SCHUYLER, Philip, major-general in the army of the American revolution, was appointed to that office in 1775, and despatched to the fortifications in the north of New York, for the purpose of preparing for an invasion of Canada. By the loss of his health, the command soon devolved upon Montgomery. On his recovery he employed himself in directing the operations in that section, and on the approach of Burgoyne in 1777, made every exertion to obstruct his progress. In consequence of the evacuation of Ticonderoga by St. Clair, he unreasonably fell under some suspicion, and was superseded in the chief command by general Gates. He afterwards rendered important services in the transactions at New York, though not in command. He was a member of congress previous to the establishment of the present constitution, and afterwards twice a senator. He died at Albany in 1804, in his seventy-third year. He possessed a mind of great vigor and enterprise, and was characterized by integrity and amiableness.

SCHWARTZ, Bertholet, the inventor of gunpowder, was a monk of the order of Cordeliers, and was born at Friburg in the 13th century. He was an able chemist, and it is said, discovered the fatal secret of the ingredients of gunpowder, when making some chemical experiments on nitre. This discovery was first applied to fire arms at the battle of Cressy 1346, or according to others as early as 1300 by the Venetians, and it consequently changed the whole art of war. Roger Bacon is considered by some to have been acquainted with the fatal secret, which he refused to reveal.

SCHWARTZENBERG, Charles Philip, prince, an Austrian field-marshal, was born of an ancient and illustrious family at Vienna, in 1771. He early entered into the army and rapidly proceeded through all the grades of military rank until he became a general officer. After serving two campaigns against the Turks, he was employed in the first campaign against the French, in the war which followed the execution of Louis XVI. On the death of the emperor Paul, in 1801, he was sent to St. Petersburg to congratulate Alexander on his accession. He served under general Mack in 1805; and succeeded in withdrawing the cavalry under his command from the consequences of the capitulation of Ulm. He also took a share in the battle of Austerlitz, which was fought against his advice, as well as in that of Wagram. At the peace of Vienna he was nominated ambassador to the court of France, at which time he gave the unfortunate fête at Paris in which his princess lost her life by a fire that accidentally occurred during the festivities. In 1812 he was appointed to the command of the auxiliary force of thirty thousand Austrians, extorted by Napoleon in aid of his disastrous invasion of Russia. The conduct of this force in the French reverses is well known. In 1813 he was invested with the rank of field-marshal, with the commandership-in-chief of all the armies allied against France. On the return of Buonaparte from Elba, he was again entrusted with the command of a great portion of the allied forces; and at the conclusion of the war, was named president of the allied council of war; which post he occupied until his death, in October, 1820. The French writers affect to regard the military abilities of this Austrian general as far below his reputation; but if not a brilliant, all circumstances seem to prove him an able commander, and highly serviceable to his country both in the cabinet and the field.

SCHWEDIAUER, Francis Xavier, physician, was born, in 1748, at Steit, in Lower Austria; was educated at Vienna; practised with great success for some years in England and Scotland; settled and was naturalized at Paris, in 1789; and died there August 27th, 1824. He wrote a Treatise on Syphilitic Maladies; Pharmacologia; a New System of Medicine; and other works.

SCHWERIN, Christopher, count of, governor of Niess and Brieg, and field-marshal in the Prussian service, was born 26th October, 1684, and rose by merit to the highest honors. He gained the battle of Molwitz, in 1741, when the Prussians thought that all was lost, and he continued to distinguish himself in succeeding engagements against the Austrians, till the battle of Prague in 1757, in which he fell, aged 72. His memory was honored with a statue by the king of Prussia in Berlin, and a monument by Joseph II. in 1783, on the very spot where he expired. He had been, in 1712, choyv from the duke of Mecklenburgh, to Charles XII. of Sweden at Bender, and he caught some of the martial spirit of that celebrated monarch.

SCIOPIUS, Gaspar, a learned German, born 1576, at Newark, Upper Palatinate, and known for the virulence with which he attacked every man of merit and reputation. He studied at Amberg, Heidelberg, Aldorff, and Ingolstadt, and early distinguished himself by writing, among other things, a commentary on Priapeia. In 1599 he turned Roman Catholic, and then abused not only the protestants, but also the jesuits, against whom he wrote not less than thirty different treatises. Not only Joseph Scaliger felt the acrimony of his satire, but Henry IV. of France, and James I. of England, to whom he wrote a Latin pamphlet, called an Eye Salve for his Britannic Majesty. The last part of his life he devoted to the explanation of the prophecies of the Holy Scriptures, and particularly of the Apocalypse, and he pretended to have discovered the very key which Peter left on earth. He died 1649. He was a man of extraordinary learning, and had he possessed equal moderation and good sense, his fame would have been deservedly superior to the rest of the world. His memory was such, that it was said that he could, like another Ezra, have restored the scriptures if lost, as he knew them all by heart. His works were more numerous than his years, the best known of which are Verisimilium Libri quatuor, 8vo.—Commentarius de Arte Criticâ, 8vo.—Classicum Belli Sacri—de Suâ ad Catholicos Migratione—Notationes in Phædrum—Suspectarum Lectionum—Grammatica Philosophica, 8vo.

SCPIO, Publ. Cornel. an illustrious Roman. He avenged the death of his father and uncle, who had fallen in Spain, by the total defeat of the Carthaginians in that country, and he afterwards passed into Africa, to carry war to the gates of the capital. The battle of Zama, and the defeat of Annibal put an end to the second punic war, and the victorious Roman obtained the honorable surname of Africanus. The Romans afterwards behaved with jealousy towards him, and he retired from public clamors to his country house, where he died, B.C. 180.

SCLATER, William, D.D., a native of Somers-setshire, educated at brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He died 1647, on his living of Otterden, in Kent. He was author of elegies and epitaphs, under the title of Threnodia Britannica, 4to.—Palae-Albion, or History of Great Britain to the Reign of the First James, in Latin and English verse, fol.—Psalms, or Songs of Zion—Genethliacon, or Stemma Jacobi Regis ab Adamo, folio. Another divine of that name was also D.D., fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and vicar of Pitminster, Somersetshire, where he died 1626; author of a Commentary on the Epistles to the Thessalonians and Romans, fol. His son was prebendary of Exeter, and minister of Cullumpton, Devon, and author of some sermons.

SCOT, Reynolds, an English writer, born of an ancient family near Smeeth, in Kent. He was of Hart hall, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and retired to his seat, where he devoted himself to the reading of obscure authors. He published A Perfect Platform of a Hop Garden, in 4to., second edition 1576—the discoveries of Witchcraft, 4to.—Discourse upon Devils and Spirits. These works in a superstitious age, exposed him to much obloquy, and his labors were attacked with great virulence by those who supported the doctrines of astrology, alchymy, legerdemain, and witchcraft, and he was censured not only by Meric Casaubon, Joseph Glanvil, Raynolds, and others, but by James I. in his Demonologia. This worthy man, distinguished by his piety and benevolence, as well as for his learning, died at the seat of his ancestors, and was buried at the church of Smeeth, 1599.

SCOTT, John, D.D., an able divine, born at Chippenham, Wilts, 1633. Though for three years engaged in trade, he prevailed upon his friends to send him to Oxford, where, without taking his degrees in arts, he accumulated the degrees of bachelor, and doctor in divinity, in 1635. He was successively minister of St. Thomas's, Southwark, rector of St. Peter le Poor, London, rector of St. Giles' in the Fields, prebendary of St. Paul, and canon of Windsor, and refused a bishopric, because he would not take the oath of homage. He died 1694, and was buried in St. Giles' church. He was a warm opposer of the catholics, and wrote various things, the best known of which are the Christian Life, a most valuable and popular work, in folio, and 5 vols. 8vo.—sermons—Cases of Conscience resolved, and some pieces against the papists.

SCOTT, Daniel, LL.D., a learned English author and critic, who received the first part of his education at Tewksbury, and finished it at Utrecht, where he was graduated. He wrote several treatises on Theology; and, in 1745, published an Appendix to Henry Stephens's Greek Lexicon, 2 vols. folio.

SCOTT, Thomas, brother of Daniel, was a dissenting minister, first at Hitchin, Herts, and then at Norwich, where he died 1746. He is author of Occasional Sermons, in which he endeavored to settle the dispute about the godhead of Christ, by John 20, v. 23. His son Joseph Nicol was pastor of a dissenting congregation at Norwich, and then became Arian, and at last took the degree of M. D. in Scotland, and practised as a physician. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons, and assisted in the revision of Bailey's folio Dictionary. His brother Thomas was also a dissenting minister at Lowestoff, afterwards at Ipswich, and then at Hapton, Norfolk, where he died 1775. He is author of single sermons—of lyric poems—of a translation of Job into English verse, with notes, twice edited, &c.

SCOTT, Thomas, B. D., an English divine, for some years preacher to the English company at Utrecht. He was basely assassinated by a soldier, as he was going to his church, in 1626. He is author of Vox Populi—Vox Dei—Vox Regis—the Belgick Pismire Stinging the Slothful Sleeper, 4to.—Synnachia, or True Love's Knot between Great-Britain and the United Provinces, 4to.—a Tongue Combat between Two English Soldiers in the Tilt Boat of Gravesend, 4to.—Digitus Dei—the Projector, a sermon before the judges at Norwich—the Highways of God and the King, two sermons, 4to.—News from Parnassus, 4to.

SCOTT, John, an English poet, of the persuasion of the quakers. His father was a London tradesman, and retired to Anwell, Hertfordshire, a place which our author has fondly celebrated in his elegant poem of that name. He wrote besides, "Digest of Laws respecting Highways and Turn-pikes"—Observations on the Poor—a Tract on Rowley's Poems. His poems, descriptive and moral, appeared together, 1782, in 8vo. and the author died the next year.

SCOTT, John, an ingenious writer, who was the original editor of the London Magazine. After the restoration of the royal family he went to France, and on his return published "A Visit to Paris in 1814, being a Review of the Moral, Political, Intellectual, and Social Condition of the French Capital," London, 1815, 8vo.; and he was also the author of "Paris Revisited in 1815, by way of Brussels, including a Walk over the Field of Waterloo," 1816, 8vo.; and "The House of Mourning," a poem on the death of the author's son. In January 1820 he commenced the publication of the London Magazine, which he conducted with great success till the beginning of the following year. His remarks on some articles in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine having given offence to the editor of that work, a quarrel took place; and Mr. Scott, after refusing to accept the challenge of the individual whose displeasure he had provoked, was wounded in a duel with a friend of that gentleman on the 16th of February, 1821, and he died a few days after, leaving a widow and two children. A volume of Observations during a Journey on the Continent, appeared after his death.

SCOTT, Thomas, D.D., an eminent evangelical clergyman of the established church, who was born in 1747 at Braytoft in Lincolnshire, and was the son of a farmer. After having acquired some acquaintance with classical learning, he was, at the age of sixteen, apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary at Alford in his native country. In this situation he stayed only two months, and then returning home he was employed in his father's business. Having a strong inclination to enter into the church, he applied himself closely to study, and obtained a considerable knowledge of both the Latin and Greek languages. In 1773 he was ordained by Dr. Green, bishop of Lincoln, and for some time he held the curacies of Weston Underwood and Ravenstone in Buckinghamshire. Becoming acquainted with Mr. Newton, curate of Olney, and afterwards minister of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, he was converted to Calvinism, in the defence of which, both from the pulpit and the press, he greatly distinguished himself. In 1781 he removed to Olney, and in 1785 to London, having obtained the chaplainship of the Lock chapel, near Hyde-park-corner. In 1801 he was appointed rector of Aston Sandford in Buckinghamshire, where he died April 16, 1821. He published in 1779, a sort of autobiographical tract, entitled "The Force of Truth," 8vo. which was followed by several single sermons, and other works; but his principal productions are a "Defence of Calvinism," against bishop Tomline; and a "Commentary on the Bible," 6 vols. 4to.

SCOTT, Henlenus, an eminent physician, who was the son of a Scottish clergyman, and was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh. He then visited London, whence he proceeded to Venice, with an intention to travel over land to India. His pecuniary resources failing, he returned to England and married. Subsequently obtaining an appointment at Bombay, he went thither and realized a considerable fortune by his professional practice, which he relinquished to go to New South Wales. Dr. Scott distinguished himself by his experiments on the use of the mineral acids in syphilitic and other complaints; and he was the author of an ingenious romance, entitled the "Adventures of a Rupee." He died on his voyage to New South Wales, November 16, 1821.

SCOTT, Walter, the most popular writer of the age, was born at Edinburgh, August 15, 1771. His father was a writer to the signet, of great respectability and considerable wealth, and his mother was a woman of talent. He was educated at the High School of that city under Dr. Adam, and at the university; but he was little distinguished in the ordinary branches of education; though he early acquired a large stock of miscellaneous reading. After having completed the preparatory studies, he was called to the bar, in 1792, but his literary taste diverted his attention from the practice of his profession to more favorite pursuits. In 1800, he was appointed sheriff of Selkirkshire; and in 1806, principal clerk in the court of sessions. His first original work, of considerable size, was The Lay of the Last Minstrel, which was published in 1805, and was received with great applause. Marmion followed in 1808; The Lady of the Lake, in 1810; The Vision of Don Roderick in 1811; Rokeby in 1812. Upwards of thirty thousand copies of the Lay were sold by the trade in England previously to 1829; and thirty-six thousand of Marmion before 1825. But it was in the character of an historical novelist that he acquired the greatest celebrity. His fictitious prose compositions, as published in Edinburgh, comprise no less than seventy-four volumes. Waverley was published in 1814; Guy Rannering in 1815; the Antiquary and the First Series of the Tales of My Landlord in 1816. These were followed in rapid succession by various other works, which were received with great applause, but were all published anonymously; nor was his authorship publicly acknowledged by himself, till 1827, when, in consequence of the bankruptcy of his publishers and his own embarrassments, the fact could no longer be concealed. Besides his poems and novels, he was the author of the Life of Napoleon Bonaparte, and various other works, and was a contributor to periodical journals. The health of Sir Walter having for some time been declining, in the winter of 1830-31, symptoms of a gradual paralysis began to be manifested; and obtaining no relief he died, September 21st, 1832. He was distinguished for uprightness and purity of character in private life, for great simplicity and kindness of manners, and benevolence of heart.

SCOU GAL, Henry, M. A. a learned Scotchman, born at Saltoro, East Lothian, 1650, and educated there, and at Aberdeen university, where he took his degree, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy, and also of theology. His exertions as a preacher brought on a consumption, of which he died 1678, aged 28. This respectable and amiable character wrote Life of God in the Soul of Man, much admired, besides nine sermons.

SCREVEN, James, a brigadier-general of the militia of Georgia in the revolutionary war, commanded a body of troops which was engaged in repelling the invaders from Florida, and died of wounds received in a skirmish with them at Midway, November 24, 1778. He early engaged in the cause of liberty, and in 1774, was one of the committee which drew up articles of association for its defence in Georgia. Congress ordered the erection of a monument as a mark of their respect for him.

SCROGGS, sir William, a native of Deddington, Oxfordshire, educated for the church, but drawn into the army during the civil wars. He afterwards entered at Gray's Inn, and was called to the bar. His abilities recommended him to the court; he was knighted in 1669, made serjeant at law, and in 1678 raised to the high office of chief justice of the king's bench. Three years after he was removed from his place by an impeachment of the commons, because he was supposed to have acted with partiality on the trial of persons concerned in the popish plots which so frequently alarmed the nation in those turbulent times. He died 1683. Some of his speeches have been preserved in the state trials.

SCUDERI, George de, a French writer, born at Havre de Grace, 1603. He possessed great facility in writing, and paid his court to Richelieu by publishing some severe censures on the Cid of Corneille. He wrote much, but with such rapidity that, as Boileau says, he could each month bring forth a volume. His works, therefore, are now little known. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris 1665.

SCUDERI, Madeleine de, sister of the preceding, was born at Havre de Grace, 1607. She was eminent for her wit, her vivacity, and her writings, and was made member of the Ricovrati academy at Padua. She was also honored with the correspondence of several learned persons, and was rewarded for her works by Mazarine, and pensioned by Christina of Sweden, and Louis XIV. Her house was the general resort of the witty and the learned. She died 1701, aged 94, and two churches disputed the honor of possessing her remains, which was at last settled by the interference of cardinal de Noailles. Her works are very numerous, but she is better known for some elegant verses, according to Voltaire, than for her ponderous romances. She wrote Clelia, 10 vols. 8vo.—Artamenes, or the Grand Cyrus, 10 vols.—Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Bashaw, 4 vols.—Conversations and Discourses, 10 vols.—a Discourse on Glory.

SEABURY, Samuel, D.D. first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, was born in 1728, and graduated at Yale college in 1751. After finishing his classical education he went to Scotland with the view of studying medicine, but soon having turned his attention to theology, he altered his purpose and took orders in London, 1753. Returning to America, he officiated—first at Brunswick, New Jersey—then, at Jamaica, Long Island—next, at West Chester, New York—and lastly at New London, Conn. where he remained, as Rector of the parish in that city, during the remainder of his life. As much as he was esteemed by his parishioners, his influence was extended among his brethren throughout the state. Consequently, when the Episcopal church was organized in that diocese he was elected Bishop. He went immediately to England in order to obtain consecration; but, meeting with some unexpected obstacles he repaired to Scotland. Here he was able to accomplish the object of his mission. He was consecrated at Aberdeen, November 14, 1784. As soon as he was able to reach home he resumed his duties as parish minister at New London in connexion with his episcopal functions for the diocese. Bishop Seabury had a vigorous and well cultivated mind; and acquired a reputation corresponding with his high station. He died February 25, 1796, aged 63 years. Three volumes of his sermons have been published.

SEAMAN, Lazarus, D.D. a native of Leicester, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and made master of Peterhouse, in consequence of his active and zealous exertions in favor of the parliament during the civil wars. He was afterwards one of the divines of the Westminster assembly, and died 1675. He published several sermons. It is said that his library was the first ever sold by auction in England.

SEBA, Albert, author of a valuable work on Natural History, in 3 vols. folio, with plates and explanations in Latin and French, published Amsterdam, 1734, was born at Etzeel, East Friseland.

SEBASTIAN, posthumous son of the infant John, and of a daughter of Charles V. succeeded his grandfather John III. on the throne of Portugal, 1557. He invaded in 1574, the Moors in Africa, but without honor, and four years after he went to the assistance of Muly-Mohammed, against his uncle Moluc, king of Fez and Morocco. The expedition was unfortunate, and in a battle fought near Tangiers, 29th July, 1578, the greatest part of the Portuguese army was cut to pieces, and Sebastian shared their fate. As his body could not be found, some supposed that he escaped from the general slaughter, and in consequence, two impostors arose to claim the throne, both of them hermits, and after some confusion, these ambitious hypocrites were removed, the one being executed and the other sent to the galleys.

SECKENDORF, Guy Lewis de, a learned German, born at Aurach, in Franconia 1626. He was much noticed, and patronised by the duke of Saxe-Gotha, and by the duke of Saxe-Weist, and afterwards by the elector of Brandenburg, who made him counsellor of state, and chancellor of Halle university. He wrote several books, the best known of which was Commentarius Historicus, & Apologeticus de Lutheranismo, &c. 2 vols. fol. a valuable work, which contains the best account of Luther. He died at Halle, 18th December 1692.

SECKER, Thomas, LL.D. a pious prelate, born at Sibthorpe near Newark, Notts, 1693. As his father was a dissenter, he was instructed in the principles of those sectaries, first at Chesterfield, and then in Yorkshire, and afterwards in Gloucestershire, and in 1716 he began to study medicine. In 1719, he visited Paris, where he became acquainted by means of his friends Benson and Butler, with Mr. Talbot, son of the bishop of Durham, who liberally promised him his father's patronage, if he would enter into the orders of the English church. After mature deliberation he accepted the proposal, but to obtain his degrees with greater facility he went to Leyden, where, after a residence of three months he proceeded M.D. On his return to England he entered as gentleman commoner, at Exeter college, Oxford, and soon after was admitted to the degree of B. A. He was regularly ordained by bishop Talbot, and in 1724, obtained the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for a prebend, and the living of Ryton near Newcastle, 1727. In 1732, he became chaplain to the king, and the next year resigned Ryton for St. James's, Westminster. In 1735, his abilities recommended him to the bishopric of Bristol, and in 1737, he was translated to Oxford, and on Hutton's death 1753, the duke of Newcastle, unsolicited, procured his elevation to the see of Canterbury. As he grew old he was much afflicted with rheumatic and gouty complaints, and on the last day of July, 1768, he had the misfortune to break his thigh bone, while turning himself on his couch. A delirium followed the fracture, but recovery was impossible, and he expired on the 3d August following, aged 75. It was afterwards discovered that his thigh bone was perfectly carious, and that the pains which long afflicted him arose from the decayed state of that limb. Secker left the best part of his property to charitable uses, and with great munificence upheld the dignity of his see, and of his clergy. In his conduct as a bishop he was vigilant and attentive, eager to reward merit, and at all times severe against vicious or dissipated members of the church. He was an elegant scholar, an animated preacher, and a sound divine. His sermons are deservedly popular, and in his lectures on the catechism he displays all the perspicuity, eloquence, and argumentation, which can command not only admiration but conviction, in the pure and apostolic doctrines of the church of England. His works have altogether been published in 12 vols. 8vo. 1795. His life was given to the public by Dr. Porteus, his chaplain and executor.

SECONDAT DE MONTESQUIEU, John Baptist, son of the celebrated Montesquieu, was counsellor in the parliament of Bordeaux, and devoted himself to the study and the pleasures of agriculture. He died at Bordeaux, 17th July, 1796, aged 79. He wrote Memoir on Electricity, 8vo. against Nolle—Observations on the Mineral Waters of the Pyrenees, 12mo.—Considerations on the Marine of France, 8vo.—Natural history of the Oak, folio.

SECOUSSE, Denys Francis, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 8th January, 1691. He was one of Rollin's first pupils, and afterwards left the bar for the study of literature. He was admitted into the academy of belles lettres, and became the friend of the learned and of the great. He continued, at the request of the chancellor d'Aguesseau, the collection of royal ordonnances begun by Lauriere, and also discharged the office of censor royal. He gradually became blind in the last period of life, and died at Paris, 15th March, 1754. He was author of a Collection of Royal Ordonnances, from the second to the ninth vol., lately continued by Villevaut—Memoirs for the history of Charles the Bad, 2 vols. 4to.—Memoirs of Condé, edited with Lenglet, 6 vols. 4to.—Dissertations in the Memoirs of the academy of inscriptions.

SECURIS, John, a native of Wiltshire, educated at New college, Oxford. He afterwards studied at Paris, and then settled at Salisbury, where he practised physic with great success, and died about 1570. He wrote Prognosticons, a sort of almanacs, besides a Compendium how to keep a Moderate Diet—Detection and Querimony of the Daily Enormities and Abuses committed in the Three Branches of Physic.

SEDAINE, Michael John, a French dramatic writer, son of an indigent architect, was born at Paris, 14th June, 1719. He left the obscure employment of stone mason, for literature, and by frequenting the theatre, he imbibed such partiality for dramatic pieces, that he directed all the powers of an ardent imagination to the composition of a play. He was successful, and in 1754, Mouet, director of the comic opera, soon discovered, that by employing the talents of the new dramatist, he could command numerous and applauding audiences. Sedaine was in his private character, a mild and amiable man, and his abilities procured him a seat in the academy of inscriptions, and he also became secretary to the academy of architecture. He died in the spring of 1797. His comic operas are numerous and valuable, and some of them, such as Richard Cœur de Lion, and Blue Beard, have made their appearance on the English stage.

SEDGWICK, Theodore, LL.D., was born at West Hartford, Connecticut, in May, 1746. He was educated at Yale college, but in consequence of the straitened circumstances of the family, did not complete the whole course of study to receive his degree. On leaving this institution, he commenced a theological education; but soon relinquished it, and studied law, to the practice of which he was admitted before reaching the age of twenty-one. He commenced at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, then settled at Sheffield, and afterwards at Stockbridge in the same county. In the revolutionary war he embarked with all his constitutional ardor. In 1785 and 1786, he was a member of congress; also from 1789 to 1796. From 1796 to 1798, he was a senator of the United States. In 1799 he was again member of the House, and was chosen speaker. From 1802 till his death, he was a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts. He died at Boston, January 24, 1813, aged 66 years. He received honorary degrees from Princeton and Cambridge. He was beloved by his family and friends, and as a statesman and jurist, highly valued by his country. His life was in an uncommon degree varied and active; his industry was unwearied, and an ardent enthusiasm was the basis of his character.

SEDLEY, sir Charles, an English poet, born at Aylesford in Kent, 1639. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, but left it without a degree, and became afterwards one of the wits of the debauched court of Charles II. Thus devoted to dissipation of every kind, he grew poor; but though unprincipled, he was highly offended with the intrigue which James II. had with his daughter, who was in consequence ennobled with the title of countess of Dorchester. This elevation gave him the greater concern, and he espoused the more warmly the revolution, observing that he did it from a principle of gratitude, 'for since his majesty,' said he, 'has made my daughter a countess, I wish to do all I can to make his daughter a queen.' Sedley's works were published, 2 vols. 8vo. 1719, and consist of plays, translations, songs, and epilogues; but though without much fire or genius, they possess the dangerous art of insinuating loose and licentious principles. He died 1703.

SEED, Jeremiah, an able divine, born at Clifton, near Penrith in Cumberland. He was educated at Lowther, and then entered at Queen's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1732. He was for a long time curate of Twickenham, and in 1741, obtained from his college the rectory of Enham, Hants, where he died 1747. This excellent divine, deservedly esteemed for his private exemplary character, published discourses on several important subjects, 2 vols. 8vo., and after his death, his Posthumous Works, consisting of sermons, letters, &c., appeared under the care of Mr. Hall of his college, 2 vols. 8vo.

SEE-MA-KOANG, a Chinese philosopher, in the eleventh century. Though a Mandarin of distinction, and the favorite of the emperor, he relinquished all his employment about the court, and retired to solitude, where he devoted himself to study and meditation. He was fifteen years in composing an history of China, which began at the year 403 before Christ. He wrote also some moral pieces, and was universally esteemed as a learned and amiable man.

SEETZIN, Ulric Jasper, a German traveller, a native of East Friseland, was educated at Göttingen, under professor Blumenbach. He was early in life appointed aulic counsellor to the czar for Jever; but being desirous of visiting Africa and the east, and being encouraged by the dukes of Ernest and Augustus of Saxe Gotha, he set off in August, 1802, for Constantinople. He proceeded to Syria, and remained a considerable time at Aleppo. In 1806, he explored the course of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, travelled through Palestine, and went to Hebron and Mount Sinai. His enthusiastic desire of knowledge prompted him to profess Mahometanism, that he might undertake a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, in 1809 and 1810. In the month of November of the last year he was at Mocha, whence he wrote the last letters which arrived from him. Having had his property seized by the Arabs, he proceeded towards Saana, in December, 1811, to complain to the Imam; and a few days after, died suddenly at Tæes, as it has been thought, from the effects of poison given him by order of that barbarian. No account of the researches of this traveller ever appeared; but his letters, addressed to baron von Zach, were inserted in his Geographical and Astronomical Correspondence, a periodical work published at Gotha, and a translation was printed in the French Annales des Voyages, 1809-14. Extracts from his letters to Blumenbach and others, were also published in the Magasin Encyclopédique.

SEGNERI, Paul, a native of Nettuno, who entered among the jesuits, and became by the austerity of his manners, and the eloquence of his tongue, a popular preacher, and an active missionary of the society. He was invited to Rome by pope Innocent XII. to whom he became chaplain; but he soon after fell into a languid state, which carried him off 9th December 1694, aged 70. He wrote sermons, 7 vols.—the Unbeliever without excuse—the Pastor instructed—the Illusions of the Quietists—the Servant of Mary, all collected into 3 vols. fol.

SEGRAIS, John Renaud de, a French poet, born 1624, at Caen, of a noble family. He was educated among the jesuits, but declined to enter into orders, and afterwards distinguished himself so much by his pen, that he was introduced by count de Frisque, to Mad. de Montpensier, who took him into her family. His opposition to her marrying count de Lauzun, drove him from her protection, but he found a new patroness in Mad. de la Fayette, in whose house and society he was for seven years treated with kindness and honorable distinction. He afterwards returned to his native country and married a rich heiress 1679, and spent the rest of his life in the retirement of learned ease and independence. He died at Caen of a dropsy 1701. His conversation was very fascinating and witty, and many of his anecdotes are recorded in the "Segrasiana," published after his death. He was a member of the French academy, and wrote several things, the best known of which are his poems, consisting of pastorals, besides translations of Virgil's Georgics and Æneid. His prose writings were chiefly romances possessing little merit.

SEGUI, Joseph, a native of Rodez, who early devoted himself to belles lettres and poetry, and obtained in 1732, the poetical prize of the French academy. He was honored in consequence of his success with a place at the French academy, the abbey of Genlis, and a canonry in Meaux cathedral. He died at Meaux, March, 1761, aged 72. He published Panegyrics 2 vols. 12mo.—sermons, 2 vols.—Academical discourses. His panegyric of St. Lewis was received with such applause, that some attributed it to the superior powers of la Mothe.

SEGUIER, John Francis, a native of Nismes, who abandoned jurisprudence to follow his more favorite studies of botany. He improved his knowledge by travelling with the Marquis Scipio Maffei into France, England, Holland, Germany, and Italy, and was honored on his return with the place of president of the academy of Nismes. This indefatigable writer, who also paid great attention to medallic history, died at Nismes, 1st September, 1784, aged 81. He wrote Bibliotheca Botanica, 4to.—Plantae Veronenses, 8vo.—a Translation of Maffei's Memoirs, 2 vols. 12mo.

SEGUR, Count Louis de, a French diplomatist and writer, the eldest son of Marshal de Segur, was born in 1753, at Paris; and, after having served in America, was successively ambassador to St. Petersburg and Berlin. He was ruined by the revolution, and for a considerable period supported his father and his family by the productions of his pen. Napoleon, however, placed him in the council of state, and nominated him grand master of the ceremonies, and a senator. Count Segur died at Paris, August 27, 1830. His principal works are, A History of the Reign of Frederic William II.; Moral and Political Gallery; and Ancient and Modern History.

SEJANUS, Ælius, a well known favorite of Tiberius. He first introduced himself to the notice of Caius Caesar the grandson of Augustus, and afterwards engaged the favors of Tiberius when on the throne. Not satisfied with the honors which he enjoyed he aspired to the imperial purple, and after murdering Drusus the emperor's son, he claimed the hand of his widow, but was indignantly rejected. Tiberius at last opened his eyes, and the favorite deserted by all his flatterers, was strangled A.D. 31, and his body thrown into the Tiber.

SELDEN, John, a learned Englishman, born at Salvington, Sussex, 1584. He was educated at Chichester school, and Hart hall, Oxford, after which he entered at Clifford's Inn, and two years after removed to the Inner Temple. He early distinguished himself as an antiquarian, and in 1610, published Jani Anglorum Facies Altera, & Duello, or the Origin of Single Combat. Besides other pieces he published Titles of Honor, 1614, a work of great merit, and in 1618, appeared his History of Tithes, which as it censured the ignorance and laziness of the clergy gave great offence to that body. The work was attacked by several writers, especially Montague afterwards bishop of Norwich, and the author at last was obliged to make submission before the lords of the privy council for this offensive publication. His opinions in favor of the privileges of the house of commons, and his opposition to the measures of the court, drew upon him in 1621, the displeasure of king James, who committed him to the custody of the sheriff of London, from which he was liberated by the intercession of his friend bishop Andrews. In 1623, he was chosen member of parliament for Lancaster, and two years after for Great Bedwin, and in the house he distinguished himself by his attack on the character of Buckingham, and became one of the managers of his impeachment. His opposition to the measures of the court continued, and for the freedom of his sentiments he was, in 1629, arrested with several other members, and upon refusing to make submission to the court he was sent to the king's bench prison. He was again sent into confinement the following year; but his sufferings in the cause of public liberty were rewarded by the parliament of 1646, who voted him £5000 for his losses. Though apparently much engaged in politics, Selden was laboriously employed in literary pursuits. In 1634 he defended, in his Mare Clausum, the privileges of the English, and their rights in the herring fishery, against Grotius's work, called Mare Liberum. He was in 1640, elected member for Oxford university, and in 1642, it was intended by the king's ministers to remove lord Lyttleton from the seals, and to give them to him, as, though he opposed the measures of the court, he was a sincere friend to the just prerogatives of the crown. But the offer was not made, as his delicate constitution, and his great love of ease prevented his exertions, and would have induced him to decline the honorable office. In 1643, he became one of the lay members of the Westminster assembly of divines, and he about this time took the covenant, and was made by the parliament keeper of the records of the tower. But, however, though he continued member of the house, and was in 1644, one of the twelve commissioners of the admiralty, he did not concur in the violent measures of the parliament, and when the Icon Basilice appeared, Cromwell in vain solicited him to employ his talents to write against it. He died 30th November 1654. His valuable library was given by his executors to the university of Oxford. As a scholar Selden ranks very high. He was not only skilled in the Hebrew and oriental languages, but he was acquainted with all laws, divine and human, and in the stores of a most retentive memory he had treasured up whatever is valuable, interesting, and important, in ancient and modern literature. He was, as Grotius states him, the glory of the English nation, and as Whitelock says, his mind was as great as his learning, and he was as hospitable and as generous as any man. He was a person, as Clarendon has observed, whom no character can flatter, or transmit in any expressions equal to his merit and virtue. His learning was stupendous, and if he had some infirmities they were weighed down with wonderful and prodigious abilities and excellences, in the other scale. The works of this great character were collected by Dr. Wilkins, 3 vols. fol. generally bound in six, 1726, of which the two first contain his Latin pieces, and the third his English, with a long life prefixed.

SELIM, I. second son of Bajazet II. defeated his father in 1512, and after poisoning him, and cutting off his elder brother Achmet, and the younger Korcud, he ascended the throne of Turkey. Firm in his power he marched against Egypt, and in a bloody battle near Aleppo, he killed Campson Gaury the Egyptian monarch, and in another battle near Cairo defeated the new king, and totally crushed the power of the Mamelukes, which for two hundred and sixty years had governed the country. He was equally successful against the Persians; but whilst he prepared to make war against the christians, he was attacked by a violent disease, which soon proved fatal. He died at Cluri in Thrace, 21st September 1520, on the very spot where he had caused his father to be poisoned.

SELIM II. grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne after the death of his father Solyman II. 1566. He violated in 1570, the treaty which existed between him and the Venetians, and by a sudden attack he made himself master of Cyprus, but the next year he lost at the battle of Lepanto above thirty-five thousand men besides his fleet, and therefore readily listened to terms of peace. Devoting his time to the sensual pleasures of his seraglio, he died little respected, 1574, aged 52.

SELIS, Nicholas Joseph, a French poet, born at Paris 27th April, 1737. By the friendship of Delille he left Amiens, where his poetical talents were already admired, and settled at Paris, respected by the learned, and admitted professor of belles lettres at the central school of the Pantheon, and member of the national institute. He is author of a translation of Persius, with notes, 8vo.—Epistles in verse—Relation of Voltaire's Disorder, Confession and Death—Letter to de la Harpe on the College of France—Discourse on Central Schools—Dissertations, Literary and Grammatical, &c. He died 19th February 1802.

SELKIRK, Alexander, a native of Largo in Scotland, who, by his application, and his knowledge of navigation, obtained the command of a ship, and made several voyages to the South seas. In one of these, 1705, while in the ship of captain Pradling, he had a quarrel with him, and in consequence of it was cruelly sent on shore, on the desert island of Juan de Fernandez, with only a fowling piece, gunpowder and shot, and very few necessaries. In this desolate situation he continued three years, comfortably subsisting on the goats, with which the island abounded, and the various sorts of fish, which he caught around the shore, till the accidental arrival of captain Wood Rogers, in 1709, removed him from his solitary abode. This singular adventure forms the basis of Robinson Crusoe, a romance embellished by the pen of the celebrated de Foe.

SELLER, Abednego, a native of Plymouth, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. He became minister of Combefine head, Devonshire, and obtained another living in London, both of which he lost at the revolution for refusing to take the oaths to William. He wrote remarks relating to the state of the church, in the three first centuries, 8vo.—the Devout Communicant, often reprinted under the title of the Week's Preparation for the Sacrament, 12mo.—Tracts against Popery. He died about 1720, aged 73.

SELLIUS, Godfrey, a native of Dantzic, member of the imperial academy, and of the Royal Society in London. He lived much of his time in France, and died at Charenton, where he had been confined a little time in consequence of insanity, 25th June 1767. He wrote Geographical Description of Dutch Brabant, 12mo.—Voyage to Hudson's Bay, 8vo.—Dictionary of Monogrammes—a Natural History of Ireland—History of the Ancient Revolutions of the Globe—History of the United Provinces, 8 vols. 4to.

SENAC, John, a native of Lombes, who became physician to the French king, counsellor of state, and superintendent of the mineral waters of the kingdom. He died at Paris, 20th December 1770. He published a translation of Heister's Anatomy, with Physical Essays on the Use of the Parts of the Human Body, 8vo. and 3 vols. 12mo.—treatise on the Causes and the Cure of the Plague, 4to.—on the Structure of the Heart, 2 vols 4to.—de Reconditâ Febrium Naturâ & Curatione, 8vo.—Reflections on Drowned Persons—Memoir on the Diaphragm.

SENAUDT, John Francis, a native of Antwerp, who became member of the oratory, and afterwards its superior. He died at Paris, universally respected, 3d August 1672 aged 71. He wrote a treatise on the Use of the Passions, 4to and 12mo. a popular work translated into English, German, Italian, &c.—a Paraphrase of Job, 8vo.—the Christian Man, 4to.—and the Criminal Man, 4to.—the Duties of the Sovereign, 12mo.—Lives of Saints and Illustrious Persons—sermons.

SENECA, Luc. Annæus, was born at Corduba. He was appointed tutor to Nero by Agrippina, but all the sound precepts which he had inculcated were forgotten when his pupil ascended the throne, and instead of being rewarded, the virtuous preceptor was marked for destruction. On the discovery of Piso's conspiracy, he was commanded to destroy himself, and after taking poison, and then opening his veins to no effect, he was suffocated in a warm stove, A.D. 65. As a philosopher and moralist, Seneca ranks very high. The tragedies ascribed to him are possessed of little merit.

SENECAL, or SENECE, Anthony Bauderon de, a French poet, born at Macon, 13th October 1643. He left the profession of the law for belles lettres; but an unfortunate duel drove him to Savoy. Here a quarrel with the brothers of a lady who had shown strong partiality for him, rendered his residence disagreeable, and he retired to Madrid, from whence he was permitted to return to France. He became first valet to Maria Theresa, the wife of Louis XIV. and after her death, entered into the service of the duchess of Angouleme. He died at Macon, 1st February 1737. He wrote epigrams—satires—poetical novels—and fugitive poems, in a pleasing style.

SENNERTUS, Daniel, a German physician, born at Breslaw, son of a shoe-maker. He studied at Wittenburg, and afterwards at Leipsic, Jena, Frankfort, and Berlin, and on his return was elected professor of physic at Wittenburg. He introduced the study of chemistry among his pupils, and acquired great celebrity both as a professor and as a practitioner; but his censure of the ancients, and his opinions about the soul, drew upon him the virulence of contemporary writers, and the charge of impiety. He was three times married, and had by his first wife seven children, and none by the rest. He died of the plague at Wittenburg, 21st July, 1637. He wrote various things, printed together at Venice, 3 vols. fol. 1640, and Lyons, 1676, 6 vols. fol.

SEPULVEDA, John Genes de, a Spanish writer, born at Cordova, 1491. He was historiographer to Charles V. and is known for his profligate vindication of the cruelties of the Spaniards against the Indians, against the humane representations of de la Casas. He wrote some other works, not much esteemed, and died at Salamanca, 1572.

SERARIUS, Nicholas, a learned jesuit, born at Rambervillers in Lorraine. He taught philosophy at Wurtzburg and Mayence, and died at the last place, May 20th, 1610, aged 65. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, fol.—Prolegomena, fol.—Opuscula Theologica, all of which have been collected into 16 vols. fol. and display great labor and extensive erudition.

SERGEANT, John, an American missionary, among the Indians, was born at Newark, New Jersey, in 1710, and graduated at Yale college in 1729. After receiving his degree he spent four years, as tutor in this institution. In October, 1734, he went to Housatonic, an Indian village in the western part of Massachusetts, and began to preach to the inhabitants, and continued there till his death, which took place, July 27th, 1749, aged 48. He baptised one hundred and twenty-nine Indians, and forty-two were communicants at the time of his death. With great labor he translated the whole of the New Testament, excepting the Revelation, into the Indian language, and several parts of the Old Testament.

SERGEANT, Jonathan Dickinson, an eminent counsellor at law, was born at Newark, New Jersey, in 1746. He entered the college at Princeton, and was graduated in that institution in the year 1762, in the 16th year of his age. He studied law, and commenced the practice of that profession in his native state; but the revolutionary struggle coming on, his patriotic zeal and eminent talents soon recommended him to the confidence of the people for public employment. He was elected a member of congress from the state of New Jersey, and took his seat a few days after the declaration of independence. He was repeatedly afterwards sent as a delegate to that body. Before the close of the war, he transferred his residence to the city of Philadelphia, and soon became a very conspicuous member of the bar in that city. Here he continued to reside until the year 1793, when during the prevalence of the yellow fever, he fell a victim to his benevolent exertions as one of the board of health. He died in the 47th year of his age. Mr. Sergeant was endowed with a powerful and active mind, and his moral qualities were not less distinguished and estimable than his intellectual.

SERGEL, John Tobias, an eminent Swedish sculptor, was born in 1740, at Stockholm; was a pupil of Larchevéque, and subsequently completed his studies at Rome; rose to great eminence, and was ennobled after his return to Sweden; and died in 1814. Among his most admired productions are, Othryades; a recumbent Faun; a Venus Callipygis; Diomedes bearing away the Palladium; Venus and Mars; and Cupid and Psyche.

SERRANUS, or DE SERRES, John, a learned Frenchman, who, as a protestant, escaped with difficulty the St. Bartholomew massacre, and fled to Lausanne. He was afterwards minister at Nismes, and enjoyed the favor of Henry IV. He published in 1597 a book, called "de Fide Catholicâ," in which he attempted to reconcile the protestants and Roman catholics to the same tenets, in consequence of which he displeased both parties, and was at last supposed to have been poisoned by the Calvinists of Geneva, as he died there suddenly 1598, aged about 50. He wrote also a treatise on the Immortality of the Soul, 8vo.—Inventory of the History of France, 2 vols. folio—Memoirs of the third Civil War of France, 3 vols. 8vo.—History of the Five kings of France—de Statu Religionis & Reipub. in Franciâ—besides an edition of Plato, 3 vols. folio, of which the Latin version is very elegant, but inferior in accuracy to that of Ficinus.

SERRES, Oliver de, a French agriculturist, born at Villeneuve de Berg, near Viviers, 1539. Though his chief delight was in the country, he was prevailed upon by Henry IV. to come to Paris, and as the monarch was pleased with his conversation, he made him superintendent of his plantations. He was the first who introduced the white mulberry-tree into France, and to his labors agriculture was much indebted for the rapid improvement which it made under his directing hand. He died 1619, aged 80. He wrote a treatise on the White Mulberry-tree, and on Silk, since reprinted—the Theatre of Agriculture and the Management of Land, 4to. a work of great merit and utility, and often reprinted.

SERRES, John Thomas, a French artist of considerable merit and reputation in sea-pieces. He was descended of a noble family, long resident at Beaupierre, near Oche, whence his father, count Dominic de Serres, nephew of the then archbishop of Rheims, eloped, in order to avoid an ecclesiastical life. Entering the Spanish service, he was taken prisoner by the English, received his liberty on parole, and, though afterwards this restriction was removed, he continued to reside in England, and to exercise his talents as a draughtsman, which at length procured him the honor of a seat among the followers of the Royal Academy. His eldest son, the subject of this article, inherited his father's genius, and besides the many proofs of his talents as a painter yet extant, was the author of a work entitled the Little Sea Torch, a Guide for Coasting Pilots, folio, 1801. Mr. Serres was husband to the so-called princess Olive of Cumberland. He died December 23th, 1825.

SERTORIUS, Quintus, a famous Roman, who, after distinguishing himself in war under Marius and Cinna, found himself proscribed by Sylla, and retired to Spain, where he declared himself independent. He was at last defeated by Pompey and Metellus, and assassinated by one of his officers, B. C. 73, after governing the country with great wisdom and moderation, and every where showing himself valiant, vigilant, and active.

SERVETUS, Michael, a native of Villanuova in Arragon, son of a notary. He studied the law at Toulouse, but afterwards applied to medicine at Paris, and took there his doctor's degree. The boldness and pertinacity of his opinions created him enemies, and he left the capital to settle at Lyons, but afterwards he retired to Charlieu. On the invitation of the archbishop of Vienne in Dauphiny, he was prevailed upon to fix his residence there, and he might have lived in peace and respected, had he been satisfied to seek celebrity in medical pursuits alone. Eager to publish his Arrian opinions on religion, he sent three questions to Calvin on the Divinity of Christ, on Regeneration, and on the Necessity of Baptism, and when answered with civility, he reflected on the sentiments of his correspondent with arrogant harshness. This produced a quarrel, and ended in the most implacable hatred, so that Calvin, bent on revenge, obtained, by secret means, copies of a work in which his antagonist was engaged, and caused him to be accused before the archbishop as a dangerous man. Servetus escaped from prison; but on his way to Italy, he had the imprudence to pass in disguise through Geneva, where he was recognized by Calvin and immediately seized by the magistrate as an impious heretic. Forty heretical errors were proved against him by his accusers, but Servetus refused to renounce them, and the magistrates, at last yielding to the loud representations of the ministers of Basil, Berne, and Zurich, and especially of Calvin, who demanded the punishment of a profane heretic, ordered the unhappy man to be burnt. On the 27th October, 1553, the wretched Servetus was conducted to the stake, and as the wind prevented the flames from fully reaching his body, two long hours elapsed before he was freed from his miseries. This cruel treatment deservedly called down the general odium on the head of Calvin, who ably defended his conduct and that of the magistrates. Servetus published various works against the Trinity, which were burnt in disgrace at Geneva, and other places. They bore for title, de Trinitatis Erroribus Libra Septem—Dialogorum de Trinitate Libri Duo—de Justitiâ Regni Christi.—Christianismi Restitutio—Apologia pro Serveto. Servetus wrote besides, some medical tracts—and a translation of Ptolemy's Geography.

SESSA, an Indian philosopher, who is said to be the inventor of the game of chess. When he presented his invention to Scheram, king of India, the monarch, pleased with his ingenuity, desired him to demand for his reward whatever he pleased. Sessa asked only a grain of wheat to cover the first square of the chess board, two for the second, four for the third, and so on in progressive order through the sixty-four squares. The king regarded the request as unworthy of his merit; but the philosopher persisted in his wishes, and when the numeration began to be made, it soon appeared how difficult it would be to grant it, since all the granaries of the kingdom contained not wheat enough to satisfy the demand. The king, still more pleased with the wisdom of the philosopher, conferred on him the highest honors of his kingdom.

SETTLE, Elkanah, an English poet. He was born at Dunstable, Bedfordshire, 1648, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, which he left without a degree, to reside in London. He there soon distinguished himself by his writings, became the city poet with a pension, and composed some dramatic pieces of merit, besides the Metal Reversed—Azariah and Hushai, against Dryden, in which he showed himself a very formidable rival, "and left the palm of superiority," says Johnson, "undecided." His Cambyses, king of Persia—Fatal Love—and Empress of Morocco, are mentioned with applause. He was known also as a violent supporter of the measures of administration, in whose favor he was a weekly journalist. He died in the Charter-house, 1724.

SEUME, John Theophilus, a German writer, born in 1763, at Posern, near Leipsic, and was educated at the university of the latter town, where he dedicated himself principally to the Greek and Latin languages and the mathematics. He was about to proceed to France, to enter the school of artillery at Metz, when he was induced by the landgrave of Hesse to accompany the subsidiary body of Hessians taken into the service of England to oppose the American colonists. He subsequently entered into the service of Russia, from which he was dismissed by the emperor Paul. In 1801, he traversed a great part of Italy, Sicily, and Switzerland on foot. In 1803, he once more visited Russia. He died at the baths of Toplitz in 1810. His works have been published in 5 vols. by J. H. Zimmerman. The principal are, Details relative to the Events in Poland in 1794; An Essay on the Life and Character of Catherine II; Changes in Russia since the Accession of Paul I; Walk to Syracuse; and My Summer in the North. The two last works contain some interesting particulars of the personal history and habits of the author.

SEVERUS, Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor after Pertinax. He took as his partner on the throne, Albinus, whom, after the defeat and death of his other rival, Pescennius Niger, he cut off in Gaul. He was a brave general, and made many conquests in the East, and built the Roman wall in Britain, to check the invasions of the Picts. He died at York, A. D. 211. Two other emperors of that name afterwards perished by the hand of their enemies, one by Maximin, 307, the other 461.

SEVIER, John, governor of Tennessee, was an officer in the revolutionary war, and distinguished himself in the battle with the party under colonel Ferguson, at King's Mountain, in 1780. He and colonel Shelby, afterwards governor, were the principal projectors of that enterprise against the British commander, and it was by their exertions chiefly that the force was raised and organized. In consideration of his services on that occasion, the legislature of North Carolina, in 1813, voted him a sword. He commanded the forces which defeated the Creek and Cherokee Indians in 1789. He was afterwards a general in the provisional army, and in 1798, governor of Tennessee. In 1815, he was a representative in congress from that state, and one of the commissioners appointed to ascertain the boundary line, and died while engaged in that service at Fort Deatur, in October, 1815.

SEVIGNE, Mary de Rabutin, marquise de, a lady eminent for her wit, and for her virtues, daughter of Celsus Benignus de Rabutin, baron of Chantal, was born 1626. She, when little more than a year old, lost her father at the defence of Rhé against the English, and in 1644, she married the marquis of Sevigné, who seven years after fell in a duel. Thus left a widow with a son and daughter, she devoted herself to the education of these children, and had the happiness to find her labors most successfully rewarded. Her daughter married, in 1669, the count de Grignan, governor of Provence, and it was at her house that she caught a fever, and died 1696. She was a woman of great mental powers, and her letters are considered as the best models for epistolary writings. They have frequently been published; and the best edition is in 8 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1754. In the celebrated dispute about the merit of the ancients and the moderns, she said that the ancients are the finest, and we are the prettiest. A collection of anecdotes, moral sentiments, and apophthegms, extracted from her letters, and called Sevigniana, appeared at Paris, 1756. Her son was one of the admirers of Ninon de Pénelos, and disputed with Madame Dacier about a passage in Horace. He died 1718.

SEWALL, Joseph, D.D. minister in Boston, was born in 1688, and graduated at Harvard college in 1707. He was the son of chief-justice Samuel Sewall. In 1713, he was ordained minister of the Old South; and thenceforward labored for this society till his death, which took place, June 27, 1769—being at that time 80 years of age, and in the 56th year of his ministry. Dr. Sewall possessed respectable abilities, and was well acquainted with classical learning. In 1724, he was chosen president of Harvard college, but he declined the appointment. He published a sermon on family religion, 1716—nine funeral sermons—an election sermon, 1724—an ordination sermon, 1733—a fast sermon, 1742—and a large number of other occasional sermons, upon various subjects.

SEWALL, Samuel, chief-justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was born in England on the 28th March, 1652, and came with his father to America in 1661. The family resided at Newbury, the settlement of which the father had commenced at a former visit to Massachusetts. Young Sewall was educated at Harvard college, where he obtained his degree in 1671. He became a magistrate in 1684, and by the charter of 1692, was appointed a member of the council. He was made a judge the same year, and in 1718, chief-justice of the superior court. He retained that office, as well as that of judge of probate, till 1728, when his age induced him to resign. He died on the first of January, 1730, in his seventy-eighth year. He was distinguished for learning, integrity, and piety.

SEWALL, Stephen, chief-justice of the superior court of Massachusetts, was born in 1702, and graduated at Harvard college in 1721. He was then engaged for some years in the instruction of youth at Marblehead. He also commenced preaching; but, in 1728 was appointed tutor in his alma mater. He continued in this office till 1737, when he was called to a seat on the bench of the superior court. On the death of chief-justice Dudley in 1752, he succeeded to that station. He was distinguished for genius and learning; and also for ardent piety, and a charity to those in want that was thought excessive. On this account probably, at his death he was insolvent. He died September 10, 1760, aged 57 years.

SEWALL, Stephen, professor of Hebrew in Harvard college, was born in 1734, and graduated at that institution in 1761. He was inaugurated in 1765, and continued in office more than twenty years. The latter part of his life he spent in retirement. He died, July 23, 1804, aged 70. Professor Sewall delivered lectures which proved him to have possessed a well cultivated mind. The following works were from his pen. A Hebrew Grammar, 8vo. 1763; Oratio funebris in obitum D. Edvardi Holyoke, 1769; An Oration on the death of professor Winthrop, 1779; translation of the first book of Young's Night Thoughts in Latin, 1780; carmina sacra, quæ Latine Græceque candida America, 1789; the Scripture account of the Schechinah, 1794; the Scripture history, relating to the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, and to the origin of the Salt sea, or lake of Sodom. And he wrote a Dictionary in Chaldec and English, now in the library of Harvard college.

SEWALL, Samuel, LL.D. chief-justice of Massachusetts, who was born at Boston, December, 1757, and graduated at Harvard college in 1776, devoted himself to the law and soon became eminent in the profession, particularly as a commercial lawyer, for which department he had qualified himself by an unusual attention to the laws of nations. He settled at Marblehead. In 1797, and again afterwards he was elected a member of congress, and was distinguished in that body for his knowledge of commercial law. In 1800, he was placed on the bench of the supreme judicial court, and continued in that station till 1813, when he was appointed chief-justice, but enjoyed the office only till the 8th of June, 1814, when he died suddenly at Wiscasset, where the gentlemen of the bar erected a monument to his memory. Judge Sewall possessed a fine understanding and fancy. He was high-minded and quick in his feelings, and correct in his principles. As an advocate, he was learned, ingenious, and often highly eloquent; and as a judge, characterized by integrity and firmness, and was highly popular both with the bar and people.

SEWALL, David, LL.D. a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, born at York, Maine, and graduated at Harvard college in 1755, being a classmate of John Adams. In 1777, he was made a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts; and in 1789, a judge of the district court of the United States. He had the reputation of being a good man, as well as of being an honest lawyer; a learned and upright judge; and a sincere patriot. He died, at the advanced age of ninety years, October 22, 1825.

SEWARD, William, a native of London, son of a brewer. He was educated at the Charter-house, and at Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. As he possessed a comfortable fortune, he devoted himself to literary ease, unambitious of honors, or of any distinction, except what private merit and virtue confer. He was fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and was highly and deservedly respected for urbanity of manners, and entertaining anecdotes by those who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He published Anecdotes of distinguished Persons, extracted from scarce curious books, 5 vols. 8vo. to which he afterwards added a supplement, in two vols. under the title of Biographiana. This worthy man died 1799, aged 52.

SEWARD, Anna, the daughter of the Rev. Thomas Seward, rector of Eyam, Derbyshire, prebendary of Sarum, and canon residentiary of Litchfield, was born in the year 1747. Her father was himself a poet, and seems to have inspired his daughter with a strong predilection for that department of literature, in which her taste was excellent, and her talents considerable. In the Literary Society of Litchfield, where Miss Seward lived, she held a very distinguished place, and her correspondence with learned and distinguished characters was extensive. For a considerable period her poetical effusions were confined to her social circle; the applause of which at length induced her to commit to the press, Elegiac Commemorations of Major André and Captain Cook, which were favorably received by the public. In 1782, besides other occasional pieces, she published a poetical novel, entitled Louisa which was also favorably received, and passed through several editions. In 1799, she published a collection of original sonnets of considerable merit, with translations from Horace of less value. In 1804, Miss Seward published a Biographical Memoir of Dr. Darwin, the friend of her youth; in which there is much curious and interesting literary anecdote, chiefly of the early part of Dr. Darwin's life, and of the Society of Litchfield, while it was the place of his residence. In 1807, our authoress was engaged in arranging for the press the edition of her poems, which was edited, in 1810, by Walter Scott, Esq., in 3 vols., with a sketch of her life by that poet, and extracts from her literary correspondence. To Mr. Scott she bequeathed by letter her literary performances, particularly that which she had been so long preparing for the press. Miss Seward died on the 25th of March 1809, having also bequeathed to Mr. A. Constable twelve quarto volumes of letters from the year 1784 to the period of her death, for publication. Six volumes of these have been published, containing a vast variety of miscellaneous matter, of which the world will judge variously. That Miss Seward's talents and acquisitions were considerable will not be questioned. Her prejudices were also great, and her reflections on many persons and subjects are unnecessarily harsh and severe. In politics, amidst the ever varying scenes of the French Revolution, and of domestic policy connected with that great event, she cannot be exempted from the charge of rashness, injustice, and inconsistency. Miss Seward was undoubtedly a distinguished person; but she already holds in public estimation a far less eminent place than she fixed for herself. In her conduct she was always respectable.

SEWELL, William a quaker, born at Amsterdam, of English parents, 1654. He practised as a surgeon at Amsterdam, but distinguished himself chiefly by his excellent History of Quakers, written in low Dutch, 1717, and translated into English in folio. He wrote besides, a Dictionary of the English and Low Dutch Languages, 4to—a Dutch Grammar—a Translation of Josephus—of Kennet's Roman Antiquities. He died at Amsterdam, 1720.

SEWELL, George, an English poet and physician, born at Windsor, and educated at Eton, where his father was treasurer and chapter clerk to the college, and at Peter-house, Cambridge. He afterwards studied medicine at Leyden, and then settled at Hamstead, where for some time he met with great success, but died poor, 8th February 1726, and was meanly buried, unattended by friends or relations, though universally and deservedly esteemed. He wrote seven controversial pamphlets—the Life of John Philips—a Vindication of the English Stage—sir Walter Raleigh, a tragedy, acted at Lincoln's inn fields, 1719—Richard the first, left unfinished—two Moral Essays, besides single poems.

SEYBERT, Adam, Dr. a highly respected citizen of Philadelphia, who was, for eight years, a member of congress from that city. He was a man of considerable science, particularly in chemistry and mineralogy. He was also a man of benevolence. He bequeathed one thousand dollars for the education of the deaf and dumb, and five hundred dollars for the orphan asylum, Philadelphia. He died at Paris in May, 1825. A valuable work entitled Statistical Annals of the United States, from 1789 to 1818, was from his pen.

SEYDLITZ, Frederic William, baron de, one of the famous generals of the great Frederic, born in the duchy of Cleves. He distinguished himself in the war of Silesia, and ably covered the retreat of the Prussian army after the fatal day of Kolin. He was at the battle of Rosbach, and defeated the Russians at Zorndorf. He died 1773, covered with glory, and his memory was honored by the gratitude of Frederic, who raised him a public statue at Berlin.

SEYMOUR, Edward, protector of the kingdom, and guardian to Edward VI. to whom he, as brother of Jane Seymour, was uncle, was created viscount Beauchamp, and duke of Somerset. Though he discharged his trust as protector with ability, and supported the reformation, he was violently opposed by the party of the earl of Warwick, and at last brought to the scaffold as guilty of high treason, a disgraceful sentence, which the young king was prevailed upon to confirm, 1552. His brother Thomas, admiral of England, had, by his unnatural influence, suffered on the scaffold three years before, on a charge of high treason.

SEYMOUR, lady Arabella, daughter of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox, the youngest brother of Darnley, the husband of Mary of Scots. Her mother was a daughter of sir William Cavendish, of Chatsworth, Derbyshire. Her affinity to the royal family proved the source of her misfortunes; and in those turbulent times, the measures planned by the disaffected for her elevation to the English throne, procured her severe imprisonment under Elizabeth. Soon after James's accession, she privately married William Seymour, the second son of lord Hertford, but as this was without the permission of the king, she was seized, and with her husband conveyed to the tower. They escaped after a year's confinement; but though the husband made good his flight on board a vessel, lady Arabella was taken, and four years after, 1615, died in her melancholy prison.

SFORZA, James, a renowned warrior, surnamed the Great, born at Cotignola, 1869. He was the son of a laborer or shoe-maker, and attracted by the fame of a military life, he joined a party of soldiers passing through his village, and gradually rose by valor to command. He was for some time in the service of Joan, queen of Navarre, and was afterwards made gonfalonier of Rome by pope John XXIII. and also count of Contignola. His abilities were now displayed in the defence of Naples, when besieged by Alphonso, king of Arragon, whom he obliged to raise the siege. In his pursuit of the flying enemy, he was unfortunately drowned in the river Peseara, 1424, after rendering his name illustrious, and laying the foundation of the noble house of the Sforzas, dukes of Milan.

SFORZA, Francis, natural son of the preceding, became an eminent statesman and a great general. He served under his father, and was present at his melancholy death, and continued the war against Alphonso with equal success. He afterwards served Joan of Naples, and also her successor René, duke of Anjou, and his reputation in arms was such that he was chosen by the pope, the Venetians and Florentines, general of their armies against the duke of Milan, though he had married his daughter. The death of the duke changed the face of affairs, 1447, Sforza was appointed general of the Milanese against Venice, and after a successful campaign, he turned his arms against his employers, and obliged them to name him duke of Milan, an honor which he deserved for his services, and which was acknowledged by the French king, and to which afterwards was added the sovereignty of Genoa. This celebrated warrior died 1466.

SFORZA, Galeas-Marie, succeeded his father Francis, as duke of Milan; but his debaucheries, and his ferocious conduct, revolted the affection of the people, and he was assassinated ten years after, 25th December 1476. His son John Galeas Marie, was for a little time under the guardianship of his mother, but the government was seized by his uncle Ludovic-Marie, a monster of iniquity, who administered slow poison to him, and cut him off in 1494. The murderer was seized by Louis de Tremouille, the general of Louis XII. and carried to France, where he died in prison, 1510.

SFORZA, Catherine, natural daughter of Galeas-Marie, mentioned above, acquired celebrity for her courage and presence of mind. She married Jerome Riario, prince of Forli, who was some time after assassinated by Francis Ursus, who had revolted against the government of her husband. She in consequence fell with her children into the hands of the enemy; but found means to escape to Rimini, which still continued attached to her person, and she defended it with such determined bravery against her enemies, who threatened to put to death her children if she did not surrender, that at last she restored herself to sovereign power. She afterwards married John de Medicis, and again in 1500, ably defended Forli, against the attacks of the duke of Valentinois, the illegitimate son of Alexander VI. When obliged to surrender, she was taken prisoner, and confined in the castle of St. Angelo, but soon after set at liberty, though never restored to her dominions. This heroic woman died soon after.

SHADWELL, Thomas, an English poet, descended of a good family, and born at Stanton hall, Norfolk, 1640. He was of Cains college, Cambridge, and afterwards of the middle temple, but after travelling abroad, he turned all his attention to dramatic composition, and acquired great celebrity. At the revolution he was made historiographer to the king, and poet laureat in the room of Dryden, who resented the appointment by the severest satire in his Mack Flecknoe. In spite, however of the attacks of malevolence, he possessed merit, and wrote with great ease, and rapidity, so that he composed his Psyche in five weeks. He was an amiable man and died 6th December 1692, it is said in consequence of a large dose of opium, taken by mistake. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Brady, and a monument erected to his honor in Westminster abbey, by his son sir John. The best known of his plays were his Virtuoso—the Gentleman of Alsace—Epsom Wells—the Misanthrope—and the Lancashire Witches—comedies.

SHARTESBURY, Anthony Ashley COOPER, earl of, a celebrated statesman, was born, in 1621, at Winborne, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Exeter College, Oxford; and studied the law at Lincoln's Inn. In his nineteenth year he was chosen representative for Tewkesbury. At first he leaned to the king's party, but ultimately espoused that of the people. He was hostile, however, to Cromwell's usurpation, and he took an active part in restoring Charles II. For his services to the royal cause, he was made chancellor of the exchequer, and a lord of the treasury, and created Lord Ashley. He formed a part of the Cabal administration; but it is doubtful whether he participated in some of its worst measures. In 1672, he was made earl of Shaftesbury, and appointed lord chancellor. At the end of a twelve-month, however, he resigned the seals, which even his bitterest enemies confessed that he had held with honor to himself. He was but once more in office, and that only for four months, in 1679; but during that brief period he conferred on his country the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Act. The rest of his life was spent in opposition to the unconstitutional measures of Charles II. For this conduct he was libelled by Dryden, and a swarm of inferior writers; was twice committed to the Tower; and was accused of treason, but the grand jury threw out the bill. He at length withdrew, in 1682, to Holland; and died there January 22, 1683.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley COOPER, earl of, a celebrated writer, the grandson of the foregoing, was born, in 1671, in London. His education was partly private, and partly received at Winchester. After having travelled, he became, in 1693, M. P. for Pool, and, as a senator, he acted on enlightened and liberal principles. Subsequently, however, his delicate health deterred him from taking an active part in public affairs; and he devoted his leisure to literature. He died, in 1713, at Naples. His works, the style of which is polished with too laborious care, were collected in three volumes, under the title of Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times.

SHAKSPEARE, William, the illustrious poet of Nature, was born of a respectable family at Stratford on Avon, April, 1564. His father was engaged in the wool trade, and of ten children the poet was the eldest. He was early removed from the grammar school of Stratford, as business, and not learning, was to form the employment of his future life; but after being some time engaged in his father's trade, he married, at the age of seventeen. At this time he unfortunately formed a connection with some dissipated companions, and in a thoughtless hour he accompanied them in deer stealing, in the park of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford. The offence was again and again repeated, and a prosecution was consequently begun against the depredaters; but the young poet, instead of conciliating the baronet by submission, wrote a ballad upon him, with such satirical bitterness, that it became unsafe for him to remain at Stratford. He fled therefore to London, to escape the law, and soon enrolled himself among the players. For a while he maintained himself in the character of an inferior performer; but the acquaintance which he formed with the stage was productive of the noblest consequences. Though his name appears in the list of the actors of those days, it is not ascertained that he rose to any eminence in the profession, as Mr. Rowe asserts, that the Ghost in his own Hamlet was the highest character which he could venture to perform. He was, however, born not to act, but to delineate characters, not to play the hero, or the tyrant of a foreign muse, but to create characters and beings of his own, and with the pencil of nature, to portray in the most glowing colors, the various emotions of the heart. Without patronage from the great, and an exile from his native town, the poet at last burst to eminence and fame. His plays became popular, several of them were performed before the court, and Elizabeth was so pleased with his Falstaff, in the two parts of Henry IV., that she wished to see the valiant knight in love, and the hint produced the inimitable drama of the Merry Wives of Windsor. These meritorious exertions for the entertainment of the court, and of the public, no doubt raised patrons to the poet; but little is known of them, and the name of lord Southampton only is mentioned, as distinguishing him with his friendship and confidence. It is said that in one instance the generous lord gave the poet £1,000, to enable him to complete a purchase which he had made. For some years Shakspeare, as allied with Ben Jonson, and the other wits and poets of the age, was manager of the playhouse, and after he had acquired a competent fortune, he retired to his native town, where he lived respected and beloved by his neighbors. The mulberry tree which he planted in his garden afterwards became an object of veneration, and when cut down by the hands of an avaricious proprietor, the wood was fashioned into various utensils, which sold for a high price, and were preserved with more than common affection, as a precious memorial of the immortal planter. Shakspeare made his will in the beginning of 1616, and died the 23d of April of the same year, in the 53d year of his age. As an author, Shakspeare deserves particular praise, as in originality, sublime conception, force and delineation, he has surpassed the poets of every age, and every country; and he therefore is properly the boast and the glory of England. In the midst, however, of his great and incomparable beauties, there are many blemishes, and while he scatters roses with a full and liberal hand, he is careless of the offensive weeds which accompany his exuberant profusion. His plays, of which it is scarce possible to trace the history or to discover the date, except from a few scattered passages, have been often published, and by their own intrinsic merit, have given celebrity even to those who, as editors, have bestowed some labor in the elucidation of them. The first collection of them was in 1623, in folio, by two of his friends and fellow comedians, Heminge and Condell, and afterwards they engaged the attention of Rowe, in 1714, of Pope in 1721; of Theobald in 1726, of Hanmer in 1744, in 6 vols. 4to., of Warburton in 1747, of Dr. Johnson in 1765, of Steevens in 1766, of Capell in 1768, of Johnson and Steevens in 1778, besides more modern editions, and the publication of separate plays.

SHARP, James, a Scotch prelate, born of a good family in Banffshire, 1618. He was educated at Aberdeen, and early distinguished himself as an able opponent against the Covenanters. He was in England, where he was noticed by Hammond, Taylor, and others, and in consequence of his great abilities was patronised by lords Rothes and Crauford, and obtained some preferment. He was the advocate of a Presbyterian party for Scotland before Cromwell, and acquitted himself of his duty with great dexterity, and when Monk was commander in Scotland, he used the talents of Sharp in his attempts to settle the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom, and in soliciting the approbation of the exiled king to the proposed measures. At the restoration he became a convert to the principles of the Church of England, and was made archbishop of St. Andrew's; but this elevation was considered as a shameful dereliction of his friends, and the covenanters were determined to sacrifice him to their resentment. His life was attempted in 1679, by a fanatic preacher; but in 1679, nine assassins proved more successful, and he was barbarously murdered on Magask moor, three miles from St. Andrew's. He was then in his coach with his daughter, but neither her cries, nor his entreaties availed, and he fell, pierced with twenty-two wounds.

SHARP, John, D. D., an English prelate, born at Bradford, Yorkshire, 1644. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge, and after he had taken orders he became chaplain to Sir Heneage Finch, attorney-general. In 1672, he was made archdeacon of Berks, and in 1675, prebendary of Norwich, and then rector of St. Bartholomew near the Exchange, and afterwards of St. Giles' in the Fields. In 1686 he was suspended, for preaching in favor of the Anglican church against popery; but though the bishop of London, who refused to pronounce against him, was himself suspended, the storm of disgrace passed away, and he was restored to favor, and in 1689, promoted to the deanery of Canterbury. Though he refused some of the bishoprics vacated in consequence of the refusal of the bishops to take the oath of allegiance to William, yet he consented to succeed to the see of York, on the death of Dr. Lamplugh. He preached the sermon on Anne's coronation, and was made privy counsellor. He died at Bath, 1713, and was buried in York cathedral, where an inscription by Dr. Smalridge records his merits. His sermons, in 7 vols. 8vo., have been published since his death, and are deservedly popular.

SHARP, Thomas, D. D., younger son of the preceding, was born in Yorkshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, 1723. He became chaplain to archbishop Dawes, of York, and obtained the rectory of Rothbury, Northumberland, a prebend of Durham, and the archdeaconry of Northumberland. He died 1758, aged 65. He is author of two Dissertations on the Etymology of the Hebrew words Elohim and Berith, 8vo.—besides Discourses on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Tongue and Characters. He was father to Granville Sharp, so eminently known as an elegant classical scholar, and as the author of Remarks on the Definitive Article in the Greek Testament, 12mo.

SHARP, William, an eminent engraver, was born, in 1740, in Haydon Yard, in the Minories; was apprenticed to Mr. Longmate, a writing engraver; rose to excellence in the highest branch of the graphic art by dint of his own unassisted exertions; and died July 25, 1824. His works are numerous, and are held in high estimation. His talent was all confined to his art. He was, in other respects, a common place being; and was, in succession, the dupe of Mesmer, Swedenborg, Brothers, and Joanna Southcott.

SHARPE, Gregory, D. D., an able divine, born in Yorkshire, 1713. From Hull School he went to Westminster under Dr. Friend, and then completed his education at Aberdeen, under Dr. Blackwell. Soon after his return to England he took orders, and then became minister of Broadway chapel, St. James', and chaplain to the king, and next succeeded Dr. Nicolls, as master of the Temple. He died 8th Jan. 1771, highly respected for his virtues, and his extensive knowledge of oriental literature. He wrote a Review of the Controversy about the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 8vo.—Two Dissertations on the Origin of Language, and the Power of Letters, with a Hebrew Lexicon, 8vo.—Defence of Dr. Clarke against Leibnitz, 8vo.—Dissertation on the Origin and Structure of the Latin Tongue, 8vo.—Two arguments in Favor of Christianity—Holberg's Introduction to Universal History, translated, 8vo.—Sermons, 8vo.

SHARROCH, Robert, LL. D. a clergyman's son, born at Adstock, Buckinghamshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New College, Oxford. He was prebendary and archdeacon of Winchester, and rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, and of Horewood, Bucks, and died 1684, much respected as a divine, and as a man. He wrote the History of the Propagation and Improvement of Vegetables, 8vo.—Hypothesis de Officiis secundum Humanæ Rationis Dicitæ, seu Naturæ Jus, unde Casus Conscientiæ, 8vo., against Hobbes—Judicia, seu Legum Censuræ, de Variis Incontinentiæ Speciebus, 8vo.—De Finibus Virtutis Christianæ, in several discourses, 4to.

SHAW, Thomas, D. D. a celebrated traveller, born at Kendal, Westmoreland, 1692, and educated there, and at Queen's college, Oxford. When he took orders in 1719, he received the appointment of chaplain to the English factory of Algiers, and during his residence there, he made various excursions to examine the curiosities and antiquities of the country. In his absence he was chosen fellow of his college, and returned in 1733, and the next year took his doctor's degree, and in 1740, was appointed principal of Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hants. He was afterwards regius professor of Greek, and died 15th Aug. 1751. His travels were published at Oxford, in 1738, and have often been reprinted. They contain an interesting and accurate account of Barbary and the Levant, and particularly of Egypt, and were ably vindicated by the author, against the attacks of Dr. Pococke.

SHAW, Cutbert, an English poet, son of a shoe-maker, born at Ravensworth, Yorkshire, 1739. He was brought up at Seorton school, where he became assistant, and afterwards also at Darlington grammar school; but this laborious confinement was too much for his volatile spirit. He therefore removed to London, in quest of easier employment, and went afterwards to Bury, and engaged as actor in the Norwich company. In 1760 he performed Sir George Wealthy, in the Minor, under Foote, at the Haymarket, and the next year he appeared on the boards of Covent Garden, but met with little public encouragement. After a life of chequered adventures and misery, he died 1771, in very indigent circumstances. He was author of Liberty, 4to. 1756—Odes on the Four Seasons, 4to. 1760, published under the name of Seymour—the Four Farthing Candles, 4to. 1762, a poem, which attacked and ridiculed Lloyd, Churchill, Colman, and Shirley—the Race, a satirical poem on the chief poets of the time, 1766—a Monody on his Wife, whom he lost 1768, soon after his marriage. He wrote also an Account of the Beaume de Vie, a quack medicine, of which he was proprietor.

SHAW, Stebbing, a native of Stowe, Staffordshire, educated at Repton school, and Queen's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his master's degree. He travelled in 1787, through the Highlands of Scotland, and the next year visited the West of England, of which two journeys he published an account separately, of no great merit. In 1789, he was engaged in the Topographer, which contained extracts from curious works preserved in the British museum; but this work was discontinued in 1791. The first volume of his History of Staffordshire, a work of considerable merit, and of great labor, appeared 1793, folio, and three years after, the first part of the second volume was published. This respectable divine, who had, in 1799, succeeded to the living of Hartshorn, Derbyshire, on his father's death, died 1803, aged only 41.

SHAW, George, a naturalist, was born, in 1751, at Berton, in Buckinghamshire. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; studied medicine at Edinburgh; and took his degree at Oxford. He was a fellow of the Royal Society; vice president of the Linnæan Society; and librarian and assistant keeper of natural history at the British Museum. He died in 1813. His principal works are, General Zoology; Zoological Lectures; and the Zoology of New Holland. He also conducted the Naturalist's Miscellany; and was one of the editors of the abridged Philosophical Transactions.

SHAYS, Daniel, an officer in the American revolutionary war, but more known as the leader of an insurrection in Massachusetts, in 1787. At Springfield, with a force of two thousand men, he attempted to seize the United States' arsenal; but they were soon dispersed. He also made an attempt to organize an opposition to the government at Pelham; but here also he was routed, and one hundred and fifty of his men were taken prisoners. There was thought to be no occasion for severity with these deluded persons. Even Shays, after a while, was pardoned, and he then removed to Sparta, New York. He died at the advanced age of 85, September 29, 1825. In the latter part of his life he received a pension of twenty dollars a month for revolutionary services.

