death, in his 35th year.

BALDWIN II. the last Latin emperor of Constantinople, was raised to the throne 1228, in his 11th year, after his brother Robert. His reign was agitated with the dissensions of powerful rivals; and though he was once victorious over his enemies, he had the misfortune to see his capital taken, by Michael Paleologus, in 1261, and, to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror, he fled to Negropont, and then to Italy, where he died, 1273, aged 55. His only son Philip died two years after him.

BALDWIN I. king of Jerusalem, was brother of Godfrey de Bouillon, whom he accompanied to Palestine during the crusades. After the death of Godfrey, he succeeded to the throne of Jerusalem, 1100, and the next year conquered the towns of Antipatris, Casaria, and Azotus, to which Acre was added in 1104, after an obstinate siege. He died 1118, and his remains were deposited in a church on Mount Calvary.

BALDWIN II. king of Jerusalem, was son of Hugh count Rethel, and succeeded to the throne after Eustace, brother to Baldwin I. had declared his unwillingness to reign, 1118. He was a brave warrior, and defeated the Saracens in 1120, but four years after he was unfortunately taken prisoner, and obtained his release only by delivering up the town and fortress of Tyre. He died 1131.

BALDWIN III. king of Jerusalem, son of Fulk of Anjou, succeeded his father, 1143, under the guardianship of his mother. He was successful in some battles, and took Ascalon, and died 1163.

BALDWIN IV. king of Jerusalem, succeeded his father Amaury, 1174. As he was a leper, Raymond of Tripoli held the reins of government, which were resigned by the subtle sovereign to his nephew, Baldwin V. He died 1185, and his successor the following year, as it is said, of poison, administered by his mother, that her husband, Guy de Lusignan, might ascend the vacant throne.

BALDWIN, Thomas, D. D., a baptist minister in Boston. He was invited to Boston in 1790, and acquired a high rank as a preacher. Of his own denomination in New-England he was the head, and to him all his brethren looked for advice. He died in 1828, aged 71 years. He published several sermons, and a work entitled, "the Baptism of believers only, and particular communion vindicated."

BALDWIN, Abraham, eminent as a statesman, and president of the university of Georgia, was graduated at Yale College in 1772. He was a member of the Convention which formed the constitution of the United States in 1787, and held a seat successively in both houses of Congress. He died at Washington in 1807.

BALE, John, an English divine, was born, in 1495, at Cove, in Suffolk, was educated at Norwich and Cambridge, and became a zealous convert from popery to protestantism. Under Edward VI. he was made bishop of Ossory, and excited the hatred of the Irish catholics by his reforming zeal. When Mary ascended the throne, he fled to Basil, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth, and was appointed a prebend of Canterbury. He died in 1563. His works are numerous; but chiefly controversial; and his writings of this class, some of which were published under the name of Harrison, are abundantly acrimonious. He appears to have been the last writer of those religious dramas called Mysteries. The work by which principally he is remembered is his Latin Account of the Lives of eminent British authors.

BALECHON, Nicholas, an eminent engraver, born at Arles, son of a button-seller. He died suddenly, at Avignon, August 1765, aged 46. There was much delicacy and softness in his execution. His principal pieces are les belles marines, Ste. Genevieve, and a portrait of Frederic Augustus king of Poland. Of this last he took proof impressions, contrary to his promise to the dauphiness, for which violation of his word he was expelled from the academy, and sent to a disagreeable retirement. He was well acquainted with chemistry.

BALEN, Henry Van, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Antwerp, studied in Italy, and rose to high reputation. His death took place in 1632. Vandyke received his first instructions from him.

BALES, Peter, a great master of penmanship, was born in 1547, and died, in indigence, about the year 1610. Some of his performances were astonishing for their minuteness and perfect legibility. Bales taught his art at Oxford and London, and was employed by Walsingham, in counterfeiting hand writings, for the purpose of detecting treasonable correspondence. He is the author of the Writing School Master.

BALEY, Walter, a native of Portsham, Dorsetshire, educated at Winchester-school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He was proctor of the university, 1558, and took his degrees in physic, whilst he studied divinity with equal attention. He was made professor of physic at Oxford, and soon after became physician to queen Elizabeth, which recommended him to practice and to opulence. He died March 3, 1592, aged 63, and is buried in New college chapel. His writings were chiefly on the eye-sight and its preservation, and were neither valuable nor learned. He also wrote a discourse on the qualities of pepper, 1588, 8vo.—directions for health, 4to.

BALGUY, John, an English divine, born at Sheffield, where his father was master of the grammar school. He was admitted of St. John's college, Cambridge, where he laments, that two years were lost to himself by an improper fondness for reading romances, till he was awakened from his inactivity by perusing Livy, and by reflection urged to more serious and honorable pursuits. When admitted to orders, he soon distinguished himself as a preacher. During the four first years of his residence on the donative of Lamesley and Tanfield, in Durham, he never omitted writing a new sermon every week, so that afterwards he committed at once to the flames 200 of these valuable compositions, in the presence of his son, afterwards archdeacon and prebendary of Winchester, whom he wished to excite to the same laudable application. As a writer, he became respected in the Bangorian controversy, and at all times he maintained the character of a good divine, and a warm advocate in the cause of rational religion and Christian liberty. His works consist of sermons and of tracts, all on divinity; and though some of his philosophical opinions are considered erroneous, his principles must ever be applauded, and his discourses highly admired. He was a great friend to toleration, and whilst he abhorred the tenets of the Romish church, he cultivated an acquaintance with the most respectable of the dissenters and of the quakers. His defence of Hoadley recommended him to the friendship and patronage of that prelate; but he nobly disdained to use the esteem of the great for his character as a step to preferment. He died 21st September, 1743, in his 63d year.

BALIOL, Sir John, the founder of Baliol college, Oxford, was born at Barnard castle, Durham. He was governor of Carlisle, 1248; and the guardianship of Alexander III. of Scotland and of Margaret, daughter of king Henry III. of England, his wife, was intrusted to his care; but an accusation of misconduct drew upon him the vengeance of the English king, which he averted by paying a large sum of money. The foundation of his college was laid, 1263, and the building was completed by his lady. During the wars of Henry III. and his barons, he supported the king's power. He left three sons.

BALIOL, John de, king of Scotland. He was descended from David earl of Huntingdon, brother of king William called the Lion; and on the death of queen Margaret, in her passage from Norway, he laid claims to the crown, in which he was opposed by Bruce. His rights were established by the decision of Edward I. of England, who acted as arbitrator; and he did homage 12th November, 1292. When, however, he found himself not an independent monarch, but a vassal of England, he boldly shook off the yoke, and made an alliance with the French king, and war was kindled between the two countries; but the battle of Dunbar proved fatal to Baliol, who, with his son, was carried a captive to the Tower, and afterwards was released by the pope's legate, 1299. Baliol retired to France, where he died, 1314. His son Edward afterwards claimed the kingdom, and obtained it for a little time; but dying without issue, the family in them became extinct.

BALLARD, George, a native of Campden, in Gloucestershire, who, while the obscure apprentice of a habit-maker, employed the hours which his companions devoted to sleep, to the acquisition of the Saxon language, and recommended himself by his industry to the patronage of lord Chedworth, who liberally offered him an annuity of 100*l.* a year, of which, however, he only accepted 60*l.* as sufficient for his expenses. He went to Oxford, where, by the kindness of Dr. Jenner, he was made one of the eight clerks of Magdalen college, and afterwards one of the beadles of the university. His weakly constitution was impaired by the severity of his studies, and he died June, 1755, in the prime of life. His access to the Bodleian was the means of his increasing his valuable collections; but he published only "memoirs of British ladies celebrated for their writings," in 4to. 1752. His account of Campden church was read before the antiquarian society, 1771, November 21.

BALLENDEN, or BULLANDEN, Sir John, a Scotch historian, in favor with James VI. He took orders, and was made canon of Ross and archdeacon of Murray, and he afterwards succeeded to the office of clerk-register to the court of chancery, which the troubles of the times obliged him to resign, but to which he was restored in the succeeding reign. He was also a lord of session; but the opposition which he, with Dr. Laing, made to the reformation, rendered him obnoxious to the ruling powers, so that he retired to Rome, where he died, 1550. He wrote several pieces in prose and verse, besides a translation of Hector Boetius' history.

BALLEXFERD, a native of Geneva, author of the education physique des enfans, a valuable composition, honorably noticed by the society of sciences of Haerlem. He wrote also on the causes of the death of so many children, an equally meritorious publication. He died 1774, aged 49.

BALLIN, Claude, a skilful artist of chased work in gold and silver. He was born at Paris in 1615, and brought up to the occupation of a goldsmith under his father, who exercised that art. He studied drawing, and improved his taste as a designer by copying the pictures of Poussin. When only nine teen, he made four silver basins, decorated with figures representing the four ages of the world. These were purchased by cardinal Richelieu. He was subsequently employed in making plate services for Louis XIV., of which it is said the workmanship added ten times to the value of the material. He died in 1678.

BALTHASAR, Christopher, a king's advocate at Auxerre, who abandoned the emoluments of his office, and the catholic religion, to embrace the tenets of the protestants, in whose favor he wrote several controversial treatises, especially against Baroni- us, which were received with great avidity. The synod of Loudun granted him, in 1659, a pension of 750 livres, for his literary services.

BALTHAZARINI, surnamed Beaujoyeux, an Italian musician, recommended by Brissac, governor of Piedmont, to Henry III. of France, by whom he was liberally patronized, and for the entertainment of whose court he wrote several ballads and pieces of music. He composed a ballet called Ceres and her nymphs, for the nuptials of the duc de Joyeuse with the queen's sister, mademoiselle de Vaudemont; and this is regarded as the origin of the ballet heroique of France.

BALTUS, John Francis, a Jesuit of Metz, author of several works, especially of an answer to Fontenelle's history of oracles, printed at Strasburg, 8vo. Baltus possessed considerable learning and talents, which he wholly employed in defence of Roman Catholic orthodoxy. He died librarian of Rheims, the 9th of March 1743, at the age of 76.

BLUE, John, a cardinal, born of mean parents, in Poitou. He raised himself to consequence by flattery and merit, and gradually became bishop of Evreux and of Arras. He was raised to the purple by Paul II. and when honored with the confidence of Louis XI. he became his minister, and acted as general over his troops. Ungrateful to his duty and to his master, he formed intrigues with the dukes of Burgundy and Berri; and when at last discovered by the king, he was imprisoned for eleven years; after which he repaired to Rome, and rose to new preferments. He afterwards came to France as pope's legate, though he had so ill deserved of the confidence and honor of his country. He died at Ancona, 1491.

BALUZE, Stephen, a native of Tullés in Guenée, patronized by Peter de Marca, archbishop of Toulouse, by Tellier, afterwards chancellor of France, and by Colbert. He employed the hours of his easy independent life, in enriching the libraries of his patrons with valuable manuscripts, till in his 39th year he was appointed professor of canon law in the royal college with every mark of distinction. His lives of the popes of Avignon proved so interesting to the king that he granted the author a pension, but his attachment to the duke of Bouillon, the history of whose family he had undertaken to write, but in which he inserted some offensive remarks, was soon after productive of trouble. When the duke was banished he shared the disgrace, and was confined by a lettre de cachet at Orleans; he however was restored to favor, though he was not replaced to his directorial chair of the Royal college, which he before held. He died 23th of July, 1718, in his 87th year, and left behind him the character of an indefatigable collector of curious manuscripts and annotations.

BALZAC, John Louis Guez de, a native of Angoulême, who visited Holland in his 17th year, where he wrote a discourse on the state of the united provinces. He travelled with the duke d'Épernon, and was at Rome with the cardinal de la Valette, but he found at last the tranquillity of retirement on his estate at Balzac more congenial to his studious inclinations, than paying court to Richelieu, who flattered his ambition with promises of high patronage. He was universally admired for the elegance of his writings, especially his letters to Voltaire, who however censures his style, but allows him the merit of having given harmony and numbers to French prose. His writings created him some political opponents, but though he dreaded the weapons of an adversary, he was pleased with the familiarity of the great, and a pension from the court of 2000 livres, and the pompous title of historiographer of France and counsellor of state. He was of a weakly constitution, so that he used to say when he was about 30, that he was older than his father. He died Feb. 18th, 1654, in his 60th year.

BAMBRIDGE, Christopher, a native of Westmoreland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and employed as ambassador from Henry VIII. to pope Julius II. who raised him to the purple. He was made bishop of Durham, and in 1508, translated to York, and six years after he was poisoned by his servant, who thus revenged himself for some blows which he had received from him.

BAMPFYLDE, Sir Charles Warwick, a baronet descended from one of the oldest and most distinguished families in Devonshire. He was the fifth baronet of his family, and had sat in seven parliaments for the city of Exeter. Sir Charles received his death from an assassin named Morland, whose wife had lived in his service. The act was perpetrated almost at his own door in Montague-square, in the vicinity of which the murderer waited his approach, and after a short conversation, discharged one pistol at his victim, and with a second blew out his own brains upon the spot. The baronet lingered several days, and then expired April 19, 1823, in his 71st year.

BANCHI, Seraphin, a Dominican of Florence, who came to France for the improvement of his studies. When Peter Barrere, a youth of 27, formed the diabolical project of assassinating Henry IV. Banchi became acquainted with the secret, which he prudently revealed to one of the lords of the court. The assassin was thus discovered as he was ready to perpetrate the deed, and Banchi was rewarded with the bishopric of Angoulême, which however he resigned, in 1608, for the life of a recluse in the monastery of St. James de Paris, where he died some years after. His writings were chiefly controversial.

BANCK, Lawrence, a Swede, professor of law at Norkoping his native place. He died in 1662, author of several works of jurisprudence, and treatises against the pope's usurpation.

BANCROFT, Richard, was born near Manchester, and educated at Jesus college. He was chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and bishop of London, 1597, and advanced to Canterbury on the death of Whitgift, 1604. He was a strong advocate for the royal prerogative, and was indefatigable in his endeavours to establish episcopacy in Scotland. He died at Lambeth, 1610, aged 66.

BANCROFT, John, nephew to the primate, was born in Oxfordshire, and educated at Christ Church. He was afterwards elected master of University college, and during the 20 years in which he presided over the society, he laboriously employed himself in establishing their rights and improving their property. In 1622 he was raised to the see of Oxford, and built the palace of Cuddesden for the residence of the bishops. He died 1640, and was buried at Cuddesden.

BANDELLO, Matthew, an Italian dominican, was born at Castelnovo di Scivria, in 1480. Though belonging to a religious order, the greater part of his life was spent in secular pursuits. He was preceptor to the celebrated Lucretia Gonzaga, was employed in negotiations by Italian princes, and resided with various noble personages. In 1550, he was made bishop of Agen, in France. His death occurred subsequently to 1561. His great work is his Tales, which is reckoned among the classical productions of modern Italy.

BANDINELLI, Baccio, a celebrated sculptor, the son of a goldsmith, was born at Florence, in 1487. He gave the first indication of his talent in boyhood, by making a gigantic figure out of snow. In manhood, he realized the promise of his early years, and his productions were much admired. Among his best works are, a copy of the Laocoön; an Orpheus; and a Hercules binding Cacus. Painting, also, he attempted, but did not succeed. Bandinelli was vain, proud, and envious. He died in 1559.

BANDURI, Anselm, a monk born at Ragusa, who studied in France, where he was patronized by the duke of Orleans, and admitted into the academy of inscriptions. The grand duke of Tuscany, who was not ignorant of his merit, intended to place him at the head of the academy of Pisa. He died at Paris 1743, aged 72. His antiquitates Constantinopolitane, in two vols. fol. and his numismata Roman. Imperat. a Trajano ad Palaeologos 1718, are chiefly valuable.

BANGUIS, Peter, a native of Helsingberg in Sweden, professor of theology at Abo for 32 years, and in 1682 raised to the see of Wylburg. He wrote an ecclesiastical history of Sweden, a sacred chronology, and other works, and died 1696, aged 63.

BANGUISI, Thomas, author of an Hebrew lexicon, and of a treatise on the origin of the diversity of languages, was professor of Hebrew, theology, and philosophy at Copenhagen, where he died 1661, aged 61.

BANIER, Anthony, an ecclesiastic of the diocese of Clermont in Auvergne, who acquired by his industry and the patronage of his friends those means of education which the poverty of his parents could not supply. He was intrusted with the care of the children of Monsieur de Metz, president of the chamber of accounts at Paris; and it was for their education and improvement that he applied himself to mythological studies, and soon produced his "Historical explanation of fables." This work on its appearance was universally admired, and procured the author admission to the academy of inscriptions besides the applauses of the learned world. The fruits of his literary labors were numerous and valuable, various essays and not less than 30 dissertations were produced by him to the academy of Belles Lettres, the treatises on history and literature by Vigneul Marville or rather Bonaventure D'Argonne, were republished, and new light and beauty given to the voyages of Paul Lucas into Egypt, and of Cornelius le Brun to the Levant. In the last ten years of his life Banier particularly devoted his time to his favorite study of mythology, and then translated the metamorphoses of Ovid, with historical remarks and explanations, published at Amsterdam in folio, 1732. It was also at that time that he completed his mythology or fables explained by history, Paris 1740, in 3 vols. 4to. or 7 in 12mo. a book abounding in erudition, and deservedly admired. He was prevailed upon by the booksellers when he labored under the attacks of a fatal distemper, to superintend a new edition of a general history of the ceremonies, &c. of all the nations in the world, which 20 years before had appeared in Holland, and he had the gratification to see it finished in 1741 in 7 vols. fol. with the assistance of le Maserier a Jesuit of learning. Banier died Nov. 19th, 1741, in his 69th year.

BANISTER, John, a learned physician of the 16th century, who, after studying at Oxford and proceeding there to his first degree in physic in 1573, removed to Nottingham, where he acquired great reputation. He was author of several works on physic and surgery.

BANKS, Sir John, an eminent barrister of Gray's Inn, born at Keswick in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was in 1630 attorney general to the prince of Wales, and was afterwards made chief justice of the king's bench from which he removed to the common pleas. He died at Oxford, Dec. 28th, 1664. Several of his MSS. on law are still extant. His wife is famous for defending Corff-castle against the parliament, till relieved by the earl of Carnarvon.

BANKS, Thomas, an eminent sculptor, was born, in 1735, in Gloucestershire, and was brought up under Kent, the architect. His genius, however, led him to sculpture. Having gained prizes from the Royal Academy, he was sent by that body to study in Italy. After having completed his studies, he resided two years in Russia, and the empress purchased his statue of Cupid. On his return home, he attained high reputation, and was much employed till his death, in 1805.

BANKS, Sir Joseph, was born, in 1743, at Revesby Abbey, in Leicestershire, and educated at Eton and Oxford. His love of travelling, and of natural history, prompted him to explore foreign countries; and, accordingly, in 1763, he made a voyage to Labrador and Newfoundland; in 1768, accompanied the great navigator Cook; and, in 1772, visited Iceland and the Western Isles of Scotland. While with Captain Cook, he nearly lost his life by the intense cold, at Terra del Fuego. On his return, the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1778, he obtained the order of the Bath, and the presidency of the Royal Society; but, after having held the latter about five years, his conduct so deeply offended many scientific members, that a schism was on the point of taking place. The differences were, however, arranged, and he held his seat till he died, on the 9th of May, 1820. He wrote some papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and a tract on the Rust in Wheat. His collection of books on natural history was the most complete in Europe.

BANNAKER, Benjamin, a negro of Maryland, who died in 1807. By dint of talents, without any other assistance than Ferguson's works and Mayer's Tables, he acquired, in his leisure hours, a complete knowledge of mathematics, and for many years calculated and published the Maryland Ephemerides.

BANNIER, John, a Swedish general under Gustavus Adolphus. He distinguished himself in various battles, and after the death of his master added to the glory of Sweden by fresh victories and by the taking of several important places from the Germans and Saxons. In the latter part of his life he was unfortunate, and he forgot his military character to espouse the daughter of the prince of Baden, after the death of his wife. He died 10th May, 1641, aged 40.

BANNISTER, John, an eminent botanist. In 1630 he transmitted to Mr. Ray a catalogue of plants observed by him in Virginia. He drew with his own hand the figures of the rarer species. He fell a victim to his favorite pursuit, for in one of his botanical excursions, while clambering the rocks, he fell and was killed. He published in the philosophical transactions, besides his catalogue of plants, observations on the natural productions of Jamaica; the insects of Virginia; observations on the musca lupus, or several sorts of snails; a description of the pistolochia or serpentaria—Virginia, the snake root. The time of his death is not accurately known.

BAPTIST, John, surnamed Monnoyer, a native of Lisle, resident for some time in England, and distinguished as a painter of flowers. He studied at Antwerp, and he displayed the superiority of his talents in assisting le Brun in painting the palace of Versailles, in which the flowers were his execution. The duke of Montague, who was ambassador in France, saw and admired his merit, and he employed him with la Fosse and Rousseau in the decoration of Montague house, now the British museum. A looking-glass which he adorned with a garland of flowers for queen Mary, is still preserved at Kensington palace. There is a print of him from a painting by Sir Godfrey Kneller, in Walpole's anecdotes. He died 1699.

BARAHONA Y SOTO, Louis, a Spanish physician and poet, a native of Luceria, in Andalusia, continued, under the title of the Tears of Angelica, the romance of Ariosto, and executed his task in such a manner as to gain the applause of Cervantes. He is also the author of some eclogues, stanzas, and sonnets.

BARANZANO, Redemptus, a monk born at Serravalle near Verceil in Piedmont, was professor of philosophy at Anneci, and the correspondent of the great Bacon. He possessed vast energy of mind, and acquired great reputation at Paris, both as a preacher and a philosopher, but more as a warm and judicious opposer of Aristotle's doctrines. He died at Montargis, 23d December 1622, in his 33d year, and thus early was finished a career, which promised to add much splendor to literature, and to criticism. His works on philosophical subjects, were "doctrina de celo," 1617, fol.—de novis opinionibus physicis, 8vo. 1617—Campus philosophorum, 8vo. 1620.

BARATIER, John Philip, a most extraordinary person, born January 19th, 1721, at Schwobach, in the Margravate of Anspach, and of such uncommon powers of memory, that at the age of four, he conversed with his mother in French, with his father in Latin, and with his servants in German. The rapidity of his improvements augmented with his years, so that he became perfectly acquainted with Greek at six, with Hebrew at eight, and in his 11th year translated from the Hebrew into French the travels of the rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, which he enriched with valuable annotations. His proficiency in mathematics was so great that he submitted to the London Royal society a scheme for finding the longitude, which, though found insufficient, exhibited the strongest marks of superior abilities, with all the labor of mathematical calculation. He visited Halle with his father in 1735, where he was offered by the university the degree of M. A. The young philosopher drew up 14 theses, which he printed, and the next morning disputed upon them with such ability and logical precision that he astonished and delighted the most crowded audience. At Berlin he was received with kindness by the king of Prussia, and honored with those marks of distinction which his superior genius deserved. His abilities however, so great and so splendid, shone but like a meteor; a constitution naturally delicate, was rendered still more weak by excessive application; and a cough, spitting of blood, and fever on the spirits, put an end to his life, at Halle, fifth of October 1740, in his 20th year. Baratier has deservedly been mentioned as a prodigy of learning and of genius, his memory was universally retentive, and his application scarcely credible, when it is recollected that he spent 12 hours in bed till his tenth year, and ten afterwards. In one winter he read 20 great folios, with all the attention of a vast comprehensive mind, and the large work which he prepared on Egyptian antiquities, showed the variety of materials collected, as well as their judicious and laborious arrangement. In his domestic economy he was very temperate; he ate little flesh, lived totally on milk, tea, bread, and fruit.

BARBARO, Francis, a noble Venetian, distinguished by his learning as well as his political talents. He defended Brescia, of which he was governor, against the duke of Milan, and obliged the besiegers to retreat. He died 1454, aged about 56. He is principally known by a partial translation of Plutarch's works, and a Treatise, "De Re Uxor." The latter was published in 1515 at Paris. Some familiar epistles of his were also published as late as 1743.

BARBARO, Ermolao, the elder, nephew to Francis, was bishop of Trevisa, and afterwards of Verona, where he died 1470. He translated some of Æsop's fables into Latin, when only 12 years old.

BARBARO or BARBARUS, Hermolao, grandson of Francis, a learned Venetian, employed by his countrymen as ambassador to the emperor Frederic, to his son Maximilian, and to Pope Innocent VIII. He was honored by the pope with the vacant patriarchate of Aquileia against the wishes of his countrymen, who had passed a law that their ambassadors should accept no favor from the Roman pontiff; and so inexorable were the Venetians, that Barbaro's father, who was far advanced in years and intrusted with the first offices of the state, was unable to avert their resentment, and died, in consequence, of a broken heart. Barbaro wrote some excellent treatises as well as poetry; and in translations from Plutarch and Dioscorides he showed his abilities as a Greek scholar. He died at Rome 1493, aged 39, of the plague, according to Bayle.

BARBARO, Daniel, coadjutor of the patriarchate of Aquileia, with his uncle Hermolao, was sent as ambassador from Venice to England, where he continued till 1551. He died 1570, and left several learned works behind him, among which were a treatise of eloquence, in 4to. 1557, Venice—an Italian translation of Vitruvius 1584,—the practice of perspective, folio.

BARBAROSSA, Aruch, a well known pirate, who made himself master of Algiers, and murdered the king Selim Entem, whom he had come to assist and defend against his Spanish invaders. He afterwards made himself master of Tunis, and of Tremecen, whose sovereign was assassinated by his own subjects. His success was stopped by the marquis of Gomares governor of Oran, whom the heir of the Tremecen dominions had invited to his support; but when besieged in the citadel he made his escape by a subterraneous passage; but though he strewed the ways with silver and gold, he was overtaken and cut to pieces, bravely defending himself with a few Turkish attendants, 1518, in his 44th year.

BARBAROSSA, Cheredin, successor to his brother Aruch on the throne of Algiers, was the able admiral of the naval forces of Selim II. He obtained possession of Tunis, but was checked by the arms of Charles V. after which he plundered several towns of Italy, and then advanced to Yemen in Arabia, which he conquered for the emperor of the Turks. He died 1547, aged 80, leaving his son Asan in possession of the kingdom.

BARBAROUX, Charles, deputy from Marseilles to the national convention, proved himself one of the bitterest enemies of the unfortunate Louis XVI. whose accusation he read with triumph in the assembly. He was intimate with Roland, and with boldness attacked the Orleans party, the usurpation of Robespierre, and the machinations of the Jacobins. His conduct rendered him obnoxious to the demagogues in power; and when the Girondists were overthrown, he was accused but escaped into Calvados. He afterwards passed from Quimper to Bourdeaux, where he was recognised and immediately guillotined, 25th June 1794.

BARBAULD, Anna Letitia, daughter of the Rev. John Aikin, born at Kibworth in Leicestershire, June 20, 1743, one of the most distinguished female writers of the age. She received from her father, who in the early part of her life presided over a dissenting academy at Warrington in Lancashire, an excellent literary and classical education, to which she was indebted for the full development of her great natural talents, and of a vein of poetry at once elegant and imaginative. Her earliest production was a small volume of miscellaneous poetry, printed in 1772, which in the year following was succeeded by a collection of pieces in prose, published in conjunction with her brother, Doctor John Aikin of Stoke Newington. In 1774 she accepted the hand of the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, with whom she took up her residence at Palgrave in Suffolk, and there composed the works on which the durability of her reputation is most securely founded, viz. "Early Lessons and Hymns for Children," pieces which are justly considered as of standard merit, in conveying the first rudiments of instruction to the infant mind. In 1785, she accompanied her husband on a tour to the continent, and on their return, resided for several years at Hampstead, but in 1802 again removed to Stoke Newington, in order the more constantly to enjoy her brother's society. In 1812 appeared the last of her separate publications, entitled, "Eighteen hundred and Eleven," a poem of considerable merit; previous to which she also amused herself by selecting and editing a collection of English novels with critical and biographical notices. A similar selection followed from the best British Essayists of the reign of Anne, and another from Richardson's manuscript correspondence, with a memoir and critical essay on his life and writings. Mrs. Barbauld died at Stoke Newington, March 9, 1825, in her 82d year, leaving behind her many unpublished manuscripts both in prose and verse.

BARBAZAN, Stephen, a native of St. Fargeau-en-Puisaye in Auxerre, who made himself acquainted with authors of the middle centuries, from whom he drew the most curious anecdotes and remarkable stories. He assisted in the completion of the Recueil alphabetique, in 24 vols. 12mo. 1745, and the following years; a laborious but desultory work. He wrote also instructions from a father to a son, 1760, 8vo. He died 1770, in the 74th year of his age.

BARBEAU DES BRUYERES, Jean Louis, son of a wood-monger at Paris, rose by the strength of his genius from the mean occupation of his father. He resided 10 or 15 years in Holland, and on his return he assisted for 23 years M. Bauche in the completion of his works. His first publication in 1759, was his mappe monde historique, an ingenious chart, in which was united all the information which geography, chronology, and history could produce. He published besides the tablettes chronologiques of Lenglet, a translation of Strahlenberg's description of Russia, La Croix's modern geography, besides large contributions to the works of his friends, and the two last volumes of the Bibliothèque de France, by le Long. Barbeau had to struggle through life against poverty, but it did not ruffle his temper, or render him unwilling freely to communicate to others from the vast store of his knowledge in geography and history. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, Nov. 20th, 1781.

BARBEYRAC, John, a native of Barriers, in Languedoc, teacher of philosophy at Berlin, and afterwards for seven years professor of law and history at Lausanne, from whence he passed to Groningen. He was eminent in the knowledge of the law of nature, and of nations; and besides a treatise on the morality of the fathers, and another on gaming, two vols. he translated into French Puffendorf's works, besides Noodt's discourses, Grotius' de jure pacis, &c. some of Tillotson's sermons, &c. Some of his critical and literary remarks were also inserted in the various journals of the times. He died 1729, aged 55. His brother Charles was eminent as a physician at Cereste in Provence, and he was the friend of Locke and Sydenham. He died at Montpellier, 1699, aged 70, author of two works, traités de médecine, 12mo.—and questiones medicæ duodecim, 4to. 1658.

BARBIE DUBOCAGE, John Dennis, a geographer, the only pupil of d'Anville, and not unworthy of his master, was born at Paris, in 1760, became geographer for foreign affairs to Napoleon, and was a member of the Institute, and of other scientific bodies. He died in 1825. His productions are numerous and valuable. Among them are the maps to the Voyage of Anacharsis; a fine map of the Morea; and the maps and various geographical notices in Choiseul Gouffier's Picturesque Journal in Greece.

BARBIER d'AUCOUR, John, a native of Laugres, whose great application raised him from the obscurity and indigence of his family. He devoted himself to the studies of the bar, but he was unsuccessful in his first pleading, either from fear, or failure of memory, a circumstance to which Boileau, in the Lutrin, has alluded; and so small were his pecuniary resources, that he consented to marry his landlord's daughter, that he might thus satisfy the large demands which he had upon him. The patronage of Colbert, one of whose sons he educated, promised him better times, but the minister's death disappointed him, and a more fortunate attempt at the bar at last restored him to his lost character. In his last cause in defence of Le Brun, a valet accused of murdering his lady, he displayed, besides generosity of heart, a most commanding eloquence. He died of an inflammation in the breast, Sept. 13, 1694, aged 53.

BARBIER, Anthony Alexander, born in 1765, at Colomnières, in France, was educated for the church, but quitted it, and was successively librarian to the Directory, to Napoleon, and to Louis XVIII. From the service of Louis, however, he was dismissed in 1822, and this circumstance preyed upon his spirits, and probably aggravated the disease an aneurism, of which he died in 1825. Of his bibliographical works, all of which are esteemed, the principal is a Dictionary of Anonymous and Pseudonymous Works, 4 vols. 8vo.

BARBOUR, John, a Scotch ecclesiastic, employed by David Bruce as ambassador at the English court. He wrote in verse an account of the life and actions of Robert Bruce, a work highly esteemed for its authenticity, printed at Glasgow 1671. He died 1378, aged 58.

BARBOUR, Thomas, colonel, was a whig of the American revolution, and in 1769 was a member of the house of burgesses of Virginia, which made the first protest against the stamp act. He died in 1825, aged 90.

BARCALI, author of a commentary on the Arabian. He died in the 960th year of the hegra. Another, of the same name, author of some books of devotion. He died the 981st or 982d of the hegra.

BARCLAY or BARKLAY, Alexander, a writer of the 16th century, born in Scotland according to Mackenzie, or according to Wood, at Barclay in Somersetshire. He was of Oriel college, Oxford, and from thence travelled over Holland, Germany, France, and Italy. On his return he was preferred by Cornish, the provost of his college, who had been raised to the bishopric of Tyne. Authors disagree about his preferment. He was rector of Baddow Magna in Essex, according to Wood, but he is mentioned by others as rector of Allhallows, Lombard Street. He was an elegant writer, and translated some of the best authors on the continent. He died at Croydon in an advanced age.

BARCLAY, William, a native of Aberdeen, who, not meeting the patronage which he expected from Mary queen of Scots, went over to France, where he studied civil law at Bourges, and was made professor of the newly founded university of Pontamousson, by the duke of Lorraine. His son was nearly engaged to follow the tenets of the Jesuits, which the father prevented, and the dissent between him and the society was so great, that he abandoned Lorraine, and came to England, where king James offered him some handsome preferment, provided he subscribed to the articles of the Anglican church, a condition which he declined. He returned to France, and died professor at Angers in 1605.

BARCLAY, John, son of the preceding, was educated by the Jesuits, but removed from their society, by his father, who was afraid he should follow their tenets. He visited England with his father, and complimented with a Latin poem king James, who wished to patronise him, but he returned to France. After the death of his father he resided in London for ten years, and afterwards went to Rome, where he was well received by pope Paul V. and cardinal Bellarmin. He died at Rome 1621. His works were numerous and elegantly written.

BARCLAY, Robert, a native of Edinburgh. His father, colonel Barclay, sent him to Paris to the care of his uncle, who presided over the Scot's college; but in becoming acquainted with the literature of the times, he imbibed the tenets of the Roman catholics. On his return to Scotland, he embraced the principles of the quakers with his father, and he showed himself, by his actions as well as by his writings, a most zealous defender of the sect. His writings are numerous, and chiefly on theological or controversial subjects. The most celebrated is his apology for the quakers, published in Latin at Amsterdam 1676, and two years after translated by himself, and addressed to Charles II. with excessive freedom of language. He was universally respected, not only for the celebrity of his writings, but the purity of his life. He travelled over England, Holland, and Germany, with the famous legislator Penn, with the intention of making converts; and on his return spent the rest of his life in dignified retirement. He died at Ury, third of October, 1690, in his 42d year.

BARCLAY DE TOLLY, a Russian field marshal, and minister of war, distinguished himself in the German and Polish campaigns of 1806 and 1807, and succeeded Kutusow as commander in chief. At the battle of Leipsic, he headed the Russian troops. In 1814 he commanded them in Champagne, and in the following year he again led them into France, with the title of prince. He died in 1818.

BARCLAY, Henry, D. D., an Episcopal clergyman born at Albany, N. Y. and graduated in 1734 at Yale College. He received orders in England, and was appointed a missionary to the Mohawk Indians. Subsequently, he was appointed Rector of Trinity Church in the city of New York, in which office he remained till his death, which took place, in 1765.

BARCOCHEBAS, BARCHOCHEBAS, or BARCOCHAB, a Jewish deluder, who, in the reign Adrian, declared himself to be the Messiah. His original name, a very appropriate one, is said to have been Bar Coziba (the son of lying), which he changed into Barcochebas (the son of a star). Having, by audacity and some juggling tricks, cheated multitudes of the Jews into a belief of his divinity, they revolted against the Romans. After the war had lasted for two years, Julius Severus besieged them in Bether, took the city by assault, and the pseudo messiah and fifty thousand of his followers were slain. Though, in a religious point of view, Barcochebas was an impostor, it must be allowed that he possessed patriotism, courage and talents.

BARD, John, a learned physician. He engaged in business in Philadelphia, and afterwards removed to New York, where he remained till within a few months of his death. In the year 1795 when the yellow fever had put to flight a number of physicians, who were in the meridian of life, the veteran Dr. Bard remained at his post. He died in 1799 aged 83. He was the author of several papers on the Yellow fever in the American medical Register. In 1750 he assisted Dr. Middleton in the first recorded dissection in America.

BARD, Samuel, M. D., to obtain a thorough medical education, he spent five years in France, England and Scotland. He received his degree at Edinburgh in 1765. Dr. Bard formed the plan of the Medical school of New York, which was established within a year after his return. He was appointed professor of the practice of physic. Medical degrees were first conferred in 1769. By his exertions the hospital was founded. In 1774 he delivered a course of chemical lectures. In 1813 he was appointed president of the college of physicians and surgeons. His discourses on conferring degrees were very impressive. He died in 1821 aged 79.

BARDAS, called Scelerus, a general raised to the purple by his soldiers after the death of John Zimisces. He was opposed by Bardas Phocas, and in consequence of a defeat fled to Bagdad, where he was imprisoned 979. He was afterwards reconciled to Phocas, and after his death was honorably treated by his successor Basil.

BARDESANES, a heretic of the second century, born in Syria, was a man of great genius and learning, and had travelled into India to acquire knowledge. He adopted the doctrine of two principles, and taught that Christ descended from heaven not with a real but an aerial body, to recover mankind from the corruption into which they had been plunged by the prince of darkness.

BARBONE, Praise-God, a violent leader of Cromwell's parliament of 1654. He was a leather-seller by trade, but he acquired such celebrity as an orator and a demagogue, that the parliament was ludicrously called after his assumed name. Two of his brothers, it is said, had adopted likewise scripture names, one of them, "Christ came into the world to save Barbone;" and the other, "if Christ had not died thou hadst been damned, Barbone," which the wits of the time abbreviated to the two last words. When Monk led his army to London, Barbone acted with such violence at the head of the rabble, that the general sent a petition to parliament to dismiss and punish this furious zealot and his partizans.

BARETTI, Joseph, a native of Turin, son of an eminent architect, born about 1716. He received a respectable education, but the little fortune which he inherited was lost at faro, and the indigent son became an author by profession. After enduring many difficulties, and after visiting several countries of Europe, he came in 1750 to London without any recommendations, and with an imperfect knowledge of the English language. He accidentally met at the Orange coffee-house Mr. Lennox, whose wife wished for instruction in the Italian language, to enable her to translate some of the romances from which Shakspeare had drawn his plays, and from this connexion, arose the consequence and respectability which he afterwards enjoyed. Mrs. Lennox introduced him to Dr. Johnson, whose friendship he long and sincerely enjoyed, and he was soon after introduced to the Thrals family, and to other persons of respectability and distinction. After a residence of ten years in London, he resolved to revisit his native country, and he set out on 13th August 1760, through Spain and Portugal, not however without expressing with all the power of gratitude, his deep sense of the kindness, generosity, and philanthropy of England. In his journey he followed the directions of Dr. Johnson, and in taking notice of whatever scenes passed before his eyes, with the good-humor and playfulness of youth, accompanied with the accurate judgment of the philosopher, he produced a most amusing and valuable performance, published in four vols. 8vo. At Venice he published a periodical paper called Frustra literaria, which did not succeed. He returned to England and was appointed foreign secretary to the Royal Academy, and pensioned by government. He died in 1789. Baretti was a man of integrity, and of considerable powers. Besides an Italian Dictionary, and various school books, and minor works, he published Travels through Spain, France, Portugal, and Italy, in four octavo volumes.

BARGRAVE, Isaac, an ecclesiastic of great abilities, member of Clarehall Cambridge, and Chaplain to James I. and Charles. He was made dean of Canterbury, 14th of October 1625; but he suffered greatly during the civil wars, and Sandys, a man whose life he had saved from the gallows, treated him and his family with unusual severity, and imprisoned him in the Fleet. Bargrave survived that mark of ingratitude only three weeks, and died of a broken heart, 1642, aged 56.

BARKER, Robert, inventor of the panorama, was born at Kells, in Ireland, about 1740; and, having failed in business, became a miniature and portrait painter. He settled at Edinburgh, in that capacity; and, while viewing the landscape from the Calton Hill, was first struck with the idea of representing similar scenes in a circular picture. Eminent artists treated the project as chimerical; but he persisted, and ultimately succeeded in accomplishing what may be considered as the triumph of pictorial illusion. It was in 1787 that his first attempt was exhibited; and his exhibition soon became so popular that he gained a considerable fortune. He died, in Saint George's Fields, in 1806.

BARKHAM, John, a native of Exeter, who, after studying at Oxford, and holding several places of preferment, died at Bocking in Essex, of which he was rector and dean. He is mentioned by Speed, and others, as possessing "learning, virtue, and courtesy." His valuable collection of coins and medals, which he gave to Laud, was presented to the university. Though he never published any thing, yet his friends had reason to acknowledge his great erudition, so that Guillim's display of heraldry, and Speed's John and Henry II. are attributed to him.

BARNSDALE, Clement, a native of Winchcomb, Gloucestershire, educated at Abingdon school and Oxford. He was elected master of Hereford school, but during the civil wars, he left his situation and took pupils at Hawling, in Gloucestershire. On the restoration he was presented to the living of Naunton, where he died 1637, aged 73. His works are, besides several sermons, and some tracts, monumenta literaria, sive obitus et elogia, doctorum virorum ex historiis Thuani, 4to.—Nynpha Libethris, or the Corswold muse, 8vo. 1651—the life of Grotius 1652, 12mo.—memorials of worthy persons, 1661, 12no.

BARLAAM, a Greek monk, who, in 1339, was sent into the west, by the younger Andronicus, the Greek emperor, to solicit assistance against the Turks, and to negotiate an union between the Latin and Greek church. On his return, he was censured, as heterodox, by a council; upon which he went back to Italy, and obtained the bishopric of Hieracium, in Calabria. He died about 1348. Barlaam introduced the study of Grecian literature into Italy; and Petrarch and Boccaccio were his disciples.

BARLÆUS, Gasparus, a Latin poet of Antwerp, appointed subprincipal of the college of Leyden, but afterwards rejected from his office, for the zealous share which he took in the disputes of the Arminians. He now took his degrees in physic at Caen, and in 1631 was invited by the magistrates of Amsterdam, to fill the chair of professor of philosophy, which he held till his death in 1643, in his 64th year, though his writings, in favor of Arminius, raised him a number of enemies, who loudly called for his dismissal. His orations are admired for their wit and purity, and his poems for their elegance and correctness. Two volumes of his letters were published after his death. He wrote also an account of count Maurice's government in Brazil.

BARLETTA, Gabriel, a Dominican, born at Barletta in the kingdom of Naples. He acquired some celebrity as a writer and as a preacher, and it became proverbial to say, nescit predicare qui nescit Barlettare. It is reported that his sermons rapidly passed through 20 editions, but so incongruous was the composition, so full of serious reflections and ridiculous levities, of obsolete words and of modern and ancient idioms, that a more singular and extraordinary performance scarce ever appeared. The best edition is that of Venice 1577, two vols. 8vo. He was born about 1040, but the time of his death is unknown.

BARLOW, Thomas, an English prelate, was born, in 1607, at Langhill, in Westmoreland, and educated at Oxford. He was raised to the bishopric of Lincoln, in 1675, and held it till his death, in 1691. His principles were anything but inflexible. He wrote against popery during the reign of Charles II.; vindicated the regal power of dispensing with the laws, under James II.; and finally gave his allegiance to William III. Nor did he properly fulfill his episcopal duties. He was, however, a learned and a tolerant man. His works consist of some tracts; a Collection of Cases of Conscience Resolved; and Genuine Remains.

BARLOW, Joel, graduated at Yale college in 1778. After leaving college he engaged for a short time in the study of the law, but soon changed it for theology, and became a chaplain in the army, which station he retained until the return of peace. From 1783 to 1795 Mr. Barlow was occupied with various private pursuits, in America and Europe; and in the latter year was appointed by President Washington consul at Algiers, with powers to negotiate a treaty of peace with the Dey, and redeem the American captives on the coast of Barbary. He concluded a treaty with Algiers and also negotiated one with Tripoli, and rescued many American citizens from slavery. In 1797 he resigned his consulship. In 1805 he returned to the United States. In 1811 he was sent as minister plenipotentiary to the French government. He failed in the object of his mission, but in October 1812 he was invited to a conference with the emperor at Wilna. The fatigue and exposure to which he subjected himself, to comply with this invitation, caused his death at Zarowitch, an obscure village near Cracow in Dec. 1812. While in college Mr. Barlow was a votary of the muses.

BARLOWE, William, son of William Barlowe bishop of St. David's, studied at Balliol college, and distinguished himself as the first discoverer of the nature and properties of the load-stone, the piercing and cementing of which he effected by a new method. He explained the difference between iron and steel, and why a magnet by being doubly capped takes up a greater weight. His opinions were made public in three different treatises. He died 1625.

BARNARD, Theodore, a native of Amsterdam, who studied under Titian, and adorned the cathedral of Chichester by his paintings of the kings and bishops. There is a family near Chichester descended from him.

BARNARD, Sir John, an upright magistrate, and an incorrupt statesman. He was born at Reading, where his father, a quaker, was a wine merchant. He succeeded to the business, but at the age of 19 he relinquished the quakers for the established church, and became first known in the examination which he underwent in the house of lords on a wise bill, to the passing of which the merchants objected. The spirited and becoming manner in which he expressed himself on the occasion, gained him popularity. He became candidate for the city of London, and was elected in 1722, and he served the city in the six succeeding parliaments. In 1727, he was appointed alderman of Dowgate ward, and in 1738 he filled the chair of the city with all the dignity which became a great and opulent corporation. His conduct in parliament was ever guided by a strong attachment to his country; he supported every measure which contributed to extend commerce and prosperity, and in his opposition to Walpole, especially during the debates on the excise act, his language was firm, manly, and patriotic. In July 1758 this virtuous magistrate resigned his gown, to the great regret of the city, and retired to his seat at Clapham. After attaining nearly the age of 80, he expired, 29th August, 1766, leaving one son and two daughters. The general character of sir John may be collected in the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens on his resignation. He was complimented with all those expressions of gratitude and admiration which are due to integrity and to virtue, and his public and private life was equally made the subject of panegyric liberally bestowed and unmeritoriously earned. He had been knighted in 1732 by George II. and in memorial of his merits his fellow citizens erected his statue in the Exchange.

BARNARD, John, graduated at Harvard college in 1700. He was ordained minister of Marblehead July 18, 1716, as colleague with Mr. Cheever. In 1762 he received Mr. Whitwell as his assistant. The last sermon which he preached, was delivered Jan. 8, 1769. He died in 1770, aged 88. Mr. Barnard was eminent for his learning and piety, and was famous among the divines of America. In early life he was a chaplain in the army, visited England, and on his return, the north church in Boston was built for him, and he preached the dedication sermon, expecting soon to be ordained according to mutual agreement, but the people finally chose a Mr. Webb for their pastor. Of this transaction he could not speak with calmness to the day of his death. He was not more useful to Marblehead as a spiritual teacher, than as a temporal guide and friend. When he first went there, there was not one trading vessel belonging to the place, nor was there so much as one proper carpenter, mason, tailor nor butcher. It was through his exertions that great improvements soon took place. Having taken great pains to learn the mystery of the fish trade, he directed the people to the best use, which they could make of the advantages of their situation. By prudence in the management of his affairs he acquired considerable property; but he gave tythes of all he possessed. His charity was of a kind which is worthy of imitation. He was not disposed to give much encouragement to common beggars, but he sought out those objects of benevolent attention, who modestly hid their wants. The poor were often fed by him, and the widow's heart was gladdened, while they knew not where to return thanks, except to the merciful Father of the wretched. In one kind of charity he was somewhat peculiar. He generally supported at school two boys whose parents were unable to meet the expense. By his last will he gave two hundred pounds to Harvard college. The publications of Mr. Barnard were numerous, but mostly sermons. The first Dudleian lectures, that was published, was preached by him. When he was about seventy years of age he published a version of the psalms. In the Massachusetts hist. col. there is a letter from Mr. Barnard to president Stiles, giving a sketch of the eminent ministers of New England:

BARNARD, Thomas, a minister of the first church in Salem, Mass. He graduated at Harvard University in 1732, and was ordained at Newbury Jan. 31, 1739. His continuance in this place was short, being dismissed at his own request. He afterwards studied law; but, on the 17 Sept. 1755, was installed at Salem. Here he remained till his death, which took place, August 15, 1776, aged 62 years. He published two ordination sermons; two election sermons; a sermon before the society for encouraging industry; a funeral sermon; and a Dudleian lecture.

BARNARD, Thomas, D. D. was graduated at Harvard college 1766, and was ordained over the north society in Salem, Mass. Jan. 13, 1773. He published two ordination sermons; two thanksgiving sermons; a missionary sermon; an election sermon; a convention sermon; a sermon before the humane society; a sermon before the Bible society of Salem; and a Dudleian lecture. Dr. Barnard died, Oct. 1, 1814, aged 66.

BARNAVE, Anthony Peter Joseph Marie, a native of Grenoble, brought up to the bar. The revolution called him to Paris, where, as a deputy to the national assembly, he displayed great eloquence and strong powers of mind. His popularity however quickly vanished, when he expressed some interest for the captive family of the monarch, whom he had conducted back from Varennes to Paris, and ventured to predict that liberty by its excesses might be productive of a thousand miseries to his country. He was sent to prison, and after 15 months of confinement, he was dragged to Paris, where his innocence and the energy of his appeal to the sense of the nation, would have procured his acquittal if his judges had been upright. He was guillotined 29th Nov. 1793, aged 32.

BARNES, Joshua, a native of London, educated at Christ hospital, and admitted servitor of Emanuel, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and where he soon distinguished himself by his great learning, and his superior knowledge of Greek. The celebrated Dr. Bentley, with whom he was no favorite, sarcastically observed, that "Barnes knew as much Greek as an Athenian cobbler." In 1700, Mrs. Mason, of Hemmingford, Huntingdonshire, a widow not beautiful in person, but possessed of 200*l.* a year, visited him at Cambridge, and her offer to settle on him the half of her income at her death, induced him to solicit her hand, which the obliging fair-one did not refuse to Joshua, for whom, she observed, the sun stood still. He died August 3d, 1712, in his 57th year, and his widow, who was nearly of the same age as himself, erected a monument over him at Hemmingford. His works were valuable for their erudition and criticism. The chief were, a poetical paraphrase of Esther 1676—the life of Edward III. dedicated to James II. in 1688—a learned edition of Euripides, in 1694—Anacreon, in 1705—and Homer, &c. in 1706.

BARNES, Robert, D. D. was employed by Henry VIII. to collect the opinions of the German divines, about his divorce from queen Catherine. His attachment to Luther's doctrines incurred the displeasure of the monarch, who sent him to the tower. He was burnt alive at a stake, in 1540. He wrote a treatise on justification, and the history of the popes.

BARNES, David, D. D. minister of Scituate, Mass. graduated at Harvard college in 1752, and was ordained Dec. 4, 1754. He published an ordination sermon, 1756; on the love of life and the fear of death, 1795; on the death of Washington, 1800; on the death of Rev. James Hawley, 1801; ordination sermon, 1802; and a discourse on education, 1803. He died April 27, 1811, aged 80 years. A volume of his sermons was also published with a biographical sketch.

BARNES, Daniel H., a distinguished conchologist, died in the meridian of life Oct. 27, 1818. He and Dr. Griscom originated and conducted with great reputation the high school of New-York. He was also a baptist preacher. On Sunday, the day before his death, he preached at New Lebanon, from the text, "Ye know not what shall be on the morrow;" on the next day, the driver having been thrown from his seat, Mr. Barnes in his alarm jumped from the carriage, fractured his skull, and died soon after. He was probably the first conchologist in the United States. His learned communications on conchology were published in Silliman's journal, with explanatory plates. Of his writings in that journal, the following is a catalogue: geological section of the Canaan mountain; memoir on the genera unio and alasinodonta, with numerous figures; five species of chiton, with figures; memoir on batrachian animals, and doubtful reptiles; on magnetic polarity; reclamation of unios.

BARNEY, Joshua, a distinguished commander in the American navy. He was employed in the public service during the war of the revolution. He was twice captured. In a vessel named the Hyder Ally, carrying 4 nine and 12 six pounders he captured, after an action of 26 minutes, the Gen. Monk of 18 guns, nine pounders, with the loss of 4 men killed, and 11 wounded. The Gen. Monk lost 30 killed, and 53 wounded. He sailed in the Gen. Monk with despatches for Dr. Franklin at Paris, and brought back a valuable loan from the king of France. In 1796 he went to France with Mr. Munroe, deputed the bearer of the American flag to the National Convention. In 1813 he was appointed to the command of the flotilla for the defence of the Chesapeake. He participated in the battle of Bladensburg, and was wounded by a ball in the thigh. In 1815 he was sent on a mission to Europe. He died in 1819 aged 59. He had been 41 years in public service and engaged in 26 battles.

BARNEVELDT, John D' Olden, a statesman of great abilities, ambassador to Elizabeth in England, and to Henry IV. of France. His attempts to limit the authority of Maurice the second stadtholder of Holland, raised him enemies, by whose virulence he was accused of designs to deliver the country to the Spaniards, and in consequence of this false charge, he was tried and beheaded in 1619. His sons, William and René, resented the cruelty exercised against their father, and though the elder escaped, René felt the punishment due to a conspirator. The mother stepped in defence of her son, and when Maurice expressed surprise to see her eager to save him when she had seen his father fall unlamented, she indignantly replied, "I would not solicit a pardon for my husband, for he was innocent. I ask it for my son because he is guilty."

BARO or BARONI, Peter, a native of Estampes, in France, who left his country on account of his attachment to protestantism, and found a hospitable asylum in England, in the house of lord Burleigh, and at Cambridge with Dr. Pierce, by whose influence he was chosen Margaret professor of divinity 1574. The tranquillity of his residence was however of short duration. He opposed Whitacre, Tindal, and Chadderton, who violently supported the tenets of absolute predestination, and whilst he gave a more moderate explanation to the doctrine in his sermons and in his lectures, he found himself cited before the vice chancellor, and accused before archbishop Whitgift; and though lord Burleigh the chancellor disapproved of the virulence of his prosecutors, he found himself obliged to leave Cambridge for Crutchedfriars, London, where he died. His writings were on divinity subjects, and in Latin.

BAROCHE, Frederic, a painter of Urbino, who learnt sculptor of his father, and architecture and geometry and perspective of his uncle, and drew the heads of his Virgins after the features of his sister, and those of his Jesuses after his nephew. Cardinal de la Rovere became early his patron, but the jealousy of his rivals proved nearly fatal. He was maliciously poisoned, and though he recovered by the immediate application of medicine, his constitution grew weak and languid, and he lingered in an unhealthy state, till his 84th year, 1612. His paintings are in great esteem, his historical pieces are deservedly admired, but he shines with superior lustre in the execution of his devotional portraits. His merit was universally admitted, and his infirmities alone prevented him from accepting the honors which were liberally offered to him by the duke of Tuscany, the emperor Rodolph II. and Philip II. of Spain. In correctness he is great; he understood well the effects of light and shade, and though the attitudes of some of his figures are out of proportion, he certainly may be said to approach near the softness and graces of Corregio.

BARON, Bonaventure, a native of Clonmel, Ireland, educated by his uncle Luke Wadding, and afterwards employed as divinity professor at Rome, where he spent 60 years, and died blind in a good old age, March 18th, 1696. He was a learned and voluminous writer. His Theologia in 6 vols. is his best performance. See a list of his works in sir James Ware's writers of Ireland, p. 253.

BARON, Michael, son of a merchant of Isson-dun, became celebrated as a player. His powers in expressing the passions were unusually great and he was deservedly called the Roscius of his time. He was not insensible to the popularity which he enjoyed, and with arrogance and vanity he observed, that once in a century perhaps a Cæsar might arise, but that 2000 years were requisite to produce a Baron. His superior excellence was in a great degree owing to his own exertions, so that Racine in representing his Andromache to the actors, with the judgment and correctness of a poet and of a man of feeling, paid him the highest compliment, assuring him that he could give him no instructions, "for, added he, your own heart will tell you more than any lessons of mine can suggest." He died at Paris 22d Dec. 1729, aged 77. Three volumes in 12mo. of theatrical pieces, appeared in 1760, under his name, of which however some supposed that he was not the author. His dialogue is lively, and his scenes diversified; but there is not frequently that brilliancy of coloring which an acquaintance with the manners of the great could have supplied.

BARONI, Adrienne Basile, a native of Mantua, sister to the poet Basile. She was so admired for her beauty, her wit, and her accomplishments, that volumes were written in her praise. Her daughter Leonora possessed equal charms, and met equal admiration, and in 1639, a collection of pieces in Latin, Greek, Spanish, Italian, and French, was published, in which her beauty and her perfections were portrayed with all the graces of poetry. She also wrote some poetical trifles. The daughter had profound skill in music, a sweet voice, and the utmost delicacy of manner. Mr. Bayle styles her one of the finest singers in the world.

BARONIUS, Cæsar, a native of Sora in Italy, educated at Veroli, Naples, and Rome. In this last place he became a priest, and was appointed soon after confessor to Clement VIII. keeper of his library, and raised to the rank of cardinal. On the death of the pope 1605 he was nearly elevated to the pontificate, as he had 31 voices in his favor, but his election was opposed by the Spanish faction, as he had asserted that the claims of the king of Spain on Naples were founded on false grounds. His constitution was injured by his intense application, so that in his old age he digested his food with difficulty. He died 30th June, 1607, aged 68. His works are numerous and valuable, especially his Annales ecclesiastici, in 12 vols. fol. abridged by several authors, by H. Spondæus, Lud. Aurelio, and Bazovius.

BAROZZI, James, an architect, born in the duchy of Modena, and better known by the name of Vignola. His skill in architecture was displayed in the splendid edifices of Bologna, and in the canal between Ferrara and Bologna. He succeeded M. Angelo as the architect in the erection of St. Peter's at Rome, and died there 1577. He was member of the academy of designs at Rome, and was much noticed during an excursion in France. He wrote a treatise on perspective, and also rules for the five orders of architecture, a popular work which has passed through 16 editions.

BARRAL, Peter, an ecclesiastic of Grenoble, who kept a school at Paris, and distinguished himself as the author of several useful publications. He also abridged Pitæus's dictionnaire des antiq. Rom. and published an abstract of Sevigne's letters. His style was manly and vigorous, though occasionally negligent and incorrect. He died at Paris, July 21st, 1772.

BARRALIER, H. F. N. D., a youth of precocious talents, was born at Marseilles, in 1805, acquired a knowledge of languages with extraordinary facility, and, before he was sixteen, wrote a Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul; a Treatise on Morality; and some poems. He died in 1821.

BARRAS, Paul John Francis, Comte de, a prominent character of the French revolution, was born, in 1755, at Fox, in the department of the Var, and was of so ancient a family that it was proverbially said to be "as old as the rocks of Provence." After having served with applause in India, he returned to Paris, where he wasted his patrimony in dissipation. When the revolution broke out he espoused its principles, and he subsequently assisted in dethroning the monarch, and, as a member of the Convention, voted for his death. To the overthrow of the Girondist party he also contributed. The Jacobins, however, regarded him with suspicion, and their fears were justified by his lending his strenuous aid to effect the downfall of Robespierre. When the directorial government was established, Barras became one of the five directors, and he held this high office till 1799. While, in the latter year, he was secretly negotiating the restoration of the Bourbons, the directory was dissolved by Napoleon, and Barras retired to Brussels. After having been foiled in some political intrigues in 1813 and 1814, he lived in privacy till his decease, which took place on the 29th of January, 1829.

BARRE, Louis Francois Jos. de la, a native of Tournay, member of the academy des inscriptions, editor of Moreri's dictionary, and author of some books on antiquarian history, and other kindred subjects, among which are memoirs of the history of France and Burgundy. He also assisted Banduri in his imperium orientale, and in his collection of Roman medals from Decius. He was rewarded with a pension by the grand duke of Tuscany, and died at Paris 1738, aged 50.

BARRE, Isaac, an English gentleman, who distinguished himself as a politician during the American war. In the earlier part of his life he was in the army, in which he attained the rank of colonel. Becoming connected with the marquis of Lansdown, he obtained a seat in the House of Commons, and was an active member of the opposition, and a frequent speaker, during the ministry of lord North. He was afflicted with blindness for several years previous to his death, which took place, July 1st, 1802, at the age of seventy-five. Some have supposed that colonel Barre wrote the celebrated letters of Junius, in conjunction with his friend the marquis of Lansdown, and counsellor Dunning, afterwards Lord Ashburton; but this is a bare conjecture, unsupported by any probable arguments.

BARRE, Joseph, an ecclesiastic, canon of St. Genevieve, and chancellor of the university of Paris, where he died 25th of June 1764, aged 72. He was well versed in ecclesiastical and profane history. His history of Germany 11 vols. 4to. is the best of his works, though it does not abound either in elegance of language, choice of matter, or happy and interesting combination of events. He published, besides a life of marshal de Fabert, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of the laws and the tribunals of Justice, 4to.—Vindiciæ librorum deuterocanonico-rum veteris Test. and a General History of Germany, 11 vols. 4to., reckoned the best work in French on the subject.

BARRES, Joseph Frederic Wallet, Des, had the title of colonel, and was Lieut. Governor of cape Breton, and afterwards of Prince Edward Island. He died at Halifax in 1804, aged 102. In 1780, he published valuable charts of the coasts and harbors in the gulf of St. Lawrence, of Nova Scotia, of New England, of New York and southerly, compiled from surveys, by Major Samuel Holland, surveyor general. These charts of Des Barres, are still the most authentic surveys of these extensive coasts.

BARRETT, George, a native of Dublin, eminent as a self-taught painter. In his youth he obtained the prize of 50*l.* from the Dublin society for the best landscape in oil, and in 1762, he also with another landscape gained a similar prize from the London society for the encouragement of arts. He was zealous in the establishment of the royal academy, of which he was member. His most admired pieces are preserved in the collections of the dukes of Portland and Buceleugh, Mr. Locke and others. He died 1784, aged 52.

BARRETT, William, a native of Somersetshire, who settled at Bristol as a surgeon, and devoted much of his time for twenty years in making collections for the history of that city. The work was published in 4to. 1788, and the author died the next year. He was interested much in the Chattertonian controversy, as he was one of the earliest friends and patrons of the unfortunate youth.

BARRY, John, first commodore in the American navy. In Feb. 1776, congress appointed him to the command of the brig Lexington, of 16 guns; he was afterwards transferred to the large frigate Effingham. In Feb. 1781, he sailed in the frigate Alliance, of 36 guns, from Boston for L' Orient, carrying Col. Laurens on an embassy to the French court. On his return, he fought the ship of war Atlanta, of between 20 and 30 guns, and her consort, the brig Trepasa. After a severe action, both struck their colors. Commodore Barry was dangerously wounded in the shoulder by a grape shot.

He sailed again from Boston in the Alliance, and carried La Fayette, and the Count de Nouilles to France, and proceeded on a cruise. On his return, he fought a vessel of the enemy, of equal size, which escaped only by the aid of her consorts. It is related, that Gen. Howe, at one period, attempted to bribe him to desert the cause of America, by the promise of fifteen thousand guineas, and the command of a British frigate, and that the offer was rejected with disdain. Under the administration of Mr. Adams, he superintended the building of the frigate United States, of which he retained the command till she was laid up in ordinary, after the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the executive chair. He died in 1803, aged 58.

BARRINGTON, John Shute, son of Benjamin Shute, merchant, was born at Theobald's, Herts, and partly educated at Utrecht. He early imbibed the tenets of the dissenters, in whose favor he wrote some treatises. He applied himself to the law, and so conspicuous were his abilities, and so great his authority among the dissenters considered, that the ministry, at the instance of lord Somers, applied to him when he was but 24 years old to exert his influence with the Scotch presbyterians to promote the union of the two kingdoms. He was successful, and his labors were rewarded by the appointment of commissioner of the customs in 1708, from which however he was removed three years after on the change of administration. His character was so highly respectable that John Wildman, esq. of Becket, Berks, though a stranger, left him his estate, and some years after the same liberal and honorable compliment was paid him by Francis Barrington of Tofts, who had married his relation, and whose name and arms he assumed. Mr. Shute sat in parliament for Berwick-upon-Tweed, but he did not distinguish himself as an eloquent or a frequent speaker. In 1720 he was raised to the peerage of Ireland by the title of Viscount Barrington, but in 1723 his character was undeservedly tarnished for his conduct in the Harburgh lottery, for which he was expelled from the house. He died at Becket Dec. 4th, 1734, in his 66th year. He was the disciple and the friend of the famous Mr. Locke, and was the author of various publications.

BARRINGTON, Daines, fourth son of lord Barrington, was, in 1757, appointed a Welsh judge, and afterwards second justice of Chester. These offices, which he discharged with great dignity, he resigned some years before his death, and devoted himself to those literary pursuits which he loved. He was author of observations on the statutes, 4to.—tracts on the probability of reaching the north pole, 4to. &c.—and made besides valuable communications to the royal and antiquarian societies, of which he was a distinguished member, and of the last of which he was vice-president. He died March 14, 1800, aged 73.

BARROW, Isaac, a learned mathematician and divine of an ancient family in Suffolk, was born in London. From the Charter-house, where he gave few proofs of application, he went to Felsted in Essex, where a change of disposition from indolence to industry soon distinguished him. He was admitted pensioner of Peter-house, Cambridge, 1643; but when he went two years after to reside, he became member of Trinity college, where his uncle had entered, after being ejected from Peter-house for writing against the covenant. He was afterwards chosen fellow of the college; but though his income was small, from the losses which the civil war had brought upon his father, he did not ingloriously submit to the ruling powers; and though he inadvertently subscribed to the covenant, he soon repented of this weakness, and insisted upon the erasure of his name. His studies were directed to divinity; but when he observed the connexion which exists between chronology and astronomy, he applied himself with indefatigable zeal to those higher sciences, and made a rapid progress besides in anatomy, botany, and chemistry. Upon his disappointment in not being elected Greek professor, on the death of Dr. Duport, he resolved to travel, and to supply his expenses he parted with his books, and left the kingdom, 1655. He visited Paris, Leghorn, and Florence, and every where enriched the stores of his mind by observation and inquisitive researches. From Leghorn he passed to Smyrna, and in his voyage displayed his uncommon courage, by assisting the crew of the vessel in beating off an Algerine corsair that threatened them with death or slavery. He passed from Smyrna to Constantinople, where he resided one year, and returned to England through Venice, Germany, and Holland, in 1659. He now took orders, agreeable to the statutes of his college, and in 1660, he was elected to the Greek professorship of the university, and two years after, to that of geometry in Gresham college. The next year he was made Lucasian mathematical lecturer at Cambridge, an office which, in 1669, he resigned to his great friend Isaac Newton, that he might with closer application devote himself to divinity. He now received the preferment which was due to his merit from his uncle, bishop of St. Asaph, and from Ward, bishop of Salisbury, and, in 1672, the king, whom he served by his conduct, and flattered by his poetry, raised him to the mastership of Trinity college, observing, with real truth, that he gave it to the best scholar in England. He was vice chancellor in 1675; but his public services were of short duration. He died of a fever, 4th May, 1677, aged 47, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where his friends, by contribution, erected a monument over him, of which the epitaph was written by Dr. Mapletoft. The writings of Barrow are numerous and valuable, and chiefly on mathematical subjects. As a divine he was great as well as exemplary. The mathematical part of his valuable works consists of Euclid's elementa, and data—lectiones geometriæ—Archimedis opera—Apollonii conicorum, libri 4.—Theodosii sphericorum, libri 3.—Novâ methodo illustrata et succinetè demonstrata—& lectio in quâ theoremata Archimedis de spherâ et cylindro—& mathematicæ lectiones habitæ in scholis publicis acad. Cantab. published after his death. His sermons are highly esteemed, and have been frequently edited. His works in English were published together by Dr. Tillotson, in 3 vols. fol. 1682.

BARROS, or DE BARROS, John, a native of Viseo, engaged as preceptor to the children of Emanuel, king of Portugal. After being three years governor of St. George, on the coast of Africa, he was recalled by his pupil, king Juan, to be treasurer of the Indies; and in this employment he formed the design of writing the history of that lately discovered part of the globe. He died at Pompal, the place of his literary retirement, 1570, in his 74th year. His history is divided into 4 decades, and though censured by la Boulaye le Goux, and extolled by Possevin and de Thou, it contains a collection of many hitherto unknown facts, though unadorned with the graces of elegance, or the strictest attachment to truth. Alfonso Ulloa translated the book from Portuguese into Spanish. The work was edited, 3 vols. fol. Lisbon, 1736.

BARRUEL, Abbe Augustin, a French Jesuit, born in 1741, at Villeneuve de Berg, was conductor of the Ecclesiastical Journal, from 1787 to 1792, but was obliged to fly to England after the deposition of Louis XVI. When the consulate was established, he returned to France. His best known work is, Memoirs for a History of Jacobinism, 5 vols. 8vo.; a production which blends some facts with much fiction, and proves either the credulity or the bad faith of the author. He died, Oct. 5, 1820, at the age of seventy-nine.

BARRY, Girald, a native of Pembrokeshire, called Giraldus Cambrensis. He was of a respectable family, and obtained preferment in the church, and was at last nominated bishop of St. David's by the chapter, which, however, could not be sanctioned by the pope. When afterwards offered the same bishopric, in 1215, he indignantly refused it. He is author of the history of the conquest of Ireland, and of the topographia Hibernica, edited by Camden, 1602—itinerarium Cambrie, edited by Dr. Powel, besides ecclesie speculum against the monks.

BARRY, James, son of the representative of Dublin, was brought up to the bar, and in 1629, made king's serjeant, and in 1634, knighted, and appointed one of the barons of the exchequer. At the restoration he was made chief justice of the king's bench, and raised to the peerage, by the title of lord Santry. He was intimate with the unfortunate Stafford; and died 1673, and was buried in Christ Church, Dublin. He wrote the case of tenures upon the commission of defective titles, published, Dublin, fol. 1637, and 12mo. 1725.

BARRY, Spranger, was born in Dublin, son of a silversmith, 20th November, 1719. After following unwillingly for two or three years, his father's business, his inclination for theatrical pursuits burst forth, and, in 1744, he appeared on the stage, in the character of Othello. As his acting was of superior order, he was received with unprecedented applause; and he so highly established his character at Cork, as well as in the capital, that he ranked with the great names of Garrick, Cibber, Sheridan, Quin, and Woffington, who at that season were engaged on the Dublin stage. In 1746, Barry went to England; but his connection with Drury-lane was of short duration. In Covent-garden, however, he became a formidable opponent to the great Roscius, as he played the same characters, and divided with him the applauses of the town. After eleven years of arduous contention, in which the highest powers of theatrical eloquence were successfully displayed by both rivals, Barry joined with Woodward, of Covent-garden, in an expedition to Ireland, where they built, at great expense, two elegant play-houses, at Dublin and Cork. The plan did not, however, succeed. Woodward left his friend to settle the debts of this ruinous scheme, and returned to London, where he was followed, in 1766, by Barry. He died 1774. His greatest characters were Othello, Macbeth, Lear, Essex, and Jaffier; and so powerfully expressive of grief and agony were his features, that the spectators, says a writer of the times, were disposed to pity before he spoke, and his broken throbs so wrung the soul that their distress could be relieved only by torrents of tears.

BARRY, James, a native of Cork, in Ireland, whose genius early marked him for eminence as a painter. His piece on the legendary baptism of the king of Cashel recommended him to the notice of the Dublin society for the encouragement of arts; and by a consequent introduction to Mr. Burke, he was noticed by Johnson, sir Joshua Reynolds, and other men of great public fame. By the friendship of his patron Burke, he was enabled to travel through France and on the continent, and to improve himself in the celebrated schools of Italy. He returned to England in 1772. In 1777 he was elected royal academicien, and in 1786 appointed professor of painting to the royal academy. He was, in 1799, removed from his office, and soon after expelled from the learned body whose fame and honor he had long supported by the elegant labors of his pencil and the animated language of his lectures. The cause of this disgrace is attributed by some to the republican principles entertained, and publicly set forth, by the professor, too often in a manner offensive to the feelings of moderate and impartial men. This eminent artist was attacked by a paralytic stroke, which ten days after proved fatal, 22d March, 1806.

BARRY, George, a Scotch divine, born in Berwickshire, educated at Edinburgh, and successively minister of Kirk-wall and of Shapinbay in the Orkneys, where he died, September, 1805, aged 57. His statistical account of his two parishes for the publication of sir John Sinclair was much admired, and his reputation as a writer and as a public teacher procured him from the university of Edinburgh the degree of D. D. From his character as a preacher, Dr. Barry was appointed, by the society for propagating Christian knowledge, their superintendent of the schools in that distant part of Scotland.

BARTAS, Guillaume de Salluste du, a French poet born at Monfort, in Armagnac. He was commander of a corps of cavalry under Henry IV.; and he travelled through England, Denmark, and Scotland. The poem which rendered his fame known, was his commentary of the week of creation, in 7 books; a work in which he displayed his conceit, as well as the barbarity of his age, by calling the head the lodging of the understanding, the eyes the twin stars, the nose the gutter or chimney, the teeth a double palisade, used as a mill to the open gullet, &c. This poem, so incorrect and so injudicious, had, however, its admirers, and in five or six years it passed through 30 editions. Bartas wrote some other poetical pieces but all in the same contemptible style. What, however, renders his character amiable, is the integrity of his life, and the innocence and modesty of his conduct. He retired from the bustle of the world to his chateau de Bartas, where his time was devoted to literary pursuits. De Thou speaks of him in the most flattering terms. He died 1590, at the age of 46.

BARTH, John, was born at Dunkirk, and by his bravery and enterprise he rose from the obscurity of a fisherman's occupation to consequence in the French navy. When he had the command of a squadron of seven frigates, he eluded the vigilance of the English and Dutch, who were blocking up Dunkirk, destroyed a fleet of 86 English merchantmen, afterwards made a descent near Newcastle, in Northumberland, where he destroyed 200 houses, and brought back prizes to the value of 500,000 crowns. In various actions with the Dutch, he distinguished himself by his courage, presence of mind, and great dexterity. His uncouth figure and rough manners were the ridicule of the courtiers of Louis XIV. When the Monarch told him that he had made him chef d'escadre, you have done very well, replied the unpolished seaman. His language was incorrect, his words few, and he could neither read nor write, but merely was able to scrawl his name. This great man, who rose without friends and without patrons, by merit alone, died at Dunkirk, 27th April, 1702, at the age of 51.

BARTHELEMI, Jean Jacques, celebrated as the author of the voyage of Anacharsis, was born at Cassis, near Aubagne, in Provence, 20th January, 1716. He was educated at Marseilles in the oratory, and after devoting himself to Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek, he was admitted into the church. His abilities recommended him to Gros de Boze, with whom he became, 1744, associate in the care of the medals of the king's cabinet at Paris. He was afterwards placed in the office of secretary to the academy of inscriptions, and on the death of Boze he succeeded as keeper of the cabinet of medals. He visited Italy in 1755, and not only enlarged the powers of his own mind, but benefited the republic of letters by the judicious observations which he made on the valuable relics of the lately discovered city of Herculaneum. On his return to France, he was honored with a seat in the royal society of London, and his services to literature were rewarded by the minister, the duke de Choiseul, with a pension of about 250*l.* a year, to which was added, in 1765, the place of treasurer of St. Martin de Tours, and, five years after, the post of secretary-general to the Swiss guards. The public had already applauded the literary abilities of Barthelimi, who had been admitted into the French academy, when his great work, entitled the voyage of the young Anacharsis in Greece, which appeared in 7 vols. 8vo. 1788, commanded the universal admiration of the world. This composition was the labor of 30 years, and in elegant and chaste style exhibited the most pleasing characters of antiquity, interspersed with philosophical reflections, interesting anecdotes, and amusing descriptions, and every where abounded with proofs of judgment, taste, and erudition. In 1793, the venerable philosopher was dragged from his peaceful retreat, under the reign of terror, to a prison; but he was soon after liberated, by order of the government, at a moment when, with calmness and resignation, he expected the fatal decree which had already hurried so many of his countrymen to the grave. He died 30th April, 1795, universally respected, not only for his learning, but the mildness of his temper, for his modesty, and his affability and unaffected manners. He wrote, besides other works, contributions, chiefly on medallic subjects, to the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, and the journal des savans.

BARTHELEMI DES MARTYRS, a Dominican of Lisbon, made archbishop of Braganza, and highly extolled by Roman catholic writers for his great charity and other meritorious actions, in times of public danger and calamity. He died 1590, aged 76.

BARTHIUS, Gaspard, a native of Custrin, in Brandenburg. As his father was professor of civil law at Frankfort on the Oder, he received the best instruction, so that he is mentioned by Baillet as having, at 12 years of age, translated the psalms into Latin verse, of every measure. He unfortunately lost his father, but his education was not on that account neglected. He went through all the universities of Germany, and afterwards visited Italy, France, Spain, England, and Holland, and made himself a perfect master of most of the foreign languages, as his elegant translations from the Spanish and French evidently show. He settled at Leipsic, and devoted himself totally to literature. In his old age he relinquished all worldly affairs for devotion. He died September, 1658, aged 71. His commentaries on Statius and Claudian, in 4to. and his adversaria, in fol. are his best works.

BARTHOLDY, Jacob Solomon, a Prussian Diplomatist, who was a native of Berlin, but of Israelitish parentage. He studied at the university of Konigsberg, and afterwards travelled in Greece. Returning to Germany, he abjured Judaism, and became a Protestant. Soon after, the war of 1807 broke out, and he served against the French as an officer in the Landwehr of Vienna. He wrote a tract called the War of the Tyrol, which produced great sensation. In 1813 he became attached to the chancellor's office, under the minister Hardenberg; and he drew up the edict relative to the Landsturm, after the publication of the armistice. In 1814 he accompanied the allies to Paris, and then visited London. Next year Baron Bartholdy was appointed Prussian consul-general at Rome; and after the congress of Aix la Chapelle, he was made chargé d'affaires at the court of Tuscany. He died in 1826. He published, besides the work named, Travels in Greece in 1803 and 1804, and left in manuscript a Treatise on the colored Glasses of the Ancients.

BARTHOLIN, Gaspard, a native of Malmoe in Schonen, who is said, at the age of three, to have learned to read perfectly in fourteen days, and to have composed with correctness at the age of 13 some Greek and Latin orations. After finishing his studies, he travelled through the greatest part of Europe, and directed his attention to medicine, in which science he took his degree. He at last settled at Copenhagen as Latin professor, an employment which, six months after, he exchanged for the chair of medicine, which he filled with credit and respectability. A severe illness, however, alarmed his conscience, and he vowed to apply himself to divinity if he recovered. He kept his vow, and afterwards succeeded to the theological professorship on the death of Aslach. He died of a violent cholera, the 13th July, 1629, at Sora, aged 44. His works were on anatomy, metaphysics, logic, and rhetoric.

BARTHOLIN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen, 20th October, 1616. He studied physic at Leyden, Paris, Montpellier, Padua, Malta, and Basil; and in 1646 he returned to his native city, where he was appointed mathematical professor, and the next year promoted to the anatomical chair, which he held for thirteen years. Ill health obliged him to resign, and he retired to his small estate of Hagedest, near the capital, where his hopes of repose and literary ease were disturbed by the destruction of his library and valuable papers by fire in 1670. His misfortunes did not pass unnoticed. The university of Copenhagen made him librarian, and the monarch made him his physician, with a handsome salary, exemption from taxes, and the honor of a seat in the council of Denmark. He died 4th December, 1680. His works are chiefly on medical subjects.

BARTHOLIN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was professor of history and law at Copenhagen, and counsellor to the king. He died 1690. He published antiquitates Danicæ, &c. His brother Erasmus was professor of geometry and medicine at Copenhagen, and died 1698, aged 73. Another brother, called Gasper, succeeded his father in the anatomical chair—John was professor of theology—and a daughter called Margaret was eminent as a poetess in the Danish language.

BARTHOLOMEW, The Martyr, an ecclesiastic, a native of Lisbon, who attended the council of Trent, and was strenuously urgent for the introduction of a reform among the clergy. He was made archbishop of Braga, where, during a pestilence, he behaved with all the kindness of a friend, and the mild benevolence of a good Christian. He retired in his old age from his see to a monastery, and died 1590, aged 76. His works have appeared in 2 vols. folio.

BARTLETT, Josiah, M. D. governor of New Hampshire. He commenced the practice of physic at Kingston in 1750. He held commissions, both civil and military, under the royal government, but was deprived of them, in consequence of being a zealous whig. He was appointed a delegate in congress, and his being the first name called, as representing the most easterly province, on the vote of the declaration of independence, he boldly answered in the affirmative. In 1777, as medical agent he accompanied Stark to Bennington. In 1778 he withdrew from congress. He was appointed chief justice of the court of common pleas in 1779, a justice of the superior court in 1784, and chief justice in 1788. In 1790 he was President of New Hampshire, chosen by the legislature. In 1791 and 1792 he was chosen by the people. In 1793 he was elected the first governor under the new form of government. Of the medical society established by his efforts in 1791, he was the president. He died in 1795, aged 65 years.

BARTOLI, Daniel, a Jesuit of Ferrara, who settled at Rome, where he published several historical works, in Italian. His best composition, was an history of his society, in 6 vols. folio, and translated into Latin by Giannini; and he deserves the praise of laborious attention, of purity and precision in style, and happiness in diction. He died at Rome, 1685, aged 77, much respected.

BARTOLI, Cosimo, a native of Florence, sent to Venice as the resident of the great duke Cosmo. He continued there five years, and wrote an account of Frederic Barbarossa in Italian, besides other works, in the 16th century.

BARTOLO, a lawyer of eminence, born in the march of Ancona. He took his degrees at Bologna, and became law professor at Pisa, from whence he removed to Perugia. He was honored with the title of counsellor by the emperor Charles IV. and died 1859, aged 46, leaving behind him 10 vols. in fol. on law subjects.

BARTOLOCCI, Julius, a Cistercian monk of Celano, Naples, Hebrew professor of the Neophytes at Rome. He published a bibliotheca rabbinica, 4 vols. fol. to which his pupil, Imbonati, added a 5th. He died 1st November, 1687, aged 74.

BARTOLOZZI, Francis, an engraver of great merit, was born at Florence, in 1728, and was taught painting by Hugford, after which he applied to engraving. In 1764 he came to England, and five years subsequent to his arrival was admitted a member of the Royal Academy. The productions of his graver were numerous and highly esteemed. Poverty, however, compelled him, in 1802, to accept an invitation from the prince regent of Portugal, who gave him a pension, and he died at Lisbon in 1815.

BARTON, Benjamin Smith, M. D. professor in the university of Pennsylvania. He pursued his medical studies at Edinburgh and London. His medical degree he obtained at Gottingen. In 1789 he returned to Philadelphia, and the same year was appointed professor of natural history and botany in the college. He succeeded Dr. Griffiths as professor of materia medica, and Dr. Rush as professor of the theory and practice of medicine. He died 1815 aged 49. His publications are the following. On the fascinating quality ascribed to the rattlesnake; new views of the origin of the tribes of America; collections towards a materia medica of the U. S.; remarks on the speech attributed by Jefferson to Logan; Medical physical journal, begun 1804, continued several years; eulogy on Dr. Priestley; elements of botany, with 30 plates, 1804; also in two vols. 40 plates 1812; flora Virginica; an edition of Cullen's materia medica; account of Syren lacer-tina; observations on the opossum; collections of extinct animals; fragments of the natural history of Penn's remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake; on the honey bee; on the native country of the potato and other papers in the A. philo. transactions.

BARTON, Elizabeth, a religious impostor in the age of Henry VIII. called the holy maid of Kent. The convulsive fits and distortions to which she was subject, were converted to purposes of deception by Masters, the minister of Aldington, her native place, and she was so perfectly instructed in her art, that she imposed not only upon the vulgar, but upon the more enlightened mind of sir Thomas More, bishop Fisher, and archbishop Warham. Her external conduct, her piety and devotion, countenanced her profession, and she was believed when she asserted that she saw visions of angels, and that in her trances the virgin Mary appeared to her to comfort her. Commissioners were appointed to examine into the truth of these reports, and when the artifice had so far succeeded, the impostor began to prophesy, and she acknowledged that God had revealed to her, that if Henry divorced queen Catharine, his reign would not extend to a month's duration; but the boldness of the imposture roused the king's resentment. The maid and her accomplices were produced before the star-chamber, the whole plot was revealed, and the confession of the actors was publicly read to the astonished populace at St. Paul's cross, and the holy maid and her confederates, were condemned and executed at Tyburn, April 20th, 1534.

BARTRAM, John, an eminent botanist. He early discovered an ardent desire for the acquisition of knowledge, especially of botanical knowledge. The infant state of his colony, Pennsylvania, and other circumstances of his situation, placed great obstacles in his way. He surmounted them by intense application and the resources of his own mind. He was the first American who conceived and carried into effect the design of a botanic garden, for the cultivation of American plants as well as of exotics. He purchased a fine situation on the west bank of the Schuylkill, about four miles below Philadelphia, where he laid out with his own hands a garden of 5 or 6 acres. He furnished it with a variety of the most curious and beautiful vegetables collected in his excursions from Canada to Florida. At the age of seventy he made a journey into east Florida, to explore its natural productions. By his means Europe was enriched with the flowering shrubs, plants and trees of America. He made such proficiency in his favourite pursuit, that Linnæus pronounced him "the greatest natural botanist in the world." He was at length appointed American botanist to his Britannic majesty, George III. in which appointment he continued till his death in 1777 aged 75.—Mr. Bartram's communications in the British philosophical transactions, vols. 41, 43, 46, 62, are these; on the teeth of a rattlesnake; on the muscles and oyster banks of Penn.; on clay wasp nests; on the great black wasp; on the libella; account of an aurora borealis, observed Nov. 12, 1757. He published also observations on the inhabitants, climate, and soil in his travels to lake Ontario; description of east Florida with a journal.

BARTRAM, William, a botanist, son of the preceding, was born at the botanic garden, Kingressing, Penn. in 1739. He spent nearly five years in examining the natural productions of Carolina, Georgia and the Floridas. His collections and drawings were forwarded to Dr. Fothergill. His account of his travels was published in 1791. It is a delightful specimen of the enthusiasm, with which the lover of nature, and particularly the botanist, surveys the beautiful, and wonderful productions which are scattered over the face of the earth. Reposing in a grove of oranges, palms, live oaks, and magnolias, in the midst of beautiful flowers, and singing birds, he cried out,—“Ye vigilant and most faithful servants of the Most High; ye, who worship the Creator morning, noon, and eve in simplicity of heart! I haste to join the universal anthem. My heart and voice unite with yours in sincere homage to the great Creator, the universal sovereign.” In 1782 he was elected professor of botany in the university of Penn. Besides his discoveries in botany, he prepared the most complete table of American ornithology, till the appearance of Wilson's book, and whom he assisted in the commencement of his work. Such was his continued love of botany, that he wrote a description of a plant a few minutes before his death, which occurred suddenly in 1823, in the 85 year of his age. In addition to his travels, he published an account of J. Bartrani; anecdotes of a crow; description of Carthia; on the site of Bristol.

BARUFFALDI, Jerome, an Italian poet and literary character, was born at Ferrara, in 1675, and died in 1753. His works, in his native language and in Latin, amount to more than an hundred, among which are five dramatic pieces. His poem entitled Il Canapaja, the subject of which is the culture of hemp, is considered as his best production, and ranks among the most esteemed specimens of Italian didactic poetry.

BARWICK, Peter, brother of the dean, was eminent as a physician for his skill in the small-pox, and in several kinds of fevers. He published in Latin a life of his brother, and supported Harvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and defended the Eikon Basilike against Dr. Walker. He died Aug. 1705.

BASEDOW, John Bernard, a native of Ham-burgh, son of a barber. He was the pupil of Reimarus, and afterwards studied at Leipsic, and in consequence of his character and abilities, he obtained, in 1753, the chair of professor of moral philosophy and belles lettres at Sorog in Denmark, which, however, he afterwards lost for speaking irreverently of religion. He next tried a plan of education in a new method, but though he obtained large sums of money to carry his schemes into execution, the measures failed upon trial. He was author of various works of no great merit, though possessed of plausible assertions. He died 1790, aged 67, a victim it is said to intemperance.

BASHUYSEN, Henry James Van, a native of Hanau, and there professor of ecclesiastical history, and of the oriental languages. He was afterwards called to the divinity chair of Berlin, and made member of the royal society there. He printed in his own house various learned works, chiefly on rabbinical subjects, and died 1758, aged 79.

BASIL, St., surnamed the Great, a celebrated father of the Greek church, was born, in 326, at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, and, after having studied at Athens, he for a while taught rhetoric and practised at the bar. These occupations, however, he relinquished for a monastic life, and became the founder of a convent in Pontus. In 370, he was chosen bishop of Cæsarea; filled the episcopal seat with much piety and courage; and died in 379. His works composed three folio volumes.

BASIL I., a native of Adrianople, of an obscure family. He was taken prisoner by the Bulgarians when a soldier, and he escaped to Constantinople, with only his wallet on his back and his stick in his hand. Here he was noticed by the emperor Michael, and raised gradually to consequence, and at last taken as partner of the empire. Basil discovered that Michael, jealous of his popularity, intended his destruction, and he anticipated the blow, and became sole emperor in 867. He reigned till 886, when he was killed by a stag in hunting. He defeated the Saracens at Cæsarea, and he was distinguished for his prudence and his love of justice, though some marks of weakness and ambition appear in his character.

BASIL II., son of Romanns, and emperor of Constantinople after John Zimisces, died 1025, aged 70, after a reign of 50 years. He was valiant and fond of justice. His inhumanity, however, is remarkable, after he had in 1014 defeated the Bulgarians, killed 5000, and taken 15,000, he permitted only one in every 100 to retain his eye-sight, that he might conduct his 99 eyeless companions to their terrified monarch, who it is said survived only two days the horrid spectacle.

BASILICES, brother of Verina, wife of Leo I. emperor of the east, was unsuccessful in an expedition against Genseric, and lost the greatest part of his fleet. He afterwards seized the empire under Zeno Isauricus, and governed with cruelty. Two years after, 477, he was attacked by the deposed emperor, his army was defeated, and he was doomed to the horrors of a prison, where he expired the following year. During his short reign part of Constantinople was destroyed by fire, and the valuable library of upwards of 120,000 volumes was totally destroyed.

BASILOWITZ, Iwan, a bold hero, who rose against the tyranny of the Tartars, and in giving freedom to his countrymen laid the foundation of the Russian power, and first assumed the name of Czar, and added Astracan to his dominions. He reigned 50 years, and died 1584. He was succeeded by Födor.

BASINGE, John de, or BASINGSTOCHIUS, so called from Basingstoke, the place of his birth, was educated at Oxford and Paris; travelled to Athens, and became an excellent Greek scholar; and, on his return, obtained the archdeaconries of London and Leicester. He died in 1252. Basinge brought many MSS. from Greece, and contributed much to spread in his own country a knowledge of the Greek language.

BASIRE, Isaac, D. D. a native of Jersey, who studied at Cambridge, and was archdeacon of Northumberland, and chaplain to Charles I. During the rebellion he retired to Oxford, and in 1646 travelled towards the Levant with the intention of recommending the doctrines of the church of England to the Greeks. After preaching in Greek to the bishops and clergy of the Morea, he extended his travels to Aleppo and Jerusalem, where he visited the temple of the sepulchre, and returned through Mesopotamia and Constantinople to Transylvania, where George Ragotzi II. the prince of the country, raised him to a divinity professor's chair. On the return of Charles II. he came back to England, and was promoted to a prebend of Durham, and died October, 1676. His works were diatriba de antiq. Eccles. Brit. libertate—a letter to sir Richard Brown, relating to his travels, and the history of the English and Scotch presbytery.

BASKERVILLE, John, an English artist, deserving of notice for his improvements in printing and type-founding. He was born at Wolverley, in Worcesterhire, 1706, and inheriting a small estate was brought up to no particular profession. He, however, acquired a particular skill in penmanship and carving letters on stone; and at the age of twenty, he settled at Birmingham as a writing master. He subsequently engaged in the manufacture of japanned works; and in 1750, commenced his experiments on the branch of art which acquired for him so much celebrity. His first great performance as a printer, was an edition of Virgil in royal 4to. 1756; which was followed by many of the Latin classics, and some English ones 4to., and smaller sizes. The beauty of his typographical production, was superior to any thing which had previously appeared from an English press; and when it is considered that the paper and ink, as well as the types and workmanship, were the fruits of one man's skill and ingenuity, it must be admitted that he possessed great merit. He died in 1775; and his types and matrices were afterwards sold to a literary society at Paris for 3,700 pounds.

BASKERVILLE, Sir Simon, knight, descended from the ancient family of Baskerville in Herefordshire, was born at Exeter, and studied at Exeter college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1606 he was senior proctor of the university, and he adorned his public character by an intimate acquaintance with the learning of ancient and modern times. He particularly devoted himself to medicine, and as a physician in London, he not only obtained distinction, and the honor of knighthood, but he amassed so large a fortune, that he was called Baskerville the rich. It is said that he had no less than 100 patients a week, and the hospitality of his life, and his liberal and affable manner, deserved the success which he obtained. He died fifth July 1641, aged 68, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

BASNAGE, James, a native of Rouen, in Normandy, son of Henry. He studied at Saumur under Tanaquil Faber, and when he had made a rapid progress in the ancient as well as the modern languages, he went at the age of 17 to Geneva, where he prepared himself under the ablest masters for the ministry. He settled in his native town, but the disgrace of the protestants in 1635 drove him to Rotterdam, where he continued as pastor till the interest of the pensionary Heinsius obtained for him, in 1709, a share in the ministry of the Walloon church at the Hague. Basnage distinguished himself, not only as a divine, but as a statesman, so that Voltaire said with truth, that he was more fit to be a minister of state than of a parish. His abilities were courted by the duke of Orleans, regent of France, who directed his ambassador du Bois to follow his advice in the negotiation for an alliance between Holland, France, and England; and the exiled protestant, as a reward for his political services, obtained the restitution of all his forfeited property. As a scholar, Basnage was of a superior order, in private life he was affable, candid, and sincere, and he had the happiness of cultivating friendship with the greatest men in Europe, his epistolary correspondence with whom does honor to his head and heart. He fell a victim to a complication of disorders, 22d December, 1723, in his 70th year. His works are numerous, and his history of the Jews since the time of Christ, 15 vols. 12mo. 1716, is particularly valuable.

BASS, Edward, D. D., first bishop of Massachusetts, was born in Dorchester, 1726, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1744. In 1752, at the request of the episcopal society in Newburyport, he went to England for orders, and was consecrated by bishop Shirlock. In 1796, he was elected by the convention of the protestant episcopal churches of Massachusetts to the office of bishop, and was consecrated May 7, 1797, by the bishops of Pennsylvania, New York, and Maryland. Afterwards the episcopal churches in Rhode Island, elected him their bishop, and in 1803, a convention of the churches in New Hampshire put themselves under his jurisdiction. He died Sept. 10, 1803.

BASSAN, James du Pont, a painter born at Bassan in Italy. As he chiefly lived in the country, and possessed a mind well stored with literature, his pieces are generally on subjects of landscapes, animals, and night scenes, and with so much success that Annibal Carrache was himself deceived by a book which he had drawn on a wall, and which he attempted to seize, as if real. In his flowers he interwove serpents with great dexterity, though little taste. His valuable pieces were dispersed through Europe, and among others Titian purchased several of them. Bassan died at Venice 1592, aged 80, leaving four sons, all painters. Of these Francis was employed by the Venetian republic, with Paul Veronese and Tintoret, to adorn the palace of St. Mark. He was of a melancholy turn, and once thought himself pursued by archers, so that in a fit of self-created terror he threw himself out of a window and died soon after, 1694, aged 44.—Leander, another brother, obtained as a reward for his pieces, the collar of St. Mark, from the doge of Venice, and a gold medal from the emperor Rodolphus II.—John Baptiste and Jerome were eminent as imitators of the style and manner of their father.

BASSANTIN, James, a Scotchman, who after studying astronomy and the mathematics at Glasgow, travelled in quest of learning, through the Netherlands, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, and at last settled at Paris, where he acquired both reputation and money, as a mathematical teacher. He returned in 1562 to his native country, and became early acquainted with sir Robert Melvil, a strong partisan of Mary queen of Scots, and he afterwards supported the pretensions and ambitious views of the earl of Murray. Bassantin died 1568. In his religion he was a zealous protestant, as a man of learning he was strongly tinctured with the failings and the superstition of the time. He placed great confidence in astrology, and with more zeal than good sense asserted the influence of the planets on the affairs of the world. His works are all on mathematical subjects, and though not free from pedantry, and improbable conclusions, they yet bear strong testimony to his merits as a philosopher.

BASSET, Richard, governor of Delaware, was a member of the old congress in 1787, and was appointed a senator under the new constitution. In 1801 he was placed on the bench of the federal judiciary; but the repeal of the act constituting the courts, deprived him of his office in 1802. He died in 1815.

BASSI, Laura, wife of Joseph Verati, honored in 1732 with the degree of doctor of philosophy for her high mental accomplishments, which she displayed in her lectures on experimental philosophy. Her private life was also deserving of the highest encomiums, and exhibited her as the possessor of every amiable virtue. She died 20th February, 1778.

BASSOMPIERRE, Francois de, a marshal of France, of a family of distinction in Lorraine, was confined in the Bastille by Richelieu, who dreaded the power of his satire. He remained in this confinement 10 years till the death of his persecutor, and employed his time in writing his memoirs, published, 3 vols. in 1665, Cologne, which are interesting, though occasionally trivial. On his release he received the offer of 500,000 livres from the dutchess of Aiguillon, niece of Richelieu, which he politely refused, adding "Madam, your uncle has done me too great an injury, to allow me to receive so much good from you." He was employed in embassies by Louis XIII. and he possessed all the requisites of a courtier, with great presence of mind, affability, wit, and uncommon generosity. He spoke the languages of Europe with great fluency. He was found dead in his bed, 12th October, 1646, in his 67th year. The account of his embassies appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1668.

BASTWICK, Dr. John, a native of Writtle in Essex, born 1593, of Emanuel college, Cambridge, which he left without degree. He travelled nine years, through Europe, and became doctor of physic at Padua. His publication called flagellum pontificis, drew upon him the resentment of the bishops, though he declared he did not wish to reflect upon them or their office, and he was fined 1000*l.* excommunicated, and imprisoned, till he made a recantation of his assertions. In his confinement, which lasted two years, he wrote several things, and in his new litany inveighed against the severity of his treatment, which called down the vengeance of his enemies. He was therefore fined 5000*l.* sentenced to be pilloried, lose his ears, and to be imprisoned for life. He was consequently immured in St. Mary's castle in the Scilly islands till the civil wars put an end to his sufferings. In 1640, the house of commons voted the proceedings against him, and against Prynne and Burton illegal; he was recalled to London amidst the acclamations of thousands, and he was repaid the fine from the forfeited estates of the archbishop of Canterbury and the other commissioners who had so severely treated him. He was living in 1643, but the year of his death is unknown.

BATE, John, D. D. prior of the Carmelites at York, was born in Northumberland, and studied at Oxford at the expense of some powerful patrons. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of philosophy, divinity, and Greek. He published several things chiefly critical and theological, and died 26th January, 1429.

BATE, George, a physician, born at Maidsmorton near Buckingham. He studied at New college, Queen's and St. Edmund's hall, Oxford, and practised as a physician in the university. He possessed such insinuation united with great talents, that he was physician to Charles I. while at Oxford, afterwards to Oliver Cromwell, and to the royal family after the restoration. His recommendation to the favor of Charles II. originated, it is said, in the report that he had given the usurper a strong dose which hastened his death. He wrote among other pieces a Latin account of the civil wars, and died 1669, and was buried at Kingston-on-Thames.

BATE, Julius, a friend of Hutchinson, by whom he was recommended to Charles duke of Somerset, and to the living of Sutton in Sussex. He attended Hutchinson in his last illness, and thus he was enabled to contradict the report which had been spread, that his friend on his death-bed had recanted to Dr. Mead the publication of his writings. These writings maintained that all the arts and sciences have been derived from the Bible. Bate was author of some valuable pieces on criticism and divinity, and in defence of his friend's system. He died 7th April, 1771.

BATES, William, a noneconformist divine, educated at Emanuel and King's colleges, Cambridge, where he took his degrees, and at the restoration was created D. D. by royal mandate. He was chaplain to Charles II. and minister of St. Dunstan's in the west, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity. He was at the conference of the Savoy for reviewing the public liturgy, and he also was, with Jacomb and Baxter, engaged in the dispute against Pearson bishop of Chester, Gunning of Ely, and Sparrow of Norwich. His character was so respectable that, though a non-conformist, he might have obtained the deanery of Coventry, or even been raised, according to Dr. Calamy, to any bishopric in the kingdom. His great intimacy with Tillotson, lord chancellor Finch, lord Nottingham, and lord keeper Bridgman, is a further proof of his merit and respectability. He published the lives of some eminent men in Latin, in 4to. 1631. His works were published in a folio volume after his death. He resided at Hackney the last part of his life, where he died 1699, aged 73.

BATHURST, Ralph, a Latin poet, physician, and divine of Trinity college, Oxford, of which he was elected president 1664. In the younger part of life he left divinity for physic, but after the restoration he took orders, and became dean of Wells, and vice chancellor of the university. He refused, in 1691, the bishopric of Bristol, from his great regard for the society over which he presided, and whose chapel he rebuilt in a very neat and elegant style. He was a man of great erudition, as appears from his poems and other pieces. He died 1704, in his 84th year.

BATHURST, Allen, descended from the Bathursts of Northamptonshire, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, under his uncle, the president, and afterwards was elected in two parliaments for Cirencester. He opposed the duke of Marlborough, and he was one of the 12 lords introduced in one day, 1711, to the upper house, to form a majority. He continued firm to his political friends even in their disgrace. He boldly opposed the attainder of lord Bolingbroke, and the duke of Ormond, and in 1718, he began to show himself as a speaker among the peers, the most formidable opponent of the measures of the court, and of Walpole in particular. In 1704, he married Catherine, daughter of sir Peter Apsley, of Sussex, by whom he had four sons and five daughters. His only surviving son was for some years chancellor of England, and made a peer by the title of lord Apsley. Lord Bathurst was employed about the person of Frederic, prince of Wales, and of his son, George III. at whose accession he resigned his offices for a pension of 1200*l.* In his private character, lord Bathurst was a man of great generosity, affable in manners, and humane in sentiment, and his long and familiar acquaintance with Pope, Swift, and Addison, prove him to have possessed wit, taste, and erudition. He was made an earl in 1772, and died at his seat near Cirencester, 16th Sept. 1775, aged 91.

BATONI, Pompeo, a native of Lucca, eminent as a painter. His merit was so universally acknowledged, that the greatest personages were proud of his society, and the emperor Joseph added to the honors already bestowed upon him, the title of nobility. His best piece is Simon the magician contending with St. Peter, which is preserved at Rome in the great church, dedicated to the apostle. Batoni died 1787, aged 79.

BATTELY, Dr. John, born at Bury, Suffolk, was fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and chaplain to the primate Sancroft, who gave him the living of Adisham, and the archdeaconry of the diocese. He wrote Antiquitates Rutupinæ et St. Edmundburgi, and died 10th Oct. 1708, aged 61.

BATTEUX, Charles, a French philosopher, eminent for his erudition, as well as for his private virtues, and the humanity which was directed to the maintenance of a numerous and impoverished family. His works are various, and all chiefly on classical literature, in which he displays frequently more method and more labor, than eloquence or purity, not without a mixture of metaphysical ideas. It is said that his death was accelerated by grief in observing that the elementary book which he wrote for the military school of Paris, did not succeed so well as he wished. He died at Paris, 14th July, 1780, aged 67. Among other works he published the four poetries of Aristotle, Horace, Vida, and Boileau, with notes, two vols. 8vo. 1771.

BATTIE, Dr. William, a physician, born in Devonshire, and educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He practised at Uxbridge and London, and became physician to St. Luke's, and in 1733, he married the daughter of Barnham Goode, under master of Eton school, a man whom, for a satirical poem, Pope has immortalized in his Dunciad. Though the Colemans had a political dislike to Goode, they behaved with kindness to his daughter, and the survivor of them left 30,000*l.* to her husband. Dr. Battie was lampooned for the active part which he took with the college of physicians against Dr. Schomberg, in 1750, in the Battiad, a poem said to be written by Schomberg, Moses Mendez, and Paul Whitehead. Dr. Battie's publications were all on medical subjects, and all respectable. His observations on madness recommended him to public notice, and he was, with Dr. Munro, examined at the bar of the house of commons, with respect to the private madhouses in the kingdom, and the highest testimonies of his abilities are recorded in the journals of the day. Dr. Battie died of a paralytic stroke, 13th June, 1776, aged 75. He published an edition of Isocrates, two vols. 8vo.

BATTISHILL, Jonathan, an eminent musician, was born in London, in 1738, and died at Islington, in 1801. His anthems and hymns, and his catches and glees, are highly esteemed. The most popular of his songs is Kate of Aberdeen.

BATTONI, Romeo, the most distinguished Italian painter of the eighteenth century, was born at Lucca, in 1708. He was the son of a goldsmith, an employment which, in Italy, has always been deemed a branch of the fine arts, and was intended for the same profession. Having executed with great taste, a golden cup, to be presented to pope Benedict XIII., it was so much admired, that a subscription was entered into for supporting him at the Roman school of painting. Possessing both genius and industry, he soon distinguished himself; and, with the exception of Mengs, became the most eminent artist of the day. He was more admired for his coloring and facility than for strength of conception, but generally executed his own designs in a very masterly manner. It was, however, as a portrait painter, that he acquired his greatest share of fame, few princes or nobles visiting Rome, without sitting to him. This eminent artist, who was more distinguished by natural talents, than by learning or acquirements, died in 1787.

BAUDELOQUE, John Louis, an eminent French surgeon and man midwife, was born in Picardy, in 1746, and died in 1810. Such was his reputation that Napoleon appointed him principal midwife to the Empress Maria Louisa. He had the merit of simplifying his art, and discarding the unnecessary use of instruments. His Principles of Midwifery, and Art of Midwifery, are considered as standard works. The first was reprinted at the expense of the government, for the instruction of country female practitioners.

BAUDIER, Michael, a native of Languedoc, historiographer of France under Louis XIII. He wrote the history of the Mahometan religion, 8vo. 1636—the life of cardinal Amboise, 1651, 8vo.—of marechal de Toiras, 1644—of Ximenes, Suger, and others; and though his style is heavy and inelegant, yet his works are curious and interesting, and valuable for their authenticity and the variety of his matter.

BAUDIUS, Dominique, a native of Leisle, who studied at Aix la Chapelle, Leyden, and Geneva. He visited England in the suite of the ambassador of the states of Holland, and formed an acquaintance with Sir Philip Sidney, and afterwards he went to France, where he staid 10 years, and by means of Achilles de Harlai he was admitted advocate of the parliament of Paris. He next went to Leyden, where he was raised to the professorial chair of eloquence, and with Meursius named historiographer to the states of Holland in 1611. He was a man of genius, as well as erudition, and in his Latin poems, some of which he dedicated to the king of England and to the prince of Wales, he displayed taste and elegance of composition. He died at Leyden, 22d August, 1613, aged 52.

BAUDOT de JUILLI, Nicholas, a native of Vendome, son of a collector of excise. He is author of several historical pieces written with method and ingenuity, though too much in the spirit of romance. His history of the conquest of England, by William of Normandy, 12mo. of Philip Augustus, two vols. 12mo. and Charles VII. two vols. 12mo. are his best pieces. He wrote besides the history of Catherine of France queen of England—Germaine de Foix—the secret history of the constable of Bourbon—Spain invaded by the Moors, four vols. &c. He died 1759, aged 81.

BAUDRAND, Mich. Anton., an ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He visited Rome, Germany, and England, and distinguished himself by his "Dictionnaire Geographique, two vols. fol." printed first in Latin, and afterwards in French. The work is not without its errors, which have not been corrected in subsequent editions. He died 1700, in his 67th year.

BAUHINUS, John, distinguished himself as a physician and medical writer at Basil and Lyons. He was physician to the duke of Wirtemberg, and died at Montbeillard 1613, aged 73. The best known of his works is Historia plantarum universalis, fol. three vols. He wrote a treatise on the medicinal waters of Europe.

BAUHIN, Gaspar, born at Basil, in 1560, was the brother of John, and, like him, an excellent botanist. In 1596, he was chosen one of the physicians of the duke of Wirtemberg; and, in 1614, first medical professor at Basil. He died in 1624. His anatomical works are numerous. Of his botanical works, the principal are Phytopinax; and Pinax. His son, John Gaspar, who was also a man of talent and a botanist, published the first volume of the Theatrum Botanicum which his father left in manuscript.

BAULDRI, Paul, a native of Rouen, professor of sacred history, at Utrecht, and son-in-law of Henry Basnage. Besides some chronological tables and historical treatises, he published Lactantius' de morte persecut. with learned notes. He died 1706, aged 67.

BAULOT or BEAULIEU, James, a lithotomist, born of obscure parents in a hamlet in Franche-comté. He served in a regiment of cavalry, till he formed an acquaintance with an empirical surgeon called Paulouni, who pretended to cut for the stone. After five or six years of instruction, he began to practice for himself, and he travelled in a monastic habit over different parts of France, and to Geneva and Amsterdam, with the boldness of an enthusiast. His success was great, so that at Amsterdam the magistrates, in gratitude for his services, had his portrait engraved, and a medal struck. His method was adopted from Holland by Cheselden with such unusual success that it was called the English operation, though certainly the invention belonged to the French. After visiting Rome and Vienna, Baulot retired to a seat near Besancon, where he died 1720, aged 69.

BAUME, James Francis de la, a native of Carpentras, and canon of St. Agricola's church, Avignon, author of a poem called the Christiade, in 6 vols. 12mo. a work uninteresting, and written in a pompous and affected style. He wrote besides a pamphlet called éloge de la paix, and other small pieces. He also wrote for more than 10 years for the Courier de l'Europe. He died at Paris 1757, aged 52.

BAUME, Anthony, a French apothecary, who acquired considerable reputation as a chemist, was born at Senlis, in 1723, and died in the vicinity of Paris, in 1804. His whole life and fortune were devoted to the improvement of chemistry. Among other works, he is the author of Experimental and Analytical Chemistry; Manual of Chemistry; and Elements of Pharmacy.

BAUMER, John William, a native of Rhewiller, who studied at Jena and Halle, and left the pursuit of divinity for medicine, of which he was made professor at Erfurt. He wrote the natural history of the mineral kingdom, 2 vols.—the natural history of precious stones, and other works, and died 1738, aged 69.

BAUMGARTEN, Alexander Gottlieb, a native of Berlin, who studied at Halle, where he was made professor of philosophy, and afterwards at Frankfurt, on Oder. He wrote metaphysica, 8vo.—Ethica philosophica, 8vo.—aesthetica, initia philosoph. practicæ, primæ,—and died 176, aged 48.—His brother, Sigismund, was a Lutheran minister, divinity professor at Halle, and died 1757.

BAUR, Frederic William Von, a native of Hessian Hanau, who served in the Hessian troops in the pay of Britain 1755. In 1757 he was made a general, and was ennobled by Frederic II. of Prussia, and in 1769 he entered into the service of the Russians, and was appointed by Catherine inspector of the salt-works of Novogorod. His abilities as an engineer and mechanic were also employed in supplying Moscow with water, and in making deeper the canal of Petersburg, and in constructing a capacious harbor at its extremity. He died 1783, author of memoires historiques et géographiques sur la Valachia, 8vo.—of a chart of Moldavia, to illustrate the war between the Turks and Russians, in seven sheets.

BAUSSET, Cardinal Louis Francis de, an eminent French prelate, born at Pondicherry, in 1748, was educated in France, and was made bishop of Alais before the revolution. That bishopric he resigned in 1802. Napoleon patronized him; and Louis XVIII. made him a peer, and obtained for him the cardinal's hat. He died in 1824. He is the author of a History of Fenelon, 4 vols.; and of a History of Bossuet, 4 vols.; both works of merit, but of which the first is far superior to the second.

BAUTRU, William, a Frenchman famous for his wit, which he displayed with great freedom and efficacy at the court, and among the ministers. After seeing the escorial, in Spain, attended by an ignorant librarian, he told the king that it would be advantageous for him to make his librarian his treasurer, because, said he to the monarch who inquired why, he never touches what he is intrusted with. He died at Paris 1665, aged 77.

BAXTER, Richard, a nonconformist, born at Rowton, Shropshire, 12th November, 1615. He compensated for the deficiencies of a neglected education, by unusual application, and was appointed master of Dudley free-school by the interest of Mr. Richard Foley of Stourbridge, and soon after admitted into orders by the bishop of Winchester. His scruples were raised by the oath which was proposed by the convention at that time sitting, and he was among the number of those who showed their dislike to an unequalled submission, "to archbishops, bishops, et cætera," as they knew not what the et cætera comprehended. In 1640 he was invited to be minister at Kidderminster, but the civil war which broke out soon after, exposed him to persecution, as he espoused the cause of the parliament. He retired to Coventry, and continued his ministerial labors till the success of the republicans recalled him to his favorite flock at Kidderminster. The usurpation of Cromwell gave him great offence, and he even presumed to argue in private with the tyrant on the nature and illegality of his power, but in the only sermon which he preached before him, he wisely confined his subject to the dissensions which existed in the kingdom on religious matters. He was in London after Cromwell's death, and preached before parliament the day before the king's return was voted, and likewise before the lord mayor for Monk's successes. Charles II. made him one of his chaplains, and chancellor Clarendon offered him the bishopric of Hereford which he declined. He was, however, soon involved in the general persecution of the non-conformists. His paraphrase on the New Testament, drew upon him, in 1685, the vengeance of Jeffries, and he was condemned to be imprisoned for two years, from which punishment, six months after, he was discharged by the interference of lord Powis with king James. He died December 8th, 1691, and was interred in Christ Church. His compositions were very numerous, some of which are very popular. Burnet speaks of him as a man of great piety, whose learning would have commanded universal esteem if not directed to politics. He was moving and pathetic, but he possessed too much of the subtle and metaphysical.

BAXTER, William, a nephew to the preceding, was born at Lanlugany, Shropshire. His early education was much neglected, so that when he entered at Harrow school, at the age of 18, he knew not one letter, and understood nothing but Welch. Application, however, surmounted all difficulties. As a grammarian, a critic, and an antiquarian, he equalled his contemporaries, as his editions of Horace, published 1710, Anacreon 1695, his translations of some of Plutarch's lives, his glossary of Roman antiquities 1726, and his dictionary of British antiquities 1719, sufficiently evince. The best part of his life was employed in imparting instruction. He died 31st May 1723, in his 73d year.

BAXTER, Andrew, an eminent metaphysician, was born, in 1686, or 1687, at Aberdeen, and educated at King's College, in that city; after which he gained a subsistence by teaching private pupils. He died at Whittington, in East Lothian, in 1750. His works are, an Inquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul, a production which Warburton highly praised; and Matho, sive Cosmotheoria Puerilis, which the author afterwards translated and enlarged. In his Inquiry, he maintains the doctrine that dreams are caused by the agency of separate immaterial beings.

BAYARD, Pierre du Terrail, chevalier de, a soldier of fortune, born at Dauphiné. He followed Charles VIII. to the conquest of Naples, and he every where distinguished himself by his heroic valor, and obtained the love of the army. His generosity and his humanity have been deservedly celebrated. He gave back to the daughter of his hostess at Brescia, the 2000 pistoles which he had received for the protection of the house. He was with Francis I. at the battle of Marignan, and when mortally wounded, against the imperialists in 1524, he seated himself under a tree, exclaiming, that in his life he had always faced the enemy, and that in his death he would not turn his back upon them. He was in his 48th year, 32 of which had been devoted to the service of his king and country. His remains were honored with the most magnificent obsequies by the duke of Savay, and he was lamented not only by his own men, but by the enemy. Not less than four persons have written an account of his life.

BAYARD, James A. a distinguished statesman. After studying law at Philadelphia with gen. Reed and Mr. Ingersoll, he commenced the practice in Delaware. In 1796 he was elected a member of congress. In the party contests of the day he was a distinguished supporter of the federal administration. From the house he was transferred to the senate in 1804, of which latter body he continued a member, till he was selected by Mr. Madison as a commissioner to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. He sailed from Philadelphia for St. Petersburg in May 1813. The absence of the emperor preventing the transaction of any business, he proceeded to Holland by land. He lent his able assistance in the negotiation of the treaty of peace at Ghent. At Paris he was apprized of his appointment as envoy to the Court of St. Petersburg. This he declined, stating, "that he had no wish to serve the administration, except when his services were necessary for the good of his country." He tendered, however, his co-operation in forming a commercial treaty with Great Britain; but an alarming illness compelled him to return to the United States. He arrived in June, and died in August 1815, aged 48.

BAYER, Theophilus Sigfred, a German, who devoted himself with great industry to ancient and modern languages. After visiting Dantzic, Berlin, Halle, Leipsic, and other towns of Germany, he settled at Konigsberg as librarian, and nine years after, 1726, he went to Petersburg, where he became professor of Greek and Roman antiquities. He died there in 1738, aged 44. He wrote a number of valuable dissertations. His Museum Sinicum in two vols. 8vo. is highly esteemed. His grandfather, John Bayer of Augsburg, was a mathematician of great eminence, and chiefly known for his description of the stars in a book published 1603, called Uranometria, in which he assigns the names of the Greek letters to the stars of each constellation. His Uranometria was republished by himself in 1627, with great improvements, and the new title of Cælum Stellatum Christianum.

BAYLE, Peter, born 18th Nov. 1647, at Caria, a small town of Foix, was educated by his father, who was a protestant minister, and gave early strong proofs of superior genius. He was employed at Toulouse as tutor in three private families, but this sphere of action was too circumscribed for his rising fame, and he retired therefore to Paris, and soon after was raised to the chair of a philosophical professor at Sedan. In this new situation he maintained the high character which he had acquired, but the cause of the protestants was not favored at the court of Louis XIV. and among other establishments the college of Sedan was suppressed by a royal edict 1631. Bayle, thus abandoned to himself for some time, doubted whether he should take refuge in England or Holland, but an honorable invitation from Rotterdam drew him to that city, where he was appointed professor of philosophy and history, with an annual salary of 500 guilders. In this peaceful retreat, he began to publish some of his works, which, with the admiration of the learned, brought upon him the resentment and envy of rivals and enemies. In 1696 he was deprived of his professorship at Rotterdam by the calumnies and exertions of his quondam friend Jurieu, who never ceased to persecute him. He was afflicted in his latter years with a decay of the lungs; but as he considered it as an hereditary complaint, he disregarded the advice of medical men. He died 28th December 1706, after writing the best part of the day. The works of Bayle are "thoughts on the comet of 1680, 4 vols. 12mo." in which he introduces with much good sense, profane and religious conclusions—"nouvelles de la republique des lettres," a very popular periodical work, published from 1684 to 1687—"a philosophical commentary on the words of our Saviour, 'compel them to come in,' 2 vols. 12mo."—"answers to the questions of a provincial, 5 vols. 12mo."—"letters in 5 vols." and a "dictionary historical and critical, 4 vols. folio." Of these works, which all possess great merit, and display strength of mind, deep research, and vast erudition, the dictionary is the most celebrated. Among the homage paid to the abilities of Bayle should be mentioned, not only the opinion of Voltaire, who considers the dictionary as a book where a man may learn to think, but the decree of the parliament of Toulouse. When his relations wished to cancel the will that he had made in Holland, as not valid in France, one of his judges, with the indignation of a man of sense and humanity, exclaimed, that the learned were citizens of all countries, and that he ought not to be branded with the name of foreigner, in whose birth and writings France had so much reason to glory. In his private character Bayle was liberal, open, and disinterested, he was fond of independence and maintained his principles under persecution and in distress. His life was a series of literary occupation, and it is not to be wondered that his writings are so numerous, since, to a happy judgment and a copious fluency of words, he added the powers of a very retentive memory. His various compositions, besides the dictionary, have been published in 4 vols. folio. Des Maiseaux has written his life.

BAYLEY, Anselm, an English divine, who became minor canon of St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, and subdean of the chapel royal. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took the degree of L. L. D. in 1764. He died 1794. He was author of some useful publications, the antiquity, confidence, and certainty of Christianity, canvassed, on Dr. Middleton's examination of the bishop of London's discourses on prophecy—practical treatises on singing and playing with just expression,—a plain and complete grammar of the English language—a grammar of the Hebrew, with and without points—the old testament, Hebrew and English, with remarks critical and grammatical, 4 vols. 8vo. And some other works of less reputation.

BAYLEY, Matthias, remarkable for longevity, died about the year 1789 at Jones' creek, a branch of the Pedee, in North Carolina, aged 136 years. He was baptised at the age of 134. His eye sight remained good, and his strength was very remarkable till his death.

BAYLEY, Richard, an eminent physician of New York. He studied physie with Dr. Charlton. In 1769 or 1770 he attended the London lectures and hospitals. Returning in 1772, he commenced practice with Dr. Charlton in New York. In the autumn of 1775 he revisited England in order to make further improvement under Hunter, and spent the winter in dissections and study. In the spring of 1776 he returned in the capacity of surgeon in the English army under Howe. In the spring of 1777 he resigned the office and returned to New York. In 1781 his letters to Hunter on the croup was published, in which, he recommends the active treatment of that disease, which, experience has proved, gives the best chance of recovery, and to Dr. Bayley, as the founder of this practice, the public are justly indebted. In 1787 he delivered lectures on surgery. In 1788 a mob, in consequence of the imprudence of some students, destroyed Dr. Bayley's valuable anatomical cabinet. In 1792 he was elected professor of anatomy at Columbia college; but in 1793 he took the department of surgery, in which he was very skilful. About 1795 he was appointed health officer to the port. During the prevalence of the yellow fever he fearlessly attended upon the sick, and investigated the disease. In 1797 he published his essay on that fever, maintaining, that it had a local origin, and was not contagious. He also published in 1798 a series of letters on the subject. The state quarantine laws originated with him. In August 1801 an Irish emigrant ship, with ship fever, arrived. He found the crew, passengers, and baggage huddled in one unventilated apartment, contrary to his orders. Entering it only a moment, a deadly sickness at the stomach, and intense pain in the head seized him, and on the seventh day he expired, aged 56.

BAYLY, Lewis, a native of Caermarthen, educated at Oxford, and made bishop of Bangor in 1616. He is author of a book called "the practice of piety," which became so popular that in 1734 it had reached the 59th edition. The bishop died 1634 leaving four sons.

BAYLY, Thomas, son of the preceding, was educated at Cambridge, and made subdean of Wells by Charles I. He was with Charles at Oxford, and defended with lord Worcester Ragland castle; after which he retired to the continent, where he became a zealous papist, and published some religious and controversial tracts. After being settled at Douay for some time, he went to Italy, where he died in great poverty in an obscure hospital, according to Dr. Trevor, fellow of Merton, who saw the place where he was buried.

BAYMAN, William, surgeon, a native of Virginia. He was for years an assistant demonstrator to Mr. Else, professor in St. Thomas' hospital. After residing 16 years in England he returned to this country, and settled in Essex about 1785. He performed many remarkable surgical operations. As an anatomist, he is said to have had no superior. The best preparations of Cline and Cooper, at London, were made by him. Various papers by him were published in the medical journals. He died in 1814, aged 66.

BAYNES, Sir Thomas, knt. a physician, professor of music in Gresham college, was educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, and accompanied Sir John Finch to Italy and Turkey. He died at Constantinople 1681, aged about 59, and was soon followed to the grave by his friend sir John. They both together left munificent donations of 4000*l.* to Christ's college.

BAYNES, John, son of an attorney, was born at Middleham in Yorkshire, and educated at Richnond school, from whence he passed to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1780. Great application marked his progress in literature, and at the age of 20 he obtained the medals for the best exercises on mathematical and classical subjects. His abilities were displayed not only by his speeches as a politician, but he employed the great poetical talents, which he undoubtedly possessed, to fan the flames of party. As his pieces were all anonymous, it is difficult to ascertain what he wrote, but the London Courant among other papers owed its fame for some time to his exertions, and he has been considered by some perhaps with impropriety, as author of the celebrated archæological epistle to dean Milles. In his friendship Baynes was warm, zealous, and sincere, he was at all times a strong advocate for his favorite liberty. He was attacked by a fever, hastened it is supposed by excessive application, and after three days illness he expired Aug. 3d, 1787, aged 29.

BAZIRE, Claude, a native of Dijon, son of a porter, whom the revolution raised from obscurity to consequence and infamous celebrity. In the national assembly and in the convention he shone above all others for violent measures, and as the tool of the Jacobins he inveighed indecently against the king, and proposed a law to set a price on the head of La Fayette. At last Robespierre, tired with his bloody services, caused him to be condemned, and he suffered with Danton 5th April, 1794, aged 30.

BE, Guillaume le, an engraver and letter founder at Troyes. In 1545, at the age of 20, after seeing the manner of composing types, in the famous house of Robert Stephens, he went to Venice, where he cut punches for the Hebrew printing house of Mark Anth. Justiniani, and acquired both reputation and opulence. He returned to Paris, where he died 1598, aged 73. He is mentioned with credit by Cassaubon in Scaligers's opuscula.

BEACH, John, an Episcopal clergyman, who graduated at Yale college in 1721. For several years he was a congregational minister at Newton, Con.; but in 1732, he went to England for holy orders. On his return to America, he acted as Episcopal missionary at Newtown and Reading. He died March 19, 1782. He published several sermons and other small works. Among others a calm and dispassionate vindication of the members of the church of England. They were mostly of a controversial character.

BEACH, Abraham, D. D. an Episcopal clergyman, born at Cheshire, Connecticut, Sept. 9, 1740, and graduated at Yale College in 1757. He was ordained priest by the bishop of London in June 1767. For 17 years, including the period of the revolution, he discharged the duties of his office, at New Brunswick, N. J. After the peace, he was called to the city of New York, as an assistant minister of Trinity Church, where he remained about thirty years, and then retired in 1813 to his farm on the Rariton to pass the evening of his days. He died Sct. 11, 1828, aged 88 years, respected by all who knew him.

BEALE, Mary, daughter of Mr. Cradock, minister of Walter on Thames, was born in Suffolk, and distinguished herself as a portrait painter in oil, water colors, and crayons. She copied sir Peter Lely's and Vandyke's portraits, and was little inferior to her contemporaries. Her portraits of Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Patrick, Wilkins, and other divines, are preserved at the earl of Ilchester's. She died Dec. 23th, 1697, aged 66.

BEATON or BETON, David, archbishop of St. Andrew's and cardinal, was born 1494, and educated in the university of St. Andrew's and Paris. His abilities, which were great, but more probably the interest of his uncle, James Beaton, archbishop of Glasgow, raised him to consequence. In 1528 he was made lord privy seal, and some years after he was employed in the honorable office of negotiating the king of Scotland's marriage with Magdalen, the French king's daughter, and afterwards that with Mary, daughter of the duke of Guise. His popularity raised him enemies, and not only the Scots but Henry VIII. himself grew jealous of his influence, and when he was raised to the rank of cardinal and the primacy of Scotland, the English monarch sent an ambassador to king James, to undermine the power of the prelate, but the Scottish monarch gave no heed to the admonition. On the death of James the cardinal made an attempt for the regency, which occasioned his imprisonment, but was liberated by the earl of Arran. He now began to renew his persecution of the heretics; and, among the rest, of the famous protestant preacher George Wishart, whose sufferings at the stake he viewed from his window with apparent composure. Beaton was assassinated in his chamber, May 29th, 1547.

BEATON, James, nephew of the archbishop, was born at Balfour, and raised to the see of Glasgow before his 25th year. At the reformation in 1560, he fled to France with the records and sacred vessels of his cathedral, which he presented to the Scotch college of Paris. He left a MS. history of Scotland, and died at Paris, 1603, aged 73.

BEATTIE, James, LL. D. a Scotch poet, son of a respectable farmer, and born in Kincardineshire, October 1735. He was educated at Aberdeen, where he obtained a scholarship, and afterwards he undertook the care of Alloa school in Fifeshire, from whence he removed to Aberdeen grammar school as assistant, and married the daughter of the head master. He now distinguished himself as an elegant writer, and the publication of his minstrel, which was begun in 1771, and finished in three years, procured him the patronage of lord Errol, and the professorship of moral philosophy and logic in the Marischal college of Aberdeen, with a pension of 200*l.* from the king. Soon after this he visited London, where he was received by Dr. Johnson, Dr. Porteus, and other high and literary characters, with all the respect due to merit and virtue. He died August 1803, universally regretted as a man who had devoted his time to the advancement of literature, of taste and of morality. Besides his elegant poem of the minstrel, he published a small volume of poems and translations 1760,—the judgment of Paris 1765,—an essay on the nature and immutability of truth, in opposition to sophistry and scepticism, 1770, a work of great merit and full of sound argument, urged with such force against David Hume's doctrines that he never heard the name of Beattie mentioned without emotion,—dissertations moral and critical in 4to. 1783,—the evidences of the Christian religion in two small volumes, written at the request of his friend the bishop of London,—elements of moral science, delivered in lectures to his pupils and an account of the Life and Writings of his eldest Son.

BEATTIE, James Hay, son of the above, was born at Aberdeen, 6th November 1768. He early displayed great powers of mind, and at the age of 13 he entered at the Marischal college where he took his master's degree in 1786. His abilities were so promising that, before he was 19, he was appointed by the king, at his father's solicitation, and with the approbation of the college, assistant professor of moral philosophy and logic. To the mildest manners he united the profoundest devotion; he always carried about him a pocket bible and a Greek new testament. He was in his disposition very cheerful, he studied music as a science, and was so fond of it that he built himself an organ, upon which he performed skilfully. He was carried off by a nervous atrophy, 19th November, 1790.

BEATTY, Charles, a missionary for many years at Neshaminy, Penns., was appointed an agent to procure contributions to a fund for the benefit of the presbyterian clergy, their widows and children. He died at Barbadoes, whither he had gone to obtain benefactions for the college of New Jersey 1772. He was a missionary from the presbyterian church to the Indians from about 1740 to 1768. He published a journal of a tour of two months to promote religion among the frontier inhabitants of Pennsylvania, 8vo. Lond., 1768.

BEATTY, John, M. D., general. After studying medicine with Dr. Rush, he entered the army as a soldier. Reaching the rank of lieutenant, he in 1776 fell into the hands of the enemy, at the capture of fort Washington, and suffered a long and vigorous imprisonment. In 1779 he succeeded Elias Boudinot as commissary general of prisoners. After the war he settled at Princeton as a physician, and was also a member of the state legislature, and in 1793 of congress. For ten years he was secretary of the state of New Jersey. He died 1826, aged 77.

BEAU, John Lewis le, a learned professor and academicien of Paris. He wrote a discourse on the dangers which attended literary men from poverty and from opulence, and he strongly recommended mediocrity as the truest standard of happiness. He published Homer in Greek and Latin, 2 vols. 1746, and Cicero's orations with annotations, 3 vols. 1750, and died 12th March, 1766, aged 45.

BEAU, Charles le, elder brother of the preceding, was also distinguished as a scholar and professor of belles lettres at Paris, and like Rollin he enjoyed and deserved the love and veneration of a great number of respectable pupils. Besides valuable contributions to the memoirs of the academy, he wrote a history of the lower empire, in 22 vols. 12mo. admired for its correctness, elegance, and accuracy. The honor of a seat in the academy of belles lettres was intended for him, but he no sooner understood that Bougainville, the translator of Anti-Lucretius, opposed his pretensions, than he nobly transferred his interest to the support of his rival, exclaiming "every sacrifice should be made to oblige a man of merit." He was gladly received on the next vacancy. He died March 13th, 1773, aged 77. His opera latina were edited in 1783, at Paris, in 3 vols. 12mo.

BEAUCAIRE DE PEQUILLON, Francois, was born in the Bourbonnois, and raised to the see of Metz, by the interest of his pupil cardinal Charles de Lorraine. He wrote, besides his treatise des enfans, morts dans le sein de leur mere—rerum Gallic. commentarie, from 1461 to 1562, and died 1591. In his history of France, which, as he desired, appeared only after his death, he is too partial to the Guises, but otherwise he is correct and elegant, a polite scholar, and the friend of virtue and merit.

BEAUCHAMP, Joseph, was born, in 1752, at Vesoul, in France, and blended his theological studies with the astronomical lessons of Lalande. Being employed in the Levant, first as vicar general, by his uncle, a bishop; next, as consul, by the government; he made numerous astronomical observations, constructed a map of the Tigris and Euphrates, and surveyed the Black Sea. Bonaparte invited him to Egypt; but he was taken on his passage, and imprisoned for three years as a spy. He was released in 1801, but his health was ruined, and he died in the same year.

BEAUCHATEAU, Francis Matthias Chatelet de, a precocious genius, born at Paris, in 1645, was the son of an actor. At seven years of age he spoke several languages, and wrote verses almost extempore upon a given subject; and at twelve he published a volume of poems, under the title of the Young Apollo's Lyre, for which pensions were given to him by cardinal Richelieu and chancellor Seguier. After having visited England, he went to Persia, in 1661, and his subsequent fate is unknown.

BEAUFORT, Margaret, Countess of Richmond and Derby, daughter of the duke of Somerset, was born, in 1441, at Bletsoe, in Bedfordshire, and died in 1509. She was thrice married—to the earl of Richmond, to Sir Henry Stafford, and to Lord Stabley. Her son by her first husband was afterwards Henry VII. Christ's and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, and the divinity professorship, were founded by her. She wrote the Mirroire of Golde for a sinful Soul; and translated the first book of Thomas à Kempis.

BEAUFORT, Henry, brother of Henry IV. of England, was successively bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards of Winchester, chancellor of England, ambassador to France, a cardinal in 1426, and legate in Germany. He crowned, in 1431, Henry VI. in the metropolitan church of Paris. In his character, he was proud, haughty, and ambitious; and he is well delineated by our immortal poet. He died at Winchester, 1447.

BEAUFORT, Francois Vendome duc de, son of Cæsar duke of Vendome, was born at Paris, 1616. He was imprisoned for conspiring against Mazarin, and attempted in vain to excite a rebellion. He distinguished himself in the French civil wars, and became a great favorite among the populace, whose manners and language he strangely affected. He acquired additional honors against the Turks in Africa, and afterwards at the siege of Candia, where he was slain in 1669. It has been said, with little probability, that he was the man in the iron mask so long and so mysteriously confined in the bastille at Paris.

BEAUHARNOIS, Eugene, son of the Empress Josephine, by her first husband, was born in 1780. When his mother married Bonaparte, Eugene entered the army, and was his father-in-law's aid-de-camp in Italy and Egypt. In 1804, he was created a French prince, and vice-chancellor of state. In 1805 he was appointed viceroy of Italy, which office he held till 1814. He governed with mildness and equity. In the campaigns of 1809, 1812, 1813, and 1814, he acquired distinguished reputation; particularly at Raab, Wagram, Borodino, and Viazna, and in defending Italy against a far superior force. On the downfall of his patron, he retired into the states of the Bavarian monarch, whose daughter he had married, and who now made him duke of Leuchtenberg. He died February 21, 1824.

BEAULIEU, N. Baron de, an Austrian general, who distinguished himself in quelling the insurrection of the Brabanters in 1789, and afterwards against Biron, the French general. In 1796 he was sent to command the Austrian armies in Italy, but sunk before the superior good fortune of Bonaparte, and after losing the battles of Montenotte, Millesimo, and Mondovi, he resigned his power into the hands of Wurmser, and died soon after. He was brave and active, but more fit to command a detachment than a large army.

BEAUMARCHAIS, Peter Augustin Caron de, son of a clock maker, was born at Paris, 24th January, 1732. He was brought up to his father's profession, and invented a new escapement in the machinery of a watch, which was disputed with him by another artist, but honorably adjudged to him by the academy of sciences. He was also eminent as a musician, and excelled on the harp and guitar, so that he was noticed by the sisters of Louis XV. and liberally patronised for the part which he supported in their private concerts. The abilities which he displayed in three lawsuits in which he was engaged, recommended him to government, and procured him some honorable employment. Upon the breaking out of the revolution, he fled to Holland, and then to England; but afterwards returned to France, and was imprisoned. Liberated with difficulty from the abbaye, he died suddenly, in 1799, aged 69. He wrote memoires contre les sieurs de Goesman, la Blache, Marin, d'Arnaud, 1774—memoir in answer to W. Kornman, 1787—Eugenie, a drama, in five acts, 1767—the two friends, a play, 1770—the barber of Seville, a comedy, 1775—the marriage of Figaro, 1784—Tarare, an opera, 1787—la mere coupable, 1792. These plays, and his great and indefatigable activity, contributed much to render him independent and rich.

BEAUMELLE, Laurent Angliviel de la, a native of Valleraugues, in the diocese of Allais, whose literary fame procured him an honorable reception in Denmark, and afterwards at Berlin, where he became acquainted with Voltaire, whose abilities he admired, but whose irritable temper, opposed to his own, produced dissension, distrust, and enmity. On his return to Paris, 1753, le Beaumelle was confined in the bastille for some severe remarks in his book called "mes pensées;" but he was restored to liberty, and retired to Toulouse, where he married the daughter of M. Lavaisse, by whom he left a son and a daughter. His merits were not, however, permitted long to languish in the country. He was called to Paris to be librarian to the king; but a dropsy in the chest rapidly terminated his useful career, November 1773, in his 46th year. His most valuable works are, the memoirs of mad. Maintenon, 6 vols. 12mo.—letters to Voltaire—thoughts of Seneca—a commentary on the Henriade—a defence of the spirit of laws. He possessed the powers of wit and satire in a respectable degree; but it is to be lamented that his personalities were so illiberal against Voltaire, whom, in spite of his quarrel, he still respected and esteemed.

BEAUMONT, Francis, studied at Canbridge and at the Inner Temple. His dramatic pieces, which he composed in conjunction with Fletcher, acquired him great celebrity, and though he did not reach his 30th year before he paid the debt of nature, March 1615, the correctness of his judgment, his taste, and his genius, have immortalized his name as a poet. He was intimate with Ben Jonson, who submitted his pieces to his criticising eye. He was buried in St. Peter's, Westminster, but there is no inscription on his tomb. He left a daughter, who was alive in 1700. His works are published with those of Fletcher.

BEAUMONT DE PEREFIX, Hardouin, archbishop of Paris, wrote a valuable history of Henry IV. for the use of Louis XIV. to whom he was preceptor. He displayed with fidelity, elegance, and fire, the great virtues and amiable character of his hero. He died 1670.

BEAUMONT, Elias de, a native of Carentan, in Normandy. He was brought up to the bar; but though he possessed powers of mind equal to the profession, he unfortunately was not blessed with the gift of pleasing elocution, and therefore he retired from the public eye to his closet. The memoire which he wrote on the Calas had a most powerful effect over the French nation. He wrote besides various other memoirs which possessed merit. He died at Paris, 10th January 1785, much esteemed. His wife, whose name was Dumessnil-Molin, wrote an interesting novel, called lettres du marquis de Roselle, 12mo. and died 1783.

BEAUMONT, John Lewis Moreau de, an able political writer, who died 2d May 1785, at Mesnil, near Nantes, aged 70. His works, on the impositions des états de l'Europe & de la France, in 4 vols. 4to. reprinted 1787, were much and deservedly admired on the continent.

BEAUMONT, Baronet, Sir George, distinguished as an amateur of the fine arts, was born in 1753. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his father in 1762, and he received his education at Eton and Oxford. In 1782 he set out on his travels, and visited France, Switzerland, and Italy. He distinguished himself not only as a patron of the fine arts, but was himself an artist of no mean skill. Some landscapes which he painted were exhibited at Somerset house. He died, February 7, 1827.

BEAUNE, Jacques de, baron de Samblancai, a minister of the priories under Francis I. He was obliged by threats to give to the queen-mother the 300,000 crowns which had been promised to Lautrec for the defence of the Milanese, and when the expedition failed he was violently accused of speculation. In his justification, he informed the king of the application of the money; but the queen-mother perfidiously obtained the receipts from his secretary, Gentil, and the unfortunate minister having now nothing to produce in his defence, was condemned, and executed, 1527. Gentil afterwards suffered for some other crime.

BEAURAIN, Jean de, a native of Aix en Issart in Artois, known as a negotiator, but more particularly as a geographer. After studying under the famous Sanson, he was made, at the age of 25, geographer to Louis XV. for whom he composed a curious perpetual almanac. His topographical description of the campaigns of Luxemburg from 1690 to 1694, in three vols. folio, were highly valued. He died at Paris, February 11, 1771, aged 75.

BEAUSOBRE, Isaac de, an able protestant of Niort, who fled to Berlin from France for tearing the king's signet from the door of a reformed church which he was forbidden to enter. The king of Prussia esteemed him as his chaplain and counsellor; and he deserved his confidence by his erudition, the openness of his character, and the spirit and morality of his discourses. His writings were theological; the most esteemed was his history of the Manichæans, 2 vols. a work praised by Gibbon. He died 1738, aged 79. He wrote besides a defence of the reformation—a translation of the New Testament, with notes, together with l'Enfant—dissertation on the Adamites of Bohemia.

BEAUVILLIERS, Francis de, duke of St. Aignan, was author of some prose and poetical pieces. He died 1687, aged 80. His eldest son, Paul, was preceptor to the duke of Berry, father of Louis XIV. He died 1714, in his 66th year. His brother, who was bishop of Beauvais, wrote some pieces of devotion, and died 19th August, 1751. Another brother, Paul Hippolitus, was eminent in the military service of his country, as well as in negotiations. He wrote "amusemens literaires;" and died 1776, aged 92.

BEAUZEE, Nicolas, author of an universal grammar, or exposition of the elements of languages, 2 vols. 8vo.—of an exposition of the historical proofs of religion, and other works, besides the articles in grammar in the encyclopædia, was member of the academy, and professor of grammar in the military school. He was born at Verdun, and died at Paris, 25th January, 1789, aged 72.

BECCADELLI, Lewis, a native of Bologna, who followed the fortunes of cardinal Polc, of whose life he wrote an account, in Latin. He was employed as ambassador at Venice and Augsburg, and had the care of Ferdinand son of Cosmo I. duke of Tuscany. He resigned the archbishopric of Ragusa; but was disappointed in his expectations to succeed to Pisa. He died 1572, aged 80. He wrote a life of Petrarch, in Italian, and corresponded with Sadolet, Bembo, and other learned men.

BECCADELLI, Antonio, a native of Palermo, professor of belles lettres at Pavia. He was crowned with the poetic laurel by the emperor Sigismund, 1482, and was in the train of Alphonso king of Naples, who ennobled him, and gave him some honorable appointments. He died at Naples, 1471, aged 97. His epistles, &c. were printed at Venice, 1453. He wrote also a book on the sayings and actions of Alphonso king of Aragon; and showed himself so partial to Livy, that he sold an estate to purchase a copy of the historian. He wrote also Hernaphroditus, an obscene and licentious work.

BECCARIA, John Baptist, a learned monk of Mondovi, known as a teacher of philosophy and mathematics at Palermo, Rome, and Turin. The honors which he received in this last place, as preceptor to the royal family, were unable to divert his attention from philosophical pursuits. He wrote dissertations on electricity, and an essay on the cause of storms, and various other works. He died at Turin, May 22, 1781.

BECCARIA, James Bartholomew, a native of Bononia, who applied himself to the study of medicine, and became professor of natural philosophy in the university of Bononia. A liberal communication with the learned men who frequented his company produced a new mode of instruction; the old forms were abandoned, and lectures in natural philosophy, anatomy, chemistry, physic, were delivered to crowded audiences by twelve respectable professors; and as a medical reader Beccaria acquired opulence and fame. A dangerous fever, however, nearly proved fatal to him, and left such unpleasant traces behind as shook his constitution. His publications on philosophical and medical subjects were numerous and valuable, so that his opinion was courted by the learned of Europe, and his name enrolled among their most respectable societies. Beccaria studied the diseases of the temper as well as those of the body; and by perseverance and attention he converted a sour and ungovernable disposition to mildness and placid composure. He died the 30th January 1766, aged 84.

BECCARIA, Cæsar Bonesana marquis, an Italian philosopher, the pupil of Genovesi of Naples. He published a treatise on crimes and punishments, which proved a popular work, and was translated into various languages—disquisitions on the nature of style. He died at Milan 1795, aged 75.

BECKER, John Joachim, successively physician to the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, was born at Spire, and died at London 1685, aged 40. He possessed great genius, and his discoveries in chemistry and mechanics were many and important; but these high merits were obscured by impetuous passions, and an unyielding temper, which raised him enemies, and at last obliged him, after residing at Vienna and at Haarlem, to fly from Germany for an asylum in Britain. His publications were seven in number, on philosophical subjects, the chief of which are physica subterranea—and institutiones chymicæ.