SHEBBEARE, John, a native of Bideford, Devon, educated there under Mr. Mudge, the master of the grammar school. He was apprenticed to an apothecary, and after being in business in Bristol, he removed in 1740, to London. His politics, however, were unfriendly to the government, and he went to Paris, where he was admitted member of the academy of sciences, and presented to a doctor's degree. On his return to England, he published the Marriage Act—and Lydia, or Filial Piety, two satirical novels of little merit, and in 1759, his seventh Letter to the People of England, exposed him to the resentment of government, and he was pilloried. On the accession of George III. he obtained a pension from lord Bute, and laying aside his attachment to the Stuart family, he defended the conduct of government in several pamphlets, especially at the beginning of the American war. He wrote also an History of Jersey, 2 vols. 8vo. 1771, in which he with partial severity, attacks the conduct of the chief magistrate of the island—History of the Sumatrans, 2 vols.—Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea, 4 vols.—Practice of Physic, 2 vols. 8vo.—Letters on the English Nation, under the name of Angeloni, 2 vols. 8vo. He died 1788, aged 79.

SHEFFIELD, John, duke of Buckinghamshire, a respectable poet, and able statesman, born 1650. Though he lost his father when only nine years old, his education was not neglected; but assiduity brought to perfection, the naturally strong powers of his mind. After travelling into France, he went as volunteer in the second Dutch war, and afterwards made a campaign in the French service. He was next intrusted by Charles II. with the defence of Tangier, on the coast of Africa, which was threatened by the Moors. He soon became a great favorite at court, though his violent partiality for the princess Anne, afterwards queen, involved him in temporary disgrace. Under James II. he was privy counsellor, and lord chamberlain; and though he did not at first approve of the revolution, he afterwards warmly supported the measures for proclaiming William king, against those who wished to appoint Mary sole sovereign. Under Anne he was raised from the rank of an earl to that of duke of Normandy, and afterwards of Buckinghamshire, and was made steward of the household, and president of the council. On George's accession, he retired from the court, and died 24th February 1720-1. His works were elegantly published in 1729, in 2 vols. 8vo. the first of which contains his Essay on Poetry, his Rehearsal, and other poems, written on several occasions, and the second his prose works, consisting of essays, speeches, historical memoirs, dialogues, and letters. His learning and abilities have been greatly praised by his contemporaries; but later writers affect to speak with indifference of his compositions, and consider the adulation of Prior, Dryden, Addison, Garth, and Pope, as paid more to the nobleman, and the favorite of courts, than to the man of poetical merit and deserved literary fame.

SHEFFIELD, John Baker HOLROYD, earl of, a statesman, was born, about 1735, at Penn, in Buckinghamshire; sat in the house of commons for Coventry and Bristol; obtained an Irish peerage; and died in 1821. He possessed considerable knowledge upon mercantile subjects; and wrote several pamphlets on Irish and American commerce, and on the corn and wool trade. Holroyd was one of the most intimate friends of Gibbon, whose miscellaneous works he edited.

SHELBY, Isaac, a distinguished American revolutionary officer, was born December 11, 1750, near Hagers Town, Maryland. He received a common English education in Fredericktown, and acted as a deputy sheriff in Frederick county previous to his becoming of age. He removed with his father to the western waters when twenty-one years old. In 1774, he was appointed a lieutenant in the expedition under Lewis, against the Shawanees and other Indian tribes north-west of the Ohio. In 1775, he went to Kentucky, and engaged in the business of a land surveyor. After nearly a twelve months' exposure in the cane-brakes, living without bread or salt, his health beginning to fail, he returned home. In 1776, and before his return from Kentucky, the committee of safety in Virginia appointed him captain of a minute company—a species of troops organized upon the first breaking out of the revolution—but not called into service from the extreme frontier on which he lived. In 1777, he was appointed by the governor of Virginia a commissary to supply rations for the militia posted in several garrisons to guard the back settlements, and to lay in supplies for a grand treaty, to be held at the Long Island of Holston river, with the Cherokees. These supplies were not to be obtained nearer than Staunton in Virginia, a distance of three hundred miles; and to accomplish it, required the exertion of all the energy, enterprise and perseverance which marked his character. In 1778, he was still engaged in the commissary department to provide supplies for the continental army, and for a formidable expedition by the way of Pittsburgh against the north-western Indians. In 1779, he was appointed by governor Henry to furnish supplies for a campaign against the Chickamoggy Indians—a numerous banditti on the south side of the Tennessee river, under the control of a daring Cherokee chief, called Drggon Canoe, who, after his defeat at the Long Island of Holston, in 1776, had declared eternal war against the whites. The frontiers from Georgia to Pennsylvania suffered from their depredations more than from all the other hostile tribes together. Owing to the poverty of the treasury, the government was unable to advance the necessary funds, and the whole expense of the supplies, including transportation, was sustained by his individual credit. In the spring of the same year, he was elected a member of the Virginia legislature from Washington county; and in the autumn, was commissioned by governor Jefferson as a major in the escort of guards to the commissioners for extending the boundary between Virginia and North Carolina. After the surrender of Charleston, and the loss of the southern army in 1780, he devoted himself to the military service of his country, and, throughout the residue of the revolutionary struggle, was actively engaged in fighting her battles in the south. For his conduct in the battle of King's mountain, October 7, 1780, he received a vote of thanks and an elegant sword, from the legislature of North Carolina. In 1781 he was chosen a member of that body, and the following year was reelected. He was also appointed one of the commissioners to settle the preemption claims on the Cumberland river, and lay off the lands allotted to the officers and soldiers of the North Carolina line, south of where Nashville now stands. This service he performed in the winter of 1782-3. After the separation between Virginia and Kentucky, and the formation of a constitution for the latter state, by a convention, of which colonel Shelly was a member, he was chosen governor of Kentucky, in 1792. From 1796, after the expiration of his term of office, until 1812, he lived in retirement, discharging no public duty whatever, except that of elector for president and vice-president to which he was invariably called. In the latter year he was again chosen governor, and during the war was zealous in his exertions to aid the common cause. In 1813, he marched at the head of four thousand men across the state of Ohio, to the frontier, where general Harrison commanded the American forces. In 1816, he returned to private life, and in 1818, acted as a commissioner, in conjunction with general Jackson, in forming a treaty with the Chickasaw Indians. In 1820, he experienced a paralytic stroke which rendered his right arm useless, and occasioned a slight lameness during the rest of his life. His death occurred suddenly, July 18, 1826, in the 76th year of his age, in consequence of a stroke of apoplexy.

SHELDON, Gilbert, a distinguished prelate, born at Stanton, Staffordshire, 1598. He was admitted at Trinity college, Oxford, 1613, and in 1622 was elected fellow of All Souls. He afterwards took orders, and was made prebendary of Gloucester, and recommended by his patron, lord Coventry, to Charles I. who gave him the living of Hackney and other preferments. In 1635 he was elected warden of his college, and would have risen to higher honors had not the civil wars prevented his elevation. His attachment to the king, rendered him suspected by the parliament, and he was deprived of his preferment, imprisoned with Dr. Hammond, and when set at liberty, forbidden to visit his royal master at the Isle of Wight. He retired to Shelston, Derbyshire, and at the restoration recovered his ecclesiastical appointments, and was soon after made master of the Savoy, dean of the chapel royal, and successor to Juxon in the see of London. In 1663 he became primate, and in 1667, succeeded lord Clarendon as chancellor of Oxford. His freedom with the king, in advising him to put away his mistress, Barbara Villiers, proved so offensive, that he retired from the court, and spent the rest of his days at Croydon, where he died 9th November 1677, aged near 80. His only publication was a sermon, preached before the king at Whitehall. His munificence was very great, he expended not less than £66,000 in charitable purposes.

SHELLEY, Percy Bysshe, eldest son of sir Timothy Shelley, Sussex, was born at Field-place, in that county, August 4, 1792. He was sent to Eton, whence he was early removed to Oxford.

This removal was owing to his eccentricity of character, which led him to neglect the studies and violate the rules of the school, and finally resulted in his expulsion from Oxford. His family naturally offended with his conduct, and not less with his free opinions on matters of religion, was still further estranged by an ill-assorted marriage. The result was very unfortunate, for after the birth of two children, a separation took place by mutual consent; and the death of the lady soon after exposed him to much obloquy. On the decease of his first wife, he married Miss Godwin, daughter of the celebrated author of Political Justice, by Mary Wolstonecraft, and soon after retired to Marlow, in Buckinghamshire, where he wrote his Revolt of Islam. About this time, application was made by his family to deprive him of the guardianship of his two children, a boy and a girl, on the ground of his atheistical and sceptical notions, and certain dangerous opinions respecting the intercourse of the sexes. The application succeeded, principally owing to a juvenile production, called Queen Mab, written while at Oxford, and published without the consent of the author. This event caused him much uneasiness, and probably induced him to quit England, and repair, with his second wife and their children, to Italy, where he renewed an acquaintance with lord Byron, to whom he had become known during a former visit to the continent. With him and Leigh Hunt, Shelley joined in a periodical miscellany, published in London, entitled the Liberal. This publication, which contained the Vision of Judgment by lord Byron, and other original productions, was interrupted by the untimely death of Mr. Shelley, who was drowned in his return from Leghorn to his house, on the gulf of Lerici in the bay of Spezia, by the wreck of his sailing boat, in a sudden storm, July, 1822. A few days afterwards, the body was washed on shore near Via Reggio, and was subsequently reduced to ashes by his friends. Shelley's remains were deposited in the Protestant burial ground at Rome. At the time of his decease, Mr. Shelley had nearly completed his thirtieth year. His principal works are The Revolt of Islam; Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude; The Cenci, a tragedy; Adonais; Hellas; Prometheus Unbound; and a posthumous volume of poems.

SHEENSTONE, William, a celebrated English poet, born at Hales-Owen, Shropshire, November, 1714. He was taught to read by an old dame, whose kind services he has transmitted to posterity in his School Mistress, and from his earliest years he showed a great fondness for books. After being at Hales-Owen school, and at Solihull, under Mr. Crompton, he removed in 1732, to Pembroke college, Oxford, a respectable society, among which he derived both delight and advantage, as he continued his name among them ten years, though he took no academical degree. After wandering about and visiting sometimes London, sometimes Bath, yet without forgetting the muses, he settled, 1745, on his estate, on the death of his friend Mr. Dolman, who had, with indefatigable attention and strict integrity hitherto regulated his affairs. But his object here was not to increase his income, but to improve the beauties of his estate; and by degrees, through inattention and injudicious expense, he brought on himself pecuniary distress, and probably hastened his own death by the difficulties and anxieties which surrounded him. He was a lamp, as his biographer observes, that spent its oil in blazing. He was attacked by a putrid fever, which proved fatal, at the Leasowes, 11th February 1763. The tenderness and generosity of his character are mentioned with deserved applause. He was kind to all within his influence, but so irascible, that, if once offended, he was not easily appeased. He was inattentive to economy, and careless of his expenses, but his life was unstained by any crime. His mind was not very comprehensive, nor his curiosity active, and he esteemed light those parts of learning which he had not cultivated. His works have been published by Dodsley, in 3 vols. 8vo. consisting of twenty-six elegies, songs, odes, ballads, moral pieces, &c. written with ease, elegance, and simplicity. His epistolary correspondence afterwards appeared by Mr. Hull, in 2 vols. 8vo. and recollections of his life have been published by his venerable friend Mr. Graves.

SHEPARD, Thomas, a native of England, was born November 5, 1605, and was educated at Immanuel college, Cambridge, in that country. After leaving the university he became a preacher of some distinction; but, being a puritan, he was induced to seek an abode in America. He arrived in Boston, October 3, 1635; and engaged in the formation of a church at Cambridge, Massachusetts. Here he continued, as pastor of the new society, till his death, which took place, August 25th, 1649, being then 44 years of age. He exerted a powerful influence upon the interests of learning and religion, in this then infant country. It has been supposed that Harvard college was located at Cambridge, partly at least, on account of his influence there. His publications were numerous for that period. The following is a list of them. Theses Sabbaticæ—A Letter, entitled, New England's Lamentation for Old England's Errors—Cautions against Spiritual Drunkenness, a sermon—Subjection to Christ in all his ordinances the best means to preserve our Liberty—The Sincere Convert—The Sound Believer—Singing of Psalms, a gospel ordinance—Clear sunshine of the gospel upon the Indians—An Answer to Mr. Ball, on the church—The evangelical call—The Right Use of Liberty—The Parable of the Ten Virgins—The churchmembership of Children, and their right to Baptism—and the Saint's Jewel and soul's imitation of Jesus Christ.

SHEPREVE, John, an eminent scholar, born at Sugworth near Abingdon, Berks, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became Greek reader. In 1538, he succeeded Wakefield as university professor of Hebrew, and acquired great popularity as a lecturer. He had a most retentive memory, and wrote verses with astonishing rapidity, often one hundred during the vacant hours of the day. He died at Amersham in Buckinghamshire, 1542. He wrote Summa & Synopsis Novi Testamenti Ducentis Sexaginta Distichis Comprehensa, 8vo.—Hippolytus Ovidianæ Phædræ Responsions, &c. His nephew William, was a Roman catholic, who wrote some religious pieces, and died at Rome, 1593.

SHERARD, or SHERWOOD, William, LL.D., an eminent botanist born in Leicestershire, and educated at Merchant-Taylors' school, and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and where he took the degree of bachelor of laws 1677. During his travels abroad as tutor to some noblemen, he visited the chief places of Europe, and was honored with the acquaintance of the great Boerhaave, of Tonrnefort, and other learned men. He obtained the appointment of consul at Smyrna in 1702, and during sixteen years' residence in this distant region, he applied himself to form a valuable collection of the plants of Asia Minor and Greece, and to examine every thing remarkable as a subject of antiquity, or of natural history. After visiting England, he returned to the continent, and ascended the Alps in search of plants, where he nearly escaped being shot by a peasant, who mistook him for a wolf as he was lying on the ground. On his return to England he was attended by Dillenius, to whom he gave an honorable asylum at his seat at Eltham, and whom he appointed first professor in the botanical professorship which he founded at Oxford by the bequest of £3000. He had been admitted doctor of laws at Oxford, in 1718, and he died ten years after, much respected for his benevolence and liberality, as well as his great learning and extensive information. He published Herman's Paradius Batavus, 4to.—Schola Botanica, 12mo. which appeared under the name of Wharton, and he made some valuable communications to the philosophical transactions.

SHERBURNE, sir Edward, an English writer, born at St. Giles' Cripplegate, London, 1618, and educated at Mr. Furnaby's school. He travelled abroad, and, in 1641, succeeded on his father's death as clerk of the ordnance, from which he was soon afterwards ejected by the House of Lords for adhering to the king. He then joined the king, and was at the battle of Edgehill, and retired with Charles to Oxford, where he was made master of arts. When Oxford surrendered to the parliament, he, after suffering much in his property from parliamentary prosecution, went to London, and lived for some time in the Middle Temple. In 1652 he travelled abroad with sir John Coventry, and at the restoration was reinstated in his clerkship, and knighted by Charles II. On the abdication of James II. he was deprived of his offices, and lived the rest of his life in retirement, and died 4th November 1702, aged 85. He translated some of Seneca's tragedies into English, besides the Sphere of Manilius, Theocritus' 16th Idyllium, and poems and other translations.

SHERIDAN, Thomas D.D., a divine and poet, born about 1634, in the county of Cavan, Ireland. Though his parents were in indigent circumstances, he received by the kindness of his friends a good education, which he finished at Dublin college. He afterwards kept a school in Dublin, and obtained celebrity by the number of his scholars, and the diligence and abilities with which he instructed them. He was presented by the friendship of Swift to a living in the South of Ireland, worth about £150 per ann. but his sermon on these words, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof," preached at Cork on the anniversary of the first George's birth day, seemed so pointed at the politics of the times, that he ruined all hopes of further preferment. He afterwards exchanged his living for that of Dunboyne, and again exchanged that for the free school of Cavan; but his temper was fickle, and dissatisfied with the air, or more properly with the inhabitants of his new appointment, he sold it for £400. He died some time after in indigent circumstances, 10th September 1738, aged 55. Lord Corke describes him as better acquainted with books than men, as slovenly, indigent, and cheerful, yet in the midst of his poverty still a quibbler, a punster, a fiddler, and a wit, who never suffered the day to pass without a rebus, an anagram or a madrigal. He published a prose translation of Persius, with judicious notes, 12mo. 1739, and his correspondence with Swift, &c. has also appeared in Swift's Miscellanies.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Quilca in Ireland, and educated at Westminster school and Dublin university. He early showed a partiality for the stage, and in 1743, when twenty-two years old, he personated Richard III. in the Smock-alley theatre, after which he exhibited on the boards of Covent-Garden. In 1744, æ undertook the management of the Dublin stage, but he met with such opposition in his attempts to reform abuses and to introduce regularity, that a conspiracy was formed against him, and a mob threatened the demolition of his theatre. Thus driven from Dublin he became an itinerant lecturer on elocution, and he acquired such celebrity in this new method of conveying instruction, that not only his own university, but Cambridge, honored him with the degree of M.A. About 1760, he again had recourse to the stage, and appeared at Drury-lane theatre with great applause, and had the interest to obtain a pension from the government. In 1767, he engaged himself at the Haymarket, and for a while amused the town with his Artic Evening, an entertaining medley of singing, music, and repetition. He quitted the stage in 1776, but he resigned three years after, and again had recourse to his lectures and literary labors. He died at Margate 1788, aged 67. He was author of several works, the best known of which are, a Dictionary of the English language, in which he attempts to establish a permanent standard of pronunciation, 4to. and 2 vols. 12mo.—British Education, or the Source of the Disorders of Great Britain, 8vo.—Lectures on the Art of Reading, 8vo.—Dissertation on the Causes and Difficulties of learning the English Tongue, 4to.—Course of Lectures on Elocution, 4to.—Life of Swift prefixed to his works, 8vo. Elements of English, 12mo.

SHERIDAN, Richard Brinsley, was born October 31, 1751, at Dublin; was educated at Harrow, and studied the law at Lincoln's Inn; but was not called to the bar. He married early in life, and, having exhausted his pecuniary resources, he looked to literature for his immediate subsistence. His first dramatic attempt was The Rivals, which was but imperfectly successful. The Duenna, however, and The School for Scandal, placed him foremost among living dramatists; and he sustained his reputation by The Critic. In 1776 he became one of the proprietors of Drury Lane Theatre; and in 1780 he was elected member for Stafford. For two and thirty years he pursued a splendid parliamentary career, during which he was unrivalled in wit, and had few equals in eloquence. One of his greatest efforts of oratory was his speech, as manager, upon the impeachment of Hastings. He was thrice in office, for short periods, under the Rockingham coalition, and whig administrations. In his latter years he drank deeply of the cup of bitterness. His profuse habits involved him deeply in debt; the destruction of Drury Lane Theatre by fire contributed to his ruin; his failure to obtain a seat in parliament deprived him of protection from arrest; his person was more than once seized by the harpies of the law; and, amidst difficulties, fears, and sorrows, this highly gifted man sunk to the grave on the 7th of July, 1816. His poems and plays were collected, in two volumes, by Moore, who also wrote a Life of him.

SHERLOCK, William D.D., an English divine, born at Southwark 1641, and educated at Eton, and Peter house, Cambridge. In 1669, he obtained the rectory of St. George's Botolph lane, London, and a prebend of St. Paul's, and soon after was chosen master of the Temple. He was an able advocate for the church of England against the papists, but at the revolution he refused to take the oath of allegiance, though he afterwards complied, and published an account and vindication of his conduct, which was severely censured by the non-jurors. In 1691, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and died 19th June, 1707. He had a controversy with Dr. South about the Trinity, and also published various sermons, and some pamphlets on death and the last judgment. Burnet says that he was a clear and strong writer, but that the contempt he expressed for his adversaries made him pass for an insolent and haughty man.

SHERLOCK, Thomas, D.D., a learned prelate, son of the preceding, and born 1678. He was of Catherine hall, Cambridge, of which he was elected master. He was early eminent for his learning, and the policy and wisdom of his conduct at the head of a house procured him from Dr. Middleton the title of the principal champion and ornament of the church and university. He succeeded his father as master of the Temple, and this honorable appointment was held by father and son for more than seventy years. He displayed great abilities in the vindication of the corporation and test acts against the attacks of bishop Hoadley; and also in the defence of the use and intent of prophecy, in six discourses delivered at the Temple, in answer to Collins, and also in an able vindication of the miracle of Christ's resurrection against the attacks of Woolston. He wrote besides other controversial works; but his sermons ... 4 vols. 8vo. are particularly valuable, as compositions of elegance, ingenuity, and erudition. In 1728, Dr. Sherlock was made bishop of Bangor, and in 1734, was translated to Salisbury, but in 1747, on the death of Potter, he refused the offer of the metropolitan see, in consequence of a severe illness under which he labored, though the following year he accepted the diocese of London. He died July 18, 1761, in his 84th year. His private character was adorned with the purest virtues of benevolence and humanity. He sent two thousand copies of his excellent discourse to the colonies and settlements of America, and presented his valuable library to Catherine hall, where he founded a scholarship and the office of a librarian.

SHERLOCK, Richard, D.D., a native of Oxton in Werral, Cheshire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Trinity college, Dublin. He obtained some preferment in Ireland, but during the civil wars returned to England, and was made chaplain to one of the king's regiments. At the restoration he took the degree of doctor of divinity at Dublin, and was presented by his patron lord Derby, to the valuable living of Winwick, Lancashire, where he died 20th June, 1689, aged 76. The best of his works are, the Practical Christian, 8vo. to the sixth edition of which his life is prefixed by bishop Wilson—Confessions, Meditations, and Prayers, for the Sacrament, 8vo.—pieces against the quakers.

SHERMAN, John, one of the first ministers of Watertown, Massachusetts. He was born in England 1618, and was educated at Cambridge in that country. His puritan principles were his inducement for seeking an abode in America, which he did in 1634. For a short time he was an assistant to Mr. Phillips at Watertown, and then removed to the state of Connecticut; but, on the death of Mr. Phillips in 1644, he returned to Watertown, and was minister in that place till his death, which took place August 8, 1675, at the age of 71. Mr. Sherman was a distinguished divine, and was also distinguished as a mathematician. For several years he published an almanac.

SHIPPEN, Edward, LL.D., the first mayor of Philadelphia, was born in that city, February 16, 1729. He commenced the study of law in his native city; but completed his course at the temple in London. On his return to Philadelphia he soon rose high in public estimation. He was an accomplished commercial lawyer, and in all that related to the practice and process of courts, possessed singularly accurate and extensive knowledge. After holding other judicial offices, he was in 1799 appointed chief-justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. He resigned this office in 1805; and died April 16th 1806, aged 77 years.

SHIPPEN, William, an eminent physician, was born in Pennsylvania, and was graduated at Princeton College in 1754. His medical studies were completed at Edinburgh, and on his return in 1764 he began at Philadelphia the first course of lectures on anatomy ever delivered in the country. He assisted in establishing the medical school of that city, and was appointed one of its professors. In 1777 he was appointed director-general of the medical department in the army. He died in 1808.

SHIPLEY, Jonathan, an English prelate, born 1714. He took his degrees at Christ-church, and upon entering into orders obtained a living, and in 1743, was made prebendary of Winchester. After travelling, in 1745, with the duke of Cumberland as his chaplain, he was promoted in 1749 to a canonry at Christ church, became dean of Winchester in 1760, and in 1769 bishop of St. Asaph. He was author of some elegant verses on the death of queen Caroline, and published besides, some poems, and sermons preached on public occasions, and died 1788.

SHIRLEY, sir Antony, a native of Wiston, Sussex, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of All Souls. He studied the law, but afterwards accompanied sir Philip Sydney to the Low Countries, and in 1596, he was sent to America by queen Elizabeth. He next attended Essex when lord lieutenant of Ireland, and was knighted there, after which he went abroad, and became so much respected for his knowledge and acquirements that the king of Spain created him a grandee of the kingdom, and appointed him admiral of his fleet. James I. jealous of these honors bestowed on one of his subjects recalled him home, but he had the boldness to refuse, and died in Spain 1640, aged 75. He was author of a Voyage to America, inserted in Hackluyt's collection—Account of Muley Hamet's Elevation to the Kingdom of Morocco, 4to.—History of his Travels into Persia, 4to.—Voyage over the Caspian and through Russia, in Purcha's Pilgrims—and History of his Embassies, fol. His brother Robert accompanied him into Persia and settled there, and became so great a favorite at court, that the emperor not only employed him as his ambassador to Poland and to England, but gave him his own niece in marriage, and loaded him with honors and opulence. He died, it is said, of a broken heart on his return to Persia, 23d July, 1627, aged 63, because he had been treated as an impostor at the English court by his predecessor, the Persian ambassador, and because he was not able to receive in Persia that satisfaction which he expected.

SHIRLEY, James, an English dramatic writer and poet, born in London, 1594. He was educated at Merchant Taylor's and at St. John's college, Oxford, which he left without a degree to go to Cambridge, where he took his degrees. He afterwards took orders and served a cure near St. Alban's, but changed his religion for that of Rome, and then settled at St. Alban's where he kept a school, from which he removed to London. There he devoted himself to writing plays, and was patronised by Charles's queen, but when the civil wars broke out, and plays became unpopular among the republican fanatics, he had recourse to education for support, and kept a school at White-friars with some reputation. The fire of London which robbed him of his property proved so terrific to him that both himself and his wife died in consequence of fright within twenty-four hours of each other, and were buried in the same grave, 29th October 1669. He wrote thirty-seven plays, besides a volume of poems, and was patronised by lord Newcastle.

SHIRLEY, William, governor of Massachusetts, was educated a lawyer. He was a native of England, and came to Boston about the year 1733. In 1741 he was appointed governor of the province; and retained the office till 1756, when he was superseded by Abercrombie. Subsequently he was for a number of years governor of one of the Bahama islands, but returned to Massachusetts, and died at Roxbury, in March 1771. He was a man of talents and great industry. The abolition of paper currency was owing in a great measure to his firmness and perseverance. Though he held several of the most lucrative offices within the gift of the crown in America, yet he left no property for his children.

SHORE, Jane, wife of Matthew Shore, a goldsmith in Lombard-street, is known in history as the mistress of the voluptuous Edward IV. To great and fascinating personal charms she added some of the best qualities of the heart, and though she had not virtue enough to withstand temptation, she was benevolent and humane in the midst of a debauched court. After the king's death she lived with lord Hastings, and when he fell under the tyranny of the third Richard, she was seized as an accomplice in his pretended conspiracy, and felt all the resentment of the usurper. She was accused of witchcraft, and did open penance for her adulteries, and was also plundered of her property by the artful Richard. She survived her misfortunes, and was seen by sir Thomas More in the reign of Henry VIII., poor, decrepid, and shrivelled, without the least traces of that beauty which once commanded the admiration of a court. She perished of hunger in a ditch, called from her, Shore-ditch, though Stow relates that that street bore the name before her time.

SHORE, John, right hon. Lord Teignmouth, in the peerage of Ireland, and president of the British and Foreign Bible Society, was born in London 1751. At about the age of eighteen, he went to India in the civil service of the East India Company. After passing about sixteen years in different stations, and having made great progress in the study of the oriental languages, he returned to England in 1785, in company with Governor Warren Hastings. At the close of the following year, he was appointed member of the supreme council to accompany Lord Cornwallis, who was placed at the head of the government, and he took an active and prominent part in the formation of the judicial and fiscal systems of India. On the resignation of Lord Cornwallis, he was appointed governor-general of India, and in 1792, he assumed the reigns of government, having also been created a baronet. In 1797 he was raised to a peerage of Ireland, and in 1798 he retired from office, and returned to England. He was the intimate friend of that eminent scholar sir William Jones, succeeded him in the presidency of the Asiatic Society, and published the Memoirs of his Life and Writings in 1804. He fixed his residence at Clapham near London, and in conjunction with his friends, Wilberforce, Thornton, Charles Grant, Granville Sharpe, and others, took an active part in the establishment of the Christian Observer. On the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1814, Lord Teignmouth, at the suggestion of Bishop Porteus, was chosen first president, Bishops Porteus, Barrington, Fisher, and Burgess, together with sir William Pepperell, lord Gambier, Charles Grant, and William Wilberforce, being vice presidents. This honorable office Lord Teignmouth held till his death; and to the able, zealous, and prudent manner in which he conducted the affairs of the society, and to the catholic and amiable spirit with which he presided over it, the institution has been gradually indebted for its prosperity. He died in London, Feb. 14, 1834, aged 82 years.

SHOVEL, sir Cloudesly, a celebrated English admiral, horn of obscure parents about 1650. He was apprentice to some mean trade, which he quitted for the sea, and by application, bravery, and steadiness, he gradually rose from a cabin boy under sir Christopher Myms to consequence and command. He served under sir John Narborough at the attack on Tripoli 1674, and by being sent on shore had the opportunity, while negotiating with the Dey, of observing the weak parts of the enemy's fortifications and defence, and in consequence directed the blow which completely destroyed all their ships. This brave conduct procured him the command of a ship; and, after other eminent services, especially in Bantry bay, he was knighted by king William at Portsmouth, and conveyed, in 1690, that king and his army into Ireland. He was engaged as one of the rear admirals at the battle of la Hogue, and afterwards had an important command before Vigo, and in the Mediterranean before Malaga. In 1705, he was again sent against Spain, and after an unsuccessful attack upon Toulon he returned home. His fleet, however, unfortunately was wrecked on the Scilly islands 22d October 1705, and in his ship, the Association, perished with him his sons-in-law, and other persons of distinction. His body was next day cast on shore, and robbed of a ring by some fishermen, who buried him in the sand. The ring discovered his quality, the fishermen pointed out where they had deposited the body, which was dug up and carried to Portsmouth, and thence conveyed to London and buried in Westminster abbey, where a monument, by the queen's directions, records his meritorious services.

SHREWSBURY, Elizabeth, countess of, daughter of John Hardwich esq. of Derbyshire, married at the age of fourteen Mr. Barley, and after a widowhood of twelve years, William Cavendish of Chatsworth, the ancestor of the Devonshire family. She had three sons, one of whom was earl of Devonshire, and the other father to the duke of Newcastle, and three daughters, one of whom was ancestor to the Pierreponts, dukes of Kingston, and another, wife of Charles, duke of Lennox, uncle to James I. Her third husband was sir William St. Low, and her fourth, lord Shrewsbury. She was for seventeen years the keeper of Mary, queen of Scots, and died 1607, aged 87.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, rector of Shelton, Norfolk, canon of Canterbury, and chaplain to the king, was author of an History of the World, Sacred and Profane—Introductory to Prideaux's Connections—and the Creation and the Fall of Man, and died 1754.

SHUTE, Josias, archdeacon of Colchester, rector of St. Mary Wolnoth, London, was author of a folio volume of sermons on the 16th chapter of Genesis. He was a most eloquent preacher, and much admired, but he was exposed to great persecution during the civil wars for his attachment to the king. He died 1643.

SHUTE, Samuel, governor of Massachusetts, was the son of a highly respectable family of London, and served for some time under the duke of Marlborough as a lieutenant-colonel. He arrived at Boston with his commission as governor, the 4th of October, 1716. His administration was agitated by a strong opposition, on account of his endeavours to obtain a fixed salary. He embarked for England on the 1st of January, 1723, and exhibited complaints against the colony which drew on it the censure of the king and council. He remained in England, enjoying a pension from government, till his death in 1742, in his eighty-ninth year. He was characterised by uprightness, generosity, and love of liberty.

SHUTE, Daniel, D. D., a congregational minister of Massachusetts, born in 1722, and graduated at Harvard college in 1743. In 1746 he was ordained pastor of the church in Hingham, where he continued till his death, which took place August 30, 1802, at the age of eighty years. Dr. Shute was a member of the convention, which formed the Constitution of the United States. He published an Artillery Election sermon, 1767; Election sermon, 1768; and a sermon on the death of E. Gay, 1787.

SIBBALD, sir Robert, a physician, born near Leslie, Fifeshire, 1643, and educated at St. Andrew's. He travelled into France, and on his return to Scotland, projected the establishment of the college of physicians, Edinburgh, and the plantation of the botanical gardens. In 1686, he embraced the Catholic religion, but afterwards read his recantation in Liberton church, with great contrition for his folly. He was the first professor of medicine at Edinburgh, and in consequence of his great reputation was knighted by Charles II. He died, 1720. He was author of Scotia Illustrata, fol.—Phalainologia Nova, 4to.—History of the Sheriffdom of Fife and Kinross—Miscellanea Quædam Erudite Antiquitatis, 1710—and contributions to the philosophical transactions.

SIBTHORPE, Robert, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at Oxford. He became rector of Water Stratford, Buckinghamshire, and vicar of Brackley, Northamptonshire, and by his zeal in the cause of Charles I. and by the eloquence of his preaching he obtained a prebend in Peterborough cathedral, and Burton Latimer's rectory, Northamptonshire. These preferments were taken from him after the destruction of royalty, and his discourses were exposed to the severest censures of the house of commons. He died 1662.

SIBTHORPE, John, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at Oxford, where he took his medical degrees, and where he succeeded his father Dr. Humphrey Sibthorpe, as professor of botany. In his zeal in the service of botany he travelled twice to Greece, and made a valuable collection of curious plants, which have appeared before the public in a splendid form under the title of Flora Græca. Dr. Sibthorpe published Flora Oxoniensis, and died 1796, leaving a handsome bequest to the university for the encouragement of his favorite science.

SICARD, Roch Ambrose CUCURRON, an eminent teacher of the deaf and dumb, was born, in 1742, at Fousseret, near Toulouse, and was brought up to the church. In 1789 he was chosen to succeed the Abbé de l'Épée, in the Parisian institution for the deaf and dumb; and he held this situation for many years, with honor to himself and great advantage to his pupils. He died May 10, 1822. He wrote Elements of General Grammar—several valuable works on the tuition of the deaf and dumb—was editor of the Catholic Annals—and assisted in the Encyclopedic Magazine.

SIDDONS, Sarah, the most consummate of English tragic actresses, was born, in 1755, at Breck

noek, and was the daughter of Roger Kemble, the manager of a company of itinerant players. In early life she experienced those privations and vicissitudes to which wandering actors are necessarily exposed. At the age of fifteen she became attached to Mr. Siddons, and her parents refusing their consent to her marriage, she went over to reside with Mrs. Greathead, of Guy's Cliff, as a humble companion. In her eighteenth year she was united to the object of her choice, and she returned to the stage. In 1775 she tried her powers on the London boards, but was unsuccessful. Time, however, matured her powers, and, after an absence of seven years, partly spent at Bath, where she was much admired, she reappeared at Drury Lane, on the 10th of October, 1782, in the character of Isabella. Thenceforth her course was a perpetual triumph. In 1812, having acquired an ample fortune, she withdrew into private life. She died June the 9th, 1831.

SIDNEY, Henry, an English statesman, descended from a noble family in Surrey. He was a student of New college, Oxford, 1513, and afterwards became the favorite of Edward VI. who knighted and employed him as ambassador to France. Under Mary he was made collector of the revenues in Ireland, and on Elizabeth's accession he became lord president of the marches of Wales, and knight of the garter, and in 1568, was sent to Ireland as lord deputy to the queen. He was a man of great integrity, and married Mary, eldest daughter of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland. He died 1586. He promoted the printing of the Irish statutes, while in the government of the country. Some of his letters to his son have been published.

SIDNEY, sir Philip, son of the above, was born at Pen-hurt, 1554, and named Philip in honor of the king of Spain, the husband of queen Mary. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, and at the age of seventeen he began his travels. At Paris he escaped the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew by flying into the house of the English ambassador, and afterwards extended his travels to Germany, and returned to England after an absence of four years. In 1576 he was sent by the queen to Rodolph, emperor of Germany, and on his return visited Don John of Austria, and William, prince of Orange, by both of whom he was received with great courtesy. In 1579 he ventured to oppose the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou, and soon after, in consequence of a quarrel with Vere, earl of Oxford, he absented himself from the court, and in his retirement wrote his famous romance, called Arcadia. He was in 1582 knighted, and three years after, while he meditated an expedition to America with Drake, he was sent by the queen to take upon himself the government of Flushing. The next year he surprised Axil, and behaved with such prudence, moderation and wisdom, that he was proposed as a fit candidate for the vacant crown of Poland, but Elizabeth opposed it, observing, that England ought not to lose the jewel of the times. This brave man received a mortal wound in the thigh, at the battle of Zutphen, 22d September 1586, and was carried to Arnheim, where he expired the 16th October following. As he lay bleeding on the field of battle, and was going to taste a bottle of wine which his attendants had procured to refresh him, he saw a wounded soldier carried by, and casting a longing look on the liquor, upon which he ordered it to be given to him, adding, "poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine." His body was carried home, and buried in great funeral pomp in St. Paul's cathedral; but though no monument was placed over him, his memory was embalmed by an epitaph written in his honor by king James, and by verses from the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. This Marcellus of England was universally respected as a statesman, soldier, and scholar, and the panegyrics passed on him in his time have been recchoed by the succeeding ages. Besides his popular Arcadia, which passed through eight editions before the end of 1638, he wrote an Apology for Poetry, 4to.—sonnets—Ourlania, a poem—and other pieces.

SIDNEY, Algernon, an English gentleman, second son of Robert, earl of Leicester, by Dorothy, daughter of the earl of Northumberland, was born 1617. In the civil war he espoused the party of the parliament, and was colonel in the army, and one of the king's judges, though he did not sit on the tribunal. Like Brutus, whom he made his model, he was the ardent friend of a pure republic, and therefore retired in disgust on Cromwell's usurpation. He was, however, in 1659, employed as ambassador to Copenhagen, to mediate a peace between the kings of Denmark and Sweden, but at the restoration he refused to return, and continued abroad till 1677. He was then permitted to return, and obtained the king's pardon, on condition of demeaning himself in a quiet and obedient manner. He was in 1683 accused as being concerned in the Rye-house plot, and was arraigned in November before judge Jeffreys, and found guilty. He appealed to the king, and complained of the partiality of the judge, who had tried him with a packed up jury, but all was in vain, and he was beheaded on Tower-hill, 7th December 1683. His attainder was reversed as cruel and illegal in the first year of William and Mary. This strong republican was, as Burnet observes, a man of extraordinary courage, steady even to obstinacy, sincere, but of a temper that could not bear contradiction, a christian in principle, but averse to all public worship, and an enemy to every thing that looked like monarchy. He left behind him Discourses upon Government, published 1698 and 1704, a work of such merit, that some authors declare, that the composition fully compensates for the loss of Cicero's six books de Republica.

SIGEBERT, king of the East Angles, mentioned with great praise by Bede, on account of his learning and piety. He was a munificent prince, and founded several churches, schools, and monasteries, and at last abdicated the throne to live in a cell at Burgh castle, Suffolk. He was assassinated 642.

SIGEBERT, third son of Clotaire I. inherited the kingdom of Austrasia, and married Brunehaut. He was a valiant prince, and was successful against the Huns, who invaded his kingdom, and against Chilperic, king of Soissons, his brother-in-law. He was assassinated 575, by the intrigues of Fredegorde, the wife of Chilperic.

SIGISMUND, king of Burgundy, after his father Gondebald, 516, abjured the Arian principles of his father. He was engaged in war with Clodimir, son of Clovis, who took him, and threw him into a well, to perish, with his wife and family, at Orleans, 523.

SIGISMUND, son of Charles IV. was born 1368. He was made king of Hungary, 1386, and emperor of Germany, 1410. After reestablishing, by wise regulations, the peace of the empire, he prevailed upon pope John XXIII. to tranquilize the church by the calling of a council, which was to sit at Constance. Sigismund visited France and England to facilitate the peaceful measures which he proposed to establish, and was present at the deliberations of the council, which assembled in 1414, and consisted of eighteen thousand ecclesiastics, and sixteen thousand nobles. His conduct, however, was treacherous in suffering John Huss and Jerome of Prague, to be thrown into the flames, after he had solemnly granted them a safe passport; and this violation of faith armed against him the bravest of his subjects. The Hussites, headed by the brave Ziska, obtained a victory over the forces of the emperor, 1419, and sixteen years elapsed in civil discord and bloodshed, before peace could be restored in Germany. Sigismund died December 8, 1437, aged 70.

SIGISMUND I., king of Poland, surnamed the Great, son of Casimir IV. was elected to the throne, 1507. After establishing order in his dominions, and restoring Poland to its ancient glory, he defeated the Muscovites, and drove them from Lithuania, and afterwards retook from the Teutonic knights the cities of Poland which they had seized, and in 1531 cut to pieces an army of Wallachians that had invaded his territories. This brave and wise prince died 1548, universally respected, aged eighty-two.

SIGISMUND II., son and successor of the preceding, was surnamed Augustus, because born in the month of August. He offended his subjects by elevating to the throne Barba Radzivil, his mistress, whom he had married privately, and he reconciled the nobles only by permitting them to send their sons to be educated in the universities of Germany, which, before his reign, was not permitted. Heretical opinions were thus introduced into the kingdom, which he was not able to repress. He died 7th July, 1572, and as he had no issue, the race of the Jagellons became extinct. He was succeeded by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. of France.

SIGISMUND III., son of John III., king of Sweden, ascended the Polish throne 1587, to the exclusion of Maximilian of Austria, who had been elected by some of the nobles. On his father's death, 1594, he went to Sweden to possess himself of the crown; but as he was a determined catholic, the Swedes, who favored the protestant principles, placed, in 1604, his uncle Charles, the duke of Sudermania, on the throne. These civil dissensions long distracted the kingdom, and by the valor of Gustavus Adolphus, Sigismund was defeated; though in Poland he obtained some advantages over the Muscovites and the Tartars, who had made war against him. He died 1632, aged 66.

SIGONIUS, Carolus, a learned Italian, born at Modena, 1525. His father intended him for a physician, but he preferred literature, to which he assiduously devoted himself. He was professor of Greek at Venice, Padua, and Bologna. He died 1584, aged 60. He wrote several books, the best known of which are, his excellent treatise de Republicâ Hebræorum—de Republicâ Atheniensium—Historia de Occidentis Imperio—de Regno Italie—an Ecclesiastical History, Milan, 2 vols. 4to. 1734.

SILHOUETTE, Stephen de, a native of Limoges, who, by his abilities, became master of requests to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards, by the influence of his patron, comptroller-general and prime minister, 1759. His wise attempts, however, to introduce order and economy in the government were ridiculed by the fickle nation, and he retired nine months after from the helm of the state to private life. He died at his seat of Bry-sur-Marne, 20th January 1767, aged 58. He is author of General Ideas on the Chinese Government, 4to.—Political Reflections on Great Princes, from the Spanish of Gracian, 4to.—a translation of Pope's Essay on Man, 12mo.—Miscellanies, from Pope's treatise on Happiness—Union of Religion and Politics from Warburton, 2 vols. 12mo.

SILVA, John Baptist, a native of Bourdeaux of Jewish origin. He abandoned the religion of his parents, and studied medicine at Montpellier and Paris, and acquired such celebrity, that the empress of Russia made him liberal offers to settle in her dominions, which he declined. He died at Paris, 18th August 1744, aged 61. He was author of a treatise on the Use of Bleeding, 2 vols. 12mo.—Dissertations and Consultations of Chirac, and Silva, 3 vols. 12mo. Memoirs of his Life were published by Bruhier.

SILVESTER I., made pope 314, opposed the Donatists at the councils of Arles and Nice, and labored earnestly to establish order and tranquillity in the church. Under him the Arian schism began first to arise. He died 335.

SYLVESTER II., Gerbert, was born of obscure parents at Auvergne. He was educated at the monastery of Aurillac; but the ignorance and the consequent jealousy of his ecclesiastical brothers, drove him to Spain, where his abilities were noticed by the duke of Barcelona, who took him into Italy. Here he was recommended to the emperor Otho, who appointed him abbot of Bobbio; but this office he soon quitted and became preceptor to Otho III. He was afterwards in the service of the archbishop of Rheims, and then selected by Hugh Capet to preside over the education of his son Robert, and in reward for his attention, he was, in 992, raised to the see of Rheims. He afterwards became archbishop of Ravenna, and on the death of Gregory V. he was, by the interest of Otho, placed in the papal chair, 999. He died 1003. He was a very learned man, and chiefly skilled in mathematics.

SIMEON STYLITES, a native of Cilicia, who, in his 13th year, left the employment of shepherd to enter a monastery. With the most romantic zeal of religious frenzy, he became the founder of a new sect of devotees, and exhibited himself to his astonished followers on the top of a column sixty feet high, on the mountains of Syria. He died 461, aged sixty-nine, of which he had passed forty-seven on the top of a column exposed to the inclemencies of the air, and of the seasons, and often supporting himself for hours and for days on one foot in his elevated situation. This new mode of mortification had several followers, who were called from the column, Stylites, and who, like their founder, were said to have frequent visions and communications with heaven.

SIMEON METAPHRASTES, a native of Constantinople, secretary of state to Leo and to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and author of the Lives of Saints, which he composed at the request of his imperial patron in the 10th century. His work has been translated into French and Latin. He wrote also some verses, preserved in the Corpus Poetarum Græc.

SIMLER, Josias, a native of Zurich in Switzerland, author of an abridgment of Gesner's Bibliotheca, folio—of a treatise de Helvetiorum Republicâ, 12mo.—Vallesie Descriptio, and other works. He was an able protestant divine, and died at Zurich, 1576, aged 45. There was an eminent portrait painter, of the same family, called John, who was also born at Zurich, and died at Stein on the Rhine, 1748, aged 55.

SIMON MACCABÆUS, high priest and ruler of the Jews, 143 B. C. signalized his valor under his brothers Judas and Jonathan, and bravely supported his countrymen against the invasions of the Tyrians and Sidonians. He was unanimously elected chief of his nation at Jerusalem, and immediately employed himself in repairing the fortifications of the cities of Judea, and in obtaining from Demetrius, king of Syria, the confirmation of the privileges and independence of his nation. After defeating the troops of Antiochus Soter, he was basely murdered with his two sons by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, who had invited him to a feast, B. C. 135.

SIMMONS, Samuel Foart, a physician, was born at Sandwich, in Kent, in 1750. He was educated in France, and afterwards went to Edinburgh, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree. He settled in London in 1778, and the next year became a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1780, he was elected physician to the Westminster Dispensary, which situation he resigned, on his appointment to St. Luke's hospital. In 1803, he was called to attend his late majesty, who, on his recovery appointed him one of his physicians extraordinary. In 1811, he retired from St. Luke's, and, for his services, was elected a governor of that institution. He died in 1813. Besides papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and the London Medical Journal, of which he was editor, he wrote an Elementary Work on Anatomy; a Treatise on Consumptions; and the Life of Dr. William Hunter.

SIMON, Claude Francis, a printer of Paris, who died there 1767, aged 55. He was author of the Knowledge of Mythology, a work, in the first edition, very offensive and licentious, and he wrote besides Mimos—and Reciprocal Confidence, two comedies—Memoirs of countess Horneville, a romance, 2 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs of Duguay Tronin, 4to. He also edited Virgil, Terence, and other classics.

SIMON, Richard, a French critic, born at Dieppe, 1633. He became priest of the oratory, which he quitted to study at Paris, but to which he returned 1660. He again left that society in 1678, and died at Dieppe, April, 1712. He was a man of great critical powers, of extensive learning, and strong judgment. His works are critical History of the Old Testament, 1678, suppressed by the intrigues of the Port Royal—History of the Rise and Progress of Ecclesiastical Revenues, 1684, edited again 1709, 2 vols. 12mo.—Disquisitiones criticæ de Variis per Diversa Loca & Tempora Bibliorum Editionibus—Answers to Le Clerc—Critical Dissertation on Dupin's Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques—Critical History of the New Testament, 4to.—a New Select Library, pointing out good books in various kinds of literature—Critical History of the Versions of the New Testament—the New Testament translated into French with Critical Notes, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.

SIMON, Edward Thomas, a French physician and man of literature, was born at Troyes in 1740, and brought up to the medical profession. He repaired to Paris in 1776, and in 1790 was nominated secretary of the Council of Health, and afterwards of Mendicity and Public Charity. On the adoption of the constitution of the year III, he formed the plan of a library for the Council of Ancients and the Council of Five Hundred, and was appointed keeper of the same. He was afterwards employed in public instruction at Nancy and Besançon. He died in 1818. He was the author of several poems on subjects of temporary popularity, and was concerned in some able translations of useful collections.

SIMPSON, Edward, D.D., a native of Tottenham, Middlesex, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of doctor of divinity. He died 1652, at his rectory of Eastling, Kent. He was author of Universal Chronology, in Latin, 1652, reprinted at Leyden, 1739, and Amsterdam, 1752.

SIMPSON, Thomas, an eminent mathematician, born at Market-Bosworth, Leicester-shire, 20th August 1710. As he was intended for the profession of his father, who was a stuff-weaver, he was taught only to read; but the loom was too humble an occupation for him, and the solar eclipse of 1724, roused all his attention to know and to understand how these extraordinary phenomena could be predicted. An accidental acquaintance with an itinerant pedlar, who pretended to tell fortunes and cast nativities, gave him opportunities of improving himself, and from the books which the modern sage lent him, from Cocker's Arithmetic, a book of Partridge's, &c. he derived much information, and began himself to be the oracle of Bosworth, and its environs. Leaving Leicestershire, he came to London, and worked for some time in Spital-fields, and by his industry was enabled not only to maintain his wife and children, but to purchase books, and to advance his knowledge of mathematics. He next engaged in teaching mathematics, and soon after published Proposals for a New Treatise of Fluxions, &c. which at last appeared in 1737. He continued to write on mathematical subjects, and became so well known, that in 1743, he was appointed professor of mathematics at Woolwich academy, and some time after elected member of the Royal society. In his new appointment he devoted himself with such ardor to the improvement of his pupils, that he gained general esteem by his mildness, and the clear and distinct manner of his instruction. His health, however, was weak, and the intensesness of his application still enfeebled it more, so that he sunk into such lowness of spirits, that the dropping of a tea-cup terrified him as much as if a house had tumbled down upon him. In this delicate state he was recommended to try the air of his native town; but on his arrival at Bosworth, he gradually grew worse, and died 14th May, 1761. His widow honorably received a pension from government and handsome apartments near the academy of Woolwich. His other works are, a treatise on the Nature and Laws of Chance, 4to.—Essays on Curious Subjects in Mathematics, 4to. 1740—the Doctrine of Annuities and Reversions, with useful tables, 1742, with an Appendix the next year, in answer to de Moivre's objections—Mathematical Dissertations—a treatise of Algebra—Elements of Geometry—Trigonometry, plain and Spherical—the Doctrine and Application of Fluxions—Miscellaneous tracts,—papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

SIMPSON, John, a Scotch divine, born near Dumfries, and educated at Glasgow, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1716, he became professor of divinity; but in his lectures he denied the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, which excited great persecution against him for ten years, and at last procured his deposition and excommunication from the Scotch church. Queen Caroline had some concern for his sufferings, and procured for him a pension equal to his salary. He died at Edinburgh, 1744, aged 65.

SIMPSON, Robert, an able mathematician, born at Hamilton, 1695, and educated at Glasgow university, where he took his degrees in medicine. As he did not succeed in his profession, he applied himself to mathematics, for which he had strong natural abilities, and was appointed mathematical professor at Glasgow, where he died 1765. He published a treatise on Conic Sections—a valuable edition of Euclid, &c. His posthumous works appeared at Glasgow, 1776, in 4to.

SINGLIN, Anthony, a French ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He was at the head of the abbey of Port-

Roval, and was distinguished for his learning and piety. He died 1664. He wrote Christian Instructions on the Mysteries of Religion, &c. 5 vols. 8vo. a work of merit—and Letters.

SIRMOND, James, an eminent French jesuit, born at Riom, 1559. He was sent by the jesuits of his college at Billom, to Paris, where he taught Greek and Latin, and acquired so perfect a knowledge of these languages, that his style for elegance and animation has been universally admired. In 1590 he removed to Rome by order of the general of his society, Aquaviva, and undertook the office of his secretary, in which he was laboriously employed for sixteen years. During his residence at Rome, he became the friend and the counsellor of all the men of learning, and assiduously applied himself to the study of antiquities, and to the examination of MSS. In 1606 he returned to Paris, but Urban VIII. sensible of his merit, sent for him to return to Rome, which Louis XIII. would not permit. In 1637 he was made confessor to the king of France, after whose death, in 1643, he again returned with pleasure to the tranquillity of an humble life. In 1645 he was at Rome at the appointment of a general of his order, and on his return to France, in consequence of extraordinary exertions to support his opinions in the Jesuit's college, he heated himself too much, which brought on a jaundice, and an improper secretion of bile, of which he soon after died, October 7th, 1651, aged 62. He wrote various pieces on theological subjects, and edited the works of Marcellinus, Theodoret, and Hincmar, the councils of France, amounting to 15 vols. folio. He also assisted Baronius in the composition of his Annals. His character, as drawn by Dupin, is that of an amiable and virtuous man, not more distinguished by extensive erudition than by the most benevolent and mild qualities of the heart.

SITGREAVES, John, an officer in the American revolutionary war, was elected in 1784 one of the delegates of North Carolina to congress. In 1790 he was appointed attorney of the United States for North Carolina, and in November following, succeeded Mr. Stokes as judge of the district court for that state. He died at Halifax, March, 1801.

SIXTUS IV., Francis Albecola, son of a fisherman of Celles, in the state of Genoa, entered into the order of the Cordeliers, and after being professor of divinity at Padua, and in other Italian universities, he was made provincial of his society. He was raised to the rank of cardinal by Paul II. after whose death he succeeded to the popedom, 1471. He attempted to make a crusade against the infidels, but without success. In 1476 he granted, by a bull, immunities to those who celebrated the feast of the immaculate conception of the Virgin. He was author of some theological tracts, and a liberal patron of the learned, but so easy of access, that he granted often favors to the unworthy, and was imprudently lavish in his kindnesses to his nephews. He died 13th August 1482, aged 71.

SIXTUS V., Felix Peretti, pope, was born December 1521, in the march of Ancona. For some time he kept the sheep and the swine of a neighboring farmer, and he was at last drawn from his obscurity by a cordelier, who had lost his way, and who, pleased with the shrewdness of his remarks, took him with him, and placed him in a mean office in the school of his order. His improvement was here rapid, and he soon embraced the order, became a priest, a doctor, and professor of theology at Sienna, where he took the name of Montalto. Distinguished as a preacher at Rome, Genoa, and other places, he was sent as commissary-general to Bologna, and as inquisitor to Venice; but in this last city he behaved with such severity that he was obliged to fly from the public odium. He afterwards went to Spain with Buoncompagno, and was raised to the rank of cardinal by Pius V. On the death of Gregory XIII. the successor of Pius, the opinions of the conclave were divided, and as father Felix was regarded as a man of weak constitution, and delicate habits, he was selected by the opposite factions as a proper person, fit for a few months to settle the dispute of the rival parties. No sooner was the tiara on his head than to the astonishment of all, his weaknesses, hitherto feigned, disappeared; he threw aside the stick on which he leaned, and lifting himself up, he began to sing, with the loudest voice, a Te Deum, and displayed in his conduct such activity, that the people could with difficulty believe him to be the same weak, helpless, and languid Montalto. His first care was to destroy the public robbers which infested the ecclesiastical states, and everywhere justice was administered with impartiality and with celerity. Anxious not only to embellish Rome, but to immortalize his memory, he caused an obelisk to be erected which Caligula had brought from Spain to Rome, and after the labor of four months, this stupendous column, above one hundred feet high, was raised at the entrance of the church of St. Peter, and consecrated to the holy cross. He fixed, by a bull, the number of cardinals to seventy, and introduced various salutary regulations in the government of the church. He labored much to improve the collection of the Vatican library; but his popularity was lost in the protection which he wished to afford to Clement, the vile assassin of Henry III. of France. He died 27th August 1590, aged 69, universally detested for his pride and severity.

SKELTON, John, an English poet, born in Cumberland, and educated at Oxford, where, in 1489, he was invested with the laurel, a sort of poetical degree, occasionally conferred on the favorite of the muses. He took orders, and became rector of Diss, in Norfolk; but was suspended by his diocesan, for writing loose and satirical poems. His attacks were directed not only against obscure individuals, but against Wolsey, from whose resentment he fled to the sanctuary of Westminster, and the protection of abbot Islip. He died 21st June, 1529. He is called by some, but on doubtful authority, preceptor, and poet laureat to Henry VIII. His poems consist of satires, sonnets, and also an attack on Lilly the grammarian, which was retorted in similar language. His genius, according to Warton, was suited to the low burlesque, and his poetry abounds not only with obscurity, but with coarse scurrility, and offensive obscenity.

SKELTON, Philip, an able divine, born near Lisburn, in Ireland, 1707. After an education at Trinity college, Dublin, where he took his master's degree, he became curate of Monaghan, and in 1750, obtained the living of Peltigo, in Donegal. In this place his conduct was not only exemplary, but humane in the extreme, so that in a time of scarcity, the charitable pastor even sold his library to supply his indigent parishioners with bread. So much merit did not pass unrewarded; the bishop of Clougher, in 1759, presented him to the living of Deonish, in Fermanagh, and in 1766, to that of Fintona, in Tyrone, where his pulpit eloquence was so powerful, that he is said to have gained over to the church, the dissenters of his district. This worthy and pious divine died in Dublin, 1787. He published three volumes of sermons, which for language, argumentation, and pathos, possess superior merit.—Deism Revealed, 2 vols. 8vo. an excellent performance—besides tracts and fugitive pieces, all of which have been collected in 7 vols. 8vo.

SKINNER, Stephen, an English antiquary, born at London, 1662, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, which he left without a degree, in consequence of the civil wars. He studied in various universities of Europe, and travelled over Italy, France, Germany, &c., and after taking a doctor's degree in medicine at Heidelberg, he returned to England, and was incorporated to the same academical honors at Oxford, 1654. He settled at Lincoln, where he practised with great success, and died of a malignant fever, 1667. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and was, as Wood says, a walking library. He wrote, Prolegomena Etymologica—Etymologicon Lingue Anglicane—Etymologicon Botanicum—Etymologicon Onomasticon.

SLEIDAN, John, a German historian, born at Sleiden, on the confines of Juliers, 1506. He studied at home, and afterwards at Paris and Orleans, and in 1535, was recommended by his friend and school-fellow Sturmius, to cardinal du Bellay, who settled a pension on him, and treated him with great attention. He was afterwards engaged in negotiations in France and England, and assisted at the council of Trent. He died at Strasburg, where he had settled, and it is said, of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of his wife, 1556. He was an able and learned writer, and strongly attached to the doctrines of Luther. The best known of his compositions are, "De Statu Religionis & Republicæ Commentarii, Carolo Quinto Cæsare," in twenty-five books, 1555, a well written book, translated into various languages—De Quatuor Summis Imperiis Libri tres, a useful work, from which Voltaire drew much information—Froissart's, and Ph. de Comines histories translated into Latin.

SLOANE, Sir Hans, an eminent physician and naturalist, was born, in 1660, at Killileagh, in Ireland; took his degree at Montpellier; settled in London, in 1684; and became a fellow of the college, and a member of the Royal Society. In 1687 he went to Jamaica, as physician to the duke of Albemarle; and, during the fifteen months that he remained there, he made a valuable collection of objects of natural history. After his return to London, he acquired great reputation, and an ample fortune. He was secretary, and, on the decease of Newton, president of the Royal Society; president of the College of Physicians; physician general to the army; physician to George II.; and was created a baronet. He died in 1752. Sloane bequeathed the whole of his immense collection of natural curiosities, medals, and books to the public, on payment of a comparatively trifling sum, and it constitutes the basis of the British Museum. His chief work is a Natural History of Jamaica.

SMALBROKE, Richard, fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, was raised, in 1723, to the see of St. David's, and in 1730, translated to Lichfield and Coventry. He wrote a Vindication of our Saviour's Miracles, against Woolston, 8vo. a performance of great merit, and died 1749.

SMALLEY, John, D. D., a minister of Connecticut, was born in 1734, and graduated at Yale college in 1756. In 1753 he was ordained over the congregational church in Berlin of that state. Dr. Smalley ranked high among his brethren, as a learned divine, and a successful preacher. He died in 1820, aged nearly 86 years. He published sermons on natural and moral inability, 1760; eternal salvation not a debt, against John Murray, 1785; concio ad clerum; at the election, 1800; sermons, on connected subjects, 1803; sermons, 2 vols.

SMALLWOOD, William, governor of Maryland, was appointed a brigadier-general in 1776, and commanded a brigade of Maryland troops on Long Island, and at the battle near Camden. When the Americans were defeated on Long Island in August, 1776, no portion of the army suffered more severely than that commanded by him. Two hundred and fifty-nine men, many of whom were of the first families in the country, were lost on that occasion. He also commanded the Maryland troops in the battle of Germantown in 1777. In 1785, he was appointed a delegate to congress, and the same year governor of the state. He died in February 1792.

SMALRIDGE, George, D. D., an English prelate, born of a good family at Lichfield, 1666, and educated at Westminster school. In 1682 he was elected to Christ-church, and began soon to display his learning and his application, by his publication of Animadversions on a piece of Obadiah Walker, on Church Government, 1687, and 1689 appeared his Latin poem called Auctio Davisiana, on the sale of the books of Davis, the Oxford bookseller. When in orders he obtained respectable preferment, and in 1693, was made prebendary of Lichfield, and afterwards canon of Christ-church, then dean of Carlisle, and in 1713, dean of Christ church, and the next year bishop of Bristol. He died September 27th 1719, and was buried at Christ-church. He published besides, 12 sermons in one volume, and after his death, sixty more were published by his widow.

SMART, Christopher, a poet, was born, in 1722, at Shipbourne, in Kent, and was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. After having encountered numerous vicissitudes and sufferings, and having for a while labored under insanity, he died, in 1770, within the rules of the King's Bench prison. Smart was a man of genius; and his poems, many of which are of a superior order, deserve the place which they have obtained among the collected productions of the British Poets. Among his other works are prose and metrical versions of Horace, and a translation of Phædrus.

SMEATON, John, an eminent mechanic and engineer, born 28th May, 1724, at Austhorpe, near Leeds. He early displayed a strong inclination for mechanical pursuits, though his father, an attorney, wished to bring him up to his own business. The law, however, had no charms for him, and his father wisely indulged his inclinations, and permitted him to follow the bent of his genius. In 1750 he commenced mathematical instrument maker in Turnstile, Holborn, and gained so much applause by his machine to measure a ship's way at sea, and by his compass, that in 1753, he was elected fellow of the royal society. In 1759 he received the gold medal, for his curious paper on the experimental inquiries concerning the power of wind and water to turn mills. When the Edystone lighthouse was destroyed, in 1752, Smeaton was recommended by lord Macclesfield, as the fittest person to repair the damage, and of this great and astonishing work, completed in 1759, he published a very interesting account in 1791, in a folio volume. In 1764 he was elected one of the receivers of the Derwentwater estate, which he highly improved, and afterwards rose to great eminence in his profession. His abilities were employed in the execution of the great canal of Scotland, in better supplying Greenwich and Deptford with water, in improving and repairing Ramsgate harbor, and in other public works. Besides these meritorious efforts of labor and genius, he made improvements in the air pump, in mills, in the pyrometer, the hydrometer, and the steam engine. On the 16th September 1792, he was attacked by a paralytic stroke, of which he died 28th October following. His papers were purchased by sir Joseph Banks, and are to appear before the public.

SMELLIE, William, a surgeon and physician of great eminence. He was born in Scotland, and practised in his native country, and afterwards went to London. As a teacher he was highly respectable, and had nearly a thousand pupils, who assisted him during his lectures, in the delivery of eleven hundred and fifty poor women. He paid great attention to his profession of midwifery, and he was the first writer who considered the shape and the size of the female pelvis as adapted to the head of the fetus, and his observations from practice and experience were most important. He had, in the height of his celebrity, several able opponents; but the skill and judgment which he displayed, the numerous improvements which he introduced in the theory and practice of midwifery, and the forceps, and other surgical instruments which he used and recommended, are proofs of a great mind happily exerted in facilitating the delivery of the female sex, and in removing erroneous customs and dangerous systems. This eminent practitioner retired, after a long and successful practice, and died some time after, at an advanced age, at Lanerk, in Scotland, 1763. He published his lectures, 8vo. 1752—a volume of cases, 1754—Anatomical Tables, with thirty-six plates, folio—and five years after his death a second volume of his cases appeared, making together a most valuable collection, and a complete system of midwifery.

SMELLIE, William, a naturalist, was born, in 1740, at Edinburgh, and followed the profession of a printer. He died in 1795. He wrote The Philosophy of Natural History; A Dissertation on the Sexes of Plants; and some articles in the first edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica; translated Buffon; and, in conjunction with Gilbert Stuart, carried on the Edinburgh Review and Magazine.

SMITH, sir Thomas, LL.D. a learned writer, born at Walden, Essex, 1512. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1531, and in 1536 he was made university orator. In 1539 he travelled through France and Italy, and took the degree of doctor of civil law at Padua, and on his return received the same academical honors at Cambridge. He was afterwards professor of civil law in the university, and on the accession of Edward VI. was admitted into the family of Somerset, the protector, by whose interest he was raised to the office of steward of the stammeries, provost of Eton, and dean of Carlisle. In 1548 he was made secretary of state, and knighted, and then sent as ambassador to Flanders. The disgrace of his patron removed him from the court; but his abilities were again called into action, and in 1551 he was sent ambassador to France. In Mary's reign he was again dismissed from favor, though not treated with harshness, and under Elizabeth he was restored to confidence and employment. He went to France, 1562, as ambassador, and was engaged in affairs of state till his death, 1597. As a man of learning, and a zealous protestant, he was as respectable as he was as a politician. While at Cambridge, and public Greek lecturer in his college, he united with his friend John Cheke to introduce a new method of pronouncing the language; but though espoused by the best scholars of the university, by Ponet, Roger Ascham, and others, it met with opposition, and was publicly censured by the chancellor, bishop Gardiner. Smith expostulated with boldness, yet with moderation, and his epistle on the occasion was printed at Paris, when he was ambassador there, by Robert Stephens, 1568, 4to. with another, on the pronunciation of the English tongue.

SMITH, Miles, a native of Hereford, educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, from which he removed to Brazen-nose. He obtained the canon residentiaryship of his native city, and in 1612, was made bishop of Gloucester. He died 1624. He was a man of great and profound learning, well skilled in oriental languages, and he also assisted in the translation of the Bible, and wrote the preface to it. His sermons appeared in one vol. fol. 1630.

SMITH, John, an able divine, born at Achureh, near Oundle, 1618. He entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge 1636, and in 1644 was chosen fellow of Queen's. He died August 7, 1652, and was interred in the chapel of his college. He was a man of great learning, and endowed with the most amiable virtues. He wrote ten select discourses on theological subjects, collected together 1660 in a 4to. volume.

SMITH, Thomas, D. D. a learned writer, born in London, 1638, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. In 1663 he was appointed master of Magdalen college school, and three years after elected fellow of that college. In 1668 he went as chaplain to the embassy to Constantinople, and returned 1671. He afterwards travelled in France, and was promised a Windsor canonry for collating the Alexandrian manuscripts in St. James's library, but this he did not execute. His learning and abilities were so universally acknowledged, that he was selected to travel into the east, and to visit mount Athos to make a collection of valuable manuscripts, but he declined the offer, and continued at home. He was disappointed in his expectation of preferment from sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of state, and in 1688 he was deprived of his fellowship, by Giffard the catholic president of Magdalen, but though restored to it, he was finally deprived of it, for refusing the oaths to William and Mary. He died in London 16th May 1710. He published Remarks on the Manners, Religion, &c., of the Turks, originally written in Latin, in four letters—de Græcæ Ecclesiæ Hodierno Statu Epistola—a Latin Life of Camden—three papers in the Philosophical Transactions—Vite Quorundam Eruditissimorum, & Illustrium Virorum, 1707, 4to. including Usher, Cosins, Greaves, Patrick, Young, Dee, Bainbridge, —sermons—Diatriba de Chaldaicis Paraphrastis, 8vo.—Syntagma de Druidum Moribus & Institutis, 8vo.

SMITH, John, D.D., an English divine, born at Lowther, Westmoreland, 1659. After being educated partly under his father, the rector of the parish, he was intended for a Scotch university, but at last was sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, 1674, where he took his degree of doctor of Divinity, 1696. He was chaplain to lord Lansdown, and was afterwards patronised by Crew, bishop of Durham, who presented him to a prebend, and the living of Bishop's Wearmouth. He died 1715, at Cambridge, where he was laboriously engaged in preparing for the press an edition of the works of the venerable Bede, which at last appeared in 1722 under the care of his son George. He had also begun to write the Antiquities of Durham.

SMITH, Edmund, son of Mr. Neale, a merchant, was brought up under the care of Mr. Smith, who had married his father's sister, and, in gratitude for his affectionate treatment, he assumed his name. He was born, 1668, and educated at Westminster under Busby, from whence he removed to Christ-church. Here he distinguished himself for his ~~te~~, and for his extensive knowledge of classical literature, and in 1707 his tragedy of Phædra and Hippolitus was acted at the theatre royal, recommended by a prologue from the pen of Addison, and an epilogue from the pen of Prior. This play possessed little merit, though for a while supported by the partiality of friends. He prepared besides a plan for a tragedy of lady Jane Grey, and wrote a translation of Longinus, with notes and observations. In his conduct Smith was very irregular and intemperate, and though admired for his wit and his learning, he was yet offensive to the directors of his college, by the impropriety of his conduct, so that at last he was expelled from the society 1700. He was so negligent in his dress, that he was generally called captain Rag, and he was so careless of his interests that after dedicating his tragedy to lord Halifax, he, either through pride, or indolence, neglected to present it to his patron who had provided for him the grant of a place of £300 a year. He died 1710.

SMITH, William, an able scholar and divine, born at Worcester, 1711. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, and became rector of Trinity church, Chester. He was for one year at the head of Brentwood school, Essex, but resigned in 1749, and in 1758 was promoted to the deanery of Chester, to which was added, in 1766, the rectory of Handley. His life was spent in the laborious service of literature, and of the church, and he published an elegant and valuable translation of Thucydides, and of Longinus, besides a volume of sermons on the Beatitudes. He died 1787.

SMITH, Adam, LL.D., a celebrated writer, born 5th June, 1723, at Kirkaldy, where his father who died a few months before his birth, was comptroller of the customs. Though of a weak constitution he had from his earliest years great partiality for books. At the age of three he was stolen by some vagrants and with difficulty reeovered. After receiving instruction at Kirkaldy he was sent to Glasgow university, but as his friends destined him for the church of England he removed in 1740, to Balliol college, Oxford, as an exhibitioner. Not wishing, however, to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, he left Oxford after seven years' residence and returned to Scotland, and in 1751, he was elected professor of logic in the university of Glasgow, and the next year succeeded Cragie in the chair of moral philosophy. In 1759, he published his Theory of Moral Sentiments, and in 1763, he quitted his professorship to accompany the duke of Buccleugh in his travels on the continent. He visited, with his pupil, Toulouse, Geneva, and the south of France, and on his return to Paris became acquainted with the wits and the learned men of the capital. His travels were continued for three years, after which he retired to the domestic seclusion of Kirkaldy, with his mother, for ten years. Hume and his other friends in vain expostulated against his retirement, but in 1771, he convinced them that his mind had been actively employed, by the publication of his celebrated work, an Inquiry into the Nature and Cause of the Wealth of Nations, 2 vols. 4to. This book often republished in 3 vols. 8vo. procured him the appointment of commissioner of the customs in Scotland, and after being some time in London, he, in 1778, retired to Edinburgh, where he enjoyed the rest of life in honorable independence, in the society of the learned, and among the companions of his earliest years. He now occasionally devoted himself to study, but not with that zeal which might have enabled him to add fresh celebrity to his fame; and when at last infirmities came upon him, he found it was too late to think of completing the works on which, in his serious hours, he had meditated. He died July 1790, and after his death some essays and other miscellanies, which he had not ordered to be destroyed, were published by his executors in 4to. 1795. Of the powers of his mind, and of his comprehensive information, his works will be a lasting memorial to the latest posterity. With all the perfections of a well cultivated understanding, he did not however, possess that knowledge of the world which might have adorned a more active life, and though admired for his talents, he was careless in the midst of business, and absent to an extraordinary degree. It is to be lamented that his great qualities were disgraced by notions of infidelity. When he published the Life of David Hume, written by himself, he added remarks which conveyed to the world how determined a foe he was to christianity, and though he was attacked with efficacy, and all the powers of wit by Dr. Horne, he never renounced those principles which proved him a deist, and the friend of the infidel philosophers of France.

SMITH, Charlotte, a poetess and novelist, whose maiden name was Turner, was born, in 1749, in Sussex, where her father possessed considerable property. When she was only sixteen, she married a West India merchant, who was subsequently ruined, partly by imprudence, and partly by legal chicanery. Her pen, which had been her amusement, now became the support of her husband and family, and she long enjoyed great popularity as a writer both of verse and prose. Her volume of Elegiac Sonnets, published in 1784, and which passed through several editions, was the first work which she gave to the press. She died in 1806. Among her works are, Poems, Minor Morals, and other productions for youth; and the novels of Emmeline, Desmond, Marehmont, Ethelinda, Celestine, and The Old Manor House.

SMITH, Sir James Edward, an eminent naturalist and physician, was born, in 1759, at Norwich; studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Leyden; was one of the founders and president of the Linnæan Society; and practised as a physician at his native place, where he died, March 17, 1828. His chief works are, A Sketch of a Tour on the Continent; Natural History of the Lepidopterous Insects of Georgia; English Botany; English Flora; and An Introduction to Botany.

SMITH, Elizabeth, an accomplished female, was born, in 1776, at the family seat of Burnhall, in the county of Durham; and died in 1806. She had a knowledge of mathematics and drawing, possessed much poetical talent, and understood the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, German, and French languages. Her Fragments, Translation of Job, and Translation of the Life of Klopstock, have been published.

SMITH, John Gordon, M.D. F.R.S. an English gentleman who acquired notoriety from his eccentricities and misfortunes, as well as from his attainments in science. He became eminent in his profession; was the author of a celebrated work on Medical jurisprudence; and, in 1823, when the London university was opened, he was instituted as the first English professor in that branch of medical science. His habits were somewhat irregular, and he became involved in pecuniary difficulties, which led to his becoming an inmate of the Fleet Prison, where he terminated his short and useful life, September 15, 1833, at the age of 41 years.

SMITH, John, one of the early settlers of Virginia, was born in Lincolnshire in 1579. After passing through a variety of wonderful adventures, he resolved to visit North America, and having with a number of other persons procured a charter of South Virginia, he came over thither in 1607. Being taken prisoner by the Indians, and condemned to death, his life was saved by the daughter of the savage chief, the celebrated Pocahontas. He published an account of several of his voyages to Virginia, a history of that colony, and an account of his own life. He died at London, in 1631.

SMITH, Elihu H., a physician, was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, in 1771, and was graduated at Yale College. He studied medicine, and engaged in its practice at New York, where he soon obtained an extensive business. In conjunction with Dr. Miller and Dr. Mitchell, he commenced the publication of the Medical Repository, and communicated to it a number of valuable treatises. He died in 1798. His medical learning was very uncommon.