BECKET, Thomas, was born at London, 1119, and educated at Merton abbey in Surrey, and afterwards at Oxford and Paris. By the favor of his patron, Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, he passed to Bonouia in Italy, where he studied civil law, and soon after embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and so highly was he recommended to king Henry II. that he was made chancellor 1158. On the death of Theobald, the monarch rewarded his favorite with the vacant see, but, by resigning the seals of chancellor, Becket offended his benefactor; and his subsequent haughtiness and obstinacy, and the high tone in which he asserted the privileges of the church, further widened the breach, and disturbed the peace of the kingdom. As the guardian of his people, Henry wished for a community of laws, but Becket refused to repress the disorders of his clergy by suffering them to be tried in the same manner as the laity, and though for a time he assented to the famous constitutions of Clarendon, he retracted his acquiescence, and resigned his archiepiscopal office at the feet of the pope, who not only forgave the error of his judgment, by reinstating him, but espoused his cause and annulled the decrees. Supported by the papal power the primate excommunicated those who favored the royal cause, and Henry, swollen with indignation, banished his relations and adherents, and sent them in disgrace and indigence to their exiled master. Becket continued to indulge his resentment. Not only the representations and intreaties of the clergy, but the interference of the pope by two cardinals, proved for a while abortive with the haughty prelate, who, when at last he condescended to see his sovereign 1167, broke off the conference, because Henry refused to give him the kiss of peace. In 1169, however, another meeting with difficulty took place on the confines of Normandy, and a reconciliation was effected, and the king, in proof of his sincerity, held the bridle of Becket's horse while he mounted and dismounted twice. The return of the primate to his country was not attended with the conduct which the friends of public peace expected, he refused to restore the excommunicated bishops; and so irritated was Henry on hearing this, that he exclaimed, "he was an unhappy prince, since none of his followers had either spirit or gratitude to revenge his wrongs on so insolent a priest." The words animated four of his courtiers, who sailed for England and dashed out the prelate's brains before the altar of his cathedral on the 29th Dec. 1171. The murderers fled, and to expiate their crimes, they undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where they died. The news of Becket's death alarmed Henry, who not only exculpated himself before the pope, but performed penance at the shrine of the murdered priest, and not only passed the night on the cold pavement in penitence and prayer, but suffered himself to be scourged by the monks. To the violence of his death, and not to his virtues, Becket was indebted for the honors paid to his memory. The spot was visited by thousands with religious awe, and the shrine of the saint, like that of a god of Delphi in ancient times, was adorned with whatever was most costly, rich, and valuable in the kingdom.

BECLARD, Peter Augustus, one of the most eminent of modern anatomists, was born at Angers, in 1785. At a very early period he obtained the first anatomical, physiological, philosophical, and chemical prizes; and from 1818 to 1825, in which latter year he died, he was celebrated as a lecturer on physiology and anatomy. He is the author of Anatomical Memoirs; and he published an edition of Bichat's Treatise of General Anatomy, with additions.

BECKMANN, John Anthony, a native of Hoya, in Hanover, was born in 1739, travelled in Russia and Sweden, and, in 1766, was chosen professor at Gottingen, where, for nearly half a century, he lectured, with great applause, on subjects connected with rural and political economy and technology. He died in 1811. His works are numerous. Among the principal are a History of Discoveries and Inventions; History of the earliest Voyages made in Modern Times; and Elements of Rural Economy.

BECTOZ, Claude de, abess of St. Honoré de Tarascon, was eminent for her knowledge of Latin. Her letters were so polished and elegant, that Francis I. not only showed them to his courtiers as perfect models, but paid the abess a friendly visit. She published several pieces in Latin and French, both prose and verse, and died 1547.

BEDA, Noel, a violent ecclesiastic, born in Picardy, and raised to the headship of the college of Montaign. His attack on Erasmus was so severe that the offended scholar convicted him of asserting 181 lies, 210 calumnies, and 47 blasphemies. It was by his influence that the Sorbonne did not pronounce in favor of the divorce of Henry VIII. and so irritative were his writings and his conduct, that he was three times sent into banishment, and at last died in his exile, in the abbey of Mount St. Michael, Feb. 8th, 1537. His works were neither elegant nor correct.

BEDA or BEDE, surnamed the Venerable, was born at Wearmouth or Jarrow, in the county of Durham, and from his earliest years educated in the monastery of St. Peter. The monastic life gave him the opportunities which he so ardently desired, his time was devoted to the severest studies, and his name and learning became so respectable that Pope Sergius in vain solicited his presence at Rome. He was courted by the most learned of his countrymen, and particularly by Egbert, bishop of York, to whom he wrote, in the last years of his life, an epistle, valuable for the curious statement which it gives of the ecclesiastical affairs of the times. Confinement and application at last overpowered his constitution; but though laboring under the complicated weight of a consumption and an asthma, he continued occasionally to impart instruction to the monks of the monastery, till he expired, 26th May 735, aged 63. Of his writings, which were all composed in Latin, the most celebrated were his ecclesiastical history from the time of Julius Cæsar to his own age, collected from the annals of convents and ancient chronicles and his commentaries on scripture. His works were so universally admired that not only his countrymen, but foreigners, were loud in his praises. Some however have severely attacked his literary character. He certainly possessed all the puerile credulity of the times; he indulged in the relation of legendary miracles. He wrote, says du Pin (tom 6, p. 88.) with surprising facility, but without elegance, art, purity, or reflection; and though his style is clear, he appears to be a greater master of learning than of judgment, or true critical taste. He was, however, according to Camden, Bale, Pits, and others, a man of superior powers of mind, and he shone like a meteor in the darkness of a barbarous age. So valuable were his writings considered that a council ordered them to be publicly read in churches.

BEDELL, William, an illustrious prelate, born 1570, at Black Notley in Essex. He studied at Emanuel college, Cambridge, which he left to reside upon the living of St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, and five years after, 1604, he went to Venice as chaplain to the ambassador sir Henry Wotton. During a residence of eight years in this ancient republic, he diligently applied himself to the study of Hebrew, and formed a friendly and intimate acquaintance with Paul Sarpi, the rabbi Leo, and Antonio de Dominis, men equally celebrated for their learning and piety. On his return home he was presented to the living of Horingsheath, and twelve years after he was unanimously elected to the provostship of Trinity college, Dublin, which by the king's command, though reluctantly, he accepted, and two years after the favor of his patrons, sir Thomas Jernyn and bishop Laud, raised him to the see of Kilmore and Ardagh. A strong advocate for the church, he always abhorred persecution, and supported the justice and the rights of his cause by the arms of meek persuasion, not of virulent compulsion. The liturgy as well as the bible was translated into Irish, and every method pursued which might inform and enlighten the minds of a rough and uncivilized peasantry. So much exemplary meekness did not go unappreciated; when the country was torn by rebellion in 1641, the bishop's palace was the only habitation in the county of Cavan that remained unviolated. Malice however prevailed, the rebels, who had declared that the prelate should be the last Englishman driven from the country, demanded the expulsion of the unfortunate men who had fled to his roof for refuge, and when he continued firm to his refusal, he and his family were seized and sent prisoners to the castle of Cloughboughter. The horrors of confinement, and more particularly the misfortunes of his country, however, broke his heart; he expired on the 7th of February 1641.

BEDFORD, Hilkiah, a quaker of Sibsey, Lincolnshire, who settled as stationer in London. His son of the same name was educated at St. John's, Cambridge, of which he became fellow; but though patronised by the earl of Winchelsea, the politics of the revolution deprived him of his benefice in Lincolnshire. He was fined 1000 marks in 1714, for publishing "The hereditary right of the crown of England asserted," though the real author was Harbin, a nonjuring priest, whom his friendship thus protected. He wrote an answer to Fontenelle's oracles and Dr. Barwick's life, translated from the Latin, and died Nov. 26th, 1724, aged 61.

BEDFORD, Arthur, a learned clergyman of the church of England, who was a native of Gloucestershire, and was educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. in 1691. After holding for several years some church preferment in Somersetshire, he was in 1724 chosen chaplain to Aske's hospital at Hoxton, where he died September 15, 1745. As an author he distinguished himself by a treatise on the "Evil and Danger of Stage Plays," in which he produced "seven thousand instances of blasphemous and impious expressions; taken out of the Plays of the eighteenth century, and especially of the last five years of it, in defiance of all methods hitherto used for their reformation;" to which he has added "above fourteen hundred texts of Scripture, which are mentioned either as ridiculed and exposed by the stage, or as opposite to their present practices." He published other works on the same subject, as well as several single sermons and tracts. He was also the author of a treatise entitled, "Scripture Chronology demonstrated by Astronomical Calculations."

BEDFORD, John duke of, third son of Henry IV. distinguished himself as the general of the English armies in France, during the minority of Henry VI. whom he proclaimed king at Paris. He defeated the French fleet in several encounters, especially near Southampton, and in the battle where he routed the duke of Alençon. He died at Rouen 1435. When some courtiers advised Charles VIII. of France to demolish the monument of this noble foreigner, the monarch answered, "Suffer to sleep in peace the ashes of a man who when alive made all France tremble."

BEDFORD, Gunning, governor of Delaware, was a patriot of the revolution. He was chosen governor in 1796. He was afterwards appointed the district judge of the Court of the United States. He died in 1812.

BEGER, Laurence, son of a tanner of Heidelberg, was librarian to the elector of Brandenburg. He published several valuable books on antiquities and medals, particularly thesaurus ex thesauro, palatinus selectus, seu gemmæ, folio,—spicilegium antiquitatis, fol. and thesaurus five gemmæ numismate, 3 vols. folio. He died at Berlin 1705, aged 52. He wrote, besides a book in favor of polygamy at the instance of Charles the elector palatine, who wished to espouse his mistress, but he recanted its tenets after the prince's death.

BEHAIM, Martin, a native of Nuremberg, whose penetrative genius, enriched by the studies of navigation and cosmography, formed the first idea of a new world. This bold adventurer sailed in 1460 in quest of discoveries, and actually visited the Brazils, the isle of Fayal, and the straits of Magellan, and on his return he constructed a globe of 20 inches diameter, with a representation of his voyage, still to be seen at Nuremberg. This curious circumstance, if supported by truth, detracts from the long established merit of Columbus, as the first discoverer of America. He died at Lisbon, 1506.

BEHN, Aphra, known by the poetical name of Astrea, a dramatist and miscellaneous writer, was born in the reign of Charles I., and went, when young, with her family to Surinam, where she became acquainted with the African prince Oroonoko, on whose story she founded a novel, which Southern dramatized. On her coming back to England, she married Mr. Behn. Charles II. employed her to gain intelligence on the continent, for which purpose she resided at Antwerp; and is said to have furnished, as to the intended Dutch attack on Chatham, information which was unfortunately disregarded. After her return to her native country, the rest of her life was spent in literary labor, and in the company of wits and men of talent. She died in 1689. Her works consist of novels, poems, and seventeen plays. Pope, in language which might safely have been stronger, alludes to the gross licentiousness which disgraces her dramas.

BEK, David, a native of Delft, in the Netherlands, pupil to Vandyk. His abilities as a painter highly recommended him to Charles I. of England, and to the kings of France and Denmark, and to queen Christina of Sweden. It is said that in travelling through Germany, he fell sick at an inn, and was considered as dead. His servants, however, drinking by his bed-side, poured, in a frolic, a glass of wine into his mouth, observing that he was a friend to the bottle when alive, and the sudden application operating upon him, he opened his eyes, and gradually revived. He died at the Hague, 1656, aged 35. He had been in most of the capitals of Europe, to paint the most illustrious persons of each court for Christina of Sweden.

BEKKER, Balthasar, a Dutch divine of Warthuisen, in Groningen. After studying at the universities of Groningen and Franeker, he settled as minister of Oosterlingen, where he published a catechism for children, which drew upon him the censures of several ecclesiastical assemblies. The synod of Franeker, however, approved of his doctrines, and recommended the book as full of wholesome and useful instructions. He passed afterwards to Loenen near Utrecht, to Wesop and to Amsterdam, where he acquired celebrity, by writing a treatise on comets, and an exposition of the book of Daniel. The most known, however, of his publications, was "the world bewitched," an inquiry into the vulgar notions of spirits, and devils. So high was the clamor raised against him by this composition, that he was suspended from his ministerial office, though the magistrates of Amsterdam, with unparalleled generosity, continued to pay him his salary. A medal was struck to ridicule the process of the synods against him. Bekker died of a pleurisy, June 11th, 1698.

BEL, John James, a native of Bourdeaux, author of the "dictionnaire neologique," since improved by des Fontaines—of critical letters on Voltaire's Mariamne—and of an apology for Houdar de la Motte. He was severe against the use of novel expressions and affected terms, and united, with great penetration, the powers of irony and satire. He died at Paris, of excessive labor, 1738, aged 45.

BEL, Mathias, an ecclesiastic, born at Orsowa, in Hungary. He studied physic at Halle, which he relinquished for divinity. He was rector of the school of Presburg, and minister, and was ennobled by Charles VI. for his literary works. He wrote apparatus ad historiam Hungariæ, and notitia Hungariæ nova; two works of merit, which procured him honorable marks of esteem and admiration from the pope, the empress of Russia, and the king of Prussia. He died 1749, aged 66.

BELCHER, Jonathan, governor of Massachusetts and New Jersey. He graduated at Harvard college in 1699. Not long after the termination of his college life, he visited Europe, and after the lapse of several years, returned, and commenced business as a merchant in Boston. He was chosen a member of the council, and in 1729 was sent as an agent of the province to England. After the death of governor Burnet, he was appointed to the government of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, in 1730. In this station he continued eleven years. He was superseded. On repairing to England, he so far succeeded in vindicating his character and conduct, as to obtain the appointment of governor of the province of New Jersey, where he arrived in 1747, and where he spent the remaining years of his life. He enlarged the charter of Princeton college, and was its chief patron and benefactor. He died in 1757, aged 76.

BELCHER, Jonathan, chief justice of Nova Scotia, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1728. He studied law at the temple in London. He was among the first settlers of Chebucto, afterwards called Halifax, and being, in 1760, senior counsellor on the death of governor Lawrence, he was appointed lieutenant governor, in which office he was succeeded by col. Wilmot, in 1763. In 1761, he received his appointment of chief justice. He died in 1776, aged 68.

BELCHIER, John, was born at Kingston, Surrey, and after an Eton education was put apprentice to Cheselden, the most celebrated surgeon of his age. Perseverance and assiduity soon rendered him eminent in his profession, and in 1736, in his 30th year, he succeeded Craddock as surgeon in Guy's hospital. In this employment he became respected and beloved for his attention, and, unlike the mercenary practitioners of the times, he considered not the emoluments of his office, but the character of his station, and treated with unwearied patience and humanity those whom diseases or misfortunes had placed under his care. In his private life he was equally amiable, his whole time was devoted either to his friends or to the improvement of his profession, and many are the ingenious communications with which he favored the philosophical transactions and other publications. He respected the name of Guy almost to adoration, observing, that no other man would have sacrificed 150,000*l.* for the relief of his fellow creatures. After enjoying an uninterrupted health, he died almost suddenly in 1785, in his 79th year.

BELDEN, Joshua, physician. After graduating at Yale college, in 1787, he studied physic with Dr. L. Hopkins. Besides his useful toils as a physician, he was employed in various offices of public trust. He was a zealous supporter of all charitable and religious institutions. At the age of 50, he fell a victim suddenly to the spotted fever, June 6, 1818.

BELIDOR, Bernard Forest de, a native of Catalonia, born in 1697, displayed such an early proficiency in the mathematical sciences, that, when quite young, he was appointed royal professor at the artillery school of La Fere. Other situations of the same kind were afterwards conferred on him, and he was inspector of artillery when he died, in 1761, at Paris. Of his works, the most celebrated are his Treatise on Fortifications; Science of Engineers; Hydraulic Architecture; and French Bombardier.

BELING, Richard, a native of Belingstown, in the county of Dublin. After being educated in Dublin, and in the catholic tenets of his family, he studied law at Lincoln's Inn, but without the intention of practising, as he became a leading officer in the rebellion of 1641. He was afterwards a member of the catholic council of Kilkenny, and so high were his services valued, that he went over as ambassador to the pope, and brought back the nuncio Rinuccini with him. The intrigues of this foreign prelate, however, were unfriendly to the views of the catholics, and this was no sooner discovered than Beling became reconciled to the duke of Ormond and the royal authority, and on the success of the parliamentary forces, he retired to France, where he devoted his time to give a Latin history of the rebellion, which distracted his unfortunate country. This book, called Vindiciarum Catholicæ Hiberniæ, is considered as highly important and authentic. Beling returned to Dublin after the restoration, where he recovered his estates, and where he died September, 1677, aged 64.

BELISARIUS, a celebrated general in the service of the emperor Justinian. After serving his country against the Persians, the Vandals in Africa, the Goths and the Huns in Italy, and every where displaying marks of wisdom, fortitude, bravery, and heroism, he was accused of rebellion, and dishonorably condemned by the weak emperor, who confiscated his estates. The story of his being blind, and begging for his bread, is of modern invention. He died 565.

BELKNAP, Jeremy, D. D. minister in Boston, and eminent as an American author. He graduated at Harvard college in 1762. He was ordained pastor of the church in Dover, New Hampshire, in 1767. Here he passed nearly twenty years of his life; and during this period, compiled his history of New Hampshire, which gained him a high reputation. His connexion with the church in Dover was dissolved in 1786. The presbyterian church in Boston becoming vacant, and having changed its establishment, from the presbyterian to the congregational form, soon invited him to become its pastor. He was installed April, 1787. Here he passed the remainder of his days, discharging the duties of his pastoral office, exploring various fields of literature, and giving his efficient support to every useful and benevolent institution. He died in 1798, aged 54. His works, besides the numerous sermons he published, were the history of New Hampshire, the first volume in 1784, the second in 1791, and the third in 1792; collection of psalms and hymns, 1795; American biography, first volume in 1794, the second in 1798; the foresters, an American tale, being a sequel to the history of John Bull the clothier. He published several essays upon the African trade; upon civil and religious liberty; upon the state and settlement of this country; in periodical papers; in the Columbian Magazine; in the Boston Magazine; in the historical collections; and in newspapers.

BELL, Andrew, D. D. LL. D., the founder of the Bell or Madras system of Education, was born and educated at St. Andrew's in Scotland. In 1789, he went to India, and resided as a minister at Madras, where, having undertaken the superintendence of the Military Male Orphan Asylum, he formed and introduced the system of mutual instruction. In 1796, he returned to England and submitted his report to the authorities at home. The system was soon afterwards adopted in that country, and has since been widely diffused over the civilized world. "The establishment of 10,000 schools in Great Britain alone, without any legislative assistance, wherein 600,000 children are educated by voluntary aid and charity, speaks volumes in its favor." Dr. Bell amassed a large fortune in India, which, before his death, he distributed among the institutions of Scotland. To his native city of St. Andrew's, he left £10,000, besides a sum of £50,000 for the building and endowment of a new college at that place. He died, Jan. 27, 1832, in his 80th year. His remains were removed to London, and deposited in Westminster Abbey.

BELL, John, a distinguished citizen of New Hampshire, of great judgment, decision, and integrity, died at Londonderry, Nov. 30, 1823, aged 95 years. His father, John, was an early settler of that town. During the revolutionary war, he was a leading member of the senate. Two of his sons, Samuel and John, have been governors of New Hampshire, the former was twelve years a senator of the United States.

BELLAMY, Joseph, D. D., a distinguished congregational minister of Woodbury, Con. He was born at New Cheshire in that state, 1719, and graduated at Yale College, in 1735. His ordination took place in 1740. In 1750, he published a work, entitled, True Religion Delineated. Such was his reputation, that many young men, studying for the ministry, placed themselves under his instruction. Dr. Bellamy died, March 6, 1790, aged 71 years. He was reckoned one of the most learned divines of the country. His works were published in three vols., 1811.

BELLOMONT, Richard, earl of, governor of New York, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, was appointed to these offices, early in May, 1695, but did not arrive at New York, until May, 1698. He remained in the province of New York about a year. He arrived at Boston, May 26, 1699; he was received with the greatest respect, as it was a new thing to see a nobleman at the head of the government. Twenty companies of soldiers, and a vast concourse of people met, "his lordship and countess," on his arrival. "There were all manner of expressions of joy, and to end all, fireworks, and a good drink at night." He took every method to ingratiate himself with the people; his success may be justly appreciated, by the remark of one of his biographers, that by his wise conduct, he obtained a larger sum as a salary, and as a gratuity, than any of his predecessors or successors. Though he remained but fourteen months, the grants made to him were one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling. His time was much taken up in securing the pirates, and their effects, to accomplish which, was a principal reason of his appointment. During his administration, captain Kidd was seized, and sent to England for trial. In 1700, he returned to New York, and died there in 1701.

BELLARMIN, Robert, a celebrated Jesuit, born in Tuscany, 1542. After a residence of seven years at Louvain, he returned to Italy, and recommended himself by his lectures to the pope, Sixtus V. who employed him, and raised him, in 1599, to the dignity of cardinal. He was afterwards advanced to the see of Capua, which he resigned in 1605, that he might bestow greater attention to the affairs of the church, and be near the pope's person. His infirmities however increased upon him, he left the Vatican, 1621, and died 17th September, the same year, at the house of the Jesuits, and received at his burial all the honors which were due to a saint. Bellarmine deservedly acquired great reputation as a controversial writer; his powers of eloquence were extensive, and so formidable were the labors of his pen, in defence of the Romish church, that for 40 or 50 years there was scarce a man of abilities among the protestants, who did not take up the shield to oppose his opinions. He did not however adopt all the tenets of the Jesuits; he could not embrace fully the doctrine of predestination, nor many of the expressions of the Romish litany, and he rather inclined to the opinions of St. Augustine. His most famous book is his body of controversy, in four vols. folio, besides a commentary on the psalms, a treatise on ecclesiastical writers. His life has been published by James Fulgati, and he is represented as a man of uncommon temperance, patience, and chastity, small in stature; but though indifferent in his person, he showed the strong feelings of his soul in every feature.

BELLAY, William du, a French general, distinguished also as a negotiator, so that Charles V. observed that his pen had fought more against him than all the lances of France. He strongly interested himself in favor of Henry VIII. to obtain his divorce from queen Catherine. His penetration was remarkable, so that by intrigue or bribery he made himself master of the most secret councils of the emperor. With the view of communicating some important intelligence to Francis I. he left Piedmont, of which he was viceroy, but his infirmities were so great that he died on the way at Saphorin, between Lyons and Roan, 9th January, 1543. He was buried at Mons. Of his compositions the most known is his Latin history of his own times, of which however the best part has been lost.

BELLAY, John du, bishop of Bayonne, and afterwards of Paris, was engaged as a negotiator between Henry VIII. of England and the pope, with respect to his divorce; but he labored in vain to prevent the bull of excommunication from being fulminated against the refractory prince. His abilities, however, were more immediately directed to the service of Francis I. and when that monarch opposed the invasion of Provence by Charles V.

Bellay, now became a cardinal, assumed the defence of Paris, and fortified it with a strong rampart still to be seen. The death of Francis was attended with the disgrace of Bellay; cardinal de Lorraine became the favorite, and the discarded minister retired to Rome, where his great riches enabled him to build an elegant palace. He died there 16th Feb. 1560, aged 68, leaving the character of an able negotiator, a brilliant wit, and an insinuating courtier. To his fondness for literature the French owe the institution of the college royal.

BELLAY, Joachim du, was born at Lire, 24 miles from Angers, but the talents which nature had bestowed upon him were neglected by the inattention of his elder brother, to whose care he was intrusted. He, however, at last burst forth through all obstacles, and though his health was impaired by the weight of domestic misfortunes, he studied the productions of ancient and modern times, and excelled so much in poetry, that he was called the Ovid of France. He followed his relation the cardinal to Italy, but returned after three years' absence to Paris, where his cousin, Eustache du Bellay, the bishop, procured him a canonry, and a peaceful retirement from the malice of his enemies, who envied his fame and his merits. He died of an apoplexy 1st January, 1560, aged 57, and deserved the tears and the regret of the learned, who stated him with truth pater elegantiarum, pater omnium leporum.

BELLEAU, Remi, one of the seven poets called the pleiades of France, was born at Nogent le Rotron, and lived in the family of Renatus of Lorraine. He excelled as a pastoral writer, and in his translations of Anacreon he preserved all the beauties and ease of the original. His poem on the nature and difference of precious stones is much admired. He died at Paris 1577, aged 49.

BELLEFORET, Francis de, a native of Sarzan in Guienne, whose early years were supported by the labors of a poor widowed mother, and the greater partiality of the queen of Navarre. He studied at Bourdeaux and Toulouse, and passed to Paris, where he was honored with the friendship of the learned and the great. His history of the ninth Charles of France—his universal history of the world—his annals or general history of France, are the most known of his works. He died at Paris 1583, aged 53.

BELLENDEN, William, a Scotchman, master of the requests to James VI. and humanity professor at Paris. In the enjoyment of literary ease, he devoted his time to classical pursuits, and published some learned works, called Ciceronis princeps, 1608, and Ciceronis consul, 1612, dedicated to Henry prince of Wales, with treatises on political writers, &c. His admiration of the Roman orator, and of Seneca and Pliny, was further demonstrated in a more comprehensive work, "de tribus luminibus Romanorum," the completion of which, however, was stopped by death. This valuable treatise was edited in 1737, with all the care and homage which the labors of an elegant scholar could receive from the nervous pen of Dr. Parr.

BELLENGER, Francis, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, who translated Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and also Herodotus, of which the copy was left in MS., and among other things, he wrote criticisms on Rollin's works, to prove his ignorance of Greek. He was born in the diocese of Lisieux, and died at Paris 12th April, 1749, aged 61.

BELLEVRE, Pomponne de, was born at Lyons, and distinguished himself as a negotiator at the court of Charles IX. Henry III. and Henry IV. but after enjoying the smiles and favors of princes, as a counsellor, and as chancellor of France, he was disgraced for the introduction of Silleri. He died at Paris 9th September, 1607, in his 78th year. There have flourished of the same family some superior characters, the best known of whom was a president of the parliament of Paris, to whose humanity and charitable feelings the poor and helpless were indebted for the foundation of the general hospital of Paris. He was also ambassador in England and Holland.

BELLIN, Gentil, a Venetian, so eminent as a painter that Mahomet solicited him to come to Constantinople. He complied with the request, and adorned that capital with the most masterly efforts of his pencil. His best piece was the decollation of John the Baptist; the skin of the neck of which, however, the grand signior censured, as not agreeable to nature, and to convince the painter, summoned a slave before him, and ordered his head immediately to be struck off. This so intimidated Bellin, that instead of correcting the fault, he earnestly solicited his dismissal. He returned to Venice loaded with presents, and died 1501, aged 80.

BELLINGHAM, Richard, Governor of Massachusetts, was a native of England, where he was bred a lawyer. He came to this country in 1634, and the next year was chosen deputy governor. In 1641 he was elected governor in opposition to Mr. Winthrop. He was again elected in 1654, and after the death of governor Endicott in 1668. He continued chief magistrate of Massachusetts during the remainder of his life. In 1664 the king sent four commissioners to regulate the affairs of the colonies. Bellingham with others, obnoxious to the king, were required to go to England to answer for themselves; but the general court, by the advice of the ministers, refused compliance, and maintained the charter rights. But they appeased his majesty by sending him a ship load of masts. Bellingham died Dec. 7. 1672 aged 80.

BELLINI, Laurence, a physician of Florence, who, after studying at Pisa, under the able direction of Oliva et Borelli, was elected there professor of philosophy, though only 20 years of age. He enjoyed the patronage and friendship of the grand duke Ferdinand II. and as an anatomist and physician deservedly acquired great celebrity. His works were numerous and in Latin, and much admired. After being thirty years professor, he left Pisa for Florence, where he died January 8, 1703, aged 60.

BELLOE, William, a divine and critic, was born at Norwich, and educated at Cambridge. After having been assistant to Dr. Parr, who was then head master of Norwich School, he took orders, and obtained church preferment. He was, finally, rector of Allhallows, a prebendary of St. Paul's, and librarian of the British Museum. The latter situation, however, he lost, in consequence of a visitor to the Museum having purloined some valuable prints. In conjunction with Dr. Nares, he established the British Critic. He is the author of Anecdotes of Literature and Scarce Books; the Sexagenarian; and other works; and the translator of Herodotus and Aulus Gellius. He died in 1817, aged 60.

BELLOI, Peter, a native of Montauban, who espoused the cause, and wrote in favor of Henry III. against the Guises. He was advocate in the parliament of Toulouse, and was honored and promoted by Henry IV. His writings are now little known.

BELLOI, Peter Laurence Buyrette du, a native of St. Flour, in Auvergne, who, after being educated by his uncle, who intended him for the bar, abandoned his country, and a profession which he despised, and retired to Russia, where he assumed the character of comedian. He returned to Paris in 1758, and recommended himself to public notice by the tragedy of Titus, and afterwards that of Zelmira. His most popular piece was the siege of Calais, which drew upon him not only the favors of the king, but the applauses of the nation. The success of the siege of Calais was followed by Gaston and Bayard, inferior in merit, in sentiment, and composition. The last pieces which he composed were Peter the cruel, and Gabrielle de Vergi; but so little were they admired, that the poet's heart was broken through disappointment; he fell a prey to a lingering disease; and though Louis XVI. who knew his merit, with an exemplary benevolence of heart, sent him 50 louis d'or, and the comedians promised their united support for his benefit, he expired on the 5th of March, 1775, aged 48. The works of Belloi were published by Gaillard, in 6 vols. 8vo. with a life and valuable annotations. Though frequently happy in noble sentiments and fine strokes of nature, Belloi sacrificed simplicity and the true pathetic to unnatural harangues and bombastic ejaculations.

BELLORI, John Peter, celebrated as an antiquarian, was born at Rome, and died 1696 aged 80. He was chief librarian to queen Christina. His writings, which are in 12 different publications, are valuable and curious for the information which they contain on the antiquities and monuments of Rome and Italy. The most known are, explication des médaillons rares du cabinet du cardinal Campegue, 4to.—les vies des peintres, architectes, et sculpteurs modernes, 1672, 4to.—description des tableaux peints par Raphael au Vatican, 1695, fol.

BELLOV, Peter Laurence Burette de, a French dramatic writer and member of the Academy, was born at St. Flour, in 1727. Being destined by his uncle to the profession of the law, which he detested, he eloped, and for some years was an actor in the theatres of the north of Europe. This step made his uncle a determined enemy. After the death of that relative, he returned to France, and acquired reputation as a writer of tragedy. He produced the Siege of Calais, which was extremely popular; Titus; Zelimira; Gaston and Bayard; Gabrielle de Vergy; and Peter the Cruel. The failure of the latter play is said to have brought on an illness, of which he died in 1775.

BELSUNCE, Henry Francis Xavier de, descended from a noble family in Guienne, was of the society of the Jesuits, and became bishop of Marseilles in 1709. His name is immortalized by the humanity of his conduct, for, during the dreadful plague which ravaged the city of Marseilles in 1720, he was seen running from street to street to administer relief and consolation to the afflicted, as a physician, a magistrate, and as a spiritual guide. So exemplary a conduct drew upon him the love of the people and the favors of his sovereign; but the good bishop refused the more elevated rank of the diocese of Laon in Picardy, offered him by Louis XV. observing, that Marseilles was dear to him by habit, as well as by calamity. He was honored by the pope with the pallium, which is never granted but to an archbishop, but the highest reward was the applause of the good, and a tranquil conscience. He died in 1755, mourned as he deserved. He founded a college at Marseilles for benevolent purposes, that still bears his name. An interesting and elegant account of the plague and of the humanity of Belsunce was written by Bertrand.

BELZONI, John Baptist, one of the most eminent travellers in Egypt, was born at Padua, in Italy, came to England in 1803, and resided in this country for nine years. Being involved in pecuniary difficulties, he for a while obtained a subsistence by displaying feats of strength and activity at Astley's Amphitheatre; for which his colossal stature and muscular powers particularly qualified him. From 1815 to 1819 he was incessantly occupied in exploring and bringing to light the antiquities of Egypt. The talent which he displayed, and the success which he met with, in this pursuit, are extraordinary. Few men, indeed, could have accomplished as much as Belzoni. In 1820, he published a Narrative of his Operations, quarto, with forty-four illustrative plates; and, in the following year, he exhibited a model of a splendid tomb which he had discovered near Thebes. In 1823, he sailed to the coast of Guinea, with the intention of penetrating to Houssa and Timbuctoo; but, on the third of December, his career was, unfortunately, arrested by the hand of death. He died of the dysentery, at Benin.

BEMBO, Peter, a noble Venetian, whose father was governor of Ravenna. He studied at Florence, Ferrara, and in Sicily; and he not only acquired the ease and delicacy of the Tuscan language, but he imbibed a higher taste than his contemporaries for the literature of Greece. He was drawn from the retirement which he loved, to be the secretary of pope Leo X. in 1518; but ill health obliged him to remove from Rome to Padua, and afterwards to Venice. His services to the holy see were rewarded by Paul III. who raised him to the rank of cardinal, and made him bishop of Bergamo, where he died, 20th January, 1547, aged 77, from a contusion received on his side against a wall, while on horseback. An epitaph was written over his grave by his son Torquato, and a marble statue was erected to his honor at Padua by his friend Jerome Quirini. Bembo's life has been written by de la Casa. His writings consist of letters—a history of Venice in 12 books—speeches—the life of Gui Ubaldi de Montefeltro duke of Urbino, all in Latin. Of his poetical pieces, only one is in Italian.

BENBOW, John, an English seaman, who fought a most desperate engagement in the Mediterranean, against an African corsair, and for his great gallantry was invited to the Spanish court by Charles II. who not only loaded him with presents, but recommended him to James II. This high distinction introduced Benbow into the English navy, where after the revolution his skill and bravery were employed in the protection of commerce, and in the blockading and bombarding the French ports. The activity which he every where displayed, was deserving of the highest favors, he was raised to the rank of a vice admiral, and with a squadron under his command he was sent by king William to the West Indies, where his courage and good conduct were so conspicuous as to call forth the commendation of the commons, whilst they censured the object and views of his expedition. In a second voyage to the West Indies, he fell in with the French fleet under du Casse near St. Martha's on the Spanish coast, which he pursued and attacked with his usual bravery; but the merit of Benbow did not animate his men, his officers refused to do their duty, and the admiral who had lost a leg in the engagement, was thus dishonorably robbed of a most glorious victory. On his arrival in Jamaica, Benbow arrested his cowardly officers, but their punishment could not check the rapid powers of disease. The admiral was exhausted by the severity of his wound, and more by a broken heart occasioned by the cowardice of his fleet; he fell a prey to a consumptive disorder, and died 4th Nov. 1702, aged about 52.

BENDLOWES, Edward, a man of education and property, who after studying at St. John's college, Cambridge, travelled over the greatest part of Europe, and on his return home became the Meccenas of the age. Poets, musicians, buffoons, and flatterers shared his favors, and reduced him from an income of 700 or 1000*l.* a year to almost poverty; and after a long residence at Oxford he died there 18th Dec. 1686, aged 73. He wrote himself some poetical pieces, and was the friend of Davenant, Payne, Fisher, &c. He was inclined to popery, though age produced an alteration in his religious sentiments.

BENEDICT, St. a native of Italy, who retired at the age of 14, to Sublaeo, 40 miles from Rome, and devoted his life to the most penitential austerities, in a cave far from the conversation of mankind. So much severity did not pass unnoticed, he was surrounded by crowds of admirers, and Benedict became a saint, built twelve monasteries, and laid the foundation of the society of Benedictines, so famous in Europe. His regula monachorum is the only authentic book he wrote. He died about the year, 542 or 547, aged 67. His life has been written by Gregory the great, with a long account of pretended miracles.

BENEDICT, a famous abbot of the 7th century, of a noble Saxon family. He not only devoted himself to the services of religion, but introduced into England great improvements, in architecture, with the polite arts, from the continent. He founded two monasteries, and introduced chanting in choirs in 678, and was canonized for his sanctity after death.

BENEDICT, Joel, D. D. graduated at Princeton college in 1765. He was settled at Plainfield Con. in 1782, where he remained till his death, which occurred in 1816, at the age of 71 years. Dr. Benedict was a distinguished Hebrew Scholar.

BENEDICT VIII. bishop of Porto, succeeded Sergius IV. 1012. He was opposed by Gregory, but his cause was warmly espoused by the emperor Henry II. who came in person to Rome and was crowned, with his wife Cunegonde, by the hands of the sovereign pontiff. On that occasion the pope presented to the emperor, an apple of gold, enriched with two circles of jewels crossed, surmounted with a cross of gold. To the arts of the politician Benedict united the valor of the warrior, and defeated and utterly exterminated the Saracens who had invaded Italy, 1016. He also defeated the Greeks who had ravaged Apulia, and died 10th July, 1024.

BENEDICT XI. Nicolas Boecasin, son of a shepherd, was raised to the papal chair after Boniface VIII. 1303. He was poisoned by some seditious cardinals, who caused him to be presented with a bason full of beautiful figs, of which he eat immoderately, and died soon after, 6th July, 1303.

BENEDICT XII. James de Nouveau, surnamed the Baker, because his father was of that trade, was doctor of Paris, and earlinal, and was elected 1334, after John XXII. Considering himself incapable of the office, he told the cardinals who had unanimously elected him, you have chosen an ass. His conduct, however, was dignified and firm, more inclined to maintain the authority of his situation than enrich his family. He died at Avignon, universally respected, 25th April, 1342.

BENEDICT XIII., Pope, a son of the duke of Gravina, a Neapolitan nobleman, was born in 1649, and was raised to the papal chair in 1724. He was pious, virtuous, and liberal; but, unfortunately, placed too much confidence in Cardinal Coscia, his minister, who shamefully oppressed the people. A fruitless attempt which he made to reconcile the Romish, Greek, Lutheran, and Calvinist churches, bears honorable testimony to his tolerant spirit. His theological works form three folio volumes. He died in 1730.

BENEDICT XIV., Pope, whose name was Prosper Lambertini, was of an illustrious family at Bologna, in which city he was born, in 1675. After having been bishop of Ancona, and archbishop of Bologna, he was elected pope in 1740. He protected the arts and sciences, endeavored to heal the dissensions and reform the discipline of the church; and displayed such a liberal spirit, that he was sometimes called the Protestant Pope. In private life he was extremely amiable. He died in 1758. His works fill sixteen volumes in folio.

BENEFIELD, Sebastian, D. D. an English divine, born at Prestbury, Gloucestershire, educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, and appointed Margaret professor of divinity. He died, aged 59, 1630, at Meysey Hampton, Gloucestershire, of which place he was rector. He was fond of retirement, and exemplary for piety and integrity. His works are learned, and all on theological subjects. He was strongly attached to Calvin's opinions.

BENEZET, St., or Little Benedict, so called on account of his shortness, was a native of Vivarais, born in the twelfth century, and is said to have been originally a shepherd. Many accidents occurring at the passage of the Rhone, at Avignon, he meditated on them till he imagined himself inspired by Heaven to procure the erection of a bridge there; and he succeeded in accomplishing his project. The bridge was begun in 1177, and he superintended the execution of it till his death in 1184; for which good work he was sainted.

BENEZET, Anthony, a philanthropist of Philadelphia. He was a native of France. In early life he was engaged in mercantile pursuits, which, however, he soon abandoned, that he might devote himself to some other pursuit, which would afford him more leisure for the duties of religion, and for the exercise of that benevolent spirit, for which, during the course of a long life, he was so conspicuous. In 1742, he accepted the appointment of instructor in the friends' English school of Philadelphia. The duties of a teacher of youth, he from this period continued to fulfil with very little intermission, till his death. During the two last years of his life, his zeal to do good induced him to resign the school, which he had long superintended, and to engage in the instruction of the blacks. In addition to the general motive of all his conduct, he wished to contribute something towards rendering them fit for the enjoyment of that freedom, to which many of them had been restored. So great was his sympathy with every being capable of feeling pain, that he resolved, towards the close of his life, to eat no animal food. This change in his mode of living, is supposed to have been the occasion of his death. He died 1784, aged 71. Mr. Benezet employed his pen in writing books on religious subjects, composed chiefly with a view to inculcate the peaceable temper and doctrines of the gospel, in opposition to the spirit of war, and to expose the flagrant injustice of slavery, and to fix the stamp of infamy on the traffic in human blood. His writings contributed much towards meliorating the condition of slaves, and undoubtedly had influence on the public mind, in effecting the complete prohibition of that trade, which, until the year 1808, was a blot on the American national character. On this subject, he corresponded with various persons, both in Europe and America. In 1788, he addressed a letter to the queen of England on the subject of the slave trade, and solicited her influence on the side of humanity. He published an account of that part of Africa inhabited by negroes, 1762; a caution to Great Britain and her colonies, in a short representation of the calamitous state of the enslaved negroes in the British dominions, 1767; some historical account of Guinea, with an inquiry into the rise and progress of the slave trade, 1771; a short account of the religious society of Friends, 1780; a dissertation on the plainness and simplicity of the Christian religion, 1782; tracts against the use of ardent spirits; observations on the Indian natives of this continent, 1784.

BENGER, Elizabeth Ogilvy, was born at Welles, in 1778, and had to struggle with many difficulties in early life. So few books could she procure, that she used to read the open pages of the new publications in the window of the only bookseller's shop in the little town which she inhabited, in Wiltshire, and return, day after day, in the hope of finding another page turned over. She, nevertheless, acquired a respectable portion of learning. On her removal to London, she obtained reputable literary friends and patronage, and was generally esteemed for her virtues, manners, and talents. She died January the 9th, 1827. Besides a drama, two novels, and poems, she wrote Memoirs of Mrs. Hamilton, Tobin, and Klopstock; and Lives of Anne Boleyn, Mary Queen of Scots, the Queen of Bohemia, and Henry IV. of France.

BENI, Paul, a native of the island of Candia, while under the power of the Venetians. He was professor of Padua, and is known by his opposition to the della crasca academy at Florence, whose dictionary he censured, and whose opinions he refuted, in his defence of Tasso and Ariosto, the first of whom he compared to Virgil, and the latter to Homer. He wrote also some treatises on the pastor fido of Guarini, and besides these, which were in Italian, he composed several works in Latin, all collected in 5 vols. folio, 1622, Venice. He died 12th July, 1625.

BENJAMIN, a rabbi of Tudela in Navarre, who travelled over all the world to examine the synagogues and ceremonies of his nation. He published a curious account of his travels, which was printed at Constantinople in 8vo. 1543, and translated into French by L. Ph. Baratier, 2 vols. 8vo. 1704, and into English by Gerrans. He died 1173.

BENINI, Vincent, a native of Cologne, who practised physic at Padua. He had a press in his house, where he printed good editions of eight classic authors. He was author also of Latin notes on Celsus—observations in Italian, an Almanac's poem called Culture, and a translation of Fracastorius' Syphilis. He died 1764, aged 51.

BENNET, Henry, earl of Arlington, was born 1618. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and strongly espoused the royal cause during the civil wars. He retired afterwards to the continent, and was knighted at Bruges, by Charles II, who employed him as his minister at Madrid, and after the restoration as his secretary of state. His abilities were fully equal to the important office, and it reflects no small credit on his integrity that though he was one of the five ministers, Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, denominated from their initials, cabal, he did not enter into their views, nor support the scheme which they formed to render the monarch absolute. The war with Holland, which had been undertaken by the perfidious intrigues of the courtiers now drew forth the indignation of the people, and Bennet, now earl of Arlington, found that Lauderdale and Buckingham exonerated themselves by throwing the popular odium upon their late coadjutor. Their accusation however proved abortive, Arlington defended himself before the commons, and he was acquitted by a small majority. After serving the king 12 years as secretary, Arlington retired upon the indolent office of chamberlain; and though no longer in possession of the favors of the capricious Charles, he was yet employed as a negotiator with the prince of Orange; but he was unsuccessful in his endeavors to procure a general peace. He died July 28th 1685. In his general character Arlington is described by Burnet as a proud man, but his abilities were so strong, and at the same time so versatile, that he was the only person who could manage with success the king's temper.

BENNET, Dr. Thomas, born 7th May 1673, was educated at the grammar-school of Salisbury, his native city, and passed to St. John's college, Cambridge. In 1700 he accidentally preached a funeral sermon on his friend Mr. John Rayne, rector of St. James, Colchester, and so highly was his discourse applauded, that the parishioners petitioned Compton bishop of London to appoint him to the vacant benefice, a request which was liberally granted. His exertions in his new situation were great and successful, he was followed as a popular preacher for several years, till the other churches of the town were at last filled with ministers of abilities, and the charms of novelty vanished, and an income of nearly 300*l.* a year was reduced to 60*l.* Upon this he removed to London, where his abilities and his popularity procured him the chaplaincy of Chelsea hospital, and afterwards the lectureship of St. Olave, Southwark, and the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate, worth near 500*l.* a year. He died, October 9th, 1728. He was author of several sermons, religious and political tracts, an essay on the 39 articles, and a Hebrew grammar.

BENNETT, David, a Physician, born in England Dec. 1, 1615, and died at Rowley, Mass. Feb. 4, 1719, aged 103. He never lost a tooth. His senses were good to the last. His wife was the sister of William Phips. His son, Spencer, who took the name of Phips, was graduated in 1703, was lieutenant-governor of Mass. and died April 4, 1757, aged 72.

BENOIT, Elie, a protestant minister of Paris, who fled to Holland on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and became pastor of Delft. He died 1728, aged 88. He wrote several works held in high esteem, especially his historie de l'edit de Nantes, 5 vols. 4to. 1693. Of the lady whom he married, he has given a most disagreeable picture, representing her as morose, avaricious, insolent, and for 47 years the disturber of his repose.

BENOIT, father, a learned Maronite, born at Gsta, in Phœnicia. He was early sent to Rome, and educated among the Maronites, and afterwards he became, under the patronage of Cosmo III. Hebrew professor at Pisa. At the age of 44 he was admitted among the Jesuits, and died at Rome, 22d September, 1742, aged 80. He was the editor of the works of Ephrem Syrus, 3 vols. fol.

BENSERADE, Isaac de, a French poet, born at Lyons, near Roan. His wit and his poetical talents soon rendered him popular; he was noticed by Richelieu, to whom, according to some, he was related, and a pension was settled upon him. After the death of Richelieu, he attached himself to the fortunes of the duke de Brèze, who patronised him, and so highly was he esteemed at court, that he was named as envoy to Christina, queen of Sweden, an employment however which he did not undertake. As a poet his talents were great, and his name became popular, and for a time he divided the applauses of the town with the celebrated Voiture In the last part of his life he retired from the court to Gentilly, where he employed himself in works of piety, and translated almost all the psalms. He was so afflicted with the stone, that he reluctantly submitted to the operation of cutting; but the surgeon puncturing an artery, ran away instead of checking the effusion of blood, and the unfortunate patient soon after expired in the arms of his friend and confessor Comire, October 19th, 1690.

BENSON, George, D. D. a dissenter, born at Great Salkeld, Cumberland, September 1699. After being educated under Dr. Dixon, at Whitehaven, and at the university of Glasgow, he assumed the ministerial character in London, and went to reside for seven years, as pastor of a dissenting congregation at Abingdon, Berks. He removed in 1729 to Southwark, and in 1740 he became the associate of Dr. Lardner, at Crutched Friars. He particularly devoted his time to the study of the sacred writings, and following the example of Locke, he directed his labors to elucidate scripture, and published a paraphrase and notes, on several of St. Paul's epistles. He wrote besides the life of Christ—a defence of the reasonableness of prayer—tracts on persecution—an history of the plantin of Christianity, from the epistles and acts of the apostles, in two vols. 4to. a work replete with taste, judgment, and erudition, and which procured him an honorable degree by diploma from Scotland, and letters of kindness and acknowledgment from the first divines of the age, Hoadley, Herring, Butler, and Conybear. He died 1763, in his 64th year. His posthumous works appeared 1764, in 4to.

BENTHAM, Thomas, a native of Yorkshire, made fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, 1546, an office which he lost during the tyrannical reign of Mary. On Elizabeth's accession his merits were rewarded with the bishopric of Lichfield and Coventry. He was author of an exposition of the acts of the apostles, and translated into English some of the books of the old testament. He died 1578.

BENTHAM, Edward, D. D. a clergyman of the established church in England, was born 23d July, 1707. After various other preferments, on the death of Dr. Fanshawe he was nominated by the king to the divinity chair at Oxford, a respectable office which he accepted with great reluctance. His lectures in this new appointment were learned and instructive, they were delivered three times a week, during term time, and the course continued one year. In his private character Dr. Bentham was reserved, though his manners were amiable, and his conduct mild, pious, and benevolent. He published some single sermons and also tracts, and he was preparing an answer to Gibbon's objectionable chapters, when he died in his 69th year, 1st August, 1776. He was buried in Christ Church cathedral.

BENTHAM, James, M. A. brother to the preceding, born at Ely, in 1706, became prebendary of Ely in 1733, rector of Bowbrick-hill, Bucks. His office in the cathedral of his native place, engaged his attention to church architecture, and he enriched ecclesiastical literature by the publication of "the history and antiquities of the church of Ely, from the foundation, 675 to 1771," in 4to. As a further specimen of his researches, it was his intention to give an history of ancient architecture in the kingdom, but the avocations of a busy life prevented the completion. To his patriotic exertions it is to be observed that the island of Ely owes many of its improvements. By his spirit of perseverance, against clamor and vulgar prejudice, turnpike roads were made, travelling was rendered easy, and the unfruitful lands of that part of the kingdom were converted into valuable fields by draining. He died 17th November, 1794, aged 86.

BENTHAM, Jeremy, a celebrated jurist of England, was born in 1747, and was educated at Oxford. He attended the lectures of Sir William Blackstone, afterwards entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar, but soon abandoned the profession, and devoted himself to the composition of his voluminous writings on jurisprudence, government, and various branches of political and moral science. Mr. Bentham had a high reputation for talents, and held a correspondence with many of the most distinguished statesmen of Europe. A part of his works have been translated into French. As a writer he was obscure. Utility was the basis of his philosophy; and he was one of the most eccentric individuals of the age. He bequeathed his body to the dissectors, in order to benefit the science of anatomy. His death took place, at the age of 85, June 6, 1832.

BENTINCK, William, first earl of Portland, was descended from a noble family in Holland. When the prince of Orange was seized with the small-pox, it was recommended by his physicians that he should receive the warmth of a young person with him in the same bed. Bentinck cheerfully offered himself, and consequently caught the disease in a violent degree, but the pains and the danger to which he submitted were amply repaid by the favor and friendship of the prince. William brought him with him to England, raised him to the peerage, and granted him lands in Denbighshire, which were, on the representation of the parliament, exchanged for other grants. He died 1709, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

BENTICK, William Henry Cavendish, third duke of Portland, was born in 1738. During the American war he acted with the opposition, and in 1782 was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, where he remained only three months, in consequence of the breaking up of the administration by the death of the marquis of Rockingham. The memorable coalition of that period succeeded, which fell before the rising fortunes of Mr. Pitt; and from that time the duke acted with the Whig Opposition until 1792, when he was elected chancellor of Oxford, and soon after, joining with Mr. Burke in his alarm at the French revolution, agreed with this orator and other seceders on the score of French politics, to support administration. He was accordingly, in 1794, made secretary of state for the same department, which he held until 1805. On the resignation of Lord Grenville in 1807, he was appointed first lord of the treasury, which office he resigned soon after, and was succeeded by Mr. Percival. He died in 1808, leaving behind him a character highly respected for probity.

BENTIVOGLIO, Guy, was born at Ferrara, 1579, and studied at Padua. His address and intrigues produced a reconciliation between two factions which laid claim to the sovereignty of Ferrara after the death of duke Alfonso, and so highly were his services valued by the Roman pontiff that he was made chamberlain of the palace, and afterwards employed as nuncio to Flanders and in France, and at last, in 1621, raised to the dignity of cardinal. His popularity was so great that he probably would have succeeded to St. Peter's chair, on the death of pope Urban VII. had he not been attacked by a violent disease produced by his attendance on the conclave during the intense heats of the summer; so that in consequence of want of rest for 11 successive nights, he expired September 7th, 1644, in his 65th year. The most known of his works are his history of the civil wars of Flanders—an account of Flanders—and letters and memoirs.

BENTLEY, Richard, one of the most eminent of English critics and scholars was born, in 1662, at Oulton, near Wakefield, in York-shire, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He took his degree of M. A. at that university in 1684, and at Oxford in 1689. Stillfleet, bishop of Worcester, to whose son he had been tutor, made him his chaplain, and, in 1692, gave him a prebend in his cathedral. In 1693, he was appointed keeper of the royal library at St. James's, and in 1694, he published his Discourses against Atheism, which he had delivered as preacher of the lectures instituted by Boyle. Having denied the genuineness of the Epistles of Phalaris, he was engaged in a warm controversy with all the leading wits of the age. His antagonists claimed a triumph, but posterity has decreed in his favor. In 1700, he was appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge; but this preferment was not a bed of roses: it involved him in disputes with the vice-master and some of the fellows, which ended in a lawsuit of twenty years' duration. In 1717, a demand which he made of fees, brought on him another litigation, and he was even degraded from his offices in the university. After a struggle of eleven years, however, the court of king's bench decreed in his favor. Thenceforth, he enjoyed his college honors and emoluments in quiet, till his death, in 1742. His editions of Horace, Terence, and Phædrus; his Annotations on Aristophanes; his Notes on Menander; and his Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris, establish his character as a profound scholar. His edition of Paradise Lost, with conjectural emendations, is, on the contrary, a decided failure.

BENTLEY, William, D. D., a minister of Salem, was born in Boston, graduated in 1777, and was ordained over the second church, in 1783. He died suddenly in 1819, aged 61. Dr. Bentley was remarkable as a great collector of books, and for being conversant with much ancient lore, with little regard to its practical application. His valuable library and cabinet he bequeathed chiefly to the college at Meadville, Pennsylvania, and to the American Antiquarian society at Worcester. In addition to the sermons, he published a collection of psalms and hymns; three masonic addresses, and a masonic charge; and a history of Salem in Historical collections, vol. 6th.

BENWELL, William, an able divine, and elegant scholar, born at Caversham, Oxfordshire, in 1765. From Reading school, where his abilities were fostered by the judicious care, and directed by the classical taste, of his brother-in-law, Dr. Valpy, he entered, in 1783, at Trinity college, Oxford. In the university the same ardent application continued to mark his progress, and his labors as a Latin poet were, in 1785, rewarded by the chancellor's prize. The subject was the plundering of Rome by Alaric, and it was treated with great judgment, and with all the energy of description, and the majestic dignity of the Mantuan bard. Two years after he obtained another prize for an English essay, "on what arts the moderns have excelled the ancients," in which he displayed deep research and correctness of judgment, in a style chaste and elegant. The same year he entered into orders, and in 1787 took his master's degree, and in 1790, was elected fellow of his college, where he gained the respect of the society, as an active and well informed tutor. In 1794 he obtained the living of Hale Magna in Lincolnshire, which he soon resigned for Chilton in Suffolk. He resided at Milton, Wilts, and during a contagious fever which raged in the village, from his great benevolence of heart, he exerted himself in affording consolation to the poor sufferers, and unhappily caught the infection, which, after ten days, proved fatal, 6th Sept. 1796. At his death Mr. Benwell was engaged in publishing Xenophon's memorabilia, of which the half was already printed. As a polite and classical scholar his name must stand high, as a divine the simplicity of his discourses made its way to the heart of his hearers, by his zeal, his earnestness, and his eloquence, aided by the most powerful recommendation of his exemplary conduct and benevolent manners.

BENYOWSKY, Count Mauritius Augustus de, magnate of Hungary and Poland, was born 1741, at Verbowa in the Hungarian province of Nitria. He embraced early the profession of arms, and after serving in the imperial armies, he at last joined the confederation of the Polish nobles, to withstand the encroachment of foreigners. He accepted a high command in the army, and in his military capacity he distinguished himself against the Russians in various skirmishes, with unparalled bravery and success, till several wounds disabled him, and he fell into the hands of the enemy. The triumph of the Russians was great, in possessing the person of so indefatigable an adversary; but instead of respecting his misfortunes, they insulted his fate, and with shocking barbarity they loaded him with irons, and confined him in a prison, where the dead carcasses of his companions in misery poisoned the air, and threatened a pestilential contagion. If he was so fortunate as to escape, it was to fall again under the power of his persecutors, and to add to his sufferings, he was hurried away through the deserts of Siberia to Kamschatka, where he found himself an insulted exile and degraded prisoner on the 3d Dec. 1770. He did not, however, sink under his confinement; in this distant retreat he formed the design of escaping, and so highly was his character of bravery and heroism respected, that even the daughter of Mr. Nilon, the governor of the place consented to share his fortunes, and to assist him in his escape. Having made himself master of Kamschatka by force and stratagem, and accompanied by 86 faithful followers and nine women, among whom was his fair protector, he sailed on the 11th May, 1771, from the harbor, and passing by the island of Formosa and the coast of China, he reached, 17th Sept. the port of Macao, from whence he departed for Europe in a French vessel. He no sooner landed in France, than he was encouraged by the French court to form a settlement in the island of Madagascar, a proposition which he eagerly embraced, and on 22d March, 1773, set sail for Africa. His great genius might have surmounted all difficulties in his new establishment, in the midst of barbarous uncivilized nations; but Benyowsky had to contend with more dangerous adversaries, with the envy and malice of favorites, courtiers, and governors, who thwarted his views and opposed his career of glory. It is scarce to be wondered that in those disappointments and provocations, he forgot his allegiance to the French monarchy. He considered himself as an independent sovereign, and the power which he had acquired by his valor, and by his insinuating manners among the barbarians of Madagascar, was consolidated by the stronger cement of popularity, and the affection of the natives. On the 11th October he left this rising settlement for Europe, that he might increase his connection, and form reciprocal alliances with the more polished nations of the north, but though he offered his friendship and services successively to the courts of France, Germany, and England, and claimed their support as the independent sovereign of Madagascar, his offers were disregarded, and he embarked again for Africa, 14th April, 1784, from London, accompanied by his family and a number of settlers. His return to Madagascar was not followed by those happy consequences, which the friends of virtue and humanity could wish. He attacked a French settlement, and the governor of the isle of France sent a small force to oppose his progress. Benyowsky met his invaders with his usual bravery, but receiving a musket ball in the breast, he fell behind the parapet, and in a few moments expired, May 23d, 1786.

BENZELIUS, Eric, an obscure native of West Gothland, who, after a good education, became tutor to the sons of the chancellor of Sweden, and by his influence rose to ecclesiastical dignities and the archbishopric of Upsal. He was author of the lives of the patriarchs, and translated the bible into the Swedish language. He died 1709, aged 67.

BERAULD, Nicolas, a native of Orleans in the 16th century, preceptor to the Colignys, and famous for great learning, and for his acquaintance with Erasmus and other learned men. He compiled a Greco Latin Lexicon. His son Francis was also eminent as a scholar, and quitting the catholic tenets, became principal of the colleges of Montargis and Rochelle.

BERENGARIUS, Jacobus, a surgeon of Carpo, the first who cured the venereal distemper by mercurial ointment. His success in this disorder procured him both fame and money, and he grew so insolent that he wrote in a contemptuous style to the pope and to the king of Spain, who invited him to practice at their courts. He died 1527.

BERENGER, archdeacon of Angers, maintained that the bread and wine used in the sacrament were not the real body and blood of Christ, but merely human food, of which the communicants partook by faith. These tenets which had been before supported by John Scotus Erigena, and were afterwards maintained by the Sacramentarians, were violently opposed by Lanfranc, and Berenger was condemned at Paris and at Rome, but though he was compelled to make a public recantation, he died 1082, firmly attached to his opinion.

BERENICIUS, an eccentric character, who appeared in Holland in 1670, and maintained himself by grinding knives, and sweeping chimneys. His abilities were such that he could repeat by heart Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, Cicero, Pliny, and other Greek and Latin authors, and he was besides well versed in all modern languages, and could translate passages extempore from gazettes into Greek and Latin verse. He was at last suffocated in a bog into which he had fallen when in a state of intoxication. The Georgarcholomachia is attributed to him. It is generally supposed that he was an expelled Jesuit.

BERGIER, Nicolas Sylvestre, an ecclesiastic, born at Darnay, in Franche comté. He became principal of the college of Besancon, professor of theology, and canon of Paris Cathedral, and he might have risen to higher preferment, but when offered an abbey, he answered, "I am already rich enough." His manners were amiable, and his character irreproachable. He died at Paris 9th April, 1790. He is author of a refutation of the system of nature, 2 vols. 12mo.—Deism self-confuted, 2 vols. 12mo.—Evidences of Christianity, 2 vols.—and other learned and valuable works.

BERGMAN, Torbern, a native of Catherineburg, educated at Upsal, and distinguished for his knowledge of medicine and chemistry. He was the friend of Linnæus, and gave him a collection of non-descript insects, one of which the philosopher called by the name of Bergman. In 1761, his abilities recommended him to the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and in 1767, to that of chemistry. His labors were usefully employed in investigating the secrets of nature, he discovered the properties of fixed air, made experiments on the regulus of manganese, the earths ponderosa and magnesia, and other mineral substances. Among his many publications are a treatise on electric attractions, and a theory of the earth; and he was also one of those employed to observe the transit of Venus in 1761. He was made rector of Upsal university, and died soon after, 1784.

BERING, BEERING, or BEHRING, Vitus, a Danish navigator, commodore in the service of Russia. He was sent by Peter I. in 1723, with some ships to explore the north coasts of America, but it was only in a third voyage, made in 1741, that he discovered any thing remarkable. His ship struck on an island on the coast of Kamtschatka, and while repairing the damages sustained there, he died in the place. The island and the straits still bear his name.

BERKELEY, George, D. D., bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, and a distinguished benefactor of Yale college, Dublin. After publishing a number of his works, which gained him a high reputation, particularly his theory of vision, he travelled four or five years on the continent. He returned in 1721 and a fortune was soon bequeathed him by Mrs. Van homrigh, a lady of Dublin, the "Vanessa" of Swift. In 1724 he was promoted to the deanery of Derry. He obtained a grant of 10,000 pounds from the government of Great Britain to aid him in a benevolent project he had conceived of converting the savages of America to christianity. For this purpose he proposed to erect a college in one of the isles of Bermuda, and set sail for the field of his labors. He arrived at Newport, Rhode Island, in Feb. 1729 with a view of settling a correspondence there for supplying his college with such provisions as might be wanted from the northern colonies. Here he purchased a seat and farm in the neighborhood of Newport, and resided about two years and a half. Finding at length that the promised aid of the ministry towards his new college would fail him, dean Berkeley returned to England. He sent as a gift to Yale college a deed of the farm, which he held in Rhode Island; the rents of which, he directed to be appropriated to the maintenance of the three best classical scholars, who should reside at the college at least nine months in a year in each of three years between their first and second degrees. All surpluses of money arising from accidental vacancies were to be distributed in Greek and Latin books to such undergraduates, as should make the best composition in the Latin tongue, upon such a moral theme, as should be given to them. He also made a present to the library of Yale college of nearly one thousand volumes. When it is considered that he was warmly attached to the episcopal church, and that he came to America for the express purpose of founding an episcopal college, his munificence to an institution under the exclusive direction of a different denomination must be thought worthy of high praise. In the year 1733 he was made bishop of Cloyne. He died 1752, aged 69. The works of bishop Berkeley are the principles of human knowledge; dialogues between Hylas and Philonous; the minute philosopher; arithmetica absque algebra aut Euclide demonstrata; theory of vision; de motu; an essay towards preventing the ruin of Great Britain; the analyst; a defence of free thinking in mathematics; the querist; discourse addressed to magistrates; on the virtues of tar-water; maxims concerning patriotism.

BERKELEY, George, L. L. D. second son of the bishop of Cloyne by Anne daughter of John Forster, speaker of the Irish house of commons, was born in Grosvenor-street, London, 28th September 1733, and after being under the care of his father, he entered at Christ Church, Oxford. He was honorably patronized by archbishop Secker, who revered the memory of his illustrious father, and together with the livings of St. Clement's Dane, London, and Tyshurst church, Sussex, he obtained the chancellorship of Brecknock, and a prebendal stall in Canterbury cathedral. He died January 6, 1795, and was buried in the same vault with his father. He wrote some single sermons, one of which, on Charles' martyrdom, has gone through six editions; and a volume was published after his death by his widow.

BERKELEY, Sir William. In 1662 gov. Berkeley returned to Virginia, and in the following year the laws were enforced against the dissenters from the establishment, by which a number of them were driven from the colony. In 1667, in consequence of his attempt to extend the influence of the council over certain measures of the assembly, he awakened the fears and indignation of the latter body. From this period the governor's popularity declined, his faithlessness and obstinacy may be regarded as the causes of Bacon's rebellion in 1676. As his obstinacy caused the rebellion, so his revengeful spirit after it was suppressed, aggravated the evils of it, by the severity of the punishments, inflicted on Bacon's adherents. Though he had promised pardon and indemnity, nothing was heard of but fines, executions, and confiscations. When the juries refused to aid his projects of vengeance, he resorted to the summary proceedings of martial law. The assembly at length restrained him by their remonstrances. Charles II. is said to have remarked concerning him:—"the old fool has taken away more lives in that naked country, than I have taken for the murder of my father." In 1667 gov. Berkeley was induced on account of his ill health to return to England, and died in 1677, after an administration of nearly forty years. He published the Lost Lady, a tragedy-comedy, 1639; a discourse and view of Virginia, 1663.

BERKENHOUT, John, a physician and literary character, born at Leeds, was the son of a Dutch merchant, and, after having served in the Prussian and English military service, studied physic at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Leyden. He went to America with the British commissioners in 1778, and on his return received a pension. He died, aged about sixty, in 1791. He is the author of various works, among which may be mentioned Biographia Literaria; a continuation of Campbell's Lives of the Admirals; and outlines of the Natural History of Great Britain and Ireland.

BERKLEY, Norbonne, baron de Botetourt, one of the last governors of Virginia while a British colony, obtained the peerage of Botetourt in 1764. In July 1768 he was appointed governor of Virginia, in the place of general Anierst. He died 1770, aged 52. Lord Botetourt seems to have been highly and deservedly respected in Virginia. His exertions to promote the interests of William and Mary college were zealous and unremitting. He instituted an annual contest among the students for two elegant gold medals of the value of five guineas; one for the best Latin oration on a given subject, and the other for superiority in mathematical science. He was extremely fond of literary characters, no one of this class, who had the least claim to respect, was ever presented to him without receiving his encouragement.

BERNARD, St., known as one of the fathers of the church, and as the founder of 160 monasteries, was born at Fontaine in Burgandy 1091. As abbot of the religious house of Clairvaux, in 1115, he acquired celebrity as a preacher his lectures were frequented by the most famous men, and all affairs of importance were referred to the consideration and decision of his superior powers of judgment. He firmly opposed schismatics, supported the power of the popes, and convicted Abelard of heresy at the council of Sens in 1140. He died 1153. His works have been published by Mabillon, in 2 vols. folio, 1690.

BERNARD, of Menthon, a native of Savoy, born 923, who was made archdeacon of Aoust, at the bottom of the Alps, and in the discharge of his ecclesiastical duties labored strenuously to convert the uncivilized inhabitants of the mountains to Christianity. To forward his humane purposes, he founded two monasteries in the passes of the Alps, for the relief of pilgrims and unfortunate travellers; and they still subsist a monument of his benevolence, and a happy asylum to the weary.

BERNARD, Edward, D. D., an eminent mathematician and oriental scholar, born May 2, 1638, and educated at Oxford. The proficiency of his early years was so great in classical literature, that he applied himself at the university not only to philosophical and mathematical studies, but to Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Coptic. In 1668, he visited Leyden, to consult some oriental manuscripts presented to that university by Jos. Scaliger and Warnerus; and in 1673 he was appointed successor to sir Christopher Wren, as Savilian professor of astronomy, to whom, four years before, he had been chosen deputy. In the intended plan of publishing all the ancient mathematicians, Mr. Bernard's assiduity was great, he collected and compared whatever was most curious and valuable in the Bodleian and other libraries, and presented the public with a specimen of the work; which, however, either from its vast extent, or the negligence of its first patrons, was never completed. He was sent, in 1676, to Paris, by Charles II. to superintend the education of his two natural children by the duchess of Cleveland; but the simple and reserved manners of the professors were not in unison with the gay dissipation of a court; and he retired, in one year, from a situation which suited neither his taste nor his inclination. He went to Leyden, in 1683, to attend the sale of Nic. Heinsius' library, and repeated his visit some years after, when the books of Golius were sold. As he had been obliged to give up his preferments on his election to the professorship, he began now to be tired with an office which confined his attachments and his pursuits; and he resigned it 1691, to take the living of Brightwell, Berkshire. He died of a consumption, at Oxford, January 12, 1696, in his 59th year. His works are, a treatise on ancient weights and measures, annexed to Pococke's commentary on Hosea—private devotions, 1689—orbis eruditi literaturæ a characteræ Samaritico deductæ—etymologicum Britannicum,—besides various astronomical papers in the philosophical transactions.

BERNARD, James, was born at Nions, in Dauphine, 1st September 1658, and educated at Geneva. The persecution of the protestants obliged him to fly from France to Switzerland, and from thence to Holland, where he became minister of Ganda, and professor at the Hague. His sermons, as well as the celebrity of his writings, recommended him to the public favor, and the people of Leyden fixed upon him for their minister; but William III. who hated his republican principles, refused to confirm their choice, and it was not till 1705, after the king's death, that he appeared as public preacher there. He was also professor of philosophy in the university; but he embraced the system of Descartes, till his knowledge of English made him acquainted with the sublime discoveries of Newton. He died 27th April, 1713, aged 60. His writings were mostly periodical, such as his histoire abrégée de l'Europe—nouvelles de la republique des lettres—besides sermons and a supplement to Moreri's dictionary, in 2 vols. folio.

BERNARD, Catherine, was born at Rouen, and died at Paris, 1712. She wrote poetry with ease and elegance, and obtained three times the poetical prize at the French academy. Her tragedies, Brutus and Laedania, were received with applause on the French theatre; and she was rewarded with a pension of 200 crowns by Louis XIV. She suppressed some of her pieces which might reflect upon her morality and religion. Two romances, count d'Amboise and Inez de Cordova, are attributed to her.

BERNARD, of Thuringia, a fanatical hermit, who, in the last part of the 10th century, pretended to announce the immediate end of the world, and prevailed so much upon the vulgar, that a solar eclipse just at that time was interpreted as a completion of the prophecy, and all, in the utmost consternation, fled to caves and mountains. His reveries are now justly forgotten.

BERNARD, John Frederic, a bookseller of Amsterdam, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, was a man of talent and learning, and the author and editor of several works, among which may be mentioned a Collection of Voyages to the North; Memoirs of Count de Brienne; Religious Ceremonies and Customs of all Nations, in nine folio volumes; and Ancient and Modern Superstitions, in two volumes folio. He died about 1751.

BERNARD, Peter Joseph, a French poet, the son of a sculptor, was born, in 1710, at Grenoble, was taken into Italy, by the marquis de Pezay, in 1734, and fought at the battles of Parma and Guastalla, and was subsequently patronised by the marshal de Coigny, on the express condition of his not making verses. On the death of the marshal, Bernard devoted himself to society and to the Muses. His conversation being delightful, his company was eagerly sought. In the latter part of his life, he sunk into a state of mental imbecility. His poems are elegant but voluptuous. Among his principal works are the Art of Love; Phrosine and Melidor; and the opera of Castor and Pollux. Voltaire styled him le gentil Bernard, and the epithet remains attached to his name. He died in 1775.

BERNARD, Sir Thomas, a philanthropist and scholar, was born at Lincoln, in 1759. He received his education at Harvard College in New England, and on his return to his native country became a student of Lincoln's Inn. He was the projector of the Society for bettering the Condition of the Poor, and an active promoter of many other charities. He died at Leanington Spa, in 1818. Besides various pamphlets, he is the author of Spirina, or the Comforts of Old Age.

BERNARD, Francis, governor of Massachusetts, was the governor of New Jersey after gov. Belcher in 1758. He succeeded governor Pownall of Mass. in 1760. He continued at the head of the government nine years. His administration was during one of the most interesting periods of American history. The first part of his administration was very agreeable to the general court, and much harmony prevailed for two or three years. There had long been two parties in the state, the advocates of the crown, and the defenders of the rights of the people. Governor Bernard was soon classed with those, who were desirous of strengthening the royal authority in America; the sons of liberty therefore stood forth uniformly in opposition to him. His indiscretion in appointing Mr. Hutchinson chief justice, instead of giving that office to colonel Otis of Barnstable, to whom it had been promised by Shirly, proved very injurious to him. In consequence of this appointment he lost the influence of col. Otis, and by yielding himself to Mr. Hutchinson he drew upon him the hostility of James Otis the son, a man of great talents, who soon became the leader on the popular side. The causes, which finally brought on the American revolution, were then operating. Governor Bernard possessed no talent for conciliating; he was for accomplishing ministerial purposes by force, and the spirit of freedom gained strength from the open manner in which he attempted to crush it. He was the principal means of bringing the troops to Boston that he might overawe the people; and it was owing to him that they were continued in the town. He endeavored to obtain an alteration of the charters to transfer the right of electing the council from the general court, to the crown. This attempt, though it drew upon him the indignation of the province, was so pleasing to the ministry, that he was created a baronet in 1769. One of his last public measures was to prorogue the general court in consequence of their refusing to make provision for the support of the troops. It was found necessary to recall him. He died in England in June 1779.

BERNARDEZ, Diego, a poet, born in the province of Entre Minho e Douro, who died in 1596, is denominated the Portuguese Theocritus by his countrymen. His pastoral poems, under the title of the Lyma (the name of a river), appeared at Lisbon on the year of his decease, and have passed through numerous editions. He succeeded also in other kinds of poetry. Bernardez was a warrior as well as a poet; and, after having fought with chivalric bravery, was taken prisoner by the Moors at the fatal battle of Alazarquivir.

BERNARDIN DE SAINT PIERRE, James Henry, was born at Havre, in 1737, and is said to have been a descendant of the celebrated Eustace de St. Pierre, the patriotic mayor of Calais. At the age of twenty he entered into the engineer service; and he successively served at Malta, in Russia, and in Poland. On his revisiting his native country, he obtained a captain's commission in the engineer corps, and was sent to the Isle of France, from whence, however, after a residence of three years, he returned, with no other fortune than a collection of shells and insects, and a narrative of his voyage. The latter, which was his first literary effort, was published in 1773; and he, thenceforth, devoted himself to literature. His Studies of Nature appeared in 1784, and passed rapidly through several editions. Paul and Virginia was published in 1788, and this delightful tale acquired an unprecedented popularity, and set the seal on his reputation. During the reign of terror, he narrowly escaped the scaffold. From Napoleon and his brother Joseph he received pensions, which gave comfort to his latter days. He died in 1814. His Harmonies of Nature was given to the press after his death. The best edition of his works is in twelve octavo volumes. The philosophy of St. Pierre is occasionally eccentric; but the purity of his morality, and the beauty of his style, deserve the highest praise.

BERNIA, or BERNI, Francis, an ecclesiastic of Florence, where he died, 1543. He was patronised by Julio de Medicis, afterwards pope Cleme-ent XII., and he distinguished himself so much as a satirical poet, that a species of burlesque was called, among the Italians, Berniasque. His Orlando Innamorato Rifatto is much esteemed. It is but the work of Boiardo put into a more elegant, witty, and satirical dress. His Latin poems were collected with those of Segni, 1562, and his Italian pieces were placed in a collection with those of Varchi, Moro, Dolche, 1548, reprinted at London, 1721 and 1724, in 2 vols. 8vo.

BERNIER, Francis, a native of Angers, who studied at Montpellier, and travelled to the holy land, and through Cairo and Suzz to the Mogul empire, where he resided for twelve years, eight of which he was physician to the emperor Aurungzebe, from which circumstance he was called the mogul. He wrote an account of his travels on his return to Paris, published 1699 and 1710, and died 22d September, 1688.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, John Lawrence, was born at Naples, and became celebrated for his superior skill in painting, architecture, sculpture, and mechanics. No less than fifteen of his pieces adorn the church of St. Peter at Rome, the most admired of which are the altar and tabernacle, St. Peter's chair. He was in France, where he gained the admiration of the court of Louis XV. He died at Rome, 29th November, 1680. Several of his pieces are preserved in the Florentine gallery. It is said, that in viewing the picture of Charles I. by Vandyke, of which he executed three busts, he exclaimed, that he had never seen a more unfortunate looking face before.

BERNIS, Cardinal Francis Joachim de Pierres de, a French poet and statesman, was born at St. Marcel de l'Ardèche, in 1715. In early life, he published some light poetry, which gained him the patronage of Madame de Pompadour, through whose influence he was pensioned, and received into the Academy; he was subsequently employed to negotiate in Italy, Spain, and Austria, promoted to be minister for foreign affairs, and gratified with the dignity of cardinal. In 1764, he was made archbishop of Alby, and in 1769 was sent ambassador to Rome. The revolution deprived him of his revenues; but he obtained a pension from Spain. He died at Rome in 1794. He left behind him a poem, with the title of Religion Avenged.

BERNOULLI, James, an eminent mathematician, was born at Basil, in 1654, and died in 1705. He was originally intended for the church, but studied geometry and astronomy in secret, contrary to the wishes of his father, which made him take for his device Phæton conducting the car of the sun, with the motto Invito patre sidera verso. He was professor of mathematics at Basil, and a member of many learned societies. His works were published complete in 1744.

BERNOULLI, John, brother of the preceding, was born at Basil, in 1667, became professor of mathematics at Groningen, and succeeded his brother at Basil. He died in 1748. His works form four quarto volumes; and his correspondence with Leibnitz occupies two more. He was the master of Euler. His eldest son, Nicholas, was also a mathematician of talent. He died in 1726, at Petersburg, where he was professor of mathematics. He was, however, far exceeded by his brother.

BERNOULLI, Daniel, was born at Groningen, in 1700, and died in 1782. He was one of the most eminent of an eminent family, and his manners were as modest as his science was extensive. He is the author of the first published treatise on Hydrodynamics; and of many other valuable works.—Several other members of this family excelled in the abstract sciences.

BERNOULLI, John, grandson of the above-mentioned John, was born at Basil, in 1744, and died, in 1807, at Berlin, where he was director of mathematics in the Royal Academy. He was also a voluminous writer. Among his principal works are, Travels in Germany, Switzerland, &c. 3 vols.; and in Prussia, Russia, and Poland, 6 vols.; a Collection of Voyages and Travels, 16 vols.; and Archives of History and Geography, 8 vols.

BERNSTORFF, John Harting Ernest count, an able statesman, descended from a noble family in Hanover. After travelling over Europe, and improving the resources of a mind already rich with the stores of science and learning, he settled in Denmark, and became the friend and favorite of Christian VI. He was employed in various embassies, and at last became the prime minister of the kingdom. In this dangerous office he applied himself to the advancement of the happiness of his adopted country. Her commerce was enlarged, her manufactures encouraged, and every beneficent plan was adopted which could add to the prosperity of the state. A society for agriculture and economy was established under royal patronage, and also another for the improvement of the Danish language, and of the fine arts; and under his influence, a learned body was formed, whose object was to examine into the history of the east, of which the travels of Niebuhr were a most interesting specimen. Bernstorff was in 1767 created a count, and the next year accompanied his master to England, but in 1770, he fell under the royal displeasure, and after a life devoted to the service and honor of Denmark, he retired on a pension to Hamburg where he died February 18th, 1772.

BERNSTORFF, Andrew Peter count, nephew to the preceding, was born at Gartow, in Lauenburg, 28th August, 1735, and after studying at Leipsic and Gottingen, and travelling through Europe, he settled in Denmark, to assist and to share the honors of his uncle. He was, in 1769, raised to the rank of privy counsellor, and though a temporary disgrace banished him to his seat, he was, in 1772, recalled to be placed at the head of affairs. As a negotiator with Russia, he conducted himself with great ability, and by persuading the ambitious Catherine, that it ill became her dignity to retain a small patrimony which made her dependent on the German empire, he obtained for his country the cession of Sleswick, and part of Holstein, and thus strengthened Denmark by the accession of a convenient territory, whose population amounted to above 100,000 men. In the American war he recommended the armed neutrality between Russia, Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, and thus protected commerce against the violence of the belligerent powers. He retired in 1780 from the helm of the state, but was again recalled four years after by the prince of Denmark, and he had the sagacity to forbear engaging in the struggles which kindled a war in 1788 between Russia and Sweden. This great statesman died 21st June, 1797, universally lamented, and respectfully followed to the grave by the Danes, who admired his patriotism and virtues, and who, to commemorate his affability, benevolence, and popularity, struck medals to his honor.

BEROALDUS, Philip, was born of a noble family of Bologna, where he was professor of belles lettres, and where he died, 25th July, 1505, aged 52. He was very dissipated in his youth, so that he dreaded the restraints of wedlock. A lady however of singular accomplishments was at last united to him, and she produced the greatest reformation in his conduct. He became regular, beneficent, and unambitious. He possessed great learning for his age, and wrote both in verse and prose, but his chief labors were valuable editions of the classics. His life was published by Jean Pins, at Bologna, 1505.

BEROLDINGEN, Francis de, a learned ecclesiastic, canon of Osnaburgh and Hildesheim, a native of St. Gall, and born in 1740. He applied himself most assiduously to the study of mineralogy, and passed several years in foreign travel for the purpose of facilitating his progress in this his favorite branch of science. He is the author of several works connected with this pursuit, among which are a treatise "on ancient and modern volcanoes," 8vo; another on the mines of quicksilver in the Palatinate; an account of the spring at Dribourg; "Observations on Mineralogy;" and a new theory of Basaltes. He died in 1798.

BERQUIN, Arnauld, a celebrated French writer, born at Bourdeaux. He first commanded the public attention by his Idylles, which possess sweetness, elegance, and pathos, and he afterwards wrote his romances; but his greatest and most popular work is his ami des enfans, in 6 vols. 12mo. This interesting work, which conveys instruction to the youthful mind, and leads it by an amusing and agreeable narrative, clothed in spirited dialogue, to the admiration and to the love of virtuous and honorable actions, has been frequently edited and translated into the various languages of Europe. He died at Paris, 21st December, 1791, aged 42.

BERQUIN, Lewis de, a gentleman of Artois, known as a courtier at the court of France. As he had embraced the tenets of the protestants, he was exposed to the persecution of the papists. He was twice imprisoned and twice acquitted of heresy, from the respectability of his character or the influence of the court, but as he wished to avenge himself on his accusers, he was the third time seized, and on refusing to make a recantation, he was condemned to be strangled and burnt, which sentence he underwent with astonishing fortitude, 1569, in his 40th year. He was the friend of Erasmus.

BERRI, Charles Ferdinand De Bourbon, duke de, son of the count d' Artois. He was born at Versailles, in 1778, and at the age of eleven the progress of the revolution obliged his father to become an emigrant. The young prince entered the army of the prince of Condé, who gave him the command of a corps of gentlemen styled Chasseurs Nobles, with which he engaged in the service of Russia. After the peace of 1801, the duke de Berri joined his father in England. In April, 1814, he returned in triumph to his native country, and on the reappearance of Bonaparte from Elba he took the command of the troops in the neighborhood of Paris, in order to oppose his progress. Being obliged to give way to circumstances, he followed the king and royal family in the retreat into Belgium, and returned to Paris on the 8th of July. The following year he married Maria Caroline Theresa, eldest daughter of the prince royal of the two Sicilies. His death was tragical, as he fell a victim to the dagger of an assassin, named Louvel, who stabbed him at the opera, February 13, 1820, and he expired the next morning.

BERRIMAN, William, D. D., was born 24th September, 1688, and educated at Banbury, afterwards at Merchant Taylor's school, and Oriel college. He obtained the living of St. Andrew Under-shaft, from Robinson, bishop of London, to whom he was chaplain, and became in 1727 fellow of Eton. He died February 5th, 1750, aged 62. There were published of his five volumes of excellent sermons, the three first of which were preached at Boyle's and Moyer's lectures, and the two last were posthumous—and some controversial writings.

BERRY, Sir John, son of the clergyman of Knowston, Devonshire, was a naval officer who distinguished himself against the Buccaneers, at the battle of Southwold bay, and at the demolition of Tangier under lord Dartmouth. He was highly respected by James II. whom, when duke of York, he by his presence of mind, saved from shipwreck at the mouth of the Humber, in the Gloucester frigate, 1682, and he commanded his fleet in the invasion of William of Orange. He continued to be employed after the revolution, as his abilities well deserved. He was poisoned in February 1691, on board a ship at Portsmouth, in his 56th year, and was buried at Stepney.

BERTHEAU, Charles, a French protestant, born at Montpellier, admitted minister at the synod of Vigan. He left his country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled in London, where he was chosen minister of the Walloon church, Threadneedle-street, and where for 44 years he was respected and admired as a preacher and an exemplary pastor. He published two vols. of French sermons, and died 25th December, 1732, aged 73.

BERTHIER, Alexander, a distinguished officer, was at Versailles, in 1753, served in America during the war of independence, and attained the rank of major-general in 1792. After having fought gallantly in Vendée, he was made general of division, and was placed at the head of Bonaparte's staff in Italy. He afterwards acted in the same capacity with him in Egypt. In both countries he signalized his talents and bravery. On the establishment of the consulate, he became minister of the war department. He was subsequently raised to be a marshal, vice constable of the empire, and prince of Neufchatel and Wagram. Unlimited confidence was reposed in him by Napoleon. On the first restoration of Louis XVIII., Berthier immediately recognized his authority, and was created a peer; but when Napoleon returned, his old companion and confidant withdrew to Banberg, where, in a fit of frenzy or remorse, he threw himself from a window, and died, on the 1st of June, 1815.

BERTHIER, Guillaume Francois, a Jesuit, born at Issoudun en Berri, known as the conductor of the journal de Trevoux for 17 years. He was an able as well as candid critic, but his reflections on some of Voltaire's pieces, drew upon him the vengeance of this satirical poet, which however he treated with becoming disdain. Soon after the dissolution of the order of the Jesuits, he was made a royal librarian, and joint preceptor to Louis XVI. and Monsieur, but in 18 months he resigned his employments and retired to Offenbourg, where he continued ten years. He returned afterwards to France, and died of a fall at Bourges 15th December, 1782, aged 78, where his remains were interred with particular honor by the chapter of the metropolitan church. His translation of the Psalms into French was published in 1785, in 8 vols. 12mo. He wrote the last six volumes of "l'Histoire de Peglise Gallicane."

BERTHOLLET, Claude Louis, an eminent chemist, was born at Talloire, in Savoy, in 1748, and studied medicine at Turin. Having been appointed physician to the duke of Orleans, he settled at Paris, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. His chemical researches were extensive, and the results highly important. In 1799 he accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt; and, under the empire, he was made a senator and an officer of the legion of honor. He was, however, one of the first to desert Napoleon, and was rewarded with the title of count. He died in 1822. Among his principal works are, Elements of the Art of Dyeing; Essay on Chemical Statistics; and Inquiry into the Laws of Affinity.

BERTHOLON, N., an eminent French writer, born at Lyons, where he died 1799. He was educated at St. Lazare, and afterwards became professor of medicine at Montpellier, which he quitted for the historical chair of the central school of Lyons. His works were numerous and written with ability, and chiefly on electricity, acrostation, vegetation, &c. His memoir on the causes of the prosperity and of the decay of the commerce of Lyons, was a popular work, published 1782, in 8vo. and contained much interesting matter on machines, the arts, &c.

BERTI, John Laurence, a learned Augustine monk of Serravezza, in Tuscany, born 28th May, 1696. His great work "de disciplinis theologicis," in eight vols. 4to. drew upon him the censures of the Jesuits, and was accused before pope Benedict XIV. as a follower of Jansenius, against which he defended himself in two prolix vols. 4to. He wrote an ecclesiastical history in Latin in 7 vols. 4to. but his ideas of the papal power over the kingdoms of the world are ridiculous and extravagant. He died at Pisa, May 26th, 1766, aged 70.

BERTIN, Nicholas, a painter, born at Paris 1664. After studying at Rome he returned to France, where he was patronised by Louis XIV. and by the electors of Mentz and Bavaria. His pictures, which are preserved at Paris, possess great merit. He died 1736, aged 72. He was member of the academy of painting, Paris, where he gained a prize in his 18th year.

BERTIN, Exupere Joseph, a French physician, born at Tremblai, in the diocese of Rennes. He was for some time physician to the Hospodar of Wallachia, but he left the country in disgust to return to France. He was chosen assistant anatomist of the academy of Paris, and he published his osteology in four vols. 12mo. 1753. He died February 1781, aged 69.

BERTIN, Anthony, a French officer, and poet, born in the isle of Bourbon, 10th October, 1752. At the age of nine he came to France, and was educated in the college of Plessis, where he greatly improved himself, and displayed a strong and elegant taste for poetry. He went in 1789, to St. Domingo to marry a beautiful creole whom he had known and loved at Paris, but on the eve of his nuptials he was seized with a fever, and died 17 days after, at the end of June 1790, aged 38. His works were reprinted at Paris, two vols. 12mo. 1802. The French attributed to him the beauties and faults of Propertius, a brilliant imagination, often regardless of the language of decorum.

BERTRAM, Cornel Bonaventure, a native of Thouars, in Poitou, professor of Hebrew at Genoa, Frankenthal, and Lausanne. He died at Lausanne 1794, aged 63. He was author of a dissertation on the republic of the Hebrews—a revision of the Geneva French bible—an edition of Pagnin's thesaurus lingue sancte—a parallel of the Hebrew and Syriac languages—lucubrations Frankendalenses.

BERTRANDI, John Ambrose Maria, an eminent Italian anatomist and surgeon, was born at Turin, in 1723, and died in 1765. He was professor of surgery and chemistry in his native city, and head surgeon to the king. His works form thirteen vols. 8vo. The principal of them is a Treatise on Surgical Operations.

BERULLE, Peter, an ecclesiastic, born at Scilli near Troyes. He distinguished himself at the conference at Fontainebleau, and more as being the founder of the oratory in France, an institution which merited, by the piety and good order of its members, the patronage of the king, and of the pope. He was engaged in political affairs as almoner to Henry IV. and after his death as chief of the council of the queen-mother Mary de Medicis. He also accompanied Henrietta-Maria when she came to England, on her marriage with Charles I. Berulle was rewarded with a cardinal's hat by Urban VIII. 1627, and he died suddenly while celebrating mass, October 2d, 1629, aged 55, after a life of exemplary piety and virtue. His writings were on spiritual and controversial subjects, and appeared in one vol. folio.

BERWICK, James Fitzjames, Duke of, a natural son of James II., was born, in 1671, at Moulins, in France, and served with distinction in Hungary, Ireland, and Flanders. In 1704, he commanded in chief, the French troops in Spain; in the following year, he was opposed to the Languedocian insurgents; and in 1706, being then a field marshal, was again at the head of the army in Spain, and gained the battle of Almanza. In four subsequent campaigns, he successfully defended Dampliné against the attempts of the duke of Savoy. His last service in the succession war was the reduction of Barcelona. In 1734, he was placed at the head of the French army on the Rhine, and was killed on the 12th of June, at the siege of Philippsburg. He is the author of his own Memoirs. By Lord Bolingbroke he is considered as the best great man that ever lived.

BESPLAS, Joseph Mary Anne Gros de, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Languedoc, and known as an excellent preacher, and as the earnest friend and comforter of such criminals as were sentenced to death. He wrote an essay on the eloquence of the pulpit, and a treatise on the causes of public happiness, two vols. 12mo. 1778. He died at Paris 1783, aged 49.

BESSARION, Cardinal John, a native of Trebizond, born in 1395, was made bishop of Nicæa, by John Paleologus, and sent by him into Italy, to negotiate the union of the Greek and Roman churches. Pope Eugene IV. gave him a cardinal's hat. Bessarion's efforts, however, gave such offence to those of his own communion, that he thought it prudent to remain at Rome; and Pius II. gave him the title of patriarch of Constantinople. He was very near being elected pope on the death of Nicholas. His death took place at Ravenna, in 1472. Bessarion was a man of talent, and a promoter of literature. The work by which he is best known is his Defence of Plato.

BESSIERES, John Baptist, Duke of Istria, a French marshal, was born in Poitou, in 1769, and entered the army in 1792. He distinguished himself in Italy and in Egypt, and at Austerlitz, Jena, and Eylau; commanded a corps in Spain; and the cavalry of the imperial guard in 1812 and 1813. He was killed in the combat that preceded the battle of Lutzen; and his loss was greatly regretted by Napoleon. Bessieres was a general of talent, and an honorable man.

BETHAN, Edward, B. D. was educated at Eton, and became fellow of King's college, Cambridge, 1731, and 40 years after of Eton college. He is known for his exemplary manners, the goodness of his heart, and his great liberality, so that he presented to the university 2000*l.* for the better support of the botanical garden, and gave 600*l.* to erect a marble statue to Henry VI. the founder of the college, within whose walls he had received his education.

BETHENCOURT, John de, a celebrated adventurer, of a noble family, born in Normandy, in the fourteenth century, was chamberlain to Charles VI. Wishing to avoid bearing a part in the dissensions by which France was desolated, he resolved to undertake the conquest of the Canaries. This purpose he accomplished at the head of a band of resolute men, and received the investiture of the islands, as sovereign, from Henry III. of Aragon. He died, in 1425, on his estate in Normandy.

BETHLEM-GABOR, the son of a poor Transylvanian calvinist gentleman, was patronized by Gabriel Batori, then dethroned him, and, in 1613, proclaimed himself prince of Transylvania. In 1618, he reduced Hungary, assumed the title of king, and invaded Austria and Moravia; whence, however, he was expelled by Tilly. A treaty ensued, and he relinquished his Hungarian conquests; but remained sovereign of Transylvania till his death, in 1629.

BETHUNE, Divie, an eminent philanthropist and christian, was born at Dingwall, Rosshire, Scotland, in 1771. In early life he resided at Tobago, where his only brother was a physician. He removed to the United States in 1792, and settled as a merchant in New-York. He died in 1824. Before a tract society was formed in this country, Mr. Bethune printed 10,000 tracts at his own expense, and himself distributed many of them. He also imported bibles for distribution. From 1803 to 1816 he was at the sole expense of one or more sunday schools. The tenth of his gains he devoted to the service of his heavenly Master.

BETTERTON, Thomas, a celebrated actor, was born, in 1635, at Westminster, and began life as an apprentice to a book-binder. At the age of twenty, however, he went upon the stage, and ultimately acquired a high degree of reputation as a tragic actor; especially in some of Shakspeare's principal characters. In 1695, he opened a new theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields; but this speculation was unsuccessful. He died in 1710. Several pieces were altered by him for the stage.

BETTINELLI, Xavier, an elegant Italian writer, was born at Mantua, in 1718, and became a member of the society of Jesuits. For some years he had the direction of the college of nobles at Parma, and afterwards was professor of eloquence at Modena. He continued his literary career till his death, which took place at Venice, in 1808. His works occupy 24 vols. 12mo., of which two are occupied by tragedies, and three by poems. Of his prose works, one of the most celebrated is Letters of Virgil. Bettinelli was an elegant minded, an amiable, and a pious man.

BEUCKELS, William, a fisherman, a native of Dutch Flanders, is one of those men who have a claim to be considered as the benefactors of mankind. About the beginning of the fifteenth century, he discovered the art of curing and barrelling herrings; a discovery which proved in the highest degree beneficial to his native land. His countrymen erected a statue to his memory, and his tomb was visited by Charles V. Beuckels died in 1449.

BEURNONVILLE, Peter Riel, count de Beurnouville, a French marshal, was born in Burgundy, in 1752, served in the East Indies, and under Dumourier, and was made minister of war in 1793. He was one of the republican commissioners whom Dumourier gave up to the Austrians, and was imprisoned at Olmutz, till 1795. On his return to France, he was appointed to the command of the armies of the Sambre and the Meuse and of Holland. During the consulate he was ambassador at Berlin and Madrid; and under the empire, was grand officer of the legion of honor, senator and count. He voted for the deposition of Napoleon, followed Louis to Ghent, was rewarded with the title of marshal, and died in April 1821.

BEVERIDGE, William, a native of Barrow in Leicestershire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. His application was so intense, and his proficiency in Hebrew so respectable, that at the age of 18 he published "a treatise on the use of oriental languages." He gained the public esteem by his eloquence in the pulpit, and was liberally patronized by Hinchman and Coughton, both successively bishops of London, and he was made chaplain to king William in 1684. He was successively prebendary of St. Paul's, archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Canterbury, and he, in 1691, refused the see of Bath and Wells, on the deprivation of Dr. Kenn, but in 1704 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph. In his episcopal character he strongly recommended to his clergy the catechising of children, and earnestness in public instruction. He died 5th March, 1707, aged 71. He left the best part of his property to charitable purposes. He published 150 sermons in 12 vols. 8vo. and two vols. folio, besides other theological tracts, in Latin as well as English, consisting of institutionum chronologicarum libri duo—Codex canonum ecclesie primitiva—Synodicon sive pandectæ canonum S. S. apostolor. concil. ab ecclesia Græca receptorum, 1672, 2 vols. fol.—private thoughts on religion—the church catechism explained—the great necessity of frequent communion—the thesaurus theologicus, or complete system of divinity, 4 vols. 8vo.—a defence of the old version of the psalms—and an exposition of the 39 articles, fol.

BEVERLEY, John of, a native of Harpham, in Northumberland, made abbot of St. Hilda, then bishop of Hexham, and in 687 translated to York. He was a learned man, and a great encourager of learning, and he founded a college for secular priests at Beverley. After holding the episcopal dignity 34 years, he retired to the obscurity of a cell, and died 721.

BEVERWICK, John de, a native of Dordrecht, educated under the patronage of G. J. Vossins, and distinguished as an able physician and a respectable medical writer. He took his degrees at Padua, and practised in his native town. He died 1647, aged 41, and merited to be called in his epitaph by Dan. Heinsius "Titæ artifex, mortis iugoatr." His works appeared in 4to. 1651.

BEUF, John le, member of the academy of belles lettres at Paris, was born at Auxerre. He was a learned antiquary, and has enriched literature with many valuable compositions on the history and topography of France. This respectable ecclesiastic died 1760, aged 78. He wrote memoirs on the history of Auxerre, besides collections for the history of Paris and of France.

BEYSER, John Michael, a native of Mentz, who early showed a great propensity for adventures and travelling. He was in the Indies and in Holland, and became a general at the beginning of the revolution. He was employed in la Vendee, but being defeated, he was accused and condemned as a traitor, and as the accomplice of Hebert, and he suffered with great composure, 13th of April, 1794.

BEZA, Theodore, a zealous protestant, born at Vezelai, in Burgundy, 24th of June, 1519, and educated at Orleans, under the care of Melchior Wolmar. He was intended for the bar, but he earnestly devoted himself to classical literature, and leaving France, he went to Geneva, with a woman to whom he had promised marriage, and in 1549 he was elected to the Greek professorship of Lausanne, where for 10 years he supported the character of a respectable lecturer, and an accomplished scholar. In 1559 he settled as protestant minister at Geneva, where he became the friend and the associate of Calvin, whose tenets he maintained with the eloquence of the pulpit, and the arguments of logical disputation. He was delegated by the university of Geneva to the conference of Poissy before the king of Navarre, and his abilities and moderation commanded universal respect from a most crowded audience. He remained with the duke of Condé during the civil wars of France, and was afterwards engaged as an active and zealous advocate in the synods, which were held on ecclesiastical affairs at Rochelle, at Nismes, at Montbeliard, and at Bern. His intense studies and labors, to which his whole life was exposed, early shattered his constitution, and after eight years of gradual decay, he expired 13th Oct. 1605. His abilities were of the most comprehensive kind, and as he exerted himself warmly in support of the protestant cause, it is not surprising that he should be branded with the most opprobrious terms by his religious opponents. His controversies were with the most respectable scholars of the times, and he evinced in the contest the superiority of his cause, as well as the extent of his learning. His publications were all on theological subjects, partly in French and partly in Latin, a catalogue of which is given by Anthony la Faye, who has written an account of his life. A Greek MS. of the new testament once in his possession, is preserved at Cambridge, of which Dr. Kipling has published a copy.

BEZOUT, Stephen, born at Nemours, 1730, died at Paris, 27th Sept. 1783. He is known by his course of mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo. and his treatise on navigation, 6 vols. 8vo. besides a general theory of algebraic equations, and other works. He was of the academy of sciences, and also examiner of the pupils of the artillery and of the marines, for whose use chiefly he published.

BIANCANI, Joseph, author of cosmography demonstrated—chronology of eminent mathematicians—dissertation on the nature of mathematics, besides an edition of Aristotle, and other works; was a Jesuit and mathematician of Bologna, and he died at Parma 1644.

BIANCHINI, Francis, a native of Verona, illustrious not only for his universal learning, but the establishment of the Alethofili society in his native town, whose pursuits were directed to physical and mathematical subjects. He was patronized by pope Alexander VIII. and by his successors, and received public marks of respect from the Roman senate. He died 2d March, 1729, aged 67. The people of Verona honored his memory by setting a bust of him in their cathedral. His works were in Italian and chiefly on antiquities, such as Palazzo di Cesari,—and iscrizioni sepolcrali della casa di Augusto, fol. 1727, besides pieces of poetry and eloquence. His universal history 1697, is highly valued, and also his hesperi et phosphori nova phenomena, sive observat. in Veneris planetan.

BIBB, William W., governor of Alabama, was a representative in the 13 congress, from 1813 to 1815, from Georgia. He was appointed, in 1817, governor of the territory of Alabama, and under the constitution of the state was elected the first governor in 1819. He died in 1820, aged 39.

BIBIENA, Bernardo de, a Roman of obscure origin, but great talents. He was in the service of the Medici family, and by his intrigues promoted the election of Leo X. to the popedom, for which he was made a cardinal and employed in important negotiations. He afterwards roused the indignation of his patron, and was poisoned as it is supposed by his directions 1520, aged 50. His Calandra, a comedy, is still held in high esteem in Italy.

BIBIENA, Ferdinand Galli, known as a painter and architect, was born at Bologna 1657. He was patronised by the duke of Parma and the emperor, and the magnificent buildings which were erected according to his plans, show the superiority of his abilities in architecture, and the rules of the perspective. He wrote two books on his art, and died blind 1743, leaving two sons of equal merit, one of whom, J. Galli, wrote the history of the amours of Valeria and Barbarigo.

BICHAT, Marie Francis Xavier, a pupil of Petit at Lyons, who came to Paris, and, under the instruction and patronage of Desault, was appointed medical professor at the Hotel Dieu. He is author of a treatise on the membranes—recherches physiologiques sur la vie & la mort, 8vo. 1799—besides memoirs in the collection of the medical society, and an eloge on his friend Desault, in the 4th vol. of the journal de chirurgie. He died 1802, aged 31.

BIDDLE, John, was born at Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire, 1615, and was educated at Oxford, and after he had taken his degree of M. A. he was elected master of the free school in Gloucester, but his refusal to acknowledge the divinity of the Holy Ghost, interrupted his success and popularity, and drew upon him accusations of heresy. The firmness with which he supported his opinions roused the vengeance of his enemies, but though he was liberated from prison by his friends, he was still unwilling to yield to the arguments which arch-bishop Usher, in his way through Gloucester, kindly used to remove his doubts and effect a reconciliation. He was summoned to appear before the parliament at Westminster, but the 12 arguments and other things which he published as a criterion of his faith, instead of liberating him, exposed him to greater persecution, and the assembly of divines, to whom his cause had been referred, solicited the commons, and an ordinance was passed, to punish with death such as denied the received doctrine of the Trinity. In the struggle for power which divided the commons, Biddle procured his release, and passed some time in Staffordshire, till serjeant Bradshaw, jealous of his liberty, recalled him to London, where he was again confined with greater severity. To the horrors of a prison were added those of poverty, but Biddle was a man of learning, and he earned a subsistence by correcting the septuagint bible, in the publications of which Roger Daniel, a London printer, was employed. By the general oblivion act of 1654, Biddle recovered his liberty, but a fresh publication again exposed him to the rigor of Cromwell's parliament, and at last the protector, incited by the intrigues of Griffin, an anabaptist, who had experienced the superior powers of his antagonist in theological disputes, gave orders for his banishment to St. Mary's castle, in the isles of Scilly, in 1655, where he continued three years. On the restoration, when the liberty of dissenters was abridged, Biddle, who as a minister, expounded his doctrines in private as well as in public, was seized and dragged before a magistrate. He was fined 100*l.* and his hearers 20*l.* each, but from his inability to pay, he was detained, and after fifteen weeks of confinement, a sudden disease came to put an end to his sufferings 22d September, 1662, in his 47th year.

BIDDLE, Nicholas, an American naval commander, was born in 1750. He was regularly bred to the sea, and was a thorough seaman. In 1770 he went to London, and entered the British navy. After the commencement of the revolution, he returned to Philadelphia. Being appointed commander of the Andren Doria, a brig of 14 guns and 180 men, he sailed under commodore Hopkins, in the successful expedition against New Providence. After refitting at New London, he was ordered to proceed off the bank of Newfoundland. He captured, in 1776, among other prizes, two ships from Scotland, with 400 highland troops. Being appointed to the command of the Randolph, a frigate of 32 guns, he sailed from Philadelphia in Feb. 1777. He soon carried into Charleston, 4 valuable prizes bound from Jamaica to London, one of them, the True Briton, of 20 guns. A little fleet was now fitted out under his command, with which he cruised in the West Indies. In an action with the British ship Yarmouth, of 64 guns, March 7, 1778, Capt. Biddle was wounded, and, in a few minutes afterwards, while he was under the hands of the surgeon, the Randolph, with a crew of 315, blew up, and he, and all his men but four, perished.

BIDLAKE, John, a divine and poet, was born at Plymouth in 1755. He was educated at the school of his native place, and after taking his first degree in arts at Christ church, Oxford, he became master of the same seminary, which he conducted with reputation. He proceeded to his doctor's degree, and in 1811, was appointed to preach the Bampton Lectures; but in the act of delivering the third discourse, he was suddenly seized with an epileptic fit, which produced total blindness. He died in 1814. Besides some single sermons on different occasions, he published two volumes of Discourses; the Bampton Lectures, in 1 vol.; Introduction to the Study of Geography, 12mo.; Poems, 4to.; the Sea, a Poem, 8vo.; the Country Parson, a Poem, 8vo.; Eugenio, or the Precepts of Prudentius, a tale, 12mo.; the Summer Eve, a Poem, 8vo.; Virginia, a Tragely; Youth, a Poem, 8vo.; and the Year, a Poem, 1813.

BIDLOO, Godfrey, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a physician and an anatomical writer. He was professor at the Hague, and afterwards at Leyden, and physician to king William, whom he attended in England. He died at Leyden, April 1713, aged 64. Some of his poems in Low Dutch were published in 1719. His great work is anatomia corporis humani, Amsterdam, 1685, folio.

BIEFIELD, James Frederick baron de, a native of Hamburgh, employed by the king of Prussia as secretary of legation, and afterwards as preceptor to his brother, Ferdinand, and in 1747, made curator of the universities, and afterwards baron and privy counsellor. He spent the last part of his life in literary retirement, and died at Altembourg, 5th April, 1770, aged 53. He is author of several works not highly esteemed.

BIEVRE, Marechal, Marquis de, a son of the king's head surgeon, was born at Paris, in 1747, and acquired a reputation by his repartees, and, especially, by his pertinacious spirit of punning; no word or expression escaped him on which he could make a pun. He was, however, capable of better things; for, among other works, he produced two comedies, the Seducer, and the Reputations, the first of which has considerable merit. He died in 1789. Even on the brink of the grave he persisted to pun. His decease took place at Spa, and just before it he said to a friend, "Je pars de Spa (de ce pas)." His jests have been collected into a volume, called Bievriana.

BIGELOW, Timothy, a lawyer of reputation in Massachusetts. He was born in Worcester in that state, April 30, 1767, and graduated at Harvard college in 1786. For more than 20 years, he was a member of the legislature; and for 11 years was speaker of the house of representatives. He commenced his practice in the town of Groton; but in 1807 he removed to Medford, and kept an office in Boston. It has been calculated, that during a practice of 32 years, he argued not less than 15,000 causes. He died May 18, 1821, aged 54 years.

BIGNICOURT, Simon de, a counsellor of Rheims, eminent for his knowledge of ancient and modern literature. His "pensées and reflections philosophiques," are much esteemed. He wrote, besides epigrams and short poems, in French and Latin, none of which exceed 20 lines, in a style of such neatness and elegance, that he has been compared to Catullus. He died at Rheims, 1775, aged 66.

BIGNON, Jerome, was born at Paris, and educated by his father. His progress was so rapid, and his abilities so maturely displayed, that at the age of 10 he published his description of the holy land, and at the age of 14, his treatise on the election of the popes. He was noticed by Henry IV. and obtained a place at court; but after his death, he travelled into Italy, where he received many proofs of esteem from pope Paul V. On his return he devoted himself to the bar, and with such success, that he was nominated counsellor of state and advocate general in the parliament of Paris. He likewise distinguished himself as a politician, he was consulted by queen Anne of Austria during her regency, he assisted at the completion of the treaty with Holland in 1649, regulated the succession of Mantua, and concluded the alliance with the Hans towns in 1654. He died seventh April 1656, aged 66, of an asthma.

BIGOT, Emeri, a native of Rouen, known for his learning, and for his exemplary manners. He was very intimate with the learned men of his age, such as Menage, Nicholas Heinsius, and others, and he liberally assisted his friends in their publications. He published the life of St. Chrysostom by Palladi, discovered by him in the grand duke's library at Florence, and died 1639, at Rouen, aged 64.

BILFINGER, George Bernard, a man of almost universal learning, was born at Canstadt, in Wurtemberg, in 1693. In 1725, being then professor of logic and metaphysics at Petersburg, his Dissertation, on the cause of the weight of bodies, gained the prize offered by the Prussian Academy of Sciences. His reputation caused him to be recalled to Wurtemberg, where the duke appointed him a privy counsellor, and placed unbounded confidence in him. Bilfinger did much for the advancement of education, agriculture, and commerce, in his native country. He died in 1750. Among his works may be mentioned Dilucidationes Philosophicæ; and De Harmonia Anima et Corporis Humani.

BILLAUT, Adam, a joiner of Nevers, known by the name of Maitre Adam. He possessed great abilities as a poet, and he had the good sense and fortitude to prefer his obscure residence at Nevers, to a magnificent dwelling at Versailles. His "Chevelles," his "Villebrequin," and his "rabot," deservedly procured him fame, and he received a pension from Richelieu and from the duke of Orleans. He was intimate with the poets of his age, and displayed great vivacity and spirit in his verses, though it cannot be surprising to find some dull and frivolous lines from the pen of a man who cultivated the muses with the tools of a joiner in his hand. He died at Nevers 1662.

BILLINGSLEY, Henry, a native of Canterbury, educated at Oxford. Instead of pursuing his studies he became a haberdasher in London, and not only acquired great opulence, but rose to the highest honors of the city. He was elected sheriff, alderman, and, in 1598, lord mayor of London, when he received the honor of knighthood. His hospitable reception of Whitehead the mathematician turned his attention to geometry, and by the assistance of this poor inmate he became so skilled in mathematics that he published the first English translation of Euclid's elements, with learned annotations, 1570, folio, for which a preface was written by Dr. Dee. Sir Henry died 1606.

BILSON, Thomas, a native of Winchester, educated at the college there, and at New college, Oxford. He early distinguished himself as a poet, but when he entered into orders, he applied himself totally to divinity, and met with such success in his profession that he gradually became master of Winchester school, afterwards warden of the college, in 1596 bishop of Worcester and 3 years after of Winchester. He was eloquent as a preacher, and in the pulpit and by his writing he successfully maintained the protestant religion. He was engaged in all the theological disputes of the times, he assisted in the revision of the bible, and as a delegate he pronounced the famous divorce between Devereux earl of Essex and lady Frances Howard in 1613. He died 18th June, 1616, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. He published a treatise of the difference between christian subjection and unchristian rebellion, dedicated to Elizabeth 1585, and another in 1593, on the perpetual government of Christ's church.

BINGHAM, Joseph, an eminent divine, was born at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, in 1668, and educated at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, which he resigned, in consequence of being censured for heretodox opinions concerning the Trinity. He then retired to his living of Headbourne Worthy, in Hampshire. In 1712, he obtained the rectory of Havant; in 720, he was nearly ruined by the South Sea bubble; and he died in 1723. His Origines Ecclesiasticæ is a valuable work.

BINGHAM, Caleb, graduated at Dartmouth college in 1732. He was the preceptor of an academy, and also for many years a teacher of one of the public schools in Boston. He was for a long time a director of the state prison. He died in 1817, aged 60. He published the Hunters; young lady's accident; epistolary correspondence; and the Columbian Orator.

BINNING, Hugh, was born in Ayrshire, and educated at Glasgow, where he became professor of moral philosophy. As minister of Govan, he distinguished himself by his eloquence in the pulpit, and his amiable manners. He died of a consumption 1654, aged 29. His tracts, sermons, &c. were published in 4to. 1735.

BICERNSTAHL, a learned professor of the oriental languages at Upsal, was a native of Rotarbo in Sudermania. He visited Europe with his pupils, the sons of baron Rudbek, and afterwards travelled to Turkey, by order of the king of Sweden. He died at Salonica, 12th July, 1779. His entertaining letters, written in Swedish during his travels, published 1778, in three vols. 8vo. have been translated, with the continuation published in 1781, into German by Groskurd, Leipsic, 1779 and 1781, in six vols. 8vo.

BION, a Greek pastoral poet, a native of Smyrna, was a contemporary of Theocritus, and the friend of Moschus; and is said to have died by poison, about B. C. 300. Some, however, maintain, that he lived a century later than Theocritus. His Idyllia are remarkable for elegance and pastoral sweetness.

BION, a Greek philosopher, of Borysthenes, in Scythia, died about B. C. 240. He was first a cynic, then a disciple of Theodorus, the atheist, and lastly of Theophrastus. Bion was skilled in music and poetry, and had a talent for repartee.

BIRAGUE, Clement, an engraver of Milan, said to be the first who discovered the means of engraving diamonds, of which he gave a specimen in the portraits of don Carlos. He lived at the court of Philip II. of Spain.

BIRAGUE, Rene de, a native of Milan, who escaped from the vengeance of Lewis Sforza into France, and became a favorite at the court of Charles IV. who made him keeper of the seals, and chancellor of the kingdom 1573. He was made a cardinal by Gregory XIII. at the request of Henry III. He was concerned in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and died 1582, aged 74, little respected, from the servility and perfidiousness of his character. One of the same family distinguished himself as a general in the wars of Italy, especially in the capture of Carde, a fortress of Piedmont.

BIRCH, Thomas, son of a quaker, coffee-mill maker, was born in the parish of St. John, Clerkenwell, 23d November, 1705. His fondness for learning was so great, that rather than follow the profession of his father, he determined to depend upon his own exertions for subsistence, and therefore he became assistant at Hemel Hampstead school, where he received his education, and afterwards in two other establishments, all kept by quakers. His desertion of the tenets of the quakers was followed by his ordination by the bishop of Salisbury, and he quickly passed, by the favor and patronage of the Hardwicke family, into the possession of several benefices, the last of which were the rectory of Depden in Essex, and St. Margaret Patens and St. Gabriel, Fenchurch-street, London. He died by a fall from his horse between London and Hampstead, 9th January, 1766, though it was conjectured that his previous indisposition and lowness of spirits brought on an apoplexy, which caused his death. He had been honored with the degree of D. D. by the Marischal college of Aberdeen, and by Herring the primate. In his private character Birch was friendly, communicative, and unaffected, and as a writer he possessed unusual activity and solid judgment. His knowledge of Greek was not considerable, but French and Latin he thoroughly understood; and though not particularly distinguished for general information, his accuracy as a modern historian is very great. His publications are voluminous. Among his numerous works are a History of the Royal Society; Lives to Honour and Vertue's heads; Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth; Lives of Boyle, Tillotson, Greaves, Ward, Raleigh, and Henry Prince of Wales.

BIRD, William, known for his excellent musical compositions, was according to some conjectures employed in king Edward VI's chapel, and afterwards he became organist of Lincoln cathedral. Few particulars are known of his life, though it is ascertained that he died the 4th July, 1623, aged 80, leaving a son Thomas, educated in the same profession.

BIRDSEYE, Nathan, remarkable for longevity. He graduated at Yale college in 1736, was settled in the ministry at West Haven from 1742 to 1758. He died in 1818 aged 103 years and five months. In his last years, he occasionally preached, and once at Stratford after he was 100 years old.

BIREN, John Ernest, a person of mean birth, noticed by Anne, dutchess dowager of Courland, and raised by her when elevated to the Russian throne to the highest dignities. As the favorite minister of the empress his conduct was violent and ty rainical, not less than 20,000 persons were capriciously exiled by him to Siberia, but still he continued in power, and was by his mistress made duke of Courland in 1737. On the death of the empress he assumed the reins of government agreeable to her will, but an insurrection of the nobles in 1740 prevailed against him, and the sentence of death was exchanged for banishment into Siberia. He was recalled by Peter III. and restored to favor by Catherine. He resigned his honors as duke of Courland to his son in 1769, and died three years after.

BIRKENHEAD, Sir John, born at Northwich, Cheshire, in 1615, and was educated at Oxford. When Charles I. came to Oxford, Birkenhead supported the royal cause by his writings, and when he was at last expelled from the professorship of moral philosophy by the republicans, he hurled from an obscure retreat in London all the shafts of his satire against his persecutors. After the restoration he was created LL. D., by the university, elected member for Wilton, and knighted, and appointed master of requests. His popularity as a courtier drew upon him the censures of jealousy, and Wood is among those who detract his character. Dryden, however, Langbaine, and Winstanley, speak of him in the highest terms. He died fourth of December 1679, aged 64. His writings were chiefly political pamphlets and satirical poems.

BIRON, Amand de Gonrault baron de, a native of Perigord, born about 1524, and rose through all the gradations of the army to the rank of marshal de France, 1577. He distinguished himself in the wars of Italy, and in the service of Henry III. and IV. and was engaged in the battles of Dreux, St. Dennis, and Moncontour. He was commander in seven battles, and he received seven honorable wounds. He was defeated by the duke of Parma, when he went to the Low countries to assist the duke of Alencon, and he was at last killed by a cannon ball at the siege of Epemai, in 1592, aged 68. His humanity was displayed at the massacre at St. Bartholomew, when he saved several of his friends. His commentaries on the campaigns in which he was engaged are lost.

BIRON, Charles de Gonrault duc de, son of the preceding, was admiral and marshal of France, and a favorite of Henry IV. who made him a duke, and sent him as his ambassador to England and other courts. He distinguished himself highly in the civil wars of France, but his attempts to league against his master, with Savoy and Spain, proved his ruin. He was discovered and beheaded 31st July, 1602. His love of pleasure and gaming is said to have produced those fatal steps to which he fell a sacrifice.

BISHOP, Samuel, M. A., an English poet, born in London 1731, and educated at Oxford, of which he became fellow. He afterwards was appointed head master of Merchant Taylor's school, and obtained the livings of St. Martin Outwich, London, and Ditton, Surrey. He died 1795. His poems, which are on light subjects, and in a pleasing and elegant style, were published in two vols. 4to. and two vols. 8vo. with his life prefixed.

BISSET, Charles, M. D., at St. Andrews, was author of an essay on fortifications and of some medical tracts. He served in Flanders as an engineer, till the peace 1748, and three years after settled at Skelton, in Yorkshire, where he resumed the practice of physic, to which he had formally attended. He died at Knayton, near Thirsk, May 1791, aged 75. He wrote an essay on the theory and construction of fortification, 8vo. 1753—a treatise on the scurvy, 8vo. 1775—an essay on the medical constitution of Great Britain, 8vo. 1762.

BISSET, Robert, a miscellaneous author, member of an academy in Sloane-street, Chelsea. He wrote a sketch of democracy, 1796, 8vo.—a life of Edmund Burke, 8vo.—a valuable composition, 2 vols. 8vo.—history of the reign of George III.—an edition of the Spectator and memoirs of living authors. This laborious writer was a native of Scotland, and received his education at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of L.L. D., after which he settled in London. It is supposed that his death was hastened by the ruined state of his pecuniary affairs, and that he fell a victim to a broken heart, 14th May, 1805, aged 46.

BITAUBE, Paul Jeremiah, a native of Konigsberg, in Prussia, the son of French refugee parents, was born in 1732, educated as a protestant divine, and became a member of the Royal Academy of Berlin. He settled at Paris, was incarcerated during the revolution, and was subsequently admitted into the Institute, and made one of the first members of the legion of honor. He died in 1808. His works have been collected in nine volumes octavo. The principal of them are, Joseph, a poem; the Batavians, a poem; and a translation of Homer.

BLACK, Joseph, a celebrated chemist, born of English parents at Bourdeaux, 1728. He was educated at Belfast and Glasgow, where he took his degree of M. D., in 1754. His abilities were such that he early obtained the professorship of anatomy, which he soon resigned that he might more zealously devote himself to chemical pursuits. In 1776 he succeeded Dr. Cullen in the professorial chair of chemistry at Edinburgh, and became distinguished by the superior excellence of his lectures and the number of his pupils. He died 26th November, 1799. He was author of a treatise de acido a cibus orto, an inaugural dissertation, on his taking his doctor's degree—experiments on magnesia and quicklime—observations on the ready freezing of boiled water, inserted in the philosophical transactions—analysis of boiling water in Iceland, in the Edinburgh memoirs—lectures on the elements of chemistry, edited by Dr. Robison, 2 vols. 4to. 1803.

BLACKBURN, William, eminent as an architect and surveyor, was born December 20th, 1750, in Southwark. His native genius overcame the disadvantages of a contracted education, and he obtained a medal from the royal academy, and the more flattering commendation of sir Joshua Reynolds, for the best drawing of St. Stephen's church, Walbrook. He acquired reputation in business, and when an act was passed in 1779, for the erection of penitentiary houses, to contain 600 males and 800 females, his plans were approved by the three superintendents, and he was appointed to superintend the building, which however was suspended for a time by government. The design, though abandoned, was not lost, the country was awakened to convert the confinement of culprits to useful labor and to reformation of morals, and several prisons were erected on Blackburn's plan. This ingenious artist did not long enjoy the favors of the public, he died at Preston on his way to Scotland, 25th October 1790, in his 40th year.

BLACKHALL, Offspring, D. D., was born in London, and educated at Catherine-hall, Cambridge. He became rector of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, London, chaplain to king William, and in 1707 bishop of Exeter. He died 29th November 1716, and was buried in his cathedral. He was a popular preacher, and as a writer he acquired consequence, by his sermons at Boyle's lecture, and his defence of Charles I. as author of Icon Basilike against the attacks of Toland. He was an able scholar and an acute divine, orthodox in his principles, and charitable in his character; though some have accused him of opposition to the revolution, so that it is asserted, that he refused for two years to take the oath of allegiance to king William. His works have been published in two vols. folio, 1723.

BLACKHOOF, a chief of the Shawanese tribe of Indians, died at Wapaghkonnetta in Sept. 1831, aged 114 years. He was at St. Chair's, Harmer's, and Crawford's defeats; and perhaps was the last survivor of those who were concerned in Braddock's defeat.

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, son of a bricklayer, of Annan in Scotland, was deprived of his eye-sight by the small-pox about 1721, before he was six months old. This great misfortune was relieved by the kindness of his father, and the assiduities of his friends. His mind was cultivated and improved by the books which were read to him, and so strong were the powers of his understanding that at the age of twelve he wrote a small poem not devoid of beauty and elegance. The rebellion of 1745 interrupted for a while his literary pursuits, but after spending some time at Glasgow he returned to Edinburgh, and after studying ten years in the university, he acquired the fame of a polite scholar and an elegant poet. His poems were published and universally admired, and though misfortune might in the apprehension of an infidel have clouded his thoughts with distrust and dissatisfaction, that the book of nature was shut upon him, we admire every where the most sublime piety, resignation to the will of providence, and that tranquillity and contentment of mind, which were most fully exhibited in his private character. By means of Mr. Spence, who began to patronise him in 1754, Blacklock was placed in an eligible situation in the university of Edinburgh, his labors were rewarded by an ample sale of his poems, he took orders, and in 1766 obtained the degree of D. D. In 1774 he published "the Graham," a heroic ballad in four cantos, and two years after he wrote in opposition to Dr. Price, some remarks on civil liberty. This amiable man, respected for the great and uncommon powers of his mind, and the exemplary conduct of his private life, died July 1791, aged 70. Both Hume and Spence have been lavish of their praises on his character, and the portrait in this instance drawn by friendship is not exaggerated. He wrote besides consolations deduced from natural and revealed religion, 8vo.—discourses on the spirit, and evidence of Christianity from the French, 8vo. &c.

BLACKMORE, sir Richard, from a private school passed to Westminster and Edmund-hall, Oxford, and after visiting Italy, took his degrees in physic, at Padua. His early support of the revolution, procured him the place of physician to king William, and the honor of knighthood; but though he acquired celebrity and opulence in a medical character, he courted popularity as a votary of the muses. In 1696, he published his first poem, Prince Arthur, which was rapidly succeeded by other works; nor was he deterred from pursuing his career by the ridicule which was heaped upon him by Dryden, Pope, and nearly all the wits of the age, whose dislike of him was sharpened by his whig principles. He is the author of nearly thirty works, in verse and prose; of the latter many are on medical subjects. His best poem is entitled Creation. Blackmore was an indifferent poet, but he was undoubtedly possessed of considerable talent, and was a pious and worthy man. He died in 1729.

BLACKSTONE, Sir William, an eminent lawyer, was the third son of a silk mercer, and was born in London, in 1723. After having been for several years at the Charter House, he completed his education at Pembroke College, Oxford, and at both seminaries displayed superior talent. When he was only twenty, he composed, for his own use, a Treatise on the Elements of Architecture. Having chosen the profession of the law, and entered the Middle Temple, in 1741, he wrote his elegant valedictory poem, the Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse. In 1743, he was elected a fellow of All Souls, and in 1746, he was called to the bar, and went the circuit, but obtained little practice. He remained in comparative obscurity till 1753, when he began to deliver, at Oxford, his lectures on the English laws; which, in 1765 and the four following years, he published, with the title of Commentaries on the Laws of England. In consequence of these lectures, he was elected Vinerian professor of law in the university, and obtained a great accession of business. In 1761, he sat in parliament as member for Hindon, and was made king's counsel, and solicitor-general to the queen. In 1770, he was offered the place of solicitor-general, but declined it, and was made a judge of the king's bench, whence he was soon after transferred to the common pleas. He died in 1780. His Law Tracts were published in 1762, and his Reports, two volumes folio, after his death. Blackstone was the first who wrote on the dry and repulsive subject of English law in such a manner as not to excite disgust in a reader of taste. Like almost all lawyers, he leans to the side of prerogative; nor is there much more of enlargement in his principles of religious liberty. For this reason he was exposed to attack from Priestley, Bentham, and Junius.

BLACKSTONE, William, an episcopal minister, and the first inhabitant of Boston, settled there as early as 1625, or 1626; and there he lived, when Gov. Winthrop arrived in the summer of 1630, at Charlestown, the records of which place say,—“Mr. Blackstone, dwelling on the other side of Charles River, alone, at a place by the Indians called Shawinut, where he only had a cottage, at or not far off the place, called Blackstone's point, he came and acquainted the governor of an excellent spring there, without inviting him, and soliciting him thither, whereupon, after the death of Mr. Johnson and divers others, the governor, with Mr. Wilson, and the greatest part of the church removed thither.” Though Mr. Blackstone had first occupied the peninsula, or Trimountain, he claimed no right to the soil. At a court in April, 1633, it was agreed, to give him fifty acres near his house in Boston, to enjoy forever. In 1634, he sold this estate, and removed to Pawtucket river, now bearing his name, Blackstone river, a few miles north of Providence. He died, 1675.

BLACKWELL, Thomas, was born at Aberdeen, fourth of August 1701, and after studying in the Marischal college, he became, 1723, Greek professor, and distinguished himself by the eloquence and popularity of his lectures. In 1737 he published anonymously “an inquiry into the life and writings of Homer, 8vo.,” which he afterwards accompanied with “proofs” or translation of all the notes which he had inserted in the composition. He was appointed in 1748 to be principal of the college, and was the first clergyman raised to that dignity, since the forfeiture of the Marischal family in 1716. At the head of his society, he displayed the abilities of the scholar and the politeness of the gentleman, the college flourished, and its members were respectable in learning and in numbers. A consumptive disorder early attacked his constitution, and it was increased by voluntary abstemiousness. Too late he wished to recover his health by travelling, but he died at Edinburgh, in his way to South Britain, February 1757, aged 56. His other publications were letters concerning mythology, 1743, and the memoirs of the court of Augustus, in three vols. 4to.—the first of which appeared in 1752, the second 1755, and the last, after his death. He left no issue.

BLACKWELL, Alexander, a native of Aberdeen, who studied physic at Leyden, under Boerhaave, and attempted without success to practice in his native town, and afterwards in London. From a physician, he became a corrector of the press, and a printer, but he failed; and in 1740, he went to Sweden, where by means of a Swedish nobleman, whose friendship he had cultivated at the Hague, he recommended himself to the public as a physician, and as projector for draining the fens and marshes near the capital. His schemes succeeded, he was applauded by the king and his court, but soon after, being suspected of a conspiracy with count Tessin, he was tortured, and beheaded 9th August, 1748. His wife, Elizabeth, to support her husband in prison, published in two volumes folio, 1737 and 1739, a Herbal, containing five hundred plates, drawn, engraved, and colored by herself.

BLACKWOOD, Adam, a native of Dunfermline, known as a warm advocate of the unfortunate Mary of Scots. He published in 1587, in French, an account of her martyrdom, addressed to the princes of Europe. He displayed great virulence in the defence of his benefactress, against Elizabeth, whose illegitimacy he wished to establish. He resided at Poitiers, and died 1613. He was eminent as a poet, civilian, and divine. His works were printed by Sebast. Cranoise at Paris, 1644.

BLADEN, Martin, known as translator of Cæsar's commentaries, was a lieutenant colonel under the duke of Marlborough, and member in five parliaments. He was comptroller of the mint in 1714, and three years after named for envoy to Spain, an appointment which he did not accept. He died 1746. He wrote, besides the dramatic pieces of Orpheus and Eurydice, a masque, and Solon, a tragi-comedy, but they are of inferior merit.

BLAEU, or JANSSEN, William, a learned printer, the friend of Tycho Brahe, author of a beautiful atlas in three vols. folio.—He died in his native town, Amsterdam, 1638, aged 67. His sons, John and Cornelius, republished, in 1663, his atlas in 14 vols. folio, which is very scarce and valuable, as several were copies destroyed by a fire which consumed the best part of their property.

BLAGRAVE, John, was educated at Reading school and St. John's college, Oxford, and early devoted himself to mathematical pursuits at his seat of Southcote. He published four works, the mathematical jewel,—a treatise on the making of the familiar staff, for the mensuration of altitudes,—the astrolabium, uranicum generale,—and the art of dialling,—in which he labored to render more popular and more universally understood all mathematical subjects.

BLAIR, James, M. A., first president of William and Mary college in Virginia, a native of Scotland, who, after being unsuccessful as minister of the episcopal church, came to England, where he recommended himself to the patronage of Compton, bishop of London, who sent him as a missionary to Virginia in 1685. He displayed, so much zeal and ability in this employment, that he was appointed to the high office of commissary, and so intent was he to improve the manners and understanding of the colonists, that he raised a subscription, and procured a patent for the erection of the college of which he was honorably nominated the first president. He was also president of the council in Virginia, and after presiding for near 50 years over his college in the most zealous and exemplary manner, he died in a good old age, 1743. His works were sermons in four vols. 8vo. London, 1742.

BLAIR, Robert, an eminent poet, eldest son of David B. one of the ministers of Edinburgh. He was educated at the school and college of his native city, and when admitted to orders was appointed minister of Athelstanford, East Lothian, where he spent his life devoted to the sacred offices of his ministry, the labors of literature, and the occasional pursuits of botany. In which, from his superior knowledge of the use of the microscope, he was a great proficient. He died 4th Feb. 1746, aged 47. The only poem of note which he published is his "grave," which has insured his fame and immortality.

BLAIR, John, LL. D., a chronologist, was a native of Edinburgh, and a near relation of Dr. Hugh Blair, who materially assisted him in the composition of his principal work, the Chronology and History of the World, which was published in 1754, and to which he afterwards added maps of ancient and modern geography. This work procured him considerable church preferment. He died in 1782.

BLAIR, Hugh, D. D., a celebrated divine, born at Edinburgh in 1718. He was educated at the university of his native city, where he took his master's degree in 1736. He was soon invited to the second charge of the Cannongate church of Edinburgh, and in 1758 he was promoted to the High church, and honored with the degree of D. D. by the sister university of St. Andrew's. In 1759 he appeared before the public as lecturer in rhetoric and belles lettres, and with such effect, that the King in 1762 erected for his encouragement, with a salary of 70*l.* a year, a professorship on that branch of literature in the university. His dissertation in support of the authenticity of Ossian's poems, appeared in 1763, and in 1777 he published the first volume of his sermons, which met with such applause that in 1779 he printed a second volume, and afterwards three volumes more appeared. These discourses became popular, not only in Scotland and England, but were translated into foreign languages, and claimed the admiration of the learned on the continent. Such services in the cause of religion and virtue did not pass unrewarded, and at the instance of the Queen, to whom the sermons were dedicated, the worthy professor obtained a pension of 200*l.* a year, which was increased 100*l.* more in 1783, when his infirmities obliged him to resign his public offices. He not only carried into his retirement the respect and good wishes of his fellow collegians, but he was permitted to retain his salary in the most honorable terms. His lectures in three vols. appeared in 1783, and obtained as rapid a sale and as wide a circulation as his sermons, as they were entitled to equal commendation. His sermon preached for the sons of the clergy in Scotland, was published in 1796. Dr. Blair died at Edinburgh 27th December, 1800.

BLAIR, James, first president of William and Mary college Virginia. He came to Virginia as a missionary about the year 1685. In 1689 he was appointed by the bishop ecclesiastical commissary, the highest office in the church, which could be given him in the province. With him originated the design of establishing a college at Williamsburg.

He solicited benefactions in this country, and by direction of the assembly made a voyage to England in 1691 to obtain the patronage of the government. A charter was obtained with liberal endowments, and he was named in it, as the first president. He held the office from 1729 to 1742. He died 1743.

BLAIR, John, one of the associate judges of the supreme court of the United States, died in 1800, aged 63. He was a judge of the court of appeals in Virginia in 1787, and in the same year, he was a member of the general convention which formed the constitution of the United States. To that instrument the names of Blair and Madison are affixed as the deputies from Virginia. When the new government commenced its operation, he was appointed by Washington to the office, which he held till his death.

BLAIR, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Ireland, and came to America in early life. He was educated at the Academy of Mr. Tennent at Neshaminy, and in 1745, established an academy at Fog's Manor, Chester county, Pennsylvania, and took the pastoral care of the church in that place. He occupied the first rank among his contemporaries in talents, learning, piety and usefulness, both as a preacher and an academical instructor. President Davies, Dr. Rogers, of New-York, Alexander Cumming, James Finley, and Hugh Henry, were among the distinguished ministers who received their classical and theological education at his seminary. He died about the year 1751.

BLAKE, Robert, one of the most celebrated of British admirals, was born at Bridgewater, in 1599, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford. By the interest of the puritans, he was elected member for Bridgewater, in 1640. In the struggle between Charles I. and his people, he espoused the cause of liberty, and distinguished himself by his gallant defence of Taunton, and other exploits. In 1549 he was put in command of the fleet. His first achievement was the destruction of Prince Rupert's squadron, at Malaga. In 1652 and 1653 he fought four desperate engagements with the Dutch fleet, under Van Tromp, in two of which the enemy were defeated with great loss. The next theatre of Blake's glory was the Mediterranean, to which he sailed in 1654, and where he destroyed the Tunisian castles of Goletta and Porto Ferino, and intercepted the Spanish plate fleet. Having received intelligence that another plate fleet was lying at Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe, he sailed thither, forced his way into the harbor, burned the ships, and came out without having suffered any loss. His health was now entirely broken, and he bent his course homeward, but expired August 27, 1657, while the fleet was entering Plymouth Sound. His body was interred by a public funeral, in Henry the Seventh's Chapel; but on the restoration of Charles II. it was torn from its resting place, and buried in a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard; a base act, well worthy of a monarch who became a traitor to his country and a pensioner of France. Blake was not merely a man of courage and talent; he was pious, just, and singularly disinterested.

BLAKE, John Bradley, was born in London, 6th November, 1745, and educated at Westminster school. After acquiring a deep knowledge of chemistry and mathematics, in the pursuits of his favorite study of botany, he went to China as supercargo of the India company, and with laudable assiduity collected and sent to Europe, the seeds of all the vegetables of that remote country used by the natives for purposes either of medicine, food, or manufactures. He began likewise a valuable collection of ores and fossils but his great application weakened his constitution, he was afflicted with the stone, and the complaint when attended by a fever proved fatal. He died at Canton, 16th November, 1773, in his 29th year.

BLAKE, Joachim, a Spanish general, was born at Velez Malaga, and served, first as captain, and next as major, in the war, from 1793 to 1795, between France and Spain. When Napoleon seized the crown of Spain, Blake espoused the cause of his country; but with more valor and zeal than success. Though defeated at Rio Seco and Espinosa, he still sustained his military character. In 1810 he was appointed one of the regency, from which rank he was transferred to that of captain general. Having been defeated at Murviedro, he shut himself up with his army in Valencia, but was at length compelled to surrender. In 1820, on the establishment of the constitution, he was admitted into the council of state; and his attachment to that constitution subsequently exposed him to danger. He died at Valladolid, in 1827.

BLAKE, Joseph, governor of South Carolina, was a proprietary and a nephew of the famous admiral Blake. He was governor but one year. During Blake's administration a set of 41 articles called "the last fundamental constitutions," was sent from England, by the earl of Bath, the palatine, and other patentees; but the change in the government was never confirmed by the Carolina assembly. He died in 1700.

BLAKELEY, Johnston, a captain in the United States navy, during the war with Great Britain of 1812. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1800. In 1813 he was made a master-commandant and soon after appointed to the command of the Wasp. In this vessel he fell in with his Britannic majesty's ship Reindeer, which he took after an action of nineteen minutes. The loss of the Americans was 21 killed and wounded; that of the enemy 67. Finding it impossible to save his prize, he set her on fire. On his next cruise he fell in with ten sail of merchantmen, under convey of a ship of the line, and succeeded in cutting off one of the vessels. On the evening of the first of September, 1814, he fell in with four sail, two on each bow, but at considerable distances from each other. The first was the brig-of-war Avon, which struck after a severe action, but he could not take possession of her, as another enemy was approaching. This enemy, it seems however, was called off to the assistance of the Avon, which was now sinking. The enemy reported that they had sunk the Wasp by the first broadside; but she was afterwards spoken by a vessel off the Western isles. She has never been heard from since. The legislature of North Carolina, to which state Capt. Blakeley's father emigrated, after prescribing the destination of the sword they had voted to Capt. B., Resolved, unanimously, that captain Blakeley's child, (an only daughter), be educated at the expense of this state; and that Mrs. Blakeley be requested to draw on the treasurer of this state, from time to time, for such sums of money, as shall be required for the education of the said child.

BLANC, Antony de Guillet de, professor of rhetoric in the congregation of the oratory at Avignon, was born at Marseilles, 2d March, 1730, and died at Paris 1799. He afterwards came to Paris where he was appointed professor of ancient languages in the central schools, and member of the institute. He wrote Manco Capac, a tragedy, which did not possess much merit, and met with little success. The Druids, another tragedy, 1772, was proscribed by the clergy for some offensive passages. He published besides other plays, Virginie a tragedy—Albert I.—l'heureux evenement—some romances—and a translation of Lucretius into French verse BLANCHARD, James, a painter of eminence, born at Paris, 1600. He improved himself at Lyons, Rome, and Venice, and on his return to France, he showed by his excellent pieces how judiciously he had examined and studied the works of Titian, Tintoret, and Paul Veronese. The most remarkable of his pieces is a kneeling St. Andrew in the church of Notre Dame, with the Holy Ghost descending. His grand pieces are few, as he devoted much of his time to madonnas. He was fortunate in his coloring. He died of an imposthume in the lungs, in his 33th year.

BLANCHE, daughter of Alphonso IX. of Castile, married Louis VIII. of France in 1200, by whom she had nine sons and two daughters, she was on the death of her husband in 1226, made regent of the kingdom, during the minority and the crusades of her son saint Louis, and she behaved with moderation and spirit in the administration of the government. Happy in the conduct of her children, whom, by her example and her precepts, she had nurtured in virtue and religion, and secure in the esteem and affection of her subjects, whom her justice and humanity attached to her person, she crushed every attempt to disturb her power or weaken her authority. The defeat and imprisonment of her son, it is said, preyed deeply on her mind, and tended to shorten her existence. She died 1st Dec. 1252, and was buried at Manbuisson.

BLAND, Richard, a political writer of Virginia, was for some years a principal member of the house of burgesses. In 1763 he was one of a committee to remonstrate with parliament on the subject of taxation; in 1773 one of the committee of correspondence, in 1774 a delegate in congress. He was again chosen a deputy to congress in 1775. Though he declined the appointment from old age, he declared, he should ever be animated, "to support the glorious cause, in which America was engaged." He died in 1778.

BLAND, Theodoric, a patriot and statesman, was a native of Virginia. He was bred to the science of physic; but at the commencement of the revolutionary war, he took an active part in the cause of his country. He soon rose to the rank of colonel and had the command of a regiment of dragoons. In 1779 he was appointed to the command of the convention troops at Albemarle barracks in Virginia. He was chosen a representative from Virginia, in the first congress under the present constitution of the United States. He died in 1790 aged 48.

BLANDRATA, George, an Italian physician, who renewed all the tenets of Arius with respect to the Trinity. He fled from the persecution of the inquisitors of Pavia to Geneva, and afterwards to Poland, where the king, Stephen Batori, made him a privy counsellor. He attempted to make the king a follower to his opinions, but failed. He was strangled by his nephew, a worthless character, to whom he had left his property, 1593.

BLANEY, Benjamin, D.D., a learned theologian and biblical critic, educated at Oxford, at which university he filled the Hebrew professor's chair. He was originally of Worcester college, but quitted it on obtaining a fellowship at Hertford college. He resigned the latter appointment in 1787 for a canonry of Christ-church, with the professorship annexed. The only benefice he enjoyed was the rectory of Polshot, Wilts, which he held till his death in 1801. His theological writings are numerous. Besides a variety of manuscript works, deposited after his death in the library of Lambeth palace, he published in his life time a Dissertation on the Seventy Weeks of Daniel, in 4to; new translations of the books of Zechariah and Jeremiah with the lamentations, and several sermons. But he is principally known as the editor of the Oxford Bible, printed in 1769, and celebrated for the accuracy of its marginal references.

BLANKOF, John Temisz, a Dutch marine painter of considerable eminence. He was born at Alkmaar in 1628, where he became a scholar of Everdingen, and on leaving that master passed some time at Rome. His best pictures represent storms on the coasts of the Mediterranean, in which he combined the truth and nature of the Flemish school, with the grand scenery of Italy.

BLEGNY, Nicholas de, an eminent French surgeon, who gave lectures in his house on the various branches of his profession, which were attended by men of science and learning. He wrote various works on surgery and physic, and also had the management of a journal called New discoveries in all departments of medicine. He died at the latter end of the 17th century.

BLETERIE, John Philip Rene de la, a native of Rennes, who became professor of eloquence in the royal college of Paris, and distinguished himself as author of a life of Julian, two vols. 12mo. and of a life of Jovian, two vols. 12mo. two performances replete with erudition, criticism, and judgment, though the former possesses superior merit. He wrote besides several dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of belles lettres, and translated some of the works of Tacitus with a life of the author, to whose compositions he said he was much indebted. He possessed learning, and in private life and as an ecclesiastic he was an exemplary character. He died 1772, in an advanced age.

BLIN DE SAINMORE, Andrew Michael Hyacinth, was born at Paris, in 1733. At the very outset of his career he lost all his fortune, but his literary talents procured him friends, and he successively filled several honorable offices connected with literature, the last of which was that of conservator of the library of the arsenal. He died in 1807. He is the author of Orpheus, a tragedy, and of many heroic epistles and fugitive poems of no common merit.

BLOCK, Marie Eliezer, an able naturalist of mean parentage at Anspach. Under a surgeon, to whom he was apprenticed, he applied himself deeply to the study of medicine and anatomy, and afterwards turned his attention to natural history. Besides his memoirs on fishes published in the Berlin memoirs, and a treatise on intestinal vermes, he published a valuable work called a general and particular history of fishes, with colored plates. 6 vols. fol. 1785 and 1799. He died 6th Aug. 1799.

BLOCK, Daniel, a portrait painter of Pomernia, who died 1661, aged 81. There were two others of the same family, Jacob and Benjamin, one of whom excelled in architecture and the perspective, and the other in historical pieces and portraits.

BLODGET, Samuel, remarkable for enterprise, was born at Woburn, Mass. Having raised in 1783, by a machine of his invention, a valuable cargo from a ship sunk near Plymouth, he was induced to go to Europe, for the purpose of recovering from the deep, the treasures buried there. In Spain he met with discouragement. His project for raising the Royal George was no better received in England. After his return, he set up a duck manufactory, in 1791; and in 1793, he removed to New Hampshire, and commenced the canal, which bears his name, around Amoskeag falls. This work was not completed by him. He died 1807 aged 84.

BLOEMART, a painter of Gornem in Holland. He was self-taught, but his genius fully supplied the deficiencies of education. His claro obscuro is peculiarly striking, and the folds of his draperies are much admired. He died in 1647, aged 80. His sons Henry and Adrian were also painters, but not his equals in merit.

BLONDEL, David, a protestant minister, born at Chalons 1591. His writings in favor of the tenets which he embraced were universally admired, and for more than 20 times he was appointed secretary to the synods of the isle of France. He was invited to the historical chair at Amsterdam on the death of Vossius, and his great learning supported the character of his predecessor. His application injured his health so much that he lost his sight, but even under that calamity he dictated two folio vols. on the genealogy of the kings of France against Chofflet. He was suspected for a while of Arminianism, and died April 6th, 1655, aged 64. His other works are explications on the eucharist—on the primacy of the church—on bishops and presbyters—on the sibyls—a defence of the reformed churches against Richelieu—a refutation of the history of pope Joan.

BLONDEL, Francis, eminent for his knowledge in geometry, as well as of belles lettres, was professor of mathematics and architecture, and preceptor to the dauphin of France. He travelled with the count of Brienne as his tutor, between 1652 and 1655, of which he published a Latin account. His writings were on architecture—and also on the art of throwing bombs, and on a new manner of fortifying places, besides a comparison between Horace and Pindar. He died Feb. 1st, 1636.

BLONDEL, John Francis, nephew of the preceding, was equally eminent in architectural knowledge. He was born at Ronen, and died Jan. 9th, 1774, aged 69. Besides his course of architecture, six vols. 8vo.—his discourse on architecture, 12mo.—his treatise on the decoration of edifices, two vols. 4to.—he furnished all the articles on that subject in the French encyclopaedia.

BLONDUS, Flavius, a native of Forli in Italy, secretary to pope Eugenius IV. and his two successors. His works were on antiquities, the best known of which are, Roma instaurata—Italia illustrata—de origine & gestis Venetorum.—Histor. Roman. decades tres, from the year 400 to the year 1440. He died 4th June, 1463, aged 75.

BLOOD, Thomas, better known by the name of colonel Blood, was one of Cromwell's officers. After failing in his attempts to seize the castle of Dublin, by the activity of the duke of Ormond, he came to England, where he seized the person of that nobleman, with the diabolical intention of hanging him at Tyburn, which a rescue by his servants happily prevented. His next exploit was to gain access, in the disguise of a clergyman, to the tower, to carry off the crown and regalia, which he might have effected if he had not hesitated, and in a moment of compassion spared the life of the keeper, whom he had devoted to death. Charles II. not only pardoned this bold offender, but admitted him into his presence, and heard him assert that he had once formed a plan to shoot him. He afterwards granted him an estate of 500*l.* per ann. and showed him so much favor, that the wits of the times, alluding to Coventry's fate, said that the monarch kept the ruffian about his person to intimidate his enemies.

BLOOMFIELD, Robert, a poet, born at Honington, in Suffolk, in 1766, was the son of a tailor, and was early left fatherless. He was taught to read by his mother, who kept a village school, and this was, in fact, his only education. At the age of eleven he was employed in such husbandry labor as he could perform; but, his constitution being delicate, he was subsequently apprenticed to the trade of shoemaking, at which he worked as a journeyman for many years. His leisure hours were spent in reading and in the composition of verses. His poem of the Farmer's Boy was at length brought before the public, by the benevolent exertions of Capel Loft, and it procured the author both fame and profit. He subsequently published other poems, among which may be mentioned Wild Flowers, and the Banks of the Wye. Ill health and misfortune clouded the latter years of this modest and meritorious writer, and he died in 1823, when he was almost on the verge of insanity.

BLOOMFIELD, Joseph, governor of New Jersey. He was a soldier of the revolution. In the war of 1812, he was a brigadier general. He died in 1823.

BLOUNT, Thomas, a barrister at law, born at Bordesley, Worcestershire. He was a Roman catholic, and possessed a strong natural genius, which he improved by great application. He died 26th Dec. 1679, author of several respectable publications, viz. Glossographia, interpreting Greek and Hebrew words used in the English language—Jocular customs of some manners—a law dictionary, folio—Boscobel, or the king's escape after the battle of Worcester, and various other works.

BLOUNT, Sir Henry, born at Tittenhanger, Herts, Dec. 15th, 1602, was educated at St. Albans, and Trinity college, Oxford. In 1634 he travelled over France, Spain, and Italy, and afterwards passed to Constantinople and Cairo, and on his return home, two years after, he published an entertaining and popular account of his observations in the Levant. In 1651 he was employed by the parliament to remedy the abuses of the law, and his abilities continued to be directed to the improvement of the trade and navigation of the state. His integrity was admired by all parties, and at the restoration he gained the confidence of his sovereign, was sheriff of Herts in 1661, and passed the last 20 years of his life in literary ease and retirement. He died 9th of Oct. 1692.

BLOUNT, Sir Thomas Pope, son of the preceding, was born 12th September 1649. He was created a baronet by Charles II. and was made member of parliament for St. Albans, and afterwards for Herts in three parliaments. He was a man of extensive erudition, and a warm supporter of liberty. He wrote the popular book "censura celebriorum authorum, besides essays, remarks on poetry, natural history, 12mo. 1693. He died 30th June, 1697.

BLOUNT, Charles, younger son of Sir Henry, was born 27th April, 1654. He was a zealous advocate for liberty, and possessed all the learning of his family. As a friend to the revolution, and to king William, he published a pamphlet, which drew upon him the censures of parliament, for asserting that the monarch was a conqueror. After his wife's death he fell in love with her sister, and the lady, possessed of beauty, wit, and virtue, strongly favored his passion, but as an application to the archbishop was disregarded, and such an union universally reprehended, she refused at last his solicitations, and the lover in despair shot himself, and died a few days after of the wounds, in August, 1693. The best known of his works are his Diana of the Ephesians—his introduction to polite literature—and his life of Apollonius Tyanaeus—and his anima mundi,—in which, however, he cavils at the doctrines of revelation, and shows himself a deist. His works have been edited together by Gildon.

BLOUNT, William, governor of the territory south of the Ohio, was appointed to that office in 1790. In 1796, he was chosen president of the convention of Tennessee. He was afterwards elected by that State to a seat in the United States senate, but was expelled in July, 1797, for having instigated the Creeks and Cherokees to assist the British in conquering the Spanish territories, near the United States. He died at Knoxville, in March 1810, aged 56.

BLOW, John, was born at Collingham, Nottinghamshire, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of music. He was master of the children of the chapel royal, composer to the king, and after Purcell's death, organist of Westminster. His merit procured him a doctor's degree from archbishop Sancroft, he died 10th October 1703, aged 60, and was buried in Westminster-abbey.

BLUCHER, Gebard Lebrecht Von, a celebrated general, was born at Rostock, in 1742, entered the Swedish service at the age of fourteen, and was made prisoner by the Prussians. He joined the banners of Frederic the Great, served during the seven years war, and rose to the rank of captain; but, being disgusted at some real or imagined slight, he demanded his dismissal in such a haughty manner, that Frederic granted it in the following pithy terms—"Captain Blucher has permission to quit the service, and to go to the devil, if he pleases." For many years Blucher lived in retirement, engaged in agricultural pursuits; but, in 1786, he was recalled to the army, with the rank of major. In the campaigns of 1792, 1793, and 1794, he bore an active part, and rose to be major-general. It was not till 1806 that he had an opportunity of again displaying his military talents. In that year he commanded the advanced guard at Auerstadt, and also distinguished himself by his obstinate defence of Lubeck, where he was taken prisoner. He was, however, speedily exchanged for the duke of Belluno. In 1813, he was once more called into the field, and displayed astonishing ardor and activity. He signalized himself at Lutzen, utterly defeated Macdonald on the Katzbach, and contributed greatly to the victory of Leipsic. His unintermitting exertions gained him the rank of field marshal, and from the allied troops, the appellation of "Marshal Forward." In the campaign of 1814, he was alternately victorious and defeated; he sustained heavy losses at Champ Aubert, Montmirail, and Vauxchamps, but triumphed at Dienville and Laon, and in the attack upon Paris. At the conclusion of the contest he visited England, and was received with enthusiasm. When the war again broke out, he was once more entrusted with the command of the Prussian troops. On the sixteenth of June, 1815, he was defeated at Ligny, by Napoleon, and narrowly escaped with his life, he being thrown from his horse, and charged over by both the French and Prussian cavalry. He, nevertheless, brought up his army in time to render the battle of Waterloo decisive. His subsequent conduct at Paris was not that of a generous enemy. For his service he received the title of Prince of Wahlstadt. He died at Krielowitz, September 12, 1819. Blucher was intrepid, indefatigable, prompt in his movements, and undismayed by reverses; but he did not belong to the higher class of military leaders; he is believed to have been but an indifferent strategist, and to have been indebted to general Gnesenau for his most successful plans of operation.

BLUM, Joachin Christian, a German poet, born at Rathenau. He studied at Brandenburg, Berlin, and at Frankfort on Oder, under Baumgarten; and, regardless of public affairs, sought the retirement which his easy fortune allowed him, to devote himself to the muses. His works were lyric poems, idyls, orations, German proverbs, and Rathenau delivered a drama represented at Berlin with success. He died 1790, aged 51.

BLUTAEU, Dom. Raphael, a learned preacher, born in London, of French parents. He went to France, and afterwards to Lisbon, where he died, 1734, aged 96, highly honored by the academy of the appliqués. He wrote a Portuguese and Latin dictionary, in 8 vols. folio, with a supplement of 2 vols. more.

BOADICEA, queen of the Iceni, is known in British and Roman history for the valor which she displayed against the Romans, who had insulted her and abused her daughters. She was afterwards defeated by Paulinus, and killed herself A. D. 60.

BOBROFF, Simon Sergievitch, a Russian poet, who died, in 1810, at Saint Petersburg, enjoyed considerable reputation. His best poem is said to be the Chersonide, or a summer's Day in the Crimea. His lyrical works have been collected in four volumes.

BOCCACE, John, was born at Certaldo in Tuscany, 1313, and intended by his father for a mercantile profession; but after spending six years with a merchant at Florence and Paris, and turning his thoughts to the canon law, he abandoned the pursuits which interest or authority dictated, and devoted himself totally to literature. He studied under his friend and patron Petrarch; and by his suggestions he retired from the tumults and factions of Florence, and visited Naples, where he was received with kindness by king Robert, of whose natural daughter he became enamored; and in his travels in Sicily he met from queen Joan the flattering reception which his writings and merit deserved. He passed the remainder of his life in his native village, where his constitution was weakened by his great application, and where he died, of a sickness in the stomach, 1375. His works are some in Latin and some in Italian. He possessed uncommon learning, and he may honorably be reckoned as one of those whose great exertions contributed most to the revival of learning in Europe. His best known composition is "Decameron," a romance occasionally licentious, but abounding with wit, satire, and elegance of diction. His life of Dante—his genealogy of the gods—his history of Rome and his thesis, are much admired. Though his poetry does not possess the sweetness of Petrarch's lines, his prose is unequalled for its graceful simplicity and varied elegance.

BOCCAGE, Marie Anne le Page, a French lady of Rouen, who, at the age of 16, married Peter Joseph du Boccage, and acquired great celebrity by her writings. She was the friend of the wits of the age, of Voltaire, of Montesquieu, Henault, and others. She obtained a prize from the Rouen academy in 1746, and nearly gained another from the French academy, on the eulogium of Louis XV. against her successful rival Marmontel. Her paradis terrestre, borrowed from Milton, and her translation of the death of Abel, were much admired. Her poems appeared in three vols. 8vo. She died 1802, aged 92.

BOCCALINI, Trajan, a wit, born at Rome, and highly honored by the Italian literati for his political discourses and his elegant criticisms. Under the patronage of cardinals Borghese and Cajetan, he published his Ragguagli di Parnasso, his secretaria di Apollo, and his Pietra di Paragone; but as in this last piece he had attacked the tyranny of the Spanish court, he dreaded its vengeance, and fled to Venice. Here he was attacked in his bed by four ruffians, who killed him, by beating him with bags full of sand. Several reports were spread about his death; but it was generally imagined that it proceeded from the resentment of the Spanish court. The register of St. Mary's in Venice records, that he died of a cholick and fever, 16th November, 1613, aged 57. His works have been translated into several languages.

BOCCONI, Sylvio, was born at Palerino, 24th April, 1633, and became eminent for his knowledge of natural history, in pursuit of which he visited Italy, Malta, Poland, Germany, France, and England. He was of the order of the Cistercians, and died in one of their convents, near Palerino, 22d December, 1704. His valuable publications, in number twelve, are chiefly on subjects of natural history, botany, mineralogy, &c. The best known is musea di piante rare, Venice, 1697—besides icones et descriptiones rariorum plantarum Sicil. Melit. Gallie, Italie, 1674, Lyons and Oxford.

BOCHART, Samuel, a protestant, born at Rouen, 1599. After studying at Paris, Sedan, and Saumur, he visited England and Holland, and enriched his mind with all the treasures of Arabic and of Oriental languages. As minister of Caen, he acquired the public esteem in his theological disputations with father Veron; and his publications added so much to the reputation of his learning, that the queen of Sweden invited him to her court, and received him with all the respect due to merit and virtue. He died suddenly, when delivering an oration in the academy of Caen, May 6, 1667. Besides his geographia sacra, a most learned and valuable book, he wrote a treatise on the terrestrial paradise—sermons, and a history of the animals and of the plants and precious stones mentioned in scripture. His works appeared, three vols. fol. Leyden, 1712.

BODIN, John, a native of Angers, who studied law at Toulouse, where he acquired reputation by his lectures. He came to Paris; but not succeeding at the bar, he devoted himself totally to writing books. His wit, as well as his merit, recommended him to public notice. Henry III. visited and admired him; and in the company of the duke of Alencon he visited England, where he was flattered to see his book on "the republic" approved and read in the university of Cambridge. He died of the plague at Laon 1596. His compositions were numerous and respectable. Besides his republic, he wrote a commentary on Appian—discourses on coins—law table—methods of history, and demonology.

BODLEY, Sir Thomas, celebrated as the founder of the Bodleian library at Oxford, was born at Exeter, 2d March, 1544, and at the age of 12 he removed with his father to Geneva, to avoid the persecutions which awaited the protestants during Mary's bloody reign. In the university of Geneva he had the advantage of attending the learned lectures of Chevalerius, Beroaldus, Calvin, and Beza; and on his return to England, on Elizabeth's accession, he entered at Magdalen college, Oxford; and in 1564 he became fellow of Merton college. Here he distinguished himself as lecturer of natural philosophy, and as proctor of the university; and after travelling four years in France, Germany, and Italy, he was introduced at court, and soon was employed by the queen as an able and faithful negotiator in several embassies to the different courts of Europe. The ingratitude of the great, however, and the cabals and intrigues of courtiers, soon disgusted a mind naturally strong and independent; and in 1597, as he says himself, he abandoned all public business, and retired to ease and privacy. Not ignorant how much mankind are benefited by the propagation of learning, he undertook to enrich his favorite Oxford with the most magnificent collection of books; a task, says Cambden, suited to the dignity of a crowned head. He wrote, February 23, 1597, to Dr. Ravis, the dean of Christchurch, and his offers were accepted with rapture by the university; and after the rarest and most valuable books had been procured, with great trouble and much expense, in every part of Europe, a building, fit to receive so magnificent a collection, was begun, the first stone of which was laid down, with great pomp and solemnity, 9th July, 1610. Bodley did not live to see the completion of this great work; but his fortune, by his will, was applied to the use of the foundation; and his example was followed by the great and opulent, who by liberal donations contributed to the support of the noble institution. Bodley died 29th January, 1612.

BOECLER, John Henry, a native of Franconia, honored for his learning by several princes, and particularly by Louis XIV. and by Christina of Sweden, who appointed him her historiographer, with a liberal stipend. He was professor of history at Strasburg, and died 1686, aged 75. His works were, "commentaries on Pliny and on Grotius," whom he praises with great adulation—"Notitia Sancti Rom. Imp."—"Timur or Tamerlane," and "Historia schola principum."

BOEHM, BOEHMEN, or BEHMEN, Jacob, a German fanatic, was born, in 1575, in a small village, near Georlitz, in Lusatia, and was by trade a shoemaker. Insanely believing, or artfully affecting to believe, that he was favored with revelations and inspirations from the Deity, he published numerous works, and gained many followers. Mosheir justly characterizes his productions as "a strange mixture of chemical terms, mystical jargon, and absurd visions." They also at least verge on spinosism and manicheism. Yet the pious Law became the English editor of them. Boehm died in 1624.

BOERHAAVE, Herman, one of the most eminent of modern physicians, was born, in 1668, at Voorhout, near Leyden. His father, the minister of Voorhout, educated him for his own profession, and he made an honorable progress in his studies. But, on the death of his parent, who left him slenderly provided for, he obtained a subsistence by mathematical lectures, and at length devoted himself to the medical profession. For that profession he had imbibed an early liking, by the circumstance of his having cured himself of an ulcer in the thigh, which had foiled the faculty for six years. He took the degree of M.D. at the university of Harderwick, in 1693. At first his success was limited; but at length he became professor of physical botony at Leyden, and his lectures at once enhanced the fame of the university and established his own. In 1714 he became rector of the university. Patients thronged to him from all quarters, wealth consequently flowed in upon him, and he confessedly stood at the head of modern physicians. From his multifarious knowledge, Boerhaave has been called the Voltaire of science. He died September the 23d, 1738. His works are numerous; among the principal may be mentioned, Institutiones Medicæ; Aphorismi de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis; Index Plantarum; and Elementa Chinæ.

BOETHIE, Etienne de la, of Sarlat in Perigord, died at Gernignan, near Bourdeaux 1563, aged 32. He was eminent as a scholar, and translated several of Plutarch's and Xenophon's works, besides "Voluntary slavery," published after his death by Montagne his friend, to whom he left his library.

BOETHIUS, Anitins Manlius Torquatus Severinus, a celebrated philosopher, made consul at Rome, A. D. 510. He defended his principles against the Arians, and during his confinement by order of Theodoric, king of Italy, he wrote his well known book de consolatione philosophiæ, often published, and translated into English by Alfred. He was put to death, but by what means is unknown, about 524.

BOETHIUS, BOECE, or BOEIS, Hector, was born at Dundee about 1470, and after studying in his native town, and at Aberdeen, he went to Paris, from whence he was recalled to become principal of the college of Aberdeen lately founded by bishop Elphinston. His labors in the cause and promotion of learning were indefatigable, and his college flourished. He wrote the lives of the bishops of Aberdeen in compliment to his patron Elphinston, whose memoirs fill the third part of the work. He afterwards engaged in an history of Scotland, in which he displayed great research and industry, but too much credulity. He has been censured for his fondness for legendary tales, but Erasmus, who knew him, speaks of him as "a man of an extraordinary happy genius, and of great eloquence." The history was afterwards continued from the death of James I. where he concluded, to the reign of James III. by Ferrerius a Piedmontese.

BOGAN, Zachary, a learned English divine, born at Little Hempstone, Devonshire, and educated at St. Alban's hall, and Corpus Christi, Oxford. He wrote comparatio Homerii cum scriptoribus sacris quoad Normann loquendi, 8vo.—a view of the threats and punishments mentioned in scripture, 8vo.—additions to Rons's archæologiæ atticæ—meditations on the mirth of a Christian life, 8vo.—an help to prayer, published after his death, 12 mo. He died 1659, and was buried in Corpus Christi Chapel.

BOILEAU, James, born at Paris, in 1635, was a doctor of the Sorbonne, a canon, and dean and grand vicar of Sens. He died in 1716. He is the author of several theological and other works in the Latin language, the most celebrated of which is the Historia Flagellantium. James Boileau, was caustic and witty. Being asked why he always wrote in Latin, he replied, "for fear the bishops should read me, in which ease I should be persecuted." The Jesuits he designated as men "who lengthened the creed, and abridged the decalogue."

BOILEAU DESPREAUX, Nicholas, a celebrated poet, born at Paris, 1st November, 1636. His father, who left him an orphan before he was 17, had not formed the most promising expectations of the powers of his mind; but the dullness of youth disappeared as he approached to maturity. He applied himself to the law; he was admitted advocate in 1656, but he did not possess the patience and application requisite for the bar, and exchanging his pursuits for the study of divinity, he at last discovered that a degree at the Sorbonne was not calculated to promote the bent of his genius, or gain him reputation. In the field of literature he now acquired eminence and fame. The publication of his first Satires, 1666, distinguished him above his poetical predecessors, and he became the favorite of France and of Europe. His art of poetry added still to his reputation; it is a monument of his genius and judgment, and far surpasses the ars poetica of Horace, in that happy arrangement of his ideas, the harmony of his numbers, and the purity of his language. His Lutrin was written in 1674 at the request of Lamoignon, and the insignificant quarrels of the treasurer and ecclesiastics of a chapel are magnified by the art and power of the poet into matters of importance, and every line conveys with the most delicate pleasantry, animated description, refined ideas, and the most interesting scenes. Louis XIV. was not insensible of the merits of a man who reflected so much honor on the French name; Boileau became a favorite at court, a pension was settled on him, and the monarch in the regular approbation from the press to the works of the author, declared he wished his subjects to partake the same intellectual gratification which he himself had so repeatedly enjoyed. As a prose writer Boileau possessed superior merit, as is fully evinced by his elegant translation of Longinus. After enjoying the favors of his sovereign, Boileau retired from public life, and spent his time in literary privacy, in the society of a few select and valuable friends. He died March 2d, 1711, in his 75th year. As a poet Boileau has deservedly obtained the applauses of every man of genius and taste.

BOIS, Jean du, was born at Paris, and from an ecclesiastic distinguished himself so much in the military service of Henry III. that the monarch always called him the emperor of monks. After the death of his patron, he resumed his clerical character, and became eminent as a preacher, but his boldness in accusing the Jesuits of the murder of Henry IV. drew upon him the resentment of the order, and on his visiting Rome, he was thrown into the castle of St. Angelo, where he died 1626, after a confinement of 14 years. He published some ecclesiastic tracts in Latin, besides a character of Henry IV. and of cardinal Olivier his benefactor.

BOISMORARD, abbe Chiron de, was born at Quimper, with a strong and fertile imagination, and a fund of genuine wit. He did not however possess much sincerity, as, under a fictitious name, he attacked the Jesuits, of whose order he was a member, and afterwards refuted for a considerable sum the calumnies of their unknown aggressor. Some of his memoirs are highly commended, those of the count Philip Augustus are ascribed to him though they bear the name of Madam de Lassan. He died at Paris 1746, aged 60.

BOISROBERT, Francis le Metel de, a native of Caen, known for his wit, his satirical powers, and his facetiousness. He was peculiarly great in the liveliness of his conversation, which was aided by a strong retentive memory, enriched with all the treasures of Boccace and Beroaldus, and he recommended himself by his jokes to cardinal de Richelieu, of whom he became the favorite and the buffoon. He died 1662, aged 70. He wrote some poems, letters, tragedies, comedies, &c. of no considerable merit.

BOISSARD, John James, known as an antiquary, was born at Besancon, 1528. In pursuit of his favorite study he visited Italy, and the islands of the Adriatic, and examined with a most judicious eye the monuments of ancient Peloponnesus; but these valuable remarks were unfortunately destroyed in the ravages to which Franche Comté was exposed from the people of Lorraine. Boissard saved from the general wreck of his labors only the materials from which he published his account of Rome, in four vols. folio. His treatise de divinatione and magicis præstigiis appeared after his death. He died at Metz 1602.

BOISSIEU, Bartholomew Camile de, an eminent physician, born at Lyons 6th August, 1734. His abilities procured him both fame and respectability. He died at the close of the year 1770. He published two treatises which possessed merit, and left another in MS. on the method of purifying the air of hospitals and prisons.

BOISSY, Louis de, was born at Vic in Anvergne, and became at Paris a most popular author, by the sallies of his muse and the genuine delicacy of his wit. But while the favorite of the public, applauded in the theatres and in the coffee-houses, he sunk under the most melancholy dejection through want, and took the fatal resolution of starving himself to death rather than subsist by soliciting relief from the hands either of friendship or of charity. His wife acceded to his measures, and their only child was also made to share this dreadful fate. They were, however, fortunately discovered by a friend, by whom, in the last gasp of expiring nature, and by the tenderest attention, they were restored to life. This extraordinary circumstance excited the pity of the Parisians. Madame de Pompadour no sooner heard of it, than she sent them 100 louis d'ors, and Boissy soon after was made comptroller of the Mercur de France, with a pension for his wife and son if they survived him. His plays are nine vols. 8vo. the most celebrated of which is le babillard. He died in April 1758.

BOIVIN, John, was born at Montreuil l'Argile, and became Greek professor at Paris, and librarian to the king. He was amiable in private life, and died October 29th, 1726, aged 64. He wrote an apology for Homer, and the shield of Achilles, and translated the Œdipus of Sophocles, the birds of Aristophanes, the batrachomyomachia of Homer, and edited the mathematici veteres 1693, in folio, and wrote a life of le Peletier in Latin.

BOKHARI, a learned Arabian, who wrote at Mecca, a book called Techich, in which he has collected 7275 authentic traditions, selected from 100,000 other traditions, all on the Mahometan religion. He has had several commentators to explain him. He died the year 256 of the hegra, leaving a son called Iman Zadeal Bokhari, equally learned and respected.

BOLESLAUS I., first king of Poland, succeeded in 969 his father duke Micislaus. Otho III. gave him the title of king, and made Poland an independent kingdom in 1001. Boleslaus conquered the Moravians, and was a wise and politic prince. He died 1025.

BOLEYN, Anne, daughter of sir Thomas Boleyn, is known in English history, as the wife of Henry VIII. and as the occasion of the reformation. She went to France in the seventh year of her age, and was one of the attendants of the English princess, wife to Louis XII. and afterwards to Claudia the queen of Francis I. and then of the dutchess of Alencon. About 1525 she returned to England, and when maid of honor to queen Catherine, she drew upon herself the attention and the affection of Henry VIII. and by her address in the management of the violence of his passion, she prevailed upon him to divorce his wife, to obtain the possession of her person; and as the pope refused to disannul his marriage, England was separated from the spiritual dominion of Rome. Henry was united to his favorite 14th Nov. 1532, by whom he had a daughter, queen Elizabeth, but his passion was of short duration, and Anne Boleyn so long admired, so long courted by the amorous monarch, was now despised for Jane Seymour, and cruelly beheaded May 19th, 1536. She bore her fate with resignation and spirit; but though branded with ignominy by catholic writers, she must appear innocent in the judgment of impartial men, and her disgraceful accusation of a criminal connection with her own brother and four other persons, must be attributed to the suggestions and malice of that tyrant, who, in every instance, made the law and morality subservient to his lust.

BOLINGBROKE, Henry St. John, Lord Viscount, son of Sir Henry St. John, was born at Batterssea, in Surry, in 1672, and educated at Oxford. He was eminent as a scholar, and as a politician. In 1700 he obtained a seat in parliament, and in 1704 was appointed secretary of war and the marines, but in 1707 resigned the secretaryship. In 1710, he again formed a part of the ministry, as secretary of state, and had a principal share in the peace of Utrecht. In 1712 he was created Viscount Bolingbroke; but, dissatisfied with not having obtained an earldom, and with other circumstances, he became the enemy of his colleague Harley, of whom he had long been the friend. On the accession of George II, an impeachment of Bolingbroke being meditated, he fled to France, and, at length, accepted the office of secretary to the pretender. He was soon, however, dismissed from this new service, and, in the meanwhile, had been impeached and attained in England. After a residence in France till 1723, he was pardoned, and his estates were restored, but he was not allowed to sit in the house of peers. More indignant at this exclusion than gratified by his pardon, he became one of the chief opponents of Sir R. Walpole, and by the power of his pen contributed greatly to the overthrow of that minister. In 1735, he again withdrew to France, and remained there till the death of his father, after which event he settled at Batterssea, where he resided till 1751, when he died of a cancer in the face. Bolingbroke was intimate with and beloved by Pope, Swift, and the most eminent men of his age; his talents were of the first order; he possessed great eloquence; and, in point of style, his writings rank among the best in the English language.

BOLIVAR, Simon, a distinguished chieftain of South America, born in the city of Caraccas in 1783. Having acquired in his native place the elementary part of a liberal education, he went to Europe, and completed his studies at Madrid. Afterwards he visited France, and in 1809 embarked for America. On his return he took an active part in the revolutionary movements in Caraccas. At first he received from the new government a colonel's commission only. This was in 1810. Soon, however, he rose to higher offices, and in 1816 he was universally acknowledged as the liberator and father of his country. At this favorable juncture, through his influence, the republics of New Grenada and Venezuela were united in a simple state under the title of the Republic of Colombia. On the adoption of a constitution in 1821, Bolivar was elected the first president. In 1825 he was declared perpetual protector of the republic of Bolivia, a state which had detached itself from the government of Buenos Ayres, and been named in honor of the liberator. For this republic he was requested to prepare a constitution; which he accordingly completed, and presented to the congress of Bolivia in May 1826. Some of the provisions of this code were considered anti-republican, and excited the liveliest apprehensions among the friends of liberty. A rebellion now demanded his immediate return to Colombia, where all signs of insurrection vanished at his approach. Bolivar had been re-elected to the office of president, and should have been qualified anew as such in January 1827. But in February he addressed a letter to the president of the Senate, renouncing the presidency of the republic, and declaring his intention to repel the accusations that had been made against him, by a voluntary retirement. Notwithstanding the distrust of Bolivar entertained by the friends of the republic, he was reappointed to the presidency, and again accepted it, taking the oaths prescribed by the constitution, in the September following, at Bogata. In 1828 he assumed the chief power in Colombia, by a decree, dated Bogata, Aug. 17, which invested him with almost unlimited authority, but provided that he was to be assisted in the exercise of executive powers by the council of ministers. In January, 1830, Bolivar issued a proclamation resigning his military and political offices; and in May the constituent congress elected Joaquin Mosquera president. In the September following, having been reappointed, Bolivar accepted the presidency, and on the 17th of December died at his country seat, about a league from Santa Martha. On his death, every possible demonstration was made by the people of respect and affection.

BOLLAN, William, a native of England went to Boston in New England about 1740. He was bred a lawyer, and had just received the appointment of collector of customs for Salem and Marblehead, when he was sent to England in 1745 as agent to solicit a reimbursement of the expenses in the expedition against Cape Breton. It was a difficult, toilsome agency of three years, but he obtained at last a full repayment of the expenditure being £188,649 sterling. He was sent again to England as agent and kept in that office till 1762, when he was dismissed. In 1768 or 1769 he obtained from Alderman Beckford copies of 33 letters of Gov. Bernard, which he sent to Massachusetts, being employed as agent by the council, though not by the general court. For this act Lord North exclaimed against him in parliament; but it restored his lost popularity. Mr. Hancock declared in the house of representatives, that there was no man, to whom the colonies were more indebted. In 1775 he exerted himself in recommending to the mother country conciliatory measures. He died in England 1776. He published a number of political tracts, but it is extremely doubtful, whether more than their titles can now be found.

BOLLANDUS, John, a Jesuit of Tillemont in Flanders, possessed of judgment, erudition, and sagacity. He was appointed to collect the materials for the lives of the saints of the Romish church, five vols. of which he published in folio, but died before the completion in 1665. This work, called Acta Sanctorum, was continued by Henschenius and Papebrock, but not finished. There are upwards of 47 vols. replete with matter sometimes interesting, and often tedious.

BOLTON, Robert, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. He resided for some time at Fulham and Kensington, and became acquainted with Mr. Whiston, Pope, and Mrs. Butler, a lady whose respected memory he embalmed in the public papers of the time by the effusions of a warm heart and the language of friendship. He became chaplain to sir Joseph Jekyl, master of the rolls, and after his death to lord Hardwick, by whose friendship and patronage he became dean of Carlisle in 1735. Three years after he obtained St. Mary's vicarage, Reading, where he distinguished himself as an excellent preacher and a good parish priest. He printed some few of his sermons, and late in life he attacked the vices and foibles of the times in small tracts, which displayed good sense, great piety, and deep erudition. He died in London, 26th November, 1763, aged 65.

BOLTON, or BOULTON, Edmund, an eminent antiquary, author of an historical book called Nero Cæsar, dedicated to the duke of Buckingham, in 1624, and valuable for the medals with which it is adorned, and for the curious observations which it contains. He says that the battle of Boadicea with the Romans was fought on Salisbury Plain, and that Stonehenge was erected as her monument. He published, besides elements of armories 1610, 4to.—hypercritica, or a rule of judgments for writing or reading our histories.

BOLTON, Robert, a puritan of great learning and vast powers of oratory. When James I. visited Oxford, 1605, he was appointed as one of the professors publicly to dispute before him, and the reputation which he had acquired was well supported by his numerous publications, the best known of which is his book on happiness. He died with Christian resignation, December 17th, 1631, aged 60.

BOMBASIUS, Paul, a native of Bologna, gained esteem by the profession of philology about the beginning of the sixteenth century. He taught Latin and Greek at Naples, and was professor of Greek at Bologna. His abilities induced Cardinal Pucci to make him his secretary, with a good salary. He lived very easy at Rome with the cardinal, till that city was plundered under Clement VII. when he was killed, while endeavoring to get into the castle of St. Angelo. He was an intimate friend and correspondent of Erasmus, who has preserved some of his letters, and gives him a good character.

BOMBERG, Daniel, an eminent printer, born at Antwerp. He was the first who printed Hebrew books at Venice. He began with an edition of the Bible in 4to. in 1511; and afterwards printed many others in folio, 4to. and 8vo. He printed a folio edition in 1517, with the commentaries of the rabbins, dedicated to pope Leo X., and another under the inspection of Rabbi Jacob Haiim, in four vols. folio, in 1525. He also printed three editions of the Talmud, each of which cost him 100,000 crowns. One of these was begun in 1520, and consisted of 11 folio volumes. He brought the art of printing Hebrew books to such perfection, says Mr. Bayle, that the Jews allege, that since his death the Hebrew printing has continually grown worse.

BONA, John, an ecclesiastic, was born at Mondovi, in Piedmont, 10th October, 1609, and distinguished himself by his learning and his love of solitude. Pope Alexander VII., who knew his merit and his virtues before he was raised to the chair, promoted him to places of honor and consequence, to induce him to settle at Rome, and so well known and esteemed was his character that it was wished he might be elected to fill the papal chair on the death of Clement IX., who had made him a cardinal. Bona was author of several tracts on devotion. He died universally respected, 1674.

BONAC, John Louis d'Usson marquis de, a French nobleman, whose abilities were employed by Louis XIV. in embassies to the courts of Sweden, Poland, Spain, and Constantinople. He possessed all the dexterity, firmness, and dignity requisite for his situation, and to these he added many private virtues and great erudition. He died at Paris, 1738, aged 66.

BONAMY, Peter Nicholas, a native of Louvres, member of the academy of inscriptions, and historiographer of Paris, and known for his learned dissertations, and the most amiable virtues of a private character. He conducted the journal de Verdun, a periodical work of great reputation, and died at Paris, 1770, aged 76.

BONANNI, Philip, a learned Jesuit, known for several works on antiquities and history, the best of which are his recreatio in observat. animal. testaceorum, with near 500 figures, 1694, in 4to.—his collection of the medals of the popes, two vols. fol.

1699—his catalogue of the orders, religious, military and equestrian, with plates, four vols. 4to.—observations circa viventia in non viventibus, 4to. 1691—musæum colleg. Rom. Kircherianum, 1709, fol. He died at Rome, 1725, aged 87.

BONARDI, Jean Baptiste, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne. He was born at Aix, and died at Paris, 1756. He left some manuscripts, the most valuable and curious of which is a dictionary of anonymous and pseudonymous writers.

BONAVENTURE, John Fidauza, a cardinal and saint of the Romish church, born in Etruria, 1221. He was of the order of St. Francis, but so disinterested in his conduct that he refused the archbishopric of York, offered him by Clement IV. When the cardinals disagreed in the election of the pope, he was universally called upon to decide, and he fixed his choice on Theobald, afterwards Gregory X. He died, 1274, highly respected and admired. He was canonized, 1482. His works on subjects of divinity and morals, are in eight vols. fol. 1583. He has been called the seraphic doctor for treating of mystical subjects.

BONCERF, a French writer, who applied himself to the draining of marshes, and wrote a treatise on the hardships of feudal rights. This work proved so offensive to the parliament that they ordered it to be burnt. This increased his popularity, and at the revolution he was promoted, and employed to dismiss that parliament which had voted his disgrace. His services were too great to escape the notice of the revolutionary tribunal, but by the majority of one voice his life was spared. He however soon after died of a broken heart.

BOND, John, an eminent commentator educated at Winchester school and New college. He was elected master of Taunton school, in his native county of Somerset, which, after distinguishing himself as a successful preceptor, he resigned for the practice of physic. He died at Taunton, 3d August, 1612, aged 62. He wrote valuable notes on Horace and Persius.

BOND, Thomas, a distinguished physician and surgeon, was born in Maryland in 1712. After studying with Dr. Hamilton he spent a considerable time in Paris. In 1734 he commenced practice at Philadelphia. The first clinical lectures in the Pennsylvania hospital were delivered by him. He assisted in founding the college and academy. Of a literary society, composed of Franklin, Bartram, Godfrey and others, he was a member in 1743, and an officer of the philosophical society from its establishment. The annual address before the society was delivered by him in 1782, on the rank of man in the scale of being. He died in 1784, aged 72. He published in the London med. inquiries and observations, vol. 1. an account of a worm in the liver, 1754; on the use of Peruvian bark in scrofula, vol. 11.

BONET, Theophilus, a native of Geneva, who, after studying at most of the great universities of Europe, began to practise physic. He was very successful, but after 40 years' experience he was afflicted with deafness and retired to literary ease. He published in his old age several medical treatises, valuable for the facts and observations which they contained. He died of a dropsy 29th March, 1689, aged 69.

BONFADIUS, James, an Italian writer, born near the lake di Garda. He was engaged as the secretary of cardinal Bari, and afterwards of Glinucci, at Rome, but at last he abandoned a court where merit met no reward, and after wandering in different places of Italy, he settled at Genoa, and by reading lectures on the politics and rhetoric of Aristotle he gained popularity, and with the title of historiographer, a handsome pension. In his historical employment he created himself enemies by speaking with unpardonable freedom of several families distinguished in the annals of Genoa, and in revenge for the severity of his remarks some unnatural propensities towards a favorite youth which he had gratified, were revealed to the public eye. The facts were proved, and Bonfadius was sentenced to death, which he suffered in 1560. Before his execution, with the superstitious notions of a visionary, he wrote to his friend Grimaldi, that he would visit him if it were possible in no terrific shape, and report the state of the other world.

BONFINIUS, Anthony, an historian, born at Ascoli in Italy, in the 15th century. He was invited into Hungary by Matthias Corvin, the king of the country, and he was received by the monarch and by his courtiers with kindness, and allowed a liberal pension. He undertook, at the desire of his patron, an history of Hungary, and carried it to the year 1495, in 45 books, which were deposited in the royal library at Buda, and not published before 1568, by Sanbucus. Bonfinius died, as is supposed, in Hungary, about 1502.

BONGARS, James, a native of Orleans, who studied at Strasburg, and after profiting by the instructions of the famous Cujacius in civil law, he devoted himself for 30 years to the service of Henry IV., whom he represented with dignity and firmness at several of the German courts. As a statesman and negotiator he was sagacious and well informed, and as a scholar he possessed an extensive fund of erudition. He published, in the midst of his public avocations, besides his elegant letters, a valuable edition of Justin, and the "gesta dei per Francos," in 2 vols. folio, containing the history of the expedition into Palestine. Bayle speaks of him with high commendation, and represents his style as fine, clear, polite, and full of natural charms. He died at Paris, 1612, aged 58.

BONIFACE, the apostle of Germany, was born in England, and commissioned by Gregory II. to convert the barbarians of the north to Christianity. He was very successful in his mission, and loaded with honors by the pope. He was killed by some of the pagans of Frizland, whom he attempted to convert, 754, aged 74. His writings are obscure and inelegant. His letters were printed 1616.

BONIFACIO, Balthazar, a Venetian, professor of law at Padua, and afterwards bishop of Casio d'Istria. He was author of several learned tracts on history, such as Historia Trevigniana, 4to.—Historia Ludicia, 4to. 1656, besides some Latin poems. He was instrumental in the institution of the academies of Padua and Trevisa, and died 1659 aged 75.

BONJOUR, Guillaume, an Augustine monk, born at Toulouse. He assisted Clement XI. in discovering the errors of the Gregorian calendar, and died in China, where he had been sent as a missionary 1714, aged 44. He was well versed in oriental literature, and wrote some dissertations on scripture, and the coptic monuments of the Vatican.

BONNELL, James, an Englishman, eminent for his virtues and piety. He was born 1653 at Genoa, where his father was a resident merchant, and he came to England when two years old, and was educated at Dublin and Cambridge. He was afterwards tutor in a private family, and wished to enter into the church, but as his father had greatly suffered during the civil wars, he was joined with him in a patent to hold the office of accountant general of Ireland. He discharged the duties of his office with great integrity and honor, and died at Dublin, 1699, universally respected. His funeral sermon was preached by bishop Wettenhall, and his life was written by archdeacon Hamilton 1703, 12mo., in which some of his meditations are introduced.

BONNER, Edmund, bishop of London, was the son of a man of indigent circumstances, born at Harley in Worcestershire, and charitably educated at the expense of the family of Lechmere. He entered 1512 at Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, and by his learning and assiduity he recommended himself to the notice of Wolsey, whose influence procured him several ecclesiastical preferments, and great favor at court. He was made chaplain to the king, and he gained his heart by promoting with all his powers his divorce from Catherine of Arragon. He was sent to Rome to plead the king's cause before Clement VII., but he spoke with such vehemence and indignation against the tyranny of the holy see, that the pope threatened to throw him into a caldron of melted lead, and he escaped from the vengeance of the pontiff only by flight. Bonner's abilities as a negotiator were great, and his manners insinuating, therefore he was ambassador severally to the courts of Denmark, France, and Germany. In 1533 he was nominated to the see of Hereford, by the recommendation of his great friend and patron lord Cromwell, who had now succeeded to Wolsey's honors, and before his consecration he was promoted to London. He had formerly opposed the pope's prerogative only to rise in Henry's favor, but after his death he convinced the public that he was firmly devoted to the catholic faith, and therefore he withstood the measures that were adopted by Edward VI. to spread the reformation, and for his obstinacy he was deprived of his bishopric, and committed to the Marshalsea. This persecution endeared him more in the eyes of Mary, and of her popish ministers; she no sooner ascended the throne than Bonner was restored to his honors, and made president of the convocation in the stead of Cranmer now disgraced. He not only dismissed and excommunicated several of the clergy, but he committed some hundreds to the flames for not renouncing the doctrines of the reformation. On the death of Mary he paid his respects to the new queen, but Elizabeth turned away from a man stained with the blood of suffering innocence, and the bigoted ecclesiastic soon after, when summoned before the council, refused to take the oaths of allegiance, and was again deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned. He died about the tenth year of his confinement, 5th September, 1569, and as he was excommunicated, his body was privately buried at midnight in St. George's church-yard, Southwark, that a public ceremony might not draw more strongly the indignation of the populace against his remains.

BONNET, Charles, a native of Geneva, distinguished by his pursuits in the law by reading la Pluche's spectacle de la nature, and Reaumur's memoirs of insects. Devoted to the studies of natural history and of metaphysics, he made some valuable discoveries in entomology at the age of 20, and when 27, he claimed the public attention by his treatise on psychology and his analytical essay on the mental powers, and his system of physics. He died at Geneva 20th May 1793, aged 73, universally respected as a good Christian and as a benevolent man.

BONNEVAL, Claudius Alexander count de, of Limousin, was allied by blood to the royal family of France. He quitted the French service, where he began to distinguish himself, and followed the fortunes of prince Eugene. His interest, however, at the court of Vienna was ruined by the intrigues of his enemy de Prié, and therefore he offered his services to Russia, and afterwards to Turkey, where he was honorably received, made bashaw of three tails, and appointed to a government, and the command of 30,000 men, at the stipend of forty-five thousand livres a year. As the vassal of the Turkish emperor he quelled a dangerous insurrection in Arabia Petrea, and defeated a large Austrian army on the banks of the Danube. His successes however hastened his disgrace. Though the favorite of the sultan he was disgraced and banished to the island of Chio, from which he was afterwards recalled and restored to places of honor and emolument. He wrote the memoirs of his own life, published London 1755, and died in Turkey, 1747, aged 75.

BONNIER D'ALCO, N., a Frenchman, known in the national assembly and in the convention for his strong republican principles. He was engaged as minister in the conferences with the English ambassador at Lisle, and afterwards at Radstadt; on returning from which he was assassinated by some men in the dress of Austrian hussars, 28th April 1799.

BONNIVET, William Gouffier de, admiral of France, distinguished himself at the siege of Genoa, in 1507, and at the battle of Spurs, in 1513. Francis I. also employed him as a negotiator in England and Germany. Bonnivet afterwards commanded in Spain and the Milanese, opposed peace, committed many military faults, and fell, at last, at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, which was fought by his advice. It was mainly by his intrigues that the constable of Bourbon was driven into rebellion.

BONNYCASTLE, John, was a native of Whitechurch, in Bucks, and, after having been tutor to the sons of the earl of Pomfret, was appointed one of the mathematical masters at Woolwich. He resided there for forty years, and became professor of mathematics to the Royal Military Academy. He died in 1821. As a man of science he enjoys a deserved reputation. Among his various works may be mentioned his Treatises on Geometry, Trigonometry, Algebra, and Astronomy; and his contributions to Rees's Cyclopaedia.

BOONE, Daniel, one of the first adventurers who penetrated into the wilds of Kentucky. From 1769 to 1773, he spent in exploring the wilderness. In Sept. 1773, he commenced his removal to Kentucky, with his own and five other families, and was joined by forty men, who placed themselves under his guidance. Being attacked by the Indians, six of his men were slain, and the cattle belonging to the party dispersed. The survivors returned, in consequence, to the settlements on Clinch river, about forty miles from the scene of action. Boone was employed to buy a tract of country, on the south side of the Kentucky river, from the southern Indians. He performed the service, and soon after made a road from the settlements on the Holston, to the Kentucky river, notwithstanding the incessant attacks of the Indians, in which four of his men were killed, and five wounded. In April, 1775, he built a fort, at a salt spring, on the southern bank of the Kentucky, where Boonesborough is now situated. It consisted of a block house and several cabins enclosed with palisades. In 1777, he sustained two sieges from the Indians. In the following year he was taken prisoner by the savages, while hunting with a number of his men. In May they were conducted to Detroit, where they experienced great kindness from governor Hamilton, the British commander of that post. He even offered the Indians £100 for their prisoner, in order that he might liberate him on parole, but they would not part with him, having conceived for him sentiments of great affection and respect. On his return, he was adopted by one of the principal chiefs at Chillicothe, and might have been happy in this situation, had not the thoughts of his wife and children continually kept alive the desire of escape. This he effected one morning, having risen at the usual hunting hour, and departed, apparently for the woods, but in reality for Boonesborough. He performed a journey of 160 miles in four days, having eaten, it is said, but one meal during that time. On the 8th of August, a body of savages, to the number of 450, commanded by Canadian Frenchmen, and some of their own chiefs, invested the fort, with British colors flying. Boone was summoned to surrender, but announced his determination, and that of the garrison, which amounted to but fifty men, "to defend the fort as long as a man of them was alive." The enemy then attempted to obtain it by stratagem; they requested that nine of the principal persons of the garrison would come out and treat with them, promising terms so favorable, that the invitation was accepted. After the articles of the treaty had been signed, Boone and his companions were told, that it was customary, upon such occasions, among the Indians, for two of them to shake each white man by the hand, in order to evince the sincerity of their friendship. This was also agreed to; and accordingly, two Indians approached each of the nine, and taking his hand, grappled him, with the intent of making him prisoner. Their object being then immediately perceived, Boone and his party extricated themselves, and retreated into the fort, amid a heavy fire from the savages. An attack was then quickly commenced, and continued till the 20th of August, when the enemy abandoned the siege. This was the last attempt of the Indians to possess themselves of Boonesborough. Till 1798, alternately, in Kentucky and Virginia, Boone had his residence. In that year, he removed to Upper Louisiana, where he received a grant from the Spanish curiosities of 2000 acres of land. His children, friends and followers were also presented with 800 acres each. He settled with them on the Missouri river, at Charrette, some distance beyond the inhabited parts of the country, where he followed his usual course of life, hunting and trapping for bears, until Sept. 1322, when he died, aged 85.

BOOT, Arnolt, a Dutch physician, author of animadversiones ad textum hebraicum, in which he ably defended the Hebrew text of scripture against Morin and Cappel. He wrote also some medical treatises; and died at Paris, 1653.

BOOTH, Birton, a celebrated actor in the reigns of Anne and George I., was born in 1681, in Lancashire, and was educated at Westminster school, under Dr. Busby. At the age of seventeen, however, he joined a strolling company of players; his talents, at length, gained him a footing on the regular theatre; his popularity continually increased; and his performance of Cato, in 1712, set the seal upon his histrionic reputation. In 1715, he became one of the joint patentees and managers of Drury Lane theatre. He died in 1733. Booth was the author of a mask called Dido and Eneas, and of some songs and minor pieces.

BOOTH, Abraham, a clergyman of the Baptist persuasion, was born at Blackwell, in Derbysire, in 1734, of poor parents. He had consequently but little education, and at an early age was placed with a stocking-weaver. He studied the Scriptures diligently, however, and became so well versed in them as to be called to the ministry among the Baptists, and he at the same time opened a school at Sutton, Ashfield. In 1769, he was ordained pastor of the church in Prescott street, Goodnan's fields, where he exercised his charge in a great professional conduct and a spotless character till his death, in 1806. He wrote the Reign of Grace; Glad Tidings to Perishing Sinners; The Death of Legal Hope, the Life of Evangelical Obedience; an Essay on the Kingdom of Christ; Pastoral Cautions; Pædobaptism Examined, and some other works.

BOOTH, Henry, earl of Warrington, distinguished as a statesman, was member of several parliaments for Chester under Charles II. He strenuously opposed the papists, and zealously promoted the exclusion of the duke of York; and to this resistance to the views of the court, he probably owed the confinement which he endured three times under the reign of James II. He was tried for treason, but he was acquitted, in spite of the efforts of Jeffries and the court; and in his retirement he favored the cause of freedom and of William of Orange. At the revolution he was advanced to high offices; but as he wished to check the royal prerogative, William dismissed him from his employments, not without complimenting his great services with a pension of 200*l.* and the earldom of Warrington. He died 2d January, 1694, aged 41.

BORDA, John Charles, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer, was born at Dax, in Gascony, in 1733; served as an engineer in the French army in 1757; then became a naval officer; accompanied Pingré, in 1771, on a voyage to the South Sea, to make experiments on timekeepers; was captain of the Solitaire, in 1781, and displayed great gallantry in an action with the English; was employed with Delambre and Mechain in measuring an arc of the meridian; and died in March, 1799. He invented the reflecting circle, and a mensuration rod, and made many improvements in hydraulics, and experiments to determine the length of the pendulum.

BORDE, or BOORDE, Andrew, a physician, born at Pevensey, about 1500, was educated at Oxford, and travelled all over Christendom, and a part of Africa. He settled at Winchester, and afterwards at London, at which latter city he died in the Fleet, in 1549. He is the author of various works, among which are a Book of the Introduction of Knowledge; the Breviary of Health; and Merry Tales of the Madmen of Gotham.

BORDE, John Benjamin, a French writer, born at Paris, 5th September, 1734. He was at first the valet of Louis XV., and on the monarch's death was appointed farmer-general. Naturally fond of literature, he cultivated it in the midst of business, and wrote some learned works. His essays on ancient and modern music, 4 vols. 4to. 1780—memoires historiques de Concy, 2 vols. 8vo.—pieces interessantes for the history of Louis XIII. and XIV. 12mo.—letters on Switzerland, 2 vols. 8vo.—abregé cronique, 8vo.—history of the South sea, 3 vols. 8vo.—Swinburne's travels translated—besides a valuable collection of airs, in 4 vols. 8vo. are very interesting proofs of his taste and assiduity as a lover of music, and as an author. During the revolution, he retired to Rouen, in hopes of passing the rest of his life in repose, but the satellites of Robespierre discovered him, and he was guillotined 22d July, 1894, aged 60.

BORDEU, Theophilus de, was born February 22, 1722, at Ieste in the valley of Ossan in Bearn, and early distinguished himself at the university of Montpellier, where, at the age of 20, he held a thesis de sensu generice considerato, in so learned a manner as to astonish his auditors. He gained great reputation at Paris, and though he had enemies as a physician, he gained the esteem and the approbation of the learned, the judicious, and the great. His constitution was early impaired by a flying gout, and a deep melancholy, and he expired under an attack of apoplexy 24th November 1776. He published nine different treatises on anatomical and medical subjects, much admired for the information and judicious remarks which they convey.

BORDLEY, John Beale, a writer on agriculture. He was of the profession of the law, and before the revolution was a judge of the superior court, and court of appeals of Maryland. He had also a seat at the executive council of the province. He found our revolution necessary to our freedom, and he rejoiced in its accomplishment. His habitual and most pleasing employment was husbandry; which he practised extensively upon his own estate on Wye island in the bay of Chesapeake. He died in 1804 aged 76. He published Forsyth's treatise on fruit-trees with notes; sketches on rotation of crops, 1792; essays and notes on husbandry and rural affairs with plates, 1799, and 1801; a view of the courses of crops in England and Maryland, 1804.

BORE, Catharine Von, a nun of the convent of Nimptschen, near Wittenburg, who, with eight others, quitted the veil on the first dissemination of Luther's principles. The many qualities of her mind, the beauty of her person, and the heroic features of her conduct, recommended her to the notice of the great reformer, who loved her, and, though far more advanced in life, married her, in her 26th year. Luther reaped in her fidelity both happiness and instruction; and though the tongue of malevolence propagated reports to the discredit of her virtue, it must appear incontrovertible, that the affections of her husband were bestowed on none but a woman of delicacy and virtue. After a hospitable and exemplary life, she died 1552, aged 53, leaving three sons, Paul, Martin, and John.

BORELLI, John Alphonsus, was born at Naples, 28th Jan. 1608, and distinguished himself as philosopher and mathematician at Florence and Pisa, under the patronage of the house of Medici. As he was concerned in the revolt of Messina, he fled to Rome for safety, where the kindness of Christina, queen of Sweden, alleviated his distress, and supported his fortunes. He there taught mathematics, and died of a pleurisy, 31st Dec. 1679, aged 72. He wrote 13 different treatises in Italian and Latin, highly esteemed for the erudition and scientific knowledge which they contain. That "de motu animalium," in two parts, is particularly quoted by authors as a book of superior merit.

BORGHESE, Marie Pauline, princess, originally Bonaparte, sister of Napoleon, was born in 1780, at Ajaccio. Her first husband was general Leelere, and, after his death in 1802, she married the prince Camillo Borghese. With Napoleon, who loved her tenderly, she had many disputes, and as many reconciliations; for if he was capricious, she was also proud. Before the battle of Waterloo she placed all her diamonds, which were of great value, at his disposal; and they were in his carriage, which was taken in that battle, and exhibited in London. She lived, afterwards, separated from her husband, at Rome; where her house was the centre of refined and fashionable society. She died at Florence, in June, 1825.

BORGIA, Cæsar, a natural son of pope Alexander VI. He no sooner heard of his father's exaltation to the papal chair, than he left Pisa, where he was fixed for his education; but the ambitious prospects which he had formed in his aspiring mind, were a little obscured by the coldness with which Alexander received him. He complained to his mother Vanozza, who for a while quieted his impatience, but he was dissatisfied to see the dukedom of Gandia conferred upon his elder brother Francis, whilst the primacy of Valenza was reserved for himself. Afterwards, by the influence of his mother, whose greatest favorite he was, a preference to three other sons and a daughter called Lucretia, the dignity of cardinal was conferred upon him, and he became the friend and confidant of his father's counsels. The elevation of Francis, however, to secular power continued to excite his jealousy, so that at once to gratify malice and revenge, he caused his unhappy brother to be murdered by assassins, and thrown into the Tiber, where his mangled carcass was a few days after found. The pope bitterly lamented his fate, but all his inquiries after the murderer were silenced by Vanozza, who, justly suspected as an accomplice, terrified the astonished father, by declaring that if he did not desist, the same dagger was ready to stab him to the heart. Cæsar succeeded to his brother's honors and fortune, and now he resigned the dignity of cardinal, that he might with greater latitude gratify his avarice, ambition, and enmity. Bands of assassins were kept around him, who sacrificed to his pleasure both friends and foes; but his murderous schemes proved nearly fatal. United with his father in the attempt to poison nine newly created cardinals, that they might seize their possessions, the wine was by mistake brought to them, so that Cæsar escaped with difficulty by the power of antidote and strength of constitution, the pope died of it. His crimes were now too public to be unnoticed. Though lately raised to the dukedom of Valentinois by Louis XII. he was stripped of all his dignities, and sent a prisoner to Spain, but he escaped to the court of his brother-in-law, John, king of Navarre; and after trying in vain to restore his fallen fortunes, he engaged in the civil war, by which his brother's kingdom was distracted, and was killed by the stroke of a spear under the walls of Viana, 12th March, 1507.

BORIS, Gudenou, an intriguing officer, regent of Muscovy under Foedor. He assassinated Demetrius the brother of Foedor and afterwards Foedor himself, and thus obtained the sovereign power. His success was however of short duration, Griska an impostor arose who pretended to be Demetrius who had escaped from the dagger of his murderers, and as his cause was espoused by many adherents, and the vaivode of Sandouir, he was enabled to attack Boris, who died of a broken heart 1605. The infant son of Boris was proclaimed by the Boyards in opposition to the new usurper, but the fortunes of the false Demetrius prevailed, and the son of Boris and his mother were murdered 10th June, 1605.

BORLACE, Edmund, M. D. son of sir John Borlace, lord justice of Ireland, was educated in Dublin, and afterwards studied at Leyden and Oxford, in which places he took his degrees. He died at Chester, in 1682, where he had practised with great reputation. He wrote several books chiefly on the history and antiquities of Ireland, 1680, in folio.

BORLASE, William, L. L. D. was born at Pendeen in Cornwall, second of February, 1696, and educated at Penzance and Plymouth, from whence he removed to Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was made rector of his native parish, St. Just in Pendeen, by lord King in 1732, and from that circumstance, his genius was now directed with all the judgment of a man of science, to investigate the curiosities, the mineral and metallic fossils which surrounded him. He published the antiquities of Cornwall in fol.—observations on the Sicilly islands, 4to.—and the natural history of Cornwall, folio, works universally and deservedly admired, besides communications to the philosophical transactions. He enriched likewise the Ashmolean museum at Oxford, with several curious remains of antiquity, and he beautified the grotto of Twickenham for his poetical friend Pope. He died 31st August, 1772, aged 77.

BORN, Ignatius, a German baron, born at Carlsburg. He resided at Prague, where he devoted himself to mineralogy and natural history. Besides some valuable treatises on these subjects, he wrote a satire on the monks, in which he classed them, after the system of Linnæus. He died 1791, aged 49.

BORRI, Joseph Francis, a native of Milan, who distinguished himself by his extravagant pretensions as a chemist, a heretic, and a quack. After playing for some time the prophet at Rome, he returned to Milan, where he attached to himself great multitudes, from whose credulity he exacted an oath of secrecy, while the riches of individuals were permitted to flow into his hands, with the expectation that the kingdom of God, like a general fold, was going to be established on earth. His schemes were so well concerted that he nearly seized the sovereign power by means of his adherents, till, being discovered, he secured himself by flight, whilst the inquisition passed sentence of condemnation on his character, and publicly burnt his effigy and his writings in 1660. From Strasburg, where he had retired, he came to Amsterdam, and there for some time figured as a character of superior dignity and uncommon virtues. He was respected, and courted as an universal physician, till a revolution in his fortune drove him away from the country, loaded with the borrowed jewels of the credulous Hollanders. At Hamburg he obtained the protection of Christina, queen of Sweden, by pretending to find the philosopher's stone; and he gained the same confidence at Copenhagen from the King of Denmark. Though his hypocrisy at last became known to his illustrious patrons, he gained his wishes in the liberality of their rewards, and attempted to retire to Hungary. Being however accidentally seized as a spy, his name was reported to the emperor of Germany in the presence of the popish nuncio, who claimed him as an excommunicated heretic. The emperor consented, provided his life was spared, and Borri was conveyed to Rome, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, which was however softened by the interference of the duke of Estrées, whom he cured in a dangerous illness. He died at the castle of St. Angelo, in 1695, aged 70.

BORRICHUS, Olaus, a native of Denmark, educated at the university of Copenhagen, of which he became a learned professor in poetry, chemistry, and botany. After practising with great reputation as a physician, and refusing the rectorship of the famous school of Heslow, he began to travel, and, like a man of erudition and sound sense, he visited Holland, England, France, Italy, and Germany, and after an absence of six years returned to his native country in 1666. His genius procured him the friendship of the literati of Europe, and the rectitude of his principles the patronage of his sovereign. He died in October, 1690, aged 64. He published several tracts in Latin, on subjects of chemistry, philosophy, and antiquities.

BORROMEIO, Charles, a saint of the Romish church, was born 2d October, 1538, and early patronized by his maternal uncle, pope Pius IV. who made him a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, though only 22 years of age. These high dignities and others which were lavished upon him were due to his merit and his virtues. Barromeo was an example of meekness and piety: he reformed the abuses of his clergy, gave largely relief to the necessitous, and provided institutions for the reclaiming of profligate and debauched women. This zeal in the cause of humanity however enraged the Humiliés, an order which he attempted to reform; and one of the brethren, Farina, fired a gun at the worthy prelate while in prayer with his domestics. The shot was not fatal, and the assassin was deservedly punished. During a dreadful pestilence the attentions of Borromeo to the distressed of every description were unusually exemplary; yet ingratitude and persecution generally await the good and benevolent. This great and good man died 3d Nov. 1594, aged 47, and his name was canonized by Paul V. in 1710. He wrote several works on doctrinal and moral subjects, in 5 vols. folio.

BORROMEIO, Frederick, was cousin to the preceding, and like him a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, and also the copy of his excellent character. He founded the Ambrosian library, and died 1632. He wrote some theological tracts.

BORROMINI, Francis, an architect of Bissone, who acquired much reputation at Rome, though in his rivalry with le Bernin, he deviated from that simplicity and those received rules which taste and judgment have always pronounced the basis of the beautiful. He died in consequence of a wound which he had given himself in a fit of madness, 1667.

BOS, Lambert, an eminent philologist and scholar, was born, in 1670, at Woreum, in Friesland; became a Greek professor at Franeker, in 1704; and died, of consumption, in 1717. His most popular production is an excellent work on Greek ellipses. He published an edition of the Septuagint, with a prolegomena and various readings.

BOSC, Louis Augustus William, a French naturalist and agricultural writer, was born in 1759, at Paris, and died there in 1823. In 1784 he was appointed secretary of the post office, and was subsequently promoted to a still higher station in that office. In 1793 he was driven from his place by the jacobins, and he took up his residence in the forest of Montmorency, where he lived for three years in solitude, and devoted himself to the study of natural history, to which he had always been partial. His latter years were wholly devoted to science. Among his numerous works are a History of Shells, Worms, &c.; two Dictionaries of Agriculture; and a New Dictionary of Natural History.

BOSC, Pierre du, son of an advocate of Rouen, was born at Bayeux, 21st February, 1623. He was made protestant minister at Caen at the age of 23, and maintained with spirit and success the doctrines he had embraced. When Louis XIV. published some severe proclamations against the protestants, Bosc obtained a royal audience, and disarmed the rigor of the catholics; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired to Holland, where he became minister of the church of Rotterdam, till his death, second January, 1692. His sermons, in four vols. 8vo. are masterly proofs of his genius and oratorical eloquence. Two other vols. in 8vo. consisting of several detached pieces, were also printed after his death.

BOSCAN, John of Barcelona, by his residence at Venice, introduced the Italian rhyme into the poetry of his country, and distinguished himself by the elegance of his diction and the majesty of his lines. He wrote Medina, 4to. published 1544, and Salamanca, 8vo. 1547, two poems, besides some admired sonnets, and died 1543.

BOSCAWEN, Edward, a celebrated admiral, was born 1711, in Cornwall, and early devoted to the sea service. In 1740 he was appointed to the command of the Shoreham, and distinguished himself at Porto Bello, and also at Carthage, where at the head of a few seamen he took a battery though annoyed by the most tremendous fire. In 1744 he obtained the Dreadnought of 60 guns, and took the Media commanded by Hocquart, who again fell into his hands at the battle off Cape Finisterre, under Anson three years after. He was sent, in 1747, as commander of an expedition to the East Indies, with the rank of rear admiral of the blue, and though he was unsuccessful in his blockade of Pondicherry, on account of the monsoons, he had the good fortune to take Madras. On his return, during the peace which followed, he was made one of the lords of the admiralty, and in 1755 he was sent to intercept a French squadron in North America, and had the singular fortune of again taking prisoner for the third time Hocquart in one of the two ships which surrendered to his arms. In 1758, he was joined with lord Amherst, and succeeded in the capture of Cape Breton, and Louisburg. In 1759 he went to the Mediterranean, and upon the sailing of the French fleet through the straits he immediately left Gibraltar to pursue with all speed the admiral de Clue, and took three of his ships and burnt two in Lagos bay. These great services were acknowledged by the gratitude of the parliament and the applauses of the nation: the admiral was in 1760 made general of marine, with a liberal salary of 3000*l.* a year, but he did not long survive these honors. He died 10th Jan. 1761.

BOSCOVICH, Joseph Roger, a geometrician and Jesuit, born at Ragusa, 18th May, 1711, and professor of mathematics at Rome, Pavia, and Milan. Upon the suppression of the Jesuits, he came to France, and afterwards retired to Milan, where he died 12th Feb. 1787. As his knowledge of optics, geometry, and metaphysics was very extensive, he was usefully employed by some of the Italian states, in measuring a degree in Lombardy, and he deserved likewise the patronage of the public by his elegant poetry. His works are on mathematical subjects. He travelled over the greatest part of Europe, and greatly improved the theory of achromatic glasses. His poem de solis & lune defectibus is much admired.

BOSSU, Rene le, was born at Paris, 16th March, 1631, and after studying at Nanterre, he became canon of St. Genevieve. He devoted his time to divinity, and particularly to belles lettres, on which he read lectures in several religious houses. He published a comparison between Aristotle's and des Cartes' philosophy, and a treatise on epic poetry, the best composition ever written on the subject in French, according to Boileau his friend and favorite. He left several MSS. preserved in the abbey of St. John des Chartres, and died March, 1680.

BOSSUET, James, was born at Dijon, 27th September, 1627, and studied in the college of Navarre at Paris. He distinguished himself as a preacher at Paris, and his great erudition recommended him so much, that he was made preceptor to the Dauphin in 1669, to whom he dedicated his discourse on universal history, in 1681. His merits raised him to further offices of honor and trust; he became bishop of Condam, and afterwards of Meaux, and in 1695 he was made superior of the college which had contributed to the education of his early years. His writings gained universal admiration. As a catholic he displayed firmness and moderation, and it is said that his strong appeals to the protestants, in his doctrines of the catholic church, drew away many back from the new tenets to the pale of the Romish church. His history of the protestant churches, and his history of France, are well known, but his funeral orations, delivered in honor of the memory of the princes and great men of the time, possess peculiar sublimity. After a life spent honorably in the defence of the religion which he had embraced, he died at Paris, 12th April, 1704. His works appeared at Paris together, 12 vols. 4to. 1743.

BOSTON, Thomas, M. A. a native of Dumse in Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, and minister of Simprin and afterwards of Etterick, where he died of a scorbutic disorder, 20th May, 1732, aged 36. He wrote a well-known book, "Human Nature in its fourfold state."

BOSTWICK, David, a respectable American divine, was a native of New-Milford, Conn. born in 1721. At the age of 15 he entered Yale College, and graduated after the usual course of study. On leaving college, he was engaged as an instructor in an academy at Newark, New-Jersey, under the inspection of the Rev. Aaron Burr, afterwards president of the college of New-Jersey. He was ordained to the ministry, and installed pastor of the presbyterian church of Jamaica, Long-Island, October 9th, 1745. Here he remained for more than ten years. In 1756, he accepted the pastoral charge of the first presbyterian church in the city of New-York, in which he continued eminently beloved and useful, until the year 1768, when he was removed by death. Mr. Bostwick possessed an impressive, commanding eloquence, to which few attain; and the ardor of his piety, together with the purity of his life, and the solidity of his judgment, gave him a strong hold on public esteem.

BOSWELL, James, the Biographer of Dr. Johnson, eldest son of Alexander Boswell, lord Auchinleck, one of the Scotch judges, was born at Edinburgh, 29th October, 1740. He studied civil law in the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and though inclined to a military life, he followed at last the advice of his father, and was called to the Scotch bar. A desire of acquiring knowledge by observation, induced him to visit foreign countries, and after crossing Germany and Switzerland, and paying his respects to the poet of Ferney and to the philosopher of Geneva, he left Italy to examine Corsica; and the kindness of Paoli was therefore repaid by deserved encomiums in the history which he published of that island; a volume which has to add to the commendation of Johnson the labors of Dutch, German, Italian, and French translators. He returned to Scotland in 1766, and three years after he was at the famous Jubilee at Stratford on Avon, where he supported at a masquerade the favorite character of an armed Corsican chief. As his intimacy with Johnson was founded upon the basis of reciprocal esteem, it is a happy circumstance that he began early to collect and digest the materials for the life of this extraordinary man, and therefore the publication of the work in 1790 was received with that avidity from the public which is the best tribute to the memory of an illustrious character, as well as to the judicious execution of the biographer. Besides Dr. Johnson's life, he published an account of his tour to the Hebrides with the great moralist—two well-known letters to the people of Scotland, and essence of the Douglas cause, when it so much engaged the public attention. Boswell had a strong predilection for the literary enjoyments of London, and he not only visited the capital frequently, but at last settled there in 1785, and was called regularly to the English bar. He died 19th June, 1795, aged 55

BOTH, John and Andrew, two Flemish painters. They were so fond of each other, that their pictures were generally executed in common. John, who was the disciple of Abraham Bloemart, imitated Claude Lorraine, and his brother copied the manner of Barboche. John was drowned 1650, in the canal of Venice, and the other died at Utrecht 1656.

BOTHWELL, James Hepburn, earl, is known in Scotch history for his marriage with queen Mary. It is supposed by some historians that he was deeply concerned in the murder of the unfortunate Darnley, Mary's husband, and that he was even supported by the deluded queen; but though suspected, his innocence was inferred from his acquittal upon the trial. If the death of Darnley did not seem to pave the way to his elevation, he made himself sure, by seizing the queen at Edinburgh, and carrying her a prisoner to Dunbar castle, where he prevailed upon her by violence to yield to his wishes and to marry him, after he had divorced his own wife. Though seemingly thus secure in the possession of power, and though created earl of Orkney by the unfortunate queen, he soon found that his conduct had roused the indignation of the kingdom. Mary found not in him that fond husband she expected, and Bothwell became unkind and brutal. A confederacy was formed against him by the barons, the queen was liberated from his power, and the disgraced husband escaped to the Orkneys, and afterwards to Denmark, where he died, 1577.

BOTT, John de, an architect born in France, of protestant parents. He was in the military service of king William III. and afterwards of the king of Prussia, and of the elector of Saxony, king of Poland. The arsenal of Berlin, the fortifications of Wesel, and several public edifices at Dresden, are monuments of his architectural genius. He died at Dresden, 1745, aged 75.

BOTZARIS, Mark, one of the gallant defenders of liberty in modern Greece, was born in Albania, in 1780, and is said to have been, at an early period of his life, in the French service. When the Greeks rose to throw off the Ottoman yoke, he ardently espoused the cause of his country, and was chosen stratach of Western Greece. The Turks having invaded Etolia with a large army, he, at the head of two hundred and fifty volunteers, made a nocturnal attack on the enemy's camp, and put great numbers of them to the sword; but, towards the close of the contest, he received a mortal wound. His companions in arms, by a desperate effort, succeeded in bearing him from the field, and he expired at Missolonghi on the following day, August 23, 1823.

BOVADILLA, or BOBADILLA, Don Francisco de, a Spaniard, raised from obscurity to be governor general of the Indies in 1500. His conduct in his office was haughty and tyrannical; but when he had the presumption to load with irons, and to send as prisoners to Europe, Diego Columbus, and his illustrious brother, to whose zeal the discovery of America was due, Ferdinand and Isabella repented of their choice. The noble sufferers were treated with distinction, Ovando was sent to supersede Bovadilla, who, however, never reached his native home, as the fleet of twenty-one ships on board of which he was, were shipwrecked, and, with an immense quantity of gold, sunk to the bottom, 1502.

BOUCHARDON, Edmund, a native of Chaumont in Bassigni, who devoted himself to the study of sculpture, and after he had perfected himself at Rome, adorned Paris with various monuments of his genius. He was highly honored by the king and by the academy, and his amiable manners and his exalted and independent spirit deserved the distinction. Count de Caylus wrote his life. He died 1672, aged 64.

BOUCHAUD, Matthew Anthony, a native of Paris. From advocate of the parliament, he became professor of the law of nature in the university, and distinguished himself by his publications. Besides various articles in the encyclopædia, he wrote a commentary on the laws of the 12 tables with interesting notes—poetical antiquities—translations of Juliet Mandeville, an English novel, and the dramas of Apostolo and Zeno. He died 1804, aged 85.

BOUCHER D'ARGIS, Antoine Gaspard, born 1708, was an advocate of Paris, counsellor of the council of Dombes, and author of some respectable publications on law subjects. He wrote all the articles on jurisprudence in the encyclopædia from the second volume.

BOUCHER, John, a seditious doctor of the Sorbonne during the French civil wars. He severely inveighed in his sermons and writings against Henry III. and afterwards against Henry IV., and when Paris submitted to the conqueror he retired into the Netherlands, where he died dean of the chapter of Tournay, 1644, aged 94.

BOUCHER, Pierre, governor of Trois Rivières, in Canada, died at the age of nearly 100 years. He was sent to France to represent the temporal and spiritual wants of the colony; and published in 1664 an account of Canada, entitled, Histoire véritable et naturelle des moeurs et productions.

BOUCHER, Jonathan, a learned archæologist, was a native of England, but came to America at the age of sixteen. He was educated for the episcopal church, and was appointed rector of Hanover, and then of St. Mary, Virginia. Gov. Eden gave him also the rectory of St. Anne, Annapolis, and of Queen Anne, in Prince George's county. At the beginning of the revolution in 1775, he returned to England, declaring in his farewell sermon, that as long as he lived, he would say with Zadock, the priest, and Nathan, the prophet, "God save the king." He was appointed vicar of Epsom; and there he spent the remainder of his life. He died in 1804 aged 67. He was esteemed one of the best preachers of his time. During the last fourteen years of his life, he was employed in preparing a glossary of provincial and archæological words, intended as a supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. The manuscripts of Mr. Boucher were purchased of his family, by the proprietors of the English edition of Dr. Webster's Dictionary. He published in 1799 a view of the causes and consequences of the American revolution, in fifteen discourses preached in N. America, between 1763 and 1775, dedicated to Washington, containing many anecdotes, illustrative of political events; also two sermons before the grand juries of Surry and Cumberland, 1799.

BOUCHIER, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, is known as the first person who encouraged printing in England. He sent two persons to Haerlem, where the art was then beginning to flourish, and they were artful enough to bribe one of the compositors of the press, to embark with them, and to bring with him a set of letters. This useful foreigner was settled at Oxford, 1464, and thus that university may claim the honor of printing next to Mentz and Haerlem. Bouchier has been accused of avarice; but it should not be forgotten that the persons he sent to Holland were provided with a thousand marks, 300 of which were his own. He died 1486.

BOUCICAUT, marshal de France, and viscount Turenne, surnamed John de Meingue, was emiment as a warrior, and went with Nevers against Bajazet, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Nicopolis. He was for some time governor of Genoa for Charles VI. of France, but while he seized Milan, all the French were massacred at Genoa, and he himself was defeated, and escaped with difficulty across the Alps. He afterwards distinguished himself against the Turks and Venetians. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and died in England 1421. He was fond of music, and some of his ballads are still preserved as possessing merit.

BOUDINOT, Elias, LL. D., was born in Philadelphia, May 2, 1740. He studied the law, and became eminent in that profession. At an early period of the revolutionary war, he was appointed, by congress, commissary-general of prisoners. In the year 1777, he was chosen a member of congress, and in 1782, was made president of that body. After the adoption of the constitution he entered the house of representatives, where he continued six years. He then succeeded Rittenhouse as director of the mint of the U. States, an office which he resigned in the course of a few years, and lived from that time at Burlington, New Jersey. He devoted himself earnestly to Biblical literature, and being possessed of an ample fortune, made munificent donations to various charitable and theological institutions. The American Bible society, of which he became president, was particularly an object of his bounty. He died 1821, aged 82.

BOVEY, Catharine, married, at the age of 15, William Bovey, a gentleman of opulence and respectability in Gloucestershire. To the greatest personal charms she united the most benevolent character, and all the mild virtues and benign charities of private life, so that she is deservedly extolled by sir Richard Steele in his dedication of the two vols. of his ladies' library. She was left a widow early, and died at Haxley, in Gloucestershire, 1726, aged 57. Her maiden name was Riches.

BOUFFLERS, Stanislaus, Marquis of, a descendant of the duke, was born at Luneville, in 1737, and was celebrated for wit, talents, accomplishments, and elegance of manners. He early embraced a military life, and became a knight of Malta, and governor of Senegal. During the revolution he emigrated to Berlin, and was chosen a member of the Academy of that city. He died at Paris, in 1815. His poems are polished and playful, but some of them are licentious; his prose works also have considerable merit.

BOUGAINVILLE, John Peter de, was born at Paris 1st Dec. 1722. His great learning and uncommon application procured him many friends, and a respectable situation in the literary societies of the capital. His ambition, however, was disappointed in his wish to be admitted into the French academy. He urged the precarious state of his health, and the probability of an early vacancy; but Duclos the secretary with great harshness observed, that it was not the business of the academy to administer extreme unction. As his constitution was greatly weakened by intense study, he died at the early age of 41, June 22d, 1763. He wrote a parallel between Thomas Kouli Khan and Alexander,—a translation of Polignac's Anti-Lucretius, two vols. 8vo. and other works.

BOUGAINVILLE, Louis Anthony de (brother of John Peter,) was born at Paris in 1729. In Canada he acted as aid-de-camp to Montcalm, and displayed such bravery in many actions, that he obtained the rank of colonel, and a gift of two cannon. He next made a voyage round the world, which was completed in 1769. The narrative of it was published in 1772. He rose to high military and naval rank; but retired from the service in 1790. Under the empire he was made a senator, and a member of the Institute. The Royal Society also chose him one of its members. He died in 1811. Besides his Voyage, he gave to the press a Treatise on the Integral Calculus, 2 vols. 4to.

BOUGAINVILLE, M. D. F., a Frenchman, whose discoveries in his navigation round the world, procured as much glory to his nation, as Cook had before acquired for the English name. Neither his virtues nor his services shielded him against the ferocity of a Paris mob, and he was one of the thousands inhumanly sacrificed on the 10th of August 1792.

BOUGEANT, Guillaume Hyacinth, a Jesuit, born at Quimper, 4th Nov. 1690. He was professor of humanities at Caen, Nevers, and Paris, but for a little time fell under disgrace by the publication of his amusement philosophique, in which he supposes that brutes are animated by demons. He was a man of engaging manners, great wit, and pleasing conversation; but the disappointments which he endured shortened his life. He died at Paris, 7th Jan. 1743, aged 53. His publications are respectable.

BOUGUER, Peter, was born at Croisie 10th Feb. 1698. He early distinguished himself by his knowledge of mathematics. He was employed with Godin and de la Condamine to go to Peru, the better to ascertain the figure of the earth, and he acquitted himself with credit and ability; but his quarrel with his associates lessened his fame, and drew upon him the character of a rough, ferocious, and unforgiving man. He died 15th August 1758, aged 60. His publications are respectable, especially la construction du navire, 4to.—la figure de la terre, 4to.—traité de'optique, 4to.—la manœuvre des vaisseaux, 4to.

BOUHOURS, Dominique, a Jesuit, born at Paris 1628, and celebrated as a critic. He first gave lectures at Clermont. He afterwards attended at Dunkirk the popish refugees from England, and became known by his "entretiens d'Ariste and d' Eugene," an elegant and learned work, which was read with avidity, and criticised by the learned in every part of Europe. This performance so pleased Colbert, that he made him tutor to his son, the marquis of Sequelai. His literary fame was not, however, without attacks, and Menage has levelled against him the well directed shafts of criticism. His remarks and doubts on the French language are particularly worth attention. He wrote, besides dialogues on the art of thinking well—the life of Francis Xavier, the apostle of India—the life of Ignatius, and ingenious thoughts of ancients and moderns. Bouhours closed his youthful life, at Clermont 27th May, 1702.

BOUILLAUD, Ismael, was born at London, 28th Sept. 1605. Though born of protestant parents, he embraced the popish faith, and soon became eminent in theology and every branch of science. His connections with the learned were very extensive; but, in the midst of his great reputation, he showed himself modest and diffident. He died 25th November, 1694. He published a discourse on the reformation of some religious orders—an edition of Ducas, in Greek and Latin, 1649, fol.—opus novum ad arithmeticum infinitorum, 1682, fol.

BOUILLE, M. le marquis de, a french general of great character. During the American war, he served with credit in the West-Indies, and was appointed commander in chief of the French islands, and for his services was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, and of knight of the Holy Ghost. He opposed the rise of the revolution, and particularly the plans of Necker, and, as a friend of the king and monarchy, he repressed, with spirit and effect, the insurrection of the garrison of Metz, of which he was governor, in August 1790; but though applauded by the assembly for his active conduct, he was accused by the jacobins as a shedder of blood; and the odium thus directed against him was farther increased upon the flight of the king to Varennes. Bouillé, who failed in his attempts to liberate his master, boldly defended the measures which he had taken, and was in consequence pronounced an enemy to his country, his property was confiscated, and a price fixed on his head. An exile from France, he entered the Swedish army in 1791, but soon after enlisted under the banners of Coudé, and shared the dangers and the fatigues of the heroic, but unfortunate emigrants. His memoirs of the revolution appeared in 1797, and excited great interest by their impartiality. He died in London, 14th November, 1800.

BOULAINVILLIERS, Henry, Count de, a native of Normandy, was born at St. Saire, in that province, in 1658, and died in 1752. As an historian he is depreciated by Henault, but Montesquieu and Voltaire speak of him with considerable respect. He was an idolater of the feudal times, which he considered as the golden age of the monarchy! He is the author of a History of the Ancient Government of France; the State of France; the Life of Mahomet; a History of the Arabs; and various other works.

BOULANCER, Nicholas Anthony, a native of Paris, who, by strong application, overcame the difficulties of a natural stupidity, and became eminent as a mathematician and architect. He was engineer in the army; and being afterwards employed in the care of the highways of Champagne, Burgundy, and Lorraine, he observed, with a curious and inquisitive eye, the various strata of the earth, in cutting through mountains to alter or improve the direction of rivers and canals. His conjectures on the formation of the globe were curious and interesting. He sought for new light in ancient languages; but death cut off his useful career in 1759, in his 37th year. He was of a mild and benevolent temper, and resembled in features the famous Socrates.

BOULANGER or BOULLEGER, Claude Francois Felix, a native of Amiens, who was for some time an advocate at Paris, but he became better known as a man of extensive erudition and great powers of memory. He wrote treatises on electricity, 8vo.—historical and critical researches on ancient plays, 12mo.—besides fables in verse, inferior to la Fontaine. He died 1758, aged 34.

BOULLONGNE, Louis, a French painter of great merit. His picture of Augustus shutting the temple of Janus, his flight into Egypt, and several other pieces, preserved in the churches of Paris, are valuable monuments of his genius. He died at Paris 1674.

BOULLONGNE, Bon, eldest son of the preceding, was educated at Rome and Lombardy, and possessed, with his father's talents, a greater versatility of genius, whence he was called the Proteus us of painters. He died 1697, aged 43. His younger brother Louis was equally eminent as a painter. He was patronized by Louis XIV. and gained universal admiration. He died 1733, aged 79, leaving two sons and two daughters.

BOULTER, Hugh, D. D., was born in or near London, and educated at Oxford. His merit and his learning recommended him to the notice of sir Charles Hodges, secretary of state, to Tenison, the primate, and to the earl of Sunderland, by whose patronage he was liberally promoted, and made chaplain to George I. whom he attended to Hanover in 1719, and afterwards English tutor to prince Frederick. He was raised to the deanery of Christ Church and the bishopric of Bristol in 1719. His moderation and firmness were so conspicuous, that when the primacy of Ireland became vacant, the king appointed him to that high station, and with great reluctance he was prevailed upon to accept of the situation. Ireland was then a prey to faction and clamor, in consequence of Wood's ruinous schemes with respect to the coin; but the primate's efforts were strenuously directed to restore tranquillity and comfort to the distracted country. Though at first unpopular, his plans succeeded, the scarcity of silver was remedied, and he became the favorite of the Irish. His munificence to the poor was indeed unbounded, during the scarcity of 1741. Not less than 2500 souls were daily supported at his expense, hospitals were nobly endowed, the children of the indigent clergy were educated by his liberality, public buildings erected, and not less than 30,000*l.* were devoted to improve the small livings of Ireland. This great and good man, so universally and deservedly esteemed, visited, in June 1742, his native country, and died in London the September following.

BOUQUERANT, a negro of St. Domingo, who possessed courage, sagacity, and eloquence, and by his arts raised himself to consequence among his fellow sufferers in the colony. He was killed November 1791, bravely fighting in defence of liberty.

BOUQUET, Madam, is celebrated for her humanity during the revolution, in concealing some of the proscribed deputies, though death was the consequence of this mark of friendship. After supporting these unfortunate men for some time, and seeing their escape from her abode but to perish on the scaffold, she was herself dragged before the bloody tribunal of Bourdeaux, and suffered death with truly Christian resignation.

BOURBON, Charles duc de, son of Gilbert, count of Montpensier, constable of France, was born 1489, and early distinguished himself by his valor in the field, especially in the battle of Marignano. After serving Francis I. he was disgraced, through the intrigues of Louisa the queen-mother, whose offers of marriage he had contemptuously rejected, and he immediately espoused the cause of his great rival Charles V. and by his intrepidity highly contributed to the victory of Pavia. He was placed at the head of the imperial armies; but the murmurs of the soldiers for want of pay would have proved destructive to his interests, had he not, with bold enthusiasm, promised them riches and victory, and immediately led them against Rome. The attack was unexpected, but the valor of Bourbon would have overcome all obstacles. He placed the first scaling ladder against the wall, and as he was mounting at the head of his troops he received a shot, which immediately proved fatal, 6th May, 1527. His victorious soldiers buried him with great funeral honors.

BOURBON, Nicholas, a native of Vandreuves, employed in the education of Jeanne d'Albert, mother of Henry IV. of France. He retired from the intrigues of the court to literary ease, and wrote eight books of epigrams, which he called Nugæ, besides his poem on smiths (ferraria), of which profession his father was. He died about the middle of the 16th century. His great nephew, who was born at Bar-sur-aube, and bore the same name, was equally known and admired as a Latin poet. He was Greek professor at Paris, and canon of Orleans and of Angers. His works were published 1651, in 12mo. He died 1644, aged 70.

BOURCHIER, John lord Berners, was born about 1469. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards travelled abroad, and became known by his spirited conduct in repressing the insurgents in Devonshire and Cornwall 1495. He was chancellor of the exchequer for life under Henry VIII. and made governor of Calais, where he died 1532. He was author of treatises on the duties of the inhabitants of Calais—ite in vineam meam, a comedy, acted in Calais great church—besides translations of romances and of Froissart's chronicle into English.

BOURDALOUE, Lewis, a Jesuit, born at Bourges, August 1632, deservedly celebrated as the first and most eloquent preacher of France. His powers were exhibited before the court of Louis XIV. and the monarch so strongly felt and admired the efficacy of his eloquence, that, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he sent him to preach the catholic doctrines to the new converts of Languedoc. The latter part of his life was spent in visiting the sick and the prisons, and in other works of charity. He died 13th May, 1704, aged 72. His sermons have passed through several editions, the best of which is that of Bretonnean, in 16 vols. 8vo.

BOURDEILLES, Peter de, a French abbot and courtier in the service of Charles IX. and Henry III. better known by the name of Brantome. The best edition of his memoirs is that of the Hague, in 15 vols. 1741, and, though irregular, they are interesting, as they contain the private history of the French monarchs of his age. He died 5th July, 1614, aged 87.

BOURDELLOT, John, a native of Sens, master of the requests to Mary of Medicis, and better known as an able and learned critic, and the editor of Lucian, Petronius, and Heliodorus, with notes full of taste and erudition. He wrote, besides an universal history, commentaries on Juvenal, and died suddenly at Paris 1638. His sister's son, who changed the name of Peter Michon to that of Bourdelot, became known as a physician at Paris, as the friend of Condé, of Christina of Sweden, and as the author of a sensible treatise on the viper, 12mo. 1651. He wrote also a treatise on mount Ætna, besides a MS. catalogue of medical books, with lives of authors, and critical observations on their works. He died 9th February 1685, aged 76.

BOURDON, Amé, a native of Cambrai, who, at the age of 36, began to study physic, and acquired great reputation in the profession. He published a valuable anatomical description of the human body, 12mo. besides anatomical lectures; and died 1706, aged 68.

BOURDON, Sebastian, a native of Montpellier, eminent as a painter. He studied seven years at Rome, and acquired great reputation and consequence on his return to France. His powers of execution were so strong, that he once laid a wager that he could paint twelve heads after life, and as big as life, in one day; and he won. His best pieces are, the martyrdom of St. Peter, in the church of Notre Dame, and the seven works of mercy. As he was a protestant, he left France for the protection of Christina queen of Sweden; and died 1662, aged 46.

BOURDONNAYE, Bernard Francis Mahe de la, a native of St. Malo's, distinguished as a warrior and negotiator. He was made governor of the isles of France and Bourbon; and, with an enterprising spirit, in the war of 1741, he armed a small squadron, and laid siege to the English settlement of Madras, which he took, and restored to the conquered for a ransom of about 9 millions. His successes created him enemies. On his return to France, he was accused of suffering himself to be corrupted by the enemy, and sent to the Bastille; but his innocence was revealed before his judges, and in the eyes of France. This persecuted man died 1754, in consequence of the severe imprisonment to which he had been exposed.

BOURG, Ann du, a learned counsellor of the parliament of Paris, was cruelly put to death, and burnt, by the influence of Henry II. for embracing the doctrines of Calvin, 1559, though several princes interested themselves in his fate. He was then 38 years old. He was the descendant of a noble family, and a man of great fortitude, and strong presence of mind.

BOURGEOIS, Sir Francis, whose parents were Swiss, was born in London, in 1756, and was designed for the army, but displayed such an attachment to painting that he was placed under Louthembourg. After having travelled for improvement, he became a royal academician. In 1791 he was appointed painter to the king of Poland; and, in 1794, landscape painter to George III. He died in 1811. The splendid collection of pictures which Mr. Desenfans had bequeathed to him, Sir Francis left to Dulwich College, with ten thousand pounds to build a gallery for them.

BOURGET, dom John, a Benedictine of the diocese of Secz, eminent for his piety and learning. He enjoyed respectable offices in the church, and was admitted member of the London antiquarian society in 1765. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, and left behind him a curious and interesting account of the abbey of Caen, founded by William the Conqueror, and of that of Bec, so well known in English history as being the nursery of several archbishops of Canterbury. He died 1st January, 1776, universally respected.

BOURGET, Clemence de, a lady born of respectable parents at Lyons. She possessed so much merit as a writer, a musician, and a poetess, that she was presented to two monarchs who passed through Lyons as the most honorable object and the greatest ornament of her native city. She died of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of her lover, John de Peyrat, who fell at the siege of Beaurepaire 1561.

BOURGOING, John Francis, Baron de, was born at Nevers, in 1748, served early in the army, and successively acted as secretary of legation, and lastly as ambassador at various courts. He died, envoy at Dresden, in 1811. Of his writings the principal are, the Picture of Modern Spain, 8 vols.; and Historical and Philosophical Memoirs of Pius VI.

BOURIGNON, Antoinetta, a fanatic, born at Lisle, in 1616. So frightful was her appearance at her birth, that her parents hesitated whether they ought not to destroy her as a monster. As she grew up, however, her appearance improved, and she gave signs of considerable talent. Having an aversion to matrimony, she twice eloped from home to avoid it. The reading of mystical works inflamed her imagination, and she believed that she had visions and ecstasie trances, in which she was commanded to restore the true evangelical spirit in the world. She wandered about incessantly, and was expelled from many countries; but she made numerous proselytes, among whom were men of abilities. The virtue of charity she certainly did not possess; for she never gave alms. She died at Franeker, in Holland, in 1680. Her reveries fill twenty-two volumes.

BOURLIE, Antoine de Guiscard, a native of Perigord, who abandoned his country, and after visiting Holland, became a pensioner of queen Anne in England. He was accused of treason against the state in 1711; and when examined before the privy council, he stabbed lord Oxford, for which murderous action he was sent to Newgate, where he destroyed himself.

BOURN, Samuel, a native of Birmingham, educated at Glasgow. He was, in 1742, minister of a dissenting congregation at Rivington, Lancashire, and then removed to Norwich as assistant to Dr. J. Taylor. He was author of some sermons, and had a dispute with Dr. Chandler about the duration of future punishments. He died at Norwich 1796, aged 83.

BOURNE, Benjamin, LL. D., of Bristol, Rhode-Island, was born about the year 1755, and educated at Harvard College, where he was graduated in 1775. He was conspicuous for talents and learning, and spent a large part of his life in public and honorable employments. He was for some time a member of Congress, and in 1801, was appointed judge of the circuit court of the United States. He died Sept. 17th, 1808.

BOURRIT, Mark Theodore, a native of Geneva, born in 1739, and died in 1819, was a chanter in the cathedral of his native city. He is known to the public by his various journeys to the Alps, and particularly to the glaciers and Mont Blanc; of which he published narratives in 1772 and 1785. The last of these works was reprinted in 1789, with a Description of the Glaciers of the Pennine and Rhetian Alps.

BOURSAULT, Edmund, a French writer, was born at Muci l'Evêque, in Burgundy, in 1638, and though his father, a dissipated officer, to prevent him from knowing more than himself, would give him no education, he acquired a consummate knowledge of the French language. He wrote several comedies, particularly Esop in Town, and Esop at Court, three romances, and other works of considerable merit, among which may be mentioned Letters to Babet. Boursault was a man of a modest mind and a forgiving spirit. He died in 1701.

BOURSIER, Lawrence Francis, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who died at Paris in 1749, aged 70. He was author of several controversial books in divinity, and of an able treatise called Paction de dieu sur les creatures, 2 vols. 4to. or 6 vols. 12mo. which was attacked by Malebranche. He wrote also an address to Peter the great when he visited Paris, for the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches.

BOURSIER, Philip, an ecclesiastic of Paris, who died 1763, aged 77. He was the first concerned in the nouvelles ecclésiastiques in 1727, in which he was assisted by Berger, d'Etémare, de Fernanville, and others.

BOURVALAIS, Paul Poisson, a famous French financier, who rose from obscurity to opulence and consequence, by industry, and afterwards assisted by dishonest means. He was accused of having amassed a princely fortune from the distresses of the state during the Spanish succession war, and his vast wealth was forfeited. He was some time after indemnified; but his disgrace had broken a heart naturally fierce and impatient, and he died the year after, 1719.

BOUSMARD, M. de, a military engineer, after having been in the French service, passed, in 1792, into that of Prussia, and rose to the rank of major-general. He was killed, by a bomb, at the siege of Dantzick, May 22, 1807. He is the author of a valuable Essay on Fortification, in four quarto volumes, with a volume of plates; and of a Defence of Vauban, who had been attacked by Lacroix.

BOUVART, Michael Philip, professor of medicine at Paris, was born at Chartres, and died at Paris 19th January, 1787, aged 66. He acquired great celebrity in his profession, and wrote some tracts on medicine which possessed merit. He once visited a banker who was seized with melancholy at the prospect of bankruptcy, and finding that the disorder of his patient was such as his purse could remove, he honorably sent him 20,000 livres to enable him to meet his creditors. His eulogy was pronounced by Condorcet.

BOWDLER, Thomas, the son of a physician at Bath, was born in 1754, and died in 1825. He wrote Reform and Ruin; Letters written in Holland; and edited the Family Shakspeare; and an expurgated edition of Gibbon's History. His two sisters, Jane and Hannah, and his brother John, all possessed literary talents.

BOWDICH, Thomas Edward, a native of Bristol, where he was born in 1793, received a good education, and engaged in trade at his native place, but relinquished it to become a writer in the service of the African Company. In 1816, he was sent on a mission, from Cape Coast Castle, to the king of Ashantee. Of this embassy he subsequently published a valuable narrative. By his exposures and representations government was induced to dissolve the company. Eager to pursue his discoveries in Africa, he again visited that country; but, unfortunately for geography and science, disease, brought on by anxiety and toil, closed his career, on the 10th of January, 1824, shortly after he reached the river Gambia.

BOWDOIN, James, a governor of Massachusetts under the present constitution. He graduated at Harvard college in 1745. Being the son of an eminent Merchant, it is not known that he devoted himself to any particular profession. In 1753 he was elected a representative to the general court, and in 1756 became a member of the council. From this period he was constantly employed in the public service, on the side of his country, and in 1778 was chosen president of the convention which formed the constitution of Massachusetts. He was chosen governor in 1785 and again in 1786. Governor Bowdoin was a member of the convention of Massachusetts assembled to deliberate on the adoption of the constitution of the U. S. The university of Edinburgh honored him with the degree of doctor of laws. He was first president of the academy of arts and sciences, and several papers, printed in the first volume of their transactions, were contributed by him. His letters to Dr. Franklin have likewise been published. He died at Boston in 1790 aged 63.

BOWDOIN, James, minister of the United States at the court of Spain. He graduated at Harvard college in 1771. He spent several years in travelling in various parts of Europe. He passed one year, during the time, in the study of the law at the University of Oxford. Upon his return to America he took up his residence in Dorchester, devoting his time to literary pursuits. He sustained successively the public offices of representative, senator, and counsellor. In 1805 he received his commission as minister plenipotentiary to the court of Madrid. He left the United States in 1805, and returned in 1808. The objects of his mission were not accomplished. He died in 1811, aged 60. He was a munificent benefactor of Bowdoin college.

BOWEN, Jabez, LL. D., Lieut. gov. of Rhode Island, graduated at Yale college in 1757, and died 1815, aged 75. For 30 years he was chancellor of the college at Providence. During the revolutionary war he was devoted to the cause of his country, and was a member of the board of war, judge of the supreme court and lieut. governor. Of the national convention at Annapolis, and of the state convention to consider the constitution, he was a member. During the administration of Washington he was the commissioner of loans for Rhode Island.

BOWEN, Pardon, M. D., a distinguished physician of Providence in the state of Rhode Island. He graduated at the college in Rhode Island in 1775. He embarked as a surgeon in a privateer in 1779. Though captured, and imprisoned seven months at Halifax, he was not deterred from engaging repeatedly in similar enterprises, resulting in new imprisonments. In 1782 he reached home, and was content to remain on shore. He slowly and gradually obtained practice, and at length his success was ample, his eminence in medicine and surgery were then undisputed. During the prevalence of the yellow fever he shrunk not from the peril; more than once he was attacked by that disease. For much of his success he was indebted to his study of idiosyncrasy, or of the peculiarities, moral, intellectual, and physical of his patients. He died 1826, aged 69. He published an elaborate account of the yellow fever of Providence in 1805 in Hosack's medical register, vol. iv.

BOWEN, William C., M.D., professor of chemistry in Brown university. He graduated at Union college in 1803. He studied medicine with Dr. Pardon Bowen, and visited Edinburgh and Paris, and at London was a private pupil of Sir Astley Cooper. He returned in 1811. Experiments to discover the composition of the bleaching liquor, just brought into use in England, laid the foundation of the disease which terminated his life in 1815, aged 29. Though his labors on chlorine impaired his property, and destroyed his life, they led to the creation of the valuable bleaching establishments of Rhode Island.

BOWER, Archibald, was born near Dundee in Scotland, 17th January, 1685, and educated at Douay, from whence he passed to Rome, 1760, and became a Jesuit. He, however, in 1726, fled to England, and embraced the Protestant faith. His learning recommended him to the great, and he had the good fortune to become acquainted with lord Aylmer, in whose family he passed several years, and when he sufficiently understood English, he began to labor for the booksellers by the publication of the Historia literaria, which he abandoned in 1734, for a large share in the composition of the Universal History. Unsteady and insincere in his principles, he was again reconciled to the Jesuits in 1745, and two years after, again made public his dissent from the religion of those within whose pale he had lately been received as a penitent refugee. His history of the popes was begun and continued to the seventh volume a little before his death, but his quarrels with the Jesuits rendered his principles suspected both as an historian and as a man. His insincerity was discovered, and his imposture revealed, by the keen searching eye of Dr. Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and from a favorite writer, he became a suspected character, and he saw all those who had supported and patronized him except Lyttelton, turn away with disdain and indignation from him. Bower married a niece of bishop Nicholson in 1749. He died September second, 1766, aged 80, without any public profession of his faith, though his wife soon after attested that he died in the protestant persuasion.

BOWIE, Robert, general, governor of Maryland in 1803 and in 1811. He died in 1818, aged 64. He was an officer of the revolution, and presents one of the multitude of instances in America, of the success of patriotism, integrity and benevolence, unassisted by the advantages of wealth, or of a learned education.

BOWLE, John, descended from a bishop of Rochester of that name, was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, and died on his birth day, 26th October 1788, aged 63. He was the first detector of Lander's forgeries, and author of a letter to Dr. Percy, and editor of Don Quixote in Spanish, &c. besides Marston's satires, and some old English poetry.

BOWYER, William, a learned English printer, born in London, 17th December 1699, educated at Merchant taylor's school, and afterwards admitted at St. John's college, Cambridge. On his leaving the university, he followed the business of his father, who was a printer of great eminence, and the first publication which came from his correcting hands, was Selden's works by Wilkins, three vols. folio. He was made printer of the votes of the house of Commons in 1729, by the friendship of Onslow the speaker, and he held that respectable situation for nearly 50 years. He was admitted into the antiquarian society in 1736, and he proved an ornament to the institution by the number and value of his communications. In 1761, he was appointed printer to the royal society, and two years after he published his excellent edition of the new testament, two vols. It was not merely in printing books in a superior style that Bowyer distinguished himself, but in enriching various works with notes, prefaces, and dissertations. He took, in 1766, Mr. John Nichols for his partner, and trusted into his able hands the business which he had conducted with such respectability of character. He was in 1767, made printer of the house of Lords, and for the rolls of parliament. His literary career was finished in 1777, by the publication of Bentley's dissertations on Phalaris with additional notes; and he died 18th November the same year.

BOYCE, William, an English musician, born in London, 1710. He was at first a singing boy at St. Paul's, but under the care of Dr. Greene, the organist of the cathedral, he made such a proficiency that the highest expectations were formed of him. His master at his death intrusted all his MSS. to his care, and the publication of his anthems; but an incurable deafness came as it were to darken all the prospects of the young proficient. Perseverance, however, overcame every difficulty, and he continued to prove so excellent a master, that he was honorably made, in 1749, Doctor of Music by the university of Cambridge, and in 1757 master of the king's band, and afterwards organist and composer to the royal chapel. This able musician died 1779, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

BOYD, Mark Alexander, a native of Galloway in Scotland, educated under the care of his uncle, who was archbishop of Glasgow. He was however of such a bold untractable spirit, that he early fled from his instructors to Flanders, and engaged in the wars of the united provinces and of France. In Paris he lost all his property by gaming, and the distress to which he was reduced, roused him to reflection, so that he applied himself to study civil law under Cujacius. He returned to Scotland, where he died of a slow fever, 1601, aged 39. He left in MSS. some Latin poems, much admired for elegance and taste, of which the Epistolæ Heroidum, and the hymns, appeared in the Deliciæ poetarum Scotorum, Amsterd. two vols. 12mo. 1637.

BOYD, Robert, lord, a Scotchman, son of sir Thomas Boyd of Kilmarnock. He became the favorite of the court and of the people, and was raised to the peerage, and on the death of the second James, was made judiciary of the kingdom, and one of the regents during the king's minority. Ambitions however of having no rival, he carried off the young king from Lulithgow to Edinburgh, and declared himself sole regent. Not only the favors of the crown were now distributed to his family and adherents, but the king's sister was married to his son, afterwards lord Arran, till the monarch, extricated from the power of his guardian, ventured to call a parliament in 1469, to inquire into his conduct. Afraid of his enemies, Boyd fled to England, and died at Alwick 1470, and his son, divorced from his wife, was obliged to leave the kingdom for Antwerp, where he died 1474. This family are the progenitors of the lord Kilmarnock who suffered in the rebellion of 1745.

BOYD, John P., brigadier general in the army of the United States in the war of 1812. He commanded the detachment of 1500 men of Williamson's army, which fought the battle of Williamsburg, Upper Canada, Nov. 1813. Gen. Boyd was a good officer, his early military career was in India. In 1808 he was in Paris. After the war he received the appointment of naval officer for the port of Boston. He died 1830, aged 62. He published documents and facts relative to military events during the late war, 1816.

BOYDELL, John, an eminent artist, born at Dorrington, Shropshire, and brought up to the business of land surveyor under the care of his father. The accidental meeting of some landscapes so captivated his attention, that he studied engraving under an able master, and determined to seek reputation and opulence in this new profession. His landscapes, published in 1745, for the use of learners, proved the source of profit, as well as celebrity, and in the metropolis he became the friend and the patron of artists of genius and ability. Eager to exhibit the productions of his countrymen in one pleasing and recommending view, he nobly stood forth as the public encourager of merit, and by opening the Shakspeare gallery in Pall-mall, he exhibited the beautiful and highly finished labors of the English school. His virtues and popularity had so powerfully recommended him to the notice of the citizens of London, that he was elected an alderman, and in 1791, served the distinguished office of lord mayor. Sensible of the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens, he perpetuated their kindness and his own merits, by presenting to the corporation some valuable pictures, which are preserved as monuments of his friendship in the council chamber of Guildhall. He died Dec. 12, 1804, aged 85 years.

BOYER, Abel, was born at Caste in France, 1664. The edict of the revocation of Nantes banished him to Geneva, from whence he came to Franeker and to England, where he spent the best part of his life, and died at Chelsea, November, 1729. He is chiefly known by his useful French and English dictionary, and his French grammar, which have passed through several editions. His history of William and Mary, three vols. 8vo.—his political state of Great Britain, a periodical work like the annual register—his annals of queen Anne, 11 vols. 8vo. &c. are inferior works.

BOYER, John Baptist Nicholas, a physician, knight of the order of St. Michael, and distinguished for the zeal, skill, and humanity, which he displayed during the dreadful plague at Marseilles in 1720. His success in combating the violence of contagious disorders recommended him to the notice of the French king and to the gratitude of Spain and Germany. He gave an edition of the Pharmacopœia Parisiensis 4to. and died at Paris second April, 1768, aged 75.

BOYLE, Richard, known by the title of great earl of Cork, was born at Canterbury in 1566. He went to Dublin in June 1588, in quest of fortune, with fewer pounds in his pocket than he afterwards acquired thousands a year. His abilities recommended him to the great and powerful, he drew memorials and cases with precision and accuracy, and in the service of the government he acquired a knowledge of public affairs. He was not however without enemies, he was represented to the queen as a traitor, in corresponding with the Spaniards, but he was permitted to answer his accusers, and sir Henry Wallop, the most violent of his persecutors, was disgraced by Elizabeth. His merits were too great to be long neglected, he was appointed to offices of trust in Ireland under his friend sir George Carew, afterwards earl of Totness, and by his patronage he rose to consequence and dignity. He was knighted, made a privy counsellor, and afterwards advanced to the peerage, first by the title of lord Boyle, afterwards of earl of Cork. In his elevated situation he felt the storms which agitate the great, and received many mortifications from the jealousy of Wentworth, earl of Strafford, when viceroy of Ireland. His whole life was devoted to the support of his country, towns were built on most eligible spots, and improvements were introduced on his estates with such judgment and success, that Cromwell declared if Ireland had a Cork in every county, rebellion could never have raised its head there. He died 15th September, 1643, aged 78, and so desirous did he show himself even in his last moments, to publish to the world the vast fortune which he had collected by industrious application from an obscure beginning, that he caused to be placed on his tomb, the motto of his family, "God's providence is my inheritance."

BOYLE, Roger, earl of Orrery, was fifth son of Richard earl of Cork, and born April 1621. He was made lord Broghill when only seven years old, in reward of his father's services. He was educated in the college of Dublin, and after making the tour of France and Italy, with his eldest brother lord Kinlmeaky, he engaged in the Irish wars, and distinguished himself by his courage and bravery. The death of Charles I. proved so very dreadful to his feelings that he left the army, and lived in retirement on his estate at Marston in Somersetshire, but so apprehensive was he of the jealous tyranny of the parliament, that he soon prepared to join in secret the royal party on the continent. His views were discovered, and Cromwell, who knew his merit, charged him with the resolution of abandoning the kingdom, and proved the inutility of denying the charge, by showing him copies of letters that had passed between him and his most confidential friends. Broghill was so thunderstruck at the discovery, that Cromwell prevailed on him to espouse his cause rather than to submit to the horrors of a dungeon, and when he was informed that he was to fight only against the Irish rebels, whose cruelties he detested, he accepted the pledges of faith and protection offered him by the republican general. In this new engagement he displayed so much coolness and activity that Cromwell, now become protector, honored him with his friendship and confidence, and sent him to settle the affairs of Scotland with absolute authority. On the death of Cromwell, Broghill supported his son with the same zeal that he had served the father, but when the pusillanimity of Richard dropped the reins of government, he looked for future protection from the exiled king. His intentions were however conjectured by the few who still propped the republican government, he was seized in Ireland, but his firmness disarmed his persecutors, and he was permitted to retire unmolested to his estate at Munster. But his thoughts were turned to the restoration of the monarchy, and he prepared measures so effectually with sir Charles Coote who was in the north of Ireland, that the whole kingdom declared for Charles II. The restored monarch paid those marks of respect to Broghill which his services deserved, he was made earl of Orrery, and president of Munster. After a splendid display of the character of statesman, general, and writer, this excellent man died October, 1679, aged 58.

BOYLE, Robert, seventh son and fourteenth child of Richard, earl of Cork, was born at Lismore in Munster, 25th January, 1626-7. In 1638, his father sent him with his brother Francis to Geneva, through Dieppe, Paris, and Lyons, and in this peaceful retreat he devoted himself to a severe course of study, and renewed his acquaintance with the mathematics. After staying about 21 months at Geneva, he visited Verona, Venice, Florence, Rome, Genoa, and Marseilles. He returned to England in 1644, but with difficulty, as, from the troubles of England and Ireland, some of his supplies had been lost, and his tutor Mr. Marcombes was obliged to raise money upon his jewels. His father died before his return, but he found an ample settlement, which, however, the confusion of the time prevented him from immediately possessing. In March 1646, he retired to his estate at Stalbridge, and in this peaceful solitude, he spent his time in literary labors, particularly in philosophical and chemical studies. Here he remained till 1654, when he fixed his residence at London. About 1678, he invented the air pump, an engine which has thrown new light on the works of the creation. After the restoration he was treated with the respect due to his merit, both by the king and his ministers, Southampton and Clarendon, but he refused the highest ecclesiastical preferment which was offered to him if he entered into orders, observing with becoming firmness and independence, that whatever he did or wrote in support of religion, would have greater weight in coming from a layman. Charles II. unasked, bestowed upon him, in 1665, as the reward of his splendid talents, the vacant provostship of Eton, which, however, against the advice of all his friends, he modestly declined. Honors were vain in his eyes. For the same reason he refused to become president of the royal society, which his name and services had so much dignified, for independence was the object nearest his heart. The most favored public office he ever held was that of governor of the corporation for the propagation of gospel, and this he at last resigned when he found the approaching decline of his health. So numerous were his friends, and so anxiously excited was the public curiosity with respect to him, that when his strength failed, he published an advertisement, and placed an inscription over his door to inform the world that he declined receiving visits, and what in another might have appeared vanity or ostentation, must be considered in him as the preparation of a man of sense and virtue to withdraw from the tumult of life, and to make his peace with his Creator. His health now rapidly declined, so that he made his will 18th July, 1691, and expired on the 30th of December following, in his 65th year. His disinterestedness in refusing the honor of a peerage is well known, his zeal in the propagation of Christianity is equally noble, and it is recorded by his biographers that his charities annually amounted to no less than 1000*l*. His works have been published in 5 vols. folio, and in 6 vols. 4to.

BOYLE, Charles, earl of Orrery, was second son of Roger, earl of Orrery, and born August, 1676. On his brother's death he succeeded to the earldom, and afterwards became knight of the thistle, major-general in the army, and a member of the privy council. He was envoy from the queen to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and he displayed firmness, wisdom, and dexterity in the support of this new character, and for his services was raised to the dignity of the British peerage. His disinterestedness was such, in his political career, that he frequently voted against the minister, and the apostacy was soon after punished by a privation of his offices of honor and emolument. In September, 1722, he was sent to the tower, on suspicion of being an associate in Layer's plot, but after six months' imprisonment he was admitted to bail, and his innocence fully asserted upon the minutest inquiry. He died, after a short illness, 21st August, 1731. His writings were Lysander's life, translated from Plutarch—besides his edition of Phalaris' epistles, which produced the celebrated controversy with Bentley, in which he was assisted by his friends Aldrich and Atterbury. The astronomical apparatus, called Orrery, was so named by the inventor Graham, in gratitude for marks of favor and protection which he had received.

BOYLSTON, Zabdiel, a physician, eminent as being the first to practice inoculation for the small-pox in America. In 1721, when the small-pox broke out in Boston, Dr. Cotton Mather called the attention of the physicians, to an article in a volume of the transactions of the royal society, giving an account of the practice of inoculation in the East. The whole faculty treated the communication with great contempt, except Boyleston. It made such an impression on him, that he immediately inoculated his own son, a child of six years of age, and two servants, and carried them safely through the disease. Encouraged by his success, he began to extend his practice. The opposition to him was general. The other physicians were unanimous in their opinion against the practice. The selectmen of Boston passed an ordinance to prohibit it. He however persevered, and in 1721 and 1722, inoculated 247 persons; 89 more were inoculated by others, and of the whole number, (286), only six died. During the same period, of 5759, who had the small-pox the natural way, 844, nearly one seventh, died. The opponents of Dr. Boyleston called religious bigotry to their aid, and made the ignorant believe, that he was not only wilfully spreading contagion, but impiously attempting to avert the just judgment of heaven from the land. Many became so exasperated against him, that attempts were threatened against his life, and it became unsafe for him to leave his house after dark. Time and experience at length came in to the aid of truth, opposition died away, and the Dr. had the satisfaction of seeing inoculation in general use, in New-England, for some time before it became common in Great Britain. In 1725, he visited England, and was elected a fellow of the royal society. He died 1766, aged 82. His only publications, besides his communications to the royal society, are, some account of what is said of inoculating, or transplanting, the small-pox, by the learned doctor Emanuel Timonius, and Jac. Pylarinus, (a pamphlet, Boston, 1721), and an historical account of the small-pox inoculation in New-England and London, 1726.

BOYLSTON, Nicholas, a benefactor of Harvard college, died in Boston, in 1771, aged 55. His portrait, which is an admirable painting, is in the philosophy chamber of the college. He had been an eminent merchant, and was about to retire from business, to enjoy the fruit of his industry, when he was removed from the earth. He bequeathed to the university at Cambridge, 1500 pounds for laying the foundation of a professorship of rhetoric and oratory. June 12, 1806, John Quincy Adams was installed the first professor, with the title of "the Boylston professor of rhetoric and oratory in Harvard college."

BOYLSTON, Ward Nicholas, a patron of medical science, died in 1828, aged 78. In the year 1800, he gave to the medical school of Harvard college, a valuable collection of medical and anatomical books, and engravings, making also an arrangement for its perpetual enlargement.

BOYSS, BOYS, or BOIS, John, one of the translators of the bible under James I., was born at Netstead in Suffolk, 1560, and educated at Hadley school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. After studying medicine for a little time, he was ordained and succeeded his father as rector of West Stowe, which, however, he resigned upon his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Holt, rector of Boxworth, whom he succeeded in 1596. His domestic affairs were conducted with so little economy that to relieve his wants he sold his valuable books. He however was reconciled to the extravagance of his wife, and as his knowledge of classical literature had been so eminently displayed at college, he was selected to translate the bible, and was afterwards one of the six who met to revise the whole at stationer's hall. He assisted sir Henry Saville in the publication of St. Chrysostom, but the death of his patron left him in poverty, and instead of succeeding to a promised fellowship of Eton, he received only one copy of the work to which he had so much contributed. Andrews, bishop of Ely, at last made him prebendary of his church in 1615. He died 1643, aged 84, leaving several valuable MSS.

BOYSE, Joseph, a dissenting minister, born at Leeds in Yorkshire, 14th Jan. 1660, and educated near Kendal. He was at Amsterdam, where he sided with the Brownists, and afterwards became popular as a preacher in London and Dublin, and had for his coadjutor Thomas Emlyn, so well known for his writings and his sufferings. A long and intimate friendship was however severed by theological disputes, and instead of becoming the defender of Emlyn, Boyse inflamed his persecutor by publishing a book against him. He died about the beginning of December 1728, and his funeral sermon was preached at Dublin on the 8th of the same month. He was eminent for his learning and piety, as his works in 2 vols. fol. sufficiently prove.

BOZE, Claude Grosde, was born at Lyons, 28th Jan. 1630, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of antiquities and medals, which gained the patronage of chancellor Pontchartrain, and other illustrious characters, and the honor of a seat in the French academy, and in the academy of belles lettres, of which he became perpetual secretary. He was respected for his private character, as well as his great learning. His works were on medallic subjects, besides historical panegyrics on the members of the academy, the first 15 vols. of which he published—and a valuable catalogue of his own library. He died at Paris 10th Sept. 1753, aged 74.

BRACCIOLINI DELL' API, Francis, an Italian poet of Pistoya, who, at the age of 40, became an ecclesiastic, and was patronised by pope Urban VIII. and by cardinal Anthony Berberini, with whom he had been secretary. He wrote several tragedies, comedies, and pastorals—besides "la croce riacquisitata," a poem which the Italians rank next to Tasso's Jerusalem—and a poem in 23 cantos, on the pope's election, for which, at his patron's desire, he assumed the surname of Della Api, and added to his arms three bees. He died in his native country at the age of 80, 1645.

BRACKENRIDGE, Hugh Henry, a judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. He graduated at Princeton college in 1771. In 1781, he settled at Pittsburg, which he deemed favorably situated for becoming a large town; and in its improvement he engaged with zeal. In 1789, he was appointed judge. He died in 1816, aged 67. He published a poem on the rising glory of America, 1774; eulogium of the brave men who fell in the contest with Great Britain, 1779; modern chivalry, the adventures of capt. Farrago 1792, 2d edit. 2 vols. 1808; oration July 4, 1793; incidents of the insurrection in 1794 in Pennsylvania, 1795; gazette publications, collected, 1806; law of miscellanies, containing instructions for the study of the law, 1814.

BRACKETT, Joshua, a physician, graduated at Harvard college, 1752. He first became a preacher, but gave up that profession for the study of medicine. He established himself in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and continued there during life. He died in 1802, aged 69. He took a deep interest in the promotion of natural history at Cambridge, and requested his wife to appropriate 1500 dollars towards the professorship of that science in Harvard college. She complied with his request, and added to the amount. He was a benefactor of the N. H. medical society, of which he was president from 1793 to 1799, presenting to it, at its establishment, 143 vols. of valuable medical books.

BRACON, Henry de, a native of Devonshire, who studied at Oxford, and became eminent as a lawyer, and in 1244 was made one of the judges itinerant by Henry III. He is chiefly known by his excellent work "de legibus and consuetudinibus Angliæ," a most finished and valuable performance, divided into five books, and containing, in good language, a curious and interesting detail of the legal learning, the laws and customs of our ancestors. Though blamed by Houard for mingling too much of the civil and canon law in his compositions, he has long been held as a writer of the first authority, and deservedly esteemed by lord Coke, and other great lawyers, as the first source of legal knowledge.

BRADBURY, Thomas, a native of London, educated at Clapham in company with Dr. Watts, and distinguished among the nonconformists as a bold and eloquent preacher in defence of Calvinistical doctrines and revolution principles. He wrote some theological treatises—besides three vols. of sermons—and the mystery of godliness. He died 1757, aged 85, and was buried in Bunhill fields.

BRADDOCK, Edward, major general and commander in chief of the British forces in America, in 1755. He undertook to conduct in person an expedition against fort Du Quesne, now Pittsburg. He reached the Monongahela July 8th. The succeeding day he expected to invest the fort. He accordingly made his dispositions in the morning. He was advised to advance the provincial companies in the front, for the purpose of scouring the woods, and discovering any ambuscade which might be formed for him. He disregarded the caution, and fell into an ambush, by which he lost nearly one half of his troops, and received himself a mortal wound. All his officers on horseback, except colonel, afterwards general Washington, who acted as aid, being killed, the army retreated precipitately, near 40 miles to colonel Dunbar's camp, where the general, who was conveyed there on a tumbril, expired.

BRADFORD, William, second governor of Plymouth colony, and one of the first settlers of New England. He was early a dissenter from the church of England, and in 1607, when he was only eighteen years of age, he was one of a company, which made an attempt to go over to Holland, where a commercial spirit had established a free toleration of religious opinions; but the master of the vessel betrayed them, and they were thrown into prison at Boston in Lincolnshire. He made another unsuccessful attempt, but at length effected his favorite object, and joined his brethren at Amsterdam. He engaged with zeal in the plan of removal to America of the English church at Leyden, under the care of Mr. Robinson. He sailed in the first ship, and on her arrival, was among the foremost to find a proper place for the seat of the colony. Upon the death of gov. Carver, Mr. Bradford was elected in his place. One of the first acts of his administration, was to take measures to confirm the league with the Indian sachem Massasoit. In the beginning of 1622, the colony began to experience a distressing famine. In the height of their distress a threatening message was received from Canonicus Sachem of Narragansett, expressed by the present of a bundle of arrows, bound with the skin of a serpent. The governor sent back the skin filled with powder and ball. This prompt and ingenious reply terminated the correspondence. The Narragansetts were so terrified, that they even returned the serpent's skin without inspecting its contents. In addition to the supplies for the suffering colony, which gov. Bradford was enabled to obtain in consequence of his intercourse with the Indians, still more important benefits soon resulted from his desire to preserve their friendship. During an illness of Massasoit in the spring of 1623, Mr. Winslow was sent to him with cordials which contributed to his recovery. In return for this benevolent attention, the grateful sachem disclosed a dangerous conspiracy, then in agitation among the Indians, for the purpose of totally extirpating the English. As the most effectual means of suppressing the conspiracy, Massasoit advised, that the chief conspirators, whom he named, should be seized, and put to death. This melancholy work was accordingly performed by captain Standish, and the colony was relieved from apprehension. When the report of this transaction was carried to Holland, Mr. Robinson, in his next letter to the governor, expressed his deep concern at the event. "O that you had converted some, before you had killed any." The scarcity, which had been experienced was owing, in a great measure, to the impolicy of laboring in common, and putting the fruit of their labor into the public store. The plan was abolished, and it was agreed in the spring of 1623, that each family should plant for themselves, on such ground as should be assigned them by lot. After this agreement there was no difficulty in procuring the means of subsistence for the colony. The original government of Plymouth was founded entirely on mutual consent. The first patent was obtained in the name of John Peirce; but another patent of larger extent was obtained of the council for New England, in 1630, in the name of William Bradford, his heirs, associates, and assigns. In the year 1640, the general court requested governor Bradford to surrender the patent into their hands. With this request he cheerfully complied, and after the surrender the patent was immediately delivered again into his custody. Mr. Bradford was annually chosen governor as long as he lived, excepting in the years 1633, 1634, 1636, 1638, and 1644. At these times it was by his own request, that the people did not elect him. He died 1657, aged 68.

BRADFORD, William, attorney general of the United States. He received the appointment in Jan. 1794 and died in August 1795, aged 39. He graduated at Princeton college, 1772. He was prosecuting the study of the law, when he felt himself called upon by the peculiar circumstances of the times, to come forth, and join the standard of his country in opposition to the oppressive exactions of Great Britain. He was chosen major of brigade to gen. Roberdean, and on the expiration of his term, accepted a company in colonel Hampton's regiment of regular troops. He was soon promoted to the station of deputy master general, with the rank of lieutenant colonel, which office ill health compelled him to resign in about two years. He now returned to the study of the law, and in 1779 was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. In August 1780, he was appointed attorney general of Pennsylvania. In 1791, he was commissioned as a judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania—which office he held till he received the appointment of attorney general of the U. S. He published in 1793, an inquiry how far the punishment of death is necessary in Pennsylvania, with notes and illustrations. In the earlier periods of his life, some of his poetical productions were published in the Philadelphia magazine.

BRADFORD, Samuel, was born in Blackfriars, 20th December, 1652, and after studying at St. Paul's school, the Charter house, and Benet's college, Cambridge, he went abroad on account of some scruples of conscience, and applied himself to physic. He afterwards was reconciled to the doctrines of the church, and as the friend of archbishop Sancroft and the chaplain of king William, he rose in ecclesiastical preferment to the rectory of St. Mary-le-bow, a prebend of Westminster, and the mastership of his own college. In 1718 he became bishop of Carlisle, and in 1723 of Rochester, which he held to the time of his death, 17th March, 1731, aged 79. He edited Tillotson's sermons.

BRADFORD, John, an English martyr, born of a respectable family at Manchester. He was for some time clerk to sir John Harrington, the treasurer of the English forces at Calais, but afterwards turned his thoughts to the study of divinity, and took his master's degree at Cambridge. He was eloquent as a preacher, and his abilities exposed him to persecution in Mary's reign, so that, after a long imprisonment, he was burnt in Smithfield, 1st July, 1555. Some of his letters are extant. It is said that he was so struck by hearing a sermon from Latimer on restitution, that he made a restitution of some of the king's goods, which he had dishonestly appropriated to his own use while clerk at Calais.

BRADICK, Walter, author of "Chobelet or royal preacher," a poem of considerable merit, was a merchant of Lisbon, where he lost all his property by the earthquake. On his return to England, loss of sight was added to poverty, till his sufferings were relieved by the queen, who placed him as a pensioner in the Charter house, where he died 31st December, 1794.

BRADLEY, James, D. D., was born 1692, at Shireborn in Gloucestershire, and educated at Oxford. His talents were directed to mathematical pursuits, in the company and under the direction of his maternal uncle, Dr. Poind, a man of singular genius, and great learning, and from his own accurate observations with the sector, he settled, upon the most correct basis, the laws of the alterations of the fixed stars in consequence of the motion of light, and also the nutation of the earth's axis. His great merit did not pass long unrewarded, he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, 1721, on the death of Dr. Keill, to which was afterwards, in 1730, added the lectureship in experimental philosophy, and with these honors, a distinction equally flattering to the lover of science, the friendship of the great and the learned, of lord Macclesfield, sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Halley, and others. In 1742 he succeeded Dr. Halley as astronomer royal at Greenwich, and in this important appointment his attention was directed to improve and increase under the royal patronage, and the gift of 1000*l.* and the assistance of those able artists, George Graham and Bird, the valuable instruments which enrich this celebrated observatory. His great disinterestedness appeared on his refusal of the living of Greenwich, but his services were too numerous to be neglected, and the king therefore settled a pension of 250*l.* upon him. He died 13th July, 1762.

BRADLEY, Stephen R., a senator of the United States, graduated at Yale College, 1775. He was the aid of gen. Wooster when that officer fell in a skirmish with the enemy. He was one of the first senators from Vermont in the congress of the U. S. He died 1830, aged 76.

BRADLEY, Richard, a once popular writer on gardening and husbandry, was a member of the Royal Society, and professor of botany at Cambridge. The date of his birth is unknown; he died in 1732. The original idea of the kaleidoscope has been erroneously attributed to him. Among other works, he wrote a History of Succulent Plants; the Gentleman's and Gardener's Kalendar; a General Dictionary of Husbandry and Gardening; and a Botanical Dictionary.

BRADSHAW, John, celebrated as president of the tribunal by which Charles I. was tried, is said by some to have been born in Derbyshire, and by others in Cheshire, in 1536. He studied the law in Gray's Inn. In the contest between Charles and the people, Bradshaw espoused the cause of the latter. The parliament made him chief justice of Chester, and he was also chosen to preside in the high court of justice which sat upon the king. Cromwell, to whose usurpation he was hostile, deprived him of the chief justiceship. Bradshaw died in 1659; and, at the restoration, his remains were disinterred, and hanged at Tyburn.

BRADSTREET, Simon, governor of Massachusetts. He was in March, 1630, chosen an assistant of the colony about to be established there, and arrived at Salem, in the summer of the same year. He was at the first court which was held at Charlestown, August 23*d.* He was afterwards secretary and agent of Massachusetts, and commissioner of the united colonies. He was sent with Mr. Norton, in 1662, to congratulate king Charles on his restoration, and as agent of the colony to promote its interests. From 1673 to 1679, he was deputy governor. In this last year, he succeeded Mr. Leverett as governor, and remained in office till May, 1686, when the charter was dissolved, and Joseph Dudley commenced his administration as president of New-England. In May, 1689, after the imprisonment of Andros, he was replaced in the office of governor, which station he held, till the arrival of sir William Phips, in May, 1692, with a charter, which deprived the people of the right of electing their chief magistrate. He died 1697, aged 94.

BRADSTREET, Anne, entitled to remembrance as the author of the first volume of poetry published in America. Her volume was dedicated to her father, in a copy of verses, dated March 20, 1642. The title is,—Several poems, compiled with great variety of wit and learning, full of delight; wherein especially is contained a complete discourse and description of the four elements, constituting ages of man, seasons of the year, together with an exact epitome of the three first monarchies, viz.; the Assyan, Persian, Grecian, and Roman commonwealth, from the beginning to the end of their last king, with divers other pleasant and serious poems. By a gentlewoman of New-England. A third edition was published in 1753. She died 1672, aged 60.

BRADSTREET, John, a major-general in America, appointed by the king of Great Britain, was in 1746, lieutenant governor of St. John's, Newfoundland. He was afterwards distinguished for his military services. It was thought of the highest importance, in the year 1756, to keep open the communication with fort Oswego, on lake Ontario. General Shirley accordingly enlisted 40 companies of boatmen, and placed them under the command of Bradstreet. In the spring of this year, a small stockaded post of 25 men had been cut off. It became necessary to pass through the country with large squadrons of boats, as the enemy infested the passage through the Onondago river. On his return from Oswego, July, 1756, colonel Bradstreet, who was apprehensive of being ambushed, ordered the several divisions to proceed as near each other as possible. He was at the head of about 300 boatmen in the first division, when at the distance of nine miles from the fort, the enemy rose from their ambuscade and attacked him. He instantly landed upon a small island, and with but six men maintained his position, till he was reinforced. A general engagement ensued, in which Bradstreet with gallantry rushed upon a more numerous enemy, and entirely routed them, killing and wounding about 200 men. His own loss was about 30. In the year 1758, he was intrusted with the command of 3000 men on an expedition against fort Frontenac, which was planned by himself. On the 27th of August it was surrendered to him. In 1764, he compelled the Delawares, Shawnese, and other Indians to terms of peace. He was appointed major-general in 1772, and died in 1774.

BRADWARDIN, Thomas, a native of Hatfield in Sussex, educated at Oxford, where he was proctor and divinity professor. For his great merit as a mathematician, philosopher, and divine, he was made confessor to Edward III, during his wars in France, where as a preacher his eloquence had great influence in restraining the violence and lawless conduct of the military. He became archbishop of Canterbury in 1348, and from his learning was called the profound doctor. Among other things he published a tract called Causa Dei—besides geometria speculativa—arithmetica speculativa—tractatus proportionum, Venice, 1505. He was consecrated at Avignon, and died 1549, at Lambeth.

BRADY, Nicholas, D. D., was born at Bandon in Ireland, October 28th, 1659, and at the age of 12 he came over to England, and was educated at Westminster college and Christ Church, Oxford. He afterwards returned to Ireland, where his father, who was in the military line, resided, and he took his degrees at the university of Dublin. He showed himself zealous and active during the revolution, and thrice successively, by his influence and address, he saved his native town from conflagration, agreeable to the orders of king James' generals. He died 20th May, 1726, aged 66. He wrote three vols. of sermons, besides a translation of Virgil's Æneid, and his well known version of the psalms in conjunction with Mr. Tate.

BRADY, Robert, a physician and historian, a native of Norfolk, was educated at Caius College, Cambridge; of which college he became master. He was also keeper of the records in the Tower, regius professor of physic at Cambridge, physician to James II., and one of the representatives for Cambridge. He died in 1700. His principal works are, an Introduction to the Old English History; a Complete History of England; and a Treatise on Burghs. Gilbert Stuart justly observes of Brady, that "he prostituted an excellent understanding, and admirable quickness, to vindicate tyranny, and to destroy the rights of his nation."

BRAHE, Tycho, descended from an illustrious Swedish family, was born at Knudstorp in Denmark, 1546, and distinguished himself as an astronomer. He studied rhetoric and philosophy at Copenhagen, but so great was his admiration of the skill of astronomers in calculating eclipses to the precision of a moment, that he employed all his money in purchasing books for his favorite pursuit, and often spent whole nights with a small celestial globe in his hands in learning the names of the stars, and in the acquisition of a science which he called divine. His friends in vain attempted to represent astronomy as beneath his rank; he continued his study with increasing application, and gained the patronage of the Danish king, at whose request he read some popular lectures on the theory of comets. His knowledge was improved by visiting Switzerland, Italy and Germany, and he would have removed to Basil, if the king of Denmark, with a munificence truly noble, had not retained him in his dominions, by settling upon him for life the island of Kuen in the Sound, and building a commodious observatory and laboratory, which he called Uraniburgh, and to which he annexed a pension of two thousand crowns, besides preferment of equal or superior value. Thus flattered by his sovereign, and honored with the praises and the visits of the noble and the great, especially of James II. of Scotland, when he came to Denmark, to marry the princess Anne, Brahe might be said to live happy and respected. Malice however attacked him in his retreat, his enemies vilified his services, he was abandoned by the king, and bidding adieu to his favorite Uraniburgh, he found at last an asylum at Prague, under the protection of the emperor, and with a pension of 3000 crowns. He died 24th October, 1601. The Rodolphine tables and the historia cœlestis, are the best of his works, but the wildness of his opinions is sufficiently proved by the absurdity of the system which he endeavored to establish in mere opposition to the Copernican.

BRAINERD, David, the celebrated missionary, was born in April, 1718, at Haddam, Connecticut. In 1739, he became a member of Yale college, where he was distinguished for application, and general correctness of conduct; but was expelled in 1742, in consequence of having said, in the warmth of his religious zeal, that one of the tutors was as devoid of grace as a chair,—an expression which reached the ears of the rector, who commanded Brainerd to make a public confession in the Hall. Thinking the order unjust, he refused to comply, and on this account, and as he had been guilty of going to a separate meeting, after prohibition by the authority of college, he was expelled. In the spring of 1742, he began the study of divinity; and at the end of July, he was licensed to preach, for which a thorough examination had shown him qualified. He had for some time entertained a strong desire of preaching the gospel among the heathens, which was gratified by an appointment as missionary to the Indians, from the society for propagating Christian knowledge. At Kannapeck, an Indian village of Massachusetts, he commenced his labors in the 25th year of his age. He remained there about 12 months, at first residing in a wigwam among the Indians, but afterwards in a cabin, which he constructed for himself, that he might be alone, when not engaged in his duties of preaching and instruction. In 1744, he was ordained by the presbytery of Newark, New-Jersey, and took up his habitation near the forks of the Delaware, in Pennsylvania, where he resided for a year, during the course of which he made two visits to the Indians on the Susquehanna river. His exertions, however, were attended with little success, until he went to the Indians at Crosweeksung, near Freehold, in New-Jersey. Before the end of a year, a complete reformation took place in the lives of the savages, seventy-eight of whom he baptized within that time. Being advised on account of his health to travel, in the spring of 1747, he went as far as Boston, and from thence to Northampton, where in the family of Jonathan Edwards, he was doomed to pass the remainder of his days. He died Oct. 9th, 1747, aged 29. His publications are, a narrative of his labors at Kaunapeck, and his journal, or account of the rise and progress of a remarkable work of grace among a number of Indians in New-Jersey and Pennsylvania, 1746.

BRAINT, Hir, the nephew of Cadwallon, king of North Wales. He supported bravely his uncle against Edwin, king of England, in 620, and when defeated he went privately to England, and by his conciliating conduct gained such a number of adherents, that he was enabled to make head against the enemy, and to recall his uncle who had fled to Ireland, and to replace him on his throne, 633, after the battle of Hatfield, in which Edwin fell.

BRAITHWAITE, John, an enterprising mechanic, who employed the diving-bell most successfully in recovering shipwrecked property. In 1783 he descended in the Royal George, sunk off Spithead, and brought up the sheet anchor and many of her guns. From the Hartwell East Indiaman, lost near one of the Cape de Verd islands, he obtained, in 1788, dollars to the value of £33,000; 7000 pigs of lead, and 360 boxes of tin; and from the wreck of the Abergavenny East Indiaman, off the isle of Portland, property estimated at £105,000. He died in the year 1818.

BRAMAH, Joseph, an eminent mechanic and engineer, born in 1749, at Stainsborough, in Yorkshire, was apprenticed to a carpenter; but very early evinced his genius for mechanics. Removing to London, he commenced business, and laid the foundation of his fortune by an improvement on water-closets. He became, however, still better known by his ingenious locks, which cannot be picked, and for which he obtained a patent. Many other inventions followed; among which one of the most useful is the hydraulic press, on the principle of the hydrostatic paradox: the power of this press may be said to be unlimited, and is of extensive application. Bramah died in 1815.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO, Lazarus, was born at Castel-Duranti in Urbino 1444, and distinguished himself as an architect at Naples and Rome. It was in conformity to his plan that pope Julius II. was persuaded to rebuild the church of St. Peter; but though the work was conducted with great expedition, the artist did not live to see the completion of his noble design. He died 1514, aged 70, eight years after the foundations had been laid, and the merit of finishing the building was reserved for Michael Angelo. Bramante was amiable in his private character, and as a poet and musician he was also eminent. His poetry was published at Milan, 1756.

BRAMHALL, John, an eminent prelate, was born at Pontefract, in 1593, and educated at Sidney College, Cambridge. After having obtained several preferments in England, and been one of the king's high commissioners, he went to Ireland, where he rose to be bishop of Londonderry, and took an active part in church affairs. In 1641, however, articles of treason were exhibited against him, but the proceedings were subsequently dropped. During the civil wars he was highly serviceable to the royal cause; and when the parliament triumphed, he withdrew to Brussels. After the restoration he was made archbishop of Armagh. He died in 1668. Like Laud, Bramhall was a high church and prerogative champion, but had more temper and moderation. His works form a folio volume.

BRANCAS-LAURAGAIS, the Duke of, a French nobleman, equally remarkable for his generosity, wit, and love of science, was born in 1735, and died in 1824. He had a share in discovering the basis of the diamond, improved the manufacture of porcelain, and contributed greatly to spread inoculation throughout France. He is the author of several literary, scientific, and political works; among which are the tragedies of Clytemnestra and Jocasta.

BRAND, John, a native of Newcastle on Tyne, born in 1743, was originally a shoemaker, but fortunately obtained the means of being educated at Oxford. He died, in 1806, rector of St. Mary Hill, London, and secretary of the Antiquarian Society. His principal works are, a History of Newcastle, two volumes quarto; and Observations on Popular Antiquities.

BRAND, John, a divine, and political writer, took his master's degree at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1769, and obtained the livings of St. George, Southwark, and Wickham Skeigh, in Suffolk, which he retained till his decease, in 1808. His chief productions are, a Defence of Mr. Reeves; Historical Essay on Political Associations; and a Vindication of Marquis Wellesley, on the Oude charge.

BRANDES, John Christian, an actor and dramatist, was born at Stettin, in 1735, and died at Berlin, in 1799, after a life of singular vicissitude. He was an indifferent actor; but as an author he had merit, and has been called the Goldoni of Germany. His works form eight octavo volumes. He also wrote his own Memoirs.

BRANDOLINI, Aurelio, a native of Florence, eminent as a poet. He was for some time resident in the university of Buda under the patronage of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, and after his death he entered among the Augustines at Florence. The best known of his works is de ratione scribendi, in which he gives good directions for the acquiring of a good style. He was also eminent as a preacher. He was surnamed Lippo because he was blind.

BRANDON, Charles, duke of Suffolk, a favorite of Henry VIII. of England. He was valiant in the field, and handsome in his person, and gained the public esteem by his courteous behavior. At the tournament of St. Denys, in honor of Mary the sister of Henry who married Louis XII. of France, he was attacked by a strong and gigantic German, at the instigation of the French, who were envious of his reputation, but he repulsed and defeated his antagonist, and so noble was his conduct, says Henualt the historian, that it won the heart of the youthful bride, who in three short months became a widow, and soon offered her hand and her fortune to her favored champion. The marriage accordingly was celebrated with the permission of Henry.

BRANDT, Sebastian, a counsellor of Strasburg, and professor of law, was author of a poem called "Navis stultifera mortalium," 1488, 8vo. of which there appeared a French translation 1497. He died 1520, aged 66.

BRANDT, colonel, a noted half-blooded Indian Chief of the Mohawk tribe, was educated by Dr. Wheelock of Dartmouth college. His attainments in knowledge were such that he made a translation of the Gospel of Mark, and of the liturgy of the Episcopal church, which were published. He attached himself to the British in the war of the revolution, and in 1788 with colonel Butler headed a party which broke up the settlements on the Susquehannah, and with circumstances of horrid treachery and cruelty destroyed the beautiful village of Wyoming, and in the following year attacked Minisink and did much injury. He resided in Canada after the war, and died there in 1807.

BRANDT, Gerard, a minister of Amsterdam, author of the life of de Ruyter the admiral, of a Flemish history of the reformation of the Low Countries in 4 vols. 4to. afterwards abridged in a French translation of 3 vols. 12mo. The work was so popular, that Fagel said once to bishop Burnet, that it was worth learning Flemish to read the original. He died at Rotterdam 1685, aged 59.

BRASAVOLA, Antonius Musa, a physician of eminence, born at Ferrara, where he was professor of medicine, and where he died 1555, aged 55. His abilities recommended him to the popes and the other princes of Italy, to whom he was physician, and also to Francis I. of France, Henry VIII. of England, and Charles V. of Germany. He wrote some works on medical subjects, and besides commentaries on Hippocrates and Galen.

BRAHWAYTE, Richard, a native of Westmoreland, known as a poet. He entered at Oriel college, Oxford, 1604, and thence removed to Cambridge, and afterwards became captain in the army, and a justice of peace in his native county. His works are the golden fleece and other poems, 1611, 8vo.—the poet's willow, or the passionate shepherd, 8vo. 1614.—the prodigal's tears, or farewell to vanity, 1615, 8vo.—essays on the five senses, 8vo. 1620—the English gentleman, 4to. often edited. He died at Appleton, Yorkshire, about 1673.

BRAATTLE, William, a man of extraordinary talents and character, graduated at Harvard college 1722. He was a representative of Cambridge in the general court, and was long a member of the council. He studied theology and preached with acceptance. His eminence as a lawyer drew around him an abundance of clients. As a physician his practice was extensive and celebrated. He was also a military man, and obtained the appointment of major-general of militia. While he secured the favor of the governor of the state, he also ingratiated himself with the people. At the commencement of the American revolution an unhappy sympathy in the plans of general Gage induced him to retire into Boston, from which place he accompanied the troops to Halifax, where he died in 1775.

BRAY, Sir Reginald, was descended from a family which came to England, with the Conqueror, and settled in the counties of Northampton and Warwick. He was instrumental in raising Henry VII. to the throne, and he negotiated with the duke of Buckingham and others that prince's marriage with Elizabeth daughter of Edward IV. He was a man of valor, and was made a knight baronet at the battle of Bosworthfield, or as some say, at that of Blackheath, and he received as the reward of his services the forfeited land of lord Audley. St. George's chapel at Windsor, and that of Henry VII. at Westminster abbey, are mentioned as specimens of his skill in architecture, as he contributed to the raising and embellishing of them. He died 5th August 1501.

BRAY, Thomas, D. D., a native of Marston, in Shropshire, educated at Hurthill, Oxford. He was at first patronized by Lord Digby, but his abilities soon recommended him to bishop Compton, by whom he was sent as commissary to settle the church affairs of Maryland and Virginia. In this employment, which engaged the best part of his life, and obliged him to cross the Atlantic several times, he behaved with all that zeal and disinterestedness which characterize the true Christian. He instituted libraries in several parts of America for the information and improvement of the missionaries employed in preaching the gospel, and mainly contributed to the establishment of the society for the Propagation of the Gospel. It was not only the money subscribed by individuals, or granted by corporations, for those charitable purposes, which was economically spent, but Dr. Bray contributed the whole of his small fortune to the support of his liberal plans, better gratified in the promotion of public happiness, than in the possession of private wealth. This great and good man, whose whole life was thus devoted to benevolent purposes, and whose high services deserved and received the gratitude of king and parliament, died 15th February, 1780, aged 73, leaving only one daughter. He was author of some useful publications.