SMITH, James, a singer of the Declaration of Independence, was a native of Ireland, born probably between 1715, and 1720. His father was a respectable farmer, on the Susquehanna. James, the second son, was educated at the college of Philadelphia, and afterwards studied law. On being admitted to the bar, he established his residence near the present town of Shippensburg, as a lawyer and surveyor, but, some time after, removed to York, where he continued the practice of his profession during the remainder of his life. In 1774, he was a member of the meeting of delegates from all the counties of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of expressing the public sentiment on the expediency of abstaining from importing any goods from England, and assembling a general congress. In January 1775, Mr. Smith was a member of the Pennsylvania convention, and concurred in the spirited resolution which it passed, that 'if the British administration should determine by force to effect a submission to the late arbitrary acts of the British parliament, in such a situation, we hold it our indispensable duty to resist such force, and at every hazard to defend the rights and liberties of America.' He was also a member of the provincial conference, which assembled on the eighteenth of the ensuing month of June, to establish a new government for Pennsylvania, in consequence of the instructions given by the general assembly to their delegates in congress, to resist every measure tending to a separation, and seconded the resolution moved by doctor Rush, to express in form the sentiments of the conference on the subject of a declaration of independence, which was carried, although the obnoxious instructions had been rescinded. Doctor Rush, Mr. Smith, and Thomas M'Kean, were the committee by whom the resolution was drafted. It was unanimously adopted, and signed by the members, and presented to congress, a few days only before the declaration of independence. In July, a convention was assembled in Philadelphia for the purpose of forming a new constitution for Pennsylvania, of which colonel Smith was a member. On the twentieth of the month, he was elected, by the convention, a member of congress. He retained his seat in that body until November, 1778, and then resumed his professional pursuits. From these he withdrew in 1800, and died in 1806.

SMITH, Thomas, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Philip Ludwell. He was created a landgrave under the original form of government in 1691, and commenced his administration in 1693. It was at a period when the high-church party distracted the colony by their violence. Smith was a man of prudence and liberality, but wearied by fruitless attempts to satisfy the discontented, he soon asked leave to retire from office, and Archdale, a proprietor, was sent out as governor.

SMITH, William, an eminent lawyer of New York, was born at Newport, Pagnell Buckinghamshire, in 1696. He came to America in 1715, and received his education at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1719. In 1736, he was appointed recorder of the city of New York, and was afterwards a member of the council, and a judge of the supreme court of the province. In the political transactions of the time, he took an active part, and few individuals possessed so great influence in determining the course of public affairs. He was one of the original trustees of the college of New-Jersey, and died November 22d, 1769.

SMITH, William, an eminent lawyer of New York, was son of the preceding. He graduated at Yale college in 1745, and after a successful course of practice in his profession, he became chief-justice of the province. When the revolution commenced he adhered to the mother country, and was one of Clinton's deputies for receiving acknowledgments of allegiance from the colonies. He was afterwards chief-justice of Canada. In 1757, he published a history of New York, from its first settlement to 1732. In 1814, a second edition of it with additions, and a continuation to 1762, by his son William Smith, was published at Albany.

SMITH, Josiah, an American clergyman, born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1704, and graduated at Harvard college in 1725. He was ordained to the work of the ministry in 1726, and became a popular preacher and a voluminous writer. He officiated in Bermuda—afterwards at Cainhoj—and then at Charleston. At the latter place, he became a prisoner of war to the British, and in 1781, went on parole to Philadelphia, where he died in the same year, aged 76 years. He published a volume of sermons, 8vo. ; a large number of occasional sermons ; the church of Ephesus arraigned, the substance of five short sermons contracted into one ; and Letters to W. Cooper.

SMITH, Thomas a clergyman of New England, born at Boston in 1702, and graduated at Harvard college in 1720. Six years afterwards he went to Falmouth in Maine, now Portland, as chaplain to the troops stationed there, and preacher to the inhabitants. In 1727, a church was formed, and he was ordained the pastor of it. He remained in this place till his death, which took place May 23d, 1795, aged 93 years. He continued to preach till within ten years of his death ; and to perform other public duties till past the age of ninety.

SMITH, Robert, D.D., a presbyterian clergyman of Pennsylvania. He was born in Ireland, 1723, and when about seven years of age was brought to America. In 1751, he was settled at Pequea, where he continued to officiate with reputation and usefulness till his death, which took place about the year 1785. In the American preacher, vol. 4th, are published three of his sermons, entitled the nature of saving faith ; the excellency of saving faith ; practical uses from the nature and excellency of saving faith.

SMITH, John Blair, first president of Union college at Schenectady, was born at Pequea, Pennsylvania, in 1756. He was son of the Rev. Dr. Robert Smith. Having completed his education at Princeton college, he graduated from that institution in 1773. He now devoted himself to the study of theology. In 1779, he was settled in Virginia and became the principal of Hampden and Sidney college. In 1791, he was installed over the third presbyterian church in Philadelphia. On the establishment of Union-college in 1795, he was appointed president, an office which he filled with credit to himself, and with advantage to the institution. But, still feeling a strong desire to spend himself in preaching the gospel, he was induced to accept, in 1799, an invitation to his former station. Accordingly, he returned to Philadelphia; and, in the same year, August 22d, 1799, died of the yellow fever, aged 43.

SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D., LL.D., president of Princeton college, and a distinguished clergyman of the Presbyterian church, was born March 16, 1750, at Pequea, in Pennsylvania. He was educated at his father's academy; in his sixteenth year entered Princeton college; took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1769; then became an assistant in his father's school, and, soon after, tutor at Princeton. In this office he remained two years, pursuing at the same time the study of theology. As soon as he was licensed to preach, he devoted himself to missionary labors in the western counties of Virginia. Here he became so popular and respected, that he was selected to preside over the new college, which went into operation under the name of Hampden Sidney. In 1779, he was recalled to Princeton to be professor of moral philosophy. The war at this time had driven the president from the state, had greatly dispersed the students, and reduced the building to a state of dilapidation, and much embarrassed the funds of the institution. Mr. Smith exerted himself strenuously to revive the institution, and made considerable pecuniary sacrifices for this purpose. In 1783, he received the additional office of professor of theology, and in 1786, that of vice-president of the college. In this latter year, he was a member of a committee, to draw up a system of government for the Presbyterian church of the United States. In 1795, he became president of the college, in place of doctor Witherspoon, who had died the preceding year. In 1812, repeated strokes of the palsy compelled him to resign his connexion with the college. He died in August, 1819, in the 70th year of his age, having been very infirm for several years. Doctor Smith was distinguished for his acquaintance with ancient and modern literature, for polished manners, for an elegant and perspicuous style, and for his eloquence and popularity as a preacher. His chief works are an Essay on the Variety of Complexity in the human species; Lectures on the Evidences of the Christian Religion, and on Moral Philosophy; and a system of natural and revealed Religion. Several volumes of his sermons have also been published.

SMITH, Robert, D.D., the first Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in South Carolina. He arrived in this country from England in the year 1757; was chosen rector of St. Philip's church, Charleston, in which he first had officiated as assistant to the reverend Richard Clarke, in 1759; and was chosen Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina, in 1795. His consecration took place, on the 13th of September in the same year. He died in 1801, aged 70. Bishop Smith was a man of wealth, and was eminently distinguished for his liberality to the poor.

SMITH, Nathaniel, judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, was born at Woodbury, in that state, January 6th, 1762. His means of early education were very limited, and he rose to distinction by the energy of his talents. He commenced the study of law under the care of judge Reeve, about the close of the revolutionary war, and began the practice in his native town in 1789, and soon became eminent in the profession for keenness of discernment, accuracy in investigation, adroitness in argument, and energy in delivery. After having been repeatedly chosen a member of the state legislature, he was in 1795, transferred to a seat in congress, where he continued four years, and on declining another election, was chosen a member of the upper house in the legislature of Connecticut, and continued in that body till 1804. In October, 1806, he was placed on the bench of the supreme court, and was distinguished for the sagacity and uprightness with which he discharged the duties of that station. He held the office till May, 1819, and died March 9th, 1822, in the 61st year of his age. He possessed a mind of a very superior order, his legal knowledge was extensive, and he was greatly esteemed for his integrity, public spirit, and piety.

SMITH, John, D.D., an eminent American linguist, was born at Byfield, Massachusetts, in 1752. He graduated at Dartmouth college in 1773. From 1774 to 1778, he was tutor; and from 1778 he was professor of Hebrew, Greek, and other oriental languages in that institution. He died in May 1809, aged 56 years. He published a Latin Grammar; a Hebrew Grammar; a Greek Grammar; and an addition of Cicero's Orations in Latin, with Notes.

SMITH, William Loughton, LL. D., a distinguished American citizen, resident in South Carolina. In 1789, he was elected from that state a member of congress. In 1797, he was appointed minister to Portugal; and in 1800 to Spain. He died in 1812. He was a man of talents, and published several works, mostly on political subjects.

SMITH, Israel, governor of Vermont, was a native of Connecticut, born April 4th, 1759, and graduated at Yale college in 1781. He studied law, and settled in the practice at Rupert, Vermont. He was soon after elected the representative of that town in the assembly, and from this period continued to hold a high rank among the public characters of that state. In 1789, he was one of the commissioners appointed to determine the controversy with New York respecting boundaries, and was active in procuring the admission of Vermont into the union. In 1791, he was elected a representative to congress, and continued in that station till 1797. Having removed to Rutland, he was now elected a representative from that town, and was the same year appointed chief-justice of the supreme court. He held the office but one year. In 1800, he was again elected representative to congress, and in 1802, succeeded Mr. Chipman as a senator in that body. He remained in this office until elected governor of the state in 1807, as the successor of Mr. Tickenor. He was universally esteemed for his integrity and public spirit. His death took place December 2d, 1810.

SMITH, John, D.D., an American clergyman, born at Belchertown, Massachusetts in 1766. He graduated at Dartmouth college in 1794. In 1797, he was settled over the congregational society in Salem, New Hampshire. Here he remained twenty years, and was then settled in Wenhau, Massachusetts. In 1819, he was appointed professor in the Theological Seminary at Bangor, Maine. Here he died in 1831, aged 65 years. Dr. Smith was a man of respectable talents, and was highly esteemed for his piety. In consequence of an impediment in his speech, he was accustomed to commit his sermons to memory, being able to rehearse from memory with much more ease and fluency than he could deliver them from notes. By long practice the labor of committing to memory was very trifling.

SMOLLETT, Tobias, M. D., a Scotch physician, more celebrated as an author. He was born near Cameron on the banks of the Leven, 1720. He was brought up for the medical line, and served as a surgeon in the fleet which bombarded Carthage; but as his professional talents did not meet with encouragement, he commenced author. After trying his fortune in plays and poems, he published in 1748 his Roderick Random, 2 vols. 12mo. which excited much of the public attention, and insured success to his future publications. Peregrine Pickle appeared in 1751, 4 vols. 12mo. and became very popular, not only on account of its own intrinsic merit, but for the adventures of a lady of quality, lady Vane, and for the entertainment of a republican doctor, supposed to be Akeside, portrayed with all the humor and skill of a most facetious and learned scholar. Ferdinand, Count Fathom, appeared in 1754, and the next year the Critical Review was undertaken and conducted by him till 1763. In this work he exposed himself to much obloquy, and his censure of admiral Knowles' pamphlet on the Rochefort Expedition, brought on a prosecution against him. He was in consequence fined £100, and imprisoned in the King's Bench three months, during which confinement he wrote his Sir Lancelot Greaves, 2 vols. 12mo. In 1762 he enlisted among the periodical writers in defence of Lord Bute's administration, and published the Briton, which was immediately followed by the North Briton. In 1763 he went abroad for the benefit of his health, and returned after two years' absence, and published an account of his travels, 2 vols. 8vo. a work which Sterne, in his Sentimental Journey, ridicules under the name of Smellfungus. His Humphrey Clinker appeared in 1771, and soon after, in consequence of the ill state of his health, and other disagreeable circumstances, he left England for Italy. He died in Italy, 21st Oct. 1771, and an epitaph on his monument by his friend Dr. Armstrong, marks the spot of his interment near Leghorn. Besides those works already mentioned, Dr. Smollett published, 1757, an History of England, 4 vols. 4to., edited also in 8vo. a work which produced him great profit, though regarded as partial, inaccurate, and hastily written—a translation of Gil Blas and Don Quixote into English—a Collection of Voyages and Travels—the Regicide—poems, &c. His life has been written by Dr. Anderson, 1796, and since by Dr. Moore. In his character Smollett was a man of acknowledged virtue and probity, and his abilities rank him high in the list of the authors of celebrity. His two best works are Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle, and in these he introduces great diversity of characters, interesting descriptions, and pleasing variety, though it is to be lamented that some parts of his narrative are more licentious than virtue can approve. His other novels are inferior performances, though they are not devoid of interesting anecdotes. The persecution and poverty to which he was occasionally exposed, ruffled the disposition of this able writer. The mortifications and disappointments to which he was exposed by the spirit of faction, and the persecution of enemies, were increased by the loss of his daughter, an only child; and he must be added to the number of those who, after contributing to the amusement, the improvement, and the intellectual pleasures of others, find vexation disquiet, and neglect, the reward for mental exertions.

SNELL, Rodolphus, a native of Oudewater in Holland, professor of Hebrew and mathematics at Leyden, where he died 1613, aged 67. He is author of some mathematical and philosophical works, now little known. His son Willebrord, was born at Leyden, 1591, and succeeded his father in the chair of mathematics, 1618. He is the first who discovered the true laws of the refraction of light and he undertook to measure the earth in the same method, which afterwards was adopted by Picard and Cassini. His best works are, Eratosthenes Batavus—and Cyclonetricum, 4to. He died at Leyden, 1626, aged 35.

SNORRO, Sturlesonius, a native of Iceland, whose abilities were employed in political affairs, as the minister of state to one king of Sweden, and to three kings of Norway. He retired, in an insurrection, to Iceland, where he was governor, and was at last pursued and put to death by his enemy Gysurus, 1241. He wrote Chronicon Regnū Norwegorum—Edda Islandica, two useful works, the last of which was translated by Mallet.

SOANEN, John, an Eminent French Ecclesiastic, born at Rioms, 6th Jan. 1647. After teaching divinity in the provinces, he acquired celebrity as a preacher at Lyons, Orleans, and Paris, and was one of the four distinguished orators who at that time, were called the four evangelists. He was raised to the see of Senez; but his opposition to the bull Unigenitus was condemned by the council of Embrun, and he was stripped of his episcopal honors, and died an exile at Chaise-Dien, Auvergne, 25th Dec. 1740. He wrote Pastoral Instructions—Mandemens—letters—sermons, &c.

SOAVE, Francis, an Italian writer, was born, in 1743, at Lugano. Being appointed professor of philosophy at Milan, he introduced important reforms into the method of teaching; wrote and translated many works on education; and established numerous schools in Lombardy. He died in 1816, professor of ideology at the university of Pavia. His Moral Tales have been often reprinted.

SOBIESKI, John III., king of Poland, surnamed the Great, was born, in 1629, of an illustrious family, at the castle of Olesko, in Poland. In the Polish wars, from 1648 to 1674, he distinguished himself on numerous occasions; not only by being one of the bravest where many were brave, but also by superior military genius. During that period he gained several battles, in spite of an enormous disparity of numbers against him. In 1674 he was raised to the throne, and he led his troops to fresh victories. He repeatedly defeated the Turks and Tartars, and overran Moldavia and Wallachia; but the greatest of his exploits was the raising of the siege of Vienna, in 1683, by which he saved Europe from all the calamities consequent upon an irruption of the Ottoman forces. He died in 1696.

SOCINUS, Lullius, the founder of the Socinian sect, was born at Sienna in 1525, and designed for the civil war by his father, who was himself an able civilian at Bologna. To the study of civil law he united that of divinity, and therefore acquired a knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic; but when, by deep investigation, he discovered the fallacy of the Romish church, he sought a safer asylum out of Italy, and after travelling through Germany, France, England, the Netherlands, and Poland, he at last settled at Zurich. In this retreat he became the friend and associate of the celebrated reformers, of Calvin, Bellinger, Beza, Melancthon, and others; but a difference of opinion with respect to the Trinity, soon produced hostile treatment. Calvin reproved sharply the strange opinions of his late friend, and Socinus, in the midst of theological animosity, had the good sense to keep his sentiments, and further to dread the resentment of his opponents when he saw Servetus soon after dragged to the stake. He afterwards travelled into Poland, and disseminated his opinions where he could be secure and unmolested, and after visiting Venice, he returned to Zurich, where he died 1562, aged 37. His tenets, though not very widely disseminated by him, were afterwards more fully spread by his nephew.

SOCINUS, Faustus, nephew to the above, was born at Sienna, 1539, and educated under the care of his uncle, who expected from his rising abilities a firm and active supporter of his theological opinions. He was at Lyons when Lælius died, and though only twenty years old, he immediately repaired to Zurich, to obtain possession of his papers, which, however, he for some time disregarded, while for twelve years enjoying the favors and the patronage of the court of Florence. In 1574 he left the palace of the Medici, and came to Germany, and after studying divinity at Basil, he, in 1579, went to Poland, where he began to disseminate his uncle's doctrines with a few alterations of his own. He was violently opposed by some of the Unitarians, but found an asylum near Cracow, in the house of a Polish lord, whose daughter he married. In 1598 he was exposed to fresh insults from the students and the populace of Cracow, and he escaped with difficulty from their fury. He spent the remainder of his days about nine miles from Cracow, in the house of a Polish gentleman, and died there 1604, aged 65. His sect survived their leader. The Socinians maintain that Jesus did not exist before he was born of the Virgin Mary, that he was a mere man, that the Holy Ghost is no distinct person, and that the Father alone is properly God. They explain away the doctrine of redemption, and the satisfaction made by the sacrifice of Christ, and therefore deny the existence of original sin, of grace, and of predestination. They affirm that the soul sleeps in death with the body, and that both will again raise together, either to the enjoyment of felicity, or the sufferings of punishment; but that whilst future felicity is eternal, the punishments of hell-fire are proportioned only in duration to the demerits and offences of the sinner.

SOCINUS, Marianus, LL. D. an eminent Italian lawyer, descended from an ancient family which had produced several civilians. He was born at Sienna, in Tuscany, in 1482; and took his degree of doctor of laws in 1503. He taught civil law as professor at Sienna several years; he afterwards went to Padua, and last to Bologna in 1543, where he died in 1556.

SOCRATES, an illustrious philosopher of Athens. He followed the profession of his father, a sculptor, for some time, till philosophy more fully engaged his attention. After distinguishing himself in the field of battle in the defence of his country, he commenced public instructor of youth, and soon saw his lectures followed by large, respectable, and admiring audiences. The simplicity of his dress, and the innocence and virtues of his life, however, in the midst of a restless and jealous population, soon procured him enemies; and while he directed all the energies of his mind to reform the morals of Athens, he was accused of corrupting the young Athenians, and of making innovations in the religion of his country. Against perjured witnesses, and before prejudiced judges, integrity is of no avail, and Socrates, therefore, was condemned to death. Though he could escape, he bowed before the unjust sentence, and drinking the fatal poison, expired in a few moments, B. C. 400. The Athenians too late repented of their cruelty; but while they punished his murderers with death, the virtues and character of their immortal sage were delineated in the writings of two of his faithful pupils, Xenophon and Plato.

SOLANDER, Daniel Charles, a celebrated naturalist, the pupil of Linnæus. He was born in the province of Nordland in Sweden, 29th Feb. 1736, and studied at Upsal, where he took the degree of M. D. In 1760, he visited England, and by the recommendation of his friend Collinson, he was employed to form a catalogue of the natural curiosities preserved in the British museum, and in 1765, was appointed one of the assistants in that valuable establishment. In 1768, he was prevailed upon by his friend Mr. afterwards sir Joseph Banks, to accompany him in Cook's voyage round the world, and without losing his appointment at the museum. By his judicious and indefatigable inquiries during this voyage, a great addition was made to the plants and natural curiosities then known to Europeans. In 1773, he was advanced to the place of under librarian in the museum, and he died of an apoplexy 16th May, 1782. He is author of a description of the collection of petrifications found in Hampshire, and presented to the British museum, by Mr. Brander, and also of observations on natural history in Cook's voyage, and a letter in the philosophical transactions, &c. He has been celebrated by Dr. Pultney and by others, not only as a man of great abilities as a philosopher and naturalist, but as of modest and unassuming manners, and his visit to England may be regarded as an important era in the history of botany.

SOLIGNAC, Peter Joseph de la Pimpie, chevalier of, the secretary and friend of Stanislaus, king of Poland, and author of a Polish History, in 5 vols. 12mo. was born at Montpellier, and died 1773, aged 86. He wrote besides, an Eloge on Stanislaus—a piece on Education—the Amours of Horace—Pieces on the Memoirs of the Academy of Nanci

SOLIS, Antonio, de, a Spanish writer, born at Placenza in Old Castile, 1610. He studied law at Salamanca, but devoted himself more fondly to literary pursuits. At the age of seventeen he wrote a comedy well received, and by his abilities obtained the patronage of the viceroy of Navarre, and then of the king of Spain, to whom he was made secretary. He was afterwards appointed historiographer of the Indies, and in this office, which was as honorable as it was lucrative, he published his History of the Conquest of Mexico, admired as a valuable composition, which he concludes with the subjugation of the Mexicans, that he may not have to record the consequent cruelties of his countrymen. In the latter part of his life he devoted himself more seriously to religious duties, and took orders at the age of fifty-seven. He died 1686. He wrote besides some poems and dramatic pieces. His history has been translated into various languages, and into English by Townshend.

SOLOMON, Ben Job Jalla, an African, born at Bonda near the river Senegal. He was sent by his father, who was a prince of the country, to sell slaves to captain Pyke, an English trader, and not agreeing in price set out across the Gambia, where he was taken prisoner by another race of blacks, enemies to his country, and sold himself as a slave. He was carried to Annapolis in America, and afterwards escaped, and upon making himself known was ransomed by general Oglethorpe and others and went to England, 1733. He was in London employed by sir Hans Sloane in translating some Arabic MSS. and during his residence of fourteen months he was much noticed, and after being introduced at court returned to his country loaded with kindness and presents. He had a very retentive memory, and could repeat the Koran by heart at fifteen, and he actually wrote the whole book in England three times by recollection only. Memoirs of him were published by Mr. Bluet, and he is also mentioned in Moore's travels, and Astley's voyages.

SOLON, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was called upon by his countrymen in the midst of their turbulent and distracted state to introduce regularity and order into their government, and he established among them his famous laws, which they solemnly bound themselves by an oath to observe. He died in Cyprus 553 B. C. aged 80.

SÖLVYNS, Francis Balthazar, an oriental traveller, born at Antwerp, in 1760, displayed his abilities at an early age, as a painter and engraver. His first works were sea views. He went to Germany with the archduchess Maria Christina, and after the death of that princess accompanied Sir Home Popham to the Red Sea and the East Indies. On his arrival at Hindostan he studied the languages of the East, and their manners and customs, that he might be able accurately to illustrate them by the pen and pencil. Having after fifteen years absence returned to Europe, he settled at Paris, and commenced a work entitled Les Hindous, or Description pittoresque des Mœurs, Costumes, et Cérémonies religieuses de ce peuple, in 4 vols. large folio. After the restoration of the prince of Orange, Solvyns returned to his native country, and was made captain of the port of Antwerp, where he died October 10th, 1824.

SOLYMAN I., saved himself from the fatal battle of Ancyra, and was proclaimed emperor of the Turks after his father Bajazet 1402. He displayed great valor as a warrior, but his glory was tarnished by his excessive love of pleasure, which at last hastened his end. He was dethroned in consequence of his effeminacy by his brother Musa, 1410, and assassinated.

SOLYMAN II., surnamed the Magnificent, succeeded to his father Selim I. 1520. His reign was useful and splendid, he defeated the rebellious Mamelukes in Egypt, and made peace with Ismael Sophi, after which he carried his arms against Europe, and took Belgrade. In 1522, he attacked Rhodes, which was held by the knights of Jerusalem, and after a vigorous defence he took it, and then invaded Hungary, and defeated the Hungarian army at the celebrated battle of Mohatz, 1526. The conquest of Buda was followed by the siege of Vienna, but after twenty unsuccessful assaults, Solyman retreated from the place, with the loss of eighty thousand men. In 1534, he made war against Tauris and Persia, but suffered a defeat, and was disappointed in his attack on Malta, though in 1566, he took from the Genoese the island of Chios. This brave emperor died 30th August 1566, aged 76, at the siege of Sigeth in Hungary, four days before its surrender.

SOLYMAN III., emperor of Turkey 1687, after the deposition of Mahomet IV. He was a very indolent and superstitious prince, whose affairs were administered by his favorite Mustapha Coprogli. He died 22d June, 1691.

SOMBREUIL, Francis Charles Virot de, a French general, whose attachment to the cause of Louis XVI. during the revolution produced his ruin. He was imprisoned in consequence of his loyalty, and on the 2d September 1792, as he was going to be assassinated by the murderers of that fatal day, his daughter, young and amiable, rushed into the midst of the bloody assembly, and obtained his release. The next year, however, proved more fatal, and he was condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal, on some frivolous accusation, and was guillotined with his eldest son by his side. His second son Charles escaped from the murderers, and after distinguishing himself in the Prussian armies, and in Holland against Custines, he passed to England, and in 1795, was sent to head the forces which were landed at Quiberon. This expedition was unfortunate, and he was taken prisoner by Hoche, and carried to l'Orient and Vannes, where he was condemned to be shot. In the preparations for death he obtained permission to repair for three days on board the English ships on the coast to settle his affairs, and at the appointed moment this heroic character returned to save his honor and to perish. He gave himself to the soldiers, who shot him, the order to fire, and fell lamented even by those who cruelly shed his blood.

SOMERS, John lord, chancellor of England, son of an attorney, was born at Worcester, 1652. He was educated at a private school, Staffordshire, and then entered at Trinity college, Oxford, from which he removed to the Middle Temple. He united here the study of polite literature with that of the law, and in 1681, he assisted in the publication of "a just and modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments," which Charles had dissolved with dissatisfaction. He afterwards highly distinguished himself as an able and eloquent pleader, and was, in 1683, one of the council for Pilkington, lord Gray, and others, who had caused a riot in London, and in 1688, for the seven bishops. In the convention parliament of 1689, he was member for Worcester, and was one of the managers of the commons at a conference with the lords about the word "abdicated." He was soon after made solicitor-general and knighted, and in 1692, appointed attorney-general. In 1697, he was raised to the peerage, and made lord chancellor, but in 1700, he was removed from his high situation, and accused by the commons, of high crimes and misdemeanors, of which, upon trial before his peers, he was acquitted. He now abandoned the struggles of political life for studious retirement, and was soon after chosen president of the Royal society. He, however, occasionally labored for the prosperity of his country in the house of lords, and projected the union between Scotland and England. In 1708, he was president of the council, but was removed by the change of ministry two years after. He grew so infirm, that he held no office under George I. He died 26th April 1716. He wrote various pieces, and translated Plutarch's life of Alcibiades, in the lives by several hands, and also Dido's letter to Æneas from Ovid. His character is deservedly celebrated, not only as a man of learning, but as the patron of the learned; and in the midst of political corruption and court intrigue he is represented as a patient, mild, and benevolent magistrate, uncorrupted as a statesman and lawyer, as an orator eloquent, possessed of a most refined taste, and a most upright patriot. He was among those who recommended to public notice the Paradise Lost, which party-spirit and false taste seemed desirous to condemn to eternal obscurity.

SOMERVILLE, William, an English poet, born of an ancient family at Edston, Warwickshire, 1692. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, and when settled on his paternal estate he became known as a justice of the peace, as a poet, and as a country gentleman. The latter part of his life was spent in the midst of distress and poverty. He died 14th July, 1743. He wrote the Chace, a poem, much and deservedly admired, and some other pieces. He also is said to have translated Voltaire's play of Alzire.

SOMMERY, R. Fontette de, a lady, whose parentage is unknown, as she was secretly intrusted to the care of a convent by some person who withdrew immediately all connection with her. She possessed great powers of mind, with inoffensive gaiety, and she was patronised by the wife of marshal Brissac, and by her liberality rendered independent. Her company was in consequence sought by philosophers and men of learning, and her conduct and conversation deserved the respect which she received from the noble and the opulent. She died about 1792, in an advanced age, universally esteemed. Her Doutes sur les Opinions reçues dans la Société, appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1784, and she published besides P'Oreille, an Asiatic romance, 3 vols. 12mo.—and letters.

SOMMIER, John Claude, a French ecclesiastic of Lorraine. He published l'Histoire Dogmatique de la Religion, 6 vols. 4to. a work of merit, and the History of the Holy See, 7 vols. 8vo. a composition which, though decried in France, procured for him from Benedict XIII. the archbishopric of Casarea. He died 1737, aged 76.

SOMNER, William, an eminent antiquary, born at Canterbury, 30th March, 1606. After finishing his education at Canterbury school, he became assistant to his father, who was engaged in the ecclesiastical courts of the diocese, but antiquities, and not law, were his particular study. In 1640, he published "the Antiquities of Canterbury," a very valuable performance, and by the encouragement of his friend Meric Casaubon, he devoted himself laboriously to the acquisition of the old Gaelic, Irish, Scotch, Danish, Gothic, Saxon, and other northern dialects, that he might with greater accuracy and success develop the records of ancient times. Thus celebrated, he was consulted by the most learned of the nation, and when the Anglicanæ Historiæ Scriptores decem, &c. were published, he prepared the Glossary for that valuable work. He was in 1657, at the recommendation of archbishop Usher, nominated to the vacant Saxon lectureship at Cambridge, by Spelman the patron, and in consequence of this appointment he finished his Saxon dictionary, published at Oxford 1659. Before the restoration he was imprisoned for petitioning for a free parliament, but in 1660, he was made master of St. John's hospital, Canterbury. He published in 1660, in 4to. a treatise of Gavel Kind, &c. a most capital work. He died 30th March, 1669, leaving several valuable papers behind him.

SONNERAT, Peter, a traveller and naturalist, was born, about 1745, at Lyons; went to the isle of France, in 1763, made several voyages to various parts of the Indian peninsula and islands; and died in 1814. The bread fruit, the cacao, the mangoutan, and other trees and fruits were introduced by him into the isles of France and Bourbon. He wrote a Voyage to New Guinea, and a Voyage to the East Indies and China.

SONNINI DE MANONCOURT, Charles Nicholas Sigisbert, a traveller and naturalist, was born, in 1751, at Luneville, and was brought up to the bar, but quitted it to become an officer of marine engineers, in order to gratify his love of travelling. He spent three years in Guiana; after which he visited various parts of the European and African continents. He died in 1812. Among his works are, Travels in Egypt; Travels in Greece and Turkey; and an edition of Buffon's works.

SOPHOCLES, an Athenian, distinguished as a warrior, and particularly as a tragic poet. He was twenty times rewarded with the poetical prize, and had for his master Æschylus, and for his rival Euripides. Only seven of his plays are extant, to prove how deservedly he was entitled, for the spirit and elegance of his language, and the sublimity of his thoughts, to the applauses of his admiring countrymen.

SORBIERE, Samuel, a French writer, born in the diocese of Usez, 1610 or 1615. He lost his parents in his youth, and was educated by his maternal uncle, the learned Petit, and afterwards studied divinity at Paris, which he relinquished for medicine. He visited Holland, and wished to settle at Leyden; but in 1653 he abandoned the protestant religion for the popish, and published a Vindication of his Conduct, dedicated to Mazarin. He was at Rome, and was noticed by the pope, and then visited England, and published an account of his voyage thither, though he resided only three months in the country; but his abuse and scurrility were so offensive, that not only Sprat, but Voltaire himself, is severe upon his work; and for this satirical composition he was dismissed from the office of historiographer of France, by the French government. He afterwards paid his court to Clement IX, but he received no higher preferment, as some suspected the soundness of his faith. He was in general, a fair, unblemished character, and died of a dropsy at Bonne, 9th April, 1670. He wrote various publications, about twenty in number, though none of any importance. He was a correspondent of Hobbes, and had the art of sending his letters on philosophical subjects to his friend Gassendi, and then of transmitting, as his own, his answers to the English philosopher, who, thus deluded, admired the abilities, and the profound learning of his French associate.

SORBONNE, Robert de, founder of the celebrated college of that name at Paris, was born at Sorbon, near Rheims, 1201. Though originally poor, yet he acquired celebrity as a preacher, and became chaplain to Louis IX. and when made canon of Cambrai, he laid the foundation of his college, 1253. He died 1274, and left all his property to the improvement of his college, which has produced many respectable members. He wrote some theological tracts, &c. now little read.

SOREL, Agnes, a native of Fromenteau, in Touraine. She was maid of honor to the queen of Charles VII. of France, who became enamoured of her, and at last abandoned the cares of government for her loved society. Agnes, weak only in the presence of her royal lover, influenced him to deeds of glory, and roused him to attack the English forces, which depopulated his kingdom. She maintained her influence over the heart of Charles till her death, which happened 9th Feb. 1450, in her 40th year, at Mesnel, near Jumièges. Some have reported, but falsely, that she was poisoned by order of the dauphin Louis XI. From her beauty she was called by the poets of the age, the fairest of the fair, and in the powers of the mind, had she preserved her virtue, she might have equalled the most celebrated of her sex. She bore three daughters to Charles VII.

SOTHEBY, William, F. R. S. an English gentleman of liberal education and considerable fortune—a respectable poet, and a distinguished translator. Some of his principal works are the Battle of the Nile, Saul, several tragedies, Oberon (a faithful translation from the German of Wieland,) the Georgics of Virgil translated into English verse, and the translation of the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, in four volumes, octavo, with the designs of Flaxman. Most of these works have received high commendations; and, it is said that his translations from Virgil and Homer rank in the first class of that difficult and rarely successful branch of literature. He was the oldest of the English poets at the time of his death, which took place, Dec. 30, 1833, aged 76 years.

SOTHEL, Seth, governor of North Carolina, succeeded Eastchurch in that office. He became a proprietor by purchase from Lord Clarendon. On his passage to America he was captured by the Algerines, and until his liberation and arrival in the colony the government was administered by Harvey. Sotel conducted in a manner so intolerably unjust, that the assembly compelled him to relinquish his office, and depart from the colony. He retired to South Carolina, and was made governor there in the room of Colleton in 1690. He proved to be arbitrary and rapacious, and was removed within two years, and died in North Carolina in 1694. Governor Ludwell succeeded him.

SOTO, Dominic, a learned Dominican, born 1494, at Segovia, where his father was a gardener. He studied divinity at Alcalá, and at Paris, and entered among the Dominicans on his return to Spain, and was made, in consequence of his abilities, confessor to Charles V. by whom he was sent in 1545, to the council of Trent. Though distinguished for eloquence, he possessed little ambition, and refused the bishopric of Segovia, and early resigned the place of imperial confessor. He died 1560. He wrote a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans—a treatise, De Justitiâ and Jure—De Pauperum Causâ—De cavendo Juramentorum Abusu.

SOUBISE, John de Parthenai, lord of, of an illustrious house in Poitou, was one of the chief leaders of the protestants. He came from Ferrara, where he had enjoyed the favor of the duke, to France, and was sent by the prince of Condé, his new patron, to defend Lyons, and he behaved there with such bravery, that the duke of Nemours was obliged to raise the siege. This great man, so much loved by the Calvinists, and dreaded by the catholics, died 1566, aged 54.

SOUBISE, Benjamin de Rohan, duke of, son of Renatus de Rohan, by the only daughter of the preceding, distinguished himself on the side of the protestants, and ably defended with his brother, the town of Rochelle against the arms of France. In 1621 he long maintained the independence of St. John d'Angeli against Louis XIII. and when he surrendered, he obtained honorable terms, and a free pardon. The next year he took Oleron, and extended his conquests over Poitou; but a reverse of fortune obliged him to fly, and he retired to England, where he died 1640.

SOUCHAI, John Baptist, a French writer, born at St. Amand, near Vendome. He distinguished himself as a member of the academy of inscriptions, to whose memoirs he made valuable contributions, and he became canon of Rodez, counsellor to the king, and professor of eloquence in the royal college. He translated sir Thomas Browne's Vulgar Errors, 2 vols.—edited Ausonius, 4to.—and Pellison's works, 3 vols. 12mo. and died 1746, aged 59.

SOUTH, Robert, D. D., a celebrated English divine, son of a merchant, born at Hackney, Middlesex, 1633. He was educated under Busby, and in 1651, was elected to Christ-church, Oxford. Here he greatly distinguished himself by his talents both as a poet and a preacher; but it must be observed that his character, if we may credit Wood, his contemporary, was neither candid nor consistent. When Cromwell had made peace with the Dutch he congratulated him in a Latin poem, and abused the independents in the pulpit, whilst he favored the cause of the presbyterians; but when the restoration approached, he inveighed with the most eloquent zeal against presbyterians, and every denomination of dissenters. His abilities were so respectable, however, notwithstanding his time-serving character, that he was in 1660, elected public orator of the university, and the next year became chaplain to lord Clarendon, and in consequence of this connection obtained a sinecure in Wales. In 1670 he was made canon of Christ-church, and in 1676, attended Hyde ambassador to Poland, and at his return published an account of that kingdom. In 1678, he was made by the chapter of Westminster, rector of Islip; but though some have imagined that he was eager after higher preferment, and dissatisfied, it is asserted that he lived in retirement at Caversham, near Reading, and refused not only an English bishopric, but an archbishopric in Ireland, offered him by Rochester, the lord-lieutenant. At the revolution he took the oaths of allegiance, and might have again received a high ecclesiastical dignity. In 1693 he had a controversy with Sherlock about the Trinity, which was carried on with great acrimony, and though the university of Oxford declared in his favor, yet the dispute was not allayed till the king published a decree to forbid the meddling with the subject of the Trinity, except in a manner agreeable to the doctrines of the church of England. This controversy was finally ridiculed in the "Battle Royal," a popular ballad, which exposed to public derision the two disputants, and Dr. Burnet, of the Charterhouse. In Anne's reign South did little, though he was a warm advocate of Sacheverell, and of his doctrines. He died 8th July, 1716, aged 83. Though learned and eloquent, South was not an amiable character; he was morose, overbearing, and haughty, and while his zeal for religion rendered him popular, his disposition, and the violence of his manners, showed him to be a disagreeable man. His sermons have often appeared in 6 vols. 8vo. and possess great merit, and unite, with judgment and erudition, art, and a strong vein of satirical moroseness. His Opera Posthuma appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1717.

SOUTHCOTT, Joanna, a fanatic, was born, in April, 1750, in the west of England. Her parents were poor, and she herself was, for many years, a servant. Early in life she indulged in visionary feeling; but, when she was forty-two, she went further, and claimed the character of a prophetess. From that period, for more than twenty years, she continued to pour forth her unintelligible rhapsodies; by which, however, she succeeded in making numerous dupes. At length, mistaking disease for pregnancy, she announced to the world that she was destined to be the mother of the promised Shiloh; and splendid preparations were made for his reception by her deluded followers. She, however, died of the malady, December 27, 1814. Her sect is not even yet extinct.

SOUTHERN, Thomas, an English dramatist, born at Stratford on Avon, Warwickshire, 1662. He was servitor at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. and then went to settle in London. He now began to publish plays, and by this employment acquired a very comfortable subsistence. The Loyal Brother, or Persian Prince, appeared in 1682, to compliment the duke of York, who when on the throne gave him a captain's commission. In 1721 he obtained for his "Spartan Dame" £150, a high price at that time, and he was the first who extended the advantage of play-writing to a second and third night. The most affecting of his plays, and perhaps of all English plays, is his Innocent Adultery, and the most finished is his Oroonoko, or the Royal Slave, borrowed from a true story from Mrs. Behn's novel. He wrote besides Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage, and also the Disappointment, and the Rambling Lady, comedies

The last ten years of his life he lived at Westminster and was there a regular attendant at the abbey service. He died 26th May, 1746, aged 83. His dramatic works were published by T. Evans, 3 vols. 12mo.

SOWERBY, James, a naturalist, was born in 1766, and was originally a drawing master; but acquired considerable reputation as a botanist and mineralogist. He died October 25, 1822. Among his works are, English Botany; English Fungi; and British Mineralogy.

SPAENDONCK, Gerardvan, a flower and miniature painter, was born, in 1746, at Tilburg, in Holland, and was a pupil of Herreyns of Antwerp. He settled at Paris; became miniature painter to the king, and, subsequently, professor of iconography at the botanical garden; and died in May, 1822. As a flower painter he stands highest, perhaps, of all modern artists.

SPAGNOLI, Baptist, a native of Mantua, who became general of the Carmelites, and distinguished himself by the sound and virtuous regulations which he attempted to introduce among the corrupted members of his order. He devoted himself much to studious pursuits, and wrote verses with great facility, but not always with equal success. His works, containing eclogues and other poems, and prose miscellanies, were edited at Venice, 1499, 4to. and at Antwerp 1576, 4 vols. 8vo. He died 20th March, 1516, aged 72.

SPALLANZANI, Lazarus, a celebrated Italian naturalist and physiologist, was born in 1729, at Scandiano; studied at Reggio and Bologna; and was intended for the bar by his parents, but, at the request of Valisneri, was allowed to follow the natural bent of his genius towards science. After having held professorships at Reggio and Modena, he became professor of natural history, and director of the museum, at Pavia. He held this office till his decease, in 1799, and his labors were interrupted only by several tours in various parts. His works are numerous, and are highly valuable, as having contributed largely to the progress of physiology and comparative anatomy.

SPANHEIM, Frederic, D.D. divinity professor at Leyden, was born at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate, 1600. He was educated under his father, a learned man, and then studied at Heidelberg and Geneva. He refused a professorship at Lausanne, and in 1631 succeeded to a divinity chair at Geneva, which he left in 1642 to settle at Leyden, where he had been honorably invited. Here he distinguished himself as a professor, and also as a preacher, in the Walloon church, and was respected by the queen of Bohemia, the prince of Orange, and Christina of Sweden. He died May, 1649. He wrote Exercitationes de Gratia Universalis, 3 vols. 8vo.—Dubia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to.—the Swiss Mercury—Life of Count Dhona, 4to. &c.

SPANHEIM, Ezekiel, the son of Frederic Spanheim, a learned divine, was born, in 1629, at Geneva; and, after having been professor of eloquence in that city, was employed in a diplomatic capacity, by the elector palatine, and, subsequently, by the elector of Brandenburg. He died Prussian ambassador at London, in 1710. His chief work is, A Treatise on Medals, two volumes folio.

SPANHEIM, Wigand, D.D. was a very learned man, of the sixteenth century, and became ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector of Palatine. He was progenitor of a learned race. He died in 1620, after reading a letter from his son, which made him weep for joy, and die happy.

SPANHEIM, Frederic, D.D. son of Frederic, and brother to the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1632, and carried to Leyden by his father. He studied under Hereboord, Golius, and Boxtton, and after distinguishing himself as a preacher at Utrecht, he was invited to the chair of divinity at Heidelberg, by the elector palatine, 1665. After acquiring reputation here as a professor, he removed in 1670 to Leyden, where he succeeded to the professorship of divinity and sacred history with universal approbation. His laborious studies enfeebled his health, and he died 1701, in consequence of a palsy. He left only one son out of several children whom he had by three wives. His writings are very numerous, and were printed at Leyden, 3 vols. folio. They are chiefly on theological subjects, of which the chief is his Ecclesiastical History.

SPARRMAN, Andrew, a Swedish naturalist and traveller, was born, about 1747, in the province of Upland, studied medicine at Upsal, and gained, by his progress in natural history, the notice of Linnæus. He visited China and the Cape; penetrated a considerable distance into the interior of southern Africa; and accompanied Captain Cook on one of his voyages. He died in 1820, at Stockholm. His principal works are narratives of his Travels.

SPARROW, Anthony, a native of Depden, Suffolk, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, from which he was expelled for refusing to subscribe to the covenant, 1643. On the restoration of the second Charles, he was placed at the head of his college, made arch-deacon of Sudbury, and in 1667 raised to the see of Exeter, from which he was translated to Norwich. He compiled a collection of Articles, Injunctions, Canons, and also published Rationale, or the book of Common Prayer, 1657, 8vo. improved afterwards with additions, and again edited 1722. This pious and learned divine died in his diocese, 1685.

SPARTACUS, a Thracian hero, who was torn from his country by the Romans, and made a gladiator at Capua. Escaping with a few of his companions from his tyrants, he at length rallied round his standard a formidable army, repeatedly defeated the Roman generals, and, had he been properly seconded, would, perhaps, have shaken the power of Rome. He was slain B. C. 71, after having displayed the most daring valor.

SPEED, John, a celebrated historian, born at Farington, Cheshire, 1555. Though originally a tailor, and of some eminence in his profession, he abandoned the needle for the pen, and in 1596, under the patronage of Mr. Fulke Greville, he published his "Theatre of Great Britain," afterwards improved and enlarged. His History of Great Britain under the conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, appeared 1614, dedicated to James I. and was recommended by verses from sir Henry Spelman, and other learned men. He published also, 1616, the Cloud of Witnesses, or Genealogies of Scriptures, &c. a valuable book of divinity, often bound up with the bible. He died 28th July, 1629. He was an able antiquary, and had his education been equal to the powers of his natural genius, as Nicolson observes, he would greatly have outdone himself.

SPELMAN, sir Henry, an eminent antiquary, born at Congham, near Lynn, Norfolk, of a respectable family, 1561. He was two years at Trinity college, Cambridge, and then entered at Lincoln's Inn. He was sheriff for Norfolk, 1604, and became so well known for his abilities, that James sent him three different times into Ireland on public business, and appointed him at home one of the commissioners to inquire into the fees exacted in all the courts and offices of England. He received a present of £300 for his services, and was knighted by the king. When fifty years old, he settled in London with his wife, and devoted himself there totally to literary pursuits, and to the company and correspondence of the great and the learned of the age; of Usher, Williams, Selden, Cotton, Abbot, Laud, Dugdale, Salmasius, Rigaltius, Bignonius, and others. He founded a Saxon lectureship at Cambridge, but the intervention of the civil wars prevented the full execution of his wishes in this respect. He died in London 1641.

SPENCE, Joseph, an elegant scholar and divine, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he was fellow. In 1727, he published an Essay on Pope's Odyssey, which, though coldly praised by Dr. Johnson, is allowed by Warton to possess great merit; and indeed, far from irritating the poet, it procured his friendship, and to that connexion the critic owed some of the preferment which he afterwards held. In 1728, he was elected poetry professor at Oxford, and travelled as tutor with lord Lincoln, afterwards duke of Newcastle. In 1742, he was made professor of modern history, and also obtained from his college Great Horwood rectory in Buckinghamshire, where he never resided, and in 1754, he was promoted to a stall in Durham cathedral. On the 20th August 1768, he was found drowned in a canal in his garden at Byfleet, and though the particulars of the melancholy accident must remain unknown, it is generally supposed that in a fit he fell with his face downwards into the water, where it was too shallow to cover his head, and was thus suffocated. He published an Account of his friend Stephen Duck, 1731—an Account of the Life and Writings of Blacklock—some pieces preserved in Dodsley's Miscellany, and other compositions; but the work for which he is deservedly admired as a man of genius and of taste, is his Polymetis, or an Inquiry on the Agreement of the Roman poets, and the Remains of Ancient Artists, to illustrate each other, folio, 1747. This work, though fastidiously censured by Gray, has met with universal approbation, and has been highly commended by Lowth, Johnson, and Warton.

SPENCER, John, D.D., an ingenious divine, born in Kent, 1630, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1667, master. In 1677 he was made dean of Ely, and after a life, usefully devoted to literature and religion, he died May, 1695, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He published some occasional sermons; but his works best known are a Discourse concerning Prodigies, a learned composition—a Latin Dissertation concerning Urim and Thummim, 1668—and in 1685, his celebrated work de Legibus Hæbreorum Ritualibus, & eorum Rationibus, which has met with opposition from various quarters, because, while he vindicates the ways of God to men, he asserts that many of the rites and ceremonies of the Jews are deduced from the practices of their heathen neighbors. This work was edited with the author's notes by Leonard Chappelow, Cambridge, 1727, folio.

SPENER, Philip James, a Lutheran divine, of Frankfurt on the Maine, born in Alsatia, 1635. He became in 1680, founder of a new sect called Pietists, which maintained that only persons inspired by the Holy Ghost could understand the scriptures, a doctrine which produced many enthusiasts, and was at last checked by the interference of the civil power. He settled at Dresden, and afterwards at Berlin, where he held some ecclesiastical dignities, and died 1705, aged 70.

SPENSER, Edmund, a celebrated English poet, born at London, and educated at Pembroke hall,

Cambridge, where he took his master's degree 1576. He left Cambridge upon being an unsuccessful candidate for a fellowship at Pembroke, and for some time resided with some friends in the North, where he fell in love with his fair Rosalind, whose beauties and cruelty he has laboriously painted. His first publication was the Shepherd's Calendar, which was dedicated to sir Philip Sidney, a great favorite at court, and a fond admirer of good poetry. By means of this worthy patron, he was introduced at court, and appointed poet laureat, with a salary of £50 and his verses pleased Elizabeth so much, that she ordered Burleigh to present him £100, to which the sagacious minister objected as being too much for a song. "Then give him," replied the queen, "what is reason." He was afterwards employed by lord Grey de Wilton, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, as his secretary, and for his faithful services he was rewarded with a grant of three thousand acres of land in the county of Cork, and in the mansion on this estate, he spent some time, and completed his celebrated poem, the Faery Queen. The rebellion, however, disturbed his repose; he was plundered and robbed of his estate, and broken in heart and fortune, he went to London, where he died 1598. He was interred in Westminster abbey, near Chaucer. A monument was erected to his memory by Robert Devereaux, earl of Essex. Though he is said on his monument to have been born 1510, and to have died 1596, these dates are false according to Camden, who fixes the time of his death 1598. As a poet Spenser is deservedly regarded as little inferior either in invention or in judgment, and in the true fire of the muse, to any author in ancient or modern times. But with all his beauties, he was, says Rymer, fanciful and chimerical, and without uniformity, so that his poem is truly fairy land. His language unfortunately is becoming obsolete, and the form of his stanzas is heavy and ill-judged; but though his characters are generally all equal in the possession of moral virtues, and not drawn with sufficient discrimination; and though for every adventure a hero is raised by the inventive powers of the poet, yet the composition is interesting, grand, and sublime, full of variety, and animated by the happy efforts of a most fertile imagination.

SPERLING, Otto, a native of Hamburgh, who studied medicine in Italy, and after travelling in Dalmatia, settled as physician at Bergen in Norway. He afterwards went to reside at Copenhagen, as physician to the king of Denmark; but he was involved in the disgrace of count Ulfeld, and was sent to prison, 1664, where he died after a long confinement, 1681. He wrote a Catalogue of the Plants of Denmark, 1642, 12mo.

SPERONE, Speron, a polite writer, born at Padua, 1500. He lived for some time at Rome, patronised by Pius IV. who knighted him, and employed him in embassies to Venice, France, and Spain. He died at Padua, 1588. His works are written in excellent Italian, and consist of orations, dialogues, letters, dissertations, and a tragedy, called Canace.

SPIELMAN, James Reinhold, a physician, born 1722, at Strasburg. After travelling over Europe, and residing some time at Berlin, he returned to his native city, where, as professor of medicine and chemistry, his lectures were attended by numerous and respectable classes. He promoted the establishment of a botanical garden at Strasburg, which is now one of its principal ornaments, and he died September 1782, universally esteemed. He published Elementa Chymicæ, 8vo.—Prodromus Floræ Argentinensis, 8vo.—Institutiones Materię Medicę —Syllabus Medicamentorum—Pharmacopœia Generalis, 4to.

SPILLER, John, a young sculptor of great promise, was born December, 1763, in London, and after a liberal education became a pupil of Bacon. His talents becoming known, he was chosen to execute a statue of Charles II. for the centre of the Royal Exchange; and while engaged in this work the pulmonary disease, to which he had a tendency, became so much aggravated that soon after his much admired production was placed on its pedestal he expired, in May 1794. The author of the Curiosities of Literature makes the following observations illustrative of the enthusiasm of genius:—'The young and classical sculptor who raised the statue of Charles II., placed in the centre of the Royal Exchange, was, in the midst of his work, advised by his medical friends to desist from working in marble; for the energy of his labor, with the strong excitement of his feelings, already had made fatal inroads on his constitution. But he was willing, he said, to die at the foot of his statue. The statue was raised, and the young sculptor, with the shining eyes and hectic blush of consumption, beheld it there, returned home, and shortly was no more.' He married in 1792, and his accomplished wife died a few months after him of a similar disease. They left behind them, at the tender age of a few months, an only daughter.

SPINCKES, Nathanael, an eminent divine, born at Castor, Northamptonshire, 1654. He entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, and though after his father's death possessed of a respectable fortune, he applied for a Rustat scholarship at Jesus, which he obtained as an honorable proof of his abilities after a strict and prolonged examination. In 1681, he was chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, and in 1685, obtained the rectory of Peakirk, Northamptonshire, and afterwards was promoted to a stall at Salisbury, and to the rectory of St. Mary in that city. He however, lost all his preferments in 1690, for refusing to take the oaths to William, and lived afterwards in some distress, and in dependence upon the contributions of other nonjurors, of whom he was elected one of the bi-shops. He died 28th July, 1727, and was buried in St. Faith's cemetery, north side of St. Paul's. He wrote various pious books and devotions—the Sick Man visited, a sixth edition of which appeared 1775.

SPINOLA, Ambrose, a famous general in the service of Spain, where he was born 1569, but descended from a Genoese family. He distinguished himself in Flanders, and as commander in chief, took Ostend, 1604. His abilities were eminently displayed against Maurice of Nassau, the greatest hero of the age, whom he opposed with skill and military judgment. After the truce of 1608, he lived in retirement, till fresh troubles called him again to take the field, and to make Aix-la-Chapelle, Wesel, and Breda, submit to his arms. In 1629 he was employed in Italy, where he took Casal; but the court of Spain disconcerted his measures, and prevented his obtaining possession of the citadel, in consequence of which he fell sick, and died soon after, 1630, exclaiming, they have robbed me of my honor.

SPINOZA, Benedict de, an atheistical writer, son of a Portuguese Jew, born at Amsterdam, 1638. He studied medicine and theology, but his religion was so loose, and his inquiries for the reason of every thing which he was to believe, became so offensive to the rabbis, that he was thrust out of the synagogue. In consequence of this he became a Christian, and was baptized; but his conversion was insincere, and though during his life he did not openly profess himself an atheist, his posthumous works plainly proved him such. He died of a consumption at the Hague, February 1677, aged 45. He is the founder of a regular system of atheism, and by his hypothesis he wished to establish that there is but one substance in nature, which is endowed with infinite attributes, with extension and thought; that all spirits are modifications of that substance, and that God, the necessary and most perfect being, is the cause of all things that exist, but does not differ from them. These monstrous doctrines, though not new, were thus built into a regular system by this extraordinary man, who is said in other respects to have been of a good moral character in private life, benevolent, friendly, and charitable. His conduct was marked by no licentiousness or irregularity; but he retired from the tumults of Amsterdam, to a more peaceful residence at the Hague, where curiosity led princes, philosophers, and learned men to see and to converse with this bold asserter of atheism. His works were Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, 4to. 1670—Opera Posthuma, 4to. Few have studied the abstract and difficult principles of Spinoza, and fewer have followed them. Toland may be said to approach nearest, as a free-thinker, in his Pantheisticon, to the opinions of the Dutch philosopher, and his sentiments seem in some degree to be the repetition of those of his atheistical predecessor.

SPIRA, Francis, a Venetian lawyer of eminence in the 16th century. Being accused before the papal nuncio of favoring the tenets of the reformation, he was compelled to make a public recantation of his opinions to save his life, and this had such effect upon his spirits, that he was seized with a dreadful melancholy, which baffled all the aid of medicine, and carried him to his grave, under the most poignant agonies of mind, 1548.

SPON, Charles, an ingenious Frenchman, born at Lyons, 1609. He studied at Ulm and Paris, and in 1632, went to Montpellier, to devote himself more attentively to medicine. He took his degree of M. D. there, and settled at Lyons, where he practised with great success, and died 21st Feb. 1684, highly respected. He was an excellent scholar, and had such facility of writing Latin verses, that Bayle says he had a copy of some of his iambics, on the Deluge and last conflagration, which, though written at the age of fourteen, would have done credit to established abilities, if composed in moments of leisure. He had an extensive correspondence with the learned of Europe, and was particularly attached to Gassendus, and to his philosophy. He published the Prognostics of Hippocrates, in hexameter verses, dedicated to his friend Guy Patin.

SPON, James, son of the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1647, and after a careful education, was admitted doctor of medicine at Montpellier, 1667, and member of the Lyons college of physicians two years after. In 1675 he began to travel into Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant, in company with Mr. Wheeler, of which he published an interesting account. He left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 1685, with the intention of retiring to Zurich, but died on the way at Vevay, on the lake Lemán, 1696. He was member of several learned societies, and was a most respectable character, than in whom, says Bayle, the qualities of a learned and of an honest man were never more happily united. He wrote various works, the best known of which are, Recherches des Antiquités de Lyons, 8vo. 1674—Ignotorum atque Obscurorum Deorum Aræ, 8vo. 1677—Histoire de la Ville & de l'Etat de Geneve, 2 vols. 12mo. 1680—

SPONDANUS, John, or DESPONDE, a learned man, born at Mauleon de Soule, in Biscay, 1557. At the age of twenty he began a commentary on Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, printed at Basil, 1583, folio, full of much erudition, though sometimes trifling. He abjured the reformed religion, and left the court of his patron, Henry of Navarre, afterwards the fourth of France, and retired to the mountains of Biscay. He died 1595, and was buried at Bourdeaux. He published Aristotle's Logic in Greek and Latin, at Basil, with notes, 1583.

SPONDANUS, Henry, younger brother of the preceding, was born 1568, and educated at the reformed college of Ortez. He became early eminent for his knowledge of Greek and Latin, and afterwards studied the civil and canon law, and recommended himself to the notice of Henry IV. of France, then prince of Bearn, who made him master of the requests at Navarre. He abandoned the protestant religion 1595, and then retiring to Rome, took orders, and obtained, on his return to France, the see of Pamiers from Louis XIII. He died at Toulouse, 1643. He abridged his friend Baronius's Annales Ecclesiastici, and wrote besides, Annales Sacri a Mundi Creatione ad ejusdem Redemptionem.

SPOTSWOOD, John, archbishop of St. Andrew's was descended from an ancient family, and born 1565. He was educated at Glasgow, where he distinguished himself, and afterwards attended as chaplain the duke of Lenox, in his embassy to France, and when James I. took possession of the English throne in 1603, he was in the number of his attendants. That year he was made bishop of Glasgow, and privy counsellor of Scotland, and in 1615 was translated to the see of St. Andrew's. In 1633 he crowned Charles I. as king of Scotland at Holyrood-house, and in 1635 was made chancellor of the kingdom. The troubles of the country obliged him to leave his situation, and he retired to England, where he sunk under his infirmities, and the melancholy state of public affairs. He died in London, 1639, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote an history of the Church of Scotland, published 1655, folio. It was begun at the command of James I. and is regarded as accurate. His second son sir Robert, was a man of abilities, patronised like his father by James I. and by his successor. He shared the fortunes of the great Montrose, and was put to death with him.

SPOTSWOOD, Alexander, governor of Virginia, succeeded Jennings in 1710. He was a man of uncommon enterprise and public spirit, a friend of learning and religion, and exercised a useful administration. He was succeeded in 1723 by Drysdale. In 1730 he was appointed post-master general of the colonies, and in 1739 commander of the forces raised against Florida, but he died at Annapolis, June 7th, 1740.

SPRAGG, Edward, a valiant Englishman. He commanded the Royal Charles in the first engagement with the Dutch fleet in 1665, and behaved with such courage, that the king knighted him in his own ship. The following year he distinguished himself under the duke of Albermarle, in the fight which continued four days with the Dutch, and in 1667 he contributed to the defeat of the same enemy by burning some of their ships when they attempted to sail up the Thames. He was employed in 1671 against the Algerines in the Mediterranean, where he destroyed seven of their men of war; but two years after he was unfortunately drowned in the dreadful engagement with Van Tromp, as he was passing in a small boat from his ship, which was sinking in the fight, to another.

SPRAT, Thomas, an English prelate, born at Tallaton, Devonshire, 1636, and educated at Wadham college, of which he became fellow. He here began to cultivate poetry, and published in 1659 his poem on the death of Cromwell, dedicated to Dr. Wilkins. He afterwards wrote the Plague of Athens, a poem, and another poem on the death of Cowley. After the restoration he took orders, and was chaplain to Buckingham, and then to the king. He also became an active promoter of the establishment of the Royal society, of which he was one of the first members, and of whose labors he published the history, 1667. He next wrote Observations on Sorbiere's Voyage to England, and in 1668 edited his friend Cowley's poems. Thus distinguished as a writer, he was amply rewarded by preferments. In 1668 he became prebendary of Westminster, afterwards minister of St. Margaret's church, canon of Windsor, and in 1693 dean of Westminster, and next year bishop of Rochester. In 1685 he was prevailed upon to write the history of the Rye-house plot, and as he had been liberally noticed by James II. and made dean of the chapel royal, he was appointed one of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs. In this office he acted with some timidity, and then at last withdrew; but when it was debated whether the throne was vacant by the flight of James, he boldly stood the manly advocate of his master. He, however, submitted to the revolution, and took the oath; but an infamous attempt was made by some unprincipled informers to involve him in trouble by forging his name, and by introducing into his house the plan of a pretended plot, all which, however, proved his innocence, and after some confinement, left him the exercise of his episcopal duties. He died 20th May, 1713. His character is delineated with some degree of asperity by Burnet; but it should be remembered that they were rivals and enemies, and that while Burnet preached before the Commons, he made the pulpit the vehicle of sedition, and Sprat there displayed his zeal and loyalty in favor of the government. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote a Relation of the wicked Conspiracy of Stephen Blackhead and Robert Young, who united to rob him of his Honor and of his Life—and also sermons, 8vo.—poems. It has been observed that every book of his composition is of a different kind, and has its distinct and characteristic excellence.

SPRING, Samuel, D.D. a learned divine, settled at Newburyport, Massachusetts. He was born at Uxbridge in that state, 1746, and graduated at Princeton college in 1771. His ordination at Newburyport took place, August 6, 1777, and here he spent the residue of his life. He died, March 4, 1819, aged 73 years. Previous to his ordination he acted for some time as chaplain in the American army. In this capacity he accompanied a detachment of Arnold through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec, in 1775. Dr. Spring was chiefly distinguished as a metaphysician in controversial divinity. He was, however, active in the great charitable enterprises of his time. His agency in founding the theological seminary at Andover, was no less important, than in organizing the Massachusetts Missionary Society, of which he was president. The following are among his publications.—Friendly dialogue, 1784; Disquisitions and Strictures, 1789; Thanksgiving sermon, 1794; Missionary sermon, 1802; sermon on the Duel between Hamilton and Burr, 1804; two Discourses on Christ's self-existence, 1805; Two Fast Sermons, 1809; sermon at the inauguration of Dr. Griffin at Andover, 1809; one on the death of Thomas Thompson, 1818; and one before Missionary Society, 1818.

SPROAT, James, D.D., native of Scituate, Massachusetts, born in 1722, and graduated at Yale college, in 1741. He was ordained in 1743, at Guilford, where he was highly popular and useful. From this place he removed to Philadelphia, and succeeded Mr. Tennent at the close of the year 1768. Here he continued till his death, October 18, 1793, aged 71 years. He died during the prevalence of the yellow fever in Philadelphia; and, the large number of people, at such a time, that attended his funeral, showed the estimation in which he was held.

SPURSTOW, William, D.D., master of Catherine hall, Cambridge, from which he was expelled in the civil wars for refusing the engagement, was afterwards minister of Hackney, of which he was deprived in 1662, for nonconformity. He was member of the Westminster assembly of divines, and assisted also at the Savoy conference. He was author of a treatise on the Promises, 8vo.—the Spiritual Chemist, 8vo.—the Wiles of Satan—and sermons, and died 1666. He was also engaged in the attack on episcopacy, under the name of Smeatymnus.

SPURZHEIM, John Gaspar, the celebrated phrenologist, and author of various works on the science of phrenology, was born at Longvich in Germany, 31 December, 1776. He was educated at the university of Treves, and about the year 1800 became acquainted with Dr. Gall, the founder of the doctrine of craniology, as it was then called. In 1804 he united himself with Dr. Gall, and for the three following years they travelled in company on the continent of Europe, delivering lectures upon their new found and favorite science. In 1807 they became residents in Paris. In 1813 Spurzheim and Gall separated; and in the year following, Spurzheim visited England. Having given lectures in various cities on the continent of Europe, and in Great Britain and Ireland, he sailed for America, and, on the 17th of September 1832, commenced a course of lectures on phrenology in Boston, and soon after another course in Cambridge. But his course of labors was now short. He became ill, and after a few weeks, died November 10th of the same year, much respected by all who knew him.

SQUIRE, Samuel, D.D. a learned prelate, son of an apothecary at Warminster, Wilts, where he was born 1714. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and afterwards was successively made archdeacon of Bath, rector of Topsfield, Essex, in 1750 rector of St. Anne's Westminster, vicar of Greenwich, and in 1760, dean of Bristol. The following year he was raised to the see of St. David's, and died May 6th, 1766. In the various characters of pastor, bishop, husband, father, and friend, he was a most excellent and amiable pattern. He left two sons and a daughter. The best known of his works are, a Defence of the Ancient Greek Chronology—and an Enquiry into the Origin of the Greek Language, 8vo.—Enquiry into the Nature of the English Constitution, 8vo.—Indifference to Religion inexcusable, 12mo.—the Principles of Religion made easy to Young Persons, &c.—a character of his first patron Herring.

STAAL, Madame de, a French lady, daughter of a painter called de Launai, well educated in a convent by the favor of the abbess. She was in the service of the duchess of Maine, and shared her disgrace by being confined two years in the bastille, and afterwards she married de Staal an officer of the Swiss guards. She died 1750, leaving her memoirs, published afterwards in 3 vols. 12mo. to which a fourth was afterwards added, containing two comedies. She possessed great wit and vivacity as her memoirs fully prove, and it was this which recommended her to the notice and friendship of la Fontenelle, and other learned men.

STACK, Edward, general, an Irishman by birth, died, at a very advanced age, in Calais, France, December 1833. He was a man of talents and accomplishments; and his life was full of adventure. In his youth he was one of the aids-de-camp of Louis XV. of France, and came to America with general Lafayette. He continued in the French service till the revolution; afterwards entered the service of his native country; became one of Bonaparte's prisoners, and was confined three years at Biche, and afterwards at Verdun, where he remained till the restoration. He was, for a time, a fellow-prisoner with the Duc d'Enghein.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, a pious divine, for some years curate of Finchley, and afterwards vicar of Beenham, Berks, where he died 11th October 1752. He wrote several things, and among them a History of the Bible, 2 vols. folio, a popular and valuable work, often reprinted—a System of Practical Divinity, fol.—a Tract on the Miseries of the inferior Clergy, 8vo.—a Review of the Controversy concerning Miracles, a complete body of Divinity—and an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed.

STADIUS, John, a native of Lochnout, in Brabant, who became professor of history at Louvain, and afterwards filled the chair of mathematics and history at Paris, where he died 1579 aged 52. His knowledge of mathematics was disgraced by his fondness for astrological calculations. He wrote Ephemerides, 4to.—Tabula Æquabilis & Apparentis Motus Cælestium Corporum—a Latin Commentary on Florus—Fasti Romanorum.

STAEL-HOLSTEIN, Anne Louisa Germaine, baroness de, a celebrated female writer, the daughter of M. Necker, the French financier, was born, in 1766, at Paris. Her talents were so early displayed that she was said never to have been a child, and the utmost care was taken to cultivate them. In her twentieth year she married the Baron de Stael, the Swedish ambassador. From that period she took an active part in literature, and an almost equally active one in politics. It was through her influence with Barras that Talleyrand was appointed minister of the foreign department. At the commencement of Bonaparte's career she was one of his admirers, but she afterwards became hostile to him; and, in 1801, in consequence of her attempting to thwart his government, she was ordered to quit Paris. After having visited Germany, Prussia, and Italy, she returned to France, whence, however, she was again expelled. Her peregrinations were next extended to Moscow, Stockholm, and London; nor did she again behold her favorite abode of Paris till after the restoration of the Bourbons. In 1811 she married M. de Rocca, but their union was kept secret. She died July 14, 1817. Of her works, which form seventeen volumes, the principal are the romances of Delphine and Corinna; Considerations on the French Revolution; Dramatic Essays; Considerations on Literature; Germany; and Ten Years of Exile.

STAFFORD, Antony, a writer, descended from a noble family, and born in Northamptonshire. He received his education at Oriol college, Oxford, and was made master of arts, 1623. He was a man of great learning, and died 1641. His works are, Niobe dissolved into Nilus, or his age drowned to her own Tears, 12mo.—Meditations and Resolutions, 12mo.—Life and Death of Diogenes—the Life of the Virgin Mary, or Female Glory—the Pride of Honor—Honor and Virtue triumphant over the Grave, exemplified in the Life and Death of Henry lord Stafford, 4to. His Female Glory proved very offensive to the puritans of England.

STAHL, George Ernest, an eminent German chemist, born in Franconia in 1660, and chosen professor of medicine at Hall, when a university was founded in that city in 1694. The excellency of his lectures while he filled that chair, the importance of his various publications, and his extensive practice, soon raised his reputation very high. He received an invitation to Berlin in 1716, which having accepted, he was made counsellor of state and physician to the king. He died in 1734, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. Stahl is without doubt one of the greatest men of which the annals of medicine can boast; his name marks the commencement of a new era in chemistry. He was the author of the doctrine of phlogiston, which, though now completely overturned by the discoveries of Lavoisier and others, was not without its use; as it served to combine the scattered fragments of former chemists into a system, and as it gave rise to more accurate experiments and a more scientific view of the subject, to which many of the subsequent discoveries were owing. This theory maintained its ground for more than half a century, and was received and supported by some of the most eminent men which Europe has produced; a sufficient proof of the ingenuity and the abilities of its author. He was the author also of A Theory of Medicine, founded upon the notions, which he entertained of the absolute dominion of mind over body, in consequence of which he affirmed that every muscular action is a voluntary action of the mind, whether attended with consciousness or not. This theory he and his followers carried a great deal too far, but the advices which he gives to attend to the state of the mind of the patient are worthy of the attention of physicians. His principal works are, 1. Experimenta et Observationes Chemicæ et Physicæ, Berlin, 1731, 8vo.; 2. Dissertationes Medicæ, Hall, 2 vols. 4to. This is a collection of theses. 3. Theoria Medica vera, 1737, 4to.; 4. Opusculum Chymico-physico Medicum, 1740, 4to.; 5. A Treatise on Sulphur, both inflammable and Fixed, written in German. 6. Negotium Otiosum, Hall, 1720, 4to. It is in this treatise chiefly that he establishes his system concerning the action of the soul upon the body. 7. Fundamenta Chymicæ Dogmaticæ et Experimentalis, Nuremberg, 1747, 3 vols. 4to.; 8. A Treatise on Salts, written in German. 9. Commentarium in Metallurgium Beecheri, 1723.

STAHREMBERG, Guido Balde, count de, an Austrian general, who raised himself by merit to the highest military honors. He displayed great gallantry at the battle of Zenta, and by his courage and military skill insured the victory of Saragossa, 1719. He died at Vienna, 1737, aged 80.

STANDISH, Miles, the first military commander at Plymouth, New England, was born at Lancashire, about the year 1584. After having served some time in the army in the Netherlands, he settled at Leyden, with Mr. Robinson's congregation, and accompanied them to Plymouth in 1620. He was there chosen captain, or chief military commander, and rendered the most important services to the colony, in the wars with the Indians. Many of his exploits were peculiarly daring, and his escapes extraordinary. In 1625 he went to England, as an agent for the colony, and returned the following year. He lived from that time in Duxbury, holding the office of magistrate. He died in 1656. He was somewhat rough and passionate, but a daring and skillful soldier, and an upright magistrate.

STANHOPE, George, D.D., an able divine, born at Harts-horn, Derlyshire, March 1660, of a respectable family, which had suffered much during the civil wars. He was removed from Uppingham school to Eton, and was elected to King's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of doctor of divinity 1697. He first obtained Tewing rectory, Hertfordshire, and afterwards Lewisham in Kent, by the favor of Lord Dartmouth, in whose family he had been tutor, and soon after he became chaplain to the king. In 1701, he preached Boyle's lectures, and two years after exchanged Tewing for the vicarage of Deptford, and soon after was made dean of Canterbury in the room of Hooper, raised to the see of Bath and Wells. These preferments were due to his integrity, learning, and piety, and, as one of our ablest divines, his writings must always be held in high esteem. This worthy man, whose private life was as virtuous and exemplary as his public conduct was useful, died 18th March, 1728, aged 68. The second wife survived him. The best known of his works are a Translation of Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, 8vo.—a Translation of Charron on Wisdom, 3 vols. 8vo.—Translation of M. Aurel. Antoninus' Meditations, 4to.—sermons on several occasions—a Translation of Epictetus, with Simplicius' Commentary, 8vo.—Paraphrase on the Epistles and Gospels, 4 vols. 8vo.—the Truth and Excellence of the Christian Religion, in sermons preached at Boyle's lectures, 4to.—Translations of Rochefoucaud's Maxims, 8vo.—of St. Augustine's Meditations—of Bishop Andrews' Greek Devotions—Parsons' Christian Directory, 8vo.—the Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion.

STANHOPE, James, earl of, of an ancient Nottinghamshire family, was born 1673. He embraced the military profession, and for his services at the siege of Nanur, in 1695, king William gave him a company, and the rank of colonel. He served under the great Peterborough in Spain, and distinguished himself at the siege of Barcelona, and at the victories of Almanza and Saragossa; but he was obliged to surrender the citadel of Briheuga to the forces of Vendome, after a very brave resistance. Under George I. he was made secretary of state, and in 1714 went as ambassador to Vienna, and in 1717 was appointed first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer. These services to his country were rewarded with an earldom. He died 3d February 1721.

STANHOPE, Philip Dormer, earl of Chesterfield, a distinguished nobleman and able writer, born in London, 22d September, 1694. After a private education he entered at the age of eighteen, at Trinity hall, Cambridge, where he studied the classics with great assiduity. In 1714, after two years' residence, he left the university to make the tour of Europe, and after receiving lessons of gaming at the Hague, and polishing his manners under the tuition of the dissipated belles of Paris, and visiting Italy, he returned home the next year. He became gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, and in the first parliament of George I. was elected member for St. Germain's, and then began his political career. He proved himself an able and accomplished speaker; but after defending the septennial bill he followed the prince of Wales in his opposition to the measures of the court, and no offers could persuade him to espouse the cause of the ministry. The death of his father, in 1726, removed him to the house of lords, and in this place he began to distinguish himself more as an orator than he had done in the house of Commons. Elegant and perspicuous in his delivery, with an inexhaustible command of language, adorned by all the graceful arts of high-bred urbanity and sportive facetiousness, he acquired decisive superiority above all other orators, and riveted the attention of his auditors by the dignified and vehement powers of his eloquence, and the fascinating touches of his raillery and humor. When George the second was raised to the throne, Chesterfield, who had faithfully served him, was placed in offices of trust and honor. He was in 1728 sent ambassador to Holland, and for his services there, was rewarded with the garter, and the office of high steward of the household. He returned in 1732, to England; but his determined opposition to Walpole stripped him of his offices, and he desisted from attending the court, where he was now received with coldness and indifference. During twelve years he continued to attack the measures of government from the ranks of opposition; but the coalition of parties, in 1744, restored him to a seat in the cabinet, and the following year he was again engaged in a short embassy in Holland. He hastened back from the continent, to take the office of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and in this high situation he had the happiness, by the mildness of his government, to conciliate the affections of the Irish nation. He left Ireland in 1746, and became principal secretary of state, but resigned two years after. Though infirmities and deafness came now rapidly upon him, yet he attended his duty in the house of lords, and in the debates, for the alteration of the style, 1751, he distinguished himself by an eloquent speech in favor of the plan. He lived with increasing infirmities to the 24th March, 1773. As a public character lord Chesterfield is highly esteemed, as from his rank, his influence, and his experience in political intrigues, he was, for many years, a distinguished leader. He wished not only to appear a man of letters, but to be the patron of learned men; and his friendship with Pope, and the other wits of the time, insured him celebrity. His conduct, however, to Dr. Johnson, from whom he expected an adulatory dedication of his dictionary, exposed him to the reprehension and indignant contempt of that unbending moralist. Lord Chesterfield wrote some papers in the World, and some poetical pieces, inserted in periodical publications; but his fame as an author rests on the celebrated letters which he sent to his natural son. These letters are written in an elegant and fascinating style; but in wishing to form his son for the higher ranks of life, he has shown himself the advocate of hypocrisy, licentiousness, and infidelity. The applause of the world was the governing principle of his life; but it was not by virtue alone that the polished peer endeavored to command popularity, but by every art which can, without hesitation, sacrifice honor, religion, and morality, to its favorite objects. The publication of his letters prove him to be an excellent scholar; but they display a studied relaxation of principle, and as Johnson says, inculcate the morals of a strumpet with the manners of a dancing master. His favorite son, to whose education he had so ardently and anxiously devoted himself, died November 1763, and left him in a state of deep and lasting despondency. His letters appeared first in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, and his miscellaneous works also, in 2 vols. 4to. 1777, and have since frequently been published in other forms.