BREARLEY, David, chief justice of the state of New Jersey, was graduated at Princeton in 1781. In 1787 he was elected a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and affixed his name to that instrument. Two years after he was appointed by President Washington judge of the Federal Court for the district of New-Jersey. He died at Trenton, August 1790.

BREBEUF, Jean de, uncle to the preceding, distinguished himself as a missionary, to convert the wild inhabitants of Canada to Christianity. He was cruelly burnt by these infatuated savages in 1649, in his 56th year.

BREGUET, Abraham Louis, one of the most eminent watch and chronometer makers in Europe, was born in Switzerland, in 1747, and settled at Paris, after having served his apprenticeship at Versailles. At his outset in life he had severe pecuniary difficulties to contend with, but he surmounted them by perseverance and talent, and established the most celebrated manufactory on the continent. His improvements in watches and time pieces were numerous and highly important. He died in 1823. His business and his talents are inherited by his son.

BREGY, Charlotte Saumaise de Chazan, comtesse de, a maid of honor to Ann of Austria. She was niece to Salmasius, and became known for the ease and elegance of her conversation, her wit, and the beauty of her person. She died at Paris 1693, aged 74. Some of her verses and letters were published in 1688, in 12mo. abounding in metaphysical conceits, and occasionally interesting descriptions.

BREITKOPF, John Gottlieb Emmanuel, one of the most eminent of German printers and letter-founders, was born at Leipsic, in 1719, and died there in 1794. The whole of his life was spent in improving typography and the art of casting types. He gave elegance to the German letter, rendered types twice as durable as usual, and invented musical types and moveable characters for printing Chinese. Breitkopf is the author of an essay on the Invention of Printing; and an Essay on the Origin of Playing Cards.

BREMONT, Francois de, a Parisian, made secretary to the Royal London society, in consequence of his translating their philosophical transactions.

He died at Paris 1742, in his 29th year, admired for his laborious application and critical discernment.

BRENNER, Henry, a native of Cronoby in West Bothnia who in 1697 went with Fabricius the Swedish ambassador to the Persian court. On his return, he was arrested at Moscow, in consequence of the war with Sweden; but his hours of confinement were devoted to literary pursuits. He translated into Latin the history of Armenia by Moses Armenius Choroniensis, printed at Stockholm 1723; and also wrote observations on the Czar Peter's expedition against the Persians with a map of the Caspian and of the river Dwina. He was made keeper of the royal library at Stockholm, where he died 1732, aged 63.

BRENT, sir Nathaniel, a native of Woolford, Warwickshire, educated at Merton college, of which he became the warden, by the influence of Abbot the primate whose niece he had married. Among other things he published a Latin and English translation of the history of the council of Trent, a copy of which he had procured at Venice. He was knighted by Charles I. at Woodstock; but his loyalty gave way to his eagerness to retain his offices, and as the friend of the puritans, he continued at the head of his college, and was made the chief visitor of the university. He died in London 6th Nov. 1652, aged 79.

BRENTIUS or BRENTZEN, John, was born at Wiel in Swabia, and distinguished himself as the friend and follower of Luther. He was the founder of the ubiquists, a sect who maintained the presence of the body of Jesus every where. He was highly honored by the duke of Wirtemberg, and deserved it, if we reckon the ponderous form of his controversial writings in eight folio volumes. He died at Tubingen 1570, in his 71st year, leaving 12 children by a second wife.

BRENTON, William, governor of Rhode Island, was a representative of Boston for several years from 1635. Of Rhode Island he was president between 1660 and 1661, and governor under the charter from 1666 to 1669. He died 1674.

BREREWOD, Edward, a learned antiquary, born at Chester, of which his father was three times mayor. After finishing his education at Brazenose, Oxford, he was elected the first astronomical professor of Gresham college. He died in London of a fever, 4th November, 1613, aged 48, much respected, not only for his great learning, but his highly exemplary private character. His works, consisting of nine treatises, were published after his death, among which the most esteemed are "on the weight and value of ancient coins, in Latin, 1614, in 4to."—inquiries touching the diversity of languages and religion through the world, 1614, 4to. and elements of logic.

BRETONNEAU, Francis, a Jesuit of Tours, who died at Paris, 1741, aged 81. He is author of a life of James II, and of seven volumes of sermons, edited by Berryer, and recommended, if not by the eloquence, yet by the more excellent example of the preacher's virtuous life.

BREVAL, John Durant de, was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow 1702. In consequence of a dispute with Bentley, the master of his college, he quitted the university, and rose to the rank of captain under the great Marlborough. Besides poems and plays, Breval was the writer of four entertaining volumes of travels, and by his censure of Pope, he gained immortality among the heroes of the Dunciad. He died Jan. 1739.

BREUGEL, Peter, or Old, a native of Breugel, near Breda, distinguished as a painter, and celebrated for the originality of character, and truth of delineation which he infused into his pieces, especially such as represented the feasts and rustic enjoyments of his countrymen. He died at Antwerp in the last part of the 16th century. Some of his pieces are in the possession of the grand duke of Tuscany.

BREUGEL, John, second son of old Peter, surnamed Velvet, from his mode of dress, chiefly excelled in painting flowers and fruits, in which his superiority was inimitable, so that Rubens himself solicited the perfecting strokes of his pencil in the finishing of his Vertumnus and Pomona. After visiting Italy, and residing long at Cologne, respected and beloved, he died about 1642, remarkable for never having admitted a pupil near his person.—Another of that name, called Abraham, born at Antwerp, 1672, excelled as a flower and landscape painter.

BREVINT, Daniel, a native of Jersey, who studied at Saumur, and then became fellow of Jesus college, Oxford, after the foundation of three fellowships at Jesus, Exeter, and Pembroke, by Charles I. for the education of the divines of Jersey and Guernsey. During the civil wars he retired to France, and after the restoration he was raised to the enjoyment of a prebendal stall of Durham, and in 1681 to the dignity of dean of Lincoln. He died May 5th, 1695, aged 79. He wrote a treatise on the Lord's supper, and other theological pieces, in Latin, now no longer remembered.

BREWSTER, William, one of the first settlers of Plymouth colony, was born in England 1560, and educated at the university of Cambridge. After completing his education, he entered into the service of William Davison, ambassador of queen Elizabeth in Holland. A mutual attachment subsisted between Davison and Brewster. Davison regarding Brewster as a son, and Brewster showing to him the affection and reverence due to a father, till Davison's unfortunate meddling with the warrant for the execution of Mary, put it out of the power of Brewster to remain with him. His attention was now chiefly occupied by the interests of religion. As he discovered much corruption in the constitution, forms, ceremonies, and discipline of the established church, he thought it his duty to withdraw from its communion, and to establish with others a separate society. This new church, under the pastoral care of the aged Mr. Clifton and Mr. Robinson, met on the Lords' days at Mr. Brewster's house, where they were entertained at his expense, as long as they could assemble without interruption. They were at length compelled to seek refuge in a foreign country. In this attempt they were opposed by the government, and he was seized with Mr. Bradford and others, just as they were going to Holland in 1607, and imprisoned at Boston in Lincolnshire. He was the greatest sufferer of the company, because he had the most property. Having with much difficulty and expense obtained his liberty, he first assisted the poor of the society in their embarkation, and then followed them to Holland. His estate being exhausted, he opened a school at Leyden for teaching the English tongue, and being familiar with the Latin, he found no impediment from the want of a language common to both. By means of a grammar, which he formed himself, he soon assisted them to a correct knowledge of the English. By the help of some friends he also set up a printing press, and published several books against the hierarchy, which could not obtain a licence for publication in England. Such was his reputation in the church at Leyden, that he was chosen a ruling elder, and he accompanied the members of it, who came to New England in 1620. He suffered with them all the hardships attending their settlement in the wilderness. He partook with them of labor, hunger and watching; and his bible and his sword were equally familiar to him. As the church at Plymouth was for several years destitute of a minister, Mr. Brewster, who was venerable for his character, and years, frequently officiated as a preacher, though he could never be persuaded to administer the sacraments. He died 1644, aged 83.

BRIDAINE, N., a famous French preacher of the diocese of Uzès, compared by Maury, in his principles of eloquence, to Demosthenes and Bossuet. His powers of delivery were such, and his address so commanding, that he could be heard distinctly by 10,000 people in the open air. He died 1767, author of cantiques spirituels, printed 12mo. 1748.

BRIDGE, William, a leading preacher among the independents of England. When expelled by bishop Wren, he became a zealous pastor at Rotterdam, and soon after returned to England, and resided at Yarmouth. He was member of the assembly of divines held at Westminster. He wrote 21 treatises, in two vols. 4to. besides sermons, and died March 1670, aged 70.

BRIDGEWATER, Francis Egerton, duke of, celebrated as the first person who planned and completed the cutting of a navigable canal in England, was born 21st May, 1736. His first canal, from Worsley to Manchester, was opened in 1760. Though the sums spent on this great work were almost beyond calculation, and nearly ruined the noble and enterprising projector, yet he had the happiness to see his plans succeed to the fullest wishes of his heart, and, with the infinite benefits which he conferred on the national commerce and on provincial intercourse, he had the satisfaction to find his income increase in a most rapid progression. This truly great and illustrious character died March, 1803.

BRIDPORT, Alexander Hood, Admiral Lord, the youngest brother of Viscount Hood, like his relative, entered the navy early, and, like him, distinguished himself on many occasions, as an able and gallant seaman. He bore a part in the action of the first of June, 1794, and, in June, 1795, defeated a French squadron, and captured three sail of the line. He was created an Irish peer in 1794, an English peer in 1796, and died in 1814.

BRIENNE, Walter de, a native of Champagne, distinguished for his courage at the siege of Acre against the Saracens. He was afterwards king of Sicily, and duke of Apulia; and was killed in 1205, in defending the invaded rights of his wife Maria Alberic, by whom he obtained his dukedom. His son, and successor, of the same name, surnamed the great, distinguished himself also against the Saracens, by whom he was taken prisoner, and cruelly put to death, 1251.

BRIGGS, Henry, a native of Halifax, in Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and made, 1596, first professor of geometry in the college founded by Gresham. He resigned this office in 1619, when made Savilian professor at Oxford, where he devoted his time to study, and rendered himself beloved by his unaffected manners, great goodness of heart, and humility of deportment. His writings consist of eleven different treatises on mathematical subjects, and also arithmetica logarithmica, containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. The science of logarithms had been lately discovered by Napier, in Scotland, whom he visited, and by whom he was honored with many friendly communications. He died January 1630, aged 74.

BRIGGS, William, a native of Norwich, a city four times represented by his father in parliament. He was educated at Benet college, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow in 1668, and as a student of medicine, ambitious of distinction and eminence, he travelled through France in search of knowledge and information. On his return he published a valuable treatise on the eye, and was made physician to the king, and universally courted for his skill and experience. He was also made physician to St. Thomas' hospital. He died 14th Sept. 1704.

BRIGHTMAN, Thomas, rector of Hawnes, Bedfordshire, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; and wrote Latin commentaries on the canticles and apocalypse. In this last book, which was afterwards translated into English, and became very popular, he calls the English church the church of Laodicea, and the angel loved by God the church of Geneva and the Scotch kirk. It is said that he prayed for a sudden death, and as if his wishes were fulfilled, he died in a coach while travelling, with a book in his hand, 1607.

BRILLAT-SAVARIN, Anthelme, was born at Bellej, on the Savoy frontier of France, in 1755, and at the time of his death, in 1826, filled a place in one of the higher French tribunals. He produced various works; but is best known by his Physiology of Taste, or Meditations of transcendental Gastronomy, which has passed through several editions.

BRINDLEY, James, was born in 1716, at Tunsted, in Warmhill parish, Derbyshire. After being engaged in the humble occupation of mill-wright, in Cheshire and Staffordshire, he was called to direct and complete the vast plans which the duke of Bridgewater had conceived, in the conveying of a canal over the Mersey and the Bolland, and over many wide and deep vallies, by means of elevated aqueducts, and subterraneous perforations. Every obstacle was surmounted by the genius of the architect, and the opulence of his persevering employer, and new triumphs were prepared for boldness of mechanism and undaunted ingenuity in the completion of the grand trunk navigation, which, in uniting the Trent and the Mersey, extended 93 miles, and which had, at Hare-castle-hill, a tunnel 2880 yards long, more than 70 yards below the surface of the earth. As Brindley's education had been neglected, his calculations were seldom communicated to paper. When immersed in deep meditation, he would often remain two or three days in bed, and when he had unravelled the difficulties of his plan, he would rise, and hasten to execute, without any model or sketch but the strong suggestion of his own head. He died at Turnhurst, in Staffordshire, 27th September, 1772, aged 56. His end was probably hastened by the intenseness of his application, which produced a hectic fever, which for a long time gradually wasted his powers of life. His other more remarkable works were, the canal which joined the navigation of Bristol with that of Liverpool, by the union of the grand trunk near Haywood in Staffordshire to the Severn near Bewdley, and his plan to clear the Liverpool docks from mud, and to check the intrusions of the sea, by walls built without mortar. His attachment to inland navigation was such, that when asked the use of rivers, in the house of commons, he bluntly replied, to feed navigable canals.

BRINVILLIERS, Maria Margaret d'Aubrai, marchioness of, a French lady, known for her intrigues and her crimes. She was, when very young, married, in 1651, to the marquis of Brinvilliers, and for some time maintained a character of prudence and chastity. The introduction of a young officer of Gascony, called de St. Croix, into her house, by her husband, however, proved the beginning of her misfortunes and her crimes. She loved this stranger with such ardor that she sacrificed her honor to her guilty passion; but her father, who was sensible of her debauched conduct, confined her lover in the prison of the Bastille, whilst his daughter, as if penitent for her incontinence, devoted herself to religious duties, and assumed the appearance of sanctity. After a year's confinement, de St. Croix, who had in the prison learned the art of mixing poison, from an Italian of the name of Exili, was permitted to visit his guilty favorite. He communicated the fatal secret of poison, and she with alacrity received it, and unsuspected, by slow degrees, cut off her father, her two brothers, and her sister, in 1670; and if she spared her husband, it was because he looked with indifference and without jealousy on her lewdness. An accident brought her crimes to light. St. Croix, in working some subtle poison, was suddenly overpowered by its effluvia, and dropped down dead. As no relation appeared to claim his property, it was sealed; but the marchioness insisted with such importunity upon obtaining possession of a particular box, that its contents were examined upon suspicion, and it was discovered to contain papers with directions, full of slow poison. The guilty marchioness escaped, however, her pursuers, and fled to England, and thence to Holland; but she was seized at Leige, and brought to Paris, where her crimes were laid open, and she was condemned to have her head cut off, and then to be burnt. She underwent the dreadful sentence of the law, 16th July, 1676, with great firmness, and with the appearance of contrition for the murder of her relations, and the licentious conduct of her life.

BRISSEOT, John Pierre, a Frenchman, of great natural powers, but of a restless and ambitious soul. Dissatisfied with the political servitude of his country, he for some time engaged in the publication of the courier de l'Europe, which might disseminate his principles under pretence of foreign or domestic intelligence; and when this failed, he turned his thoughts towards criminal jurisprudence. His theory of criminal laws appeared, in two vols. 8vo. 1780, with great popularity, and was soon followed by two discourses which gained the public prize at Chalons sur Marne. In the prosecution of his studies, and after the publication of his philosophical library, he, after going to Geneva and Neufchatel, visited England, whose language, laws, and manners, he regarded with affectionate reverence, as diffusive of that liberty which he in vain wished to discover at home. On his return to Paris, 1784, he was committed for a few weeks to the Bastille; and this probably tended to inflame his rancor against the abuses and intrigues of monarchy. He was however liberated by the influence of the duke of Orleans, to whose children his wife, of the name of Dupont, had been governess, under the direction and auspices of madam Genlis. Eager to promote happiness in every part of the earth, he instituted, at Paris, a society for the abolition of negro slavery; and more effectually to carry his plans into execution, he passed over to America, to examine the manners and the constitution of that newly emancipated republic. His abode beyond the Atlantic was of short duration. His schemes to establish a colony of Frenchmen, under republican laws, totally failed; but the revolution at Paris was an epoch too fruitful in portentous events, and too attractive for his ambitious views, to detain him in America, and he soon appeared in the capital, where he displayed all the ability of a statesman, a demagogue, and a factious partisan. For a while he acquired popularity, supported by the gold, the arts, and the intrigues of the infamous Orleans, and as the leader of a party called Brissotins or Girondists, because composed of the members of the Gironde; and though violent, he is to be commended for the mildness which he displayed towards the unfortunate Lewis, whose fate he wished to be suspended till the final consolidation of the republic. The versatility of his talents could not, however, ensure his safety. In the midst of political intrigue, and sanguinary faction, he was denounced as the agent of England by Robespierre and his adherents, and after a mock trial, guillotined, the 30th November, 1793, with his friends and associates. He was in his 39th year. Besides the works enumerated, he wrote, thoughts on the means of attaining truth—letters on the history of England—an examination of the travels of Chattleux in America, with an account of the country, 3 vols. 8vo.

BRITTON, Thomas, a native of Higham Ferrers, in Northamptonshire, engaged in London as a small coalman, an employment to which he afterwards added the pursuits of chemistry, and the practice of music. Though eccentric in his conduct, yet the respectability of his private character recommended him friends, and though in an humble station, his musical meetings were attended frequently by many of the great and the opulent of the town. After he had long amused and entertained the public, a ventriloquist was introduced at one of his concerts, who in an unusual manner proclaimed the sudden and approaching death of the musical coalman. Britton was so astonished and alarmed by this apparently invisible agent, that he fell ill, and expired a few days after, in September 1714.

BROCK, Isaac, major general in the British army, captured gen. Hull and his whole army at Detroit August 16, 1812. He afterwards proceeded to the Niagara frontier, and was killed in the battle of Queenstown, Oct. 13th. He was rallying his troops, which had been put to flight by a desperate charge of col. Chrystie, when he was pierced by three balls. He was a brave and generous officer. During his funeral the guns of the American fort were fired as a token of respect.

BROCKLESBY, Richard, a native of Minehead, Somersetshire, eminent as a physician, and known as the friend of Wilkes, of Johnson, and of Burke. He studied at Edinburgh and Leyden, where he took his degrees in 1745; and acquired both opulence and fame in his professional engagements in London; and nobly presented Burke with 1000*l.* that he might thus oblige his friend in his lifetime, rather than leave him that as a legacy at his death. He was admitted at Cambridge ad eundem 1754, and thus obtained a fellowship in the college of physicians, and afterwards served in Germany, 1753, as physician to the army. He died in December, 1797, aged 75, and left, among other things, besides an essay on the mortality of horned cattle, 8vo. 1746, oeconomical observations for the improvement of hospitals in 8vo. from 1738 to 1763, and various papers inserted in the philosophical transactions.

BRODEAU, John, was born at Tours, in 1500, and rose to such eminence as a scholar and critic, that Scaliger, Grotius, and others, have bestowed on his merits the most unbounded encomiums. He studied law under Alciat, and afterwards applied himself to philosophy and belles lettres, of which he became the support and the ornament. After travelling in Italy, he returned to France, where he lived in literary retirement, and honorable independence. He died 1563, unmarried. His annotations on several of the classics were published after his death.

BROGLIO, Vietor Maurice count de, marshal of France, was born of an illustrious family at Quercy, and distinguished himself in the service of Louis XIV. He died 1727, aged 80. His son, Francis Marie, was also marshal of France, and deserved the highest honors by his warlike conduct in Italy, and in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734. He died 1745. His son, also a marshal, was the conqueror of Bergen, and greatly distinguished during the seven years' war. He quitted France in 1794, and retired to Russia, where he was received with honorable distinction, and raised to the same rank which he held in the emperor's service. His son, Claudius Vietor, prince of Broglio, espoused the party of the republicans at the beginning of the revolution, and was flattered by the demagogues with the title of marshal. His refusal to receive as law, while commander of the army of the Rhine, the decree which suspended the king's authority, proved fatal to him. He was called to Paris, and condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal. He was guillotined 27th June, 1794, aged 37.

BROKESBY, Francis, a native of Stokes, in Leicestershire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and promoted to the rectory of Rowley in Yorkshire. He was the friend of Dodwell, and also of Nelson, whom he assisted in the compilation of his feasts and fasts, and in the hospitable residence of Mr. Cherry, at Shotesbrook; he wrote several treatises on moral and religious subjects, such as history of the government of the primitive church, 8vo. 1714—life of Henry Dodwell. He died about 1718.

BROME, Richard, a menial servant in the family of Ben. Jonson, who rose by the native powers of his genius to great literary eminence, as the author of some comedies, 15 of which still exist. His jovial crew was lately revived at Covent-garden, and met with great success. He died 1652.

BROOK, Ralph, York herald, is known for the errors which he discovered in Camden's popular work, Britannia, and which he published, with severe remarks, when treated with harshness and contempt by the antiquary. He died 15th October, 1625, aged 73; and in 1723 his second part of discovery of errors was published, with a head of the author.

BROOKE, Sir Robert, a judge of eminence in the reign of Mary, born at Claverly, in Shropshire, and educated at Oxford and the Middle Temple. His integrity at the bar and on the bench have been deservedly celebrated. He died chief justice of the common pleas, 1558, and was buried in Claverly church, where a monument preserves his memory. He is author of an abridgment containing an abstract of the year books till the time of Mary, fol. —certain cases adjudged, from 6 Henry VIII. to 4 of queen Mary—reading on the statutes of limitations, 32 Henry VIII. in 8vo.

BROOKE, Henry, a writer of eminence, born at Rantaven in Ireland, and educated in the school of Dr. Sheridan, and in Dublin college. At the age of 17 he entered at the Temple, and from the vivacity of his genius, the excellence of his heart, and the literary powers of his mind, he soon became the friend and favorite of Pope, of Swift, and other great characters. By the friendship of lords Lyttleton and Chatham he was introduced to the prince of Wales, and promised himself the fairest harvest of literary labors and poetical exertions. His tragedy of Gustavus Vasa was prepared, but unfortunately the politics of the time, and the influence of government, forbade its introduction on the public stage, as it seemed to breathe sentiments too warm and elevated in favor of liberty. This disappointment however was succeeded by a rapid sale of the play, and the public, by a most uncommon liberality of subscriptions, repaid, in a tenfold degree, the most sanguine expectations of the author. Returning to Ireland, he resolved to spend the rest of his days in retirement. The political ingratitude of the times, and the violence of party spirit, as well as the influence of a beloved wife, who was attached to the peaceful scenes of privacy, and not to the tempestuous revolutions of dignified life, were probably the causes of this remarkable seclusion. In his retirement Brooke courted the muses, and though he found Garrick unwilling to support his merit, by a representation on the London stage, yet he met with some success in Dublin. He died at Dublin, 10th October, 1783, aged 77.

BROOKS, John, LL. D., a governor of Massachusetts, under the constitution of 1780. Without a public education, gov. Brooks was regularly educated as a physician. He had not been long engaged in practice, when the revolutionary war broke out, and he was appointed to the command of a company of minute men, and he commenced practice in his new profession, with the British on their retreat from Lexington and Concord. He was soon after raised to the rank of Major in the continental service, and was distinguished for his knowledge of tactics, being associated with baron Steuben, in the duty of introducing a uniform system of exercise and manœuvres. In 1777 he was appointed lieutenant colonel, and had no small share in the capture of Burgoyne, on the seventh of October at Saratoga. When the conspiracy of some of the officers against the commander-in-chief, in March 1783, had well nigh ruined the country, Washington rode up to Brooks and requested him to keep his officers within quarters, to prevent their attending the insurgent meeting. Brooks replied, "Sir, I have anticipated your wishes, and my orders are given." Washington took him by the hand, and said, "Colonel Brooks, this is just what I expected from you." He was one of the committee who brought in the resolutions of the officers, expressing their abhorrence of this plot, and also one of that appointed by the officers to adjust their accounts with congress. After the army was disbanded gov. Brooks resumed the practice of medicine in Medford. He was for many years major-general of the third division of the Massachusetts Militia. In 1812, he was appointed adjutant-general, which office he held during the last war with England. In 1816, he was elected governor almost without opposition, and was annually reelected till 1823, when he declined being a candidate. He died March 1st, 1825, aged 73.

BROOKS, Eleazer, a brigadier-general, was born in Concord-Mass. in 1726. Without the advantages of education he acquired a valuable fund of knowledge. It was his practice in early life to read the most approved books, and then to converse with the most intelligent men respecting them. In 1774 he was chosen a representative to the general court, and continued 37 years in public life, being successively a representative, a member of the senate, and of the council. He took a decided part in the American revolution. At the head of a regiment he was engaged in the battle of White Plains, in 1776, and distinguished himself by his cool, determined bravery. From the year 1801, he secluded himself in the tranquil scenes of domestic life. He died 1806, aged 80.

BROOME, William, the poet, was born of obscure parents in Cheshire. He was engaged by Pope in furnishing the notes from Eustathius for his Iliad, and when the Odyssey was undertaken, Broome was not thought unworthy by his poetical friend of sharing his labors and his success. The 2^d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 18th, and 25^d, together with all the notes, were written by Broome, who for this laborious contribution received the small sum of 500*l*. and 100 copies. But literary friendship is too often of short duration, and while Broome considered his services as ill repaid, Pope not only disregarded his discontent, but meanly exhibited him to public ridicule in the Dunciad and in the Bathos. In 1728, Broome was created LL. D. but though he was courted by the great, he did not rise to high preferment in the church. He died at Bath, 16th November, 1745. He translated some of Anacreon's odes, besides a small miscellany of poems.

BROSCHI, Carlo, a celebrated singer, born at Andria in the Neapolitan states, and better known by the name of Farinello, which he received from the patronage of three brothers called Farina. A fall from his horse in his youth rendered castration necessary, and to this accident he was indebted for the celebrity of his fame and the opulence of his fortune. After enrapturing the crowded audience of the theatres of Naples, Rome, Venice, and Vienna, Broschi was invited by lord Essex to London, where for three years he displayed the superiority of his powers, and was munificently rewarded. In 1757, he left London, and passing through Paris in his way to Madrid, he drew the admiration and the applauses of the French king and of his court. In Spain he was treated with all the distinction which his talents deserved, so that king Philip not only lavished every honor upon him, but regarded him with the confidence and affection of an intimate friend. He held the same distinguished rank of honorable partiality with Philip's successor Ferdinand, and till his death and that of his queen Barbara in 1759, he continued the favorite of the court, and deservedly respected by the public for the generosity of his heart, the benevolence of his conduct, and the condescension and affability of his manners, not only to his inferiors, but even to his personal enemies. On the succession of Charles to the Spanish throne, Farinello, though honorably received by the monarch, hastened to his native country, where, in the neighborhood of Bologna, he enjoyed the rest of his life in dignified retirement. He died 16th September, 1782, in his 78th year.

BROSSARD, Sebastian de, a canon of Meny, who died 1730, at the age of 70. He excelled as a musician, and wrote several treatises on the science. His dictionary of music in 8vo. is highly valued, and proved of great service to Rousseau.

BROSSE, Gny de la, a physician, author of a treatise on the virtues of plants, &c. He is better known as the promoter of the royal foundation of a garden of medicinal plants in 1626 at Paris, of which he was the first director, and which he enriched by a valuable collection of 2000 plants. He published a description of the medical plants in the garden, besides a book de la nature des plantes, 1628—dessein du jardin royal, 8vo.—and avis defensif, 1634—and other works.

BROSSES, Charles de, president of the parliament of Burgundy, was born at Dijon, and died at Paris 7th May, 1777, aged 68. He wrote letters on the discovery of Herculaneum, besides an history of the voyages towards the south pole, and a translation of Sallust, enriched with valuable notes—parallel between the worship of the negroes and the ancient heathens, and on the mechanical formation of languages.

BROTIER, the alibé, a Jesuit born at Tanay in the Nivernois, celebrated for his great erudition and the vast powers of his mind. Well versed in ancient and modern languages, he made every branch of science and literature the object of his studies, and, except in mathematics, to which he gave little attention, he excelled in all. With indefatigable zeal he made notes of every thing which he read, and in the regular habit of devoting 12 hours of each day to study, he collected treasures of valuable information for criticism and for historical composition. The dissolution of the order of Jesuits made a revolution in his plans and pursuits, but he found an abode of friendship and tranquillity in the house of Mr. de la Tour, a printer of eminence. In this retirement he spent the last 26 years of his life, and gave to the public those editions of Tacitus in four vols. 4to. and in seven, 12 mo. and of Pliny, which derive their merit not only from correctness, but most valuable and learned dissertations and annotations. Besides these, Brotier edited, in an elegant manner, Phœdrus, and Rapiu on gardens, and it is to be much lamented that he never completed the history of France, for which he had in his younger years provided ample materials. His other works were, an examination of the apology of Prades—a treatise on the money of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, compared with those of France—memoirs of the Levant, and the life of the abbé de Caille. This worthy man, equally amiable as a private or a literary character, died at Paris, 12th February, 1789, aged 67.

BROUGHTON, Hugh, an English divine, born at Oldbury, Shropshire, and by the friendship of Bernard Gilpin, educated at Cambridge. He wrote against the Roman catholics, and severely attacked Theodore Beza, and the whole body of dissenters. His application was intense, so that he always devoted to study 12 hours, often 16 every day. His works, which were numerous and on theological subjects, are not held in high esteem. Among them were consent of scriptures, or a system of scripture chronology and genealogy, which was attacked by Dr. John Reynolds, 1588—a discourse on Christ's descent into hell, answered by the prelates Whitgift and Wilson. Broughton was well skilled in Hebrew, and as being an eloquent preacher he settled as minister of the English congregation at Middleburg, and returned to England in 1611, and died the next year.

BROUGHTON, Thomas, a learned divine, born in London, 5th July, 1704, and educated at Eton, where he was superannuated, and at Gonville college, Cambridge. The patronage of the duke of Bedford, to whom he was chaplain, and that of bishop Sherlock, who gave him Bedminster vicarage, near Bristol, raised him to comfortable independence, and afforded him the means of devoting himself to his favorite studies. His publications were numerous and valuable, the best known of which were, Christianity distinct from the religion of nature—part of Bayle's dictionary corrected—Dryden's poems—answer to Tindall's Christianity as old as the creation—Demosthenes' Olynthiacs and Philippics—Hercules, a musical drama—various articles in the biographia Britannica—an historical dictionary of all religions, 2 vols. fol. He died on his living, 21st December, 1774, leaving six children. Four years afterwards, some of his sermons were published by his son the Rev. Thomas Broughton, vicar of Tiverton, near Bath.

BROUNCKER, William Viscount, a native of Castle Lyons, in Ireland, celebrated for his attachment to the royal cause during the civil wars, as well as for his great proficiency in mathematical knowledge. He was engaged in a learned correspondence with Dr. Wallis of Oxford, and was the first president of the royal society, an office which he adorned by his polite manners and extensive erudition. He was also master of St. Catherine, near the Tower, after a severe contest with judge Atkins. He died 5th April, 1684, aged 64, and was buried at St. Catherine's. Some of his essays are preserved in the philosophical transactions, besides des Cartes' compendium of music, translated and published anonymously—letters to archbishop Usher, published by Dr. Parr, in the life of the primate.

BROUSSON, Claude, a native of Nismes, known as an eloquent advocate, and as a warm supporter of the protestants in France. He encouraged in his own house a private meeting of the leading members of his sect, after their churches had been demolished by the persecution of the times; but though an amnesty was offered to him and his followers by Louis XIV. he fled to Geneva, Lausanne, and other countries, imploring the assistance and compassion of strangers upon his suffering brethren. He was at last seized and cruelly broken on the wheel at Montpellier 1698, in his 51st year, on pretence of corresponding with the king's enemies. The states of Holland nobly allowed his widow a pension of 600 florins, besides the 400 granted to himself. Brousson was author of some tracts in French in favor of the protestants, besides remarks on anulets, and a translation of the new testament.

BROUSSONET, Peter Augustus Maria, a French naturalist, was born at Montpellier, in 1761, became a member of the Academy of Sciences and of the Royal Society, consul at Teneriffe, and, lastly, professor of botany at his native place, where he died in 1807. Among his principal works are his Ichthyologia; and a kind of Farmer's Journal, which extended to eight volumes quarto. Broussonet was the first who introduced merino sheep and Angora goats into France. During the last months of his life, in consequence of a fall, he entirely lost the power of remembering proper names and nouns; while, on the contrary, French and Latin adjectives crowded into his memory, and he used them to designate those objects of which he wished to speak.

BROWN, Robert, was the founder of the sect of the Brownists. He was educated at Cambridge, but either from love of novelty, or from fondness for celebrity, he separated himself from the church, and when cited by the bishop of Norwich, to answer for the eccentricity and depraved tendency of his opinions, he offered insolence instead of submission. The favor of Burleigh, to whom he was related, saved him from ecclesiastical censures; but when he despised the reproof and the counsel of archbishop Whitgift, to whom his noble friend had recommended him, he was permitted to withdraw as a refractory recusant to Holland, where for some time he established a church of his own persuasion. He afterwards returned to England, and though he continued to abuse the church, yet we find him promoted to a rectory in Northamptonshire, no doubt by the influence of Burleigh; but though he received the emolument he devoted the care of the parish to a curate. In his 80th year he was sent to Northampton gaol, for ill treatment to a magistrate, and there he soon after died 1630, boasting that he had been confined in no less than 32 prisons.

BROWN, Thomas, a writer of talent and of considerable though coarse wit, was the son of a farmer at Shifnal, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, but quitted college on account of his irregularities. For a while he was a schoolmaster at Kingston, in Surrey. Quitting this situation, however, he settled in London, as an author by profession, and gained notoriety by his lampoons, his humour, and his conversational powers. He died in 1704. His works form 4 vols. 12 mo.

BROWN, Moses, a man who, from a pen-cutter, acquired some eminence as a poet and writer. By the advice of Hervey he took orders, and was promoted to the vicarage of Olney, Bucks, and the chaplainship of Morden college. He published two dramatic pieces, Polidus or distressed love, a tragedy—and all be-devilled, a farce—besides Percy-lodge, a poem—Sunday thoughts, in blank verse—an edition of Walton's Angler, and piscatory eclogues—and some poems in the Gentleman's magazine, when first undertaken by Cave. He died 13th Sept. 1787, aged 84.

BROWN, Ulysses Maximilian de, a general of eminence in the imperial armies, descended from an Irish family, and born at Basle, 24th Oct. 1705. His intrepidity and coolness were displayed in the various encounters at Belgrade, in Corsica, Parma, Ganstalla, Banjaluca, Veletri, Placentia, Genoa, and Lobositz. In the famous battle of Prague, May 6th, 1757, he was mortally wounded, and died on the 26th June following, aged 52.

BROWN, John, D. D., an English divine, born 5th Nov. 1715, and educated at Cambridge. During the rebellion in 1745 he behaved with great spirit as a volunteer at the siege of Carlisle, and distinguished himself as a popular preacher and as an elegant writer, so that he gained the patronage of Osbaldiston, bishop of Carlisle. A spirit of independence strongly marked the character of Dr. Brown, he was conscious of the powers of his mind as a writer, and indignantly rejected every attempt to shackle his opinions, or influence his reason. The consequence and authority which he had acquired in the republic of letters, introduced him to the company of great men, and even procured him an invitation from the empress of Russia to come to Petersburg, to assist and direct the establishments which she wished to form for the education and improvement of her subjects. This proposal, so honorable to the empress, was cheerfully accepted by Dr. Brown; but while preparing for his journey, a sudden attack of the gout and rheumatism so enfeebled his delicate constitution, and diminished the powers of his mind, that, in a fatal moment of dejection and melancholy, he cut his throat with a razor, Sept. 23d, 1766, in his 51st year. The most popular works of this ingenious but unfortunate man, were "an estimate of the manners and principles of the time," of which seven editions were printed in little more than a year, 1757—a second volume of the estimate—honor, a poem—essay on satire—essays on Shaftesbury—characteristics—Barbarosa, a tragedy, 1755, and next year, Athelstan, a tragedy, both acted with great popularity under Garrick—a dialogue of the dead between Aristides and Pericles—a political performance to defend Mr. Pitt's character—history of the use and progress of poetry and music—a letter to Dr. Lowth, who, in a pamphlet on the divine legation of Moses, had accused him of being a flatterer of Warburton—and sermons—besides thoughts on civil liberty, licentiousness, and faction.

BROWN, John, a painter, was born at Edinburgh, in 1752, resided ten years in Italy, and acquired there a knowledge of all the elegant arts. On his return, he settled at Edinburgh, in which city he died in 1787. He was the intimate friend of Lord Monboddo, to whom he addressed his Letters on the Poetry and Music of the Italian Opera.

They were published by the learned judge in 1789.

BROWN, John, a self educated Scotch divine, was born, in 1722, at Kerpoole, in Perthshire, became a minister and schoolmaster, and died in 1787. His principal works are, the Self Interpreting Bible, 2 vols 4to.; and a Dictionary of the Bible, 2 vols. 8vo.

BROWN, John, celebrated as the parent of the Brunonian system of medicine, was born, in 1735, at Bunclie, in Berwickshire, and originally studied with a view to the church, but afterwards commenced the study of physic. For a while he was patronized by Dr. Cullen. He, however, quarrelled with that gentleman, and became his active opponent. After many struggles and vicissitudes he settled in London, in 1786, and died there in October, 1788, leaving a numerous family in want. His misfortunes principally arose from his habits of intemperance. His medical system is developed in his Elementa Medicinæ, and has, at least, the merit of simplicity, as it classes all diseases under two heads—those of deficient and those of redundant excitement.

BROWN, John, an eminent landscape engraver, was a fellow pupil of Woollet, and for some time worked in conjunction with him. Their teacher's name was Tinney. Brown acquired considerable reputation for the taste and spirit of his burin, and became an associate of the Royal Academy. He died, at the age of sixty, in October, 1801.

BROWN, William, a celebrated gem engraver, was born, in 1748. At the commencement of his career he was patronized by Catherine of Russia, and subsequently by Louis XVI. The French revolution drove him from Paris, and he settled in London, where he produced many excellent works. He died in 1825.

BROWN, Charles Brockden, greatly distinguished as a novelist, and the editor of various periodical works, was born in the city of Philadelphia in 1771. He was regularly educated to the profession of the law, but when the time approached for his admission into the courts, he renounced altogether his legal career, from constitutional timidity, and an invincible dislike to the scenes which courts present. His friends remonstrated and reasoned in vain. The youth desired only retirement and the employments of a student, and an author. The delicacy of his frame, moreover, incapacitated him for the bustle of business, and all athletic amusements. He died in Feb. 1810. The memorial he has left behind him, are his literary works. The first novel which he wrote, was entitled Sky Walk; it was never published, owing to the death of the printer who had undertaken to issue it, at his own risk. Parts of it were afterwards incorporated in the productions, by which, he became so advantageously known to this country and Great Britain. The first of these was the novel called Wieland, which appeared in 1798; the next was Ormond, or the secret witness: Arthur Mervyn, and Edgar Huntley followed; in 1801 he published Clara Howard; the last of his novels was Jane Talbot in 1804. In April 1799, Brown published the first number of the monthly magazine, and American Review; this work he continued till the end of the year 1800. In 1805 he commenced another journal, with the title of the Literary Magazine and American Register, and in this undertaking he persevered for five years. During this period he also published, An address to the government of the U. States, on the Cession of Louisiana to the French, and the late Breach of Treaty by the Spaniards; the British Treaty; An address to the Congress of the U. States on the utility and justice of restrictions on foreign commerce, with reflections on foreign trade in general, and the future prospects of America.

BROWN, Jacob, general, and at the time of his death at the head of the American army. In early life he belonged to the sect of the quakers, and was employed as a teacher of youth. In 1799 he went on to the frontiers, and purchased a lot of land, took his axe, and began to fell the forest with his own hand, in order to commence a settlement. This was soon done; he purchased more land, and was made agent for M. Le Roy de Chamont, a distinguished Frenchman, who owned a large tract of that country, and was industrious in obtaining settlers, and when he had enough for a company of militia, they were formed, and he so far shook off the quaker as to take the command of them, at their urgent request. From the command of a company he soon found himself at the head of a regiment. At the commencement of the war of 1812 he was raised to the office of Major-general of Militia. The general government soon after proffered him a high command in the army of the United States. It was accepted, and he moved on from one degree of fame to another in this short war, until he found himself at the head of the army, and at the return of peace he made his head quarters at Washington. He died in 1828.

BROWN, Moses, an eminent merchant of Newburyport in the State of Massachusetts. He was taught the trade and mystery of a wheelwright, and followed the business for many years with great industry. So remarkable was he for early and constant labor, that one of his indolent neighbors, when tauntingly reminded of his idleness, facetiously replied, that he and Moses Brown did as much work as any two men in the town of Newburyport. He commenced trade in 1763. In a few years he owned vessels, was very successful, and before the revolution was a man of considerable property. After the peace of 1783 he commenced on a large scale, and accumulated property with great rapidity. For sixty years, he was seen almost every day during that long period, taking his customary walk between his house and wharf. He died at Newburyport in the fall of 1825. He not only gave to charitable and religious institutions in his life time, but remembered them in his will. He was a great benefactor to the theological institution at Andover.

BROWN, Samuel R., author of several books in the war of 1812. He edited a newspaper at Cayuga, N. Y. He died 1817, aged 42. He published View of the campaigns of the north western army, 1814; History of the war of 1812 in 2 vols.; Western gazetteer, or Emigrant's directory, 1817.

BROWN, Francis, D.D., president of Dartmouth college, at which he graduated in 1805. He had been settled as the minister of North Yarmouth, Maine; and was an overseer and trustee of Bowdoin college. He was appointed president in 1815, and died 1820, aged 36. His publications were occasional sermons, and some controversial writings with the Rev. Martin Ruter, D.D., on the subject of Calvinism.

BROWN, Dr. Thomas, a man eminent as a metaphysician, moral philosopher, and poet, was born at Kirkmabreck, in Scotland, in 1777, and displayed an early acuteness and thirst for knowledge. His first education was received in the vicinity of London, and was completed at the university of Edinburgh. At the age of twenty, he wrote a masterly answer to Darwin's Zoonomia. In 1810, he succeeded Mr. Stewart, at Edinburgh, as professor of moral philosophy, and soon gained universal admiration as a lecturer, by his eloquence and talents, and affection by his kindness to the students. His brilliant career was unfortunately cut short, by consumption, on the 2d of April, 1820. As a philosopher, his reputation is established by his inquiry into the Relation of Cause and Effect; Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind; and Physiology of the Mind: as a poet, by his poems, in two volumes; Agnes; the Wanderer of Norway; and the Paradise of Coquettes.

BROWNE, William, an English poet, born at Tavistock, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He resided for a little time at the Inner Temple, London, and was afterwards tutor in the families of Carnarvon and Pembroke. He published Britannia's pastorals, in two parts—and the shepherd's pipe, in seven eclogues—works of great merit, and deservedly recommended by Selden, Drayton, and other judges of poetical fame. He died in his native county, 1645, where he had purchased an estate. His works appeared together, 3 vols. 12mo. 1772.

BROWNE, sir Thomas, born in Cheapside, 19th October, 1605, was educated at Oxford. He early turned his thoughts to physic, and after taking his two first degrees at Oxford, he travelled through France and Italy, and after some stay at Padua and Montpellier, he was created M. D. at Leyden. Soon after his return to London, 1634, he published his religio medici, a book replete with sound sense and great information, and which, with deserved popularity, exposed him to the virulence of critics and the envy of rivals. In 1636 he settled at Norwich, where he acquired an extensive practice. He was, in 1671, knighted at Norwich by Charles II. and continued to maintain his high reputation as an excellent scholar and an experienced physician till the time of his death, which happened on his birthday, 1682. He published, besides his "religio," a treatise on vulgar errors, a work of great and acknowledged merit, besides a discourse on sepulchral urns. His character was held in such high esteem, and his knowledge so very extensive in every walk of science and philosophy, that his life has been published by Dr. Johnson.

BROWNE, Edward, son of the above, was educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of M. D. 1667. He visited several parts of Germany, Hungary, Thessaly, and Italy, and at his return published an interesting account of his travels, and became physician to Charles II. and to Bartholomew hospital. He bore also the most distinguished offices of the college of physicians, and fully proved his claims to the high character of a superior scholar in the learned languages, and a fluent writer in most of the modern tongues. The king said of him, that he was as learned as any of the college, and as well bred as any at court. He died August, 1703, aged 66, at Northfleet. Besides his travels, he wrote several lives in the translation of Plutarch, published in his time.

BROWNE, Simon, a dissenting minister, born at Shepton-Mallet, Somersetshire, and early appointed pastor of a congregation at Portsmouth, and afterwards at the Old Jewry, where for many years he was admired for his eloquence, and respected for the correctness of his conduct. The death however of his wife and his only son in 1723, had such an effect upon his feelings that it deprived him of his reason, and at times exhibited him a melancholy monument of great powers of mind departed. Unable longer to officiate, he retired to his native town, where, remote from society, and unwilling to associate with his dearest friends, he considered himself as struck by the Almighty, deprived of his rational soul, and sunk to the level of the brute creation. He died about the end of 1782, aged 52; and what is remarkable, he composed, about two years before his death, in his more luminous intervals, two works in defence of Christianity, against the attacks of Woolston and Tindal, in which he displayed all the powers of a sound and vigorous understanding.

BROWNE, Peter, a native of Ireland, provost of Trinity college, Dublin, and afterwards bishop of Cork, where he died, 1735. He wrote in defence of Christianity against Toland, a work which, as Toland observed, raised him to the rank of bishop, the progress, extent, and limits of the human understanding—two volumes of sermons—besides a tract against the fashionable custom of drinking to the memory of the dead.

BROWNE, Isaac Hawkins, an English poet, born 21st January, 1706, at Burton upon Trent, where his father was minister. He was educated at Lichfield, Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge, from whence, after taking his degree of M.A. he removed to Lincoln's Inn. Here he devoted himself to the muses, and wrote some poetical pieces, especially on "design and beauty," and his "pipe of tobacco." He served in the parliament of 1744, and 1748, for Wenlock, and died 14th February, 1760, in his 53th year. His most popular work was "de animi immortalitate," in two volumes, a composition which displayed his great classical taste, as a happy imitator of Virgil and Lucretius, and which so much commanded the approbation of the public, that several translations quickly appeared, the best of which were those of Soame Jenyns and Mr. Lettice.

BROWNE, Sir William, a physician of eminence, who, after practising with great success at Lynn, in Norfolk, came to settle in London, where he died 10th March, 1774, aged 82. He left two prize medals to Cambridge, to be contended for by the rising poets of the university. He is known not only for his abilities in the medical line, but for many ingenious and entertaining pieces both in prose and verse, in Latin and in English, which he wrote, besides a translation of Gregory's elements of catoptrics and dioptrics. He was a man of genuine wit, and had a great command of temper; and when Foote introduced him, in consequence of his dispute with the licenciates of the college of physicians, in his Devil upon two Sticks, and exactly caricatured him as a tall figure, with his wig and identical coat, the physician, who disdained to resent the affront, sent the actor his card, to compliment him in his happy representation, accompanying it at the same time with his muff, which he said had been omitted in the play.

BROWNE, William George, an English traveller, a man of fortune, who penetrated into the interior of Africa, and was the first who gave an account of the African kingdoms of Darfur and Bornou. His Travels in Africa, Egypt, and Assyria, from 1792 to 1793, were published in 1799. About the year 1814 he was murdered, in Persia, while on his way to explore the regions south of the Caspian.

BROWNWRIG, Ralph, son of a merchant at Ipswich, was educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, and after various promotions, became master of Catharine-hall, and vice-chancellor of that university, and last of all, in 1641, was nominated bishop of Exeter. During the civil wars he was deprived of his ecclesiastical office, and passed his life in retirement. It is said that he once boldly advised Cromwell to restore Charles II. to his throne. Two years before his death, which happened in 1659, in his 67th year, he was made preacher at the Temple. His sermons were published in three vols. and Dr. Gauden who knew him, and respected his abilities and character, speaks in the highest terms of him.

BRUCE, James, a famous traveller, was born at Kinnaird, and educated at Harrow, and afterwards at Edinburgh. He became, by his early residence in England, acquainted with many eminent characters in literature and in politics. The indisposition of his wife, who was the daughter of a wine merchant, with whom he was in partnership in London, induced him to travel to the south of France, and in consequence of her death he prolonged his absence from home by visiting Portugal and Spain. On his return he was invited to accept the consulship of Algiers in 1763, and after improving himself in learning the languages of Africa, he began to form the project of exploring the most unknown parts of that continent. In 1768 he visited Aleppo, and immediately after entered Egypt, and penetrated into Abyssinia, where for nearly six years he remained employed in examining the antiquities, the manners, and institutions of a people known to Europeans only by name. The history of this excursion was published in five vols. 4to. 1790, but so extraordinary and marvellous did the circumstances related by the traveller appear, that few were inclined to credit his assertions, or to trust to his narrative. Some events however have tended to throw authenticity on his history, and he has established a greater claim to veracity by the respectable testimony of Buffon, Daines Barrington, and sir William Jones. He was unfortunately killed by a fall down his staircase at Kinnaird, in April 1794, in his 65th year.

BRUCIOLI, Anthony, a native of Florence, banished from his country for opposing the house of Medicis. When restored by a revolution to his native city, he drew upon himself the public odium as being suspected of favoring the opinions of Luther, and he retired to Venice, where his brothers were printers, and where he published, in 1532, his translation of the bible in Italian, with a prolix commentary, in 7 vols. fol. a work called by the monks heretical. He wrote translations of Pliny's history, and some pieces of Aristotle and Cicero, besides dialogues, editions of Petrarch and Boccaccio. He died after the year 1554, but what year is uncertain.

BRUCKER, John James, a native of Augsburg, who studied and took his degrees at Jena. He became member of the Berlin academy of sciences, minister of Kaufbeuren, and afterwards of Augsburg, where he died 1770, aged 74. His chief work is historia critica philosophiæ Leipsic, 6 vols. 4to. abridged by Dr. Enfield, in 2 vols. 4to. He wrote other learned works.

BRUEYS, David Augustine, a native of Aix, who, by writing against Bossuet's exposition of the faith, was converted by the prelate from protestantism to the Catholic religion. He soon after quitted divinity and wrote plays, and again turned his thoughts to theological controversy. He died at Montpellier, 1733, aged 83. His dramatic pieces were published in three vols. 12mo. 1735. He translated also, or rather paraphrased, Horace's art of poetry.

BRUGNATELLI, Lewis, a physician and chemist, was born at Pavia, in 1761. He took his doctor's degree at the university of his native place, in 1784, and soon after was elected demonstrator of Chemistry. In 1787, he succeeded to the chemical professorship, as he afterwards did to that of medicine. He was an indefatigable experimentalist, and made several important discoveries, particularly in the properties of the gastric juice, and the varieties of combustion. He died Oct. 24th, 1818. His works are—1. Elements of Chemistry. 2. A general Pharmacopœia. 3. Materia Medica. 4. Bibliotheca Fisica d'Europe, 20 vols. 5. Avareamenti delle Medicinæ e Fisica, 20 vols. 6. Annali di Chimica. 7. Commentarie, Medici. 8. Giornale di Fisica Chimica e Storia Naturale, 8 vols. 4to.

BRUGUIERES, John William, a native of Montpellier, who devoted himself to the study of medicine and natural history. Though his father wished him to settle at home, and induced him to comply with his wishes by giving him a wife, he quitted all his connections three months after his marriage, and embarked on a voyage to the south seas in the character of a botanist. He was thus enabled to make a valuable collection of curiosities in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and the name of Langaha, which he gave to some reptiles which he discovered, has been preserved in la Cèpede's history of serpents. After his return he settled at Montpellier, but after seven years residence there, the accidental discovery of a coal mine, and of some fossils and petrefactions, awakened in him a strong desire of explaining the nature of minerals. He therefore repaired to Paris, and after laboring for some time as the friend and associate of Daubenton, in preparing an interesting account of vermes for the encyclopedic methodique, he prepared to embark for the Levant, in company with Oliver. A weak constitution, however, prevented his departure, and he died at Ancona, September 1799, of a fever. He wrote a valuable account of the vermes, mollusce, zoophyte fossils and shells of the torrid zone, and in honor of his services to natural history, a curious shrub, which he discovered among the rocks of Madagascar, has received his name in Heretier's writings. His account of his voyage to the south seas has not yet been published.

BRUIN, John de, an ingenious professor of philosophy and mathematics at Utrecht. He was a great lover of experiments, and was a skillful operator in the dissection of animals. He died in 1675, aged 55, and his funeral oration was pronounced by the famous Grævius. He wrote several valuable treatises, de vi altrice—de corporum gravitate et levitate—de lucis cansâ and origine—de cognitione dei naturali,—besides an apology in favor of the Cartesian philosophy, which he warmly espoused.

BRUMOY, Peter, a French Jesuit, born at Ronen. He is chiefly known for his valuable work called the theatre of the Greeks, in which he displays great correctness and elegant taste as a scholar and as a critic. He wrote besides miscellaneous pieces in verse and prose, four vols. 12mo. and died in 1742, aged 52, universally esteemed for the excellence of his private character.

BRUN, Charles le, a famous painter, of Scotch extraction, son of a statuary, born in France in 1619. Destined by nature to excel as a painter, he at the age of three drew figures with charcoal, and when 12 made a picture of his uncle so exact, that it is still admired as a highly finished piece. He studied under Vouet and Poussin, and was fortunately patronised by Seguier, Mazarin, and Colbert, by whose munificence he improved himself and rose to distinction. The honors which he received from the king, and the appointments which he held, were fully deserved by the elegant and amiable painter, who was popular as much for excellence of private character, as for professional superiority. His most famous pieces were St. Stephen, the family of Darius, five pieces in the history of Alexander, besides the beautiful paintings which adorned the palace of Fontainebleau and Versailles, especially the staircase of the latter, in which he was engaged fourteen years. Brun died 1690, at his house in the Gahelins, where he was director of the manufactory. He wrote a curious treatise on physiognomy, and another on the character of the passions.

BRUNCK, Richard Philip Frederic, a celebrated scholar and writer of Strasburg, member of the academy of inscriptions, and of the national institute at Paris, died 1803, aged 84. He is particularly known in the republic of letters for his great erudition and his extensive reading. He published, besides other works, learned editions of Æschylus, Anacreon, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Apollonius Rhodius, and Virgil, carefully compared with MS. copies, and rendered valuable by annotations—and also analecta veterum poetarum Græc. 4 vols. 8vo. repeatedly edited—and gnomici poeta Græci, 8vo.

BRÛNE, George, M. A., a French marshal, was born at Brive la Gaillarde, in 1763; espoused warmly the cause of the revolution; and, after having been a printer and an editor of a paper, he entered the army in 1793. In 1796 and 1797, he served under Bonaparte, and his distinguished merit gained him rapid promotion. In 1799, he was commander in chief of the united French and Dutch forces, and displayed high military talents in the defence of North Holland against the duke of York, whom he reduced to a mortifying capitulation. Under the consular government, he had a prominent share in the pacification of the royal provinces. From 1803 to 1805, he was ambassador to Constantinople; and, during his absence, was made marshal. Having in 1807, been appointed governor of the Hanseatic cities, he gave dissatisfaction to Napoleon, who, during the remainder of his first reign, did not employ him. Brune submitted to the Bourbons; but, being slighted by them, he joined Napoleon on his return from Elba, who gave him a command in the south of France. After the second abdication of the emperor, Brune was assassinated at Avignon, August 2, 1815, by a band of murderers, who were allowed to remain unpunished.

BRUNELLSCHI, Philip, a native of Florence, originally a goldsmith and clockmaker, and afterwards distinguished for his great knowledge of architecture. The dome of St. Mary's church at Florence is among the monuments of his genius. He was patronised by the Medicis; and died in his native city in 1444, aged 67, universally regretted. He was also an engineer; and some of his verses appeared with those of Burchiello.

BRUNNER, John Conrad, a learned physician of Switzerland, who studied at Strasburg and Paris, and visited Holland, England, and Germany. He died at Manheim in 1727, aged 74. He was author of several treatises on medicine in Latin; and he defended the opinion, that the pancreas is unnecessary to the support of animal life, in a 4to. vol. 1683. His other works are, de glandulis in duodeno intestino delectis, 4to. 1687—de glandula pituitaria dissertatio, 4to. 1688.

BRUNO, Jordano, a native of Nola, who visited Geneva, Lyons, Toulouse, Paris, and London, where he became the friend of Philip Sidney and Fulke Greville. His opinions were considered as heretical and impious, and consequently exposed him to the jealousy and persecution of the times. In various cities of Germany he drew ecclesiastical censures upon him, and at last he was apprehended at Venice, where he was sentenced by the inquisition to be burnt at a stake, on the 17th February, 1600. Though an atheist at heart, he yet believed the effects of magic and sorcery. He wrote, among other things, a curious book called Spaccio della bestia trionfante, dedicated to sir Philip Sidney, and an Italian comedy, called Il Candelajo, besides some Latin poems.

BRUNSWICK, Ferdinand, Duke of, was born in 1721, and, after his return from his travels, entered into the Prussian service, and distinguished himself in the Silesian war. In the seven years' war, he was placed at the head of the combined British and Hanoverian forces, manifested talents of the first order, and defeated the French on many occasions, especially at Crevelt and Minden. The peace of 1763 terminated his military career; and he died at Brunswick, July 3, 1792.

BRUNSWICK LUNENBURG, Charles William Ferdinand, Duke of, nephew of Ferdinand, was born in 1735, studied the art of war under his uncle and Frederic of Prussia, and gained great reputation in the seven years' war, and in the war of 1778 with Austria. In 1780, he succeeded to the duchy, and proved himself the friend of internal improvement and of literature. He resumed his military career in 1787, when, at the head of the Prussian army, he restored the authority of the stadtholder in Holland. In his next enterprise he was unsuccessful. Having invaded France, at the head of a powerful Austrian and Prussian force, and published a violent and impolitic manifesto, he was compelled to retreat, by an inferior army under Dumourier. In 1794 he resigned the command. Till 1806, he was occupied with the peaceful labors of government; but in that year he was appointed leader of the Prussian army, and was mortally wounded at the fatal battle of Austerstadt. He expired at Altona, on the 10th of December.

BRUSCHIUS, Gaspar, a Latin historian and poet of Egra in Bohemia, born in 1518. He travelled much, and published various works on ecclesiastical affairs, which produced him the patronage of several learned men, and of some princes, who munificently rewarded his labors. He was at last murdered in a forest near Rotterdam, 1559. His writings are very numerous; but his ecclesiastical history of Germany is particularly esteemed, though he is accused of favoring too strongly the doctrines of Luther.

BRUTUS, Lucius Junius, a Roman, celebrated as the author of the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, after the suicide of Lucretia. He was made first consul, and fell in the war against the Tarquins, B. C. 509.

BRUTUS, Marcus Junius, a son of Jun. Brutus, by the sister of Cato. He joined other conspirators to cut off Julius Cæsar, though he was his friend, and according to others his father. He afterwards fell at the battle of Philippi, fighting against the triumvirate.

BRUTUS, John Michael, a learned Venetian, who travelled over Spain, France, England, Germany, Poland, and Transylvania, and acquired an extensive knowledge of the history, politics, and manners of Europe. He was invited by Stephen King of Poland to reside at Cracow, to compose a history of that kingdom; and after the death of his patron, he fixed his abode at Prague, where he was distinguished by the title of imperial historiographer. His notes on Cæsar, Horace, and Cicero, display his great abilities as a scholar; and the general joy which was expressed when Mr. Cromer undertook to publish a new edition of his writings, evinces the eminence of his powers as a philosopher and historian. In his letters to great men and princes, Brutus laid aside the pompos and slavish deference which modern times have introduced in correspondence, and he addressed them with all the simplicity of an ancient Roman. His history of Florence was said to depreciate the merits of the Medicis, and therefore it proved offensive to the duke. The time of his death is unknown. He was born in 1518.

BRUYERE, John de la, a native of Dourdan, member of the French academy, and appointed by Bossuet preceptor of history to the duke of Burgundy. He died 1695, aged 52. He is the author of "characters," after the manner of Theophrastus, a work highly esteemed in France, as descriptive, not of imaginary, but real persons, in a style rapid, concise, and nervous. This book, as might be expected, procured the author many admirers, and more enemies; but its merits are so great, that it will always be considered as a composition of established excellence. The best editions are, of Amsterdam, 1741, and Paris, 1765.

BRUYN, Cornelius, a painter, born at the Hague. He travelled through Russia, Persia, and the East Indies for several years, of which he published an entertaining and interesting account. The best edition is that of Rouen, in 1725, in 5 vols. 4to. as it has been improved and corrected by the labors of the abbé Bannier.

BRUYS, Peter de, founder of the sect called from him Petro-Brussians, was a native of Languedoc. He maintained that churches were of no use, he opposed infant baptism, recommended the destruction of crucifixes and other church ornaments, he forbade the offering of prayers for the dead, and declared that the body of Christ was not in the sacrament. After committing great excesses with the view of establishing his tenets, he was seized and burnt alive at St. Gilles, 1130.

BRUZEN DE LA MARTINICLÉ, Anthony Augustine, was born at Dieppe, and educated at Paris under the famous Richard Simon, his uncle. He was patronized by the dukes of Mecklenburg and Parma, and afterwards by the king of Naples, who granted him an honorable pension. He died at the Hague 1749, aged 83. His great work is the grand Dictionnaire Historique, 1730, in 10 vols. folio, reprinted at Paris, 6 vols. 1768, with corrections; a performance very useful, though not elegantly executed.

BRYAN, George, judge of the supreme Court of Pennsylvania, was a native of Dublin, Ireland. He came to America in early life, and resided at Philadelphia. After employing several years in commerce, he was introduced into public life, and in 1765, appointed a member of the congress which met to remonstrate against the oppressive acts of the British government. During the war of the revolution, he took an active part in the cause of freedom. After the colonies had declared themselves independent, he was appointed vice-president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, and in 1788 was advanced to the head of the government. In 1789 he was a member of the legislature, and rendered himself most honorably conspicuous, by projecting and procuring the passage of an act for the gradual abolition of slavery. He soon after received his appointment as judge of the supreme Court, and continued to hold that office till his death, in January 1791. He possessed a vigorous understanding, a sound judgment, and a tenacious memory; his knowledge was extensive, his integrity unsullied, and his attachment to the country and its republican institutions ardent. He was a man of piety and amiable manners, and gave dignity to the public stations which he was called to fill.

BRYAN, Michael, an eminent connoisseur in the fine arts, who was at one period a picture dealer, was born in 1757, and died 1821. He is the author of a valuable Biographical and Critical Dictionary of Painters and Engravers, 2 vols. 4to.

BRYANT, Jacob, a philologist and antiquary, was born at Plymouth, in 1715, and received his education at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. The duke of Marlborough, to whom he had been tutor, gave him a place in the ordnance department. He settled at Cypenhain, in Berkshire, and died November 14, 1804, of a mortification in the leg, occasioned by bruising the skin against a chair. Bryant was an indefatigable and a learned writer, but fond of paradox. He wrote one work to maintain the authenticity of the pseudo Rowley's poems, and another to prove that Troy never existed. His principal production is a New System or Analysis of Ancient Mythology, in three volumes quarto, which was published in 1774 and 1776. It is ingenious and erudite; but often fanciful and erroneous. Among his other compositions are, Observations relative to Ancient History; a treatise on the authenticity of the Scriptures; Observations on the Plagues of Egypt; and Dissertations on the Prophecy of Balaam.

BRYDONE, Patrick, a native of Scotland, was born in 1741, and travelled in Italy, as companion to Mr. Beckford and other gentlemen. He was appointed comptroller of the stamp office, which situation he held till his decease, in 1819. The publication of his Travels in Sicily and Malta, gained him admission to the Royal Society, to the Transactions of which body he contributed several papers. The narrative of his travels is well written; but much dissatisfaction was excited by some of his statements, which militate against the Mosaic account of the creation.

BUC, George, a learned antiquary, born in Lincolnshire, and knighted by James I. to whom he was master of the revels. He wrote the life of Richard III. in five books, and supported the opinion that he was deformed neither in body nor mind, an idea afterwards maintained by Horace Walpole—a treatise on the ancient colleges, and schools of learning in and near London—and a treatise on the art of revels.

BUCER, Martin, a Dominican, born in Alsace, who early embraced the tenets of Luther. He afterwards inclined more to the opinions of Zuinglius, and, in his zeal for the reformation, attempted in vain to reconcile these two powerful leaders. For 20 years his eloquence was exerted at Strasburg to establish the protestant cause, but the turbulence of the times, and his opposition to the views of the Catholics at Augsburg, rendered him unpopular, so that he received with pleasure the invitations of Cranmer to settle in England. He was received with gratitude by the nation. Edward VI. treated him with great kindness, and he was appointed theological professor at Cambridge, in 1549, where he died two years after. Five years after, the persecutions of Mary were extended to his remains, which were ignominiously burned, but the insult was repaired by the good sense of Elizabeth. In learning, judgment, and moderation, Bucer was inferior to none of the great reformers, and with Melancthon he may be considered as the best calculated to restore and maintain unanimity among contending churches, and opposite sects. His writings in Latin and German were very numerous, and all on theological subjects.

BUCHANAN, George, a learned Scotchman, born near Kellernie, in Lenox, 1506. Though his relations were poor, yet he was well educated by the advice of his uncle Heriot, who foresaw his future eminence; and at Paris and in Scotland, he acquired that learning which contributed so much to his honor and the honor of his country. He early embraced, from conviction, the tenets of Luther, and at Paris became acquainted with the earl of Cassilis, with whom for five years he was engaged as an instructor and a friend. After the death of Cassilis he was appointed by the king, preceptor to his natural son, the famous Moray, but the jealousy of the papists and the severity of his satire against the monks, especially in his piece called Francis canus, rendered his situation so dangerous that he fled to England, and from thence to France. For three years, under the friendly patronage of Andrew Govianns, he lived in obscurity at Bourdeaux, and taught in the public schools there, and wrote four Latin tragedies, to draw the attention of his pupils from the allegories of the moderns to the imitation of the purer models of Greece and Rome. The jealousy of cardinal Beaton, however, who had persecuted him in Scotland, pursued him in his retirement, and he left Bourdeaux for Coimbra, where, till the death of his patron Govianus, he was respected and admired for his lectures in philosophy and classical learning. Soon his opposition to the Catholic tenets, and his being a foreigner, rendered him suspected, and he was confined by his enemies in a monastery, where he translated the psalms of David into Latin. When set at liberty he embarked for England, and then returned to France, where, in 1554, the elegant dedication of his tragedy of Jephtha procured him the friendship of marshal de Cossi, who made him for five years preceptor to his son. In 1566, he was made principal of St. Leonard's college, St. Andrews, and invited by Mary of Scots to be the future preceptor to her son; but he forgot his gratitude in the misfortunes of that unhappy princess, and in his "Detection" severely arraigned her character in favor of his old pupil Moray. The appointment which Mary destined for him was confirmed by the states, and from him James VI. derived much of the knowledge of literature and the critical taste which he afterwards displayed on the throne. In the thirteen last years of his life, Buchanan was engaged in writing the history of his country, but though nervous, elegant, and perspicuous, it is occasionally deficient in fidelity and accuracy. He died at Edinburgh 28th February, 1582. His works were published together, Edinburgh, 2 vols. fol. 1714.

BUCHANAN, Claudius, a divine, was born at Cambustang, near Glasgow, in 1766. He received his education at the school at Inverary, and when only fourteen became a tutor in a private family. In 1782 he entered the college of Glasgow, where he remained about a year and a half, and then went to live as tutor in another family; but in 1787 he quitted Scotland, and visited London, where he officiated as clerk to an attorney. On becoming acquainted with the Rev. John Newton, that gentleman recommended him to Mr. Thornton, of Clapham, who sent him to Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of Bachelor of arts. In 1793 he was appointed one of the chaplains to the East India Company at Bengal; and when the marquis Wellesley founded a college at Fort William, he was nominated vice-provost, and classical professor of that institution. In 1805 he was honored with the degree of doctor in divinity by the university of Glasgow; and the year following he returned to England, when the university of Cambridge, in return for his donation of some valuable manuscripts, presented him with the same degree. Having lost his first wife in the East, he married, in 1809, Miss Thompson, a lady of fortune in Yorkshire, who four years afterwards departed this life, to the grief of her husband. Dr. Buchanan was employed in superintending an impression of the Syriac Testament, for the Eastern Christians, when he died at Broxbourne, Feb. 9, 1815. While at the head of the college at Fort-William, he gave premiums to the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Glasgow, for sermons and prize-essays on the propagation of learning and religion in the East. His works are—1. The first four years of the college of Fort-William, 4to.—2. Memoir on the expediency of an ecclesiastical establishment in India, 4to.—3. The Star in the East, a sermon, 8vo.—4. Three sermons, on the Jubilee, 8vo.—5. The Light of the World, a sermon, 8vo.—6. Christian Researches in Asia, 8vo.—7. The three Eras of Light, two discourses at Cambridge, 8vo.—8. The Healing Waters of Bethesda, a sermon at Burton, 8vo.—9. Sermons on interesting subjects, 8vo.—10. A brief view of the state of the colonies of Great Britain and her Asiatic empire, in respect to religious instruction, 4to.—11. A letter to the East India company, in reply to the statements of Mr. Butler, concerning the idol Juggernaut, 8vo.—12. An apology for promoting Christianity in India, 8vo.—13. Address delivered at a special meeting of the Church Missionary Society to four ministers destined for Ceylon and Tranquebar, 8vo.

BUCKERIDGE, John, was born at Draycot near Marlborough. His worth, learning and eloquence, recommended him to king James, before whom he preached at Hampton court, to bring the Melvins and other Scotch presbyterians to a true knowledge of the doctrines of the English church. He was made bishop of Rochester in 1611, and of Ely in 1628, and died three years after. He wrote some sermons, but his chief work is de potestate pape, adversus Bellarminum.

BUCKHOLD, John, a butcher of Leyden, who headed the fanatical mob of anabaptists at Munster, over whom he had the art to make himself king. After an obstinate siege Munster was taken, and the seditious leader ignominiously but to death, 1536.

BUCKINGHAM, George Villiers, Duke of, the unworthy favorite of James I. and Charles I., was born, in 1592, at Brookesby, in Leicestershire, and was the son of Sir George Villiers. Having attracted the notice of James I. in 1615, that monarch appointed him his cupbearer, became his tutor, and rapidly and successively raised him to be gentleman of the bedchamber, lord admiral of England, warden of the cinque ports, master of the horse, baron, earl, marquis, and duke. More a sovereign than the sovereign himself, the dispensation of all graces and favors was in his hand, and his insolence and tyranny excited general disgust in the nation. His strange expedition to Madrid, and his conduct there, is said to have weakened the infatuation of James I. for him, and had that monarch lived, Villiers might, perhaps, have lost his power. But the accession of Charles I., in 1625, rendered the favorite still more potent. In vain the parliament attacked him; it was dissolved, and he enjoyed a complete triumph. He next plunged the nation into a war with France; and being entrusted with the command of an army, he lost the flower of it in an ill conducted attack on the isle of Rhé. He returned to England to refit his shattered armament, and was again about to sail when he was assassinated at Portsmouth, on the 23d of August, 1628, by a lieutenant by the name of Felton.

BUCKINGHAM, George Villiers, Duke of, son of the preceding duke, was born in 1627, studied at Cambridge, served the king zealously in the civil wars, and was present at the battle of Worcester. By marrying a daughter of Lord Fairfax, he recovered a considerable part of his forfeited estates; and, at the Restoration, he was made a lord of the bedchamber, master of the horse, and lord lieutenant of Yorkshire. These honors, however, he lost in 1666, for being engaged in a conspiracy against the king; but he recovered the royal favor, was once more "the life of pleasure and the soul of whinn" at court, and was employed as ambassador to France. Villiers was one of the most versatile, projecting, and profligate of mankind. Dryden has drawn his character admirably, under the name of Zimri. This witty and unprincipled nobleman died, at Kirby Moorside, in Yorkshire, April 16, 1688, of a fever caught in fox-hunting. Of his works, the most celebrated is the comedy of the Rehearsal, which, undoubtedly, affords a decisive proof that his talents were of a superior order.

BUCKMINSTER, Joseph, D. D., minister of Portsmouth, N. H. He graduated at Yale college in 1770, and from 1774 to 1778 was a tutor in that seminary. At this period he became temporarily attached to a lady, then of reputation and celebrity, whose character is the basis of a production entitled the coquette. He was ordained in 1779. After a ministry of thirty-three years his health became greatly impaired; a depression of spirits to which he had been subject came upon him with new violence; spasmodic affections caused at times a suspension of reason; under these distressing complaints, a long journey was thought necessary to his relief. He left home June 2, 1812, accompanied by his wife and two friends, but on the Green Mountains of Vermont, he was arrested by the messenger of death. He died June 10th, 1812, aged 60. It is remarkable, that on the preceding day his eldest son, a minister in Boston, died after a week's illness. Although Dr. B. had not heard of his sickness, yet he said to his wife repeatedly a few hours before his own death, Joseph is dead. He published a number of sermons and a short sketch of Dr. Mackintosh.

BUCKMINSTER, Joseph Stevens, minister of the Brattle Street church in Boston. He graduated at Harvard college in 1800. The next four years were spent partly in the family of his relative Theodore Lyman of Waltham, partly as an assistant in the academy at Exeter, and in the prosecution of theological studies. He was ordained in 1805. A severe illness immediately followed, which interrupted his labors. In the course of this year the return of the epilepsy, which he had previously experienced, excited his apprehensions, that his mental faculties would be destroyed. He wrote in Oct.—"the repetition of these fits must at length reduce me to idiocy. Can I resign myself to the loss of memory, and of that knowledge, I may have vainly prided myself upon? O God, enable me to bear this thought." A voyage to Europe being recommended, he sailed in May 1806, and visited England, Holland, Switzerland, and France, in Paris he spent five months; and there and in London, he collected a valuable library of nearly 3000 vols. After his return in Sept. 1807, he was occupied in the ministry about five years, with occasional attacks of the epilepsy, till his death, caused by that disorder, June 9th, 1812, aged 28. Mr. Buckminster was a very interesting and eloquent preacher, and perhaps as popular as any one who ever occupied a pulpit in Boston, his hearers appearing, wherever he preached, to hang on his lips with delight. In 1808 he published a collection of hymns for the use of his society, a number of reviews in the monthly anthology and other periodicals; the right hand of fellowship at the ordination of the Rev. C. Lowell, 1806; a sermon on the death of gov. Sullivan, 1809; on the death of W. Emerson, 1811; an address before the Phi Beta. Kappa society, 1809. After his death a volume of twenty-four sermons was published, with a memoir of his life and character by S. C. Thacher.

BUCQUET, John Michael Baptist, a physician, born at Paris, where he died 1730, aged 34, a victim to excessive application. He was early noticed for his abilities in every branch of medical knowledge, and made professor of chemistry, and member of the academy of sciences. His lectures were very popular, and particularly interesting. Several of his treatises are published in the memoirs of the academy.

BUDÆUS, William, was born in Paris, in 1467. As he was of a noble family, and heir to a splendid fortune, he was early introduced in the schools of Paris and the university of Orleans, but the expectations of his friends were disappointed. He was regardless of study, and totally attached to every species of extravagance and dissipation, till at last the follies of youth subsided, and from the most debauched he became the most studious, regular, and virtuous man of his age. He not only cultivated literature, but patronized it with all the warmth of friendship and interest in others, and to his advice and influence with Francis I. France is indebted for the foundation of her royal college. He was employed by the king as ambassador to Leo X. and died at Paris 1540, leaving four sons and two daughters. His works, which are valuable, were printed at Basil, 1557, in four vols. fol.

BUDGE, Eustace, descended from a respectable family in Devonshire, was born at St. Thomas near Exeter, 1635, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. About 1710 he began his literary career, and with Steele and Addison divided the public favor, as a writer in the Spectator, where his numbers were marked with the letter X. He also afterwards contributed largely to the Guardian, where his papers are designated with an asterisk. The elevation of Addison to higher offices in the state was shared by his friend, who now became an active and eloquent member of the Irish parliament, and was appointed accountant general of the kingdom. The tide of fortune, however, at length turned against him. He was dismissed from his office of accountant and comptroller general in Ireland, for satirizing the lord lieutenant, who had treated him ill; he lost twenty thousand pounds in the South Sea bubble; he spent five thousand pounds more in vain attempts to obtain a seat in the house of commons; and at last he became involved in lawsuits and embarrassments. The finishing stroke was put to his fate, by the setting aside the will of Dr. Matthew Tindall, in which appeared a bequest of two thousand pounds to Budget. His difficulties, and the disgrace of having a forgery attributed to him, stung him to the heart, and he ended his existence by throwing himself into the Thames, May 4, 1737. Besides the works already mentioned, he established a periodical called the Bee; assisted in the Craftsman; and wrote the History of Cloanemes; and Memoirs of the family of the Boyles.

BUFFIER, Claude, a Jesuit, was born in Poland, of French parents, in 1661, and studied at the college of Rouen, where he afterwards held the situation of theological professor. He died in 1737. Buffier was employed in the Mémoires de Trevoux, and likewise produced a great number of theological, metaphysical, biographical, and geographical works. Several of them were collected in a folio volume, with the title of a Course of Sciences on new and simple Principles. Though sometimes superficial, he is, on the whole, an elegant and instructive writer.

BUELL, Samuel, D. D., an eminent presbyterian minister on Long Island, was born at Coventry in Connecticut, 1716. In the seventeenth year of his age his attention was especially turned to the subject of religion. In 1741 he was graduated at Yale college. In November 1743 he was ordained as an itinerant preacher; and in Sept. 1746 he became the pastor of the church at East Hampton on Long Island, where he remained till his death in 1793, at the age of 81 years. His publications were fourteen occasional sermons and a narrative of the revival of religion among his people in 1764. He was the patron of literature and science, and was much beloved for his social virtues.

BUFFON, George Louis le Clerc count de, a learned French philosopher, born at Montbard, in Burgundy, 7th September, 1707. His father destined him for his own profession, the law, but nature had marked him for the sublimer studies of philosophy. After travelling in Italy, where the works of art were disregarded by his inquisitive mind for the more attractive charms of nature, and after visiting for three short months the English dominions, he fixed his residence at home, and began his career of fame by devoting every day fourteen hours to his favorite studies. At the death of his mother he inherited a princely fortune of about 12,000*l.* per annum, but neither pleasure nor opulence diverted the train of his learned occupations. In composition he exhibited the severest correctness; his works when finished were set aside, and some time after, the author returned to the task with all the impartiality of a stranger, but the scrutinizing eye of criticism. Though so strongly devoted to the sciences, yet he was fond of company; his table displayed hospitality, and his conversation was easy, pleasant, and void of all affectation of pedantry and superior knowledge. His favorite authors were Montesquieu, Fenelon, and Richardson. He lived to a good old age, and died 16th April, 1788. Buffon translated Newton's fluxions, and Hale's statics, but his great and immortal work is his "Histoire naturelle," 35 vols. 4to. or 62 12mo. 1749—1765. Though his writings are so deservedly entitled to celebrity, yet, like other great men, he is not without his faults. In his private character Buffon was a libertine, occasionally vain and puerile. The works of men of genius, he would exclaim, are few, only those of Newton, Montesquieu, Leibnitz, and my own. His son suffered during the reign of terror, and was guillotined in 1793, exclaiming triumphantly on the scaffold, "citizens, my name is Buffon."

BUIST, George, D. D., minister in Charleston, S. C., was born in 1770 in Fifeshire, Scotland. In the college of Edinburgh, which he entered in 1737, he became very distinguished. In classical learning he excelled, having a predilection for Grecian literature. With the Hebrew he was also familiar. In French and Italian he was skilled. He was invited to the pastoral care of a presbyterian church in Charleston, 1793; and in 1805 he was appointed principal of the college in that city. He died in 1808, aged 33 years. He wrote various articles for the British Encyclopedia. He published an abridgement of Hume for Schools; a version of the psalms; and a funeral sermon. After his death two volumes of his sermons were also published.

BULL, John, a native of Somersetsbire, admitted 1586 bachelor of music at Oxford, and doctor at Cambridge. He was so skilful in music that he was appointed organist to the Queen's chapel, and on the establishment of Gresham college, he was elected professor of music, and permitted to deliver his lectures in English. He travelled afterwards in Germany and France, and at last went to reside in the Netherlands, where the archduke patronised him. He died at Lubec, or according to Wood, at Ham-burgh, about the year 1615, aged little more than 50. His compositions in the collection entitled "Parthenie," show him to have had great power of execution on the harpsichord.

BULL, George, D. D., bishop of St. David's, was born at Wells 25th March, 1634. Under the care of William Thomas, a puritan of extensive learning and amiable manners, he made progress in divinity, and, at the age of 21, he was ordained by Skinner, the ejected bishop of Oxford, and soon after was appointed minister of St. George's, near Bristol. In this capacity he gained the esteem and reverence of his parishioners. He married in 1653, and was made rector of Suddington in Gloucestershire; and during the 27 years of his residence in this parish he composed the greatest part of his valuable works. His excellent defence of the Nicene creed procured him, in 1635, the honorable degree of Doctor of Divinity from the gratitude of the university of Oxford; and after passing through several preferments he was at last elevated to the see of St. David's in 1705, where he resided in pastoral dignity, and died February 17, 1709. His chief works, besides the Defensio fidei Nicenæ, are his harmonia apostolica—apologia—examen censure—judicium ecclesie catholice,—primitiva apostolica traditio de J. C. divinatione, besides various discourses, published by Nelson, in 4 vols. 8vo. His character was great, and amiable in private as well as in public life. His learning, as his judicious editor, Nelson, observes, was tempered with that modest and humble opinion of it that made it shine with greater lustre. He not only inculcated, but in his conduct displayed all the meek and endearing virtues of benignity, humility, prudence, piety, and purity of the primitive ages of Christianity; and in his last moments exhibited that mild resignation which was the best proof of his hopes and reliance on the great truths of the gospel. His Latin works were edited by Dr. Grabe, one vol. folio.

BULL, William, M. D., a physician eminent for literature and medical science, was the son of William Bull, lieutenant-governor of S. Carolina, who died March 1755, aged 72. He was the first native of South Carolina, and probably the first American, who obtained a degree in medicine. He was a pupil of Boerhaave. After his return to this country his services in civil life were required by his fellow citizens. In 1751 he was a member of the council; in 1763, he was speaker of the house of representatives, and in 1764, he was lieutenant-governor of South Carolina. He was many years in this office and commander in chief. When the British troops left South Carolina in 1782 he accompanied them to England, where he resided the remainder of his life. He died 1791, aged 81.

BULLER, Francis, an English judge, descended from a respectable family, long settled in Cornwall and Devonshire. From Westminster school he entered at the Temple, and was called to the bar in 1763. As a special pleader, and at the bar he soon acquired reputation; and by his marriage alliance with lord Bathurst, he obtained the dignity of Welsh judge, and soon after that of justice in the king's bench. His abilities, his knowledge, and his integrity, ensured him here the friendship of lord Mansfield, who wished him to be his successor; but the interest of lord Kenyon prevailed over his recommendation; in consequence of which sir Francis, who was made a baronet, removed to the common pleas. He died suddenly, June 4, 1800, universally respected as a good lawyer and an impartial judge.

He published, in 1772, an introduction to the law of nisi prius, a work of acknowledged merit among lawyers.

BULLET, John Baptist, died 6th September, 1775, aged 76, at Besancon, where he was dean of the university. He published a history of the establishment of Christianity, taken from Jewish and pagan authors, in 4to.—the existence of God demonstrated from nature—dissertation on the history of France, 8vo.—answers to unbelievers—memoirs of the Celtic tongue, 3 vols. fol. He possessed a most retentive memory; but though his works are learned and useful, they do not display either grace of diction, or elegance of style.

BULLIALDUS, Ismael, an astronomer, born at Laon, in the isle of France. He travelled in his youth in pursuit of knowledge, and in a more advanced period he visited the famous Hevelius at Dantzic, whose works, like his own, had commanded the applause of mankind. He died at Paris 1694, aged 89. His works were, de naturâ lucis—Philolaus, in four books, with tables of the system, revived by Copernicus—opns novum ad arithmetica infinitorum—tractate on spiral lines—and astronomiæ et philol. fundamenta, against Ward, the learned bishop of Sarum.

BULLIARD, Peter, a native of the Barrois, in France, where he was born about 1742, combined the talent of an artist with that of an eminent botanist. He himself designed and engraved the plates which embellish his works. He died in 1703. He is the author of a Parisian Flora; a History of the Poisonous Plants of France; a history of French Champignons; and other productions.

BULLINGER, Henry, one of the early reformers, was born in the canton of Zurich, at Baumgarten, in 1504. The works of Melancthon converted him to protestantism, and he became closely connected with Zuingli, to whom he succeeded as pastor of Zurich. He was one of the authors of the Helvetic Confession, and assisted Calvin in drawing up the Formulary of 1549. Bullinger was a moderate and conscientious man; and it is much to his honor that, on the ground of it being inconsistent with christianity for any one to hire himself out to slaughter those who had never injured him, he successfully opposed a treaty for supplying France with a body of Swiss mercenaries. He died in 1575. His printed works form ten folio volumes.

BULOW, Henry William, a native of Prussia, born at Falkenberg, adopted the military profession, and bore a part in the ephemeral insurrection of the Netherlands against the Emperor Joseph; after which he visited America on an abortive commercial speculation; and next became a Swedenborgian preacher in that country. On his return to Europe, he resorted to his pen for subsistence, and wrote various military works. Of these, the most celebrated is, Principles of Modern War, in which he proposes a new strategical system, that has excited much controversy. His History of the Campaign of 1805 having given offence to Russia, he was incarcerated, and he died in prison, at Riga, in July, 1807.

BUNYAN, John, was born at Elstow, near Bedford. The trifling instruction which he received was quickly forgotten, by the indulgence of every vicious propensity; but his career of vice was stopped by the sudden darting of a voice from heaven into his soul, say his biographers, which bade him either to leave his sins, or follow them and perish in hell. From this circumstance his mode of life was altered, and, after being for a little time a soldier in the parliament army, where he behaved bravely at the siege of Leicester, he established himself as a baptist preacher at Bedford; but, as the holder of a conventicle, he was adjudged to be imprisoned for life. During his confinement, he wrote several of his works, and maintained himself by making long tagged thread laces, till, after more than twelve long years' imprisonment, he was liberated by the compassionate interference of Barlow, bishop of Lincoln. When restored to liberty, he travelled through England to visit and comfort the brethren of his persuasion; and on the publication of the act of toleration by James II., he built a meeting house at Bedford, where his doctrines became popular. He died of a fever, in London, in 1683, aged 60, leaving four children, one of whom, Mary, was born blind. His works were collected and published in two vols. folio, 1736—7. The most celebrated of his compositions is his Pilgrim's progress, a work which, under an allegorical form, conveys and recommends the sublimest truths and purest virtues of morality and religion. It was written during his imprisonment, and has passed through more than 50 editions, and been translated into various languages.

BUNACORSI, Philip, a native of Tuscany, who, after the fashion of the times, called himself by the new name of Callimaco Esperiente. He removed from Rome upon being suspected of forming a conspiracy against Paul II. and settled in Poland as tutor to Albert the son of king Casimir. His abilities were also employed in several honorable embassies and as prime minister. He died at Cracow 1496, aged 59. He wrote a life of Attila—of Ladislaus king of Poland before Casimir, besides other works, highly esteemed.

BUNAMICI, Castrucio, a native of Lucca, who studied at Rome, and devoted himself to the clerical profession. Not meeting, however, with the encouragement which he expected, he turned his attention to the military life, and bore arms with courage and distinction in the service of the king of Naples. He devoted much of this time to study, and published the history of the war of Velletri, in 4to. 1746, and, four years after, the history of the last war of Italy, in 3 vols. 4to, which procured him from the duke of Parma, the hereditary title of count, and from the king the rank of commissary-general, and a pension. These works are highly esteemed, for the purity of the Latinity, and the accuracy of the narration. The author died in his native city in 1761, in his 50th year.

BUNTALENTI, Bernardo, surnamed Giron-dile, was distinguished for his knowledge of architecture, of sculpture, of hydraulics, and also for his miniatures and historical pieces. His madonnas were greatly admired. When an infant, the house of his father, on the Arno, fell down, and destroyed all the inhabitants besides himself. His distress was made known to the duke of Florence, who nobly supported and patronised him, and thus enabled him to become the honor of his country. He died 1603, aged 61.

BURCHELLO, Dominico, a harper at Florence, whose wit and genius rendered him the favorite of his countrymen. He wrote sonnets and lighter pieces, which have gained the admiration of critics, and rank him high among Italian poets. Occasionally obscure, and sometimes enigmatical, he is censurable for the little respect which he paid to good manners. He died at Rome 1448, aged 68. The best edition of his poems is that of Florence, 8vo. 1568.

BURCKHARDT, John Lewis, was born at Lausanne in 1784, and educated at Leipsic, from whence he removed to Gottingen. In 1806, the troubles of Germany, and the ravages of the French, induced him to visit England, where he offered his services to the African Association, which offer was readily accepted. He accordingly went to Cambridge to study the Arabic language, after which he applied to physic and surgery, and such science as might qualify him to travel in Africa. In March, 1809, he sailed for Malta, from whence he proceeded to Aleppo in the character of an Indian Mohommedan, and under the name of Ibrahim. He remained two years and a half in Syria to acquire a readiness in the vulgar Arabic. At the beginning of 1813, he made his first journey through Nubia, and afterwards travelled along the Arabian coast of the Red Sea. He next crossed the Desert, visited Mecca and Medina, from which last place he descended to the sea-coast, and after undergoing great hardships, arrived at Cairo in June, 1815. The next spring he set out for Mount Sinai, after which he was preparing for further researches, when he was carried off by a dysentery.

BURD, Benjamin, general, a soldier of the revolution, at the age of 21, he joined col. Thompson's regiment of Pennsylvania riflemen and marched as a volunteer to Boston, where he arrived August 1775. He was afterwards in the battle of Long Island. In 1777, as captain in the 4th Pennsylvania regiment, he was in the battles of Trenton and Princeton, and afterwards at the battle of Brandywine. In the capacity of major he was engaged in the battles of Germantown and Monmouth. In 1779, he accompanied Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians. He died 1822, aged 69.

BURETTE, Peter John, a physician of Paris, who died there 1747, aged 82. He was the son of a musician, and played with his father before Louis XIV. but at the age of 18, he quitted the profession for literature. He became an elegant and polished scholar; and besides his many valuable contributions to the memoirs of the academy, on the games of the ancients, and other curious subjects, he was engaged in the journal des savans. His treatise on the symphony of the ancients is much admired. He was also an able orientalist, and as a professor of medicine in the royal college, and a reader on the materia medica, he acquired great applause. The catalogue of his library is contained in 3 vols. 12mo.

BURGER, Godtfrid Augustus, a native of Wolmerswende in Germany, who studied divinity at Halle, and afterwards applied to the profession of law at Gottingen. Poetry, however, was his favorite pursuit, and the productions of Shakspeare gave him more real pleasure than any other employment. He was for some time engaged in the periodical publication of the almanac of the muses from 1770 to 1775, and of the German museum, and translated with great spirit the tragedy of Macbeth, which was acted at Hamburg. Burger, who was fickle in his pursuits, was for some years engaged as a steward to baron Uslar, and as a farmer; and in the latter part of life he was professor at Gottingen. He died 1794, aged 46.

BURGES, Cornelius, D. D., a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford. He was chaplain to Charles I. but, on the breaking out of the civil wars, he sided with the parliament, and enriched himself by the plunder of that church, which it was his duty to support. At the restoration, his ill-begotten wealth was torn with difficulty from his grasp. He died 1665. Some of his sermons and other tracts have been printed.

BURGH, James, LL. D., a popular writer, born at Madderty in Perthshire. After studying a little time at St. Andrew's for the clerical profession, which his health did not permit him to pursue, he engaged in the linen trade, and was unsuccessful. Disappointed at home, he went to England, where for one year he was engaged in correcting the press, in the house of an eminent printer, and from thence he went as assistant in the grammar school at Marlow, where he published, 1746, Britain's remembrance, a book universally read and admired, and considered as the finished production of some of the bishops. On leaving Marlow he was engaged in the same laborious employment at Enfield, and afterwards, in 1747, he opened a school on his own account at Stoke Newington, and three years after he removed to Newington Green, where for 19 years, with great reputation and success, he trained many respectable pupils to the knowledge of literature, and the practice of virtue and morality. His writings were, thoughts on education—political disquisitions, 3 vols.—Crito or essays, 12 vols.—the dignity of human nature, one vol. 4to. or two vols. 8vo.—the art of speaking, 8vo.—besides other treatises.

BURGOYNE, John, an English general officer and dramatist. He was a natural son of lord Bingley, and entered early into the army. In 1762, he commanded a force sent into Portugal for the defence of that kingdom against the Spaniards. He also distinguished himself in the American war, by the taking of Ticonderoga, but was at last obliged to surrender with his army, to general Gates, at Saratoga. He was elected into parliament for Preston, in Lancashire, but refusing to return to America, pursuant to his convention, was dismissed the service. He published some pamphlets in defence of his conduct, and is the author of three dramas—the Maid of the Oaks, Bon Ton, and the Heiress. He died 1792.

BURIGNY, Levesque de, a native of Rheims, who died at Paris, 8th Oct. 1785, aged 94. He wrote a treatise on the authority of the pope, four vols. 12mo. 1720—a learned history of pagan philosophy, 1724—general history of Sicily, two vols. 4to. 1745—revolution of Constantinople, three vols. 12mo. 1750—Porphyry on abstinence—life of Grotius, of Erasmus, of Bossuet, of Perron.

BURKE, Edmund, a celebrated statesman, was born at Carlow in Ireland, 1st Jan. 1730, and educated at Dublin, where, after three years residence, he took his bachelor's degree, 1749. He afterwards applied for the logic professorship at Glasgow, and when his solicitations were unsuccessful, he came to London, and in 1753 entered at the Middle Temple. But though possessed of great powers of elocution, he paid no serious attention to the law, but considered literature and politics as the field most favorable for the exertion of his genius. His first acknowledged work, which was of course published anonymously, was his Vindication of Natural Society; an admirable imitation of Lord Bolingbroke's style and manner of reasoning, which deceived even some of the best judges. This was followed in 1757, by his Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful. In 1758 Dodsley began at his suggestion the annual register, which owed much of its celebrity to his pen. In 1761 he visited Ireland, as a companion of his friend Singlespeech Hamilton, by whose interest he procured a pension of 300*l.* on the Irish establishment, and on his return he was introduced by Mr. Fitzherbert to the notice of lord Rockingham, first lord of the treasury, who made him his secretary, and had him returned to parliament for Wendover. In 1774, without any solicitation on his part, he was elected for Bristol; but this seat he lost at the next election, in consequence of his having displayed too much liberality of principle, with respect to the catholics and to Ireland. He subsequently sat for Malton. In the mean while he gave to the public his Observations on Grenville's State of the Nation; a Short Account of a late short Administration; Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discontents; and his speeches on American Affairs. To the impolitic contest with America he made a strenuous and eloquent resistance as a senator. On the downfall of Lord North's ministry, Burke obtained the office of pay-master-general, and a seat in the council; and he availed himself of this opportunity to carry his celebrated reform bill, which he had previously brought forward in vain. The expulsion of the coalition ministry of course deprived him of his office. The prosecution of Mr. Hastings, and the opposition to Mr. Pitt's regency bill, were among his next and greatest parliamentary efforts. Though the former of these has drawn down upon him much censure, and even calumny, there can be no doubt that he undertook it as a sacred and imperative duty. This is irrefragably proved by his recently published letters to Dr. Lawrence. When the French revolution took place, he early foresaw the result, and, in 1790, he produced his celebrated Reflections on that event. A breach between him and Mr. Fox was also occasioned by their difference of opinion on this important subject. In 1794, he retired from parliament, and a pension of one thousand two hundred pounds a year was bestowed on him by the government. From the time when his Reflections were published, till his decease, his literary hostility to the doctrines of revolutionary France was continued with unabated vigor. The last work which he gave to the press was Two Letters on a Regicide Peace: the concluding two were posthumous. He died on the 8th of July, 1797. His compositions have been collected in sixteen volumes octavo. In private life Burke was amiable and benevolent; in public, indefatigable, ardent, and abhorrent of meanness and injustice. It was this latter quality which rendered him a persevering advocate of the Irish catholics. As an orator he ranks among the first of modern times; and as a writer, whether we consider the splendor of his diction, the richness and variety of his imagery, or the boundless stores of knowledge which he displays, it must be acknowledged that there are few who equal, and none who transcend him.

BURKE, Aedanus, a judge of the court of chancery in South Carolina, was a native of Galway in Ireland. At the beginning of the revolution, he came as a volunteer, to fight for American liberty. In 1778, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court. In 1789, he was a delegate in congress. He died 1802, aged 59.

BURKE, John Doly, author of a history of Virginia, was a native of Ireland, and educated at Trinity college. Coming to America in 1797, he conducted for a short time a paper at Boston and afterwards at New-York, where he was arrested under the sedition law. He was killed in a duel in 1808. He published a history of Virginia from its first settlement to 1804, in 3 vols. He published also Bunker hill, a tragedy; Bethlem Gaber, an historical drama, 1803; an oration delivered March 4, 1808.

BURKITT, William, was born at Hitcham, Northamptonshire, 25th July, 1650, and educated at Stowmarket school and Penbroke-hall, Cambridge. He was made vicar of Dedham in Essex, where, as before at Milden in Suffolk, where he was curate, he adorned his office by a pious and practical elocution, and by a friendly and charitable demeanor. He died Oct. 1703. He wrote some books, the best known of which is his commentary on the New Testament, which continues to be a popular work.

BURLAMAQUI, John James, a native of Geneva, professor of civil law there, and afterwards tutor to the prince of Hesse Cassel. He was made counsellor of state on his return to Geneva, and died there 1748, aged 54. His principles of natural law, and of political law, three vols. 12mo. are two popular works, which show him to have been well acquainted with his subject, and all the arguments of Grotius, Puffendorf, and Barbeyrac.

BURMAN, Francis, of Leyden, was professor of theology at Utrecht, where he died, 1679, aged 51. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the historical books of the Old Testament in Dutch—an abridgment of theology—exercitationes theologice, two vols. 4to.—and other works.

BURMAN, Peter, an eminent critic, was born at Utrecht, in 1668, and was professor of history, eloquence, and Greek, first at Utrecht, and afterwards at Leyden. He subsequently became professor of history and chief librarian to the United Provinces. He died in 1741. Besides publishing valuable editions of many of the Latin classics, and an edition of Buchanan's works, he wrote Latin poems, and various critical and philological dissertations, discourses, and epistles.

BURMAN, John, a physician and botanist, the pupil of Boerhaave, and nephew of the celebrated critic, was born in 1707, and died in 1780. He was professor of botany at Amsterdam. Burnan, among other things, published a Catalogue of Ceylonian Plants, in which Linnæus assisted him; and Descriptions of rare African and American Plants; and translated into Latin Rumphius's Herbal of Amboyna.

BURMAN, Peter, brother of the botanist, was born at Amsterdam, in 1714, and was brought up by his uncle, whom he assisted in his critical labours, and of whom he was no unworthy rival in erudition. He was professor of eloquence at Franeker, and afterwards professor of poetry, librarian, and keeper of the gymnasium, at Amsterdam, where he died of an apoplexy in 1778. He wrote a volume of Latin poems, and edited Aristophanes, Claudius Propertius, and other classical writers. Like his uncle, he was irascible, and was frequently engaged in violent literary quarrels.

BURN, Richard, was born at Kirby Stephen, near Winton, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he received the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1762. He died at Orton, where he had been vicar 49 years, 20th November, 1789. He was chancellor of Carlisle, and justice of the peace for Westmoreland and Cumberland, and distinguished himself as the author of the office of justice of peace, and on the ecclesiastical laws, two works of great repute and respectability, besides the history and antiquities of Westmoreland and Cumberland.

BURNAP, Jacob, D. D., an amiable clergyman, born at Reading, Mass. Nov. 2, 1748, and graduated at Harvard college in 1770. In 1772 the congregational church of Merrimac, N. H. was constituted, and Dr. Burnap in the same year became the first pastor. Here he continued his ministry nearly fifty years, and died Dec. 26, 1821, aged 73. He published five funeral sermons; an oration for independence; a fast sermon; an election sermon; and two thanksgiving sermons.

BURNET, Gilbert, bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh, 18th September, 1743, and was educated in the college of Aberdeen. At the age of 13 he was a united expectant preacher, but he refused the offer of a benefice, and in 1663, two years after his father's death, he visited Oxford and Cambridge for six months, and soon after passed over into Holland, where he applied to the study of Hebrew, and by an indiscriminate and friendly intercourse with men of every religious persuasion, he fixed his principles of universal benevolence and toleration, without regard to tribe or sect. On his return to Scotland 1665, he was ordained, and afterwards appointed divinity professor at Glasgow. He afterwards engaged himself to write the history of the dukes of Hamilton, and recommended himself so much to the earl of Lauderdale and to the king's ministers in London, by his moderation and superior abilities, that he was several times offered a Scotch bishopric which he as often declined. His interest with the court however was of short duration; he became suspected, and was treated with harshness by the king, who ordered his name to be erased from the list of chaplains. To avoid the enmity of Lauderdale, he determined to settle in London, where he was appointed preacher of the Rolls' chapel, and lecturer of St. Clements. His two first volumes of the History of the Reformation about this time commanded the public admiration, and received as an honorable testimony of its merits the thanks of both houses of parliament. About this time likewise he became acquainted with the profligate Rochester, and by his conversation he reclaimed him, and had the happiness to see him atone for his debaucheries by a most penitential death. Upon the change of administration in 1682, Burnet's conduct gave offence, and his attendance on lord Russel at his trial created so much indignation at court, that he was by the king's command discharged from his office at the Rolls' chapel and at St. Clements. His character was so well established, that, in his travels in France and Italy, he was received with every mark of attention and respect by the French king, and by pope Innocent II. The accession of James II. to the throne formed a new era in the life of Burnet. Unwilling to return to his native country, he resolved to settle in Holland, and the attention which was paid to him by the prince and princess of Orange, proved so offensive to the English monarch, that he caused his ambassador to demand his banishment from the states, a tyrannical interference which was rejected, as he was under the protection of the laws as a naturalized subject and the husband of a Dutch lady. Some time after he accompanied as chaplain the prince on his invasion of England, and so zealously active did he show himself in his cause, both by his pamphlets and his pulpit eloquence, that William, a few days after he was seated on the throne, advanced him to the see of Salisbury. He resided in his diocese the best part of his time, and though he was engaged as preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, yet he devoted himself as much to improve the comforts of his clergy, by augmenting poor livings, as to advance the interests of religion by his writings. He died 17th March, 1715, in his 72d year. Besides his works already mentioned, and a third volume of the reformation, &c. he wrote the History of his own times—an excellent treatise on the pastoral care—an exposition of the 39 articles—and sermons.

BURNET, William, gov. of several of the American colonies, was the eldest son of the celebrated bishop Burnet, and was born at the Hague, 1688. In the year 1720, he was appointed governor of New York and New Jersey, and held the office till 1728. He was then appointed governor of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. He reached Boston in July 1728 and was received with unusual pomp. In his speech to the assembly, he made known his instructions, to insist upon a fixed salary, and expressed his intention firmly to adhere to them. Thus the controversy which had been agitated during the administration of his predecessor, was revived. The governor pursued the controversy with zeal, but without success; and opposition had an evident effect upon his spirits. A violent cold, occasioned by the oversetting of his carriage, was followed by a fever, which terminated his life in Sept. 1729. He published some astronomical observations in the transactions of the royal society, and an essay on scripture prophecy, wherein he endeavored to explain the three periods contained in the twelfth chapter of Daniel, with arguments to prove, that the first period expired in 1715. This was published 1724, 4to. pp. 167.

BURNET, Elizabeth, third wife of bishop Burnet, was the daughter of sir Richard Blake, knight, and was born in London 1661. At the age of 18 she married Robert Berkeley, esquire, with whom she went to reside in Holland till the revolution, and after being a widow seven years, she, in 1700, married the bishop of Salisbury. The fortune which she possessed was employed to the most benevolent purposes, and the goodness of her heart was displayed in her maternal attention to the children of her last husband. She published a method of devotion, a book of merit, which showed her great knowledge of religion, and which was again reprinted four years after her death. She died 1709.

BURNET, Thomas, a philosopher and divine, born at Croft, in Yorkshire, about 1635, was educated at Cambridge, was travelling tutor to the sons of several noblemen; was appointed master of the Charterhouse, in 1685, became chaplain and clerk of the closet to King William; and died in 1715. As master of the Charterhouse, he distinguished himself by boldly resisting the attempts of James II. to make a Roman catholic a pensioner of the establishment. As a literary character, he acquired reputation by various works of merit, but particularly by his Telluris sacra Theoria, which he subsequently translated into English, with the title of the Sacred Theory of the Earth, and which, though its philosophy is radically defective, will always be admired, for the sublimity of its imagery and the eloquence of its style.

BURNET, William, the son of Bishop Burnet, was born at the Hague in 1688. After having held the office of comptroller of the customs in England, he was in 1720 appointed governor of New York and New Jersey. In 1728 he was appointed to the government of Massachusetts and New Hampshire; where his administration was rendered unpleasant by a controversy with the assembly. He died at Boston in 1729. He was a man of learning, and published several works on theological and philosophical subjects.

BURNEY, Charles, a doctor of music, and literary character, was born at Shrewsbury, in 1726, and studied music under Dr. Arne. In 1749, he produced, at Drury Lane, the musical pieces of Alfred, Robin Hood, and Queen Mah. He then settled at Lynn, where he resided nine years, during which period he was employed on his General History of Music, the first volume of which, however, he did not give to the press till 1776. In 1760 he returned to the capital, and in 1766 brought out, at Drury Lane, an English version of the Devin du Village. In 1770 and 1772, he travelled through France and Italy, and Germany and the Netherlands; of which tours he published interesting narratives. He became a member of the Royal Society after his second return, and contributed to their Transactions an account of young Crotch. He died in 1814, at Chelsea Hospital, of which he was organist. Besides the productions already mentioned, and many musical compositions, he produced several works, one of the chief of which is, a Life of Metastasio, in three volumes.

BURNEY, Charles, second son of the musical composer, was born at Lynn, in 1757, and educated at the Charter House, Cains College, Cambridge, and Aberdeen, of the king's chaplains. He died December 28, 1817. Dr. Burney was one of the most consummate Greek scholars in Europe. His classical acquirements were first displayed in his criticisms in the Monthly Review. He published an Appendix to Scapula; an edition of the Choral Odes of Æschylus; and other erudite works. His valuable library was purchased for the British Museum.

BURNEY, Rear Admiral James, a son of the historian of music, was born in 1789; accompanied Captain Cook in two of his voyages; was much beloved by Johnson; and displayed a respectable portion of the literary talent of his family, in a History of Voyages of Discovery, 5 vols. 4to; an Account of the Russian Eastern Voyages; and some philosophical tracts. He died of apoplexy in 1820.

BURR, Aaron, president of New Jersey college, graduated at Yale College in 1735. In 1742 he was invited to take charge of the presbyterian church at Newark in New-Jersey. Here he became so eminent as an able and learned divine, and an accomplished scholar, that in 1748 he was unanimously elected president of the college, which he was instrumental in founding, as successor to Mr. Dickinson. The college was removed about this time from Elizabethtown to Newark, and in 1757, a short time before the death of Mr. Burr, to Princeton. In 1754 he accompanied Mr. Whitefield to Boston, having a high esteem for the character of that eloquent itinerant preacher and greatly rejoicing in the success of his labors. He died 1757, aged 43. Mr. Burr published a treatise entitled the supreme deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, maintained in a letter to the dedicator of Mr. Emlyn's inquiry; reprinted at Boston in 1791. He published also a fast sermon on account of the encroachments of the French, Jan. 1, 1758; the watchman's answer to the question, what of the night? a sermon 1756; a funeral sermon on governor Belcher, 1757.

BURR, Joseph, a philanthropist, died at Manchester, Vermont, without a family, 1828, aged 56. He gave in his will over ninety thousand dollars to public institutions, viz. to the foreign mission society 17000, to the bible society 15000, to Middlebury college 12000, to the American home missionary society 10,000, to the tract, colonization, Vermont missionary societies, and to the parish in Manchester 5000 each, to an education society 3000, to Dartmouth and Williams colleges each 1000, for a public seminary of learning in Manchester 10,000. He left besides a large amount of property to his relatives. He was the banker of his region.

BURNS, Robert, a Scotch poet of great merit, born 29th January, 1759, at Ayr. Though originally a ploughman, and humbly educated, he rose to high poetical fame by the untutored powers of his genius. His writings are all in the Scotch dialect, which undoubtedly lessens their merit, though they possess uncommon beauty and an elegant simplicity, which cannot be sufficiently admired. Burns no sooner appeared in print than he was noticed, and drawn from the plough to associate with men of letters and opulence. By the exertions of his friends, and Dr. Blacklock of Edinburgh in particular, a handsome subscription of nearly 1100*l.* was raised for him, and a place in the excise was obtained, and a farm rented, where he might exercise his genius in noble independence, while he maintained his family. These generous efforts however were unavailing; Burns, transplanted from the plough, was a withered plant; he contracted bad habits, which, added to a natural propensity for licentious pleasures, shattered his existence, and he sunk into an untimely grave in 1796. He left behind him a widow and four children, towards whom the hand of benevolence, guided by the kind interference of Dr. Currie of Liverpool, who edited his poems and letters in four vols. 8vo. 1800, has been humanely extended to raise them above the miseries of low and often vicious indigence, and the handsome sum of 1000*l.* has been obtained as the profit of the publication.

BURRILL, James, LL. D., a distinguished lawyer and statesman of Rhode Island, was born in Providence of that state, 1772, and graduated at Brown University, 1788. He studied the profession of law, and soon acquired high reputation in its practice. In 1797, he was appointed attorney-general of the state, and continued to discharge the duties of this office for more than sixteen years. In 1813 the decline of his health induced him to retire from the bar. He was immediately elected to a seat in the state legislature, and in the following year was chosen speaker of the house of representatives. In 1816 he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court, and in the next year was elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States. Of this body he continued a member till his death in 1820. Judge Burrill was eminent as a scholar in general literature; and his moral character was free from reproach or suspicion. His moral and social virtues, united with intellectual attainments of so high an order, gave him an influence in the circle of his acquaintance seldom surpassed.

BURROUGHS, George; the name of this man ought to be preserved from oblivion, as a memento of the excesses to which mankind may be driven, when under the influence of any powerful delusion. He was executed for witchcraft, a crime impossible for any human being to be guilty, since the age of miracles. Mr. Burroughs graduated at Harvard college in 1670, and was a settled minister in Falmouth, Maine, now Portland, and afterwards in Salem or Danvers. The evidence, on which he was convicted, could not have been admitted in any court, whose members were not deeply infected with the prevailing mania. The witnesses were allowed to tell, that two of his wives had appeared to them, and accused him of being the cause of their death; and threatening if he denied it, they would appear to them in court. This, they pretended, actually happened, and were thrown into a paroxysm of fear from the horrid apparition. This is a specimen of the testimony by which he was convicted and executed at Salem, Aug. 1692.

BURROWS, William, an officer in the American navy. In 1799 he received a midshipman's warrant, and served on board different ships. In 1803 he was under Preble in the Tripolitan war. In the war of 1812 he was appointed to the command of the sloop of war Enterprize, he sailed from Portsmouth, and on Sunday, Sept. 5, 1813, fell in with his Britannic majesty's brig the Boxer, off Portland, between Seguir and cape Elizabeth. After an action of 45 minutes, the Boxer was captured, the commander, Blyth, being killed by a cannon ball. At the first fire lieut. Burrows was wounded, but refused to be carried below. When the sword of his enemy was presented to him, he exclaimed, clasping his hands, "I am satisfied, I die contented." He died at 12 o'clock at night. For his gallantry congress voted a gold medal to his nearest male relative. The two commanders were honorably buried in Portland.

BURTON, Henry, an ecclesiastic, born at Birsall in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge. He was made B. D. at Oxford, and afterwards introduced into the family of lord Carey. He was next clerk of the closet to prince Henry, and after his death to Charles, who on his accession to the throne discarded him from his favor. This affront, whether merited or not, was highly resented by Burton, who was now inflamed with the spirit of the times, and railed with vehemence against the episcopal bench, especially Neil and Laud. In his office of rector of St. Matthew's in Friday-street he preached and published two sermons, which were considered as libellous and seditious, and for them he was summoned before the star-chamber and condemned to pay a fine of 5000*l.* to be exposed on the pillory, to have his ears cut off, to be degraded from his ecclesiastical honors, and be imprisoned for life, without the permission of seeing his wife or relations. After enduring this severe punishment for 12 weeks in Lancaster gaol, he was removed to Cornet castle in Guernsey, in October 1637, from which, three years after, he was liberated by the interference of parliament. His sufferings were rewarded by the compassion of parliament, who voted to him 6000*l.*, which in consequence of the turbulence of the times he never received, and he was restored to his living and his degrees, and by embracing the prevalent opinions of the puritans and independents he continued to retain his popularity till his death in 1648, aged 69.

BURTON, William, an antiquarian, born at Lindley in Leicestershire, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards became a member of the Inner Temple, and was barrister and reporter in the court of common pleas. The law however did not long engage his attention; his favorite studies were genealogy, heraldry, and antiquities, and under the patronage of Villars marquis of Buckingham, and with the assistance of his friends John Beaumont and Augustus Vincent, he published his great work on the history of his native county, in fol. 1622. This composition is valuable on account of its antiquity, though it is not free from errors, and though it is often too overloaded with long genealogies and useless digressions. Burton was a man of property as well as of education, but he was a sufferer by the civil wars. He died at Falde, sixth April, 1645, aged 70.

BURTON, Robert, brother to the preceding, was born 8th February 1576. He was a man of extensive learning but of a melancholy turn of mind, and extravagantly addicted to astrology. His anatomy of melancholy, by Democritus junior, as he calls himself, fully established his character for erudition and eccentricity. The work continued, in a 4to. and octavo form, long a favorite of the public, and his bookseller it is said gained an handsome estate by the sale of it. As Burton died about the time which he had predicted by calculating his nativity, some foolishly suspected that to give celebrity to the accuracy of his art he destroyed himself.

BURTON, John, D. D., a learned divine, educated at Oxford, where he soon became Greek lecturer, and for near 15 years a respectable and indefatigable tutor. His abilities were exerted not only to render his pupils learned, and the university regular and correct in discipline, but he endeavored to smooth the difficulties which attend the publication of learned and important works, and drew contributions and exemptions for such books as issued from the Clarendon press. In 1733, he succeeded Dr.

Litt'eton, as vicar of Mapledurham, Oxfordshire. At an advanced period of life, when his eyesight began to fail, he published his scattered pieces called opuscula miscellanea; but soon after a severe attack of an erysipelas fever destroyed his faculties and rendered him a melancholy monument of fallen greatness. This worthy and truly amiable man, died 11th February, 1771, aged 76.

BURY, Arthur, D. D., a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from which he was ejected in 1648, after a residence of 10 years, by the parliamentary visitors. At the restoration he obtained a prebend of Exeter, and in 1665, was made rector of Exeter college, and chaplain to the king. His "naked gospel," in which he defended and avowed the principles of the Socinians, caused his ejection from his preferment, and the work was burnt by order of the university of Oxford. He vindicated his conduct in some pamphlets, and died about the end of the 17th century, near Exeter.

BURY, Elizabeth, daughter of captain Lawrence, was born at Linton, Cambridgeshire, and married Mr. Lloyd of Huntingdonshire, and, after his death, Samuel Bury, a dissenting minister of Bristol. She was a respectable woman in private life, and particularly excelled in her knowledge of divinity, of mathematics, and of the learned languages, especially Hebrew. Her life and diary were published by her last husband, and Dr. Watts honored her virtues with an elegant elegy. She died at Bristol, 1720, aged 76.

BUSBEQUIUS, Auger Gislén, a natural son of the lord of Busbec, was born at Commines in Flanders. He was educated with the greatest care by his father, who perceived in him the prominent features of a man of genius and talents. He visited London in the suit of the imperial ambassador, and in 1554 went himself at the head of an embassy to the capital of Turkey, where, besides examining with the eyes of a statesman, the character and genius of the inhabitants, he made a curious and valuable collection of coins, manuscripts, and inscriptions. He published an interesting account of his travels, printed by Elzevir, Leyden, 1633, which is highly commended by Thuanus; and so respectable and useful were his abilities considered, that he was drawn from the privacy of retirement to attend Elizabeth when she espoused Charles IX. of France, and to remain at the French court, as imperial ambassador. He died October 1592, aged 70.

BUSBY, Richard, a celebrated schoolmaster, born at Luton in Lincolnshire, 22d Sept. 1606, and educated at Westminster school, of which, after taking his degrees at Christ church, Oxford, he was appointed master, 1640. For 55 years he presided over that respectable institution, and had the happiness to see many of his pupils fill the highest offices of the church and state, with credit and ability. After the restoration he was made prebendary of Westminster by Charles II., and in the same year he took his degree of D. D. He died sixth April, 1695, in his 89th year. The great opulence which, in a laborious office, he acquired, was liberally dispersed for the promotion of piety and learning, or for the relief of virtuous and suffering indigence. He wrote some books for the use of his school, where they are still retained as a monument of his erudition, and critical discernment.

BUSCH, John George, a native of Luneburg, who was born in 1728, and died in 1800, was director of the Commercial Academy at Hamburg, and is the author of several standard works on commerce and political economy. Among them may be mentioned, the Theory of Commerce; Essays on Commerce; on Banks; and on the Circulation of Money. Busch understood all the European languages; was versed in the mathematics; and was a truly patriotic citizen. His Encyclopædia of Mathematics proves his scientific knowledge.

BUSCHING, Dr. Anthony Frederic, a native of Stadhagen in Prussia, educated at Halle, and made pastor of the Lutheran church at Presburg. He was author of a new treatise on geography in German, two vols. 1754. This work was liberally rewarded on the continent, and its merits were made known to the English in a translation in six vols. 4to. 1763-1779. Dr. Busching died 1793, aged 69, at Berlin, where Frederic II. had placed him as director of the college.

BUSHELL, Thomas, a native of Worcestershire, educated at Baliol college. He was afterwards in the service of Bacon the chancellor, and upon his disgrace he retired to Oxfordshire, to reside on his estate. He was in his principles a strong royalist, and had the honor to receive Charles I. and his queen at his seat, and for his attachment to his cause he was made master of the royal mines in Wales. In this new appointment he established a mint, and coined money, which he sent to the monarch at Oxford. At the restoration he was permitted by an act of parliament to work and improve the lead mines of Mendip in Somersetshire. He died 1674, aged 80.

BUSSY, Roger Rabutin, count of, a French writer, born, 3d April, 1618, in Normandy. He devoted himself to a military life for some time, and rose to high rank, but his publication of les amours des Gaules proved so offensive on account of the liberty which he took with the character of the French ladies, that he was deprived of all his honors, and thrust into the Bastille, 1665. The following year he was liberated, but on condition of living in exile on his estate in Burgundy. As a writer he is eminent for his wit, the fire and elegance of his diction, and the interesting manner of his narratives. He died 1693.

BUTE, John Stuart, Earl of, of an ancient Scotch family, was born early in the eighteenth century, and, in 1738, was appointed one of the lords of the bed-chamber to Frederic, prince of Wales, the father of George III. He possessed the entire confidence of the princess of Wales, and is said to have exercised a prejudicial influence in the political education of the future sovereign, of whom, however, he became a favorite. On his accession, George III. made him groom of the stole, and one of the privy council, and, in 1761, appointed him one of the secretaries of state, in the room of Lord Holderness. In the following year, Bute became first lord of the treasury. Under his auspices, a treaty, which disappointed the hopes of the nation, was concluded with France and Spain. He, soon after, apparently retired from public business; but he is believed to have long influenced the measures of the monarch. He died in 1792. In his private life, Bute was an amiable and worthy man, and a lover of science. To botany he was particularly partial, and had an extensive knowledge of it.

BUTLER, Samuel, the poet, was born at Strensham in Worcestershire. After being educated at Worcester grammar-school, his father, who was a farmer, sent him to Cambridge, where, however, he never was matriculated, and after staying six or seven years there, he became the clerk of Mr. Jefferys a justice of the peace. In this employment he devoted himself to poetry and other literary pursuits, as well as to music and painting. Afterwards he was in the family of the countess of Kent, where he not only had access to a valuable library, but familiarly conversed with the great Selden, whose amanuensis he occasionally was. For some time after he was in Bedfordshire in the house of sir Samuel Luke, one of Cromwell's officers. In this situation no doubt he planned, if he did not write, his Hudibras, as the knight was intended for the hero of the poem. Upon the restoration he became secretary to lord Carbery, by whom he was appointed steward of Ludlow castle. In 1663 Butler appeared in a new character, by the publication of the first part of his Hudibras in three cantos, and the merit of the poem was no sooner known at court by the influence of the earl of Dorset, than the king, and the whole of the royalist party received it with enthusiastic applause. The next year the second part was published, and a third in 1678; but the golden dreams of the poet were disappointed; and though the nation expected it, and the merit of the poem had the strongest claim to royal patronage and public remuneration, yet Butler sunk in want and obscurity. Butler who did more by the sarcastic powers of his muse, to expose to ridicule the fanatical supporters of republicanism, than all the courtiers who shared the smiles of Charles, refused to write more for the amusement of an ungrateful nation, the author was unrewarded, and the poem remained unfinished. Butler soon after died 25th Sept. 1680.

BUTLER, Joseph, an eminent prelate and theological writer, was born, in 1692, at Wantage, in Berkshire, and was originally a dissenter, but conformed to the church, and studied at Oriel College, Oxford. He was successively preacher at the Rolls College, rector of Houghton and of Stanhope, a prebend of Rochester, and clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline. In 1736, he published his celebrated Analogy of Religion; in 1738, he was made bishop of Bristol; and in 1750 bishop of Durham. He died in 1752. Besides the Analogy, he printed a volume of Sermons, and a Charge to his Clergy, on the subject of external religion.

BUTLER, James, duke of Ormond, an able statesman, born 19th October, 1610, at Clerkenwell, London. He succeeded his grandfather as earl in 1632, and early distinguished himself against the rebels of Ireland, for which services he was created a marquis. During the civil wars he was lieutenant of Ireland; but upon the invasion of the island by Cromwell, he retired to France, where he was honorably received by the French nobility, and afterwards employed by Charles II. in various negotiations with the royalists in England. On the restoration, to which he had so much contributed by his counsels and his abilities, he was, with other honorable appointments, created a duke, and nominated viceroy of Ireland. In this office he, by his vigilance, prevented Blood from seizing his person and the castle of Dublin; and some years after he again with difficulty escaped, by the interference of his servants, from the violence of the same assassin, who dragged him from his coach in St. James's street, with the intention of hanging him at Tyburn. The duke died 21st July, 1688, in his 78th year.

BUTLER, Thomas, earl of Ossory, son of the preceding, was born at Kilkenny 9th July, 1634. He was confined in the tower for eight months by Cromwell; and upon his liberation he went over to Flanders. He accompanied Charles on his restoration, and was made a lieutenant-general in Ireland, and in 1666 raised to the honor of an English peerage, as lord Butler of Moor-park. He served as a volunteer against the Dutch, and shared the glories of lord Albemarle's victory, and further contributed to the honor of his country in the engagement off Southwold bay. In consequence of these services he was promoted in the navy, and in 1673 was made admiral of the whole fleet, in the absence of prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English in the service of the prince of Orange, and at the battle of Mons he gathered fresh laurels against the French. In the senate he vindicated his father so ably against lord Shaftsbury, that the veteran orator was confounded and abashed at the exertion of his powers. He died 30th July, 1680, aged 46.

BUTLER, Alban, a Roman catholic, born at London, and educated at Doway. He was director of the English college at St. Omer's, and wrote the lives of the fathers, saints, and martyrs, in English, with valuable notes. He died 1732.

BUTLER, Pierce, a senator, was of the family of the dukes of Ormund in Ireland. Before the revolution he was a major in a British regiment in Boston. He afterwards attached himself to the republican institutions of America. In 1787 he was a delegate from South Carolina to congress; in 1788 a member of the convention, which framed the constitution of the United States. Under the constitution he was one of the first senators from S. C. He died 1822, aged 77.

BUTT, George, D. D., an English divine, born at Lichfield, 26th December, 1741. In 1765 he took orders, and in 1787 he obtained the valuable vicarage of Kidderminster. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke in June 1795, and yielded with serenity and composure to a gradual decay, which proved fatal the 30th Sept. following. Dr. Butt was distinguished as a preacher, ardent yet meek, pathetic yet unaffected, directing all the powers of his eloquence with the pure spirit of devotion, and the mild graces of benevolence and christian charity. As a poet, he possessed originality, force, and sublimity, and what the muse inspired was expressed with all the fire and energy of true genius. He published a volume of sermons, and in 1784 he dedicated to the king his versification of Isaiah, and in 1793 he collected and published his poems, in 2 vols. 8vo.

BUXTON, Jedediah, an extraordinary calculator, born at Elmeton, near Chesterfield, in Derbyshire. Though the son of a schoolmaster, and the grandson of a clergyman, he was shamefully neglected, and knew neither to write nor read. His powers of meditation, and his command of thought, were so astonishing, that, in the midst of the greatest multitudes and the most confused noises, he would reply with quickness and accuracy to the most difficult questions. He was accidentally asked by a stranger how many cubical eighths of an inch there were in a body, whose three sides were 23, 145,789 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards; and though surrounded by a hundred laborers, he proceeded to the intricate calculation, and, in five hours, gave a correct answer to the astonished inquirer. Other instances are mentioned of his powerfully retentive memory; and it is said, that, by walking, he could measure any piece of land with as much exactness as if he had marked it with a chain. He died at the age of 70, about the year 1774.

BUXTORFF, John, a learned Hebrean, born at Camen in Westphalia, professor at Basil, where he died of the plague 1629, aged 65. He displayed his extensive knowledge of rabbinical learning as the author of some valuable books, especially an Hebrew grammar—a lexicon Chaldaicum talmudicum and rabbinicum, 1639, folio—a Hebrew bible—synagoga Judaica, or the religious ceremonies of the Jews—a small Hebrew and Chaldaic lexicon, 12mo.—institutio epistolaris Judaica—a rabbinical commentary—thesaurus linguae, Hebraicae, 2 vols. 8vo.

BUXTORFF, John, son and successor to the preceding, was born at Basil, where he died in 1664, aged 65. He translated the moreh nevochim of Maimonides—the book called Cosri—a valuable Hebrew concordance—a defence of the points and vowels of the Hebrew text against Louis Capellus—anticritica, likewise against Capellus—besides some dissertations on Jewish history and literature. Like his father, he gained the esteem and veneration of the learned for his extensive erudition. Both indeed received, as they merited, the most flattering marks of respect from Gerard Vossius, Joseph Scaliger, and Isaac Casaubon.

BUZOT, Francis Nicholas Leonard, one of the heroes of the French revolution, was born at Evreux, March 1760. He was member of the national assembly and of the convention, where he was sur-named the evil prophet, because he constantly inveighed against pretended plots, and suspected machinations. Regardless of the cries of faction, he had the courage to attack the Orleans party, and particularly Danton and Robespierre, in consequence of which his destruction was decreed. He was proscribed 31st May, 1793, but escaped, and wandered poor, wretched, and destitute in the department of Calvados, where he was at last found dead by the side of his friend Pethion. Some have attributed his death to assassination, and others to suicide. His enemies, the Jacobins, to render him more odious, called him king Buzot.

BYFIELD, Nathaniel, judge of the vice admiralty, and member of the council of Massachusetts. He arrived at Boston in the year 1674. He was one of the four proprietors, and the principal settler of the town of Bristol in Rhode Island. He lived in this place till the year 1724, when on account of his advanced age he returned to Boston, where he died 1733, aged 79. He held a variety of offices both civil and military.

BYLES, Mather, D. D., minister of Boston. He graduated at Harvard college in 1725, and was ordained the first pastor of the church in Hollis street, 1733. It was not long before he attained considerable eminence in his profession, and he became known by his publication of several pieces in prose and verse. He continued to live happily with his parish until the revolution began. Falling under the imputation of being a tory, he was in 1776 separated from his people, by the jealousy and violence of the times, and he was never afterwards reunited to them. In May, 1777, he was denounced in town meeting as a person inimical to America, and he was obliged to enter into bonds for his appearance at court the June following. He was pronounced guilty, and sentenced to confinement on board a guard ship, and in forty days to be sent with his family to England. The sentence was afterwards altered to confinement in his own house with a guard placed over him. This was accordingly done for a few weeks, and then the guard was removed. A short time afterwards, a guard was again placed over him, and again dismissed. Upon this occasion he observed, in his own manner, that he was guarded, regarded, and disregarded. He died 1788, aged 82. He published a number of essays in the New England weekly journal, which are marked by one of the letters composing the word Celoiza; a poem on the death of George I., and the accession of George II., 1727; a poetical epistle to governor Belcher, on the death of his lady, 1736. A number of his miscellaneous poems were collected and printed in a volume in 1744. He also published numerous sermons.

BYNG, George, lord Torrington, was born 1663, and at the early age of 18 engaged in the naval service of his country. He gradually rose by merit, and in 1704, with the rank of rear admiral of the red, he greatly contributed to the capture of Gibraltar, under sir Cloudesley Shovel. For his services at the battle of Malaga he was knighted, and after bravely protecting the borders of Scotland against the pretender, and maintaining the honor of his country in the Baltic, he was in 1718 appointed commander in chief of the fleet in the Mediterranean, where he bravely protected the coasts of Italy against the invasion of the Spanish arms, and defeated some of their formidable armaments. His merits were gratefully acknowledged by the queen of Denmark, and by the emperor Charles VI. who complimented him on his valor, and presented him with his picture set in diamonds. He died in 1733.

BYNG, John, son of the above, served in the glorious expedition of his father, and by his merits, as well as the influence of his name, was raised to the rank of admiral. His attempts to relieve Fort St. Philip in Minorca, when blockaded by a French fleet under la Galissoniere, proved abortive, and his hesitation in engaging the enemy, when a bold attack might have perhaps gained him the victory, drew the clamors of the nation against him. The ministry, who wished to avert the public odium from their unsuccessful measures, beheld with seeming satisfaction the unpopularity of the admiral, and when he was condemned by a court-martial, they suffered him, though recommended to mercy, to be sacrificed to the general indignation, and he was shot at Portsmouth 14th March, 1757, meeting his death with calm resignation.

BYRD, William, colonel, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, was a member of the council about 1682. When, in 1699, about 300 of the persecuted French protestants arrived in the colony, he received them with the affection of a father, and gave them the most liberal assistance. His generous charity to the poor foreigners is particularly described by Beverly. He had received a liberal education in England, and was distinguished for his literary taste, and his patronage of science. He had one of the largest libraries on the continent. In 1723 he was one of the commissioners for establishing the line between North Carolina and Virginia. He died about 1743, at an advanced age.

BYROM, John, a poet, was born at Kersal near Manchester, and after being educated at the Charterhouse, he entered at Trinity-college, Cambridge. His talents for poetry were displayed while in the university, by the publication of his beautiful pastoral of Colin to Phœbe, which appeared in the first volume of the Spectator, as well as two ingenious essays on dreams. He afterwards went to Montpellier for the recovery of his health, but an intimate acquaintance with the writings of Malebranche, Bourignon, and Behmen shook his religious principles and made him imbibe the tenets of wild and visionary enthusiasm. On his return to London he applied himself to physic, but with small success. On this account his little property was soon consumed, and to maintain himself he began to teach at Manchester a new method of short-hand writing, which he had invented at Cambridge, and he afterwards removed to London. His industry was rewarded, and he obtained a handsome competence. He died at Manchester 28th Sept, 1763, aged 72, leaving behind him the character of an inoffensive man, who, to considerable learning and poetical genius, united mild and amiable manners.

BYRON, George Gordon, Lord Byron, the son of Captain Byron, was born at Dover, January the 23d, 1788. The youthful Byron was of delicate health, in consequence of which his studies were often interrupted, and he was treated with an indulgence that, perhaps, went beyond the bounds of prudence. By the death of his great uncle, in 1798, he succeeded to the family title and estates, and became a ward of his relative, the earl of Carlisle, by whom he was placed at Harrow School. At the age of sixteen he was removed to Trinity College, Cambridge. In his nineteenth year he quitted the university, and took up his residence at the family seat of Newstead. It was during his residence at Newstead that he published his first work, with the title of Hours of Idleness. This volume gave undoubted indications of talent; but the Edinburgh Reviewers pounced upon it with a rabid violence that was thoroughly disgusting. They soon found, however, to their cost, that they had made a wrong selection of their victim. His lordship retorted upon them in English Bards and Scottish Reviewers, one of the most pungent satires of modern times, and thus rendered them objects of public laughter. On his coming of age, Byron took his seat in the house of peers; but in that house he never delivered more than three speeches. He was now engaged in a career of dissipation which was injurious alike to his fortune and to his health. Breaking, however, through the Circean snares that beset him, he proceeded on his travels, with his friend Mr. Hobhouse, and visited Spain, Portugal, and Greece; in which latter country, the land of his idolatry, he continued for a considerable time. In 1811 he returned to England, and, a few months afterwards, he gave to the world the first two cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, which at once placed him in the foremost rank of British poets. This work was rapidly succeeded by the Giaour; the Bride of Abydos; the Corsair; Lara; and an ode to Napoleon Bonaparte; all of which, with the exception of the latter, acquired unbounded popularity. Byron was, in fact, the poetical idol of the day. On the 2d of January, 1815, he married Miss Milbanke. This ill-starred union terminated in a final separation, after the birth of a daughter. After having given to the public his Hebrew Melodies; the Siege of Corinth; and Parasina; he quitted England, to which country he was destined never to return. For a while he lived on the borders of the Lake of Geneva, whence he removed to Italy, where he fixed himself, first at Venice, and subsequently at Pisa. During this period his mind was incessantly active; and, in rapid succession, he produced the last two cantos of Childe Harold; the dramas of Manfred, Marino Falieri, Sardanapalus, the Two Foscari, and Cain; the poems of the Prisoner of Chillon, Monody on Sheridan, the Lament of Tasso, the Prophecy of Dante, Mazeppa, Beppo, and Don Juan; and a large portion of a publication which bore the title of the liberal. Greece was now struggling for her freedom, and her struggles could not be viewed by Byron with indifference. Relinquishing the tranquillity of private life, he resolved to devote to her cause his fortune, his pen, and his sword. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1823, he joined the Greeks, and had already made himself venerated by his personal exertions and his generous pecuniary aid, when he was attacked by a fever, which terminated fatally on the 20th of April, 1824. He expired at Missolonghi, at the early age of thirty-seven, leaving behind him a name that will be as imperishable as language itself. His loss was mourned by the Greeks as that of a public benefactor, and almost regal honors were ordered by the provisional government, to be paid to his memory and his remains.

BYTHNER, Victorinus, a native of Poland, eminent for his knowledge of Hebrew. He came very young to Oxford, and read lectures in Hebrew, and afterwards removed to Cambridge and then into Cornwall, where he began to practise physic. His best known work is Lyra prophetica Davidis regis, five analysis criticopractica psalmodum, 4to. He died 1664.

BZOVIVS, Abraham, a learned Polander, educated first at Prosovitz, and afterwards at Cracow. He visited Italy, and gave lectures of Philosophy at Milan, and of divinity at Bologna, and as his writings tended to support the authorities of the ecclesiastical states, he was received with great distinction when he was introduced to the pope, and lodged in the vatican. He afterwards left this residence, being terrified by the murder of one of his servants, and retired to the convent of Minerva, where he died 1617, aged 70. His works are represented as so numerous that it would require some pages to enumerate them, but the chief are the Continuation of Baronius' annals of the church, in 9 vols. folio from the year 1118—and lives of the popes, 3 vols.—He was of the Dominican order, and was for some time principal of a college of Dominicans at Cracow. His attack on the emperor Lewis of Bavaria was severely resented by the duke of that house, and he was obliged not only to retract, but to submit to the imputation of a malevolent, feeble, injudicious, and illiberal historian.

D.

CAB, Ben Zohair, an Arabian poet, who died in the first year of the hegira. He is chiefly known as the opponent, and afterwards as the friend of Mahomet, whom he assisted in the propagation of his religion, and in the composition of the Koran.

CABANIS, Peter John George, a French physician and literary character, the son of an agriculturist of talent, was born at Conac, in 1757, and in early life visited Poland, where the political servility and corruption, which he witnessed on a great occasion, inspired him, as he tells us, with a precocious contempt of mankind, and a disposition to melancholy. This, however, did not prevent him from manifesting infinite kindness and benevolence in his subsequent career. On his return to his native country, he chose the medical profession, and attained high reputation. In politics he also bore a part. He was the bosom friend of Mirabeau, and sat in the council of five hundred, and in the senate of Napoleon. He died in 1807. His collected medical and other works have been published in seven octavo volumes.

CABASSOLE, Philip de, chancellor and chief minister of the queen of Sicily, was made a cardinal by Urban V. He died 1372, metropolitan of Constantinople, and author of a treatise on the life and miracles of Mary Magdalen, and de nugis curialium. He corresponded with the poet Petrarch.

CABASSUT, John, professor of the canon law at Avignon, was born at Aix, and died 1685, aged 81. He is author of juris canonici theoria & praxis, fol. 1638—notitia ecclesiarum, consiliorum, canonum veterumque ecclesiarum, 1670, in fol.

CABESTAN or CABESTAIN, William de, a provençal poet in the service of Tricline Carbonal, wife of Raymond de Scillans. He gained 30 much the affection of his mistress that the husband, jealous of the favour, murdered him, and dressed his heart, which he placed on the table before his guilty wife.—She ate of the horrid food, and when informed of it died of grief 1213.

CABOT, Sebastian, son of John Cabot, a Venetian, was born at Bristol 1467. Under the eye of his father he learnt mathematics and cosmography, and by accompanying him in several voyages he became, even before he was 20 years old, very eminent in the art of navigation. In 1497 he was engaged with his father by Henry VII. for the discovery of a north-west passage to India, and after touching at Prima Vista and St. John's island they sailed as far as Cape Florida before their return home. Succeeding voyages completed the discoveries thus begun; a settlement was made on the coast of Newfoundland, and Sebastian, by being the first among Europeans who touched the new continent, established a greater claim to give his name to those unknown regions than either Americus Vesputius or even Columbus himself.—The next exertions of Sebastian were under Henry VIII. to penetrate to the East Indies by the south, but the want of support on the part of sir Thomas Pert, vice-admiral of England, disappointed his hopes, and he returned home after penetrating only as far as the Brazils and visiting Hispaniola and Porto Rico. In 1524 Cabot was employed by the king of Spain, and in the character of chief pilot of Spain to sail to the Moluccas by the straits of Magellan, but the mutinous spirit of his crew checked his progress, and he stopped at Paraguay, from whence, after five years' residence, he returned to Europe, and though he exhibited the most flattering proofs of the fertility and opulence of the countries he had visited, he was treated with coldness by the court and by the mercantile companies, whose avaricious hope he had in vain endeavored to realize. Disgusted with the ingratitude of the Spaniards, Cabot returned and settled at Bristol, where his great merits soon recommended him to Edward VI. and Somerset the protector, and from his experience and great knowledge he was now consulted as an oracle on commercial affairs, and with a liberal pension he was appointed governor of the company of the merchant adventurers. In 1552 he planned a voyage for the discovery of the northern parts of the world, and to him therefore England owes her first mercantile connection with Russia, by the establishment of the Russia company, of which Cabot was honorably appointed governor for life by the charter of Philip and Mary. After a very active and most useful life, this worthy and patriotic man died aged about 70. It is remarked of him, that he first observed the variation of the needle. He published a map of the world, besides an account of his voyages in the southern parts of the world, printed Venice 1533, folio.

CABOT, George, a distinguished statesman, was born at Salem, Massachusetts, and employed the early part of his life in foreign commerce. Possessing a vigorous, inquisitive, and contemplative mind; he made his voyages to other countries the means of gaining varied and extensive knowledge, particularly of obtaining correct and enlarged views of human nature and society. Before he was 26 years old, he was elected a member of the provincial congress of Massachusetts, which met to establish a maximum in the prices of provisions, and displayed his good sense by opposing that measure, and advocating those correct principles of political economy, for the profound knowledge and able support of which he afterwards became distinguished. He was a member of the convention of Massachusetts, which formed the constitution of that state, and also of that which ratified the constitution of the United States, to promote which, he made the most strenuous exertions. In 1790, he was elected to a seat in the senate of the United States, and was one of the most distinguished members of that body, and one of the confidential friends of Washington and Hamilton, to the latter of whom he rendered the most important assistance in forming his financial system. In 1803, he became a member of the council of Massachusetts, and in 1814, was appointed a delegate to the convention which met at Hartford, and was chosen president of that body. He after that period retired from public life, and died at Boston, April 18th, 1823, aged 72. He possessed a mind of great force and penetration, was a sagacious statesman, and excelled particularly in the science of political economy, was a vigorous and persuasive speaker, and was greatly distinguished for the simplicity of his manners, the disinterestedness of his patriotism, and his uprightness, amiability and benevolence.

CABRAL, or CABRERA, Pedro Alvares, a Portuguese, sent in 1500 by king Emanuel with a fleet to the East Indies. A storm drove him on the coast of Brazil, where he called the place where he landed Santa Cruz, and he afterwards reached his destination, and compelled the chief of Calicut to submit to his arms. He returned to Europe in 1501, loaded with the treasures and curiosities of the east. An account of his voyage was published in a collection by Ramusio, Venice.

CACAULT, Francis, a French diplomatist and literary character, was born at Nantz, in 1742, and became mathematical professor of the military school; after which he travelled in Italy for six years, whence he returned in 1775. In 1785, he was appointed secretary of embassy at Naples, and he subsequently was ambassador at Rome and Genoa. He signed the treaty of Tolentino, and opened the negotiation for the Concordat. In France, he was thrice one of the representatives of the people. He died a senator in 1805. Cacaull translated the Lyric Poems of Ramler, and the Dramaturgia of Lessing.

CADALSO, Jose, one of the late writers of Spain, was born of a noble family, at Cadiz, in 1741. He was educated in Paris, where he obtained an acquaintance with the principal languages of modern Europe, and afterwards travelled through England, France, Portugal, Germany and Italy. At the age of 20 he returned home and joined the army, where he remained till his death, attentive to his military duties, though devoted to literature. He was killed at the siege of Gibraltar in 1782. He is the author of Cartas Marruecas, a series of letters possessing much merit; a satire called Eruditos á la Violeta; a tragedy; and several poetical pieces under the title of Ocios de mi Juventud.

CADAMOSTO, Lewis, a famous Venetian navigator, born 1422. He was engaged in the service of Henry of Portugal, and in 1455 he proceeded to Madeira, and visited the Canaries and the coast of Africa as far as the mouth of the Gambia. The following year he prosecuted his discoveries as far as the river St. Dominic, and on his return to Portugal he was received with great honor, and during his residence at Lagos treated with every mark of respect and gratitude by the inhabitants. He returned to Venice, where he died 1464, and an account of his voyages was afterwards published and translated into French by Redoner in the 16th century.

CADET DE GASSICOURT, Charles Louis, (brother of Cadet de Vaux), was born at Paris, in 1769, and, after the death of his father in 1799, quitted the bar to devote himself to chemistry and philosophy. He died in 1821. His works, in various departments, are numerous and meritorious. Among others may be mentioned his Dictionary of Chemistry, in 4 vols; Travels in Austria, Moravia, and Bavaria; Letters on London and the English Nation; Travels in Normandy, and the Supper of Moliere. He likewise was a liberal contributor to all the scientific journals.

CADMUS, the founder of Thebes, came to Europe about 1493 B. C. and introduced the knowledge and the use of the alphabet.

CADOGAN, William Bromley, second son of lord Cadogan by Frances daughter of lord Montfort. From Westminster, where his abilities were rewarded with several prizes, he went to Christ church, Oxford, and afterwards was presented to the livings of St. Giles' Reading, and St. Luke's Chelsea. In the discharge of his religious and ecclesiastical duties, he was indefatigably zealous and ardent, and inclined strongly to the tenets of the methodists, though he retained the forms of the church of England. Some of his sermons have been published. He died 18th January 1797, aged 46, and his parishioners at Reading, in respect to his memory, all put on mourning.

CADWALADYR, king of Britain in 660, had the misfortune to see his kingdom overrun by the Saxons, and its independence destroyed. He died at Rome 703, and was the last king of the Britons. He is called one of the three blessed kings, for his benevolence in the relief of the christians.

CADWALLADER, Thomas, M.D., a physician of Philadelphia. He completed his medical education in Europe. From 1752 to his death he was one of the physicians of the Pennsylvania Hospital. His dissections for Dr. Shippen were among the earliest made in this country. He died 1779, aged 72. He published an essay on the liac passion, entitled, an essay on the West India Dry Gripes 1745, in which he recommended the use of opiates and mild cathartics, instead of quicksilver, then employed. This was one of the earliest American medical treatises.

CADWALLADER, John, was appointed by the American Congress a brigadier general in the army, in February, 1777. He was a man of inflexible patriotism and undoubted bravery. He fought a duel with general Conway, in consequence of the intrigue in which Conway was engaged for placing Gates at the head of the army. After the war, he was a member of the Assembly of Maryland, and died February 10th, 1786.

CADWALLON, son of Cadwan, was prince of North Wales, and fled to Ireland, on being defeated by Edwin of England 620. On his return he took the name of king, and was engaged in perpetual war with the Saxons. His memory has been highly honored by the bards, whom he patronised.

CÆSAR, C. Jul. a Roman general, famous for his learning, his intrigues, his ambition, his valor, his military successes, and his tragical death. He conquered Gaul, and was the first Roman who invaded Britain, which he twice reduced to apparent submission. His arms were equally successful in Africa, in Egypt, and in Asia, and divided the world with two other triumvirs, after whose death he grasped at the sovereign power of Rome under the title of emperor. His ambitious views were defeated by the jealousy of his enemies as well as of his friends, and he was stabbed in the senate-house B. C. 43, in the 56th year of his age.

CÆSAR, Julius, a learned civilian, born at Tottenham 1557, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He took the degree of doctor of the civil law at Paris 1581, and four years after became doctor of the canon law at Oxford. He was master of the court of requests under Elizabeth, judge of the admiralty, and master of St. Catherine's near the Tower, and under James I. he was knighted, and appointed chancellor of the exchequer, an office which he resigned on succeeding to the mastership of the rolls 1614. He was a man of great learning and integrity, charitable and benevolent. He died 28th April, 1636, and was buried in Great St. Helen's church, Bishopsgate, London. His manuscripts, which were very valuable, were sold by Patterson, the auctioneer in 1757, for more than 300*l.*, and they now adorn the marquis of Landsdown's library.

CÆSARALPINUS, Andreas, a philosopher of Arezzo, physician to pope Clement VIII. He was a man of great erudition, and from some passages in his writings it has been conjectured that he was acquainted with the circulation of the blood. He was also well skilled in botany, but the regular distribution which he makes of plants was not adopted till 100 years after, by Robert Morison, professor of botany at Oxford. He published a treatise de plantis, and questiones peripateticæ, and died at Rome 23d February 1603, aged 54.

CAGLIARI, or CALIARI, Paul, a celebrated painter, generally known by the name of Paul Veronese, was born at Verona, in 1532, and was instructed in painting by his uncle Badile. Having accompanied an embassy to Rome, he profited from studying the works of Michael Angelo and Raphael. His pictures are numerous, and in high estimation. The Marriage of Cana is the finest of them. Cagliari excels in coloring and composition; but is defective in drawing and costume. He died at Venice, in 1588. His sons, Carletto and Gabriel, and his brother Benedict, were all painters.

CAGLIOSTRO, Count Alexander, an adventurer, whose real name is said to have been Joseph Balsamo, was born at Palermo, in 1743. Under various names, and ostensibly in the character of a chemist and physician, but, as some affirm, really in that of a swindler, he wandered through Greece, Egypt, Arabia, Persia, and other countries. In 1780, he visited France, where he lived in a style of great splendor, and was much admired for his medical skill, and his liberality. He was, however, involved with the cardinal de Rohan, in the mysterious affair of the diamond necklace, and confined in the Bastille; but was finally pronounced innocent. He was tried at Rome, in 1789, as being guilty of freemasonry, and he died, in 1795, a prisoner in the castle of Saint Angelo.

CAIET, Peter Victor Palma, a native of Mont-richard in Touraine, who from a calvinist became a catholic, and died 1610, aged 85, doctor of the Sorbonne, and Hebrew professor in the royal college. He was so respected for his learning, that he was highly favored by Catharine of Bourbon, and Henry IV. admitted him to court, notwithstanding the slovenly appearance of his dress. He was for some time foolishly employed, as many of the learned men of the times, in searching for the philosopher's stone, and he was severely attacked by the calvinists, whose tenets he had abjured. Most of his works are controversial, but his chronologie septennaire in 8vo. from the peace of Vervins 1598 to 1604, and his chronologie novennaire, from 1589 to 1598, in three vols, are valuable and interesting compositions.

CAIETAN, a cardinal, born at Caieta in the kingdom of Naples, 1469. His proper name was Thomas de Vio. He was of the order of the Dominicans, and displayed his great talents as professor of philosophy and divinity at Paris and Rome, till his book in support of the power of the pope, raised him to the rank of cardinal and to the archiepiscopal see of Palermo. He was employed by the pope in several important negotiations, but especially in opposing the doctrines of Luther, which he found it impossible either to silence or check. He died 1534, aged 65. He was a man of great learning as a logician, and philosopher and divine. Besides some commentaries on Aristotle's philosophy, and Thomas Aquinas' theology, he published a literal translation of the greatest part of the books of the old and new testaments, which his death prevented him from completing. He has been attacked by cardinal Pallavicini for his translation, but he has been ably defended by father Simon.

CAILLER, Nicholas Lewis de la, a French mathematician and astronomer, born at Rumigny, 1714, and educated at the college of Lisieux at Paris. He became the friend and disciple of Cassini, and with de Thury projected the meridian line, which extended from the observatory to the extremities of France. In 1739 he was named professor of mathematics of the college of Mazarine, and for his great knowledge was elected honorary member of most of the learned academies of Europe. In 1750 he went under the royal patronage to the Cape of Good Hope, to see the stars of the southern hemisphere, of 10,000 of which in the course of two years he determined the exact position. The whole of his time was usefully employed in the service of astronomy, mathematics, and navigation, but unfortunately a malignant fever terminated his labors in 1762, in his 48th year. He possesses the great character of clearness, accuracy, and precision. His works contain several volumes in 4to. and 8vo. besides detached papers in the collection of the academy.

CAIUS or KAYES, Dr. John, a physician, born at Norwich, 6th October, 1510, educated at Norwich-school and Gonvil-hall, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, 1533. To improve himself he visited France, Flanders, and Germany, and after studying at Padua under Montanus, he took his degree of M. D. 1541, and three years after returned to England. His great knowledge of medicine rendered him popular, he became physician to Edward VI. and to his two sisters, till a suspicion of favoring the catholics discarded him from royal patronage, 1568. He died at Cambridge, 1573, and by the munificent donation of some estates, he erected his hall into a college, now called Gonvil and Caius college. His monument is in the chapel with these two words, "Fui Caius." He wrote the history of Cambridge, and some other learned works.

CALAMY, Edmund, a celebrated non-conformist divine, was born at London, in 1600, and studied at Cambridge. Having embraced presbyterianism, he took an active part in the religious disputes of the age, and was one of the authors of the treatise which bore the title of Smectymnus, and was directed against episcopacy. He was a member of the assembly of divines at Westminster; but he strenuously opposed the trial of the king, and the usurpation of Cromwell, and had a share in effecting the restoration of Charles the Second. The restored monarch offered him the bishopric of Lichfield, but he refused it, and he was subsequently expelled from his living by the act of uniformity. Such was his grief in consequence of the fire of London, that he is said to have died of it, in 1666. He produced many sermons and controversial writings.

CALAMY, Benjamin, D. D., son of the preceding, from St. Paul's school entered at Catharine hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and tutor. He was made minister of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1677. In 1683 he published a sermon which he had preached in his parish church, for which he was severely attacked by Delaune, a warm non-conformist, whom, for his virulence, government seized and sent to Newgate. Dr. Calamy interfered with Jeffries the chancellor for the unhappy libeller; but all applications were unavailing, and Delaune, fined a sum which he could not discharge, died a victim to the oppressive measures of the times, and his wife and children shared the same fate in the same confinement. After the resignation of St. Mary Aldermanbury, Dr. Calamy succeeded to other more valuable livings, and the prebend of Harleston, in the cathedral of St. Paul; but his happiness was interrupted by the severe sufferings of his friend alderman Cornish, who was tried and executed for high treason. The repeated applications of friendship for mercy, could not influence the inexorable Jeffries; and the execution of Cornish, it is said, broke the heart of his surviving friend, who died in January 1686. He published seven sermons in his lifetime, and thirteen more were given to the world after his death.

CALAMY, Edmund, an eminent divine among the non-conformists. He was grandson to Edmund Calamy, by his son Edmund, and was born 5th April, 1671. He abridged Baxter's history of his life and times, and afterwards, in future editions, continued the work by a copious account of such ministers as were ejected for their religious opinions after the restoration to the time of queen Anne. The book was attacked by Hoadly, afterwards bishop of Winchester, and a controversy between the two opponents, which continued for some time, and produced on both sides replies full of much learning, not however without the bitterness of party zeal. In 1709, Calamy was honored, on his visit to Scotland, with the degree of D. D. by the three universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. He published, in 1718, a vindication of his grandfather and others against the reflections of Echard in his history of England. Calamy died 3d June, 1732. His writings were mostly controversial, besides 2 vols. of sermons, and 4 of Baxter's history. He was twice married, and was the father of thirteen children.

CALAS, John, an unfortunate merchant of Toulouse, of the protestant religion. When his son, Mark Anthony, who had embraced the tenets of the catholics, had, in a moment of gloomy melancholy, committed suicide, the father was seized by the suspicious government as guilty of the murder. No proof could be brought against him, but the jealousy entertained against his religion; and though the improbability of a father, an old man of the age of 65, murdering his own son, a robust young man aged 29, and in a house where his family were then resident, was self-evident, yet he was condemned, and broke on the wheel, 9th March, 1762. This treatment was reported to the French king by the agonizing widow and her family; but the wishes of the monarch were frustrated by the jealousy of ministers, who thought that they granted too much to the protestants if they allowed the reversal of the bloody sentence of the tribunal of Toulouse.

CALASIO, Marius, a Franciscan friar, was born at Calasio, near Aquila, in the Neapolitan territory, about 1550. He died in 1620, just as he was on the point of publishing his Concordance of the Bible, in four folio volumes; an excellent work, which forms a complete Hebrew Lexicon, and on which he had spent forty years of incessant labor. Hebrew was as familiar to Calasio as his native language. His Concordance appeared in 1621, and was republished by Romaine, in 1747.

CALCAR, John de, was born in the duchy of Cleves, and died young, at Naples, 1546. He was very eminent as a painter, and took for his models the finished pieces of his master Titian, and of Raphael. His nativity was so admired by Rubens, that he never would part with it. To Calcar we owe the anatomical figures of the book of Vesal, and the portraits of painters.

CALDERINI, Domizzio, a native of Toris, in the Veronese territory. He was professor of belles lettres at Rome, where he died 1478, aged 32, and so sincerely regretted that his scholars attended his funeral in deep mourning. He published a translation of Pausanias' two first books into Latin, besides some commentaries on the Latin poets, and some original poetry.

CALDERONI DE LA BARCA, don Pedro, a Spanish poet, who from a soldier became an ecclesiastic, and canon of Toledo. His dramatical pieces were published, 9 vols. 4to. 1689, Madrid. They possess all the extravagances of Shakspeare's muse, with occasional sublime and pathetic passages, but all throughout devoid of correctness and regularity. He flourished 1640.

CALDERWOOD, David, a Scotch divine. He applied himself with uncommon diligence to the study of divinity and of the writings of the fathers, and became an active, zealous, and determined opposer of episcopacy in Scotland. He strenuously opposed the plan of James VI. to establish conformity between the English and Scotch churches; for which he was banished. Retiring to Holland, he published, in 1625, his work entitled Altare Damascenum; a severe attack on episcopacy. He returned to Scotland; contributed greatly to the establishment of presbyterianism; and died in 1651. Calderwood left a voluminous History of Scotland, of which only a portion has been printed.

CALDWALL, Richard, a physician, born in Staffordshire about 1543, and educated at Brazenose, of which he became fellow. He was so eminent in the knowledge and practice of medicine, that he was elected censor, and afterwards president of the college of physicians, where he founded a surgical lecture with a handsome salary. He wrote, according to Wood, several treatises on physic, besides a translation of the table of surgery by Horatio More of Florence. He died 1585.

CALED, or KHALED, one of Mahomet's friends, called from his courage the sword of God. In the spreading the doctrines of the koran, and the dominion of the prophet, he committed atrocious cruelties, and even put to death the garrison of Damascus after he had granted them their liberty. He was cut off by the plague 639.

CALEPINO, or DA CALEPIO, Ambrose, a noble native of Bergamo, who entered among the Augustines. His vocabulary of the Latin tongue first appeared 1503, and with such celebrity, that it has been often reprinted and improved, and enlarged to 2 vols. fol. 1681. He died blind, 1511.

CALIGULA, Caius Cæsar, a Roman emperor, son of Germanicus and Agrippina. He succeeded Tiberius A.D. 37, and after the promising virtues of a happy reign displayed the most ferocious and dissipated character, till the conspiracy of Chærea cut him off, A.D. 41, in his 29th year.

CALIXTUS, George, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1586, at Medelbui, in Holstein; became professor of divinity at Helmstadt; and bore a prominent part in the conference at Thorn, which was convoked in 1645. Calixtus strove, with all his eloquence and zeal, to bring about a union between the Lutherans and the other protestant sects; but his well intended efforts were repaid only by reproach and calumny from all parties. The few who espoused his opinions were called Sybcretists and Calixtins; and, as well as their leader, were considered as little if at all better than heretics. Bossuet, however, denominates him "the most able Lutheran of our times, and the one who has written the most learnedly against us." Calixtus died in 1656. His theological works are numerous.

CALLARD, John Baptiste, professor of medicine in the university of Caen, where he died 1718. He established a botanical garden there. His great work is, lexicon medicum etymologicum, 1693, 12mo. of which he was preparing an improved folio edition when he died.

CALLCOTT, John Wall, Doctor of Music, was born at Kensington in 1766. He was intended for the medical profession; but, having been disgusted by witnessing an operation, he turned his attention to music. At the same time he acquired a considerable knowledge of classical and oriental literature. He assisted Dr. Arnold in forming the Glee Club; in which club, and in the Noblemen's Catch Club, of which he was an honorary member, he obtained numerous prizes. He died in 1826, after having long been in a melancholy state of intellect. He is the author of a Musical Grammar. The most celebrated of his admirable catches, glees, and canons have been published, in two volumes, by his son in law Mr. Horsley.

CALENDER, John, a baptist minister of Newport, R. I. He was the nephew of Elisha Callender, minister of the first baptist church in Boston. Both graduated at Harvard University; the one in 1710, and the other in 1723. John Callender died Jan. 26, 1748, aged 41 years. He was at that time distinguished as a preacher and a writer. His publications were an ordination sermon, a funeral sermon, and a sermon on the history of Rhode Island. The latter is spoken of as particularly creditable to the author.

CALLIERES, Francis de, an eminent statesman, born at Torigui, near Bayeux. He was engaged in several embassies under Louis XIV. and was honorably rewarded for his services. He published some poetical tracts, and died 1717, aged 72.

CALLIERES, Chevalier de, governor of Canada, was appointed governor of Montreal in 1684. He enclosed the town with palisades. In 1689 he went to France to suggest the project of the conquest of New York. In the enterprise he was to have been commander in chief; but it failed. After the death of count de Frontenac in 1698, he acted as governor till his appointment in 1699. He died 1703.

CALLIMACHUS, an architect, inventor of the Corinthian capital, from seeing an acanthus spreading its branches most gracefully over the monument of a Corinthian lady, B. C. 540.

CALLISTHENES, a philosopher, who attended Alexander in his Asiatic expedition, and was cruelly mangled by him on suspicion of a conspiracy. He took poison given him by Lysinachus, and thus put an end to his misery, B. C. 328.

CALLOT, James, a famous engraver, born at Nancy, 1593, of a noble family. His desire to see the capital of Italy, and her valuable monuments, tempted him twice to elope from his family, at the age of 12, and two years after, when at last permitted by his father to reside at Rome, he applied himself with such assiduity to the arts of designing and engraving, that he soon became celebrated for the boldness, beauty, and execution of his pieces. He was for some time at Florence under the patronage of the great duke, after whose death he resided at the court of Lorraine, and in 1628 visited France, where the munificence of Louis XIII., invited him to design and engrave the siege of Rochelle and the isle of Rhe. When Nancy was reduced by the arms of France, Callot refused to employ his pencil to perpetuate the misfortune of his country, and Louis, who admired his superior abilities, respected a patriotic reluctance, which neither bribes nor promises could conquer. He died 28th March, 1636, aged 34.

CALMET, Augustin, a learned Frenchman of the order of the Benedictines, made abbot of St. Lepold de Nanci, and afterwards of Senones, where he died 1757, aged 85. He was well acquainted with the oriental languages, and he published several learned works, which at the desire of his friends appeared in French rather than Latin. He wrote a commentary on the books of the old and new testament, 22 vols. 4to.—dissertations on the commentaries, 3 vols. 4to.—history of the old and new testament, 4 vols. 4to.—historical and critical dictionary of the bible,—universal history, sacred and profane, 15 vols. 4to. of which only eight were printed,—ecclesiastical and civil history of Lorraine, 3 vols. fol.

CALONNE, Charles Alexander de, an illustrious French statesman, born at Douay 1734, of noble parents. He was educated at Paris and intended for the bar, but afterwards he was made solicitor general to the parliament of his native town, master of requests, intendant of Metz, and in 1783 he succeeded Necker as comptroller general of the finances. This last office required great abilities and undaunted firmness, and the new minister possessed them; and though when he came into power he found an empty treasury, and the nation discontented with the extravagance of the court, he adopted such vigorous measures as restored credit to the state, and rendered the expenditure subservient to the resources of the country. To carry his schemes of reform and to exonerate the people of some burdens, by suppressing some of the abusive privileges of the higher orders, he advised the king to convene the notables of the kingdom, whose authority and consent might give weight and importance to his measures. The plan was grand, and might have been happily productive of good in another age, but unfortunately the nobles and the clergy were alarmed at the thought of losing their privileges, and the minister, opposed by the great, and not ably supported by the timid monarch, yielded to the storm, and took refuge in England, where he composed his requete au roi, and his reponse a l'ecrit de M. Necker, which proved him to be a good scholar, an acute politician, and a loyal subject. At the end of the revolution he revisited his country, and died at Paris, 1802.

CALOVIVS, Abraham, a native of Morungen in Brunswick, divinity professor at Radstock, which he quitted for Dantzic, and afterwards for Wittemberg. He was a strong Lutheran, and opposed with great warmth the union of the protestant church, in consequence of which his followers were called Calovians. He wrote several controversial tracts, and died 1686, aged 74.

CALVERT, George, baron of Baltimore, founder of the province of Maryland, graduated at Oxford 1597. In 1619 he was appointed one of the principal secretaries of state. In 1624 he became a Roman catholic, and resigned his office. He was continued, however, a member of the privy council, and was created baron of Baltimore in the kingdom of Ireland in 1625. While he was secretary of state he was constituted by patent proprietor of the south-eastern peninsula of Newfoundland, which he named the province of Avalon. He spent 25,000 pounds in advancing his plantation and visited it twice; but it was so annoyed by the French, that though he once repulsed, and pursued their ships and took sixty prisoners, he was obliged to abandon it. Being still inclined to form a settlement in America, whither he might retire with his family and friends of the same religious principles, he made a visit to Virginia, the fertility and advantages of which province had been highly celebrated, and in which he had been interested as one of the adventurers. But meeting with an unwelcome reception on account of his religion, and observing that the Virginians had not extended their plantations beyond the Potomac, he fixed his attention upon the territory northward of this river, and as soon as he returned to England, obtained a grant of it from Charles I. But owing to the tedious forms of public business, before a patent was completed he died, 1632, aged 50. After his death the patent was again drawn in the name of his eldest son, Cecil, who succeeded to his honors, and it passed the seals June 20, 1632. The country was called Maryland in honor of Henrietta Maria, the queen consort of Charles I.

CALVERT, Leonard, first governor of Maryland, was the brother of Cecilius Calvert, the proprietor, who sent him to America as the head of the colony in 1633. He arrived with his colony at point Comfort, in Virginia, 1634. On the third of March he proceeded in the bay of Chesapeake to the northward, and entered the Potomac, up which he sailed twelve leagues, and came to an anchor under an island, which he named St. Clement's. Here he fired his cannon, erected a cross, and took possession, "in the name of the Saviour of the world, and of the King of England." Having obtained an interview with the Werowance or prince, Calvert asked him whether he was willing, that a settlement should be made in his own country. He replied, "I will not bid you go, neither will I bid you stay; but you may use your own discretion." Having convinced the natives that his designs were honorable and pacific, the governor now sought a more suitable station for commencing his colony. He visited a creek on the northern side of the Potomac about four leagues from its mouth, where was an Indian village. Here he acquainted the prince of the place with his intentions, and by presents to him, and his principal men, conciliated his friendship so much, as to obtain permission to reside in one part of the town until the next harvest, when it was stipulated the natives should entirely quit the place. Thus the governor took peaceable possession of the country of Maryland, and gave to the town the name of St. Mary's, and to the creek on which it was situated the name of St. George. The province was established on the broad foundation of security of property and of freedom of religion. This liberal policy rendered a Roman catholic colony an asylum for those, who were driven from New England by the persecutions which were there experienced from protestants. The governor superintended the affairs of the country, till the civil war in England, when the name of a papist became so obnoxious, that the parliament assumed the government of the province, and appointed a new governor. On the restoration Cecilius Calvert recovered his right. Leonard Calvert died in 1676, far in years, and high in reputation.

CALVIN, John, a celebrated reformer, born at Noyon, in Picardy, 10th July, 1509. His family name was Cauvin, which he latinized into Calvinus.

He was first intended for the church, and, subsequently, for the profession of civil law. Having embraced the principles of protestantism, he was under the necessity of quitting France; and he settled at Basil, where he published his celebrated Institutions of the Christian Religion. After having visited Italy, he was returning by the way of Geneva, in 1536, when Farel and other reformers induced him to take up his abode in that city. He was chosen one of the ministers of the gospel, and professor of divinity. A dispute with the city authorities soon compelled him to leave Geneva, and he withdrew to Strasburg; whence he was recalled in 1541. From the time of his recall, he possessed almost absolute power at Geneva; and he exerted himself vigorously in establishing the presbyterian form of church government. The reformer, who so loudly exclaimed against the tyranny of Rome, directed the whole torrent of his persecution against Servetus, a physician, who had in an ambiguous style written upon the trinity; and his vengeance was not appeased till the unfortunate heretic had expired in the flames. He died May 26, 1564, and though he had long enjoyed a high reputation and exercised an unbounded authority, he left only 300 crowns to his heirs, including his library, the books of which sold afterwards at a great price. The works of Calvin were printed in 12 vols. fol. Geneva, and in nine Amsterdam, in 1667. He died in 1564.

CALVISIUS, Sethus, a learned German, born at Grosleb, in Thuringia in 1559. He distinguished himself as a learned and accurate chronologer. His elenchus calendarii a papâ Gregorio XIII. comprobati, was published in 1611; and in 1620, three years after his death, appeared his improved chronology; a work in which he has employed 20 long years of laborious study.

CAMBACERES, N., a native of Montpellier, whose eloquence as a preacher was much admired at court, and was at last rewarded by the archbishopric of Rouen. He died Nov. 6th, 1808, aged 80. His nephew was the second consul with Bonaparte, after the abolition of the directory.

CAMBACERES, John James Regis, one of those individuals whom the French revolution raised to high station, was born at Montpellier, in 1753, and brought up to the law; and, in 1791, was appointed president of the criminal tribunal of the department of the Herault. As a member of the convention, he gave a modified vote for the death of the king; bore a prominent part in all judicial questions in the committees; and, after the downfall of Robespierre, had for a while the management of foreign affairs. He was also a member of the council of five hundred. Subsequently he was minister of justice; and was next chosen by Bonaparte to be second consul. When Napoleon became emperor, he created him arch-chancellor, grand officer of the legion of honor, a prince, and duke of Parma, and confided to him the organization of the judicial system. He joined Napoleon after his return from Elba; was banished by Louis, but soon recalled; and died in 1824.

CAMBRIDGE, Richard Owen, a learned Englishman, born in London, 14th Feb. 1714, and educated at Eton school and Oxford. After three years' residence in the university, he in 1737 entered at Lincoln's-inn, and in 1741 married Miss Trechard, with whom he settled at Whitminster, Gloucestershire. He published the Scribleriad, a poem, 1744—and in 1761 an history of the war on the coast of Comandell, and contributed some valuable papers to the World. His works were collected and printed together by his son G. O. Cambridge, M.

A. with his life, two vols. 4to. 1803. He died much respected in private life, as a cheerful companion, exemplary in his conduct, and virtuous and benevolent in practice, 17th Sept. 1802.

CAMBYSSES, king of Persia, after his father Cyrus, B. C. 529, made war against Egypt and Æthiopia, and died in consequence of a wound which he had accidentally given himself in the eighth year of his reign. He was cruel and vindictive in the extreme.

CAMDEN, William, a celebrated antiquary, was born at London, 2d May, 1551. By the friendship of Dr. Goodman, dean of Westminster, he was appointed in 1575 second master of Westminster school, and it was during his relaxation from the labors of this important office, that he applied himself to the compilation of his valuable work the Britannia, or history of the ancient Britons, their origin, manners, and laws, which appeared in Latin, 1586, and passed rapidly through several editions. His abilities were now so universally acknowledged, that Piers bishop of Salisbury, in 1583 conferred on him the prebend of Iffarcomb, though he never was in holy orders, and the same year he was admitted to the degree of M. A. In 1593, he succeeded Dr. Grant in the headship of Westminster-school, and four years after he published a Greek grammar, which though judiciously digested, and long popular, must be considered rather as an epitome of the grammar of his predecessors, than as an original work. In 1597 Camden was removed from his laborious office, upon being appointed Clerencieux king of arms, an employment more congenial to his taste and his pursuits. In 1600 he published an account of the monuments of the kings, queens, and nobles in Westminster abbey, and subsequently, at different intervals, various other works. Camden died at Chisselhurst in Kent, ninth November, 1623, and though he had directed to be buried where he died, his remains were deposited in great pomp in Westminster abbey. Camden was respected as a man not only of great and extensive learning, and just taste, but of amiable manners, easy and candid in his conversation, and the friend of learned men, and eminent scholars.

CAMERARIUS, Joachimus, a German, born at Bamberg in 1500, and educated at Leipsic. His great application in the acquisition of Grecian and Roman literature soon made him known to the literati of the age, and in those days of theological dissention, he became the friend of Erasmus, and also of Melancthon, whose life he wrote in a very copious manner. During the various religious disputes which took place in consequence of the reformation, Camerarius was consulted, and his opinion respected, especially in the diets of Nuremburg and Ratisbon. He died at Leipsic 17th April, 1575, full of years and honor. Besides Melancthon, he was intimate with Carlowitch, Turnebus, Victorius, Wolfius, Baumgartner, and indeed every man of learning and consequence in his age. His literary labors were very great, as he translated Herodotus, Demosthenes, Euclid, Xenophon, Homer, Theocritus, Sophocles, Lucian, Theodoret, Nicephorus, and others, and he deservedly was called by Vossius the phoenix of Germany.

CAMILLUS, Marcus Fucius, an illustrious Roman, banished by his countrymen on suspicion of pecculation. His services and character were remembered when Rome was taken by the Gauls, and he issued from his banishment to defeat the enemies of his country. He died B. C. 365.

CAMOENS, Lewis, a Portuguese poet, deservedly called the Virgil of his country. He was born at Lisbon, 1527, and studied at Coimbra, from whence he went in the service of his country to Ceuta, where he lost one of his eyes in a campaign against the Moors. He afterwards passed to the East Indies, in hopes of bettering his fortunes, where he began the composition of his celebrated Lusiad, but on his return he had the misfortune to be shipwrecked, and with difficulty saved his life, swimming with his right hand, and supporting his poem with his left. When restored to Portugal in 1569, he finished his poem, and dedicated it to king Sebastian, but his hopes of patronage and of honourable remuneration were cruelly disappointed. The merits of the poet were neglected by the monarch and his courtiers, and Camoens, feeling all the miseries of indigent and despised virtue, expired in the midst of his ungrateful countrymen, a prey to poverty and the deepest wretchedness, 1579. Admired for the boldness of his descriptions, the unaffected display of his learning, and the happiest flights of a sublime imagination, Camoens is yet censured for the obscurity of some of his verses, and for an injudicious mixture of heathen mythology and christian truths. The Lusiad however will always rank high in the list of heroic poems. It has been translated into French once, twice into Italian, four times into Spanish, and into English by Fanshaw, besides the elegant version in which Mr. Mickle has immortalized his name with the fame of his favorite author.

CAMPANELLA, Thomas, an Italian philosopher belonging to the Dominican order, born at Stilo in Calabria, September 5th, 1563. His great and extensive knowledge of the ancient classics soon enabled him to examine with accuracy the tenets of the peripatetic philosophy, and to prove them built upon false and untenable foundations. The superior information and brilliant eloquence which he displayed in his disputations on theology with professors of long established reputation, increased with his fame the number of his rivals and enemies, and he was accused before the inquisition, of having obtained by magic that vast extent of learning which he possessed. He fled upon this from Naples to Rome, and afterwards to Florence, and on his way to Bologna his papers were seized, but his person remained unmolested. Some expressions however which he dropped some years after, against the Spaniards, procured his arrest. He appeared in 1599 at Naples as a criminal against the state, and was seven times put to the rack and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. The weight of his sufferings was at last lessened by the interference of the pope with Philip IV. of Spain in 1626, but when restored to liberty, to avoid the further persecutions of the Spaniards, he retired secretly to France, where the friendship of Richelieu and the favor of Louis XIII. procured him a pension of 2000 livres. He died in the monastery of the Dominicans 21st March 1639. His writings were numerous, the best known of which are de reâ rectâ ratione studenti,—aphorismata politica,—de monarchiâ Hispanicâ.

CAMPANO, John Antonio, a native of Campania, of obscure origin. While tending sheep he was noticed by a priest who admired his promising appearance, and who kindly instructed him in the learned languages, and enabled him to become professor of rhetoric at Perugia. He was raised to a bishopric by Pope Pius II. and engaged at the congress of Ratisbon, and made governor of Citta de Castello by Sixtus IV. His opposition to some of the measures of the court of Rome rendered him unpopular with the pope, and he removed to his see of Terrano where he died 1477, aged 48. He wrote the life of the famous commander Andrew Braccio, besides orations, letters, and Latin poems.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, son of the earl of Argyle, was born in 1598, and became known for his strong partiality to the covenanters, though he retained all his attachment to Charles I. by whom he was created a marquis. He opposed Cromwell's invasion of Scotland, and placed the crown on the head of Charles II. when his coronation took place at Scone in 1651. But notwithstanding his attachment to the king, and the display of an undaunted character in political life, he was seized in London when he came to congratulate Charles on his restoration, and upon being condemned as guilty of high treason was beheaded as a traitor at Edinburgh cross, 27th May, 1661. He wrote instructions to a son, and defenses against the grand indictment of high treason.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, earl of Argyle, son of the preceding, distinguished himself so much by his bravery at the battle of Dunbar, and on other occasions, that Cromwell exempted him from the general pardon granted in 1654. In consequence of the intercession of one of his letters, in which he spoke of the ingratitude of courts, he was tried before the parliament of Scotland, for leasing, making, or sowing dissensions between the king and the subject by false information. He was condemned to lose his head, and the sentence would have been executed had not the great Clarendon interfered with the king. Argyle was afterwards restored to royal favor, and made privy counsellor, and one of the lords of the treasury, but he was afterwards again exposed to persecution and most iniquitously condemned to suffer death. He escaped from confinement and after concealing himself in London, he went to Holland, and soon returned to Scotland, to support the rebellion of Monmouth. The plans which he pursued were not however well concerted, he was abandoned by those who ought to have shared his dangers, and he was taken and carried to Edinburgh, where he suffered in pursuance of his former sentence. He was beheaded 30th June, 1685.

CAMPBELL, George, D. D., was educated at St. Andrew's and was promoted to a small living in the Highlands. He was made professor of church history at St. Andrew's 1728, and published a discourse on miracles, besides a vindication of the christian religion, 8vo. and a treatise on moral virtue. He died 1757, aged 61.

CAMPBELL, George, a Scotch divine, born at Aberdeen. He was educated at the Marischal college, of which he became a principal in 1759, and professor of divinity in 1771. He died 1796, aged 77, a little time after resigning his office. Among his works his translation of the four gospels are particularly entitled to commendation. His answer to Hume on the miracles was much admired; but in his ecclesiastical history, a posthumous work, he is censured as partial and bigotted in favor of the presbyterians.

CAMPBELL, John, LL. D., an eminent writer on biography, history, and politics, born at Edinburgh, 8th March, 1708. At the age of five he left Scotland, which he never saw again, for the neighborhood of Windsor; and he was placed as clerk to an attorney at the usual age, but the occupation was irksome to his feelings, and he relinquished it for the more laborious life of an author. In his 30th year he first appeared before the public in the military life of prince Eugene and of Marlborough, in 2 vols. fol. He was afterwards engaged in the ancient universal history, and in 1739, published the travels of Edward Brown, esquire, and the memoirs of Ripperda, and two years after the concise history of Spanish America. In 1742 the two first volumes of his history of English admirals appeared, to which two years after two volumes more were added, a work of great merit and established reputation. He published in 1743 Hernippus revived, which six years after was more fully improved, and in 1744 appeared his "voyages and travels," on the plan of Dr. Harris. Besides other popular publications he was engaged in the Biographia Britannica, which first appeared in weekly numbers in 1745, and to which he contributed some of the most interesting and best written articles. In 1750 he published his present state of Europe, and afterwards was employed in the modern universal history which appeared in detached parts in 16 vols. fol. His last work was "a political survey of Britain" in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, in which he displayed extraordinary labor, great judgment, and extensive knowledge. He lived in the indulgence of his literary pursuits so retired that few had the happiness of his acquaintance, but those that visited him found him amiable in his manners, instructive in his conversation, and in his general conduct mild, humane, and religious. He was appointed in 1765 king's agent for the province of Georgia, an office which he held till his death, a melancholy event, which was hastened by his sedentary mode of life, and his intense application. He died of a decline at his house, Queen-square, Ormond-street, 23th December 1775, aged nearly 68.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, a Scotch prelate of the noble family of the Campbells, made in 1721 bishop of Aberdeen, which he resigned in 1724. He was a man of great learning, and intimate with the most famous men of his time, with bishop Bull, Hickey, Grabe, Nelson, and others. He died 16th June, 1744, author of the doctrine of a middle state between death and the resurrection, fol. 1721, a work curious and interesting, full of great learning, and profound observations.

CAMPEGGIO, Lorenzo, a Roman cardinal, born at Milan, 1474. He was professor of civil law at Bologna for several years, and married, but on the death of his wife, he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and in 1512, was made a bishop, and afterwards created a cardinal by Leo X. He came to England 1519, as nuncio, to settle the tenths for the crusade against Turkey, and was made bishop of Salisbury, and in 1524 passed into Germany to attempt to resist the torrent of the reformation. He afterwards returned to England to settle the affairs about the divorce of Henry VIII., and Catherine of Arragon, and when recalled in 1529 by the pope, he went to the diet of Augsburg again to oppose the progress of Lutheranism. He died at Rome, 1539. He was a man of learning and deep political knowledge, and acquainted with Erasmus and most other learned men in Europe. Some of his letters are published in the collection of Basil, 1550. He had a brother Thomas, who was also a bishop, and author of several learned works on the canon law. He died 1564.

CAMPER, Peter, a celebrated physician, and naturalist. He was born at Leyden, and carefully educated by his father who was a protestant divine, and under Boerhaave, Muschenbroek, Gravesande, and other famous professors, he laid the foundation of that knowledge in which he became so eminent. He travelled at the age of 26 over England, France and Germany, where he was received by the learned with the respect due to rising merit, and in Berlin he was particularly noticed by Frederic the great. His works were on philosophy and natural history, in 6 vols. 8vo. with 100 folio plates beautifully engraved. He wrote, besides a treatise on the physiognomies of men of different countries, a work of great erudition but occasionally fanciful. He had also a taste for the fine arts, and excelled in the use of the pencil. He died 1789, highly respected.

CAMPIAN, Edmund, a learned writer, born in London, 1540, and educated at Christ's hospital. He was afterwards elected to St. John's college, Oxford. In 1568 he went to Ireland, and wrote an history of the country in two books, but the suspicion of favoring the catholic tenets rendered him unpopular, and he fled to the low countries. Here he renounced protestantism and entered into the holy of the Jesuits at Douay, and from thence passed to Rome, where he was received as a true and useful convert. He wrote a tragedy called Nectar and Ambrosia, which was acted before the emperor at Vienna, and for six years he taught rhetoric and philosophy at Prague, till he was commissioned by pope Gregory XIII., to pass over to England in 1580. In this delicate employment he used all the arts of cunning and insinuation, but though he seems to have challenged the English clergy to a trial of skill, yet he discovered too much vehemence and impetuosity, and when discovered by the emissaries of Walsingham, he was dragged to the tower, and being found guilty of high treason for adhering to the pope, the queen's enemy, he was hanged and quartered at Tyburn, first December, 1581.

CAMPISTRON, Jean Galbert, a French poet, born at Toulouse in 1615. He became the secretary and the friend of the duke of Vendome, and merited to be ranked little inferior to Racine in the merit of his dramatic compositions. He died of an apoplexy, 11th May, 1723, at the age of 67. His plays, three vols. 12 mo. first published in 1750, have passed through many editions.

CAMUS, John Peter, a French prelate, born at Paris. He was made bishop of Bellay by Henry IV., and consecrated by St. Francis de Sales 1609. As a preacher he was particularly eloquent, but at the same time indulged an ironical turn, especially against the monks, which caused them to complain of his conduct to Richelieu. He resigned his see after an enjoyment of 20 years, and though offered two others afterwards he preferred the retirement of a monastery, and died in the hospital of incurables at Paris, 1652, aged 70. Among his numerous works are mentioned, pious romances to suppress the licentious productions of his age.

CAMUS, Stephen la, a native of Paris, doctor of the Sorbonne 1650, and bishop of Grenoble 1571. He was an exemplary prelate, attentive to his episcopal duties, and in his private conduct very austere, always sleeping on straw, and wearing a hair shirt. He was made a cardinal by pope Innocent II. 1686, and died 1707, aged 75, leaving his property to the poor, and to some schools which he had founded. He was author of some pastoral letters,—a treatise on the perpetual virginity of the Virgin Mary.

CAMUS, Armand Gaston, born at Paris, in 1740, was brought up to the law. He was one of the deputies from Paris to the States General in 1789; bore a prominent part in the labors of the constituent assembly; and was elected a member of the convention, in which capacity he voted for the death of the king. Camus was one of the conventional commissioners, whom Dumourier put into the hands of the Austrians, when they came to arrest him. After his liberation, he became a member of the council of five hundred, and he opposed the establishment of the consular government. He was, nevertheless, confirmed by Bonaparte, in his office of archivist, which he had held for some years. He died in 1804. Camus produced many works. Among them are, the Matrimonial Code, Travels in the recently united Departments; and translations of Aristotle's Animals and the Manual of Epictetus.

CANALETTO, CANALETTI, or CANALI, Anthony, a Venetian painter, was born at Venice, in 1697. His father was a scene painter, and brought him up to that branch of the arts. After having studied at Rome, however, Canaletto dedicated himself to landscape, in which he attained a high degree of excellence. His views in Venice are admirable works. In 1746, he visited England, and, during a residence of two years, produced many fine pictures. Canaletto was the first who made the camera obscura useful in painting. He died in 1768.

CANANI, John Baptist, a native of Ferrara, professor of medicine and anatomy there, and physician to the duke. He wrote humani corporis picturata dissectio, now very rare, and is said to have discovered the valves of the veins. He died 1590, aged 75.

CANDIAC, John Lewis Eliz. de Montcaim, a child of astonishing powers, brother to the marquis of Montcaim. At the age of four he learned Latin, and when six he could read Greek and Hebrew to the astonishment of the learned. This prodigy of premature superiority in the knowledge of literature and of science, was cut off by a complication of diseases at Paris, 8th Oct. 1726, aged seven years.

CANER, Henry, D.D., Rector of king's chapel, now the stone chapel in Boston. He graduated at Yale college in 1724, and in 1727 went to England for Episcopal ordination. On his return he officiated, as a missionary in Fairfield and Norwalk, Con. In 1747, he began his stated labors in Boston, where he remained till the commencement of the American revolution, in 1775. From this time he resided in England till the close of his life, in 1792, aged 92 years. Dr. Caner published five funeral sermons; a thanksgiving sermon; and a sermon entitled the true nature and method of christian preaching.

CANGE, Charles du Fresne du, a learned Frenchman, born at Amiens, and made treasurer of France. He early applied himself to the study of ancient and modern history, and published some valuable works. He died 1688, aged 78. Lewis XIV. presented a pension to his children, in memory of their father's learning and his services to literature. The most valuable of his works are history of the eastern empire under the French emperors of Constantinople, fol.—Latin Glossary, 3 vols. fol.—a Greek glossary of the middle ages, 2 vols. fol.—annals of Zonaras, and historia Byzantina illustrata in fol.

CANITZ, Baron of, a German poet and statesman, born at Berlin, 1654, five months after his father's death. He travelled through Europe, and was engaged in important negotiations by the king of Prussia. He took Horace for his model in his German compositions, and was so popular a poet that his works were published for the 10th time in 1750 in 8vo. He died at Berlin, 1699, aged 45.

CANNING, the Right Hon. George, born in London, April 11, 1770, was the son of an Irish barrister, who was a man of talent and a poet, but who died in such embarrassed circumstances that he left his family wholly unprovided for. The future prime minister was placed at Eton by his father's relations, at which seminary he distinguished himself as a classical scholar, and one of the principal authors of the Microcosm. From Eton he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, where he gained several prizes, after which, he entered himself a member of Lincoln's Inn, intending to make the law his profession. The exhortations of his friend Sheridan, however, induced him to relinquish that intention, and to enter on the career of politics. In 1793, therefore, he obtained a seat in the house of commons as member for Newport, in the Isle of Wight, and in 1796 he was appointed under secretary of state, and returned for the treasury borough of Wendover. In 1798 he contributed some brilliant satirical pieces, among which are New Morality, and parodies on Darwin and Southey, to the Anti-Jacobin weekly paper. He resigned with Mr. Pitt; proved a severe scourge to the Addington administration; returned again to office with Mr. Pitt, as treasurer of the navy; and held that situation till the death of the premier. After having been once more in opposition for a short time, he again formed a part of the ministry, as secretary of state for foreign affairs. But, in 1809, the Walcheren expedition produced a quarrel between him and Lord Castlereagh. The result was a duel, in which he was severely wounded in the thigh, and his resignation of the secretaryship. In 1812, he was elected one of the members for Liverpool, and was subsequently thrice returned, though never without a strenuous contest. In 1816, he was sent ambassador to Lisbon, and on his return, in 1818, he became president of the board of control; but he relinquished that place, and went abroad, in order to avoid taking part in the proceedings against the queen. He was appointed governor general of India, in 1822, and was on the point of embarking, when the death of Lord Londonderry opened to him the post of secretary for foreign affairs. This he held till the sudden illness of the earl of Liverpool broke up the cabinet, when he was raised to the dignity of prime minister. He did not, however, long retain this splendid prize of his talents and exertions; for, worn out by mental and bodily toil, he died on the 8th of August, 1827, to the deep regret of the majority of his countrymen.

CANO, Alonzo, a native of Grenada, eminent as a painter, sculptor, and architect. He was patronised by the duke of Olivares, and made director general of the king's works at Madrid, and preceptor to the prince Balthazar Carlos. The palaces and churches of Madrid were adorned with the elegant labors of his chisel, as well as of his pencil. He had the singular misfortune of finding on his return home one evening his house plundered, his wife murdered, and his Italian servant fled; and while he had reason to suspect the treachery of his domestic, in consequence of his jealous and resentful temper, he was himself seized as a perpetrator of the horrid deed and tortured, but no punishment could force him to confess a crime of which he was not guilty. He afterwards entered into the church to escape further persecution, and died, 676, aged 76.

CANO or CANUS, Melchior, a native of Tarazon, in the diocese of Toledo. He was of the Dominican order, and professor of theology at Salamanca, and in 1552, he became bishop of the Canaries, which he resigned to enjoy the favors of the court of Philip II. He died at Toledo 1560, author of some works, especially locorum theologorum, &c.

CANOVA, Antonio, a celebrated sculptor, was born in 1757, at Passango, in the Venetian States. He early exhibited an extraordinary talent for sculpture, and was patronised by Sir William Hamilton, and several other English gentlemen, by whose aid he was enabled to pursue his studies with success. His works are astonishingly numerous, and superior to any other productions of modern, and scarcely excelled by any of ancient art. His chief statues of modern personages were one of Washington, several of Bonaparte, one of the mother of Bonaparte, of the Empress Marie Louisa, of the princea Esterhazy, and of Ferdinand IV. of Naples. The most valuable of his works have been purchased by English Noblemen. His character through life was marked by great liberality and benevolence, and his unrivalled talents procured him the most distinguished honors from the patrons of art in Italy, and throughout Europe. He died at Venice, October 12th, 1822, in the 64th year of his age.

CANTACUZENUS, Johannes, a Byzantine historian, born at Constantinople, and nearly related to the imperial family. His knowledge in literature and in arms was so great, that he became the favorite of the court and people, and was made first lord of the bedchamber to the emperor Andronicus. He retained his offices under his grandson of the same name, who made him generalissimo of his forces, and would have admitted him to the throne, if he had been willing to consent. At his death the emperor left the guardianship of his son John Paleologus to the integrity of Cantacuzenus; but the jealousy of the empress and of her favorites, thwarted his benevolent schemes, till at last he assumed himself the imperial purple, at the request of the nobles at Adrianople, 1342. The new monarch was victorious over his enemies, and with unparalleled moderation, he adopted the conquered Paleologus for his associate on the throne, and gave him his daughter Helen in marriage to cement their reconciliation. Jealousy, however, still prevailed, and Cantacuzenus, wearied with the troubles of sovereignty, retired to a monastery accompanied by his wife. In that tranquil retreat he devoted himself to study, and wrote an history in Greek of his own times, in four books, from 1320 to 1355. This work is very valuable. He wrote besides some theological works. The history was translated into Latin at Ingolstadt, in 1603 by Pontanus, and in 1645 the original Greek was splendidly edited at Paris in 8 vols. fol. The time of his death is unknown, though it is supposed that he lived till about the year 1411, and reached his 100th year. He wrote also a defence of christianity against the Mahometans.

CANTEMIR, Demetrius, a Tartar of illustrious birth. He visited Constantinople early in life, and promised himself to succeed his father as governor of Moldavia; but he was supplanted by a rival; and when at last sent to defend the province against the Russians, he betrayed it to the Czar Peter, whose fortunes he followed, and by whom he was amply rewarded. From Moldavia, over which he presided, he retired to Ukraine, where he died, much lamented, 1723, aged 50. He wrote a Latin history of the rise and fall of the Ottoman empire in Russia, dedicated to the Czar—the system of Mahomet's religion—the state of Moldavia, in Latin, with a map of the country.

CANTEMIR, Antiochus, son of the preceding, displayed the advantages of a well finished education in several embassies at London and Paris. On his return to Petersburg, he devoted himself to literature, and was the first who introduced the graces of poetry among the Russians. He was author of some odes, satires, and fables, besides a translation of Anacreon and of the epistles of Horace. His life was written by Guasco. He died 1744, aged 54.

CANTERUS, William, an eminent scholar, born at Utrecht 1542, and educated chiefly at Louvain, under Cornel, Valerius, and afterwards at Paris, under Auratus. The civil wars of France afforded him an opportunity to visit Germany, Italy, and Venice, where he purchased some valuable manuscripts; and on his return to Louvain he devoted himself with indefatigable diligence to his favorite studies. An application so intense, which regularly began at 7 in the morning, and continued till midnight, with the intervention of scarce four hours for exercise and refreshment, was not calculated to insure longevity, and consequently Canterus fell a sacrifice to his studious retirement, and died in his 33d year, 1575. His mind was stored with vast erudition, and from his familiar acquaintance with six languages, besides that of his country, viz. Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Italian, and German, the greatest expectations, as Thuanus observes, might have been formed from him.

CANTON, John, a native of Stroud, in Gloucestershire, born in 1718, was the son of a cloth weaver; devoted his leisure moments to mathematics; and first manifested his talent, and obtained patronage, by cutting out a sundial upon stone with a common knife. He was sent to London, and articulated to the master of an academy in Spital Square, of whom he became the partner, and ultimately the successor. His experiments on the Leyden phial made him a member of the Royal Society, and obtained for him their gold medal. His communications to the Transactions were many and important. Among them is a valuable paper on the making of artificial magnets. He died in 1772.

CANUTE, or KNUD, surnamed the Great, succeeded his father Sweyn as king of Denmark, and afterwards undertook an expedition against England. He attacked Edmund Ironside with such boldness and success, that the two rivals agreed to divide the country between them, and while Edmund was satisfied with the land at the south of the Thames, his opponent claimed the north as his own. When Edmund was murdered by Edric, 1017, Canute seized the whole kingdom, and endeavored to establish himself by the punishment of Edric and of the nobles, and by the laying of a heavy tax on the people. His reign, though severe, was impartial, and he regarded both nations equally as his subjects, and distributed justice without favor. He showed himself also superior to the flattery of his courtiers on the sea-shore at Southampton, and whilst they wished to extol him as more than a mortal, he showed them, that as the sea refused to obey his summons, and retreat back at his word, so is every thing on earth subservient to the will of him whom the winds and the sea obey. He repressed the invasion of the Swedes, and killed their king in battle; and afterwards, in his old age, he made a pilgrimage to Rome. He died at Shaftsbury 1035.

CANUTE IV., king of Denmark after Harold, 1080, was surnamed the Pious. His great partiality and liberal donations to the church raised an insurrection against him; in which he was slain by one of his subjects, 1087. He was canonized by pope Alexander III. in 1164.

CAPASSO, Nicholas, a native of Fratta, in the kingdom of Naples, professor of civil law at Naples. He was eminent as a poet, and he spent, it is said, more than twenty years in translating Homer into the Neapolitan patois; a work much esteemed by judges of this vulgar idiom. His poetical pieces were printed at Naples 1780, 1 vol. 4to. and possess merit. His prose compositions are not much esteemed. He died at Naples, 1743, aged 75.

CAPEL, Arthur lord, a virtuous nobleman, whose attachment to the cause of Charles I. proved fatal to him. At first he favored the parliament, and voted for the death of Strafford, of which he sincerely repented; and when he saw the violent measures of the republican chiefs, he sided with the king, and was created lord Capel of Hadham. He, with lord Norwich and sir Charles Lucas, boldly defended Colchester; but upon the surrender, he, in violation of a solemn promise of quarter, was beheaded on the scaffold, March 9, 1649. While in prison, he wrote some beautiful and elegant verses, which have frequently appeared before the public.

CAPEL, Arthur, son of the preceding, was made earl of Essex by Charles II., and employed as ambassador to Denmark, and as viceroy of Ireland. He was first lord of the treasury 1679, and supported the exclusion singly of the duke of York, for which, though his former services were acknowledged, and the merits of his family known, he was dishonorably struck off the list of privy counsellors, and in 1683 accused by lord Howard as an accomplice in the Ryehouse plot. He was soon after found with his throat cut with a razor, but though it was evident that he was murdered, the coroner's jury pronounced a verdict of felo de se.

CAPELL, Edward, was born at Troston, near Bury, Suffolk, 11th June 1713, and educated at Bury school. Upon his appointment to the office of inspector of plays, by the patronage of the duke of Grafton, he turned his thoughts to an immaculate edition of Shakspeare's plays. Three and twenty years were employed in searching old manuscripts, and in examining various readings, before the publication appeared; but after all, the public were disappointed in their expectation of illustrative notes and commentaries to adorn an edition of 10 vols. 8vo. The labors of Malone, Steevens, Farmer, Percy, and others, checked the ardor of Capell to finish what he had so long promised, and, after forty years, the annotations appeared as posthumous, under the care of Mr. Collins, the editor, in 3 vols. 4to. This publication is in itself valuable, and throws great light on the characters of Shakspeare, and the various sources from whence the fables were derived. Capell died 24th January, 1781.

CAPELLO, Bianca, a Venetian lady, who, after marrying a person of inferior rank, retired to Florence, where she had the imprudence to become the mistress of Francis the grand duke Cosmo's son. After the death of her husband, she had the art to prevail upon her lover to marry her, and she was formally recognised, in consequence of an embassy to the Venetian states, as a true daughter of Venice. Though possessed of great powers of mind and strong resolutions, she showed herself odious and tyrannical at Florence, so that her memory is still held there in abhorrence. The sudden death of her husband and of herself, within a few days of each other, in October, 1537, was justly attributed to poison administered, it is said, by cardinal Ferdinand, their brother.

CAPELLUS, Lewis, a French protestant divine, born at Sedan, and professor of divinity and oriental languages at Saumur. He was engaged in a long and learned controversy with the younger Buxtorff concerning the antiquity of the Hebrew points; and whilst his adversary maintained, that they were coeval with the language, he supported, that they were unknown before the dispersion of the Jews, and that they were invented by the Masoreth rabbis of Tiberias, about 600 years after Christ. The learned were on this occasion divided. The Germans supported the opinion of their favorites the Buxtorffs, while Capellus was seconded by all the powers and abilities of the protestants, by Luther, Calvin, Zuinglius, and afterwards, by Scaliger, the Casaubons, the Heinsii, Grotius, Erpenius, Salmasius, and others. Besides his controversial books, he wrote critica sacra, in which he was engaged for thirty-six years; a work of merit, but such as displeased some of the protestants for the liberty of his criticisms on the Bible. Capellus died at Saumur, 1653, aged nearly 80. He wrote some account of himself in his "de gente Capellorum."

CAPMANY, Don Antonio, a celebrated Spanish writer, was born in Catalonia, in 1754, and died in Andalusia, in 1810. He is the author of several esteemed works, among which are, the Philosophy of Eloquence, 8vo.; History of the Marine, Commerce, and Arts of Barcelona, 4 vols. 4to.; and Historical and Critical Theatre of Spanish Eloquence, 5 vols. 4to.

CAPO D'ISTRIA, John, Count of, president of Greece, the son of a physician of Corfu, was born in 1780, and studied medicine at Venice. He entered into the service of the Russian government, and was sent as ambassador to Vienna. In 1812 he conducted the diplomatic affairs of the army of the Danube, and subsequently of the whole Russian army, under the immediate direction of the emperor, who admitted him to his entire confidence. Soon afterwards, he was engaged in public negociations of the highest importance, was appointed secretary of state for the department of foreign affairs, and received several orders of nobility. In 1813, he was Russian ambassador to Switzerland, and in the ensuing year he was present as Russian plenipotentiary at the congress of Vienna. The downfall of Napoleon recalled him to the head-quarters of the allies at Paris, where he subscribed the treaty of November 20, 1815, and returned with his monarch to St. Petersburg. Here he for some years took an active part in the affairs of the council of state; and in 1819 visited his native island and formed a connection with the Hetaria. In 1822, when the Russian minister returned from Constantinople, Count D'Istria left the Russian service and retired as a private man to Germany and Switzerland, where he resided till 1827, when he was appointed to the presidency of the Greek republic. In this station, he remained till his assassination in October, 1831.

CAPPERONIER, Claude, a learned Frenchman of Montdidier in Picardy. Though brought up to the business of a tanner, he devoted himself earnestly to the study of the learned languages, and made such a proficiency that he was offered the chair of professor of the Greek language in the university of Basil. He died at Paris in 1744, aged 73, in the house of M. Crozat, whose three sons he had educated. He published an edition of Quintilian; and after his death his edition of ancient Latin rhetoricians was made public at Strasburg, 4to.

CAPRANICA, Nicholas, a learned Italian, made secretary to pope Martin V., and raised to a bishopric, and to the rank of cardinal. This last honor, however, was not confirmed, in consequence of the death of the pope; and Capranica, refused a seat in the conclave and plundered of his property by Eugenius IV., applied to the council of Basil, which confirmed all his claims. He was afterwards employed by Eugenius in various embassies, and commanded the Roman army against Francis Sforza, by whom he was defeated and wounded. He directed, by his will, that his palace at Rome should be turned into a college. He died 1453, aged 58.

CARACCI, Lewis Augustine, and Hannibal, celebrated painters of the Lombard school, all natives of Bologna. The fame of the Caracci soon spread through Italy, and Hannibal, whose powers of memory were so retentive that he never failed to recollect what he once saw, was liberally invited by cardinal Farnese to paint and adorn the gallery of his palace. He was soon followed by Augustine, but on an unexpected quarrel between the brothers, Augustine retired to the court of Parma, where, after some years spent in dissipation and in consequent remorse, he died 1602, aged 45. The labors of Hannibal however, which render the Farnese gallery such an object of delight and admiration to the curious, were unhandsomely rewarded by his employer, and for the immortal executions of his pencil during eight long years he received a sum scarce equivalent to 200*l*. This ill treatment quite overpowered his faculties, and in his agony of rage and despair, he vowed never to touch again his pencil, a resolution which his wants made him violate. Though occasionally deprived of his senses, yet he proved licentious in his morals and hastened his own death by his debaucheries, at Naples, 1609, in his 49th year. While Hannibal was engaged at Rome, Lewis remained at Bologna, admired by the neighboring clergy, whose churches he adorned by his pieces and designs. He died at Bologna in 1619, aged 63. The most admired piece of Augustine, is the communion of St. Jerome, in Bologna. The works of Hannibal are chiefly admired as possessing all the sweetness and purity, the judicious distribution of coloring, and the delicate correctness of the most approved masters. He had so much veneration for the labors of Raphael, that he ordered himself to be buried in the same tomb, and his remains were accordingly deposited in the rotunda at Rome.

CARACCIO, Anthony, a Roman nobleman of the 17th century. He wrote tragedies, besides an admired epic poem, 40 cantos, called Imperio Vendicato, in 1690, in 4to.—This work, though praised by many, is yet far inferior to the finished poems of Ariosto and Tasso. His tragedy Il Corradino is admired.

CARACCIOLI, Lewis Anthony, a native of Paris, of a noble family. He was for some time in the army in the service of the king of Poland, and on his return to France devoted himself to literature, and died 1803, aged 80. He published letters, 4 vols. 12 mo., which were imposed upon the world as the correspondence of Ganganelli, pope Clement XIV. A nearer examination, however, proved the deceit, when Ganganelli was represented as speaking of Herculanum, before it was discovered, and of the writings of Gesner before they were published. These letters possess, notwithstanding, merit, and are written in an elegant style, and abound with morality, and pleasing historical relations.

CARAVAGIO, Michael Angelo Amerigi da, son of a mason at Caravagio in the Milanese, was born 1569. Without the assistance of a master, he acquired deserved celebrity as a painter, but his temper was so quarrelsome that he found few friends, many rivals, and more enemies. After a life of misfortunes increased by licentiousness of conduct, in the midst of poverty and persecution, he at last expired on the common road 1609, in his 40th year. From his servile and correct adherence to nature, he was surnamed the naturalist; but though Rubens himself acknowledged him as his superior in the clear-obscure, yet he failed in large compositions, and represented his figures all on the same plan without gradation, and perspective. When once shown a fine collection of antique figures, he pointed to the living forms about him as superior models, and immediately painted a gipsy in the street with such exactness of delineation that criticism was silent.

CARAUSIUS, a native of Flanders, employed by the emperor Probus and his successor, to protect the coasts of Gaul against the invasion of the Saxons. He acquired in this office such skill and popularity, and so much property, that when threatened by the emperor Maximian, he fled into Britain where he proclaimed himself independent emperor 287. All attempts to reduce him to obedience proved unavailing, and after an arbitrary reign he was at last assassinated by one of his soldiers named Allectus 293. Some of his coins are still preserved.

CARDAN, Jerome, an Italian of extraordinary character, born at Pavia 24th September, 1501. He was the illegitimate son of a physician and civilian of Milan, and his mother endeavored to destroy him before his entrance into the world. He studied at Pavia, and after taking his degree of M. D. at Padua, he was engaged as a professor of medicine and of mathematics in several universities of Italy. In 1552 he visited Scotland at the request of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, whom he cured of a violent asthma that had baffled the skill of the most expert physicians. He afterwards travelled through London, where he calculated the nativity of Edward VI. and passing through the Low Countries, France and Germany, he returned after an absence of 10 months to Milan. Here and at Pavia he continued his lectures, but some offence procured his imprisonment at Bologna, 1571, from which he extricated himself with difficulty and passed to Rome, where he lived in private retirement, and where he died 21st September, 1575. Though poor he never disgraced himself by any mean or immoral action, but he was too often pleased to speak on subjects which might give uneasiness to his hearers, and he was immoderately attached to gaming. When he had cast his nativity and fixed on the day of his death, it is said that he abstained from food, and thus he destroyed nature that he might exactly fulfil his prophecy. He wrote various things which displayed the eccentricity of his character and the wildness of his opinions. His works were printed at Lyons 1663, in 10 vols. folio.

CARDON, Anthony, an engraver, was born at Brussels, in 1772; came over to England in 1792; and died, in London, in 1813. Cardon was an artist of much taste and talent. His Woman taken in Adultery, after Rubens, and his Marriage of Catherine of France with Henry V. are among his most prominent works.

CARDONNE, Dennis Dominic, an eminent orientalist, was born at Paris, in 1720, and at nine years of age went to Constantinople, where he remained twenty years, and acquired a thorough knowledge of oriental languages, customs, and manners. After his return home, he became interpreting secretary to the king, royal censor and librarian, and professor of the Persian and Turkish languages at the Royal College. He died in 1783. Cardonne published a History of Africa and Spain under the Arabian dominion; and Miscellanies of Oriental Literature; and continued the translation, which Galland began, of Ancient Tales and Fables, from Bidpay.

CAREW, Thomas, a native of Gloucestershire, educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford. His wit recommended him to the notice not only of Ben Jonson and Davenant, but of Charles I. who made him a gentleman of his privy chamber and sewer in ordinary. He died about 1639, leaving several poems, and a masque called Cælum Britannicum, performed at Whitehall by the king and some of his favorites, in 1633.

CAREW, Richard, author of the survey of Cornwall, was born at Anthony in Cornwall, and educated at Christ church, Oxford.—From thence he removed to the Middle Temple, and after travelling abroad he settled in his native county, where he became a justice of the peace, and high sheriff in 1686. In his retirement he devoted himself to antiquarian pursuits, and was intimate with some of the learned men of his time, especially sir Henry Spelman. He died November sixth, 1620, aged 63, and an extravagant inscription on his tomb described him as another Livy, another Maro, another Papirian. His survey, though praised by Camden, is not regarded by Gough as a valuable performance. It was reprinted in 1723, and next in 1769.

CAREW, George, brother to the preceding, was educated at Oxford, and after being called to the bar became secretary to chancellor Hatton. Elizabeth, who knew his merits, knighted him, and appointed him as her ambassador to Poland. In the following reign he was one of the commissioners for the union of the two kingdoms, and afterwards he resided as ambassador in the French court for four years, where he gained the friendship of Thuanus, and furnished him with some useful information for the completion of the 121st book of his history. On his return from France, he was made master of the court of wards, an honorable situation which he did not long enjoy, as he died 1613. He wrote a relation of the state of France, with the characters of Henry IV. and of the principal persons of the court, a work of great merit, which long remained in MS. till Dr. Birch gave it to the world in 1749.

CAREW, sir Alexander, a Cornish gentleman, member for his county in 1640. He voted for the death of Strafford, and for his attachment to the cause of the republicans he was made governor of St. Nicholas' island and fort, at Plymouth. In this office, either through disaffection or the fear of seeing his estates plundered by the royalists, he made overtures to deliver up the garrison, but his intentions were discovered, and he was dragged to London, and by the sentence of a court martial beheaded on Tower hill 1644.

CAREY, Henry, a man who, to poetical and musical talents, joined the more dangerous power of wit and malevolent satire. He wrote some dramas for Goodmanfields theatre, and ridiculed the bombast of modern tragedies in his chrononhotontologos in 1734. He was a great enemy to the Italian operas and Italian singers, and distinguished his zeal and loyalty by the composition of the popular song of "God save great George our king." His satirical vein procured him enemies, and like most men of genius he was persecuted by indigence, which unfortunately aided by melancholy dejection, incited him to commit suicide. He destroyed himself in 1744. His songs were published by him in 1740, and his dramatic pieces in 1743.

CAREY, George Saville, was bred a printer, but quitted that business for the stage, where he had little or no success. He then became an itinerant lecturer upon heads, and the writer and singer of popular songs; besides which, he was the author of some farces, and the following publications. 1. Anecdotes in prose and verse, 2 vols.—2. A lecture on mimicry—3. A rural ramble—4. Balnea, or sketches of the watering places in England. He died in 1807.

CAREY, Felix, son of Dr. William Carey, the missionary, was born in 1786; assisted his father in his pious labors in Bengal; and died at Serampore, in 1822. Among his works are, a Grammar and Dictionary of the Burman Language; and other Philological Productions.

CARLETON, sir Dudley, was born at Baldon Brightwell, in Oxfordshire, and educated at Christ church. When he had finished his travels, he attended Sir Rolph Winwood as his secretary into the Low Countries, and soon after he was himself employed as ambassador, and for twenty years served his sovereign at Venice, Savoy, France, and the United Provinces. Charles rewarded the fide-ty of his services by creating him baron Imbercourt, viscount Dorchester. He died secretary of state 1631, aged 58, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote various pamphlets, besides letters from Holland during his embassy, from 1616 to 1620, which were printed at lord Harwicke's expense in 1757, and again in 1775, in 4to.

CARLETON, George, a native of Norham, Northumberland, maintained at Edmund-hall, Oxford, by the northern apostle, Bernard Gilpin. In 1580 he was elected fellow of Merton, and in 1617 was appointed bishop of Llandaff. He was sent by James, with three other divines, to the synod of Dort, where he ably maintained the cause of episcopacy. On his return, he was translated to Chichester, and died nine years after, 1628, aged 69. He wrote several theological tracts, besides the life of his patron Gilpin; and in his character he displayed a great aversion to popery, whilst he strictly supported the rigid tenets of the calvinists.

CARLETON, Sir Guy, lord Dorchester, a distinguished officer in America. He signalized himself at the siege of Quebec in 1758. In 1762, he was promoted to the rank of colonel, and was at the siege of the Havannah. In 1772, he was appointed governor of Quebec, and created major general. By his great exertions he saved the whole of Canada, the capital of which was besieged by the American generals Montgomery and Arnold. The inhabitants joined the British troops, and after an obstinate resistance, the Americans were repulsed, and Montgomery was killed at the head of his army. In consequence of this exploit, he was knighted, and the next year became a lieutenant general. In 1781 he was appointed to succeed sir Henry Clinton as commander-in-chief in America, which office he held till the conclusion of the war. In 1786 he was appointed governor of Quebec, Nova-Scotia, and New-Brunswick; and as a reward for his long services, was raised to the peerage. He died 1808, aged 85.

CARLETON, Osgood, a teacher of mathematics and navigation, residing chiefly in Mass. but died in Litchfield, N. H. in June, 1816. He published valuable maps of Mass. and of the district of Maine; the American navigator; the South American pilot, 1804. a map of the U. S. 1806; practice of arithmetic, 1810.

CARLYLE, Joseph Dacres, a learned orientalist, born at Carlisle, where his father practised as a physician of eminence. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge. At the university he devoted himself to the study of Arabic and the oriental languages, in which he made great progress, with the assistance of David Zabio, a native of Bagdad, who was resident at Cambridge. In 1794 he succeeded Dr. Craven as Arabic professor, and in 1795 was made chancellor of Carlisle. In 1799 he went to Constantinople in lord Elgin's embassy, and not only obtained admission into the libraries of that celebrated city, but he made excursions into Asia Minor, examined the site of Troy, visited Egypt, Syria, and the Holy Land, and after examining every thing with the eye of a divine, a philosopher, and an antiquarian, returned by Constantinople, through Italy and Germany, and reached England in September 1801. The services which he had rendered to literature and oriental science were not, happily, forgotten; but while he promised himself long life, his constitution, undermined by the severities of travel in foreign climates, hastened to a rapid decay, and he expired, deservedly and universally lamented, 12th April 1804. At the time of his death he was employed in the publication of a bible in Arabic.

CARMICHAEL, Gershom, a native of Glasgow, educated at the university there, in which he became professor of moral philosophy. He died 1738, aged 56. He wrote notes on Puffendorf, besides a system of moral philosophy, which he did not live to complete.

CARMICHAEL, William, charge d' affaires at the court of Spain, was a native of Maryland. In 1776 he aided Mr. Deane the American minister at Paris in his correspondence, and the transaction of business. He went to Berlin to communicate to the king of Prussia intelligence concerning American commerce. He assisted the American commissioners in Paris. He was a delegate in congress from Maryland in 1773. He was secretary of legation during Mr. Jay's mission to Spain. When Mr. Jay left Spain in June 1782, he remained as charge d' affaires, and after the peace was commissioned in that character by congress, and continued as such about fifteen years. In March 1792, William Short was joined with him in a commission to negotiate a treaty with Spain. The attempt was unsuccessful. Mr. Carmichael returned to the United States, and died in 1795.

CARNOT, Lazarus Nicholas, one of the most prominent actors in the French revolution, was born in Burgundy, in 1753; entered the engineer corps at the age of eighteen; and became so distinguished for talent that Prince Henry invited him, but in vain, into the Prussian service. In 1791, the department of the Pas de Calais chose him one of its representatives to the legislative assembly; by which assembly he was nominated a member of the military committee. In both capacities he was active, and his principles were decidedly republican. He was re-elected to the convention, and voted for the death of Louis XVI. Of the too celebrated committee of public safety he was a member. The military operations of the French armies were under his superintendance, and, though Napoleon depreciates his abilities, there can be little doubt that the plans of Carnot contributed largely to the triumph of France. When the directorial government was established, he was chosen one of the five directors; but, in September, 1797, he was proscribed with his colleague Barthelemy, and nearly seventy members of the councils, as a royalist, and he took refuge in Germany, to avoid transportation. When Bonaparte became first consul, he recalled him, and made him war minister; an office, however, which Carnot retained only for a few months. Thoroughly republican in his feelings, he saw with infinite displeasure the strides which Bonaparte was making towards the throne; and, as a member of the tribunate, he entered his protest against the establishment of the imperial government. He lived in retirement, and in somewhat narrow circumstances, for several years after the accession of Napoleon, but at length a pension was given to him. In 1813, when the star of the French emperor was on the wane, Carnot came forward to offer his services; he was entrusted with the defence of Antwerp; and he amply justified the confidence which was reposed in him. Disgusted with the impolitic conduct of the Bourbons, he drew up, early in 1815, a Memorial to the King, which became public, and produced an extraordinary effect. When Napoleon returned from Elba, he appointed him minister of the home department, and gave him the title of count; and, after the downfall of the emperor, Carnot was chosen one of the temporary government, in which character he labored strenuously to prevent a sovereign from being forced upon his country by the allies. He was exiled in 1816, and died at Magdeburgh in August, 1823. Notwithstanding he had held so many high offices, he lived and died poor; for he was rigidly disinterested and incorrupt. He is the author of various mathematical and military works, among which are the Geometry of Position; and a volume on the Defence of Fortresses.

CARO, Hannibal, an Italian poet and orator of Civita Nuova, who served the duke of Parma and Cardinal Farnese as secretary, and afterwards was made knight of Malta. He translated the Æneid, in blank verse, 2 vols. 4to. 1765, published at Paris, with so much spirit, that some judges have declared the composition scarce inferior to the original. His poems and sonnets were much admired, and appeared at Venice 1564, 4to. He published also letters, printed, Padua, 1749, 3 vols. 8vo.—a translation of Aristotle's rhetoric—orations of Gregory Nazianzen. He died at Rome, 1566, and was buried in the church of St. Lawrence of Damascus.

CAROLINE, Amelia Elizabeth, queen of England, and consort of George IV. was the daughter of Charles William Ferdinand, prince of Brunswick Wolfenbuttle, and was born May 17th, 1768. Her marriage with the prince of Wales took place on the 8th of April, 1795, and the birth of her daughter, the princess Charlotte of Saxe Cobourg, on the 7th of January, 1796. Dissensions arose between herself and the prince, which led to their separation in May following, after which she resided at Blackheath. In 1806, being accused of some irregularity, an examination of witnesses took place, which resulted in her vindication. In August, 1814, she embarked for the continent, and resided chiefly in Italy until June, 1821, when she returned to England. A bill was soon after introduced into the House of Lords to deprive her of her title and prerogatives as queen, on the charge of infidelity to her husband, which, after a laborious trial, was lost. In June, 1822, she addressed a memorial to the king, requesting to participate in the honors of the coronation, but was denied. Her death took place suddenly on the 7th of August, 1822. She was conveyed to Brunswick, and buried with her ancestors.

CARPZOVIVS, Benedict, a native of Brandenburg, known as an able professor of law at Wittenberg. He died 1624, aged 59, and left four sons: Conrad, his successor in the university of Wittenberg; Benedict, an able professor of law, and afterwards of divinity, who died at Leipsic in 1666, aged 71; David Benedict, a Lutheran, author of a dissertation on the dress of the Hebrews; John Benedict, a Lutheran also, professor of divinity at Leipsic, where he died 1657, author of the penitence of the Ninevites, and of some controversial tracts. John Benedict had a son of the same name, who died at Leipsic 1699, aged 60, author of some dissertations on the scripture, besides translations from rabbinical books. His brother, Frederic Benedict, was a learned counsellor of Leipsic, where he died 1699, aged 50. The famous journal Acta Eruditorum, begun 1682, was greatly enriched by contributions from his pen.

CARR, Sir Robert, was appointed by Charles II. in 1664 a commissioner, with col. Nicolls, Cartwright and Maverick with extensive powers in New England. It was designed to repress the spirit of liberty. Clarendon said, "they are all ready hardened into republics." In 1664 Nicolls and Carr with four frigates and 300 men captured from the Dutch New Amsterdam, and called it New York, in honor of the Duke of York and Albany the brother of the King. Carr forced the Dutch and Swedes on Delaware bay to capitulate; thus New Netherlands, including New Jersey, was subjected. The commissioners, excepting Nicolls, repaired to Boston in Feb. 1665. When they arrived in Maine in June 1665, they assumed all the powers of government there, so that the authority of Massachusetts was suspended. By special commission from them a court was held at Casco by Jocelyn and others in July 1666. The government, thus created by the commissioners, expired in 1668, the people looking to Massachusetts for a firmer administration of affairs. Carr returned to England, and died 1667.

CARR, Sir John, a native of Devonshire, was brought up to the law; but seems to have abandoned his profession, to become a tourist. His first work was the Stranger in France, published in 1803. It was succeeded by a Tour round the Baltic; and that was followed by others in Holland, Ireland, Scotland, and Spain. His Stranger in Ireland procured for him the honor of knighthood, and drew down upon him the ridicule of an unmerciful satirist, for whose attack the knight absurdly and vainly sought redress in a court of justice. He died about 1822. Sir John Carr is a lively but superficial writer. Besides his tours, he produced some very indifferent poems.

CARRA, John Lewis, a French demagogue, born at Pont de Vesles in 1743, and brought up to the law. He afterwards devoted himself to literature, and was also secretary to the hospodar of Moldavia. On the breaking out of the revolution, he came to Paris, where he published les annales politiques and literaires, a popular journal; and in consequence of his services in the cause of the republic he was made keeper of the national library, and member of the convention. Restless and ambitious in this assembly of blood, he favored the cause of the Girondists, and for some time was employed as commissioner with the army; but the clamors of his enemies at last prevailed against him. He was accused of being in the pay of England, and of plotting the exclusion of the Bourbons, with the intention of raising the duke of York to the throne. When his party was proscribed by Robespierre, he was with them hurried to the guillotine, 31st October 1793. He was author of new principles of philosophy, 2 vols, 4to.—an history of Moldavia and Wallachia, 12mo.—an essay on aerial navigation—examinations of animal magnetism—and historical memoirs of the Bastille.

CARRA, John, LL.D., an eminent schoolmaster, was born at Muggleswick, in the county of Durham, in 1732. He was educated at St. Paul's school in London, for the mastership of which he became candidate, but without success. He was at first usher, and next master, of that at Hertford; and by the interest of Dr. Beattie, obtained his degree of doctor of laws from the Marischal college of Aberdeen. He died in 1807. Dr. Carr is known as the translator of Lucian, in five vols. 8vo. He also wrote some poetical and other pieces, but of no peculiar merit.

CARRIER, Thomas, remarkable for longevity, died at Colchester, Con. May 16, 1735, aged 109 years. He was born in the west of England, and removed thence to Andover Mass. His wife fell a victim to the witchcraft infatuation at Salem, 1692, one of her own daughters, aged seven, being allowed to testify against her. He lived at Colchester about twenty years, his head in his last years was not bald, nor his hair grey. Not many days before his death he travelled on foot six miles, and the very day before he died he was visiting his neighbors.

CARRINGTON, Edward, a valuable officer in the American revolution, was some time quartermaster-general of the army under general Greene, in the south, and by his judicious counsels and unremitting exertions in supplying the army, greatly contributed to the advantages gained over the enemy. He afterwards was attached to the army in the north, but, previously to the evacuation of Charleston, resumed his former station. After the peace he was a representative in congress from Virginia. When Aaron Burr was tried for high treason, he was foreman of the jury. He was born February 11th, 1749, and died October 28th, 1810.

CARROLL, John, D.D. LL.D., first catholic bishop in the U. S. was born at Upper Marlborough in Maryland in 1734, and sent for education at the age of thirteen to Flanders. From St. Omer's, where he remained six years, he was transferred to the colleges of Liege and Brayes. He was ordained a priest and became a Jesuit. In 1775 he returned to America and engaged in the duties of a parish priest. In 1786 he was appointed vicar general, and settled at Baltimore. In 1790 he was consecrated in England catholic bishop of the U. S. and he returned with the title of the bishop of Baltimore. A few years before his death he was created archbishop. He died 1815, aged 80.

CARROLL, Charles, the last surviving signer of the Declaration of American Independence. He was born at Annapolis, on the 20th of Sept. 1737; and died at Baltimore, Nov. 14, 1832, in his 96th year. He was descended of a respectable Irish family; inherited a large estate; and was of the Catholic religion. He was educated and studied civil law in France. Subsequently he went to England and pursued the study of common law at the Temple. At the age of 27 years he returned to America, and was soon known as an advocate for liberty, and one of the ablest political writers of Maryland. In 1776, he was elected a delegate to congress, and subscribed his name to the Declaration of Independence. In 1778, he left congress, and devoted himself to the councils of his native state; in 1789, he was elected a senator in Congress; and, in 1810, he quitted public life at the age of 64, and passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity, beloved and revered by his friends and neighbors, and honored by his country. His mind was highly cultivated, and he was much distinguished for urbanity of manners and social virtue.

CARSTARES, William, a learned Scotchman, born at Cathcart, near Glasgow. He was educated at Utrecht, and became the confidential friend of the prince of Orange before his invasion of Britain. At the revolution, William appointed him his chaplain for Scotland, and consulted him without reserve on every occasion with respect to the political affairs of that kingdom. Queen Anne on her accession continued him chaplain for Scotland; but he soon retired from court, and was elected principal of the college of Edinburgh, and one of the ministers of the city. He died universally respected, in 1715. His state papers, letters, &c. were published in 1774, in a 4to. vol. by Dr. M'Cormick. He was in his character benevolent and patriotic, liberal and humane. He supported the union, but he also opposed the bill for the tolerating of the episcopal clergy in Scotland.

CARTE, Thomas, a learned English historian, born at Clifton, Warwickshire, April 1686. He was educated at University college, Oxford. He then took orders, and officiated as reader of the abbey-church Bath, where in a sermon he ably vindicated the memory of Charles I. and there published his first composition, the Irish massacre set in a clear light. On George's accession, as he refused to take the oaths, and as he assumed the lay habit, he has been accused of being concerned in the rebellion of 1715. He however continued his attachment to the Stuarts, and became secretary to bishop Atterbury, a circumstance which rendered him suspected to government, so that, on the imprisonment of the prelate, 1000*l.* were offered for the apprehension of Carte, who escaped by flying into France. Here he remained in exile, under the assumed name of Phillips, for six or seven years, sedulously employed in literary pursuits, till queen Caroline, who knew and respected his merit, procured his recall. Soon after his return he published his history of James duke of Ormond, in 3 vols. folio, 1735 and 36. In 1738 he issued proposals for a new history of England, and whilst he was employed in collecting materials in public and private libraries, so great was the popularity of his name that subscriptions upon subscriptions appeared for his encouragement to the amount of 600*l.* a year. The 1st vol. was published in 1747, the second in 1750, the third in 1752, and the fourth, which extends the history to the year 1654, and which was posthumous, in 1755. The work is a composition of great merit, which displays the author's abilities in a very respectable view. That there are prejudices and partialities in the narrative cannot be denied: but the history is valuable for information on many curious, important and interesting facts. He died April 2, 1754.

CARTER, Francis, an English writer, who died first August 1783. He published a journey from Malaga to Gibraltar, 2 vols. 8vo. with plates, 1776, reprinted 1778, valuable for the engraved coins it contains, collected from the cabinet of the Spanish medallist Flores. He began an interesting account of the earliest printed Spanish books, and as he unfortunately died as soon as the first sheet was printed, the work must ever remain incomplete.

CARTER, Elizabeth, an English lady of learned celebrity, born at Deal, where her father, the Rev. Dr. Carter, was minister. The superior talents which she early displayed were ardently cultivated by her father, who instructed her in the learned languages, and stored her mind with the choicest treasures of ancient literature. As a specimen of her extensive erudition, she published all the works of Epictetus with an elegant translation, and with notes and a learned introduction; a performance which was received in the most flattering manner by the learned world, and has since been reprinted. Her poems on several occasions were published in 1762, and appeared under the recommendation of lord Bath, and lord Littleton. She also contributed two papers to the Rambler, Nos. 44 on religion and superstition, and 100, on modish pleasure, in which she shows herself a worthy coadjutor of the great moralist. She wrote, besides some scattered pieces, an ode to wisdom inserted in Richardson's Clarissa, and as a poetess she displayed great simplicity of sentiment, mingled with melodious sweetness of expression, sublime ideas, and the purest morality. Mrs. Carter was never married. She died in very good circumstances, and respected by a very numerous circle of friends, in Clarges street Piccadilly, 19th February 1806, aged 89.

CARTER, Nathaniel Hazeltine, a scholar and traveller, graduated at Dartmouth college in 1811, and afterwards studied law. He was two or three years professor of languages in Dartmouth university. In 1820 he became the proprietor and editor of a newspaper in the state of New York. From 1825 to 1827 he was abroad travelling upon the continent of Europe, as the companion and guide of a young gentleman of New York, whose father defrayed the expenses of the tour. During his absence he enriched his paper with letters from Europe, which on his return he collected and published in two large 8vo. volumes, entitled Letters from Europe, comprising the journal of a tour through Ireland, England, Scotland, France, Italy, and Switzerland, 1827. In 1829, he relinquished his paper, and for the benefit of his health proceeded again to France. He died at Marseilles, Jan. 2, 1830, aged 42. He was a poet as well as a writer of prose; his largest poetical piece is entitled, the pains of imagination, delivered at Dartmouth college. His hymn for Christmas is preserved in Specimens of American poetry.

CARTERET, Sir George, one of the proprietors of New Jersey. The name of New Jersey was given, because Carteret's family were from the isle of Jersey. Elizabethtown is said to have been named from his wife.

CARTERET, John, earl of Granville, succeeded his father, George Lord Carteret, at the age of 5, and, after a respectable education at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, he took his seat in the house of lords 1711. The zeal and activity which he displayed in supporting the Hanoverian succession recommended him to George I. by whom he was employed in various offices, and in 1719 sent to Sweden, where he brought about a reconciliation between the kings of Sweden and Denmark. In 1721 he was made secretary of state, and went in 1724 to Ireland, as viceroy, and again filled the same high appointment with equal credit and honor at the accession of George II. till 1730. He warmly opposed Walpole, and on his removal from office he obtained the place of secretary of state, 1742; and though before he had blamed continental alliances, he pursued them with the same alacrity as his predecessor. In 1744, he succeeded, on his mother's death, to the title of viscount, and earl Granville, and died in 1763, much respected as a man of learning, and the friend and patron of learned men.

CARTES, René, or Des Cartes, a celebrated French philosopher, born at la Haye in Touraine, 31st March 1596, and educated by the Jesuits of la Fleche. His father, who was of a noble family, urged him early to pursue a military life, and he at last complied by entering into the service of the prince of Orange 1616. Literature and philosophy, however, still continued his favorite pursuits amidst the dissipation and bustle of the camp. In 1619 he entered into the service of the duke of Bavaria, and two years after, upon the death of his general, count Buequoy in the Hungarian campaign, he quitted the army, and travelled through the various countries on the borders of the Baltic. Upon his return to Paris, and, after visiting Switzerland and Italy, he applied himself to the study of philosophy with uncommon ardor, but he seemed to be in an unsettled wavering state by frequently changing his habitation, and fixing his residence sometimes at Amsterdam, sometimes near Franeker, and sometimes at Deventer. In 1637 appeared his four treatises concerning method, dioptrics, meteors, and geometry, and about this time he received a friendly and pressing invitation from sir Charles Cavendish to come and settle in England, which a few years before he had visited, but the troubles of the times, and the approaching civil war prevented his wishes. The invitations of Louis XIII. were not more successful, and Descartes refused to quit his retirement, though the French monarch liberally settled upon him a pension of 3000 livres. His reputation was now so well established that princes were anxious to court his good opinion, and to refer their literary disputes to his arbitration. He corresponded in a friendly manner with Elizabeth the daughter of the elector palatine, king of Bohemia; and Christina the celebrated queen of Sweden not only paid the most flattering testimony to his abilities, but pressed him in the most earnest terms to settle in her dominions. Descartes did not refuse the liberal invitation, he came to Stockholm in October 1648, and was admitted to the confidence of the queen, whom he attended every morning at five o'clock, to instruct her in philosophical knowledge. Sensible of the merit of the learned stranger, Christina formed the most generous plans for the instruction and improvement of her subjects, and in rewarding the philosopher with an handsome estate, and an annual pension of 3000 crowns, she meditated the establishment of a learned academy under his guidance as director, but death prevented these munificent intentions. Descartes died 11th February 1650, aged 54. His body was interred at Stockholm, but 17 years after it was removed to Paris, and deposited in the church of Genevieve du Mont. Descartes is deservedly esteemed as a man of genius, well acquainted with mathematics and philosophy, possessed of a strong mind capable of profound meditation, of patient inquiry, but not devoid of great warmth of imagination.

CARTIER, Jacques, a French navigator, who made important discoveries in Canada, was a native of St. Malo. After the voyage of the Cabots the French learned the value of their discoveries, and in a few years began the cod fishery upon the banks of Newfoundland. After some unsuccessful attempts, the importance of having a colony in the neighborhood of the fishing banks, induced Francis I. to send out Cartier in 1534. The king said, "the kings of Spain and Portugal are taking possession of the new world without giving me a part; I should be glad to see the artele in Adam's last will, which gives them America." Cartier sailed from St. Malo April 20 with two ships of sixty tons, and 122 men. On the tenth of May he came in sight of Bonavista on the Island of Newfoundland, but the ice obliged him to go to the south, and he entered a harbor at the distance of five leagues, to which he gave the name of St. Catharine. As soon as the season would permit, he sailed northward, and entered the straits of Bellisle. In this voyage he visited the greater part of the coast, which surrounds the gulf of St. Lawrence, and took possession of the country in the name of the king. He discovered a bay, which he called baye des Chaleurs, on account of the sultry weather which he experienced in it. He sailed so far into the great river, afterwards called the St. Lawrence, as to discover land on the opposite side. He returned home in September. It was determined to make a settlement in that part of America, which he had visited. In the following year he was equipped with three vessels, and a more ample commission. He sailed May 19, 1535. In sailing up the St. Lawrence he discovered an island, which he named Bacchus, but which is now called Orleans, in the neighborhood of Quebec. -He proceeded up the river as far as Hochelaga, a settlement upon an island, which he called Montroyal, but which is now called Montreal. In two or three days he set out on his return and arrived at St. Croix, now called Jacques Cartier's river. Here he passed the winter. Cartier's company suffered much from the scurvy, and a number died. In May, he set sail on his return to France, and arrived in July. Four years after a third expedition was projected. Francois de la Roche, lord of Roberval, was commissioned by the king as his lieutenant governor in Canada; and Cartier was appointed his pilot with the command of five ships. He sailed May 1540. He arrived at the haven of St. Croix, in the river St. Lawrence; about four leagues above that place, on a cliff at the east side of the mouth of a small river, he built a fort, which he called Charlesbourg. This was near Quebec. In the spring of 1542, he determined to return to France, and arrived at St. John's in Newfoundland on his way home. Here he met Roberval, who did not accompany him in his voyage, and who had been detained till this time. He was ordered to return to Canada, but he chose to pursue his voyage to France, and sailed out of the harbor privately in the night. Cartier published memoirs of Canada after his second voyage.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, a puritan of eminence, born in Hertfordshire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He devoted himself so rigorously to study that he did not allow himself more than five hours sleep in the night, a custom from which he never departed through life. When queen Elizabeth visited the university, Cartwright was among the few men of learning and eloquence who were selected to dispute before their sovereign, but his popularity as a preacher and a scholar was soon assailed when he ventured to inveigh against the ecclesiastical government of the church. The chancellor of the university, sir William Cecil, was directed by archbishop Grindal to proceed against him, and he was not only forbidden to propagate his doctrines, but deprived of the divinity Margaret professorship which he held, and of his fellowship at Trinity. Thus disgraced and exiled he travelled into Germany, and after establishing a correspondence with some of the learned men of the times, he was chosen minister of the English merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleburg. About two years after he returned to England by the sollicitations of his friends, and he boldly undertook the defence of the puritans, by publishing admonitions to the parliament. This pamphlet became popular, and received a spirited reply from Dr. Whitgift; but after a paper war continued with more acrimony than moderation, Cartwright found it safer to leave the kingdom, whilst his victorious opponent was raised to the see of Worcester. During the five years of his absence, he officiated as minister to the English factories, and he received a strong invitation from James VI. of Scotland to fill a professorship at St. Andrew's, which he declined. When he ventured to return to his country he was sent to prison but liberated by the interference of lord Burleigh and of the earl of Leicester, the last of whom made him master of his newly founded hospital at Warwick. Cartwright died 27th Dec. 1603, in his 68th year. His publications were mostly theological, and displayed his character as a man of great perseverance, extensive learning, and great eloquence.

CARTWRIGHT, William, a native of Northway near Tewksbury, educated at Cirencester and Westminster schools, and Christ church, Oxford. He was an eloquent and popular preacher, and was patronised by bishop Duppa. He was esteemed by Ben Jonson and the wits of the times. He wrote 4 plays—besides poems and sermons. He died 1644, aged 33.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, D. D. a prelate, born at Northampton, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. At the restoration he was made chaplain to the king, and prebendary of St. Paul's, and on Pierson's death raised to the see of Chester. He greatly favored the proceedings of James II. whom he accompanied on his flight to France, and afterwards to Ireland. He died at Dublin, 1689, aged 55, and was buried in great pomp in Christ church there. His sermons, &c. have been published.

CARTWRIGHT, George, colonel, was one of king Charles' commissioners to New England, with Nicolls, Carr, and Maverick in 1664. When the commissioners on their arrival at Boston informed the general court, that they should next day sit and hear a cause against the governor and company, the court published "by sound of trumpet," its disapprobation of this proceeding, and prohibited all persons from abetting it. Thus early and boldly was the note of liberty sounded. The commissioners finding that they had to do with stiff-necked men, soon went away in displeasure. In Cartwright's voyage to England in 1665, he was taken by the Dutch, lost his papers, and hardly escaped with his life. The loss of his papers was deemed a benefit to the colonies, as his prejudices were strong against them, and as the papers would have been employed for purposes of mischief.

CARVALHO D'ACOSTA, Anthony, a native of Lisbon, eminent for his knowledge of mathematics, hydrography, and astronomy; but more as the author of a topographical description of Portugal, in 3 vols. folio. To give accuracy to his work, he climbed mountains, traced the sources of rivers, and exhibited every thing with discriminating judgment. He wrote besides a complete compendium of geography, and a method of studying astronomy. He died 1715, aged 65, so poor, that his funeral expenses were publicly defrayed.

CARVER, John, first governor of Plymouth colony, was a native of England, and was among the emigrants to Leyden who composed Mr. Robinson's church in that place. When a removal to America was contemplated, he was appointed one of the agents to negotiate with the Virginia company in England for a suitable territory. He obtained a patent in 1619, and in the following year came to New England with the first company. As they arrived without the territory of the south Virginia company, from whom they had received the charter, which was rendered useless, it was thought best that a political association should be formed. A written instrument was drawn up and subscribed before they landed, and Mr. Carver was unanimously elected governor for one year. He conducted the affairs of the colony with great prudence, and discovered great address in his management of the natives. In the ensuing March he was confirmed as governor for another year. He died suddenly in April following.

CARVER, Jonathan, an enterprising traveller, was a native of Connecticut. He was intended for the profession of medicine, but he quitted it for a military life. He was an officer in the French war, and served with reputation till the peace of 1763. After this he spent two years and five months, in exploring the most interior parts of North America, and penetrated to the Pacific ocean, over that broad part of the continent, which lies between the forty third, and the forty sixth degrees of north latitude. He hoped to facilitate the discovery of a north west passage, or of a communication between Hudson's bay and the Pacific ocean. He arrived at Boston in Oct. 1768, after having travelled nearly seven thousand miles. He went to England for the purpose of publishing his journals and charts. Though he presented a petition to the king, even his expenses were never refunded to him. When his papers were almost ready for the press, under a permission he had obtained for their publication, an order in council required him to deliver them into the plantation office, to do which, he was compelled to repurchase them, from the bookseller, to whom he had sold them. About ten years afterwards he published an account of his travels. He died in abject want in London, 1780, aged 48.

CARUS, Marcus Aurelius, a Roman emperor after the death of Probus, 283. He defeated the Persians and Sarmasians, and was killed in his tent by lightning, or, as some assert, his tent was set on fire by his servants.

CARY, Robert, LL.D. was born at Cookington, Devon, and educated at Oxford. He was presented to the living of Portlemouth, in Devonshire, and for some time inclined to the tenets of the presbyterians, of whose provincial meetings he was chosen moderator. Upon the restoration he congratulated Charles II. and was made archdeacon of Exeter; but he was ejected in 1664, by the influence or intrigues of some of his enemies, and continued afterwards in retirement at his rectory where he died in 1688, aged 73. He published a chronological account of ancient times, in fol. 1677.

CARY, Lincius, eldest son of Henry first viscount Falkland, was born at Burford, Oxfordshire, 1610, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and St. John's, Cambridge. So laborious were his studies that before he reached his 23d year, he had read all the Greek and Latin fathers. He did not, however, neglect public affairs, he served in the army of Essex as a volunteer against the Scots, and in 1640 was chosen member of parliament for Newport, Hants, a place which he again represented in the next parliament. In this new scene the candor of the commons seemed so fair and plausible, that the unsuspecting Falkland inveighed against the arbitrary measures of the court, and declared himself a warm advocate for the prosecution of Strafford, and of Finch, and for the exclusion of the bishops from the house of peers. But reflection wrought a change in his political sentiments, and the next time that the disqualification of the bishops was mentioned in the house, he opposed it with firmness and dignity. On this occasion indeed his sincerity was suspected, but the goodness of his heart forbad the aspersion of his character, and when he received with indifference the compliments of the court to his loyalty, and manfully rejected the honors and offices which the sovereign proposed to confer upon him, it then became evident that his conduct was the effect of principle and not of party. To repeated solicitations he at last however yielded, and became secretary to the king; but in this high office, he refused to follow the practice of his predecessors, in encouraging and maintaining spies, and in opening suspected letters. Eager to support the cause of loyalty, he not only signed with other lords a declaration, that the king's intentions were friendly to the parliament, but he levied some soldiers for his service. The kindling of the civil wars and the violence of party seemed to operate powerfully upon his mind; instead of a serene, placid, and lively countenance, he now betrayed gloominess, inward sorrow, and dejection. Reserve succeeded to an affable behavior; the negligence of his dress and person fully evinced the great perturbation of his soul, and often in the midst of the deepest silence he would in agonizing accents exclaim peace, peace! Though obliged by his office to be near the king's person, yet he frequently exposed himself in the thickest of the battle, and observed to his friends, who wished to check his ardor, that his impatience for peace proceeded not from pusillanimity. This illustrious character was slain in battle, in his 34th year. His mind was amply stored with all the riches of ancient and modern literature, and the goodness of his heart was equal to the vast resources of his mind. He is the author of some poems—speeches in parliament—a discourse on episcopacy—on the infallibility of the church of Rome—and other pieces.

CARY, Henry, earl of Monmouth, grandson to lord Hunsdon, was cousin-german to Elizabeth, and was educated with Charles I. He suffered greatly by the civil wars. He translated from various authors seven folios, two octavos, and a 12mo. and died 13th June, 1661, aged 65.

CARY, Thomas, deputy governor of North Carolina for the proprietors, and collector of their quit rents, succeeded Daniel in the administration of the province, but was removed from his offices in 1709, for neglecting to account to his employers. He continued to sit in the council, and the next year attempted to resume the reins of government by force, in order that he might retain the treasures which were in his hands. He armed a band of insurgents, but was at length repulsed and his followers dispersed. He was carried to England for punishment, but was never tried.

CARYL, Joseph, a learned nonconformist, who wrote a tedious commentary on Job, in three vols. 4to. He was for some time member of Exeter college, and was a popular preacher at Lincoln's-inn, and some years after at St. Magnus, London-bridge. He was in favor with Cromwell, whom he attended as chaplain in Scotland, with Dr. Owen. He published several sermons, and died 1673.

CARYLL, John, a Roman catholic, probably born in Sussex. He was secretary to Mary, queen of James II. and he followed the fortunes of his fugitive master, by whom he was knighted, and created earl Caryll, baron Dartford. He was in England in the reign of queen Anne, and was intimate with Pope, to whom he recommended the subject of the Rape of the Lock, a poem which the poet inscribed to his catholic friend. He wrote two plays, besides a translation of the psalms of David. He was living in 1717.

CARYSFORT, John Joshua Proby, Earl of, the son of the first baron Carysfort, was born in August, 1751; was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge; obtained an Irish earldom in 1789, and an English peerage in 1801; held various state employments, among which were those of envoy to Berlin, and ambassador to St. Petersburg; and died on the 7th of April, 1828. His lordship was a man of taste, talent, and learning; great amenity of manners; and a truly benevolent heart. His Poems and Dramas, 2 vols. 8vo., contain many fine passages. He was also the author of two political pamphlets.

CASA, John de, an Italian writer of the 16th century, born at Florence. He was engaged in various negotiations under the popes, at Venice and other places, and was made archbishop of Benevento 1544. His works, in Latin and Italian, were much esteemed, and particularly among these his — Galateus, seu de morum elegantia, a poem printed at Hanover with notes in 8vo. 1603. He wrote besides some beautiful Italian poems, the lives of cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and various other works, collected together at Venice in 5 vols. 4to. 1723. He died at Rome, 1556, aged 53.

CASANOVA, Mark Anthony, a Latin poet of Rome, who in his imitations of Martial displayed great keenness of satire, and severity of wit. He also imitated Catullus in the illustrious characters of ancient Rome. His poems are in the Deliciae poetarum Italorum. He died 1527.

CASAS, Bartholomew de las, a Spanish prelate, of a noble family, was born at Seville, in 1474, and, at the age of nineteen, visited the new world with his father. On his return to Spain he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, that he might act as a missionary in the western hemisphere. Having settled in St. Domingo, "he spent his days there in preaching the gospel to the Indians, and humanity to their oppressors." In truth, his whole existence, for half a century, was devoted to struggling with the Spanish tyrants, and consoling the persecuted natives. Twelve times he crossed the ocean, to plead at the foot of the Spanish throne the cause of the wretched Indians. Las Casas was bishop of Chiapa, but he resigned his see in 1551, and returned to his native country, where he died, at Madrid, in 1566. It has been asserted that he gave rise to the horrible traffic in African slaves, in order to save the American Indians from slavery; but this calumny is refuted by Gregoire, and by passages in his own writings. Of his works, which form five quarto parts, the most celebrated is his Short Narrative of the Destruction of the Indies.

CASATI, Paul, a native of Placentia, who died at Parma, 1707, aged 90. He was one of the Jesuits, and his great learning recommended him to queen Christina of Sweden, whom he persuaded to abjure her religion and turn catholic. His writings are mostly on mathematical subjects, besides a valuable treatise on optics, which he wrote, when 88 years old, and blind.

CASAUBON, Isaac, a celebrated critic and calvinist theologian, was born at Geneva, in 1559, and made an early and extraordinary progress in his classical studies. After having held the chair of Greek professor at Geneva for fourteen years, he removed to Montpellier, and thence to Paris, where Henry IV. appointed him royal librarian. On the death of Henry, Casaubon settled in England, where James I. made him a prebend of Westminster and Canterbury, and gave him a pension. He died in 1614, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His liberality of feeling induced many to accuse him wrongfully of leaning towards popery. He published editions of Strabo, Polyænus, Aristotle, Theophrastus, Polybius, and several other ancient authors; and produced some original works, among which are nearly one thousand two hundred letters.

CASAUBON, Meric, son of the preceding, was born at Geneva 14th August 1599. He was educated first at Sedan, and afterwards, when his father came to England, at Christ church, where he became student, and took his degrees. His defence of his father against the catholics in 1621, made him known to king James, and sometime after he was presented to the living of Bledon in Somersetshire by bishop Andrews, and 1628 to a prebend of Canterbury, and afterwards to other benefices by the patronage of his friend Laud. The violence of the civil wars, however, robbed him of all his preferment, and he was not only persecuted as a suspicious person, but imprisoned. He was however solicited by Christina of Sweden to come and preside over her universities, with a handsome salary, but he declined the honorable offer, and chose rather to live in England, though without the prospect of future independence. At the restoration, Casaubon was reinstated in all his ecclesiastical preferments, which he enjoyed till his death, July 4th, 1671, in his 72d year.

CASIMIR MATTHIAS SARBIEUSKI, a Jesuit of Poland, professor of philosophy and theology at Wilna, whose Latin odes, epodes, and epigrams, are little inferior to the delicate and elegant productions of the best poets of Greece and Rome. Grotius and others have indeed set his fame above that of Horace, but many critics, though fully sensible of his great merit, do not elevate his compositions to so high a rank. He was preacher to king Ladislaus V. and died at Warsaw, second April, 1640, aged 45, and unfortunately before he had completed his Lesciade, a heroic poem in 12 books, in imitation of Virgil. His poems have been frequently edited. The best edition is Barbou's, 1759, 12mo.

CASLON, William, an eminent letter founder, born in 1692, at Hales Owen in Shropshire. He was originally apprentice to an engraver of ornaments on gun-barrels, a business which he carried on, and to which he added the making of tools for book-binders, and for chasing of silver plate. The neat lettering of a book exposed to sale in a bookseller's shop, accidentally recommended him to the friendship of Mr. Bowyer, who encouraged him in undertaking a letter foundry. His ingenuity soon procured a large and increasing concern: he was engaged to cut the fount for the printing of the new testament in Arabic, for the use of the poorer Christians in the east, and he executed his fount of English letters with such neatness and elegance that types were no longer imported from Holland, but by exceeding the productions of the best artificers, large demands for exportation to the continent, evinced the great superiority of English workmanship. He died 23d June, 1766, aged 74.

CASSAS, Louis Francis, a French painter and architect, born in 1756, at Azay le Feron, a pupil of Vien and the younger Lagrenez, was inspector general and professor of drawing at the Gobelins manufactory. He explored Istria, Dalmatia, Syria, and Palestine; and published the result of his observations in two splendid works, folio, with numerous plates, under the titles of Picturesque Travels in Istria and Dalmatia, and Picturesque Travels in Phenicia and Palestine. He died in 1827.

CASSERIO, Julio, a native of Placentia. Though of poor parentage his employment as domestic in the family of Fabricius ab aqua-pendente proved the beginning of his fame. He was instructed by his master, and proved so able an assistant that he afterwards succeeded him as professor of anatomy and medicine at Padua. He wrote de vocis auditusque organis historia, fol. 1600—anatomical tables,—and other works, and died 1616.

CASSINI, John Dominic, a native of Nice, was born in 1625. His attention was first turned to the study of the heavenly bodies by the chance perusal of a work on astrology, and he soon became so consummate an astronomer that, at the age of twenty-five, he was chosen to fill the astronomical chair in the university of Bologna. He held this office for many years, and while at Bologna, traced a new meridian line, in the church of St. Petronius. The pope also employed him as inspector of the fortifications of fort Urbino, and the senate of Bologna placed under his superintendence the navigation of the Po. In 1669 Colbert invited him to France, where he intended to remain only six years, but he was ultimately prevailed upon to take up his permanent residence there. He died in 1712, having been blind for some years. Cassini stands high as an astronomer. Among other things, he solved a problem by which Kepler had been foiled; ascertained the true nature of comets; continued the French meridian line; made valuable observations on the sun, Mars, Venus, and Jupiter; and discovered the zodiacal light and four of the satellites of Saturn.

CASSINI, James, born at Paris, in 1667, succeeded his father as royal astronomer, and proved himself the worthy heir of his parent's situation and abilities. He made various important discoveries, and proceeded with the meridian line which his father had continued. He died in 1756. In his work On the Magnitude and Figure of the Earth, he erroneously maintained, in opposition to Newton, that the form of the globe is an oblate spheroid. This gave rise to the scientific expeditions for measuring a degree in the polar circle and at the equator. Among his other productions is, Elements of Astronomy.

CASSINI DE THURY, Cæsar Francis, a son of James, was born, in 1714, at Paris, and died, of small pox, in 1784. He was director of the French Observatory, and a member of various scientific societies. In talent he proved himself no degenerate scion of his race. Even when he was only ten years old, he possessed extensive astronomical knowledge. His great labor is his Map of France, in 182 sheets, which has served as a model for all subsequent works of the same kind. He is also the author of various productions on astronomical subjects, or connected with them.

CASTAGNO, Andrew del, a painter of Tuscany. He obtained the secret of painting in oil from Dominico de Venise, and afterwards conceived such hatred against him, that one evening he assassinated him. Dominico, who knew not his murderer, hastened to the house of his perfidious friend, and expired in his arms. The bloody deed remained undiscovered, till Castagno revealed it on his death bed, and drew upon his memory the execution of his country. He finished, in 1478, at the request of the Florentine republic, the execution of the conspirators against the Medicis.

CASTALDI, Cornelius, a native of Feltri, eminent as a poet. He executed with success an embassy to the republic of Venice, and founded a college at Padua, where he died 1537, aged 57. His poems, consisting of Latin and Italian pieces, are much esteemed, and were edited by abbé Conti in 1757, in 4to.

CASTALIO, Sebastian, born at Chatillon on the Rhone, was the friend of Calvin, by whose influence he became regent in the college of Geneva. He translated the bible into elegant Latin, and displayed his various and extensive knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew by several other publications. His opinions with respect to Solomon's song and Christ's descent into hell, and about predestination and grace, procured him many enemies; and he at last incurred the displeasure of Calvin and of Theodore Beza, who reviled him as a papist. His colloquia sacra, in elegant Latin, appeared in four vols. 12mo.

CASTEL, Lewis Bertrand, a Jesuit and geometrician of Montpellier, who, through his abilities, became the friend of Fontenelle, and other learned men. He published some very ingenious works, but his vrai systeme de physique generale de Newton, in 4to. 1743, gained him universal and deserved reputation as a philosopher and a man of science. His optic of colors, 12mo.—his treatise on gravity, 2 vols. 12mo.—and his system of mathematics, 4to. were also much esteemed. He died 757, aged 69.

CASTELL, Edmund, D.D. a learned divine, born in 1606, at Hatley, Cambridgeshire, and educated at Emanuel college. He was afterwards removed to St. John's for the convenience of the library in the compilation of his lexicon heptaglotton, a valuable work, in the completion of which he was assiduously engaged for 17 years, and upon which he expended upwards of 12,000*l*. Such sacrifices in the cause of learning deserved high and liberal patronage, but his preference was at first only the small vicarage of Hatfield Paverell in Essex, afterwards the rectory of Wodeham Walter, and then that of Higham Gobion, Bedfordshire. Some time after he became king's chaplain, professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and prebendary of Canterbury. The lexicon was published 1669; but the work, though much commended, remained almost entirely unsold upon his hands. Though thus discouraged, he yet devoted himself to the cultivation of oriental literature, and assisted in a very extensive degree the labors of Dr. Walton, in the publication of his polyglott bible. Dr. Castell died 1685, aged 79.

CASTALVETRO, Lewis, a learned Italian of Modena. It is said that he was engaged the half of his life in his commentary on Aristotle's poetics. As he had travelled in Germany he was suspected of having embraced the tenets of Luther, and being brought before the inquisition at Rome, he made his escape from the punishment which awaited him, and fled to Basil, where he devoted himself to literature, and died 20th Feb. 1571, aged 66.

CASTI, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born in 1721, at Montefiascone, in the Papal territory. After having been professor of Greek and Latin at his native place, he obtained a canonry in the cathedral of Montefiascone. Being fond of travelling, he visited several foreign countries. At the death of Metastasio, Casti was appointed imperial poet laureat; but he resigned this office on the decease of Joseph II. In 1798 he settled at Paris, and he died there in February, 1803. To the latest period of life he retained all the vivacity of youth. He is the author of numerous Tales and minor poems; a Satire upon the Russian Court; and three burlesque operas; but his great work is, The Speaking Animals, a satirical poem in 26 cantos; a part of which has been imitated by Mr. Stewart Rose. Though not always decorous, his poetry is full of wit, gaiety, and elegance.

CASTIGLIONE, Balthazar, an Italian nobleman, born Dec. 6th, 1478, at Casatico in the duchy of Mantua. After receiving a very liberal education, he served in the army, under Sforza, duke of Milan, and afterwards was engaged by duke Urbino, as his ambassador to pope Julius II. and afterwards to Lewis XII. of France, and Henry VII. of England. He published at Rome 1516 his celebrated "Courtier," a work highly admired for its moral and political instructions, and for the elegance of the Italian. The abilities of Castiglione proved very serviceable to the holy see, and were employed in several negotiations with Charles V. and Francis I. He died at Toledo, 2d Feb. 1529, and by order of Charles V. who admired and respected him, his funeral was solemnized with the greatest pomp. Sixteen months after, the body was removed by his mother from Toledo, to a church at Mantua which he himself had built, and an epitaph was inscribed on a sumptuous monument by cardinal Bembo.—Besides the Courtier, Castiglione wrote some very elegant Latin and Tuscan poems, inserted in the deliciae poet. Ital. His letters appeared at Padua, in 2 vols. 1769.

CASTRIES, N. Marshal de, an able French general, who served with distinction in the seven years war. He was called to the assembly of the notables in 1787, but disapproved of the violent conduct of his colleagues, and left France. He died at Wolfenbutel in Brunswick, Jan. 1800.

CASTRO, John de, a native of Lisbon, who, after serving against the Moors, went with Gama to the east, and published a description of the Red sea. When he returned to Europe he was appointed over a fleet, and went with Charles V. against Tunis, and afterwards was sent as governor of the East Indies by the Portuguese government. He died at Diu, which he had rendered almost impregnable 1548, aged 48.

CASTRO, Paul de, a native of Castro, professor of law at Florence, Bologna, Sienna, and Padua. His works possessed great merit, and were edited in 8 vols. fol. He died 1437. It became proverbial to say of him, after the words of Cujas, qui non habet Paulum de Castro, tunicam vendat et emat.

CASTRUCIO, Castracani, a celebrated monk, who was a foundling, discovered by the monk Antonia, and his sister Dianora, in a heap of leaves in a vineyard, at Lucca in Tuscany, in 1284. He was tenderly brought up by the humanity of his preservers, and intended for the church; but his fondness for bold exertions and military exercises made him prefer the profession of arms. He entered in his 18th year as a lieutenant in the army of the Ghibelins, whom the party of the Guelfs had just driven from Pavia. The valor and coolness which he displayed recommended him to the good opinion of Guinigi the general, and he soon rose, though opposed and even imprisoned by his enemies, to the highest honor, and was at last declared by the people of Lucca their sovereign prince. Beloved at home and respected abroad, he now meditated the extension of his power over the neighboring states, and though flattered by the pope, he did not dissolve into effeminate luxury, or betray tyrannical oppression. The Florentines, however, viewed his elevation with jealous enmity, and 30,000 foot, and 10,000 horse appeared in the field, 22,000 of which the active general destroyed, with the loss of only 1600 of his own men. But here fortune checked the career of his greatness; fatigued after the bloody contest, and regardless of a chill north wind which blew upon him, he was seized with an ague, which carried him off in a few days, when he expected to rise to the sovereignty of Italy. He died in his 44th year, 1328, admired in his life-time, and regretted after his death.

CASWELL, Richard, governor of North Carolina. He was a member of the first congress 1774. In 1776 he was at the head of a regiment, and was engaged by a body of loyalists under gen. Mc Donald, at a place called Moore's creek bridge. Mc Donald was defeated, and taken prisoner by Caswell, with the loss of 70 men in killed and wounded, and 1500 excellent rifles. This victory was of eminent service to the American cause in North Carolina. He was president of the convention, which formed the constitution of North Carolina in Dec. 1776, under which constitution he was governor from 1777 to 1780, and from 1785 to 1787. He died 1789.

CAT, Claude Nicholas le, a native of Bleraucourt in Picardy, intended for the church, but finally educated as a surgeon. In 1725 he published a letter on the aurora borealis of that year, and in 1731 he became the surgeon of the hotel Dieu at Rouen, where, five years after, he formed a public school of anatomy, and a literary society of which he became the secretary. He was pensioned with 2000 livres by the French king in 1759, and seven years after raised to the rank of nobility. He wrote on the theory of hearing 1753, 8vo.—on the nervous fluid, 1765, 8vo.—on astrology, 1767, 8vo. and on the senses, 2 vols. 12mo., and died 1768, aged 68.

CATESBY, Mark, an English naturalist. He resided for seven years in Virginia, and made such a collection of natural curiosities, that, at the request of sir Hans Sloane, and other friends, he visited the Carolinas, and the Bahama islands, for the improvement of knowledge. On his return to England, 1726, he gave to the public his natural history of Carolina, Florida, and the Bahamas, 2 vols. fol. with colored plates, of his own execution. He was honorably made fellow of the royal society, whose transactions he enriched with a paper on the migration of birds. He died in London, 1749, aged 69. His great work was again edited in 1754 and in 1771.

CATHARINE of Arragon, daughter of Ferdinand V. of Castille, married Arthur, son of Henry VII. in 1501, and on his death, five months after, Henry afterwards the VIIIth. Her conduct as a wife was most exemplary, and her many virtues place her character in the most amiable point of view. Her divorce from Henry, who had fallen in love with Anne Boleyn, produced the reformation of England. She wrote some religious pieces, and died at Kimbolton, universally respected.

CATHARINE de Medicis, queen of France, daughter of Lorenzo de Medicis, duke of Urbino, married, in 1534, Henry duke of Orleans, son of Francis I. Though at first she had no children, afterwards she had ten, three of whom became successively kings of France, and a daughter, queen of Navarre. Her husband died 1559; and during the short reign of her son Francis, she obtained no influence in the cabinet, from the superior power of the Guises; but on the elevation of Charles IX. then only 11 years of age, the queen-mother became the regent, and showed the infamous features of her mind by the dreadful murders of St. Bartholomew. Despised for her cruelties and perfidy, and the slave of lust, this worthless and too powerful woman died 1589, aged 70.

CATHARINE Alexievna, empress of Russia, a native of Ringen, in Livonia, born of obscure parents. She was early instructed in the house of a Lutheran clergyman; but his death, and that of her mother, left her destitute, and she retired to Marienburg. There, in 1701, she espoused a dragoon of the Swedish fortress in that city; but, on the day of her nuptials, and before their consummation, the unhappy bridegroom fell in the field of battle, and the captive Catharine became the property of general Bauer, who saw and admired her beauty. She was afterwards in the service of prince Meutshicof, and, in her 17th year, she became the mistress of Peter the great, and so much captivated him that, on the 29th of May, 1711, he privately married her, and on the 12th of the following February announced her as his empress in his capital. On his death, in 1725, she was proclaimed as sovereign of all the Russias: and she deserved the high dignity. The grand designs of the czar were completed by her extraordinary genius, and a mild system of government insured her the affection and respect of her subjects. She died 17th May, 1727, aged 38. Notwithstanding the noble qualities of her character, and the great services which she rendered to her husband, especially at the affair of Pruth, she was suspected of being faithless to his bed, and a French favorite, de la Croix, the chamberlain of the court, was beheaded by the irritated husband, and his body exposed to public view with great ignominy.

CATHARINE II., empress of Russia, was daughter of Christian Augustus of Anhalt-Zerbst, in Upper Saxony, and, at the age of 14, she married the duke of Holstein, afterwards Peter III. After some years she became the mother of a son and daughter; but the mental imbecility of her husband rendered Catharine dissatisfied and faithless, and, on the death of the empress, in 1762, the young monarch soon found an ambitious rival, instead of a submissive consort. By a well managed plot she seized her husband, July 14, 1762, and after three days' confinement he expired in the castle of Robscha, whilst his murderer proclaimed herself as sole sovereign empress, and insured the stability of her government by the wisest and most popular measures. To remove every obstacle, prince Iwan, grandson of Peter, an inoffensive youth, was secretly cut off; and the empress, sure of the tranquillity of her dominions, imposed on Poland her favorite, prince Poniatowski, as king, by the name of Stanislaus Augustus, in 1764. Great as a sovereign, but dissolute as a woman, Catharine was engaged for ten years in a Turkish war, and lastly with the Swedes, whilst at home she indulged herself in the most sensual gratifications, in the company of favorites, whom, however, she rewarded with profuse liberality. The patronage which she extended to genius and literature, and the benevolent motives which influenced her government in all internal affairs, will always appear as illustrious features in the character of Catharine. The bloody capture of Ismael, however, and the partition of Poland, must excite indignation against her conduct, as proceeding from the same corrupted heart which waded to the throne over the carcass of a murdered husband. She died suddenly of an apoplectic fit 10th November, 1797, and was succeeded by her son Paul, who in 1800 was succeeded by Alexander.

CATHRALL, Isaac, M.D. a physician in Philadelphia, studied in that city, and in London, Edinburgh and Paris, and returned home in 1798. During the prevalence of the yellow fever in that year, and in 1797, 1798, and 1799, he remained at his post, and even dissected those who died of the disease. He died 1819, aged 56. He published remarks on the yellow fever, 1794; Buchan's domestic medicine, with notes, 1797; memoir on the analysis of the black vomit, showing that it might be safely tasted, 1800, in 5th vol. of the transactions of the Amer. philosoph. society; and a pamphlet on the yellow fever, in conjunction with Dr. Carris in 1802.

CATILINA, Lucius Sergius, a noble Roman, famous for his debaucheries, his intrigues, and the dangerous conspiracy which he formed against the happiness and the existence of his country. Cicero, who was then consul, happily discovered the whole plot; and Cataline, mad with revenge, left Rome, and repaired to the army, which was assembling under his auspices. This was soon attacked, and defeated, by the consular forces; and Cataline fell in the number of the slain, B.C. 62.

CATINAT, Nicholas, one of the most celebrated of the French generals, was born at Paris, in 1637. He was brought up to the bar, but relinquished the gown, in consequence of his losing a just cause. Entering the army, he distinguished himself on innumerable occasions, and was raised to the rank of lieutenant general in 1688. The victories of Staffarda and Marsaglia over the duke of Savoy gained for him the dignity of marshal; and that well earned dignity excited the envy and hatred of many of his unworthy rivals. In 1701, from causes over which he had no control, he was unsuccessful against Prince Eugene in Italy. He died in 1712. Catinat was as remarkable for his virtues as for his military talents. He was disinterested, modest, sincere, and pious.

CATO, Marcus Porcius Censorius, an illustrious Roman, known for his temperance, virtue, and valor. He served his country in various provinces and in various offices, and displayed his hatred against Carthage, by the fatal exclamation of "delenda est Carthago." He was distinguished not only as a soldier, but as an historian, and died about 150 years B.C.

CATO, Marcus Portius Uticensis, was great grandson of the censor, and possessed the same integrity, the same heroic firmness, and the same attachment to his country. He boldly opposed the conspiracy of Cataline, and the ambition of Cæsar, and moved the thanks of the senate with the appel.

lation of father of his country, to Cicero for his public services. Defeated with the republicans at Pharsalia, he fled to Africa, and rather than fall into the hands of his enemy Cæsar, whose power he could no longer oppose, he destroyed himself at Utica, after reading Plato's treatise on the immortality of the soul, B.C. 45.

CATZ, James, a native of Zealand, known as a politician, but more as a poet. During Cromwell's usurpation his abilities were employed by his countrymen as ambassador to London. On his return he retired to his favorite studies in one of his country houses where he died 1660, aged 83. His poems, which are in Dutch, are highly esteemed by his countrymen. The last edition was in 1756, 2 vols. folio.

CAVALIER, John, son of a peasant at Cevennes, is famous for his bravery in the wars of the Camisards, or protestant insurgents against Lewis XIV. At the head of an enthusiastic multitude he defeated the bravest of the king's troops, though commanded by the greatest generals. Villars, at last concluded a truce with him, and he was received into the pay and protection of the king, but fearing treachery, he quitted France, and went to England. He greatly distinguished himself afterwards in Spain, especially at the battle of Almanza, and was made governor of Jersey, where it is supposed that he died about 1705.

CAVALLO, Tiberius, an eminent philosopher, was the son of a physician at Naples, and born there in 1749. Being intended for trade he was sent to England in 1771, but the study of philosophy superseded that of commerce, and he devoted himself wholly to scientific pursuits. In 1779 he was admitted a member of the Neapolitan Academy, and he was also a fellow of the Royal Society, to whose transactions he communicated a number of valuable papers. His separate works are—1. A complete treatise of Electricity, 1777, 8vo.; enlarged to 3 vols. in 1795.—2. An essay on the Theory and Practice of Medical Electricity, 8vo.—3. A treatise on the nature and properties of Air, with an introduction to Chemistry, 4to.—4. The history and practice of Aerostation, 8vo.—5. Mineralogical Fables, fol.—6. A treatise on Magnetism, 8vo.—7. Description of the Micrometer invented by him, 8vo.—8. An essay on the medicinal properties of Facitious Airs, 8vo. He died in London in 1809.

CAVANILLES, Antonio Joseph, a Spanish botanist, was born at Valencia in 1745. He was educated among the Jesuits, became an ecclesiastic, and was appointed tutor to the sons of the duke de P'infantado, whom he accompanied to Paris, where he resided twelve years, and became associated with Jussieu. In 1801 he was intrusted with the care of the royal garden at Madrid, where he died in 1804. He published—1. Observations sur l'article Espagne, de le nouvelle Encyclopedie.—2. Dissertation upon Monadelphous Plants, 4to. in Latin.—3. Icones et descriptiones Plantarum quæ aut sponte in Hispania crescant, aut in hortis hospitantur, 6 vols. fol.—4. History of the kingdom of Valencia, 2 vols. fol. He has also many valuable papers in the work entitled "Annales de Ciencias Naturales," published at Madrid.

CAVE, Dr. William, was born in 1637, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge. He was successively minister of Hasely Oxfordshire, Great Alhallows, and Islington near London, and afterwards chaplain to Charles II. and in 1684 canon of Windsor. Among his works were an history of the lives, acts, deaths, &c. of the Christian fathers during the three first centuries of the church, and his historia literaria, published in 1688, containing an account of all writers either against or in favor of christianity to the 14th century, two works which engaged him in a controversial and important dispute with Le Clerc. He died 1713, and was buried at Islington.

CAVE, Edward, a native of Warwickshire, was born at Newton, in 1691, and educated at Rugby School. After having been a clerk to a collector of the excise, he learned the trade of a printer, and occasionally wrote for the newspapers. He obtained the situation of clerk of the franks to the post-office, but was dismissed in consequence of his having too rigidly performed his duty. In 1731, he established the Gentleman's Magazine, the parent of modern periodicals, and had the happiness to succeed to the fullest extent of his wishes. He died in 1754.

CAVENDISH, Thomas, was born at Frimly, in Suffolk, and allied to a noble family. He determined to repair, at the expense of the Spaniards, his fortune, which youthful extravagance had ruined, and with two ships which he built, one of 120 and the other of 60 tons, with a bark of 40 tons, he sailed from Plymouth 21st July 1586. After crossing the straits of Magellan, he began to enrich himself by the many prizes which he made in the Pacific Ocean, and especially by an Acapulco ship, which he burned, after taking 60,000*l.* of gold from her cargo. Having thus surrounded the globe, he returned to Plymouth on the 9th September 1588; but the many riches which he brought home were soon quickly wasted away, and three years after he again embarked in pursuit of new adventures and fresh prizes. He reached the straits of Magellan April 8, 1592, but the tempestuous weather obliged him to return, and the ill success of his expedition so preyed upon his heart that he died of grief on the coast of Brazil.

CAVENDISH, sir William, a gentleman of Suffolk, known as gentleman usher in the splendid establishment of cardinal Wolsey's household. His attachment to his patron was so sincere, that he refused to abandon him even in his disgrace; and this proof of fidelity was observed by Henry VIII. who took him under his protection, knighted him, and conferred upon him several important and lucrative offices. He continued in favor at the court of Edward VI. and with his successor Mary, and died 1557, aged about 52. Sir William was the progenitor of the dukes of Devonshire and Newcastle. He published a life of his patron Wolsey, in which he extols him as a great and perfect character.

CAVENDISH, William, Duke of Newcastle, grandson of the preceding, was born in 1592. His person and elegant manners recommended him to the favor of James I. by whom he was made knight of the bath, and baron Ogle, and viscount Mansfield. Charles I. likewise patronized him, and created him earl of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and appointed him governor to the prince of Wales. Buckingham envied, but could not prevent, the king's partiality; for Cavendish displayed not only the courtier but the loyal subject; and he not only entertained Charles at Welbeck, on his march against the Scots, but he presented him with 10,000*l.* and a body of 200 knights, serving at their own charges, and commanded by himself. The disastrous event of the royal cause at last alarmed Cavendish, and after the battle of Marston-moor he fled to Scarborough, from whence he passed to Hanburgh, and afterwards to Amsterdam and Paris. Though an exile, he early foresaw the fall of the commonwealth; and he returned with the king, by whom he was created duke of Newcastle. He died on Christmas-day, 1676, aged 84.

CAVENDISH, William, first duke of Devonshire, was born 25th January 1640. He sat, when of age, in the long parliament, for Derbyshire, and in 1665 he accompanied the Duke of York as a volunteer in the fleet. Four years after, he was in the suite of Montague, the ambassador to France; and when at the opera at Paris, he was rudely insulted, and severely wounded by three of the king's officers; a heinous offence, which was pardoned only by his earnest intercession for the culprits. In his conduct in parliament, Cavendish was bold, manly, and patriotic; he promoted the inquiry into the murder of sir Edmonbury Godfrey; he supported the impeachment of Danby and of Scraggs; and not only appeared at the trial of lord Russel personally, to vindicate his character, but, after his condemnation, he offered to exchange clothes with him; a proposal which was generously refused. In the arbitrary reign of James, he preserved the same unyielding spirit; and when personally insulted by colonel Culpepper, the favorite of the king, he, though in the presence chamber, took him by the nose, and dragged him out of the room. This insult offered to the royal residence was denounced in the king's bench, and the offender was fined 30,000*l.* and, though a peer, imprisoned till the mulct was discharged. He, however, escaped to Chatsworth; and when seized by the sheriff of the county, he gave him for the faithful payment a bond, which William III. afterwards cancelled. The tyranny of James now induced Cavendish, with other peers, to invite the prince of Orange to invade the kingdom; and on his landing, he joined him with a respectable number of followers, and ever after deserved and enjoyed his fullest confidence. At the coronation of William and Mary he acted as lord high steward; and, 1691, he attended the monarch to the Hague, where, with all the magnificence of an English nobleman, he entertained several sovereign princes at his table. In 1694 he was created duke of Devonshire, and, during the king's absence, he was always nominated one of the lords justices. Under Anne, he was engaged in the settlement of the act of union with Scotland. He died 18th August 1707, and was succeeded by his son, the marquis of Hartington. Cavendish was an elegant scholar, as well as an able statesman; and Chatsworth remains a noble specimen of his taste and genius. He wrote poetry with great ease, and his ode on the death of queen Mary, and his allusion to the archbishop of Cambray's supplement to Homer, are still deservedly commended.

CAVENDISH, Hon. Henry, son of lord Charles, (who was brother to the third duke of Devonshire) and the lady Anne Grey, third daughter of Henry duke of Kent, was born at Nice in 1731. He received his education first under Dr. Newcome, at Hackney, and next at Cambridge, where he applied solely to scientific pursuits, particularly chemistry and natural philosophy. In 1760 he ascertained the extreme levity of inflammable air, now called hydrogen gas, which discovery has given rise to many experiments, particularly in aerial navigation. He also made the important discovery of the composition of water by the union of two airs, which laid the foundation of the modern system of chemistry. He was also an excellent mathematician and astronomer, as his valuable papers in the philosophical transactions abundantly prove. He was a man of extreme modesty, and reserved even to his own relations; so that by living a recluse life, and never marrying, his property accumulated to the sum of one million two hundred thousand pounds. He died at his house on Clapham Common, February 24, 1810.

CAUSSIN, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit, born at Troyes, counsellor to Lewis XIII. He opposed Richelieu, by whom he was dismissed from attendance on the king's person, and banished to a town of Lower Britany. He was permitted to return to Paris after the cardinal's death; and he died in the Jesuits' convent July 1651, aged 71. He published several works in French and Latin. His book de sacrâ et profanâ eloquentiâ, is well known in England, and his "court sainte" has been translated into almost every language of Europe.

CAWTON, Thomas, born at Colchester, was educated at Rotterdam and Utrecht, and afterwards at Merton college, Oxford, and declaring himself a nonconformist, he began to preach to a dissenting congregation at Westminster. He died of a consumption in 1677, aged about 40. He was a good Hebrew scholar, on which language he wrote a dissertation, besides a treatise on divine providence—a discourse on the Syriac version—and the life of his father, who was minister of St. Bartholomew, behind the Exchange, who had been accused of being concerned in Love's plot against Cromwell, and who had therefore fled to Holland, where he died, at Rotterdam, 1659. The father, who bore the same name, was a good Hebraist, and gave assistance to the compilation of the polyglott bible, and to Castel's polyglott lexicon.

CAXTON, William, a man worthy to be held in immortal memory, as the first who gave to England the means for the diffusion of knowledge, was born in the weald of Kent, about 1410. Having been brought up a mercer, he was employed by the Mercers' Company as their agent in the Netherlands; a situation which he filled during twenty-three years. He also negotiated a commercial treaty between Edward IV. and the duke of Burgundy, and was subsequently in the service of Lady Margaret, the duke's wife. He had learned the art of printing, and, at the request of the duchess, he translated The Recuevell of the Historyes of Troye, from the French, and printed it, in 1471, at Cologne. This is the earliest typographical production in English, and is now so scarce that, at the Roxburgh sale, a copy of it sold for £1060. He returned to England, but in what year is uncertain. It must, however, have been previous to 1474, as he then had a press in Westminster Abbey. The first book executed in this country, was the Game and Playe of the Chesse. Caxton continued his labors for nearly twenty years, and is supposed to have died about 1492.

CAYLUS, Anne Claude count de, a French writer, born at Paris 1692. Distinguished as a soldier in Catalonia and at Friburg, he left the army at the peace of Rastadt, and travelled to Italy and the Levant. His "relics" of Egyptian and other antiquities, in 7 vols. 4to. 1752-67, is a most valuable work. He wrote also, besides a description of the gems in the royal cabinet, the lives of celebrated painters and engravers of the French academy; and, from a passage in Pliny, discovered the ancient mode of encaustic painting, and of tinging marble. He died 1765.

CAZALES, James Anthony Maria de, one of the most eloquent of modern French orators, was born, in 1752, at Grenade sur la Garonne; and served for some time as a captain of cavalry. In the States General, and in the National Assembly, he was one of the most active and most highly gifted of the defenders of the monarchy. The talent of extempore speaking he possessed in an extraordinary degree; and in eloquence he was the rival of Mirabeau. After having twice emigrated, and fought in the campaign of 1792, he returned to France in 1801, and died in 1805. In private life he was one of the most honorable and amiable of men. By Burke he was held in high estimation.

CAZOTTE, James, a native of Dijon, mayor of Pierry, near Epernay. He was, for his loyalty to the king, drawn to the abbaye prison, in 1792; and when the fatal month of September came, his daughter, aged 17, who had shared his confinement and misfortunes, accompanied him to the bloody tribunal, where assassins mocked the forms of justice. The blows aimed at the father were repelled by the heroic daughter, and with such effect, that the murderers, astonished at her conduct, permitted her and her trembling parent to escape. A few days after, however, Cazotte was again arrested, on suspicion, and condemned to die. He was guillotined 25th September 1792, aged 72. He wrote some things in prose and verse, which have appeared in 6 vols. 12mo. and 2 vols. 8vo.

CECIL, William, lord Burleigh, was born at Bourn, Lincolnshire, 1521, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. From Cambridge he removed to Gray's inn, and applied himself with such great assiduity, that he soon became distinguished at the bar. In Mary's reign, his abilities were respected, and though he had favored the cause of Jane Gray, yet the queen often consulted him, though not in office, and he retained the good opinion of her ministers. Under Elizabeth, he became again secretary, and besides master of the courts of wards, and chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1571 was created lord Burleigh. He died August 1598, aged 78. Though twenty-seven years high treasurer of England, he yet died not opulent; and while he managed with honest frugality the revenues of the kingdom, he, with inflexible integrity, disdained to enrich himself by base and dishonorable means. His state papers were published by Haynes 1740, and a continuation by Murdin 1760.

CELLARIUS, Christopher, a learned man, born at Malcalde in Franconia. He applied himself to classical learning and the oriental languages at the university of Jena, where he took his degree of D.D. 1666. The following year, he became professor of Hebrew and moral philosophy at Weisenthal, and in 1673 he was appointed rector of Weimar college, and three years after removed to Zeitz; and in 1678 he accepted the rectory of Mersbourg college, where his fame soon drew around him a respectable number of students. Though extremely partial to Mersbourg, yet he was prevailed upon by the king of Prussia to become professor of eloquence and history in the newly founded college of Halle, in 1693, and here he composed the best part of his works, till unceasing application hastened the imbecilities of old age, and carried him off in 1703, aged 69. His works were very numerous and valuable, and chiefly on geography, history, grammar, and the oriental languages, besides learned editions of more than twenty Latin and Greek authors. The best known of his works are, atlas cœlestis, fol.—notitia orbis antiqua, 2 vols. 4to.—historia antiqua, 12mo. and de Latinitate.

CELLINI, Benvenuto, a celebrated sculptor, engraver, and goldsmith, was born at Florence in 1500, and was apprenticed to a goldsmith. He was employed by Pope Clement VII., the grand duke of Florence, and Francis I. the French monarch; and executed many admirable works. He died in 1570, in his native city. Cellini was a man of high talent and acquirements; but vain, singular in manner, irascible, and quarrelsome. He wrote two Treatises on the arts in which he excelled. His most valuable literary production, however, is a Biography of himself. If Cellini may be credited, he fired the shot by which the constable de Bourbon was slain.

CELSIUS, Olaus, a Swedish orientalist and naturalist, was born in 1670, and died in 1756. He was the founder of natural history in Sweden, and has the merit of having extended the most liberal patronage to Linnæus, when that distinguished character was young and poor. Celsius twice refused the archbishopric of Upsal. Besides various theological and antiquarian dissertations, he published, with the title of Hierobotanicon, a learned work on the plants mentioned in the Bible.

CELTES, Conrad, a Latin poet of Sweinfurt, near Wertzburg, died at Vienna 1508, aged 49, after having obtained the honor of the poetic laurel. He was patronized by the emperor Maximilian. His works are elegiac verses, odes, epigrams, besides an account of the city of Nuremberg, published 1513, and a poem on the manners of the Germans. His style is not inelegant, nor devoid of wit; though from the age in which he lived, he is not to be expected to be a correct writer.

CENTLIVRE, Susanna, a dramatic writer, was born about 1667, in Ireland, where her father, Mr. Freeman, a Lincolnshire gentleman, and a partisan of the Commonwealth, had deemed it prudent to settle, on the restoration of Charles II. At the age of twelve years, she was left an orphan, by the death of her mother. Unkind treatment from those who had the care of her induced her to adopt the wild resolution of proceeding to London. While travelling hither on foot, she is said to have met with Anthony Hammond, father to the author of the Love Elegies, who gained her affection, and induced her to accompany him to Cambridge, and live with him for some months, disguised as a boy. When only sixteen, she married a nephew of Sir Stephen Fox. He died in little more than twelve months, and she became the wife of an officer named Carrol, who, at the end of eighteen months, was killed in a duel. Distress drove her to write for the stage, and, in 1700, she produced a tragedy, called the Perjured Husband. This play she followed up by several comedies, many of which were successful. Her dramatic pieces are nineteen in number. Some of them, among which are, The Busy Body, The Wonder, and A Bold Stroke for a Wife, still keep possession of the stage. For a while she was an actress, and, in this capacity, she captivated her last husband, Mr. Centlivre, yeoman of the month to Queen Anne. She died in 1723. As a dramatist, she excels in plot, incident, and character: her dialogue, though by no means contemptible, is of an inferior order, and it partakes of the licentiousness which stained the theatrical productions of that period.

CERATINUS, James or Teyng, of Hørn, in Holland, a name which he rendered into Greek, for his own appellation. He obtained the Greek professorship by means of his friend Erasmus, and died at Louvain 1530. He published a translation of Chrysostom on the priesthood, into Latin, and a Græco-Latin lexicon, besides a treatise de sono literarum Græcarum.

CERCEAU, John Anthony du, a Jesuit, born at Paris, who became known as a Latin poet. His Latin poems were published in 1705, and gained him reputation; but his French verses, in imitation of Marot, were little above mediocrity. He died at Veret, near Tours, 1730, aged 60. He wrote also some comedies for the pupils of the college of Lewis le grand.

CERISANTES, Mark Duncan de, son of a Scotch physician, settled at Saumur, was preceptor to the son of the marquis of Vigeon, and, by his address and learning, gained the notice of Richelieu, who sent him ambassador to Constantinople, and afterwards to Sweden, from which, through his ill conduct and quarrelsome temper in challenging a French nobleman, he was recalled. From Paris he went to Naples, and assisted the duke of Guise in the support of the Neapolitan insurgents. He died during the siege of Naples 1648. He wrote a Latin account of his journey to Constantinople, and two Latin odes by him are also preserved in the Menagiana.

CERUITI, Joseph Antony Joachim, a native of Turin, educated by the Jesuits, of whose society he became a member, and also a professor at Lyons. His abilities as a scholar were very respectable, and when young, he obtained two prizes from the academies of Dijon and Toulouse. When his order was abolished he wrote an apology for the Jesuits, but on such terms as offended the parliament of Paris, and he was obliged to make a public recantation. He afterwards lived for 15 years under the protection of the duchess des Brancas, and at the revolution, through the interest of Mirabeau, obtained a seat in the national assembly. He was the editor of the feuille villageoise, a revolutionary paper, and the year after his death, which happened in 1792, his pieces and miscellaneous works were published in one vol.

CERVETTO, father to the violincello performer of that name, came late in life to England, and was engaged to play the bass at Drury-lane. He died 14th June 1783, aged 103. When once Garrick was performing sir John Brute, and the audience in the most profound silence fixing their eyes on the incomparable actor, poor Cervetto from the orchestra uttered a loud yawn, which by its suddenness and oddity excited a violent laughter through the house. Garrick, offended, sent for the musician, who assuaged the rage of the hero, by saying with a shrug, "I beg ten thousand pardons; but I always do so ven I am ver much please."

CESAROTTI, Melchior, a voluminous and eminent Italian author, was born at Padua in 1730; was professor of rhetoric there, at the age of nineteen, and subsequently of Greek and Hebrew; was admired and pensioned by Napoleon, and died, at his native place, in 1808. His works, including translations, amount to forty-two volumes; he produced versions of Homer, Demosthenes, Juvenal, and Ossian; a Course of Greek Literature; and various original compositions, both in verse and prose.

CESSART, Louis Alexander de, a civil engineer, was born at Paris, in 1719; and was originally an officer in the army. Ill health, however, obliged him to quit the military service, and he then studied civil engineering, and at length became inspector-general of roads and bridges. Among his works are the bridge at Saumur, and the quay at Rouen. But the invention of the cones to form the harbor of Cherbourg is considered as his greatest effort of talent. He died in 1806.

CEZELI, Constance de, wife of Barri de St. Aunez, governor of Leucate under Henry IV. is distinguished for her bravery. Her husband being taken prisoner by the Spaniards 1570, she put herself at the head of her brave neighbors, and though the besieging enemy threatened to put to death her husband, she heroically refused to give up the garrison. The cowardly Spaniards, irritated with her opposition, put her husband to death and raised the siege; but when the indignant garrison wished to make reprisals on some Spanish captives, the courageous widow stepped as an advocate for their lives, and they were spared. She was honored for her conduct by Henry IV. as well as by the whole nation.

CHAIS, Charles, was born at Geneva 1701, and educated for the church. He possessed such eloquence that he was chosen pastor at the Hague 1728, where he exerted himself by unceasing diligence and great purity of life in the defence and support of religion. He died there 1786, aged 85, leaving behind the character of a benevolent man, a zealous preacher, and an elegant scholar. Besides publishing the bible with a valuable commentary in 6 vols. 4to., he wrote some divinity tracts, an apology for inoculation, and assisted in the publication of Hainault's history of France, and the bibliothèque historique.

CHAISE, Father de la, a French Jesuit, born at Forez near Lyons. He was early patronized by cardinal Mazarine, and recommended to Lewis XIV., whose confessor and favorite he soon became. After the cardinal's death, he increased and supported with great dexterity his influence with the king, and not only prevailed upon him to marry Madame de Maintenon, but advised him in the management of his affairs in church and state. In spite of the intrigues of the court, he maintained his situation of favorite to the last, and was even consulted on his death-bed by the king about the choice of his successor. He died January 1709, aged 83.

CHAILES, Claudius Francis de, a native of Chamberi, brought up among the Jesuits, and made royal professor of hydrography at Marseilles, and of mathematics at Lyons. He was afterwards professor of theology, for which he was little calculated, and then removed by Emanuel of Savoy to the mathematical chair. He was author of a complete course of mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on navigation and researches on the centre of gravity—an history of mathematics from Thales to 1680—and died at Turin 1678, aged 57.

CHAILIER, Marie Joseph, a French revolutionist, born in 1747, at Beautard in Dauphiné. From an ecclesiastic he became a traveller, and at last settled at Lyons as a merchant. At the beginning of the revolution he admired the sanguinary conduct of Marat, and determined to imitate it at Lyons; by sacrificing to suspicion every man of probity, virtue, and opulence. At the head of the jacobins he proposed to erect a guillotine for the destruction of 900 persons, whom he had marked for slaughter, and he himself was accused and guillotined 17th July 1793. When Lyons was taken by the jacobins the royalists, the body of the bloody incendiary was dug up, and his ashes placed in a silver urn, and carried in triumph to the convention.

CHAILERS, Lionel, M.D. a physician of South Carolina, eminent for medical science. He first practised in Christ Church, but soon removed to Charleston, where he continued till his death. He died in 1777, aged 62. He wrote in 1754 useful remarks on opisthotonos and tetanus, which were published in the first volume of the observations and inquiries of the medical society of London. His most respectable work is an essay on fevers, published at Charleston, 1767, in which he gave the outlines of the spasmodic theory; which had been taught by Hoffinan, and which was afterwards more fully illustrated by Cullen. Besides several smaller productions, he also published a valuable work on the weather and diseases of South Carolina, 2 vols. London, 1776.

CHAILERS, George, died in London in June 1825, aged 82. In early life he practised law in Maryland. He published Political annals of the United Colonies, 4to. 1780; estimate of strength of Britain, 1782; opinions on subjects of law and policy, arising from Amer. independence 1784; opinions of lawyers on English jurisprudence, 2 vols. 1814; life of Mary, queen of Scots, 1822.

✓ CHALMERS, William, a physician of New-York, died in that city July 23, 1827. A short time before his death he acquired considerable celebrity by the invention of a medicine for the cure of intemperance. The effects was produced by the strong association of what is nauseous and insufferable with the taste of ardent spirits.

CHALONER, sir Thomas, a statesman, soldier, and writer, was born in London, about 1515; was in the expedition of Charles V. to Algiers, and narrowly escaped drowning; fought at the battle of Musselburgh, and was knighted; was subsequently ambassador to Germany and Spain; and died in 1565. His principal work is, On the right ordering of the English Commonwealth.

CHALONER, sir Thomas, son of the above, was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. On his return from his travels, he married the daughter of sir W. Fleetwood, recorder of London, and in 1591, was knighted, and afterwards appointed tutor to Henry prince of Wales, till the death of that promising person. On his estate at Gishborough, Yorkshire, he discovered alum mines, the first known in England, which were seized by the crown, but during the civil wars restored to his family. He died 1615, and his son was created a baronet 1621, but the title became extinct in 1680.