STANHOPE Charles, the third earl, was grandson of the preceding, and born August 3d 1753. He received the early part of his education at Eton, and completed it at Geneva, where he applied chiefly to the mathematics, in which he made so great progress as to obtain a prize from the society of Stockholm, for a memoir on the construction of the pendulum. In 1774 he stood candidate for Westminster, but without success. By the interest of the earl of Shelburne, however, he was brought into parliament for the borough of Wycombe, which he represented till the death of his father, in 1786, called him to the Upper House. He distinguished himself at an early period of the French Revolution, by an open avowal of republican sentiments, and went so far as to lay aside the external ornaments of the peerage. He was also a frequent speaker, and on some occasions was left single in a minority. As a man of science he ranked high, and was the author of many inventions, particularly of a method of securing buildings from fire, an arithmetical machine, a new printing-press, a monochord for turning musical instruments, and a vessel to sail against wind and tide. He was twice married, first to lady Hester Pitt, daughter of the great earl of Chatham, by whom he had three daughters; and secondly to Miss Grenville, by whom he had three sons. He died December 16th, 1816. He published some philosophical pieces, and a few political Tracts.

STANISLAUS, Leczinski, king of Poland, was born at Leopold 20th October 1677. He was son of the grand treasurer of the kingdom, and to an elegant person joined an insinuating address, which prevailed so much with Charles XII. of Sweden, to whom he was deputed in 1704, by the assembly of Warsaw, that he determined to make him master of the kingdom, which his valor had conquered. Stanislaus was accordingly crowned at Warsaw, 1705, in the room of the deposed Augustus, agreeably to the will of the victorious Swede, and he continued attached to his benefactor, till the defeat of the Swedes at the battle of Pultowa, and the incursions of the Russians rendered his situation dangerous, and obliged him to fly from the kingdom. Augustus was restored to his crown, but on his death, in 1733, Stanislaus though supported by the interest of Louis XV. who had married his daughter, was unable to re-ascend the throne, and remained satisfied with the humbler title of duke of Lorraine and Bar, in which character he gained the affection of his new subjects, and deserved the name of the Beneficent. He died February 23, 1766. Stanislaus was author of Œuvres du Philosophe Bienfaisant, 4 vols. 8vo. in which he delineates the character of a true philosopher, meaning himself.

STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS PONIATOWSKY, king of Poland, was son of a private gentleman in Luthuania, by the princess Czartorinski, of the illustrious family of the Jagellons, was born 1732. After receiving an excellent education he travelled to Paris, where the friendship of the Swedish ambassador recommended him to the notice of the great, but his expenses were so extravagant that he was liberated from prison only by an act of generosity in the wife of a rich merchant. From Paris he went to London, and became intimately acquainted with sir William Hanbury, whom he accompanied in his embassy to Russia. The elegant person and high accomplishments of Poniatowsky here captivated the heart of the grand duchess, afterwards Catherine II. which gave so much offence to the empress Elizabeth, that the young favorite was recalled by order of Augustus III. of Poland. The death of Augustus, in 1763, interested Catherine in the fortunes of her favorite, and by her influence, and the terror of her armies, he was elected king of Poland, 7th September 1764, in the diet of Wola. The new monarch gained all hearts by the moderation and prudence of his government, but unfortunately religious disputes disturbed the peace of the kingdom, the dissidents or protestants, who had been excluded by the catholics from offices of trust and emolument, laid claim to new indulgences, and were supported in their petition by the ambassadors of England, Prussia, and Russia. Stanislaus favored their cause, and thus rendered the catholics his most inveterate enemies, so that they formed the plan of taking him prisoner or destroying him. Three bold conspirators at the head of forty dragoons disguised like peasants, entered Warsaw, 3d November, 1771, and seized the unsuspecting king as he was returning in his carriage at ten o'clock in the evening. After much personal violence they mounted him on a horse, and rode away from the town, but during the darkness of the night these assassins lost their road, and on the return of light, Stanislaus exhausted, found himself in the custody of only one of the conspirators, on whom he prevailed to conduct him back to Warsaw. In 1787, Stanislaus visited Kanieff, and after an absence of twenty-three years had an interview with Catherine whom he accompanied in her tour through Tauris and Caucasus, to the borders of Persia. Though loaded with presents and honors by this ambitious princess, the Polish king soon saw his dominions invaded by her armies, and in 1792, all his efforts and the valor of Koskiusko were unable to arrest the career of her arms. Wilna and Warsaw were taken, and Catherine, after having frequently declared herself the protectress of the independence of Poland, consented to share the disunited kingdom with the emperor of Germany and the king of Prussia. In 1795, prince Reppin delivered a letter to the unfortunate Stanislaus, which commanded him to descend from the throne, and his people from the rank of nations. Stanislaus retired to Grodno, and forgot the dangers of greatness and of royalty in the obscurity of a private life, and afterwards, on the accession of Paul to the Russian throne, he was sent for to Petersburg, where every mark of respect and attention was paid to him. He died at Petersburg, 11th April, 1793. This unfortunate man, if he had possessed more vigor and decision might have retarded if not totally averted the dangers which ruined the monarchy; but he was more calculated to shine in private life than adorn a throne, and uphold the fates of a falling empire. He was well informed, and the friend of the learned, and he spoke and wrote with ease the seven languages of Europe.

STANLEY, Thomas, esq. was born at his father's house, Herts, 1644. He was admitted at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a polite scholar, and good philologist. After taking his degrees he travelled through France, Italy, and Spain, and on his return entered at the Middle Temple. Not the law, however, but literature was his pursuit, and he published in 1665, an edition of Ælian's Various History with notes. His next work was the History of Philosophy, containing the lives, and opinions of philosophers of every sect, 4to. dedicated to his uncle John Marsham, esq. a composition of great and acknowledged merit, which passed through four editions, and was translated into Latin for the use of the German literati—and in 1664, appeared his Æschylus, cum Versione & Commentario. He wrote besides, various remarks on Euripides, Sophocles, and other classical authors, besides commentaries on Æschylus in 8 vols. fol. which have remained in manuscript. This worthy man, who had thus early given such strong and valuable proofs of his learning and application, died in 1678, when scarce 34.

STANLEY, John, an English musician, born in London 1718. He lost his sight when two years old, and at the age of seven he devoted his attention to music, under the care of Dr. Green, and with such effect that he was chosen organist of All-Hallows church, Bread-street, in his 11th year. In 1723, he was made organist of St. Andrew's Holborn, in 1734, he was elected by the benchers, organist of the Temple church, and in 1779, he was nominated master of the king's band. His execution on the organ was particularly admired, and his compositions displayed the most correct taste, and the soundest judgment. He died 1786.

STANYHURST, Richard, a native of Dublin, son of the speaker of the Irish house of commons, was educated at University college, Oxford. After studying the law in London he returned to Ireland, and married, and became a Roman catholic. He afterwards went abroad, and entering into orders was appointed chaplain to Albert archduke of Austria, governor of the Netherlands. He died at Brussels, 1618, aged about 72. He was universally esteemed as a good divine, an eminent philosopher, and a tolerable poet and historian. He wrote various things, the best known of which are, de Rebus in Hiberniâ Gestis—Harmonia, seu Catena Dialectica in Porphyrium—Vita Sancti Patricii—the four first books of the Æneid translated into English hexameters—the Principles of the Catholic Religion. He was uncle to archbishop Usher.

STAPLEDON, Walter, a native of Devonshire, educated at Oxford. His abilities recommended him to the notice of the court, and he was advanced in the church, and made bishop of Exeter, and treasurer of England. He distinguished himself as a patron of learning, and founded Exeter college, Oxford. His conduct in office rendered him afterwards unpopular, and he was seized in an insurrection in London, and cruelly beheaded at Cheapside cross, 1326.

STAPLETON, Thomas, an eminent controversialist, born at Henfield, Sussex, 1585, and educated at Canterbury and Winchester schools, from which he was removed to New college, Oxford. In Mary's reign he obtained a prebend of Chichester, but on Elizabeth's accession he left the kingdom with his family, and retired to Louvain, where he was made regius professor of divinity, canon of St. Peter's, and dean of Hilverbeck. He died 1598, and was buried in St. Peter's church at Louvain. He was an indefatigable writer in favor of the Roman catholic religion. His works were published in 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1620.

STAPYLTON, sir Robert, LL.D., a native of Carleton, Yorkshire. Though the son of a catholic family, and educated at Douay, he became a protestant, and was gentleman to the prince of Wales, afterwards the second Charles. He was zealously attached to the fortunes of Charles I. and served with valor at the battle of Edgehill, and was knighted. At the restoration he was reinstated in his honors, and died 1669. He was a very intelligent man, and a poet of some merit.

STARK, John, major-general of New Hampshire, was born in Londonderry of that state, August 28, 1728. In 1756 the family removed to Derryfield, now Manchester, where he resided till the close of his life. He served in the French war; and, on hearing of the battle of Lexington, he repaired to Cambridge, and, receiving a colonel's commission, enlisted in the same day eight hundred men. He fought in the battle of Breed's Hill; was engaged in the attack on Trenton; and was in the battle of Princeton. On the invasion of Burgoyne in 1777, he received the command of the New Hampshire militia to oppose him, and had the honor by his skill and intrepidity of achieving the first step toward the capture of that general by the defeat of Colonel Baum in the battle of Bennington. In September, he enlisted a new and larger force and joined Gates. In 1778 and 1779 he served in Rhode Island, and in 1780 in New Jersey. In 1781 he had the command of the northern department of Saratoga. At the close of the war he bid adieu to public employment. In 1818 congress voted him a pension of sixty dollars a month. He died May 8, 1822, aged 93 years.

STAVELEY, Thomas, esq. a native of Cusington, Leicestershire, who was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and afterwards studied the law at the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar 1654. He succeeded his father-in-law, Onebye, as steward of the records of Leicester, 1662, but the latter part of his life was clouded by habitual melancholy, probably arising from too intense an application to his studies. He died 1693. He wrote the Romish Horseleech, or a discovery of the enormous exactions of the court of Rome, 8vo.—the History of Churches, and also made collections for the history and antiquities of Leicestershire.

STAUNTON, sir George Leonard, LL.D., a native of Galway in Ireland. After finishing his education at home he passed into France, and studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree, and then returned to settle in London. In 1762, he went to Grenada, and became secretary to the governor, lord Macartney, whom, after the capture of the island by the French, he accompanied back to England. When his patron and friend went as governor to Madras, he attended him as his confidential secretary, and so great were his abilities, and so important his services, that on his return to Europe he was raised to the dignity of baronet, and received in the most honorable manner a pension from the East India company. In the embassy of lord Macartney to the court of China, sir George accompanied his noble friend as secretary of legation, and in consequence of the opportunities of information which he had, and the judicious observations which he made, he presented to the world a very valuable and interesting account of that mighty and populous empire, 2 vols. 4to. and three 8vo. Sir George was intimate with men of science and literature throughout Europe, and was made honorary doctor of laws by the university of Oxford. Among other things, he published a translation of the medical essays of Dr. Storck, a physician of Vienna. He died in London, 18th January, 1801.

STEBBING, Henry, an English divine, known for his attacks on Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy, and on Warburton on the publication of his Divine Legation. He died 1763, chancellor of the diocese of Salisbury. His other works are, sermons preached at Boyle's lecture, 8vo.—Collection of tracts, 8vo.—sermons on Practical Christianity, 2 vols.—and Tracts against Dr. James Forster on the subject of Heresy.

STEELE, sir Richard, a celebrated English writer. He was born in Dublin, where his father, a counsellor at law, was private secretary to the duke of Ormond. He came very young to England, and was educated at the Charter house, where he had Addison for his school-fellow. In 1695, he wrote "the Procession," on queen Mary's funeral, and afterwards obtained an ensigny in the guards. He wrote the Christian Hero, to strengthen his mind in habits of religion and virtue, against those seducing pleasures to which a military life exposed him. This little work, valuable for the morality and piety of its contents, was dedicated to lord Cutts, who in consequence noticed him, and not only made him his secretary, but gave him a captain's commission in Lucas' fusiliers. His first comedy called the Funeral, or Love-a-la-Mode, was acted with great applause in 1702, and the next year the Tender Husband appeared, and in 1704, the Lying Lovers. By the friendship of Addison he was introduced to the patronage of lords Halifax and Sunderland, and obtained the appointment of Gazetteer, and in 1709, under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, he began the Tatler, the first number of which was published 12th April, and the last 2d January 1711. He next engaged with Addison in the Spectator, which first appeared 1st March, 1711, and afterwards in the Guardian, of which the first number appeared 12th March, 1713. He resigned in 1713, the place of commissioner of the stamp office, which he held, to sit in parliament for Stockbridge, but his parliamentary career was short, as his papers in the Englishman and in the Crisis, were voted by the house to be scandalous and seditious libels, and he was therefore, after an able vindication of himself in a speech of three hours, expelled by a majority of two hundred and forty-five against one hundred and fifty-two. He now engaged in defending the rights of the house of Hanover, and in exposing the arts of the pretender, and in reward for his loyalty he was on the accession of George I. made surveyor of the royal stables at Hampton court, and governor of the royal company of comedians, and in 1715, knighted by the king. In the first parliament of the new monarch he was elected member for Boroughbridge in Yorkshire, and after the suppression of the rebellion he was made one of the commissioners of the forfeited estates in Scotland. Though engaged in offices of trust and business, Steele did not forget his character as a writer, but occasionally produced political pamphlets. His account of the Roman catholic religion throughout the world appeared in 1715, and it was followed by a letter from the earl of Mar to the king,—a second volume of the Englishman—the Spinster—a Letter to lord Oxford on the Peerage Bill—the Crisis of Property—the Nation a Family, on the South Sea Scheme. During the publication of the Theatre, a periodical paper, his patent of governor of the comedians was withdrawn in 1720, but though he exerted himself against the intrigues of the lord chamberlain, he never could recover it, though he computed the loss occasioned by that arbitrary measure little less than £10,000. His comedy of the Conscious Lovers appeared in 1722, and was received with great applause, and procured to him a present of £500, from the king, to whom it was dedicated. In the decline of life Steele became paralytic, and retired to his seat of Llangunnor near Caermarthen, in Wales, where he died 1st September 1729, and was very privately interred. As a writer Steele appears a very eminent character. The versatility of his talents, the extent of his information, and the deep acquaintance with polite literature, which he every where displayed, prove him to be an author of no ordinary rank, who would perhaps have shone to greater advantage if not united with the elegant Addison. Sir Richard in his private character was very eccentric, and often exposed himself to difficulties, from which all the interest and the ingenuity of his friends were required to extricate him.

STEEVENS, George, one of the most successful of the editors and commentators of Shakspeare, was born in 1735. His parents were in affluent circumstances. George received the rudiments of his education at Kingston-upon-Thames, under the tuition of Dr. Woodson and his assistants; and had for a companion at that school Gibbon the historian. From Kingston he went to Eton, whence after some years, he was admitted a fellow-commoner of King's College, Cambridge. After he left the university, he accepted a commission in the Essex militia on its first establishment; and he spent the latter years of his life at Hampstead in almost total seclusion from the world; seldom mixing with society but in the shops of booksellers, in the Shakspeare gallery, or in the morning conversations of Sir Joseph Banks. He died January, 1800. Mr. Stevens was a classical scholar of the first order. He was equally acquainted with the belles lettres of Europe. He had studied history, ancient and modern, but particularly that of his own country. He possessed a strong original genius, and an abundant wit; his imagination was of every colour, and his sentiments were enlivened with the most brilliant expressions. Mr. Stevens also had a very handsome fortune; and his generosity was equal to it.

STEINBOCK, Magnus, an illustrious Swede. After distinguishing himself in Holland and Germany, he followed the fortunes of his master Charles XII. and contributed by his valor to the victories of Narva and of Poland. During the absence of his master from Sweden he governed the kingdom with wisdom and moderation, and defeated at Gadembusk the Danes, who attempted to disturb the general tranquillity. He afterwards advanced against Altona, but was taken at Tonningen, and died a prisoner of war in the castle of Fredericks-haven, 23d February 1717, aged 53. His memoirs have appeared in 4 vols. 4to. 1765. He is improperly called by some writers the last of Swedish heroes.

STELLINI, James, a native of Forly in Italy, professor of divinity at Padua, where he died 1770, aged 71. He was an ecclesiastic, and was respected as a man of learning. He wrote on ethics, a valuable work, published 4 vols. 4to. Padua, 1778.

STENNET, Samuel, D.D., a Baptist clergyman, pastor of a congregation in Little Wild-street, London, was born in 1727, and died August 22nd, 1795, at his residence at Muswell-hill near high-gate. He was a man much respected among the Protestant dissenters, both for the excellence of his character, and for his learning and ability. Besides some single sermons, he was the author of Discourses on Personal Religion, 2 vols. 12mo.; Discourses on Domestic Duties, 8vo.; Sermons on the Divine Authority and various Use of the Holy Scriptures, 1790, 8vo. He also carried on a controversy on the subject of baptism with Dr. Stephen Addington.

STENO, Nicholas, a Danish anatomist, born at Copenhagen, 10th January, 1638. He studied under Bartholin, and afterwards travelled over Germany, Holland, France, and Italy, and obtained an honorable pension from Ferdinand II. grand duke of Tuscany, who appointed him tutor to his son. In 1669, he renounced the protestant religion, but the wish of his sovereign Christian V. to establish him as professor at Copenhagen, proved abortive, and he settled in Italy, and became an ecclesiastic. The pope, in approbation of his conduct, appointed him apostolical vicar for Germany, and bishop of Titiopoli in Greece. He died at Schwerin, 1686. He was author of Elementorum Myologiæ Specimen—Anatomical Observations and Discoveries, 1680, 12mo.—Latin Discourse on the Anatomy of the Brain, 12mo.

STEPHEN I. pope, succeeded to the papal chair, after the martyrdom of Lucius, 253. He was engaged in a controversy with St. Cyprian and Firmilian, about rebaptizing penitents, who had been baptized before by heretics, and while he considered the imposing of hands upon such persons as sufficient to admit them into the church, his opponents held a contrary doctrine. He suffered martyrdom 2d August, 257, in the persecution of Valentinian.

STEPHEN II., a Roman, succeeded to the papal chair 752, after another pontiff of the same name, who lived only three days after his election. He was attacked by Astolphus king of Lombardy, who seized Ravenna, and threatened Rome, and in his distress he applied for assistance to Constantine Copronymus, emperor of the East, who being engaged in a war with Armenia, recommended his fortunes to Pepin king of France. Pepin thus reconciled to the pope, whom before he had offended, marched into Italy, defeated Astolphus, and stripping him of the exarchate of Ravenna, and twenty-two other towns, he bestowed them on the holy see, and thus laid the foundation of the temporal power of Rome. Stephen died 26 April, 757.

STEPHEN VI., was elected in the room of the Antipope Boniface VI. 896. He rendered himself ridiculous and unpopular by causing the body of his predecessor Formosus to be dug up, and to be tried in his pontifical robes, and to have the head severed from the body, because he had been his enemy. This barbarous conduct revolted the affection of the Romans, who rose against their pontiff, and at last strangled him in prison, 897.

STEPHEN I. St., king of Hungary after the death of his father Geisa 997, labored earnestly to reform the barbarous manners of his people. After defeating some insurgents who opposed his measures he introduced christianity into the country, and divided the kingdom into eleven bishoprics. He confirmed the wholesome measures which he had adopted by a wise code of laws in fifty-five chapters, and he died much and deservedly regretted by the affection of his subjects at Breda, 1038. He was ably seconded in his pious and benevolent labors by the cooperation of his virtuous queen Gisela.

STEPHEN, king of England, was third son of Stephen earl of Blois, by Adela the Conqueror's daughter, and was born 1105. By well concerted measures he seized the English crown 1135, and thus in her absence dispossessed the lawful sovereign, Matilda, the daughter of Henry I. who was wife of Henry IV. emperor of Germany. This usurpation was soon resented, Matilda landed with an army, 1139, and Stephen was defeated two years after at the battle of Lincoln, and taken prisoner. He was exchanged for Robert earl of Gloucester, the illegitimate brother of the empress, and on his liberation so managed his affairs that he at last triumphed over all opposition, and Matilda, unpopular on account of her pride, and supercilious conduct to the barons, left the kingdom 1147. Stephen, however, was not long to enjoy peace, and he found a new and powerful competitor in Henry the son of Matilda, by her former marriage with Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou. The kingdom was for a while distracted by civil war, till at last wiser sentiments prevailed, and an agreement was made between the two rivals 1153, by which it was stipulated that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and that at his death, to the exclusion of his son, it should descend to Henry. Stephen died the following year, and Henry peacefully ascended the throne.

STEPHENS, Robert, a printer, was born at Paris 1503. He set up for himself, and married soon after the daughter of Badius, the printer, a woman who was well versed in Latin, and could thus converse with the learned correctors of the press whom he kept in his house. His great Latin Bible appeared in 1532, and the clamors raised against him ten years before were now repeated by the doctors of the Sorbonne, because he had printed the notes of Calvin to his work. Though protected by Francis I. who had appointed him his printer, he found the virulence of his enemies particularly pointed against him, and after the king's death in 1547, he left Paris and retired to Geneva, carrying with him, it is said, the types and moulds of the royal press. He died at Geneva, 1559. In his business he was most exact and particular, he undertook the printing of none but good books, and so solicitous was he of correctness that he exposed the sheets to public view, and promised a reward to such as could discover errors. His mark was a tree branched, and a man looking upon it, with the words noli altum sapere, to which he added sometimes, sed time. His Hebrew Bible, 8 vols. 16mo. 1544, and his Greek Testament, 2 vols. 16mo. 1546, called nirificam, from the first word of the preface, are much admired. He was not only a good printer, but a learned man, the friend of Calvin, Beza, Rivet, and others, and his Thesaurus Lingæ Latinæ, 4 vols. fol. is an astonishing monument of his labor and erudition. He wrote also an Answer to the Censures of the Sorbonne Doctors to his bible. He had three sons, Henry, Robert, and Francis, and one daughter. He had also two brothers, Francis and Charles; Francis worked with Colinaeus, and died at Paris, 1550, and Charles, the youngest of the family, wrote several valuable books. He went into Germany, with Lazarus de Baif, and was tutor to his son. He afterwards studied medicine at Paris, and took his degrees, but he, however, continued the profession of his family, and was appointed printer to the king. He died at Paris 1564, leaving only one daughter, who was very learned. He wrote more than thirty works on various subjects, of which were an Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary—de Vasculis, 8vo.—de Rusticâ, 2 vols. 8vo.

STEPHENS, Henry, son of Robert, just mentioned, was born at Paris, 1528. He was well educated, and considered as the most learned of his learned family, and the best Grecian of his time, after the death of Budeus. Before he applied himself assiduously to his father's business, he travelled into Italy, and afterwards visited Flanders and England. Though his father left Paris for Geneva, he still continued in France, and settled there, and then devoted himself to the correct printing of the Greek classics, and other valuable authors, of which he gave most elegant and learned editions. He was liberally patronised by Henry III. and sent by him to Switzerland, to make a collection of manuscripts, but the troubles which agitated the last years of that monarch's reign, extended to Stephens, who followed his father's example, and retired to Geneva. Stephens paid great attention, and expended large sums for the completion of a Greek Thesaurus, but when he expected his labors to be rewarded, he found that Scapula the printer, whom he confidentially employed, had dishonorably taken a copy of his papers, and offered to the world a Lexicon under his name, which was in some degree well received, and thus robbed the real author of the merit of his performance. This infamous conduct, though it did not lessen the reputation of Stephens, was, however, the cause of his ruin, the money he had spent in the collection was irrecoverably lost, as the Thesaurus did not sell, and the last years of his life were spent in poverty and distress. He died in an hospital at Lyons 1598. Besides the Thesaurus, a most valuable work, he wrote Introduction & l'Apologie pour Herodote, 3 vols. 8vo. a popular performance, which severely reflected on the papists—de Origine Mendorum—a version of Anacreon in Latin verses—Juris Civilis Fontes & Rivi.

STEPHENS, Paul, son of Henry, was very learned, though inferior to his father. He continued his father's business at Geneva, but did not exhibit the same correctness and accuracy. He died at Geneva, 1627, aged sixty, leaving a son Anthony, the last printer of the family. Anthony turned Roman catholic, and left Geneva for Paris; but though he was for some time printer to the king, his inattention and prodigality proved his ruin, and he was supported for the last years of his life in an hospital, where he died 1674 aged 80. With him expired the glory of a family which, for five generations, had laboriously contributed to the advancement of literature.

STEPHENS, Robert, an eminent antiquary, born at Eastington, Gloucestershire, and educated at Wotton school, from which he removed in 1681 to Lincoln college, Oxford. He afterwards entered at the Middle Temple; but as his fortune was easy, and his fondness for polite literature very great, he did not apply much to the study of the law. He was for some time solicitor of the customs, by the influence of his relation Harley, earl of Oxford, and afterwards historiographer royal. He published lord Bacon's letters, with curious notes, and prepared materials for an history of James I. which he did not execute. He died 9th November, 1732.

STEPHENS, Alexander, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1757, at Elgin; studied at Aberdeen; was designed for the law, but gave himself up to literature; and died in 1821. He wrote a History of the War of the French Revolution; and Memoirs of John Horne Tooke; and contributed to the Monthly Magazine; Public Characters; and The Annual Obituary.

STEPNEY, George, an English poet and statesman, born in London, 1663. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he formed an intimacy with Charles Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, which proved the source of all his future honors. Though he had paid his court to James II. he warmly embraced the principles of the revolution, and was employed as envoy to various courts in Germany, and though his abilities were not of a superior cast, he was very successful in his embassies. He was one of the commissioners of trade, and died at Chelsea 1707, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a pompous inscription marks the place of his remains. He is ranked among the minor poets, and besides some parts of Juvenal, he wrote some short pieces, "where," says Johnson, "a happy line may now and then perhaps be found, though there is neither the grace of wit, nor the vigor of nature."

STERNE, Laurence, an eminent writer, descended from Sterne, archbishop of York. He was born at Clomwell, in the south of Ireland, 24th November 1713, where his father, an officer in the army, was then stationed; and after being nine years at school, at Halifax, Yorkshire, he entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. By means of his uncle, who was prebendary of York, he obtained the living of Sutton, and afterwards a prebend in York cathedral, and by the interest of his wife he added Stillington living to his other preferments. In 1760, he came to London to commence author, and in 1762 he travelled to France, and afterwards to Italy, for the recovery of his health; but a consumption on the lungs could not be removed by change either of air or of occupation. He died 1768, in London. The works of Sterne consist of the Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, a sentimental romance, remarkable for its eccentricity, and for an interesting delineation of characters, but not without occasional obscenity—a Sentimental Journey—sermons—letters, published since his death. He is accused of plagiarism by Ferriar, who discovers several striking parallel passages in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, bishop Hall's works, and other ancient books.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, an English poet, born in Hampshire according to Wood, and educated at Winchester school and Oxford, which he left without a degree. He was groom of the robes to Henry VIII., and had one hundred marks left him by that king's will, and he continued in the same office with his successor. In his principles he was a rigid reformer, and was so highly offended at the obscene songs which were then in vogue, that he turned into English metre, fifty-one of David's Psalms for the use of the courtiers, instead of lascivious sonnets. These were gradually introduced into parochial churches, and are still in repute, though the more elegant version of Tate and Brady, and that of Merrick, recommend themselves more powerfully to the attention of the musical ear. Of the rest of the Psalms, fifty-eight were translated by Hopkins, a contemporary poet, and the remainder by Norton and other hands. No other composition of his is now extant. He died in London, 1549.

STEBUBEN, Frederic William baron de, major-general in the army of the American revolution, was a distinguished Prussian officer, who had served for many years in the army of Frederic the Great, had been one of his aids, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general. He came from France to America in November, 1777, with high recommendations to congress, to which he offered himself as a volunteer to serve in whatever department he could render himself useful. He was soon appointed inspector-general, with the rank of major-general, and was of the greatest service to the army, by introducing a system of uniform manœuvres. He fought as a volunteer at the battle of Monmouth, and had command in the trenches in Yorktown, on the day that concluded the contest with the British. He was an accomplished gentleman, an able officer, and virtuous citizen. He died at Steubenville, New York, November 28th, 1794.

STEVENS, George Alexander, a native of London. He was brought up to a mechanical profession, but quitted it for the stage. The life of a theatrical hero, however, did not produce him popularity or fame, and he had recourse to a different mode of support. For several years he travelled over the kingdom, and even extended his excursions to America, lecturing on heads, in a style amusing and facetious, but often verging to licentiousness and sarcastic ribaldry; and having thus gained a comfortable income, he disposed of his lectures and of his heads to Lee Lewis. This eccentric character died at last in a mad-house, 1784. He was author of Tom Fool, a novel, 2 vols. 12mo.—some farces—songs—besides the Dramatic History of master Edwards, in which he censured and ridiculed his old friend and companion Shuter.

STEVENS, William Bagshaw, D.D., a native of Abingdon, educated at the grammar school there, and at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of doctor of divinity. He became usher, and afterwards master, of Repton school, Derbyshire, and by the patronage of the Harpur family, he was presented to the rectory of Seckindon, Warwickshire, and the vicarage of Kingsbury. He died 1800, aged 45. He wrote Retirement, a poem in blank verse, 1782, 4to.—Indian Odes, 4to.—Idyls in the Topographer—and some poetical pieces in the Gentleman's Magazine, and other periodical works.

STEVENS, Benjamin, D.D., a son of the Rev. Joseph Stevens, minister of Charlestown, Massachusetts. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1740, and became the minister of Kittery in Maine. His ordination took place, May 1st 1751, and he died May 18th, 1791, aged 70 years. He was esteemed as a good man, and as an able preacher. He published a funeral sermon on the death of Andrew Pepperell, 1752; also one on the death of Sir William Pepperell, 1759; and an election sermon, 1760.

STEVIN, Simon, a native of Bruges, who instructed prince Maurice of Nassau in mathematics, and was made superintendant of the dykes of Holland. It is said that he invented the sailing chariots which were for some time adopted by the Dutch. He died 1635. He is author of a treatise on Statics—Geometrical Problems—Mathematical Memoirs—de Portuum investigandorum Ratione. His mathematical works written in Flemish, have been translated into Latin by Snellius, 2 vols. folio.

STEWART, sir James, a Scotch baronet, who died 1789, aged 76. He is author of an Apology of sir Isaac Newton on Ancient Chronology—and a treatise on Political Economy, a work of great merit, and replete with much information, though written in a negligent style.

STEWART, Matthew, a native of Rothsay in the isle of Bute, who after studying under his father, who was the minister of the parish, went to Glasgow university, to devote himself to theology. He afterwards studied mathematics at Edinburgh, where he succeeded his master Maclaurin in the mathematical chair. He died at Edinburgh, 1785, aged 68. He was author of tracts, physical and mathematical, on the Theory of the Moon, the distance of the Sun from the earth, &c., 1761—Propositiones More Veterum Demonstratæ—general Theorems, published when he succeeded to the professor's chair.

STEWART DENHAM, Sir James, a political economist, was born, in 1713, at Edinburgh; was educated at the university of his native place; and became an advocate. Having taken, in 1745, an active part in favor of the house of Stuart, he was under the necessity of living for several years in exile. He was, however, allowed to return in 1767, and his estate was restored to him. He died in 1780. His chief work is, An Inquiry into the Principles of Political Economy.

STEWART, Dugald, an eminent philosopher and writer, was born, in 1753, at Edinburgh, and was the son of the professor of mathematics; was educated at the high school and university of his native city; and attended the lectures of Dr. Reid, at Glasgow. From Glasgow he was recalled, in his nineteenth year, to assist his father; on whose decease, in 1785, he succeeded to the professorship. He, however, exchanged it for the chair of moral philosophy, which he had filled in 1778, during the absence of Dr. Ferguson in America. In 1780, he began to receive pupils into his house, and many young noblemen and gentlemen, who afterwards became celebrated, imbibed their knowledge under his roof. It was not till 1792 that he came forward as an author; he then published the first volume of the Philosophy of the Human Mind. He died June 11, 1823; after having long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the most amiable of men, and one of the ablest of modern philosophical writers. Among his works are, Outlines of Moral Philosophy; Philosophical Essays; Memoirs of Adam Smith, and Dr. Robertson and Reid; and Prefatory Dissertations in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica.

STILES, Ezra, D.D., president of Yale college, was born in North Haven, Connecticut 1727. His father was the minister of that town. In 1746, he graduated from that institution, and in 1749, was chosen tutor of it, in which office he remained six years. Although he had commenced preaching, he was induced to study law, which he practised in New Haven for two years. But, having resumed preaching, he was ordained over the second congregational church in Newport, Rhode-Island, October 22, 1755. Here he remained till his congregation was dispersed by the war in 1776. He then preached at Portsmouth; but being chosen president of the college in 1777, he proceeded thither, and entered on the duties of the office in July the following year. He remained in that station till his death in May, 1795, in his 68th year. President Stiles has been considered one of the most learned men this country has produced. He read the French language with great facility. He was critically acquainted with the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. In the study of the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, he had made considerable progress; and on the Coptic and Persian he had bestowed some attention. He was also well versed in most branches of mathematics, and as a divine ranked second to no one, in systematic theology, in the country. As a preacher he was serious and impressive, and was a warm friend of his country. His publications were not numerous, but he left more than forty volumes in manuscript. Among his publications was a funeral oration in Latin on Governor Law; and a Latin oration on his induction into office.

STILLINGFLEET, Edward, an eminent prelate, descended from an ancient Yorkshire family, and born at Cranbourn, Dorsetshire, 17th April, 1635. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and by the patronage of his friend sir Roger Burgoyne, of Wroxall, Warwickshire, he obtained in 1657, the rectory of Sutton. He in 1659, published his Irenicum, or Weapon-Salve for the Church's Wounds, which, though written with great ability, gave offence to some of the churchmen of the times, but he added afterwards a discourse to another edition of it, to conciliate the favour of all parties. His greatest work, Origines Sacrae, or a Rational Account of Natural and Revealed Religion, appeared in 1662, and though produced by a young man only twenty-seven years old, astonished every reader for its erudition, elegance, strength, and clearness of argument. Thus recommended to public favor by his abilities, he was appointed preacher of the Roll's chapel, and in 1665, was presented to the rectory of St. Andrew's Holborn. He afterwards gradually advanced through preferments, became lecturer to the Temple, chaplain to the king, canon of St. Paul's, prebendary of Canterbury, dean of St. Paul's, and in 1689 was raised to the see of Worcester. He died March 27th, 1699. Stillingfleet wrote besides, some controversial books against the deists, socinians, papists, and dissenters, and he was engaged in the latter part of life with Locke, some part of whose Essay on Human Understanding, seemed to strike at the Mysteries of Revealed Religion. His works are the composition of an able scholar, deep divine, and a sound argumentative philosopher. They were collected and published altogether in 1710, in 6 vols. folio.

STILLINGFLEET, Benjamin, an eminent naturalist and poet, grandson of the Bishop. His father Edward, rector of Wood-Norton, Norfolk, displeased his father by marriage, and the displeasure of the bishop proved injurious to his posterity. He died 1708, and Benjamin, his only son, after being educated at Norwich school, entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, but here he was disappointed of a fellowship, by the interference of Bentley, the master, who had been his father's friend, and his grandfather's chaplain. Thus thrown upon the world he travelled through Italy, and by the friendship of lord Barrington he obtained the place of barrack master at Kensington. He also succeeded to some property on the death of his friend Mr. Wyndham of Norfolk, with whom he had travelled abroad, and applied himself assiduously to the study of history and botany. He died at a saddler's in Piccadilly, 15th December, 1771, aged 69, leaving some valuable papers behind him. His works are the calendar of Flora, 1761—Miscellaneous Travels, 8vo.—the Principles and Powers of Harmony, 4to.—Essay on Conversation 1757, a poem, and other poems in Dodsley's collection—some thoughts concerning happiness.

STILLMAN, Samuel, D.D., a Baptist minister of Boston, born in Philadelphia, February 27, 1737. His family removing to Charleston, South Carolina, he received his education at an academy in that city. Here also he was ordained, February 26, 1759. He preached in different places; and, after having officiated for a year as assistant minister with the second Baptist society in Boston, he was installed pastor of the church of that society, January 9, 1765. In this parish he continued his benevolent labors, universally respected and beloved, till his death by a paralytic shock, March 13, 1807, at the age of sixty-nine years. As an eloquent preacher, Dr. Stillman held the first rank. He possessed a pleasant and most commanding voice; and he was enabled to transfuse his own feelings into the hearts of his auditors. Such was his urbanity of manners, and his kind and catholic spirit, that he was, comparatively, alike popular with all denominations. His uncommon vivacity and energy of feeling were united with a perfect sense of propriety, and with affability, ease and politeness. This gave him, deservedly, a great influence in Boston. He published three ordination sermons; four funeral sermons, one of which was on the death of Washington; two election sermons; one before a society of freemasons; three discourses on apostolic preaching; a thanksgiving sermon; a fast sermon; one on the opening of the Baptist Meeting-house in Charlestown; one on the first anniversary of the female asylum; and one on the anniversary of the Massachusetts Baptist missionary society. After his death a volume of his sermons was published.

STITH, William, president of the college of William and Mary in Virginia. He was a clergyman of respectable standing. About the year 1740 he withdrew from the college over which he had ably presided. In 1747, he published a history of the discovery and first settlement of that state. The history is brought down only to the year 1624. Mr. Stith was considered a faithful historian, but his style is bad, and his details are tediously minute. He died in 1750.

STOBÆUS, John, author of a valuable collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers, translated into Latin by Gesner, Geneva, 1608, was a learned Greek of the fifth century.

STOCHADE, Nicholas de Helt, a native of Nimieguen 1614, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Ryccaert, and excelled as a portrait and historical painter.

STOCK, Christian, a German orientalist, born at Canburg, 1672. He was professor at Jena, and died 1733, highly respected for learning. He wrote Disputationes de Pœnis Hebræorum Capitalibus—Clavis Linguae Sanctæ Veteris Testam.—and Nova Testam.

STOCKDALE, Percival, Rev., was a native of Branxton, in Northumberland, where he was born about the year 1736. He was sent into Scotland for education, and studied at St. Andrew's, where he graduated, but afterwards embraced a military life, and served abroad. At length, on his return to England, he recurred to the line of life for which he had been originally designed, and entered the church in 1759. Settling in London, he for some time continued to support himself by combining the profession of an author with that of a clergyman, till he again entered the king's service, in the capacity of chaplain to a ship, and eventually obtained the living of Long Houghton and Lesburg in his own county. He published a series of Lectures on the Poets, an Essay on the Genius of Pope, and a Biographical Memoir of Waller, besides a volume of miscellaneous poems of no great merit, and a few sermons. He also wrote his own life with a sufficient portion of vanity. His death took place at the rectory house, in Long Houghton, in 1811.

STOCKTON, Richard, a lawyer of New Jersey, who was graduated at Princeton in 1748, and devoting himself to the law, soon arose to unrivalled reputation and success, by his superior talents and integrity. He was appointed to the office of judge, both under the provincial government, and after the adoption of the constitution in 1776, and discharged the duties of the station with distinguished ability, and uprightness. He was a member of the congress of 1776, and signed the declaration of independence. He was an accomplished scholar and statesman, a persuasive speaker, and an exemplary Christian. He died on the 1st of March, 1781.

STODDARD, Solomon, an American divine, settled at Northampton, Massachusetts. He was born at Boston in 1643, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1662. He spent two years in Barbadoes, with governor Serle. After his return he was ordained at Northampton, September 11, 1672, where he continued till his death, February 11, 1729, aged 85 years. Mr. Stoddard was one of the most learned men of those times, and was particularly able in religious controversies. He was so much devoted to his studies, that he wrote a considerable number of sermons, found among his manuscripts, which he did not have occasion to use. His publications were pretty numerous; and, some of them were on subjects particularly interesting. He maintained that the Lord's Supper is a converting ordinance, and that all baptized persons, not scandalous in life, may lawfully approach the table, though they know themselves to be destitute of true religion. Many of his published works, it might be inferred from their titles, had a bearing upon this topic.

STOFFLET, Nicholas, a native of Luneville, who for some years served in the army as a private soldier. During the French revolution he warmly espoused the cause of royalty, and assembling a band of men, of similar feelings with his own, he seized Bressuire, and maintained himself with vigor and success against the troops of the convention. Mildness effected what military art could not do, and Hoche prevailed upon this courageous chief, to lay down his arms, and to be reconciled to the existing government. Stofflet agreed to an armistice in 1795, but soon after, his conduct was interpreted by the suspicious republicans, as subversive of the treaty, and as he was defenceless, he was easily seized and dragged to Angers, where he was shot, 23d February 1796, in his 44th year. This active and heroic leader, who thus fell a victim to the cruelty of the convention, was during the short space of two years, present at one hundred and fifty battles where he not only displayed valor, but generally insured the victory. He showed in his last moments the same intrepidity which had marked the whole of his life.

STOLBERG-STOLBERG, Frederic Leopold, count, a German writer, was born, in 1750, at Bramstedt, in Holstein; was educated at Halle and Göttingen; was employed in negotiations by the duke of Oldenburg and the prince regent of Denmark, and died in 1819. He translated the Iliad and the tragedies of Æschylus; and wrote a History of the Christian Religion; Travels in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy; Poems, and Dramas.

STONE, Edmund, a self-taught mathematician, son of the gardener of the duke of Argyle. Though not nurtured by education, he yet acquired by the feeble assistance of the duke's butler, and his own indefatigable industry, a most correct and extensive knowledge of arithmetic and mathematics. The duke accidentally found him, when eighteen years old, reading Newton's Principia, and his grace had the good sense to give encouragement to such powers of genius, and he therefore transplanted him from obscurity and manual labor, to a comfortable situation, where he devoted himself to study, and produced some valuable works. He died about 1750. His works are a Mathematical Dictionary—a treatise on Fluxions—an edition of Euclid's Elements, 2 vols. 8vo. He is described by Ramsay as a man of the utmost modesty.

STONE, Thomas, a member of the American congress from the state of Maryland, and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was a lineal descendant of William Stone, who was governor of Maryland during the protectorship of Oliver Cromwell. He was born in Charles county, in that province, in the year 1743, at Pointon Manor, the seat of his father, David Stone; and received his education under the care of a Scotch gentleman of distinguished erudition and taste, who resided as a teacher in his paternal neighborhood. After completing his academical course, he studied law under the direction of Thomas Johnson, esq., in the city of Annapolis, and engaged in the practice of his profession with high reputation. He was a member of the American congress in 1776, when the Declaration of Independence was signed, and stood forth among the champions of his country's rights and honor at that trying period. Mr. Stone was again member of congress when General Washington resigned his office as commander-in-chief of the American armies. In the year 1787 he was appointed one of the delegates from Maryland to attend the convention which met in Philadelphia in that year, and formed the constitution of the United States; but domestic circumstances constrained him to decline accepting the appointment, and in the autumn of the same year he died, in the forty-fourth year of his age. This patriotic and worthy man was repeatedly a member of the senate of his native state during the intervals of his congressional service, and was in a variety of ways devoted to the welfare of his country. He was honored in his life and lamented in his death.

STONE, Samuel, one of the first ministers of Hartford, Connecticut, was born in England; and was educated in that country at the University of Cambridge. Being a puritan he came to America, and was settled as an assistant minister with Hooker at Cambridge, Massachusetts, October 11, 1633. In 1636 he removed to Hartford, where he died in 1663. He was an able controversialist; and was distinguished for pleasing manners and other social qualities.

STONE, John Haskins, governor of Maryland, entered the army of the revolution at an early period, a captain in Smallwood's regiment, and distinguished himself at the battles of Long Island, White Plains, Princeton, and Germantown, in the last of which he received a wound which disabled him for further service. He was afterwards appointed a member of the executive council of Maryland, and in 1794 governor of that state, in which office he continued three years. He was respected as an amiable, liberal, and upright citizen, as well as a brave soldier and zealous friend of liberty. He died in 1804.

STONEHOUSE, sir James, a physician and divine of great eminence. He was born at Tubney in Berkshire, 1716, and after receiving his education at Winchester school, and St. John's college, Oxford, he applied himself to medical studies under the instruction of Dr. Nicholls. He afterwards travelled abroad, and then settled at Coventry, from which he removed to Northampton, where his benevolence was strongly displayed in the erection of the county infirmary. Though for some years inclined to the principles of infidelity, in the defence of which he even wrote a book against revealed religion, three times edited, he gave way to better thoughts, and by reading the books of the best divines, especially Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion, he became a convert to the opinions of the English church. In proof of his sincerity, though in full and extensive practice, insured by an experience of twenty years, he took orders, and obtained the lectureship of All Saints, Bristol. He afterwards was presented to the livings of Great and Little Cheverell, in Wiltshire, where he devoted himself not only to the promotion of the spiritual comfort of his parishioners, but the composition of useful works in the cause of religion and virtue. As a preacher he was eloquent and impressive, and his discourses always carried conviction to the heart, and disposed the mind to more than the outward and barren profession of christianity. In 1791, on the extinction of the elder branch of his family, settled at Radley, Berkshire, he succeeded to the title of baronet, and died at Bristol, 1795. His works are very numerous, and all on religious subjects, and some of them have been recommended by the society for the promotion of Christian knowledge. His friendly Advice to a Patient has been frequently edited. An account of his life was prefixed by Mr. Stedman, to his letters, which were published in 1800, 12mo.

STORACE, Stephano, an eminent composer of dramatic music, was the son of an Italian performer on the bass viol, long settled in London, where he was born in 1763. Early displaying strong musical talent, he was sent by his father to Italy, that he might enjoy every opportunity of cultivation, and his progress was so rapid, that at the very commencement of his career he produced his celebrated finale to the first act of the Pirates, and some of his very best compositions. On his return to England he resided at Bath, till the friendship of Mr. Michael Kelly procured him the appointment of composer to Drury Lane theatre. Here he remained, with daily increasing reputation, till a violent attack of gout in the head carried him off, in 1796, in the flower of his age. His compositions are remarkable for their spirit, and his melodies have not often been excelled. His productions are the music to the Doctor and Apothecary, a farce, 1788; Haunted Tower, opera, 1789; No Song no Supper, farce, 1790; Siege of Belgrade, opera, 1791; Cave of Trophonius, musical interlude, 1791; Pirates, and Dido, operas, 1792; Prize, and Glorious First of June, musical entertainments; Cherokee, and Lodoiska, operas, 1794; Three and Deuce, comic drama, 1795; My Grandmother, farce; Iron Chest, musical play; and Mahmoud, an opera, 1796.

STORCK, Nicholas, a native of Saxony, who abandoned the tenets of Luther to found the sect of the anabaptists with Muncer. By the most extravagant doctrines, and by assuming the powers of a sovereign, he gained numerous adherents, and when banished from Saxony he retired to Swabia and Franconia, where his opinions were eagerly embraced by the deluded multitude. The military power was at last exerted to silence his preaching, and to disperse his followers, and after being guilty of the grossest excesses, he escaped to Poland, 1527, and afterwards settled at Munich, where his sect again raised its head, and spread its influence into Moravia. He died soon after, in the greatest poverty.

STOUFFACHER, Werner, a native of the canton of Schwitz, who, in 1307, joined Furst, Melchtal, and Tell, in the destruction of Griesler, the oppressive governor of the country. This small band of heroes succeeded in their attempts, and overturned the Austrian government, and restored their country to its original independence. Their names are still held in honor, and celebrated in the national songs of Switzerland, and will never fail to excite their posterity to deeds of heroism and glory.

STOUGHTON, William, an American citizen who flourished in the latter part of the seventeenth century. He graduated at Harvard college in 1650. He became a preacher, and spent some years in England; but, in consequence of the political and religious troubles of that country, he returned, in 1662, to New England. In 1668, he was appointed to deliver the Massachusetts election sermon. This sermon was spoken of as one of the best ever delivered upon the occasion. In 1677 he went to England as an agent of the province. He also held the office at different times, of lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts; of chief-justice of the superior court; and was a member of the council. He was an early and generous benefactor of Harvard college. Stoughton Hall, built in 1698, was erected at his expense. He also left property for other public charitable objects. He died at Dorchester, July 7, 1701, aged 70 years.

STOW, John, an eminent English antiquary, born in London, about 1525. In 1560 he began to make a collection for his Chronicle, and whatever was illustrative of the history and antiquities of the country, was the object of his indefatigable researches. These studies, however, were not productive at first of fame, much less of gain, and he would have abandoned them, had not Parker, the primate, stepped to his aid, and honorably contributed to his support and encouragement. His first work was, a Summary of the Chronicles of England, from the coming in of Brute to his own Time, 1573, begun at the request of lord Robert Dudley, whose grandfather Edmund had, during his confinement in the Tower, laid the foundation of this work in his Tree of the Commonwealth. Afterwards, in 1593, appeared his Survey of London, containing the original antiquity of that city, 4to. and in 1600 he published his Flores Historiarum, or Annals of this Kingdom, from the times of the Britons to his own, dedicated to Whitgift, the primate. This last work was an enlargement of his Summary, but even in that state was little less than an abridgment of a larger work, which he had prepared, and which his printer was afraid to undertake. In the latter part of his life, Stow was reduced to indigent circumstances; he petitioned twice the corporation of London, whose history he had by his labors elucidated; but the relief he received is unknown. He also obtained a brief from the king, to collect the benevolent contributions of well disposed people for his support, and after thus devoting himself for upwards of forty years, to develop the history, and to illustrate the antiquities of his country, and suffering the infirmities of old age, added to the horrors of indigence, he fell a victim to disease, 5th April, 1605, aged about 80. To the high merits of an able historian, and indefatigable antiquarian, Stow united all the virtues of private life. He wrote for the public, he adhered to truth, and recorded nothing either through fear, or envy, or favor. He had transcribed many valuable MSS. the originals of which he could not obtain, and he travelled on foot to the various cathedrals, in search of authentic papers.

STRADA, Farnianus, a learned jesuit, born at Rome. He taught there rhetoric, and wrote several treatises on oratory and other subjects. His Prolusiones Academicæ—and his Historia de Bello Belgico, have been much admired for their correctness, the elegance of the language, and the purity of the style, though he has been attacked and severely censured by Sciooppius, Rapin, and even Bolingbroke. He died at Rome 1649, aged 77.

STRAHAN, William, a native of Edinburgh. After serving his time with a printer in his native town, he came to London, and by his assiduity soon rose to eminence in his profession. He purchased in 1770 a share of the patent place of king's printer, and in 1775 sat in parliament for Malmesbury, and in the next parliament for Wotton-Basset. Thus raised by his own merits to distinction and to opulence, he became the friend of the learned, and was ever ready to contribute to the comfort of those whose mental exertions had promoted his elevation. Among his particular friends was Dr. Johnson, and it is no small proof of his discernment and loyalty that he attempted to introduce this great philosopher into the House of Commons, though lord North, to whom it was earnestly proposed, did not finally accede to the measure. Mr. Strahan died 1785, aged 70.

STRAIGHT, John, rector of Findon in Sussex, to which he was presented by Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, was author of some poems in Dodsley's collection, much in the style of Prior. He was presented by bishop Hoadly to a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, but injured his property by turning farmer to maintain his family, and died poor about 1740, leaving a widow, and six children. His sermons in 2 vols. 8vo. were published after his death for the benefit of his family.

STRANGE, sir Robert, an eminent engraver, born at Pomona in the Orkneys, July 14, 1721. He studied the law, but his genius pointed a different path to eminence, and his sketches and other drawings appeared so highly finished, that he was placed by his friends under the care of Mr. R. Cooper of Edinburgh. His progress to fame was however arrested by the rebellion, he joined the pretender, and after the ruin of his affairs, he wandered for some time a fugitive in the highlands, and at last, not without alarm, returned to Edinburgh, and then passed to London, with the intention of visiting Rome. He was at Rouen, and at Paris where he studied under Le Bas, and had the first knowledge of the dry needle, an instrument which his genius afterwards so much used and improved. In 1751 he settled in London, and began to be distinguished as an historical engraver, of which art he may be said to be the father in England. In 1760 he visited Italy, where everywhere he was received with respect and attention, and honorably elected member of the learned schools of Rome, Florence, and Bologna, and made professor of the royal academy of Parma, and member of the royal academy of painting at Paris. He was knighted by the king in 1787, and died of an asthma, 5th July, 1792. His works are greatly admired, and about fifty capital plates are still preserved by his family. In private life he was a most worthy and amiable man.

STRAUCHIUS, Giles, a native of Wittenburg. He studied at Leipsic, and afterwards was appointed professor of divinity in his native town from which he was invited to go and preside over the university of Dantzic as rector and theological professor. The disputes which then prevailed between the protestants and catholics prevented his settlement, and soon after, on his way to Hamburg, he was arrested by order of the elector of Brandenburg, on account of some improper allusions made by him in the pulpit. He was soon after released, and died 1682, aged 50. He is author of Breviarium Chronologicum, translated into English by Salt—Breviarium Historicum Geographia Mathematica—Doctrina Astrorum Mathematica.

STRIGELIUS, Victorius, a native of Kauffbier, in Swabia, one of the first of Luther's disciples. He taught theology and logic at Leipsic, but his disputes with Francowitz, and his opposition to some of Luther's principles, rendered him unpopular, and he was deposed and imprisoned by his enemies. He was afterwards professor of morality at Heidelberg, where he died 26th June, 1569, aged 45. He wrote Notes on the Ancient and New Testament, and other works now little known.

STRONG, Nathan, D.D., a clergyman of Hartford Connecticut, born in 1748, and graduated at Yale college in 1769. His father was a minister in Coventry of the same state. He was ordained in 1774, and died December 25, 1816, at the age of 68 years. Dr. Strong was a man distinguished among his brethren for learning and good judgment. His superior social qualities also rendered him an agreeable companion. He was editor of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, and had an important agency in getting up the congregational Missionary Society of Connecticut. He published the doctrine of eternal misery reconciled with the benevolence of God; a sermon on the death of Dr. Cogswell; and two volumes of sermons 8vo.

STRONG, Caleb, LL.D., a governor of Massachusetts, born in January 1745, and graduated at Harvard college in 1764. In consequence of poor health he did not commence the practice of law for eight years afterwards. He spent his life at Northampton, whence, his paternal ancestors had lived from the year 1659. He held various public offices. In 1780 he was chosen one of the council of the state. In 1779 he assisted in forming the constitution of Massachusetts; and in 1787, he also assisted in forming the constitution of the United States. From 1789 to 1797 he was a senator in Congress; and from 1800 to 1807, he was governor of the state. Also from 1812 to 1815 he held the same office. Governor Strong was a man of unimpeachable moral character; and he possessed a vigorous and well cultivated mind. He died November 7, 1819, aged 74 years.

STRONG, Jonathan, D.D., congregational minister of Randolph, Massachusetts was born in 1764, and graduated at Dartmouth college in 1786. He was ordained at Randolph in 1789, and died November 9, 1814, aged 50 years. Dr. Strong possessed a vigorous mind; and, although it had not received all the polish acquired by more modern scholars, he evinced no small degree of native eloquence in his preaching. He wrote much for the Panoplist, a religious periodical; and published a number of occasional sermons.

STRONG, Simeon, LL.D., was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts in 1800. He was born at Northampton in 1735, graduated at Harvard college in 1756, and died at Amherst, December 14th, 1805. He was distinguished in early life as an intelligent and industrious student, was several years a preacher, but his health not permitting his continuance in that employment, he engaged in the study of law, and rose to eminence in the profession. He was several years a member of the house of representatives and senate of Massachusetts, previous to his appointment as a judge. He was a man of great excellence of character, and enjoyed in an eminent degree the respect of his acquaintance.

STROZZI, Cyriaco, a learned Florentine, born 1504, and called a peripatetic philosopher, as he supported the doctrines of Aristotle, to whose eight books on politics he added a ninth, and a tenth, in Greek and Latin, and in the most able manner. He was professor of Greek and of philosophy at Florence, Bologna, and Pisa, and died 1565, aged 40. His sister Laurentia, a nun, was well skilled in the learned languages, and wrote some Latin hymns on the festivals of the church.

STRUENSEE, Count, a physician, who by his abilities recommended himself to the notice of the king of Denmark. He became prime minister and maintained his power by great talents in politics and in negotiation; but his imprudent partiality for the queen, Caroline Matilda, proved fatal to him. The queen mother, determined to ruin this favorite, caused by her intrigues his arrestation and that of his friend Brandt; and Struensee, falsely accused of an improper intercourse with Matilda, but guilty of treasonable practices for the preservation of his power, was conducted to the scaffold, 26th July, 1772. The unfortunate Matilda, banished from the presence and protection of her husband, was demanded back by her brother, the king of England, and she retired to Zell in Hanover, where she died of a broken heart, 1776.

STRUVIUS, George Adam, professor of jurisprudence at Jena, and counsellor to the dukes of Saxony, was born at Magdebourg, and died 15th December 1692, aged 73. He was twice married, and was father of twenty-six children. He wrote Syntagma Juris Feudalis, and Syntagma Juris Civilis, two works of great merit.

STRUVIUS, Burcard Gotthelf, one of the sons of the preceding, was born at Weimar, and afterwards settled at Jena, where he engaged in his father's profession, and was equally esteemed. He died 1638, aged 67. He published, Antiquitatum Romanarum Syntagma, 4to.—Bibliotheca Historica Selecta, 8vo.—Syntagma Juris Publici, 4to.—Syntagma Historiæ Germaniæ, 2 vols. fol.—Historia Misnensis, 8vo.—a History of Germany, in German.—Introductio ad Notitiam Rei Literariæ, & Usus Bibliothecarum.

STRUYS, John, a Dutchman, who began to travel in 1647, and visited, in three different journeys, Madagascar, Japan, the Levant, the shores of the Mediterranean, Muscovy, and Persia. He wrote an account of his travels which were published by Glanville, Amsterdam 1681, 4to. and afterwards in three vols. 12mo at Rouen. He died about 1690.

STRYPE, John, a learned editor, born in London, of German parents. He was educated at Catherine hall, Cambridge, and in 1669, was presented to the living of They-don-boys, Essex, which he the same year resigned for Low Leyton. He had also a sinecure, the gift of Tenison the primate, and was lecturer of Hackney, where he died, 13th December 1737, at a great age, having been in possession of his vicarage sixty-eight years. He published the lives of Archbishops Cranmer, Grindal, Parker, and Whitgift, of Aylmer, bishop of London, of sir Thomas Smith, of sir J. Cheke, and also ecclesiastical memorials, 3 vols.—Annals of the reformation, 4 vols. folio.—the 2d vol. of Lightfoot's works.—Stow's Survey of London.

STUART, James, an eminent architect, born in London, 1713. The death of his father left him and his mother and three children in very indigent circumstances, but his genius began early to shine forth, and his abilities were successfully exerted and employed to support his orphan family by painting fans for a person in the Strand. While thus honorably engaged, he directed his attention to the acquisition of other branches of science, and by assiduity he obtained a perfect knowledge of anatomy, geometry, painting, the mathematics, and architecture, to which he joined a tolerable acquaintance with Greek and Latin. After his mother's death, he settled his brother and sisters in a comfortable situation, and with scanty resources set out to visit the antiquities of Rome and Athens. He mostly travelled on foot, through Paris, and when he reached the capital of Italy, he was so fortunate as to form an intimacy with Mr. N. Revett, an able architect and painter. With this worthy associate he continued his journey to Athens, and there for five years, till 1755, remained laboriously employed in making drawings, and in taking the measures of the remarkable places of this venerable city. Their perseverance was supported and encouraged by the kindness of sir Jacob Bouverie and Mr. Dawkins, who were then at Athens, spectators of the magnificent remains of that classical spot. The result of their useful labors appeared in 1 vol. folio, 1762, under the title of the Antiquities of Athens, measured and delineated by I. Stuart and N. Revett. The merit of this publication recommended Stuart to the patronage of the great, he was taken into the society of Mr. Dawkins, and noticed by lords Anson and Rockingham, and others, and was appointed surveyor of Greenwich Hospital. He died at his house in Leicester square, 2d February 1788, aged 76. Two more volumes have appeared since his death, one in 1790, published by Mr. Newton, the other in 1794, by Mr. Revely. Mr. Stuart is best known by the deserved surname of the Athenian Stuart.

STUART, Gilbert, LL.D. a Scotch historian, born in 1742, at Edinburgh, where his father was university professor. He was well educated, and intended for the law, which, however, his natural indolence made him abandon for the less laborious pursuit of elegant literature. Before the completion of his twenty-second year, he published his historical dissertation concerning the antiquity of the British constitution; which was so admired that the university granted him the degree of doctor of laws. He afterwards published his view of Society in Europe, in its progress from rudeness to refinement, an able written composition; but his labors did not sufficiently recommend him in his application for the law professorship of the university, and when disappointed he came to London, where he continued from 1768 to 1774, to write for the Monthly Review. In 1774 he returned to Edinburgh, but his attempts to establish there a review and magazine failed, and in 1782 he again visited London, and took a share in the Political Herald, and the English Review. Intemperance brought on here complicated disorders, and when laboring under an attack of the jaundice and of the dropsy, he returned to Scotland by sea, and died in his father's house, 13th August 1796. He published besides, Observations concerning the public law, and constitutional history of Scotland—the history of the reformation in Scotland—the history of Scotland from the reformation to Mary's death, in which he ably defends the character of that unfortunate queen against Dr. Robertson and other writers.

STUART, Gilbert, a celebrated painter, was born in Newport, Rhode Island, in 1755. Soon after becoming of age, he went to England, where he became the pupil of Mr. West. He soon rose to eminence as a portrait painter, and obtained a high reputation both in England and Ireland. In 1794 he returned to his native country, chiefly residing in Philadelphia and Washington, in the practice of his profession, till about the year 1801, when he removed to Boston. Here he remained till his death in 1828. Mr. Stuart was not only one of the first painters of his time, but was also a very extraordinary man out of his profession. His picture of Washington alone is sufficient to confer on him an imperishable distinction.

STUART, Robert, marquis of Londonderry, viscount Castlereagh, was born June 18th, 1769. He commenced his parliamentary career, as a member for the county of Dover, Ireland. In 1797, he became chief secretary to the Viceroyalty of Ireland, and assisted to bring about the union of that country with Great Britain. After the union he was appointed privy counsellor, and president of the board of control; and in 1805, minister of war, which station he occupied, with the exception of two short intervals, during the remainder of his life. His predominant influence in the cabinet is dated from the death of Mr. Percival in 1811; after which event he was virtually at the head of the administration, and represented it as ambassador, in all the most important negotiations on the continent. His life was terminated by his own hand, August 12th, 1822; when it is supposed he was laboring under mental derangement.

STUBBE, Henry, a learned writer, born at Partney, Lincolnshire, 28th February 1631. He was sent to Westminster-school, and Busby commended and rewarded his extraordinary abilities. In 1649 he was elected to Christ church, and distinguished himself there by his zeal and his learning. When bachelor of arts, he went and served in the parliamentary army in Scotland, and after he had been admitted to his master's degree, he was in 1657 appointed under librarian to the Bodleian. As he refused to conform to the orders of government, he was ejected from his offices and retired to Stratford on Avon to practise physic, to the study of which he had formerly applied himself. In 1661 he went to Jamaica as king's physician to the island, but soon returned in consequence of the unfavorable climate. He afterwards settled at Warwick, and then at Bath, where he acquired considerable practice. He was intimate with Hobbes, whom he supported against Dr. Wallis, and against the new establishment of the royal society, and in consequence of this controversy, in which he ably maintained the ancient doctrines of the schools of the Aristotelian philosophy, he made a severe attack on Mr. Glanvill, and charged him and the other members of the society with the intention of undermining the universities, destroying the established religion, and introducing popery. His enemies, fairly however, accused him of inconsistency, as before the restoration he had abused monarchy, universities, churches, and all ancient establishments, while he defended the conduct and principles of his early friend and patron sir Henry Vane. After a life chequered with accidents and controversial quarrels, this extraordinary man was unfortunately drowned, 12th July 1676, while crossing the river two miles from Bath. The body was taken up the next morning, and when buried in the great church, Bath, a funeral sermon was preached over him, probably with little commendation, by his antagonist Glanvill the rector. As a man of erudition, of extensive information, an accomplished scholar, an able and ready disputant, Stubbe deserves the highest praise. In other respects he was strongly deficient in common discretion, wavering in his principles, occasionally rash and obstinate in his opinions, and regardless of that sobriety and that decorum in conduct, which should accompany great powers of mind. His writings are very numerous, but though they convey much information and deep research, they are distinguished for abuse, satire, and malevolence.

STUBBS, George, an able writer, rector of Gunville, Dorsetshire, and known as the author of some of the best papers of the Free Thinker, with Ambrose Phillips and others, 1718. He wrote also the new adventure of Telemachus, 8vo. an admired performance, founded on principles of liberty, and in opposition to Fenelon's work. He wrote besides some elegant verses, which are still preserved in MS. by his friends. He was twice married. The time of his death is not mentioned.

STUBBS, George, a native of Liverpool, distinguished as a painter and anatomist. At the age of thirty he visited Rome, to improve himself in the study and knowledge of the arts and the monuments of the ancients, and on his return he devoted himself laboriously to the completion of his valuable work, the anatomy of the horse, including a particular description of the bones, cartilages, &c. with most valuable plates, published 1766. In the delineation of animals he particularly excelled, and his pieces stand very high in the public estimation. He undertook another elaborate work, a comparative anatomical exposition of the structure of the human body, with that of a tiger and common fowl, in thirty tables, of which, however, he published only three parts before his death. This excellent artist died in London, 10th July, 1806, aged eighty-two.

STUCKIUS, John William, a native of Zurich, distinguished as an antiquary. He wrote a treatise on the Feasts of the Ancients and their Sacrifices, a learned work in fol.—a Commentary on Adrian—a treatise called Carolus Magnus Redivivus, 4to. in which he compares Henry IV. of France with Charlemagne. He died 1607.

STUKELEY, William, a celebrated antiquary, born at Holbeck, Lincolnshire, 7th November 1687. After receiving his education in the school of his native town, he was, in 1703, admitted of Benet college, Cambridge, where he studied physic and botany with great assiduity. When he had taken his degrees of bachelor in medicine, he settled at Boston, and in 1717 removed to London, where he was soon after, at the recommendation of his friend Dr. Mead, elected fellow of the royal society, and also one of the first members of the antiquarian society. He left London in 1726 to settle at Grantham, in his native county, where his abilities were called into action by his attendance on the noblest, and most respectable families of that neighborhood. He found himself, however, so much afflicted with the gout that he determined to abandon his laborious profession, for the church preferment, which his powerful friends could command for him, and after being ordained by Wake, the primate, in 1730 he was presented to the living of All-Saints, Stamford. In 1739 he obtained from the duke of Ancaster the living of Somerby near Grantham, and in 1747, he relinquished, at the pressing solicitation of the duke of Montague, his country preferments, for the rectory of St. George, Queen's square, London. He was seized with a stroke of the palsy, the 27th February 1765, and died four days after in his 78th year. The best known of his works are Itinerarium Curiosum, or an Account of the Curiosities and Antiquities in Great Britain, folio, with copper plates—Palæographia Sacra, or Discourses on the Monuments of Antiquity, that relate to Sacred History, 4to.—Palæographia Britannica, 4to.—an Account of Stonehenge and Abury, folio—History of Carausius, 2 vols. 4to.—Dissertation on the Spleen, folio—a treatise on the Gout, besides other valuable tracts on antiquities. His knowledge of druidical history was so extensive, that he was not improperly called by his friends the archdruid of his age. He was the correspondent and the friend of the most learned and respectable persons of his time.

STURGES, Jonathan, LL.D. one of the most distinguished citizens of Connecticut who espoused and supported the cause of Independence, was born at Fairfield, August 23d, 1740. He was graduated at Yale College, in 1759, and became a lawyer. In 1774 he was chosen a delegate to congress, and was repeatedly elected previous to 1792, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, and continued in the office until 1805. He died at Fairfield, October, 4th, 1819, aged 79, having sustained in his various public stations, as well as in private life, a character of eminent excellence.

STURMIUS, James, a learned German, born at Strasburg 1489. His abilities were employed in several embassies to the diets of the empire, to England and the imperial court, and he contributed greatly by his influence to the reformation at Strasburg, and also to the creation of a college there. He assisted Sleidan in the compilation of the History of the Reformation in Germany, which was honorably acknowledged by the author, and died at Strasburg, 30th October 1553.

STURMIUS, John, the Cicero of Germany, was born at Sleidan, in Eisel, near Cologne, 1507. He studied at Liege and Louvain, and afterwards set up a printing press with Rudger Rescius, and began the printing of the Greek classics. In 1529, he was at Paris, where he read lectures on Greek and Latin writers, and logic, and then retired to Strasburg in 1537, as he was afraid of the persecution which might attend his attachment to the protestant principles. He settled at Strasburg, which now obtained the title of an university, and he was appointed rector, and saw his pupils numerous and respectable. When pressed on account of his principles he declared himself a Calvinist, and in consequence was deprived of his rectorship. He died 3d March, 1589, aged about 80. He published various books, among which were valuable notes on Aristotle's Rhetoric, and other authors, besides, a tract called Linguæ Latinæ resolvendæ Ratio, 8vo STURMIUS, John Christopher, professor of philosophy and mathematics at Altorf, where he died 1703, aged 68, was a native of Hippolstein. He published a German translation of the works of Archimedes—Collegium Experimentale Curiosum, 4to.—Physica Electiva & Hypothetica, 2 vols. 4to.—Scientia Cosmica, folio—a Course of Mathematics, translated into English, 3 vols. 8vo.—Mathesis Juvenilis, 2 vols. 8vo.—Physicæ Conciliatricis Conamina, 12mo.—Prælectiones contra Astrologiæ Divinatricis Vanitatem, 2 vols. 4to.—Physicæ Modernæ Compendium.

STUYVESANT, Peter, the last of the Dutch governors in New York, deserved to be kept in remembrance. He began his administration in 1647; and he exerted all his energies to prevent the encroachment of the English and Swedes, on the territory under his command. He was more successful with the latter than the former. In 1655, he obliged the Swedes at a place in Delaware Bay, now called Newcastle, to swear allegiance to the Dutch authority. But, in 1664, colonel Nichols, with an English fleet, arrived at New York, then called New Amsterdam, and compelled governor Stuyvesant and his whole colony to surrender to their invaders. He, however, remained in the country till his death.

SUARD, John Baptist Anthony, a French writer and translator, was born, in 1734, at Besançon; acquired considerable reputation as a contributor to and editor of many public journals; was admitted into the Academy, and subsequently into the Institute; and died in 1817. Among his translations is Robertson's Charles V. Many of his pieces are contained in the Literary Varieties, and Literary Miscellanies. Several lives in the Universal Biography are also from his pen.

SUAREZ, Francis, a Spanish jesuit, born at Granada, 5th January 1548. He was professor at Alcala, Salamanca, and Rome, and afterwards was invited to Coimbra in Portugal, where he became professor of divinity. He died at Lisbon, 1617, with a great character for piety. He wrote on metaphysics, morality, and theology, and his works amounted to twenty-three vols. fol. and so extraordinary was his memory that on quoting any passage from his works, he could continue the quotation to the end of the page. His treatise de Legibus was an able performance.

SUCHET, Louis Gabriel, duke of Albufera, a celebrated French marshal, was born, in 1772, at Lyons, and entered the army, as a volunteer, in his twentieth year. Between that period and 1800 he distinguished himself in Italy, Switzerland, and the Grisons, and rose to the rank of major-general. He subsequently increased his fame at Marengo, at Austerlitz, and in Poland. In 1808 he was appointed to the command of the French forces in the southeast of Spain, and this command he retained till the termination of the war. He gained many victories, reduced a great number of fortresses, and conquered Valencia; and his services were rewarded with the rank of marshal, and the title of duke. When Napoleon returned from Elba, he intrusted Suchet with the defence of the departments bordering on the frontier of Savoy. He died January 7, 1826.

SUCKLING, sir John, an English poet, born at Witham, Essex, 1613. His abilities were early displayed, so that he could speak Latin at five, and write it at nine. When his education was completed he went on his travels, and studied the manners and character of foreign nations, without imitating their vices. He was prevailed upon to attend one of the campaigns of Gustavus Adolphus, and was present at three battles, and five sieges, and on his return, as a proof of his patriotism, and military spirit, he raised at his own expense of above twelve thousand pounds a troop of horse, for the king's service. This troop was more remarkable for finery than valor, so that it is said sir John took much to heart their ill conduct against the Scots, and fell a victim to a fever, in his 28th year, 1641. He wrote besides, a few poems, and some letters—an Account of Religion by Reason—a Discourse, upon occasion presented by lord Dorset, and four plays, which have been edited several times, in 2 vols. 8vo.

SUE, John Joseph, came to Paris, in 1729, and studied under the celebrated anatomist Verrier, whom he succeeded in the professorial chair. He died at Paris, 10th December, 1792, aged 82. His works are, an Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo.—treatise on Bandages, 12mo.—Elements of Surgery, 8vo.—Anthropotomia, or the Art of Injecting, Dissecting, and Embalming, 8vo.—Osteology, translated from the English of Dr. Munro, 2 vols. fol. with thirty-one plates, besides memoirs in the collection of the Savans Etrangers, &c.

SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS, Caius, a Latin historian, was born in the first century of the Christian era, and died in the second, but the precise dates of his birth and death are not recorded. Little more is known of him than that he was brought up to the bar, was made tribune, and subsequently became secretary to Adrian, but lost the secretaryship in 121, and that he was intimate with Pliny. All his works have perished except The Lives of the Twelve Cæsars.

SUETONIUS PAULINUS, a celebrated Roman general of the first century, the place and time of whose birth and death are unknown, first distinguished himself by reducing, A. D. 37, the revolted Mauretians to obedience. In 59 he was appointed to the government of Great Britain, which province he brought completely under the yoke; defeating Boadicea, and destroying the Druids in Mona. In his latter years he stained his reputation by the means to which he resorted for obtaining the favour of Vitellius, after having fought for Otho.

SUER, Thomas le, of the order of Minims, was born at Rethel, in Champagne, 1703, and taught with great applause, theology, philosophy, and mathematics at Rome. He assisted in the education of the infant duke of Parma, and died at Rome 22d September, 1770. He was deservedly patronized by the popes, and from his long, and faithful intimacy with father Jaquire, arose the composition of a learned commentary on Newton's Principia—a treatise on the Integral Calculus, 2 vols. 4to.—Institutiones Philosophiæ, 5 vols. 12mo.

SUFFREN, John, a native of Salon, in Provence, who became an active member of the jesuits' society, and was confessor to Mary de Medicis. During the disputes between this princess and her son Louis XIII. he attempted to produce a reconciliation, but without effect, and by the intrigues of Richelieu he was banished from the court, and died at Flushing, 1641, aged 70. He wrote Année Chretienne, 4 vols. 4to. a work of merit, abridged by Frizon in 2 vols. 12mo. Admiral Suffren, who distinguished himself in the East Indies against the English, is supposed to be of the same family, as he was born in Provence. This gallant officer was highly honored by the French king for his services, and died 1789.

SUHM, Peter Frederic, an eminent Danish historian and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1728, at Copenhagen; held various important offices under the government, and was appointed royal historiographer; married in Norway, and resided there for fourteen years, during which period he was indefatigable in collecting historical materials relative to the northern nations; returned to Copenhagen in 1765; and was a liberal patron of learning till his decease in 1795. His Miscellanies form fifteen volumes; and his valuable Histories of Denmark occupy sixteen volumes 4to.

SUICER, John Gaspard, a learned German, born at Zurich 1620. He was there professor of Greek and Hebrew, and died at Heidelberg, 1705. His Lexicon, sive Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus Patrum Græcorum, best edited 2 vols. fol. 1723, Amsterdam, is an useful work. His son Henry, was also an able professor at Zurich, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died 1705. His Chronology of Switzerland, in Latin, is much esteemed among his other learned works.

SUIDAS, a Greek lexicographer. When and where he was born and died are unknown, but he is supposed to have lived in the latter end of the ninth and the beginning of the tenth century. His Lexicon, faulty as it is in many respects, is valuable for the fragments it contains of lost works, and the information which it affords respecting ancient writers.

SULIVAN, sir Richard Joseph, an English writer. He went early in life to the East Indies, and after his return to England, he published an account of his tour through various parts of the kingdom, 2 vols. 8vo. He afterwards published a letter to the East India Directors—Analysis of the Political History of India—Thoughts on Martial Law—Philosophical Rhapsodies—a View of Nature, in Letters to a Traveller among the Alps, a work of little merit, though commended by the author of the Pursuits of Literature. In 1790 he obtained a seat in parliament and continued member of the house of commons till his death. He was created a baronet in 1804, and died at Thames-Ditton, Surrey, 17th July, 1806.

SULLIVAN, John, LL.D., an officer in the army of the American revolution, was born in Maine, and established himself in the profession of law in New Hampshire. Turning his attention to military affairs, he received, in 1772, the commission of major, and in 1775 that of brigadier-general. The next year he was sent to Canada, and on the death of general Thomas, the command of the army devolved on him. In this year he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was soon after captured by the British in the battle on Long Island. He commanded a division of the army at the battles of Trenton, Brandywine and Germantown; and was the sole commander of an expedition to the island of Newport, which failed through want of cooperation from the French fleet. In 1779 he commanded an expedition against the Indians. He was afterwards a member of congress, and for three years president of New Hampshire. In 1789 he was appointed a judge of the district court, and continued in that office till his death in 1795.

SULLIVAN, James, LL.D., governor of Massachusetts, was born in Berwick, Maine, April 22, 1744. He was a brother of the preceding, and was also educated by his father. The subject of this article was intended for a military life; but the fracture of a limb in his early years induced him to bend the vigorous powers of his mind to the investigation of the law. After pursuing the study of this science under his brother, general Sullivan, and opening an office at Biddeford, on Saco river, he soon rose to celebrity, and was appointed king's attorney for the county of York, in which he resided. On the approach of the revolution he took an early and active part on the side of his country. In 1775 he was chosen a member of the provincial congress. In 1776 he was appointed a judge of the superior court. He was subsequently a member of congress, a member of the executive council, judge of probate, and in 1790 was appointed attorney-general. He retained this latter office until 1807, when he was elected governor of the state. He died, during the second year of being chief magistrate of Massachusetts, December 10, 1808, aged 64 years. The various public offices which he sustained during a period of forty years, were conferred upon him by the free and unbiassed suffrages of his countrymen. As he was not assisted in his progress to distinction by the advantage of opulence or family connexions, the stations which he held were a proof of his talents, and of the confidence reposed in his integrity. And in all the relations of domestic and social life his conduct was exemplary. He was the author of a History of Maine; a Dissertation on Banks; a Dissertation on the Suability of States; a History of land titles in Massachusetts; a Dissertation on the Constitutional liberty of the Press; and a History of the Penobscot Indians.

SULLY, Maximilian de Bethune, baron of Rosni, duke of, celebrated as the friend and minister of Henry IV. was born of an illustrious family at Rosni, 1559. At the age of eleven he was presented to the queen of Navarre, and educated with her son afterwards Henry IV., of France. He accompanied him to Paris, but must have perished in the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew, if not humanely concealed for three days by the principal of the college of Burgundy. Attached by affection to the young king, Sully distinguished himself in the various campaigns in which he was engaged, and at Marmande, Cahors, Coutras, Fosseuse, Arques, Gisors, Dreux, and Ivry, his character as an able, active, and intrepid warrior, was nobly established. But he was born to shine not only in the field, but in the cabinet. Before his master ascended the French throne, he was his envoy at the court of Paris, and by his negotiations with the Swiss in 1586, he obtained a subsidy of twenty thousand men. In 1599 he negotiated the marriage of Henry with Mary de Medicis, and in his embassy at the court of Elizabeth, he displayed the most consummate prudence, and after the decease of that princess, he had the address to settle the wavering mind of James in favor of his master. Raised to the office of prime minister he exerted himself for the prosperity of the kingdom as well as the splendor of the monarchy. The taxes were collected with ease and without oppression to the subject and all impositions were abolished. Though often thwarted in his views, by the intrigues of the courtiers, and of the mistresses of the monarch, he remained firm to his principles, distinguished more as the zealous friend than as the temporizing minister of Henry. Regular in the affairs of his office, he rose every morning at four, and after devoting some time to business, he gave audience to such as solicited an admission to him, and never rejected the meanest person from his presence. Always attentive to the interests of the kingdom, he prevailed upon his master to change his religion, and to become a catholic to please his catholic subjects of France, but when solicited also to abandon the protestant tenets, he firmly refused, and replied to the pope, who in flattering him, upon the greatness of his abilities as minister, artfully pressed him to enter upon the right way, "I never shall cease to pray for the conversion of your holiness." After the murder of Henry, he was disgraced from the court, and when recalled some years after by Louis XIII. he recommended the banishment of all the buffoons, and the flatterers, who amused and ruined the effeminate monarch. Sully died 21st December, 1641, aged 82. The memoirs which he composed in his retreat, and which he called Economes Royales, have been published, and contain a very minute detail of the history of the court, not only during his ministry, but during the reign of Charles IX. of Henry III. and Henry IV. This work has been pruned of its obsolete terms by de l'Écluse, and published in 3 vols. 4to. and in 8 vols. 12mo. 1745.

SULZER, John George, an eminent philosopher, born at Winterthur, in the canton of Zurich, October 1720, the youngest of twenty-five children. His abilities slowly unfolded themselves; at sixteen he had no taste for study, till at last a perusal of Wolfe's Metaphysics roused his attention, and called into action all his powers of thought. He became an ecclesiastic, and was the friend of Maupertuis, Euler, and Sack, and in 1747, he was invited to fill the mathematical chair at Berlin, where he died February 1779, universally respected for modesty, learning, benevolence, and all the milder virtues. His works are numerous, the best known of which are, Moral Contemplations on the Works of nature—treatise on Education—Universal Theory of the Fine Arts, 2 vols. 4to.—Remarks on Hume's Essays.

SUMMERFIELD, John, a methodist minister, who, in the few years of his labors, acquired great popularity. He was born in England, January 31, 1798, and came to New York in 1821. Such was his peculiar and chastened eloquence, that crowds followed him, wherever it was known he would preach. And he was conspicuous for the christian graces. His course, however, was painfully short. Health soon failed him; and on this account he was induced, in 1823, to visit France. But the mild climate of that favored country did not avail him. He returned to New York, and died June 13, 1825, aged 27 years.

SUMNER, Increase, governor of Massachusetts, was born November 27, 1746, and graduated at Harvard college in 1767. In 1770 he established himself as a lawyer in his native town, and soon became conspicuous in the profession. He was elected in 1776 to a seat in the state legislature, and retained it till 1780, when he was chosen senator. In 1782 governor Hancock placed him on the bench of the supreme court; and in 1797 he was elected governor of the state. He held this office till his death, June 7, 1799, at the age of 52 years. He possessed a highly vigorous and well cultivated mind; and such was his moral character, that the utmost confidence was reposed in his integrity and patriotism.

SUMOROKOF, Alexander, the founder of the Russian theatre, was born at Moscow, 14th November, 1727. He was educated at home, and then removed to the seminary for cadets, at Petersburg, where he studied with uncommon assiduity. He was recommended by count Shuvalof to the empress Elizabeth, and at the age of twenty-nine he began to study the plays of Racine, and soon produced his first piece, Koref, which was acted in private, and then before the court, and received with the most unbounded applause. The public favor animated his muse, and he successively wrote Hamlet, Aristona, Sinaf and Truvor, Zemira, Dimisa, and other tragedies, besides comedies, and two operas, sonnets, elegies, fables, satires, and ers, except epic poetry. Thus supported by national applause, he was not unrewarded by the court; Elizabeth raised him to the rank of brigadier, and made him director of the Russian theatre, with a pension of £400, and Catherine appointed him counsellor of state, and knight of St. Anne. He died universally respected, 1st October, 1777. His tragedies possess great merit; but there are some blemishes in them, and in his comedies he displayed much humor, though he sacrifices too much to vulgarity, while he attempts to excite the laughter of his auditors. His satires are the best in the Russian language, but are very unequal. In his elegies he shows great powers of tenderness and animation, and in his idyls, the most pleasing simplicity. He is deservedly regarded with Lomonozof as the honor of the nation; and while he displayed all the softness, the graces, and the harmony of poetry, his illustrious countryman soared to the regions of sublimity and majestic strength. He wrote also some short historical pieces, in a style clear and elegant, but perhaps too flowery.

SUMTER, Thomas, a distinguished soldier of the American revolution. He belonged to the state of South Carolina; and, by governor Rutledge, in 1780, was promoted from the office of colonel to that of brigadier-general. In his martial enterprises general Sumter experienced no very small share of the vicissitudes to have been expected under such circumstances. But, whether defeat or success attended him no one doubted his patriotism and his courage. For his services he received the thanks of congress and the applause of his country. In 1811 he was chosen senator of the United States. He died suddenly, June 1, 1832, aged 97.

SURIAN, John Baptist, a native of St. Chamas, in Provence, who became bishop of Vence, and died 3d August 1754, aged 84. He was a pious and benevolent prelate, an amiable man, and an eloquent preacher. Some of his sermons have been published, of which the best known is that on the small number of the elect.

SURVILLE, Margaret Eleanor Clotilde de, a French poetess, who celebrated the heroic deeds of her countrymen, and died at a great age at the close of the 15th century. Her language is almost obsolete; but she possessed great vigor of mind, and a fertile imagination. Her poems were published at Paris in 1803, prepared for the press by one of her descendants, Joseph Stephen de Surville, an officer of merit, who, after distinguishing himself in the wars of Corsica and America, fell a victim to the French revolution, and was shot at Puyen-Velay, 1799.

SUTCLIFFE, Matthew, a learned divine, known for his controversial works—a treatise of Ecclesiastical Discipline, 4to. 1591—De Presbyterio, 4to.—De Turco-Papismo, or the resemblance between Mahometanism and Popery, 4to.—De Purgatorio—De Vera Christi Ecclesiâ, 4to. 1600—De Missâ. He was then dean of Exeter, and founder of Chelsea college, and died about 1610.

SUTTON, Thomas, founder of the Charter-house, was born at Knaith, in Lincolnshire, 1532. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, as is supposed, and then studied the law at Lincoln's Inn, but he had no inclination for that profession, and therefore travelled over Holland, France, Spain, and Italy. At his return he became secretary to the earls of Warwick and Leicester, and distinguished himself in the north of England, in the service of Elizabeth. He purchased some estates in the county of Durham, which were found to contain coal mines, and thus produced him an immense income. His property was further increased by marrying a rich widow, and by engaging in commerce, and with such success that he is said to have had thirty agents abroad, and to have prevented, for one year, the armament of Philip against England, by draining the bank of Genoa of the money which was intended for that monarch's use. With money and patriotism he possessed courage, and one of his ships, called Sutton, was distinguished among the fleet which defeated the Spanish Armada. After living with great splendor, he retired to private life and solitude, after the death of his wife, 1602, and he determined to render his name immortal by some spirited foundation, though the court tempted him with the honors of a peerage, to divert him from his purpose, and to induce him to make the duke of York, Charles I. his heir. In consequence of this resolution he bought the dissolved Charter-house for £13,000, and founded there a noble hospital, and public school. He died 11th December, 1611, at Hackney, aged 79, and his remains were deposited in Christ church, London, till removed, in 1614, to a vault in his newly erected hospital. His property, at his death was £5000, a-year in land, and above £60,000 in money, an immense fortune in those times.

SUWARROFF, Alexander, a Russian general, born of an ancient family, 1730. His father intended him for the magistracy; but the future general preferred the military service of his country, and in 1742, he entered into the army as a common soldier, and by a gradual rise he, in 1762, was made a colonel. After some campaigns in Poland, he went under the celebrated Romanzoff against the Turks, and behaved with such personal bravery, that he killed with his own hand, several of the Janissaries, and as a proof of victory, threw their heads into a sack, and emptied the contents at the feet of his general. He next crossed the Danube, near Silistria, and joining Kamenskoy, he defeated the forty thousand men commanded by the Reis-Effendi, and took all his artillery. In 1788, he obliged the Tartars of Kuban and Budziack to submit to the power of Russia, and to take the oath of allegiance, for which the empress nominated him general in chief. In 1787, he bravely defended Kimburn against the Ottoman fleet, and cut to pieces the Janissaries who had been landed. In 1789, after defeating the enemy at Focksan, he flew, at the head of ten thousand men, to the relief of the prince of Saxe Coburg, who with the imperial troops, was surrounded by one hundred thousand Turks, and he obtained so signal a victory, that his services were rewarded with the title of a count of the Roman empire, under the name of Rimiński, in commemoration of the river Rimiński, near which the battle had been fought. Soon after he was sent by Potemkin against the town of Ismailow, which had already resisted its assailants for seven months, and he was ordered to take it in three days, and on the third day, the town submitted, after the dreadful slaughter of forty thousand Turks, who refused to give or take quarter. The treaty of Yassy put an end to the war with the Ottomans; but Suwarroff found in Poland a new field of glory. He attacked Prague, and made himself master of Warsaw, after cutting to pieces twenty thousand of the Poles who opposed his progress, and for this bold conduct, and his successful campaign, which thus enabled three neighboring powers to parcel out among themselves the Polish dominions, the conqueror was raised to the rank of field marshal, and rewarded with large domains. In 1799, the general was sent to command the Russian forces in Italy, and to check the career of the French triumphs. After a glorious campaign, in which he restored the fallen fortunes of the allies, he was opposed to the genius of Moreau; but notwithstanding the abilities, and the generalship of his enemy, he maintained his superiority, and though obliged at last to give way, his retreat through the snows of Switzerland, to the borders of Germany, displayed the most masterly manœuvres. Another campaign would have opened the way to fresh victories, but Paul capriciously changed his politics, and the general, displeased with the want of cooperation on the part of the Germans, retired to Russia. Though honorably received at Petersburg, and created prince Italisky, he fell under the displeasure of his ungrateful master, and died, it is said, of a broken heart, near the capital, 1800. In his character, Suwarroff was as singular as he was bold and intrepid. He was the idol of his soldiery, and often on the field of battle, he appeared among them stripped to his shirt, and with one leg booted, and the other with only a sandal. His food was often coarse, like that of the common soldier, and he rested in the camp like his inferior associates, covered with a sheep skin. In his intercourse with the world he affected to be laconic. When he took Toutou-Kai, in Bulgaria, he sent these words to Catherine, "the town is taken, I am there," and when Ismailow fell into his hands, the empress was informed of it by this short sentence, "Madam, proud Ismailow is at your feet." He declined all political and diplomatic employments about the court, observing that the pen is unbecoming the hand of a soldier. In his religious opinions he affected great devotion, and he ordered his officers every evening to repeat a prayer in the presence of their soldiers, and he never began a battle without paying adoration to the image of St. Nicholas, which accompanied him in all his expeditions. Though brave, fortunate, and heroic, Suwarroff must be condemned for his inhumanity; for surely that general sinks below the name of man, who permits his soldiers to ravage and to murder when the prostrate enemy implores aloud for mercy.

SWAMMERDAM, John, an eminent naturalist, born at Amsterdam, 1637. He imbibed his first ideas of natural history from the occupation of his father, who was an apothecary, and early began to make a collection of curiosities. He employed much time in catching and examining the flying insects of Holland, and to improve a taste so strongly marked for the examination of the works of nature, he studied at Leyden, and became the friend of Steno the celebrated anatomist, and of Van Horne, and in 1667, took his degree of M. D. He had in the mean time visited Paris and Saumur, and improved himself by the conversation and intimacy of Tanaquil Faber, and Thevenot. In 1667, he made his first experiment of injecting the uterine vessels of the human body, with ceraceous matter, which he afterwards brought to great perfection. A dreadful ague, however, interrupted his anatomical labors, which he had pursued with his friend Horne, and in consequence he determined to devote himself solely to the study of insects. In 1669, he published a general history of insects, a work of great merit, in 2 vols. fol. but though tempted by liberal offers by the grand duke of Tuscany, he refused to quit his native country, though his father was displeased with his pursuits, and insisted upon his practising physic. In 1673, he became acquainted with Madam de Bourignon, and for her mystical reveries he abandoned the pursuits of natural history, wholly devoted as he said, in adoring and loving the sovereign good. He continued thus lost to himself and to the world, and died 1680. His other works are, a treatise on Respiration, 4to.—de Fabricâ Uteri Muliebris, 4to. His works in Dutch, have appeared in an English translation from the Latin version of Gaubius, in folio, with fifty-three copper plates, 1758.

SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, was born at Stockholm, 29th January, 1688. His father was a bishop of the Lutheran persuasion, and president of the Swedish churches. The son travelled abroad in 1710, and on his return was elected assessor of the Metallic college, an office which he resigned in 1747. He was well acquainted with the business of his profession, and wrote Regnum Minerale, 3 vols. fol. 1734, besides a treatise on the Tides, and another on the position and course of the Planets. From the pursuit of philosophical objects, he at last withdrew himself to the contemplation of heavenly things, and in his opinions he became the founder of a new sect of religionists, which though not numerous during his life-time, has since his death increased rapidly on the continent and in London. A small number of his followers exist in New England. This singular character, who in his moments of mystical reveries supposed that he conversed not only with angels, but with the Supreme Being, pretended that whatever happens in the world, has already happened in the world of spirits, which is situated between heaven and hell. According to his declaration the final judgment took place in 1756, in this invisible world of spirits, and the result of it was communicated to him by the Redeemer himself. To support his doctrines he published various works, such as books on the New Jerusalem—on Heaven and Hell—Spiritual Influx—and the White Horse of the Revelations. This extraordinary character died in London, 29th March, 1772, aged 85. In his younger years he had shared the favors of the king of Sweden, and been ennobled in 1719.

SWIFT, Jonathan, a celebrated writer, was born at Dublin, in 1667, and was educated at Kilkenny School, Trinity college, Dublin, and Hertford college, Oxford. For some years he lived with Sir William Temple as a companion, and when that statesman died he left him a legacy and his posthumous works. From king William he entertained expectations of preferment, which were disappointed. Having accompanied Lord Berkeley, one of the lords justices, to Ireland as chaplain, he obtained from him the livings of Laracor and Lathbeggan, on which he went to reside, and to which he invited the lady whom he has celebrated under the name of Stella. He eventually married her, but would never acknowledge her as his wife. His conduct to two other ladies, Miss Waring and Miss Vanhomrigh, with whom he coquetted, was equally devoid of proper feeling. In 1701 he took his doctor's degree, and on the accession of Queen Anne he visited England. In the course of the nine ensuing years he published several works, but it was not till 1710 that he became active as a political writer. Having gone over to the Tories, and become intimate with Harley and Bolingbroke, he exerted himself strenuously in behalf of his new allies. Among his labors in this cause, were the Examiner, and the Conduct of the Allies. It was not, however, till 1713, that he obtained preferment, and even then he was frustrated in his hopes of an English mitre, and received only the Deanery of St. Patrick. When he returned to Ireland he was exceedingly unpopular; but he lived to be the idol of the Irish. Of the writings by which this change was produced, The Drapiers Letters, published in 1724, stand foremost. In 1726 he gave Gulliver's Travels to the world. As he advanced in years he suffered from deafness and fits of giddiness; in 1739 his intellect gave way; and he expired in October, 1745.

SWIFT, Deane, a near relation of the dean of St. Patrick, was called Deane from the name of one of his maternal ancestors. He published in 1755 an Essay on the Life, Writings, and Character of Dr. Jonathan Swift; in 1765 an eighth quarto volume of the dean's works, and in 1768, 2 vols. of his letters. He intended a complete edition of his relation's works, but died before it was finished, at Worcester, 12th July, 1783.

SWIFT, Joh, D.D., an American clergyman of the congregational order, born in Sandwich, Massachusetts in 1743, and graduated at Yale college in 1765. About the year 1766 he was ordained at Richmond, where he continued seven years. Afterwards he officiated in the state of New York; and the last sixteen years of his life were spent at Bennington, Vermont. He died, October 20, 1804, aged about sixty-one years. A volume of his sermons was published in 1805.

SWIFT, Zephaniah, LL.D., chief-justice of the state of Connecticut, was born in Wareham, Massachusetts, 1759, and graduated at Yale college in 1778. He established himself in the practice of the law at Windham, where his superior talents and professional attainments soon raised him to extensive business and a high reputation. After being a member of congress from 1793 to 1796, he accompanied Mr. Painesworth as secretary to France. In 1801 he was appointed a judge of the superior court; and from 1806 to 1819 he was chief-justice of the state. His elevation was the result of his own merit and intellectual worth, having had no family friends to assist him in his way to eminence. Judge Swift died September 27, 1823, aged 64 years. He published a Digest of the Laws of Connecticut, in 2 volumes, on the model of Blackstone, a work of great learning. He also published an Oration on domestic slavery; a System of the Laws of Connecticut; a Digest of the Laws of Evidence; and a Treatise on Bills of Exchange.

SWINDEN, Tobias, an English divine, author of a curious Inquiry into the Nature and Place of Hell, which he places in the sun. This work, first published in 8vo. 1714, appeared again with an appendix, 1727, and was translated into French by Bion, Amsterdam, 1728, 8vo. The author, who was vicar of Cuxton in Kent, died about 1720.

SWINNOCK, George, a native of Maidstone, educated at Cambridge, from which he removed to Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He lost, in 1662, his living of Great Kymbels, Bucks, for nonconformity, and died at Maidstone, 1673. He was author of Heaven and Hell Epitomized, 4to.—the Door of Salvation Opened, 8vo.—the Christian Man's Calling, 3 vols. 4to. a useful work, and other divinity tracts, now little known.

SWINTON, John, B.D., an English antiquary born 1703, at Bexton, Cheshire. He was originally servitor of Wadham college, Oxford, where, in consequence of his good conduct, he was elected scholar and fellow. When he had taken orders he obtained the living of St. Peter-le-Bailey, in Oxford, and then went as chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn. As the situation did not agree with his health, he returned home through Venice, Presburg, and Vienna. He married in 1743, and in 1747 was elected keeper of the university records. He died 4th April, 1777, and his wife in 1784. They were both buried in Wadham chapel. The monuments of his literary life, which are numerous without being of magnitude, consist principally of Dissertations on ancient Etruscan Language, or Phenician and Samaritan coins and inscriptions; on Parthian and Persian coins, and similar subjects, the most of which appeared in the British Philosophical Transactions.

SYDENHAM, Thomas, an eminent physician, born at Winford Eagle, Dorsetshire, 1624. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, which, when it was garrisoned by the king's forces, he left for London, but afterwards returned, and took his degree of M.B. 1648. He then subscribed to the authority of the parliamentary visitors, and was made fellow of All Souls, and some years afterwards settled as a physician at Westminster, and took his doctor's degree at Cambridge. From 1660 to 1670 he enjoyed a most extensive practice, and a reputation superior to that of his contemporaries, but the gout arrested his progress, and permitted him to go little abroad. He was, however, consulted at home, and his writings continued to improve and enlighten the medical world. He died 29th December 1689. In his practice he followed experience rather than theory, and observed the nature, properties, and symptoms of disease with such success and discrimination, that he has been called the father of physic among the moderns. He was the first who recommended a cool regimen in the small-pox. His treatises on nervous disorders, and on consumptive fevers are very valuable. His works were written in English, but translated into Latin by his friends, and universally esteemed by the learned of Europe. There were editions of them at Leyden, Geneva, Leipsic, and London.

SYDENHAM, Floyer, a learned man, born 1710, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1734. He undertook the translation of Plato, for which he was well qualified by his great knowledge of ancient literature, and published some parts; but poverty persecuted him, and clouded the happiest of his hours. He was at last arrested by a victualler, at whose house he had often a scanty dinner, and he died while in confinement, 1783. The amiable character of the man, his unassuming modesty, and well known abilities, as well as his melancholy fate, deeply interested the friends of humanity and of science, and to that honorable feeling England owes the institution of the literary fund, a noble establishment, which tends to banish indigence and despair from the humble abodes of the professional favorite of the muses, and to shed a beam of comfort on his declining years.

SYLBURGIUS, Frederic, a learned German, born at Marburg, 1546. He was for some time school-master at Licha, but afterwards devoted himself to the study of ancient authors. He published learned editions of Herodotus, Aristotle, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Dion Cassius, Justin Martyr, &c. wrote some Greek poems, and also assisted Stephens in the compilation of his Greek Thesaurus. His Greek Grammar, and Etymological Magnum, folio, 1594, are highly valued. He died universally lamented, 1596.

SYLLA, Lucius Cornelius, a famous Roman, who acquired military fame in the armies of Marius and of Catullus. Success in the war against the Marsi, and great popularity among the soldiers, incited him to aspire to the sovereign power under the title of dictator, and though opposed by Marius, he gained his purpose, and cruelly murdered the most powerful of the senators, who wished to curb his authority. After being absolute at Rome, he had the courage to lay down his office, and to retire to the inconsequence of a private life. He died at Puteoli, B.C. 78, aged 60. The last years of his life were spent disgracefully in low debauchery.

SYLVESTER, Joshua, an English poet, born 1563. He was noticed by Elizabeth and James I, and was for some time engaged in mercantile business. He was poetical pensioner to Henry, James' eldest son. He was obliged to leave his country, for what cause is unknown, and died at Middleburg in Holland, 23th September, 1618. He is known as the translator of Du Bartas' Divine Weeks, and works, 4to. and as the author of some poems, but of little merit.

SYLVIUS, Francis, professor of eloquence, and principal of the college of Tournay at Paris, was a native of Levelly near Amiens. He labored zealously to introduce the right pronunciation of the Latin language in the colleges of France, and to supersede the barbarous jargon of the schools by the more elegant diction of Cicero. Besides commentaries, he wrote Progymnasmatum in Artain Oratorium, and died 1530. After the fashion of the times, he altered his name of Dubois to the more classical word of Sylvius.

SYLVIUS, Francis de le Boe, a native of Hanau in Veteravia, professor of medicine at Leyden, where he ably demonstrated the truth of Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood. He promoted also the study of chemistry, and died 14th November, 1672, aged 58. His works have been collected by Elizevir, 1679, 4to. and fol. Venice 1708.

SYLVIUS, James, or DUBOIS, an eminent French physician, born at Amiens in Picardy 1478. After receiving an excellent education, he devoted himself totally to medicine, and to the study of Hippocrates and Galen. He gave lectures on the medical art at Paris with such success, that other physicians, jealous of his fame, exclaimed against him, as he had been graced by no degree. In consequence of this he went to Montpellier, but his avarice was so great that he would not spend money to procure the university honors. He afterwards obtained a degree by interest, at Paris, and in 1548 was nominated to the medical chair of the royal college. He died 1555. His great learning was obscured by his uncommon avarice, and he unfortunately was engaged with his pupil Vesalius. His works have often been printed, called Opera Medica, the best edition of which is that of Cologne, 1630.

SYMMES, Thomas, one of the first ministers of Bradford, Massachusetts, was born February 1, 1678, and graduated at Harvard college in 1698. He was first settled in Boxford, Massachusetts, 1702; but in 1708, succeeded his father as minister of Bradford, the adjoining town. He died October 6, 1725, aged 47 years. Mr. Symmes was a man, possessing native talents, learning, and moral powers, of a high order in his day; and was much respected by his brethren. He published occasional sermons and other small works.

SYMMES, William, D.D., an American clergyman, settled at Andover, Massachusetts. He was educated at Harvard college, from which he graduated in 1755; and, from 1755 to 1758 was a tutor in that institution. He became an ordained minister at Andover in 1758; and died in 1807, aged 77 years. He published an election sermon, and two other occasional sermons.

SYMMES, John Cleves, for some years a captain in the American army, was born in New Jersey, and died in Ohio, June 19, 1829. As a soldier he distinguished himself in the last war with Great Britain; but is particularly deserving remembrance, from the fact, that he was enthusiastically devoted to the belief of the earth's being hollow, with an opening at each of the poles. Such was his confidence in this theory, that he was engaged for years, in attempting to get up an expedition for exploring the polar regions, in order to find one of these openings and if possible to enter it. For this purpose he delivered lectures in various parts of the country. Death, however, put an end to his fancies and his enterprises. He was said to be an exemplary and good man.

SYMMONS, Charles, D.D., a native of Cardigan, which his father had represented in three successive parliaments, was born in 1749, and received the rudiments of his education at Westminster school, whence he removed to Glasgow, and subsequently to Clare-hall, Cambridge. Having graduated in 1776 as bachelor of divinity, he obtained two years afterwards the rectory of Narberth, and in 1794 that of Lampeter in Pembrokeshire. This last piece of preferment he narrowly escaped losing, in consequence of a sermon preached by him at Cambridge, before the presentation was made out, the discourse containing some whiggish sentiments little congenial to those then in power. The same cause operated to throw difficulties in the way of his doctor's degree, which on that account he obtained at Oxford. Dr. Symmons was a warm admirer of literature, and a zealous supporter of its interests. His own writings consist of Luez, a dramatic poem, 1797; a second entitled Constantia, 1800; an octavo volume of miscellaneous poetry, partly of his own composition and partly that of his daughter, 1813; a Rhymed translation of the Æneid, 1817; and a Life of Milton, prefixed to an edition of that author's prose works. After his decease, which took place in 1826, there was published of his, a biographical sketch of Shakspeare.

SYMMACHUS, Q. Aur. Avianus, a learned Roman, who warmly opposed Christianity, and wished for the re-establishment of paganism at Rome. He was banished by Theodosius. His epistles are extant.

SYNGE, Edward, a pious prelate, second son of the bishop of Cork, was born at Inishonane, in Ireland, where his father was then vicar, 6th April, 1659. He was educated at Cork school, and then came to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his first degree, and afterwards completed his studies at Dublin university. He distinguished himself for above twenty years, as an active and laborious parish priest in Ireland, and in consequence of his great zeal in favor of the Hanoverian succession was made bishop of Raphoe in 1714, and two years after advanced to the primacy of Tuam. He died at Tuam 1741. His tracts are valuable, as written in a popular style, and for the active promotion of piety and virtue. They have appeared in 4 vols. 12mo. and often been reprinted, especially by the society for promoting christian knowledge. Dr. Synge had the singular fortune of being a bishop, the son and the nephew of a bishop, and the father of two bishops.

SYPHAX, a king of Numidia, who revolted from the side of the Romans, to the cause of Carthage, and of Asdrubal, whose daughter he had married. He was defeated by Massinissa, and died in prison at Rome, B.C. 201.

SZALKAI, Anthony, a Hungarian poet, who is considered as the founder of the dramatic literature of his country. He held an office in the household of the archduke palatine, Alexander Leopold, and died in 1804, at Buda. His Pikko Hertzog was the first regular drama composed in the Hungarian language. He also wrote a travesty on the Æneid.

T.

TABOR, John Otho, a native of Bautzen in Lusatia. On the destruction of his country during the wars of Germany, he retired to Giessen where he became counsellor to the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt. He died at Frankfurt 1674, where he had retired a few years before, aged 70. His works, which are all on law, were published 1688, in two vols. fol. An account of his life was written by Paschius, his son-in-law.

TACCA, Peter James, a native of Carara, who studied sculpture under John of Bologna. He travelled into Spain and France, and acquired great celebrity. He died at Florence, 1640. The best of his pieces is an equestrian statue of Philip IV. at Madrid. His statue of Henry IV. at Paris, his Jane of Austria, his Ferdinand III. of Tuscany, and the four slaves in bronze, in the harbor of Leghorn, are also much admired. His son Ferdinand was also an able sculptor, and his statue of Ferdinand was among his best pieces.

TACHARD, Guy, a French jesuit, sent in 1686 as missionary to Siam. He, with the ambassadors Chaumont and Choisi, visited Europe, 1688, and then returned, and died at Bengal of a contagious disorder, 1694. An account of his voyages to Siam have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1686, and 1689, but he is very credulous and inaccurate.

TACITUS, Caius Cornelius, a Latin historian, was born about A. D. 56, and was of an equestrian family. The place of his birth is not known. He early cultivated poetry; he became an advocate; and he is supposed also to have borne arms. He was successively questor, edile, and pretor; and, in 97, attained the rank of consul. Pliny the younger was his bosom friend, and Agricola was his father-in-law. He is believed to have died about A. D. 115. Of his admirable History and Annals a large portion is unfortunately lost. Tacitus also wrote The Life of Agricola; The Manners of the Germans; and a Dialogue on Eloquence. the last of these, however, is by some attributed to Quintilian.

TACITUS, Marcus Claudius, a Roman emperor, who claimed descent from the foregoing, was raised to the throne by the senate, in 275, at the age of 75, after having been twice consul. He reigned only six months, during which short period he displayed both wisdom and vigor. It is not certain whether he was assassinated, or died of a violent disease.

TACKANASH, John, one of the most distinguished of the Indian preachers, was ordained colleague with Hiacoomes, (the first Indian convert,) Minister on Martha's Vineyard, August 22, 1670. Contemporary writers speak of him, as possessing respectable talents, which he cultivated by attentive study, and intercourse with the wise and good. Devout and impressive in his exercises in the sanctuary, faithful in his instructions, and exact in maintaining the order and discipline of his church, he acquired the confidence and respect, not only of his own congregation, but of the English residents on the island; to whom he often administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, when deprived of their own minister. He died the 22d of January, 1684.

TALBERT, Francis Xavier, a native of Besançon. He abandoned the law, for which his father, a counsellor of the parliament of Franche-Comté, designed him, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession and obtained a canonry at Besançon. He was a popular and eloquent preacher at Luneville, Versailles, and Paris, and in 1791, he quitted France, to reside in Italy, and afterwards went with the princess of Nassau into Poland. He died at Lemberg in Galicia, 4th June 1803, aged 78. He is author of a discourse on inequality among men, crowned at Dijon, 1755—Panegyric of St. Louis—Eloges of Bonnet, Montaigne, cardinal Anboise, Philip regent of France, and Boileau, and some poetical pieces.

TALBOT, John, earl of Shrewsbury, a warlike Englishman descended from a Norman family, distinguished himself in the reduction of Ireland, of which he was made governor by Henry V. He was afterwards in France with the English army, and took Alençon, Pontoise, and Laval, but was repulsed at the siege of Orleans, by Joan of Arc. He was afterwards taken prisoner at the battle of Patay, but when restored to liberty he signalized himself at the siege of Beaumont-sur-Oise, and afterwards invaded Guienne, and took Bourdeaux, and other towns. This brave warrior, who was the terror of the French, and deservedly named the Achilles of England, at last fell in battle near Castillon, a town of which he was attempting to raise the siege, 17th July, 1453.

TALBOT, Peter, a native of Ireland, almoner to Catherine, wife of Charles II. He was a zealous papist, and was made by pope Clement IX. archbishop of Dublin. He was seized by the protestants, and died in prison 1682. He wrote de Natura Fidei & Hæresis Tractatus de Religione, and other works.

TALBOT, William, a native of Lichfield, educated at Oriel college, Oxford, where he entered 1674. The interest of his relation the earl of Shrewsbury opened for him the door of preferment, and he became dean of Worcester 1691, bishop of Oxford 1699, of Sarum 1715, and six years after was translated to Durham. He died 1730. He wrote sermons which have been published in 1 vol. 8vo.

TALCOTT, Joseph, was descended from Major John Talcott, who commanded the combined English and Mohegan forces in the successful expedition against the Indians in 1676. Eminent for talents and piety, he served the province of Connecticut for a long period, in various official stations. In 1724 he was elected governor of Connecticut, which office he held until the period of his death, which occurred about the close of the year 1741.

TALLARD, Camille d'Hostun, count de, a celebrated marshal of France, born 14th February, 1652, in Dauphiné. He early distinguished himself as a soldier, and in 1672, was under Louis XIV. in Holland, and soon after gained the approbation and friendship of Turenne, by his noble conduct in the battles of Mulhausen and Turkheim. In 1693 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, and in 1697, was sent as ambassador to England, concerning the succession to the Spanish crown in the person of Charles II. In 1702 he was placed at the head of the armies on the Rhine, and made marshal of France soon after. He defeated the Imperialists under the prince of Hesse, before the town of Landau, which he took after a short siege; but his pompous ostentation of announcing the victory rendered him ridiculous. "I have," said he, "obtained more standards than your majesty has lost soldiers." In 1704 he was opposed to the great Marlborough, and at the battle of Blenheim was taken prisoner and brought to England, where he continued seven years. On his return to Paris, 1712, he was created a duke, and in 1726, made secretary of state. He died March 3d, 1728.

TALLIEN, John Lambert, a French republican statesman, born at Paris in 1769, was the son of the porter to the marquis de Bercy, to whom he was indebted for his education. He commenced his political career as secretary to the deputy Broustaret, and then published a daily journal, called Ami du Citoyen, which was affixed to the walls of the metropolis. The Jacobins furnished the expenses of printing this paper, the object of which was to excite the indignation of the populace against Louis XVI., and his ministers. Tallien soon became one of the most popular men of the revolutionary party, and was deeply concerned in the terrible commotions of the 10th of August, at which time he was secretary of the commune which had installed itself at the Hôtel de Ville, and which continued its sittings in spite of the assembly, becoming the centre and origin of the intrigues and massacres of that disastrous period. Being nominated a deputy to the convention, from the department of Seine and Oise, he often mounted the tribune, and was the constant advocate of violent measures. In the session of December 15, 1792, he strongly urged the immediate trial of Louis XVI., objected to allowing him counsel, and added new charges to the accusation against him. He afterwards voted for his death, and against an appeal to the people; and on the day of execution, January 21, 1793, he was president of the convention. He took part in most of the sanguinary proceedings which occurred during the ascendancy of Robespierre; and, after defending Marat, assisting in the destruction of the Girondists, and becoming the advocate of the infamous Rossignol, he was sent on a mission to Bordeaux, where he showed himself the worthy associate of Carrier, Lebon and Collot d'Herbois. He was checked in this sanguinary career by the influence of madame de Fontenay, a woman remarkable for her personal beauty, who, having been imprisoned at Bordeaux, as she was going to join her family in Spain, owed her life to the compassion of Tallien. He took her with him to Paris, whither he went to defend himself before the convention against the charge of moderantism. After the fall of Danton and his party, Tallien perceived that he should become one of the next victims of Robespierre, if he did not strike the first blow. Accordingly, at the sitting of the convention of the ninth of Thermidor, 1794, he ascended the tribune, and, after an animated picture of the atrocities which had taken place, and which he ascribed to Robespierre, he turned to the bust of Brutus, and, invoking the genius of that patriot, drew a dagger from his girdle, and swore that he would plunge it into the heart of Robespierre, if the representatives of the people had not courage to order his immediate arrest. On the morrow, Tallien had the satisfaction to announce to his colleagues that their enemies had perished on the scaffold. Being elected a member of the committee of public safety, the Jacobins replaced his name on their list. At this period he married his protégée, madame de Fontenay. He took a part in all the proceedings of the assembly, and used his power and influence to promote the interests of justice and humanity. This was the honorable period of his life; but the re-creation and opposition which he experienced prevented him from enjoying tranquillity. In July, 1795, he was sent, with extensive powers, to the army on the coasts of Brittany; but after the victory of the republicans at Quiberon, he returned to Paris. He subsequently became a member of the council of five hundred, under the constitution of the year III; but his influence gradually declined, and he was at length reduced to such a state of political insignificance, that he thought proper to retire to private life. Domestic uneasiness induced him to wish to leave France; and he followed Bonaparte to Egypt, as one of the savans attached to the expedition. He became a member of the Egyptian institute, and editor of the Décade Egyptienne, printed at Cairo; besides being administrator of the national domains. After Bonaparte left Egypt, general Menou treated Tallien harshly, and obliged him to return to France. The vessel in which he sailed was captured by the English, and he was taken to London, where he received much attention from the leaders of the whig party. The duchess of Devonshire having sent Tallien her portrait, enriched with diamonds, he kept the portrait, but returned the diamonds. On revisiting his native country, he discovered that he had lost his wife, as well as the favor of Bonaparte, who was then rising to sovereign power. He appears to have been reduced to distress, but at length obtained, through Fouché and Talleyrand, the office of French consul at Alicat. He died at Paris in 1820. Madame Tallien, having been divorced from her husband, (by whom she had a daughter named Thermidor,) was married, in 1805, to Joseph de Caraman, prince de Chimay.

TALMA, Francis Joseph, the late Roscius of the French drama, was born at Paris about the year 1770, and is said to have given the first indication of his histrionic talent when only eight years old, in an old tragedy entitled Tamerlane, performed by boys. But soon after his father, who had settled in London, sent for him to England; and after a few years spent at a boarding-school in Lambeth, artiled him to a surgeon. At this period his fondness for theatrical amusements introduced him to sir John Gallini, manager of an amateur French company which performed at the Hanover Square rooms, and he appeared in several comedies, especially as count Almaviva in Beaumarchais' comedy of the Barber of Seville. The performances of Kemble and Siddons are said to have decided Talma's taste. He returned to Paris, and, through the interest of Molé the actor, made his débüt on the boards of the theatre Français in the part of Seide, in Voltaire's tragedy of Mahomet. After performing a variety of insignificant characters, accident lifted him to the summit of his profession. Chenier's tragedy of Charles IX. was put in rehearsal, when Saintfal, the principal actor, returned his part, saying, with a sneer to the author, "give it to young Talma." Chenier took him at his word; Talma accepted the part with delight, and devoted all his energies to the study of it, and to a strict fidelity of costume; so that the audience, equally surprised and delighted, continued to him, throughout the representation, the tumultuous approbation with which they first greeted his appearance. His greatest triumph, however, was yet to follow. Ducis had translated the Othello of Shakspeare; but, not daring to contend so far against French prejudices as to exhibit the murder of Desdemona on the stage, he had furnished a new catastrophe. Talma was bold enough to prefer the original termination, and, after considerable hesitation, resolved, with the consent of the author, to risk it. His success astonished even himself, and was most honorably rewarded. From this moment he became the paramount tragedian, and continued at the summit of his profession, by which he acquired a handsome fortune, till his death. He was generally esteemed by men of rank and talents for his powers of fascination also in private society, and was a great favorite with the emperor Napoleon. In 1825 he published Reflections on his art, which display a considerable variety of study and research. The death of Tal-ma took place at Paris, October 19th, 1826, after a distressing illness arising from an obliteration of a portion of the large intestines. Before his death he embraced his theatrical friends, Jouy, Arnault, and Duvalliers, and expired ejaculating the name of Voltaire.

TAMERLANE, or TMER BEG, or TIMUR the Lame, from some defect in his feet, was born in the village of Kesch, in ancient Sogdiana, 1335. Whether the son of a shepherd, or descended from the royal race, is unknown; but, however, the obscurity of his first years was soon forgotten in the glory of his exploits. Distinguished by courage, by intrepidity, and by unbounded ambition, he soon gained a number of faithful adherents, and at their head, he seized the city of Balk, the capital of Khorasan, and easily subdued the province of Candahar, the kingdom of Persia, and Bagdad. Elate with his success he now meditated the conquest of India, and though his soldiers at first refused to follow, their hesitation was soon conquered by promises, and the powerful aid of a pretended prophet. Thus seconded by an enthusiastic army, he penetrated to India, took Delhi, with the immense treasures of the Mogul, and returned to conquer Damascus, and to punish Bagdad, that presumed to shake off his yoke. The offending city was given up to the pillage of his soldiers, and eighty thousand of her inhabitants put to the sword. Now master of the fairer part of Asia, he interfered, at the request of the Greek emperor, in the affairs of Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, and sent to him a haughty message, commanding him to abandon the siege of Constantinople, and to restore the princes whom he had deposed. The message roused the indignation of Bajazet; he marched against this new enemy, and was defeated by Tamerlane in the plains of Aneyra, in Phrygia, after a dreadful battle, which continued three days. Bajazet fell into the hands of the conqueror, and was treated with great inhumanity, and carried about in mockery in an iron cage. Some writers, however, deny this, and affirm, that the conduct of Tamerlane towards the captive prince, was as humane and honorable as fallen greatness merited. To these last conquests Tamerlane added Egypt, and the immense treasures of Cairo, and then fixed the seat of his empire at Samarcand, where he received the homage of submissive princes, and among them, of Manuel Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople, and Henry III., king of Castille, by their ambassadors. Tamerlane was preparing fresh victories by the invasion of China, when death stopped his career, April 1st, 1405, in the 36th year of his reign. He appointed his grandson as his successor over that vast empire, which he had acquired with such astonishing success and rapidity.

TANNER, Thomas, a learned antiquary, born 1674, at Market Lavington, Wilts, where his father was minister. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and became chaplain and fellow of All Souls. In 1701 he was made chancellor of Norwich, and rector of Thorpe, and afterwards prebendary of Ely, canon of Christ-church, and in 1732, bi-hop of St. Asaph. He died at Christ-church, Oxford, 14th December, 1735, and was buried in the cathedral. He is known as the author of Notitia Monastica, or a short History of all the Religious Houses in England and Wales, 8vo. 1695, republished in folio, 1744—Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica, the labor of forty years, published 1743, folio.

TANSILLO, Luigi, an Italian poet, born at Nota 1520. The best part of his life was spent in the service of Don Pedro de Toledo, viceroy of Naples, and he was made judge of Gaieta, and died after 1596. He was esteemed as a poet, but his il Vendemiatore, or the Vintager, a poem 1584, was considered so indelicate and licentious, that his writings were put into the index expurgatorious of the pope. He published besides other poems, and reconciled himself to the see of Rome, by his Tears of St. Peter, which removed the papal interdicts from his writings, except the Vintager. His poems consist of sonnets, songs, and comedies. The Tears of St. Peter were translated by Malherbe into French.

TANUCCI, Bernard, marquis de, chief minister of Naples, was born of poor parents at Stia, in Tuscany, 1698. He studied at Pisa, and by his merit rose to the chair of jurisprudence in that university. On the coming of Don Carlos to succeed to the Neapolitan throne, the professor, who had been recommended to the new king, and who had defended the legality of seizing a murderer from the asylum of a church against the opinions of the see of Rome, was raised to the office of minister, and by his firmness and wisdom, deserved the high appointment. For fifty years he continued in this important office, and after contributing zealously to the prosperity of the kingdom, and to establish its independence from the ecclesiastical superiority of Rome, he resigned in 1777, and died 29th April, 1783. This enlightened minister encouraged literature; and to his zeal in the cause of science, antiquarians are indebted for the important discoveries, and the valuable collections made in the subterraneous towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii.

TAPPAN, David, D.D., was the son of Rev. Benjamin Tappan, minister of Manchester, and was born in that town, April 21, 1753. Having graduated at Harvard College in 1771, he pursued the study of divinity for a few years, and was ordained minister of the third church in Newbury in April, 1774. In June, 1792, he was elected Professor of Divinity, in Harvard College, as successor to Doctor Wigglesworth; and having, by the advice of an ecclesiastical council, dissolved his connexion with his church, he was inaugurated, December 26, 1792. He discharged the duties of his office with great zeal and success. His lectures, abounding with profound research, and happy illustration, were received with marked attention, and blessed with great and happy result. At a period when irreligion, and a tendency to infidelity, were becoming but too prevalent throughout our country, it required powers of no ordinary standard, to expose the subtlety of the popular philosophy. Doctor Tappan stood boldly at his post, and by his eloquence, learning, and piety, successfully inculcated the great truths of revelation, where skepticism had nearly prepared the way for open infidelity. He died August 27, 1803, after a short illness, aged 51. The following, it is believed, is a correct list of Doctor Tappan's printed works. Two sermons, preached on the Sunday after his ordination, 1774; a discourse on the character, &c. of unregenerate sinners, 1782; a sermon on the fast, 1783; on the peace, 1783; on the death of M. Parsons, 1784; of eight persons drowned, 1794; of J. Russel, 1796; of Washington, 1800; of S. Philips, 1802; of Doctor Hitchcock, and Mary Dana, 1803; two friendly letters to Philalethes, 1785; at the ordination of J. Dickenson, 1789; of John T. Kirkland, 1794; of J. Kendall; of N. H. Fletcher, 1800; installation of H. Packard, 1802; address to the students of Andover Academy, 1791; General Election, 1792; before an association at Portsmouth, 1792; farewell sermon at Newbury; on the fast, 1793; a discourse to graduates; address to students at Andover; to the class which entered college, 1794, 1796 and 1798; on the Thanksgiving, 1795; before the convention, 1797; on the fast, 1798.

TARGE, I. B., professor of mathematics, and author of a general history of Italy, from the fall of the Roman empire, to modern times, 4 vols. 12mo.—translated Smollet's history of England, 19 vols. 12mo.—Barrow's travels, 12 vols. 12mo.—and died at Orleans, 1788. He wrote also an history of England, from the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle to 1763, 5 vols. 12mo.

TARIN, Peter, a French physician, born at Courtenai. He died in 1761, but his age is unknown. His writings were held in great esteem, especially his Adversaria Anatomica, 4to.—Anatomical Dictionary, 4to.—Osteographia, 4to.—the Art of Dissecting, 2 vols. 12mo.—a treatise on Ligaments—Observations on Medicine and Surgery, 3 vols. 12mo.—a description of the Muscles, 4to. with figures.

TARQUIN, the elder, fifth king of Rome, settled at Rome from Tarquinius the place of his birth, and by liberality and mildness so gained the hearts of the Romans, that on the death of Ancus Martins he was elected king. He was a benevolent prince, and adorned his city with stately buildings, and aqueducts, and added dignity and consequence to the body of the senate and to the magistrates. He was assassinated by the sons of Ancus Martins, B. C. 578, aged 80.

TARQUIN the second, or the Proud, was grandson to the elder Tarquin. He was brave, but his rise to the throne by the murder of his father-in-law Tullius, rendered him deservedly unpopular. The licentious and cruel conduct of his son proved fatal to his interests; and while he was at the siege of Ardea, the Romans took up arms and shut him out of their city. He took refuge among the cities of Etruria, and died there, aged ninety.

TARRAKANOFF, N., princess of, daughter of Elizabeth empress of Russia, by her secret marriage with Alexis Rozoumofski, was carried away at the age of twelve by prince Radzivil in 1767, and concealed in a convent at Rome. This singular step was taken by the dissatisfied noble, to curb the views of the ambitious Catherine, but they failed, and Alexis Orloff, pretending greater discontent against the government of the empress, prevailed upon the princess, in the absence of Radzivil, to marry him, and by her influence and presence to excite a new insurrection in Russia. The unsuspecting princess no sooner yielded her person to her seducer, than she was seized in the bay of Leghorn, where she had been conducted on pretence of paying her military honors, and cruelly bound in chains and conveyed to Petersburg. In December 1777, a violent rising of the Neva suddenly forced the waters into her prison, and the unfortunate princess was drowned before any assistance could extricate her.

TARTAGLIA, Nicholas, an eminent geometer, was born, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, at Venice. Though at the age of six years, he was left an orphan, and in distress, he overcame every impediment in the acquisition of learning, and rose to be one of the most celebrated mathematicians of his time. He died in 1557. Among his works are, A Treatise on Gunnery; Various Questions and Inventions; and A Commentary on Euclid.

TARTINI, Joseph, a musician, called the Admirable by Dr. Burney, was born April 1692, at Pirano in Istria. He studied the law at Padua, but his powers were formed for musical eminence, and by practice and application he became one of the best performers on the violin, and was made master of the band in the church of St. Antony of Padua. He died 26th February 1770 at Padua, universally respected and endeared to the inhabitants by a residence of fifty years. He wrote, sonatas, a treatise on music 1754, and other things, and was a great admirer of Corelli.

TASKER, William, a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his first degree in arts. He afterwards obtained the living of Iddesleigh, in Devonshire, and died there, 1800. He distinguished himself as a poet, and published Odes of Pindar and Horace, in English verse, 3 vols. 8vo.—Ode to the warlike Genius of Britain—Letter on Physiognomy.

TASMAN, Abel Janssen, a great navigator, a native of Holland, was born at Hooru, but in what year is not known. In 1642 and 1644 he was employed on exploratory voyages by Van Dieman, the Dutch governor-general in the East, and he made many important discoveries in Australia, and the surrounding islands. The time of his death is not recorded.

TASSO, Bernardo, an Italian poet, better known as the father of the illustrious Tasso. The best esteemed of his poems is Amadis in one hundred cantos, and his letters also are regarded as very valuable by the Italians. He died at Rome in the convent of St. Omphrius, 1575. The best edition of his letters is that of Padua, 3 vols. 8vo. 1733, and of his poem 1560, 4to.

TASSO, Torquato, a celebrated Italian poet, son of the above. He was born at Sorrento in the kingdom of Naples, 11th March, 1544. His father was secretary to San Severino, prince of Salerno, and he shared his honor and his disgrace. When the prince made a complaint to Charles V. against the viceroy of Naples, who wished to introduce the inquisition into the kingdom, he was condemned, and the cruel sentence was pronounced not only against him but against his secretary, and also his son the future poet, who was only nine years old. They withdrew from the fatal punishment by flight, and came to Rome, where the young poet already wrote verses, and compared his escape to the adventures of Ascanius and Æneas flying from Troy. From Rome he was sent to Padua to study the law, and there he took his degrees in philosophy and theology, but poetry was his favorite pursuit, and at the age of seventeen he produced his Rinaldo. In 1565, he placed himself under the protection of Alphonso duke of Ferrara, and he accompanied his brother, the cardinal, in an embassy from pope Gregory XIII. to the court of Charles IX. of France. On his return to Ferrara he imprudently became enamoured of the sister of his patron, and this passion joined to the malevolent insinuations of his enemies and persecutors, proved the cause of that melancholy, which embittered his life for twenty years. To fly from the scene of his misery he retired to his sister's house at Sorrento, and there spent a whole summer, but absence increased his flame. He returned to Ferrara, and in the midst of a crowded assembly he had the imprudence to embrace his favorite princess Eleonora. The duke, who was present, with great coolness, ordered his courtiers to remove the poet, whom he pronounced insane, to a place of confinement, and there in the hospital of St. Anne the unfortunate lover mourned his misfortunes, a prey to lingering disease, and at intervals deprived of his reason. The interference of the duke Vincent de Gonzaga, at last restored him to liberty 1586, and he retired to Naples in quest of tranquillity and happiness. His great merits now eclipsed the clouds, which envy and malice had raised around him, and his poetical works began to be regarded as the pride and glory of Italy. Sensible of his deserved reputation, the pope, Clement VIII., in a full congregation of cardinals, determined to encircle his brows with the laurel crown, and to honor him with a triumph. The poet was sent for from Naples, and received with all due honors at the distance of one mile from Rome, and the most magnificent preparations were made for the ceremony in the capitol. Vain, however, are the schemes of man. Tasso as if persecuted by fortune, to the last moment of life, was taken ill, and the preparations made for his coronation ended in the melancholy procession of his funeral, as he died the evening before the intended ceremony, 15th April, 1595, aged 51. He derives his celebrity and the palm of immortality from his Jerusalem Delivered, a poem well conducted throughout, and abounding with all the pleasing description of tender scenes, the animated representation of battles, and the majestic flow of language, which so much captivate and overpower the reader in the pages of Homer and Virgil. Besides his Jerusalem, which is familiar to the English reader in the elegant translation of Mr. Hoole and of Miss Watts, Tasso wrote Jerusalem Conquered—Rinaldo—Aminta, a pastoral—Torismond, a tragedy. His life has been written by the marquis Manzo. His works have been published in various forms, the best of which is that of Florence, 6 vols. fol. 1724.

TASSONI, Alexander, an Italian poet, born at Modena 1565. Though early an orphan, his abilities displayed themselves through want and obscurity. He was in the service of cardinal Colonna, and of the dukes of Savoy and of Modena, and died 1635. He wrote Secchia Rapita, or Rape of the Bucket, a mock-heroic poem much admired in Italy for its elegance and delicate humor. It was written in consequence of the war between Modena and Bologna.

TATE, Nahum, a native of Dublin, born 1652, and educated at the college there. He was befriended by Dryden, and patronised by Dorset, and succeeded Shadwell as poet laureat, with a salary of one hundred pounds per annum, and a butt of canary. He wrote nine dramatic pieces, but he is now little known but as the joint translator of the psalms of David with Dr. Brady. Of his miscellaneous poems, that on the death of queen Anne was most admired. He died 12th August 1715, at the mint, where he resided, to escape from the persecution of his creditors.

TATIAN, a Syrian pagan, who was converted to christianity and became the disciple of Justin Martyr. He still retained the principles of the platonists and fell into the errors of Marcion. Of his works nothing remains but an apology for the christian religion, edited 1700, 8vo. at Oxford.

TAVANES, Gaspard de Saulx de, a French general, born 1509. He was taken prisoner with Francis I. at the fatal battle of Pavia, and afterwards became the companion of the king's second son, the duke of Orleans. Called away at last from scenes of dissipation and extravagance, he became an ornament to the military profession. He prevailed upon the rebellious citizens of Rochelle to return to their duty in 1542, and two years after he ably contributed to the victory of Cerisoles. He distinguished himself so much at the battle of Renti in 1554, that the king seeing him covered with dust and with blood tore the order of St. Michael which he wore round his own neck, to throw it around that of his valiant general. His courage again was displayed at the sieges of Calais and Thionville, and afterwards at the famous victories of Jarnac and Moncontour: but his character in the eyes of humanity must deservedly suffer for the countenance and support which he gave to the bloody massacre of St. Bartholomew, though he had the magnanimity to save from the horrors of that dreadful day the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé. He died at Sully 29th June, 1573, as he was preparing to go to the siege of Rochelle, which had again revolted. His son William was governor of Burgundy, and espoused the cause of the league, which he maintained at the battle of Ivry, but he was afterwards reconciled to Henry IV. and died 1633. The family long distinguished itself in the military service of France.

TAUBMAN, Frederic, a German critic, born at Wonscisch, in Franconia, 1565. He was well educated at Culmbach, though his father-in-law was but a tailor, and on the foundation of the college of Heilbrun, 1582, he was removed thither among other promising students. Ten years after he went to Wittenberg, and became the favorite of the prince of Saxony, and in 1595, obtained the professorship of poetry and belles lettres, which he kept till his death 1613. His private character was very amiable. He left a widow and five children. He wrote commentaries in Plautum, 1605, and also in Virgilium—de Linguâ Latinâ Dissertatio, besides Latin poems.

TAVERNIER, John Baptist, a famous traveller born at Paris, 1605. He acquired a fondness for travelling, in the house and conversation of his father who was a merchant, and after visiting the best part of Europe, before he had completed his twenty-third year, he meditated more distant excursions in mercantile pursuits as a trader in jewels. In the space of forty years he is said to have travelled six times into Turkey, Persia, and the East Indies, by various routes, and after being ennobled by Louis XIV., he, in 1668, purchased Aubonne near Geneva, there to spend the rest of his days, in the enjoyment of independence and tranquillity. His affairs however were afterwards thrown into disorder by the ill conduct of a nephew, and to repair his losses he began a seventh journey into the East. He died on his way at Moscow, July 1689, aged 84. His travels 6 vols. 12mo. were published in French, with the assistance of his friends, as he was not a perfect master of the language, and they have been translated into English.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, D.D., a celebrated prelate, son of a barber at Cambridge. At the age of thirteen he was admitted at Caius college, Cambridge. And when he had taken orders, he removed to London, where he was introduced to Land, who admired his abilities as a scholar, and his eloquence as a preacher, and by his influence, procured him a fellowship at All-souls college, Oxford, 1636. He was afterwards made chaplain to his patron, who bestowed upon him the rectory of Uppingham, and in 1642, he was created by royal mandamus doctor in divinity. During the civil troubles he retired to Carnarthenshire, where he maintained himself by teaching a school, till the death of three sons in three months rendered his retirement extremely unpleasant, and therefore he retired to London, and soon after accompanied lord Conway to Ireland, and settled at Portmore. At the restoration he came back to England, and in 1662, he was nominated to the bishopric of Down and Connor, and to the administration of Dromore, and was appointed vice-chancellor of the university of Dublin. He died 13th August, 1667. His friend and successor Dr. Rust represents him as a most learned man, of solid judgment, keen sagacity, and the most lively imagination, to which were united all the mild virtues of private life. His writings are universally known and admired, the best of which are, his life and death of Jesus Christ, folio.—Holy living and dying, 8vo.—Ductor Dubitantium—Cases of Conscience—Discourse on the liberty of prophesying.

TAYLOR, John, a dissenting minister of abilities, was born near Lancaster. He was settled twenty years at Kirkstead Lincolnshire, and then removed to Norwich, and afterwards, by pressing invitations, to Warrington, where he was engaged to superintend the academy there. In this situation, where he expected independence and comfort, he soon found oppositon and ill treatment, and this weighed so much upon his mind, that it shortened his days. He died 5th March, 1761. He wrote a treatise on Original Sin,—and various theological tracts, but his most valuable work is a Hebrew and English concordance, 2 vols. folio.

TAYLOR, John, LL.D., an eminent critic, born 1703, at Shrewsbury. He was educated at the grammar school there, and at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1730. He soon distinguished himself by his publications, and was appointed, by the university, its librarian, and afterwards registrar. He took his doctor's degree in civil law, and was of Doctors Commons, and afterwards became known to lord Carteret, who intrusted him with the education of his sons. After some hesitation he took orders and obtained the rectory of Lawford, Essex, the archdeaconry of Bucks, and the residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He died April 4th 1766, universally and deservedly lamented, and was buried nearly under the litany desk in St. Paul's. His publications were numerous and highly respectable. Besides public orations and other tracts, he published Elements of the Civil Law, 4to. 1755 and 1769,—valuable editions of Lysias and Demosthenes,—and a Latin dissertation on the Mariner Sandvicense.

TAYLOR, Brook, LL.D., an eminent philosopher and mathematician born at Edmonton 23th August, 1685. He was educated at home, and at the age of fifteen entered at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became known by his treatise on the Centre of Oscillation, and in 1712, was admitted into the royal society, and two years after elected the secretary of that learned body. He visited Paris in 1717, and was honorably received by the French literati, and soon after his return he resigned the office of secretary to the royal society. On the 29th December, 1741, he fell a victim to a consumptive disorder in his 46th year. His works on mathematical subjects are very valuable, especially his new Principles of Linear Perspective, which has often been republished and also improved by Colson of Cambridge. He wrote also Contemplatio Philosophica, published by sir William Young, the son of his only surviving daughter by his second wife.

TAYLOR, Jane, an accomplished female writer, born September 23d, 1733, in London, where her father, a respectable artist, then resided. Being also a dissenting minister, Mr. Taylor accepted, in 1792, an invitation from a congregation at Colchester to officiate as their pastor, and carried his daughters thither with him, continuing to superintend their education, and teaching them his own art as an engraver. It was in the intervals between these pursuits that Miss Taylor began to commit the effusions of her genius to writing; and a visit to London in 1802, introducing her to the society of some young females of congenial disposition and talent, she, as well as her sister, was induced to join them in contributing to the Minor's Pocket Book, a small publication, in which her first work, the Beggar Boy, appeared in 1804. The success of this little poem encouraged her to proceed, and from this period till 1813, she continued to publish occasionally miscellaneous pieces in verse, of which the principal are entitled Original Poems for Infant Minds, in 2 vols.; Rhymes for the Nursery, in 1 vol.; and some verses in The Associate Minstrels, a publication written in conjunction with the ladies already alluded to, and Mr. Josiah Conder. In the winter of the last mentioned year she commenced a prose composition of higher pretension, which appeared in 1815, under the name of Display, and met with much success. Her last and principal work consists of Essays in Rhyme on Morals and Manners. The latter part of her life was passed in occasional excursions from Ongar, in which place her family had resided since the year 1810. After some months of lingering debility, in which however the vigor of her mind appears to have remained to the last, this amiable and intellectual female expired of a pulmonary complaint in the month of April, 1823.

TAYLOR, George, a native of Ireland, was born in 1716. He arrived in this country, penniless; but having received a good education, he was advanced from the menial office of a laborer in an extensive iron foundry, to the station of clerk to the proprietor, whose widow he afterwards married. In 1776, Mr. Taylor was sent as a delegate from Pennsylvania to the continental congress, and had an opportunity of signing the declaration of Independence. In the following year, he removed into the state of Delaware, and never afterwards appeared in public life. Mr. Taylor was a patriot in the truest sense of the word; and in all the various relations of life, discharged his duties with fidelity and zeal. He died at Easton, February 23d, 1781.

TAYLOR, John, a senator in the Congress of the United States from the state of Virginia, was distinguished among the great and good characters which that ancient commonwealth has produced. He did much towards advancing the science of agriculture in his native state; and was ever forward in promoting objects conducive to the public good. As a statesman, he is perhaps better known by his Construction construed; and an Inquiry into the principles of the Government of the United States, which he published in 1814. He also published several other treatises on various subjects. He died in Caroline County, Virginia, August 20th, 1824, ripe in years and honor.

TAYLOR, John, Lieutenant-governor of New York, was born in the city of New-York, July 4th, 1742, of respectable parents. He received the rudiments of a classical education, having been intended for one of the learned professions. But his father dying, he was left, at the age of seventeen, an orphan. Too independent to become a burden on his mother, he removed to the city of Albany, in pursuit of fortune. Here he learned that a British garrison was stationed at Lake George; and having obtained some pecuniary aid, he removed to the neighborhood of the post, for the purpose of furnishing the officers with their necessary supplies. In this he succeeded so well, that on the removal of the garrison to Oswego, in the ensuing year, he determined to continue with them; and not only pursued his usual avocations, but was frequently employed in various military services. He remained connected with the army until 1771, when he married a lady of Albany, by the name of Van Valkenburg; and retired to a farm which he had purchased at Stillwater. In 1773 Mr. Taylor commenced business, in the mercantile line, in the city of Albany, and was thus engaged, when the expedition to Canada was undertaken, in 1775. The result of that attempt is well known; but Mr. Taylor, who was employed by General Schuyler, to superintend the commissarial and military stores, rendered most important services, which were ever gratefully appreciated by officers and men. After his return from Canada, he was elected a member of the provincial congress, and in 1777, a member of the council of safety. During the whole of the revolutionary war, Mr. Taylor was actively engaged in the service of his country, either in the council or legislature of his native state. And that his fellow-citizens placed a due value upon his services and talents, may be inferred from the fact, that, for a period of nearly forty years, he was almost constantly elected to one or the other branch of the state legislature. In the year 1813, Mr. Taylor was elected Lieutenant-governor of the state of New York, which office he filled for the period of nine years; and when Governor Tompkins was elected Vice President of the United States, he discharged, for a few months, the office of Governor. From this period, to the close of his life, Governor Taylor employed his time in the discharge of those duties, which the patriot, the philanthropist, and above all, the christian, count most sacred. Possessed of an ample fortune, his hospitality was liberal, and elegant. But his fame is far more ennobled, by the charity, almost unlimited; the unaffected sympathy; the ready and present help, which he afforded to the sons and daughters of affliction. Thousands have arisen, and blessed his name; and his memory will be cherished by all, who delight in the contemplation of that pure and undefiled religion, which constitutes the man of God.

TECUMSEH. This renowned warrior was born in Ohio, on the Scioto river, about the year 1770. For many years he had been engaged in predatory incursions against the whites, intercepting boats on the great rivers of the west, &c; but it was not until the year 1806, that his great project of a confederacy of all the Western Indians against the whites, was probably matured. The battle of Tippacanoe, which was fought November 7th, 1811, in which General Harrison defeated the brother of Tecumseh, better known as the Prophet, completely overthrew the ambitious hopes of the brothers. Tecumseh was not present at this battle. In the last war with Great Britain, we find Tecumseh an ally of King George, and holding the rank of Brigadier-general; having generally at his command, about two thousand Indians. He was present with his forces, in several engagements, and was eventually killed by Col. R. M. Johnson, in the battle of Moravian Towns, October 5th, 1813.

TEISSIER, Anthony, a native of Montpellier, who quitted France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Prussia. He was made by the elector historiographer, with a handsome salary, and counsellor of embassies. He died at Berlin, 1715, aged 83. He is author of Eloges of learned Men, from de Thou's History, 4 vols. 12mo.—Catalogus Auctorum qui Librorum Catalogos Indices Bibliothecas, Virorum Literator. Elogia, Vitam aut Orationes Funebres scriptis Consignarunt, 8vo.—the Duties of Man as a Citizen, from Puffendorf—Moral and Political Instructions—Calvin's Letters—and the Life of Illustrious Princes.

TEKELI, Emmerie, count de, a noble Hungarian, who escaped from the captivity which the Austrians prepared against his father for his attachment to the cause of some rebellious chiefs. From Poland, where he had concealed himself, Tekeli issued forth to head the Hungarian malcontents, and he proved successful against the forces of Austria. Assisted by the armies of the Turks, and by the Transylvanians, he wished to assume the title of king, but the terror which he spread among the Imperialists did not further his views of ambition, nor promote a reconciliation with the emperor. He joined in the siege of Vienna with the vizier Mustapha; but though the disasters which happened were attributed to him by the suspicious Turk, he hastened to Adrianople to justify himself in the presence of the grand signior Mahomet, who assured him of his protection, and bestowed on him the principality of Transylvania. This was but an empty title, as the province was in the hands of the Austrians, and therefore, after a vain but gallant struggle against Heusler, the governor of the country, he retired from the contest, and lived in a private manner at Constantinople. He was a man of great courage, but though admired for his intrepidity, he wanted judgment, and that commanding presence of mind which often converts dangers into prosperous events in the career of the military hero. He died near Nicomedia, 13th September, 1705, aged 47.

TELFAIR, Edward, several years governor of Georgia, was one of the principal promoters of the revolution in that colony, and one of the committee appointed in 1774, to draw up resolutions to be adopted by the friends of liberty. In 1780 he was appointed delegate to congress. He was employed in various public stations during a long life, and died at Savannah, October 1807.

TELL, William, a celebrated Swiss, one of the heroes who restored liberty to their oppressed country in 1307. The conspiracy which he had formed with others was suspected, when the Austrian governor, Herman Gesler, more clearly to ascertain the spirit of the people, ordered a hat to be raised on a pole, and homage to be paid to it as to himself. Tell refused, and when seized for disobedience, was directed to shoot an arrow at an apple placed on the head of his own son, or else to be dragged with his child to immediate death. He cleft the apple in two without injuring his son, and declared that the other arrow which he had in his girdle was intended for the heart of the governor if he had hurt his child. This boldness occasioned his confinement, and the governor, afraid of a rescue, carried him across the lake of Lucern; but a violent storm obliged Gesler, who knew the nautical skill of his prisoner, to intrust to him the helm for his own preservation. Tell, freed from his fetters, steered the boat to a rock, still called by his name, leaped ashore, and escaped into the mountains. The governor afterwards was shot by the hand of Tell, and the Swiss, roused to arms by the conduct of their hero, drove away their Austrian masters, and established the independence of their country. Tell, forty-seven years after this great event, lost his life in an inundation at Burgein, 1354. His descendants became extinct in the male line in 1684, and in the female 1720.

TELLIER, Michael le, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 19th April, 1603. After filling various law offices about the court, he was in 1640 named intendant of Piedmont, and gained the favor of cardinal Mazarin, who recommended him to Louis XIII. as a proper person to be secretary of state. He displayed great abilities in this office, and during the political disputes which agitated France after the death of Louis XIII. he possessed the confidence of the queen mother and of the cardinal, and contributed much to the restoration of concord and reconciliation among the contending parties. Though he resigned in 1666 his office to his son, he yet continued in the cabinet, and in 1677 was made chancellor of the kingdom. It is to be lamented that his many services were disgraced by a particular hatred against the protestants, whom he represented to the monarch as suspicious subjects. By his influence with Louis XIV. the famous edict of Nantes was revoked, and the minister, triumphing in the cruel measures which he saw adopted, exclaimed profanely, "nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine, quia viderunt oculi mei salutare tuum." He died a few days after, 28th October, 1685, aged 83, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Bossuet. To great intrigue of character, and to deep dissimulation, he joined the imposing appearance of simple and austere manners, high talents for business, indefatigable application, and extensive knowledge.

TELLIER, Francis Michael le, marquis de Louvois, son of the chancellor of France, was born at Paris, January 18th 1641. The elevation of his father, as well as his own abilities, recommended him to notice; at the age of twenty-three he was made war minister, and in 1666, he became secretary of state. He was a great favorite at court, and after the death of Colbert in 1683, he was placed by Louis XIV. in the office of superintendent of buildings, arts, and manufactures. His attention was likewise directed to military affairs; he introduced more regular discipline into the army, supplied the magazines with provisions, and built the royal hospital of invalids. The consciousness, however, of his own abilities, rendered him proud and arrogant, and he even showed some marks of disrespect to his king. Louis, in consequence of this, treated him with coolness, and the ambitious and disappointed minister, returning home from the levee, died in his own apartment of vexation and grief, 16th July, 1691. Though at last unpopular in the court, he was a statesman of most splendid talents, who united for the glory of France, promptitude, secrecy, spirit, and magnanimous conduct. Madame de Sevigné has elegantly commented on his death in her letters to her daughter. The Testament Politique, published in his name, was written by Courtils.

TELLIER, Adrian, le, a lawyer of Melun, who was returned as deputy to the national assembly of France, and afterwards to the convention. He was in 1795, sent by the convention to Chartres, to encourage a more free circulation of the corn, but the disaffected raised a violent cry against him, and obliged him not only to sign a decree, to reduce bread to three sous the pound, but to proclaim it, in the public square, mounted on the back of an ass. This indignity had such an effect on the feelings of this honest deputy, that he shot himself on returning to his lodgings, leaving a paper by which he declared the decree which he had signed void, and hoped that no blood but his own might be shed to restore the public tranquillity.

TEMPLE, sir William, an eminent statesman, son of sir William Temple, master of the Rolls in Ireland, was born in London, 1629. He did not continue more than one year at the university, and then travelled through France, Holland, Flanders, and Germany, and returned to England in 1654. He lived in Ireland during the usurpation, devoted to studious pursuits and philosophy; but at the restoration he became a member of the Irish parliament. About 1663, he removed with his family to England, and then began to be employed as an active and penetrating negotiator. He was chiefly instrumental in forming the triple league in 1668, between England, Holland, and Sweden, and also by his means the marriage of the Lady Mary with the prince of Orange was effected. After spending twenty years in the affairs of the state, and in advancing her prosperity and consequence by his negotiations with foreign nations, he retired in 1680, from public life, and employed the rest of his time in literary pursuits, and in the cultivation of his grounds. But, though withdrawn from the intrigues of courts, his character for general information and for integrity, was too well known to be neglected; his advice and opinion were frequently consulted by the leading men of the nation, and even king William himself visited him to converse with him on political affairs. Sir William died at the end of 1700. Though universally respected as an able negotiator, sir William is censured, and with justice, by bishop Burnet, not only for his vanity and spleen, but for his irreligious and profane principles. The works of sir William are valuable, and consist of Memoirs of Public Affairs during his public employments—Letters—Miscellanies—Observations on the United Provinces of the Netherlands, 2 vols. folio.

TEMPLETON, Peter M.D., a physician born at Dorchester, Dorsetshire, 17th March, 1711, and educated at the Charter-house, from whence he went to Trinity college, Cambridge. After taking his first degrees, he went to Leyden, where for two years he studied medicine under Boerhaave, and other celebrated professors, and in 1739, returned to London. Though he settled in London with the intention to practise, yet he was of too indolent a disposition to succeed, and his fondness for literature, and the company of men of science and erudition, left him little time to pursue his original plan. In 1753 he was appointed keeper of the reading room of the British museum, which he resigned in 1760, when elected secretary to the new society of arts. He died of an asthma, 23d September, 1769. He was a man of great erudition, and published a translation of Norden's Travels in Egypt—Curious Remarks on Physic and Anatomy, extracted from the memoirs of the French academy of sciences,—besides some poetical pieces.