CHAMBERLAYNE, Edward, LL.D., born at Odington, Gloucestershire, was educated at Gloucester school, and Edmund-hall, Oxford. During the civil wars he made the tour of Europe, and after the restoration he accompanied lord Carlisle as secretary to Stockholm, and afterwards became the tutor of Henry duke of Grafton, Charles' natural son, and some time after of George prince of Denmark. He died at Chelsea 1703, aged 87, and at his death ordered some of his books to be covered with wax and deposited in his grave, that they might be useful to future ages. Of the six books which his monumental inscription by Dr. Harris has mentioned, the best known is Angliæ Notitia, or the present state of England, which has passed through 34 editions.

CHAMBERLAYNE, John, son of the preceding, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and continued his father's present state of England. He wrote besides various other books; but though reported to be well skilled in 16 languages, and a man of great excellence of character, he never rose higher than to the office of gentleman usher to prince George of Denmark. He died 1724, highly respected as a good Christian in profession and in practice.

CHAMBERS, Ephraim, the compiler of a well-known dictionary of arts and sciences, was born at Milton, in Westmoreland; educated at Kendal School; and afterwards apprenticed to Senex, the mathematical instrument and globe maker. While he was in the service of Senex, Chambers projected his Dictionary, and some of the articles were written behind the counter. It came forth in 1728, in two folio volumes, and the next year he was chosen a member of the Royal Society. Five editions of his work appeared in the course of eighteen years. He translated the Jesuit's Perspective from the French; and joined with Martyn in translating and abridging the Memoirs of the Royal Academy at Paris. He died in 1740. It is not, as some have supposed, to Chambers that we are indebted for the first Cyclopædia; but to Dr. John Harris, who published his Lexicon Technicum in 1708.

CHAMBERS, sir William, an eminent architect, who became surveyor general of the board of works, treasurer of the royal academy, and knight of the polar star in Sweden. He was of Scotch extraction, and was born at Stockholm where his father was resident for some years. He went, at the age of 18, to the East Indies, in the service of Sweden, and brought back to Europe that taste for Chinese and Asiatic architecture, which under the king's patronage became so popular in England. He settled in England, and as an architect planned the magnificent buildings of Somerset-house, which display his genius and taste to great advantage. His stair-cases, and his designs for the interior ornaments of buildings, are said to be particularly admired. He wrote a treatise on civil architecture, much applauded, and died in London, 5th March 1796.

CHAMBERS, sir Robert, a learned judge, born at New-castle-upon-Tyne 1737. In 1766 he succeeded sir William Blackstone as Vinerian professor, and as head of New-inn hall, and in 1773 he was appointed second judge in the Bengal supreme court of judicature. He was knighted by the king in 1778, and in 1791 he became chief justice on the resignation of sir Elijah Impey, and in 1797 was elected president of the Asiatic society. He returned two years after to England, but the climate proved too rigorous for his delicate constitution, and in the latter end of 1802, he passed on the continent for the benefit of his health, and died at Paris, 9th May 1803. His remains were conveyed to England, and deposited in the Temple church. The Latin epitaph which adorns the monument of sir William Jones at All-souls, Oxford, reflects high honor on his feelings, as the long-tried friend of the deceased, and on his taste as a classical scholar. The collection of oriental books and MSS. which he made was very valuable.

CHAMBLY, de, Captain, gave his name to the fort in Canada, which he built of wood in 1665, but which was afterwards constructed of stone. About the year 1673 he was appointed successor of Grandfontaine to the command of the fort at Penobscot; August 10, 1674 he was taken prisoner by an Englishman; and at the same period the fort at St. John's was also surprised. In 1680 he was nominated governor of Acadia; but in a short time was promoted to the government of Grenada.

CHAMIER, Daniel, a protestant of eminence, born at Montelimar, in Dauphiné. He was professor of divinity at Montauban, where he was killed at the siege of the place by a cannon-ball 1621. He was a warm advocate for the protestants, and according to Varillas, it was he that drew up the famous edict of Nantes. As a writer his defence of the reformed church against the attacks of Belarmine, in four vols. folio, is much esteemed, besides his epistolæ Jesuiticæ, and his treatise de œcumenico pontifice.

CHAMPAGNE, Philip de, a celebrated painter, born at Brussels 1602. He was the friend of Poussin and du Chesne, and succeeded the latter as a painter to Mary of Medicis, queen of France, with a handsome salary, and apartments in the palace of Luxemburg. His works were numerous, and decorated the churches and palaces of Paris; but perhaps his best piece is the ceiling of the king's apartment at Vincennes. He died 1674.

CHAMPE, John, sergeant major of Lee's legion of cavalry in the revolutionary war. Immediately after the treason of Arnold he was sent by Lee, at the request of Washington, as a spy to New-York, for two purposes; to ascertain, whether another American general was also a traitor, as had been suggested in some papers in the hands of Washing-top; and, if possible, to bring off Arnold to the American head-quarters, that he might be tried and punished, and thus Andre be saved. It was with a daring spirit of patriotism, that Champe undertook this enterprize. He feared not the danger; but the ignominy of desertion and of enlisting in the army of the enemy, he apprehended, would destroy his hope of promotion, should he live to return. He was assured, that his character should be protected at a proper time. At 11 o'clock the same night Champe took his cloak, valise, and orderly book, drew his horse from the picket, and fled as a deserter from the American camp at Tappan. In half an hour the desertion was reported to Lee, who made all the delay in his power, and then ordered a pursuit about 12. At about day-break a few miles north of the village of Bergen the pursuing party beheld from the summit of a hill, the deserter half a mile in front. Champe now put spurs to his horse and the pursuit was hot; he passed through Bergen, to reach the British galleys a few miles west at Elizabethtown point. Getting abreast of the galleys, having lashed his valise on his shoulders, he dismounted, and running through the marsh plunged into the river, and called to the galleys for help. This was promptly given, and a boat sent to take him up. The horse was carried back to camp. To Washington the success of Champe was very acceptable intelligence. Champe was taken to New York and examined by sir Henry Clinton, and by him sent to Arnold, who offered him the place of sergeant major in a legion he was raising. On the last day of Sept. he was appointed one of Arnold's recruiting sergeants. He enlisted for the purpose of being near the person of Arnold. The dearest wish of Washington's heart, in this business, could not be accomplished, as Champe could not secure Arnold in season to save Andre, whose execution could be delayed only to the 3d of Oct. In a few days Champe sent ample evidence of the innocence of the accused general, so that gen. Washington dismissed all his suspicions. Washington expressed his approbation of Champe's plan for taking Arnold, of whom he wished to "make a public example." The plan was, to seize Arnold when in his garden, whither he went at a late hour every night, to gag him, and to drag him between two men, as a drunken soldier, to a boat on the Hudson, and to deliver him to a party of horse on the Jersey shore. It failed: it appeared that on the eventful day, Arnold removed his quarters, and the American legion, to which Champe belonged, was transferred to the fleet of transports, and landed in Virginia. Champe rejoined the American army in North Carolina. When his story was known it secured him the love and respect of the whole army. Washington granted him a discharge, lest falling into the hands of the enemy, he should die on a gibbet. In 1793 inquiry was made for Champe at the request of Washington, it was found that he removed to Kentucky and soon after died there.

CHAMPEAUX, William de, or Campellensis, a native of Champeaux in the province of Brie, professor of philosophy at Paris, where he had Abelard among his pupils, and afterwards as his rival. He was in 1113 made bishop of Chalons, and died eight years after. He wrote a treatise on the origin of the soul.

CHAMPFORT, N., a native of Paris, at first clerk to an attorney, and afterwards tutor in the family of Vaneek, a rich citizen of Liege. He devoted himself to literature, and published the journal encyclopedique, and the eulogies of Moliere and la Fontaine, which were rewarded with the prize at the French academy, and at Marseilles. Thus raised to notice under the patronage of the duke de Choiseul, and Mad. Helvetius, he applied himself to the completion of the French vocabulary, and the dictionary of the theatres, and this last work induced him to turn his thoughts to dramatic composition, in which he happily succeeded. His Mustapha and Zeangir, a tragedy, and his young Indian, and his merchant of Smyrna, two comedies, obtained deserved applause, and his fables, epistles, stories, and lighter pieces of poetry were all equally admired. His labors were praised by Voltaire, and procured him the friendship of Mirabeau, whom he assisted in his treatise on the order of Cincinnatus. He was like other literary men, the friend of the revolution; but when he saw himself imprisoned by Robespierre, and with difficulty liberated, and again threatened, he in a fit of melancholy destroyed himself, April 1794. His works were published together, in 4 vols. 8vo. Paris 1795.

CHAMPLAIN, Samuel de, the founder and governor of Quebec. He had acquired a high reputation as an able and experienced commander, when he was engaged by de Chatte to undertake a voyage to Canada. Champlain sailed March 16, 1603. He arrived at Tadoussac May 25th. He left his vessel, and in a light boat ascended the St. Lawrence to the falls of St. Louis, which bounded the discoveries of Cartier in 1535. After making many inquiries of the natives, and exploring much of the country along the St. Lawrence, he sailed for France in August. On his arrival in Sept. he found that de Chatte was dead, and his commission as lieutenant general of Canada given to the sieur de Mants. This gentleman engaged him as his pilot, in another voyage to the new world. He sailed March 7th, and arrived at Acadia May 6th. He pitched on a small island as a proper situation for a settlement, to which de Mants gave the name of St. Croix. It lies in the river of the same name, which divides the United States from the British province of New Brunswick. He explored the country as far as Cape Cod on this voyage. In 1607 he was sent out on another voyage to Tadoussac, accompanied by Pontgrave. In July, 1608, he laid the foundation of Quebec. It was on this voyage that he discovered the lake, which still bears his name. In 1610 he sailed again from France to the new world. The death of Henry IV. having deprived de Mants of his office, Champlain was appointed lieutenant to Charles de Bourbon commissioned as governor of New France. In 1612 he returned to Canada, and made new discoveries. In July, 1629, he was obliged to capitulate to an English armament under sir David Kerth or Kirk. He was carried to France in an English ship. Canada was restored to France by the treaty of St. Germain's in 1632, with Acadia and Cape Breton. In 1633 the company of New France resumed all their rights, and appointed Champlain the governor. He died 1635. He published an account of his first voyage in 1613 in 4to., and a continuation in 1620 in 8vo. He published an edition of these in 1632 in one volume, entitled, les voyages de la Nouvelle France occidentale, dicto Canada, 4to. This work comprises a history of New France from the first discoveries of Verazzani to the year 1631. There is added to it, a treatise on navigation, and the duty of a good mariner, and an abridgment of the Christian doctrine in Huron and French.

CHAMPOLLION, John Francis, a French scholar, celebrated for his works on the antiquities of Egypt. He was born in 1790, and died at Paris March 4, 1832, in his 42d year. Having devoted much attention to the study of Egyptian antiquities, he was, in 1826, appointed to superintend a department in the royal museum at Paris, which contains the antiquities of Egypt; and in 1823, went with an expedition of learned men to that country. The results of this journey are regarded as of great importance in relation to the Egyptian hieroglyphics. The Egyptian Manuscripts belonging to Champollion have been purchased by the French government for 50,000 francs.

CHANCELLOR, Richard, an English navigator. He was engaged in sir Hugh Willoughby's voyage to discover a north-west passage to China in 1553, under the direction of Sebastian Cabot; but whilst his companions, with sir Hugh, unfortunately perished on the coast of Lapland, where they had stopped to winter, he had the good fortune to reach the Russian shores, where, by means of the letters of introduction in various languages which he had with him, the grand duke John Basilovitz received him with kindness, and permitted him a free trade with the inhabitants of the country. On his return to England, Chancellor found his patron Edward dead; but Mary the next successor was sensible of the advantages of commerce, and a company was established with the most liberal patronage, and the lucky adventurer again permitted to revisit Russia. He was again successful, but on his return, accompanied by a Russian ambassador, he unfortunately was wrecked on the coast of Norway, and while he endeavored to provide for the safety of the illustrious foreigners with him, he had the misfortune to fall a victim to the severity of the climate. The Russians safely reached London, 1557, and brought the sad tidings of their companion's fate.

CHANDLER, Mary, an English poetess, born at Malmesbury 1687. She was brought up to the business of a milliner, which she carried on at Bath, but her mind was naturally stored with the treasures of poetry, and she derived pleasure and assistance from the perusal of the best poets of the nation. She preferred Horace to Virgil or Homer, as being more natural and less overloaded with fables. Her poem on the Bath, was particularly applauded by Pope. She was deformed, but her countenance was pleasing. She never was married, though she had suitors. She died 11th Sept. 1745, aged 57.

CHANDLER, Samuel, D.D., a dissenting minister, born at Hungerford, Berks, 1693. As he discovered great partiality for learning, he was educated at Bridgewater, and afterwards at Gloucester and Tewksbury, with an intention of entering upon the ministry. In this last residence under the great care of Mr. Jones, he made himself perfectly acquainted with the classics, and with oriental literature, and had the singular felicity of having as his fellow pupils, Butler, afterwards bishop of Durham, and Secker the primate. In 1716 he was chosen minister of a dissenting congregation at Peckham, and soon acquired popularity by his pulpit eloquence. In 1725 he published his vindication of the Christian religion, which, in a series of discourses, he had delivered in the pulpit at the Old Jewry. This work was applauded by Secker, and not a little increased the reputation of the author. He died May 8th, 1766, aged 73. Chandler was a man of great learning, eloquent as a preacher, and universally respected, not only by people of his own persuasion, but by many of the established church. He was very instrumental in establishing a fund for the widows of dissenting ministers. He wrote besides commentaries on Joel,—history of the persecution and vindication of the old testament. His sermons were printed in 4 vols. 8vo.

CHANDLER, Edward, a native of Dublin, was educated at Cambridge; became bishop of Lichfield in 1717, and of Durham in 1730; and died in 1750.

He is the author of A Defence of Christianity, in answer to Collins; A Vindication of the Defence; Eight Sermons; and some productions of minor consequence.

CHANDLER, Richard, D.D., a divine and antiquary, was born in 1738, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and proceeded to his degree of D.D. in 1773, after which he was presented to the living of Worlollyham, in Hampshire, and next to that of Tilehurst, in Berkshire. His first publication was the Marmora Oxoniensia, printed at the Clarendon press, in folio, 1763. The year following he went out, at the expense of the Dilletanti Society, to make observations in Greece and Asia, the result of which appeared in 1769, in an imperial folio, entitled "Ionian Antiquities." In 1774, Dr. Chandler published at Oxford "Inscriptiones antiquæ, præterque nondum editæ, in Asia, Minora et Græcia, præsertim Athenis collectæ," folio. The next year came out his "Travels in Asia Minor," 4to.; which volume was followed by his Travels in Greece, 1770, 4to. In 1802 he published "The history of Ilium, or Troy." His last work was the life of William of Waynflete, but this was not published till the year after his death, which happened at Tilehurst, Feb. 9th, 1810.

CHANDLER, Thomas Bradbury, D.D., a distinguished episcopal minister, and writer, was born at Woodstock, Connecticut, and educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1745. Embracing episcopacy in 1748, he went to England for ordination, and on his return, settled at Elizabethtown, New-Jersey, where he resided till his death in 1790. He held a high rank in talents and learning, and was honored with a degree of D.D. from the university of Oxford. He published a number of tracts, chiefly controversial, and relating to episcopacy.

CHAPELAIN, John, a French poet, who was born at Paris, and died there 22d Feb. 1674, aged 79. As the successor of Malherbe in epic poetry, he was respected by his countrymen; but his Pucelle, a heroic poem, disappointed the warmest expectations of his friends, who in vain sought for the display of those abilities which they had ranked with Virgil himself. He was very rich, but lived as a most sordid miser, and neither the refinements of learning, nor the friendship and flattery of Balzac, Menage, and Richelieu, could banish that avarice which so much disgraced the man.

CHAPELLE, Claude Emanuel Lullier, a French poet. He studied philosophy under Gassendus, but he seemed born for the muses. He was intimate with Moliere, and some have not scrupled to attribute the finest parts of his comedies to the refined taste of his friend. Flattered as a man of genius, and admired not only by the wits of the age, but the king, Chapelles was voluptuous and extravagant, and more given to intoxication than became his character or fortune. He died 1686, aged 65. He wrote besides poems that ingenious work called Voyage de Bachaumont. His works were reprinted with additions at Amsterdam 1708.

CHAPMAN, George, an English poet, who after receiving an university education settled in London, where the great luminaries of the times, Shakspeare, Jonson, Sidney, Spenser, and Daniel, became his familiar friends. He expected preferment from the patronage of the Walsinghams, and of Somerset and prince Henry; but all his hopes ended in disappointment. Besides 17 dramatic pieces, one of which was the famous mask called the Temple, he translated Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and attempted Hesiod and Musæus. Pope, who has borrowed much from him without acknowledgment, calls him an enthusiast in poetry; but the remark is invidious, as Chapman possessed respectable poetical powers, and was a man of some genius. He died 1634, aged 77.

CHAPMAN, John, D.D., a learned divine, educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge, for the provostship of which he was an unsuccessful candidate. He obtained the livings of Mersham and Adlington, Kent, from archbishop Potter, to whom he was chaplain, and at the death of this prelate, as his executor he presented himself, as one of the primate's options, to the precentorship of Lincoln, an appointment which was confirmed by chancellor Henley, but set aside by the house of lords. He died 14th October, 1784, in his 80th year. His writings were remarks on Dr. Middleton's letter to Waterland—Eusebius, two vols. 8vo. in which he defended Christianity against Morgan and Tindal—History of ancient Hebrews vindicated—two tracts relating to Phlegon, in answer to Dr. Skyes—besides sermons and other things, and a joint edition of Cicero de officiis with bishop Pearce.

CHAPONE, Mrs. Hester, an English writer, born of respectable parents in Northamptonshire, of the name of Mulso. Her marriage proved unhappy, but the comforts which she was denied in domestic life, she acquired in the cultivation of literature. One of her first productions was Fidelia, a simple interesting story in the Adventurer; and afterwards she rose to deserved celebrity by a poem prefixed to Mrs. Carter's Epictetus, and by her valuable letters on the imprisonment of the mind, addressed to a young lady, 1775. She wrote also miscellanies in prose and verse, and died at Hadley in Middlesex, December 25th, 1801, aged 75.

CHAPPE D'AUTEROUCHE, John, a French astronomer and mathematician, was born at Mauriac, in Auvergne, in 1722, of a noble family, and was brought up to the church. Mathematics, astronomy, and designing, were early and successful objects of his study. In 1759 he succeeded Lalande as assistant astronomer, and in the following year the Royal Academy, of which he was a member, sent him to Tobolsk, in Siberia, to observe the transit of Venus over the sun's disk. On his return, he published his Travels in Siberia, in two vols. 4to. His account of the Russians was so unfavorable, that the Empress Catharine was provoked to write a refutation of it. Chappe d'Auteroche died in California, in 1761, which country he had visited to observe another transit of Venus. His Voyage was published after his death.

CHAPPEL, William, a learned divine, born of poor parents at Lexington Notts, 10th December, 1572, and educated at Mansfield grammar school, and Christ church college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1607. In 1633 he was made dean of Cashel, by the influence of his friend Laud, who insisted soon after on his becoming provost of Trinity college, Dublin, an arduous office which he in vain declined. In 1638 he was elevated to the bishoprics of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, and two years after he resigned the provostship of the college. His situation, however, was now exposed to the malice and persecution of those troublous times: he was impeached in the commons, on pretence of perjury and treason, and for favoring the catholic cause, though, when at Cambridge, he was accused of puritanism. He escaped from the impending storm by obtaining leave to cross to Wales, but here he was seized as a fugitive culprit and imprisoned for seven weeks by the mayor of Pembroke. Liberated with difficulty by the friendship of sir Hugh Owen, he went to Bristol, and thence to Derby, where he ended his days in innocent but studious retirement. He died Whitsunday, 1649. He was the author of Methodus concionandi, which was translated into English and became very popular, besides memoirs of his own life. The whole duty of man has also been attributed to him.

CHARETTE DE LA COINTRIE, Francis Athanasius de, a French royalist, celebrated for the vigorous and able resistance which he made in la Vendée against the republican forces. He was originally a lieutenant in the French navy, and took up arms at the head of the Bretons, who, like himself, resented the cruelties practised daily against loyalty, virtue, and innocence. He was so successful in the struggle, that the republicans agreed on a cessation of arms with him, and he might have been persuaded to remain a peaceful citizen, had not his blood-thirsty enemies violated the treaty. In a second engagement, Charette was overpowered by numbers, and, after being dangerously wounded in the head and losing three of the fingers of his left hand with the cut of a sabre, he escaped from the field of battle, but soon to perish. He was seized in a wood, where he had concealed himself, and was dragged to Nantes, where he was shot, 9th March, 1796. When desired to kneel at the fatal moment he refused, but, baring his breast, gave with a most firm voice the word of command to the soldiers to fire.

CHARLEMAGNE, or Charles the great, and first king of France, and first emperor of the West, was son of Pepin and Bertrade. He succeeded, on the death of his father, to some German provinces, and after the decease of his brother Carloman, 741, he was acknowledged king of France. The military abilities which he possessed were soon displayed in his war against the Saxons, whom he defeated; and after he had rendered himself by repeated victories master of Germany and of Italy, and dreaded in Spain by his conquests near Barcelona, he went to Rome, and in the year 800 renewed in his person the empire of the Cæsars, and was crowned by Leo III. emperor of the West. This new and extensive power was acknowledged by neighboring princes, and Charles displayed his pride and magnificence in his pompous reception of the ambassadors of Nicophorus, emperor of the East. Great in war, he became equally illustrious in peace: he protected and encouraged the arts, and made his palace the asylum of learned men. Besides monasteries he erected academies and schools at Paris and in various parts of his dominions, and directed the powers of his genius to the establishment of salutary laws, and to the promotion of commerce and industry among his subjects. This illustrious prince died 814, aged 71, after reigning 47 years over France, and 14 over the Empire, and he was buried in the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. He appointed his only surviving son Lewis emperor and king, and bestowed the crown of Italy on Bernard, the illegitimate son of his son Pepin.

CHARLEMONT, James Caulfield, earl of, was born in Dublin, in 1728. After having travelled, for some years, in France, Italy, Greece, and Asia Minor, he returned to his native country, and, in 1763, was created earl of Charlemont. From that period till his decease he took an active and enlightened part in politics, and was acquainted with, and esteemed by Burke, Flood, and many other eminent characters. He commanded the Irish volunteers; and this delicate task he performed with no common share of prudence and dignity. Lord Charlemont was fond of and successfully cultivated literature; and to him Ireland is mainly indebted for the establishment of the Royal Irish Academy.

Of that institution he was annually chosen president. He died 1799.

CHARLES MARTEL, a natural son of Pepin d'Heristal, succeeded in obtaining the dukedom of Austrasia, after the death of his father. Under the title of mayor of the palace, he was, in fact, sovereign of France for more than twenty-five years, during the nominal reigns of the last of the Merovingians. He repeatedly vanquished the Suevians, Frisians, Allemauns, and Saxons. But his most splendid exploit was his overthrow of the Saracens at the terrible battle of Poitiers, by which he probably saved Europe from the infidel yoke. The surname of Martel, or the Hammer, he acquired by this victory. He died in 741, at Quercy sur Oise.

CHARLES VII., surnamed the Victorious, succeeded his father Charles VI. and was crowned at Poitiers 1422. He possessed great vigor and activity, and though at first a king more in name than in power, he bravely resisted the inroads of his victorious enemies, and though conquered, he still sought for more certain opportunities of annoying his invaders. Misfortunes, however, proved too great for his resources. Orleans the last important place of his dominions, was already besieged and ready to fall into the hands of the English, and Charles in despair prepared to retire to Provence, when Joan of Arc was presented to him as the future deliverer of his country. Superstition thus was enabled to finish what valor could not do, and Joan, as the pretended missionary of Heaven, quickly drove the English before her, retook all the conquered provinces, and saw her monarch crowned under her victorious standard in the cathedral of Rheims. Thus wonderfully restored to his dominions and supported by the valor of his generals, of Dunois, Sacratrailles, Arthus, and Culant, Charles too often forgot his duties in the arms of his mistress, and suffered his people to be plundered by worthless favorites. He died 22d July, 1461, aged 58.

CHARLES IX., was born 1550, and succeeded to the throne, after the death of his brother Francis II., 1560. His minority was guided by his mother Catherine de Medicis, but as the kingdom was divided by factions, which assumed the names of Papists, Lutherans, and Huguenots, nothing for the happiness of the people or the glory of the throne could be expected. In the midst of these political struggles between the leading men of the times, the Condes, Colignis, and Guises, Charles maintained a conduct full of dissimulation and hypocrisy; and while he pretended friendship and protection to all his subjects, he was cruelly meditating that fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, which leaves so indelible a stigma of barbarous cruelty on his name. Though some have considered the bloody deed as the machination of his mother and of her ecclesiastical counsellors, yet Charles deeply participated in the crime, and the encouragement which he gave to a band of murderers in his own palace, leaves him little claim to the forgiveness of outraged humanity. These horrid scenes, it is said, presented themselves in dreadful array to his terrified imagination, and on his death-bed produced the appalling exhibition of a tortured conscience and an avenging Heaven. He died 30th May, 1574, aged 24.

CHARLES V., eldest son of Philip, arch-duke of Austria, and Jane of Castille, was born at Ghent, 25th February, 1500. He was proclaimed king of Spain 1516, and two years after elected emperor of Germany, on the death of his grandfather Maximilian. His elevation to the imperial throne was disputed by the intrigues and the gold of Francis I.

of France, who aspired to the same honors, and a fierce war was consequently kindled between the two powers. Charles, supported by the aid of Henry VIII. of England, by Adrian VI. by the Florentines and Venetians, proved successful in his attacks against the French, who were driven from Italy. Even Marseilles was besieged by the imperial troops under Bourbon, and at the fatal battle of Pavia 1525, Francis fell into the hands of his enemy. This advantageous conquest did not improve the affairs of Charles; instead of marching into the heart of France, he negotiated with his prisoner, and when afterwards the fate of war placed Rome and the pope in his power, he found that his successes armed the princes of Europe against him, and rendered his power rather suspected than formidable. The peace of Cambrai in 1529, put an end to the dissensions of the continent; but Charles, restless and ambitious of military glory, crossed in 1535 the Mediterranean, to gather laurels on the coast of Africa. He took Gouletta, defeated Barbarossa, and after entering victorious into Tunis, and restoring liberty to 22,000 Christian slaves, he replaced Mulei-Hassen on the throne. Returned to Europe, Charles, in 1536, again turned his arms against Francis; he ravaged Champagne and Picardy, but ill success obliged him soon to seek a reconciliation, and the peace of Nice in 1538 restored tranquillity between the rival monarchs. After suppressing an insurrection at Ghent 1539, Charles in 1541 meditated the conquest of Algiers; but the expedition proved unfortunate, and a war with France in 1542 seemed to promise more important conquests to his gigantic ambition. But though leagued with the English, he found himself disappointed; his army was defeated at Cerisoles, and he made peace at Crepy 1545. His attempts against some of the German states were equally unsuccessful, and whilst he endeavored to oppose the dissemination of the principles of Luther, he found himself obliged by the power, the intrigues, and the perseverance of Maurice elector of Saxony, and Joachim elector of Brandenburg, to sign the treaty of Passau in 1552, and to accord liberty of conscience to the protestants of Germany. The defeat of his army before Metz, by the duke of Guise, under Henry II. of France, afterwards tended to check his pride; and at last, worn out by infirmities, dissatisfied with the world, and fully sensible of the vanity of all human grandeur, he formed the resolution of resigning his princely honors. He placed the imperial crown on the head of his brother Ferdinand, and appointed his son Philip his successor as king of Spain, 25th October, 1555, and, to the astonishment of the world, retired to the privacy of a monastic life. He died the 22d September, 1558. With some weaknesses, Charles possessed great virtues, and his reign is become interesting in the history of Europe, by the schism which shook the power of Rome, and established the protestant tenets, and by the revolution in commerce, science, and navigation, which the discoveries of Columbus effected.

CHARLES I., king of England, son of James I. and Anne of Denmark, was born at Dunferling 19th Nov. 1600. On his father's accession to the English throne, he was created duke of York, and on the death of his brother Henry he became prince of Wales. He succeeded his father in 1625. The fair prospects which a new reign and a virtuous monarch might promise to the nation, were soon obscured by the storms of popular discontent and party prejudice. The Spanish war in which the kingdom was engaged, was conducted with ill success by Buckingham; and when the parliament inveighed against the haughtiness and maladministration of this hapless favorite, Charles, instead of dismissing, resolved to support him. Another parliament proved equally unruly, and was dissolved with equal indignation by the offended monarch, who now began to raise supplies by his own authority, under the name of loans, benevolence, and ship money. This, instead of strengthening his power, rendered him more unpopular; and when Buckingham failed in his attempt to relieve the protestants of Rochelle, in 1627, the clamors of the people were loud and violent, and the exhausted state of the treasury rendered the calling of a new parliament necessary. From this turbulent assembly Charles obtained, with difficulty indeed, some supplies; but, in return, he was attacked with representations of grievances, and was obliged to assent to the petition of right, which explained and more fully settled the rights of the subject. The progress of his favorite's impeachment was stopped by his assassination at Portsmouth by the dagger of the fanatic Felton; and the conclusion of the war with France and Spain rendered Charles less dependent on his parliament, which he dissolved, with the resolution of never calling another. After Buckingham's death, the king placed his confidence on no minister with equal satisfaction; but whilst from his better judgment more mild measures were expected, the spirit of dissatisfaction was kindled in the most violent degree by the raising of ship-money for the defence of the nation. The measure was sufficiently supported by the practice of former reigns, and the unanimous opinion of the judges; but the arbitrary proceedings of the reign of Henry, or of Elizabeth, were ill calculated to insure obedience in times when the divine right of kings was disputed, and the necessity of parliamentary control loudly proclaimed. Hampden opposed the unpopular tax; and, though condemned by the court of exchequer, he rejoiced in the struggle which his single arm had waged against the oppressive measures of the government. The attempt of Charles to enforce the reading of the English liturgy in the churches of Scotland excited the same ferment in the north which unhappily prevailed in the south. In 1640 another parliament was called, but, from its clamors for the redress of grievances, was as soon dissolved; yet such were the distresses of the monarch for want of money, that he was again, the same year, persuaded by his council of peers, assembled at Rippon, to have recourse again to a popular election. This parliament, called the long parliament, met in November, 1640; and they did not separate till they had effected the ruin of the king and of his government. Instead of listening to the representations of the monarch, they exclaimed against the arbitrary measures of the court; and that they might strip the throne of all its ornaments, and the monarch of all the wisdom and integrity of faithful advisers, impeachment and persecution were denounced against the ministers. Strafford was tried, and condemned, though Charles opposed the unavailing shield of royalty to save him, and Laud soon after, on pretences as frivolous as they were cruel, was dragged to the scaffold. To serve the king seemed now to be a crime; and Charles, stripped of the assistance of his wisest ministers, was unable to stem against the torrent of fanatic zeal and popular fury, which decreed the abolition of the court of the star chamber, the high commission, and other offices which were the bulwark of the monarchy. Charles increased the virulence of the commons, by appearing, agreeable to the advice of some of his counsellors, in the house, and from the speaker's chair impeaching five of the members. This bold step ought to have been supported or never adopted; but Charles, retiring in disappointment to Windsor, wrote a letter to the parliament to excuse his conduct, and thus to render himself ridiculous in the eyes of the nation. The parliament in the mean time had called upon the militia of the city for the defence of their privileges, and the king, who found that nothing but force could now restore him to his dignity and to his consequence in the nation, retired to Nottingham, where, August 25, 1642, he erected the royal standard. This was a declaration of war, which the parliament were not backward to acknowledge. Various battles were fought at Edgehill, Marston Moor, and Newbury, with various success, but all the advantages which the monarch had gained by the valor of his troops, and the loyalty of his adherents, were unhappily lost in the fight of Naseby, 4th June, 1645, where, after displaying all the coolness, prudence, and intrepidity of the ablest general, Charles was obliged to fly with the loss of his artillery, his baggage, and his cabinet of letters, which the republicans published with every offensive remark of insolence and vulgarity. Thus left without resources, and shut up at Oxford, ignorant whom to trust, and unable to increase the number of his adherents, Charles formed the fatal resolution of throwing himself upon the mercy of the Scotch army. He left Oxford in disguise, and after wandering nine days, he appeared in the Scotch army at Newark, but instead of being received as a monarch, and of finding his misfortunes respected as they deserved, he saw himself a prisoner, and soon learnt that his expected friends with unparalleled barbarity had sold him to the English parliament for the sum of 200,000*l*. Charles was conveyed a prisoner to Holmby-castle, and to Hampton court; but though here he could not, as he hoped, restore himself to power by interfering between the jarring factions of the puritans and the independents, he had the art to effect his escape to the isle of Wight. But while he meditated passing into France, he soon found himself a prisoner. The republicans were sensible that their power could never be consolidated till the king was no more, and therefore an universal clamor was raised to pass sentence upon him. While he refused to acknowledge the authority of his judges, he betrayed no violent emotions of fury or bursting indignation; he was the meek, the patient, the resigned Christian, who yielded with all the dignity of conscious innocence to the power which usurpation and tyranny had erected for his destruction. He heard the sentence of death pronounced against him with composure; and the three days which he was allowed to prepare for another world, were passed in the affectionate duties of recommending forgiveness of injuries, moderation, and the practice of every virtue to his children, and in the becoming offices of a devout and penitent Christian. On the scaffold, he preserved his usual composure, and after conversing with Juxon, bishop of London, who attended him, and witnessed his heroic resignation, he gave the signal to the masked executioner, who cut off his head at one blow, 30th January, 1648.

CHARLES II., king of England, after his father the first Charles, was born 29th May, 1630. He heard at the Hague of the tragical death of his father; and soon after, at the invitation of the Scotch, who wished in this early proof of loyalty to wipe away their former treachery to his predecessor, he came privately to Scotland, and was crowned at Scone in 1651. Though with the title of king, Charles felt himself surrounded by all the jealousy of the republicans, and the fanaticism of the presbyterians, and perhaps might rejoice in the defeat of his followers at Dunbar, as it set him free from oppressive and suspicious advisers. From Scotland Charles proceeded to Worcester, where he was totally defeated by the superior valor of Cromwell, and he escaped from the field of battle with great difficulty. After concealing himself in the branches of an oak in Bosobel wood where he saw his enemies in full pursuit of him, and after disguising himself under the various characters of a wood-cutter, a peasant, and a servant, he at last reached Brighton, and embarked for France. The death of Cromwell and the inabilities of his successor, paved the way for his return, and when Monk, at the head of the army in Scotland, had the boldness and loyalty to declare in his favor, he was hailed by universal shouts of approbation from the nation; and on his birth-day 1660 was restored to the throne of his ancestors. But unhappily, while the gloom and fanaticism of the republicans were deservedly exposed to ridicule, neither virtue nor temperance accompanied the return of the new monarch. Charles did not possess the amiable qualities which adorned the character of his father; though affable and good-natured, he was licentious and immoral, and the debaucheries which he had seen practised in France, he permitted to flourish at his own court. The merits of those who had suffered in the cause of his father were disregarded, while infidelity was countenanced, and patronage extended to the worthless and the profligate. As a monarch he was little attached to the interests or the glory of England. Dunkirk, so long the pride of the English, was sold to France to supply his extravagance, and war was imprudently undertaken in 1663 against the Dutch, the Danes, and the French. Long accustomed to victory, the English were terrified at the sight of a Dutch fleet, which sailed up the Medway; and while they reflected on the weakness of their government, a dreadful plague came to destroy thousands of the inhabitants of London, in 1665, and the next year a most tremendous conflagration laid the fairest part of their city in ruins. Charles died suddenly of an apoplexy, 6th February 1685, leaving no issue by his queen.

CHARLES Gustavus X., king of Sweden, was son of John Casimir, count Palatine of the Rhine, and born at Upsal 1622. On the abdication of Christina, he ascended the Swedish throne 1654, and showed himself prudent and warlike. He attacked the Poles, and, in consequence of his famous victory at Warsaw, he found himself master of the whole country, from Dantzic to Craeow. Fortune, however, proved inconstant, and Casimir king of Poland, with the assistance of the emperor Leopold, was soon enabled to recover all his lost provinces, and to drive his enemy back to Sweden. Charles, expelled from Poland, turned his arms against the Danes, and marched to the gates of Copenhagen; but soon after found his victories checked by the misfortunes which befel his flag. He died at Gotenburg 13 February 1660, aged only 37. An account of his life has been written by Puffendorf, 2 vols. fol.

CHARLES XII., of Sweden, was born 27 June 1682. From his earliest years he glowed to imitate the heroic character of Alexander; and, in his eagerness to reign, he caused himself to be declared king at the age of 15, and at his coronation boldly seized the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and set it on his own head. His youth seemed to invite the attacks of his neighbors, of Poland, Denmark, and Russia: but Charles, unawed by the prospect of hostilities, and though scarce 18, wisely determined to assail his enemies one after the other. He besieged Copenhagen, and by his vigorous measures, so terrified the Danish monarch that, in less than six weeks, he obliged him to sue for peace. From humbled Denmark, Charles marched against the Russians; and though at the head of only 8,000 men, he attacked the enemy, who were besieging Navarre with 100,000 men. The conflict was dreadful, 30,000 were slain, 20,000 asked for quarter, and the rest were taken or destroyed; while the Swedes had only 1200 killed, and 800 wounded. From Navarre, the victorious monarch advanced into Poland, defeated the Saxons who opposed his march, and obliged the Polish king, in suing for peace, to renounce his crown, and to acknowledge Stanislaus for his successor. Had Charles been now reconciled to the Russians, he might have become a great monarch, as he was a successful warrior, but the hope of future triumphs flattered his ambition, and as if determined to dethrone the czar, he advanced into Ukraine, whilst his enemies fled on every side before him. The battle of Pultowa, however, proved unfortunate, July 1709, Charles defeated and wounded, fled from the field, and sought protection at Bender from the Turks. His affairs were now desperate, the banished Augustus was restored to the Polish throne, and the grand seignor tired of his guest, wished him to remove from his dominions. Charles with only 40 domestics opposed for some days a Turkish army, and when obliged to submit, he sullenly feigned sickness, and during ten months he lay in bed. At last he left his confinement with only two faithful attendants, and travelling post reached in eleven days Stralsund, from which he crossed to Sweden. Untamed by misfortunes, he immediately invaded Norway, with an army of 20,000 men, but at the siege of Fredericksshall, while visiting the works, he was struck by a cannon ball, and expired on the spot, 12th December, 1718. Charles, in his imitation of Alexander, converted his firmness into obstinacy, his courage was rashness, and his severity was cruelty. He possessed nothing of the great qualities or the amiable virtues of the hero, though he was bold even to madness, and persevering even to his ruin. At the battle of Narva, when five of his horses were shot, he exclaimed as he mounted a fresh charger, "these people find me exercise." When one day dictating to his secretary at Stralsund, a bomb fell on the roof of the house, and crushed the room next the place where they were sitting. But while the secretary dropped his pen, all terrified, the monarch asked calmly what was the matter: "The bomb!" replies the secretary. "The bomb! cries the monarch, what has the bomb to do with what I am dictating; write on."

CHARLES II., king of Navarre, son of Philip count d'Evereux, was surnamed the bad. He was born 1332, and as the son of the daughter of Lewis Hutin of France, he on his mother's death, though only 18, succeeded to the throne of Navarre. Cruelty and artifice marked his conduct, he caused to be assassinated Charles of Spain, constable of France, and when arrested by the order of king John, his father-in-law, he not only contrived to regain his liberty, but with horrid vengeance caused slow poison to be administered to the dauphin, his brother-in-law, after he had seduced him from his affection and allegiance to his father. Unable to place himself on the throne of France, he espoused the interests of the English who invaded the kingdom, and where he could not succeed by open force, he effected his purposes by the instruments of poison or assassination. His death, which happened 1st Jan. 1387, in his 55th year, was extraordinary. His physicians had ordered him to be wrapped up in clothes dipped in brandy and sulphur, to support and revive a constitution, weakened by leprosy and by debauchery, and while the operation was performing, his servant dropped a taper on the inflammable linen, which caught fire and consumed to the very bones the unhappy man before he could be extricated.

CHARLES, Edward, grandson of James II. king of England, is known in history by the name of the pretender. In 1745, at the age of 25, when the Scotch seemed inclined to resist the government of the Hanoverian family, he landed in Scotland, and supported by the adherence of some of the disaffected nobles, he proclaimed his father king, and fixed his residence at Edinburgh, with all the pomp and parade of royalty. By a sudden and masterly attack, he had the good fortune to defeat at Prestonpans, the forces which had marched to oppose him under sir John Cope, but by delaying to take advantage of the terrors of his enemies, he contributed to his own ruin, and though he afterwards advanced as far as Manchester and Derby, he soon found that the people, recovered from their panic, were unanimous against him. On his rapid return to Scotland, he routed general Hawley at Falkirk, but the approach of the duke of Cumberland, put an end to his triumph. He retreated before the royal army, and at last the hostile troops met in the field of Culloden, to decide the fate of the kingdom. The Scotch fought with accustomed bravery, but the English prevailed, and the unfortunate youth escaped with difficulty from the battle where he left dead 8000 of his misguided adherents. Though a large reward was offered for the head of the illustrious fugitive, who had thus to combat against want and temptation, yet the peasants of Scotland pitied his misfortunes, and even those of his enemies, who were acquainted with his retreat, kept inviolate the fatal secret, and while they condemned his ambition, commiserated his distresses. He at last escaped to St. Maloes, and never again revisited the British dominions. He died at Florence 1788.

CHARLEVOIX, Peter Fr. Xavier de, a learned Jesuit, born at St. Quentin, famous for his travels, and his authentic historical compositions. He died 1761, aged 78. He wrote the history of Japan, 2 vols. 4to. and 6 vols. 12mo.—History of St. Domingo, 2 vols. 4to.—History of New France, 3 vols. 4to.—and of Paragnay, 6 vols. 12mo.

CHARNOCK, Stephen, was born in London, and studied at Emanuel, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Oxford. He became an eloquent presbyterian preacher in Ireland, and was chaplain to Henry Cromwell, but on the restoration, he was unwilling to conform to the articles, and therefore preached only in private meetings. He died 1680, aged 52. His works are in 2 vols. folio. His discourse on providence is admired.

CHARPENTIER, Francis, dean of the French academy, was born at Paris, February 1620. His learning and abilities recommended him to Colbert, for whom he wrote a discourse to prepare the full establishment of an East India company. He was afterwards made a member of the new founded academy of medals and inscriptions, and greatly contributed to the noble series of medals struck in the reign of Lewis XIV. He died 22d April, 1702, aged 82. Besides harangues, and discourses delivered on public occasions, he wrote some poems, sonnets, and odes.

CHARRON, Peter, a learned Frenchman. Though born of humble parents, he was well educated, in the universities of Orleans and Bourges, but after applying himself to the law, he found that his abilities must remain long and perhaps ever neglected and unknown, he therefore became an ecclesiastic, and as an eloquent preacher soon acquired fame and popularity. He was admired by the bishops, listened to with admiration by the king, and made chaplain to queen Margaret. On his return to Paris, he wished to enter into some of the religious orders, but as he was now 48, his applications were rejected, and therefore as a secular, he continued his labors of pulpit eloquence. At Bourdeaux he became acquainted with Montaigne, who treated him with great kindness and affectionate regard. His publication of the three truths in 1594, recommended him to the notice of the bishop of Cahors, by whom he was made his vicar general, and canon theological. He was afterwards presented to the chaptership of the church of the bishop of Condom, and in 1601 he printed his books "of wisdom," which spread his fame through the kingdom. In 1603 he went to reside at Boulogne, but the climate was unfavorable to his constitution, so that he returned to Paris, where he died November 16th the same year, of an apoplexy. Of his works the best known is "of wisdom," two translations of which have appeared in England, the last by Dr. Stanhope 1697.

CHARTIER, Alan, a native of Bayeux, secretary to Charles VI. and VII. of France. He was employed in some embassies, but he acquired greater celebrity as a writer. He died 1449. His works, consisting of poetry and prose, appeared 1617. His brother John was a Benedictin, author of the great chronicles of France from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. in three vols. fol. 1493—and the history of Charles VII. printed folio 1661.

CHARTIER, Rene, a physician to the French king, and professor of medicine. He edited the works of Hippocrates and Galen in Greek and Latin, in 14 vols. folio, from 1619, to 1679, when the last vol. was published.

CHASE, Samuel, a judge of the supreme court of the United States under the constitution of 1789. He was settled in the practice of law at Annapolis, at the commencement of the American revolution. He was a delegate to the general congress at Philadelphia 1774, and served in that body several years. When the proposition for independence was before congress, as he had been prohibited from voting for it, by the convention of Maryland, he immediately traversed the province, and summoned county meetings, which should address the convention. In this way that body was induced to vote for independence; and with this authority Mr. Chase returned again to congress in season to vote for the declaration. In 1783 he was sent to England as the agent of the state of Maryland to reclaim a large amount of property, which had been intrusted to the bank of England. In 1786, he removed to Baltimore. In 1790, he was a member of the convention in Maryland for considering the constitution of the U. S. In 1791, he was appointed chief-justice of the general court of Maryland, and in 1796 an associate judge of the supreme court of the U. S. in which station he continued till his death. In 1804, judge Chase was impeached for his conduct in the trials of Fries and Callender, solely on political grounds, and the senate acquitted him. He died 1811, aged 70.

CHASSENEUX, Bartholomew de, a French lawyer, president of the parliament of Provence, who boldly opposed the prosecution of the Vaudois, a religious sect who refused to acknowledge the authority of the pope, and of the church of Rome. This conduct, which humanity and not party had dictated, was regarded with such animosity that he was poisoned 1541. He was author of a work on the customs of France, and of other things.

CHASTEL, John, son of a woollen-draper at Paris, attempted the life of Henry IV. of France 27th December 1594. He was then only 19. The blow was so sudden that he nearly escaped through the crowd, but it is said that the wildness of his looks betrayed him. He confessed that from the wickedness of his past life, he was doomed to eternal torments in another life, and that to make them more tolerable, he wished to do some great action. He was condemned to have the flesh of his arms and thighs torn off, with red hot pincers, his right hand cut off and afterwards his body drawn and quartered by four horses pulling different ways, and his remains then burnt to ashes. This was December 29th 1594, and at the same time the Jesuits, at whose instigation the crime had been committed, were banished forever from the kingdom.

CHASTELLUX, Francis John marquis de, field marshal of France, is well known by his writings. He was member of the French academy, and of several other learned bodies, and died at Paris 1738. His chief works are on public happiness, 8vo. translated into English—travels in North America, 8vo. also translated into English. This last work is far from popular in America, where the author had served in the army during the American war.

CHATEAU BRUN, John Baptist Vivien de, a native of Angouleme, member of the French academy, and eminent as a dramatic writer. He died 1775, aged 89. Besides Philoctetes, Astyanax, and Mahomet II. tragedies, he wrote les Troyennes, which is evidently his best play, and which he kept by him 40 years before he produced it before the public.

CHATEAURENARD, Francis Lewis Rousset count de, a native of Touraine, distinguished as a naval officer in the Mediterranean, against the Saltee rovers. He defeated the Dutch fleet 1675, and for his eminent services was made an admiral and marshal of France. He died 1716, aged 80.

CHATEL, Tanneguy de, a French general born of respectable parents in Britany. He gained some credit by an expedition against the English coast, and in 1410 he had the good success to defeat Ladislaus, who had usurped the crown of Naples, upon which he was, in 1414, made marshal of Guienne. He distinguished himself at the battle of Agincourt, and supported the Dauphin against the Burgundians when they attacked Paris. He afterwards effected a reconciliation between both parties, but had the meanness and brutality to advise the dauphin to assassinate the unsuspecting duke of Burgundy 1419. On the dauphin's elevation to the throne, Chatel was made grand master of the household, and trusted with important embassies. He died 1449.

CHATEL, Peter du, or CASTELLANUS, a native of Arc, educated at Dijon. He was so learned a Grecian, that he assisted Erasmus in his translations, and for some time was press corrector to Frobenius at Basil, after which he travelled to Egypt and Syria. On his return to Europe he became private reader to Francis I. who made him bishop of Tulle and afterwards of Macon, from which he was translated by Henry II. to Orleans, where he died 1552. He wrote two funeral orations on Francis I. and a Latin letter against Charles V. and showed himself a scholar of superior abilities and a strong advocate for the privileges of the Gallican church.

CHATELET, Paul du Hay lord of, descended from the Scotch Hays, was born in Britany and became president of the court of justice in the army of Lewis XIII. He was also member of the academy, and wrote various pieces in verse and prose, besides the history of Bertrand du Guesclin, constable of France, folio. He was a man of great firmness and integrity, and boldly spoke to the king in favor of Montmorency who had been condemned for high treason. He died 1636, aged 44.

CHATELET, Gabrielle Emilie marchioness de, a learned French lady, daughter of the baron de Bretenil, born 17th December 1706. Superior to the trifling pursuits of her sex, she aspired to high distinction in the regions of science and philosophy, and by her valuable works she may be said to have rivalled Leibnitz and Newton. Her institutes of physic addressed to her son is a work of very great merit. Her intense application it is said shortened her life. She died 1749, aged 43. She translated the institutes of Leibnitz and the principia of Newton.

CHATEAURONY, Marie Anne, Duchess of, of the illustrious house of Nele, was married to the Marquis de la Tournelle in 1734. Being left a widow at the age of 23, she was received by her aunt, the Duchess Mazarin, but soon lost this support. Her two sisters (Mesdames de Vintimille and Mailly) had successively been in the possession of the heart of Louis XV., when the King conceived an ardent passion for her. She was made lady of honor to the Queen, and afterwards Duchess of Chateaurony, with a pension of 80,000 livres. By her persuasion, Louis XV. put himself at the head of the armies in Flanders and Alsace. He fell sick at Metz, his life was despaired of, and he was obliged to consent to the dismissal of the Duchess. She was received in Paris by Richelieu, who, after the King's recovery, affected her recall. Her triumph was complete, and she was promised the important post of superintendent of the dauphiness, when she died, in 1744. A collection of her letters appeared in Paris, 1806, in two small volumes.

CHATTERTON, Thomas, the most remarkable instance that perhaps ever appeared of precocious talent, was the posthumous son of the master of the Free School, in Pyle street, Bristol, and was born November 20, 1752. The rudiments of education he received at Colston's Charity School, in his native city; and, about his tenth year, he acquired a taste for reading. In his general disposition he was grave and pensive, though at times exceedingly cheerful. In 1767 he was bound apprentice to an Attorney, with whom he remained for nearly three years. It was during this period that he seems to have produced many of his acknowledged works, and also those which he attributed to Rowley. He sought the patronage of Horace Walpole, but was treated with neglect. Encouraged by promises from booksellers, he visited London, in April, 1770, and for a while was frequently writer in the Town and Country Magazine, and several other publications. His character as he grew up did not develop itself favorable; he became proud and imperious, and some of his productions showed great laxity of speculative principle, although his conduct was said to be regular. How far avowed infidelity may have had a share in his ultimate suicide, it is not easy to determine; but he obtained a release from his apprenticeship by repeatedly expressing intentions of that nature, and immediately repaired to London. Here he engaged in a variety of literary labors, which required equal industry and versatility of parts. A History of England, a History of London, essays in the daily papers, and songs for the public gardens were among his projected or actual tasks; and he seems to have deemed himself in the road of fame and competence. Above all, he connected himself with the party politics of the day, and even obtained an introduction to the celebrated Alderman Beckford. The inclination of Chatterton led him to the opposition party, but finding money scarce on that unprofitable side, he observed to a friend that "he could write for both sides," and unhappily there is additional proof under his hand, that he thought very slightly of this species of mental prostitution. The boyish nature of his expectations soon however became manifest, for in a very few months he was reduced to considerable distress. The remainder of his history is brief and melancholy. Falling into a state of indigence, for which even with common industry, it is difficult to account, he was finally reduced to a want of necessary food. Yet such was his pride, he refused, as a species of insult, an invitation to dinner from his hostess the day before he died, assuring her he was not hungry. His death took place on the 25th August, 1770, in consequence of a dose of arsenic, at his lodgings in Brook-Street, Holborn; and his remains were interred in the burying-ground of Saint Andrews workhouse. Thus friendless and forlorn died poor Chatterton, before he had completed his eighteenth year. For the moral defects of this unfortunate youth's character some allowance must be made in the want of due instruction and early superintending care, which are uniformly more necessary to precocity of genius than to dulness or mediocrity.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, a poet denominated by Dryden the father of English poetry. He was born in London 1328, and studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, and then travelled upon the continent. He was afterwards gentleman of the chamber to the king, his salary was doubled in 1369, and after being employed to negotiate with the republic of Genoa, for ships for a naval armament, Edward repaid his services by granting him a pitcher of wine daily, to be delivered by the butler of England. Subsequently he became comptroller of the customs of London for wool, and was employed as commissioner to the French court on the violation of the truce. These high favors, which contributed to his independence and made his income not less than 1000*l.* a year, were confirmed by Richard, Edward's successor, but Chaucer by embracing Wickliffe's tenets became obnoxious to the persecution of the clergy, and though he escaped by flight for a time, he was imprisoned, and liberated at last with difficulty. He soon after removed from the bustle and intrigues of public life, and in his retirement at Woodstock, and afterwards at Dunnington, he devoted himself to the cultivation of his muse. He died 25th October, 1400. The poetry of Chaucer, though in the idiom of the 14th century, is not devoid of great smoothness and delicacy, the sentiments are bold, the characters are all well supported, and the genius of the poet is every where brilliant, sprightly, and sublime. Of all his poems the Canterbury tales possess the greatest merit. They have been learnedly edited by Mr. Tyrwhitt, 5 vols, 8vo. The tales have been modernised and imitated by Dryden, Pope, and others.

CHAUDET, Anthony Dennis, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Paris, in 1763, and was a pupil of Stouf. At the age of nineteen he gained the highest prize of the Academy, for a basso relievo of Joseph sold by his Brethren. He died in 1810, professor of the schools of sculpture and painting. His statues and groups are numerous, and he excelled with the pencil no less than with the chisel.

CHAUDON, Louis Mayeul, an author, was born in 1737 at Valensoles, in Provence, and died in 1817. He was a Benedictine monk of the order of Cluny. Of his numerous original works and compilations, the best known is The New Historical Dictionary, which was first published in only four volumes, in 1766. It was enlarged, in successive editions, till it reached thirty volumes; but the eighth edition, in thirteen volumes, was the last which Chaudon superintended.

CHAUFFEPIE, James George de, the author of several works, among which is a continuation of Bayle, in four folio volumes, was born at Leuwarden, in Friesland, in 1702, and was the son of a French protestant refugee. Like his father, he was an ecclesiastic, and was successively pastor at Flushing, Delft, and Rotterdam, at which latter city he died in 1786. His supplement to Bayle, more than one half of which is translated from the English, is far inferior to the learned and acute production of his great predecessor.

CHAULIEU, William Amfrye de, a French poet, was born, in 1639, at Fontenai, and died in 1720. Being a man of considerable fortune, fond of good cheer, and devoid of ambition, his whole life was spent in enjoying the pleasures of society. He resided at the Temple in Paris, of which he was called the Anacreon. His poems, though often incorrect, are distinguished by gaiety, voluptuousness, and unstudied elegance. They have gone through many editions, and are still popular.

CHAUMETTE, Peter Gaspard, son of a cooper, was born at Nevers 24th May 1763. After various low occupations he appeared as one of the boldest at the taking of the Bastille, and displayed all the violence of a republican and the zeal of a demagogue. United with Hebert he for a while guided the sanguinary multitude, and proposed with the feasts of the goddess of reason, those walking guillotines which were to purge France of all her royalists, and her suspected citizens. After being guilty of the most atrocious cruelties, and the blackest profligacy, he was sent before the revolutionary tribunal by Robespierre, and when on the scaffold prophesied that his fall would soon be followed by that of his enemies. He was guillotined 13th April, 1794. A "precis historique" on life is attributed to him.

CHAUMONOT, Joseph, a Jesuit Missionary among the Indians of North America, was an Italian. He labored with great zeal among the natives of Canada for more than fifty years. In 1655 he was the oldest missionary in New France, as the country was called. Much of his time was spent among the Hurons, who originally lived north of lake Erie; but, in consequence of the wars in which they were engaged, were induced to go down the St. Lawrence. The name of Hurons was given them on account of the manner in which they wear their hair. As they cut it for the most part very short, and turned it up in a fantastical way, so as to give themselves a frightful appearance, the French cried out, when they first saw them, "quelles hures!" what wild boars' heads! They were afterwards called Hurons. Chaumonot composed a grammar of the Huron language.

CHAUNCY, Charles, the second president of Harvard college, was born in England 1589. He was first settled in the ministry at Marston, but became Vicar of Ware in 1627. Being fined, and imprisoned, and at length silenced for nonconformity, he determined to seek the peaceable enjoyment of the rights of conscience in New England. He arrived at Plymouth 1638. He continued there about three years assisting Mr. Reyner in his public labors, and then took the pastoral charge of the church at Scituate, where he remained twelve years. The ecclesiastical state of England being now changed, he resolved to accept the invitation, which he had received, from his people in Ware, to return to them. He went to Boston to embark; but the presidency of Harvard college being at this time vacant, by the resignation of Mr. Dunster, he was requested to accept that office. He was inducted into the office of president in 1654, and continued in this station till his death in 1672 aged 81. He published a number of sermons, and some other theological works.

CHAUNCY, Charles, D.D., a minister of Boston, graduated at Harvard college 1721. He was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston as colleague with Mr. Foxcroft 1727. He died 1787, in the 83d year of his age, and the 60th of his ministry. Dr. Chauncy's publications are numerous. In addition to the sermons they are, an account of the French prophets in a letter to a friend; remarks on the bishop of Landaff's sermon; answer to Dr. Chandler's appeal; reply to Dr. Chandler's appeal defended; a complete view of episcopacy from the fathers; a just representation of the sufferings and hardships of the town of Boston 1774; the mystery hid from ages, or the salvation of all men.

CHAUNCY, Charles, LL.D., a distinguished lawyer, was born at Durham, in Connecticut, May 30, 1747. Removing to New-Haven, he was admitted to the bar, November, 1768, appointed secretary for the state, 1776, and a judge of the superior court, 1789. In 1793 he retired from public life. While at the bar his practice was uncommonly lucrative. He was forty years an instructor in jurisprudence, and his students are found in almost every state in the union, as eminent advocates, judges, and statesmen. He was president of the first agricultural society in Connecticut, which he was mainly instrumental in founding. He was familiar with the ancient and modern languages, with law, theology, and miscellaneous literature. Superior native faculties, improved by intense study for more than sixty years, rendered him one of the most learned men of the age, and his house was pre-eminently the abode of science, hospitality, and religion.

CHAUSSARD, Peter, a poet and miscellaneous author, was born at Paris in 1766. He was one of the partisans of the French revolution, and filled some subordinate offices during the early part of it. He died in 1823. Of his numerous works the chief are, a Translation of Arrian. The Festivals and Courtisans of Greece; Heliogabalus; and some poems.

CHAUSSIER, Francis, a French physician, was born at Dijon, in 1746, and died at Paris, in 1828. He was equally celebrated as a practitioner and a lecturer; was looked up to as the head of his profession in the capital; and contributed much to the progress of physiological science. He is the author of various medical tracts and dissertations.

CHAUVIN, Stephen, a native of Nimes, who as a protestant left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and went to Rotterdam, and afterwards to Berlin, where he became professor of philosophy. He died 1725, aged 85. He published Lexicon philosophicum, fol. and a new journal des savans, begun at Rotterdam 1694.

CHAZELLES, John Matthew, a French mathematician, born at Lyons 1657. He came to Paris in 1675, and was recommended to Cassini, whom he assisted in the measurement of the meridian line. In 1684, he instructed the duke of Mortemar in mathematics, and by his influence was appointed hydrography professor for the gallees of Marseilles, where he made many valuable observations, and drew a new map of the coast of Provence, besides plans of various harbors and forts. His great and extensive abilities were usefully employed by the French ministry. His astronomical observations were not confined to Europe, but he visited Greece and Egypt, and first observed in his measurement of the great pyramid, that its four corners exactly correspond to the four cardinal points of the world. Chazelles, whose private character and virtuous deportment was not surpassed by the extent of his genius, died January 1710. Besides his voyage in the Levant, he contributed greatly to the improvement of the Neptune François.

CHECKLY, John, for many years the rector of St. John's Church, Providence, R. I. He was born at Boston about 1690; and in 1727 went to England for ordination. In 1739 he returned to America, and settled in Providence, preaching also a portion of the time, in some of the adjacent towns. He died in 1758, aged 73 years. He was a good classical scholar, and was much noted for wit and eccentricities of character. He published an edition of "Leslie's Short and Easy Method with the Deists," with an addition, written by himself, of "a Discourse concerning episcopacy, in defence of christianity and the church of England against the deists and dissenters." For this publication he was fined fifty pounds, by the supreme court, held in Boston, Nov. 27, 1724. He also published his speech at the trial, and some other controversial works.

CHEKE, John, a learned Englishman, born at Cambridge, 16th June 1514, and educated at St. John's college. He was made professor of Greek in the university, with a stipend of 40l. a year, and in 1544, he was appointed tutor with sir Anthony Cooke, to prince Edward. On the accession of his pupil to the throne, he was rewarded with an annuity of 100 marks, and a grant of land, and appointed besides provost of king's college. In 1551 he was knighted, and soon after rose to the office of secretary of state. On the accession of Mary he was stripped of his honors, and permitted to travel abroad, but after supporting himself for some time at Strasburg by teaching Greek, he was seized on his return between Brussels and Antwerp, by Philip of Spain, and sent like a traitor to London. His religion was now the cause of his persecution, but he did not possess the firmness of a martyr, and when offered to choose between the faggot and popery, he abjured his faith and was received by cardinal Pole into the bosom of the catholic church. A confession so violently extorted and so rashly given, preyed now upon his spirits, and shortened his days. He died of shame and remorse, 13th September 1557, aged 43.

CHERON, Elizabeth Sophia, daughter of a painter at Meaux, was born at Paris. She devoted her time to poetry, painting, the learned languages, and music, and obtained great celebrity by her pencil, especially in history, oil colors, and in miniature. She was admitted into the academy of painting and sculpture, and the academy of Ricovrati at Padua honored her with the appellation of Erato. She died at Paris 3d Sept. 1711, aged 63.

CHESELDEN, William, an English surgeon of great eminence, born at Somerby in Leicester-shire. He was the pupil of Cowper, and also of Ferri, the surgeon of St. Thomas's hospital. He early distinguished himself, and began to read lectures at the early age of 22, which he continued for upwards of 20 years. He was successful in cutting for the stone, and he immortalized himself by giving light to a youth of 14, who had never seen, of which he published a curious and interesting account. He was now at the head of his profession, and was appointed principal surgeon to queen Caroline, and blessed with well-earned fame and independence. He obtained also what he chiefly wished, the office of head surgeon to Chelsea-hospital, which he retained till his death. He died of an apoplexy, April 10, 1752, aged 64. He was intimate with Pope, by whom he was greatly esteemed. His anatomy of the human body, published 1713, has passed through several editions. He wrote, besides osteography in folio, 1733, and other anatomical essays chiefly inserted in the philosophical transactions. He was the first foreigner admitted member of the French royal academy of surgery.

CHESENE, Andre du, called the father of French history, was born at Turenne, and crushed to death by a cart as he was returning from Paris to his country house in 1640, in his 56th year. He wrote the history of the Popes, 2 vols. fol.—history of England, 4 vols. fol.—history of French cardinals—collection of French historians, 24 vols. fol. of which only four were published by him.

CHESTERFIELD, Philip Dormer Stanhope, earl of, was born in London, in 1694, and was educated at Cambridge. Before he was of age, he sat in parliament as member for Lostwithiel, and spoke with so much violence as to provoke from his antagonists a hint, that his minority might possibly be taken advantage of to move for his exclusion. In 1726, he succeeded to the earldom of Chesterfield. The accession of George II. opened to Stanhope the road to political honors. He was sworn a privy counsellor; was appointed, in 1728, ambassador extraordinary to Holland; received the Garter in 1730; and was nominated steward of the household. The latter office he resigned in 1733; and for many years he continued in strenuous opposition to the measures of Sir Robert Walpole. Among the anti-ministerial peers he stood conspicuous for activity and eloquence. At the same time his pen was frequently employed, with powerful effect, in the Craftsman and other papers. It was not till January, 1745, that the government once more availed itself of his talents. In that month he was sent to Holland, as ambassador extraordinary; and on his return, in May, he went over to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant. The viceregal power he held rather less than twelve months, but the equity and beneficence of his sway is still remembered with gratitude. In October, 1746, he was nominated secretary of state, and this office he held till the beginning of 1748, when the state of his health induced him to resign it. In the senate he continued to speak till increasing deafness incapacitated him for oratorical exertions. But his pen did not remain idle. He contributed largely to The World; among his contributions were the two papers which drew forth the celebrated letter addressed to him by Dr. Johnson. He died March 24, 1773. Chesterfield was a man of highly polished manners, extensive acquirements, and versatile talents. He held no mean place among diplomatists, statesmen, wits, writers, and orators; in the latter capacity he has been called the British Cicero. His works consist of his Letters to his Son, in four volumes, and Miscellaneous Pieces, in four volumes. He has been severely and justly censured for the lax morality of several passages in his Letters to his Son.

CHESTER, John, colonel in the American army, was born at Weathersfield, January 29th, 1749, and graduated at Yale College, in 1766. He joined the revolutionary army in 1775, at the head of a company of volunteers, and distinguished himself at the battle of Bunker Hill. He was afterwards advanced to the rank of colonel, and continued in the army much respected till 1777. He was afterwards, for some time, speaker of the legislature of Connecticut, and a member of the council. In 1791, he was appointed by Washington, supervisor of the district of Connecticut. He also held for some time the office of judge of the county court and of judge of probate. He was distinguished for abilities, dignity, and amiableness of manners, integrity, and usefulness. He died on the 4th of November, 1809.

CHEVALIER, Anthony Rodolph le, a native of Montchamps in Normandy, who left France on account of his religion, and was employed as teacher of the French language to Elizabeth, afterwards queen of England. He left England at the beginning of Mary's reign, and studied the oriental languages under Tremelius, whose daughter he married, and then taught Hebrew at Strasburg and Geneva. He afterwards returned to France, but escaped on the dreadful day of St. Bartholomew, and came to Guernsey, where he died 1572, aged 65. Besides the Jerusalem Targum translated from the Syriac, he published a Latin grammar of the rudiments of the Hebrew language, 4to. 1574.

CHEVERT, Francis de, a French general, born of obscure parents at Verdun. He rose from the ranks, and distinguished himself by assiduity, courage, and a great knowledge of tactics. After Belisle's retreat from Prague, he defended the place with the most obstinate bravery, and yielded only through famine 1742, and on honorable terms. His valor greatly contributed to the victory of Hastenback in 1757, and that of Lauterberg. He died 1769, aged 74.

CHEVREAU, Urban, a native of Loudun in Poitou, who distinguished himself by his assiduity and learning, and became secretary to Christina queen of Sweden, whom he had the art to reconcile to the catholic faith. After his return to Paris he was preceptor to the duke of Maine, and he afterwards retired to his native place, where he built an elegant mansion, and died after spending there 20 years of ease and literary seclusion from the world, 1701, aged nearly 88. He wrote an history of the world—the effects of fortune, a romance—and other things.

CHEYNE, George, an eminent physician and mathematician, born in 1671, was a native of Scotland, and was originally intended for the church, but subsequently studied medicine under Pitcairne, and settled in London. He died at Bath, in 1743. Having rendered himself corpulent and exceedingly asthmatic by free living, he recovered his health and activity by a milk and vegetable diet. He is the author of a Treatise on the Gout; an Essay on Health; a New Theory of Fevers; The English Malady; The Natural Method of curing Diseases; Philosophical Principles of Religion; and Fluxionum Methodus Inversa.

CHICHELY, Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Higham Ferrers, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He was sent by Henry IV. to congratulate Gregory XII. on his elevation to the papacy, and was appointed by him bishop of the vacant see of St. David's. In 1409, he was at the council of Pisa, and five years after, on the death of Arundel, he was translated to Canterbury. In this high office, he supported his power with great firmness and enlarged the privileges of the clergy, and boldly excommunicated lord Strange, who had assaulted sir John Trussel in St. Dunstan's church, and killed one of his servants. He also opposed the encroachments of the pope, and rendered himself popular by his influence with the clergy, and by promoting occasional donations for the support of the government. Besides founding in his native town, a college for one master and eight fellows and other subordinate officers, he laid the foundations of that noble edifice in Oxford, called All Souls. This splendid college was completed in 1440, and the chapel was with great pomp consecrated by the founder. Chichely was very munificent in his contributions to charitable purposes. He died 12th April, 1443, after being archbishop 29 years, and he was buried in Canterbury cathedral.

CHILLINGWORTH, William, a celebrated divine, born at Oxford, October 1602. Laud, then fellow of St. John's, was his godfather. He entered at Trinity, and applied himself not only to divinity, but to the mathematics and poetry, but his acquaintance with Fisher the celebrated Jesuit, overturned his faith, and he embraced the tenets of the catholic religion. That he might pursue his studies with more success, he retired to Douai university, but the correspondence of Laud, now bishop of London, shook his religious opinions, and he soon became sensible that the pope of Rome is not that infallible person he had implicitly believed. Restored to the protestants, Chillingworth returned to Oxford, where he proposed to complete his free inquiry into religion. The change of his principles however drew upon him all the virulence of the catholics, but in several treatises, as well as by letters and conversations, he defended his conduct and supported the reasonableness of the protestant tenets, with such mildness united with firmness and candor, that even his enemies applauded him. In 1637, his book, called the religion of protestants a safe way to salvation, appeared, and with a modest and elegant dedication it was presented to Charles I. and so universally admired was it, that it passed through several editions, and will remain a lasting monument of the author's superior abilities, and of sound reason, and pure religion. Though admired and respected as a divine, Chillingworth yet started objections against the thirty-nine articles. His scruples however gradually removed, and he subscribed the articles, considering it as a subscription of peace and union, and not of belief or assent. Soon after he was promoted to the chancellorship of Salisbury, with the prebend of Brixworth, Northamptonshire, and the mastership of Wigston's hospital, Leicestershire. The troubles of the times prevented higher elevation, Chillingworth, who was zealously attached to the king's cause, took up arms against the republicans, and acted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester. At the siege of Arundel, however, he was taken prisoner with the garrison by sir William Waller, and as he then labored under an indisposition, he was removed to Chichester, where after a short illness he expired in the bishop's palace. He died about the 30th of January 1644.

CHITTENDEN, Thomas, first governor of Vermont. He was a member of the convention which, January 16, 1777, declared Vermont an independent state, and was appointed one of the committee to communicate to congress the proceedings of the inhabitants, and to solicit for their district an admission into the union of the American states. When the powers of government were assumed by this state, and a constitution was established in 1778, he was selected by the freemen as a candidate for governor; to which office he was duly elected, and continued in it, with the exception of one year, till his death. He died 1797, aged 67.

CHOISEUL, Stephen Francis due de, a French politician of great abilities. After enjoying the confidence of Lewis XV. and serving his country as an ambassador and as minister at home, he was disgraced; and on his retirement, still retained popularity and universal respect. He was a liberal and munificent patron of arts and of literature, and, by his political intrigues, was called by the king of Prussia, the coachman of Europe. He died 1785, aged 66.

CHOISEUL GOUFFIER, Count Mary Gabriel Augustus Laurence, a member of the French Academy, was born in 1752, and visited Greece in 1776. Subsequently to his return, he published, in 1779, the first volume of his Journey in Greece. He was appointed ambassador to Constantinople, which station he held till a republic was established in France, when he settled in Russia. In 1802 he revisited his native country; and he died, at Aix la Chapelle, in 1817. Besides his splendid Journey in Greece, in three volumes folio, he is the author of several learned dissertations in the Transactions of the French Academy.

CHOISI, Francis Timoleon de, prior of St. Lo, and dean of Bayeux, was engaged by the French government to go as ambassador to the king of Siam, who wished, it was said, to become a convert to christianity. Though he had spent the earlier part of his life in debauchery, yet he reformed his conduct, and applied himself to the cultivation of literature. He died at Paris October 2, 1724, aged 81. He wrote an account of his journey to Siam—the history of France, during five reigns, 5 vols. 4to.—an ecclesiastical history, 11 vols. 4to. and dialogues on the immortality of the soul.

CHOUET, John Robert, a native of Geneva, possessed of such talents, that at the age of 22 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Saumur, where he replaced the tenets of Aristotle with the philosophy of Descartes. In 1669 he returned to Geneva as professor, and by his popularity obtained a seat in the council 1686. He was repeatedly syndic, and died 1731, aged 89, universally respected as a good citizen and an upright magistrate. He wrote introduction to logic—thesis physicae de variâ astrorum luce—discourses on the history of Geneva—and other works.

CHRISTIAN, Edward, chief justice of the Isle of Ely, and law professor of Downing College, Cambridge, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He died, at Downing College, in 1823. He is the author of various works, among which are, Treatises on the Bankrupt Laws, and on the Game Laws. He also edited an edition of Blackstone, to which he added numerous notes. To him belongs the demerit of having been the originator of the iniquitous law which extorts from every author eleven copies of any work that he may publish.

CHRISTIERN II., surnamed the cruel, or the northern Nero, succeeded on the Danish throne his father John 1513. He was elected king of Sweden 1520; but, instead of proving, as he promised, the father of his people, he became their tyrant, and massacred at a feast 94 of the Swedish nobles to whom he owed his elevation. A series of atrocities rendered him so unpopular in his new dominions, that he was driven from Sweden by the valor of Gustavus; but in Copenhagen he pursued the same ferocious conduct, in consequence of which he was expelled from his throne by his indignant subjects, and escaped to Flanders. Ever restless and ambitious, he gained the Dutch to espouse his cause; but he was defeated in his attempt to recover his dominions, and died in prison 25th January 1559, universally abhorred.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus the great, was born 8th December 1626, and succeeded her father 1633. After reigning with splendor, and the character of a great and popular sovereign, she resigned the crown in 1654, in favor of her cousin, Charles Gustavus. She had sometime before embraced the catholic religion, at the instigation of the Jesuits; and she retired to Rome, where she continued to reside till the death of her cousin, in 1660; when she attempted, either by the suggestions of ambition, or the advice of her religious advisers, to resume the crown, which as a catholic she could not effect. She died at Rome 19th April 1689, aged 63. She was a woman of great abilities, was well acquainted with several languages, and was not only a frequent correspondent with Grotius, Salmasius, Descartes, Vossius, Bochart, Huet, and other men of letters, but a liberal patroness of literature.

CHRISTOPHE, Henry, king of Hayti, was a black slave, born in 1767, in Grenada. He served during the war in America, and was subsequently taken to St. Domingo. His activity against the whites gained him, from Toussaint Louverture, the rank of brigadier-general, and his subsequent conduct raised him, on the death of Dessalines, to the dignity of president and generalissimo of Hayti. In 1811 he was crowned king of Hayti, and he reigned till October, 1820, when, in consequence of a general insurrection against him, he put an end to his own existence.

CHRISTOPHERSON, John, an English prelate, born in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became fellow and master of Trinity college, and dean of Norwich, and in queen Mary's reign he was made bishop of Chichester. He died the year after his elevation, a little before the queen. He was a firm Romanist. He translated Philo Judæus into Latin, and also the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Sozomen, Socrates, Euegrius, and Theodoret; but as a translator he is neither faithful, nor elegant, nor accurate.

CHRYSOLORAS, Emanuel, a learned Greek, born at Constantinople about 1355. He went into England in the reign of Richard II. as ambassador from John Palæologus, to solicit assistance against the attacks of the Turks. After his return to Constantinople, he went to Florence, where he taught Greek for three years; and afterwards he became Greek professor in the university of Ticinum, at the request of the duke of Milan. He afterwards visited Venice and Rome; and, in 1413, he was sent by pope Martin V., as ambassador to Sigismund emperor of Germany, to settle the place for the meeting of a general council. He afterwards returned to his own emperor at Constantinople, by whom he was sent as ambassador to the council of Constance. He died at Constance, a few days after the opening of the council, 15th April 1415. He wrote, besides a Greek grammar, a parallel between ancient and modern Rome.

CHRYSOSTOM, John, a native of Antioch, who became bishop of Constantinople, and one of the most illustrious fathers of the church. In eloquence and benevolence he was equally known; but the divisions of the age embittered in some degree his happiness, and he was banished from his see by his enemies, though afterwards restored. He died at Pityus, on the Euxine sea, 407, aged 53. His works were edited by Montfaucon, in 13 vols. fol.

CHUBB, Thomas, a controversial deist, was born, in 1679, at East Harnham, near Salisbury, was successively a glover, a tallow-chandler, and a sort of humble companion or dependent in the family of Sir Joseph Jekyll. He died in 1747. His first work, which appeared in 1715, was intitled, The Supremacy of the Father asserted, and this was followed by several others. His posthumous pieces were published in two volumes in 1748. However erroneous his opinions may be, Chubb was a well meaning and modest man, with a respectable share of talent and information. His principal works are, the true gospel of Jesus Christ asserted—an inquiry into the ground and foundation of religion—and four dissertations on subjects in the old testament.

CHURCH, Benjamin, celebrated for his exploits in the Indian wars of New England, was born at Duxbury Mass. in 1639. He commanded the party that killed Philip in August, 1676. After the war of Philip, he lived first at Bristol; then at Fall River, now Troy; and lastly at Saconet or Sekonit, since called Little Conpton.

CHURCH, Benjamin, a physician of some eminence, and an able writer, was graduated at Harvard college in 1754, and, after going through the preparatory studies, established himself in the practice of medicine in Boston. For several years before the Revolution, he was a leading character among the whigs and patriots; and on the commencement of the war he was appointed physician general to the army. While in the performance of the duties assigned him in this capacity, he was suspected of a treacherous correspondence with the enemy, and immediately arrested and imprisoned. After remaining some time in prison, he obtained permission to depart for the West Indies. The vessel in which he sailed was never heard from afterwards. He is the author of a number of occasional poems, serious, pathetic, and satirical, which possess considerable merit; and an oration, delivered on the fifth of March, 1773.

CHURCHILL, sir Winston, was born at Wootton Glanville, Dorsetshire, 1620, and is known more as the father of the great duke of Marlborough than as a historian. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, but the troubles of the times prevented his taking a degree, and he engaged warmly on the side of the king, in consequence of which, his estates were forfeited. He was knighted in 1663, and elected a member of the royal society. He published in 1675, a kind of political essay on the history of England, in folio, which possessed little merit. He died 26th March 1688.

CHURCHILL, John, Marlborough, duke of, was born, in 1650, at Ashe, in Devonshire, and, at the age of twelve years, was taken from school to be a page of the duke of York, who gave him a pair of colors in 1666. It was at the siege of Tangier that he was first engaged in active service. In 1672 he distinguished himself in the Netherlands, under the duke of Monmouth. For several years he was the favorite of the duke of York, who obtained for him the barony of Eyemouth; and, on ascending the throne, sent him ambassador to France, and created him Lord Churchill. The attachment of his lordship to the protestant cause induced him, however, to join the prince of Orange. For this he received from William the earldom of Marlborough, and the command of the English army in the Netherlands. In 1690 he commanded in Ireland, and reduced Cork, Kinsale, and other places. But in 1692 he was dismissed from all his offices, and committed to the Tower, on suspicion, not wholly groundless, of plotting to restore the exiled monarch; nor, though he was soon liberated, was he again employed till after the death of Queen Mary. His splendid course of glory began with the accession of Queen Anne, when he was created captain general of the forces, and was sent as plenipotentiary to the Hague. The campaign of 1702 earned for him the title of Duke. From that period till 1711 he ran a career of victory which has placed his name among those of the most illustrious generals. He rescued the Low Countries and Gerinany, broke through the iron frontier of France, humiliated her haughty monarch, and placed her on the verge of ruin. His principal victories were those of Blenheim, i 1704; Ramillies, in 1706; Oudenarde, in 1708; and Malplaquet, in 1709. Party intrigues at home at length deprived him of the command, and even compelled him to retire to the continent. On the accession of George I. however, Marlborough resumed his employments; but age and toil had impaired his faculties, and he subsequently took very little part in public affairs. He died June 16, 1722. His imperious duchess, whom Pope has satirised under the name of Atossa, survived him more than twenty years.

CHURCHILL, Charles, the poet, was born 1731, son of the Rev. Charles Churchill, curate of St. John's, Westminster. He was educated at Westminster, but though endowed with great natural abilities, yet he so much neglected their improvement that he was refused admission at Oxford for incapacity. He continued, in consequence of this, at Westminster, and in 1756 he entered into orders, and became a curate, but he soon ceased to consider the clerical profession as his sphere of action. He began his poetical career, in 1761, by The Rosciad, which at once brought him into public notice. It was rapidly succeeded by The Apology, Night, The Ghost, the Prophecy of Famine, and many other poems, most of them political, and all, though often careless, abounding with keen satire and splendid passages. Of Wilkes he was the bosom friend and ardent partisan. While he was thus acquiring popularity as a writer, he was injuring his health and his character by dissipation. His friends, however, could not but love him for his generous feelings, and the warmth of his attachment to them. He died November 4, 1764. Though time has rendered the productions of Churchill less interesting than they originally were, they are too thoroughly imbued with the true spirit of poetry to be ever consigned to oblivion.

CHURCHMAN, John, a quaker, and native of Maryland, published a magnetic atlas, and explanation, Phil. 1790; also at London, magnetic atlas, or variation charts of the globe. He died at sea July 21, 1805.

CIBBER, Colley, poet laureat to George II., was born in London 6th November 1671, and educated at Grantham school, Lincolnshire. He did not succeed in his application to be admitted at Winchester college, and his intention of entering at Oxford was thwarted by the event of the revolution, which made him a soldier in favor of the prince of Orange. He soon after exchanged the military life for the stage, and appeared in inferior characters, at the salary of 10s. a week. The first character which he performed with success was the chaplain in the Orphan, and the next Fondlewife in the Old bachelor, till he acquired eminence and an advanced salary. To add to his income, he now had recourse to his pen, and wrote Love's last shift, in which he himself bore a part. His best plays were The Careless husband, acted in 1704, and The nonjuror, in 1717. This last was a party piece, and was dedicated to the king, who gave to the poet 200*l.* and the appointment of laureat. But besides the attacks of periodical writers, the author was exposed to the enmity and satire of Pope, who made him the hero of his Dunciad. In 1730 he quitted the stage, though he occasionally appeared before the public, especially when his own plays were represented. He died December 1757. His plays, which, like his children, as he jocosely observed, were numerous, were collected in 2 vols. 4to. Though he never succeeded either as a writer or actor of tragedy, nor as a lyric poet, yet it must be acknowledged, that his comedies are sprightly and elegant, and his character as a man and as an actor respectable.

CIBBER, Theophilus, son of the preceding, was born in 1703, and educated for a little time at Winchester school, from which he passed upon the stage. Aided not so much by the influence of his father, who was manager of the theatre royal, as by his own natural powers, he soon rose to popularity and eminence as a favorite actor; and he might have insured respectability and independence if he had possessed economy, and paid attention to the decorum and manners which ought to mark every private and public character. Thus exposed, by his extravagance and follies, to distresses and persecution, he at last embarked for Dublin, in October 1757, to assist Sheridan against the opposition of a new theatre; but unfortunately the ship was wrecked on the coast of Scotland, and Cibber and the whole numerous crew perished. As a writer he produced Pattie and Peggy, a ballad opera, and he altered The Lover, a comedy, and Shakspeare's Romeo and Henry VI. He wrote also some appeals to the public on his own distressful situation. The lives of the poets of Great Britain and Ireland, in 5 vols. 12mo. though bearing his name, were published by Robert Shields, an amanuensis of Dr Johnson.

CICERO, Marcus Tullius, a celebrated orator, born at Apinum. His eloquence in the Roman forum was so ardent as to rival the illustrious fame of Demosthenes; and in the elegance of his writings, and the clear and lucid arguments of his philosophy, he equalled the ablest authors, and the most renowned sages of Greece. He had the singular fortune of discovering, and defeating, the conspiracy of Cataline, during his consulship, and deserved to be called, for his services, another founder of Rome. In the struggles between Cæsar and the republic he however betrayed irresolution, and probably to that timidity, which feared boldly to proclaim its sentiments, he owed his downfall. Augustus, in the establishment of his triumvirate, after flattering him, meanly sacrificed him to the resentment of Antony, by whose orders he was basely murdered as he fled to the sea-coast, B. C. 42, in his 63d year.

CID, The, a Spanish hero, whose real name was don Roderigo Dias de Bivar. He was knighted in consequence of the valor he had displayed in his very youth; and, in 1063, marched with don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro king of Arragon, who fell in battle; after which he went to the siege of Zamora, where Sancho, now become king, was slain. On Sancho's death, his brother Alfonso ascended the throne of Castile; but Roderigo, instead of continuing the peaceful and obedient subject, declared himself independent, and, after depopulating the country, fixed his habitation at Peña de el Cid, the rock of the Cid, near Saragossa. He afterwards took Valentia, and maintained his independence till his death, 1099. The history of this hero, whose name Cid signified lord, has been immortalized in the romances of the Spaniards, and particularly in the popular tragedy of Corneille.

CIMABUE, Giovanni, known as the reviver of painting in Italy, was born at Florence 1240. Under the direction of Grecian painters, who were sent for by the Florentines, he soon acquired that eminence which inventive genius and indefatigable application deserve. He painted for several of the cities of Italy, but particularly for his native city, where a picture of the Virgin is still seen and admired. He was also an eminent architect, and was engaged in the building of St. Maria del Fior church in Florence. His paintings were chiefly in fresco and in distemper, as painting in oil was not yet discovered. He died at the age of 60.

CIMAROSA, Dominic, was born at Naples, in 1754, and studied under Aprile and Fenaroli. He soon acquired fame as a dramatic composer, and was invited to Petersburg by the Empress Catherine. He was subsequently conductor of the Italian opera at Vienna; after which he returned to his native country. Being a partisan of reform in Italy, he very narrowly escaped from being punished with death, on the expulsion of the French from Naples in 1799. He died at Vienna, in 1801. More than a hundred excellent operas were composed by him, of which one of the most popular is Il Matrimonio Segreto. His modesty was equal to his talent.

CIMON, an Athenian general, was dissipated in his youth; but became virtuous as he attained ripeness. At the battle of Salamis he greatly distinguished himself; and, as admiral of the Grecian fleet, he subsequently obtained many splendid victories over the Persians. Among his exploits was the recovery of the Chersonesus. He was, however, banished through the influence of his enemies; but was soon recalled, and began a new career of glory. He died B. C. 449, aged fifty-one, while besieging Citium, in Cyprus.

CINCINNATUS, Lucius Quintus, a famous Roman, whose virtues raised him to the dictatorship from the plough. He defeated the enemies of his country, and quickly returned to the cultivation of his farm. He lived about 460 B. C.

CINQ MARS, Henry Coissier marquis of, son of marquis d'Effiat, was marshal of France, and the favorite of Lewis XIII. Though thus noticed by the king, and patronised by Richelieu, he had the ingratitude to encourage Gaston duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebel and to solicit the assistance of Spain in his perfidious enterprises. The plot was discovered by Richelieu, and Cinq Mars lost his head, September 1642, aged 22.

CIOPANI, Hercules, an Italian critic of Sulmo. As a native of the same city which gave Ovid birth, he was induced to undertake a learned commentary on the works of his countryman, to which he prefixed a life, with an account of the country of Sulmo, published 1578. It possesses merit, and has been published in the edition of the variorum.

CIRILLO, Domine, a botanist, born near Naples, educated under the care of his uncle Nicholas, who was professor of medicine at Naples. Though intended for the profession of medicine, he showed greater partiality for natural history, and he obtained a professorship in botany at Naples, 1760, where the next year he published his introductory ad botanicum. He visited England, in the company of lady Walpole; and as he spoke English with great fluency, he derived much benefit from the lectures of Dr. W. Hunter, and the conversation of the learned in London. On his return to Italy, he again devoted himself to his favorite pursuits; but a restless and ambitious disposition proved his ruin. He embraced the tenets of the revolutionary philosophy, and when the French entered Naples, he boldly espoused their cause, and accepted an office under them; for which, on the restoration of the lawful sovereign, he was condemned, and executed as a traitor, 1795, aged 65. He wrote besides, nosologia methodicæ rudimenta, 1780—de essentialibus nonnullarum plantarum characteribus, 1784—Neapolitana Flora, 1793—Cyperus Papyrus, and Parme.

CISNER, Nicholas, a native of Mosbach, on the Neckar, who studied at Strasburgh, under Bucer, and was professor of moral philosophy at Wittenberg. He afterwards visited France and Italy, and took his degrees in law at Padua, and settled at Heidelberg, as professor, and counsellor to the elector Palatine. His works were published at Frankfort 1611. He died 1583, aged 54.

CLAGETT, William, an English divine, born at Bury, Suffolk, where he was educated, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he became D.D. 1683. He was for seven years a preacher in his native town, and afterwards was elected preacher to the society of Gray's-inn. He was besides rector of Farnham-royal, Bucks, and lecturer of St. Michael Bassishaw. He died 1688, aged 42. Four volumes of his sermons were published after his death by his brother Nicholas. He was author of some controversial pieces.

CLAGETT, Nicholas, brother to the preceding, was also born at Bury, and educated at Christ's-church, Cambridge, where he became D.D. 1704. He succeeded his brother as preacher at Bury, and continued there 46 years, and he was besides rector of Thurlow magna, and of Hitcham, and archdeacon of Sudbury. Besides his brother's works, he published some sermons and pamphlets of his own. He died Jan. 1727, aged 73,—one of his children, Nicholas, was afterwards bishop of Exeter.

CLAGGETT, Thomas John, D.D. bishop of the Diocese of Maryland. He was consecrated, September 17, 1792, and died August 2, 1816.

CLAIRBORNE, William C. C., governor of Mississippi and Louisiana. Being bred a lawyer, he settled in Tennessee, of which state he assisted in forming the constitution, and afterwards represented in congress. In 1802 he was appointed governor of the Mississippi territory, and in 1804 of Louisiana, and to that office he was also chosen by the people, after the adoption of its constitution, from 1812 to 1816. He was then elected a senator of the United States, but died before he took his seat in 1817.

CLAIR, Arthur St. general, was born at Edinburgh, and came to this country with admiral Boscawen in 1755. He served as a lieutenant under Wolfe. In the revolutionary war he espoused the American cause. He was appointed a brigadier general in 1776 and a major general in 1777. He evacuated Tinconderoga in July 1777, on the approach of Burgoyne's army. A court of inquiry honorably acquitted him of charges of cowardice and treachery. He was a delegate to congress from Pennsylvania in 1784, and in 1787 was chosen president of congress. He was appointed governor of the territory northwest of the Ohio in Oct. 1789. In 1791 he was appointed commander in chief of the forces to be employed against the Indians. He suffered a signal defeat in the neighborhood of the Miami villages in November. He fell into an ambush, and lost 33 officers and 593 men killed, and 21 officers and 242 men wounded. It is said that such was the panic, that the troops fled precipitately 30 miles, though pursued only four. There was no ground of censure on St. Clair for this defeat. The next year however he resigned his military commission. Ohio was erected into an independent state in 1802. In an address to the people he declined being a candidate for governor. Before the election of a governor by the people he was removed from office by Mr. Jefferson. He died 1818, aged 84. In 1817 an old claim which he had against the United States was adjusted by the payment of $2000. There was also granted him the half pay of a major general, or 60 dollars a month.

CLAIRAULT, Alexis, a learned mathematician of the French academy of sciences. He was one of those who visited the north, to discover the true form of the earth. He died 1765, aged about 52. He published elements of geometry and algebra—tables of the moon—treatise on the figure of the earth—besides several papers in the Journal des Savans. His abilities were prematurely displayed, as, it is said, that he could read and write at the age of 4, he understood algebra at 9, and at 11 wrote a memoir on curves, which was honorably applauded in the miscellanea Berolinensia.

CLAIRFAIT, N. count de, an Austrian general, greatly distinguished against the French at the beginning of the revolution. He was a Walloon by birth, and was first employed against the Turks. His manœuvres in the Netherlands were rapid and masterly; but though after taking Longwy and Stanay, he lost the famous battle of Jemappé by the superior number and irresistible impetuosity of the French, he made a most heroic retreat across the Rhine. Afterwards, under the prince of Coburg, he distinguished himself at Altenhoven, Quievrain, Hansen, and Famars, and decided the victory of Nerwinde, and afterwards bravely opposed the progress of Pichegru. He defeated, in 1795, the French army near Mayence, and took many prisoners; soon after which, he was recalled, and received with becoming respect by the emperor at Vienna, where he became counsellor of war, and where he died 1798. As a soldier, he was brave and intrepid; as a general, a severe disciplinarian; cool in the midst of danger, precise in the execution of his plans, formed after mature deliberation, and universally beloved by his army. The French with truth regarded him as one of their ablest opponents.

CLAP, Nathaniel, minister of Newport, R. I. was born, 1668, and graduated at Harvard College in 1690. He commenced preaching in Newport, 1695, and continued his labours there nearly fifty years. He died in 1745, aged 77 years. Mr. Clap was a descendant of Nicholas Clap, one of the first settlers in Dorchester, and maintained through life a character distinguished for piety and social virtues. Dean Berkeley said of him, "Before I saw father Clap, I thought the Bishop of Rome had the gravest aspect of any man I ever saw; but really the minister of Newport has the most venerable appearance."

CLAP, Thomas, president of Yale college, was graduated at Harvard college 1722. He was settled at Windham Con. in 1726, and in 1739 was chosen president. In 1766 he resigned the office, and died 1767 aged 63. He was indefatigable in labour both secular and scientific for the institution over which he presided. He was the means of building a college edifice and chapel; and he gave frequent public dissertations in the various departments of learning. Mr. Clap constructed the first orrery, or planetarium, made in America. His manuscripts were plundered in the expedition against New Haven under general Tyron. He had made collections of materials for a history of Connecticut. He published a sermon on the ordination of Ephraim Little; letter to Mr. Edwards respecting Mr. Whitefield's design; the religious constitution of colleges; a brief history and vindication of the doctrines received and established in the churches of New England, with a specimen of the new scheme of religion, beginning to prevail; an essay on the nature and foundation of moral virtue and obligation; a history of Yale college; conjectures upon the nature and motion of meteors, which are above the atmosphere.

CLAPPERTON, Hugh, was born at Annan, in Scotland, in 1788, and was apprenticed to the sea-service. Having inadvertently violated the excise laws, by conveying ashore a few pounds of rock salt, he was sent on board of a man of war, where he was speedily promoted to the rank of midshipman. His zeal and activity, his useful and amusing talents, made him a general favorite; and, in 1814, he was raised to the rank of lieutenant, and appointed to the command of the Confiance schooner, on Lake Erie. In 1817, he returned to England, and remained on half-pay till 1822, when he was chosen to accompany Dr. Oudney and Lieutenant Denham, on an expedition to penetrate into the heart of Africa. In this expedition Oudney died, but Clapperton and his companion greatly extended our knowledge of African geography. After having been at home less than six months, he was a second time despatched to Africa, in November, 1825. He succeeded in again reaching Saekatoo, but there his career was closed by disease, April 13, 1827.

CHAPTAL, Count, celebrated for his knowledge of chemistry, and for his numerous and valuable works on that science, was born at Nosaret in 1756. He became distinguished as a physician and a chemist, and was called to Paris in 1793, where, besides producing various important works on Chemistry and other practical branches of the arts and sciences, he was minister of the interior by Bonaparte, and successively filled many other important situations. He died at Paris, July 29, 1832.

CLARENDON, Edward Hyde, earl of, was born, in 1608, at Dinton, in Wiltshire; studied at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and the Middle Temple; and was called to the bar. His first appearance in the Commons was in 1640, as member for Wootton Bassett, and he sat for Saltash in the Long Parliament. At the outset he was desirous to see a redress of grievances, but he soon became convinced that the prevailing party designed to overthrow the kingly and ecclesiastical establishment, and he consequently threw his weight into the scale of the king. He joined Charles I. at York, who knighted him, and appointed him chancellor of the exchequer, and a privy counsellor. In 1644 he was one of the royal commissioners at Uxbridge. When the king's cause was ruined, Hyde retired to Jersey, where he resided for nearly three years, and wrote a considerable part of his History of the Rebellion. From 1648 till the Restoration he was employed by Charles II. on the continent, at Paris, Antwerp, Madrid, and other places, and suffered severely from indigence. With the Restoration, brighter prospects dawned on him. He had, in 1657, obtained the then barren honor of being made lord chancellor; he was now elected chancellor of the University of Oxford, created Lord Hyde, and soon after, earl of Clarendon, and received some grants from the crown. In his judicial capacity his conduct was irreproachable; but some of his political measures it is impossible not to condemn. It was not long before he became unpopular, and the kindness of his master began to cool. At last, in August, 1667, he was removed from all his employments. Not satisfied with this, the Commons proceeded to impeach him, and Clarendon found it prudent to go into voluntary exile. After having resided seven years in France, whence he more than once vainly solicited to be recalled, he died at Rouen, December 7, 1674. Besides his History of the Civil War, which, in spite of some defects in the style, and some erroneous principles; is an admirable work, he is the author of an Account of his own life; and of a folio volume of Miscellaneous Pieces. His daughter, Anne, married James, duke of York, afterwards James II.

CLARKE, Samuel, a celebrated orientalist, born at Brackley, Northamptonshire, and made student of Merton college, Oxford, in his 15th year. During the civil wars he was chiefly resident at Oxford, where he obtained the place of superior beadle of civil law, when it became vacant. He died Dec. 27th 1669, aged 46.

CLARKE, Samuel, D.D., a famous English divine, born 11th Oct. 1675. After being educated at the grammar school, he entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he applied himself diligently to the philosophical pursuits of the age. As Rohault's physics, on the principles of Des Cartes, were the system publicly taught in the university, Clarke, who well understood the tenets of Newton's philosophy, republished the book in a new translation, with learned and valuable notes, though only at the age of 22. He afterwards studied theology, and was ordained by Moore bishop of Norwich, in whose household he lived as chaplain for 12 years. In 1704 he preached Boyle's lectures, on the being and attributes of a God, and gave such satisfaction, that he was again appointed the next year, and chose for his subject the evidences of natural and revealed religion. These two courses of lectures, when published, excited some controversies, and tended to spread the celebrity of the author. About this time he is suspected by Whiston to have inclined to Arianism. His letter to Dodwell was published in 1706, on the immortality of the soul, which subject gave rise to a long controversial dispute, and afforded him the opportunity of displaying his great metaphysical and physical knowledge. Notwithstanding this controversy, he applied himself to mathematical pursuits, and published a translation of Newton's optics, with which the great philosopher was so pleased, that he gave him 500*l.* for his five daughters. He published, in 1712, an edition of Cæsar's commentaries, dedicated to the great duke of Marlborough, and in the same year appeared his book on the doctrine of the Trinity in three parts, which, though mentioned with commendation by bishop Hoadly, yet roused the attacks of many severe and acrimonious critics. In 1715, and 1716, Dr. Clarke was engaged in a dispute with Leibnitz, with respect to natural philosophy and religion, in which, as his friend Whiston says, "his letters are among the most useful of his performances in natural philosophy." The friendship of Lord Lechmere about this time presented Clarke to the mastership of Wigston's hospital in Leicester, and in 1724, he published 17 sermons. On the death of Newton, in 1727, Clarke was offered his place of master of the mint, worth near 1500*l.* a year, which he very disinterestedly refused as incompatible with his spiritual engagements. In 1729, he published the 12 first books of the Iliad, dedicated to the duke of Cumberland, with a new Latin version, and learned notes; and in 1732 the 12 other books were published by his son. Dr. Clarke died, May 17th 1729, aged 54 years. The same year were printed his exposition of the church catechism, and 10 vols. of sermons in 8vo. which had mostly been preached on Thursday mornings at St. James's church. Clarke, though attacked by various authors in the walk of theology and philosophy, has found great and learned champions in Hare bishop of Chichester, and Hoadly bishop of Winchester. They not only extol his extensive knowledge in every branch of classical and philosophical science, but they enlarge on the goodness of his heart, and the exemplary piety of his life.

CLARKE, Edward Daniel, L.L.D., a celebrated English traveller, a son of the author of Letters on the Spanish Nation, was born in 1767, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1794, he accompanied Lord Berwick to Italy, and, in 1799, he set out, with Mr. Cripps, on a tour which extended over the whole of Scandinavia, and through Russia, Circassia, Turkey, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece, and was not terminated till 1802. By his exertions the library of Cambridge was enriched with nearly a hundred volumes of manuscripts, and the colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres. He also obtained the sarcophagus of Alexander, on which he published a Dissertation. His Travels form five volumes 4to. Shortly after his return he was instituted to the rectory of Harlton, in Cambridgeshire. In 1806 he began, at the university, a series of mineralogical lectures, and, in 1808, a professorship of mineralogy being founded, he was appointed to the chair. The lectures which he delivered in that capacity were highly popular, and his experiments with the oxyhydrogen blowpipe were productive of important scientific results. Dr. Clarke died in Pall Mall, March 9, 1821.

CLARKE, George Rogers, general, a revolutionary officer, resided on the western border of Virginia, and had all the hardihood and energy necessary for a soldier. After the massacre at Wyoming in 1778, he took the command of a body of troops, designed to operate against the Indians for the protection of the frontiers. He captured the British post of Kaskaskias in the Mississippi, and also reduced three other towns, higher up the river, and sent the principal agent of the enemy a prisoner to Virginia. In the mean time, Clarke was informed that the governor of Detroit was about to attack him; this movement he anticipated, and surprised the British commander, and made him and his garrison prisoners. He also intercepted a convoy of goods and provisions valued at $10,000, and took 40 prisoners at the same time. He built fort Jefferson on the western bank of the Mississippi below the Ohio. He was employed in various expeditions during the remainder of the war. After the war he settled in Kentucky, and died 1808, aged 66. It is also said that he lived till 1817. The following anecdote is from the notes of an old officer, that at the treaty of fort Washington, where the troops were only seventy men, all the Indians in council appeared peaceable, excepting three hundred Shawahanees, whose chief made a boisterous speech, and then placed on the table his belt of black and white wampum, to intimate that he was prepared for either peace or war, while his 300 savages applauded him by a whoop. At the table sat commissary-general Clarke and gen. Richard Butler. Clarke with his cane coolly pushed the wampum from the table; then rising, as the savages muttered their indignation, he trampled on the belt, and with a voice of authority bid them instantly quit the hall. The next day they sued for peace.

CLARKE, John, D.D., minister in Boston, graduated at Harvard College 1774. He was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston, as colleague with Dr. Chauncey, 1778. While preaching his sermon in the afternoon of April 1st. 1798 he was seized by apoplexy, and fell down in his pulpit; he expired the next morning, aged 42. He published a number of sermons, a tract entitled, An answer to the question, why are you a christian? letter to a student at college; after his death a volume of sermons was published, 1799, and discourses to young persons, 1804.

✓ CLARKE, John, one of the founders of Rhode Island, was an Englishman, and once practised medicine in London. He came to Massachusetts soon after its first settlement, and on being with several others, who were Baptists, driven from that colony, settled at Newport, Rhode Island, where they organized a government. In 1644 he formed the second Baptist church established in America, and became its pastor. In 1651 he was sent to England as an agent of the colony, and resided there till 1663, when he procured a charter, and returned to his pastoral labours. He was distinguished for piety and beneficence, and had the honour of contributing much towards establishing the first government in modern times, which gave to all equal civil and religious liberty. He died in 1676.

CLARKE, Richard, a clergyman of the Episcopal church, who maintained for many years a high reputation in South Carolina. He was a native of England, and soon after his arrival in Charleston was appointed rector of St. Philip's church in that city. Here he was greatly admired as a popular preacher, and highly respected as an exemplary, amiable, benevolent, and liberal man. He returned to England in 1759, and was soon afterwards appointed a stated preacher in one of the principal churches in London. In this station his eloquence and piety attracted a large share of public attention. His publications, chiefly on theological subjects, were numerous, amounting to six or seven octavo volumes. He lived to a late period in the eighteenth century, universally beloved and respected.

CLARKE, Abraham, a member of congress from the state of New-Jersey, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was born in the borough of Elizabethtown, New Jersey, February 15, 1726. He early manifested an ardent thirst for knowledge, and was particularly fond of mathematics and of the science of law. He successively held the offices of high sheriff, commissioner for settling undivided lands, and clerk of the colonial assembly. In 1776 he was appointed a delegate to the continental congress, and took a leading part in the Jersey delegation in the memorable scenes of that year. He continued to be elected to a seat in congress, with little interruption, during the continuance of the old confederation; and after the adoption of the federal constitution was elected a member of the house of representatives of the United States. In 1794 he retired from all public employment, and in the autumn of that year died in the 69th year of his age. His strength of mind, his unsullied integrity, his public spirit, his patriotism, his uniform zeal in behalf of civil and religious liberty, and his exemplary piety, rendered him one of the most respectable and useful men of his time in New-Jersey.

CLARKE, the Rev. Adam, LL.D a distinguished Methodist preacher and divine, was born in the county of Londonderry, in Ireland, 1763. Under the patronage of the celebrated John Wesley, he became, at the age of nineteen, an itinerant preacher. At first his youth attracted great numbers of hearers; but afterwards the extent of his resources, from the gifts of nature and the fruits of study, commanded attention wherever he went; and hardly any man ever drew so large congregations, or of so mixed a character. He continued to travel in various circuits, till 1805, when he took up his residence in London, where he passed a considerable part of his subsequent life. He ranked among the first scholars of the age in oriental literature and biblical literature. He was the author of a voluminous commentary on the Scriptures, and of various other publications; the former, especially, is an imperishable monument of his extensive learning. To his great talents and erudition he united the virtues of the humble christian; was greatly respected by all denominations; and though Catholic in his feelings, he was strongly attached to the body of christians with which he was connected. He died of the cholera, at Bayswater, near London, Aug. 26, 1832, aged 72.

CLAUDE of Lorraine, a celebrated landscape painter, was born, in 1600, in the diocese of Toul. His parents were poor, and he was apprenticed to a pastry-cook. Escaping from this unpoetical occupation, he obtained some instructions in drawing, and made his way to Rome, where he learned the rudiments of painting from Tassi. By the time that he was thirty he had acquired a high reputation. His fame continued to spread more widely till his decease, which took place at Rome, in 1682. Nature was the constant object of his study, and the result of his observations he transferred to the canvass with unrivalled felicity.

CLAUDE, John, a celebrated French calvinist minister, was born at Sauvetat, in 1619, studied at Montauban, and was ordained in 1645. He was considered as the most able and eloquent protestant theologian of the age, and distinguished as a preacher, and in controversy against Bossuet, Nicole, and Arnauld, all of them formidable antagonists. The revocation of the edict of Nantz expelled him from his country, and he died at the Hague, in 1687. His polemical and other works are numerous.

CLAUDIANUS, Claudius, was a native of Alexandria, in Egypt, and flourished under the reigns of Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius. He was patronised by Stilicho, and, after the fall of his protector, Claudian spent the rest of his life in retirement. The time of his death is not known. Among the secondary Roman poets he is entitled to a distinguished place.

CLAUDIUS, Tiberius Drusus, emperor of Rome, uncle of Caligula, was born B. C. 9, at Lyons, and was originally called Germanicus. After having passed fifty years of physical and moral weakness, he was raised to the throne on the death of Caligula. At first he performed some praiseworthy acts, but he soon became contemptible, and was finally poisoned by his wife Agrippina, A. D. 54.

CLAUDIUS II., Marcus Aurelius Flavius, surnamed Gothicus, emperor of Rome, was a native of Illyria, born A. D. 214, and served with distinction under Decius, Valerius, and Gallienus. On the assassination of the latter, Claudius was placed on the throne; and, by his virtues and his victories, he proved himself worthy of empire. He defeated Aureolus, who had assumed the purple, and he then marched against the Goths. At Naissa, (now Nissa, in Servia), he overthrew them in a sanguinary battle; and he followed up his success with such vigor that he exterminated the invading army of more than 300,000 men. He died shortly after, at Sirmium, A. D. 270.

CLAY, Joseph, son of Joseph Clay, a revolutionary patriot of Georgia, was born at Savannah in 1764, and graduated at Princeton, in 1784. In 1796 he was appointed judge of the district court in his native state, but resigned the office in 1801. In 1804 he became a Baptist preacher in Savannah. In 1807 he was installed, as colleague with Dr. Stillman, pastor of the first Baptist church in Boston; but, finding his health on the decline, he asked a dismission the following year. He died Jan. 11, 1811.

CLAVIUS, Christopher, a Jesuit and mathematician, born at Bamberg, Germany, 1537. He was considered as the Euclid of his age, and he was, on account of his abilities, engaged by Gregory XIII. in the reformation of the calendar, which he ably defended against Joseph Scaliger. His works were printed, 5 vols. fol. He died at Rome 1612.

CLAYTON, Dr. Robert, a learned prelate, member of the royal and antiquarian societies in London. He was made bishop of Killala 1729, translated to Cork 1735, and to Clogher 1745, where he died 25th September 1758. He was averse to the use of the Nicene and Athanasian creeds, and unsuccessfully moved for their rejection in the Irish house of lords. He was the intimate friend of Boyer the printer, and other learned men. He published an essay on spirit, 8vo.—chronology of the Hebrew bible vindicated, 4to.—inquiry on the time of the coming of the Messiah, 8vo.—vindication of the histories of the old and new testaments, 8vo.—journal from Grand Cairo to Sinai, translated from the MS. of a prefect of Egypt, 4to. and 8vo.—and other works.

CLAYTON, John, an eminent botanist and physician of Virginia, was born in England, and came to America in 1705. He was clerk or prothonotary for Gloucester county in Virginia fifty-one years. He died 1773, aged 87. During the year preceding his decease, such was the vigor of his constitution, even at this advanced period, and such his zeal in botanical researches, that he made a botanical tour through Orange county; and it is believed that he had visited most of the settled parts of Virginia. As a practical botanist he was perhaps inferior to no botanist of his time. He left behind him two volumes of manuscripts, nearly prepared for the press, and a hortus siccus of folio size, with marginal notes and directions for the engraver in preparing the plates for the proposed work. This work, which was in the possession of his son, when the revolutionary war commenced, was sent to William Clayton, clerk of New Kent, as to a place of security from the invading enemy. It was lodged in the office with the records of the county. An incendiary put a torch to the building, and thus perished not only the records of the county but the labors of Clayton. He was a member of some of the most learned literary societies of Europe, and corresponded with Gronovius, Linnæus and other able botanists. Several of his communications, treating of the culture and different species of tobacco, were published in numbers 201, 204, 205 and 206 of the philosophical transactions; and in number 454 is an ample account of medicinal plants, which he had discovered growing in Virginia. He is chiefly known to the learned, especially in Europe, by his Flora Virginica, a work published by Gronovius at Leyden in 8vo. 1739—1743, and again in 4to. in 1762.

CLAYTON, Joshua, a physician, was the president of Delaware from 1789 to 1793, and governor under the present constitution from 1793 to 1796. In 1798 he was elected to the senate of the U. S. He died 1799. During the war, when the Peruvian bark was scarce, he substituted for it successfully in his practice, the poplar, Liviodendron tulipifera, combined with nearly an equal quantity of the bark of the root of the dogwood, Cornus florida, and half the quantity of the inside bark of the white oak tree.

CLEAVER, William, an English prelate, was the son of a clergyman who kept a school at Twyford, in Buckinghamshire, was born there in 1742. He went to Magdalen college, Oxford, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Brazenose, where he became tutor to the late marquis of Buckingham, by whose interest his brother, Euseby Cleaver, was made bishop of Fernes, and finally archbishop of Dublin. William Cleaver, in 1784, obtained a prebend in Westminster, and in 1785 was chosen head of his college, soon after which he took his doctor's degree. In 1787 he was consecrated bishop of Chester, translated to Bangor in 1800, and to St. Asaph in 1806. He died in 1815. He published—1. De Rhythmo Græcorum, 8vo.—2. Directions to his clergy on the choice of books, 8vo.—3. Remarks on Marsh's Dissertation on the Three First Gospels.—4. Sermons on Various Occasions. He was also editor of the splendid impression of Homer, printed at Oxford, by the Grenville family.

CLEGHORN, George, a Scotch physician, born at Cranton, near Edinburgh, 18th December 1716. After studying belles lettres at Edinburgh, he applied himself to physic and surgery, under the care of Dr. Munro, and, in 1736, went as surgeon to the 22d regiment of foot to Minorea, where he resided thirteen years. On his return to London, in 1750, he published his valuable work on the diseases of Minorea. The year after, he settled at Dublin, where he began to read regular courses of anatomy, and where he became highly respected for his learning and his amiable manners. He died December 1789. It is not the least of his praise to mention, that on his brother's death he sent for his widow and nine children from Scotland, and settled them in Dublin, with all the affection and tender care of a parent.

CLEMENS, Titus Flavius, a father of the church, generally called Alexandrinus, because born at Alexandria, according to some. He succeeded, 191, Panætius, in the cathedra school of Alexandria, where he died. The best edition of his works is that of Potter, 2 vols. fol. Oxford, 1715.

CLEMENT XIV., John Vincent Anthony Ganganelli, son of a physician of St. Archangelo near Rimini, was born 31st October 1705. When 18 he entered among the Franciscans, and applied himself to the studies of philosophy and divinity at Passaro, Recanati, Fano, and Rome, and when at the age of 35, he became public professor in the college of Bonaventure. He was employed under Benedict XIV. in the council of the holy office, and the next pope, Clement XIII. who equally knew his merit, raised him to the purple. Though raised to dignity, he preserved the habit and the austerity of a poor ecclesiastic, but in his opinions he espoused the cause of foreign princes, and spoke boldly of the necessity of expelling the Jesuits. On the death of Clement XIII. he was elected in a tumultuous assembly of the conclave, and proclaimed pope by cardinal de Bernis. The difficulties which surrounded him were artfully removed; he negotiated with Portugal, Spain, and France, who seemed inclined to make deep inroads on the papal power, and at their pressing solicitations he, in 1773, formally suppressed the Jesuits. The violent spirit of the times, and the unpopular measures which necessity obliged him to adopt, at last wasted away his strength, and produced such debility as proved fatal 22d September 1774, though some have been accused of hastening his death by poison. In his character he was bold, upright, benevolent, and mild, the friend of literature, and an enemy to all abuses. When desired to live with greater splendor, he replied that neither St. Peter nor St. Francis had taught him to dine splendidly. His life has been published by Caraccioli, and some letters have appeared, 4 vols. 12mo. 1776, under his name, though they are supposed many of them to be spurious.

CLEMENT, Francis, a native of Beze in Burgundy, member of the congregation of St. Maur. He was employed by his superiors at Paris to continue Rivet's literary history of France, of which he wrote the 11th and 12th vols. He afterwards composed the 12th and 13th vols. of Bouquet's collection of French historians, and improved Dantine's art de verifier les dates, published by Durand and Clemenct in 4to.—and by himself, 3 vols. fol. 1783—1792. He began Part de verifier les dates avant J. Christ, but died before its completion 1793, aged 79.

CLEMENT, Peter, a native of Geneva, who became travelling tutor to lord Waldegrave, and afterwards settled at Paris, where he conducted the Nouvelles literaries de France from 1749 to 1754. He wrote also some poems, and Merope a tragedy, and George Barnwell translated from the English. He was not always correct in his character, but often licentious. He died 1767, aged 60.

CLEMENT, John Mary Bernard, a critic, to whom Voltaire gave the name of Inclement, was born at Dijon, in 1742, and died at Paris, in 1812. He is the author of Medea, a tragedy; Satires, translations from Achilles Tatius, Cicero, and Tasso; and various severe criticisms on Voltaire, La-harpe, and other eminent writers.

CLEMENTI, Murio, the celebrated pianist, was born at Rome, in 1752; practiced in his profession as a musician with great applause in the principal cities of Europe; took up his residence in England in 1810; but afterwards ceased to take pupils and to play in public. He died at his cottage in the vale of Evesham, Worcestershire, April 16, 1832; and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Dr. Crotch says—Clementi may be considered as the father of piano-forte music, for he long ago introduced all the beauties of Italian melody into pieces calculated, by their ornamental varieties, to elicit the power of the instrument, and display the taste, as well as the execution of the performer.

CLEOPATRA, a queen of Egypt, who intrigued with J. Cæsar to ensure the possession of her kingdom, and afterwards married Antony, whom she attended at the battle of Actium. Not to be led a captive in the triumph of the victorious Augustus she destroyed herself by the bite of an asp, B. C. 20.

CLERC, John le, a celebrated scholar born at Geneva, 19th March 1657. As his father was a physician of eminence, and a Greek professor at Geneva, the greatest attention was paid to his education, and after studying belles lettres and the classics with the most indefatigable earnestness, he directed his thoughts to divinity at the age of 19, and was at the proper time admitted into orders. He soon after embraced Arminianism, and after residing some time at Saumur, he visited England, where he was honored with the acquaintance of many learned and respectable characters. As he totally differed from his friends and connexions at Geneva, with respect to religious opinions, he determined not to reside among them, but settled at Amsterdam 1633, where he became popular as a preacher, and particularly as professor of philosophy, Hebrew, and polite literature. His ars critica, 3 vols. 12mo. was published in 1696, and in 1709 appeared his Sulpicius Severus, his Grotius, and also the remains of Menander and Philemon, a collection which drew upon him the severe censures of those able scholars Bentley and Burnan. Le Clerc died 8th Jan. 1736, in his 79th year.

CLERMONT TONNERRE, Stanislaus count of, a French nobleman in the states general assembled at Paris 1789. He showed himself an able orator, attached to order, the friend of limited monarchy, and an enemy to popular tumults. His opposition to the Jacobin club sent him to prison, where he was massacred on the 1st day of Sept. 1793. His opinions have been published in 4 vols. 8vo.—and his examen de la constitution, Svo. 1791. His father, the duke of Clermont, was cruelly guillotined 26th July 1793, aged 74.

CLEVELAND or CLEIVELAND, John, a poet in the reign of Charles I. was born at Loughborough 1613, son of a clergyman, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, from which he was removed to St. John's, of which he became a fellow in 1634. As tutor he gained great applause; and as a political writer, he ably served the royal cause. Though unsuccessfully, he opposed the election of Oliver Cromwell to be a member for the town of Cambridge, and when he found his place of residence no longer safe, he retired to Oxford, where the king had fixed his head quarters. His satirical pieces, especially "the rebel Scot," were greatly admired; he was rewarded for his loyalty, by the appointment of judge advocate of the garrison of Newark; but when this was taken by the republicans, he made his escape, destitute and poor. He was seized at Norwich, and detained as a person of great abilities and averse to the reigning government, and he obtained his liberty by writing to Cromwell a letter, in which, while he supplicates his enlargement, he boldly avows his principles and defends his conduct. After his release, he retired to London, where he became the companion of the wits and loyalists of the times, especially of the author of Hudibras. He died of an intermittent fever, 29th April 1659. Though courted and admired as a poet in his own age, and preferred before Milton by his contemporaries, he is now sunk into oblivion.

CLIFFORD, George, third earl of Cumberland, was eminent as a navigator. He was born in 1553, and was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where Whitgift, afterwards primate, was his tutor. After applying himself to the study of mathematics, he was employed under government, and in 1586 sat as one of the peers on the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots. He was of a genius bold and enterprising, and not less than eleven expeditions by sea were undertaken by him, and at his own expense, either for purposes of discovery, or for the annoyance of the enemies of his country. He died in the Savoy, London, 30th October 1605.

CLIFTON, William, was the son of a wealthy quaker in Philadelphia, and was born in 1772. He is said to have manifested an eager love of literature at a very early age, and as his health was very feeble, he was not educated with a view to any particular profession. His earliest performances were various satirical effusions in prose and verse upon the most prominent political topics of the day. The best of his productions is the Epistle to Mr. Gifford, published anonymously in the first American edition of Mr. Gifford's poems. He died in December 1799.

CLINTON, Henry, grandson of Francis sixth earl of Lincoln, was knight of the Bath, and engaged as general in the American war. He evacuated Philadelphia in 1778, and took Charleston in 1780, for which he was thanked by the house of commons. He returned to England in 1782, and soon after published an account of the campaign in 1781-83, which lord Cornwallis answered, and to which sir Henry made a reply. He was governor of Gibraltar, 1795, and also member for Newark, and died soon after.

CLINTON, James, brigadier general. In the beginning of the revolutionary war he was appointed colonel and accompanied Montgomery to Canada. In 1776 he was made brigadier general. In 1777 he commanded under gov. Clinton at fort Clinton, from which, when attacked and taken by Sir Henry Clinton, gen. Clinton, though severely wounded, escaped. In 1779 he went with gen. Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians. He was stationed in command of the northern department at Albany; but he was afterwards present at the capture of Cornwallis. He died 1812, aged 75.

CLINTON, George, governor of New-York, and vice president of the United States. He was educated to the law. As a member of the colonial assembly in 1775 he was a zealous whig; and the same year was chosen a member of congress. He voted for the declaration of independence, but being called away by his appointment as brigadier general before the instrument was ready for the signature of the members, his name is not attached to it. At the first election under the constitution of New York, he was chosen, April 20, 1777, both governor and lieutenant governor. He accepted the office of governor, and was re-elected five times afterwards, and held the office till 1795. He was again chosen governor in 1801. In 1804 he was elevated to the office of vice-president of the United States, in which station he continued till his death. He died at Washington, April 20, 1812, aged 72.

CLINTON, De Witt, LL.D., governor of New York, was graduated at Columbia college 1786. Although he studied law, he was never much engaged in the practice. He was elected to the senate of New York in 1799. In 1802 he was appointed a senator of the United States. He was chosen mayor of the city of New York, an office of great emolument and patronage, in 1803, and annually excepting in 1807 and 1810, until 1815, exerting himself to promote in every way the prosperity of the city. Under his auspices the historical society, and the academy of arts were incorporated; the city hall was founded; the orphan asylum established; and the city fortified. In 1812 he was the peace candidate for the presidency of the United States. In 1816 he was appointed a canal commissioner, and president of the board. In April 1817, in consequence of the exertions of Mr. Clinton, a law was passed authorizing the Erie canal, 363 miles in length, at an estimated expense of five millions of dollars. The next year he was elected governor, and called the attention of the legislature particularly to the great subjects of education and internal improvements. He was re-elected in 1820. At the election in 1822, under the amended constitution, he declined being a candidate. He acted as president of the board of canal commissioners in 1823 and 1824; but in this last year the legislature without accusation removed him from his place. This flagrant act of injustice towards the father of the great system of internal improvement roused the indignation of the people. He was immediately nominated for governor, and was elected by a majority of 16,000 votes over his antagonist. During his administration the Erie canal was in 1825 finished, and the completion of the work was celebrated throughout the state. Re-elected in 1826, he in that declined the embassy to England which Mr. Adams offered him. He died at Albany, 1825, aged 59. He published a number of addresses before literary, masonic, and other societies.

CLIVE, Robert, lord, was born at Styche, in Shropshire, of a good family, in 1725, and in his nineteenth year was sent as a writer to Madras. In 1747, however, he passed from the civil to the military service, and soon displayed those talents which induced Lord Chatham to call him "a heaven-born general." The first occasion on which he distinguished himself was at the storming of Devicottah. In 1751 he put the seal to his reputation by his capture and subsequent defence of Arcot. Having visited England, in 1753, he was gratefully received by the East India Company, and he returned to India with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and the governorship of Fort St. David's. After having reduced the pirate Angria, he sailed to Bengal, where he recovered Calcutta, defeated Surajah Doulah, at the battle of Plassey, dethroned him, and established Meer Jaffier in his place. He also destroyed a considerable Dutch force. By these exploits he gained the title of an omrah of the Mogul empire, an Irish peerage, and enormous wealth. In 1764 he was made governor of Bengal, whence, in 1767, he finally returned to England. A severe attack was made upon him, in 1773, in the House of Commons, respecting his political conduct in India; but the motion was rejected, and a vote was passed declaratory of his services. His death took place, by his own hand, in the November of the following year. Clive must be considered as the founder of the British empire in Hindostan; but it is more than doubtful whether the measures which he adopted to accomplish his purposes were always in accordance with strict morality.

CLOUET, M. a French chemist and mathematician, was born near Mezieres, in 1751. France is indebted to him for having perfected the manufacture of cast steel, and for an imitation of the Damascus scymitar blades. He died at Cayenne, in 1801. Clouet was no less remarkable for eccentricity than for talent. He slept but little, and upon straw, made his own clothes, and cooked his own victuals, which were of the coarsest kind.

CLOVIS I. the proper founder of the French monarchy, was born 467, and succeeded his father Childeric 481. He was victorious against the Romans, but in a battle with the Germans, when he saw his troops ready to give way, he made a vow that he would worship the God of the christians, as his wife Clotilda had advised him to do, and after obtaining the victory, he was converted from the heathen religion, and was baptised, with 3000 of his subjects, on Christmas-day, by St. Remi, archbishop of Rheims. He was victorious in other battles against the Goths, and though he was checked in a battle by Theodric near Arles, he had the good fortune to subdue the best part of Gaul under his power, and he fixed his residence at Paris, which he made the capital of his dominions. He died 511, aged 45, in the 30th year of his reign.

CLOWES, William, a surgeon of eminence, of whom few particulars are known. He was originally a surgeon in the navy, and was afterwards surgeon to Bartholomew and Christ hospitals, London, and to queen Elizabeth. His last publication on the venereal disease was in 1596, reprinted 1637.

CLUVERIUS, Philip, a celebrated geographer, born at Dantzic 1580. He studied law at Leyden, but his genius and the advice of Jos. Scaliger directed him to geography. He travelled to improve himself through Germany, England, France, and Italy, and it is said he could talk with fluency ten different languages. He died at Leyden 1623, 43 years old. He published de tribus Rheni alveis—Italia—Germania antiqua—Sicilia & Sardinia,— & introductio ad geograph. universalem.

CLYMER, George, a patriot of the American revolution, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence. He was educated a merchant. In 1775 he was one of the first continental treasurers. In 1780 he co-operated with Robert Morris in the establishment of a bank for the relief of the country. He was a member of congress under the present constitution. In 1791 he was placed at the head of the excise department in Pennsylvania. In 1796 he was sent to Georgia to negotiate, together with Hawkins and Pickens, a treaty with the Cherokee and Creek Indians. He was afterwards president of the Philadelphia bank, and of the Academy of fine arts. He died 1813, aged 73.

COBB, Samuel, an ingenious poet, educated at Christ's hospital, of which he afterwards became master. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge. He died at London 1713. He wrote observations on Virgil, and a collection of poems 8vo. 1700. He also assisted Rowe in his Callipædia, and Ozell in his Boileau's lutrin.

COBB, Ebenezer, remarkable for longevity, was born in Plymouth, Mass. March 22, 1694, and was ten years contemporary with Peregrine White of Marshfield, the first son of New England, who was born on board the Mayflower in Cape Cod harbor in Nov. 1620. He died at Kingston, Dec. 8, 1801, aged 107 years. He was temperate through life, and declared in his last year that he had the same attachment to life as ever. As he apprehended the close of his days he shrewdly replied to some one, who made a remark upon his expected dissolution, "it is very rare, that persons of my age die."

COBDEN, Edward, D.D. first chaplain to Gibson bishop of London, and afterwards for 22 years to George II. was besides archdeacon of London, prebendary of Lincoln and St. Paul's, and rector of Acton, and of St. Austin, and St. Faith, London. Though such a pluralist, yet his income did not exceed 350*l.* per annum, a sum which, by moderation and contentment, he converted into honorable independence and dignified enjoyment. He published "discourses and essays," 1757, of which only 250 copies were printed, and also poems for the benefit of his curate's widow. He died 22d April, 1764, aged above 80.

COCCEIUS, Henry, a native of Bremen, educated at Leyden, and made professor of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg, from which he removed to Utrecht, and afterwards to Frankfort on Oder. In 1713, he was created a baron of the empire, and died 1719, aged 75. He is author of juris publici prudentia compendiose exhibita—prodromus justitiæ gentium—deductiones consilia, and Theses, four vols. 4to.

COCCEIUS, Samuel, a German baron, son of the preceding, born at Frankfort on the Oder. He was in the service of Frederic the great of Prussia, and, as his grand chancellor, he presided with dignity and great impartiality over the administration of Justice. Besides the Frederician code, published in three vols. 8vo. 1747, he edited Grotius de jure belli pacis, five vols. 4to. He died 1755.

COCCEIUS, John, a native of Bremen, Hebrew professor there. He afterwards removed to Franeker, and then to Leyden, where he obtained the theological chair. He excited a warm controversy by the singularity of his opinions. He considered the whole of the old testament as a mystical representation of Christ and his church, and gave to every word and sentence a metaphorical interpretation. He was an advocate for the millenium, and deeply studied the apocalypse. His followers were called Cocceians. He died at Leyden 1669, aged 61. His works filled 10 vols. fol.

COCCHI, Anthony, professor of physic at Florence and Pisa, was born at Mugellaho, and died 1753, aged 62. He was esteemed for his learning, and went to England with Lord Huntingdon to see Mead, Newton, and other learned men. He was intimate with Boerhave. He was antiquary to the emperor. He wrote a treatise on the advantages of the Pythagorean mode of life, and other medical treatises, besides an edition of Zenophon Ephesius' amoribus Anthiæ & Abrocômæ.

COCHRAN, William, a Scotch painter, born December 12, 1738, at Strathaven, Clydesdale. After studying at Glasgow, he went to Italy, in 1761, and applied himself under the direction of Gavin Hamilton at Rome, and on his return home he acquired great celebrity, and some opulence. He died October 23, 1785, and was buried in the cathedral church of Glasgow. His pieces are much admired, especially his Dædalus and Icarus, and his Diana and Endymion.

COCKBURN, Catharine, an ingenious lady, daughter of captain David Trotter, of the navy. From a protestant she became a catholic, and again was reconciled to the protestants. In 1708 she married Mr. Cockburn, son of an eminent Scotch divine, who, though at first a nonjuror, took the oaths, and obtained the living of Long Horsley, Cumberland. Though possessed with a genius for poetry, she turned her thoughts to metaphysics, and defended Locke against Drs. Burnet and Holdsworth. She survived her husband about one year, and died 1749, aged 70. Her works were collected by Dr. Birch, in 2 vols. 8vo.

CODDINGTON, William, the father of Rhode Island, was a native of Lincolnshire, England. He came to this country as an assistant, or one of the magistrates of Mass. and arrived at Salem in the Asbella 1630. He removed to Rhode Island 1633, and was the principal instrument in effecting the original settlement of that place. After various visionary projects, something like a regular plan of government was adopted, and Mr. Coddington chosen governor, and continued in that office, until the charter was obtained, and the island was incorporated with Providence plantations. In 1647 he assisted in forming the body of laws, which has been the basis of the government of Rhode Island ever since. In 1648 he was elected governor, but declined the office. In 1651 he went to England and was commissioned governor of Aquetnech island separate from the rest of the colony; but as the people were jealous, lest his commission should affect their laws and liberties, he resigned it. He was governor in the years 1674 and 1675. He died 1678, aged 77.

CODRINGTON, Christopher, a gentleman of genius and merit, was born at Barbadoes, and educated at Christ church, Oxford. He was elected fellow of All-souls, in 1689, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of physic, modern and classical literature, and divinity. He afterwards entered the army, without resigning his fellowship; and recommended himself to the notice of king William by his courage in repelling the French in their attack on St. Christopher, and at the siege of Namur. At the peace of Ryswick he was made governor of the Leeward islands, in which office he conducted himself with great propriety. He was at the successful attack on Guadaloupe in 1703; some time after which he resigned his employment, and lived in retirement and learned ease. He died at Barbadoes 7th April 1710, and his remains were brought to England, and interred June 19, 1716, in All-souls chapel. He left his library, valued at 6000*l.* to his college, besides 10,000*l.* to build a library. He left also two plantations to the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts. Some of his poems appear in the Muse Anglicanæ. He was esteemed as very superior in metaphysical knowledge.

COELLO, Alonzo Sanchez, a native of Portugal, to whom Philip II. gave the name of the Portuguese Titian, was born in 1515, and died in 1590. He was a pupil of Moro. Coello was in high favor with several of his contemporary sovereigns. Many of his works are in the Escorial; but his best piece, a St. Sebastian, is in the church of San Gerónimo at Madrid.

COEN, John Paterson, a native of Hoorn, who became governor of the Dutch East-Indies, and laid the foundation of the city of Batavia, where he removed the factory from Bantam 1619. He went to Europe in 1623, but four years after returned to Batavia, which he bravely defended against the emperor of Java. The bodies of the thousands, however, of the enemy who fell in the siege, produced a pestilence, of which unfortunately Coen died 1629, aged 42.

COEUR, James, a French merchant, the richest subject in Europe. His connections were so extensive that he had 300 factors in Italy and the Levant, and his resources were so great, that he lent Charles 7,200,000 crowns of gold, with which the monarch conquered Normandy. These high services, however, were ill repaid. Though once the favorite and friend of the king, he was basely imprisoned, and, under the false pretence that he had poisoned Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress, he was tried and condemned to dishonorable concessions, and a fine of 100,000 crowns. His clerks, in his misfortunes, showed their gratitude to him; they relieved his distresses, and facilitated his escape from confinement. He fled to Rome, where pope Calixtus III. gave him the command of his fleet against the Turks. He soon after died at Chio, 1456.

COGAN, Thomas, a physician, was born, in 1736, at Kibworth, in Leicestershire, and was educated under Dr. Aikin. In conjunction with Dr. Hawes he founded the Humane Society. A considerable part of his life was spent in Holland. He died in 1818. He translated the works of Camper, and published some original works; among which are, The Rhine, or A Journey from Utrecht to Frankfort; A Philosophical Treatise on the Passions; Ethical Questions; and Theological Disquisitions.

COGSWELL, James, D. D. was born in Saybrook, Con. Jan. 6, 1720. He graduated at Yale college in 1742, and in 1744 was ordained pastor of the first church in Canterbury of that state. Here he remained till 1771, when he was released from his charge; but in the following year was installed over a church in Windham of the same state, where he continued till Dec. 1804. The infirmities of age now admonished him to retire from public service. He died Jan. 2, 1807, aged 87.

COHORN, Memnon, a famous Dutch engineer, who early displayed his genius for military tactics, and the art of fortification. As engineer and lieutenant-general in the service of his country, he skilfully fortified and ably defended the principal towns, and supported the siege of Namur against the celebrated Vamban. He died at the Hague 1704, aged 72. He called Bergen-op-Zoom the master-piece of all his fortifications which he had erected in the United States. He wrote a treatise on fortification, in the Flemish language.

COINTE, Charles le, a French historian, born at Troyes, 4th November 1611. He was priest of the congregation of the oratory, and for his abilities he deserved the patronage of Colbert, who obtained for him a pension of 1000 livres, and three years after 500 livres more. He wrote Annales ecclesiastici Francorum, 8 vols. fol. from 235 to 835, the first volume of which appeared 1665, and the last 1679. The work, though not elegant, is curious, and contains great variety of matter. Le Cointe died at Paris 18th January 1681, aged 70.

COKE, Sir Edward, a celebrated judge, was born at Mileham, in Norfolk, in 1549. His studies were pursued at Trinity College, Cambridge, and the Inner Temple. In 1578 he pleaded his first cause, and was appointed reader of Lyons Inn, where he acquired great reputation by his lectures. The fortune which he gained by an extensive practice he increased by two advantageous marriages, the last of which being with the sister of Burleigh gave him also political influence. In 1592 and 1593 he was made solicitor and attorney general, and in the latter office disgraced himself by the manner in which he conducted the prosecution of the earl of Essex. This fault he repeated in his prosecution of Raleigh. In 1603 he was knighted; in 1606 appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas; and in 1615 was raised to be chief justice of the King's Bench, and a privy counsellor. As a judge his conduct was honorable to him. In 1616, however, falling into disfavor with James I. he was dismissed from his high office, and from the council, in a manner which was more disgraceful to the monarch than to the judge. It is to be regretted that Coke endeavored, though vainly, to recover his places by mean concession to the minion Buckingham. To the council he was, indeed, at length restored, but was soon expelled again, and committed to the Tower for his spirited and patriotic behavior in parliament. The hatred which he had thus excited he continued to merit during the remainder of his senatorial career, from 1623 to 1628, and he had a principal share in framing the celebrated Petition of Right. He died at Stoke Pogies, in Buckinghamshire, in 1634. Pre-eminent in legal knowledge, acute, and of a solid judgment, Coke had none of those fine intellectual qualities which shed a lustre round their possessor. It is only as a judge and as a senator that he can be regarded with satisfaction. His works may be considered as law classics. Among the most celebrated of them are his Reports; Book of Entries; and Institutes of the Laws of England.

COKE, Thomas, L.L. D. a methodist Bishop in the United States, was born in Wales 1747, and was educated at Oxford. At the University he was a deist; but afterwards took orders in the established church of England. In 1776 he became acquainted with Mr. Wesley; and in 1780 became one of his assistants. In 1784 he came to America and communicated the plan of government and discipline, drawn up by Mr. Wesley, and which still forms the bond of union to the great body of the methodists in this country. He visited the United States for the last time in 1804; and, in 1813 sailed for the island of Ceylon, in company with six other preachers, with a view to establish missions there, but died on his passage, aged 66 years, being found dead in his cabin, on the morning of May 3d, 1804. Dr. Coke is the author of A Commentary on the Bible; A History of the West Indies; and other works.

COLARDEAU, Charles Pierre, a French poet, born at Jauville, Orleanois, died 7th April 1776, aged 41. He translated Pope's Eloisa to Abelard, with great spirit and elegance, besides two of Young's Night thoughts. He wrote two tragedies, Astarbe and Calisto, not favorably received on the French stage. He was elected member of the French academy, but died before his inaugural speech. His works were collected in 2 vols. 8vo. 1779, Paris.

COLBERT, John Baptist, marquis of Segnelai, an illustrious statesman. His family were originally of Rheims, where his grandfather was a wine merchant, and his father of the same occupation, but afterwards a cloth and silk merchant. Colbert was first intendant of finances, and in this appointment, he settled on the firmest basis, the trade of France with the East and West Indies. As superintendent of the buildings in 1664 he began to improve and embellish the capital, and by erecting the noble palaces of the Thuilleries, Versailles, the Louvre, and Fontainebleau, he contributed to the comfort of the monarch, and to the honor of the nation. His influence with the monarch procured also the foundation of the academy for painting and sculpture, the academy of sciences, and the observatory which was first inhabited by Cassini. He likewise promoted the canal by which the two seas were united, and which was completed in 1680, after 14 years' labor, and he introduced a severe reform in the courts of justice. In 1669 he was made secretary of state, and three years after minister of state, which enabled him more fully to promote the interests of his country, and the glory of his master. He died September 6th 1683, is deservedly respected as a minister who ably restored the navy, the commerce, and the finances of France, patronised learning and science, and invigorated genius by his mild and active generosity.

COLBERT, John Baptist, marquis of Torey, son of the preceding, was born September 19th, 1665. He was early engaged in politics, and as ambassador in Portugal, Denmark, and England, he evinced great judgment and ability. He was secretary of state 1686, director general of the posts 1699, and counsellor to the regency in Lewis XV's minority. He died at Paris 2d September 1746, aged 81. Ten years after his death appeared his memoirs of the negotiations from the treaty of Ryswick to the peace of Utrecht, in four parts, 8 vols. 12mo. written with great purity and commendable impartiality.

COLDEN, Cadwallader, a physician, was a native of Scotland, and came to America about 1708. He first settled as a physician in the colony of Pennsylvania, and continued in practice there some years. In 1718 he visited England. Governor Hunter of New York conceived so favorable an opinion of Mr. Colden, after a short acquaintance, that he became his warm friend, and offered his patronage if he would remove to New York. In 1718 he therefore settled in that city. He was the first who filled the office of surveyor general in the colonies. He received also the appointment of master in chancery. In 1720, on the arrival of governor Burnet, he was honored with a seat in the king's council of the province. He afterwards rose to the head of this board, and in that station succeeded to the administration of the government in 1760. In 1761 he was appointed lieutenant governor of New York, and he held this commission during the remainder of his life, being repeatedly at the head of the government in consequence of the death or absence of several governors. He retained his loyalty during the troubles which preceded the American revolution, and in consequence became exposed to popular indignation, which however proceeded no farther than the destruction of some of his property, and burning his effigy. He died 1776, aged 88. Mr. Colden's publications were numerous in botany, medicine, history, and philosophy.

COLE, Thomas, a dissenting minister, educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. In 1656 he was made principal of St. Mary-hall, and had the great Locke among his pupils; but at the restoration he was ejected for nonconformity, from his preferments, and after keeping a school for some time at Nettlebed, he settled in London, and was lecturer at Pinner's hall. He wrote a discourse on regeneration, faith, and repentance, 8vo.—a discourse on the christian religion on sundry points, 8vo.—the incomprehensibility of imputed righteousness for justification of human reason, and other things, and died 1697.

COLES, Elisha, author of a Latin dictionary, was born in Northamptonshire about 1640, and entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, in 1658. He left the university without a degree, and maintained himself in London, by teaching Latin and English. He was afterwards usher at Merchant taylors', but left the place for some misdemeanor, at present unknown, and retired to Ireland, where he died about 1680. Besides his dictionary in 8vo. he wrote the English schoolmaster—short-hand, and Nolens Volens—an English dictionary. The famous work on predestination was written by another Elisha Coles, his uncle, who lived about this period, and died 1688.

COLET, John, D. D. was born in St. Antholin's parish, London, 1466, son of the lord mayor, and brother to 21 other children. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; his knowledge did not extend to Greek, as in those days that language was considered as unnecessary, and the learning of it was opposed by a set of men who called themselves Trojans. From Oxford he travelled on the continent, and became acquainted with the learned of the times, with Budæus, Erasmus, Groeyn, Lincæer, Lilly, and others; and on his return to England, he was courted and admired for his learning and eloquence. After inferior preferments, he was made dean of St. Paul's in 1505, and in this high office he began by preaching himself, and by procuring the assistance of able divines, to encourage inquiries after the contents of the holy scriptures. In his eagerness to promote learning, Colet founded St. Paul's school in 1512, of which Lilly was the first master, with an ample provision to instruct 153 boys gratis, under the patronage of the mercer's company. He died 16th September 1519, in his 53d year.

COLIGNI, Gaspard de, admiral of France, was born 16th Feb. 1516, at Chatillon-sur-Loing. He was early inured to a military life, and by his brave conduct at the battle of Ceri-soles, and particularly of Renti, he was made admiral of France. At the death of Henry II. he espoused the cause of the Calvinists against the Guises, and during the battles which desolated France during that melancholy period of civil war, he greatly distinguished himself, especially at Dreux, St. Deuys, Jarnac, and Montecontour. Peace at last put an end to civil broils, and Coligni appeared at court, and was loaded with the caresses and the presents of Charles IX. who soon after perfidiously planned and executed his murder. Coligni was the first who fell on the fatal day of Bartholomew, 24th Aug. 1572. His life has been written by Gatiien de Courtitz, 1636, and is also found among the "hommes il-Justres de France." His brother Odet was a cardinal and archbishop of Toulouse, but on embracing the protestant tenets, he was stripped of his honors, and fled to England, where he was poisoned by one of his servants, 1571.

COLIGNI, Henrietta, daughter of Gaspard de Coligni marshal of France, first married Thomas Hamilton, a Scotch lord, and afterwards count de la Suze of Champagne. This last union proved very unfortunate, the jealousy and severities of her husband compelled her to embrace the Catholic religion, and at last she was separated from him, and her marriage annulled by the parliament. She obtained celebrity by her wit and the effusions of her elegiac muse, so that the flatterers of her time, ascribed to her the majesty of Juno, the wit of Minerva, and the beauty of Venus. She died at Paris, 10th March 1673. Her poetical works have been printed with the works of Pelisson, 1695 and 1725, in 2 volumes 12mo.

COLLAMORE, John, died in Kensington, New Hampshire, Dec. 27th, 1828, aged 110 years and four months. He was a native of Ireland. His hair, which had been silvery white, became before his death nearly black.

COLLE, Charles, secretary to the Duke of Orleans, died at Paris, 2d Nov. 1783, aged 75. He was distinguished as a comic writer; but though he occasionally possesses all the vigor and elegance of genuine wit, and correct description, he yet wants delicacy, and that cautious regard for morals, so essential in public exhibitions. He was of that society of jovial companions known under the name of Caveau. His song on the capture of Portmahon procured him a pension of 600 livres. His works are collected in 3 vols. 12mo. under the title of theatre de societ . His best plays are, Truth in wine—Dupius and Desronias—and Partic de chasse de Henri IV. from which our Miller of Mansfield is borrowed.

COLLEONE, Bartholomew, a native of Bergamo, descended from a noble family. He followed the fortunes of de Montone, and of Joan queen of Naples, and afterwards entered into the service of the Venetians, and defeated Nicolas Piccinino. He was next in the service of Visconti, and then of Francis Sforza, for whom he defeated the French army at the battle of Frescati. After serving so many different masters, and every where carrying victory in his train, he again entered into the service of the Venetians. He died 1475, and his memory was honored with an equestrian statue, by the gratitude of the senate. He united to the great merits of a warrior the amiable character of the patron of learning, and the friend of religion and virtue.

COLLET, Peter, a French ecclesiastic of Ternay, who died 1770, aged 73. He is author of theologia moralis universalis, 17 vols. 8vo.—institutions theologic  ad usum seminianor, 7 vols. 12mo.—the life of Vincent de St. Paul, 2 vols. 4to.—lives of Bourdon and de la Croix, &c.