TENCIN, Peter, Guerin de, a native of Grenoble, who was educated at Paris, and embracing the ecclesiastical profession, became grand vicar of Sens. He went in 1721, with cardinal de Bissy to Rome, and after the election of Innocent XIII. to the popedom he remained in that capital as the envoy of France. His services were rewarded by the archbishopric of Embrun, and in 1739 he was raised to the purple, and soon after made archbishop of Lyons, and prime minister of France in the room of Fleury. This high distinction was not suited to the talents of the new cardinal, who, though he might possess the abilities or the intrigues necessary for an inferior station, was devoid of that firmness, that intelligence, and that unshaken integrity which should adorn the prime minister of a mighty empire. He retired soon after from the helm of affairs, and lived in privacy in his diocese, where he died 1753, aged 80.

TENCIN, Claudine Alexandrine Guersi de, sister of cardinal Tencin, was born at Grenoble, and took the religious habit at the monastery of Montfleuri. Tired of a religious life, she obtained the pope's permission to quit it, and she came to Paris, and launched into all the extravagances and foibles of the gay world. In consequence of the death of la Fresnaye, a counsellor of state, who was said to be murdered in her chamber, she was thrust into the Chatelet prison, and then into the Bastile, from which she was liberated soon after. She died at Paris, 1749, advanced in years. She wrote the Siege of Calais, a romance of merit—Memoirs of Comminges—and les Malheurs de l'Amour.

TENISON, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, 29th September, 1636, and educated at Norwich school, from which he went to Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. Here he became fellow, and took his degrees regularly, and in the first part of his life, during the prevalence of fanaticism, he studied physic, but afterwards applied to divinity. He was presented to the rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, by lord Manchester, and in 1680 he obtained the vicarage of St. Martin in the fields, London. During the reign of Charles II. and his successor, he was an active and zealous writer against popery, and in consequence of his services in favor of the revolution, he was made archdeacon of London by William, 1689, and in 1691 nominated to the see of Lincoln, and on the death of Tillotson, 1694, promoted to Canterbury. Distinguished as a parish priest by his benevolence and liberality, and an assiduous care of his Christian calling, he continued, at the head of the church, the same zeal, mingled with moderation, firmness, and exemplary piety. He died at Lambeth, 14th December, 1715, about one year after his wife, daughter of Dr. Love, of Benet college. He published some sermons—the Creed of Hobbes examined, &c.—Baconiani, or Remains of sir Francis Bacon, 8vo.—some tracts.

TENNANT, Smithson, an eminent chemist, was born, in 1761, at Selby, in Yorkshire; studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Cambridge in 1796, but never practised; became a member of the Royal Society in his twenty-fourth year; was chosen professor of Chemistry at Cambridge in 1813; and was killed, by a fall from his horse at Boulogne, February 22, 1815. He contributed many valuable papers to the Philosophical Transactions. Among his discoveries are, the mode of effecting a double distillation by the same heat; the true nature of carbonic acid gas, and of the diamond; and two new metals, iridium and osmium.

TENNENT, John, a distinguished physician, and author of an essay on the Pleurisy, which was published at Williamsburg, Virginia, 1736. Dr. Tennent supposed that Pleurisy was caused by a diseased state of the blood, similar to that produced by the bite of the rattlesnake; he therefore supposed that the Seneca Snakeroot, which was a well known antidote to the venom of the snake, might be advantageously used as a cure for the pleurisy.

TENNENT, William, a native of Ireland, emigrated to this country in 1713, and was admitted into the synod of the Presbyterian Church, at Philadelphia. After spending a few years in New York, and Bensalem in Pennsylvania, he was settled, in 1726, as pastor over a small presbyterian church at Neshaning, about twenty miles from Philadelphia. In this place he established a seminary, where his own sons, four in number, together with many others, who afterwards became distinguished ministers of the gospel, were instructed in classical and theological learning. He was an eminent teacher, and pious minister; of great simplicity of character; and after a life devoted to the duties of his profession, rested from his labors, with the satisfaction of having contributed, in no small degree, to the prosperity of the churches with which he had been associated. His death occurred in 1743.

TENNENT, Gilbert, the son of the preceding, was born in Ireland, February 5th, 1703, and accompanied his father to America. After receiving a good classical education, he commenced the study of medicine; but anxious in spiritual matters, he applied himself to theology, and in 1726, was ordained minister of the Presbyterian church in New Brunswick, New Jersey. His preaching was, for a time, blessed with happy results; but unmerited contumely, and scandalous imputations on his moral character, induced him, after a few years, to relinquish his charge. He then travelled for several months in New England, preaching to crowded audiences, and with great acceptance. In 1743 the followers of the celebrated Whitefield established a church in Philadelphia, over which Mr. Tennent was called to preside. Here he remained several years, and gave great satisfaction; but was prevailed upon, in 1753, to visit England to solicit aid for the college at Princeton, in New Jersey. He died in 1765. His character was that of a just man, fearlessly contending for what he believed to be the truth; calling no man, master. As a controversialist, he was, probably inferior to no one of his time; and his writings, which were numerous, rank high in the theological literature of that day. The following list comprises the most important of his printed works. The peace of Jerusalem; the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees considered; a sermon on justification; remarks upon a protestation to the synod, 1741; the examiner examined, or Gilbert Tennent harmonious, in answer to a pamphlet, entitled the examiner; 3 sermons, on holding fast the truth; at the ordination of C. Beatty, 1743; on the victory of the British arms; 2 sermons at Philadelphia; on account of a revival of religion, 1744; on the success of the expedition against Louisburg; discourses on several subjects 12mo. 1745; on the lawfulness of defensive war, 1747; on the consistency of defensive war with true christianity; defensive war defended; a fast sermon; on the holy sacrament; a thanksgiving sermon; the propitiary sacrifice of Christ; at the opening of the presbyterian church; and sermons on important subjects, adapted to the present state of the British nation, 8vo. 1758.

TENNENT, William, son of the Rev., William Tennent, was born in Ireland, June 3, 1705. When thirteen years of age, he accompanied his family to this country; and received his education under the care of his father and brother Gilbert. While pursuing his theological studies with the latter, his application was so intense, that his health declined, and his early dissolution was expected. In this state, he had a fit, in which he apparently expired. His funeral solemnities were about to be performed; when a young friend, of the medical profession, on examining the body, felt an unusual warmth; and prevailed on the brother to defer the interment for three days. The body was restored to a warm bed, and every application used to effect resuscitation, but in vain. The mourners again assembled, to discharge the last solemn offices, and when the moment had just arrived for removing the corpse from the house, fresh indications of vitality were presented. The funeral was once more postponed; new efforts were used, and in a few hours, Mr. Tennent awoke, as it were, from the sleep of death. His recovery was very slow, and it was many months before his faculties were perfectly restored. He stated to his friends, that after his apparent decease he found himself in Heaven, when he beheld a glory, and heard such sounds, as mortal eye had not seen, nor ear heard; and when about to join the heavenly host, one said to him, "you must return to earth!" at that moment, he awoke. For many years those sounds ceased not from his ears; and the glories which he had witnessed, led him to regard all sublunary affairs, as vanity. In October, 1733, he was ordained to the ministry at Freehold, New Jersey. In this situation he experienced much embarrassment in his pecuniary affairs; but having married a respectable lady in New York, in whom he truly found a help-meet, his worldly affairs prospered; and the residue of his life was passed in great usefulness to the people of his charge, as well as to his fellow-citizens generally. He died at an advanced age, at Freehold, March 3, 1777. He was a profound scholar, and well versed in theology; and was a fearless advocate of the civil and religious rights of his country.

TENNEY, Samuel, M. D. was born at Byfield, Massachusetts; and having received a collegiate education at Harvard University, applied himself to the study of medicine. When the revolution commenced, he was found among the assertors of his country's rights; and was present at the battle of Bunker's Hill, where he was employed in attending upon the wounded. He served during the whole war, and was attached to the Rhode Island line of the provincial army. At the close of the war, he retired from his profession, and settled at Exeter, New Hampshire. For many years he was Judge of Probate; and in 1800, was elected a member of the congress of the United States. His death, which occurred in 1816 was universally regretted. An ardent lover of his country; a faithful expounder of her laws and institutions; an elegant scholar, and more than all, an humble christian; his memory is still fondly cherished by many, who derived no small portion of their social happiness from his intercourse and friendship.

TENTZELIUS, William Ernest, a native of Arnstadt, Thuringia. He devoted himself to literature, and struggled with unusual resignation against the evils of poverty. He died 1707, aged 49. He wrote Saxonia Numismatica, 4 vols. 4to.—Supplementum Historiæ Gothanæ, 3 vols. 4to. works of great merit.

TERENCE, or TERENTIUS, Publius, a Latin comic writer, is believed to have been a native of Carthage, and to have been born about B. C. 192. Being taken a captive to Rome, he was sold to Terentius Lucanus who gave him a good education, and enfranchised him. He was in his twenty-fifth year when he brought out his first play. His talents acquired for him illustrious friends, among whom were Scipio and Lælius. He quitted Rome when he was thirty-five, and is supposed to have perished at sea in a storm. Of his admirable comedies only six are extant.

TERRASSON, John, a French writer, born at Lyons 1670, and admitted into the congregation of the oratory, which he afterwards left. By the friendship of Bignon, he procured a place in the academy of sciences 1707, and in 1721 was elected professor of the college royal in Greek, Latin, and philosophy. He died 1750, respected, according to Voltaire, as a good practical philosopher. He wrote a dissertation against the Iliad, 2 vols. 12mo. during the dispute between la Motte, and Madame Dacier, about Homer.—Sethos, a learned political and moral romance, translated into English—a translation of Diodorus Siculus into French, with notes and prefaces, an excellent work in 7 vols. 12mo.—Reflections in favor of Law's Mississippi Project.

TERRAY, Joseph Marie, a native of Boen near Roanne, who by his merits rose to places of honor and trust in the French government. He was made comptroller general, minister of state, and director-general of buildings; and in times of difficulty he maintained his character of integrity, loyalty, and patriotism. He recommended to the monarch, not the laying of fresh taxes on the already overloaded people, but to suppress abuses, to introduce reform and economy, and to make the expenses equal to the resources of the state. He retired in 1774 from public affairs, respected by the virtuous, but hated by those who live upon the distresses of the public, and grow rich by the profusion and the extravagance of the government. He died at Paris, 18th February 1778, aged 63. His collection Des Comptes Rendus, from 1753 to 1787, has been published. His nephew, who was intendant of Lyons, was dragged with his wife to the guillotine, at Paris, 1793, on the accusation that he had suffered his children to emigrate and to bear arms against the republic.

TERTRE, Francis Joachim Duport du, a French writer, born at St. Maloes' 1715. He was of the society of Jesuits, among whom he was professor of the learned languages. He died 1759. He wrote an Abridgment of the history of England, 3 vols. 12mo. a work of some merit—an history of famous Conspiracies, 10 vols. 12mo.—abridgment of the History of Spain, 5 vols. 12mo.—L'Almanach des Beaux Arts.

TERTRE, John Baptist, a native of Calais, who after serving his country in the military and naval service, became a Dominican, and set out as missionary into America. After a zealous discharge of his mission, he returned to Europe 1653, and died at Paris 1687. He wrote a general history of the Antilles belonging to the French, 4 vols. 4to. 1667, and 1671, a work accurate, though not elegantly written. There was a Jesuit of that name, Rodolphus, a native of Alencon, who died 1762, aged 95. He was author of some works on religious subjects, and refuted Malebranche's Metaphysics.

TERTULLIAN, Quintus Septimus Florens, one of the most learned men of the primitive church, was born, about 160, at Carthage. Originally a bitter enemy of the Christian faith, he was converted by witnessing the firmness of the martyrs, became a priest, and was thenceforth one of the most eloquent defenders of the doctrines which he had despised. Late in life he adopted the opinions of the Montanists, and afterwards formed a sect of his own. He died about 245. Among his works are, An Apology for the Christians; a Treatise against the Jews; and the five books against Marcion.

TESTI, Fulvio, an Italian poet, born at Ferrara. He became prime minister to Francis duke of Modena, but after enjoying the favor of his master he fell under his displeasure, and ended his days in confinement in a fortress, 1646. He wrote odes and other poems, printed Venice, 1656, 2 vols. 12mo. He was a successful imitator of the best writers of Greece and Rome, and was called by his countrymen the Italian Horace.

TESTZEL, John, a native of Pirn, on the Elbe. He became a Dominican, and was empowered by the archbishop of Mayence, to publish the indulgences granted by pope Leo X. for the completion of St. Peter's church at Rome. The zeal with which this holy father executed his commission, drew upon him the attacks of Luther, and at last became the cause of the reformation. Not only in the monasteries, but in taverns and even brothels, these indulgences for the remission of sins were to be bought, and whoever contributed to the filling of the purse of the holy see might be permitted to riot in the greatest debauchery, and even, as Testzal said, might offer violence to the holy virgin, and be forgiven by the power of the pope, whose arms were equal to the cross of Christ. When this bigoted preacher was reproached by Miltinius, as being the cause of all the disasters of the church in Germany, he was so afflicted with the imputation that he died of a broken heart, 1519.

THACHER, Thomas, Rev., the son of Rev. Peter Thacher, of Old Sarum, was born in England, May 1st, 1620, and arrived in America, June 4th, 1635. He studied divinity with Chauncey, afterwards President of Harvard College; and was ordained minister of Weymouth, near Boston, January 2d, 1644. A new church having been established in Boston, Mr. Thacher was invited to become the minister, and was installed February 16, 1670. He died October, 15, 1678. Mr. Thacher was esteemed in his day, as a scholar of no ordinary attainments, especially in some of the oriental languages. He composed a Lexicon of the Hebrew Language; and was supposed to be the best Arabic scholar in the country. As a preacher he was eloquent and devout; and to his other acquirements, added a competent knowledge of medicine. His publications were, a fast sermon, 1674; and a brief rule to guide the common people in the small-pox and measles, 1677, which reached to a second edition, in 1702.

THACHER, Peter, the son of the preceding, was born at Salem in 1651, and graduated at Harvard College, in 1671. Before devoting himself to the duties of the ministry, he visited England, and formed many valuable acquaintances, particularly with some of the most eminent divines of the day. He was ordained the first minister of Milton, in Massachusetts, June 1st, 1691. His pulpit performances were spoken of as promising extraordinary interest; and his parochial intercourse was greatly enhanced, by the peculiar suavity and sanctity of his deportment. Like his father, he could minister to the bodily ailment, as well as to the mind diseased; and he yearly expended a considerable portion of his salary in the purchase of medicines and other necessaries for the sick and needy. He died suddenly December 17, 1727, at the advanced age of 76. The most important of his publications, are, unbelief detected, and condemned, 1708; Election sermon, 1711; Christ's forgiveness, a pattern; on the death of Samuel Mann, 1719; He that is weak, is strong, 1723; and, the perpetual covenant.

THACHER, Peter, one of the early scholars and divines of New England, was born in Boston in 1678, and was educated at Harvard College where he received a degree in 1696. After leaving college, he taught a school at Hatfield, which he afterwards relinquished, to become the minister of Weymouth. In this place he remained several years, when he was invited to become the colleague with the Rev. Mr. Webb, in the new north church in Boston; and was installed January 27, 1720. Mr. Thacher was endued with a powerful mind, and a creative genius; and was distinguished for those traits of character which most eminently belong to the christian minister. He died February 26, 1739, aged 61. His only printed sermons, were, on the general election, 1726; and on the death of Mrs. Gee.

THACHER, Peter, son of Rev. Peter Thacher of Milton, was born October 6, 1688. Having graduated at Harvard College, he preached on probation two years at Middleborough, and was then ordained to the pastoral office, in that town, November 2, 1709. His labors were attended with great success; at one period of his ministry, no less than two hundred communicants being added to his church within the space of three years. His life and conversation were strictly consistent with his sacred profession; and he has left behind him a character in nowise inferior to the greatest and best of his time. He died April 22, 1744, aged 55. Prince's Christian History contains an account of the Revival of Religion in Middleborough, written by Mr. Thacher.

THACHER, Oxenbridge, was born at Boston in 1725, and received his education at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1738. He was a representative to the General Court from the town of Boston. He had the reputation of being a ripe scholar, and well versed in political economy, as it was understood at that period. He was the author of a pamphlet on the gold coin, 1760; and the sentiments of a British American, occasioned by the act to lay certain duties in the British colonies, 1764. He died July 8th, 1765, aged 45.

THACHER, Peter, D.D., the son of Oxenbridge Thacher of Boston, was born March 21, 1752. Having completed his education at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1769, he prepared for the ministry, and was ordained pastor of the congregational church in Malden, September 19, 1770. He was soon distinguished for his eloquence and fervor; and crowded audiences hung, delighted, upon his words. Nor was it only in the sanctuary, that his voice was heard, or his influence felt. Like many of the clergy of the day, he stirred up his people to the defence of their dearest rights, against the usurpation of the mother country. In the convention which framed the constitution of Massachusetts, in 1780, he was a delegate from the town of Malden, and took a conspicuous part in the debates of that august body. In January 1785, Doctor Thacher was invited to the pastoral care of the church in Brattle-street, Boston, and was installed on the 12th of that month, as successor to Rev. Doctor Cooper. His labors continued to increase; and his health and strength being exhausted, he was induced to try the more genial climate of the south; but in vain. He died at Savannah, December 16, 1802, aged 50. The necessary brevity of our notices prevents our doing that justice to Doctor Thacher's character, which his wisdom, piety, and excellence, deserve. It is not, however, too much to say, that amongst the host of men of genius and learning, with whom he was contemporary, none surpassed him in depth and vigor of thought, or purity and elegance of style. In the endearing intercourse which he maintained with the people of his charge, his affability and kindness won all hearts, and in the chamber of sickness, or by the bed of death, his devotions and exhortations were deeply solemn and impressive. His printed works were numerous, and consisted chiefly of sermons, and theological dissertations; viz. a discourse against standing armies, 1776; on the death of Andrew Eliot, 1778; three sermons on the eternity of future punishment, 1782; observations on the state of the clergy in New England, 1783; a reply to strictures upon the preceding; on the death of J. Paine, 1788, of Governor Bowdoin, 1791; of Governor Hancock, 1793; of Samuel Stillman, Jr., 1794; of Thomas Russell, and N. Gorham, 1796; of Doctor Clarke, and Rebecca Gill, 1798; of Governor Sumner, 1799; of Washington, 1800; at the ordination of E. Kellogg, 1798; of W. F. Rowland, 1790; at the ordination of his son, T. C. Thacher, 1794; memoirs of Doctor Boylston, 1789; sermon before the Massachusetts Congregational Charitable Society, 1795; before a society of Freemasons, 1797; at the artillery election, 1798; a century sermon, 1799.

THACHER, Thomas, Rev., was the son of Oxenbridge Thacher, and minister of the congregational church in Dedham. He was a sound scholar and an elegant writer; and was justly esteemed as a pious and devoted minister of the gospel. He was educated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1775. He published several sermons, among which are, one on benevolence, 1784; on the annual thanksgiving, 1795; on the death of N. Robbins, 1795; of Washington, 1800; of J. Fairbanks, 1801; of Samuel Adams, 1804; at Christmas, 1799; at the ordination of E. Dunbar; of Joseph Tuckerman; before the Human Society, 1800; century sermon, 1800; Duddleian Lecture, 1805; at the dedication of Milton Academy, 1807; annual fast; character of Doctor West, 1808. He died October 19, 1812, aged 56.

THACHER, Samuel Cooper, Rev., son of the Rev. Peter Thacher, D.D., was born December 14th, 1785. Having finished his education at Harvard College, at which institution he graduated in 1804, he visited Europe in company with Rev. Mr. Buckminster, and added greatly to his stock of knowledge, by an attentive observance of men and manners. When the Rev. Doctor Kirkland was called to the presidency of Harvard University, Mr. Thacher was invited to become his successor, and was ordained on the 15th May, 1811. His health which had long been delicate, was unequal to the care of a large and flourishing parish; he accordingly obtained permission to travel, with the hope that the milder climate of southern Europe, might eventually restore him to health and usefulness. His constitution, however, was too much impaired to benefit by the experiment; and he fell a victim to consumption, at Moulins, in France, January 2d, 1818, aged 32. Mr. Thacher was a fine scholar, well versed in the classics and belles lettres; his writings, which were numerous, and consisted principally of reviews and contributions to the periodical literature of the day, were noted for purity of style, elegance of diction, and depth of research. As a preacher he was fervent and impressive, commanding the fixed and delighted attention of his hearers. His early death was equally regretted by the people of his charge, and by all, who had the happiness of being associated with him in social intercourse, or in the numerous literary and charitable institutions of which he was a member.

THALES, a famous philosopher of Miletus, who improved himself by travelling, and deserved to be the first of the seven wise men. He first observed the apparent diameter of the sun, and divided the year into three hundred and sixty-five days. He also was able to predict eclipses, and died B.C. 545.

THELLUSSON, Peter, a native of Geneva, who settled as a merchant in London, where he acquired, by his industry and labor, an enormous fortune. He died at his seat at Plastow, Kent, 21st July, 1797, leaving three sons and three daughters. From an ambitious desire of posthumous fame, he left his property in an extraordinary manner. To his wife and children he left about £100,000, and the rest, amounting to upwards of £500,000 he leaves to trustees to accumulate till the male children of his sons and grandsons are dead. This distant period may extend to one hundred and twenty years, in which case the property will then amount to one hundred and forty millions, and if then he should have no lineal descendants, this astonishing property is to go to the use of the country for the benefit of the sinking fund. This extraordinary will was disputed by his surviving family, but it was affirmed by a solemn decree of chancery, though afterwards an act was passed, by the means of chancellor Rosslyn, to prevent the recurrence of so extravagant a desire of private accumulation.

THEMISTOCLES, an illustrious Athenian general. He was brave in war, and in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, his prudence and perseverance contributed to the naval battle and victory of Salamis. After strengthening and improving the resources of his country, he was treated with suspicion and ingratitude by his fellow citizens, and sought an asylum in the territories of his Persian enemies. He died at Magnesia 449 B. C. aged 65.

THEOBALD, Lewis, the editor of Shakspeare, was born at Sittingbourne, Kent, and educated at Islington. He studied the law, which he soon relinquished for poetry. He was for some time engaged in the Censor published in Mist's journal, and by his severe censure on the wits of the age drew down their resentment upon his own head. Pope made him the hero of his Dunciad, but afterwards bestowed the honor on another character. He, in 1720, introduced on the stage the Double Falsehood as the production of Shakspeare, which was attacked by Pope and other critics. He wrote in 1726, Shakspeare Restored, and besides above twenty dramatic pieces of little merit. He is chiefly known as the editor of Shakspeare's plays, 8 vols. labors which, though abused by some critics, and especially Warburton, are not devoid of merit. He died 1742.

THEOCRITUS, a famous Greek poet of Syracuse, patronised by Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote Idyllia, in a very interesting style of sweetness and simplicity, besides epigrams.

THEODATUS, king of the Goths, was placed on the throne of Italy by his aunt Amalasona, whom he married, and afterwards destroyed. He was defeated by Belisarius, the general of Justinian, and then put to death by his own soldiers, A. D. 536.

THEODORE, king of Corsica, was son of Anthony, baron de Newhoff and de Stein, in Westphalia. He was born 1696 at Metz, where his father then held an office at the court of Lorraine, having left his country in consequence of marrying a merchant's daughter against the wishes of his family. Young Theodore was for some time in the suit of baron Gortz, the Swedish minister, but after his execution he left the Swedish for the Spanish service. He afterwards visited France, Holland, and England, and in 1736 landed in Corsica, while the inhabitants of that island were in a state of rebellion against their tyrannical masters, the Genoese. His character for boldness and enterprise was such that he was treated with unusual respect by the heads of the insurrection, and as he had brought with him supplies of arms and money, he was soon regarded as the future deliverer of the oppressed Corsicans, and solemnly declared king of the island, 15th April, 1736. In this new capacity he displayed great vigor; though denounced as a traitor by the Genoese, he collected an army of twenty-five thousand men, and laid siege to Bastia, which he took. Assistance from abroad was also expected, to give weight and consequence to his measures: and to render his power more united, he established a military order, called the Order of Deliverance, but his popularity at last began to vanish when the promised succors from France and England did not arrive. His subjects grew dissatisfied, and threatened to reduce him to a private station ; but Theodore, not trusting to the negotiations of ambassadors, determined in person to solicit the crowned heads of Europe for assistance, and after appointing a regency of forty-seven to manage the public affairs in his absence, he left the island. He now travelled in disguise ; but when he reached Paris, he was ordered to leave the kingdom ; and after retiring to Amsterdam, where he met with some protection, he embarked for the Mediterranean, but was soon after seized at Naples, and imprisoned in the fortress of Cueta. His circumstances were now so desperate, that when he regained his liberty, he could not venture to visit his subjects, but fled to England for an asylum. His creditors prosecuted him also in England, and in the midst of his distresses, though a charitable contribution was made for his relief, he was thrown into the king's-bench prison, from which in 1756 he extricated himself, by the privilege of an act of insolvency, after registering his kingdom for the benefit of his creditors at Guildhall. He died soon after, December 11, 1756.

THEODORET, a father of the church, deposed from his bishopric by the council of Ephesus, but restored by the assembly of Chalcedon. He died about 460. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, lives of saints, and commentaries.

THEODORIC, first king of the Goths in Italy, was the natural son of Theodimir, king of the Ostrogoths. He was given up as an hostage by Welamir, his father's brother, to the emperor Leo I., 461, and he distinguished himself by the importance of his services to Zeno, who had been driven from his throne by Basiliscus. He became consul 484, and was sent by the emperor to Italy, against Odoacer, whom he defeated and put to death. Thus become master of all Italy, he strengthened his power by marrying, in 509, the sister of Clovis, king of France, and by making a treaty of alliance with Anastasius, emperor of the East, and with the Vandals of Africa. In the enjoyment of peace he devoted himself to the improvement of his dominions, and to the happiness of his people, and his noble plans were warmly and ably seconded by his active secretary, the celebrated Cassiodorus. New edifices were raised to beautify Rome ; her walls were repaired, and Pavia and Ravenna also equally shared the kindness of their munificent prince. While, however, he promoted commerce, encouraged the arts, and patronised literature, Theodorice grew suspicious and cruel, and he caused to be put to death Symmachus and Boethius, two of the most illustrious of his subjects. This inhumanity, it is said preyed upon his mind, and he died soon after, under the severest tortures of conscience, 30th August 526.

THEODOSIUS, a noble Roman, raised for his valor and services, to a share of the imperial throne, by Gratian. When sole emperor he waged successful war against the Goths ; but he disgraced himself in causing the people of Thessalonica to be put to the sword, a cruel action which drew down upon him the censures of St. Ambrose, and exclusion from the church till he made due atonement for the crime. He afterwards defeated the barbarians that invaded Thrace, and proved equally fortunate in his war against Maximus and Eugenius. He died at Milan, 395.

THEODOSIUS II., grandson of the preceding, succeeded his father Arcadius on the imperial throne, 408. Though a weak prince, he defeated the Persians on the borders of the Euphrates ; but in his expedition against the Huns, he was obliged to purchase a dubious peace. He married Endocia, the daughter of the philosopher Leontius, and died 450.

THEODOTUS, a tanner of Byzantium, who abandoned the Christian faith to save his life, under the persecution of M. Aurelius. His apostacy drew down upon him the censures of the church, and in consequence he became the founder of a new sect, which denied the divinity of Christ. Another of that name became the head of the Melchisedeckians, who supported that the Messiah was inferior to Melchisedeck.

THEOPHANES, George, a native of Constantinople, known as an historian, and as an ecclesiastic at the seventh general council. He was banished into Samothrace by the jealousy of Leo the Armenian, and died there 819. He is author of a chronicle, extending from the period where Syncellus finishes, to the reign of Michael Curopalatus, of which the best edition is that of the Louvre, 1655, folio.

THEOPHANES, Prokopowitch, a Russian historian of eminence, born at Kiof, 9th June, 1681. After studying under his uncle, the rector of a convent school, the learned languages, he went to Rome, where he imbibed a taste for the fine arts, and works of genius. He returned to Kiof, and assumed the monastic habit, and became professor of philosophy. He was noticed by Peter the Great, attended him in his campaigns, and, under his direction, was employed in reforming the clergy, and abolishing the patriarchal dignity. His services were duly rewarded ; he was made bishop of Plescof, and under Catherine, raised to the dignity of metropolitan of all Russia, as the archbishop of Novogorod. He died 1736. Besides sermons, disquisitions, and a treatise on rhetoric, he wrote a Life of Peter the Great, which terminates at the battle of Pultowa, a most candid and valuable performance.

THEOPHILUS, archbishop of Antioch, the first who used the word Trinity, to express the three persons in the Godhead. He flourished in the second century, and wrote a Defence of Christianity.

THEOPHRASTUS, a celebrated Greek philosopher, was born, B. C. 371, at Eresus, in Lesbos. He was a disciple of Plato and of Aristotle, the latter of whom he succeeded, and with splendid success, in the Lyceum. Twice he was persecuted by his enemies, but, in both instances, he eventually triumphed. He died in his eighty-fifth year. Of all his numerous works time has spared only a Treatise on Stones ; parts of his Characters, and of a History of Animals ; and some fragments quoted by other authors.

THERAMENES, an Athenian philosopher, one of the thirty tyrants appointed over Athens by Sparta. He was condemned to death by Critias, because he refused to assent to the violent and cruel measures of his colleagues, and took poison, B. C. 403.

THERMES, Paul de la Barthe, lord of, a native of Couserans, who early devoted himself to arms, and served under Francis I. and his two successors. The victory of Cerisoles, in 1544, was attributed to his great valor, and he acquired fresh glory at the taking of Saluces and Ravel. He afterwards passed into Scotland, to invade the English territories, and in 1551, was sent as ambassador to Rome, and soon after he headed the French forces in Italy. His capture of Dunkirk, and of St. Venox, was followed by his defeat at the battle of Gravelines, in which he was taken prisoner. The peace of 1559 set him at liberty, and he died at Paris, 6th May, 1562, aged 80, without posterity.

THESPIS, a Greek poet of Attica, called the inventor of tragedy, B. C. 536. His theatre was a cart dragged from town to town, where two men with besmeared faces entertained the people with uncouth dialogues and rustic songs.

THEVENOT, Melchisedec, librarian to the king of France, was born in Paris, 1621. He was actuated, from his youth, with the strongest desire of seeing foreign countries, and from the voyages published by others, as well as from his own personal observations, he gave to the world his voyages and travels. His account of an Instrument for ascertaining the longitude, and the declination of the needle, is considered as the best part of these books. Thevenot was, for some time, ambassador of France, at Constantinople, and also assisted at the conclave assembled after the death of Innocent X., and was afterwards envoy at Genoa. He died of a slow fever, October 1691. He was a curious collector of rare and valuable books and manuscripts, but the most noble part of his library, was the marbles presented to him by M. Nointel, with bas reliefs, and inscriptions, two thousand years old. His travels have been translated into English. He wrote also the Art of Swimming, 12mo.

THICKNESSE, Philip, born in 1720, was the son of a clergyman, and entered in the army when young, and served in the West Indies; on his return to England he obtained a captain's commission. He then married a lady of French extraction, expecting an ample fortune; but his views were disappointed, and becoming a widower, entered again into matrimony with lady Elizabeth Touchet, heiress of the ancient barony of Audley. Her fortune enabled him to purchase the lieutenant-governorship of Landguard Fort; but the union involved him in family disputes, and contributed by no means to his happiness. About 1761 Mr. Thicknesse lost his second consort; and on her only son succeeding to the title and estate of his mother, a disagreement took place between him and his father, who laid his grievances before the public in a pamphlet, entitled Queries to Lord Audley, 8vo. He seems to have indulged what Dr. Johnson calls, 'the triumph of hope over experience,' with regard to matrimony. The year after he became a widower, he married the daughter of Mr. Ford, a solicitor, who long survived him. [See the next article.] By this lady he had several children, the difficulty of providing for whom induced him to retire first to Wales, and afterwards to the continent. Having travelled through France, Italy and Spain, he returned home, and resided again in Wales, and at Bath. Shortly after the beginning of the Revolution in France, Mr. Thicknesse went abroad, intending to settle in Italy; but he died of apoplexy while travelling near Boulogne, in 1792. Among his numerous and eccentric works are Man-midwifery analysed, and the tendency of that practice detected and exposed, 1765, 4to.; A year's Journey through France and part of Spain, 1777, 2 vols. 8vo.; The new prose Bath Guide, 1778, 8vo.; The Valetudinarian's Bath Guide, or the Means of obtaining long Life and Health, 1780, 8vo.; A year's Journey through the Pays Bas and Austrian Netherlands, 1786, 8vo.; A sketch of the Life of Thomas Gainsborough, 1788, 8vo.; and Memoirs and Anecdotes of Philip Thicknesse, late Lieutenant-Governor of Landguard Fort, and unfortunately father to George Touchet, Baron Audley, 1788, 2 vols. 8vo.

THICKNESSE, Mrs. Anne, an authoress of considerable accomplishments, was born in the Temple, February 22, 1737. Her talents and personal attractions having early introduced her into the world of fashion, she gave three concerts at the opera-house on her own account, having left her father's house abruptly in consequence of his endeavoring to force her into marriage. By this step she is said to have realized £1,500, and acquiring the patronage of lady Betty Thicknesse, became domesticated in her family. On the death of this lady, governor Thicknesse offered her his hand, which she accepted, and above three hundred persons were present at the wedding. During a union of thirty years she accompanied her husband on various journeys to the continent; and was with him at his death, in 1792, which took place in his carriage. The French Revolution had now commenced, and Mrs. Thicknesse, with several other English ladies, was imprisoned and narrowly escaped the guillotine; Robespierre having sent an order for their execution. On her liberation she returned to England, and ended a long life at her house in the Edgeware Road, January 20, 1824. She was the personal friend of many of the wits of the last generation. Her principal works are Biographical Sketches of Literary Females of the French Nation, 3 vols. 12mo. 1778, and a novel entitled the School of Fashion, 2 vols. 8vo. 1800.

THIERRY I., king of France, third son of Clovis II., ascended the throne of Neustria, and Burgundy, 670, by the interest of Ebroin, the mayor of the palace, by whom he suffered himself to be governed. He was defeated at Testri in Vermandois, by Pepin, of Austrasia, and he died four years after, 691, aged 39. He is called by Henault, the third of that name.

THIERRY II., or IV. son of Dagobert III. was taken from a cloister, to ascend the throne of France. He was a king only in name, as his minister Charles Martel governed the kingdom at pleasure. He died 737, aged 25.

THIERRY I., son of Clovis I. obtained as his share of the kingdom of France, the kingdom of Austrasia, of which he made Metz the capital. The best part of his reign was occupied in repelling the invasion of the Danes, and in quarrels with his brother Childebert, king of Paris. He died 534, aged about 51, after a reign of twenty-three years.

THIERRY II., second son of Childebert, was king of Burgundy and Austrasia. He was engaged in disputes with his brother Theodebert, in consequence of the intrigues of his mother-in-law, Brunehaut, and at last he took him prisoner, and suffered him to be cruelly put to death. He was afterwards reconciled to Brunehaut, at whose instigation, he had disgraced himself by the murder of his brother, but this inhuman princess, soon after, caused him to be poisoned, 613.

THIERS, John Baptist, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Chartres, 1536. He was professor of belles lettres at Paris, and afterwards curate of Vibray, in the Mans, and of Champrond, in the diocese of Chartres. He died February 28, 1703. He wrote a treatise on Superstitions, concerning the Sacraments—de Fastorum Dierum Immunitione Liber—and other things, besides the History of Perukes, a curious book in which he says the year 1629 was the epoch of Perukes in France, and that no clergyman wore them before 1660.

THIRLBY, Styan, LL.D., an able critic, born at Leicester, 1692. He was of Jesus college, Cambridge, but the most promising abilities were clouded by great indolence of disposition, a quarrelsome temper, and a strong fondness for intemperate drinking. He studied physic, and afterwards applied himself to the civil law, and then the common law, but with this he soon grew dissatisfied, and at last obtained a sinecure place of about £100 a year as king's waiter in the port of London, by the interest of his friend sir Edward Walpole, who had been his pupil. For some time he resided in the house of his friend, but he rendered himself disagreeable by keeping a journal of whatever he observed or heard in the family, incompatible with his unsocial ideas, and he spent the remainder of his life in private lodgings, where he died, December 19, 1753. He wrote some notes on Shakspeare's plays, which appear in Johnson's edition, but he is chiefly known as the author of an able tract against Whiston on the Trinity, and as the publisher of a valuable edition of Justin's works, fol. 1723, the dedication to which is considered as a masterly production.

THIRLWALL, Thomas, an episcopal clergyman and theological writer, who was a native of Yorkshire. He studied at Brazenose college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. in 1736. Having been ordained he became curate of Trinity church, in the Minories, London, afterwards curate and lecturer of Stepney, and at length rector of Bower's Gifford in Essex. At one period he was an active public character and distinguished as a speaker at the East India House, the Middlesex election, and on other occasions; and he was also a county magistrate. Besides single sermons and tracts, he published Diatessaron, seu Integra Historia D. N. Jesu Christi, Latine, ex Quatuor Evangeliiis, 1803, 12mo.; 2d edition, 1815. In 1817 he attracted public notice by his Vindication of the Magistrates of the Tower Division, from Charges contained in the Report of a Committee of the House of Commons; which being considered as interfering with the privilege of parliament, Mr. Thirlwall was obliged to make an apology to the house. He died March 17, 1827.

THOMAS, William, D. D., bishop of Worcester, was born at Bristol, 2d February 1613. He was educated at Caernarthen school, and then entered at St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed to Jesus, of which society he became fellow. He was then chaplain to the earl of Northumberland, from whom he obtained the vicarage of Laugharn, and Lansedurnen rectory, and during the troublesome times of civil war, he continued here to discharge his duties, and became an active and benevolent parish priest. At last, however, he was deprived of his living by the parliament, and had in consequence to struggle with many difficulties and with poverty, till the restoration replaced him in the confidence of the government and the possession of his living. He was afterwards chaplain to the duke of York, and made dean of Worcester 1665, and in 1677, raised to the see of St. David's. In this diocese he rendered himself popular by his affability and attention, he often preached in Welsh, and gained the good opinion of his clergy, but his attempts to remove the cathedral of his diocese from the unfrequented town of St. David's, to the more populous and commercial town of Caernarthen, proved abortive. In 1683, he was translated to Worcester, where he behaved with exemplary attention towards his clergy, and promoted the prosperity of his diocese. In 1687, he entertained the king in his progress through the country, grieved indeed at the sight of his popish attendants, but hospitably respectful to him as became a subject. On William's accession he was unwilling to take the oaths to the new monarch, and prepared to resign all his preferments, and to retire to the house of his friend Martin, vicar of Wolverly. He died, however, before the time fixed for his departure, 25th June, 1689. Respectable as a man and as a prelate, he was also a good writer, but more nervous than elegant. He wrote an Apology for the Church of England, 1678-9, 8vo.—Letter to the Clergy—some sermons—Roman Oracles Silenced, published after his death.

THOMAS, William, grandson of the Bishop, by John Thomas and Mary Bagnall, was born 1670, and was educated at Westminster school, from whence in 1688, he was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees. By the interest of lord Somers he obtained the living of Exal in Warwickshire, and in 1721, he removed to Worcester for the better education of his family. In 1723, he was presented by bishop Hough to the rectory of St. Nicholas, Worcester, and died July 26, 1738. He was buried in the cloisters of the cathedral near his grandfather. He was distinguished as a man of letters and as a good antiquary. He published Antiquitates Prioratus Majoris Malverne—Dugdale's Warwickshire improved, 2 vols. fol. 1730—a Survey of Worcester Cathedral, and prepared materials for a history of Worcestershire, which have been handsomely noticed by Dr. Nash.

THOMAS, Elizabeth, better known by the name of Corinna, was born 1675. She was known as a writer of considerable abilities, but her misfortunes arose in the death of Mr. Gwynnet, to whom she was to have been married, 1711. After this, ill health and affliction were her constant companions, and she sunk into the grave 3d February 1730, and was buried in St. Bride's church. She incurred the severest displeasure of Pope, because she had suffered Curl the bookseller to publish some of the poet's letters with those of Henry Cromwell, and for this offence she was placed in a conspicuous situation in the Dunciad. Her poems were published after her death, together with 2 vols. of letters which passed between her and her lover Gwynnet.

THOMAS, Anthony Leonard, a member of the French academy, distinguished as a writer and a poet. He was born at Clermont in Auvergne, 1732, and educated with great care by his mother. He was intended for the law, but his abilities were called into action by the offer of a professorship in the college of Beauvais at Paris, which was more congenial with his disposition. He rose gradually by his merit, and was at last secretary to the duke of Orleans. He died 17th September 1785. Respected and beloved as a man, he was highly esteemed as a writer. In 1756, he published his reflections, historical and literary, on Voltaire's poem of natural religion, in which he ably defended Christianity. In 1759, his eulogy of marshal Saxe was crowned by the academy, and he deserved public applause also by his eulogies on d'Agucseau, Du Guay Trouin, Des Cartes, Sully, and Marcus Aurelius. He wrote also an Essay on Elogies, 2 vols. 12mo.—an Essay on the Character, Manners, and Mind of Females, 8vo. and some poems, and he was at his death engaged on a poem on Peter the Great. His works were published together 1802, 7 vols. 8vo. Paris.

THOMAS, Josiah, an English divine, was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A., entered into orders, and became successively rector of Kingston, Deverell in Wiltshire, and of Street-cum-Walton in Somersetshire. He was also made archdeacon of Bath, and chosen minister of Christ-church in that city, where he died May 27th, 1820, aged 60. He published—1. A poetical Epistle to a Curate. 2. Strictures on subjects relating to the established religion and the clergy. 3. Remarks on some popular principles and notions. Mr. Thomas made himself conspicuous about a year or two before his death by opposing the bishop of Gloucester, at a missionary meeting of the evangelical clergy, as they are denominated, at Bath.

THOMAS, John, a patriot of the revolution, and a Major-general in the Continental Army, was born in the County of Plymouth, Massachusetts. He served in the memorable war of 1756 against the French and Indians, and acquired the reputation of a skilful officer and gallant soldier. When the revolutionary war commenced in 1775, he resided at Kingston; and in April of that year, he marched to Roxbury with a regiment which he had raised by his own efforts. During the siege of Boston, he was successively appointed by congress, Brigadier, and Major-general. After the fall of Montgomery, he was appointed to the command in Canada, and arrived before Quebec, early in May, 1776. Finding his situation there, untenable, he immediately raised the siege and commenced a retreat. His death, which was caused by the small pox, occurred at Chamblee, May 30, 1776.

THOMAS, Isaiah, LL.D., a distinguished printer, was born in Boston, in 1749. His father was Moses Thomas, who died while Isaiah was yet a child. Having served an apprenticeship of eleven years, with one Fowle, a printer, young Thomas, at the age of eighteen, commenced business in Newburyport, in connexion with Henry W. Tinges. In 1770, he transferred his establishment to Boston, and published the Massachusetts Spy. In this paper, were published many bold and spirited appeals, on the subject of the oppressive acts of the British Parliament towards these, then, colonies. In 1771, Governor Hutchinson endeavored to bring Mr. Thomas before him, on account of an article which was published in his paper; and on his refusing to appear before the Governor, the attorney-general endeavored to procure an indictment against him; but in vain. Thomas was not of a disposition to submit to the minions of an arbitrary power; and his paper teemed with topics well calculated to arouse his countrymen to a sense of the dangers by which they were surrounded. When the British troops marched to Concord for the purpose of destroying the stores collected there, Mr. Thomas joined the patriotic band which assembled to intercept the retreat of the regulars, and was one of the most active and dexterous of the skirmishers, on the plains of Lexington. A few days after that memorable affair, he removed his press to Worcester, where he continued to publish his paper. In 1788 he opened a bookstore in Boston, under the firm of Thomas and Andrews; and he established branches of his publishing business, in several parts of the United States. For many years, most of the bibles and school books used throughout the continent, emanated from his great establishment at Worcester. In the latter part of his life, Mr. Thomas founded the American Antiquarian Society, at Worcester, of which he was president, and a most liberal patron. For his services in the cause of letters, the Faculty of Alleghany College in Pennsylvania, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws. He lived to see his favorite society take a high rank among the literary institutions of our country; and by his will, ample provision was made for its future support. The History of Printing, of which he was the author, was well received by the literary world; it evinces great research, and abounds with interesting anecdote. Mr. Thomas died at Worcester, April 4th, 1831, aged 82; and has left a character distinguished for integrity, patriotism, and philanthropy.

THOMAS, Sir George, governor of Pennsylvania, was appointed in 1738, and continued in office until 1747, when he was succeeded by James Hamilton. He was previously a wealthy planter of Antigua, and a member of the council there. His administration was less popular than that of his predecessor Gordon, because he was less indulgent to the Quakers. In 1752 he was appointed governor of the Leeward and Carribee Islands, where he was succeeded by governor Woodleye in 1766. On retiring from this office he was created a Baronet. He died in London, January 11th, 1775.

THOMAS, John, M. D., was born in Plymouth, Massachusetts, April 1, 1758. He served during the whole of the war of the revolution, as surgeon in the provincial army. At the termination of hostilities, Doctor Thomas settled at Poughkeepsie, New York, where he practised in his profession, and maintained a distinguished rank for skill, and application to his duties. He was celebrated for his wit, and social qualities; and was universally beloved and respected for his benevolence, and spotless integrity. He died at Poughkeepsie, in 1818, aged 60.

THOMPSON, Edward, a native of Hull in Yorkshire. He was educated under Dr. Cox at Hampstead, and early went to the East Indies. He was afterwards pressed into the navy, and by his good conduct rose, in 1757, to the rank of lieutenant. At the conclusion of the war he retired on half pay, and then turned his thoughts to literary pursuits. He published successively the Meretriciad, a licentious poem—the Soldier, a poem, 4to. 1764—the Courtezan, and the Demirep, two poems, 1765—and Sailor's letters, 2 vols. 12mo. 1767. His Trinculo's trip to the Jubilee, a ludicrous performance, in which he gave an account of the jubilee celebrated at Stratford on Avon, in honor of Shakespeare, appeared in 1769, and also his Court of Cupid, 2 vols. which contained a collection of the immoral pieces which he had already obtruded upon the world. He altered the Fair Quaker from Shadwell, in 1773, and produced it on the Drury-lane stage, with some effect, and he afterwards published Paul Whitehead's works, and also Marell's 3 vols. 4to. On the breaking out of the American war he obtained by the interest of Garriek a captain's commission, and the command of the Hydra, in which he had the good fortune to capture a valuable French East India-man. He died in 1786, on the coast of Africa, on board the Grampus, a ship to which he had been appointed the preceding year. He published proposals for maritime observations, collected from 1753 to 1763, but the work never appeared.

THOMSON, James, a celebrated English poet, son of a Scotch minister, and born at Ednam in Roxburgshire, 11th September 1700. He was educated at Jedburgh school, and then entered at the university of Edinburgh. He here distinguished himself by the elegance and spirit of his compositions, and when he had been directed by the divinity professor, Hamilton, to write an exercise on a psalm, descriptive of the greatness and majesty of God, his paraphrase was much admired for its fire and its poetical beauties. He then studied divinity, but soon relinquished it, as he considered the profession too confined for the expansion of his abilities. He determined to seek in London the patronage which might be extended to merit, and the publication of his Winter, 1726, soon introduced him to the notice of the great and of the learned. By the friendship of Dr. Rundle, afterwards bishop of Derry, he was recommended to lord chancellor Talbot, and attended his son as a companion in his travels on the continent. The popularity of Winter produced Summer in 1727, Spring 1728, and Autumn in 1730; and other pieces were also published to prove the diligence, the patriotism, and the creative powers of the poet. The death of his noble pupil was soon after followed by that of the chancellor, and Thomson was thus reduced from a state of comfort and independence, to a narrow and precarious subsistence. The place of secretary of the briefs which he had obtained from the chancellor, fell at his death, yet the generosity of his friends was kindly exerted, he was by the recommendation of lord Lyttleton noticed and patronised with a pension by the prince of Wales, and by the influence of the same noble friend he obtained in 1746, the office of surveyor-general of the Leeward islands. He died 27th August, 1748. Besides his Seasons, Thomson wrote an elegant poem to the memory of sir Isaac Newton, 1727—Britannia, a political poem, occasioned by the quarrels of the Spaniards with England, with respect to America—Liberty, a poem in five books, containing ancient and modern Italy compared, Greece, Rome, Britain, the Prospect—the Castle of Indolence, an allegorical poem, after Spenser's manner—besides some tragedies which were received on the stage with reiterated and deserved applause—Agamemnon, acted 1738—Edward and Eleanor, a tragedy, not acted in consequence of the dispute between the prince of Wales his patron, and the king—the Masque of Alfred, written jointly with Mallet—Tancred and Sigismunda, from Gil Blas, acted 1745—and Coriolanus, acted after his death for the benefit of his sisters. Thomson in private life was an amiable, pious, and benevolent character, with great goodness of heart and the most virtuous disposition. As a poet he possessed powers and perfections peculiarly his own. His Seasons display the most glowing, animated, and interesting descriptions of nature, in language at once elegant, simple and dignified. They bring before us, as is well observed, the whole magnificence of nature, whether pleasing or dreadful. The gaiety of spring, the splendor of summer, the tranquillity of autumn, and the horrors of winter, take each in turn the possession of our minds. In the midst of a florid and luxuriant flow of imagery, some exuberances perhaps may be found by the fastidious critic, but the merits of the poet are built on too solid a foundation to be shaken, and while the delightful changes of the varied year continue to convey pleasure to the eye, so long must the verse of the poet entertain the mind with the most seducing powers of well managed description and of animated portraiture.

THOMPSON, William, was a native of England, and was installed pastor of the first church at Braintree, in Massachusetts, September 24, 1639. In 1642 he visited Virginia, accompanied by Mr. Knowles and Mr. James, for missionary purposes, but meeting with opposition from the colonial authorities, he soon returned to his church at Braintree. He died, December 10, 1666, in the 69th year of his age.

THOMPSON, Benjamin, count Rumford, was born in Woburn, Massachusetts, March 26, 1753. After the death of his father, he was placed in a counting room in Salem; but his attachment to mathematics, and mechanical philosophy, soon induced him to withdraw from commercial pursuits. After attending the lectures of Professor Winthrop, at Cambridge, he removed to Rumford, now Concord, N. H. Here he taught a school for some time, and married the widow of Mr. Rolfe. In the contest between the colonies and the mother country, he espoused the cause of the latter; and in 1775 he abandoned his family and country, and removed to England. By his talents and address, he gained the good will of the ministry, and enjoyed a lucrative and honorable post in the home secretary's department. Towards the close of the war, he was appointed to the command of a regiment of cavalry, and was ordered to America; and on the establishment of peace, he became entitled to half pay, and received the order of knighthood. Having become known to the ambassador of the elector of Bavaria, he was invited to visit Munich, where he succeeded in establishing a system of police and municipal regulation, which conferred great benefits upon every class of citizens, and relieved the civil authorities of many evils which time and custom seemed to have perpetuated and sanctioned. For his services in that country, he was rewarded with high rank and liberal pecuniary endowments. He was created a count of the empire, and selected for his title, Rumford, the place where he had been a school-master in early life. Early in the present century, he visited England, and was the originator of the Royal Institution, one of the most popular of the literary and scientific establishments in the city of London. He died at Antreuil, in France, August 20, 1814, aged 61. Count Rumford's writings were numerous, and consisted principally of treatises upon philosophical subjects, and domestic and political economy. They have been collected and republished in London, in several octavo volumes, and are well known to the scientific world. He was a member of many distinguished societies, and enjoyed the correspondence and friendship of the most learned men of his day. By his will, he bequeathed fifty thousand dollars to Harvard University, to found a professorship, which bears his name; besides making liberal provision for promoting his favorite object, discoveries in the theory of light and heat.

THOMPSON, Charles, was born in Ireland in 1730, and at the age of eleven, emigrated to this country, in company with his three elder brothers. He received an excellent education under the learned and celebrated divine, Doctor Francis Allison, of Philadelphia. When the first continental congress assembled in 1774, Mr. Thompson was appointed to record their proceedings, and continued in the honorable and arduous post of secretary to that venerable body, for fifteen years; when he resigned his office, July 1789. His translation of the septuagint in 4 vols 8vo. was published in 1808, and was the result of long and laborious study. He was, emphatically, a good man, and regarded by all who knew him, as uniting extensive learning, with great probity and humble piety. He lived to the great age of 94, in the undiminished enjoyment of his faculties; and calmly exchanged this world for that better one, for which he had so long been prepared, August 16, 1824.

THOMPSON, William, an industrious writer and compiler, was born, in 1746, at Burnside, in Perthshire; was educated at St. Andrew's; and quitted the clerical profession in Scotland, to become an author and master of an academy in the metropolis. He died in 1817. Thompson was not without abilities and learning, but he was a hasty and slovenly writer. He was connected with various newspapers and periodicals; prepared for the press many works of other authors; and wrote, among other things, Mammoth; The Man in the Moon; and Memoirs of the War in Asia.

THORESBY, Ralph, an eminent antiquary, born at Leeds, Yorkshire, 1658. As his father was a merchant, he was intended for the mercantile line, and was in consequence sent to Rotterdam to learn the Dutch and French languages. On the death of his father 1680, he succeeded to his business, but he paid at the same time great attention to the study of history and to antiquarian researches. Though bred among the presbyterians, he was induced by reflection to conform to the rites of the church, and to participate in her sacraments. He was not only a learned man, but the friend of the learned, and to his kindness and communications the most respectable writers of the times have acknowledged themselves indebted, such as Gibson, Walker, Calamy, Collins, Lister, Gale, and Hearne. He died 1725, aged 68. He was fellow of the Royal society, and wrote Ducatus Leodiensis, or the topography of Leeds, and the parts adjacent, with a catalogue of the antiquities and curiosities of his cabinet. He intended to publish a view of the state of the northern parts of the kingdom, in the times of the Romans and Britons, but his age prevented the completion, and his history of the church of Leeds alone, as a part, appeared 1724, containing an account of some remarkable characters, Matthew Hutton, Edwyn Saudys, Tobie Matthews, John Thoresby, archbishop of York, and others.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, an able divine, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He obtained the mastership of Sidney college 1643, but was soon dispossessed for his attachment to the royal cause. His sufferings during the civil wars were rewarded at the restoration by the gift of a prebend of Westminster. He wrote Epilogus, fol. in which he ably defends the tenets of the church of England—treatises on Weights and Measures—on Ecclesiastical Censures, and he also assisted Walton in the completion of his Polyglott bible. He died 1672.

THORNDIKE, Israel, an eminent merchant, was born in Beverly, in 1757. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he became engaged in privateering; and in a short time, became part owner and commander of one of the most successful cruisers out of Massachusetts. Possessing an enterprising genius and daring spirit, he distinguished himself as a gallant defender of his country's rights, on that element, of which England had long considered herself the mistress. When peace was restored, Mr. Thorndike engaged extensively in commercial pursuits; his extensive knowledge and keen perception, enabled him to plan and execute some of the most prosperous commercial enterprises which have ever been undertaken in this country. His wealth increased rapidly; and with the ability, so also the inclination to promote every rational effort for public or private weal. When the federal constitution was proposed for adoption by the several states, Mr. Thorndike was a delegate from his native place to the convention assembled in Boston for its ratification; and in that body his influence was exerted, and acknowledged by those, who felt the utmost confidence in his wisdom and love of country. After a residence of many years in Beverly, he removed to Boston, where he continued his extensive mercantile operations; his sagacity and knowledge of trade, still producing favorable results. In Boston, Mr. Thorndike lived in a style of elegance and hospitality, becoming his great wealth. He had the confidence of his fellow citizens in an eminent degree; and was repeatedly elected by them to the senate of Massachusetts, where his practical good sense, and knowledge of the great interests of the state, gave him a commanding influence. In 1818, he purchased the library of Professor Ebeling of Hamburg, which he presented to Harvard University. This collection, of nearly four thousand volumes, was uncommonly rich in works on American History and antiquities; and is undoubtedly the most valuable and extensive, in this respect, ever collected. For the last few years of his life, Mr. Thorndike engaged largely in the manufacturing interest, and lived to see his enterprise in that department of our industry amply rewarded. He died at Boston, May 10, 1832, aged 75; and left the largest fortune ever acquired in New England, amounting to nearly two millions of dollars. He has left also the influence of his name and example, to show what industry, sagacity and prudence can accomplish, when united with honesty of purpose, and firm resolve.

THORNTON, Bonnel, an English poet, born in Maiden-lane, London, 1724. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1743, was elected to Christ-church. He wished to study medicine, but he preferred a literary life to the labors of the medical profession. The first publication, in which he was engaged with Smart and others, was the Student, or Oxford and Cambridge Miscellany, in monthly numbers, which was collected 2 vols. 8vo. 1748. In 1754, the Connoisseur was undertaken jointly with Colman, and was continued for two years. In 1766, after the example of his friend Colman, who had translated Terence, he published 2 vols. of a translation of Plautus, which though possessing merit, and admired by Warburton for its pure and elegant style, has not been very popular. In 1767, he published as an additional canto to Garth's Dispensary, the Battle of the Wigs, to ridicule the quarrels then kindled between the fellows and licenciates of the college of physicians. He died 9th May, 1768, aged 44, of the gout in his stomach, leaving behind him a widow with two sons and a daughter. His epitaph was written in Latin by his friend Dr. Warton, and placed on his grave in Westminster abbey. He wrote besides, the Oxford Barber, and some periodical essays, in the Public Advertiser, and other publications.

THORNTON, Mathew, was born in Ireland in 1714, and when about two or three years old his father emigrated to America, and finally settled in Worcester, Massachusetts. Young Thornton pursued the study of medicine, and commenced the practice of his profession in Londonderry, New Hampshire. In 1776 he was chosen a delegate to the continental congress, and affixed his name to the declaration of independence. He was afterwards chief justice of the court of common pleas, and judge of the superior court of his adopted state. He died in 1803.

THRASYBULUS, an Athenian general, celebrated for his bravery and his bold attack and expulsion of the thirty tyrants. He united the highest benevolence to personal courage, and passed an act of amnesty for the reconciliation of all parties. He was at last killed in a battle against the Aspendians, B. C. 394.

THUANUS, Jacobus Augustus, or DE THOU, a celebrated French historian, born 9th October 1553, at Paris, where his father was first president of the parliament. His infancy was passed in debility and disease, and while all possible care was bestowed to improve his constitution, little was done for the cultivation of his mind; his powers, however, shone forth early, and with unusual splendor. He was at first educated under private tutors, and then studied the law at Orleans, but as he was destined for the church, he was placed near his uncle, the bishop of Chartres, who resigned some of his preferments in his favor. In 1573 he visited Italy, and after devoting himself to the pleasures of retirement and study, he was employed in various negotiations in the Low Countries, and in 1578 made counsellor clerk to the parliament. The death of his brother, in 1579, induced him to give up the ecclesiastical profession, and he now gradually rose to offices of trust and honor. In 1581 he was sent to administer justice at Guyenne, with other counsellors, and in 1584, was made master of the requests. During the violence of the league he attached himself to Henry II. and was usefully employed in various negotiations by him. He afterwards enjoyed the favor of Henry IV. who appointed him his first librarian, and intrusted him with the negotiations with the duke of Guise, and with the protestants. Under Mary de Medicis he was one of the general directors of the finances. After a life spent honorably in the service of literature, and of his country, this great man died, 17th May, 1617, universally respected, not only as an historian, but as a man, and was buried in the chapel of St. Andrew of the Arches. He was twice married; by his first wife, who died 1601, he had no children, and by the second he had three sons. He is particularly distinguished for his History of his own Times, from 1545 to 1608, written in pure, elegant, and classical Latin, and admirable for its fidelity, correctness, and accuracy. It has been much and deservedly praised by Grotius, Casaubon, Perrault, and others; but as it speaks with freedom and truth, of men and of manners, it never appeared, but in a mutilated and partial form, till Dr. Mead undertook its publication, free from all omission, in 1733, in 7 vols. folio. Thuanus wrote besides, some poetical pieces, a Paraphrase on the Book of Job—on Ecclesiastes—the Lamentations of Jeremiah,—and Miscellanies.

THUCYDIDES, a celebrated Greek historian of Athens. He was in the military service of his country, and during a temporary disgrace, through the jealousy of his countrymen, he devoted himself to the composition of his famous History of Grecian Affairs in his own Times. He died 391 B. C. The best edition of his work is that of Duker. It has been ably translated by Dr. Smith.

THUILLIER, Dom Vincent, a native of Concy, in Laon, distinguished among the members of the congregation of St. Maur. He was eminent as a preacher and as a man of letters. He died 12th January 1736, aged 51. He wrote Letters of an Ancient Professor of Theology on the Bull Unigenitus, besides a translation of Polybius into French, in 6 vols. 4to.

THUNBERG, Charles Peter, an eminent Swedish botanist, the pupil and the friend of Linnæus. He visited France in 1770, and soon after, by the interference of his friend Burmann, he was sent by the Dutch company to Japan, to make observations and discoveries in botany. After a delay of three years at the Cape of Good Hope, where he made himself perfect in the Dutch language, he, in 1775, set out for Japan; but the jealousy of the inhabitants, and the mistrusting conduct of the government, limited his excursions, and he made few botanical discoveries. In 1776 he quitted Japan for Ceylon, and after some valuable observations in this island, he returned to Europe, and was appointed professor of botany at Upsal. He died at the end of the last century, leaving his valuable cabinet of natural history to the university. His Flora Japonica appeared at Leipsic 1784, 8vo. with thirty-nine plates, and gave an account of above three hundred unknown plants.

THURLOE, John, secretary to the Cromwells, during their usurpation, was born 1616, at Abbots-Roding, Essex, where his father was rector. He was educated for the law, and by the influence of judge St. John, he obtained some offices, and in 1645, was secretary to the parliamentary commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge. Though connected with the great republican leaders, he was not accessory to the king's death; but he favored with all his might, the affairs of the commonwealth, and in 1653, became secretary of state to Cromwell. In 1656 he was member for Ely, and the next year deserved the thanks of the commons for discovering Harrison's plot. On Cromwell's death, he continued in his office under Richard, the next protector, over whom he had great influence, and at the restoration he made a tender of his services to the new monarch, who, however, did not accept them. He was accused, soon after, of high treason by the Commons, but released, and then he retired to his seat at Great Milton, Oxfordshire. His knowledge of political affairs was such, that Charles solicited him in vain to take a share in the administration, which he declined. He died suddenly at Lincoln's Inn, 21st February 1668, aged 51. In his character he was very amiable, and remarkable for his courtesy and mildness to persons of all parties. His State Papers, in 7 vols. folio, have been published, and they are valuable not only for conciseness and perspicuity, but for the general and important matter which they contain.

THURLOW, Edward, lord, a celebrated lawyer. He was born in 1735, at Ashfield, Norfolk, where his father was rector, and after passing some time at Cambridge, he went to London to study the law. He was called to the bar 1758, and raised himself to professional notice by his manly and successful opposition to sir Fletcher Norton. In the famous Douglas cause, in which he was accidentally engaged, he displayed such abilities, such eloquence, and such a command of arguments, that the public attention was turned towards him, as towards a man who was formed to fill the highest stations in the law. In 1770 he was appointed solicitor-general, and the next year succeeded sir William de Grey as attorney-general; but in the house of Commons he neglected the cultivation of his oratorical powers, till, in the beginning of the American war, he stepped forth with the most commanding language of eloquence in support of the measures of administration. In June 1778, he was created a peer, and the day following he was nominated lord high chancellor of Great Britain. This dignified office he resigned in 1783, during the temporary triumph of the coalition ministry, but on the readmission of Mr. Pitt into the cabinet, he again was promoted to the seals, and kept them till 1793, when a dispute with the premier occasioned his resignation. Since that time he lived in retirement, and seldom engaged in the political disputes of the day. He died 12th September 1806. His character as a lawyer is fixed on the firmest basis of extensive knowledge, quick penetration, correct judgment, and the most undeviating integrity. Though overbearing in his manners, harsh and uncivil, he was zealously attached to his party, and inflexible in his opinions, and loyal in his conduct. As a patron of church preferment, he was the friend of persevering industry, and active merit, and though lax in his private conduct, and in his moral principles, he was ever anxious to reward virtue and to encourage learning. In his court he displayed all the wisdom, and nothing of the low cunning of the lawyer, and with a powerful mind which quickly comprehended and discussed with clearness the most intricate cases, he pronounced his judgment by the strictest rules of equity and justice, alike anxious to protect the rights and the privileges of the poor, as the immunities of the great. He was, as has been well observed, among lawyers and orators, in the senate and in the courts, what his contemporary Johnson was among wits and authors, a mighty genius proudly elevated above the littleness of common minds.

THUYSIUS, Anthony, a Dutch philologist, born 1603, at Harderwyck. He became professor of poetry and eloquence at Leyden, and librarian to the university, and died there 1670. He published Historia Navalis, a History of Naval Wars between the Dutch and Spaniards—Compendium Historiæ Bataviæ, 1645—Tracts on the Government and the Laws of Athens, besides valuable editions of Paterculus, Sallust, Valerius Maximus, Seneca's tragedies, Lactantius, and Aulus Gellius.

TIBERIUS, Claudius Drusus Nero, a Roman emperor, was born, B.C. 34, at Rome. During the reign of Augustus he was successful at the head of the armies in Spain, Armenia, Germany, and other provinces, but, falling into disgrace, he resided for some years, as an exile, at Rhodes. He was, however, restored to favor, and he was again victorious as the leader of the legions in Germany. On his accession to the throne, his acts gave promise of a beneficent sovereign; but he soon became licentious and sanguinary, and, after a reign of nearly twenty-three years, he died universally hated, at Misenum, A.D. 37.

TIBERIUS, Constantine, emperor of the East, was appointed by his merits, colleague on the throne by Justin the younger. He was a wise, valiant, and benevolent prince, and died 582.

TIBULLUS, Anlus Albius, a Roman poet, in the age of Augustus. His elegies are much admired for ease, elegance and simplicity, and they are generally published with Propertius and Catullus.

TICKELL, Thomas, an English poet, born at Bridekirk, Cumberland, 1686. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship 1710, which he vacated by marrying at Dublin, 1726. He was early introduced to the notice and the patronage of Addison, who employed him in Ireland, and when secretary of state made him his under secretary. In 1724 he was secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, and continued in that honorable office till his death, which happened 23d April, 1740, at Bath. As a writer, Tickell obtained some celebrity, and he must rank high among the minor English poets. His Prospect of Peace, written during the negotiations with the French government under queen Anne was a popular work, and passed quickly through six editions. He wrote the Royal Progress on the arrival of George I., and published a translation of the first book of the Iliad, in opposition to Pope's version. This work, which some have regarded as the labor of Addison, was not without merit; but while it was approved by the literati at Button's, Pope, no way dismayed, boasted that he had the town, that is, the mob in his favor. The Letter to Avignon is a party poem of great merit, and expresses contempt without vulgarity, and maintains its dignity without insulting arrogance. Tickell published the works of his friend Addison after his death, and wrote also a very beautiful funeral poem in honor of his memory.

TICKELL, Richard, an eminent writer who first appeared before the public 1773, in his Project, and soon after in his Wreath of Fashion, two poems of some merit and celebrity. The most admired of his performances was the Anticipation, in which he imitated with great success and humor the principal speakers in the parliament, and thus in some degree disarmed the opposition of the force of their argument. He altered Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd for the stage, 1781, and wrote also the Carnival of Venice, a comic opera. He was killed November 4, 1793, by falling from the window of his apartments in Houghton-court. He had been one of the commissioners of the stamp-office.

TIEDEMANN, Dieteric, a modern German philosopher of eminence, was born April 3, 1743, at Breunerveorde in Bremen, of which place his father was a burgomaster. He was intended for the study of divinity, but early gave the preference to a more general pursuit of science and literature. In 1772 he published his Essay on the Origin of Languages (Riga) and in 1776 his system of the Stoic Philosophy. This work, much admired by the celebrated Heyne, procured him the professorships of the Greek and Latin languages in the Collegium Carolinum at Cassel. In 1786 he published his Investigation of Man, 3 vols. 8vo., and in 1780, The First Philosopher of Greece. In 1786 he was removed with the other teachers of the college to Marburg, and appointed professor of philosophy, in which capacity he sustained a high reputation. His latest performance was a translation of De Non's Travels in Egypt. He died May 24th, 1803, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. Besides the works already enumerated he was also author of a work entitled, The Spirit of Speculative Philosophy.

TIGRANES, king of Armenia, opposed the power of Rome, but was easily conquered by Lucullus. He preserved his dominions, by a large bribe, and maintained himself against the rebellion of his son, and the insurrection of his subjects. Pompey afterwards conquered him, and sent him in chains to Rome.

TILGHMAN, William, an eminent jurist, was born, in 1756, in Talbot county, on the eastern shore of Maryland. In 1772 he began the study of law in Philadelphia, but was not admitted to the practice of the profession till 1783. In 1788, and for some successive years, he was elected a representative to the legislature of Maryland. In 1793 he returned to Philadelphia, and pursued the practice of the law in that city till 1801, when he was appointed chief judge of the circuit court of the United States for the third circuit. After the abolition of this court, he resumed his profession, and continued it till 1805, when he was appointed president of the courts of common pleas in the first district of Pennsylvania. In the following year he was commissioned as chief-justice of the supreme court of that state. He died in 1827.

TILINGIUS, Matthias, a native of Westphalia, who studied medicine, which he professed at Rinteln. He was also physician to the court of Hesse Cassel, and died 1615. He wrote de Rhabbarbaro, 4to.—Lilii Albi Descriptio, 8vo.—de Laudano Opiate, 8vo.—Opiologia Nova, 4to.—Treatise on Malignant Fevers—Anatomie de la Rate, 12mo.

TILLEMONT, Sebastian de Nain de, a French writer, born at Paris 1657. He was educated in the school of Port-royal, and distinguished himself as an accurate and elegant author. He was an ecclesiastic, but of such humility of department, that he refused to succeed to the bishopric of Beauvais, and preferred obscurity, retirement, and literature, to all dignities. His indefatigable application proved at last too much for his constitution. He died 1698, aged 61. His Histoire des Empereurs, & Histoire Ecclesiastique, are two works, valuable for accuracy, correctness, precision, and elegance.

TILLET, N. du, a native of Bourdeaux, who devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, and published various works of merit, for the destruction of insects in corn, and for the improvement of the produce of the earth. This active and ingenious author, who was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and director of the mint, at Troyes, died 20th December, 1791, aged 60.

TILLI, John Tzerclaes, count de, a native of Brussels, of an illustrious family. He quitted the order of the jesuits, for the military profession, and after signaling his courage against the Turks, in Hungary, he commanded the troops of Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, at the battle of Prague, 1620. He contributed to the capture of Breda, and of Heidelberg, and defeated Mansfield, one of the rebel chiefs, and afterwards routed the forces of the duke d'Halberstadt, at Stavelo, and took Minden. In 1626, he obtained a great victory over the army of Denmark, at the battle of Lutter, and three years after went to Lubeck to settle the articles of peace, with the Danish ministers. When placed at the head of the imperial armies, he took Brandenburg, Magdeburg, and Leipsic, but he was soon after defeated by Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and received a mortal wound in defending the passage of the Leech, at Ingoldstadt, 30th April, 1632.

TILLOCH, Alexander, LL.D., was the son of a tobacconist of Glasgow, who filled one of the municipal magistracies in that city, where his son was born, February 28th, 1759. He was intended by his father to follow his own business, but a strong bias towards mechanical and scientific subjects soon diverted his attention from commercial pursuits. In 1736 a jeweller of Edinburgh, named Ged, having, though unacquainted with the tradition respecting Vander Mey, devised the art of printing from plates, and actually produced an edition of Sallust so printed, it was reserved, however, for Dr. Tilloch to revive and bring it an important step forward. In 1787 Dr. Tilloch came to London, and two years afterwards purchased a principal share of the Star evening paper, which he continued to edit till within four years of his death. In 1797 the public attention being then directed to schemes for the prevention of forgery, he submitted to the Bank of England a plan respecting which he had been previously in communication with the French government, for producing a note beyond the reach of imitation: this proposal was declined, and in 1820 Dr. Tilloch petitioned parliament on the subject, but without any practical result. In June 1797, he projected and established the Philosophical Magazine; and only fifteen days before his death he had obtained a patent for an improvement on the steam engine. Amidst his other avocations he also found leisure to apply himself to theological studies, the fruits of which appeared in a Dissertation on the Apocalypse, published in 1823, besides a variety of detached essays collected under the title Biblicus. The last work which he was engaged to superintend was the Mechanics' Oracle, published in numbers at the Caxton press. In his religious opinions, Dr. Tilloch was a dissenter from the established church, and preached to a congregation who assembled in the Curtain Road. His death took place at his house in Barnsbury-street, Islington, January 26th, 1825.

TILLOTSON, John, D.D., archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Sowerby, Yorkshire, October 1630, son of a clothier, descended from an ancient Cheshire family. In 1656, he was tutor to the son of Mr. Prideaux, of Devonshire, and was afterwards curate to his friend Dr. Wilkins, at St. Lawrence, Jewry. After the restoration, he was curate of Cheshunt, and in 1663, was promoted to the rectory of Keddington, Suffolk, which he immediately resigned for the preachiership of Lincoln's-inn-society. In 1664, he was chosen Tuesday lecturer at St. Lawrence, Jewry, and as being a popular preacher, he exerted himself strenuously against popery and atheism. In 1666 he was promoted to a prebend in the church of Canterbury, and also of St. Paul's, and in 1672, made dean of Canterbury. He attended his friend lord Russel, when condemned to die in consequence of the Rye-house plot, and he strongly urged him to admit the doctrine of non-resistance, a measure for which he was greatly censured, and for which he censured himself. At the revolution he was confidentially consulted by the princess Anne of Denmark, and for his integrity and loyalty, he was held in high esteem by the new king, and by his queen. In 1689 he was made clerk of the closet to William, and upon the suspension of Sancroft, in consequence of his refusal to take the oaths, he was nominated by the king to fill the vacant see of Canterbury. His elevation gave great displeasure to the non-jurors, who directed all their virulence and malice against him, but he exhibited in his conduct the persevering and conscientious prelate, intent upon the reformation of all ecclesiastical abuses, and eager to introduce greater regularity, and a more strict residence among his clergy. The reproaches which were hurled against him, though they depressed his spirits, did not alter the mildness of his manners; and after his death were found some bundles of papers, and letters, full of invective and malicious insinuations against him, on which he wrote with his own hand, 'these are libels, I pray God forgive them, I do.' The cares attendant upon an elevated situation were felt and recorded by him, with all the resignation of a christian philosopher; and in his common-place book, he inserted some strong and striking remarks, to remind the reader, that what appears to a distant spectator real grandeur, and perfect happiness, is too often experienced by the unhappy possessor, a source of misery, vexation, and trouble. This great and good man died 24th October, 1694. His death was sincerely lamented. He left nothing to his widow but the copy of his posthumous sermons, which sold for two thousand five hundred guineas, to which the king added an annuity of £400, in 1695, and in 1698, an addition of £200 more. His sermons have been frequently published in 10 vols. 8vo.—and in 3 folio. These volumes have been, and continue to be, universally read, and they have been translated also into various languages. They are the composition of an able divine, who displays throughout sound reasoning, strong sense, and solid piety, in a clear, elegant, unaffected style.

TILTON, James, a physician, who became distinguished in his profession, as surgeon for the United States' army in the revolutionary war. He was born in Delaware, June 1st. From 1777 to the close of the war, he acted as hospital surgeon; and introduced hospital huts, as they were called, with a fire in the middle, and a hole in the roof for the smoke to escape. After the war, he lived upon a farm in his native state for a few years. In 1785 the office of commissioner of loans was given him. In the war with Great Britain of 1812, he was appointed Physician and Surgeon-general of the army of the United States. His death took place, May 14, 1822, being nearly 71 years of age. He published Observations on Military Hospitals, and some papers on agriculture. He was a good man; but had some eccentricities. He would keep no tea cups and saucers in his house; and maintained, that a farmer should live on the produce of his own land; of course discarding the use of tea and coffee.