COLLETON, James, governor of South Carolina from 1636 to 1690, came from Barbadoes and was proprietary and landgrave. He built a fine house on Cooper river. His government was very unpopular. There were disputes concerning tenures of land and quit-rents. In 1687 he called a parliament and procured alterations in the fundamental laws. He offended the high church party, who were inflamed with zeal against the puritans. In the end he was driven from the government and the province.

COLLIER, Jeremy, an eminent nonjuring divine, was born, in 1630, at Stow Qui, in Cambridgeshire. He took his degree at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1676, and obtained a living, which he resigned for the lectureship of Gray's Inn. At the Revolution, he not only refused the oaths, but was active in behalf of the dethroned monarch. For nearly ten years he continued inveterately hostile to the government, during which period he published several bitter pamphlets, was twice imprisoned, and at length outlawed. His most indecorous act was, in concert with two others, his attending Friend and Perkins on the scaffold, and giving them public absolution. At last he turned his talents to better ends, and made war on the licentiousness of the theatre. His first work on this subject was A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the Stage. The wits in vain opposed him, for virtue was on his side; and, after a ten years struggle, he accomplished his object. The rest of his life was spent in various literary labours, among which were Essays; a translation of Moreri; an Ecclesiastical History of England; and Discourses on Practical Subjects. He died in 1726. Collier was a man of talents; and, however we may be inclined to censure his political principles, it would be unjust to deny him the praise of having been an honest and disinterested man.

COLLIN, Henry de, a German poet, one of the aulic counsellors belonging to the financial department, was born, about 1772, at Vienna, where he died in 1811. Among the German tragic dramatists he holds a distinguished place. His War Songs are full of animation. Collin left unfinished an epic, called The Rodolphiad.

COLLIN D'HARLEVILLE, John Francis, a French dramatist and poet, was born, in 1755, at Maintenon, in the department of the Eure and Loire, and died at Paris in 1806. The Inconstant, a comedy, acted in 1786, was his first piece, and it was followed by the Optimist, Castles in the Air, and twelve or thirteen others, some of which retain possession of the stage. His works have been collected in four volumes 8vo.

COLLINGWOOD, Cuthbert, lord, an English admiral, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1748. He was educated under Mr. Moises, at the same time with the present Chancellor Eldon. In 1761, he entered into the naval service, in which he passed through all the regular steps of promotion till he was made post captain, and commanded the Prince, admiral Bouyer's flag-ship, in the battle of the 1st of June, 1794. After this he had the Hector, and next the Excellent, in which he bore a part, with his old friend Nelson, in the action off Cape St. Vincent, Feb. 14, 1797. In 1799 he was raised to the rank of rear admiral of the white, and in 1801 to the red. In 1804 he was made vice-admiral of the blue, and served with Cornwallis in the tedious but important blockade of Brest. At length, after a variety of services Collingwood became second to Nelson in the battle of Trafalgar, on which occasion his ship, the Royal Sovereign, commenced the fight, in such a manner as drew from the commander these expressions: "Look at that noble fellow! Observe the style in which he carries his ship into action!" After the loss of the great hero, the command devolved upon Collingwood at a critical period, and how well he secured by his prudence what had been so gloriously won, needs not be here related. He was now advanced to be vice-admiral of the red, confirmed in the command of the Mediterranean fleet, and created a peer of Great Britain, by the title of baron Collingwood. He died off Minorca, on board the Ville de Paris, March 7, 1810, and his body being brought to England was interred in St. Paul's Cathedral.

COLLINS, John, an eminent accomptant and mathematician, son of a nonconforming divine, was born at Wood Eaton near Oxford, March 1624. He was engaged with a bookseller, and afterwards with Mar, a clerk of the kitchen to Charles prince of Wales, a man who was particularly fond of mathematics, and who constructed those sun-dials which adorned the prince's gardens. Thus early initiated to the knowledge of mathematics he further improved himself, during the seven years which he spent in the sea service, and at his return assumed the profession of an accomptant, and published some valuable works on mathematical and geometrical subjects. He was a member of the royal society, whose memoirs he enriched by many valuable communications. He died November 10th 1683. He was the intimate correspondent of the illustrious men of his times, of Newton, Wallis, Barrow, Gregory, Flamstead, Leibnitz, and Townley. Twenty-five years after his death his writings fell into the hands of the learned William Jones of the royal society.

COLLINS, Anthony, was born at Helston near Hönnslow, 21st June 1676, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, under the tuition of Hare, afterwards bishop of Chichester. He entered at the Temple, but disliking the study of the law, he applied himself to the general pursuit of literature. He now became the friend of the learned, and gained the confidence of Locke, who corresponded with him, and at his death left a letter for him, full of the warmest confidence and affection. He was the best part of his life engaged in controversies, which proved him to be more inclined to scepticism and infidelity, than to support the christian religion, as an impartial and disinterested inquirer after truth. His chief works were, priestcraft in perfection—an essay on the 39 articles of the church of England—vindication of the divine attributes—discourse of free thinking—philosophical inquiry concerning human liberty—scheme of literal prophecy—a discourse on the grounds and reasons of the christian religion, in two parts, a work which excited general attention, and whose tenets were in a short space of time combated by not less than 35 antagonists, among whom appear the respectable names of Whiston, Chandler, Clarke, Ashley, Sykes, and Sherlock.

COLLINS, Arthur, a learned and indefatigable antiquary, whose knowledge of genealogy and labors of research are sufficiently proved in his valuable work called the peerage of England, in 8 vols. which has passed through several editions, and has been further improved by Longmate.

COLLINS, William, the son of a hatter at Chichester, was born in 1720 or 1721, and received his education at Winchester, and at Magdalen College, Oxford. While at Oxford, he published his Oriental Eclogues. In 1744 he quitted the university, and took up his abode in London as an author. His projects were numerous, but want of patronage or want of diligence, or both, prevented them from being executed. He published, however, his Odes, which, to the disgrace of the age, were utterly neglected. From the pecuniary distress which he suffered, he was at length relieved by a legacy of £2000, but fortune came too late; he sunk into a state of nervous imbecility, and died at Chichester, in 1756. His Odes, those pearls which he cast before swine, have given him a place among the greatest lyrical writers of his country. They remain unsurpassed in vivid imagination, and high poetical feeling and diction.

COLLINS, John, governor of Rhode Island from 1786 to 1789. He was a patriot of the revolution, and a delegate to congress in 1789. He died 1795, aged 75.

COLLINSON, Peter, an eminent botanist, born in the parish of Stavely near Kendal, Westmoreland. He had an early and strong partiality for natural history, and great naturalists and many literary characters of the age were soon in the number of his intimate friends; such as Derham, Woodward, Dale, Sloane, Lloyd, and others. In 1723, he became fellow of the Royal Society, whose memoirs he greatly enriched by his own inquiries, and his valuable correspondence with foreigners, especially Benjamin Franklin, Cadwallader Colden, and the famous Linnæus. In private life he was of amiable manners, very communicative, and of a very benevolent heart. He died 11th August 1768, in his 75th year.

COLLOT D'HERBOIS, John Mary, one of the most sanguinary characters of the French revolution, was born at Maintenon, near Chartres. Originally he was a provincial actor, and a dramatist; and, though he gained little praise in those capacities, he was esteemed for the correctness of his conduct. In that conduct, however, a woeful change took place, partly produced, it would seem, by falling into habits of drunkenness. He became one of the most violently jacobinical members of the Convention, and being sent on a mission to Lyons, after the surrender of that city, he committed the most horrible atrocities; the walls were battered down, and more than 200 persons perished in one evening. Collot thus stained with blood, and deservedly called the tiger, returned to Paris to become the worthy associate of Robespierre. He voted for the abolition of monarchy, and the death of Lewis, because that unfortunate monarch had refused to appoint him his minister; but when his friend Robespierre was accused, he changed sides, and as president of the convention, he exerted all his influence to procure his condemnation. This minister of iniquity was afterwards himself condemned, 1795, to be deported to Cayenne, where he endeavored to excite an insurrection of the blacks. He died in confinement, November 1796.

COLMAN, George, an English writer, born about the year 1733 at Florence, where his father was British resident at the grand duke's court. He was educated at Westminster and Christ church Oxford. He early displayed those shining talents which promised future reputation, and insured him the friendship of the wits of the time, of Lloyd, Bonnel Thornton, Churehill, and others. While at Oxford he published with Thornton the Connoisseur in weekly numbers, from 31st January 1754, to September 30th 1756. He entered at Lincoln's-inn, but though called to the bar, the profession of the law was less congenial to his taste and feelings than the pursuit of the muses. From writing fugitive pieces of poetry, he soon applied himself to dramatic composition. His Polly Honeycomb was acted at Drury-lane in 1760 with great success, and the next year his Jealous Wife divided the general applause with Murphy's Way to keep him, and Macklin's Married Libertine. The death of lord Bath in 1764 left him in the independent enjoyment of a comfortable annuity, and his income was further increased upon the decease of general Pultney in 1767. He died 14th August, 1794. Besides the comedies already mentioned, the best of Colman's plays are the Clandestine marriage, the English merchant, the Oxonian in town, the Man of business, Epicene, the Spanish barber, Suicide, the Separate maintenance, and the Manager in distress.

He evinced his abilities as a scholar and as a critic, by his respectable translation of Terence's comedies, and of Horace's art of poetry.

COLMAN, Benjamin, D.D., first minister of the church in Brattle-street, Boston, was born in that town, and graduated at Harvard college 1692. He first preached half a year in Medford. In July 1695 he embarked for London. He was captured by the French, and carried to France, but in a few weeks contrived to reach London. During his stay in England he preached at different places, and supplied a small congregation at Cambridge for a few weeks. He afterwards preached about two years at Bath. A new society having been formed in Brattle-street, Boston, the principal gentlemen who composed it, sent him an invitation to return to his native country, and to be their minister. The peculiar constitution of this church, differing from the other churches in New England, rendered the founders desirous that he should be ordained in London. They approved of the confession of faith composed by the Westminster assembly, but they were averse to the public relation of experiences, then practiced previous to admission into the churches; and they wished the scriptures to be read on the sabbath, and the Lord's prayer to be used. These innovations, the founders believed, would excite alarm, and to avoid difficulty Mr. Colman was ordained by some dissenting ministers in London August 4, 1699. He arrived at Boston November 1, and December 24th the new house of worship was opened, and Mr. Colman preached in it for the first time. He died 1747, aged 73. Dr. Colman's publications were very numerous, but mostly sermons.

COLOCCI, Angelo, a native of Jesi in Italy, descended from a noble family, who assumed the learned name of Angelus Colotius Bassus. He settled at Rome, where he distinguished himself by his noble collection of books. He was made bishop of Nocera, by Leo X. and governor of Ascoli by Clement VII. He wrote Latin poems of some merit, but his Italian verses express little excellence. He died at Rome 1549, aged 82. He was the reviver and patron of the Roman Academy.

COLOMBIERE, Claude de la, a famous Jesuit, born near Lyons. He was an eloquent preacher, and for two years delivered his discourses with great popularity and effect before James II. of England, but on suspicion of conspiracy, he was banished from England, and died at Paris, in the Charolois, 15th February 1682, aged 41. He is particularly known as the inventor of the Solemnity of the heart of Jesus, which had however been before introduced by Thomas Goodwin, president of Magdalen college, Oxford. The novelty of this improper act of devotion soon engaged the attention of the pious, and under the influence of pretended visions and miracles it soon gained a great number of partisans and zealous apostles. The better sense of mankind, however, and the return of genuine piety, soon dispelled these fanatical tenets. The sermons of Colombiere were published at Lyons in 1757, 6 vols. 12mo. He wrote besides some moral reflections, and spiritual letters.

COLONNA, Prospero, son of Anthony prince of Salerno, assisted, in company with his relation Fabricio, Charles VIII. of France in the conquest of Naples; but afterwards he exerted his influence and his military powers to reconquer it for the house of Arragon. He was made prisoner at the battle of Villa Franca 1515; but when restored to liberty by the French, he renewed the war with astonishing vigor, and after gaining the battle of la Bicoque, he was enabled to relieve Milan, in 1522. This distinguished warrior died 1523, aged 71.

COLONNA, Pompeo, nephew of Prospero, was brought up to the church, and made bishop of Rieta, and a cardinal, though his inclinations tended to the military profession. Ever restless and dissatisfied, he raised an insurrection at Rome on the reported death of Julius II. 1512, and, with his accomplice Savillo, he seized the capital; but, though pardoned, and restored to his ecclesiastical honors, he again, in 1526, engaged in another conspiracy to seize the chief power, and to put the pope to death. This perfidious conduct, which brought misery on the Romans, by the sacking of the city by the constable Bourbon, was not punished as it deserved, but Colonna, whose intrigues assisted the pope's escape from the castle of St. Angelo, was again pardoned, raised to new honors, and made viceroy of Naples. He died 1532, author of a poem de virtutibus mulierum.

COLONNA, John, a noble Italian, sent as papal legate to the christian army in Palestine. He was made prisoner by the Saracens, and cruelly condemned to be sawn in two; but the fortitude with which he bore the insults of his enemies disarmed their vengeance, and procured his liberty. He died 1245.

COLQUHOUN, Patrick, an active magistrate, was born at Dumbarton in Scotland, March 14, 1745. At the age of sixteen he went to America, in a commercial capacity, and on his return in 1766, settled at Glasgow, where he carried on business as a merchant, and contributed to the improvements of that city, of which he became lord provost and chairman of the chamber of commerce. In 1789 he settled in London, and in 1792, was appointed one of the police magistrates. In 1796 he published his "Treatise on the Police of the Metropolis;" for which the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1800 came out another work, "On the Police of the River Thames," containing a plan for the protection of property; which produced the establishment of a separate office at Wapping. After a long period of public service, he resigned his situation in 1818; and died in Westminster, April 25, 1820. Besides the two treatises already mentioned, he published a number of tracts, and three works of great merit—1. A new and appropriate System of Education for the Laboring People.—2. A Treatise on Indigence, exhibiting a general view of the National Resources for productive labor.—3. A Treatise on the Population, Wealth, Power, and Resources of the British Empire, 4to.

COLRANE, Henry Hare, lord, born at Blechingley, in Surrey, 10th May, 1693, was educated at Enfield, and Corpus Christy, Oxford. He was well skilled in the learned languages, and displayed his poetical talents by his musarum oblatio ad reginam, a poem inserted in the Musæ Anglicanæ. He travelled three times through Europe; and in his second tour was attended by the well known Conyers Middleton. He made a noble collection of prints and drawings of antiquities abroad, which were munificently presented after his decease to his college. He died at Bath 4th August, 1749.

COLSTON, Edward, an English philanthropist, born at Bristol, November 2, 1636. He greatly increased his property by his commercial connections with Spain; and the produce of his honest industry he benevolently disposed to charitable purposes. He built almshouses in Bristol, which he endowed with an income of 292*l.* and besides the erection of a school for 40 boys, he founded, at the expense of 11,000*l.* the hospital of St. Augustin, for a master, usher, and 100 boys, for whose maintenance he appropriated an annual income of above 138*l.* Besides this, gave many other munificent donations, especially 6000*l.* for the improvement of sixty small livings. He was not only charitable, but he possessed great meekness of temper, joined to exemplary temperance and sincere piety. It was his practice never to bestow his charity on beggars, but rather on poor house-keepers, and on sick and decayed persons. He died at Mortlake, in Surrey, 11th October 1721, aged 85.

COLTON, Rev. Charles Caleb, was graduated at King's college, Cambridge, in 1801; was afterwards chosen fellow; took orders, and, in 1813, obtained the vicarage of Kew and Petersham. He was noted for his eccentricities, irregularities, and inveterate attachment to gaming, which reduced him to beggary; and his excesses brought on a disease which required a surgical operation, to avoid the pain of which he blew out his brains. He is chiefly known as the author of "Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words, addressed to those who think," of which the first edition was published towards the end of 1820; and the sixth edition appeared in 1821. His death took place the 29th of April, 1832, at Fontainebleau, in France.

COLUMBUS, Christopher, the discoverer of the new world, was born in Genoa, about the year 1436. He was educated in the sciences of geometry and astronomy, which form the basis of navigation, and was well versed in cosmography, history, and philosophy, having studied some time at Pavia. To equip himself more completely for making discoveries, he learned to draw. He entered upon a sea-faring life at the age of 14. He married the daughter of an old Italian seaman, from whose journals and charts he received the highest entertainment. Columbus now conceived his great design of finding India in the west. He knew from observing lunar eclipses that the earth was a sphere, and concluded that it might be travelled over from east to west, or from west to east. Having established his theory and formed his design, he now began to think of the means of carrying it into execution. Deeming the enterprise too great to be undertaken by any but a sovereign state, he applied first, it is said, to the republic of Genoa, or to John II. king of Portugal. He next repaired to Ferdinand, king of Spain. The proposal of Columbus was rejected by the most learned men in Spain to whom the king had referred it. But by the influence of Juan Perez, a Spanish priest, and Lewis Santangel, an officer of the king's household, queen Isabella was persuaded to listen to his request, and after he had been twice repulsed, recalled him to court. By an agreement with their catholic majesties of April 17, 1492, he was to be viceroy and admiral of all the countries which he should discover, and was to receive one tenth part of the profits accruing from their productions and commerce. He sailed from Palos in Spain, Friday August 3, 1492, with three vessels, two of which were called cavales, being small vessels without decks, except perhaps at the ends, having on board in the whole, ninety men. He left the Canaries Sept. 6, and when he was about two hundred leagues to the west, the magnetic needle was observed, Sept. 14, to vary from the polestar. This phenomenon filled the seamen with terror, but his fertile genius by suggesting a plausible reason, in some degree quieted their apprehensions. After being twenty days at sea, without sight of land, some of them talked of throwing their commander into the ocean. All his talents were required to stimulate their hopes. At length, when he was almost reduced to the necessity of abandoning the enterprise, at ten o'clock in the night of Oct. 11th, he saw a light, which was supposed to be on shore, and early next morning, Friday Oct. 12, land was distinctly seen, which proved to be Guanahua, one of the Bahama islands. Thus he effected an object, which he had been twenty years in projecting and executing. At sunrise the boats were manned, and the adventurers rowed towards the shore with music and in martial pomp. The coast was covered with people, who were overwhelmed with astonishment. Columbus was first on shore, and was followed by his men. They all kneeling down, kissed the ground with tears of joy, and returned thanks for their successful voyage. This island, which is in north latitude 25, and is sometimes called Cat island, was named by Columbus San Salvador. Having discovered a number of other islands, and among them Cuba, Oct. 27, and Hispaniola, Dec. 6th, he began to think of returning. His large ship having been wrecked on the shoals of Hispaniola, he built a fort with her timber, and left behind him a colony of thirty-nine men at the port, which he called Navidad, the nativity, because he entered it on christmas day. From this place he sailed Jan. 4, 1493. During his passage, when threatened with destruction by a violent storm, he wrote an account of his discoveries on parchment, which he wrapped in a piece of oil cloth and enclosed in a cake of wax. This he put into a tight cask and threw it into the sea, with the hope, that it might be driven on shore, and that his discoveries might not be lost, if the vessel should sink. But he was providentially saved from destruction and arrived safe at Lisbon, March 4. On the fifteenth he reached Palos, and was received with the highest tokens of honor by the king and queen, who now made him admiral of Spain. Thus ended his first voyage, and justly entitles him to the character given him at the head of this article, the discoverer of the new world. The details of his other voyages are not within the limits of our plan. He died 1506, aged about 70.

COLUMBUS, Bartholomew, brother to Christopher, was ingenious in his drawing of spheres and sea charts. It is said that he was deputed by his brother to go and solicit the king of England, but that his voyage was delayed by falling into the hands of pirates; and when at last the English monarch accepted his proposals, and promised support and encouragement to his brother, he found that the plan had already been adopted by Ferdinand of Castile. Bartholomew shared the honors and the dangers of his brother's discoveries; and he was the founder of the town of St. Domingo. He died 1514, very rich.

COLUMBUS, Realdus, an Italian anatomical writer, born at Cremona. He died at Rome 1577. It is said that his works are composed from the compositions of Vesalius, his master, and predecessor in the anatomical chair of Padua, whose discoveries he freely appropriated to himself. His Latin is very elegant. His opinions on the blood nearly approached Harvey's discovery of the circulation.

COLVIUS, Andrew, a native of Dort, who went in the suit of the Dutch ambassador to Venice, where he gained the intimacy of Father Paul, and translated into Latin his treatise on the inquisition. He wrote also some elegant poetry, and made a valuable collection of books and curiosities, of which a catalogue was printed 1655. He died 1671, aged 77.—His son Nicholas was like himself a learned and eloquent divine. He died 1717.

COMBER, Thomas, D.D. an English divine, born at Westerham, Kent, 1645. He was educated at Sidney Sussex college, Cambridge. He was made dean of Durham in the room of Dr. Granville, 1691, and was chaplain to the princess Anne of Denmark, and to William and Mary. He died 25th November 1669, and was buried at Stonegrave, Yorkshire. He wrote some divinity tracts, particularly discourses on baptism, catechism, and confirmation, and on the liturgy of the church of England, &c.

COMBER, Thomas, D.D. a fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge. He was born at Shermanbury, Sussex, and educated at Horsham school. He was made dean of Carlisle, August 1630, and master of his college the following year. He was in 1642 deprived of all his preferments, and imprisoned. He died at Cambridge, February 1653. He wrote a vindication of the divine right of tithes, against Selden.

COMENIUS, John Ainos, a protestant, eminent as a divine and grammarian. He was born in Moravia 1592. After being pastor at Fulneck, and also presiding over a school there, he fled upon the invasion of his country by the Spaniards, and came to Lesna in Poland, where he maintained himself by teaching grammar, and where he published his Janua linguarum, a small book, which, it is said, acquired so much celebrity, that it was translated into 12 European languages. His fame as a grammarian was now so universally spread, that he was honorably invited by the Swedes and by the English parliament, to reform the public schools of the kingdom. In compliance with these requests he visited England in 1641, but the civil wars thwarted his expectations, and made his stay unnecessary. The next year he accepted the invitations of the Swedes, by whom he was respectfully treated. For four years he was engaged at Elbing in laying down plans for the promotion of general instruction, and his recommendations were publicly approved. He afterwards visited Sigismund Ragozki, prince of Transylvania, and gave him rules for the better regulation of the schools of his country; and on his return to Lesna, he had the misfortune to see the city reduced to ashes by the Poles, and his books and manuscripts destroyed. From Lesna he fled to Silesia, thence to Brandenburg, afterwards to Hamburg, and lastly to Amsterdam, where he ended his days 1671, aged 80.

COMINES, Philip de, an excellent historian of Flanders. His noble birth and great acquirements soon recommended him to the notice of Charles duke of Burgundy, and afterwards to that of Lewis XI. of France. Patronized by the monarch, he grew into power and consequence, and as ambassador, he served his court with fidelity and despatch. After the death of Lewis, he was stripped of his honours; the next successor, Charles VIII. viewed him with the prejudice and malevolence of a foreigner, and he was imprisoned at Loches; but though his enemies were so powerful and numerous, that no advocate would presume to plead his cause, he defended himself with the energy and effort of innocence, and after addressing his judges in an eloquent speech of two hours, he was, after three years' confinement, discharged. He died at his house at Argenton 1509, aged 64. The memoirs of his own times, are very valuable for the historical details which they give, during 34 years, of the affairs of the house of Burgundy, and of Lewis XI. and Charles VIII. of France, with anecdotes of the various transactions which at that time took place in England, and on the continent.

COMMELIN, Jerome, an eminent French printer, born at Douay. He settled at Geneva, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died 1598. He printed among other fathers, the works of Chrysostom, 4 vols. fol. an excellent edition. The mark he prefixed to his editions, was truth sitting in a COMMENDONE, John Francis, a native of Venice, who at the early age of 10, wrote Latin verses, and so recommended himself by his learning, that he became chamberlain to Julius III. and was employed in various embassies, and made bishop by Paul IV.; Pius IV. raised him to the rank of cardinal, and employed him as his nuncio in Poland, and he was afterwards legate at the diet of Augsburg, against the Lutherans. He wrote various Latin Poems and letters, and died at Padua, 1584, aged 60.

COMMERSON, Philibert, botanist to the French king; was born at Chatillon les Dombes, near Bourg in Bresse, 1727. When residing as physician at Montpellier, he showed his fondness for botany to so improper a degree, that he plundered even the king's garden, to enrich his collections. He was recommended by Linnæus to the queen of Sweden to complete her collection of rarest fishes, and consequently wrote his ichthyology in 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides a dictionary and bibliography on writers of natural history, and the martyrology of botany, containing the lives of those who had lost their life in pursuit of natural curiosities, to which his own life was to be added. His abilities recommended him to the ministry as a proper person to accompany Bougainville round the world, and he embarked in 1766, and highly distinguished himself by the labor and success of his researches. He died at the isle of France in 1778, leaving to the king's cabinet all his collection, amounting to 200 volumes in folio, besides the contents of 32 cases, containing great treasures, selected during his voyage.

COMPTON, Henry, an English prelate, born in 1632, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. Soon after entering into orders he obtained the rectory of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, a canonry at Christ-church, and the mastership of St. Cross hospital near Winchester. In 1674, he was made bishop of Oxford, and the next year succeeded to the see of London. In this elevated situation he was intrusted with the education of the princesses Mary and Anne, and the strong attachment which they showed to the protestant religion is honorably attributed to the wholesome instructions of the learned prelate. His zeal as a protestant prelate displeased James II. and therefore he removed him from the privy council, and on his refusing to suspend Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, from his ecclesiastical office, he was summoned before Jefferys and a commission, and arbitrarily deprived of all his episcopal functions. This violence on the part of the king was noticed by Mary and by William prince of Orange, and at last James, afraid of the consequences of his conduct, consented to restore the bishop to his offices. Compton however received with sullenness the reparation offered to his episcopal dignity, and when the kingdom was invaded by William, he warmly espoused his cause, and conducted the princess Anne to Nottingham, to prevent her being conveyed to France. With all the ardor of a friend, and the zeal of a partisan, he congratulated William on his landing, and supported his claims to the throne in the house of lords, and at last consecrated him, and fixed the crown on his head. Every step however which he pursued was tinctured with moderation, but because he wished the reconciliation of the dissenters, and opposed the prosecution of Sacheverell, he has been branded with the epithets of a weak and bigoted partisan. He died at the age of 81, July 7th, 1713.

CONANT, John, D. D. an English divine, was born at Yeaterton, Devon, 13th October, 1608, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. During the civil wars he left the university, but in 1649 he was unanimously elected rector of his college; he was also divinity professor, and in 1657 was admitted vice chancellor. At the restoration he appeared in London, at the head of the university, to congratulate the king; but though he assisted at the Savoy as one of the commissioners, he refused to comply with the act of uniformity, and was consequently deprived of all his preferments in 1662. He was afterwards re-admitted into the bosom of the church 1670, being ordained by Reynolds bishop of Norwich. He was soon after made minister of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, which he exchanged for Allsaints in Northampton, a place to which he was strongly attached. He became archdeacon of Norwich 1675, and in 1681 had a prebend in the church of Worcester. In 1686 he had the misfortune to lose his eyesight, and died seven years after, 12th March 1693, and was buried in his church, Northampton. Six volumes of his sermons have been published.

CONCANEN, Matthew, a native of Ireland, bred to the law. He came to London as a literary adventurer, and he gained a livelihood and some reputation by writing in support of the measures of the ministry. His attack upon Pope procured him a respectable place in the Dunciad; but the patronage of the duke of Newcastle advanced him to the lucrative office of attorney-general for Jamaica. In this appointment, for 17 years, he conducted himself with all the integrity and honor of a man of virtue, and after acquiring a respectable and independent fortune, he returned to England, with the flattering intention of spending the rest of his life in Ireland. He died at London 22d Jan. 1749.

CONDAMINE, Charles Mary la, a mathematician and philosopher, who joined ardour and perseverance with an insatiable thirst of knowledge, and who was also a man of wit and a writer of verses, was born at Paris in 1701, and died in 1774. He travelled much in his youth, and, in 1736, was one of those who were sent to Peru to measure a degree of the meridian. Condamine was remarkable for boundless curiosity, some ludicrous instances of which are recorded. His principal works are, A Journal of a Voyage to the Equator; and Observations in a Voyage on the River Amazons.

CONDE, Louis II. of Bourbon, prince of, surnamed the Great, was born at Paris in 1621. When only twenty-two, he was intrusted with the command of an army against the Spaniards, and he utterly defeated them at Rocroi. In 1645, 1646, and 1648, he gained the victories of Fribourg, Nordlingen, and Lens, and reduced Dunkirk; but he was foiled in the siege of Lerida. During the war of the Fronde, he at first joined the court, but afterwards broke with it, and was punished by an imprisonment of thirteen months. Burning with a thirst for revenge, he took up arms against the government; had a desperate engagement with the royal troops in the suburb of St. Antoine; and at length fled from France, and entered the service of Spain, in which he fought with alternate good and bad fortune. In 1659 he was permitted to return to his country. His last military acts were, the conquest of Franche Comté, in 1663; the passage of the Rhine, in 1672; and the battle of Seneff, in 1674. He died, in 1686, at Fontainebleau. Condé was active, daring, full of resources, and inflexibly persevering in spite of obstacles; but it is impossible to deny that he was culpably lavish of the blood of his soldiers; a fault which some have vainly attempted to palliate by urging that he was equally lavish of his own.

CONDER, John D. D. was born in Cambridgeshire 1714, and was educated as a dissenter. He was a minister of a congregation at Cambridge, and afterwards kept a school at Mile-end, and in 1761 succeeded to the meeting on the Pavement, Moorfields. He died 1781, aged 67. He printed several sermons, besides an essay on the importance of the clerical character.

CONDILLAC, Stephen Bonnot de, a brother of the Abbe de Mably, was born, in 1715, at Grenoble, and died, on his estate near Beaugenci, in 1780. For the use of Prince Ferdinand of Parma, to whom he was tutor, he drew up a Course of Study, in thirteen volumes. The whole of his works form twenty-three volumes in 8vo. Among them are, An Essay on Human Knowledge (his first production); and a Treatise on Sensations. As a metaphysician Condillac has a high reputation, though some have endeavored to tarnish it, by accusing him of borrowing from Locke, and of advancing principles which tend to materialism.

CONDORCET, John Anthony Nicholas Caritat, marquis of, was born 17th Sept. 1743, in Picardy, of a noble family. Mathematics and natural philosophy, for which he displayed an early fondness, he studied at the college of Navarre, and acquired such a mastery of them that, at the age of twenty-two, he published his work On Integral Calculus; which, in the course of three years, was followed by his Solution of the Problem of the Three Bodies, and the first part of the Essay on Analysis. He was secretary of the French Academy, and of the Academy of Sciences; and in this capacity composed his celebrated Eulogies of the deceased members. In 1786 and 1787 he gave to the world Lives of Turgot and of Voltaire. Condorcet was closely connected with Voltaire, D'Alembert, and the rest of his contemporary philosophers, and he lent the aid of his pen and his voice to forward the French revolution. He was a member of the Legislative Assembly and of the Convention. In the constituent assembly he was made governor to the dauphin; but his zeal in favor of republican principles overpowered the respect which he owed to majesty, and though patronised by Lewis XVI. he ventured to recommend the abolition of monarchy, and the triumph of liberty. But though hostile to the monarchy, he showed some compassion for the king, and opposed his violent trial; but his measures were viewed with jealousy by Robespierre and his party, and he was regarded as a hypocrite, who, under the mask of moderation and philosophy, aspired at the sovereign power. He was therefore condemned 28th July, 1793, as one of the Girondists, and for a while concealed himself at Paris, but afterwards sought refuge at the house of a friend in the country. His friend unfortunately was absent, and he was obliged to hide himself for several nights in some quarries, till hunger forced him to seek relief in a neighboring tavern. His long beard, squalid appearance, and the voracious appetite with which he devoured the bread placed before him, rendered him suspected, he was arrested, and might have escaped under the character of a distressed servant, but a Horace found in his pocket, proved him to be a man of education, and of consequence. On the morrow the gaoler found him dead, a sacrifice either to excessive fatigue and continued want, or to poison, 28th March, 1794. His publications were 26 in number.

CONFUCIUS or CONG-FU-TZE, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, born at Channing, of a noble family, about 550 B.C. At the age of three he lost his father, but his education was honorably superintended by the kind care of his grandfather, and his wisdom and abilities displayed themselves with such advantage, that he became the prime minister of the kingdom of Lu. His labors were ardently directed to the reformation of manners, but the dissipation of the king displeased him, and he indignantly resigned his offices, and retired to privacy, and the cultivation of philosophical pursuits. So extensively spread was his reputation, that he was frequented by above 3000 disciples, whom his examples and precepts formed to virtue and morality. He taught his disciples that the first duties were to serve, obey, and fear God, to love their neighbor as themselves, and to curb their passions to the guidance of reason. Thus deservedly respected and beloved, Confucius selected ten of his pupils, to whom he communicated the vast resources of his mind, and all the precepts which might render and preserve them happy in the possession of wisdom and virtue. He returned afterwards to the kingdom of Lu, where he died, aged 73. His memory was honored in the most solemn manner, he was regarded as a departed saint, and public edifices were raised to celebrate his services to mankind. His books on morals have been translated into French, and they possess excellent rules for virtue and morality.

CONGREVE, William, one of the wittiest of British dramatists, was born at Bardsey Grange, near Leeds, in 1670; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; and studied at the Middle Temple. At seventeen he wrote the romance of Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled. His comedy of The Old Bachelor was acted in 1693, and raised him at once to fame and affluence. Three lucrative offices were given to him by Lord Halifax. Between 1694 and 1697 he produced, and with success, Love for Love, The Double Dealer, and The Mourning Bride. Collier censured his indecency and profaneness, and the dramatist replied, but was unable to refute the charge. In 1700, his Way of the World was so coldly received that, in disgust, he resolved to write no more for the stage. He, however, continued to write verses; but they have long ceased to find readers. On the accession of George I. the gift of another sinecure office increased the income of Congreve to £1200 per annum. His latter days were, nevertheless, heavily overclouded. He was afflicted by total blindness and by the gout; and at length the latter, and an internal injury from being overturned, terminated his existence on the 19th of January, 1728-9.

CONGREVE, sir William, F.R.S. the son of a lieutenant-general, entered the military service early, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He sat in parliament for Gaton, and afterwards for Plymouth. Having unfortunately taken a censurable part in one of the bubble speculations of 1825, he quitted his country; and he died at Toulouse in 1828. For inventive talents he has seldom been surpassed. Among his numerous inventions may be mentioned his formidable rockets, a hydro-pneumatic canal lock, and a new mode of manufacturing gunpowder.

CONNOR, Bernard, a physician, born in the county of Kerry, 1666. As his friends were catholics, he was not regularly educated in Ireland, but in 1686 he went over to France, and at Montpellier and Paris, distinguished himself for his assiduity, and his great knowledge of anatomy and chemistry. He afterwards travelled through Germany as the tutor of the two sons of the chancellor of Poland, and on his arrival at Warsaw, recommended himself so much by his skill in the knowledge and cure of diseases, that he became physician to the king, John Sobieski. After collecting much valuable information on the natural history and other curiosities of Poland, he left Warsaw in 1694, as physician in the suit of the king's daughter, who was going to espouse the duke of Bavaria at Brussels; and from Holland he came to England in 1695. He now began to read lectures on anatomy, chemistry, and physic, at Oxford, and acquired such celebrity that he was elected into the royal society and the college of physicians. He also delivered lectures in London and Cambridge with equal success. On the death of Sobieski, and the tumults which a Polish election generally produced, Connor was induced to gratify the public curiosity by the publication of his history of Poland in two vols. which contains many valuable and interesting particulars concerning that now ill fated kingdom. Whilst in the enjoyment of public celebrity and rising eminence, Connor was attacked with a fever, which quickly carried him off, October 1698, in his 32d year. Though born and educated a catholic, he embraced the doctrines of the church of England, and died in her communion.

CONON, an Athenian general defeated by Lysander. He afterwards defeated the Spartans, and was reconciled to his countrymen. He was betrayed to Tribazus, and put to death 393 B. C.

CONRART, Valentin, secretary to the French king's council, was born at Paris 1603, and died September 23, 1675. To his taste, his influence, and his love for literature, the French ascribe the origin of their French academy, of which he is deservedly styled the father, as her first learned men held their first meetings in his house from 1629 to 1634. Though Conrart knew nothing of Greek, and little of Latin, he yet published some pieces not entitled however to great merit. He owes his celebrity to the affability of his manners, the goodness of his heart, the hospitable asylum which he gave to men of learning, and especially his being regarded as the founder of the academy.

CONRI, Florence, a Franciscan friar, born in Connaught, Ireland, but educated in Spain Philip III. sent him under the title of titular bishop of Tuam, to his native country, that he might reconcile the disaffected Irish to the prospects of a Spanish invasion. His perfidious schemes were however defeated, and he returned to Madrid, where he died 1629. He was author of the mirror of the christian life,—an Irish catechism, Louvain 1626, besides some Latin pieces on Augustine.

CONRINGIUS, Hermannus, professor of the law, was born at Norden in Frisia 1606, and died at Helmstadt, where he was professor of physic and politics, and senior of the university, in 1681. He was well skilled in history as well as law, and enjoyed the friendship of some of the princes of Germany. His works, which are chiefly on law and history, were printed at Brunswick in six vols. folio, 1731.

CONSTANTINE, Robert, professor of physic and belles lettres at Caen university, where he was born, died of a pleurisy in 1605, aged 103, after enjoying to the last all the faculties of his mind and body. His knowledge of Greek was very extensive, as his learned works fully evince, especially his valuable Lexicon Greek and Latin. He wrote besides three books on Greek and Latin antiquities,—a dictionary of abstruse Latin words,—a thesaurus rerum, &c. utriusque lingue.

CONSTANTINE the great, a Roman emperor after his father Constantius. He was an able general, a sagacious politician, and a benevolent prince.

He is chiefly celebrated for the building of Constantinople on the site of old Byzantium, and for being the first emperor who embraced christianity. He died 337, aged 66.

CONSTANTINE II. son of the great Constantine, was born at Arles, and became after his father's death master of Spain, Gaul, and Britain. He made war against his brother Constans, and was slain at Aquileia 340.

CONSTANTINE III. son of Constantius II. was surnamed Pogonatus, or the bearded, and was crowned emperor 668. He was successful against the Saracens, who besieged Constantinople, and he destroyed their ships with the Greek fire. Though valiant he was ambitious and intriguing. He avenged his father's murder, but he showed himself wantonly cruel by the murder of his brothers Tiberius and Heraclius, who had been raised by the army to a share of the imperial power. He condemned the heresy of the monothelites in a council at Constantinople, and died 685.

CONSTANTINE VII. Porphyrogenitus, son of Leo the wise, was born 905, and ascended the throne at the age of seven, under the guardianship of his mother Zoe. When of age he showed himself valiant and active, he defeated the Lombards in Italy, and drove the Turks by threats and by money from the borders of his empire. He was afterwards governed by his wife Helena, who oppressed the people and rendered herself odious. He was poisoned by his son Romanus 959. He was a learned man, and wrote the life of Basilus the Macedonian,—the geography of the empire,—a treatise on the affairs of the empire,—de re rusticâ.

CONSTANTINE, Flavius Julius, a private soldier, who by intrigue and great success invested himself with the imperial purple in Britain, and added Gaul and Spain to his dominions by his arms. He was besieged at Arles, where he had fixed his residence, by Constantius the lieutenant of Honorius, and when reduced to extremity he offered to surrender provided his life was spared. The conditions were accepted but inhumanly violated. He was put to death, and also his son, 411.

CONSTANTINE, of Carthage in Africa, was a physician of the 11th century. He travelled into the east, where he resided 30 years. He is supposed to be the first who brought the Arabian and Greek physic into Italy. After his return to Carthage he went to settle at Reggio, and at last became a monk of Monte Casino. His works appeared at Basil 1539, in folio.

CONSTANTIUS, Flavius Julius, the second son of the great Constantine, succeeded with his two brothers Constans and Constantine to the empire of Rome. He defeated Magnentius who had murdered his brother Constans and became sole emperor. He died 361.

CONTARINI, Gaspard, a native of Venice, engaged in various embassies, and made a cardinal 1533, and sent as legate to the council of Trent 1541. He wrote some Latin treatises on the immortality of the soul—the seven sacraments,—against Luther,—on the office of pope, with great elegance and spirit, and died at Bologna 1542.

CONTI, abbe Anthony, a noble Venetian, who died 1749, aged 71. By the extent of his travels he not only formed a numerous acquaintance with the learned of every country, but he greatly improved the powers of his mind. He is author of some tragedies, and of some poems which abound more with metaphysics than poetical elegance. His works in verse and prose were published at Venice, two vols. 4to. 1739, and another 1756.

During his visit to England, Conti became acquainted with Newton, and long esteemed and venerated the abilities and friendship of that great man.

CONTI, Armand de Bourbon, prince of, quitted the church for a military life, and warmly espoused the party of the insurgents against his brother the great Condé, during the civil wars of France. These two hostile brothers were both together sent prisoners to Vincennes by Mazarine. Conti was made, in 1654, governor of Guienna, commander of the armies in Catalonia, and governor of Languedoc 1662. He wrote in French, treatises on the duties of the great,—on comedies and plays,—on the duties of provincial governors,—three vols. 12mo. Paris 1667. He died 168.

CONWAY, Henry Seymour, second son of Lord Conway, was born in 1720; and, after having served with applause in the seven years' war, was a member of the English and Irish House of Commons, and, from 1765 to 1768, joint secretary of state. In 1782, he was appointed commander-in-chief, and in 1795 he died, being then the senior British field-marshal. He wrote some poems, political pamphlets, and the comedy of False Appearances.

CONYBEARE, John, a native of Devonshire, born at Pinhoe, in 1692, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, of which he afterwards became the head. In 1732 he published a Defence of Revealed Religion, in answer to Christianity as old as the Creation, for which he was made dean of Christ Church. In 1750 he was consecrated Bishop of Bristol, in which see he died in 1757. Two volumes of his Sermons were published after his death.

COOK, James, an eminent circumnavigator, was born at Marton, in Yorkshire, in 1723, of humble parents, and received only the commonest rudiments of education. After having served for some years in the mercantile marine, he entered into the navy in 1755, and displayed so much conduct and capacity that he was appointed master. He was now successfully employed in improving himself and storing his mind with that knowledge of navigation and mathematics, which he afterwards displayed in so remarkable a degree. The skill, firmness, and ability which he showed while employed in America and on the Jamaica station, recommended him, not only to the notice of Sir William Burnaby the commander, but to the approbation of the admiralty, and when in 1767 the royal society insisted on the propriety of observing the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, from some of the islands of the Pacific ocean, he was appointed to command the ship Endeavour in that new and distant expedition. Accordingly captain Cook sailed down the river on the 30th July, accompanied in this important voyage by sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Solander, and Mr. Green. On the 13th April, 1769, he reached Otaheite, where the observations were directed to be made, and after remaining there till 13th July, he set sail for New Zealand, and after discovering several islands he reached Batavia, 10th October 1770. The great abilities which captain Cook had evinced in this expedition recommended him to the command of the two ships intended to explore the coasts of the supposed southern hemisphere. On the 9th of April 1772 he sailed from Deptford on board the Resolution with captain Furneaux, who had the command of the other ship, the Adventure. They were stopped by the ice, in latitude seventy one, and were consequently induced to return. During this dangerous voyage of three years and 18 days.

the captain lost only one man in his crew of 118, though he navigated in various climates from 52 degrees north to 71 degrees south. The discoveries of islands in the southern seas had now engaged the attention of the nation, and another project was formed to find out a northwest passage, and thus unite the great Pacific ocean with the north of the Atlantic. On this occasion Cook, again eager to serve his country and advance the knowledge of geography, bid adieu to his domestic comforts, and a third time with ardent zeal embarked to surround the world. He set sail in the Discovery in July 1776, and after visiting several of the islands of the Pacific ocean he penetrated towards the north, explored the unknown coasts of western America, and turned back only when his further progress was impeded by vast fields of ice. Unable, in consequence of the advanced season, to go further, he visited the Sandwich islands, and stopped at Owyhee, where he unfortunately lost his life. During the night the Indians carried away the Discovery's cutter, and Cook, determined to recover it, adopted the same measures which on similar occasions he had successfully pursued, and he seized the king of the island, to confine him on board his ship till restoration of the vessel was made. In the struggle which took place, the captain and his men were assailed by the Indians, who viewed with resentment the captivity of their monarch, and before he could reach the boat Cook received a severe blow on the head which brought him to the ground, and unable alone to resist a multitude of savage foes, while his men in the boat and on the shore seemed intent in defending themselves, he was overpowered by the strokes of his assailants. His body was treated with savage barbarity, and a few bones were recovered which his mourning and disconsolate companions committed to the deep. This melancholy event happened on the 14th February, 1779.

COOKE, sir Anthony, was born at Gidding-hall, Essex, about 1506. As his name is not mentioned by Wood, it is probable that he was educated at Cambridge. He so distinguished himself by his learning, and the respectability of his character, that he was thought worthy to preside over the education of the young king, Edward VI. In Mary's reign he lived in exile; but he returned under Elizabeth, and died at his seat, 1576.

COOKE, Thomas, a poet, born at Braintree, Essex, about 1707, and educated at Felsted school. In his 19th year he edited Andrew Marvel's works, and, by an elegant dedication, introduced himself to the knowledge and patronage of lord Pembroke, who not only esteemed him, but even assisted him with valuable notes in his translation of Hesiod, published in 1723. Cooke translated besides, Terence, and Cicero de natura deorum, and the Amphitryon of Plautus. He wrote also five or six pieces for the stage, which, however, gained him neither fame nor money. He was concerned with Motley in writing Penelope, a farce, which being considered as throwing ridicule on Pope's Odyssey, just then published, greatly irritated the poet, who in consequence of this gave Cooke a respectable place in the Dunciad. Cooke died very poor, about 1750.

COOKE, George Frederic, an eminent actor, was born in Westminster, in 1756. Printing and the navy, both of which he tried in early life, he abandoned for the stage, on which he at length acquired so much reputation, that he appeared at Covent Garden, in 1800, as Richard III. Thenceforth he stood high among performers. Sir Giles Overreach, Shylock, Sir Pertinax M'Sycophant, and many other characters, he personated with consummate skill. But habits of intemperance often drew on him the public anger, and eventually shortened his days. He died in America, in 1812.

COOKE, Elisha, a physician of Boston, Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1657. In 1639 he went to England as agent of Massachusetts to procure the restoration of the charter. He afterwards, during the contentions between the legislature of the colony and the royal governors, respecting the charters, distinguished himself by advocating the rights of the people. He possessed a strong mind, and was bold and patriotic. After having held various important offices in the province for more than 40 years, he died in 1715.

COOKE, Elisha, son of the preceding, and also a distinguished politician, was graduated at Harvard college in 1697. He commenced his political career in early life, and it was marked like his fathers by violent contentions with the governors of the province. He was for many years at the head of the popular party, and held the offices of counsellor, speaker of the house of representatives, justice of the court of common pleas, and agent to the court of Great Britain. He died in 1737.

COOMBE, William, a writer, of versatile talent, is said to have been the son of a London tradesman, who left him a good fortune, which, however, he dissipated in the circles of fashion. He was educated at Eton and Oxford. Driven to literature for a subsistence, his first production was a satire, called The Diaboliad, which had an extensive but transient popularity. His novel of The Devil on Two Sticks in England had the same fate. His numerous political pamphlets are forgotten. Late in life, however, he gained a large share of public attention by his amusing Tours of Dr. Syntax, and other poems of a similar kind. Among his last works, is a History of Westminster Abbey. He died in 1823.

COOPER, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, was born 22d July, 1621, at Winborne St. Giles's, Dorsetshire. He was member for Tewkesbury in the parliament of 1640; and at the beginning of the civil wars he seemed inclined to favor the side of the king. He however retired in disgust from Oxford, and soon after took a commission in the parliamentary army. In 1645 he was sheriff for Norfolk, and the next year for Wilts: and he afterwards as member of the house of commons, had the boldness to charge Cromwell with tyranny and arbitrary government. On the restoration, his services were rewarded with a peerage, he was sworn a privy counsellor, and made chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the lords of the treasury. In 1672 he was raised to the dignity of lord chancellor; which, however, he resigned the following year, by the intrigues of his enemies, and especially of James duke of York. From a partisan of the court, he now became a violent opponent; and the eloquence of his speeches, and the firmness of his conduct, had such effect, that the earl of Danby was unable to carry the test bill, and other measures, through parliament, which the government recommended; and a prorogation followed. On the meeting again of Parliament, Shaftesbury, with others, insisted that the house was dissolved; and so offended was the king, that he sent him, together with Buckingham, Salisbury, and Wharton, to the tower, where he remained for thirteen months. When set at liberty his opposition did not cease; and at last a change of ministry placed him at the head of the council board. This triumph was short. The duke of York was so enraged at the measures which Shaftesbury had pursued in recommending the exclusion bill, that he not only procured his dismissal from office, but obtained his being committed, for high treason, to the Tower. After four months' confinement he was tried and acquitted; but so sensible was he of the power and injustice of his enemies, that he fled from their persecution, in 1682, and reached Holland, where he proposed to end his days in peace and retirement. He died 22d January 1683, aged 62. Shaftesbury was a man of no steady principles, of great ambition, and little political fidelity. Charles II. who not only said, but bore with great good humour, sallies of raillery, once talking to him of his amours, told him, "I believe, Shaftesbury, thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions." "May it please your Majesty," replied Shaftesbury, with a grave face, "of a subject, I believe I am." At which the merry king laughed heartily.

COOPER, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, known as the author of the Characteristics, was born February 26, 1671, at Exeter-house London. He was educated under the eye of his grandfather; at the age of 11 he could read Latin and Greek with great ease and fluency. In 1686 he began his travels, and highly improved himself in Italy and France in the acquisition of every polite accomplishment. He was member for Poole in the parliament of 1694. He then passed over into Holland, where he spent a year, in the most perfect friendship and all the ease of literary intercourse. On his return into England he succeeded to the earldom of Shaftesbury; but he valued little the acquisition of a seat in the house of lords, where he seldom appeared. The enthusiastic extravagance of the French prophets about this time began to engage the attention of the nation; and Shaftesbury, who dreaded the evils of persecution, published his letter concerning enthusiasm, addressed to lord Somers. In 1709 he married a daughter of Thomas Ewer esq. of Lee, Herts, by whom he had one son. The precarious state of his health, which was always delicate, induced him to remove to a warmer climate; and after being about a year in Italy, he died at Naples, 4th February 1713. The 3 volumes of his characteristics were the only works which he wished to present to the public, of which the most correct edition is that of 1713. His name, however, in literature was so respectable, that his letters to a young man in the university were, in 1716, presented to the public; and in 1721 Toland also published letters from lord Shaftesbury to Robert Molesworth esq.

COOPER, Thomas, D.D. a learned English prelate, born at Oxford 1517, and educated at Magdalen college school. He was elected fellow of the college in 1540. In 1546 he quitted his fellowship, and began to study physic, apprehensive, it is said, of the persecution of queen Mary, as after her death he returned to divinity. He was dean of Christ-church about this time, and two years after dean of Gloucester, and the next year, 1570, bishop of Lincoln. In 1584, he was translated to Winchester. He died at Winchester, April 1694. He has been greatly commended by Wood, Harrington, and others, for his great learning, eloquence, gravity, and holiness of life. His writings are, chronicles from the 17th year after Christ to 1560—thesaurus linguæ Romanæ et Britannicæ, a work highly patronized by queen Elizabeth—& dictionarium historicum poeticum,—an exposition of the chapters read in the Sunday service—admonition to the people of England—besides sermons.

COOPER, Samuel, an English painter, born in London 1609. He was bred under his uncle Hoskins, but he gained so much from the works of Vandyck, that he was called Vandyck in little. His chief excellence was in the representation of the features of the head. His works were highly esteemed on the continent, and he was intimately acquainted with the most celebrated painters of his age abroad. The king of France paid great attention to him when at Paris; but he could not obtain his Oliver Cromwell, though he offered 150*l.* for it. His best pieces were, O. Cromwell and one Swingfield. He died in London 1672, aged 63, and was buried in St. Pancras' church.

COOPER, John Gilbert, a miscellaneous writer, a native of Nottinghamshire, received his education at Westminster School, and Trinity College, Cambridge. Literature was only his amusement, for he was a man of property. He died in 1769. His poems, containing a translation of Ver Vert, Epistles from Aristippus, and other pieces, have been admitted into the collected works of the British Poets. They are lively and elegant. He also wrote a life of Socrates; and Letters on Taste; and contributed to the World.

COOPER, William, minister in Boston, was graduated at Harvard college 1712. Soon after he began to preach, the eminence of his qualifications as a minister attracted the attention of the church in Brattle street, Boston, and he was invited to be colleague pastor with Mr. Colman. He was ordained May 1716. In the year 1737 he was chosen president of Harvard college, but he declined the office. He died 1743 aged 49. He published several sermons.

COOPER, Samuel, D.D. minister in Boston, son of the preceding, graduated at Harvard college 1743. He exhibited early marks of a masterly genius. When he first appeared in the pulpit, his performances were so acceptable, and raised such expectations, that at the age of twenty years he was invited by the congregation in Brattle street, Boston, to succeed his father as colleague with Dr. Colman. He was ordained May 1746, thirty years after the ordination of his father. He did not disappoint the hopes of his friends. His reputation increased and he soon became one of the most popular preachers in the country. He died 1783, aged 53. He was a great political writer in the journals of the day, and published a number of discourses.

COOPER, Myles, D.D. president of King's college, New York; was educated in the University of Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1760. He arrived at New York in the autumn of 1762, being recommended by the archbishop of Canterbury as a person well qualified to assist in the management of the college, and to succeed the president. He was received by Dr. Johnson with the affection of a father, and was immediately appointed professor of moral philosophy. After the resignation of Dr. Johnson, he was chosen president in 1763. In the year 1778 Dr. Cooper resigned his office, and returned to England. He died 1795, aged 50. He published a volume of poems in 1758, and a sermon on civil government preached before the university at Oxford on a fast, 1777.

COOTE, Sir Eyre, a native of Ireland, was born in 1726. In 1745, he fought against the Scotch rebels. In 1754, he went to the East, where he distinguished himself at the siege of Pondicherry; in 1769, he was for a while commander-in-chief of the Company's forces; and in 1770, he revisited England, whence, in 1780, he was again despatched to India, with his former rank. Hyder was then ravaging the Carnatic with fire and sword. Coote arrested his progress, and, with an army not equal to one-tenth of his antagonist's, he defeated him in several encounters. He died at Madras, in 1733.

COOTWICH, John, L.L.D. of Utrecht, known for his travels into the East, and for the account of it which he published, called travels into Jerusalem and Syria, in Latin, 4to. 1619, containing many curious particulars.

COPERNICUS, Nicholas, a celebrated astronomer, born at Thorn, in Prussia, 19th January 1472. In his 23d year he set out for Italy, in search of knowledge; and so great was his reputation, that on his arrival at Rome he was appointed professor of mathematics. After some years' absence he returned home, and began to apply the vast knowledge which he possessed to the examination and correction of the Ptolemaic system then universally adopted and followed. The opinions of preceding philosophers were weighed with accuracy and judgment; but of all the systems of ancient times none pleased the illustrious mathematician so much as that of Pythagoras, for its beauty, simplicity, and ease. In his 35th year, Copernicus bent all the powers of his mind to this intricate subject; and after twenty years' laborious study, the cycles and epicycles of former astronomers were removed from the machine of the universe, and the sun was nobly and independently placed in the center, to illuminate and govern the whole. But though convinced of the truth of his hypothesis, the philosopher yet dreaded the bigotry and persecution of the times. His work lay long concealed, till the importunities of his friends prevailed upon him to publish; but a few hours after the first copy was brought to him, he was seized with a violent effusion of blood, which terminated his life, 24th May 1543, in his 70th year. This truly great man, who to the extensive knowledge of a comprehensive mind united the mild virtues and the innocence of private life, was canon of Worms; an appointment which he obtained from his mother's brother, Wazelrodus, the bishop of the place.

COPLEY, John Singleton, an eminent painter, was born in Boston, Mass. 1738. He went to England before the war. In 1770 he was admitted a member of the royal academy of painting in London. In 1774 he went to Italy, and returned to England 1776. He now devoted himself to portrait painting. His first historical picture was the youth rescued from a shark. His picture of the death of lord Chatham established his fame. Afterwards he painted the siege of Gibraltar; major Pearson's death on the island of Jersey; Charles I. in the house of Commons; the surrender of De Winter to Duncan. He died 1815, aged 77.

CORAM, captain Thomas, was born about 1668, and bred to the sea. From seeing many children exposed, his humanity prompted him to relieve them; and to him London is indebted for the Foundling hospital, for which, after seventeen years' benevolent attention, he obtained a charter. His disregard for private economy, whilst engaged in public good, at last reduced his circumstances so much, that he lived on the benevolent contributions of his friends, at the head of whom appeared Frederick prince of Wales. He died in London 29th March 1751, aged 84, and was, according to his desire, buried in the Foundling chapel.

CORAS, John de, a native of Realmont, who became public professor of law at Toulouse at the age of 18. He was afterwards professor at Angers, Orleans, Paris, Padua, and Ferrara, and then returned to Toulouse, and became counsellor of the parliament, and Chancellor to the queen of Navarre. He was imprisoned for his adherence to the protestant religion, and orders were sent from the king to put him to death; but while the parliament resisted the arbitrary mandate, some assassins broke into the prison and murdered him, with above 200 other prisoners, 1572. He wrote various works on civil law, which were published together, Lyons, 1558, 2 vols. fol.

CORBET, Richard, an English poet and divine, born at Ewell, in Surrey, and educated at Westminster school and Christ church, Oxford, of which he became dean, in 1620, by the favor of king James. In 1629 he was made bishop of Oxford, and in 1632 translated to Norwich. He died 29th July 1635, and was buried in the cathedral of Norwich. After his death, his poems were published, under the title of Poetica stromata, 1648, 8vo. and another edition 1672, 12mo.

CORDAY D'ARMANS, Mary Anne Charlotte, a native of St. Saturnin, near Seez, in Normandy, of respectable parents. She was brought up at Caen, where her beauty and accomplishments were seen and admired by Belsunce, the major of a regiment quartered in that town. The death of this worthy favorite, who was murdered by some assassins, excited the vengeance of the youthful heroine, and when she saw her lover branded with the name of conspirator, in a paper published by Marat, she hastened to Paris, determined to sacrifice to her resentment the man who had so shamefully abused the object of her affections, and had defended the condemnation of the deputies of merit and virtue in the convention. She was refused admittance at the house of Marat; but she obtained it by writing a letter, in which she informed him that she wished to disclose some secret of importance; and while the tyrant was engaged in conversation with her, she stabbed him to the heart, and he fell at her feet. Undismayed, and glorying in the deed, she refused to fly, and was dragged to the abbaye, and then to the revolutionary tribunal, where she heard the sentence of condemnation with tranquil composure. The serenity and dignity of her features were so commanding, as she walked to the scaffold, that Adam Lux, a deputy from Mayence, captivated by her beauty, requested of the bloody tribunal to follow her to death; and he had the singular satisfaction of expiring by the same guillotine. Charlotte suffered July, 1793. She was 24 years and nine months old; and it is said that by the female line she was descended from Peter Corneille.

CORRELLI, Arcanselo, a famous musician, born at Fusignano, near Bologna, in 1653. He preferred secular to ecclesiastical music, and was so fond of the violin, that he was considered as the first performer on it in the world. After visiting the north of Europe, and receiving the applauses which his merit deserved, in the German courts, after five years' absence, he returned to Rome, where he was patronised by cardinal Ottoboni. He died at Rome 1713, aged nearly 60, and was buried in the Pantheon. Corelli is considered as the author of new and original harmonies, in a style noble, elegant, and pathetic.

CORIOLANUS, Caius Marcius, a celebrated Roman general, who, when disgraced by his countrymen, fled to Tullus king of the Volsci, whose armies he led against Rome. His wife and mother interfered, and at their request he marched back; in consequence of which he was murdered by Tullus, B. C. 483.

CORNARO, Lewis, a noble Venetian, known for his great age. He died at Padua 1565, more than 100 years old. He wrote a treatise on the advantages of a temperate life, in his 81st year; and in this valuable little book he ingenuously confesses the irregularities of his younger years, and recommends to his youthful inquirers, at whose request he had undertaken the work, the practice of regularity and temperance, by which he enjoyed all the comforts of lively spirits and uninterrupted health. In his reformed mode of living, he never took more than twelve ounces of food and fourteen of wine. He wrote besides a treatise on waters, especially the Lagunes, near Venice. His wife nearly equalled him in longevity.

CORNARO, Helena Lucretia, a learned Venetian lady, who was educated at the university of Padua, where she took her degrees, and was made a doctor, and received the title of unalterable. At Rome she was admitted at the university, and was intitled the humble. She made a vow of perpetual celibacy, that she might with more intense application devote herself to literary pursuits; and so great was the reputation of her learning, that the most illustrious characters who travelled through Venice were more anxious to see her than all the curiosities of the city. Her great application brought on infirmity and disease, and hastened her death, which happened in 1685, in her 33th year. Her death was recorded by poetical effusions from the learned of Europe, and a magnificent funeral solemnity was performed in her honor at Rome. An eloquent oration was also pronounced, in which she was celebrated as triumphing over three monsters, pride, luxury, and ignorance. She wrote nothing, though capable to instruct and improve mankind by her pen.

CORNBURY, Edward Hyde, lord governor of New York, was the son of the earl of Clarendon, and being one of the first officers who deserted the army of King James, King William, in gratitude for his services, appointed him to an American government. He commended his administration as successor of lord Bellamantin, 1702. He was a bigot in religion, and oppressive and unjust in his administration of the government. He is said to have been guilty of the following outrage. A great sickness prevailing in New York in 1703, Lord Cornbury retired to Jamaica on Long Island; and as Mr. Hubbard, the presbyterian minister lived in the best house in the town, his lordship requested the use of it during his short residence there. Mr. Hubbard put himself to a great inconvenience to oblige the governor, and the governor in return delivered the parsonage house into the hands of the episcopal party, and seized upon the glebe. In 1707 he imprisoned, without law, two presbyterian ministers for presuming to preach in New York, without his license. He was removed from office in 1708. He returned to England, and died 1723.

CORNEILLE, Peter, a celebrated French poet, born at Rouen, June 6, 1606. He was brought up to the bar; but he soon abandoned it as a profession not congenial to his genius. His first play was Melite, a comedy, which originated in an affair of gallantry; but so great was its popularity, during those degenerate days of the French stage, that Corneille was encouraged to contribute more liberally to the public amusement. His next piece was Medea, a tragedy; and after many others, appeared the Cid, in 1637, his chief d'œuvre, a tragedy which drew against him the persecution and obloquy of rival wits and unsuccessful poets, among whom was even cardinal Richelieu himself, though he had granted a pension to the author. Corneille was chosen member of the French academy in 1647; and he died 1684, aged 79. He was a man of great merit in private life, liberal, humane, and devout, and rather of a melancholly turn of mind. His poetical works are among the sublimest effusions of the French muse.

CORNEILLE, Thomas, a French poet, brother to the preceding. He was a member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions. Though inferior to his brother, yet his plays possessed merit. They were published with those of his brother, Paris, 1738, in 11 vols. 12mo. He translated also Ovid's metamorphosis, and some of the epistles,—and wrote remarks on Vaugelas—a dictionary of arts, 2 vols. fol.—an universal geographical dictionary, 3 vols. folio. He died at Andeli 1709, aged 84.

CORNELIUS, Elias, D. D. secretary of the American Education society, graduated at Yale College in 1813. After studying theology, he engaged in 1816 as an agent of the American board of Commissioners for foreign missions, in which capacity he was for one or two years very active and successful. He spent the winter of 1818 at New Orleans in the employment of the Missionary society of Connecticut. In 1819 he was installed as colleague with Dr. Worcester, at Salem. In Sept. 1826 he was dismissed by the advice of a mutual council, having been appointed secretary of the American Education society. In Oct. 1831 he was chosen secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in the place of Mr. Evarts, deceased. He had just entered upon the duties of this office at the time of his death, Feb. 12, 1832, aged 37. Besides his labors in the quarterly journal, and in the annual reports of the education society, he published a discourse on the doctrine of the trinity, reprinted as No. 133 of the Tract society.

CORNWALLIS, Charles, marquis, son of the first Earl Cornwallis, was born in 1733, and entered the army, after having received his education at Westminster, and St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1761, he succeeded to the title. During the American war he acted a conspicuous part. He signalized himself at the battle of Brandywine, and the siege of Charleston, and obtained advantages at Camden and Guildford; but having invaded Virginia, he was surrounded at York Town, and compelled to capitulate. From 1786 to 1792, he was governor-general and commander-in-chief in India; and during that period he vanquished Tippoo Sultan, and obliged him to accept a humiliating peace. For this service he was created a marquis, and appointed master-general of the ordnance. In 1798 he was sent over to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and remained till 1801; and, by a system of blended firmness and conciliation, he succeeded in restoring peace to that distracted country. The treaty of Amiens, in 1802, was signed by him. In 1804 he was again made governor-general of India, but he died, in the October of the ensuing year, at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares. Sound practical sense, not splendid talent, was the characteristic of Cornwallis.

CORREA, De Serra, Joseph Francis, minister plenipotentiary from Portugal to the United States, was born in 1750, and studied at Rome and Naples. Botany early engaged his attention. After the peace of Amiens he resided eleven year in Paris. He came to America in 1813 in order to prosecute his researches in natural history; and while here, received his appointment as minister from Portugal. He died 1823, aged 74. He published dissertations on subjects of natural history in the English phil. trans.

CORSINI, Edward, a monk, born at Fanano, 1702. He died of an apoplexy at Pisa, in 1765, where he was professor of philosophy. He was a man of great erudition and of astonishing perseverance. He published some valuable works in criticism, philology, and literature ; the chief are, philosophical and mathematical institutions, 6 vols. 8vo.—a course of geometrical elements, 2 vols. 8vo.—the fasti of the archons of Athens, 4 vols. 4to.—a course of metaphysics—the history of the university of Pisa—and a dissertation on the games of Greece.

CORTEZ, Ferdinand, a descendant of a noble but poor family, was born at Medellin, in Estremadura, in 1485. The law, to which he was bred at Salamanca, he quitted for a military life. In 1504, he went to St. Domingo, and, in 1511, accompanied Velasquez to Cuba, and received from him a grant of land, as a reward for his services. The conquest of Mexico being resolved upon, Velasquez intrusted him with the command of the enterprize. The expedition, which consisted of ten small vessels, and only seven hundred men, sailed on the 18th of November, 1519 ; and, on his arrival at Tabasco, Cortez set fire to his ships, that his soldiers might have no other resource than their own valor. With only 500 men badly armed, and 15 horses, he defeated the Tlascalans, who presumed to dispute his progress ; and after rewarding the hospitality of the inhabitants of Cholula with rapine and slaughter, the conqueror presented himself at the gates of Mexico. He was received with great pomp and every mark of friendship by Montezuma, but though treated with confidence, Cortez acted with duplicity, and seizing the person of the unsuspecting monarch, he compelled him in the rigor of confinement to acknowledge himself the vassal of the crown of Spain. Thus absolute in Mexico, Cortez soon heard that Velasquez, jealous of his glory, had sent an expedition under Narvaez, to bring him back in chains to Cuba ; but no ways dismayed at the intelligence, he left one of his officers, Alvarado, governor of the capital, and hastened back to Vera Cruz. With the sagacity of an intrepid soldier he surprised and defeated Narvaez, and by his conciliating conduct he had the art to convert his enemies into friends, and to return to Mexico supported by those who had come to destroy his hopes. During his absence Alvarado had been guilty of excesses towards the natives, and instead of submission Cortez found the most determined hostility. Unable by force or persuasion to quell the tumult, he caused Montezuma, arrayed in his royal robes, to appear before his incensed subjects, but the Mexicans disregarded the interference of their captive monarch, who during the battle received a mortal wound. Yielding to the storm, the Spaniards retired from Mexico, and though they had lost the half of their little army, they determined on revenge. On his way towards Tlascala, Cortez was met by a large army of the natives, whom he defeated with dreadful slaughter at Otumba, and after recruiting his forces with 550 infantry and 40 horses and a number of allies from Tlascala, and other neighboring towns, he marched back to Mexico, December, 1520. The conquest of Texcuco, the second city of the empire, was followed by the siege of Mexico, which the new sovereign Guatimozin, the nephew of Montezuma, a brave prince, ably defended. The artillery of the Spaniards however prevailed over the feeble weapons of the Indians, and after three months' resistance, Guatimozin was seized in a canoe as he attempted to escape on the lake, and his captivity was followed by the fall of the capital, and the destruction of the Mexican empire. Above 200,000 Indians made their immediate submission to those few bold adventurers ; but they were not satisfied with the immense treasures of the plundered city, and the unfortunate monarch was exposed to tortures, that he might confess where the hidden riches of Montezuma were deposited. Guatimozin was shot by his inhumane persecutors, with some of his ministers, on a charge of conspiracy. Master of a populous and opulent empire, Cortez, though cruel and avaricious, began to display the character of a prudent and beneficent governor. Mexico, which had been destroyed during the siege, rose from ruins, and in 1529 assumed the form of the noblest of European cities. But while these successes enlarged the dominions of Spain, the conqueror was an object of envy at home, and he was soon recalled to give an account of his conduct ; and after enduring for a while the resentment of his enemies, he had the good fortune to procure the favor of his sovereign, and a grant of new and enlarged powers. When he pressed to Charles V. for an audience, and was asked who he was, the bold adventurer replied, " I am the man who has given you more provinces than your father left you towns." Cortez died in his native country, 2d Dec. 1554, aged 63. Great and heroic as the character of Cortez appears, he deserves the execration of posterity for the cruelties which he exercised on the inoffensive natives.

CORTLANDT, Pierre Van, lieutenant governor of New York, was chosen to that office in 1777, under the new constitution, and held it by re-elections till 1795. He early took an active part against the oppressive acts of the British government. Of the first provincial congress he was a member ; also of the convention which framed the constitution of New-York. He died 1819, aged 94.

CORVISART, John Nicholas, a physician of high reputation, was born in Champagne, in 1755, and died at Paris, in 1821. The French attribute to him, in great part, the progress which was made in France, of late years, in experimental medicine and pathological anatomy. Napoleon, whose physician he was, created him a baron, and an officer of the legion of honor. He wrote an Essay on Diseases of the Heart ; and translated some medical works.

CORY, Giles, accused of witchcraft, was brought into court at Salem, in Sept. 1592 ; but observing the fate of those who had been tried, fifteen at that court having been convicted, he refused to plead, and agreeably to law, he had judgment for standing mute, and was pressed to death. This is the only instance of the kind in the history of this country. Eight of the fifteen were executed Sept. 22, among whom was Martha Cory.

CORYATE, Thomas, son of a clergyman, born at Odcombe, Somersetshire, 1577, became known for his extravagancies. He studied for three years at Gloucester-hall, Oxford, and then was taken into the family of Henry prince of Wales, where he was the whetstone of the wits of those times. In 1608 he travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and on his return, published an account of his adventures, which he called, Crudities, in 4to. The work was recommended by the verses of Ben Jonson, Harrington, Inigo Jones, Donne, Drayton, and others ; and so pleased was the author with his success, that he determined to spend ten years in the visiting of foreign countries. With this intention, he set out in 1612, and after visiting Constantinople, the coast of Asia Minor, Egypt, and all the Levant, he advanced far into Persia, and the dominions of the great mogul. He was attacked at Surat in the East Indies, by a flux, which carried him off, 1617. Coryate was not devoid of understanding ; but his affection, and his great self-consequence, exposed him to the ridicule of the wits of the age, and turned the best intentions into levity and contempt. It is unknown what became of his notes and papers.

COSIN, John, D.D., an English prelate, born in Norwich, 30th Nov. 1594, and educated at the free school there, and at Caius college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was patronised by Overall, bishop of Lichfield, and after his death by Neal, bishop of Durham, who gave him a prebend, and the rich rectory of Branspeth. His collection of private devotions, drawn up at the request of Charles I. as well as his frequent intercourse with Laud, drew upon him the censures of the puritans, who loudly exclaimed against his popish principles. At the restoration he was raised to the see of Durham. In this elevated situation he employed himself in repairing and beautifying the cathedral and the palace, and in erecting schools and hospitals for the most benevolent purposes. Besides the large endowment which he settled, it is known, that this humane prelate, during the 11 years in which he was at Durham, spent not less than 2000*l.* a year in charitable and pious uses. He died 15th Jan. 1672, aged 78. He left many legacies for charitable purposes by his will. The various books which he wrote display much learning, solid judgment, and extensive information.

COSTANZO, Angelo di, born at Naples 1507, after 53 years of perseverance and labor, published an history of his native city in Italian, folio. He was also a poet of some consequence, and his sonnets and other pieces were collected at Venice 1752, in 12mo. He died at a very advanced age, about the year 1590.

COSTE, Peter, a native of Uzez, who fled to England on account of his religion, and died at Paris, 1747, at an advanced age. He translated Locke's essay on the human understanding, and on the reasonableness of christianity, and Newton's optics, into French, and wrote besides, the life of the great Condé—notes on Fontaine's fables, and Montaigne's essays—and a defence of Bruyere.

COSTER, Lawrence, an inhabitant of Haerlem, supposed by the Dutch to be the inventor of printing, about the year 1430. The best authorities however support that the art of printing was first invented at Mayence, though Meerman of Rotterdam, with great ingenuity and erudition, maintains the claims of his countrymen. Coster died 1440.

COTELERIUS, John Baptist, a learned Frenchman, born at Nismes 1627. He very early displayed great abilities in the knowledge of the learned languages, and at the age of 12 was able to construe the new testament in Greek, and the old in Hebrew, with great ease, at the first opening of the book. He was professor of Greek, and member of the Sorbonne. He published the works of all the fathers who lived in the apostolic age, with a new translation and learned notes, 2 vols. fol. 1672. He published besides, monumenta ecclesie Græcæ, of which he only completed three volumes before his death. His great application had undermined his constitution, so that he was snatched away, by an inflammatory disorder in his breast, in his 59th year, 10th August, 1686. Besides extensive learning, he possessed the amiable virtues of private life; he was modest, unassuming, and devoid of all pride and affectation.

COTES, Roger, an English mathematician and astronomer, born at Burbach, Leicestershire, 10th July, 1682. At Leicester school and St. Paul's, London, he was well initiated in classical literature, and at Trinity college, Cambridge, he began early to display that fondness for mathematics which in his earlier years had appeared in his family. He became, in 1705, fellow of his college, and had the tuition of the sons of the marquis of Kent, to whom he was related. In 1706 he was made Plumian professor of astronomy, and in 1713 took orders, and that same year, at the recommendation of Bentley, published Newton's mathematica principia, with the improvements of the author, to which he prefixed an excellent preface. He increased further his astronomical reputation, by his description of the great fiery meteor seen March 16, 1716. This great and rising genius died at the age of 33, on the 5th June 1716, to the regret of the university, and of every lover of science and goodness. His harmonia mensurarum was published in 1722, 4to. by his successor, Dr. Robert Smith, and also, by the same, his valuable hydrostatical and pneumatical lectures, in 1737.

COTOLENDI, Charles, a native of Aix or Avignon, was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and respectable as an author. He translated the Spanish history of Persia into French, 2 vols. 12mo.—the life of Columbus—the life of de Sales—besides dissertations on the works of St. Evremond, and the life of the duchess of Montmorenci.

COTTEREL, sir Charles, groom-porter to James I. and master of the requests to Charles II. He was well skilled in modern languages, and possessed all the manners and accomplishments of a gentleman. He resigned his office of master of the ceremonies to the king, to his son Charles Lodowick. During the exile of his royal master, he translated Cassandra, the famed romance, and was also concerned in the translation of Davila's civil wars of France.

COTTON, or COTON, Peter, a Jesuit, born 1564, at Neronde, near the Loire, early distinguished for his zeal in converting heretics, and for his eloquence in the pulpit. He became confessor to Henry IV. of France, and possessed so much of his confidence that it was a public expression, that the king was good, but that he had cotton in his ears. Cotton refused an archbishopric and a cardinal's hat, which his master's partiality offered him. After Henry's death, he was confessor to Lewis XIII. but he soon left the court, and retired into the country. He died 19th March 1626, aged 63. He wrote some sermons, besides controversial and divinity tracts.

COTTON, Sir Robert Bruce, an eminent English antiquary, born 22d June, 1570. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then removed to London, where he became a member of the antiquarian society, and soon distinguished himself for his zeal in the search of antiquities. He was knighted by James I. and so high was his reputation for learning, information, and integrity, that not only the most leading men of the times consulted him on affairs of state, but the king himself employed his pen on several occasions. At James's request, he vindicated the character of Mary queen of Scots, he also examined what punishments should be inflicted on papists, and defended the ecclesiastical institution against the innovations of the puritans. On the creation of baronets, in 1611, by James, sir Robert Cotton appeared as the thirty-sixth in the new dignity. But though such a favorite with the court, he, in the succeeding reign, joined the commons in the cry for the redress of grievances, though he recommended mild and gentle measures, which, in establishing the privileges of the people, might not endanger the safety of the sovereign. In 1629, sir Robert became an object of persecution to the court. A manuscript, "which," it is said, "laid down a plan how the kings of England might oppress the liberties of their subjects, and forever enslave them and their posterity," was lent out of his library, and being in a surreptitious copy laid before the privy council, produced his arrest and confinement in the Tower, and the seizure of his valuable library. Sir Robert with difficulty extricated himself from the virulence of his persecutors; but he still felt the indignities offered to his person and character; and the treatment he received in some degree undermined his constitution, and broke his heart. He died at Westminster, 6th May, 1631, aged upwards of 60 years.

COTTON, Charles, born in Staffordshire, of a respectable family, became known for his burlesque verses and ludicrous poetry, in the reign of Charles and James II. He translated, with great spirit and success, Montaigne's essays, which he inscribed to lord Halifax, a nobleman who highly valued the performance, which he had the capacity and good sense to appreciate. Cotton published the wonders of the peak in Derbyshire—Virgil travestied—Lucian burlesqued; of which poems an edition was printed in 1751. He died about the time of the revolution, but the exact year is unknown.

COTTON, John, one of the most distinguished of the early ministers of New England. At the age of thirteen he was admitted a member of Trinity college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Emmanuel college, where he obtained a fellowship. He was soon chosen head lecturer in the college. About the year 1612 he became the minister of Boston in Lincolnshire. When the English church fell into the hands of bishop Laud, a complaint was preferred against Mr. Cotton, for nonconformity, in not kneeling at the sacrament. Being cited before the high commission court he was obliged to flee. After being concealed for some time in London, he embarked for America, anxious to secure to himself the peaceable enjoyment of the rights of conscience, though in a wilderness. He arrived at Boston Sept. 4, 1633, and Oct. 10, was established the teacher of the church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Wilson, who was pastor. On the voyage from England Mr. Cotton's eldest son was born, and whom at his baptism in Boston he called Seaborn. He remained in this town, connected with this church more than nineteen years; and such was his influence in establishing the order of the churches, and so extensive was his usefulness, that he has been called the patriarch of New England. In 1642 he was invited to England to assist in the assembly of divines at Westminster; though he was in favor of accepting the invitation, he was persuaded by Mr. Hooker not to go. He died 1652, aged 67. Mr. Cotton's publications were numerous; they are either sermons, or relating to the religious controversies of his times.

COULOMB, Charles Augustin de, an eminent French philosopher, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, and a member of the Academy of Sciences and of the Institute, was born at Angoulême, in 1736, and died in 1806. He was generally versed in the sciences, but particularly cultivated those of electricity and magnetism, in which he made many valuable discoveries. "He may fairly," it is said, "be ranked in the same class with Franklin, Æpinus, and Cavendish."

COURAYER, Peter Francis, a native of Normandy, born at Vernon in 1631, was a canon and librarian of St. Genevieve, and a professor of theology and philosophy. Having written a Defence of the Validity of English Ordinations, he was so persecuted that he took refuge in England, in 1723, where he died in 1776. He translated into French Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, and Sleiden's History of the Reformation; and wrote several tracts.

COURIER, Paul Louis, one of the wittiest writers and most profound hellenists of France, was born near Angoulême, in 1774. He was for several years in the corps of artillery, in which he rose to be a major; but at length he resigned in disgust. Every moment of leisure while in the army was devoted by him to the study of Greek authors. He was assassinated in 1825. Courier published various translations from the Greek; but his chief fame is derived from his political pamphlets, which are remarkable for wit, irony, and pungency of style.

COURT DE GEBELIN, Anthony, a native of Nismes, for some time protestant minister at Lausanne, and afterwards superintendent of one of the museums of Paris. He wrote monde primitif, compared with the monde moderne, in 9 vols. 4to. a work of merit and great erudition. He wrote besides, the history of the war des Cevennes, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. He was a strong advocate for animal magnetism, which exposed him much to ridicule. He died at Paris, 13th May 1784, aged 59.

COURTEN, William, son of a tailor at Meninx, in the Netherlands, escaped with difficulty from the tyranny and persecution of Olivarez duke of Alva, and in 1568 reached London, where he settled his family. Their business was the making of French hoods, which were in those days in great reputation, so that by industry, the Courten family increased their connexions and property, and at the death of the father and mother, which happened about the end of Elizabeth's reign, or the beginning of James I. they were opulent and respectable merchants in the trade of silk and fine linen. In the year 1631, their returns are averaged at 150,000*l.* a-year; and so highly respected was the family, that William and Peter received the honor of knighthood. Under the activity and able management of sir William, the concerns of the company were greatly increased, so that not only the commerce of the nation was extended, but even the king's dignity supported, as it is said that by their loans to James I. and to Charles I. the firm of Courten had a claim upon the crown of not less than 200,000*l.* The extensive concerns of this extraordinary family were, however, lessened by the intrigues of lord Carlisle, who seized, as a grant from the crown, the island of Barbadoes, where sir William had settled a factory, as on a place which had been discovered by his own ships, and been protected at his own expense. His property likewise suffered some years after by the murder of his factors at Amboyna, in the Spice islands, by the Dutch, and by the total loss of his property in that part of the world. Though thus persecuted by the frowns of fortune, he yet engaged with new ardor in the Chinese trade; but the loss of two ships richly laden completed his disasters, and reduced him to poverty. He survived not long this heavy loss. He died 1636, about the beginning of May, aged 64.

COURTEN, William, the last male descendant of the family just mentioned, was born in Fenchurch parish, London, 28th March, 1642. It is supposed that he lost his father and mother before he was fourteen years old; but though his father, in consequence of his insolvency, left the kingdom, in 1643, and never again saw his son, yet he was, it is imagined, carefully educated under the eye of those many rich, independent, and noble relatives which remained to him in England. He early began to travel, and displayed a great genius for natural history, which he much improved by a residence at Montpellier. In this delightful spot, so congenial to his studies, he cultivated the acquaintance of learned men, particularly of Tournefort and of Sir Hans Sloane. How long he staid on the continent is not exactly known. After his return to England he lived for fourteen or fifteen years in chambers at the Temple, and died March 26, 1702, aged 63. The partiality which Mr. Courten showed to natural history was not employed in frivolous pursuits, or unavailing researches. He began early to make a collection of whatever was curious, important, and remarkable, in medallic and antiquarian history; and not less than 38 vols. in folio, and 8 in 4to. remain as proofs of his great industry and indefatigable attention. His curious collection, after being about fifty years in the possession of his executor and residuary legatee, was purchased, in 1763, for the use of the public, and deposited in the British Museum. It is singular, that though to his industry and perseverance the nation is indebted for so valuable an acquisition, no mention was made of him as the first and most scientific collector. The sum paid by the public was 20,000*l.* which equals scarce the value of the coins and precious stones. Besides those learned friends already mentioned, Courten was intimate with the great Locke.

COURTENAY, John, an Irish writer, was originally a captain in the military service, and patronised by the first marquis Townshend, who appointed him his secretary, and surveyor of the ordnance. He also obtained a seat in parliament, and on the death of Mr. Pitt was made a commissioner of the treasury. This situation, however, he soon lost, and then retired from public life. He died in 1816, aged 75. His publications are—1. A Tract on the Duke of Richmond's Plan of Fortifications, 8 vo. 2. A Poetical Review of Dr. Johnson's Character, 8vo. 3. Reflections on the French Revolution. 4. Poetical Epistles on the Manners of France, Italy, &c. 8vo.

COURTILZ, Garién de sieur de Sandras, born at Paris 1644, where he died 6th May, 1712. He was in the army, and was sometime in Holland, and on his return was confined in the Bastille for his political works, and remained there nine years. He was author of different works, the best known of which are his life of Coligni—the conduct of France since the peace of Niméguen—history of the Dutch war—political testament of Colbert—the life of Turenne—annals of Paris and of the court in 1697–8.

COURTNEY, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was the fourth son of Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonshire, by Margaret, grand-daughter of Edward I. He was educated at Oxford, and though possessed of abilities, owed his elevation in the church to the consequence of his family. When 28, he was made bishop of Hereford, and afterwards translated to London, where he summoned before him the great Wickliffe, in St. Paul's cathedral, 1377. The bold reformer was on this occasion attended by his friends, John of Gaunt and lord Percy, who, in supporting his tenets, treated the prelate with such asperity, that a tumult was excited among the citizens of London. Courtney was made chancellor 1381, and afterwards raised to the see of Canterbury. He was a violent persecutor of the Wickliffites, and condemned their tenets in a synod. He died at Maidstone 1396, aged 55.

COUSIN, Louis, a native of Paris, who was born in 1627, and died in 1707, was president of the mint, and a member of the French Academy. Among his works are, a history of Constantinople, eight volumes 4to.; A History of the Church, four volumes 4to.; and a Roman History, two volumes 12mo.; which consist of translations of the Byzantine sacred and profane historians. He also conducted the Journal des Savants from 1687 to 1701. As a critic, a translator, and a man, Cousin is deserving of praise.

COÜTHON, Georges, a native of Orsay, in Auvergne, who was brought up to the bar. At the revolution, he became member of the national assembly and of the convention, and there displayed the most ferocious and vindictive conduct. He lent all his powers to procure the destruction of the monarchy, and the disgrace and death of the king; and afterwards, as the friend and associate of Robespierre, he recommended the adoption of the most bloody and atrocious measures. In his zeal against crowned heads, he proclaimed death to tyrants, and peace to the cottage, and wished that kings might no longer have an earth to support, nor a sun to enlighten them. When sent as deputy to Lyons, he struck with a hammer the columns of the noblest edifices, exclaiming, "Down, ye monuments of pride, I condemn you to destruction." His savage conduct was so well known, that when once complaining of thirst, during a long debate in the convention, one of the members observed, he ought to have a eup full of blood. The fall of Robespierre, whose crimes he had shared, was his own. He was guillotined 28th July, 1794. Though of so ferocious a heart, the features of his countenance were mild and pleasing; but his body was deformed, so that the convention permitted him to sit while speaking.

COVENTRY, Francis, a native of Cambridgeshire, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, was perpetual curate of Edgeware when he died, in 1759. He wrote the novel of Pompey the Little; a paper in The World, on the absurdity of modern gardening; and some poems, one of which, Penshurst, is printed in Dodsley's collection.—His cousin, HENRY, a fellow of Magdalen College, who died in 1752, contributed to the Athenian Letters, and wrote The Letters of Philemon to Hydaspes.

COVERDALE, Miles, one of the earliest English reformers, was born in Yorkshire in 1487, was educated at Cambridge, and went abroad on becoming a Protestant. He assisted Tyndale in his version of the Bible, and in 1535 published a complete translation. In 1551, after having been almoner to Queen Catharine Parr, he was promoted to the see of Exeter. In the reign of Mary he retired to the continent, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth. He died in 1568, or, according to some accounts, in 1580.

COVILHAM, Pedrode, a Portuguese gentleman, who served with distinction in the wars of Castile, and afterwards traded to Africa. He was sent, along with Alphonso de Payva, in search of Prester John, and also to inquire whether a passage to India could be accomplished round the Cape. On this mission, while Payva proceeded to Abyssinia, Covilham visited India and Sofala, obtained the first distinct account of Madagascar, and ascertained that the voyage round the Cape might be performed. He then, Payva having died, journeyed to Abyssinia, where the monarch heaped upon him the highest honors of the state, and induced him to spend there the remainder of his days.

COWARD, William, a medical writer, born at Winchester, and educated there at the college, and at Hart-hall, Oxford, from which he was removed to Wadham. He took his medical degrees in 1685 and 87, and after settling at Northampton for some time, he removed to London, 1694. But not more devoted to physical pursuits than literature, he soon drew the public attention to his publication, called Second thoughts concerning the human soul, in which, with great learning and metaphysical knowledge, he united sentiments, which were repugnant to the opinions of the best divines. Though he was a sincere believer in the gospel, yet his ideas about the immateriality and immortality of the soul, drew upon him the censure of the public, and he was ranked with Toland, Tindal, and Gildon, as an enemy of the christian religion. This work, as well as his other book, called the grand essay in defence of it, not only drew the attacks of several writers, such as Dr. Nichols, Broughton, and Turner, but the animadversions of the house of commons, who, on the 17th March, 1704, voted the books to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, as containing doctrines contrary to the church of England, and subversive to the christian religion. It is supposed he died about 1725. Though his writings no longer engage attention, it must be acknowledged, that he was not devoid of learning, judgment, and abilities. Though sceptical in his religious opinions, he still was exemplary as a christian, and a firm believer in the mercies offered to mankind by the gospel.

COWELL, John, a lawyer and antiquary, born about 1554, at Ernesborough, in Yorkshire; was educated at Eton, and at King's College, Cambridge; and became inaster of Trinity Hall. He died in 1611. He is the author of institutes of the Laws of England; and of The Interpreter, or Explanation of Law Terms; the last of which works the Commons ordered to be burnt for its unconstitutional doctrines. With his wonted coarseness of wit, Coke, who hated him, used to call him Dr. Cowheel.

COWLEY, Abraham, the posthumous son of a grocer, was born in London, in 1618. From Westminster School he went to Trinity college, Cambridge, whence he was ejected, in 1643, by the puritanical visiters, upon which he settled at St. John's College, Oxford, and avenged himself by a satire, called the Puritan and the Papist. He had already produced Poetical Blossoms, Love's Riddle, a pastoral comedy, and a Latin comedy, intitled Naufragium Jocularis: the first two were written while he was at Westminster. He now entered into the king's service, and attended him in several journeys and expeditions. When the queen left England he accompanied her, obtained a settlement in the family of the earl of St. Albans, and was employed on various missions relative to the royal cause. During his absence appeared The Mistress, and the comedy of the Guardian. In 1656 he returned to England, and, soon after his arrival, he was imprisoned, but was bailed by Dr. Scarborough. It was at this period that he gave to the world a complete edition of his poems. On the death of Cromwell, Cowley revisited France; and he was one of those who came back in the train of the restored sovereign. The triumph of his party was for a while of no benefit to him, but, at length, he obtained a small independence, and withdrew into retirement. He died at the Porch House, Chertsey, in July, 1667. Cowley, as Johnson observes, is "undoubtedly the best" of the metaphysical poets; for, though his ideas are often far-fetched, and sometimes absurd or ludicrous, his faults are redeemed by great beauties. His prose merits almost unalloyed praise; it is pregnant with thought, and the style is natural and elegant.

COWLEY, Hannah, a dramatic writer, whose maiden name was Parkhouse, was born at Tiverton, in Devonshire, in 1743, and died at that place in 1809. She is the author of nine comedies, among which are, The Runaway, the Belle's Stratagem, and More Ways than One; the tragedies of Albina, and The Fate of Sparta; two farces; and the poems of The Siege of Acre, The Maid of Arragon, and the Scottish Village. Her poems are of that description which Horace deprecates; but her comedies have considerable merit.

COWPER, William, born at Perth, was educated at Edinburgh, where he became professor of philosophy. Though originally a strict presbyterian, he renounced his sect, and embracing the doctrines of the church, was made bishop of Galloway, 1614. He died three years after, aged 53. He was an able divine. His works were printed in one vol. folio.

COWPER, William, D. D. youngest son of earl Cowper, was born in London, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. After possessing some small living, he was made dean of Durham, which he held till his death, 1772, in his 59th year. He wrote an able treatise on geometry, besides eight sermons, and an advice to a lady much esteemed.

COWPER, William, a celebrated English poet. He was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II. and rector of Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, where he was born, 1731. As the great nephew of chancellor Cowper, he was marked for eminence in the law, and after being for some time in the office of an attorney, he entered at the Inner-temple, and at the age of 31 he was appointed clerk in the house of lords. This honorable office his great timidity prevented him from accepting, and when afterwards nominated clerk of the journals, which seemed to require no personal attendance, his agitation of mind became excessive when called upon, at the bar of the house, on an unusual occasion, to perform the duties of his place, and he resigned under the greatest depression of spirits. Weakness of nerves produced debility of body and of mind, but by the friendly attention of Dr. Cotton of St. Alban's, his melancholy terrors gradually subsided, and from a dejected gloom he rose to the purer use of his mental faculties and to the enjoyment of rational conversation, and the cheering and serene understanding of the hopes of revelation. In 1765 he settled at Huntingdon, and became the friend and the intimate of Mr. Unwin, a neighboring clergyman, after whose death, in 1767, he retired to Olney, Bucks, with his widow, whom he regarded with all the affection of a mother. His time in retirement was spent, not only in devotion but in literature, and he contributed sixty-eight hymns to the collection which his friend Mr. Newton, the curate of Olney, gave to the world. In 1732 he appeared himself before the public by the publication of a volume of poems, and in 1785 the general voice of approbation was raised towards him on the appearance of his second volume. He afterwards engaged in a translation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey in blank verse, and in the opinion of some judges the work, though inferior to the versification of Pope, possesses great merit, and presents to the English reader a more pleasing and perfect picture of the great original. The poet had communicated so much pleasure and instruction to the world by the sweetness of his lines, and the pure precepts of morality and benevolence which every where captivate the reader, that the king honorably bestowed upon him a pension of 300*l.* per annum in 1794; but the compliment, so flattering to a man of talents, gave more satisfaction to his friends than to himself. The wretched poet was again sunk into dejection and religious melancholy, and few intervals of reason beamed upon the afflicted mind of this amiable man. For a while indeed he amused himself in the revision of his Homer, but again relapsed into that depression of spirits which robbed him of all the comforts and the serenity of a reflecting mind. He died 25th April, 1800, at Dereham Norfolk.

COX, Richard, an English prelate of mean parentage, born at Whaddon, Bucks, about 1500. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was invited by Wolsey, to form one of the chosen few, on his new foundation at Oxford; but after some time his open avowal of Luther's principles, rendered him obnoxious to the censures of the university, and he was stripped of his offices and imprisoned. As tutor to king Edward VI. he became a great favorite at court, was made privy counselor, and chancellor of the university of Oxford, canon of Windsor, and dean of Westminster. During the reign of Mary he left England, and maintained on the continent, his reputation for learning, and for adhering to the protestant faith. On Elizabeth's accession, he returned to England, and gained such popularity that he was raised to the see of Ely, over which he presided for 21 years. His opposition to the catholics, drew upon him the resentment of his enemies, and even the queen herself showed herself unfriendly to him. He, however, held the bishopric till his death, 1581, in his 83d year. He wrote several theological tracts, but he is chiefly known for the active part which he took in the compilation of the liturgy. The four gospels—the acts of the apostles—and the epistle to the Romans, were also translated by him, in the share which he had in the bible, now called the Bishops' bible. He was also concerned in the compilation of Lily's grammar.

COX, sir Richard, chancellor of Ireland, was born at Brandon, county of Cork, 25th March, 1650. Though left an orphan under the age of three, he yet, under the protecting care of his grandfather and of his uncle, evinced great natural abilities. At the revolution he was made under secretary of state, afterwards recorder of Waterford, in 1690 second justice of the common pleas, and the next year governor of the county and city of Cork. In this singular character, uniting the office of judge with military duties, he behaved with great spirit and propriety, he was knighted in 1692, and the next year made chancellor of Ireland, and in 1706 created a baronet. On the accession of George I. he as well as some of the Irish judges, were removed from office, but while he hoped to spend the rest of his life in literary and independent retirement, he found himself exposed to the censures of the Irish parliament, who, however, never proceeded further against him. He died 3d May, in his 84th year. He was esteemed not only as an able lawyer, and impartial historian, but as a humane and beneficent man. Besides his Hibernia Anglicana in folio, he wrote an inquiry into religion, and the use of reason in reference to it, 8vo.—an address to those of the Roman communion in England, 12mo.

COX, Tench, a writer on public economy, died at Philadelphia July 16, 1824, aged 68 years. He published an address on American manufactures; an inquiry on the principles of a commercial system for the U. S. 1787; examination of Lord Sheffield's observations, 1792; view of the U. S. 1794; thoughts on naval power and the encouragement of commerce and manufactures, 1806, memoir on the cultivation, trade, and manufacture of cotton, 1807, memoir on the navigation act 1809; statement of the arts and manufactures of the U. S. 1814.

COYER, P Abbe Gabriel Francis, a French writer who was born at Baumelles Nones, Franche

Comté, and died at Paris July 18th, 1782, in an advanced age. Originally a Jesuit, he abandoned the order, and lived by his pen. His works possess vivacity, ease, and wit. He wrote Bagatelles morales,—the history of John Sobieski, 3 vols. 12 mo.—travels in Italy and Holland, 2 vols.—observations on England,—treatise on preaching, and on public education, besides a translation of Blackstone's commentaries.

COYPEL, Charles Anthony, a celebrated painter, who died at Paris, his native city, 1752, aged 58. He was painter to the duke of Orleans and to the king, and by his amiable manners and extensive endowments he deserved and enjoyed the friendship of the great. He was author of some theatrical pieces, which were performed in private theatres, and he also composed several dissertations on painting, and some academical lectures. He was very charitable, and for his many virtues was highly esteemed by the Duke of Orleans. He erected a preparatory school at Paris for students before they went to Rome, and he also projected the exhibition of the pictures in the Luxemburg gallery. His father Anthony, who died in 1722, aged 61, was also an eminent artist, and painter to the king, and his grandfather Noel had been equally celebrated at Paris, and at Rome where he was director of the French academy of painting.

COYSEVOX, Anthony, a French sculptor, born at Lyons. He died 1720, aged 90, chancellor and regent of the academy of painting and sculpture. Versailles was embellished by the finest of his pieces. At Marly his Neptune and Amphitrite, and at the church of St. Eustachius the statue of Colbert, are likewise fine specimens of his great powers.

CRABB, Habakkuk, an eminent dissenter, born at Watisfield, Suffolk, and educated under Dashworth at Daventry. He officiated as minister at Stowmarket, and afterwards at Cirencester, and then joined his brother-in-law Fenner in the care of a school at the Devizes. On the death of his friend the well known Thomas Hamner, he was invited by his congregation, but his principles were not appreciated with that liberality which he expected in his native place; and as being accused of departing from the faith of the dissenters, he retired from his ministry to Royston, where the loss of his wife added to other disappointments brought on a nervous fever which hurried him to his grave, two years after his wife, Dec. 25th, 1795. He left several manuscript sermons, some of which have been published. He was a respectable man, and for 45 years a very exemplary character, who while he dissented from the church, yet respected the opinions of his neighbors, and preached religion without disseminating faction.

CRABBE, George, one of the most popular of modern British poets, was born in 1754. It is said that he was originally intended for the medical profession, and that he served an apprenticeship to a provincial apothecary. He displayed a taste for poetry at an early age, and was finally induced to give up the study of medicine and devote himself to belles lettres. He went to London at the age of twenty-four, and gained the friendship of Edmund Burke, at whose recommendation he published, in 1781, his poem of the Library. This was quickly followed by the Village, which gained for him the high approbation of Dr. Johnson. In the meantime Crabbe had entered himself at Cambridge, had taken orders, and now accompanied the Duke of Rutland, as chaplain, upon his appointment to the vice regal government of Ireland. Through the same patronage he afterwards obtained some small church preferment. The study of theology for a long time withdrew Mr. Crabbe almost entirely from his poetic labors. After an interruption of nearly twenty years, he published a collection of poetry, which was very successful. This was followed by the Borough, in 1810; Tales, in 1815; and Tales of the Hall, in 1819. He died in 1832. Every thing about him is simple and characteristic; and he has been described with much felicity as the anatomist of the human soul.

CRAFTS, William, a lawyer and a popular miscellaneous writer, was born in Charleston, S. C. in 1787. He received his education at Harvard college, and studied law in his native city, where he acquired some reputation for talent and eloquence. He was a member of the South Carolina legislature, and for some time editor of the Charleston Courier. He died at Lebanon Springs, N. Y. in 1826. A collection of his works, comprising poems, essays, and orations, with a biographical memoir, was published in Charleston, in 1828.

CRAIG, Nicholas, a learned Dane. He was born at Ripen in 1541, and was regent of the school at Copenhagen in 1576. He died 1602, aged 61. He was engaged by the king of Denmark in some important negotiations, which he fulfilled with great credit and satisfaction. He wrote a learned book on the republic of the Lacedæmonians, reprinted at Leyden, 1670, 8vo. besides the annals of Denmark in six books, reprinted at Copenhagen in 1737, folio.

CRAIG, John, a Scotch mathematician, who became known by his "theologiæ christianæ principia mathematica," in 36 pages 4to. printed at London 1699, and reprinted at Leipsic 1755. In this small work he entertains curious reveries, and attempts to prove, by mathematical calculation, that the christian religion will last only 1454 years from the date of his book. This work was refuted by the abbé Houteville, in his christian religion proved by facts. He had also a dispute with J. Bernouilli on the quadrature of curved lines, and curvilinear figures, and also on an algebraic question, in which he acknowledged, very candidly, in the philosophical transactions, the fallacy of his own suppositions.

CRAIG, William, a Scotch divine, born at Glasgow, Feb. 1709, and educated at the university there. Early devoted to the pursuits of classical literature, and highly sensible of their beauty and simplicity, he with the approbation of his friends Clerk and Hutcheson, transfused their most striking passages, not only into his conversation, but his pulpit oratory, which was solemn, elegant, and correct. The popularity of his preaching recommended him to the notice of Mr. Lockhart of Cambusnethan, who presented him to that parish. After refusing the honorable invitations of some other patrons, he at last removed to Glasgow, where, in the circle of his friends, and in the midst of an applauding audience at St. Andrew's church, he pursued his ministerial career with earnestness, animation and success. He died, 1783, aged 75 years.

CRAIK, James, M. D. a physician, a native of Scotland, accompanied Washington in the expedition against the French and Indians in 1754, and in 1755 attended Braddock, and assisted in dressing his wounds. During the revolutionary war he served in the medical department. As director general of the hospital at Yorktown, he was present at the surrender of Cornwallis Oct. 19, 1781. After the war at the request of Washington he settled in the neighborhood of Mount Vernon. He died in Fairfax county Feb. 6, 1814, aged 83. He was estimated in the various relations of private life. As a physician he had great skill and success. Washington designated him in these terms, 'my compatriot in arms, my old and intimate friend.'

CRAMER, Gabriel, an able mathematician, born at Geneva 1694. He was the pupil of John Bernouilli, and became known over Europe for his great skill in mathematics. He destroyed his health by excessive application, and died at the baths of Languedoc in 1752. He published some works, besides an edition of the two Bernouilli's works, published 6 vols. 4to. 1643.

CRAMER, John James, a native of Elgg, professor of the oriental languages at Zurich, and afterwards at Herborn, where he also filled the chair of divinity and ecclesiastical history. He wrote exercitationes de arâ exteriori secundi templi, 4to.—theologia Israelis, 4to.—and died 1702, aged 29. His brother John Rodolphus, Hebrew and divinity professor at Zurich, and dean of the college of the canons, was author of some valuable works on Hebrew antiquities, dissertations, and harangues. He died at Zurich 1737, aged 59.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a German mineralogist, was born at Quedlinburg, in 1710, and died in 1777. He was the first who reduced to settled principles the art of assaying, and to him Germany is indebted for her superior progress in metallurgy. Cramer had many singularities, among which was a complete inattention to his personal appearance; so that he was compared to Diogenes. He is the author of a Latin treatise on the Docimastic art; another, on the Management of Forests; and Principles of Metallurgy; the last of which he did not complete.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a German writer, was born at Josephstadt, in Saxony, in 1723; and, with the exception of three years, resided in Denmark from 1754 to 1783, in which latter year he died. He was invited to Denmark by the sovereign, and, at the time of his decease, was chancellor of the university of Kiel. He translated Bossuet's Universal History, the Homilies of St. Chrysostom, and the Psalms of David in verse; and wrote The Northern Spectator, three vols.; Sermons, twenty-two vols.; and Poems, three vols. Eminent in many ways, it is as a votary of the Muses that he is most famous; Germany ranks him among her best lyric poets.

CRANFIELD, Edward, president of New Hampshire, succeeded Waldron in 1682, and was succeeded by Barefoote in 1688. He was afterwards collector of Barbadoes, and died about 1700. The tyrannical acts of his administration are narrated by Belknap. In his displeasure towards the Rev. Mr. Moody he endeavored to enforce the uniformity act. He ventured to tax the people without their consent. He came to this country to make his fortune; his injustice drove him away in dishonor.

CRANMER, Thomas, D. D. a celebrated reformer, the son of a country gentleman, was born at Aslacton, in Nottinghamshire, in 1459, and was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, where, in 1523, he became reader of the divinity lecture. For his rise he was indebted to an opinion which he chanced to give to Gardiner and Fox, that the best way to settle the question relative to the king's divorce would be to refer it to the universities instead of to the pope. Henry instantly made him his chaplain, ordered him to write on the subject, and subsequently employed him in negotiations at Rome, and in other parts of the continent. On Cranmer's return, the monarch raised him, in 1533, to the archbishopric of Canterbury. Thus elevated, and invested with powerful influence, the archbishop pursued with vigor the work of religious reformation. His enemies labored as strenuously to ruin him, but he was always upheld by Henry. Being a member of the council of regency, during the reign of Edward VI., he was enabled to push forward an ecclesiastical reform with still more decisive effect. But, unfortunately, he now displayed a persecuting spirit which has stained his character with a deep and bloody spot. Besides being guilty of minor acts of tyranny, he consigned to the flames, as heretics, two unhappy beings, one of them a woman! This was Joan Bocher, the warrant for whose execution was in a manner extorted from the youthful monarch, who signed it in tears, and threw on Cranmer the moral responsibility of the barbarous deed. Having consented to the measures for placing Lady Jane Grey on the throne, he became one of the victims after the accession of Mary. Lured by the promise not only of pardon but of royal favor, he was induced to sign six papers, by which he recanted his principles, and avowed his sorrow for having entertained them. In spite, however, of the promises made to him, he was brought to the stake, March 21, 1556. He had by this time recovered his firmness, and he died with the utmost fortitude, holding in the flames till it was consumed the hand which had signed the recantation, and exclaiming, "This unworthy hand! this unworthy hand!" His forgiving disposition, which led him never to revenge an injury, his extensive liberality, his services to the cause of ecclesiastical reform, and his courage at the hour of death, have shed a lustre round the memory of Cranmer; but it must, however reluctantly, be owned, that he displayed an indefensible flexibility of principle, and that he was, in fact, not less a bigot than were the men by whose bigotry, blended with personal enmity, he was at length sacrificed.

CRA SHAW, Richard, an English poet, born in London, and educated at the Charter house, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was afterwards fellow of Peterhouse, but was ejected during the rebellion, for denying the covenant, and soon after was converted, or as Pope says, out-witted, to the catholic faith. He went to Paris in quest of preferment, but his distresses and poverty became very great, till the benevolence of Cowley not only relieved him, but recommended him to queen Henrietta. By her influence he went over to Italy, and was made secretary to an Italian cardinal, and soon after obtained a canonry in the church of Loreto, where he died 1650. He was an excellent scholar, well acquainted with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spanish. He wrote Steps to the temple,—the delights of the muses, and carmen Deo nostro. He is best known by the encomiums of Pope, who not only admired his poetry, but borrowed some passages from it. An edition of his works appeared 1785.

CR A VEN, Charles, governor of South Carolina from 1712 to 1716, had been previously secretary to the proprietors. They ordered him in 1712 to sound port Royal river, and probably he built Beaufort soon afterwards. In 1715, on the occurrence of an Indian war, he displayed great vigor and talents, and expelled from the province the invading savages.

CRAW FORD, David, a Scotch lawyer, born at Drumsoy 1665. He was made historiographer of Scotland by queen Anne, and devoting himself to his favorite study of historical antiquities, he published memoirs of Scotland, during the times of the four regents—a peirage, in folio,—the history of the royal family of Stuart,—and a description of the country of Renfrew. He wrote besides the life of Guithery bishop of Dunkeld, and began the history of Scottish affairs. He died in his native place 1726, aged 61.

CR A YER, Gaspar de, a painter, born at Antwerp in 1585. He studied under Raphael Coxis, whom he soon surpassed in the boldness of genius, and in the graceful exertion of his pencil. His portrait of cardinal Ferdinand, brother to the king of Spain, was so exquisitely finished a performance, that the monarch sent the artist a golden chain, and a medal, and settled a handsome pension upon him. He was greatly esteemed by Rubens and by Vanduyck. Though he was indefatigable in his application, he lived to a great age, supported by constant temperance and regularity. Though chiefly he excelled in portrait painting, yet his historical pieces are much admired. His centurion alighting from his horse to prostrate himself at the feet of Christ, was seen with undisguised approbation by Rubens, and is admired as a masterly performance. He died 1669.

CR E B I L L O N, Prosper Joliot de, a French tragedian ranked next after Corneille and Racine, was born at Dijon 1674. He originally studied the law, but the impetuosity of his passions thwarted the views of his friends, and at last he produced a tragedy which met with applause, and encouraged him in the career of a theatrical writer. He lived to a great age, highly respected and admired for his virtues, as well as literary abilities. He died 1762, aged 88. His best plays are his Atreus, Electra, and Rhadamistus.

CR E L L I U S, John, a Socinian, born near Nuremberg, 1590. As his opinions were not tolerated in his own country, he settled in Poland 1612, where he became professor to the unitarians. He died at Racovia of an epidemic fever in his 43d year. He was a man of very extensive learning. He wrote among other things several tracts upon the new Testament, and an answer to Grotius' book de satisfactione Christi, against Socinus, which Grotius treated with respect, and acknowledged to be drawn up with moderation. His works form two vols. folio.

CR E M O N I N I, Caesar, an Italian philosopher, who was born at Cento in the Modenese, and died at Padua of the plague at the age of 80, 1630. He was professor at Ferrara and Padua, and he published several works in Italian on philosophy, in support of the doctrines of Aristotle, in which he maintained the materiality of the soul.

CR E S C E M B E N I, John Maria, an Italian born at Maurata in Ancona 1663. He was founder of the celebrated Arcadian academy for the reformation of learning, taste, and criticism. He was its first director in 1690, and continued so till his death 1728. He was eminent both as a poet and a prose writer. His chief works are a valuable history of Italian poetry, reprinted six vols. 4to. Venice 1731—and an history of the academy of Arcadia, with anecdotes of its members, seven vols. 4to. and history of vulgar poetry, seven vols. 4to.

CR E S C E N T I U S, Peter de, a native of Boulogne in the 14th century, who, to avoid the troubles of his country, travelled for 30 years as a law practitioner. On his return he published his valuable work on agriculture, called opus ruralium commodorum, dedicated to Charles II. of Sicily. The best edition is Gesner's Leipsic 1735. It has been translated into various languages.

CR E S S Y, Hugh Paulin, an English divine, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Merton college. He was chaplain to Thomas lord Wentworth, and afterwards to Lucius lord Falkland in Ireland, from whom he obtained the deanery of Laughlin, and a canonry of Windsor, which however he never enjoyed. After the death of Falkland he travelled with Bertie afterwards lord Falkmouth; but in Italy, listening to the persuasions of the catholics, he became a convert, and made a public profession of his faith at Rome 1646. From Rome he came to Paris, and was taken under the protection of queen Henrietta, and afterwards retired to the college of Douay, where he changed his name to Serenus de Cresseay, and during seven years' residence published several valuable and laborious works. At the restoration he came to England, and was chaplain to queen Catharine, and resided in Somerset-house, Strand. Though a catholic he was however respected universally, as he never interfered with the intrigues and politics of the times. His pen indeed was frequently engaged in the defence of his faith, but whilst his friends considered him as their ablest champion, the protestants respected him as a learned, judicious, and candid writer. His attack on one of Stillingfleet's works raised against him the censures of his old friend Clarendon, whom he answered with spirit but moderation. He died, 10th of August 1674, aged 70. His mild, humane, and humble deportment had endeared him to all ranks of people. The most known and valuable of his works is his ecclesiastical history, of which only one volume was published, as the second, in which he meant to bring down the history to the dissolution of monasteries, was left incomplete at his death.

CREVIER, John Baptiste Lewis, professor of rhetoric at Paris, is known as the pupil of Rollin, and the finisher of his Roman history. He published an edition of Livy, 6 vols. 12mo.—the history of the Roman emperors to Constantine, 12 vols. 12mo.—the history of the university of Paris, 7 vols. 12mo.—and rhetorique Francoise. He died 1765, in an advanced age, respected as a man of talents and of extensive knowledge.

CREW, Nathaniel, bishop of Durham, was born Jan. 31, 1634, and succeeded to the title of lord Crew on the death of his brother. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, was proctor of the university 1663, afterwards clerk of the closet to Charles II. dean of Chichester, bishop of Oxford 1671, and three years after translated to Durham. On the accession of James II. he was admitted of the privy council, and showed himself very friendly to all the measures of the court, in religion and in politics. He died September 12th, 1721, aged 88.

CRICHTON, James, a Scotchman of the 16th century, whose adventures and personal endowments, have procured him the name of "the admirable Crichton." He was born in 1551, or according to lord Buchan, in 1560. He was educated at Perth, and at the university of St. Andrews, where he made such wonderful progress, that at the age of 20 he had run through the whole circle of science, and could write and speak to perfection 10 different languages. He travelled in France and Italy, where he established a high reputation as a scholar. He was also skilled in military and athletic exercises. At Mantua he displayed his bodily agility by attacking and killing a gladiator, who had foiled the most skilful fencers in Europe, and had lately slain three antagonists; and with great benevolence, this admirable Scotchman bestowed the reward he obtained for this exploit, upon the widows of the three persons who lately had lost their lives. The Duke of Mantua was so pleased with him, that he appointed him tutor to his son Gonzaga, a youth of dissolute manners, and of an unprincipled heart. In the midst of his popularity, while walking during the carnival, and playing upon his guitar in the streets of Mantua, he was suddenly attacked by six men in masks. Their number proved no defence against the superior dexterity of Crichton, they were all disarmed, and the leader falling on his knees, begged for life. It was Crichton's pupil, to whom the astonished master recollecting his rank, immediately presented the sword, with every apology for the opposition which he had made. Instead of accepting the generosity, the perfidious prince buried the sword into his defenceless bosom. This happened July 1593, though lord Buchan fixes it on the preceding year, and asserts that he was then 22, though others with greater probability make him 32 years old.

CRILLON, Lewis de Berthon de, a French general, knight of Malta, descended from a noble Italian family, was born 1541. At the age of 15 he merited the notice of Henry II. by his valor at the siege of Calais, and he distinguished himself afterwards against the Huguenots, at the battles of Dreux, Jarnac, and Moncontour. At the battle of Lepanto in 1571, his valor was conspicuously displayed, as well as in the other encounters of these warlike and perilous times, so that he was deservedly called by Henry IV. the brave Crillon. At the peace of Vervins he retired to his estates at Avignon, where he died 2d December 1615, aged 74.

CRILLON MAHON, N. Duke de, distinguished himself in the seven years' war, and afterwards quitted the service of France for that of Spain, where he was made a grandee of the first order. In the war between England and Spain he was placed at the head of the armies, and had the good fortune to take Minorca, in 1782, in consequence of which he assumed the name of Mahon from the capital of the island. In his attempts to reduce Gibraltar he was more unfortunate, and saw the measures he adopted all baffled by the superior valor of the English, and the vigilant care of general Elliot. In the revolutionary war he would take no part in the cause of Spain, but remained neuter. He died at Madrid 1796, aged 80.

CRISP, Tobias, the champion of Antinomianism, was educated at Eton, and took his bachelor's degree at Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Baliol, Oxford, where he took his degrees of D.D. He was rector of Brinkworth, Wilts, in 1627, and there he lived in a hospitable manner, regular, virtuous, and devout. He came to London in 1642, where his tenets respecting grace opposed him in a controversy with 52 divines. He died 27th February 1642. His sermons were reprinted 1639. He asserted in his discourse "Christ alone exalted," that salvation was completed on the cross, and that belief was all that was required of the happy elect.

CROFT, Herbert, D. D. an English prelate, was born at Great Milton, Oxfordshire, 13th October 1603. At 13 he was sent to Oxford, but upon the conversion of his father to popery, he was removed from the university, and placed in the monastery of Douay, and afterwards in the college of St. Omer's. A visit to England on family affairs introduced him to the acquaintance of Morton bishop of Durham, who prevailed upon him to return to the protestant faith, and by the advice of Laud, he again entered at Christ church, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was now preferred to a living in Gloucestershire, and to another in Oxfordshire, and in 1639, he was made prebendary of Salisbury. He was afterwards prebendary of Worcester, canon of Windsor, and in 1644 dean of Hereford, but he suffered like all loyal subjects during those troublous times, till in 1659, by the death of his two elder brothers, he succeeded to all the estates of his family. At the restoration he was raised to the see of Hereford 1661, which he refused to quit for higher preferment, employing himself in deeds of charity, benevolence, hospitality, and frequent exhortation from the pulpit. In the latter part of his life he wished to resign his bishopric from some scruples of conscience. He died 18th May 1691.

CROFT, Sir Herbert, was born in London, in 1751; was educated at University College, Oxford; and studied at Lincoln's Inn; but relinquished the bar and took orders, though without obtaining ecclesiastical preferment. He died at Paris in 1816. He was a friend of Dr. Johnson, who inserted Croft's Life of Young among his own lives of the poets. But he is best known by his story of Love and Madness. He planned, but never executed, an improved edition of Johnson's Dictionary.

CROIX du Maine, Francis Grude de la, a learned French writer in the 16th century. He was passionately fond of literature, and made a most valuable collection of books. He published in 1584, his French library, or a general account of all authors who wrote in that language. The time of his death is unknown.

CROIX, Francis Petit de la, secretary and interpreter to the French king, in the Turkish and Arabic, died November 4th, 1795, aged 73. He was a man of great integrity and refused to be bribed by the Algerines, to make a treaty with them favorable to their interests. He digested Thevenot's voyages to the East-Indies, he made an accurate catalogue of all the Turkish and Persian books in the French king's library, and composed besides two dictionaries for the French and Turkish languages, and also a learned history of Genghis Khan, with a good map of the north of Asia.

CROIX, John Baptist de la, second bishop of Quebec, was of a noble family in Grenoble, and was appointed first almoner to Louis XIV. He came to Canada about the year 1685 as successor to Laval the first bishop. He died Dec. 23, 1727, aged 74, having been 42 years in Quebec. Such was his benevolence, that he founded three hospitals, and distributed among the poor more than a million of livres.

CROMWELL, Thomas, earl of Essex, a native of Surrey, born about 1490, was the son of a blacksmith at Putney. After having been a clerk to the English factory at Antwerp, he returned home, and became confidential servant to Cardinal Wolsey. On the disgrace of the cardinal, Cromwell defended him in the House of Commons with spirit and effect. He was taken into the service of Henry VIII. and rose till, in 1539, he was made earl of Essex, and lord chamberlain. He had previously taken an active and not always just part, as visitor general, in the suppression of the monasteries. His parliamentary conduct, too, was often highly criminal. To the Reformation, however, he was a warm friend, and he was charitable and grateful. Cromwell having been one of the promoters of the marriage of Henry with Anne of Cleves, the capricious tyrant brought him to the block, in 1540.

CROMWELL, Oliver, the celebrated protector of England, was born of a very respectable family at Huntingdon, 25th April 1599. He received his education in the grammar-school of his native town, and in 1616 was admitted as fellow commoner at Sidney college, Cambridge. He did not however here pay much attention to academical studies, as foot-ball, cricket, and other exercises, were more congenial to his pursuits, and therefore his mother, now become a widow, sent him in 1618 to Lincoln's-Inn. Irregularities here prevailed, and licentious and intemperate pleasures engaged his attention more than the law, till at last when 21 he married Elizabeth the daughter of Sir James Boucher of Essex, and retired to lead a regular life at Huntingdon. Here he soon became a zealous puritan. His first appearance in parliament was in 1625. Three years before the meeting of the Long Parliament, in which memorable assembly he sat for Cambridge, he meditated emigrating to America, in company with Hampden and other gentlemen of the same principles as himself, but he was prevented by a proclamation of the government. That proclamation the misguided monarch had abundant reason to repent. Cromwell was active against him in the House; and, when the Commons resolved on resistance, he raised a troop of horse, which he disciplined in an admirable manner. This force he soon enlarged to a regiment of a thousand men, at the head of which he became the most conspicuous of the parliamentary leaders. Between 1642 and 1646, he signalized himself on a great variety of occasions, particularly at Marston Moor, Newbury, Naseby, and Torrington. In the negotiations which ensued between the king and the victorious parliament, Cromwell was at first disposed to consent to restoring Charles under certain conditions, but, finding that the royal captive was not to be trusted, he resolved to join in bringing him to the block. He was one of the forty persons who, after the death of Charles, formed the Council of State. Ireland yet remained to be subdued. Cromwell was, therefore, appointed lord governor of that island for three years, and in August, 1649, he sailed to assume the command. Storming Drogheda and Wexford with horrible slaughter of the garrisons, he so terrified the enemy, that in nine months peace was restored. In 1650, he defeated the Scots at Dunbar; and, in the following year, he obtained what he called his "crowning victory" over Charles, at Worcester. One step more sufficed to place him at the summit of power. Having by force dissolved the Long Parliament, he assumed the supreme authority, in 1653, under the title of Lord protector. The title of king he was more than once desirous to obtain, but was deterred from assuming it by the dread of alienating his partisans. At the end of the year 1657 his fears were alarmed by the publication of "killing no murder," a pamphlet by colonel Titus, which directed against him the dagger of every bold assassin, and in 1658 he felt not a little disappointment at the conduct of his parliament, which he addressed as composed of lords and commons, in the usual language of the kings of England, though none of the ancient nobility condescended to appear among them. The severe agitations of his mind at last undermined the powers of his constitution, and his deportment became altered, he grew reserved and suspicious, and the attacks of a slow fever, though at first not alarming, proved fatal, 3d September 1658. Though an usurper and a tyrant, Cromwell possessed great powers of mind, and contributed much to the prosperity of the nation.

CROMWELL, Richard, son of Oliver Cromwell, was born in 1626, and succeeded his father, as lord protector, in 1658. Finding himself unable to contend with the factions hostile to him, he resigned in the following year, and he went to France on the restoration of Charles II. He returned to England in 1680, assumed the name of Clarke, and died in 1712.

CROPPER, John, general, an officer of the American revolution entered the army as captain in 1776. He was soon promoted. He fought in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. He died 1821, aged 65.

CROUSAZ, John Peter de, a mathematician of eminence, born at Lausanne 13th April, 1663. He was intended for the army by his father; but his inclinations were bent to literature; and the perusal of des Cartes' works totally directed his attention to mathematics and philosophy. After travelling over Europe, he was elected professor, and, in 1706, made rector of the academy of Lausanne, and, in 1724, mathematical professor at Groningen. He was afterwards preceptor to Frederic of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the king of Sweden, and, after being engaged in some embassies, he returned to Lausanne, where he died, 1748, aged 85. He wrote an essay on logic, afterwards enlarged to 6 vols. 8vo.—a treatise on beauty, 2 vols. 12mo.—on the liberty of thinking—on ancient and modern pyrrhonism, folio—sermons—commentary on Pope's essay on man—miscellaneous works—and pieces on philosophy and mathematics.

CROWNE, John, a native of Nova Scotia, who went to England, eager to acquire fame and independence by the powers of his mind. He became a favorite with the court, and was employed by Charles II. at the request of Rochester, to write the masque of Calypso. Upon the discovery of the popish plot, he embraced the part of the tories, and wrote his "city politics," to satirize the whigs, a comedy, which, while it procured him applause, excited against him the resentment of a powerful faction. Anxious now to retire from the intrigues and persecutions of politics, he petitioned the king for a place for life; to which Charles assented, provided he wrote another comedy. Even the king himself assisted him, by recommending him to borrow from the Spanish comedy of "non pued esser;" from which was produced the play of Sir Courtly Nice; but, on the last day of rehearsal before the comedy could be acted, the king died, and all the hopes of the poet were dashed to the ground. Instead of independence, Crowne now had recourse to his wit for maintenance. He died about 1703, author of 17 plays, besides the "church scuffle," a heroic poem, and two other poems, Pandion and Amphigenia, and the Dæneids.

CROXALL, Dr. Samuel, was educated at Eton school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. At the university he wrote the fair Circassian, which he dedicated to Mrs. Anna Maria Mordaunt, of whom it is said he was deeply enamored; but as the poem was a licentious imitation of Solomon's songs, he carefully avoided disclosing himself to be the author, before he applied for ordination. He obtained the living of Hampton, Middlesex, the parishes of St. Mary Somerset, and Mountshaw, London, and became chancellor, prebendary, and canon of Hereford, and afterwards added the archdeaconry of Salop and the living of Selk to his other preferments. His politics inclined to the whigs, and hence in queen Anne's reign he wrote in their support, and published his two cantos in imitation of Spenser, to satirize Harley's administration. He wrote besides "the Vision," a poem addressed to lord Halifax,—the fables of Æsop,—scripture politics,—the royal manual,—and all the dedications prefixed to "Select Novels." He died at a great age, February 13, 1752.

CROZE, Mathurin Veyssiere la, born at Nantz 1661, became a Benedictine monk in 1763, and distinguished himself by his extensive learning. A bold and independent mode of thinking, added to disgust and disappointment, induced him to abandon his order and his religion in 1696. He made his recantation at Basil, and employed himself in Berlin as an instructor of youth, as librarian to the king, and as professor of philosophy. He died 1739, aged 78. He wrote some valuable works, dissertations historiques,—an armenian dictionary, 4to. compiled after twelve years' labor—histoire du Christianisme des Indes, 12mo.—du Christianisme d'Ethiopie, & d'Armenie.

CRUDEN, Alexander, M.A. was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college there. He settled in London in 1728, and kept a bookseller's shop under the royal exchange; but maintained himself chiefly by superintending publications for the press. In 1737 his Concordance was published, and it again appeared improved in 1761, as a most valuable book. Cruden was occasionally deranged. About the year 1738 he went on a romantic view to reform the English universities, and was soon after confined at Chelsea. He was a second time in confinement in a mad-house, and was at last found dead, in a praying posture, at Islington, 1774, aged 70. He was a worthy, pious, and inoffensive man.

CRUZ, Juana Inez de la, an ingenious lady, born at Mexico. She was naturally endowed with great powers of mind, which were carefully cultivated, and rendered her well skilled in philosophy, history, mathematics, poetry, and every branch of literature. The poems which she published possessed great merit, according to the opinion of father Feyjod. The best part of her life was spent in the seclusion of the monastery of St. Geronimo, where she died, after 27 years' residence, aged 44, in 1695.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, D.D. a celebrated divine, born 1617, at Aller, Somersetshire, where his father was rector. He was of Emanuel college, of which he became fellow and tutor, and where he had among his pupils sir William Temple. He was, in 1657, one of those who were consulted by parliament about the English translation of the bible, and by his learning and consequence he gained the friendship of White Locke, and of Thurlow the able secretary of the two protectorates. At the restoration, Cudworth wrote a copy of congratulatory verses to the sovereign, and, in 1672, he was presented by Sheldon, bishop of London, to the vicarage of Ashwell, Hertfordshire. In 1678 he was installed prebendary of Gloucester, and he then published in folio his famous work "the true intellectual system of the universe, wherein the reason and philosophy of atheism are confuted, and its impossibility demonstrated." Cudworth died at Cambridge 26th June, 1688. Of his posthumous works, which were a continuation of his intellectual system, one was published by Chandler, bishop of Durham 1731, called "a treatise concerning eternal and immutable morality," intended chiefly against Hobbes and others. His other MSS. were on moral good and evil—a book of morality, with Hobbes' philosophy explained—discourse on liberty and necessity—de libero arbitrio—on Daniel's prophecy of the 70 weeks—of the verity of the Christian religion, against the Jews—and Hebrew learning. Cudworth was a man of extensive erudition, well skilled in the languages, an able philosopher, an acute mathematician, and a profound metaphysician.

CUEVA, Alfonsus de la, known by the name of Bedmar, was ambassador from Philip III. to the Venetian republic. In this sacred character he plotted the seizing of the city; but when the conspiracy was discovered, and the conspirators put to death by drowning, the author of the horrible scheme, out of respect to the Spanish king, was secretly dismissed by the senate to avoid the fury of the populace. Cueva fled to Flanders, where he became president of the council, and received a cardinal's hat. In consequence of the severity of his government he retired from Flanders to Rome, where he died, 1665. He was a man of astonishing powers of mind, great political sagacity, an acute judge of the manners and prejudices of mankind, composed in the most violent and popular agitations, and such a master of the knowledge of the human passions, that his conjectures about futurity seem almost prophetic.

CUJACIUS, James, an eminent lawyer, born at Toulouse 1520. He was of mean origin; but the greatness of his genius compensated for his obscurity, and by his indefatigable industry, without the assistance of a master, he made himself perfect in the knowledge of Greek and Latin literature, and particularly in civil law. He was meanly refused the professor's chair in his native town; but his abilities attracted pupils from every country; and to his superior talents in education, France owed the ablest and the most expert of her lawyers and magistrates. He settled at Cahors, and afterwards at Bourges, which he would not quit, though honored by the king of France, and invited to Turin by the duke of Savoy, and to Bologna by pope Gregory XIII. He was so kind to his pupils, and so communicative and familiar, that he was called the father of his scholars. He died at Bourges 1590. His works were published at Paris, 10 vols. fol. 1659, by Fabrot.

CULLEN, William, the celebrated physician, was born in Lanerkshire, and served his time with a surgeon and apothecary at Glasgow, and then went as surgeon in a vessel from London to the West-Indies. On his return he settled at Shotts, and afterwards at Hamilton, where an accidental introduction to the duke of Hamilton laid the foundation of his advancement. By the advice of his patron he removed to Glasgow, where he obtained an appointment in the university. It was about this time that he had formed an intimacy and partnership with William Hunter, afterwards equally celebrated. In 1746 he was appointed lecturer in chemistry at Glasgow, and in 1751 was nominated king's professor of medicine. His practice was now very extensive, and his reputation as a lecturer proved by the increasing number of his pupils. In 1756 he was invited by the university of Edinburgh to the vacant chair of chemistry, and in this new office he displayed such powers, and such knowledge, that an opposition was raised against him by those who envied his fame, and could not rival his abilities. He died 11th October, 1790.

CULPEPER, Thomas, lord, governor of Virginia from 1680 to 1683. On his arrival the assembly passed an act of oblivion in reference to persons, concerned in the rebellion under gov. Berkeley. They also, in order to encourage emigration, authorized the governor to naturalize any person by instrument under seal. An act was also passed to prevent the frequent meetings of the slaves. Of his associates in the grant of the territory, he purchased their rights between the Potowmac and Rappahannoc in 1669. He died 1719.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, D.D., a learned prelate, son of a citizen of London, where he was born July 15, 1632. He was educated at St. Paul's school and Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He published, in 1672, his work de legibus naturæ disquisitio philosophica, which has been translated into English by Tyrrel and by Maxwell. This performance greatly raised his reputation for science and for knowledge. In 1686 he published his essay on Jewish measures and weights, a work of great merit, and full of accurate calculation. In 1691 he was raised to the see of Peterborough by William, without solicitation or interest, but merely from the eminence of his learning, his exemplary manners, and his strong attachment to the protestant faith. In his episcopal duties he was indefatigably vigilant, observing to his friends who dissuaded from exertions which might injure his health, "that he would fulfil his duties as long as he could, and that a man had better wear out than rust out." Some part of his time, however, was devoted to literature: he was a sound mathematician, well acquainted with oriental learning, and perfectly informed in all the branches of science and philosophy. In his pursuits to discover the true causes of idolatry, he paid great attention to the shattered Phœnician history of Sanchoniathon; but though great labor was bestowed on the subject, and a book prepared for the press, his bookseller objected, on account of the times, to the publication, which was deferred till after his death, when his son-in-law, Mr. Payne, gave to the world, in 1720, his Sanchoniathon's Phœnician history, from Eusebius' præpar. evangel., and in 1724, his second work, his origines gentium antiquissimæ. He died October 9, 1718, in his 87th year.

CUMBERLAND, William duke of, second son of George II. was born 1721. He was at the battle of Dettingen with his father, and distinguished himself so much, that at the battle of Fontenoy he might have insured a most glorious victory, had he been ably supported by the Dutch troops. His next services were the defeat of the pretender at the battle of Culloden, 1746, for which he was highly applauded by the parliament and by the nation. In 1747 he lost the battle of Val, by the hesitating assistance of the Dutch. He died 1765.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was born Feb. 19, 1732. He was educated at Bury school, and next at Westminster till he was fourteen, when he became a student of Trinity college, where, in 1750, he obtained his bachelor's degree, and two years afterwards, he passed his examination for a fellowship. About this time, he became private secretary to lord Halifax, with whom he went to Ireland, when that nobleman was appointed to the viceroyship. On his return to England, he obtained the place of clerk of reports in the office of trade and plantations; and afterwards was appointed secretary to that board. In 1780, he went on a mission to Lisbon and Madrid, but was recalled the year following, having, as was said, exceeded his powers. He was also deprived of his situation at the board of trade, and from this time his circumstances were much contracted. He now retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he lost his wife; upon which he removed to London, and died there May 7, 1811. Mr. Cumberland's talents were considerable, and his vanity not much less, which exposed him to the attacks of some satirists, particularly Sheridan, who drew his portrait in the character of Sir Fretful Plagiary. His chief merit was as a dramatist, and the best of his numerous plays are the West Indian, the Jew, and The Wheel of Fortune. Of his poetical performances none are likely to be long remembered, except Calvary. His novels of Arundel, Henry, and John De Lancaster, possess merit, and his Observer, a series of miscellaneous papers, which holds a distinguished rank among the British classics. Besides these works, he published many fugitive pieces and tracts; Anecdotes of Spanish Painters, in 2 vols., and the Memoirs of his own life, from which this is extracted.

CUMING, William, an eminent physician, born at Edinburgh 1714, and educated at the high school and university of that city. After residing some time at Paris and Leyden, he came to London, from whence he removed to Dorchester. In this situation, from which he refused to retire for the more extensive practice of London, he soon gained universal reputation, and recommended himself to his patients as well by the gentleness of his manners and his probity as by his learning and his skilful management of diseases. Though he did not commit anything to the press, he was particularly attentive to assist his friends, among whom Mr. Hutchins, the historian of Dorsetshire, has paid very handsome and deserved compliments to his abilities and kind assiduity. He was fellow of the London and Edinburgh societies of antiquarians, and he was also fellow of the college of physicians. He died 25th March, 1783, aged 74.

CUMINGS, Henry, D.D., a congregational minister in Billerica, Mass. He was born in Hollis, N. H., Sept. 23, 1739; graduated at Harvard college in 1760; ordained, Jan. 26, 1763; and died Sept. 5, 1823, aged nearly 80 years. His occasional discourses published are fourteen in number; of which are the following—at the election, 1733; Dudleian lecture, 1791; at a thanksgiving, 1798; before a charitable society, 1802; and a half century discourse, 1813.

CUMMINGS, Jacob A., author of several elementary works, was graduated at Harvard college in 1801. He was a useful teacher and bookseller in Boston. He died 1820, aged 47. His publications for schools were highly esteemed, and his industry, useful labors and amiable qualities procured him much respect. He published N. Test. questions, 1817; geography, ancient and modern.

CUNÆUS, Peter, a learned lawyer, professor at Leyden, was born at Flushing 1596. He was educated for the church; but the rancor of the theological disputes of the times disgusted him, and he applied himself to belles lettres and to the law. He was a man of great learning, and deservedly commended by Vossius, Casaubon; Scaliger, and others. He died 1638. He wrote, among other valuable works, de republicâ Hebræorum—satira Menippæa, in sui sæculi homines inepte cruditos—remarks on Nonius' Dionysiaea, and a translation of Julian's Cæsars.

CUNITIA, Maria, a learned lady in the 17th century, born in Silesia. She possessed a perfect knowledge of ancient and modern languages, but particularly excelled in mathematics and astronomy, on which she wrote some ingenious treatises, especially her Urania propitia, in 1650, in Latin and German, dedicated to the emperor Ferdinand III. This work contains astronomical tables, calculated on Kepler's hypothesis, and displays her powers as a scholar and mathematician to have been very great and most respectable. She married a physician, Elias de Lewin, and died at Pisten 1664, much regretted as a person of science, and highly beloved as a woman of an amiable character.

CUNNINGHAM, Alexander, the son of a presbyterian minister, was born in 1654, at Ettrick, in Scotland, and was educated in Holland, whence he went over to England with the Prince of Orange. After having been a travelling tutor, he was for five years British envoy at Venice. He died in 1737. He wrote a Latin History of Great Britain, from the revolution to the accession of George I.; which was translated by Dr. Thompson. The work had passed into the hands of Dr. Hollingberry, and was recommended, from its valuable contents, for publication, by lord Hardwicke and

Dr. Douglas, bishop of Salisbury. It is indeed a work of merit, and it relates the particulars of an important period with accuracy, spirit, and impartiality; though, in the drawing of some characters, especially that of Burnet, the author shows himself prejudiced and un candid.

CUNNINGHAM, John, a poet, born at Dublin in 1729. At the age of seventeen he wrote a farce called Love in a Mist. This introduced him among actors; and the consequence was, that he himself became a strolling player. He continued so till his decease, which was occasioned by a nervous fever, in 1773. Several of his poetical pieces were published separately as pamphlets. The whole of them have been aduitted into the collections of the British Poets. They possess considerable sweetness, elegance, and descriptive power.

CURCÉLLÆUS, Stephen, an eminent divine, born at Geneva, died at Amsterdam 1659, aged 72. After residing some time in France, he settled at Amsterdam, where he was followed by the Arminians, and where he succeeded Episcopus as divinity professor. He was an able critic and a great linguist, and wrote several theological tracts. He published a new edition of the Greek testament, with various readings, and with a copious dissertation, in which he properly observes, that none of the readings affect in the least degree the articles of faith. Polemburg, the successor of Curcelæus in the professor's chair, has prefixed an account of his life to the folio edition of his works.

CURIO, Cœlius Secundus, was born at San Chirico, in Piedmont. His abjuration of the Romish religion, for the tenets of Luther, exposed him to the persecution of the catholics, and he was seized and confined in the prison of Turin, by the bishop. He however escaped from his enemies, and fled to Salo and Pavia; but the influence of the pope still persecuted him over Italy, till he took refuge at Lausanne, in Switzerland, where he became principal of the college. He afterwards removed to Basil, where, for twenty-two years, till his death, 1569, at the age of 67, he continued respectably to fill the chair of eloquence and belles lettres. His work, "de amplitudine beati regni Dei," 1550, in 8vo. is a curious composition. He wrote besides, "oposcula," 8vo.—letters—and Calvinus judaisans.

CURRAN, John Philpot, a celebrated Irish barrister, was born, in 1750, of humble parents, at Newcastle, near Cork; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; and studied the law at the Temple. For a while he had to struggle with want of practice, and consequent penury; but at length he rose to splendid forensic eminence, and, in 1784, became a member of the Irish House of Commons. As a senator, he was a determined and formidable enemy of the government. In 1806, when the whigs came into power, he was made master of the rolls in Ireland. That office he resigned in 1814; and he died November 13, 1817. Curran was somewhat mean in face and in person, but when his fine dark eye was lighted up, in conversation or in controversy, his countenance was striking and intelligent. Though occasionally not regulated by good taste, his eloquence was copious, fervid, and expressive; sometimes franght with bitter sarcasm and overwhelming invective, sometimes deeply pathetic, and at other times sparkling with wit, humor, and the most pungent ridicule.

CURRIE, James, an eminent physician, a native of Scotland, was born at Kirkpatrick Fleming in 1746, studied physie at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Glasgow, after which he settled at Liverpool, where he soon acquired popularity and fortune. He died in August, 1735. By his Medical Reports on the Effects of Water in febrile disorders, Currie mainly contributed to introduce the practice of affusion in cases of fever. He is the author, under the name of Jasper Wilson, of a Letter, Commercial and Political, to Mr. Pitt; and he published an edition of the works of Burns, to which he prefixed an excellent Memoir of the deceased poet, and a criticism on his works.

CURTIS, William, a botanist, born in 1746, at Alton, in Hampshire, was brought up as an apothecary, but devoted himself to botany, on which science he delivered lectures. He established an extensive garden, first at Bermondsey, next at Lambeth, and lastly at Brompton. He died in 1799. Of his works the most celebrated are, his Flora Londinensis; Botanical Magazine; and Botanical Lectures.

CURTIS RUFUS, Quintus, a Latin historian, the date of whose existence is fixed at widely different periods (from the reign of Augustus to that of Gordian), by different writers, while some even deem the name to be fictitious. He is the author of a History of Alexander the Great, which is more praiseworthy for its style than for its correctness. The first two books of it are lost.

CUSA, Nicholas de, a cardinal, born at Cusa, of mean parentage. His great merit, and his extensive knowledge of law and of divinity, recommended him to the notice of pope Nicholas V. who made him a cardinal 1448, and bishop of Brixia two years after. He was sent by the pope to Germany as legate, in 1451, to preach the crusades against the Turks, in which he was unsuccessful. He died at Todi, in Umbria, 1464, aged 63. His works, which were numerous and valuable, were collected and printed in three vols. Basil, 1565. They contain, besides controversial and metaphysical tracts, some geographical and astronomical pieces, and Cribratio alcorani, a treatise intended against the spreading of Mahomet's doctrines after the fall of Constantinople.

CUSHING, Thomas, LL.D., lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard college, 1744. Being the son of an eminent merchant of Boston, he had no chosen profession. He was early called into public life, first as a representative of Boston, and afterwards speaker of the house. He held the latter office when the controversy with England had reached the point, which made an appeal to arms indispensable, and he sided with his country. He was a member of the first and second congress. On his return to his own state he was elected into the council, which then constituted the supreme executive. After the adoption of the present constitution of Massachusetts he was elected lieutenant governor, and was kept in that office till his death. He died 1783, aged 62.

CUSHING, William, LL.D., judge of the supreme court of the United States, graduated at Harvard college 1751. In 1772 he received a commission as justice of the superior court of Massachusetts, and in 1777 that of chief justice. At the beginning of the revolution among the high in office, he, alone, supported the rights of his country. At the organization of the federal government, he was placed by Washington, in 1789, on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, and held the office till his death. He died 1810, aged 77.

CUSHING, Jacob, D.D., congregational minister of Waltham, Mass. was born Feb. 23, 1730; graduated at Harvard college in 1748; and was ordained, Nov. 22, 1752. After continuing in his ministry fifty-six years, he died Jan. 13, 1809, aged 78.

He published six occasional sermons, creditable to their author.

CUSSON, Peter, an eminent French physician and botanist of Montpellier, and member of the Royal Society of Sciences in that city. When young he travelled in Majorca and Spain, and brought home an excellent collection of the plants of those countries and of the Pyrenees. Soon after his return an old female relation, who lived with him, took an opportunity one day, when he was from home, to clean and ransack his study. In the course of this operation she found his herbal of dried plants, and considering them so much useless lumber, threw the whole of his fine collection into the street. This circumstance has been strangely misrepresented by Sir J. E. Smith, who, in his Introduction to Botany, states that the wife of Cusson "destroyed his whole herbarium; scraping off the dried specimens for the sake of the paper on which they were pasted." During the latter part of his life he was employed on a great work on the umbelliferous plants, which he is said to have left in a state fit for the press, but which does not appear to have been published. He also assisted Savanges in his celebrated work on Nosology. His death took place in 1734.

CUTBUSH, James, professor of chemistry in the military academy at West Point, died there 1823. He published the useful cabinet, monthly, 1 vol. 1808; philosophy of experimental chemistry 2 vols. 1813. After his death a treatise, which he prepared on pyrotechny, was published by his widow.

CUTLER, Timothy, D.D., president of Yale college, graduated at Harvard college 1701. He was minister of Stratford in Con. ten years. In 1719 he was chosen president of Yale College. In 1722 he renounced the communion of the congregational churches; and the trustees of the college, in consequence thereof, passed a vote, "excusing him from all further service, as rector of Yale college," and requiring of future rectors satisfactory evidence of "the soundness of their faith in opposition to Arminian and prelatical corruptions." He went to Boston, where a new church was offered to him, and embarked for England. In the latter end of March, 1723, he was ordained deacon and priest, and received from the university of Oxford a degree of doctor in divinity. He returned to America in July, and soon after became rector of Christ church in Boston, where he continued till his death, in 1765, aged 82. His only publications were, a sermon delivered before the general court at New-Haven 1717, and a sermon on the death of Thomas Greaves, 1757.

CUTLER, Manassah, LL.D., a congregational minister of Massachusetts, was graduated at Yale college in 1765, and settled pastor of a church in Hamilton, Massachusetts, Sept. 11th, 1771. He distinguished himself by his attention to several branches of natural history, particularly by making the first essay towards a scientific description of the plants of New-England, an account of several hundred of which communicated by him was published by the American academy, of which he was a member. In 1800 he was elected to a seat in congress, and retained it till 1804, when he declined any further political employment from its interference with his professional duties. He died July 23th, 1823, aged 51.

CUTHBERT, an English saint, born in the north, and educated by the Scottish monks in the abbey of Icolmkill. He settled in the island of Lindisferna, four miles from Berwick, now called Holy-island; from whence he came to the court of Egfrid king of Northumberland, whom, with many of his nobles, he converted to Christianity, and baptized. He was made bishop of the Northumbrian Saxons; but, from his fondness for solitude, he retired to Holy-island, where he founded a monastery, and where he died 686, leaving behind him a great number of pupils, and a deserved character of sanctity, virtue, and devotion.

CUTTS, John lord, was born of an ancient family at Matching, in Essex, and distinguished himself in the wars of William III. He was early in the service of Monmouth, and signalized himself greatly, under the duke of Lorraine, in Hungary, and at the taking of Buda by the imperialists. At the revolution, he had a regiment of foot, was created baron in Ireland 1690, governor of the Isle of Wight 1693, and complimented by Hopkins as one to whom a double crown was due, as a hero and a poet. On queen Anne's accession he was made lieutenant general of the forces in Holland, commander of the forces in Ireland, in 1705, and afterwards one of the lords justices of that kingdom; an appointment which broke his heart, because it removed him intentionally out of the sphere of active enterprise. He died at Dublin 26th of January 1707. He wrote a poem on queen Mary's death, and published, 1637, poetical exercises, written on several occasions—a poem on wisdom—another on Waller. The poetry, though not deserving to rank very high, yet possesses merit, and justifies the praises of Waller and others.

CUVIER, George Leopold, a Peer of France, was born in August, 1769. He was originally educated for the clerical profession; but having relinquished the intention of becoming a clergyman, he devoted himself to the study of natural history; at an early age he was invited to Paris to fill the place of professor of comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes, and soon attained the highest distinction as a naturalist. The cabinet of Comparative Anatomy in the Jardin des Plantes, formed wholly by him, and his various other works on natural history, form imperishable monuments of his genius. The parents of Baron Cuvier were of the Lutheran religion, and he was himself a Protestant; and besides other important offices to which he was successively called, he held the office of Director of Protestant worship. "The Christian part of his countrymen," says one of his eulogists, "rejoiced to see in the labors which constituted the basis of his fame, none of those elements of fragility which mark the conclusion of science, when opposed to the word of God." Cuvier died, May 13, 1832, at Paris; and his library was purchased by the French government for the sum of 72,000 francs.

CYPRIANI, or Cipriani, an Italian painter, who settled in England, and died in London 1795. He possessed great merit in his profession, and his pieces spread over Europe by the graver of Bartolozzi, are well known and admired for grace, beauty, and expression. In private life he was highly and deservedly esteemed for his many talents and virtues. His son inherited his virtues.

CYRILL, Lucar, was born in Candia 1572, and educated at Padua and in Germany. He was made bishop of Alexandria, and afterwards, 1621, patriarch of Constantinople. He was deposed, for his attempts to reform his clergy, and at last was strangled, by order of the grand signior, in 1633. His confession of faith and his letters were published, Amsterdam, 1718.

CYRUS, the elder, king of Persia, was son of Mandane, the daughter of Astyages. He dethroned his grandfather, established the Persian empire, and was at last killed in the battle against Tomyris queen of the Massagetæ, B. C. 530.

CYRUS, the younger, son of Darius, revolted against his brother Artaxerxes, and was defeated by him in the plains of Cunaxa, 401. Had he not been too rash, he might have obtained the victory. The retreat of the 10,000 Greeks who accompanied him is celebrated in ancient history.

CZERNI, George, or George the Black, so called from the darkness of his complexion, was born of an humble family, in the neighborhood of Belgrade, and his real name was George Petrovitsch. Wholly uneducated, he was possessed of natural talents and undaunted courage. At an early age he manifested a deadly hatred of the Turks. Having, at the head of a small troop, defeated them in many encounters, he formed the plan of liberating Servia, his country, from the Ottoman yoke. In 1800, he made himself master of Belgrade; and in 1806, after a severe struggle, he was acknowledged as Prince of Servia. He was, however, at length expelled, and he retired to Russia, where he was made a prince and general. In 1817, having entered Servia, he was taken prisoner and beheaded by the pacha of Belgrade.

D.

DACIER, Andrew, a French philosopher and critic, born 6th April 1651. His first work was the edition of Pompeius Festus, 4to. 1681, greatly improved in the edition of 1699. His Horace, with a French translation, appeared in 1681, in 10 vols. 12mo. and has frequently been reprinted. He next published St. Anastasius' contemplations, with notes and a Latin translation, in 1682. He published nothing afterwards till 1691, when his moral reflections of Marcus Antonius, 2 vols. 12mo. appeared; and in 1692 Aristotle's poetics, with a translation and critical remarks, in 4to. which some have considered as his best performance. In 1693 he published a translation of the Oedipus and Electra of Sophocles; in 1694, the first volume of Plutarch's lives; in 1697, the translation of the works of Hippocrates, 2 vols. 12mo.; in 1699, that of Plato's works, 2 vols.; in 1706, the life of Pythagoras, his symbols, and golden verses, 2 vols.; in 1715, Epictetus, 2 vols.; and in 1723, the lives of Plutarch were completed, in 8 vols. 4to. Besides these, Dacier published notes on Longinus, a dissertation on the origin of satire, speeches in the French academy, answers to some critics who had censured his person and manners, besides a commentary on Theocritus, and a treatise on religion, never published. As he had been concerned in the compilation of the medallic history of Lewis XIV. the monarch settled on him a pension of 2000 livres, and appointed him keeper of his books in the Louvre. In 1713 he was made perpetual secretary to the French academy, and in 1717 he obtained a reversionary grant of 10,000 crowns, as library keeper to the king. Dacier died September 18, 1722, in his 71st year.

DACIER, Anne, wife of Andrew Dacier, daughter of Tanaquil Faber, or le Fevre, was born at Saumur 1651. When she was 11 years old her father discovered the strong natural powers of her mind, and immediately laid the foundation of a learned education which was happily completed. In 1674, she published an edition of Callimachus in 4to. and in consequence of her extensive knowledge, she was engaged in the editing of the classics for the use of the dauphin. Her Florus appeared in 1674, in 4to. and her Aurelius Victor 1681. In 1681, her translation of Anacreon and Sappho appeared, so much commended by Boileau, and in 1683, were published Eutropius 4to. and a French translation of the Amphitryo, Epidicus, and Rudens of Plautus, three vols. and the next year the Plantus and Clouds of Aristophanes 12mo. with Dyctes Cretensis and Dares Phrygius. In 1683 she married Dacier, a distinguished scholar. In 1688 she published her translation of Terence's plays, with notes, 3 vols. 12mo. the best edition of which is that of 1717. She also assisted her husband in his Marcus Antonius and his Plutarch, and in 1711 she published her translation of Homer's Iliad, with notes, 3 vols. 12mo. In 1514 she wrote a defence of Hoier against de la Motte, and two years after against Hardouin, in which she displayed much erudition, great taste, and not a little acrimony. Her last work, the Odyssey of Homer translated from the Greek, appeared in 1716, 3 vols. 12 no. The two last years of her life she sunk into disease and debility, and died August 17th 1720, aged 69. Besides learning, Madame Dacier was graced with the noblest ornaments of human nature, with generosity, firmness, mildness, and exemplary piety.

DAGGETT, Naphali, D. D. the fifth president of Yale College, was graduated at the same institution, in 1748. He was a native of Attleborough, Mass. and in 1751 was settled in the ministry at Smith Town on Long Island. From this place he removed to New Haven in 1756, and became professor of divinity in the college. He held this office till his death; and from the death of Mr. Clap in 1766, till April 1777, he exercised the duties of president. Dr. Daggett died, Nov. 25, 1780. He was accounted a good scholar, and ranked high in his profession.

DAHLBERG, Erie, a Swedish engineer, whose excessive application compensated for the early loss of his parents, and the misfortunes of a neglected education. He prepared for the brave defence of Thorn, and accompanied Gustavus Adolphus in his Polish expedition, and advised him to march his army across the Great Belt when frozen, and thus penetrate into the very heart of the Danish kingdom and besiege the capital. His great services were rewarded in 1660 with the rank of nobility, and he was successively raised to the command of Malmo, the care of the fortifications, and the government of Livonia. He died at Stockholm 1703, aged 78. He wrote Suecia antiqua et hodierna, three vols. fol. 1700, and distinguished himself so much as an engineer that he was deservedly called the Vauban of Sweden.

DAILLE, John, an eminent protestant divine, born at Châtelleraut sixth January 1594. At the age of eighteen he was admitted into the family of du Plessis Mornay to be the tutor of his two grandsons. He began his travels in 1619, and with his two pupils passed through Geneva, Piedmont, Lombardy, and Venice, where he was introduced to the acquaintance and friendly intimacy of father Paul. While at Mantua one of his pupils was taken ill, and soon after died. With the other pupil he continued his travels, and after visiting Switzerland, Germany, Flanders, Holland, and England, they returned to France late in 1621. In 1623, Daille was ordained and first officiated in the family of the venerable Mornay, who died soon after in the arms of his beloved and reverend friend. In 1628 he wrote his celebrated book "on the use of the fathers" which lord Falkland and his friend Chillingworth greatly valued. In 1633 he published his apology for the reformed churches, which he also translated into Latin, and Mr. Smith into English in 1658. These books, from their importance, and the masterly manner in which the subject was treated, excited a great interest. Daille was at the synod of Alencon in 1637, where his authority was ably exerted to reconcile the protestants in the then disputed tenets about universal grace. These principles he warmly embraced, and indeed published in 1655 a Latin work against Spanheim the Leyden professor, as "an apology for the synods of Alencon and Charenton." This great and good man died at Paris 15th April 1670. His reputation was so high that the protestants in France declared they had seen no better writer since the days of Calvin. He wrote besides several works which were chiefly of a controversial nature, and which equally evinced his learning, erudition, and dexterity of argumentation.

DALE, Samuel, an apothecary of Braintree, Essex, who became by his merit in 1730, a licentiate of the college of physicians and fellow of the royal society. He wrote Pharmacologia, seu manuductio ad materiam medicam, often printed,—the antiquities of Harwich and Dover court, in 4to. improved from the works of Silas Taylor, besides some valuable papers in the philosophical transactions. He died at Bocking, where he had settled as a physician, 1739, aged 80.

DALE, Richard, an American naval commander, was born in Virginia in 1756. At twelve years of age he was sent to sea, and in 1776 he entered as a midshipman on board of the American brig of war Lexington. In the following year he was taken prisoner by a British cruiser, and after a twelve month confinement he escaped from Mill prison, and succeeded in reaching France. Here he joined, in the character of master's mate, the celebrated Paul Jones, then commanding the American ship Bon Homme Richard. He was soon raised to the rank of first lieutenant, and signalized himself in the sanguinary engagement between the Bon Homme Richard and the English frigate Serpis. In 1794, the United States made him a captain in the navy, and in 1801 he took command of the American squadron which sailed in that year from Hampton roads to the Mediterranean. From the year 1802, he passed his life in Philadelphia in the enjoyment of a competent estate, and much esteemed by his fellow citizens. He died in 1826, leaving the reputation of a brave and intelligent seaman.

DALE, Sir Thomas, was sent out to Virginia as high marshal, in 1609, and a second time in May, 1611, with three hundred colonists, supplies, and new laws, with the execution of which he was entrusted. His administration was rigorous and excited great disaffection, but the interests of the colony were advanced under it. He built the town of Henrico, on James river, and conquered that of the Appomattox Indians, at the mouth of the river of that name. In August, 1611, Sir Thomas Gates succeeded him in the government. He continued, however, to take an active part in the affairs of the colony, and on the return of Gates to England, in 1614, the chief command again devolved on him. He returned to England in 1616. He afterwards went to the East-Indies, and there died.

DALECHAMPS, James, a learned physician, born at Caen 1513. He died at the age of 75, at Lyons, where he had practised from 1552 to 1583. He wrote a general history of plants, three books de peste, besides Pliny's natural history with valuable notes, and also translated into Latin, Athenæus, in the completion of which he was engaged thirty years.

DALIN, Olaus de, a learned Swede, born at Winsberg in 1703. He is deservedly called the father of Swedish poetry, by his two poems on the liberty of Sweden, and the tragedy of Brunhilda. He rose by his genius to fame and fortune, and was appointed preceptor to prince Gustavus, and at last became chancellor of the court. He wrote, at the request of the government, the history of Sweden, which he brought down to the death of Charles IX. He wrote, besides, epistles, fables, satires, and panegyrics, and translated Montesquieu's book on the declension of the Romans.

DALLAS, Alexander James, secretary of the treasury of the U. S. was a native of Scotland. After receiving an early education at Edinburgh and Westminster, he came to this country in 1783, and studied law at Philadelphia. He also engaged in various literary enterprises, writing much for the periodicals, and being at one time the editor of the Columbian Magazine. In 1801 he was appointed attorney of the U. S. for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. In Oct. 1814 he was appointed secretary of the treasury of the U. S.; and in March 1815 he undertook the additional trust of secretary at war. He resigned in Nov. 1816, and died Jan. 1817, aged 57. While in office he promoted the establishment of a tariff, and of a national bank. He published features of Jay's treaty 1795; speeches on the trial of Blount and the impeachment of the judges; the laws of Pennsylvania with notes; address to the society of constitutional republicans 1805; reports of cases in the courts of the U. S. and Penns. 2 vols. 1806—7.; treasury reports; exposition of the causes and character of the late war, 1814; he left unfinished, sketches of a history of Penns.

DALLAS, Robert Charles, was born at Kingston, in Jamaica, and studied at the inner Temple, but never embraced the legal profession. He died, in 1824, at Havre. He translated many works from the French; and is the author, among other things, of the novels of Perceval, Aubrey, The Morlands, and The knights; Miscellaneous Works and Novels; Miscellaneous Writings; Not at Home, a comedy; and Recollections of Lord Byron.

DALRYMPLE, Sir David, a lawyer and antiquary, was born at Edinburgh in 1726; educated at Eton and Utrecht; called to the Scotch bar in 1748; became a judge of the court of session in 1766, on which occasion he took the title of Lord Hailes; was appointed a judge of the judiciary in 1776; and died in 1792. His knowledge of law and of antiquities was extensive, and he was in habits of friendship with the most eminent men of the age. His principal works are, Annals of Scotland, two vols. 4to.; and Memorials, &c. relating to the History of Great Britain.

DALRYMPLE, Sir John, a Scotch baronet, was for many years a baron of exchequer in Scotland. He died in 1810, at the age of eighty-four. He wrote various occasional pamphlets; but his principal work is, Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland, in three vols. 4to.; the first of which was published in 1771. It is a production of considerable merit; but it caused no small outcry against the author, in consequence of his having accused Sidney and Russel of having received bribes from the French ambassador.

DALRYMPLE, Alexander, a celebrated hydrographer, the son of Sir James Dalrymple, was born at New Hailes, near Edinburgh, in 1737; went to India, as a writer, in 1752, and remained there till 1763; resided there again from 1775 to 1780; was made hydrographer to the Admiralty and the India Company in 1795; and died 1808. He is the author of many works, among which are three Collections of Voyages; The Oriental Repertory; and a Memoir of a Map of the Land round the North Pole.

DALTON, John, D.D., was born at Deane in Cumberland, where his father was rector, 1709. He was educated at Lowther, and at Queen's college, Oxford, and became tutor to lord Beauchamp. He employed himself in the mean time, in adapting Milton's masque at Ludlow-castle to the stage, which he rendered, by a judicious selection of songs from other works of the author, and some of his own, a very popular piece, still known and admired under the title of "Comus." During the celebrity of this performance, he sought out Milton's grand-daughter, who was overwhelmed with old age and poverty, and honorably exerted his influence to procure her a benefit, which produced her 120*l*. His ill health afterwards prevented him from attending his noble pupil, who unfortunately died of the small-pox at Bologna. After being elected to a fellowship in his college, he took orders, and was presented some time after, by the duke of Somerset, to the living of St. Mary at Hill, and by his influence to a prebend at Worcester, where he died 1763. He published a volume of sermons, 1757—two epistles, 4to.—a descriptive poem on the coal mines near Whitehaven—remarks on 12 historical designs of Raphael.

DALTON, Tristram, a senator of the United States, was born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1738, and received his education at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1755. After having been speaker of the house of representatives, and a member of the senate of the commonwealth, he was transferred on the adoption of the federal constitution to a seat in the senate of the United States. He afterwards received the office of surveyor of the ports of Boston and Charlestown, and held it till his death in 1817. He was distinguished for gentleness and elegance of manners, mental cultivation, and integrity.

DALZELL, Andrew, an eminent Greek scholar, born at Ratho, near Edinburgh, about 1750. From his village school he came to Edinburgh, and studied with such zeal and application, that he became professor of the Greek language in the university, keeper of the university library, and one of the secretaries of the royal society of Edinburgh. As a professor, Mr. Dalzell possessed great abilities and powerful eloquence, and his lectures were so popular, that the study of the Greek language which had long been neglected in Scotland, became under his auspices, a favorite pursuit with the youthful students of the university. To facilitate the labors of his pupils, he devoted much of his time in the composition of valuable notes, in the elucidation of the Greek classics, which he published under the name of Analecta minora & majora. He wrote besides, some papers on biography, and on literary subjects in the Edinburgh society transactions, and recommended to the English student, Chevalier's description of the plain of Troy, by giving an elegant translation of it, enriched with learned notes. This amiable man and elegant scholar died 8th December 1806.

DALZIEL, Thomas, a Scotch officer, taken prisoner at the defeat at Worcester, and confined in the tower, from which he escaped to Russia, where the czar made him a general. At the restoration he returned to England, and Charles II. made him, for his many services, commander in chief of all his forces in Scotland. He was a singular man in his dress and appearance. He had been brought up hardy, and after the death of Charles I. he never shaved his beard, which grew white and bushy, and descended to his middle. His bald head was generally covered with a beaver hat, the brim of which, was not more than three inches broad. He generally came to London once or twice a year to kiss the king's hand, who had great regard for him, but whenever he appeared in the capital, the singularity of his dress and appearance drew crowds of boys, around him. The time of his death is unknown.

DAMER, Anne Seymour, only child of Field-marshal Conway, was born in 1743. Almost in childhood she imbibed a love of literature, and became highly accomplished. An accidental conversation with Hume, respecting some plaster casts, turned her attention to sculpture, and she took lessons from Ceracchi and Bacon, and studied in Italy. She was also fond of dramatic amusements, and was an excellent amateur actress. She died May 28, 1803. The productions of her chisel are numerous, and do honor to her talent. Among them is a bust of Nelson, in Guildhall, and two colossal heads on Henley bridge.

DAMIEN, Peter, cardinal and bishop of Ostia in the eleventh century, was originally a Benedictine monk, whom his superiors and not his ambition raised to places of eminence and dignity. He publicly condemned the wars which the popes carried on against the emperors, and asserted, from the example of our Saviour, that the ecclesiastics were to oppose their enemies, not by the arms of the flesh, but by the sword of the spirit. He was equally severe against the licentious manners of his age, which he attempted to correct and reform. His works were printed at Paris, 1663. He died about 1073.

DAMPIER, John, a native of Blois, who entered among the cordeliers, and was director of a nunnery at Orleans, where he died before 1550. His Latin poems, after the manner of Catullus, are elegant and valuable, and are published in the first volume of the deliciae poetarum Gallorum.

DAMPIER, William, a famous navigator, born at East Coker in Somersetshire, 1652. He early went to sea, and joined captain Cook, in order to cruise against the Spaniards. They accordingly proceeded to the South seas, through the straits of Magellan, where Cook died, 1684, and was succeeded in command by Davis. They afterwards burned the town of Plata, and then advanced to the bay of Panama, near which they took a Spanish ship sent with despatches to Lima, and from the intelligence received on board they meditated an attack on the plate ships, which ended unsuccessfully. Their next attack was against Leon, on the Mexican coast, which they destroyed, and also Rio Leja, and there Dampier left Davis, and sailed with captain Swan, to examine more fully the northern parts of the Mexican shore; but meeting with no success, and being disappointed in their wishes to seize the rich Manilla ship, they sailed across the great Pacific ocean for the East Indies. After visiting St. John's island, New Holland, Triest, and Nicobar, Dampier left his companions, and arrived at the English factory at Achan, where he afterwards engaged with captain Weldon in trading voyages for 15 months, and then entered as gunner at a factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he made his escape from the vigilance of the governor, and brought all his papers and journals with him, and reached the Downs, Sept. 16. As he was now in want of money he sold his share in an Indian prince, whom his companions carried about for exhibition. He was afterwards engaged for three years, till 1711, in a voyage under the British merchants to the South seas, of which he has recorded several curious and very interesting particulars. His voyage round the world has been frequently published, and is considered as an accurate and valuable performance. The time of Dampier's death is unknown.

DANA, Francis, LL.D., chief-justice of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780, graduated at Harvard college in 1762. After studying law he passed one year in England. He was a delegate in congress from Mass. from 1776 to 1779, when he accompanied Mr. Adams to Paris as secretary of legation. He was appointed minister to Russia in 1780, and though not publicly received as such, remained there till the end of the war. He returned to America in 1783, and was a delegate in congress in 1784. He was appointed chief justice in 1792, and resigned in 1806. He died 1811, aged 68.

DANA, James Freeman, M.D., graduated at Harvard college 1813, and in a few years after was appointed assistant professor of chemistry in that seminary. In 1820 he was appointed professor of chemistry and mineralogy at Dartmouth college; resigned this office in 1826, on being appointed professor of chemistry in the college of physicians and surgeons at New-York. He died 1827, aged 33. He was a distinguished chemist, and highly esteemed by his acquaintance. He published, with his brother, outlines of the geology and mineralogy of Boston, with a map, 1818; an epitome of chemical philosophy as a text book, 8vo. 1825. He wrote also for various journals many communications, a list of which is given in Thatcher's med. bio.

DANA, James, D.D., a native of Massachusetts, and a graduate of Harvard college in 1753. He became a congregational minister Oct. 12, 1758, at Wallingford, Con., where he remained thirty years. He was then, April 29, 1789, installed pastor of the first church at New Haven. From the latter office he was dismissed in 1805. He still continued to reside at New Haven, till his death, which took place, Aug. 13, 1812, aged 77. Dr. Dana was engaged at one time in Edwards' controversy on the Freedom of the Will; and he also published numerous occasional sermons. Samuel W. Dana, senator of the United States, was his only surviving child.

DANA, Joseph, D.D., was born at Pomfret Con. Nov. 13, 1742, and graduated at Yale college in 1760. He was ordained as the minister of the south society in Ipswich, Mass. Nov. 7, 1765, where he remained till his death, which took place, Nov. 16, 1827, at the age of 85 years. Dr. Dana left two sons, who are clergymen; Dr. Daniel Dana of Newburyport, and Samuel Dana of Marblehead. Twelve of his occasional sermons were published, one of which was on the death of Washington. On the 60th anniversary of his ordination, at the age of 83, he preached a sermon in which he stated, that all who were heads of families at the time of his settlement, were deceased, excepting five; and that he had followed about 900 of his parishioners to the grave.

DANCHET, Anthony, a French poet, born at Riorn 1671. At 19, he became professor of rhetoric at Chartres, and four years after he came to Paris, where he devoted himself to write for the theatre.

He was member of the French academy and of that of inscriptions, and had also a place in the king's library. He died 1748, universally esteemed as much for his private character as for his writings. His works, consisting of tragedies, songs, and operas, were printed at Paris 1751, 4 vols. 12mo.

DANDINI, Jerome, a Jesuit, born at Cesena in Italy 1554. He was the first of his order who taught philosophy at Paris. He was in consequence of his learning, rector of the colleges of Ferrara, Forli, Bologna, Parma, and Milan. He also taught philosophy at Perugia 1596, when he was appointed by pope Clement VIII. to be his legate to the Maronites of mount Libanus. He wrote an account of his journey in Italian, which Simon translated into French. Dandini died at Forli 1634, aged 80. His commentary on Aristotle's three books de anima, appeared at Paris 1611, folio, and his ethics at Cesena 1651.

DANDINI, Pietro, an eminent painter, born at Florence 1646. He studied under Valerio Spada, and his uncle Vincentio Dandini, and after travelling through Italy he resided for some time at Venice, and also at Parma and Modena, that he might more carefully view and copy the finest pieces of the greatest masters. On his return to Florence he was employed by the grand duke in adorning his palaces from subjects from sacred and fabulous history, as well as in fancy and caricature pieces. His genius was great, and he displayed astonishing powers in the imitation of Titian, Veronese, and Tintoretto. He died 1712.

DANES, Peter, born at Paris, studied at the college of Navarre, and was Greek professor at the college royal for five years. He was tutor to the dauphin, afterwards Francis II., and he was present at the council of Trent, where he delivered a celebrated speech in 1546. During his stay at Trent he was made bishop of Lavaur. He died at Paris 23d April, 1577, aged 80. He was a prelate of extensive learning, commanding eloquence, great gravity of manners and genuine piety. He wrote several things, but never set his name to them. The 10th book of Paulus Æmilii's history of France is attributed to him. His opuscula, with his life, were published by his kinsman Peter Hilary Danes in 1731, 4to.

DANFORTH, Thomas, president of the district of Maine. He had great influence in the management of public affairs in difficult times. He was an assistant from 1659 to 1679. In 1678 he was elected deputy governor. In the same year the inhabitants of the district of Maine, being no longer attached to Massachusetts as a county, elected him president of the province. He accordingly opened his court at York, and granted several parcels of land. He continued in this office and that of deputy governor till the arrival of Andros at the end of the year 1686. In 1681 he united with Gookin, Cooke, and others in opposing the acts of trade, and vindicating the chartered rights of his country. He died 1699, aged 77.

DANFORTH, Samuel, minister of Roxbury, Mass. He was born in England, Sept. 1626, and came to this country with his father in 1634. In 1643 he graduated at Harvard college, and was ordained at Roxbury Sept. 24, 1650, where he remained till his death in 1674. He published several almanacs, and an astronomical description of the comet, which appeared in 1664. He also published the cry of Sodom inquired into, or a testimony against the sin of uncleanness; and, the election sermon in 1670.

DANGEAU, Louis Courcillon de, member of the French academy, and abbot of Clermont and Fontaine-Daniel, was born at Paris, Jan. 1643, and died there Jan. 1st, 1723. He usefully devoted his time to facilitate the study of belles lettres, history, and geography, for which he invented several new and ingenious games. He published a new method to learn historical geography, two vols. folio.—the principles of heraldry in 14 plates 4to—historical games of the kings of France—reflections on the parts of grammar—of the election of the emperor. His principal work is the dialogues on the immortality of the soul, attributed by some to the abbé de Choisi. He was master of a great variety of languages, but his benevolence was equal to his learning. By economy he was in possession of a respectable income, which was liberally applied to the relief of indigence and distress.

DANIEL, Samuel, an English poet and historian born 1562. He entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, but after three years' residence left the university without a degree. He had succeeded Spenser as poet laureat, and by his genius and learning he gained the friendship of the most eminent men of the times, such as Camden, sir John Harrington, Spehnan, Cotton, Ben Jonson, Owen, and Stradling. He lived, while near the court, at a house in Old-street, where he composed many of his dramatic pieces, but in his old age he went to reside at a farm which he had at Beckington, Somersetshire, where he ended his days in peace and retirement 1619. His poetical works, consisting of dramatic and other lighter pieces, besides a poem in 3 books on the wars of York and Lancaster, were published in 2 vols. 12mo. 1718. His history of England to the end of Edward III. in 2 vols. 4to. continued afterward by Trussel, was written, it is said "with great brevity and politeness, and his political and moral reflections are very fine, useful, and instructive." This history, as Langbaine observes, is the crown of all his works.

DANIEL, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Rouen, 8th February 1649. At the age of 18, he was admitted among the Jesuits, and early began to display his abilities by delivering lectures on literature, philosophy, and theology. One of his first performances was a voyage to the world of Descartes, a romance, most ingenious and excellent, as Bolingbroke observes, which ridiculed the Cartesian system, and which became so celebrated as to be translated into several languages. His great work is his history of France to the death of Henry IV. published at Paris in 3 vols. folio, 1713, and afterwards corrected and enlarged in 7 vols. 4to. 1722. This work was afterwards continued to the death of Lewis XIV. but in an inferior style. Father Daniel wrote besides several theological and other tracts, one of which "dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxus," passed through 12 editions in less than 2 years. All these smaller tracts were collected in two vols. 4to. This very learned and amiable Jesuit died at Paris, 23d June, 1728.

DANIEL, Robert, a Landgrave of Carolina, under the first constitution, was sent from England, after the return of governor Archdale, with a new constitution for that colony. In 1703, he succeeded Mr. Walker, as president of the council of North Carolina. Thomas Cary, deputy governor, succeeded him in the administration. On the departure of governor Craven for England, in 1716, he was appointed deputy governor of South Carolina. The preceding year he had been intrusted with the protection of Charleston, while Craven was engaged in an expedition against the Indians. Governor Johnson succeeded him in 1717.

DANIEL, Samuel, an ingenious artist and traveller, who died in the island of Ceylon in December 1811, at the age of thirty-six. Early in life he went to the Cape of Good Hope, whence after some stay he proceeded to the interior of Africa, and collected much valuable information, and made drawings of various interesting objects. In this journey he was accompanied by two scientific friends; and this small party went farther in a northeastern direction than any preceding European travellers. Many of the drawings he made on the occasion were engraved and published in his work entitled, "African Scenery." He also amassed another very large collection of drawings and illustrations of scenery, animals, and native inhabitants of Africa which he took with him on his return to England in 1804. About two years after, he embraced an opportunity which offered for visiting Ceylon, where, during a residence of nearly six years, he found abundant occasions for prosecuting his favorite researches, and increasing his graphic stores. As the fruit of his labors, one volume, relating to "the Scenery," has been published; in addition to which he left an extensive collection of drawings, chiefly illustrative of the natural history of the island.

DANTE, Alighieri, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Florence 27th May, 1265, of an ancient family. He early displayed his poetical talents, but the ambition of being elevated among the ruling men of his native city, engaged him in all the troubles and miseries of violent faction. His friends were defeated in the tumult, and he sought with them safety in banishment. In his exile at Ravenna, he vented the severest shafts of his resentment against his enemies, and because the pope and Philip of Valois, brother to the French king, had been instrumental in his downfall, he ridiculed them in his writings, and intimated that Hugh Capet the progenitor of the monarch was risen from the mean occupation of a butcher. He also incited the prince of Verona to make war against the Florentines, and to procure his recall, but all to little purpose. In his honorable exile, at the court of Guy Polentano, prince of Ravenna, he was sent by that sovereign to negotiate with the Venetians who wished to make war against him, but the magistrates of Venice treated the ambassador with contempt, and refused to admit him within their walls. This arrogant conduct had such an effect upon the sensible and irritable heart of Dante, that at his return to Ravenna, unable to survive the affront, he died July 1321, aged 57. To his misfortunes perhaps we are indebted for his poems, for unable to revenge himself by force, he drew the pen of satire in his own defence. His triple poem, of paradise, purgatory, and hell, displays astonishing powers of genius, and at once exhibits the sweetness and graces of poetry with the bitterness of insatiable enmity. The reputation and the usurped power of the pope, Boniface VIII. the pedigree of the French king, and the prostituted venality of Florence, that den of thieves, are the subjects which engage and inflame the virulence of the poet. He every where displays spirit, fire, and sublimity, and from his compositions, succeeding poets have learned not only how to point the shaft of satire, but to write with elegance, dignity, and grace.

DANTE, Ignatius, a descendant of the great poet, was born at Perugia, and became known for his skill in mathematics as well as in divinity and philosophy. He read lectures on geography at Bologna, and was engaged by Gregory XIII. to draw geographical maps and plans. He evinced such dexterity in this that the pope raised him to the bishopric of Alatri. He died 1586. He published in 1569 at Florence, a treatise on the astrolabe, besides notes on the universal planisphere. He made a sphere of the world in five tables. The meridian line, which he drew through St. Petronius' church in Bologna 1576, was afterwards finished by Cassini.

DANTE, John Baptiste, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Perugia, and distinguished himself by his mechanical powers in making a pair of wings with such nicety that he could support himself in the air, and fly across the lake Trasymenus. In one of his exhibitions before the people of Perugia, one of the wings broke and he fell on the top of a church, and shattered his thigh. He was afterwards professor of mathematics at Venice, and died before he was forty years old, about the end of the 15th century.

DANTON, George James, a native of Arcis-sur-Aube, born 26th October 1759. He was originally a lawyer, but the revolution drew him into public notice, as the associate of Robespierre and Marat. To an unprincipled hatred against Lewis XVI. he added the most ferocious spirit, and after viewing the massacres of September with pleasure, he prepared to organize the public bodies of the state to resist the invasion of the Prussians. Undismayed amidst the general terror, he opposed the project of removing the convention beyond the Loire; but while he permitted the cruelties of anarchy, he secretly paved the way for his own elevation to the sovereign power. For a while Robespierre was his friend, but when he saw his superior eloquence, and his influence among the Jacobins, he marked him for destruction. Dragged before the bloody revolutionary tribunal, which he had himself established, Danton showed firmness and indifference. He was guillotined the first day of April, 1794. Indolent yet cruel, ambitious and vulgar, this bloody tyrant possessed with a stentorian voice, the imposing powers of persuasion, and while devoted to wine and low pleasures, he gained the good opinion of his guilty associates by gross ribaldry and licentious wit.

DANTZ, John Andrew, a learned Lutheran divine, born at Sanhusen near Gotha. After traveling in Holland and England, he settled at Jena, where, as professor of the oriental tongues, and of theology, he distinguished himself. He died of an apoplexy, 1727, aged 78. He wrote Hebrew and Chaldee grammars—sinceritas sacrae, scripturae veteris testamenti—translations of rabbinical writings, and dissertations.

DARAN, James, a native of St. Frajon in Gascony, who became surgeon general in the imperial army at Turin and Milan. He refused the honorable offers of Amadeus to settle in Italy, and returned to France, where he died 1784, aged 83. He wrote a treatise on the virulent gonorrhœa—and observations on the diseases of the urethra.

DARBY, William, engineer and geographer, died 1827. He was an officer under gen. Jackson in Louisiana, and was one of the surveyors of the boundary between the U. S. and Canada. He published a geographical description of Louisiana 8vo. 1816; a map of the same; plan of Pittsburg and adjacent country, 1817; emigrants guide to the western country, 8vo. 1818; memoir on the geog. and hist. of Florida, with a map, 1821; 3d edit. of Brooke's univ. gazetteer, 1823.

DARCET, N. an able chemist and physician of France, who was professor in the national institute, and died at Paris 1801, aged 75. He made some curious experiments with Rouelle and Macquer, and published some valuable memoirs on potteries, and on the various kinds of earth to be used in those manufactories. He also analysed minerals, and gave to the public the state of the Pyrenees, with conjectures on the causes of their gradual wasting away.

DARCI, Patrick count, a celebrated philosopher and engineer, born in Ireland 1725. As he was attached to the Stuart family, he removed to Paris in 1739, and at the age of 17, he distinguished himself by a new solution of the problem of the curve of equal pressure, in a resisting medium. He was engaged in the war of 1744, and was taken prisoner by the English. In 1760 he published his essay on artillery, with curious experiments on the charges of powder, &c. and in 1765 appeared his memoir on the duration of the sensation of sight. This is the most ingenious of his works, and proves him to be an accurate experimentalist. His memoir on hydraulic machines, and also his other works on experimental philosophy, evince a great genius, and a man who to the patience of observation united great and quick discrimination, and solidity of judgment. Though an exile he was attached to his country, and loved the name of an Irishman. He died at Paris, of a cholera morbus in 1779.

DARKE, William, an officer in the war of the American revolution, was born in Pennsylvania in 1736. Removing to Virginia while young he joined the army of general Braddock, and was in the unfortunate battle in which that general fell. At the commencement of the war with Great Britain he received a captain's commission, and continued in the service till the peace, when he held the rank of major. In 1791 he was advanced to the command of a regiment in the army of general St. Clair, and distinguished himself in the disastrous battle of the 4th of November. After returning to Virginia he was appointed major general of the militia of the state. He died in November, 1801.

DARQUIER, Augustine, an eminent astronomer, born at Toulouse, 23d Nov. 1718. He early paid attention to mathematical and astronomical pursuits, and as he was blessed with a comfortable independence, he provided himself with the best instruments, and built an observatory in his own house. More generally to diffuse his extensive knowledge, he took pupils whom he ably instructed in astronomy. He paid the expense of calculations to give greater accuracy to his observations, and received no pecuniary assistance whatever from the government. This learned and patriotic man died in his native town 18th, Jan. 1802, after escaping the storms of the revolution, and being admitted member of the national institute. He wrote 2 vols. of observations, published at his own expense—Lambert's cosmological letters, translated and printed at Utrecht—elements of geometry from Simpson—observations on the solar eclipse of 1778, from the Spanish of Ulloa—letters on practical astronomy. His last observations to March 1798, appeared in la Lande's histoire celeste.

DARU, Peter Anthony Bruno, Count, a member of the French Academy and the Academy of Sciences, was born at Montpellier, in 1767; and when the revolution broke out, he was a lieutenant and commissary at war. Imprisoned in 1793, he was liberated after the fall of Robespierre, and filled several military offices under the Directory. Bonaparte, while consul and emperor, gave him his entire confidence, and raised him to the highest offices. Louis XVIII. made him a peer in 1819. Daru died September 11, 1829. As an historian, Daru is known by his valuable Histories of Venice and Brittany; as a poet, by his Cleopatra, or Theory of Reputations in Literature, by a translation of Horace, and by various minor poems.

DARWIN, Erasmus, an English poet and physician, born at Newark in Nottinghamshire, 1732. As his family was respectable, he received a liberal education, and then entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. B. 1755. From Cambridge he went to Edinburgh, where he more particularly devoted himself to the study of physic, and where he took his medical degrees. He afterwards settled at Lichfield, where he acquired great celebrity in his profession. He died at Derby very suddenly, 18th April, 1802. In private life Dr. Darwin was amiable and benevolent, in his conversation easy and entertaining, and in his manners affable. The best known of his works are his botanic garden with philosophical notes, in two parts—the economy of vegetation—the loves of the plants, 2 vols. 8vo.—zoonomia, or the laws of organic life, 4 vols. 8vo.—phytologia, or the philosophy of agriculture and gardening, 4to. He wrote besides, treatise on female education, 4to.—some papers in the philosophical transactions, on medical and philosophical subjects—a thesis on the movement of the heart and the arteries, in consequence of the stimulus of the blood—the system of vegetables of Linnæus, published by the Lichfield botanical society. As a poet and botanist, the name of Darwin is respectable, his verses display elegance, grace, and beauty, but they seldom rise to sublimity, and they please more by the easy flow of number, than by the fire of description.

DASSIER, John, medalist to the republic of Geneva, struck a series of the English kings, with a hope of procuring an establishment in the English mint, which however did not succeed. His nephew, James Anthony, in 1740 was appointed second engraver to the mint in London, but returned to Geneva five years after. The family were ingenious. They executed a set of the reformers in brass, small, and also large medals of the great men then living. Their bronze medals of Roman history are valuable.

DATI, Carlo, a native of Florence, professor of literature there. He was remarkable for the civility he showed to strangers who visited his native city, and he became known by his works, which consisted of Italian poems on Lewis XIV. and other things. He proved in one of his tracts, that Marsennus is not the inventor of the cycloid, but Galileo, and he also ascribes great merit to Toricelli for the explanation of the suspension of quicksilver in a glass tube. His chief work, according to Boyle, is the life of four of the illustrious painters of ancient times, Zeuxis, Parrhasius, Appelles and Protogenes. Dati died 1675, respected for his amiable manners not less than for his extensive erudition.

DAUBENTON, Louis John Mary, a French naturalist and anatomist, a native of Burgundy, was born at Montbar in 1716, and died at Paris in 1800. At the time of his death, he was a member of the Senate and of the Institute. He was the friend and coadjutor of Buffon, and contributed all the anatomical details to the Natural History of that eloquent writer. He is the author of Instructions to Shepherds; A Methodical View of Minerals; and various other works. France is indebted to him for the naturalization of Merino sheep.

DAUBENY, Charles, L.L.D. born in 1744, was educated at New College, Oxford; obtained a prebend in Salisbury Cathedral, in 1784; was appointed archdeacon of Sarum in 1804; and died in 1827. Besides numerous Sermons and Charges, he is the author of a Guide to the Church, two vols.; Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ; Remarks on the Unitarian Method of interpreting the Scriptures; and of other works: and he contributed many theological articles to the Anti-Jacobin Review. At North Bradley, of which he was vicar, he built almshouses for twelve poor persons, an asylum for four aged and blind individuals, and a school-room; and the church at Rode was erected partly at his expense.

D'AULNAY, de Chavunise, governor of Acadia, had a fort at Penobscot as early as Nov. 1636, and claimed as far as Pemaquid. About the year 1632 Acadia was divided into three provinces, and the propriety and government assigned to De Razilly, La Tour and Denys. The first had the territory from Port Royal, in the west of Nova Scotia, to New England; the second had Acadia proper or Nova Scotia; yet La Tour had a fort at the river St. John in the province of the first. The rights of Razilly were after his death purchased by D'Aulnay, who built a fort at Port Royal. His claims conflicting with those of La Tour, a warfare was carried on between them. He made a treaty with gov. Endicott in 1644. Early in 1645 he captured La Tour's fort at St. John river, after it had been resolutely defended by his wife; he lost twelve men in the assault, and in violation of his faith, he put to death all the men in the fort, except one, whom he made the hangman of the others. La Tour's wife died with grief in three weeks. After D'Aulnay's death La Tour married his widow.

DAVENANT, John, D.D., bishop of Salisbury, was born in Watling-street, 1576, where his father was a merchant. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1597. His learning recommended him to James I. who sent him with other eminent divines to the synod of Dort 1618, and he was in 1621 raised to the see of Salisbury. He however incurred the king's displeasure, by treating in a discourse on predestination. He died of a consumption, 20th April 1641, and was buried in his cathedral. He was a learned divine, and very exemplary in his manners, but a strong Calvinist. He published an exposition of the epistles to the Colossians,—questions on which he had disputed in the schools, in numbers, 49—animalversions on Hoard's treatises—and other theological tracts.

DAVENANT, Sir William, the son of an innkeeper at Oxford, where he was born in 1605, was educated at Lincoln College; and, after having been in the service of the Duchess of Richmond and Lord Brooke, began to write for the stage, and was employed in getting up masks to entertain the court. He was appointed poet laureat, and governor of the Drury Lane company. He fought for Charles during the civil wars, and was knighted and made a lieutenant-general. Retiring afterwards into France, he became a Roman catholic. Being taken by a parliament vessel, while he was proceeding to Virginia, he was imprisoned, and would, it is said, have fallen a victim had he not been saved by Milton; an act of kindness which he returned at a later period. On the restoration of Charles II. Davenant obtained a patent for a theatre in Lincoln's inn Fields. He died in 1663. His heroic poem of Gondibert, which he left unfinished, contains much genuine poetry, but is deficient in sustained interest, and is written in an ill-chosen form of stanza. Talent is displayed in all his other poetical pieces, and in his dramatic works.

DAVENANT, Charles, eldest son of the foregoing, was born in 1656; was educated at Baliol College, Oxford; and was successively joint inspector general of exports and imports. Besides his works on political economy, which have been collected in five volumes 8vo., and contain much valuable information, he is the author of a tragedy called Circe, written when he was only nineteen, and acted with applause.

DAVENANT, William, fourth son of sir William, was educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1680, and entered into orders. He translated into English, la Mothe le Vayer's animalversions on Greek and Latin historians. He was presented to a living in Surrey by his friend Robert Wymond Sole, and it was in the company of this gentleman that he visited Paris, where he was unfortunately drowned, as he was swimming for his diversion in the summer of 1681.

DAVENPORT, Christopher, a learned Englishman, born 1598 at Coventry. He entered at Merton college, Oxford, and two years after went to Douay and Ypres, where he changed his religion and assumed the habit of a Franciscan. He afterwards travelled into England under the name of Sancta Clara, and was chaplain to queen Henrietta. In this office he was very active in advancing the cause of popery, by persuasion as well as by writing, and indeed so formidable did his influence appear, that one of the articles of impeachment against Laud, was his holding conferences with this dangerous Franciscan. During the civil wars Davenport was a fugitive residing sometime abroad, and sometime in London and Oxford, but after the restoration he was appointed chaplain to Catharine of Portugal, Charles's queen, and he was a third time made provincial of his order in England. He died 31st May, 1680. He wrote, among several works, paraphrastica expositio articulorum confessionis Anglicae, & Deus, Natura, Gratia, in which he attempted to reconcile the king, the church, and the articles of religion, to the church of Rome.

DAVENPORT, John, first minister of New Haven. He was educated at Oxford, and became an eminent preacher among the puritans and minister of St. Stephen's church in Coleman street London. Mr. Davenport becoming a conscientious nonconformist, the persecutions to which he was exposed, obliged him to resign his pastoral charge in Coleman street, and to retire into Holland at the close of the year 1633. His situation becoming uncomfortable in Holland he returned to London. A letter from Mr. Cotton giving a favorable account of the colony of Massachusetts induced him to come to America in 1637. He was received with great respect, and was a prudent and useful member of the synod assembled a few months after his arrival. He sailed with his company March 30, 1638, from Boston to Quinipiack or New Haven, to found a new colony. He preached under an oak, April 18th, the first sabbath after their arrival, and he was minister there nearly thirty years. After the death of Mr. Wilson, pastor of the first church in Boston, in 1667, Mr. Davenport was invited to succeed him; and at the close of the year he accordingly removed to that town. He was ordained in 1668, and died 1670, aged 72. He published sermons and other theological tracts.

DAVENPORT, Addington, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1689, and after having visited England, Spain, and the West Indies, returned to Boston, and sustained successively several of the most responsible offices in the government. He was clerk of the house of representatives and of the supreme court and court of common pleas, a Member of the council, and in 1715, was appointed a judge of the supreme court. He died April 2d, 1736, aged 66.

DAVID, of Hirazug, a Welsh divine and poet, called the black, about 1350. He altered and improved the grammar and prosody of Edeyrn, at the time of the conquest of his country by Edward I., and according to the new institutions and manners which that era produced, the missal or the office of the Virgin was translated by him into Welsh, and is still preserved.

DAVID EL DAVID, a Persian Jew, in the 12th century, who pretended to be the Messiah, and prevailed upon some of his countrymen to support his imposture. He was at last defeated and beheaded in the king's presence, who ordered the Jews to be massacred through the empire.

DAVID AB GWILUM, a celebrated Welsh bard, patronized by Ivor the Generous. His poetry, which possessed beauty, fire and sublimity, was chiefly on subjects of love, and 147 of his poems were inscribed to the fair Morvid his mistress, who however proved unkind to his merits, and married Rhys Gwgan, an officer, who distinguished himself in the English army at the battle of Creecy. His works were edited at London 1739.

DAVID I., earl of Northumberland and Huntingdon, was king of Scotland, after his brother Alexander the Fierce 1124. He was brought up in England, and married Maud the grand niece of William the conqueror, and after the death of the first Henry, he maintained with spirit the claims of the empress Maud to the English throne against Stephen. To enforce her pretensions he entered England, and seized Carlisle, which though conquered afterwards at the battle of North Allerton 1138, he was permitted to retain. He died at Carlisle 11th May, 1153, universally respected as a mild, popular, and benevolent king.

DAVID II., king of Scotland, was son of Robert Bruce, whom he succeeded when five years old. During the invasion of his country by Baliol he was conveyed to France, but returned after the defeat of his enemies 1342. He was in 1346 taken prisoner by an English army, after a valiant resistance, and sent a close prisoner to the tower, from which after a long confinement of 10 years, he was liberated on paying a heavy ransom. He died 1371, aged 47, leaving no issue by his wife Jane daughter of Edward II. of England.

DAVID, James Louis, a celebrated French painter, was born at Paris, in 1750, and was a pupil of Vien. Before the revolution he had already acquired fame as an artist. The course of that event threw disgrace upon him as a man. He not only, as a member of the Convention, voted for the death of the king, but also became one of the blindest and wildest idolaters of Robespierre and Marat. Nor did his jacobinical feelings cool for some years after the fall of his detestable idols. In 1800, however, Bonaparte appointed him painter to the government, and David seems to have thenceforth manifested no repugnance to seeing supreme power in the hands of a single individual. He was banished from France in 1816, and died at Brussels in December, 1825. His works are numerous, and they attest his splendid talents. Among them are The Rape of the Sabines, The Death of Socrates, The Coronation of Napoleon, and Mars disarmed by Venus and the Graces.

DAVIDSON, William, brigadier general in the army of the American revolution, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1746. He removed in early life to North Carolina, and at the commencement of the war with Great Britain, was appointed major in one of the regiments of that state, and served with it in the army under Washington, in New Jersey, till 1779, when being advanced to a lieutenant colonelcy, he was detached to reinforce the southern army. He escaped being captured with his corps at the surrender of Charleston, and was soon after appointed, with the rank of brigadier general, to command the militia of North Carolina, which were called into service. He fell at the ford of the Catawba, in endeavoring to prevent the passage of Cornwallis. He was a brave and skilful officer. Congress expressed the high respect in which they held him by voting to erect a monument to his memory.

DAVIDSON, Lucretia Maria, a youthful poetess, was born in 1808. She wrote poetry at a very early age, and when some of her productions were accidentally discovered by her mother, she in her sensitiveness and modesty burned them. An epitaph on a robin written in her ninth year is the earliest of her productions which have been preserved. The straitened circumstances of her parents compelled her to devote much of her time to domestic cares; yet such was her eagerness for knowledge, that at the age of twelve she had probably read more books than many, or perhaps any, who are placed in the most favorable situations. Great however as was her desire for knowledge, it was surpassed by her affection for her parents. On receiving a present of twenty dollars to buy books, she instantly carried the money to her father, saying, "Take it father; it will buy many comforts for mother, (her mother was then sick,) I can do without the books." Knowing that some people had counselled her parents to deprive her of pen, ink, and paper, and confine her to domestic toils, she relinquished her books and pen entirely for several months, though with tears; till her mother advised her to alternate her studies, and the business of the world. In Oct. 1824, a gentleman on a visit to Plattsburg, where she lived, saw some of her verses, and was made acquainted with her character and circumstances. He determined to give her the best education. She was placed in Mrs. Willard's school at Troy; her incessant application injured her health, and compelled her to return home. As soon as she recovered she was sent to Mrs. Gilbert's school at Albany. She was soon again very ill, and the hectic flush of her cheek indicated her approaching fate. She died 1825, aged 17. A biographical sketch, with a collection of her poems, was published by Mr. Samuel F. B. Morse in 1829, with the title of "Amir Khan, and other poems, the remains of L. M. Davidson." Of this work a very interesting review is contained in the London Quarterly Review for 1829. The writer says, "In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton, and Kirke White, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement."

DAVIE, Mary, remarkable for longevity, died at Newton, Mass., in 1752, aged 116 years. Her portrait drawn by Smibert is in the Museum of the Massachusetts historical society.

DAVIE, William Richardson, was a native of England, came to America in 1763, and graduated at Princeton college in 1776. He soon afterwards entered the army as an officer in the cavalry of count Pulaski's legion. By his talents and zeal he soon rose to the rank of colonel; and during the whole struggle great ardor and energy were displayed by him. After the war he devoted himself to the profession of the law. He was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and an able advocate for its acceptance in the convention of North Carolina. Through his efforts the university of North Carolina was established. In 1799, he was elected governor of North Carolina; and the same year appointed by president Adams envoy to France with Ellsworth and Murray. He died 1820, aged 64.

DAVIES, Sir John, a lawyer and poet, a native of Wiltshire, was born in 1570, at Tisbury, and studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and the middle Temple. From the latter his unruly temper occasioned his expulsion, but he was subsequently restored. While he was excluded from the Temple he produced most of his poems, and they met with deserved applause. On the accession of James I. Davies was employed in Ireland, and filled the offices of attorney general and speaker of the Commons' House. In 1620 he sat in the English parliament, and was just raised to the dignity of chief justice of England when he died, in 1626. His poems, particularly his Nosce teipsum, entitle him to hold a respectable station among the poets of his age; his prose work, on the situation of Ireland, proves him to have been a sound politician and an upright man.

DAVIES, John, D.D., an eminent critic, born in London 22d April, 1679. He was educated at the charter-house and Queen's college Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1701. In 1711 he was made rector of Fen-ditton, near Cambridge, and prebendary of Ely, and 1717 chosen master of his college. He died 7th March 1732, aged 53. He was the learned editor of the works of Maximus Tyrius, Caesar, Minucius Felix, Cicero's philosophical pieces, and Lactantius. Though universally admired as the editor of these valuable classics, yet the abbé d'Olivet, has censured Dr. Davies as a puerile, weak, and injudicious annotator.

DAVIES, Samuel, president of Princeton college in New Jersey, was born 1724. After the previous trials, which he passed with distinguished approbation, he was licensed to preach the gospel at the age of 22. He was also ordained, that he might be qualified to perform pastoral duties. In consequence of some events, which had recently transpired in Virginia, the presbytery of Newcastle thought it incumbent on them to send thither a faithful preacher, and Mr. Davies was chosen. He went to Hanover in April 1747, and soon obtained of the general court a license to officiate in four meeting houses. He declined a call to settle at Hanover, when first given him, on account of his health; but in the spring of 1748 a messenger from Hanover visited him, and he thought it his duty to accept the invitation of the people in that place. He hoped, that he might live to organize the congregation. His health gradually improved, and in Oct. 1748, three more meeting houses were licensed, and among his seven assemblies, which were in different counties, Hanover, Henrico, Caroline, Louisa, and Goochland, some of them forty miles distant from each other, he divided his labors. He had a long controversy with the episcopalians, who denied, while he maintained, that the "act of toleration," extended to Virginia. On this point he contended with the attorney general, Peyton Randolph, and once addressed the court with great learning and eloquence. When he afterwards went to England, he obtained from sir Dudley Rider attorney general, a declaration that the act did extend to Virginia. In 1753 he was sent to England to solicit benefactions for Princeton college. His success in this mission placed the college in a respectable condition. On his return he resumed his labors at Hanover, where he continued till 1759, when he was chosen president of Princeton college. He hesitated in his acceptance of the appointment, but the unanimous opinion of the synod of New-York and Philadelphia at length determined him. He was dismissed May 13th, and entered upon his new office July 6, 1759. He died 1761, aged 36. Besides a number of occasional sermons, he published three volumes of sermons on the most useful and important subjects; the state of religion among the protestant dissenters of Virginia in a letter to Joseph Bellamy 1751, letters from 1751 to 1757, showing the state of religion in Virginia, particularly among the negroes; an account of a revival in Princeton college; valedictory address to the senior class, 1760.

DAVIES, Thomas, a bookseller. He was in 1728 at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1736 appeared as an actor at the Hay-market theatre. He then commenced bookseller in Duke's court, but soon returned to the theatre, and after strolling over the country he appeared in 1752 at Drury-lane, with his wife, a Miss Yarrow, a woman of great beauty and unspotted virtue. In 1762 he again commenced a bookseller in Russel-street, and in 1773 became a bankrupt; but the influence and friendship of Dr. Johnson, and a benefit at Drury-lane from Mr. Sheridan, restored him to the comforts of independence. In 1780 he published his life of Garrick, which improved his income and enlarged the number of his friends. He also wrote memoirs of Henderson, a life of Massinger, of Dr. John Eachard, Mr. Lillo, sir John Davies, and also dramatic miscellanies 3 vols. besides some fugitive pieces in the newspapers. He died 5th May, 1785, and was buried in the vault of St. Paul's, Covent-garden.

DAVILA, Henry Catherine, a celebrated historian, born at Cyprus, from which he fled when that island was subdued by the Turks 1571. He came to Avila in Spain, where he understood his family originated, and he afterwards passed to France, where he became a favorite at the court of Henry III. The death of the monarch disconcerted the plans of Davila, who expected there for himself, his brother and two sisters, a permanent settlement, and though he remained for a little while in the service of Henry IV., he went to Venice, where he was honorably received. On his way to Verona, on the affairs of the Venetian republic, he was grossly insulted by a person who at last discharged a pistol at him, and wounded him mortally. The son of Davila, a youth of 18, revenged his death, and immediately cut the assassin to pieces. During his residence at Venice, Davila wrote in Italian his history of the civil wars of France in fifteen books, from the death of Henry II. 1559 to 1598. This history, considered by Bolingbroke as equal to Livy's annals, is highly esteemed for its authenticity, correctness, and the elegance of the composition. The best edition is that of London 2 vols. 4to. 1755.

DAVIS, Henry Edwards, a native of Windsor, was born 11th July, 1756. He was educated at Ealing, Middlesex, and at Baliol college, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. In 1778 he wrote his examination of Gibbon's decline and fall of the Roman empire, a work which though the production of a young man was considered as so respectable, that of many attacks it was the only one which the historian deigned to answer. He died 10th February 1784, of a lingering illness, and left behind him a most respectable character for erudition, for goodness of heart, and amiableness of manners. He was buried at Windsor.

DAVIS, John, a native of Sandridge, Devonshire, early inured to a sea life. He obtained in 1585 the command of some vessels to discover a northwest passage to the East-Indies, and he gave his name to the straits which he visited, and the next year he proceeded in his spirit of discovery to the coast of Greenland, and as high as the 73d degree of north latitude. He was with Cavendish in 1591, in his expedition to the South seas, and afterwards he was employed in five voyages to the East-Indies. He was not only an able seaman but a correct writer, as appears by the account of his voyages which he published. He was unfortunately killed on the shores of Malacca, in a quarrel with some Japanese, 1605.

DAVOUST, Louis Nicholas, duke of Auerstadt, and prince of Eckmuhl, was born of a noble family, at Annoux in Burgundy, in 1770; studied at Brienne at the same time with Bonaparte; and entered the army in 1785. Having previously distinguished himself on various occasions, he accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt. He did not, however, rise to his highest pitch of reputation till the campaigns of 1806 and 1809, in which he won the titles of marshal, duke, and prince. His conduct as governor of Hamburgh, in 1813 and 1814, excited a general hatred of him. In 1815, he was made Minister of war by Napoleon; and he commanded the army which capitulated under the walls of Paris. He died in June, 1823.

DAVY, Sir Humphry, the most eminent of chemists, was the son of a man who possessed a small landed property, and also followed the profession of a carver in wood. He was born at Penzance, in Cornwall, December 17, 1773. The first tendency of his genius seems to have been towards poetry, for he began to write verses when only nine years old; and, at a later period, he composed various pieces, among which was a spirited poem on the Land's End. Being, however, intended for the medical profession, he was placed with an apothecary to obtain the needful initiatory knowledge. But he had now given himself up to the study of chemistry, and was generally experimenting in the garret instead of mixing juleps, and on one occasion he produced an explosion, which so terrified his master that a separation took place. In his fifteenth year he became a pupil of Mr. Barlase of Penzance, to prepare for graduating as a physician at Edinburgh. By the time that he was eighteen, he acquired the rudiments of botany, anatomy, and physiology: the minor branches of mathematics, metaphysics, natural philosophy, and chemistry: but it was to chemistry that his powers were principally directed. He now became acquainted with Mr. Davis Gilbert and Mr. Gregory Watt, and was by them introduced to Dr. Beddoes, who prevailed on him to suspend his design of going to Edinburgh, and to accept the superintendance of the Pneumatic Institution at Bristol. It was while he was at Bristol that he made his experiments on Nitrous Oxide, which he published under the title of Researches Chemical and Philosophical. The fame which he thus acquired led to his being elected, in 1800, professor of chemistry at the Royal Institution. As a lecturer, his popularity was unbounded. In 1802, he was chosen to fill the professorship to the Board of Agriculture; and the lectures which he delivered in this capacity were subsequently embodied in his Elements of Agricultural Chemistry. Having at his command all the "appliances and means" furnished by the powerful apparatus of the Royal Institution, Davy began and pursued that course of scientific investigation which has immortalized his name. The discovery of the metallic basis of the alkalis and earths, the creation of the science of electro-chemistry, the invention of the safety lamp, and of the mode of preserving the copper sheathing of ships, form only a part of his labors. In 1818 he was created a baronet, and in 1820 was elected president of the Royal Society. The presidency he resigned in 1827, in consequence of the declining state of his health obliging him to travel. Unfortunately his constitution was too far broken to be restored by a milder climate, and he died at Geneva, May 30, 1829. Besides the works already mentioned, Davy is the author of numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions; and of Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing; and Consolations in Travel. They were his last productions.

DAVY, John, a composer, was born at Upton Helion, in Devonshire, in 1765; and died in February, 1824. He was a pupil of Jackson, and his musical genius was manifested when he was yet little more than an infant. He composed the opera of What a Blunder, and parts of those of Perouse and the Brazen Mask, besides many songs.

DAWES, Sir William, D.D., an English prelate, born at Lyons near Braintree, Essex, 12th September 1671. On the accession of queen Anne, he was made one of the royal chaplains; but a sermon which he preached offended some of the ministers, and the see of Lincoln intended for him, was conferred on Wake, 1705. Two years after, however, the queen named him for the see of Chester, and in 1714 he was translated to York. He died 30th April, 1724. This respectable and worthy man published an anatomy of Atheism, a short poem, 1693—the duties of the closet—sermons preached on several occasions—the duty of communicating, and a preface to Blackall's works. His whole works were collected in 1733, in 3 vols. 8vo.

DAWES, Richard, the celebrated author of Miscellaneous Critics, was born in 1708, and educated under the famous Anthony Blackwall, and afterwards at Emanuel college, Cambridge. In 1736 he published a specimen of a Greek translation of paradise lost. His attack upon Bentley, is censured by Toup. He was elected master of Newcastle-upon-Tyne school 1738, which he resigned eleven years after, and died in 1766 at Heworth near Newcastle. His miscellanea critica, has been very learnedly edited by bishop Burgess, Oxford, 1781.

DAWES, Thomas, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts under the constitution of 1780, graduated at Harvard college 1777. He was a practitioner at the bar in the county of Suffolk when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court in 1792. In 1802 he resigned the office, and was made judge of probate for the county of Suffolk, and judge of the municipal court of the town of Boston. He held the office of judge of the municipal court about twenty years, and the office of judge of probate till his death. He died 1825 aged 68. In early life he wrote a few pieces of poetry. He published an oration on the Boston massacre, 1781, oration July 4th, 1787.

DAY, John, an eminent printer, who died 23d July 1584. His name deserves to be commemorated, not only as the printer of a bible dedicated to Edward VI., of Latimer's sermons, of Tyndall's works, and of the book of martyrs, but as a man whose great diligence in his profession, widely disseminated knowledge, and advanced, not in a slight degree, the progress of the reformation.

DAY, Thomas, an eminent writer, born in London, 22d June, 1743. In his opinions of mankind he was romantic. In his schemes of visionary perfection, he selected two girls from the poor-house at Shrewsbury, with the intention of educating them after the principles of Rousseau, and of selecting one of them for his wife; but the conduct and affection of the two young women did not answer his sanguine expectations, though he honorably performed his engagements towards them, and presented them with 500*l.* each, when respectably married, the one to his friend Mr. Bicknell, and the other to a creditable tradesman. In the beginning of the American war, he embraced the part of the colonies, against the conduct of the mother country, and he published some political tracts, and two poems called the devoted legions, and the desolation of America. In the association for the redress of grievances, Mr. Day was frequently a leading man, and an eloquent speaker, and in 1786 he published a pamphlet against the increase of taxes, and another concerning the bill in parliament for the exportation of wool. The work which has gained him celebrity, is his Sandford and Merton, in three vols. published separately, in 1783, 86, and 89, for the information of youth, a composition of singular merit, which, to simplicity of diction, and interesting anecdotes, unites respect for virtue, morality, and religion. On the 23th September, 1789, Mr. Day attempted to ride a favorite but untamed horse, which by a sudden plunge, threw off his rider, and by a violent kick on the head put an immediate end to his existence.

DAY, Stephen, the first printer of New England, came to America in 1638 or 1639. The first thing printed was the freeman's oath, next an almanac, made by Wm. Peirce mariner; then the Psalms newly turned into metre. He died 1668, aged 58.

DAYTON, Elias, a revolutionary officer, was appointed by congress colonel of a New-Jersey regiment in Feb. 1778; and at the close of the war was promoted to the rank of brigadier general. His services were particularly useful when the enemy under Kniphausen penetrated into Jersey, in directing the execution of the measures adopted for their annoyance; after the war concluded, he held the office of major general of the militia. In private life he sustained a high reputation. He died at Philadelphia, July, 1807, aged 71.

DAYTON, John, governor of South Carolina, after having held several subordinate stations, was elected to that office in 1800, and again in 1808. He was afterwards appointed district judge of the United States, and held the place till his death, at Charleston, November 27th, 1822, in his 61st year. He published a view of South Carolina, and memoirs of the revolution in that state.

DEANE, Samuel, D.D., a graduate of Harvard college in 1760. He was settled in Portland, where he remained till his death. His ordination took place, Oct. 17, 1764; and he died, Nov. 12, 1814, aged about 73 years. He published a work called the New England Farmer, and two sermons—one, delivered at the election in 1794, and the other on the death of T. Smith, in 1795.

DEANE, Silas, minister of the United States at the court of France, was a native of Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college 1758. He was a member of the first congress which met in 1774. In 1776 he was deputed to France as a political and commercial agent, and he arrived at Paris in June, with instructions to sound the disposition of the cabinet, on the controversy with Great Britain, and to endeavor to obtain supplies of military stores. In Sept. it was agreed to appoint ministers to negotiate treaties with foreign powers, and Dr. Franklin and Mr. Jefferson were elected to join Mr. Deane in France. But Mr. Jefferson declining the appointment, Arthur Lee, then in London, was chosen in his place. It is remarkable that the delegates of Connecticut did not vote for Mr. Deane. In Dec. the three commissioners met at Paris. Though Mr. Deane assisted in negotiating the treaty with his most christian majesty, yet he had very little to recommend him to the high station, in which he was placed. He was instructed to engage, not exceeding four engineers, and he was most profuse in his promises of offices of rank, to induce French gentlemen to come to America. Congress being embarrassed by his contracts was under the necessity of recalling him, and John Adams was appointed in his place. After his arrival in this country, he was desired to give an account of his transactions on the floor of Congress, but he did not remove all suspicions of having misapplied the public monies. He evaded the scrutiny by pleading, that his papers were in Europe. To divert the public attention from himself he published a manifesto, in which he arraigned before the bar of the public, the conduct not only of those concerned in foreign negotiations, but of the members of congress themselves. In 1784 he published an address to the citizens of the United States, complaining of the manner in which he had been treated. He went soon afterwards to Europe, and at last, reduced to extreme poverty, died in a miserable condition at Deal, in England, 1789. His intercepted letters to his brothers and others were published in 1782.

DEARBORN, Henry, major general, a soldier of the American revolution, was a native of New Hampshire, and settled in the practice of physic at Portsmouth. He reached Cambridge, a distance of sixty five miles, at the head of sixty volunteers, the day after the battle of Lexington. He was a captain in Stark's regiment at the battle of Bunker hill. He accompanied Arnold in the expedition through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec. He was captured by the British, and put into close confinement, but in May 1776 was permitted to return on parole. In March 1777 he was exchanged. He served as a major in the army under Gates at the capture of Burgoyne. He distinguished himself at the Battle of Monmouth, by a gallant charge on the enemy. Dearborn being sent to ask for further orders, Washington inquired by way of commendation, "what troops are those?"—"Full blooded yankees from New Hampshire, Sir," was the reply. In 1779 he accompanied Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians; in 1780 he was with the army in New Jersey, in 1781 he was at Yorktown at the surrender of Cornwallis. In 1789 Washington appointed him Marshal of the District of Maine. Twice he was elected a member of Congress from Maine. In 1801 he was appointed Secretary of war, and held the office till 1809, when he was appointed to the lucrative office of collector of Boston. In 1812 he received a commission as senior major gen. in the army of the United States. In the spring of 1813 he captured York in Upper Canada, and fort George at the mouth of the Niagara. He was recalled by Mr. Madison in July. He was ordered to assume the command of the military district of New York city. In 1822 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Portugal. Two years after he returned to America at his own request. He died 1829, aged 78.

DECATUR, Stephen, commodore, was born Jan. 5, 1779, on the eastern shore of Maryland. In March 1798, at the age of nineteen he entered as midshipman the American navy under Barry. Thrice he proceeded to the Mediterranean under commodore Dale, Morris, and Preble. He arrived the third time just after the frigate Philadelphia, which had run aground on the Barbary coast, had fallen into the hands of the Tripolitans. He immediately formed the project of recapturing or destroying her, and having obtained the consent of commodore Preble, he sailed for Syracuse, Feb. 3, 1804 in the ketch Intrepid, with seventy volunteers, accompanied by the United States brig Syren, lieutenant Stewart. In a few days he arrived at the harbor of Tripoli, which he entered about eight o'clock in the evening alone, as he was unwilling to wait for the boats of the Syren, which was several miles distant. The enterprise was extremely hazardous, for the Philadelphia was moored within half gun shot of the Bashaw's castle and of the principal battery. Two cruisers and several gun boats lay near, and the guns of the frigate were mounted and loaded. The attack was to be made by a single ketch. About eleven o'clock he approached within 200 yards, when he was hailed and ordered to anchor. He directed a Maltese pilot to answer that the anchor had been lost in a gale of wind. His object was not suspected, until he was almost alongside the frigate, when the Turks were thrown into the utmost confusion. Decatur sprang on board followed by midshipman Morris, and they were nearly a minute on deck before their companions could join them, the enemy in the mean while not offering to assail them, being crowded together in astonishment on the quarter deck. The Turks were soon assaulted and overpowered. About twenty men were killed on the spot; many jumped overboard, and the rest were driven to the hold. After setting fire to the ship in different parts, Decatur retreated to his ketch, and a breeze springing up, he soon got beyond the reach of the enemy's guns, which had opened a fire upon him from the batteries and castle, and two corsairs. In this daring exploit not a single man was killed, and only four were wounded. For this achievement he was immediately promoted to the rank of post captain. At an attack on Tripoli, Aug. 3d, he commanded a division of gunboats, which he led to action covered by the frigate Constitution and some smaller vessels. Disregarding the fire of the batteries he with twenty-seven men boarded one of the enemy's gunboats, which contained forty men, and in ten minutes, with but three wounded, he cleared the deck, and made it a prize. At this moment he was informed that his brother, lieutenant James Decatur, who commanded another boat, had captured a boat of the enemy, but was treacherously shot by her commander, who immediately pushed off, and was then stretching towards the harbor. Decatur instantly pursued him, entering the enemy's line with his single boat, and overtaking the foe, boarded her with eleven men, being all the Americans he had left. He singled out the Turkish commander, who was armed with a spear, in attempting to cut off the head of which, he struck the iron and broke his sword close to the hilt. The Turk now making a push and wounding him slightly, he seized the spear and closed with him. In the struggle both fell. Decatur being uppermost, caught the arm of the Turk, who was on the point of stabbing him with a dagger, and with a pocket pistol shot him. The crews at the same time were fighting around them, and it was with difficulty, that, after killing his adversary, he could extricate himself from the slain and wounded. His life in this struggle with the Turk was preserved by a noble minded common sailor, who, when a blow was aimed at his captain from behind with an uplifted sabre, having lost the use of his hands, rushed forward and received the blow on his own head, by which his skull was fractured. He however survived, and received a pension from government. Decatur returned to the squadron with both of his prizes, and the next day received the highest commendation in a general order from commodore Preble. On his return to America he superintended the building of gunboats until he was ordered to supersede commodore Barron in the command of the Chesapeake frigate. He was afterwards removed to the frigate United States, in which ship, Oct. 25, 1812, he fell in with his Britannic majesty's ship Macedonian, one of the finest frigates in the British navy, which he captured after an action of an hour and a half. His loss was four killed and seven wounded, that of the enemy thirty-six killed and sixty-eight wounded. When capt. Carden came on board the United States and presented his sword, Decatur observed, that he could not think of taking the sword of so brave an officer, but would be happy to take him by the hand. Decatur was a long time blockaded in the harbor of New London. In Jan. 1815, he was appointed to the command of the frigate President and attempted to get to sea, but, after first fighting the Endymion, was captured on the 15th by Pomone and Tenedos and Majestic, and carried into Bermuda. After the peace with England he was despatched with a squadron to the Mediterranean, he captured off cape de Gatt an Algerine frigate of 49 guns, in which the celebrated admiral Rais Hammida was killed; soon after an Algerine brig of 22 guns. He arrived before Algiers June 28, and the next day compelled the proud regency to a treaty most honorable to our country, according to which no tribute was ever again to be demanded of the United States; all enslaved Americans were to be released without ransom, and no American should ever again be held as a slave. He proceeded also to Tunis and Tripoli and obtained redress for outrages. On his return he was appointed one of the board of navy commissioners, and resided at Washington. He was killed in a duel with commodore Barron, March 22, 1820, aged 40.

DECEMBRIO, Peter Candido, a native of Pavia, secretary to the pope, and afterwards to Alphonsus king of Arragon. He wrote lives of Philip Maria Visconti, and Francis Sforza, dukes of Milan,—and besides, published Italian translations of Quintus Curtius, and Livy,—and a Latin version of Diodorus Siculus, of Appian, and of part of Homer. He died at Milan, 1477, aged 73.

DECHALES, Claudius Francis Milliet, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Chambery 1611. He was not less respectable in private life, than as a man of learning. He read public lectures at Paris for four years, and afterwards taught navigation at Marseilles, and died professor of mathematics at Turin, 28th March, 1678, aged 67. His works containing an edition of Euclid's elements—discourses on fortification and navigation—architecture—optics—hydrostatics—and trigonometry, were first collected in three vols. folio, called Mundus mathematicus, as a complete course of mathematics, and they were afterwards improved and published in 4 vols. 1690, at Lyons.

DECKER, or DECKER, John, a learned Jesuit, born at Hazebruck, in Flanders, was professor of theology at Douai and Louvain. He was sent on an embassy into Niria, and was made chancellor of Gratz university, where he died 1619, aged 69. He wrote Velificatio seu theoremata de anno ortus ac mortis domini, 4to.—tabula chronographica a captâ per Pompeium Jerosolymâ ad delatam a Tito urbem, 4to. in which he displayed great erudition and extensive knowledge of chronology.

DE COETLOGON, Charles Edward, an English divine, was the son of Dr. De Coetlogon, a French physician, and the author of a history of the arts and sciences. He was brought up in Christ's hospital, and delivered the speech to their late majesties when they went to dine with the lord mayor, in 1761. He soon after removed to Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and on entering into orders became assistant to Mr. Martin Madan, at the chapel of the Lock-hospital. He was afterwards presented to the rectory of Godstone, in Surrey, and died Sept. 16, 1820. Mr. De Coetlogon was a strict calvinist, and at one period highly popular as a preacher. His principal works are—1. Portraiture of a Christian Penitent, 2 vols. 8vo.—2. Ten Discourses delivered in the mayoralty of Alderman Pickett.—3. Theological Miscellany, 6 vols. 8vo.—4. The Temple of Truth, 3 vols. 8vo.—5. Character of the late king, 8vo.

DEE, John, L.L.D., a mathematician of eminence, born in London 18th July, 1527. His attention to mathematical studies, so closely connected with astronomy, and, in those days, to astrology, brought upon him at this time the suspicion of magician; and, to avoid this, he retired to Louvain, in 1578. In 1551 he visited Paris, where he read lectures on Euclid's elements; but the most flattering promises could not prevail upon him to settle there. He therefore returned to England, 1551, and was so highly respected that he was presented to the king, and made rector of Upton-upon-Severn. In Mary's reign, his correspondence with Elizabeth's friends exposed him to the suspicions of treason, and therefore he was arrested, and at last with difficulty set at liberty. He paid his court to queen Elizabeth, who flattered him with compliments; but the general belief of his being a conjuror was in the way of his promotion, and the books which he published countenanced the imputation, from the mysterious language and incomprehensible subjects which they contained. In 1564 he left England, to present a work to the emperor Maximilian, and, in 1571, the queen paid such respect to his celebrity that she sent two physicians to attend him when confined by sickness in Louvain. On his return to England he settled at Mortlake, where he collected a choice library of above 4000 volumes; which however, during his absence, in 1583, was plundered by the populace, who firmly believed that he had a familiar connexion with the devil, by his magical incantations. The appearance of a new star in 1572, and of a comet in 1577, gave him opportunities of distinguishing himself as an astronomer. He died miserably poor, in 1608, aged 80.

DE FOE, Daniel, was born 1668. His father, James Foe, was a butcher. He was educated among the dissenters, and warmly embraced their tenets; and he probably prefixed De to his name to conceal the obscurity of his origin. He was early an author, and published, 1680, a pamphlet on the contest between the Turks and Austrians. Though offered a respectable commercial situation at Cadiz by his friends, he determined to live by his pen. In 1695 he was made accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, in which he continued till the suppression of the tax in 1699. He now published various pamphlets on political and temporary subjects, one of which, his "true born Englishman," a satire, in verse, in defence of the revolution, recommended him to the notice of king William. His "shortest way with the dissenters," in 1702, as it reflected on the government and the church, was noticed by the house of commons, and he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to be fined, and imprisoned. He was liberated from his confinement in 1704, by the friendship of Harley and of Godolphin, and immediately retired to St. Edmundsbury, where his pen was again employed on political subjects. In 1706 he produced some essays to remove the prejudices of the Scotch against the union; and so great were his services considered, that he was sent by Godolphin to Edinburgh to confer upon the subject with the leading men of Scotland. Upon the conclusion of the union, he was rewarded for his services, and two years after, 1709, he published the history of the union, in a manner so satisfactory, that, in 1786, the same pamphlet was republished, when the Irish union was projected. In 1713 some of his publications were considered as jacobitical, in consequence of which he was prosecuted, but at last liberated from Newgate by the influence of his friend lord Oxford. He found himself so neglected on the accession of the house of Hanover, that he published his appeal to honor and justice, the last of his political tracts, as he was seized with an apoplexy before the work was finished, and as he afterwards devoted himself only to useful and general instruction. In 1715 he wrote the family instructor; and in April 1719 appeared the first part, and August following the second part of Robinson Crusoe; a work which, though abused by some of his contemporaries, has survived by its merit the malevolence of criticism, and triumphed over the opposition of party, and stands now as the most lasting monument of literary fame and merits of the author. It is said by some, indeed, that this interesting book was dishonestly borrowed from the papers of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotchman, who lived four years and four months in an uninhabited island, till relieved by captain Wood Rogers in 1709. Selkirk's adventures, indeed, appeared before the public in the captain's voyage; and therefore, though the idea of a man thrown upon a desert island might be borrowed from Selkirk's adventures, yet the rest of the story evidently belongs to the genius and superstructure of De Foe. This respectable writer died 1731. The publications of De Foe are very numerous, and possessed great merit, and, at the time in which they appeared, they were considered as very powerful engines in the hands of party.

DEHON, Theodore, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in South Carolina.—He was born at Boston in 1776, and graduated at Harvard college in 1795. After being rector of Trinity Church in Newport, R. I. he removed to Charleston, where he was elected Bishop in 1812. He died suddenly of a malignant fever, Aug. 6, 1817, aged 41, greatly lamented by all who knew him, and especially by the church over which he presided. He was considered a man of superior talents, and was much esteemed for his social virtues. His publications were—a discourse before a charitable Society, in 1804; a thanksgiving Sermon, 1805; a discourse before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, 1807; a Sermon before the general convention of the Prot. Epis. church in the United States; and Sermons on Confirmation, 1818. After his death, in 1821, two volumes of his Sermons were published on various subjects.

DELABRE, John Baptist Joseph, an eminent French astronomer, a member of the Academy of Sciences and of the Institute, was born in 1740, at Amiens, and did not begin the study of astronomy till his thirty-sixth year, when he became the pupil of Lalande. He, however, rapidly acquired fame, and, in 1807, he succeeded his master at the college of France. He died August 18th, 1822. Of his numerous and valuable works the most prominent are, A Complete Treatise of Theoretical and Practical Astronomy, in three volumes 4to.; and A History of Astronomy in five vols. 4to.

DELAMET, Adrian Augustin de Bussy, an ecclesiastic, born of a noble family in Picardy. He attended his relation cardinal de Retz in his travels, and then settled at the Sorbonne at Paris, where he died, 20th July, 1691, aged 70. He wrote among other things, a resolution of cases of conscience, afterwards republished by Treuve, under the name of dictionary of cases of conscience, 2 vols. fol.

DELANCEY, James, chief justice and lieutenant governor of New York, was the son of a protestant emigrant from Caen in Normandy, who fled from persecution in France. Being sent to England for education, he entered the university of Cambridge about 1725. He returned to this country in 1729, and was soon, while ignorant of the law, appointed a judge of the supreme court, and chief justice in 1733. His industry made him a profound lawyer. During the greater part of the administration of Clinton from 1743 to 1753, Mr. De Lancey exerted a powerful influence on the legislature in opposition to the governor. As lieutenant governor he was at the head of the government from 1753 to 1755, and from 1757 to 1760. He died 1760, aged 67.

DELANY, Patrick, D.D., an eminent divine, born in Ireland about 1686. Young Delany was brought up as sizar at Trinity-college Dublin, of which he became fellow. At this time he formed a very intimate acquaintance with Dean Swift, and soon distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and as an active and successful tutor in his college. Lord Carteret, in 1727, presented him to the chancellorship of Christ church, and a prebend in the cathedral of St. Patrick. In 1729 he began the periodical paper called the Tribune, continued to 20 numbers; and in 1731 he came to London, to publish his "revelation examined with candor," a work to which he added a second volume, and, thirty years after, a third, and which was universally and deservedly admired. In 1733 he published his "reflections upon polygamy," a curious work, which was followed, in 1740 and 1742, with an historical account of the life of David king of Israel, in 3 vols. a performance which, while it displayed the ingenuity, learning, and judgment of the author, little contributed to the honor of the sacred writings, whose authenticity and character cannot rest upon the labors of men. The most considerable of his productions after he became dean, was his "remarks on the life of Swift by lord Orrery." This publication set in fairer colors the character of Swift, and exhibited him in a more amiable view, from the recollections of friendship and intimacy, than that of Lord Orrery. His labors, however friendly, did not pass unceasured from the pen of Dean Swift, who reflected, with petulance and abuse, on the publication of Dr. Delany; who replied, in 1755, with great temper and truly christian moderation. Besides these, he published sermons, and some theological traets. He died May 1763, in the 83d year of his age. Dr. Delany was remarkable, not more for his learning, than for his benevolence and hospitality.

DELANY, Mary, second wife of Dr. Delany, was daughter of Barnard Granville, afterwards lord Lansdowne, and was born 14th May, 1700. When she was 17, she was influenced by her relations, against her inclinations, to marry Alexander Pendarves, esq. of Roscrow, in Cornwall, a gentleman of great property, but much advanced in life. In 1724 she became a widow; in consequence of which she left Cornwall, and resided chiefly in London. After a widowhood of 19 years, she married, in 1743, Dr. Delany, whom she had long known as the friend of her learned correspondent

Dean Swift, and with him she lived till his death, in 1763. When this melancholy event took place, the duchess of Portland, who knew and loved her virtues, insisted upon her living with her at Bulstrode, and she continued in that hospitable retreat for some years. On the death of the duchess, the king, with laudable benevolence, assigned Mrs. Delany a house, ready furnished, in St. Alban's street, Windsor, and granted her a pension of 300*l.* a year, which she enjoyed till her death, 15th April 1783, at the advanced age of nearly 83. Mrs. Delany is well known for her spirited and elegant correspondence with some of the learned and of the witty of the times, but particularly for her great skill in drawing and painting. She is also known for inventing, at the age of 74, an ingenious Flora, by the tasteful application of colored papers together, skillfully cut with scissors, and so delicately disposed, upon black ground, as to imitate and almost equal the works of nature. In this elegant accomplishment she continued to be engaged till her 83d year, when her sight began to fail; and so astonishing was her assiduity, that not less than 930 plants were exhibited in her beautiful flora. She also wrote some poetry.

DELILLE, James, the most celebrated of modern French poets, was born at Aigue Perse, in 1738, and was the natural son of a barrister, who left him only a trifling annuity. At his outset in life, Delille, though he had distinguished himself at the college of Lisieux, was compelled to earn his subsistence by teaching children the rudiments of grammar at Beauvais College. His talents, however, soon bettered his condition. By his translation of the Georgics, in 1769, his fame was established, and his admission was gained to the French Academy. His poem of The Gardens, in 1782, was equally successful. Delille accompanied Count Choiseul Gouffier to Greece and to Constantinople; and, on his return, became professor of Latin poetry at the college of France, and of belles lettres at the university of Paris. In 1794 he emigrated, but went back in 1801, and was chosen a member of the Institute. In his latter years he was blind. He died in 1813. Among his numerous works are, the poems of the Three Reigns of Nature; Imagination; Misfortune and Pity; and translations of the Eneid, and of Paradise Lost. Delille was a man of talent, and possessed exquisite metrical skill, but he had no large share of creative genius: "It must be owned," says a French critic, "that Delille, the greatest of our versifiers, was deficient in that enthusiasm, that mens divina, which alone constitutes the poet."

DELOLME, John Lewis, L.L.D., a native of Geneva, who for some years resided in England, and acquired great celebrity as an author. In the latter part of his life he retired to the continent, and died in Switzerland, March 1807. He was in his character a man of talents and information, entertaining and witty in his conversation, temperate in his living, but in his person little attentive to the graces of outward appearance. He is author of parallel between the English constitution and the former government of Sweden, 1772—treatise on the constitution of England, 1775, a work of singular merit, often reprinted, and commended by the approbation not only of lords Camden and Chatham, and other great political characters, but by the nervous writer of Junius' letters—essay on the union of Scotland with England, 1787—memorials of human superstition—observations on the tax on windows, 1788, and observations on the late national embarrassments, 1789.

DELRIO, Martin Anthony, LL.D., a learned

Jesuit, born at Antwerp, of Spanish parents, 1551. He studied at the universities of Paris, Douai, and Louvain, where he displayed astonishing powers of memory, and great quickness of learning. He became a counsellor of the parliament of Brabant, and entered the Jesuits' order at Valladolid. He taught belles lettres at Liege, Mayence, Gratz, and Salamanca, and died at Louvain, two years after his friend Lipsius, 1608. Besides notes on Seneca, Claudian, and Solinus, he wrote explications of difficult passages in scripture—commentaries on the old testament—disquisitiones magicæ.

DELUC, John Andrew, a natural philosopher, was born at Geneva, in 1726, and came to England at the commencement of the reign of George III. Queen Charlotte gave him a pension, and appointed him her reader. He died in 1817. He is the author of several works, among which are, Letters on the Origin and Formation of the Earth; Elements of Geology; and Geological Travels in the North of Europe, &c.

DEMETRIUS, czar of Russia, son of the czar John Bassilowitz, is by some historians called the false Demetrius, and regarded as an obscure native of Jaroslaw, who was instructed by an artful monk to assume the character of the real Demetrius, who, it is said, had been murdered by Boris Gudenow. This youthful adventurer, whether really the prince or pretender, invaded Russia with a small army, in 1604, and was so successful as to seat himself on the throne. After a short reign of eleven months, he was assassinated, 1606.

DE MISSY, Caesar, a learned divine, born at Berlin 2d January 1703. He studied at Berlin and at Frankfort on the Oder; and after preaching for five years in several towns of the United Provinces, he went to London, where he was ordained to serve the Savoy chapel, and in 1762, named by the bishop of London French chaplain to the king. He died 10th August 1775. He published some poetical pieces—essays on profane and sacred literature—epitomes of books, and memoirs, but generally anonymously, or only with his initials. He also assisted many of his friends, particularly Westein, in his edition of the Greek testament, and Jortin in his life of Erasmus. He was a learned and pious man.

DEMOCRITUS, a famous philosopher of Abdera, whose mental acquirements were so great and extraordinary that his countrymen accused him of madness. Hippocrates, however, saw and acknowledged his merit. He laughed constantly at the follies of mankind. He died at the age of 109, about 351.

DEMOIVRE, Abraham, an eminent mathematician, born at Vitri, Champagne, May 1667. He left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and came to England, where, by studying the principles of Newton, he made himself a complete master of mathematics, in which he read some popular lectures for his support. He was admitted member of the royal society in London, and of the academy of sciences, Paris; and died in London November 1754. His works are strong evidences of his superior learning and great application. He published, miscellanea analytica, 4to.—a treatise on annuities—and his great work, "doctrine of chances," in 1713, 4to. twice reprinted, with considerable improvements.

DEMOSTHENES, a celebrated orator of Athens. Though but the son of a blacksmith, he rose to consequence; and though neglected by his guardians, and impeded in his education by weakness of lungs, and an inarticulate pronunciation, his assiduity overcame all obstacles, and enabled him to rise superior to every difficulty, and become the most illustrious and eloquent orator of all antiquity. He warily resisted the politics and the insinuating conduct of Philip of Macedon, and was equally violent against his son and successor, Alexander the great; but, in spite of his eloquence, the arts and the valor of the Macedonians prevailed, and Demosthenes unhappily found, that the Athenians whom he addressed were only the degenerate sons of those heroes who had bled at Marathon, at Salamis, and at Thermopylae. Demosthenes, who had inveighed against the bribery of the Macedonians, himself was accused of receiving some splendid presents of money from Harpalus, the deputy of Alexander; but the unpopularity of his conduct continued but a short time; till at last the victories of Antipater obliged the Athenians to deliver their orator, and Demosthenes, rather than fall into the hands of his enemies, destroyed himself by poison, B. C. 322.

DEMPSTER, William, a learned Scot-man, born in the shire of Angus, 1490, and educated at St. Andrew's, from whence he went to Paris, and was successfully employed by the university there to refute the books of Raymond Lully, who had impugned Aristotle's philosophy. After visiting Padua and other places, he returned to Scotland, of which he published an ecclesiastical history, in which he magnifies the most common events into miracles. He died at Paris 1557.

DEMPSTER, Thomas, a native of Scotland, who studied at Paris, and there taught classical learning. His quarrelsome temper however, and his severities to his pupils, rendered him unpopular, and he was obliged to fly from Paris, and to return to Scotland. He afterwards read lectures on polite learning in various universities, and obtained a professor's chair at Nismes, from whence he retired to Bologna, where after some years' residence he died 1625. He wrote some learned works, commentaries on Rosinus' Roman antiquities, and on Claudian,—four books of epistles,—dramatic pieces and poems,—a martyrology of Scotland, and a list of Scottish writers. He was a man of astonishing memory, so that he was properly called a living library. His application was indefatigable, he never studied less than 14 hours daily, but he wanted judgment and discrimination.

DEMPSTER, George, a Scotch gentleman, was born at Dundee in 1736. He became a member of the faculty of advocates, but soon quitted the bar for the senate, being elected into parliament in 1762. He joined the Rockingham party, and afterwards supported Mr. Pitt, till the affair of the regency, when he espoused the side of Mr. Fox. In 1790 he retired from parliament, and devoted himself to the improvement of the Highlands by agriculture and the fisheries. He died in 1818. His publications are—1. Discourse on being nominated chairman of the society for extending the fisheries of Great Britain, 8vo.—2. Account of the magnetic Mountains of Canmay, 8vo.—3. Several papers in the transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh.—4. Letters in the Agricultural Magazine.—5. Speeches in Parliament.

DENHAM, Sir John, a poet, the son of the chief baron of the Irish exchequer, was born in 1615, at Dublin; was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; and studied the law at Lincoln's Inn. Gaming, however, to which he was early addicted, impeded his studies, and impaired his fortune. In 1641 he published the Sophy, a tragedy, and in 1643 Cooper's Hill. He espoused the cause of Charles I. and lost his estate in consequence. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made surveyor or of the royal buildings. He died in 1688. Among the minor poets Denham holds a respectable place. His poems are frequently elegant, spirited, and marked by much felicity of expression.

DENHAM, Lieut. Col. Dixon, an enterprising traveller, and gallant officer, was born in London, in 1736, and was originally intended for the law, but went to Spain, as a volunteer, in 1811, obtained a lieutenancy, and served with honor in the peninsula and at Waterloo. In 1821, he was chosen to proceed on a journey of discovery into the interior of Africa; and, in conjunction with Clapperton and Oudney, he penetrated into Bournou, and added greatly to our knowledge of African geography. He returned to England, in 1824, and published a Narrative of his travels. In 1826 he was appointed governor of Sierra Leone, and in that pestilential colony he died on the 9th of June, 1828.

DENINA, Charles John Maria, an Italian historian, was born, in 1731, at Revel, in Piedmont, and died at Paris, in 1813. For many years he was professor of rhetoric at Turin, but was deprived of his office, in consequence of having offended the government. In 1804, Napoleon appointed him his librarian. Denina is the author of many excellent works, the principal of which are, A History of the Revolutions of Italy; A History of Piedmont; The Political and Literary History of Greece; The Revolutions of Germany; and A History of Western Italy.

DENIS, Michael, a German bibliographer, was born at Selarden, in Bavaria, in 1729. He became principal keeper of the imperial library at Vienna, and died there in 1800. His works are, 1. A German translation of Ossian, 3 vols. 4to. 2. Songs, with a preliminary dissertation on the ancient poetry of the North, 8vo. 3. A catalogue of Butterflies, 4to. 4. An introduction to the Knowledge of Books, 2 vols. 4to. 5. A topographical history of Vienna, 4to. 6. Augustini Sermones inediti, folio. 7. Codices manuscriptorum theologicorum Latini aliarumque occidentis linguarum biblioth., Palat. Vindobon, 2 vols. folio. 8. Carmina quedam, 4to.

DENMAN, Dr. Thomas, an eminent physician, a native of Derbyshire, was born at Bakewell, in 1735, and settled in London, after having served as surgeon in the navy. It was to the obstetrical branch of the medical art that he principally turned his attention, and he rose in it to the highest reputation. He died November 26, 1815. Dr. Denman is the author of An Essay on Puerperal Fever; Aphorisms; The Introduction to the Practice of Midwifery; and other able works.

DENNIE, Joseph, editor of the Port Folio, graduated at Harvard college 1790. He studied law, and opened an office at Walpole, N. H. For a short period he read prayers in a church at Dartmouth. In 1795 he published a weekly paper in Boston called the Tablet; and the Farmer's museum, at Walpole, in which he inserted essays of some celebrity entitled the Lay preacher. Mr. Pickering, secretary of state, having appointed him one of his clerks, he removed to Philadelphia in 1799. On the dismissal of his patron, he conducted the Port Folio, a literary journal commenced in 1800. Being deficient in industry and discretion, he destroyed his bodily constitution and his hopes of fortune. He died 1812 aged 43. With genius, taste, a fine style and a fund of literature; with equal powers and other interesting qualities; he yet stands only as a warning to others against indolence and imprudence.

DENNIE, William, governor of Pennsylvania, under the proprietors, succeeded governor Morris in August, 1756. His administration was unsatisfactory to the proprietors, and highly obnoxious to the people. He was succeeded in 1759 by Hamilton.

DENNY, sir Anthony, a favorite of Henry VII. born at Cheshunt, and educated at St. Paul's school and St. John's college, Cambridge. His great abilities soon recommended him to the court, where he became gentleman of the bed chamber, groom of the stole, and a privy counsellor. He was also knighted by the king, and in the general plunder of the property of the church, sir Anthony received from his capricious master very large and valuable grants of lands in Hertfordshire. When Henry was on his death bed, sir Anthony alone had the courage and humanity to approach him, to remind him of his situation, and to exhort him to devote the few remaining moments of life to the momentous concerns of religion. The king had such an opinion of his integrity, that he made him one of the executors of his will, and of the counsellors of his successor, and gave him a legacy of 300*l*. Sir Anthony was a man of great piety as well as learning. He died 1550.

DENON, Baron Dominic, Vivant, was born in Burgundy, 1747. After having been connected with the household of Louis XV, he resided for several years in Italy, as secretary of embassy, during which period he applied himself sedulously to the study of the arts. He was one of those whom Bonaparte selected to accompany him to Egypt. While there, he alternately wielded the pencil and the sword, and both with equal dexterity. His work on the Egyptian expedition, the numerous and fine drawings for which were made by himself, would alone be sufficient to immortalize his name. Napoleon was warmly attached to him, gave him the superintendence of the museums and the medallie mint, and consulted him on all affairs that were connected with the arts. The column in the place Vendôme was constructed under his direction. He died at Paris, April 25, 1825, universally beloved for his good qualities, and admired for his talents and the purity of his taste.

DENTRECOLLES, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, born at Lyons 1664. He went to China as missionary with Parennin, and he died there on the same year as his associate, 1741, and both aged 77. This Jesuit wrote several works in the Chinese language to recommend the christian religion to the disciples of Confucius, and some interesting pieces of his are also found in "lettres edifiantes & curieuses," and in du Hable's China.

DEPARCIEUX, Anthony, a mathematician, born in the diocese of Usez. He wrote a treatise on trigonometry, 4to.—essays on the probabilities of the duration of human life, 4to, a valuable work, which obtained him a seat in the academy of sciences, and memoir on the inundations of the river Seine. His skill was much applauded in his construction of sun-dials on a new plan, and also for his meridian lines. He died 1768, aged 65.

DERBY, James Stanley earl of, an English nobleman, celebrated for his courage during the civil wars. With only 600 horse he bravely defended himself at Wigan against eol. Lilburne and 3000 horse and foot, but when taken at the battle of Worcester, he was beheaded, though faithfully promised pardon, October 15th, 1651. His widow imitated his heroic conduct, and after the brave defence of Latham house, she retired to the Isle of Man, where she defied the attacks of her enemies. She was the last person who submitted to the power of the regicides.

DERHAM, William, D.D., an able philosopher and divine, born 26th November 1657, and educated at Oxford. He devoted the best part of his time to mathematics and experimental philosophy. He was chosen fellow of the royal society, and enriched the philosophical transactions with many curious and valuable communications. This pious and good man, always employed in the labors of philosophy, humanity and religion, died 5th April 1735, aged 78, and was buried at Uppinster. His publications are very numerous, not less than 40, and mostly on philosophical subjects. The best known of his works are his physico-theology, 16 discourses preached at Boyle's institution 1711 and 12, and in 1714 his astro-theology, and in 1730 his christo-theology, a sermon to prove the divine origin of christianity, besides the artificial clock-maker, an ingenious book, the fourth edition of which was published 1734. He also assisted some of his literary friends, he revised the "miscellanæ curioso," he prepared notes and observations for Eleazer Albin's natural history, 4 vols. 4to. and published some pieces of Mr. Ray, and also the experiments of Dr. Robert Hooke.

DERMODY, Thomas, a poet, was born at Ennis, in the south of Ireland, in 1775, and made such an early progress in learning that, when he was only nine years old, he assisted his father in teaching Greek and Latin. But at the same time he acquired habits of low company and intoxication, which proved his bane. He was patronized by the countess of Moira, the marquis of Hastings, Sir James Bland Burges, and others, and at one period held a commission in the army, but patronage was rendered unavailing by his besetting faults. He died, in 1802, at Sydenham, in Kent. His poems, most of which were written hastily, and under the pressure of necessity, contain many passages of great fancy, animation and elegance.

DESAGULIERS, John Theophilus, son of a Protestant minister at Rochelle, where he was born 12th March 1683, and which he left at the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, and he succeeded Dr. Kiel in reading lectures on experimental philosophy. In 1712 he married, and was the first who introduced the reading of lectures in London, where he had for his audience not only the learned and the great, but also George I. and George II. and the royal family. He was patronized by the duke of Chandos, who gave him the living of Edgware, and he afterwards became chaplain to the prince of Wales, and had a valuable living in Essex. In the latter part of his life, he had lodgings under the piazzas, Covent-garden, where his lectures were continued till his death 1749. He was member of several foreign academies, and published a course of experimental philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. 1734.—Gravesand's mathematical elements of natural philosophy,—and an edition of Gregory's elements of catoptries and dioptries.

DESAIX, Lewis Charles Anthony, a French general, born of a respectable family at Vegou, near Riom, in August 1763. He embraced the military profession as lieutenant in the regiment of Brittany, and at the revolution he assisted Custine as his aid-de-camp. He was wounded on the cheek at the battle of Lauterburg, but disregarded the pain while he boldly rallied the yielding battalions to the fight. He was general of division under Moreau, whom he assisted in his glorious retreat from the Danube; and afterwards he drove the Germans from the Rhine, and at the battle of Rastadt he obliged the archduke Charles to retreat. He bravely defended the bridge of Kehl, and afterwards in consequence of the treaty of Campo Formio, he attended Bonaparte into Egypt. In this distant country, he everywhere displayed the same presence of mind, the same bravery, and after dispersing the Arabs, and the scattered forces of Murad-bey, and Elphi-bey, he was named commander of Upper-Egypt which his valor and steadiness had completely subdued. After Bonaparte's retreat from Egypt he signed the treaty of El-arisch with the English and the Turks, and returned to Europe, but was detained as a prisoner by lord Keith. When set at liberty he hastened back to France, and found his friend Bonaparte advancing to the conquest of Italy. His happy arrival, after a severe march of 30 miles, with a fresh squadron, gave the decision to the memorable battle of Marengo, but at the very moment that he insured the victory to his already yielding countrymen, the brave Desaix received a fatal shot in the breast and immediately expired, 14th June 1800. He was buried with the military honors which his services and his private virtues deserved.

DESAULT, Peter, a native of Arsac, distinguished as a physician. His treatise on the venereal disease and on the method of curing it without salivation, was much admired, and also that on the stone in the kidneys, and the bladder, which was attacked by Astruc. He died at Bourdeaux 1737, aged 62.

DESAULT, Peter Joseph, a French surgeon, whose journal de chirurgie was translated into English by Gosling. He was born at Maguibernois near Macon, and died June 1st 1795, in his 46th year, not without suspicion of being poisoned for his attendance on the unfortunate Lewis XVII. It is remarkable that his successors, Clopart and Doublet, died within four days after. He had been much esteemed as a professor of anatomy at Paris, where 300 pupils together attended his lectures, and also as surgeon at the hospital of charity, and at the hotel Dieu.

DES BARREAUX, James de Vallee lord, a French nobleman, born at Paris 1602. He was brought up by the Jesuits, who in vain endeavored to gain him over to their society, and he afterwards became counsellor in the parliament of Paris, where his wit was more admired than his application. He exposed himself to the resentment and persecution of Richelieu, by refusing to yield a favorite mistress to the hoary libertine, and thus banished from regular employment, he spent his time in visiting his friends, and in pursuing his pleasures. About four or five years before his death, however, he began to reflect upon the vicious course of his conduct, and after disregarding the truths and the practice of christianity, he gave himself up to serious meditation, and to penitence. He retired to the pure air of Chalon on the Soan, where, after an exemplary close of life, he died 1647.

DESBILLONS, Francis Joseph, a French Jesuit, born at Chateaufeuf, 25th January 1711. After reading lectures in the colleges of Caen, Nevers, la Fleche, and Bourges, he came to Paris, where he studied for 15 years in the college of Lewis XIV. At the abolition of his order, 1762, he retired to Manheim, where he published his fables, on which he had so long been engaged, 530 in number, divided into 15 books, in two vols. He also published a learned edition of Phædrus, and wrote some Latin poems, and left in MS. an history of the Latin tongue. He died 19th March 1788, aged 78.

DESCARTES, Rene, or Renatus, a philosopher, eminent in various ways, was a native of Touraine, born at La Haye, in 1596; was descended from an ancient family; and was educated at the Jesuits college at La Flèche. His progress was rapid, particularly in mathematics. From 1616 to 1621 he served as a volunteer, under the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Bavaria, and Count Bucquoi, in Holland, Bavaria, and Hungary. After having travelled widely, he sold his estate, and settled in Holland, in 1629, to pursue his studies undisturbed. For twenty years he assiduously continued his labors in metaphysics, chemistry, anatomy, astronomy, and geometry, and during that period he produced the works which have immortalized his name. At length, some of his metaphysical opinions having excited a persecution against him, he accepted an invitation from Christina of Sweden, to reside at her court. He, however, died at Stockholm, February 11, 1650, shortly after his arrival in that capital. His works, among which are The Principles of Philosophy, Metaphysical Meditations, a Treatise on the Passions, a Treatise on Man, and a Discourse on the Method of seeking Truth in the Sciences, occupy nine volumes in quarto. While he lived, it was chiefly as a metaphysician that Descartes was celebrated, but his metaphysics, though strongly manifesting his genius, are now almost forgotten; his system of vortices, too, which once had partisans, is completely discarded; and it is to his geometrical and algebraical discoveries, which he himself undervalued, that he is indebted for the most solid part of his fame.

DESGODETS, Anthony, a native of Paris, eminent as an architect. When going to Rome in 1674, he was captured by the Algerines, and remained 16 months in slavery, and when he reached the capital of Italy at last, he composed his work "the ancient edifices of Rome drawn and measured with exactness," fol. which was newly edited 1779. He was made comptroller of the royal buildings at Paris and architect to the king. He died 1728, aged 75. Two of his works on architecture have appeared since his death.

DESHAIS, John Baptist Henry, a French painter, born at Rouen 1729. Under the direction of Vermont, Restout, and Carlo Vanloo, he improved his strong natural abilities, and in 1751 obtained the prize of the academy. After visiting Rome for improvement and information, he returned to Paris, and was admitted into the academy with universal approbation. The superior merit of his pictures promised the noblest monuments of genius to adorn the French school, but he unfortunately died in the midst of his career in 1765. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of the Virgin, the resurrection of Lazarus, Potiphar's wife and Joseph, the combat of Achilles and Xanthus, Jupiter and Antiope, and Artemisia at her husband's tomb.

DESMARIS, Joseph Francis Edward de Censembleu, a French writer, born at Sauly-sur-loire, who died February 25th 1761, aged 38. He was a man of great abilities, very amiable in his manners, moderate in his wishes, and benevolent in his intercourse with mankind. He used to say, "When my friend laughs, it is his business to inform me of the cause of his joy; but when he weeps, it is mine to discover the sources of his grief." He wrote the comedy of the "impertinent," which met with great applause. He also wrote miscellaneous works, and in his poetical pieces displayed ease, grace, and elegance. His works were published 1777, 2 vols. 12mo. Paris.

DES MAIZEAUX, Peter, a learned biographer, born at Auvergne 1666, where his father was a protestant minister. He went early to England and was elected secretary to the royal society. He died 1745. He edited the works of St. Evremont

3 vols. 4to. and also published the life of Bayle, prefixed to his dictionary. He had some hand in the general historical dictionary, 10 vols. fol. and in other useful works, and wrote the lives of Chillingworth and John Hales.

DESMOULINS, Benedict Camille, a native of Guise in Picardy, who displayed his republican zeal at the taking of the Bastille, and in the demolition of the monarchy. As the friend of Danton he was one of the original founders of the Jacobin club, and he had a share in the atrocities of the 26th of June and the 10th of August 1792. His influence in the convention was seen with jealousy by Robespierre, and he marked for slaughter the man who presumed to defend Orleans, and to talk of a committee of clemency in the midst of a sanguinary assembly. The fall of Danton was his own; when seized in the night, 31st March 1794, he opened his windows to call in vain for help against the satellites of tyranny, and with Young's night thoughts, and Harvey's meditations in his hand, he was dragged to prison, and immediately after to the scaffold. His writings were periodical—the revolutions of France and Brabant—the history of the Brissotins—the Vieux Cordelier. His wife, who wished to share his fate, was permitted to follow him 10 days after to the scaffold. When asked his age by the bloody tribunal, he answered, "My age is that of Jesus Christ when he suffered death," 33.

DESPARD, Edward Marcus, a native of Queen's county in Ireland, of a respectable family. He early embraced a military life, and was employed in the West Indies, on the Spanish main, and in the bay of Honduras, where he was appointed superintendent of the English colony. His conduct in this office gave offence to the settlers, and in consequence of their complaints he was recalled home 1790; but when he applied to government to investigate his administration, his representations were rejected without explanation. This rendered him a disaffected subject, and the French revolution no sooner tended to disseminate principles of disloyalty and rebellion, than he warmly embraced the new doctrines. He was seized for his seditious conduct, under the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and confined in several prisons, but when at last liberated, past misfortunes had made no impression upon him, but rather stimulated him to revenge. He now formed the plan of seducing the soldiery from their allegiance, and in the secret committees which he held with his associates, under the sanction of a solemn oath it was agitated to assassinate the king, as he proceeded to the opening of parliament. This design was discovered by some of the accomplices, and Despard and his associates were seized, and tried at a special commission in Southwark, 5th February 1803, and on an impartial trial his guilt was made too evident to deserve pardon. He suffered on the 21st March with nine others, and after their heads had been cut off, their bodies were delivered to their friends for interment.

DESSALINES, John James, one of those extraordinary characters who were thrust forward to greatness by the French revolution, was a native of the Gold Coast, in Africa, and was originally a slave to a free black in St. Domingo. When the disturbances first began in that colony he took an active part. He became second in command to Toussaint l'Ouverture, and, after the imprisonment of that chief, he displayed so much talent and courage that, on the 6th of October, 1804, he was chosen to be emperor of Hayti, under the title of James I. He did not long hold his new dignity; for he fell the victim of a conspiracy, in October, 1806.

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Essex, the favorite of Elizabeth, was born 10th November 1567, and was educated at Cambridge. His first appearance at court was in his 17th year, and in 1585 he accompanied the earl of Leicester to Holland, and distinguished himself greatly by his courage at the battle of Zutphen. In 1589 he went with sir John Norris and Francis Drake in the expedition to replace Antonio on the throne of Portugal; but as it was without the queen's permission, he was soon recalled with marks of displeasure, which, however, his presence soon dissipated. His unsuccessful expedition to assist Henry IV. of France, and his quarrel with lord Burleigh about the Spanish war, tended to show the violence of his temper and the ambition of his heart. Though Burleigh, by proposing a peace with Spain, opposed him, yet he loved him, and after the death of that statesman, Essex found that he had lost a most valuable friend, whose advice and protection often interposed between him and the commission of wrong. He succeeded Burleigh as chancellor of Cambridge, but his enemies viewed the increase of his dignities with a jealous eye. When a consultation took place about appointing a viceroy in Ireland, the queen recommended sir William Kuollis, and Essex sir George Carew, and when the favorite saw his mistress unwilling to yield to his persuasion, he contemptuously turned his back upon her. Elizabeth resented the ill conduct of Essex, and gave him a box on the ear, upon which he placed his hand on his sword, with threatening attitude, swearing he would not take such an affront even from her father. The courtiers present interfered, and he left the palace with unsubdued indignation. His friends however prevailed upon him to make concessions, and he was apparently reconciled to Elizabeth, and soon after by the artifice of his enemies sent over to Ireland. The ill success of his ministry there encouraged his opponents, who persuaded the queen to levy an army under Nottingham, to counteract the rebellious schemes of Essex. Essex heard of their plans, and coming suddenly over to England, he was apparently received with cordiality, but soon after stripped of all his honors except of the office of master of the horse. While thus disgraced, he was advised by his favorite Cuffe to restore himself to the queen's partiality by force, but though he disapproved all violent measures, he could not refrain saying the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was as crooked as her carcass. The rash words were reported to the queen, and Essex was summoned to appear before the council, but he conceived his person in danger, and instead of submitting he prepared to resist. After an unavailing struggle, and some bloodshed, he surrendered and was conveyed to the tower. He was arraigned before his peers on the 19th February 1601, and condemned to lose his head, and his execution took place on the 25th. He was learned, and to his honor protected and encouraged learned men. It is remarkable that his execution took place not without great struggles in the queen's affections. In the days of their friendship, she had given him a ring with promises that it would restore him at all times to her favor, and therefore she suffered to be sacrificed the man who so proudly refused to purchase and at so little price her pardon. The fatal ring indeed was sent by the repenting Essex, but lady Howard the bearer refused to deliver it, and on her death-bed she revealed to the queen her ill conduct, which she attributed to the jealousy of her husband.

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Essex, son of Elizabeth's favorite, was born 1592, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, under sir Henry Saville.

Essex served in the Palatinate under sir Horatio Vere, and in Holland, under prince Maurice, and on his return to England appeared in parliament as a violent opposer of the measures of government. During the civil wars he headed the parliamentary army, faced the king's forces at Edgehill, and at the first battle of Newbury, and after reducing Reading and relieving Gloucester, he in 1644 returned to the west of England. Here he was unsuccessful against the king's troops, and he owed his safety to flight by sea from the untenable garrisons of Cornwall. In 1645 the parliament, jealous of his power, or dissatisfied with his conduct, deprived him of his office by the self-denying ordinance, and the next year he died at Essex-house in the Strand.

D'EWES, sir Symonds, an English historian and antiquarian, born in 1602. In 1618 he entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, and two years after began his collection of materials for an history of England. His learning and his labors recommended him to the notice of the most distinguished characters of the times, of Cotton, Spelman, Selden, and others. His great work was finished when he attained his 30th year, but he did not publish it, and it appeared afterwards under the title of Journals of all the parliaments during the reign of Elizabeth, revised by Paul Bowes 1682, folio. He served the office of sheriff for Suffolk, and was knighted, and in 1641 was made baronet; but notwithstanding these marks of royal favor, he embraced the cause of the parliament. He sat in the house till December 1648, when he was ejected for supposed attachment to the king. He died April 18th, 1650. The manner in which sir Symonds spoke of Camden's Britannia has drawn upon him the censures of several writers, and he certainly was very injudicious in asserting that scarce a page of it was free from errors.

DEWEY, Daniel, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was appointed to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of chief justice Parsons, in 1814. He had previously been a member of the council of the state, and a representative in Congress from Berkshire district. He studied law under Theodore Sedgwick, and attained a high rank in his profession. He died June 3d, 1815.

DE WITT, John, LL.D., the famous pensionary of Holland, was born at Dort in 1625, and educated there. His abilities were so great, and his improvement so rapid, that at the age of 23 he published his "Elementa curvarum linearum," a work displaying the deepest knowledge of mathematics. He warmly but unsuccessfully opposed the war between England and his country, and when afterwards raised to the high office of pensionary of Holland, he sent ambassadors to Cromwell, to negotiate a peace. A pacification took place, but the secret article to exclude the family of Orange from the stadtholdership, brought public odium on De Witt's administration. When war was unfortunately declared against England, after the restoration, De Witt exerted all his power to make the naval armaments as respectable as possible, and after Opdam's defeat, he was one of those named to preside over the fleet. The fleet was shut up in the Texel; but whilst the commanders considered it impossible to sail but with only 10 points of the compass, he by mathematical calculation, convinced them that only four points were against them, and 28 for them, and in consequence of this, the ships were safely conveyed through a passage, which since that time has been called De Witt's diop. Of the famous battle of three days in 1666, he gave a full account to the states, and in 1667 he established an edict forever to abolish the stadtholderate in Holland; but in 1672 when the prince of Orange was nominated captain general, the mob invited him to accept the office of stadtholder, and De Witt, no longer popular, resigned his office, after receiving the solemn thanks of the states for his services. When Holland was invaded by the French, the odium was thrown by the friends of the Orange family on De Witt and his party, and so violent were the tumults, that De Witt's brother, Cornelius, was accused by Ticklaer, a barber, and though declared innocent, was sentenced to exile, and soon after the prison in which he was, was attacked, and he as well as his brother, who unfortunately was present, were inhumanly butchered. Thus fell this virtuous and amiable man, in his 47th year. As a politician he had no equal, and his love to his country was inferior to none of his other virtues. His work called, "the true interest and political maxims of the republic of Holland," translated into English by John Campbell, is a glorious monument of his abilities as a statesman, and it displays the true maxims by which a government may become popular at home and respectable abroad, whilst it maintains justice with liberty, and encourages trade without oppression, or monopoly.

DE WITT, Benjamin, M.D., a physician of New York, was appointed professor of medicine in Columbia college in 1807, and professor of chemistry in 1808. He was also health officer of the city, and died of the yellow fever, at the quarantine ground, Staten island, Sept. 11, 1819, aged 45. He published a dissertation on the effect of oxygen, 1797; an oration commemorative of the prisoners, who died in the prison ships at Wallabout, 1808; account of minerals in New York in Mem. of A. A. S. vol. 11.

DE WITT, John, D.D., professor of Biblical history in the theological seminary of the Dutch reformed church at New Brunswick, N. J. He was a native of Catskill, N. Y. and in 1812 was settled in Lanesborough, Ms. In the course of the next year he was dismissed, and subsequently was settled as the minister of the second reformed Dutch church in Albany. Afterwards he became professor in the theological seminary above named; and at the same time was professor in Rutgers' college. He died Oct. 12, 1831, aged about 42 years.

DEXTER, Samuel, a benefactor of Harvard college, was a merchant in Boston. In the political struggles just before the revolution he was repeatedly elected to the council and negated for his patriotic zeal by the royal governor. In his last years he was deeply engaged in investigating the doctrines of theology. He died 1810, aged 84. For the encouragement of biblical criticism he bequeathed a handsome legacy to Harvard college. He also bequeathed forty dollars to a minister, whom he wished to preach a funeral sermon without making any mention of him in the discourse, from the words "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

DEXTER, Samuel, L.L.D. secretary at war of the United States, son of the preceding, was born in 1761, and graduated at Harvard College 1781. Having studied law at Worcester with Levi Lincoln, he soon rose to professional eminence. After being some time a member of the house of representatives in congress, he was elected to the senate. During the administration of John Adams he was appointed secretary at war in 1800, and secretary of the treasury in Jan. 1801, and for a short time, also had the charge of the department of state. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency, he held the office of secretary of the treasury, and not complying with an intimation to resign, Mr. Gallatin was appointed in his place. In 1812 he abandoned the party, to which he had always been attached, and became a leader on the other side, and as such was the candidate for governor of Massachusetts in 1815 and 1816, in opposition to gov. Brooks. A mission to Spain was offered him by Mr. Madison in 1815. He died 1816, aged 55.

DIAZ, Bartholomew, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who in 1466 discovered the most southern cape of Africa, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Storms. This appellation, so ill omened, was altered by John II. king of Portugal, to the name of the Cape of Good-hope.

DIAZ, John, a Spaniard, who studied at Paris, and embraced the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards visited Calvin at Geneva, and Bucer at Strasburg, and met at Neuburg his brother Alphonsus, who, as a violent catholic, endeavored to convert him from the protestant faith. Unable to do this, Alphonsus pretends to return home, and the next morning, instigates an assassin to enter his brother's apartment, and with an axe to dash out his brains, whilst he himself awaits the event at the door of his chamber. The assassins were pursued and seized at Inspruck, but Charles V. took their punishment into his own hand. This dreadful deed was perpetrated the 27th March 1546.

DIBDIN, Charles, a dramatist and song writer, was born at Southampton in 1748. He was educated at Winchester school, which he left at the age of sixteen, and brought out an opera called "the Shepherd's Artifice," written and composed by himself. This was followed by "Lionel and Clarissa;" and "The Padlock;" in which last he performed Mungo. After this he became manager of the circus, and next the proprietor of a small theatre near Leicester square. He wrote a number of loyal and nautical songs, for which Mr. Pitt granted him a pension of two hundred a year, but this was withdrawn on the death of that great man. Being thus reduced to poverty, he became a bankrupt, but at last a private subscription was entered into for his support. He died in 1814. Mr. Dibdin published some novels, and "Observations on a Tour through England and Scotland."

DICK, sir Alexander, son of sir William Cunningham of Copington, by the daughter and heiress of sir James Dick of Prestonfield, was born 1703. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards under Boerhaave at Leyden, where he took his degrees, and after visiting several countries of Europe, he returned to England, and began to practise in Pembroke-shire. On the death of his brother sir William, he assumed the name of his maternal grandfather, and retired to his family seat at Prestonfield, where he died 1785. He was in 1756 president of the college of physicians in Edinburgh, and liberally contributed to the honor and support of his profession. He was in 1774 honored with a medal from the London society of arts and commerce, for his successful culture of rhu-barb, the first attempt of rearing which in England was owing to his patriotic views.

DICKINSON, Edmund, an eminent physician, son of the rector of Appleton, Berkshire, where he was born 1624. He published in 1655 his Delphi Phœnicizantes, a learned work, in which he proved that the Greeks borrowed their history of the oracle of Delphi from the scriptures, especially the book of Joshua. This book was universally admired, and Sheldon the primate wished in vain to turn the attention of the ingenious author to theological studies. After practising for some time in Oxford, in 1684, he settled in London, where, by recovering lord Arlington, he obtained an introduction at court, and became physician to Charles II., and afterwards to his successor. Upon the abdication he retired from practice, and applied himself to the completion of his Physica vetus & vera, which when just finished was unfortunately burnt, and cost him the heavy labors of recomposition. It appeared in 1702, and it proved that the method and mode of the creation of the universe, according to the principles of true philosophy, are related in a concise and general way by Moses. He was also an able chemist, and was intimate with Theodore Mundanus, an illustrious professor in that science at Paris. He died in April 1707, in his 83d year.

DICKINSON, Jonathan, first president of New Jersey college, graduated at Yale college 1706. He was a settled minister of the first presbyterian church, in Elizabeth Town, New Jersey, nearly forty years. The charter of the college of New Jersey, being enlarged by gov. Belcher, the institution was commenced, and Mr. Dickinson appointed president. His superintendance of it was of short duration. He was inducted into office Oct. 22, 1746, and died Oct. 7, 1747, aged 59. His publications were numerous, but exclusively upon theological subjects, and principally sermons.

DICKINSON, John, president of Delaware and of Pennsylvania. After studying law in Philadelphia, he spent three years at the Temple in London. On his return to America he commenced practice at Philadelphia. He was a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1764; and of the general congress in 1765. He was a member of the first revolutionary congress in 1774, and a member in subsequent years. In June 1776 he opposed the declaration of independence, when the motion was considered by congress, because he doubted of the policy of that particular period, "without some preclatory trials of our strength," and before the terms of confederation were settled, and foreign assistance made certain. He had occasion afterwards, in order to prove the sincerity of his attachment to his country's liberty, to appeal to the fact, that within a few days after the declaration, he was the only member of congress who marched to face the enemy. He accompanied his regiment to Elizabeth Town in July to repel the invading enemy, and remained there till the end of the tour of service. In 1779 he was a member of congress from Delaware, and in 1781 president. In 1782 he was chosen president of Pennsylvania and remained in office from Nov. 1782 to Oct. 1785. He died 1808, aged 75. In Nov. 1767, he began to publish his celebrated letters against the acts for taxation of the colonies; in which writings he supported the liberties of his country, and contributed much towards the American revolution. Of the eloquent and important state papers issued by the first congress he wrote the principal. Mr. Dickinson's political writings were collected and published in 2 volumes, 8vo. 1801.

DICKINSON, Philemon, an officer in the war of the American revolution, who engaged in that contest at an early period, and enjoyed the praise of courage and zeal in the cause of liberty. He commanded the Jersey militia at the battle of Monmouth. After the organization of the national government in its present form, he was appointed to a seat in congress. Having discharged the duties of the several civil and military stations which he held with reputation, and enjoyed several years of retirement from public life, he died at Trenton in 1809.

DICKSON, David, a Scotch divine, born at Paisley 1591, and educated at Glasgow. He was an eloquent preacher; but he was too violent against the episcopalians, which subjected him to much obloquy, and to persecution. He was in 1638 a commissioner to the general assembly at Glasgow, and in 1643 in Westminster. He was divinity professor at Edinburgh, but in 1662 he was stripped of all his employments, and died at Edinburgh two years after, aged 78. He wrote a commentary on St. Matthew—the epistle to the Hebrews and Romans—and the psalms,—besides some divinity tracts.

DICKSON, James, a botanist, a native of Scotland, died in London, in 1822. He was one of the founders of the Linnean Society, and a vice-president of the Horticultural Society. Dickson commenced life as a working gardener, and rose by his own exertions. Besides several papers in Transactions, he is the author of Fasciculi Quatuor Plantarum Cryptogamicarum Britannicæ.

DIDEROT, Denis, born in 1713, at Langres, in Champagne, was the son of a cutler. He was educated by the Jesuits, and was designed for the church, and, subsequently, for the law. Both, however, were rejected by him, and he entered on the career of literature at Paris. Translating was his earliest resource, and Stanyan's History of Greece was the work with which he began. His Essay on Merit and Virtue was his first original production. It was succeeded, in 1746, by his Philosophical Thoughts, which the parliament of Paris condemned to the flames, and, by so doing, insured its popularity and that of the author. They were reprinted, under the title of A New Year's Gift for freethinkers. Long afterwards, he added a second part, in which his atheistical principles were less carefully concealed. The same principles in his Letter on the Blind caused him to be imprisoned for nearly four months at Vincennes. Diderot now formed the plan of that extensive undertaking The Encyclopædia. On this Dictionary, the first two volumes of which appeared in 1751, he was engaged for many years. The department of arts and trades, the history of ancient philosophy, and numerous other articles, were contributed by him. While he edited this compilation, his pen was also busily employed on various original compositions, some of which are repugnant to decency. Poverty would, nevertheless, have embittered his latter days had not Catherine of Russia extended to him an efficient patronage. Diderot visited Saint Petersburg in 1773, and remained there for some months. He died July 30, 1784. His works form 15 vols. 8vo. Diderot was a man of great talent, and extensive knowledge; but his style, though sometimes eloquent, has many defects, and his sentiments are too often deserving of the severest reprobation.

DIDIUS JULIANUS, M. Salvius Severus, a Roman emperor, who purchased the diadem of the corrupt soldiery. Severus was soon after raised to the throne, and Didius was put to death after a short reign of 66 days, A.D. 193.

DIDD or ELISSA, queen of Carthage, fled from Fyre after the murder of her husband Sichæus, by his brother Pygnalion, and she settled on the coast of Africa, where she laid the foundation of a new empire. Virgil and others represent her as visited by Æneas, after whose departure she destroyed herself through grief and disappointed love.

DIDOT, Francis Ambrose, an eminent printer at Paris. The works which he printed were peculiarly admired for the correctness, elegance, and beauty of the type, and among these, the edition of the classics published by order of Lewis XVI.

for the use of the dauphin, ranked very high. He made some useful improvements in paper mills, and in printing machines, and to his ingenuity the invention of stereotype-printing may be fairly ascribed, to the perfection of which he devoted himself with so much zeal, that at the age of 73 he perused five times successively, the edition of Montaigne which his sons had undertaken. He died at Paris, 10th July, 1804 aged 74.

DIDYMUS, of Alexandria, an ancient grammarian, in the age of Augustus, said to have been the author of 400 books.

DIECMAN, John, a native of Stade, who became superintendent of the duchies of Bremen and Verdun, and rector of Stade university, where he died 1720, aged 73. Besides several theological, metaphysical, and philosophical works, he published an edition of Luther's bible, used at Stade.

DIEMEN, Anthony Van, a native of Kuilenberg, where his father was burgomaster. He went to the East-Indies, and gradually rose to be governor of the Dutch territories there, an office which he discharged with great zeal, ability, and success. He sent in 1642 Abel Tasman on a voyage of discovery to the southward, and the land which was discovered on the south of New Holland, was called in his honor Van Dieman's land. He died 1645.

DIETRICH, John William Ernest, a native of Weimar, where his father was eminent as a painter of battles, and of portraits. After studying under his father, he went to Dresden to improve himself under Alexander Thiele, and thence removed to Italy. His abilities recommended him to the public notice, and he was made professor of Dresden academy, and director of the painting school of Meissen, and died 1774, aged 62. His landscapes, portraits, scripture pieces, and conversations, were much admired, and he acquired some celebrity also as an engraver.

DIEU, Lewis de, an eminent divine, born at Flushing, 7th April 1590. He early distinguished himself as a preacher, and refused to be the court minister at the Hague, as he was more desirous to censure than countenance the licentious morals of the great. He came to Leyden to teach with his uncle and preceptor, the learned Colonius, and he was divinity professor in the Walloon college till his death in 1642. He published in 1651 a commentary on the four gospels—and notes on the Acts, after a careful examination of several translations,—the history of our Saviour in the Persian language by the Jesuit Jerome Xavier, and a Latin translation—rudiments of the Hebrew and Persian tongues—besides the revelations of St. John, in Hebrew and Syriac, with a Latin version—and other inferior treatises. His father Daniel de Dieu, was minister of Flushing, and a very learned orator, who could fluently preach in German, Italian, French, and English.

DIEZ, John Martin, commonly known by the name of the Empeinado, was born in 1775, in the province of Valladolid, in Spain, was the son of a peasant, and served in the Spanish army during the war against France from 1792 till 1795. In 1803, he was one of the very first, if not the first who set on foot the guerrilla warfare against the armies of Napoleon. He was successful in numberless engagements, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general. This gallant and patriotic officer was desirous to secure the freedom as well as the independence of his country, and was, in consequence, put to an ignominious death by his ungrateful sovereign, August 18, 1825.

DIGBY, sir Everard, was educated in the Romish church and recommended to queen Elizabeth, whose court he attended, and he was knighted by king James. Though of mild manners, and peaceful disposition, and rich and independent, he yet engaged in the schemes for the destruction of the government. Though not immediately an agent in the gunpowder plot with Guy Fawkes, he gave 1500*l.* towards the expenses of it. On the discovery of this scheme, he was sent to the tower, and when arraigned he pleaded for his conduct, that the king had broke his promises to the catholics, and that the restoration of the catholic religion was an event, which in the opinion of this infatuated sect, it became every subject to accomplish by whatever means they could; and he added, that as he alone was guilty, pardon should be extended to all others, and his family particularly, not ruined. On the 30th January 1606, pursuant to his sentence, he was hanged, drawn, and quartered at the west end of St. Paul's, London.

DIGBY, Sir Kenelm, the eldest son of Sir Everard, who suffered for participating in the gunpowder plot, was born, in 1603, at Gothurst, in Buckinghamshire, and was educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford. On his return from his travels he was knighted by James I. By Charles I. he was appointed to several offices. In 1628, some disputes having arisen with the Venetians, he sailed with a small squadron to the Levant, defeated their fleet at Scandaroon, and rescued many prisoners from the Algerines. At the commencement of the civil war he was imprisoned by the parliament, but was released in 1643. Between that period and the Restoration his time was spent partly in France, and partly in England, and much of it was devoted to study. When the Royal Society was established, he was appointed one of its council. He died in 1665. Digby was originally a protestant, but became a catholic in 1636. He was brave, learned, and eloquent, but somewhat of a visionary, and was a believer in occult qualities. His principal works are, A treatise of the Nature of Bodies; a Treatise declaring the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul; and Peripatetic Institutions. The corpusecular philosophy was that which he adopted.

DIGBY, George, earl of Bristol, was born at Madrid, October 1612. He was educated at Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his abilities, and by his friendship with the celebrated Peter Heylin. In his politics he embraced the popular cause, and was one of Strafford's accusers; but he afterwards favored the king's party, and was expelled from the house of commons for speaking in the defence of that unfortunate nobleman. During the civil wars he was very active in the royal cause, and in Ireland, Jersey, and France he displayed his zeal in the service of his unfortunate master. After Charles' death he spent his life in exile, but at the restoration was made a knight of the garter. He died at Chelsea, 20th March, 1676. It is remarkable, that though he wrote against popery he died a papist, and though a papist he spoke in favor of the test act.

DIGGES, Leonard, a learned mathematician, born at Barham in Kent, and educated at University college, Oxford. He wrote Tectonicum, to show the measuring of land, 1556, 4to. improved by his son Thomas 1592,—a geometrical practical treatise—pantometria, published by his son 1591—prognostication of everlasting right, good effect, or rules to judge the weather by the sun, moon, and stars, 1564. He died 1574.

DIGGES, sir Dudley, grandson of the preceding, was born 1593, and educated at Oxford. He studied the law, and after being knighted, travelled to improve himself in foreign lands. He was sent in 1618 as ambassador to Prussia by James I. and two years after he went to Holland as commissioner. He was in parliament in the reign of James, and of Charles I. and his conduct was very independent, and often hostile to the measures of the court, so that he was sent to the tower for his accusation against Buckingham. So powerful was his influence, that measures were adopted to gain him over, and by a reversionary grant of the office of master of the rolls in 1630, which he obtained in 1636, he was brought over to favor the measures of government. He did not long enjoy this honorable office, as he died 8th March 1639, universally lamented. He published a defence of trade, 4to.—a discourse on the rights and privileges of the subject, or a conference with the lords by a committee of both houses, 1628 and 1642—speeches on several occasions inserted in Ruthworth's collections—letters between Walsingham and Burleigh, and others, about Elizabeth's marriage with the duke of Anjou.

DIGGES, Thomas, brother to Sir Dudley, was educated at University college, and improved himself by travelling abroad. He translated Gerardo, the unfortunate Spaniard, from Cespades—and Claudian's rape of Proserpine into English verse. He was a learned man, and died 1635.

DIGGES, Edward, governor of Virginia, succeeded Bennett in 1654. He was the son of Sir Dudley Digges, privy counsellor of Charles I. It was during his administration that the Virginians were defeated by the Indians, near the falls of James river. He did much to promote the culture of silk in the province, and sent to Armenia for persons to teach the art. He was superseded by Matthews in 1656, and soon after sent to England as an agent of the colony.

DILLENIUS, John James, an eminent botanist, born at Darmstadt, in 1687, was educated at Giessen as a physician. His first botanical work was A Catalogue of the Plants of Giessen, with plates. William Sherard brought him to England, in 1721, where Dillenius published an enlarged edition of Ray's Synopsis; the Hortus Elthamensis; and Historia Muscorum; all illustrated with plates admirably drawn and engraved by himself. He died in 1747. Dillenius is considered as the father of cryptogamic botany. In his private character, he was very respectable, naturally of a mild temper, but fond of retirement, that his studious pursuits might meet less interruption. His drawings, dried plants, and MSS. were very valuable.

DILWORTH, Thomas, a diligent schoolmaster, whose spelling book—book-keeper's assistant—schoolmaster's assistant—miscellaneous arithmetic, and other works on education have been useful and popular books. He died 1781.

DIMSDALE, Thomas, an eminent English physician. His family were quakers, and his grandfather was the companion of Penn in America. Young Dimsdale, after studying at St. Thomas's hospital, settled at Hertford, which he quitted in 1745 and engaged as surgeon in the duke of Northumberland's army in the Scotch campaign. On the taking of Carlisle he returned to Hertford, and in 1761 began to practice as physician. His celebrity as an inoculator in the small-pox, recommended him to the empress Catharine, at whose request he visited Russia in 1768. His successful inoculation of the empress, and of her son the grand duke, was rewarded with the rank of baron of the empire, of counsellor of state, and of physician to the empress, besides a pension of 500*l.* per ann. and a present of 12,000*l.* In 1781 Dimsdale was again in Russia to inoculate the grand duke's two sons, and so respectable was his character, that he was elected member of parliament for Hertford in 1780, and again 1784, but resigned his pretensions at the next general election. This able practitioner had the misfortune to lose his eye-sight by a catarrh, which however was happily removed by Wenzell. He died 1800.

DINOCRATES, or DINOCHARES, a Macedonian architect, who proposed to Alexander to cut Mount Athos into a statue of that monarch. Alexander employed him more usefully in building Alexandria. Dinocrates also rebuilt the temple of Ephesus. He died in Egypt, under the reign of Ptolemy.

DINWIDDIE, Robert, governor of Virginia from 1752 to 1753, had been previously clerk to a collector of customs in the West Indies, whose enormous fraud he detected and exposed to the government. For this disclosure he was rewarded by his appointment in Virginia. But while he was governor he did not forget what he had learned when a clerk, for he trod in the steps of his principal; at least he was charged with applying to his own use £20,000 sent to defray the expenses of Virginia for the public service. It was during his administration that Braddock proceeded on his expedition against the Indians. He died 1770 aged 80.

DIO CHRYSOSTOM, a Greek rhetorician and philosopher, was born, in the first century, at Prusa, in Bithynia, and resided at Rome for many years. He was, however, obliged to fly to Thrace, to avoid being put to death by Domitian; but, after the death of the tyrant, he returned to Bithynia. He died at an advanced age. His eighty orations, which are extant, are remarkable for purity and simplicity of style.

DIOCLETIAN, Caius Valerius, a Roman emperor, born of an obscure family in Dalmatia. He succeeded Nimmerian in 284, and after a glorious reign of valor, and the honorable patronage of virtue and learning, he laid down his power at Nicomedia 304, and retired to privacy at Salona, where he died 313.

DIODATI, John, a native of Lucca, professor of philosophy at Geneva, where he died 1652, aged 73. He is well known for his translations of the bible into Italian, with notes, 4to. 1607, into French, 1644—and father Paul's history of the council of Trent into French.

DIODORUS SICULUS, a Greek historian, who flourished in the fourth century, was born at Agrinum, in Sicily, and travelled into most of the provinces of Europe and Asia, and also into Egypt. He afterwards settled at Rome. The result of his studies and researches was, An Universal History, in forty books, of which only fifteen are extant. Erroneous in its chronology, and often fabulous or trivial in its details, we must, nevertheless, regret that so much of it is lost.

DIOGENES, a famous cynic philosopher, born at Sinope, in Pontus, B. C. 414. He was so independent in his character and conduct, that he preferred living in a tub to the comforts of a house. Pride, however, and misanthropy, seem to have predominated in him, over virtue and true philosophy.

DION, a Syracusan, celebrated as the friend of Plato, and particularly as the relation and the opponent of the Dionysi, tyrants of Sicily. After successfully expelling the younger Dionysius, he was himself soon after murdered about 354-B. C.

DIONYSIUS, I., tyrant of Sicily, raised himself from obscurity to the sovereign power, which he maintained with great vigor. His reign is however marked by many actions of cruelty and oppression, and his conduct towards Plato, whom he ordered to be sold as a slave, was infamous in the extreme. He died 366 B. C. after a reign of near 40 years.

DIONYSIUS, a Romish monk called the little, in the fifth century. He compiled a book of decretals, and translated from the Greek, a body of canons, and invented, as it is said, the victorian period, or method of calculating the time of Easter.

DIPPEL, John Conrad, a German chemist and physician, who in some of his writings took the name of Christianus Democritus, was born, in 1672, at Frankenstein, in Hesse, and was the son of a Lutheran minister. Renouncing the protestant religion, he published against it two abusive works. For many years he led a wandering life, was more than once imprisoned, and was expelled from various countries. In pursuing his alchemical researches, he discovered Prussian blue, and the animal oil which bears his name. Though he had prophesied that he would not die till 1808, he took leave of the world in 1734. His works form three volumes quarto.

DISNEY, John, a native of Lincoln, educated at the grammar school there, and among the dissenters, and afterwards removed to the middle temple. He never however practised at the bar, but devoted himself to the arduous offices of public magistrate in his native country, and was so upright and zealous in the support of virtue and morality, that he received the thanks of the judges at the assize. Though brought up among the dissenters and the son of a dissenter, he yet honored the church of England, and at the age of 42, took orders and succeeded to the livings of Croft, and Kirkby on Baine, Lincolnshire, and in 1722 to that of St. Mary, Nottingham. He was author of two essays on the execution of the laws against immorality and profaneness, 8vo.—Flora prefixed to Rappin's poem on gardens, translated,—remarks on Sacheverell's sermon,—primitivæ sacræ, or reflections on devout solitude, 8vo.—genealogy of the house of Brunswick Lunenburgh, and view of ancient laws against immorality, folio. This excellent man died 1730, aged 53.

DISNEY, John, was born at Lincoln in 1746, and educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, where he proceeded to his degree of doctor in divinity. He became chaplain to bishop Law of Carlisle, and vicar of Swinderly, in his native county, which he resigned in 1783, in imitation of his friend Mr. Lindsey, to whom he was first an assistant, and afterwards his successor in Essex-street. Mr. Michael Dodson left him half his fortune, and Brand Hollis made him his sole executor, though neither of those gentlemen were related to him. In return for these favors he published their memoirs, and that of Mr. Hollis in a most splendid form, in 2 vols. 4to. Dr. Disney died in 1816. He printed several tracts and sermons; also Biographical Sketches of Bishop Law, Dr. Jortin, Dr. Sykes, and other divines.

DITTON, Humphrey, an eminent mathematician, born at Salisbury, 29th May, 1675. He entered upon the labors of the ministry at his father's request. The death of his father soon after enabled him to pursue his favorite studies, and to abandon divinity for mathematics. By the interest of his friends, and especially sir Isaac Newton, he was appointed master of the mathematical school, Christ's Hospital, where he continued till his death 1815. He favored the world with some learned works, and his tracts on the tangents of curves, in spherical catoptics, general laws of nature and motion, Alexandra's synopsis algebraica, the institution of fluxions, his discourse on the resurrection of Jesus, and the new law of fluxions and a treatise on perspective, are well known.

DIXWELL, John, colonel, one of the judges of king Charles I. fled to America for safety. In 1664 he visited Whalley and Goffe, at Hadley, and afterwards resided at New Haven, by the name of John Davids, till his death, 1689, aged 81.

DLUGOSS, John, a Pole, who became archbishop of Leopold, and died 1480, aged 65, much persecuted by king Casimir. His history of Poland, in Latin, though accurate, is written in barbarous language. He brought it down to the year 1444. The 12 first books were printed at Frankfort 1711, folio, and the 13th at Leipsic 1712.

DOBBS, Arthur, governor of North Carolina, was appointed to that office in 1758. He was selfish, arbitrary, and zealous, to abridge the rights of the people, and augment the influence of the crown. After a very turbulent and unpopular administration, he died March 25th, 1765, aged 82, and was succeeded by governor Tryon.

DOBREE, Peter Paul, an eminent scholar and professor of the Greek language, in the university of Cambridge. He was born in Guernsey in 1732, and was sent at an early age for education to the school at Reading, under the care and direction of Dr. Richard Valpy. From Reading he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he highly distinguished himself for sagacity of criticism laborious research, and exquisite taste in the beauties of the Greek and Latin languages. He was intimately acquainted with Porson, whose professorship he ultimately attained. When arrested by death he was preparing public lectures on the Greek language, in respect to which the highest expectations were entertained. In 1820 Trinity college published his notes to Porson's Aristophanica; and at the request of the same learned society in 1822 he corrected and edited the Lexicon of Photius. He was also the author of some valuable articles in the Classical Journal; and had collected materials for a new edition of Demosthenes. His death, on the 24th of September, 1825, at the early age of forty-three, excited great regret in the University to which he belonged, and in the learned world in general. Although deemed a somewhat precise and fastidious critic, he obtained the admiration not only of the most finished classical scholars at home, but of the most distinguished of those in France and Germany.

DODART, Denys, physician to Lewis XIV., was born at Paris 1634, and died 1707, greatly regretted. He was a supporter of Sanctorius' notions about insensible perspiration, and he made an experiment upon himself during Lent, by which he found that he weighed at the end of that season of abstinence only 107 pounds 12 ounces, having lost during that time eight pounds five ounces. He was a very religious and amiable character. His son Claude, was physician to the king, and died at Paris 1720, leaving notes on Pomey's history of drugs.

DODD, William, LL.D., a learned but unfortunate divine, born 1729 at Bourne, Lincolnshire, where his father was vicar. In 1745 he entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he early distinguished himself and took his degrees. He published about this time the beauties of Shakspeare, 2 vols. 12mo. and having entered into orders in 1753, he became a popular and eloquent preacher in London, and was appointed lecturer to some charities, especially the Magdalen hospital, in whose establishment he had been zealously active. In 1761 he wrote a sonnet in praise of Dr. Squire, bishop of St. David's, and for his flattery was made his chaplain, and afterwards prebendary of Brecon. In 1765 he began to publish in weekly numbers his commentary on the bible, which drew the public attention, as being collected from the papers of Lock, Waterland, West, Clarendon, and other celebrated men, and the work was completed in 3 vols. folio, and dedicated to bishop Squire, who unluckily for the author died soon after. About the year 1767 he published a volume of poems, and in 1769 he translated Massillon's sermons, inscribed to the prince of Wales. In 1771 appeared his sermons to young men, 3 vols. 12mo. dedicated to his pupils Charles Ernst, and Philip Stanhope, afterwards earl of Chesterfield. He was presented in 1772 to the living of Hoekliffe, Bucks, by his pupil, but though his income was enlarged his expenditure increased in far greater proportion, and in a thoughtless moment of ambition and avarice, he endeavored to obtain the vacant living of St. George's Hanover square, by bribery, but for this criminal attempt he was struck off the list of Kings chaplains. Pressed by his necessities, he next ventured on a more dangerous step, which proved fatal. He forged a bond on his former pupil, the earl of Chesterfield, for 4000*l.* and obtained the money. The forgery was soon discovered, Dodd was tried and condemned at the Old Bailey 24th February, and executed at Tyburn 27th June. Between the passing of his sentence and its execution, which had been delayed in consequence of doubts about the admissibility of the evidence of the man who had drawn up the bond, great interest was made, and a petition signed by thousands presented to the king, to save from ignominious death this unfortunate man, but all in vain. During his confinement he behaved with great penitence, and addressed his fellow prisoners in his "thoughts in prison," with energy and Christian fortitude. He translated Callimachus, and wrote 4 vols. of sermons on the miracles and parables of our Saviour. His publications are said to have altogether amounted to 55 in number, chiefly on religious and moral subjects.