TIMAGENES, a native of Alexandria, known as an historian. He was the slave of Sylla's sons, and afterwards was in the service of Augustus, but burnt the history of that emperor's reign, when he was discarded from his protection.

TIMOLEON, an illustrious Corinthian, who went to the assistance of Syracuse, when oppressed by the tyranny of Dionysius. He became there a most benevolent and popular character, and died B.C. 337.

TIMON, a misanthrope, born at Athens. He declared himself the enemy of the human race, and in his conduct exhibited the savage character of a man-hater. He said he loved Alcibiades, because he would prove one day the ruin of Athens.

TINDAL, Matthew, LL.D., a deistical writer, born 1657, at Beer-ferres, Devonshire, where his father was minister. He entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, 1672, and afterwards removed to Exeter, and thence was elected fellow of All Souls. In 1635 he took the degree of doctor of laws, and under James II., declared himself a papist, but afterwards renounced the Roman catholic tenets, and took the oaths to secure his fellowship. He died in London, August 1733. He is particularly known for two publications, the first published 1706, the Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other priests, 8vo.—and the other, published 1780 in 8vo., Christianity as old as the Creation, or the Gospel a republication of the Religion of Nature. In the former of these works, the intention of the author was, in subtle and insinuating language, to destroy the authority of the church; and in the latter, his design, in the most plausible and artful manner, is to set aside revealed religion, and to establish that there is no other revelation but that of the law of nature imprinted upon the heart of all mankind. These works were deservedly censured, and among the ablest opponents of his tenets, he had Dr. Hickeys, who had been his tutor at Lincoln, Dr. Conybeare, afterwards bishop of Bristol, Leland, Foster, and others. He wrote some tracts besides, on civil and religious liberty, and he left at his death, a second volume to his Christianity as old as the Creation, the publication of which was prevented by Gibson, bishop of London.

TINDAL, Nicholas, nephew to Matthew, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1713. He was afterwards fellow of Trinity college, and obtained the livings of Alverstokey, Hants, and of Great Waltham, near Chelmsford and afterwards succeeded to the rectory of Colbourne, in the isle of Wight. He died at Greenwich, where he was chaplain to the hospital, at an advanced age, 27th June, 1774. He published two quarto numbers of an intended history of Essex, in three vols. which, however, he relinquished for the translation of Rapin's History of England, in which he was assisted by Mr. Morant. This last work succeeded so well that, in addition to his agreement, his booksellers, the Knaptons, handsomely gave him a present of two hundred guineas. He published besides Cantemir's History of the Ottoman Empire, folio—and Polymetus abridged, a Guide to Classical Learning, a useful work.

TINDALL, William, an English divine, author of Juvenile excursions in Literature and Criticism, 12mo.—History and Antiquities of the Abbey and Borough of Evesham, 4to.—Plain Truth in a plain Dress—Evils and Advantages of Genius contrasted, and a poem. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1773, and he was admitted into the Antiquarian society, and appointed chaplain to the Tower, where, in a fit of melancholy, he shot himself, 1804, at the age of 50.

TIPPOO-SAIB, succeeded his father Hyder-Ally as king of Mysore, and of the Mahrattas, and he ably maintained his independence against the Great Mogul. During the American war, he joined the French in hostilities against the English; but after the breaking out of the French revolution, he was alone exposed to the fortunes of the war. In 1790 he was defeated at Travancore; Bangalore was afterwards taken, and yielding to the superior force of the British arms, he consented, in 1792, to make peace with lord Cornwallis by delivering up his two sons as hostages, and paying, besides the loss of part of his dominions, above three millions sterling. His intrigues with the French government, and his secret machinations to destroy the English power in India, renewed the war in 1799. He was quickly attacked by the British forces in his very capital, and in the storming of Seringapatam, the Mysore monarch was killed whilst bravely defending himself on the ramparts. He was fifty-two years old. Though oppressive and capricious in his government, he patronised the arts, and his fondness for literature was displayed in the valuable collection of books found in his palace, consisting of various works in the Sanscrit language in the 10th century, translations of the Koran, MSS. of the history of the Mogul victories, and historical memoirs of Hindostan, all of which have been carefully deposited in the library of the university of Calcutta.

TIRABOSCHI, Jerome, a native of Bergamo, who entered among the jesuits, and became professor of rhetoric at Milan. He was in 1770 made librarian to the duke of Modena, and was enrolled in the number of the nobility by the unanimous voice of the people, who thus honored his virtues and his merits. He died June 1794, aged 62. He wrote Memoirs on the Ancient Order of the Humiliés, 3 vols. 4to.—Catalogue of the Writers of Modena, 6 vols. 4to.—History of Italian Literature from the days of Augustus, 13 vols. 4to. a work of great merit. His eloge was written by Lombardi in Italian, and translated into French by Boulard.

TIRAQUEAU, Andrew, a French lawyer, counsellor of the parliament of Bourdeaux, and afterwards of Paris, was born at Poitou. His abilities were usefully employed by Francis I. and Henry II. and in their service he displayed great integrity and sound judgment, and exerted also all his influence to banish intrigue and chicanery from the French bar. He died at an advanced age, 1574. He wrote various books and commentaries, and it was observed that he produced every year a child and a book, till the number of each was twenty, some say thirty; as it is recorded in a jocular epigram, which mentions him being a water-drinker; 'Hic jacet, qui aquam bibendo, viginti liberos suscepit, viginti libros edidit. Si merum bibisset, totum orbem implevisset.'

TISSOT, S. A. D., a celebrated Swiss physician, a warm advocate of inoculation, and of experimental, rather than theoretical systems of medicine. He was, in consequence of his great reputation, member of the medical societies of London, Berne, and Basil. He died at Lausanne, 15th June 1797, aged 70. His works, which are valuable, have been collected in 10 vols. 12mo. His Advice to Men of Letters, and to the people on the subject of health, and other smaller pieces, possess high merit, and are deservedly popular. He also edited Morgagni's works, 3 vols. 4to. 1779.

TITIAN, or TITIANO, a celebrated painter, descended from the ancient family of Vacelli, and born at Cadore in Friuli, 1477. His fondness for painting was early observed, and he was placed under the care of Bellino; but he improved himself more by the laudable emulation between him and his fellow pupil Giorgione, than by the instruction of his master. His abilities, and the execution of his pencil soon recommended him to the notice of the great; he was patronised by Charles V. who knighted him, made him a count palatine, assigned him a pension, and bestowed on him several handsome presents, which he gave him as a mark of his esteem, and not for his pictures, which he declared to be above any price. He died at Venice, of the plague, 1576, aged 99. His character as a man as well as a painter, was so universally respected, that he received the strongest marks of esteem and friendship from the greatest and most eminent persons in Europe. His pieces are much admired for their coloring, delicacy, and correctness. His best pieces are a Last Supper in the Escorial—a Christ crowned with thorns, at Milan—and a portrait of himself, with his mistress combing her hair, in the Paris collection.

TITLEY, Walter, a polite scholar, educated at Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he held a lay fellowship. He was employed by the court as envoy extraordinary to Copenhagen, where he died, highly respected, 1754. He had been for some time resident in bishop Atterbury's house, as tutor to his son. He wrote an Imitation of Horace, and other Latin pieces, preserved in the Reliquiæ Galeanæ.

TITON DU TILLET, Everard, a native of Paris, educated at the jesuit's college, after which he followed the military profession. At the peace of Ryswick, he purchased a place in the royal household, and afterwards travelled into Italy as a man of letters, and an antiquarian. He formed in 1703 the plan of erecting a brazen Parnassus in honor of Louis XIV. and the work was completed in 1718. In this singular monument the monarch was represented in the figure of Apollo holding a lyre, while below the graces are personified by de la Suze, des Houlicres, and de Scuderi, three learned French ladies, and the nine muses appear under the name of P. Corneille, Moliere, Racan, Segrais, la Fontaine, Chapelle, Racine, Despreaux, and the musician Lully. Medallions in this celebrated group are given to less known poets, and every person distinguished for literature or the fine arts, had due honors paid to his talents. Titon published in 1727 a description of this poetical monument and of the characters of the personages represented, and as he continued additions to his Parnassus, he likewise added supplements to the lives and accounts of his heroes up to the year 1760. He died 26th December 1762, aged 86.

TITUS VESPASIAN, a Roman emperor, distinguished at the siege of Jerusalem, under his father Vespasian, and deservedly celebrated for reforming the profligacy of his youth by the most correct morals when raised to the throne. He was so anxious to do good to his subjects, that he exclaimed one day, on discovering that he had granted no favor, 'my friends, I have lost a day.' He died A. D. 81.

TIXIER, John, called also RAVISIUS TEXTOR, lord of Ravisy in Nivernois, was an elegant scholar, and taught polite literature in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he died 1522. He wrote, among other things, epistles—dialogues—epigrams—an edition of Opera Scriptorum de Claris Mulieribus, folio.

TOALDO, Joseph, an Italian physician, who taught mathematics in the university of Padua, and bestowed much attention on subjects of electricity, astronomy, and meteorology. He published a Journal Astro-Meteorological—Memoirs on the Application of Meteorology to Agriculture—Cycle of one hundred and twenty-three Moons. He died at Padua, 11th November 1797, aged 79.

TODD, Hugh, D.D., a divine, born at Blencow,

Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was elected fellow of University, 1678. He was chaplain to Smith, bishop of Carlisle, and vicar of Stanwix, and accumulated his degrees 1692. He published various things, and died about 1710. The best known of his works are the Description of Sweden, folio—and the Life of Phocion. He left in MS., an History of the Diocese of Carlisle, &c.—Notitia Prioratus de Wedderball—and Notitia Ecclesiæ Cathedralis Carlilensis.

TODD, Eli, M.D., physician of the Retreat for the Insane, in Hartford, Connecticut. He was born in New Haven of that state, about the year 1760; graduated at Yale college in 1787; established himself in his profession at Farmington, in 1819 removed to Hartford, and took the lead in founding the Retreat for the Insane. Dr. Todd was a man of superior talents and extensive acquirements, and greatly respected and beloved as a physician, a philanthropist, and a Christian. He died November 17, 1838.

TOIRAS, John Caylard de St. Bonnet, marquis de, a native of St. Jean-de-Cardonuenquis who embraced the military profession, and served under Henry IV. and Louis XIII. He distinguished himself at the sieges of Montauban, and Montpellier, and at the taking of Rhé, and when governor of the Montserrat, he acquired new glory by his gallant defence of Casal, against marquis Spinola. He was, in consequence of his services, made marshal of France; but the attachment of his brothers to the party of Orleans, and the mean jealousies of Richelieu brought on his disgrace, and he retired from France, and found in Italy, at Naples, Rome, Venice, and other places, that respect for his talents and meritorious services, which his ungrateful country refused to acknowledge. He afterwards became a general in the army of the duke of Savoy, and was killed before the fortress of Fontanette, in the Milanese, 14th June, 1636, aged 51.

TOLAND, John, one of the founders of modern deism, was born 30th November, 1669, in the north of Ireland, and educated at Redcastle school, near Londonderry, from which he went to Glasgow, 1687, and three years after to Edinburgh. Though brought up as a papist, he renounced that religion, and at the age of fifteen, declared himself a zealous protestant dissenter. He afterwards went to study at Leyden, and then returned to England, and visited Oxford, and in 1696, published at London his Christianity not Mysterious, which excited great clamor against the writer, and even occasioned its presentation as dangerous by the grand jury of Middlesex. At this time he went to Ireland, but here the fame of his book was spread, and not only his company was shunned as infectious, but his work was attacked by the parliament, and ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. He, upon this, returned to England, and was engaged in various publications. His Life of Milton was published in 1698, and some other works on political or religious subjects followed. He was abroad in 1703, at the court of Berlin and Hanover, where he was received with great respect, and on his return to England, he was for some time patronised by Harley, earl of Oxford. In 1718, he published his Nazarenus, or Jewish, Gentile, or Mahometan Christianity, &c. which was a violent attack against revelation, and in 1720, appeared his Tetradymus, in four parts. He died at Putney, near London, where he had retired for some time, 11th, March, 1722. It must be fully acknowledged that Toland possessed vast erudition, and great powers of mind; but, unfortunately, these were misapplied in the support of atheism. The wish of being known in the world, and the strong passion of vanity, with which he was influenced, led him to adopt opinions which, probably, sober reflection disapproved; and the ambition of being singular, hurried him to oppose whatever is held as most sacred and solemn amongst mankind. His works were very numerous; those which were posthumous were published in 2 vols. 8vo. 1726, and republished 1747, with an Account of his Life and Writings by Des Maizeaux.

TOLLIUS, Jacobus, a physician, born at Ingra, in the territory of Utrecht. He was, in 1684, made professor of eloquence and Greek at Brandenburg, by the elector, and died 1696. He possessed great learning, but favored the notion of discovering the philosopher's stone. He edited Ausonius, in 8vo., and Longinus, in 4to., and wrote Epistole Itinerariæ. His brother Cornelius was at first an ananucensis to Isaac Vossius, and then became professor of eloquence and Greek at Harderwyck, and published an appendix to Pierus Valerianus' treatise de Infelicitate Literatorum, 12mo. Another brother, Alexander, published an useful and valuable edition of Appian.

TOMLINE, George, D.D., a distinguished English prelate, whose family name was Prettyman. He was the son of a tradesman at Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk, where he was born about the year 1750. From the grammar school at the place he was removed to complete his education at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He applied himself with such success to his studies, that he came out senior wrangler in 1772; and having been chosen fellow of his college in 1781, he served the office of moderator. Previously to his obtaining this promotion, he filled the station of academical tutor to Mr. Pitt, who, on becoming chancellor of the exchequer, made Mr. Prettyman his private secretary. He also procured for him, in the first instance, the valuable rectory of Sudbury, with the chapelry of Oxford, in Suffolk; and then a prebendal stall in the church of St. Peter, Westminster. On the translation of Dr. Thurlow to the see of Durham, in 1787, the influence of his powerful patron was exerted to raise Dr. Prettyman, to the bishopric of Lincoln, to which was soon after added the deanery of St. Paul's. He is said to have been offered the bishopric of London, and to have declined the promotion. While secretary to the premier, he was most severely and unfairly satirized by the author of Probationary Odes for the Laureateship, who described him as a man destitute of all regard for truth. Of course little attention is to be paid to an imputation arising from the virulence of party spirit; for in point of integrity, the secretary's character was ever irreproachable, and his urbanity of manners never deviated into servility of insincerity. As a prelate, he governed his diocese in a most exemplary manner, being vigilant, impartial, and compassionate. In 1799, he published a work, entitled "Elements of Christian Theology," 2 vols. 8vo., which though professedly written for the use of students in divinity, is also well adapted for general perusal, and has passed through several editions. The following year the bishop published a Charge to the Clergy of his diocese; and in 1812, appeared his Refutation of the Charge of Calvinism against the Church of England, 8vo., which involved him in a controversy with the Rev. Thomas Scott, and other advocates for Calvinistic principles. It was in the year 1820, that Dr. Tomline was translated to the see of Winchester, the second diocese, in point of emolument, in the kingdom. Several years since, a person, to whom the bishop was almost unknown, bequeathed him a very considerable fortune, on condition of his taking the name of Tomline. The death of this successful and learned divine took place on the 8th of November, 1827. Besides the works mentioned above, he published a thanksgiving sermon, preached before the king and parliament in 1796; and the Life of the Right Honorable William Pitt, which last work was not distinguished by that peculiarity of information which the author was considered qualified to impart, and which the public consequently expected.

TOMLINS, Elizabeth S., an ingenious poetess, novelist, and miscellaneous writer, born in London, in 1768. She was the daughter of Thomas Tomlins, Esq., an eminent solicitor, well known in political circles at the close of the last century. She manifested at an early age both taste and talent for poetry, as appears from her productions, published by her brother under the title of Tributes of Affection. Afterwards turning her attention to the composition of tales and novels, she published successively several works, the most popular of which was, The Victim of Fancy, on the model of Goethe's Werter, but free from the objections urged against that production on the score of its immoral tendency. Besides various other novels, she wrote a ballad, entitled Cornell and Mary, printed in Dr. Laughton's selection; and was a considerable contributor of fugitive poetry to various periodical publications, from 1780 to 1827. Miss Tomlins also translated the first History of Napoleon Buonaparte and part of the Universal History of Anquetil. She died in consequence of a fall from her horse, at her residence at Chaldon in Surrey, August 18th, 1828.

TONSTALL, Cuthbert, a native of Tackford, Hertfordshire, who studied at the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Padua, and distinguished himself for his knowledge of mathematics and divinity. He was employed in several embassies by Henry VIII. and for his services was made bishop of London, 1522, lord privy seal 1523, and in 1530, translated to Durham. He was deprived of his honors by Elizabeth, for denying her supremacy, though he had formerly supported her father in the work of the reformation, and he died in confinement, 1559, aged 84. He was author of a treatise de Arte Supputandi, Lon. 1522, 4to.—on the Presence of Christ in the Eucharist, 4to.—and Aristotle's Morals abridged.

TOOKE, Andrew, an English writer, born in London, 1673. He was educated at the Charter house, and Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1695, he was made usher of the Charter-house, and in 1704, professor of geometry at Gresham college, and though he inherited much property from his brother, the bookseller in Fleet-street, he was so attached to his habits of life that he accepted the headship of the school, 1728. He died of a dropsy, 20th January 1731, aged 58, and was buried in the Charter-house chapel. He published Synopsis Græcæ Linguæ—Ovid's Fasti—the Pantheon, or History of the Heathen Gods translated without acknowledgment from the Latin of Pomey, a jesuit.

TOOKE, John HORNE, a politician and philologist, who for many years was known by his family name of Horne, was born, in 1736, in Westminster; was educated at Westminster and Eton schools, and St. John's College, Cambridge; and in 1760, was inducted to the chapelry of New Brentford. The clerical profession, however, was little suited to his habits and feelings, and he took an active part in politics. The cause of Wilkes he warmly espoused for a considerable time, but at length they became enemies. In 1771, he was attacked by Junius, but he defended himself with spirit and success against that formidable writer. Resigning his living at Brentford, he studied law at the Temple, but his ecclesiastical character proved an obstacle to his being admitted to the bar. In 1775, he was sentenced to imprisonment on a charge of having libelled the king's troops in America. Out of this circumstance arose his Letter to Dunning, which formed the basis of his subsequent philological work, The Diversions of Purley, published in 1786. In 1790, and 1796, he stood, ineffectually, as candidate for Westminster; and in 1794, he was one of the persons who were tried at the Old Bailey, and acquitted, on a charge of treason. In 1801, he was returned to parliament for Old Sarum; but he sat only during that session, a bill being passed to prevent individuals in orders from sitting in future. He died March 19th, 1812.

TOOKE, William, a miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1744, at Islington. He was originally a printer, but took orders in 1771, and went to Russia, where he became chaplain to the factory at St. Petersburg. He returned to England in 1792, and died in 1820. Among his works are translations of Lucian, and Zollikofer's Sermons and Prayers; and A History of Russia; A View of the Russian Empire; A Life of Catherine II.; and other productions relative to Russia.

TOMPKINS, Daniel D. This distinguished statesman was the son of Jonathan G. Tompkins, a revolutionary patriot, and was born June 21st, 1774. He received his education at Columbia College, in the city of New York, and graduated in 1795. He commenced the practice of law in New York, and took a prominent part in the great party struggle which resulted in the elevation of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency of the United States. In 1803, Mr. Tompkins was appointed chief-justice of the Superior Court of New York, which office he filled with reputation to himself, and to the approbation of the public. He was elected Governor of the state, in 1807, and during a period of great political excitement, was an active and upright chief magistrate. In 1817, he was elected to the vice-presidency of the United States, James Monroe at the same time having been raised to the presidency. In this honorable station, he served his country for two terms; and finally retired from public life, in March, 1825. He died suddenly, at his residence, in Richmond County, Staten Island, June 11th, 1825, aged 50.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, a native of Farnham in Surrey, educated at Westminster school, and Dublin university. He became in 1768 vicar of Broadhembury, Devon; but finding the air of the place unfavorable to his constitution, he settled in London, and officiated in a chapel, Orange-street, Leicester-fields. He was author of Historic Proofs of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England, and other theological works, which have been collected together in 6 vols. 8vo. with an account of his life. He died in London, 1778, aged 41.

TORELLI, Joseph, was born at Verona in 1721. He received the degree of LL.D. Being in possession of a considerable fortune, he was enabled to devote himself entirely to literature. Though he did not practice as a lawyer, he did not relinquish the study of law. He acquired the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Italian languages; also French, Spanish, and English. In fact his acquirements in every branch of learning and sciences were only equalled by his virtues. He died in 1781. He was author of twenty different works on various subjects.

TORREY, Samuel, was born about the year 1630, and after completing his preparatory studies, was ordained to the ministry in Weymouth, Massachusetts. For a period of fifty years, he was the faithful and zealous pastor of his flock, to whom he was endeared by his disinterested devotion to their spiritual and temporal welfare. He died April 21st, 1707, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. He preached the election sermon in 1674, 1683, and 1695, which were printed.

TORRE, N., a native of the Milanese, who from low beginnings, rose to eminence, as a chemist, and as an artist in fire-works. By his great application, he became acquainted with experimental philosophy, and the friendship of Reaumur, rendered him expert in the construction of barometers, and in the knowledge of pneumatics. His artificial fire-works, exhibited at Paris, on the marriage of Louis XVI. were much admired, and in his experiments in pyrotechny, it is said, that he discovered the method of preparing an unextinguishable fire, which might consume an enemy's fleet. This dreadful secret was revealed to the French government, who refused to practice it against the English fleet, and the inventor at last, sensible of the terrible consequences of this powerful engine of destruction, expressed great contrition for his discovery. The sudden death of his wife had such an effect upon him, that he soon followed her to the grave, 30th April 1780. Though an intelligent man, he wasted much of his time, in the foolish attempt of transmuting metals into gold.

TORRICELLI, Evangeliste, an eminent mathematician, born at Faenza, 1608. He was well educated, and he learned philosophy under Castelli, who had been the pupil of the great Galileo. His progress in science was so great that he was recommended to Galileo, and went to live with him as an assistant and friend; but the death of that venerable philosopher three months after left him to his own pursuits. He settled at Florence, where he was patronised by the duke Ferdinand II. and he devoted himself to the construction and improvement of telescopes and microscopes. To his ingenious experiments we are indebted for the discovery of ascertaining the weight of the atmosphere by quicksilver in the barometer, or Torricellian tube. He died 1647, aged 40. He published Opera Geometrica, 4to. 1644.

TORRINGTON, George BYNG, viscount, a British admiral, was born, in 1668, in Kent; became a rear-admiral in 1703; and, during the reign of Queen Anne, distinguished himself at the taking of Gibraltar, the battle of Malaga, and the relieving of Barcelona. In 1718, he defeated the Spanish fleet of Sicily; in 1721, he was created a viscount; and was afterwards appointed first lord of the admiralty. He died in 1733.

TOSCANELLA, Paul, an able astronomer, who erected in Florence cathedral a famous gnomon, of which a description has been published by father Ximenès in 4to. 1757. It is said to be the largest of the kind in Europe. Some suppose that Toscanella formed an idea of the possibility of a passage to the East by the Cape of Good Hope, and by mentioning the circumstance to Martenz of Lisbon, the Portuguese, it is said, were animated in their endeavors to improve navigation and to make discoveries. He died about 1490.

TOSTATUS, Alphonso, a doctor of Salamanca, bishop of Avila, who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the council of Basil, and died 1454, aged 40. He wrote Commentaries on Eusebius'

Chronicle, 5 vols. folio—Commentaries on Scripture, &c. His works were printed together at Venice, 1596, in 13 vols. folio, a ponderous mass.

TOTT, Francis, baron de, a French negotiator and officer, the son of a Hungarian gentleman, was born in 1733, at Chamigny, near la Ferté-sous-Jouarre, and, after having served in the army, was employed in the French embassy at Constantinople. In 1767, he was appointed consul in the Crimea. He subsequently went back to Constantinople, and was charged by the grand seignor to carry into effect various important reforms in the military department. He was promoted on his return to France, but emigrated in 1790, and died in Hungary, in 1793. He wrote Memoirs on the Turks and Tartars.

TOULMIN, Joshua, a dissenting minister of the Baptist persuasion, and a Unitarian, was born in London. He officiated many years to a congregation at Taunton, in Somersetshire, where also he carried on the business of a bookseller. On the emigration of Dr. Priestley to America, he was chosen minister of the united congregations at Birmingham, where he died in 1815, aged 73. Dr. Toulmin, for he had obtained a degree from an American college, was an indefatigable compiler, and published several works, the principal of which are—1. The life of Socinus, 8vo. 2. Dissertations on the Evidences of Christianity, 8vo. 3. Life of John Biddle. 4. History of Taunton, with a supplement, 4to. 5. A new edition of Neal's history of the Puritans, 5 vols. 6. Biography of Dr. Priestley. 7. Memoirs of Samuel Bourne. 8. Historical view of the Protestant Dissenters, 8vo.

TOUP, Jonathan, a learned critic, born at St. Ives, in Cornwall, 1718. He was educated in the school of his native town, and at St. Merryn's, and then entered at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree. His master's degree was taken at Cambridge 1756. His Emendationes in Suidam, which first appeared in 1760, and were continued in another volume, 1764, recommended him to the notice of Warburton, by whose means bishop Keppel bestowed on him a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and the vicarage of St. Merryn's. He published his Appendiculus Notarum in Suidam, 1775, and in 1778, his edition of Longinus in 4to. and afterwards in 8vo. He passed his life in retirement, devoted to literary pursuits; but though unacquainted with the world, he was the correspondent of the learned of the age, of Ernestus, Brunk, Valknaer, Runkenius, and Larcher. died 1785, aged 72.

TOURNEFORT, Joseph Pitton de, a celebrated French botanist, born at Aix in Provence, 5th June, 1656. From his very youth he showed a strong passion for collecting plants, and though devoted to theological pursuits by his father, he did not abandon his favorite studies, and when become his own master, he applied himself most assiduously to botany, philosophy, and medicine. In 1678, he explored the mountains of Dauphiné and Savoy in quest of plants, and in 1679, perfected himself in anatomy and medicine at Montpellier. In 1681, he set out for Spain, and after visiting attentively the mountains of Catalonia and the Pyrenees, frequently in the midst of danger from the uncivilized inhabitants, he returned to France with the intention of exploring also the Alps, to enrich his botanical curiosities. In 1683, he was at Paris, where his merit began to be known, and he was appointed botanical professor in the king's garden. He afterwards travelled over Spain, Portugal, Holland, and England, and in 1700 was sent by the king to examine the plants of Greece, Asia, and Africa, and to make observations on the manners and the natural history of those countries. He returned after an absence of three years, and brought with him one thousand three hundred and fifty-six species of plants. He was soon after made professor of physic in the college royal, and admitted into the academy of sciences. He received an injury from the wheel of a cart which passed by him, and neglecting the proper remedies, he was seized with the spitting of blood, which after some months carried him off, 28th December, 1708. This most celebrated botanist of the age published, Elements of Botany, 3 vols. 8vo. enlarged to 3 vols. 4to.—History of Plants near Paris, 12mo. enlarged to 2 vols.—Voyage to the Levant, 2 vols. 4to. and three in 8vo.—a treatise on the Materia Medica, 2 vols. 12mo. besides several papers in the history of the academy of sciences.

TOURRETTE, Mark Anthony Louis, Claret de la, a native of Lyons, who studied in the jesuits' college at Lyons, and afterwards at the Harcourt college at Paris. He became one of the magistrates of his native city, and devoted himself much to the study of natural history. He formed a valuable collection of insects and of herbs, and cultivated in his garden not less than three thousand of the rarest and most curious plants. This amiable man, whose zeal in the investigation of natural curiosities and in botanical pursuits was indefatigable, and whose correspondence was extended to all the learned of Europe, was attacked by an inflammation in the lungs at the siege of his native town in the autumn of 1793, and he survived it but few days. He died aged 64. He published, Demonstrations Elementaries de Botanique, 2 vols. 8vo.—Voyage au Mont Pila, 8vo.—Chloris Lugdunensis, 8vo.—Memoires sur les Monstres Vegetaux.

TOURVILLE, Anne Hilarion de Costentin de, a French admiral born at Tourville, near Contances 1642. He first distinguished himself against the Algerines, and afterwards at the battle of Palermo, and against the Spanish fleet. He defeated in 1690, the combined fleets of England and Holland, but the battle of la Hogue, two years after, proved fatal to his glory, and to the honor of the French flag, by the loss of fourteen of his largest ships. He was honored in 1701, with the staff of marshal of France, and died the same year, 28th May, aged 59.

TOUSSAINT LOUVERTURE, a mulatto of St. Domingo, who by his courage and abilities rose to command in the French army, under Rochambeau, in 1796. The influence which he possessed among the blacks, induced him to aspire to sovereign power, and the cruelties which the French began to exercise against the natives, served to increase the numbers which flocked to his rebellious standard. After establishing a constitution in the island, and being acknowledged the head of all power civil and military, he consolidated his authority, by the wisest, and most humane regulations; but his confidence in the friendly professions of the French, who still kept an army in the province, proved fatal to him. He trusted his person amongst them, and instead of being respected as an independent chief, he was seized as a criminal, and sent to France by le Clere. Immured in a prison, his sufferings were disregarded, while his countrymen indignant at his treatment, rose to repel their ferocious invaders. This ill-treated, but truly valiant chieftain, died in his prison 1803, and it is said that either poison, or violence, hastened his death.

TOWERS, Joseph, L.L.D., a dissenting minister, born at Southwark 1737. He followed the printing business with Goadby, of Sherborne, and then settled as a bookseller in London, and in 1774, became pastor of a presbyterian congregation at Highgate. Four years after he was associated with Dr. Price, in Newington-green meeting, and in 1779, by Edinburgh university, with the degree of doctor of laws. He wrote, British Biography 7 vols. 8vo.—Observations on Hume's History of England—the Life and Reign of Frederic III. of Prussia, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Vindication of Locke—Sermons—an Answer to Burke's famous pamphlet, and other political tracts. He also assisted Dr. Kippis, in the new edition of the Biographia Britannica. He died 1799.

TOWNLEY, Charles, an eminent English collector of antiquities, born at Townley-hall, Lancashire, long the residence of his ancient family. With genuine taste in the knowledge of antiquities, and with the command of an independent fortune, he zealously devoted his labors to the formation of a noble collection, and his house in Park-street became the depository of the bulky fragments of Egyptian architecture, and the more pleasing and beautiful specimens of the Grecian and Roman models. His medals were also numerous and valuable, and among his choice manuscripts was a Homer, which he permitted to be collated, in a late edition of that poet. The Etruscan vases, and other antiquities of his collection, were illustrated in 2 vols. 4to. by d'Ancarville, a French antiquarian, who has explained the mythological representations and inscriptions, with ingenious observations. Mr. Townley, who was fellow of the antiquarian and royal societies, and one of the trustees of the British museum, died 3d January, 1805, aged 67. By his will he left £4000 for the building of a museum, at Standish, for the reception of his valuable antiquities, but as the bequest has not been complied with, the whole collection is, agreeable to his further directions, now deposited in the British museum, for which purpose parliament have granted a very liberal allowance to the trustees.

TOWNSEND, John, an independent minister, who was the founder of the deaf and dumb asylum. He was born in the parish of White-chapel, London, March 24th, 1757; and he received his education at Christ's hospital, after which he was apprenticed to his father. Becoming a member of the methodistical society in Tottenham-court-road, he was employed as an occasional preacher at different places in and near the metropolis. At length he settled as minister to an independent congregation at Kingston in Surrey, whence in 1784, he removed to Bermondsey, where he passed the remainder of his life. In 1792, he founded the institution for the deaf and dumb children of indigent parents, in which he was assisted by the Rev. H. C. Mason, the parochial minister of Bermondsey; and this charity obtained such extensive and efficient patronage, that in 1807, an edifice for the reception of one hundred and fifty children (since enlarged to admit two hundred) was erected under the auspices of the duke of Gloucester. Mr. Townsend also instituted a congregational school, for the gratuitous education of the children of necessitous dissenting ministers; and he assisted in the formation of the Missionary Society, the British Foreign Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, the Female Penitentiary, and other charitable and religious associations. He died February 7th 1826. Besides several single sermons, and other detached pieces, he published Nine Discourses on Prayer, 1799, 8vo.; Hints on Sunday Schools and Itinerant Preaching, 1801, 8vo.; a translation of Claude's Defence of the Reformation, with a biographical preface; and in conjunction with the Rev. Henry Cox Mason, under whose name the work appeared, he produced a Family Bible, with Notes, 4to.

TOWNSON, Thomas, D.D., an able divine, born in Essex, 1715. From Christ-church, Oxford, he removed to Magdalen college, where he obtained a fellowship, and afterwards was presented successively to Hatfield Peveral, in Essex, Blithfield, Staffordshire, the lower moiety of Malpas, Cheshire, and by the patronage of bishop Porteus, Richmond archdeaconry, Yorkshire. He is eminently known for his valuable discourses on the four gospels, and three tracts in answer to the Confessional, and since his death, which happened in 1792, a discourse on the Evangelical History has appeared with his life.

TOZZETTI, John Targioni, an eminent botanist, born at Florence, 11th September, 1722. He was educated at Pisa, and succeeded in 1737 his master Micheli in the care of the botanic garden of Florence. In 1737, he was made professor of botany there, and consulting physician to the government. He was engaged with Cocchi in making a catalogue of the famous library at Florence, and in consequence of his fame as a physician and botanist, he was admitted into several of the learned societies of Europe. He was one of the first who introduced inoculation in Tuscany. He died at Florence 1780. His publications in Latin, as well as in Italian, are very respectable. He published a thesis De Præstantiâ & Usu Plantarum in Medicina, fol.—a work on the Improvement of Medicine in Etruria, in 4 vols. 4to.

TRACY, Nathaniel, was born in Newbury, Massachusetts, in the year 1749. His father, who was a wealthy merchant, had his children educated in the best manner; and the subject of this sketch was sent to Harvard College, where he graduated in 1769. He commenced business, as a merchant, in Newbury, and for several years his commercial operations were uncommonly extensive and successful. When the war of the revolution commenced, Mr. Tracy fitted out a number of privateers, which did immense damage to the British commerce. Wealth poured in upon him, and every fresh enterprise seemed more prosperous than the former. He came forward to the assistance of his country, and his fortune, his credit, and his counsels, were freely bestowed. He lived in a style of great splendor, rather suited to the means of a foreign noble, than an American merchant. His benevolence and charities were commensurate with his other expenditures, for his heart was liberal, and prudence he never regarded. A change took place in his circumstances; his privateers were swept from the ocean; the government wanted the means or the inclination to repay his advances, and in 1786 he became a bankrupt to the amount of millions. Fortunately, one of his estates had been secured to his children, and to this last relic of his vast possessions, he retired, to brood, in unavailing grief over his ruined fortunes, and disappointed hopes. He survived but a short period, and fell a victim to his sensibility.

TRACY, Uriah, was born in 1754; and graduated at Yale College, in 1778. For many years, he practised law in Connecticut with great success, and became distinguished in his profession. For several years, he was a member of the House of Representatives, and subsequently, of the Senate of the United States; in both stations he was distinguished for his devotion to the interests of his constituents; and his accurate knowledge of the resources, and general interests of the country. He was a fluent speaker, possessing a rich imagination, and well stored mind; and commanded the attention and respect of his associates in the national councils. He died of a decline, at Washington, July 19, 1807, aged 53.

TRADESCANT, John, a Dutchman, who travelled over the best part of Europe, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, and Barbary, and at last settled in England, where he became superintendant of the gardens of Charles I. It is said that he was the first who formed in England a collection of medals and objects of natural history. His son was also a great traveller. They had a large garden at Lambeth, well stocked with various plants and trees from foreign countries. An account of their valuable collection appeared under the name of Museum Tradescantium. The father died 1652, and the monument of the family is still seen in Lambeth church-yard.

TRAJAN, M. Alpinus Cernitus, a Roman emperor. After serving under Vespasian and Titus in their Asiatic campaigns, and after supporting by his valor the power of Nerva, he was associated with him on the throne. He was a brave and popular prince, though he persecuted the Christians. He died in Cilicia, 117 A. D.

TRANHAM, Mrs. Betsey, who died in Maury county, Tennessee, January 10, 1834, at the uncommonly advanced age of 154 years. She was born in Germany, and emigrated to the British Colonies in America, at the time when the first settlement was made in North Carolina, in the year 1710. At the age of one hundred and twenty years, her eyesight became almost extinct, but during the last twenty years of her life, she possessed the power of vision as perfectly as at the age of twenty. For many years previous to her death she was unable to walk, and is said to have required great attention in her friends, for many years, to prevent the temperature of her body from falling so low as not to sustain animal life. At the time of her death, she had entirely lost the sense of taste and hearing. For twenty years before her death, she was unable to distinguish the difference between the taste of sugar and vinegar. At the age of sixty-five, she bore her only child, who is now living (1835,) and promises to reach an uncommonly advanced age.

TRAPP, Joseph, D.D., an able divine, born 1672 at Cherington, Gloucestershire, where his father was rector. He was educated by his father, and then entered at Wadham college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was the first poetry-professor on the Birkhead foundation, and he published the lectures which he delivered under the title of Prælectiones Poeticæ, a very elegant and ingenious work. As he had given excellent rules for the forming of a poet, he afterwards attempted to act up to those rules in the translation of the Æneid, but in this he totally failed. Virgil, as has been well observed, viewed through the medium of Trapp, appears an accurate writer, and the Æneid a well conducted fable; but discerned in Dryden's page he glows as a fire from heaven, and the Æneid is a continued series of whatever is great, elegant, pathetic, and sublime. Dr. Trapp was rector of Harlington, Middlesex, of Christ-church, Newgate-street, and St. Leonard's, Foster-lane, and lecturer of St. Lawrence, Jewry, and St. Martin's in the Fields. Though acquainted with the great he obtained no higher preferment. He died 22d November 1747, and left behind him an excellent character, as a critic, a scholar, a preacher, and as a man. He published Milton's Paradise Lost, in Latin verse—4 vols. of sermons—Abramule, a tragedy—a treatise on being over righteous—besides 2 vols. of his Prælectiones—a poem in the Muse Anglicanæ, and, among other poems, one on the duke of Ormond, of which only eleven copies were sold.

TRAVIS, George, a native of Royton, Lancashire, educated at Manchester school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards was promoted to Eastham vicarage, and Handley rectory, Cheshire, and obtained the archdeaconry of Chester, and a prebend in that church. He ably attacked Gibbon's history, and showed himself a strenuous assertor of the genuineness of the famous passage in 1 John v. 5. 7. about the three witnesses, against Griesbach, Porson, Marsh, and Pappelbaum. He died at Hampstead 24th April, 1797.

TREADWELL, John, LL.D., was born in Farmington, Connecticut, November 23, 1745. He graduated at Yale College in 1767; and studied law, but did not engage in the practice. He settled on his paternal estate, and for many years filled the office of judge of probate, and other courts. In 1809, he was elected Governor of Connecticut, and served in that office two years; at the end of which period, he retired altogether from public employments, to which he had been devoted for more than thirty years. He was the first president of the American foreign mission society, and was a generous contributor to that, and many other charitable institutions. He was a man of stern integrity, and tenacious of the truth; inflexible in the administration of justice, and ardently devoted to the promotion of sound morals, and equal rights. He died August 19, 1823, aged 77.

TREAT, Robert, a famous warrior, and afterwards Governor of Connecticut. In the war against King Philip, he commanded the Connecticut troops, and successively defeated the Indians at Springfield and Hadley, in Massachusetts. He was elected deputy governor, and governor, from 1676 to 1708; and during the greater part of a long life, rendered important services, not only to Connecticut, but to the whole northern confederacy, in their various wars with the Indians. He died July 12th, 1710, aged 88.

TREAT, Samuel, was the son of Robert Treat, governor of Connecticut, and was a graduate of Harvard College, of the class of 1669. He was the first minister of the congregational church in Eastham, Massachusetts, and was ordained in 1672. Having acquired a competent knowledge of the Indian dialects, he devoted himself to the instruction and civilization of the Indians in his vicinity. Many of them were converted to christianity, and became orderly and industrious citizens. He preached to them in their own language, and established schools among them, in which they were instructed in morals, and secular knowledge. He died March 13, 1717, aged 68, having discharged for the period of half a century, the office of a faithful, christian pastor. He published a confession of faith, in the Indian language; and the election sermon, 1713.

TREMBLEY, Abraham, a native of Geneva who retired to Holland, not to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, according to the wishes of his father. After being private tutor to some persons of distinction in Holland, he came to London, and undertook the education of the duke of Richmond. He returned to Geneva 1757, where he married, and became an useful member of the republic. He died there 1784, aged 74. His works are Memoirs on Polypus, 4to.—Instructions from a Father to his Children, on Natural Religion, 2 vols. 8vo.—Instructions on Natural Religion, 3 vols. 8vo.—Inquiries on Virtue and Happiness.

TREMELLIUS, Immanuel, a protestant divine, born at Ferrara, 1510, of Jewish parents. He was converted by Peter Martyr, and after visiting England and Holland, he settled at Heidelberg, where he was appointed Hebrew professor. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew at Sedan, where he died 1580. He published a translation of the Bible, much esteemed by Matt. Poole and others, and also a Latin version of the Syriac Testament.

TRENCHARD, John, an English patriot, born 1669. He was bred to the law, but never followed it as a profession. He was commissioner of forfeited estates in Ireland, and enjoyed independence and comfort, by the offices he held, and by marriage. He began publishing in 1697, and distinguished himself as a political writer. In 1720 he began with Thomas Gordon to publish in the London, and the British Journal, letters under the name of Cato, which were popular, and attracted much attention. He was member of parliament for Taunton, Somersetshire, and died 1723 of an ulcer in his kidneys. He published some pamphlets now forgotten. He is described by his friend Gordon as a man of extraordinary talents, and great probity, and one of the worthiest, ablest, and most useful men England ever produced.

TRENCK, Francis, baron de, a Prussian nobleman, who by his imprudent conduct drew upon him the displeasure of his government and was imprisoned. After a long captivity he escaped, and published his memoirs, which contain a curious account of his adventures and sufferings, but not always in the language of truth. He came to France during the revolution, and wishing to acquire popularity among the leaders of the state, he was arrested as a suspected person, and by the revolutionary tribunal sentenced to the guillotine. He suffered in the summer of 1794, aged 70.

TRESHAM, Henry, a painter and poet, was born in Ireland, and imbibed the principles of art from West, of Dublin. He accompanied Lord Cawdor to Italy, and resided for fourteen years in that country. On his return to England he became a royal academician. He died in 1814. Tresham wrote three poems; The Seasick Minstrel, Rome at the close of the Eighteenth century, and Britannicus to Bonaparte.

TRESSAN, Louis Elizabeth de la VERGNE, count de, a distinguished French officer and writer, was born, in 1705, at Mons; signalized his valor in the army during several campaigns, particularly at the battle of Fontenoy; was appointed grand marshal of the court of Stanislaus at Lorraine in 1750; was admitted into the French academy in 1781; and died in 1783. His select works form twelve volumes, and contain his miscellaneous pieces, and his translations of Amadis de Gaul, The Orlando Furioso, and several old French romances. Tressan did not confine himself to subjects of mere amusement; as early as 1749 he wrote a Treatise on Electricity, which was not published till more than thirty years afterwards.

TREVETT, Samuel R., a surgeon in the army of the United States, was born at Marblehead, Massachusetts, in 1733, and was graduated at Harvard College. After studying the profession of medicine, he commenced practice in Boston, but being naturally of a chivalrous cast of character, he sought and obtained an appointment in the medical department of the navy. He was in the Constitution during her cruise before the last war, on board the United States when she captured the Macedonian, and was in the President when she was captured by the British fleet. He distinguished himself very much by his intrepid conduct when a passenger in the steam boat Phoenix, which was burned on Lake Champlain, in September 1819.

After the war he was appointed surgeon of the Navy Yard at Charlestown, and in 1822 he was stationed as surgeon on board the sloop of war Peacock, bound on a summer cruise to the West Indies. He was seized with the yellow fever, and died at Norfolk in November of that year. For some time before sailing on his last cruise he had been engaged in collecting materials for the biography of American physicians.

TRIMMER, Sarah, an ingenious lady, was the daughter of Mr. Joshua Kirby, clerk of the works at Kew, and author of some treatises on Perspective, in which art he instructed their late majesties, as well as the present king. Sarah was born at Ipswich, January 6, 1741, and received an excellent education under the eye of her father. At the age of twenty-one she married Mr. Trimmer, by whom she had twelve children, to whose education she devoted herself with exemplary assiduity. She was also an active encourager of Sunday-schools; and published several useful books for the benefit of youth; some of which are in the list of publications dispersed by the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge. She died December 15, 1810.

TRISSINO, John George, an Italian poet, born at Vicenza, 1478. He studied at Milan and at Rome, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He was employed in some embassies by the pope, and universally respected for his talents as a negotiator. His second marriage 1526, and his fondness for a son, the fruit of this marriage, proved the source of misery to him. His eldest son was jealous of his partiality for this younger child, and sued his father for the property of his departed mother, in which he prevailed. This had such effect upon Trissino, that he died of chagrin at Rome, 1550. His works were published 2 vols. fol. Verona, 1720. His chief poem is Italy delivered from the Goths by Belisarius, in Italian, a work which displays genius and felicity of invention, though it does not possess the flights or beauties of Tasso. If he was not the greatest modern poet, he was the first who attempted an epic poem in blank verse, and in a language as yet unclassical.

TRIVULCE, John James, a native of Milan, banished from his country for his attachment to the Guelfs. He next entered into the service of the king of Arragon, and afterwards of Charles VIII. king of France, and for his meritorious actions was promoted to the rank of marshal of the kingdom. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Aiguadel in 1509, but the defeat of the French before Novara was attributed to his negligence, and therefore his character suffered much in the public estimation, till his services to Francis I. in the crossing of the Alps 1515, restored him to popularity. He afterwards distinguished himself at the battle of Marignan, and died at Arpajon, 5th December 1518, aged about 80. His relation, Theodore, was also marshal of France, and distinguished himself at the battle of Aignadel. He was made governor of Genoa by Francis I. and when obliged to surrender through famine to a besieging army, he retired to Lyons, where he died 1531. His brother Anthony was a cardinal, and four others of that family also were raised to the rank of cardinals in the 16th and 17th centuries.

TROMP, Martin Happertz, a native of Brille, who at the age of eight embarked for the Indies in the naval service of his country. He distinguished himself before Gibraltar, 1607, and by degrees rose from the lowest station to the chief command, and was made admiral of Holland. He defeated a numerous Spanish fleet in 1639, and signalized his valor in the service of his country in thirty-two other naval battles. He was killed on the quarter-deck while commanding the fleet which engaged the English ships under Albemarle, 10th August, 1653, and he was honored by his countrymen with a most splendid funeral in Delft church, where his remains were deposited. This brave man refused all titles, except that of father of the sailors.

TRONCHIN, Theodore, a physician, born at Geneva, 1704. He came to England with lord Bolingbroke his relation, and after studying at Cambridge he went to Leyden, where he devoted himself to medicine, under the care of the great Boerhaave. After taking his degrees he settled at Amsterdam as physician, but returned to Geneva in 1754, and two years after removed to Paris, where he inculcated some of the royal family with great success. He was much respected in this capital, and acquired great celebrity and equal independence. He died there 1781, deservedly lauded for his benevolence and humane attention to the diseases of the poor. He wrote de Nymphâ, 8vo.—de Colicâ Pictorum, 8vo. besides an edition of Baillon's works, and various communications to the Encyclopaedia.

TROTT, Nicholas, LL.D., by birth an Englishman. After having been governor of the Bahama Islands, he became a resident of South Carolina, near the close of the seventeenth century. He was elected speaker of the house of assembly of that province in the year 1700. Three years afterwards his name appears in the list of counsellors of the province. After this he became a judge, and in the discharge of the duties of this office displayed a profound acquaintance with law, and an extent of general erudition truly rare. He was deeply versed in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, as well as in the principles of jurisprudence, and for nearly forty years, was among the most influential men in South Carolina. He died in that province in the year 1740.

TROWBRIDGE, Edmund, an eminent lawyer of Massachusetts, who became a judge of the supreme court of that state. He was born at Newton in 1709, and graduated at Harvard college in 1728. He soon became distinguished in his profession; and, in 1749, was appointed attorney-general. In 1767 he was raised to the bench of the supreme court; and it devolved on him to preside at the trial of captain Preston of the British troops in Boston, for murder, on the 5th of March, 1770. Although he was attached to the royal government, he did not approve of all its measures; and, in 1772, alarmed at the revolutionary appearances, he resigned his office. From this time he lived in retirement, and died at Cambridge, April, 1793, aged 84 years. Such were his habits of critical investigation and unwearied application to study, that long after he had ceased to be employed publicly in his profession, he was much occupied in writing essays and forming learned readings upon difficult and abstruse questions in law. It has been asserted, that he was the most profound lawyer in New England prior to the revolution.

TRUBLET, Nicholas Charles Joseph, a native of St. Malo, who became member of the French academy, of the Berlin academy, and treasurer of the church of Nantes. He published Reflexions on Telemachus, which introduced him to la Mothe and Fontenelle, and he enjoyed the patronage of cardinal de Tencin, but preferred retirement and privacy to the honors which the court might have heaped upon him. His essays on literature and morality, 4 vols. 12mo. possess great merit, and have been translated into various languages. He wrote besides, memoirs of la Mothe and Fontenelle, and died March 1770, aged 73.

TRUCHET, John, a native of Lyons. He applied himself to philosophy and divinity, but mechanics proved his favorite pursuit. Under the patronage of the great Colbert, he paid attention to geometry and hydraulics, and his superior knowledge was consulted in the construction of canals and aqueducts. He also improved the mode of bleaching, and invented various machines for purposes of commerce, and for the promotion of the arts. This ingenious man, who had embraced the order of the Carmes, died at Paris 5th February 1729, aged 72. As he was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, he enriched their memoirs with valuable communications.

TRUMBULL, William, LL.D. an eminent statesman, born in Berkshire. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards fellow of All Souls, where he took his doctor's degree 1667. He was advocate in doctor's commons, was knighted 1684, and the next year sent envoy extraordinary to France. He was member for East Loo, and afterwards for Oxford university, and in 1695 was appointed secretary of state, but resigned two years after. The time of his death is not fully ascertained. He is described by Burnet as a most able civilian, and a very virtuous man. He is, however, chiefly known as the friend and correspondent of Pope the poet.

TRUMBULL, Jonathan, governor of Connecticut, the son of Joseph Trumbull, was born at Lebanon in 1710; and graduated at Harvard college, at the early age of seventeen. He early engaged in public affairs, and served his native colony in many important offices. In 1769, he was elected governor, which office he discharged with great skill and prudence for fourteen years, embracing the whole period of the revolution. In his official station, he enjoyed the confidence of Washington, and the other sages and patriots of that eventful period. When peace was established, governor Trumbull retired from public life, in which he had borne a distinguished part for near fifty years; and passed the remainder of his days amidst the domestic circle, and in preparation for his final change. He died August 17, 1785, aged 74. He wrote a dissertation upon the revolutionary war, which may be found in the collections of the Historical Society.

TRUMBULL, Jonathan, a son of the preceding, was born at Lebanon, March 26, 1740; and was educated at Harvard college, where he graduated in 1759. For several succeeding years, he resided in his native town; but when the revolution commenced, he was found among the foremost, in defence of his country's rights. In 1775, he was appointed pay-master to the northern department of the army, and continued in that office until the close of the campaign of 1778. He was soon afterwards attached to the family of Washington, in the capacity of secretary, and first aid. He enjoyed, in an eminent degree, the confidence and friendship of the commander-in-chief, with whom he continued until the close of the war. In 1789, he was a member of congress; and for ten years represented his native state in that body; in the House of Representatives, of which he was some years speaker; and in the Senate. In 1798, he was elected governor of Connecticut, and filled that office until his death, which occurred August 7, 1809, at the age of 69. Governor Trumbull was distinguished for extensive knowledge, dignified manners, and undeviating integrity.

TRUMBULL, John, LL.D., the author of M'Fingal, was born in Connecticut in 1750, and was educated at Yale College, where he entered at a very early age. In 1772 he published the first part of his poem, The Progress of Dulness. In the following year, he was admitted to the bar in Connecticut, and, removing to Boston, continued his legal studies in the office of John Adams. He returned to his native state in 1774, and commenced practice at New Haven. The first part of M'Fingal was published at Philadelphia, in 1775; the poem was completed and published in 1782 at Hartford, where the author at that time lived. More than thirty editions of this work have been printed. In 1789 he was appointed state-attorney for the county of Hartford, and in 1801 was appointed a judge of the superior court of errors and held this appointment till 1819. In 1820 a collection of his poems was published in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1825 he removed to Detroit, where he died, in May 1831.

TRUXTON, Thomas, an officer in the American navy, was born on Long Island in 1755. In 1775 he commanded a vessel, and distinguished himself by his depredations on British commerce during the revolution. He subsequently engaged in commerce, till the year 1794, when he was appointed to the frigate Constitution. In 1799 he captured the French frigate L'Insurgente; and in the following year he obtained a victory over the La Vengeance. On the close of the French war he retired from the navy, and died at Philadelphia in 1822.

TRUSLER, Dr. John, a literary compiler, was born in London in 1735. He was brought up to physic in a very humble line; but contrived to get into orders, and for some time officiated as a curate. At length, in 1771, he began to publish abridgments of popular sermons, printed in imitation of manuscript; and next he established a bookselling business upon an extensive scale. Having thus acquired a fortune, he purchased an estate at Englefield-green, where he died in 1820. His compilations are too numerous and contemptible to deserve farther notice. The best are his Hogarth Moralized, 8vo.; and a Compendium of Chronology, 12mo.

TSCHIRNER, Dr. Henry Gottlob, an eminent German theologian, chief minister of St. Thomas's church at Leipsic, and second professor of divinity in the University there, died in the fiftieth year of his age, February 17th, 1828. He was the author of Christian Apologetics; of Protestantism and Catholicism considered in a Political View, 1822; and of the System of Reaction, 1824. The two works last mentioned excited a great sensation in Germany at their first appearance, and were translated into different languages. Professor Tschirner, who was reckoned one of the most eloquent preachers of modern Germany, left a number of Sermons in MS. from which three volumes have been selected for publication. A posthumous work by the same writer, entitled the Fall of Paganism, in five books, forming 2 vols. 8vo. has been announced as the greatest of all his productions, the principal object of twenty years' research, presenting a faithful, complete, and animated picture of the most important events in the history of the world, and raising the author to a level with Gibbon, John Muller, Herder, &c.

TUCKER, Abraham, author of the Light of Nature Pursued, 9 vols. 8vo. published under the assumed name of Search, was possessed of an affluent fortune, and died at his seat, Betchworth castle near Dorking, Surrey, 1775. By his wife, daughter of E. Barker, esq. he had two daughters, one of whom married sir H. St. John. He was an amiable man in private life.

TUCKER, Josiah, D. D., an able divine. He was born at Laughan, Caermarthenshire 1711, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford. His first ecclesiastical preferment was a curacy at Bristol, and afterwards he became rector of St. Stephen's, then prebendary of the cathedral, and in 1758 dean of Gloucester. During the American war he drew much of the public attention upon himself by his pamphlets, in which he asserted the necessity of granting independence to the colonies, rather than to attempt to subdue them by arms, and though he was abused by the friends of the minister, his deductions proved prophetically true. As a writer on subjects of government, of commerce, and of politics, his opinion was highly respectable, and insured him the good opinion of the world. In his celebrated treatise on civil government he opposed the system of Locke, and proved himself no mean antagonist in the field of philosophy and reasoning. He published some sermons, and died at an advanced age, 1799.

TUCKER, John, D. D., was born at Amesbury, Massachusetts, in 1720, and graduated at Harvard college in 1741. After completing his theological studies, he was invited to become the colleague of the Rev. Christopher Tappan, minister of the church in Newbury, in the county of Essex; and was ordained, November 20, 1745. Doctor Tucker was a learned and popular preacher; and discharged the pastoral office with great acceptance to his people. When engaged in controversy, he never suffered himself to be carried away by temper or animosity; and although he could wield the pen of satire with great ingenuity, he was guided by what he honestly believed to be the truth. His long life was usefully and honorably spent with the parish where he was originally settled; and he died the 22d of March, 1792, aged 72. His printed works are, a sermon at the ordination of Edmund Noyes, 1751; four sermons, on various subjects, 1756; at thanksgiving, 1756; on the doctrines &c. of Jonathan Parsons, 1757; at the ordination of A. Moody, 1765; account of an ecclesiastical council, and a discourse, 1767; two sermons on the death of J. Lowell, 1767; remarks on a sermon of A. Hutchinson; and the reply of A. Hutchinson considered, 1768; a letter to J. Chandler; and a reply to Mr. Chandler's answer, 1768; remarks on Mr. Chandler's seniors address, 1768; at the convention of ministers, 1768; two sermons on salvation, 1769; at the election, 1771; remarks on a discourse of J. Parsons, 1774; the Dudleian Lecture, 1778; a sermon at Newburyport, 1788.

TUCKER, St. George, a judge of the United States District Court, in Virginia, died in November 1827. He published an essay on the connexion between the common law of England and the law of the United States; a treatise on slavery; letter on the alien and sedition laws, 1799; and commentaries on Blackstone.

TUCKEY, James Hingston, a nautical writer, was born, in 1778, at Greenhill, in the county of Cork; entered the navy at an early age, and went to India; was employed in surveying the coast of New South Wales; was taken prisoner by the French in 1805, and remained in captivity till 1814; and died in September, 1816, while commanding the expedition of discovery on the Congo river. He wrote Maritime Geography.

TUDOR, William, son of William Tudor, a Judge, and one of the most eminent citizens of Massachusetts, was born at Boston in 1777. He graduated at Harvard college, with distinguished honor, in 1796; and soon after, visited Europe for the improvement of his mind. He was an observant traveller, and treasured up, for future use, a vast and varied fund of information and anecdote. He returned to his native country, with an ardent desire for the improvement of his fellow citizens in arts and literature. He was the projector, and first editor, of the North American Review, which has since become identified with the literature of our country. In whatever Mr. Tudor undertook, he had a single eye to the intellectual advancement of his countrymen; no man in public life was ever more distinguished. When a member of the legislature of Massachusetts, he proposed many plans in aid of his favorite object; but they met with opposition from those, who, though they respected his motives, considered him a visionary. Several of his projects, have, however, since been accomplished, and in the very manner that he first suggested. In 1822, Mr. Tudor was appointed consul at the port of Lima; and subsequently was sent as Charge d'Affaires, at the court of the Emperor of Brazil. In this honorable station, Mr. Tudor acquired the personal affection of the Emperor, and the respect and admiration of the Corps Diplomatique. His character, as a literary man, and accomplished gentleman, had preceded him; and it was well observed, that his country was honored in such a representative. Mr. Tudor died at Rio de Janeiro, March 9, 1830, aged 53. Besides his contributions to several periodicals, and his critiques in the North American Review, he published a discourse before the Humane Society, 1817; letters on the Eastern States, 1820; miscellanies, 1821; and the life of James Otis, 1823.

TULL, Jethro, a gentleman, descended from an ancient Yorkshire family. He is ever to be celebrated as the first Englishman who bestowed particular attention to agriculture, and endeavored to reduce it to a regular system, and on consistent principles. He is the inventor of the drill plough. He travelled into France, and visited other parts of Europe, earnestly attentive to the improvements made in agriculture in foreign countries, and he introduced into practice his own plans on his farms in Oxfordshire and Berkshire. Though in some degree baffled by the stupidity and obstinacy of his laborers and the mechanics whom he employed, he demonstrated that by careful labor and due arrangement, the ground would produce in the course of thirteen years more plentiful crops than by the usual methods of manuring and of fallow. His neighbors who observed the rapid improvements of his land, prevailed upon him to publish his theory, which appeared in 1733. His essay on Horse-hoeing Husbandry, fol. was so popular that it was translated into French by du Hamel. He published other agricultural tracts, and died 3d June, 1740.

TULLY, Thomas, D. D., a native of Carlisle, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he became tutor and fellow. He was in 1642, elected master of Tetbury grammar school, but he soon quitted the appointment for a college life. He was made head of St. Edmund hall 1657, and at the restoration he took his degree of Doctor of Divinity, and became chaplain to the king. He was made dean of Rippon 1675, and died the next year, aged 56. He was author of Logica Apodictica, 8vo. and some other theological tracts, besides controversial pieces against Bull and Baxter on the subject of justification.

TULLY, George, a relation of the preceding, born also at Carlisle, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was author of a Discourse on the Government of the Thoughts, 8vo.—and published a Translation of Plutarch's Morals—of Miltiades' Life by Corn. Nepos, and of Julius Cæsar by Suetonius, with notes. He published besides some sermons and theological tracts. He obtained a prebend of Rippon, and the rectory of Galeside near Newcastle, and the sub-deanery of York cathedral. He died 1695, aged 42.

TUNSTALL, James, an able divine, born 1710, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. He was presented 1739, to Sturmer rectory, Essex, and in 1741 elected public orator of the university. He was chaplain afterwards to Potter the primate, who gave him Great Chart rectory in Kent. He died universally respected, 28th March, 1772. He wrote Epistola ad Virum Erudit. Conyers Middleton,—Academica, or Discourses on Natural and Revealed Religion—a Vindication of the Power of the State to prohibit Clandestine Marriages.

TURELL, Ebenezer, a learned and pious minister, was born in Boston, about the year 1702. He graduated at Harvard college in 1721; and was ordained to the ministry in Medford near Boston, November 25, 1724. For fifty-four years, Mr. Turell was the good and faithful shepherd of a flock, which listened to his voice, and obeyed his call. There are those yet alive, who can testify, with what care and affection, he ministered to their spiritual and temporal necessities. As a citizen, his love of country was ardent and sincere; and in every exigency, he was ready at her call. He died, December 5, 1778, aged 76. He was the author of the life of Dr. Colman published in 8vo. 1749.

TURENNE, Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, viscount de, second son of the duke of Bouillon, by Elizabeth daughter of William I. of Nassau, prince of Orange, was born at Sedan 11th September 1611. He was alive from his earliest years to military glory, and found particular delight in reading Curtius on the exploits of Alexander the Great. In 1635 he reduced with great rapidity the castle of Solre in Hainault, with a garrison of two thousand men, and the next year so signalized himself at the taking of Brisach, that Richelieu admiring his valor, offered him his niece in marriage, an honor which as he was a protestant he declined. Italy was in 1639, the scene of his valor, and in 1642, he assisted at the conquest of Rousillon, and two years after in reward for his able services, during seventeen years under various generals, he was made marshal of France, and appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Germany. He crossed the Rhine with a small force, and though defeated at Mariendal 1645, he recovered, three months after, at the victory of Northlingen, the honor of his army. In 1645, he reestablished the elector of Treves in the possession of his dominions, and the following year he formed an union with the Swedish army under Wrangel, after a march of 140 leagues, and by this masterly manœuvre, obliged the duke of Bavaria to sue for peace. When the duke soon after violated the peace which he had made with France, Turenne again attacked him, and gaining over him the famous battle of Zusmarshausen, he obliged him to quit his dominions. In the civil wars which soon after distracted France, Turenne at first embraced the party of the rebellious princes, and was defeated near Rhetel in 1650, by du Plessis-Prassin, but the following year he was reconciled to the court, and obtained the command of the royal army. He was successfully employed in checking the progress of Condé to whom he was opposed, and after some skilful manœuvres on the Loire, the Seine, and the Marne, he went in 1654 to raise the siege of Arras, which was pressed by the Spaniards, and the following year he took Condé, St. Guillan, and other towns. In 1657 he took St. Venant and Martiel, and joined the forces of Cromwell in taking Dunkirk, which was followed by the fall of Oudenarde, Ypres, and other Flemish towns.

The peace of the Pyrenees in 1659, put an end to the war between France and Spain, but in 1667, it was renewed, and Turenne, again placed at the head of military operations, had the honor of instructing the king his master in the art of war. His success was so rapid, that the Spaniards sued for peace the next year, and about this time the general renounced the tenets of the protestants for the catholic faith. In the war against Holland the experienced general took forty Dutch towns in twenty-two days, and in 1672 and the following year, he pursued to the gates of Berlin the elector of Brandenburg, who had come to the assistance of the Dutch, and obliged him to sue for peace. His conquest of Franche Comté in 1674, occasioned a powerful league in the empire against Louis XIV. but Turenne, ever active in the service of his master, suddenly marched into the Palatinate, and defeated at Sintzein a German army under the duke of Lorraine, and laid waste the country so effectually, that from the top of his castle at Manheim the elector Palatine could see two cities and twenty-five villages around him in flames. After this campaign, in which more cruelty was exercised than humanity could defend, Turenne retreated to Lorraine, and defeated the Imperialists at Mulhausen, and again in a more terrible battle at Turkheim, and compelled them to recross the Rhine 1675. These disasters did not dishearten the cabinet of Vienna, who determined to place at the head of their armies Montecuculli, a general worthy to oppose the victorious Turenne, and these two illustrious characters were going to decide the valor of their troops and their own superiority near the village of Saltzbach, when the French hero, examining a spot on which to erect a battery, was unfortunately killed by a cannon ball, 27th July 1675, aged 64. In the midst of his victories, Turenne was particularly attentive to the comforts of his soldiers; he not only watched for their glory, but their welfare was the greatest wish of his heart. In his private conduct he was modest and unassuming, and when at the treaty of the Pyrenees, the kings of Spain and France introduced to each other the chief persons of their court, Turenne was found concealed among the crowd, and when presented to the Spanish monarch, Philip observed to his sister, Anne of Austria, 'that is the man who has made me pass so many sleepless nights.'

TURGOT, Michael Stephen, president of the parliament at Paris, was an active and popular magistrate. He contributed much to adorn Paris, and to promote the comforts of its inhabitants. He left three sons, and died 1751, aged 52.

TURGOT, Anne Robert James, an eminent statesman, youngest son of the preceding, was born at Paris, 10th May, 1727. He studied divinity at the Sorbonne, where he pronounced two Latin discourses with great applause, one on the advantages derived from the christian religion, and the other on the progress of the human mind, and at the age of twenty-four he began a translation of the Georgics of Virgil. His abilities recommended him to the court, and for twelve years he was intendant of Limoges, where he promoted commerce and industry, and opened sources of opulence by the making of new roads, and the digging of canals. Called by the favor of Louis XVI. to the office of comptroller-general of the finances, he devoted himself zealously to improve the resources of the kingdom, and to lessen the burdens of the people without diminishing the revenues of the state. His plans were grand, liberal, and useful; but unfortunately he was opposed by those who were possessed of power rather than of an enlightened mind, and his measures were ridiculed by the profligate and the vicious, who rioted on the miseries of the people, and he at last retired from a situation which he had adorned by his talents and his integrity. His ministry was, indeed, short, but very popular and useful, and he carried into his retirement the good wishes and the regret of the people. He died of the gout, 18th March 1781, aged 49. Memoirs of his life and of his works were published by Condorcet, in 1782, 8vo.

TURNEBUS, Adrian, a French critic born 1512, at Andely in Normandy. He studied at Paris, and acquired great reputation for his application, learning, and critical knowledge. He taught polite literature at Toulouse, and in 1547 became Greek professor at Paris, where his lectures were most numerously attended. In 1552 he superintended the royal press for Greek books, but resigned three years after. He died 12th June, 1565. Not only his extensive erudition, but his amiable manners, entitled him to the general praise which has been bestowed upon his character, and from the Scaligers, Scioppius, Huetics, Montaigne and others, he has been deservedly mentioned as possessing great powers of mind. His works, all in Latin, were printed in 1 vol. folio, Strasburg 1600, and his Adversaria, an excellent book in 3 vols. folio, Paris. His works chiefly consist of valuable notes on Cicero, Varro, Thucydides, and Plato—Latin poems—translations from Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plutarch, and other authors.

TURNER, William, a native of Morpeth, Northumberland, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He warmly embraced the tenets of the reformation, and preached to various congregations, till Gardiner, jealous of his popularity, imprisoned him. When liberated he went to the continent, and took his doctor's degree of medicine at Ferrara. He returned to England, on Edward's accession, and was made dean of Wells, but he went into exile, under Mary, till the elevation of Elizabeth recalled him, and restored him to his ecclesiastical honors. He wrote a treatise on the baths of England, and Germany—a complete Herbal, or History of Plants, fol.—Historia de Naturis Herbarum, Schollis & Notis Vallata, 8vo.—and other botanical works, and died 1568.

TURNER, Thomas, an able divine, born at Reading, Berks, and educated at St. John's college, of which he became fellow. He was in 1629 made residentiary of St. Paul's, and chaplain to Charles I. whom he accompanied in his expedition to Scotland, and in 1641, he was made dean of Rochester, and soon after of Canterbury. These dignities, and particularly the favor of Charles, rendered him very suspected to the parliament, and during the civil wars, he was stripped of his preferment, with every mark of cruel insult, and meditated ignominy. The restoration replaced him in his ecclesiastical offices, and he died 1672, aged 81.

TURNER, Francis, son of the above, was educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, and he afterwards obtained a prebend of St. Paul's, and the deanery of Windsor. He was in 1683, made bishop of Rochester, and the next year removed to Ely, but his opposition to the king's measures rendered him unpopular at court, and he was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths to William, and was consequently deprived of his preferment. He wrote some sermons, besides religious poems, and the life of Nicholas Ferrar, and died in privacy, 1700.

TURNER, Robert, an English divine, who quitted the kingdom to preserve his attachment to the Romish church. He was for some time in the service of the duke of Bavaria, who employed him in negotiations, and he afterwards became canon of Breslaw, and died at Gratz 1597. He wrote commentaries on Scripture and other theological works.

TURPIN, F. H., a native of Caen. He became a professor of belles lettres in his native town, and afterwards at Paris, and acquired some celebrity as a writer. He published the lives of the great Condé, and of marshal Choiseul—History of the Government of Ancient Republics—Life of Mahomet, 3 vols. 12mo.—Civil and Natural History of Siam, 2 vols. 12mo.—Universal History, 4 vols.—History of the Alcoran, 2 vols.—The French Plutarch. He died at Paris 1799, aged 90.

TURRETIN, John Alphonsus, was born at Geneva, 1671. In encouragement of his great talents, a professorship of ecclesiastical history was founded for him at Geneva. After travelling over Holland, France, and England much respected by the learned and the great, he died at Geneva 1st May 1737. He wrote, Dissertations 3 vols. 4to.—Sermons—An Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History—treatises on the Truth of the Jewish religion.

TWINING, Thomas, an elegant Greek scholar, well known for his translation of the Poetics of Aristotle, in one volume 4to. He was a native of London, and finished his education at Sidney college, Cambridge, where he proceeded M. A. 1763. He was presented to the living of St. Mary's, Chichester, by Dr. Porteus bishop of London, and he died there in 1804.

TWISS, William, a native of Newbury, Berks, educated at Winchester school and New college, Oxford. He became a zealous defender of the tenets of the presbyterians, and was made president of the Westminster assembly of divines, and rector of St. Andrew's Holborn. He wrote Vindiciæ Gratia Potestatis & Providentiæ Del, fol.—Four Dissertations de Scientiâ Medicâ, fol.—Riches of God's Love, and other theological works which tended to prove his strong attachment to the doctrines of Calvin. He died 1645.

TWISS, Richard, an English tourist, after a journey to Scotland, went successively to Holland, the Netherlands, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, and Bohemia. He spent several years in travelling through these countries, and returned to England in 1770: two years after he took a voyage to Portugal and Spain, and in 1775 went to Ireland. At the period of the Revolution he revisited France, and returning home devoted the latter part of his life to literature and the arts, particularly music. His works are, Travels through Spain and Portugal in 1772 and 1773—1775, 4to., translated into French and German; A Tour in Ireland in 1775—1776, 8vo.; in which the freedom of the author's animadversions provoked the wrath of the Hibernians, and occasioned the publication of An Heroic Epistle from Donna Teresa Pinnay Ruiz of Murcia to R. Twiss, with Notes by himself, Dublin, 1770, 8vo.; Anecdotes of the Game of Chess; A Trip to Paris in July and August 1792—1793, 8vo.; and Miscellanies, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. He died at an advanced age in 1821.

TYLER, John, governor of Virginia, was elected in 1808. He was one of the leading revolutionary characters of Virginia, was many years a member of the house of delegates, and in 1781 succeeded Mr. Benjamin Harrison as speaker. After being governor he was judge of the district court of the United States for Virginia, and died, at his seat in Charles county, January 6th, 1813. He was simple in his manners, distinguished for the uprightness and fidelity with which he discharged his official duties, and enjoyed in an uncommon degree the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens.

TYLER, James, was a native of Scotland, and came to this country in 1796. He was a man of profound and various learning, and was one of the editors of the Encyclopedia Britannica. He was also author of a treatise on the plague and yellow fever; and of an answer to Paine's Age of Reason. He was drowned in Salem, in January 1804, aged about 53.

TYNDAL, William, an English reformer. He was born on the borders of Wales, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he imbibed the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards went to Cambridge, and then settled on the continent that he might with greater security print his translation of the New Testament into English. His translation was well received in England, though the catholics exerted themselves with the aid of a royal proclamation to suppress it. He afterwards translated the five books of Moses, and intended further labor, but the papists of England were so enraged against him that they employed a spy of the name of Philips to betray him, and he was seized as a heretic at Antwerp, where he had fixed his residence. Philips was so active, that though the English merchants in Antwerp interested themselves in his favor, and lord Cromwell wrote for his release, he was condemned to die. He was first strangled, then burnt near Filford castle, eighteen miles from Antwerp, 1536. He was a man of persevering spirit, and great zeal as a reformer, and was therefore called the apostle of England. His history is mentioned in Fox's Martyrs. He wrote some other things.

TYRWHITT, Thomas, an eminent scholar, born 1730. He was sent from Kensington to Eton, and then entered at Queen's college, Oxford, from whence he was, in 1755, elected fellow of Merton. He was, in 1756, under-secretary at war to lord Barrington, and in 1761 became principal clerk of the house of Commons, which office he resigned, six years after, to Mr. Hatsell. In 1784 he was elected curator of the British museum, and died 1786, universally respected, as well for learning as for gentleness and amiableness of temper seldom equalled. His works, twelve in number, display labor, as well as taste and judgment. The best known of his publications are Observations on some passages in Shakspeare—Poetical translations of Pope's Messiah, of Philips Splendid Shilling, into Latin, and Pindar's eighth Isthmian ode into English—Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, 5 vols. 8vo.—Rowley's poems, written by Chatterton, with a vindication against Bryant, the dean of Exeter, and others—de Lapidibus, a Greek poem attributed to Orpheus—an oration of Iseus against Meneclæus—Aristotle's Poetics.

TYSON, Edward, a native of Bristol, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he studied medicine, and took his degrees. Dr. Tyson afterwards settled in London, and acquired a very extensive practice. He became physician to Bethlehem and Bridewell hospitals, and died very suddenly, 1708, aged 58. He was fellow of the royal society, and communicated some valuable papers to its transactions. His works are Phocæna, or anatomy of a porpoise, 4to. Ephemeris Vita, or the natural history of the Ephemeron, 4to.—Ourang Outang, or comparison of the anatomy of the Pigny, the Ape, the Monkey, and Man, 4to.

TYTLER, William, an able antiquary, born at Edinburgh 1711. He published the poetical remains of James I. of Scotland—a dissertation of Scottish music—an inquiry into the evidence against Mary queen of Scots, an able work, which, in reflecting on the conclusions of Robertson and Hume, endeavored to turn away the tide of unpopularity from that unfortunate queen. This last work passed through several editions. He died advanced in life, and highly respected for his private and public character. He left two sons.

TYTLER, Alexander Fraser, son of the former. This elegant and accomplished scholar died suddenly at Edinburgh on the 5th of January, 1813, too recently to allow us to collect materials even for a sketch of his life. He formerly held the important situation of deputy judge-advocate for Scotland, and professor of universal history in the university of Edinburgh. He published a Treatise on Military Law, which is held in high estimation, in 1 vol. 8vo.; and Elements of General History in 2 vols. 8vo., which has run through several editions. He published also a very valuable Essay on Translation, in 1 vol. 8vo.; and, very recently, An Historical and Critical Essay on the Life and Character of Petrarch, 8vo. He was appointed a senator of the College of Justice, in 1802, and, according to the custom of the Scottish judges, assumed the title of lord Woodhouselee. He was made a commissioner of judiciary in 1811. He was a respectable and upright judge, and particularly distinguished as a polite scholar and elegant writer.

TZETZES, John, a celebrated grammarian of Constantinople. He shone as a great scholar and a most accomplished man, and it is said his memory was so retentive that he could repeat all the scriptures by heart. He wrote valuable commentaries on the Alexander of Lycophon, published by Potter, in his edition of that poet, 1697. He wrote also, Chiliades, an elaborate work—Scholia on Hesiod—epigrams and poems—pieces on grammar—Allegories on Homer, dedicated to the empress Irene who died 1158, which proves the author to have flourished in the middle of the twelfth century.

UGHELLI, Ferdinand, a native of Florence, who entered among the Cistercians, and distinguished himself by his learning, his humility, and his other virtues. He died at Rome, 19th May, 1670, aged 75. He published Italia Sacra, 9 vols, fol. 1662, and 10 vols, fol. 1722.

UULKENS, James Albert, divine and naturalist, was born at Wierum, near Groningen, in 1772, and was passed through his academical studies at Groningen with reputation. In 1795 he took the degree of M.D. On proceeding doctor in philosophy, he supported an ingenious thesis, On the Nature of the Atmosphere; and afterwards produced an Elementary Treatise on Physic, for which he obtained the prize offered by a learned society. This work became very popular. His Discourse on the Perfections of the Creator considered in the Creature, 4 vols. 8vo., is another valuable piece, as also are his Memoir on the Utility of Insects; and his Manual of Technology. In 1815 he was chosen to the newly established chair of Rural Economy at Groningen, and in 1819, published a treatise on that subject. He died in 1825, having written several other works.

ULFELD CORNIFIX, count de, son of the Danish minister, was patronised by Christian IV., king of Denmark, whose natural daughter he married. His ambition and his intrigues rendered him suspected to the next monarch, Frederic III., and he fled to Sweden, where Christina received him with open arms. After that queen's death he returned to Copenhagen, but his intentions were interpreted as hostile to the government, and he was again obliged to fly for protection abroad. He lived for some time in disguise at Basil, but being discovered, he sailed down the Rhine, and died of cold in the vessel in which he had embarked, February, 1664, aged 60, and was buried at the foot of a neighboring tree.

ULLOAY PEREIRA, Lewis de, a Spanish poet, born at Toro, in Leon. He gained the protection of Philip IV. by his sonnets and other poetical pieces, and by the friendship of the duke of Olivares, he obtained the government of the province of Leon. He died 1660. Though great in the comic and the burlesque, he was equally successful in the grave and the serious. The best of his poems is Rachael, or the Loves of Alphonso VIII. His works were printed together, 1674, in 4to.

ULLOA, Don Anthony de, an able Spanish naval officer and mathematician, was born, in 1716, at Seville, entered the navy in 1733; and at the age of only nineteen was chosen as one of the scientific characters who were appointed to measure a degree of the meridian in Peru. He was ten years a resident in South America. After his return he rose to high rank in the navy, and was employed in various important offices by the government. Spain is indebted to him for many important improvements. He died in 1795. He published his Travels, and a Physico-Historical work on South America.

ULPHILAS, or WULFILAS, a Gothic bishop, who flourished about the middle of the fourth century. He was deputed by the Goths, in 377, to obtain leave from the Emperor Valens to settle in one of the Roman provinces. His decease is supposed to have taken place in the following year. He translated the Gospels, and some other parts of the Scriptures, into the Gothic language.

ULPIAN, Domitius, an eminent lawyer, minister of state to the emperor Alexander Severus. He was very hostile to the Christians. He was assassinated by the soldiers, 226. Some fragments of his works are extant.

ULRICA, Eleonora, second daughter of Charles XI. of Sweden, was born 1688, governed the kingdom during the absence of her brother Charles XII., and after his death she was proclaimed queen, 1719. The following year she resigned the crown to her husband Frederic of Hesse-Cassel, with whom she shared the honors of royalty; but such was the ascendancy of the nobles, that they obliged their sovereigns to acknowledge their right to the throne as the unbiassed election of the people. Ulrica, by a wise administration, contributed to restore peace and prosperity to the nation, and died much respected, 1741. The wife of Charles XI. of Sweden, and the mother of the preceding, also bore the name of Ulrica, and died 1693, in consequence of the chagrin which her husband's treatment had occasioned. When she supplicated his compassion in favor of those whom his government oppressed, he spurned her from him, observing, 'that he had taken her to give him children, not advice.'

ULUG-BEIG, a Persian prince, celebrated for his knowledge of astronomy. His catalogue of fixed stars, rectified for 1434, was published by Thomas Hyde at Oxford in 1665 in 4to. with learned and useful notes. This worthy prince was put to death by his own son 1449, after reigning forty years at Samarcand. Another learned work on Chronology, in Arabic, has been attributed to him, and it has been edited in the original with a Latin translation by John Greaves, London 1650, in 4to.

UPTON, James, a native of Cheshire, elected from Eton to a fellowship at king's college, Cambridge. He obtained the headship of Taunton grammar school, Somersetshire, and died there 1749, aged 79. He was an excellent scholar, and published a valuable edition of Aristotle's Art of Poetry, and also Ascham's School Master, 1711, with notes, 8vo. His son James, born at Taunton, received his education at Exeter college, Oxford, and obtained Rissington rectory, Gloucestershire, and a Rochester prebend. Besides Observations on Shakspeare, 8vo. he published an edition of Epictetus, 2 vols. 4to.—and Spenser's Fairy Queen, 2 vols. 4to. and died 1760.

URBAN I., pope after Calixtus I. 223, was beheaded seven years after under the persecution of Alexander Severus.

URBAN II., Odon, a priest of Cluni, made a cardinal by Gregory VII., and chosen pope after Victor III. 1080. He held the council of Clermont, where the crusade against the infidels was first published. He died at Rome 1099, respected for his wisdom, moderation, and courage.

URBAN III., Hubert Criveli, archbishop of Milan, was elected pope after Lucius III., 1185, and died two years after.

URBAN IV., James Pantaleon, a native of Troyes, who rose from obscurity to consequence in the church, and on the death of Alexander IV., was elected pope 1261. He published a crusade against Manfred king of Sicily, and died 1264.

URBAN V., William de Grimoald, was born at Grisac in the Gevaudan, and was elected pope 1362, after the death of Innocent VI. He removed in 1367 from Avignon, where the popes had constantly resided since 1304, and by fixing his abode at Rome he became popular. In 1370, he again retired to Avignon, and died there at the end of that year. He was a liberal patron to learned and religious bodies, and founded several churches and colleges. He also reformed abuses, and was not, like other popes, lavish of the treasures of the church in enriching his family.

URBAN VI., Bartholomew Prignano, a native of Naples, made archbishop of Bari, and elected to the papedom without the ordinary forms, in a popular sedition 1378. The cardinals soon after chose Robert de Geneva, who assumed the name of Clement VII., and this double election was the source of a schism in the church. Urban supported by England, Hungary, Bohemia, and the empire, exercised the severest cruelties upon his enemies, so that his death 1389 was regarded by the people as a happy event.

URBAN VII., John Baptist Castagna, was elected pope after Sixtus V. 1590, and died twelve days after, much lamented, in consequence of the happy days which the Romans expected from his many virtues.

URBAN VIII., Maffeo Barberini, a native of Florence, elected pope after Gregory XV. 1623. He united the duchy of Urbino to the holy see, and published a bull against the tenets of the Jansenists. He died 29th July, 1644. He was an excellent poet, and so good a Grecian, that he was called the Attic Bee. His poems, consisting of paraphrases from the psalms, odes, hymns, and epigrams, have been published at Paris, fol.

URQUIJO, Mariano Lewis, chevalier de, a modern Spanish minister, was born in Old Castile in 1763, and travelling when very young, passed some years in England, where he is said to have acquired those liberal ideas which had much influence on his character. Returning home, he published a translation of Voltaire's tragedy on the death of Cæsar, with a Discourse on the Origin and present state of the Spanish Theatre. He was now employed under the secretary of state, count d'Aranda; and, during the ministry of Godoy, became secretary of state for foreign affairs. In this important office he acted on the most enlightened principles, and succeeded in greatly curbing the power of the inquisition and of the clergy. Having, however, offended Godoy, he was at length disgraced, and towards the close of 1800 confined at Pampeluna. He languished here several years in the most severe imprisonment, being debarred the use of paper, ink, books, and even light. Ferdinand VII., in 1808, declared the persecutions of Urquijo to be unjust, and he was set at liberty. He endeavoured to prevent that prince from taking his journey to Bayonne, but finally himself accepted the office of secretary of the junta of Spanish notables assembled at Bayonne, and after that of minister of state. He had the satisfaction to see the inquisition suppressed by Buonaparte in 1808, and by the Cortes in 1813. After the reverses of the French in Spain he was obliged to follow king Joseph Buonaparte; and, in 1814, he fixed his residence at Paris. He died there May 3d, 1817.

URSINS, Anne Mary de la Tremouille, took for her second husband Flavio des Ursins, and became lady of honor to the queen of Spain. She was a woman of great powers of mind, very intriguing in her conduct, and possessed of such influence in the court that she guided the affairs of the nation. She was banished from Spain 1712, on the marriage of Philip V. with Elizabeth Farnese, and after seeking in vain an asylum at Paris, Genoa, and Avignon, she at last settled at Rome, where she died 5th December 1712, aged 80.

URSINUS, Zachary, a native of Breslau in Silesia. He studied at Wittenberg, and attended Melancthon at the conference of Worms 1557. The next year he was appointed over the academy of Breslau, but when he declared himself a Calvinist he was exposed to severe persecution, and with difficulty found an asylum at Zurich. He was in 1561 invited by the university of Heidelberg to fill the chair of theology, but on the death of his patron Frederic, the elector palatine, he was obliged to abandon his situation. From Heidelberg he removed to Neustadt, where he was appointed divinity professor, and where he died soon after, 1583, aged 49. He was a man of great learning, but in his disposition was violent and passionate. His works have been edited in 3 vols. fol.

URSINUS, John Henry, a Lutheran divine, eminent for his learning in sacred and profane history. He was superintendant of the churches of Ratisbon, and died there 14th May, 1667, author of Exercitationes de Zoroastro, Hermete, 8vo.—Sylvæ Theologiæ Symbolicæ, 12mo.—de Ecclesiis German. Origine, 8vo. 1664.—His son George Henry was author of Diatribe de Taprobanâ, Cerne, &c.—Disputatio de Locustis—Observationes Philologicæ and Critical notes on Virgil. He died 10th September 1707, aged 60.

URSUS, Nicolas Raymarus, a Danish mathematician. Though originally a swine-herd, and unacquainted with the letters of the alphabet, before his 18th year he made the most rapid progress; and with scarce any instruction he became a very eminent astronomer. He taught mathematics at S. asburg, and afterwards removed at the solicitation of the emperor to Prague, where he died about the year 1600. He published some mathematical works, and made some discoveries in astronomy, in consequence of which he disputed for a time with Tycho-Brahe, about the priority of the discovery of his celestial system.

USHER, James, an illustrious prelate, born of an ancient family at Dublin, 4th January 1580. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, which had been founded by his uncle Henry Usher, archbishop of Armagh, and here he acquired so much knowledge and studied with such assiduity, that before his sixteenth year he had completed a chronicle of the bible as far as the book of Kings, which became the foundation of his great work, the Annals. To be more perfectly acquainted with the true doctrines of christianity, he applied himself to the reading of the Fathers, and in eighteen years, in his thirty-eighth year, after astonishing perseverance, he completed this laborious undertaking. Though his friends wished him to follow the law, he preferred divinity, and after his father's death he devoted himself to his favorite pursuits, and gave up the whole of his patrimony, with little exception, to his brothers and sisters, to avoid the troubles of law-suits and family quarrels. Soon after he was admitted into orders, he visited England to purchase books and MSS. for Dublin college, and in 1607, he was appointed chancellor of St. Patrick's church, and divinity professor to the university. He was, in 1610, unanimously elected provost of Dublin college, but he declined the honor. Though represented by some of his enemies as a puritan, he was, in 1620, nominated by James I. to the see of Meath. His reputation was now so great as an author, and as the champion of the protestant church, that the king, a little before his death, promoted him to the see of Armagh, and in this elevated situation he showed himself vigilant and active against the extravagant claims of the catholics, and maintained, by his zeal and exemplary conduct, the dignity of the churchman, and the meekness of the christian. He visited England, with his family, in 1640, but the breaking out of the rebellion, the next year, prevented his return to his diocese, where his palace was nearly destroyed, and all his property plundered. To compensate his losses, the king granted him the bishopric of Carlisle; but as the Scotch armies were quartered there, he derived little or no benefit from the appointment. From Oxford, where he had removed, he retired, in consequence of the ruined state of the king's affairs, to Cardiff, and then to the castle of St. Donate's, in Wales, where he was afflicted with an almost fatal disease. So great was his attachment to his unfortunate master, that he was consulted by him in the treaty of the Isle of Wight, about the government of the church; but though his zeal for the royal cause was unshaken, he remained unmolested. During the usurpation, Cromwell desired once to see him, and treated him with great civility; but never fulfilled the promises which he had made to him in favor of the church. This truly great and virtuous man died 21st March, 1655-6, aged 80. His valuable library, consisting of ten thousand volumes, printed and manuscript, though solicited by the king of Denmark, and by cardinal Mazarin, was, as he wished, bestowed on Dublin college. As a scholar, Usher was highly respectable, acute as a critic, well informed as a divine, and as a prelate, meek but dignified; the friend of order, religion, and morality. His reputation was so well established for classical knowledge and deep erudition, that, during the civil wars, which distracted his country, he was solicited to accept a professor's chair at Leyden, and invited by Richelieu to settle in France, with a promise of protection, and the free exercise of his religion. His works are, Annals of the Old and New Testament, best edited at Geneva, 2 vols. fol. 1722—a Body of Divinity, folio—the History of Goteschale, in Latin—Antiquitates Ecclesiarum Britannicarum, fol.—editions of the Letters of Ignatius, Barnabas, and Polycarp, with learned notes, 2 vols. 4to.—a treatise on the London Edition of the Septuagint—sermons.

USHER, John, a British agent, who held some important trusts in New England, during its early history. For a considerable time, he was a counsellor, and treasurer of Massachusetts; and he was employed for the province, in purchasing the district of Maine. Subsequently he was appointed lieutenant governor of New Hampshire, but did not render himself popular in that capacity. He was considered subservient to the British ministry beyond what was consistent with the doctrine of colonial rights. On being relieved from the government he returned to Massachusetts. Afterwards he went to New York, where he died, but the exact period of his death is not known.

UTENHOVIUS, Charles, a native of Ghent, who studied at Paris, and afterwards went to England, where he defended the government, and the religion of Elizabeth, for which he was liberally rewarded. He returned to Cologne, where he died of an apoplexy 1600, aged 64. He was the friend of Turnebus, and published, Latin poems—Epistolarum Centuria—Mythologia Æsopica Metro-Elegiaco, 8vo. 1607.

UXELLES, Nicolas Chalons du Blé, marquis de, a French general, distinguished for his defence of Mayence for fifty-six days, against a powerful besieging army. He was afterwards plenipotentiary at Gertruydenberg and Utrecht, and was made marshal of France. He continued long a favorite at the court of Louis XIV. and at that of the regent, and died 1780, in a good old age.

V.

VACHET, John Anthony le, a French ecclesiastic, born at Romans in Dauphiné. He devoted the riches which he inherited from his noble family, to charitable purposes, and died 6th February 1681, aged 73, much respected for his works of piety. He wrote various treatises on religious subjects.

VACQUERIE, John de la, first president of the parliament of Paris, is celebrated for the firmness of his address to Louis XI. when he wished to enforce some unpopular taxes. Sire, exclaimed he, at the head of the parliament, we resign our offices into your hands, and we are determined rather to endure the severity of your displeasure, than wound our consciences.

VADE, John Joseph, a native of Ham, in Picardy, who made amends for the irregularities of his youth by the excellence of his poetical productions. He is the author of that kind of poetry which the French called Poissard, which paints in low, but natural characters, the various occupations of vulgar life. He was, among poets, what Teniers is among painters, and his parodies, songs, bouquets, fables, epistles, &c. possess great merit, with all the vivacity and boldness of the rustic muse. The dissipated life which he led shortened his days, so that he died 4th July, 1757, at the early age of 37. His works have been collected in 4 vols. 12mo.

VADIAN, Joachim, a native of St. Gal, in Switzerland, well acquainted with literature, mathematics, medicine, and philosophy. He was honored with the laurel crown for his literary merits, by the emperor of Germany, and died 1551, aged 66. He wrote, Commentaries on Pomponius Mela, folio—a treatise on Poetry, and other works in Latin.

VAHL, Martin, a Norwegian naturalist and botanist, was born, in 1749, at Bergen; studied natural history, at Copenhagen and Upsal, under Stroem and Linnæus; was sent to travel, at the king's expense, over various parts of Europe and the African coast; and died, in 1804, professor of botany and inspector of the botanic garden at Copenhagen. Among his works are, Symbolæ Botanice—Eclogæ Americanæ—Enumeratio Plantarum—and a part of the Danish Zoology.

VAILLANT, John Foy, a celebrated French medalist, born at Beauvais, 24th May, 1632. He studied jurisprudence, and afterwards medicine, in which he took his doctor's degree; but the sight of a number of medals, which a peasant had found in digging in a neighboring field, roused all his attention, and fixed the bent of his genius. On a visit to Paris he was noticed by Seguin, and other antiquarians, and introduced to Colbert, who patronised him, and engaged him to travel over Italy, Sicily, and Greece, in quest of medals to enrich the king's cabinet. On a second voyage from Marseilles, he was taken by pirates, and instead of visiting Rome, he was carried as a slave to Algiers; but after five months of cruel slavery, he was permitted to return to France for his ransom. At sea, the sight of another pirate threatened fresh slavery; but he determined to preserve the medals which he had collected at Algiers, and swallowed them. He landed soon after at the mouths of the Rhone, and, with some difficulty, nature discharged the favorite medals. Undismayed by former misfortunes, he undertook another voyage, and visited Egypt and Persia, and returned loaded with valuable curiosities. His labors in the cause of science were liberally rewarded by Louis XIV.; he was made associate of the academy of inscriptions 1701, and soon after pensionary. He died 23d October 1706, aged 76. The best known of his works are, Numismata Imperatorum Roman. Præstantiora a J. Cæsar. ad Posthumum & Tyrannos, afterwards enlarged to 3 vols. 4to.—Seleucidarum Imperium, 4to. a valuable work—Numismata Ærea Augustorum & Cæsar. in Coloniis, 2 vols. fol.—Numismata Imperatorum, apud Græcos, fol.—Historia Ptolæmæorum, fol.—Nummi Antiqui Familiarum Roman. 2 vols. fol.—Arsacidarum Imperium, 4to., and Achæmenidarum Imperium, 4to. He contributed also some valuable communications to the memoirs of the academy.

VAILLANT, Sebastian, a French botanist, born at Vigvy, near Pontoise. From organist at a convent at Pontoise, he became surgeon and secretary to Fagon, the king's physician, and by the friendship of this worthy patron, he obtained the place of director of the royal gardens. He enriched the garden by the addition of several curious plants, and, for his services to botany, was honored with a seat in the academy of sciences. He published, remarks on Tournefort's institutions of Botany—Botanical Parisiense, containing an account of the plants which grow near Paris, with three hundred plates, published by Boerhaave, fol.—a Discourse on the Structure of Flowers and their use—a small Botanicon, or abridgment of the larger work, in 12mo. He died of an asthma, 22d May 1722, aged 53.

VAISSETTE, Don Joseph, a native of Gaillac, who quitted the office of king's procureur in Albigeois, to embrace the ecclesiastic profession, as member of the congregation of St. Maur at Toulouse. He came to Paris 1713, and applied himself in company with Claude de Vic, in writing an history of Languedoc, of which the first volume appeared in 1730, folio. After the death of his coadjutor he published four other volumes, and the sixth has been presented to the public by his historical successor Bourotte. He wrote besides an abridgment of his great work, 6 vols 12mo.—Universal Geography, 4 vols. 4to., and 12 vols. 12mo. He died at St. German-des-prés, 10th April 1756, aged 71.

He was violent in his reflections against the unhappy Louis, but as he was attached to the Girondists, he was soon marked for slaughter by the sanguinary Marat. He was condemned 30th October, 1793, at the age of 42, but as the sentence was pronounced, he stabbed himself to the heart and immediately expired. He was an intelligent man on subjects of law, commerce, and agriculture, and published Lois Penales 8vo. 1784—le Reve, conte philosophique—a Mon Fils, 8vo.—Defense des Accusés au 31 Mai.

VALDO, Peter, a native of Vaux in Dauphiné, who became in 1180, the head of a sect called from him Vaudois. Louis VII. endeavored in vain to convert these fanatical men to the tenets of the catholic faith, and his son Philip Augustus considering the sword as a more powerful engine of persuasion than the tongue, destroyed their houses, and put above seven thousand to the sword. These persecuted men, though dispersed through Languedoc, Dauphiné, and Bohemia, nevertheless adhered to their principles; and their sect, regarded as the forerunners of the Calvinists, still maintains their original opinions.

VALENS, Flavius, son of Gratian, shared the imperial throne with his brother Valentinian. He defeated the Goths, but after making a treaty of peace with them, he permitted them to settle in Thrace, in consequence of which they were better enabled to attack their new allies. Valens defeated by these barbarian invaders, was pursued and burnt to death in a tower where he had taken refuge, A. D. 378.

VALENTIN, a heresiarch of the 2d century. He was an Egyptian by birth, and a follower of Plato's philosophy, but he was so offended because he was refused a bishopric, that he separated from the church, and gave rise to new errors. He maintained after the Gnostics the existence of Æons, whose numbers composed the God-head, and that by them the world had been created, and was still governed. These wild doctrines were spread with rapidity over Gaul and the western world. He died 160.

VALENTIN, Basil, the assumed name of an able chemist in the 16th century, who was a Benedictine of Erford. His works are in German, and so popular that they have been translated into Latin and English. The best known are Currus Triumphalis Antononii Amsterd. 1671, 12mo.—Azoph of philosophers, with the twelve keys of philosophy, 8vo.—Relation des Mysteries des Sept Metaux, 4to.—Testament of Basil Valentin, 8vo.

VALENTIN, Michael Bernard, a native of Giessen who studied botany and became professor of medicine in his native town. He died 13th March 1729, aged 72. He is author of, Historia Simplicium Reformata, with twenty-three plates 1723—Ampitheatrum Zootomicum, in German, 3 vols. fol, translated into Latin by Becker—Medicina Nova Antiqua, 4to.—Cynosura Materiae Medicae, 3 vols. 4to.—Viridarium Reformatum, fol.—Corpus Juris Medico-legale, fol.—Physiologiae Biblicae Capita Selecta, 4to.

VALENTINIAN I. son of Gratian, rose by his merit to the imperial throne after the death of Jovian, and while he kept the west for himself, he bestowed the eastern empire on his brother Valens. He defeated the Germans, and restored tranquillity to his African provinces. His next expedition was against the Quadi, whose territories he laid waste with fire and sword, and afterwards, when giving an audience to their ambassadors, he, whilst speaking in a fit of passion to them, burst a blood-vessel, which proved fatal 17th November 375, aged 55.

VALENTINIAN II. son and successor of the preceding, was stripped of his dominions by Maximus. In his distress he applied to Theodosius emperor of the east, who cut off the head of the usurper, 338, and restored him to his throne. He was afterwards strangled by order of Arbogastes his rebellious general, 15th May 392. He was a most virtuous and benevolent prince.

VALENTINIAN III. Flavius Placidus, son of Constantius, and Placidia, the daughter of the great Theodosius, was acknowledged emperor 425, when six years old. His mother directed the administration during his minority, and though she was obliged to yield Africa to the Vandals, she ably maintained the dignity of the empire, by the valor of her general Ætius. When of age the young emperor gave loose to the most licentious passions, and at last was assassinated by order of Petronius Maximus, to whose wife he had offered violence, 455. He was succeeded by his murderer.

VALERIANUS, Publius Licinius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor of Rome, after Æmilianus 253. He made his son Gallienus his partner on the throne, and after persecuting the Christians, and waging war against the Goths and Scythians, he marched against Sapor king of Persia. The Persians were victorious, and Valerian carried about in derision, was at last ordered by his cruel conqueror to be flayed alive, 263. His skin tanned red was hung up in one of the Persian temples in derision of the Romans.

VALERIANUS, Pierius, an Italian writer, born at Belluno in the Venetian states. He was educated by the kindness of his uncle, and studied under Valla and Lascaris, and he acquired such celebrity as a classical scholar, that he was intrusted with the care of the two nephews of Leo X. Though thus patronised by the pope, he had the modesty and firmness to refuse two bishoprics, and remained satisfied with the office of apostolic notary. After the death of his pupils, he retired to the enjoyment of literary ease at Padua where he died 1558, aged 83. He was author of various treatises on curious and interesting subjects, both in Italian and Latin, and he also published two vols. of Latin poems which were possessed of great merit.

VALESIIUS, an Arabian, who in the third century became the head of a new sect. He made himself an eunuch, and recommended the same operation to his followers, to avoid giving loose to those violent passions, which under a warm climate and with a heated imagination, might tempt them to disobey the precepts of chastity, and endanger their salvation.

VALESIIUS HENRICUS, or HENRY DE VALOIS, a native of Paris, who after studying under the jesuits at Verdun, and afterwards at Paris, and at Bourges, embraced, to please his father, the profession of the law. Literature however had greater charms for him, and he applied himself assiduously to the study of history, and antiquities. He published, at the request of the elergy of the diocese of Toulouse, the ancient ecclesiastical historians, for which he received the honorable reward of a pension from the liberality of his employers, and in 1670 he was appointed by the king, historiographer of France, with a stipend in consequence of his publication of Eusebius. His intense application at last proved fatal to his sight. He died 9th May, 1676, aged 73. Besides his ecclesiastical historians published Amsterdam 1639, 3 vols. fol. and at Cambridge 1720, he edited and improved with valuable notes, Ammianus Marcellinus. He was a critic of vast erudition, profound learning, and solid judgment, but in his character peevish, suspicious, and vain. His brother Adrian distinguished himself also as a learned historian, and acute critic.

VALETTE PARISOT, John de la, grand master of Malta 1557, bravely defended the island against the attacks of Solyman II. and an army of eighty thousand men. After a siege of four months, and the loss of twenty thousand men, the Turks retreated in dismay, and the Maltese raised anew, from its ruins, their demolished city, to which they gave the name of their heroic defender. This great patriot died 31st August 1568.

VALETTE, John Lewis de Nogaret, duke d' Epéron, a French general. He was the friend and favorite of Henry III. whom he served with fidelity, and after his death, though for a while attached to the interests of the enemies of the new king, Henry IV. he was reconciled to him, and deserved his confidence. He was loaded with all the honors which the monarch could bestow, and he maintained the same influence in the court of Louis XIII. in spite of the intrigues of Richelieu, and the jealousy of new favorites. His violent attack upon the person of the archbishop of Bourdeaux, whom he struck, exposed him to the severest censures of the church, but the interference of his friends, and his own submission, restored him to favor. He died at Loches, 13th January 1642, aged 88. His brother Bernard shared his honors, and distinguished himself in the military service of his country. He was killed at the siege of Roquebrune, near Frejus, 1592.

VALGULIO, Charles, a native of Brescia, in Italy, who published in 1507, a Latin translation of Plutarch's treatise on Music, 4to. He also translated some of the other moral works of Plutarch.

VALIN, René Joshua, a learned native of Rochelle, author of a commentary on the Costume de la Rochelle, 3 vols. 4to.—L'Ordonnance de la Marine, 2 vols. 4to.—Traité des Prises, 2 vols. 8vo. This intelligent writer died 1765.

VALINÇOUR, John Baptist Henry du Troussel de, a French writer, born in Picardy, 1653. He was secretary of marine to admiral de Toulouse at the battle of Malaga, in which he was wounded, and he was appointed by Louis XIV. his historian in the room of Racine. He died at Paris, 5th January, 1730, aged 77, universally respected. He was author of a Letter to la Marquise de . . . 12mo.—the Life of Francis de Lorraine, duke of Guise—Critical Observations on the Œdipus of Sophocles, 4to. besides some translations from Horace's Odes.

VALLA, Laurentius, a learned native of Placentia, born 1415. He possessed great powers as a critic, and his severest censures were directed against the barbarism in the Latin tongue, which the ignorance of the age still tolerated. Violent in his remarks, and contentious and contradicting in his character, he raised against himself a host of enemies, and without confining the bitterness of his reflections to subjects of literature, he ventured to attack the traditions of the church, and to declare that in his quiver he had arrows even against Christ himself. He was kindly patronised by Alphonsus, king of Naples, who at the age of fifty learned Latin of him; and when he was persecuted by the virulence of his enemies for the boldness of his opinions before the inquisition, and condemned to be burned alive, he was saved from the flames by the interference of his royal protector, and submitted only to a private correction in the convent of the Jacobines. He was invited from Naples to Rome by Nicholas V. who knew his literary merits, and who relieved his necessities by the honorable grant of a pension. He died at Rome, 1st August, 1465, aged 50, after teaching belles lettres and rhetoric with great reputation at Genoa, Pavia, Milan, Naples, and other cities of Italy. Though censured by Poggius and others, Valla has had among his defenders the impartial Erasmus, and if he cannot be exculpated from asperity of language, he yet possesses the merit of indefatigable zeal in the cause of science, of correct judgment, and acute discernment. His works are, Elegances of the Latin Language, a valuable work, printed Venice, 1471, folio, Paris, 1575, 4to. and Cambridge, 8vo.—treatise against the False Donation of Constantine—History of the Reign of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, 4to.—translations of Thucydides, Herodotus, Homer's Iliad, &c. not of much value—Notes on the Greek Testament—Fables—Facetious Stories—a treatise on Truth and Falsehood, all printed together at Basil, 1540, in folio.

VALLANCEY, Charles, an antiquary, whose real name was Vallance, was born, in 1721, in England; entered the military service at an early period; rose to the rank of general of engineers; resided in Ireland during the greatest part of his life; and died in 1812. Among his works are, The Field Engineer; The Ancient History of Ireland; and several productions relative to Irish antiquities.

VALLE, Peter della, a native of Rome, who for twelve years, from 1614 to 1626, employed himself in visiting Turkey, Egypt, the Holy Land, Persia, India, and other Eastern countries, of which he published an interesting account in a series of fifty-four letters. He died at Rome, 1652, aged 66. The best edition of his voyages is that of Rome, 1662, in 4 vols. 4to. which was translated by Carneau.

VALLEMONT, Peter le Lorrain de, an ecclesiastic, who died at Pont-Audemer, his native town, 30th December, 1721, aged 72. He wrote Elements of History, 5 vols. 12mo. a work of merit—Curiosities of Nature and Art in the Vegetation of Plants, 2 vols.

VALLI, Eusebius, an eminent and enterprising Italian physician, was born, in 1762, at Pistoia, and studied at Pisa. For ten years he was a military physician. He visited Smyrna and Constantinople to make observations on the plague; and Spain and the Havannah to perform the same task with respect to the yellow fever. In both instances he voluntarily subjected himself to the disease. From the plague he escaped, but he died of the yellow fever, in 1816. Among his works are, Treatises on the Plague; on Phthisis; and on Chronic Diseases.

VALLISNIERI, Anthony, an Italian naturalist, born at Tresilico, near Reggio. He studied under Malpighi, and was appointed by the Venetian republic professor of medicine at Padua, and on account of his celebrity, was admitted member of the learned societies of Italy, and of the London Royal society. He died 28th January, 1790, aged 69. He wrote in Italian, Dialogues on the Origin of various Insects, 8vo.—Experiments on the Worms of the Human Body—Histoire de la Generation de l'Homme & des Animaux, 4to.—de Corpi Marini che su Monti si trovano, 4to.

VALMIKI, the oldest and most celebrated of the epic poets of India, is the author of Raymayana, which narrates the exploits of Rama against the giant Ravanna. He is said to have existed at a very remote period, and the stories which are told of him are manifestly fabulous. Two books of the Sanscrit text of the Ramayana, with a literal version, have been published by Carey and Marshman.

VALSALVA, Anthony Marie, a physician, born at Imola. He studied under Malpighi, and taught anatomy with great reputation at Bologna. He died 1723, aged 57. His works are, Anatomical Dissertations in Latin, 2 vols. 4to. edited at Venice, 1740, by Morgagni—de Aure Humana, 4to. a valuable composition, the labor of sixteen years.

VALVERDA, John, a Spanish physician, the pupil of Realdus Columbus. It is said that he introduced the knowledge of anatomy from Italy into Spain, where he published the Tables of Vesalius with Remarks, &c. in Spanish. Indefatigable more than ingenious, his labors were highly useful in propagating anatomy in Spain. He wrote a treatise on Anatomy, published Venice, 1589—and de Animi & Corporis Sanitate Tuenda, 1558.

VANBRUGH, sir John, a native of Cheshire, highly distinguished for his poetical talents, and his knowledge of architecture. He was for some time in the army, and in 1697, produced his first play, the Relapse, or Virtue in Danger, which was received with such applause, that the following year he again claimed the public approbation by his Provoked Wife. Soon after his Æsop, a comedy abounding with satire and morality, appeared at Drury-lane, and in 1702, the False Friend. His character was now become so respectable, that he was knighted by queen Anne, and appointed Clarencieux king at arms, and afterwards he held successively the offices of surveyor of the works at Greenwich hospital, of comptroller-general of his majesty's works, and of surveyor of the gardens and waters. Nothing, however, could compensate the want of economy, and the poet, suffering under indigent circumstances, exerted the powers of his genius to amuse the town, and to retrieve his fortunes. He had undertaken the building of the new theatre in the Haymarket, but the plan did not succeed, though he rapidly produced for public representation, the Triumph of Love—the Confederacy—the Cuckold in Conceit—Squire Treeloby—and the Mistake. Sir John died of a quinsy, 26th March, 1726. Though ridiculed by Pope, sir John is yet acknowledged by the satirist to be a man of wit and of honor. The most remarkable monument of his architectural abilities is Blenheim house, which, though admired by some as a perfect whole, must be considered as a heavy pile, with scarce an apartment of magnitude sufficiently proportioned to the size of a splendid mansion, or adequate to the expectations formed at the sight of a noble edifice raised by national gratitude. The dramatic pieces of Vanbrugh, from their wit, ease, and vivacity, possess great merit; but they must be condemned for that licentiousness, and immoral tendency which, though palliated by the corrupt and indelicate taste of the times, are yet unbecoming a man of pure virtue, of refined sense, and of honorable principles.

VAN-CEULEN, Ludolph, a mathematician of Leyden, of great merit, in the seventeenth century. He published Fundamenta Geometriæ, translated by Snellius, 4to.—de Circulo & Adscriptis, 4to. 1619. The thirty-six cyphers by which he expressed the proportion of the circumference and the diameter of a circle, were, in honor of his laborious calculations, engraved on his tomb in St. Peter's church, Leyden.

VANCOUVER, George, a British navigator, was born about 1750; entered early into the naval service; and served, as midshipman, under Captain Cook, in his second and third voyages. In 1790, he was appointed to command an expedition, to explore the western coast of North America, to ascertain whether any communication by water exists between the Atlantic and the Pacific. On this service, which he performed skilfully, he was five years employed. He died in 1798, when he had nearly completed for the press the Account of his Voyage.

VANDALE, Anthony, a Dutch physician, born 8th November, 1638. From his earliest years he showed great fondness for literature; but his parents engaged him in commercial pursuits, which at last he quitted at the age of thirty to study medicine. He practised with great reputation at Haerlem, where he died universally respected, 28th November, 1708. He wrote Dissertations on the Heathen Oracles, best edited 1700, Amsterdam, and ably abridged and improved by la Fontenelle—a treatise on the Origin and Progress of Idolatry, 4to.—Dissertations on Important Subjects, 4to.—Dissertatio super Aristæa de LXX. Interpretibus, 4to.

VANDER-LINDEN, John Antonides, professor of medicine at Leyden, was descended from an ancient and respectable family. His grandfather Henry, who was master of the learned languages, and who, in the Spanish massacre at Naerden, lost several of his relations, was minister at Enckhuysen, and afterwards divinity professor at Franeker, where he died 1614, aged 68. His son Anthony was rector of Enckhuysen college, and afterwards practised physic at Amsterdam, where he died 1633, leaving Antonides. Antonides, who was born at Enckhuysen, 13th January, 1609, studied at Leyden and Franeker, and finished his medical studies at Amsterdam under his father. His abilities were such that for twelve years he filled the professorial chair of medicine at Franeker with universal approbation, and next removed, 1651, to Leyden, where his reputation and success followed him. He died at Leyden, 4th March, 1664. He was distinguished not only as a professor, but as a writer. His works are, de Scriptis Medicis, 8vo.—Selecta Medica, 4to.—editions of Hippocrates, Celsus, and Spigelius.

VANDER MERSCH, general of the insurgents of Brabant in 1789, against the imperial forces, distinguished himself by his valor and prudence. When insulted and betrayed by his countrymen, he retired to Brussels, and was imprisoned by his enemies in the citadel of Antwerp. He was afterwards restored to liberty, and died at Antwerp, 14th September, 1792.

VANDER-MONDE, Charles Augustin, a physician, born at Macao in China, of European parents. He became censor royal of the university of Bologna, and died at Paris 1762, aged 85. He published a Collection of Observations on Medicine and Surgery, 12mo. which were the Origin of the Journal of Medicine—Essay on the Perfecting of the Human Species, 2 vols. 12mo.—Pocket Dictionary of Health, 2 vols. 12mo.

VANDER-MONDE, N. a French mathematician, born at Paris. He studied under Fontaine, and was member of the national institute, and died at Paris 1st January 1796, aged 61. He contributed much to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, in his observations on equations, and on music.

VANDER-SPIEGEL, a Dutch statesman of great eminence, whose services from 1785 to 1795, tended much to establish order and regularity, and to repress the schemes of political innovators. He left Holland in consequence of the persecution of his enemies, and died an exile at Lingen in Westphalia 1800.

VANDYCH, Anthony, a celebrated painter, born at Antwerp, 1599. He was the pupil of Rubens, and afterwards travelled into Italy, where he studied the beauties of the Venetian school. On his return to Flanders the reputation of his historical pieces procured him honorable invitations from Richelieu and the court of France, but he preferred the patronage of Charles I. and came to England. The monarch pleased with his merits knighted him and allowed him a pension, and the painter flattered by the favors of the court, and grown rich by the exertion of his pencil, married the beautiful daughter of earl Gowry, and supported the dignity of her rank by the ostentatious display of a magnificent equipage, numerous servants, and a splendid table. He died in 1641, aged 42, and was buried in St. Paul's church, where his monument on which was inscribed an epitaph by Cowley, perished at the dreadful conflagration of 1666. The most celebrated of his pictures is a Descent from the Cross, preserved in the great church of Antwerp. His pieces in England are numerous but chiefly portraits, and from them he derived a more rapid and substantial remuneration, than from the exertion of his powers on historical subjects. Of all the pupils of Rubens, he, according to Fresnoy, best comprehended the rules and general maxims of his master. He even excelled him in the delicacy of his coloring, and in his cabinet pieces, though his gusto in the designing part was not superior to that of Rubens. His pictures preserve in high perfection the dress and the costume of the times.

VAN DYK, Harry Stoe, a poetical and miscellaneous writer, born in London 1798. His father was a native of Holland and his mother of the Cape of Good Hope. He received a classical education, and at an early age evinced a talent for poetry. His principal production was entitled Theatrical Portraits, containing criticisms in verse on popular performers. In 1825, he translated in conjunction with Mr. Bowring, Specimens of the Dutch poets, printed under the title of Batavian Anthology, for which each obtained a handsome medal from the king of Holland, through his ambassador in London, with a flattering letter acknowledging the receipt of the copies of the work, which had been forwarded to his majesty by the translators. Besides these productions Mr. Van Dyk published The Gondola, consisting of tales; and Songs set to music. He died June 5th, 1828, near London.

VANE, sir Henry, eldest son of sir Henry, the secretary of state to Charles I. was born 1612. From Westminster school, he removed to Magdalen hall, Oxford, and afterwards visited Geneva. He displayed on his return sentiments so hostile to the church, that to avoid his father's displeasure he came to New England 1635, but went back to Europe two years after. He soon after married, and by his father's interest obtained the place of treasurer of the navy with sir William Russel, but a quarrel with the earl of Strafford, who had assumed in a new created title the name of their family seat, engaged the father and the son in measures of opposition to the government. Eager to ruin his political enemy, Vane united with Pym and the more violent members of the commons, and during the civil wars he ably promoted the views of the republicans, and assisted at the conferences with the king at Uxbridge and in the Isle of Wight. Though he disapproved of the violence offered to the king's person, he accepted afterwards of a seat at the council board, but his opposition to Cromwell's usurpation was so determined that he was sent a prisoner to Carisbrook castle. At the restoration, though both houses voted for an act of indemnity in his favor, his conduct to Strafford, and the perseverance with which he had supported the republican cause, were not forgotten, and therefore he was arraigned and condemned on pretence of having compassed the late king's death. He was beheaded on Towerhill, 14th June, 1662, and suffered with great firmness and resignation. He is represented by Clarendon as a man of deep dissimulation, of quick conception, and great understanding, but Burnet speaks of him as a fearful man, whose head was darkened in his notions of religion. From his fanatical mode of preaching, he and his adherents were called Seekers, and in his writings, which were on moral and theological subjects, he clothed his thoughts in such affected language that his meaning was totally unintelligible. His only son Christopher was created baron Barnard by king William, and he is the ancestor of the present Darlington family.

VAN-HUYSUM, John, a painter, born at Amsterdam 1682. He studied under his father, but instead of seeking reputation in the various branches of his profession, he applied all the powers of his genius in the delineation of flowers, fruit, and landscapes. He was so successful, that in the representation of the down and bloom of fruit, and the varied tints of flowers, no painter ever possessed greater delicacy, more exactness, or more taste in tracing the beauties of nature through all her various refinements. His pieces were so much admired that he sold them for a very high price, and at last only princes and nobles could afford to become purchasers. The violent temper of his wife, and the ill conduct of his son, ruffled his spirits in the last part of life, and produced habits of intemperance and of melancholy, from which he seldom was able to recover. He died at Amsterdam, 1749, aged 57.

VANIERE, James, a jesuit, born at Caussacs in the diocese of Beziers, 9th March, 1664. He studied under Joubert, and soon after being admitted among the jesuits, he displayed great poetical powers. The best known of his poems is his Prædium Rusticum in sixteen cantos, a work in imitation of Virgil's Georgics, though not always interesting and free from tedious descriptions. The best edition is that of Paris 1756, 12mo. He wrote besides, eclogues, epistles, epigrams, and hymns, and a poetical dictionary in Latin, in 4to. He died at Toulouse, 22d August 1739, aged 76. His nephew, who died at Paris 1768, was author of a Cours de Latinité, 2 vols. 8vo. and also translated some of Horace's odes.

VANINI, Lucilio, LL.D. a well known atheist, born at Taurozano in Otranto 1585. After studying at Rome, Naples, and Padua, and taking the degree of doctor in civil law, he entered into orders, but soon disregarded divinity for the writings of Aristotle, Averroes, Cardan, and Pomponatius. In the pages of these philosophers it is supposed, that he drew his principles of atheism, which he labored so earnestly to disseminate through Europe. After visiting part of Germany and the Low Countries he went to Geneva, and afterwards passed into England, from which he returned to Italy and next to France, where he propagated his opinions sometimes openly, and sometimes under the imposing garb of the friend of truth and religion. Though for a while patronised by Bassompierre he preferred the freedom of a wandering life, and quitting Paris he gained some celebrity as a professor of physic, philosophy, and divinity, at Toulouse. The impious tenets, however, which he instilled into the minds of his pupils, soon drew upon him the public indignation, and he was tried before the parliament and condemned to be burnt as an irreligious and immoral atheist. The sentence was executed 19th February 1619. His works are Amphitheatrum Æternæ Providentiæ, 8vo. 1615—de Admirandis Naturæ, Reginæ, Dæque Mortalium Arcanis, 8vo. 1616, works which abound with impiety and profaneness—a treatise of Astronomy in MS. The best account of his life is by Durand, 12mo. Rotterdam, 1727.

VAN NESS, William W. an eminent lawyer of New York, who, for many years, was a judge of the supreme court of that state. He was born of Dutch parents in 1775. He commenced the practice of his profession in his native town, Claverack; and, here, and in the adjoining city of Hudson, he continued to pursue it with a continually increasing reputation and success, until he was appointed to a seat on the bench of the supreme court. He was, at this time, only thirty-two years of age, having been at the bar eleven years. He had great quickness of perception; and his sagacity in seeing all the various points of a case, and in taking advantage of all circumstances favorable to his client is rarely equalled in an advocate. His style of argumentation was of the best kind, and his persuasive eloquence was always sure to produce an effect. As a judge he also had a high reputation. His simplicity and urbanity of manners in connexion with his clear and comprehensive expositions to the jury gave him great power over them. Still, he had opposition and difficulty to encounter. There was great political excitement during the period of his being upon the bench. Taking part in this excitement, or in the discussion of subjects with which it was connected, he became obnoxious to a portion of the people. Accordingly, in 1820, under the direction of the house of assembly, there was instituted an inquiry into his official conduct. The result was altogether in his favor. Nevertheless, in May 1822, he resigned his office, and recommenced in the city of New York, the practice of law. In the following year, however, his health failed him; and, although he made the experiment of a sea voyage, he died at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 28th of February, 1823.

VAN RENSSELEAR, Jeremiah, the founder of the family of that name in the state of New York, was a man of wealth, and emigrated to America, about the year 1660. Other settlers from Holland came with him, and obtained of the Indians an extensive tract of land about Albany. The Dutch government by patent confirmed the purchase; and the lands, or a large portion of them, have descended from generation to generation in the family, and are now held by one of his descendants.

VAN RENSSELEAR, Philip S. a distinguished citizen of Albany, who died September 25, 1824, aged 58 years. In 1798, he was elected mayor of that city; and held the same office, with the exception of two years, till 1823. His annual election to such an honorable and responsible station, for so long a period, is evidence of the estimation in which he was held by his fellow-citizens. He was a liberal benefactor of the poor, patron of literature, and a munificent friend of the institution of Christianity. At the time of his death he was both a trustee of Union college, and president of the Albany Bible Society.

VAN-SWIETEN, Gerard, a celebrated physician, born at Leyden, 7th May, 1700. After finishing his education under the great Boerhaave, he left his native country, and declining the liberal offers of patronage in England, settled at Vienna, where he became first physician to the empress Maria Theresa. To an extensive practice he joined the labors of a public professor, and it may truly be said that to his indefatigable zeal and to his enlightened mind, medicine is indebted for its present flourishing state in the capital of Germany. The most celebrated practitioners of Vienna regard him still as the cause of their eminence, and his experiments and his successful mode of treating diseases laid the foundation of that superiority which his school has so justly acquired over the other medical institutions of the continent. Though branded with the appellation of the tyrant of the mind, and the assassin of the body, by those extravagant philosophers of France, whose works he censured with merited severity, it is universally admitted that to encourage merit, and to patronise rising talents, he employed with alacrity the powerful influence which he possessed at the court of the empress. This truly great and virtuous character died 18th June, 1772. His chief work is Commentaries on Boerhaave's Aphorisms de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis, 5 vols. 4to. Paris, 1771-8, which has been translated separately into French, and also into English.

VAN WART, Isaac, known in American history as one of the captors of Andre, a British spy in the revolutionary war. He was born at Greensburgh, New York in 1749, and died, at his residence in Mount Pleasant, May 23, 1828, aged 80 years. He maintained through life the reputation of being a sober, industrious, honest, and worthy man; and the act for which he is particularly celebrated, is sufficient evidence of his disinterested patriotism.

VARCHI, Benedict, a native of Fiesole, who became professor of morality at Padua. He preferred the patronage of Cosimo de Medicis to the honorable invitations of Paul III. and showed himself so correct and elegant a speaker of his native tongue that the Florentines said if Jupiter wished to talk Italian, he would speak the language of Varchi. Though admired and publicly applauded he was not without enemies who censured him, perhaps with justice, for obstinacy of opinion, and for debauchery of morals. He died at Florence 18th December 1666, aged 63. He wrote an History of the Principal Events of his time in Florence and Italy, published Cologne 1721. He wrote besides some poetical pieces called Capitoli, 2 vols. 8vo. offensive for their indelicacy—sonnets, 2 vols. 8vo.

VARDES, Francis René du Bec, marquis de, one of the favorites at the court of Louis XIV. As he was well acquainted with the debaucheries of his master, he had the imprudence to reveal them to the queen in a letter supposed to come from her mother the queen of Spain, but after procuring the disgrace of the duke of Noailles by fixing the suspicion of this perfidious conduct upon him, he was at last discovered and sent to ignominious exile. He was afterwards pardoned and died at Paris 1688.

VARENIUS, Augustus, a native of Lunenburg, well known for his deep acquaintance with Hebrew, and his extensive learning, as a Lutheran divine. It is said that he could repeat the Hebrew bible by heart, and that he was so conversant with that language that he spoke it with greater fluency than his own. He wrote, among other things, a Commentary on Isaiah, 4to. and died 1684, aged 64.

VARENIUS, Bernard, a Dutch physician, author of a Description of Japan and Siam, 8vo. —and of Geographia Universalis, 8vo. translated into English with notes by sir Isaac Newton, 1672, and from the English translated into French by Puisieux, 4 vols. 12mo.

VARENNE DE FENILLE, P. C. a native of Brescia. He was an intelligent agriculturist, and published observations on the causes why fishes die in pools, memoirs on forests, 2 vols 12mo. He was guillotined at Lyons in consequence of false accusations before sanguinary judges in 1794.

VARGAS, Alphonso, a native of Toledo, who died archbishop of Seville 1366. He was author of commentaries on the first book of the Master of Sentences, fol.

VARGAS, Francis, a Spanish lawyer, employed by Charles V. and Philip II. in various embassies. He protested in his master's name against the transferring of the council of Trent to Bologna, and after being ambassador at Rome he became counsellor of state in Spain, and some time after retired, disgusted with the world, to the monastery of Cissos, where he died about 1560. He wrote on the jurisdiction of the pope and of bishops, a work which gave offence at Rome—and memoirs of the council of Trent.

he lost, in consequence of the careless manner in which he collated some manuscripts. His historical works were popular for a time, but, after his gross errors in The History of Heresies had been detected by Burnet and Larroque, no bookseller would purchase his productions. He died in 1696. His principal work is A History of France.

He studied under del Sarto and Michael Angelo, but though he paid much attention to the noblest monuments of antiquity, he was deficient in the coloring of his pieces, though his knowledge of architecture was respectable. He was patronised by the Medicis, and published some useful works. His memory was so retentive that at the age of nine he could repeat the whole of the Æneid. He wrote the lives of the most illustrious painters, sculptors, and architects, 3 vols. 4to. 1568, published at Rome 1758. He died at Florence 1574, aged 62. The most correct edition of these valuable commentaries is that of 1729, in 2 vols. fol. It is said that in consequence of the popularity of his work he applied in 1765 to the Austrian government to introduce a reformation in the public administration of affairs at Brussels, but his solicitations were received not only with indifference but jealousy by Maria Theresa. He wrote de Ludierâ Dictione, 1658, a work of great merit, in which, with fine criticism and deep and learned research, he asserted that the Greeks and Romans knew nothing of the burlesque style—de Epigrammate, 1669, a work opposed and censured by Rapiu another jesuit, who declared that an epigram is the most insipid of all poetry except it be admirable, and that the composition is so rare, that to make an excellent one is sufficient for the whole of a man's life. He published besides, Job, a heroic poem—the miracles of Jesus Christ, a poem—Elegies—Epic poetry—3 books of Epigrams—a Commentary on Job.

His abilities were seen and acknowledged by the government, and his superior knowledge of fortifications, and of the defence of towns, was employed in raising impregnable ramparts around the French monarchy. He was honorably appointed governor of Lisle which he had strongly fortified, and his genius next planned citadels for the defence of Verceil, Verue, and Turin. In the wars of 1672, and of 1683, he contributed much to the glory of the French arms and the victories of Louis XIV. by the manner in which he conducted the sieges of the towns of Flanders; and for his many and eminent services, he was rewarded with the rank of marshal of France. This illustrious character, who had during his laborious and useful life been engaged in one hundred and forty actions, had conducted fifty-three sieges, had assisted in repairing the fortifications of three hundred ancient citadels, and had erected thirty-three new ones, died 30th March 1707, aged 74. Immortalized as an engineer, he was remarkable for his attachment to his country, and for his heroism in danger, and in the midst of victory he displayed the man of benevolence and humanity. From the suggestions of an active mind, always eager to add to his knowledge and to increase his resources of information, he had collected twelve large MS. volumes of observations, thoughts, &c. which he called his Oisivetés. His works are a treatise on Fortification, or the French Engineer, 8vo.—new treatise on the Attack and Defence of Places, 8vo.—Essays on Fortification, 12mo.—Project of a Royal Tythe for abolishing the Established Taxes, and by other means increasing the Public Revenue, 4to.—Political Testament of M. VAUGELAS, Claude Favre lord de, a native of Bourg in Bresse. He was member of the French academy, and was engaged in the completion of their famous dictionary. In his style he was unusually elegant and accurate, and his translation of Quintus Curtius, 4to. in which he was employed for thirty years, was regarded in his time as the most correct composition in the French language, so that Balzac, a judge of literary merit, said that the Alexander of Curtius was invincible, and that of Vaugelas inimitable. He wrote besides Remarks on the French language, afterwards enriched with the notes of T. Corneille, 3 vols. 12mo. He died 1650, aged 65, in indigent circumstances, though he had received a pension from the king; but his attachment to the fortune of Gaston duke of Orleans, to whom he was chamberlain and companion, embarrassed and ruined his affairs.

VAUGHAN, George, a graduate of Harvard college in 1696. He was the son of major William Vaughan, a wealthy merchant of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, who was noted for his public spirit, and for the firmness with which he resisted the claims of the proprietors of that territory. After leaving college, the subject of this article became the agent of the colony in England; and, in 1715, he succeeded Usher, as lieutenant-governor of it. In 1769 he was made governor of Corsica, and completed the conquest of the island; but in his administration he was charged with cruelty and oppression, though the French defended his conduct as just and politic. He was, in consequence of his many services, raised to the dignity of marshal of France, 1783, and in 1788 he was sent to Dauphiné to quell the troubles of that province. The Imperialists were defeated at St. Vitoria and Luzara, Mantua was relieved, Savoy was invaded, Eugene was defeated at Cassano, at Reventlau, and Calcinito, and Turin was going to open its gates to the conqueror, when he was recalled to head the armies in Flanders. From Flanders he passed to Spain, and Philip V., who had neither troops nor resources, soon saw himself surrounded with soldiers at the call of his generous defender, and replaced on his throne at Madrid. He was sent in 1771, ambassador to Sweden, and promoted the revolution which made Gustavus master of his country, and on the accession of Louis XVI. to the throne, he was recalled to share in his councils as minister for foreign affairs. Whilst he spread the influence of France through Europe, he eagerly promoted general tranquillity, and the peace of Teschen, the reconciliation of the emperor and the Dutch, and the commercial treaty with Russia, are important proofs of his wisdom and sagacity. In his politics towards the English government he, however, greatly erred, and by supporting the American colonies against the parent country, he laid the foundation of a system which hurled his master from his throne. His treaty of peace with England in 1783, was followed by a commercial treaty, which proved beneficial to both countries. He died at Versailles, 13th February, 1787, aged 68, and was magnificently buried by the order of Louis XVI. who shed tears of regret and affection on the ashes of his favorite minister. At Paris, his insinuating manners, his learning, and his virtues procured him adherents, and while he regarded confession as useless, and absolution unavailing, except it was attended with the total reformation of the penitent sinner, he failed not to inculcate that confirmation was a more important and more powerful ceremony than baptism, or the sacrament of the Lord's supper. His maxims, though committed only to the secrecy of tried friends, soon became popular, and at last drew upon him the jealousy and resentment of Richelieu, who caused him to be imprisoned in 1638. The death of his persecutor restored him to liberty, but he soon after himself fell sick, and died at Paris, 11th October, 1643, aged 62. He published Treatise de Corporis Humani Anatomia, 2 vols. 4to. translated into German,—de Febribus, and other medical works. On his homeward passage a storm arose, during which he ordered himself to be tied to the mast, that he might make a faithful sketch of the scene. On his return he was employed by Louis XV. to delineate the principal ports, a task which occupied him for ten years. He died in 1789.

VERNEUIL, Catherine Henrietta de Balzac Marquise de, a French lady, who so captivated the heart of Henry IV. that he promised to marry her. When the monarch gave his hand to Mary de Medicis, this haughty mistress was so offended that she conspired with the Spanish court to dethrone him, and to place the crown on the head of her own son, whom she had borne to Henry. Their intrigues were discovered, and her accomplices punished. She died in exile 1633, aged 54.

VERNEY, Guichard Joseph du, professor of anatomy in the royal gardens, was born at Feurs en Forez, 5th August, 1643. He acquired great celebrity at Paris as a professor, and died there 10th September, 1730. He wrote an excellent treatise on the Ear, 12mo. &c. His works appeared together in 2 vols. 4to. 1762.

VERNON, Edward, an English admiral, born at Westminster. After serving with distinction in the navy, he was sent 1739, against Porto-Bello, which he took, and with a small force, as he had often boasted in the house of Commons, but he was unsuccessful in his attack on Carthagen two years after. His name is beautifully introduced in the most pathetic lines written by Thompson. He died suddenly, 29th October, 1757, aged 73.

VERONESE, Paul Caliani, a celebrated painter born at Verona 1532. He studied under his uncle and acquired such reputation as to rival Tintoret and the most illustrious artists. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of Cana, and the supper in the house of Simon the leper. From the rich resources of a strong imagination he painted with all the truth of nature; his characters were represented with dignity, his female figures exhibited grace and elegance, and in his draperies appeared splendor and magnificence. In commendation of his great abilities, Guido said that he wished to be what Veronese was rather than acquire the celebrity of any other artist, for as he observed, others display their art, but he paints nature in all her real charms. This admired painter, equally great as a good christian and as an amiable man, died at Venice, 1588, aged 51.

VERRI, Peter, an Italian statesman and author, was born, in 1728, at Milan; quitted the military service for the civil, and held several important offices under the Milanese government; and died in 1797. His advice had considerable influence in inducing Beccaria to write the famous treatise on crimes and punishments. His principal work is, Meditations on Political Economy.

VERRI, Count Alexander, a brother of the foregoing, was born, in 1741, at Milan; was brought up to the bar, but quitted it to devote himself to literature; and died in 1816. Among his works are, A Life of Erostratus—the Romance of Sappho—An Essay on the General History of Italy—Analyses of and Criticisms upon the principal Grecian Orators—and The Roman Nights—the last of which has been translated into several languages.

VERROCHIO, Andrew, a sculptor, was born, in 1422, at Florence, and died in 1488. In bronze works he surpassed all his contemporaries. Among his chief productions are, a Christ and St. Thomas, and an equestrian statue of Bartholomew Colleoni. Verrochio was also an able painter, and one of the best musicians of his period. He invented the method of taking the features in a plaster mould.

VERSTEGAN, Richard, a native of London. His parents were of Flemish descent, and after studying at Oxford he went to settle at Antwerp, where he died 1625. He wrote a restitution of decayed intelligence in antiquities concerning the noble and renowned English nation, 4to. a curious work reprinted London 1684, and again 1674, 4to.—The Regal Government of England—Antiquitates Belgicæ, 12mo.—Theatrum Crudelitatum Hæreticorum, 4to.

VERT, Dom Claude de, an ecclesiastic of the order of Cluni. He studied at Avignon, and travelled into Italy, and devoted himself to inquiries on the ecclesiastical ceremonies of Rome. He died at Abbeville 1st May 1708, aged 63. He wrote a simple and historical history of the Ceremonies of the Church, 4 vols. 8vo.

VERTOT D'AUBOEUF, René Anbert de, a native of Bannetot in Normandy. He entered among the Capuchins, but quitted the order 1677, to be admitted among the regular canons of Premontre. In 1701 he abandoned the solitude of the monastery for an ecclesiastical life, and a residence in Paris, where he found great and powerful patrons. He became in 1715, historiographer to the order of Malta, and was selected for the office of sub-preceptor to Louis XV., but the appointment never took place. The abbé suffered much from the infirmities of age, and died 15th June, 1735, aged 80. In his character he was an amiable man, and united the virtues of private life to great intelligence, deep penetration, and an elegant taste. He wrote the History of the Revolutions of Portugal, 12mo.—History of the Revolutions of Sweden, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of the Revolutions of Rome, 3 vols. 12mo. his chief work—History of Malta, 4 vols. 4to., and 7 in 12mo.—History of the Settlement of the Britons in Gaul, 2 vols. 12mo.—Origin of the greatness of the Court of Rome, 12mo.—Dissertations on the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres.

VERUS, Lucius Ceionius Commodus, son of Ælius, distinguished himself against the barbarians in the East, and was adopted by Marcus Aurelius, and admitted to share the throne. He died of an apoplexy in his German expedition, aged 39.

VERWEY, John, a learned Dutchman, who presided with great reputation over the school of Goude, and afterwards that of the Hague, where he died about 1690. He is author of a Medulla Aristarchi Vossiani—and Nova Via docendi Græce, 8vo. two grammars of singular merit and general utility.

VESALIUS, Andrew, a celebrated anatomist, born at Brussels of a family long distinguished for their knowledge of medicine. After studying at Louvain, where he displayed the strong bent of his genius by dissecting dogs, cats, and moles, he came to Paris, and applied himself laboriously to anatomy, a science then in its infancy. He next visited Pisa, Bologna, and the other universities of Italy, and in 1537, was appointed anatomical professor at Padua. He next removed to Spain to be physician to Charles V., and there acquired the most extensive reputation by his skill and sagacity. From this high popularity, he, however, all at once formed the project of going to the Holy Land, and while some attribute it to the wish of flying from the jealousy and persecution of his enemies at court, or to the troublesome peevishness of his wife, others ascribe the cause to a more extraordinary circumstance. He obtained, it is said, permission to open the body of a young nobleman, whom during a severe illness he had attended, but dreadful to relate, he no sooner uncovered the heart of his patient, than he perceived it still palpitating with life. This circumstance so irritated the weeping family of the nobleman, that the unhappy physician was summoned before the inquisition, but Charles V. interfered and saved him from the most execrating torments, on condition that he should undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On his return from Cyprus and Jerusalem, which was hastened by the invitations of the senate of Venice, who solicited him to fill the medical chair of Padua, vacant by the death of Fallopius, the wretched pilgrim was shipwrecked and thrown upon the barren shores of the island of Zante, where he soon after perished through famine and hardship, October 1674, aged about 60. The chief of his works is, de Humani Corporis Fabricâ, Leyden, 2 vols. fol. 1722. Vesalius may be truly considered as the great restorer of anatomy in Europe, as before his time it was not only neglected, but the study of it was impeded by the gross superstition and the ignorant prejudices of the age.

VESPASIAN, Titus Flavius, an obscure native of Riti, who by his merits and virtues rose to consequence in the Roman armies, and headed the expedition against Jerusalem. On the death of Vitellius, A.D. 69, he was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers, and the wisdom, moderation, and firmness of his reign showed the propriety of the choice. This truly virtuous monarch, the liberal patron of learning, and the friend of morality and order, died A.D. 79, aged 71.

VICARS, John, a native of London, educated at Christ's hospital and Queen's college, Oxford, after which he officiated as undermaster in Christ's hospital. He was author of God in the Mount, or England's Remembrancer, a poem, 4to.—Looking Glass for Malignants, and other pamphlets in favor of the presbyterians against the royalists. He died 1652.

VICARY, Thomas, a native of London, serjeant surgeon to Henry VIII. and his three successors, and surgeon to St. Bartholomew's hospital, was the first anatomical writer in the English language. His book, A Treasure for Englishmen, or The Anatomy of a Man's Body, 12mo. 1577, and other medical and surgical tracts are chiefly compiled from the works of Galen and of the Arabians.

VIGENTE, Giles, a famous dramatic poet of Lisbon in the 16th century, whose works have served as models to the labors of Lopez de Vega, and to Quevedo. He wrote with great facility, and his pieces were so popular among the Portuguese, that he was called the Plantus of Portugal. It is said, that Erasmus learned the Portuguese, to be able to read his works, which were published by his children in five parts, 1562.

VICENZA, Armand Augustin Louis de Caulaincourt, duke de, lieutenant-general, born at Caulaincourt, in 1773, distinguished himself during the French revolution, both in diplomatic and military capacities, for his integrity, courage, fidelity and address, under the most difficult circumstances. He served in the army from the fifteenth year of his age, but, on the breaking out of the revolution, lost his post of staff-officer, and was for some time confined in prison. He then served 1792 as a grenadier, and afterwards as a mounted chasseur, but, in 1795, was restored, by the influence of Hoche, to his former rank of captain. Caulaincourt served with reputation in Italy, and began his diplomatic career at Constantinople, whither he accompanied general Dubayet. In 1801, he was sent on a diplomatic mission to the emperor Alexander, who always manifested esteem for him and confidence in him. In 1804, Caulaincourt was named grand écuyer, and, about this time, was stationed on the Rhine, where he was employed in counteracting the intrigues of the English agents, and particularly the English minister at Munich, against the life of the first consul. With the capture and execution of the duke d'Enghien, it has been fully proved that he had nothing to do. In 1805, he was made general of division, and received the grand cross of the legion of honor, with the title of duke of Vicenza. He afterwards obtained various orders of knighthood from Bavaria, Saxony, Prussia, Russia and Austria, and was sent ambassador to St. Petersburg, when Napoleon was carrying on his plans against Austria. After the fall of Prussia and the treaty of Tilsit, he was four years ambassador at the Russian court, and received from the emperor the cross of the order of St. Anne of the first class. He requested his recall on the pretext of ill health, but, in reality, because he met with various mortifications from the Russian nobility, who were jealous of his favor with Alexander. After returning to France in 1811, he accompanied Napoleon on his unfortunate expedition to Russia in 1812, which he had firmly opposed, and returned with him in a sleigh, after nearly perishing with cold. During fourteen days, Caulaincourt did not leave the emperor's side. In the campaign of 1813, Caulaincourt was appointed to negotiate with the Russian and Prussian plenipotentiaries, after the desperate battles of Lützen and Bautzen; and an armistice was the consequence. That armistice was soon broken, and only served to prepare the way for the victory over Napoleon at Leipsic. After hostilities had been removed from Germany to France, Caulaincourt, who had been named minister for foreign affairs, was sent to negotiate with the allies at Chatillon (q. v.); but, on some success of Napoleon, he received orders to raise his claims so high, that the allies broke off the conferences, and marched to Paris. When Napoleon abdicated at Fontainebleau, the duke of Vicenza was the chief negotiator on his part, and signed the treaty of the 11th of April, between the ex-emperor and the allies. He continued to follow his master until his departure from Fontainebleau, on the 20th of April, and afterwards retired to his estate. During the hundred days, he held the portfolio of foreign affairs, and,

April 4, 1815, issued the celebrated circular to the foreign cabinets, declaring the pacific intentions of Napoleon. After the second abdication of the emperor, the duke of Vicenza took an active part as member of the regency; but the return of the king terminated his public career. He passed the rest of his life alternately at Paris and on his estate, occupied with the education of his children, and died in 1823.

VICQ D'AZIR, Felix, a native of Valone, who like his father became eminent as a physician. He came to Paris in 1765, and acquired such celebrity that in 1775 he was sent by the minister Turgot to stop a contagious distemper which raged among the people of Languedoc, and in this he was happily successful. He was one of the founders of the society of medicine, and pronounced the eulogies of Haller, Linné, Pringle, and other illustrious men, and with such applause, that he was elected member of the academy of sciences in the room of Buffon. He died universally respected, 20th June, 1794, aged 46. Besides his eulogies he wrote memoirs—Anatomical Observations—Description of the Nerves.

VICTOR, Amadeus, duke of Savoy, and first king of Sardinia, was born 14th May 1666, and succeeded his father Charles Emanuel in 1675. By his marriage with the niece of Louis XIV., he insured the cooperation of France, but he was no sooner established in his power, than he declared against his new allies. He was consequently attacked and defeated by Catinat at Staffarde 1690, and lost all Savoy, but two years after he entered Dauphiné and seized upon Gap and Embrun. Another victory at Marseilles, obtained over him by Catinat, robbed him of all his newly acquired dominions, but though he was obliged to make peace in 1696, he took up arms again in 1701, encouraged by the promises of the emperor, who flattered his ambition by the hopes of possessing a large territory between the Po and Tanaro. His troops were now defeated by Vendôme, and Turin his capital besieged by the duke de la Feuillade, but the timely succor of prince Eugene saved him from ruin, and restored him to his independence. Peace was restored in 1713, and Victor, acknowledged king of Sicily by the king of Spain, soon after resigned his title in favor of the emperor, who in return supported his assumption of the name of king of Sardinia. Tired with the intrigues and labors of greatness, Victor at last in 1730, after a reign of fifty-five years, abdicated the throne in favor of his son, but the next year, with the same capricious inconsistency, he reclaimed the regal honors. The son might have complied, but when he saw that the crown was claimed by the suggestions of an ambitious mistress, who tyrannised over the affections of his father, he wisely refused, and the sickle old man soon after died at Rivoli near Turin, 31st October 1732.

VICTORIUS, or VETTORIN, Peter, a learned Florentine, appointed by Cosmo de Medicis, professor of eloquence in the college of his native town. He was universally respected for his learning and abilities, and served his country in some embassies. He died 1535, aged 37. He is to be regarded as one of the first restorers of learning in Italy, and he ably devoted his time in elucidating the classics, especially Cicero. His works are Critical Notes on Cicero, Cato, Varro, and Columella—Commentaries on Aristotle's Rhetoric,—Collection of Latin Epistles and Harangues.

VICTORIUS, Benedict, a native of Faenza, professor of medicine at Bologna. He wrote Empirical Medicine, 8vo.—de Morbo Gallico, 8vo.—

la Grande Pratique, 2 vols. fol. and died about 1552, aged 72. His uncle Lionel was also professor of medicine at Bologna, where he died 1530. He wrote a Treatise on the Diseases of Children, 8vo.—Practice of Medicine, 4to.

VIDA, Mark Jerome, a celebrated modern poet, born at Cremona 1470. After finishing his studies at Padua and Bologna, he entered into the order of the regular canons of St. Mark at Mantua, which he soon after exchanged for the order of St. John Lateran at Rome. His poetical fame reached the ears of Leo X., who rewarded him with his friendship and the priory of St. Sylvester at Tivoli. In this charming retreat he devoted himself to the composition of his Christias, and though his labors were interrupted by the death of his patron, he soon emerged from the dissatisfaction which the neglect shown to literary merit during the short reign of Adrian VI. had created, and under the next pope, Clement VII., he received the rewards due to his talents, and was made bishop of Alba, 1532. This truly benevolent prelate, and learned man, died 27th September 1566, aged 96. The tributes of praise paid to the genius and merits of this great man, have been numerous, and among them, the words of Pope are particularly striking. The poetical works of Vida were collected by himself, 2 vols. 8vo. 1550. They consist of Ars Poetica, a valuable poem—de Bombyce Libri Duo, the most correct of his works—Scacchia Ludus—Hymni de Rebus Divinis—Christiados Libri Sex—Bucolica, Elogæ, & Carmina.—Besides these he wrote, Dialogi de Republica Dignitate—Orationes Tres adversus Papienses,—Constitutiones Synodales Albæ. The best edition of his poems is that of Oxford, 1733, in 3 vols. 8vo.

VIETA, Francis, master of requests to queen Margaret, was born at Fontenay, in Poitou 1540, and acquired great celebrity as a mathematician. He was the first who used in algebra the letters of the alphabet to mark known quantities, as they could express every variety of number, and he also introduced some important improvements in that science, and in geometry. He made afterwards some alterations in the Gregorian calendar, and showed himself so exact and sagacious in deciphering the secrets of the Spanish government in their intercepted letters, that the divulging of the contents which were obscenely clothed in five hundred different characters, was ascribed to magic. He died 1603. He published Apollonius of Perga, under the name of Apollonius Gallus, 4to. 1610, and his works were collected together in 1646, in 1 vol. folio, by F Schooten.

VIEUSSENS, Raymond de, a native of Rouergue, who became physician to the king of France, and distinguished himself by his publications on his profession, one of which, on Internal Diseases, in 4 vols. 4to. was published by his grandson 1774. He died at Montpellier, where he had retired for his health, 1715.

VIGAND, or WIGAND, John, a Lutheran divine, born at Mansfield. He was engaged in the publication of that important work, the Centuries of Magdeburgh, printed at Basil, 13 vols. fol. 1562, and afterwards presided over the churches of Pomerania. He wrote several works in favor of the reformation, and died 21st October 1587, aged 64.

VIGEE, Louis William Bernard Stephen, a French poet and dramatist, was born, in 1755, at Paris, and died there in 1820, reader to Louis XVIII. He is the author of many poems; a Course of Literature, delivered at the Athenæum; three comedies; and the Pro and Con, a religious, moral, political, and literary dialogue.

VIGILIUS, a Roman, who was elevated to the papal throne by the intrigues of Theodora the wife of Justinian, to whom he promised, as the price of his elevation, that he would cancel all the decrees of the council of Constantinople, against the Eutychian bishops, whose cause she embraced. Though thus raised to the pontificate in 537 he afterwards ventured to oppose Theodora, and even excommunicated her, for which he was banished from Rome, but died soon after at Syracuse 555. Eighteen of his letters have been published at Paris, 8vo. 1642.

VIGNES, Peter des, a native of Capua, who rose from the obscure situation to the dignity of chancellor of the German empire. After receiving his education at Bologna, by the charity of some benevolent persons, he rose to consequence, and became the favorite of the emperor Frederic. It is said that he attempted to poison his master, for which his eyes were put out, but others attributed this severe treatment to the malice and misrepresentation of his enemies. Disgusted with the confinement of a prison, and the tyrannical conduct of his sovereign, he dashed his head against the column to which his galling chains were fastened, and thus expired 1249. Des Vignes was very eminent in the knowledge of jurisprudence. Some of his works have been printed.

VIGNOLES, Stephen de, better known by the name of la Hire, was of an illustrious family, settled at Languedoc. He was one of the ablest generals in the service of Charles VII. and he obliged the duke of Bedford to raise the siege of Montargis, and assisted Joan of Arc in the relief of Orleans. After contributing by his valor to the restoration of Charles to his throne, he died at Montauban, 1447.

VIGNOLES, Alphonso de, a native of Aubais in Languedoc, who, as a Calvinist, left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Prussia. He was patronised by the king of Prussia, and made director of the royal academy of sciences at Berlin, where he died 24th July, 1744, aged 95. He wrote the Chronology of the Holy Scriptures, 2 vols. 4to.—Epistola Chronologica—Conjectures on Virgil's fourth Eclogue.

VILLARET, Claude, a native of Paris, who first became known by his romance of la Belle Allemande. In consequence of some domestic distresses he quitted Paris, and to support himself began the life of an actor at Rouen, Compiègne, and Liege. He afterwards abandoned a profession in which he had acquired some celebrity. He again settled at Paris, and obtained the place of first commissary of the chamber of accounts. On the death of Velly he was appointed his successor in the completion of an History of France, which he ably continued from the 8th volume, and the reign of Philip VI. to the 348th page of the 17th volume. He wrote besides, Considerations sur l'Art du Theatre, 8vo.—and l'Esprit de Voltaire. He died at Paris, March 1766, aged 61.

VILLARS, Louis Hector, marquis and duke of, peer of France, was born at Moulins in Bourbonnois, 1653. He embraced early the profession of arms, and distinguished himself on the Rhine, at the siege of Maestricht, at the battle of Senef, and on various occasions, and for his services was raised to the rank of marshal of France, 1690. At the peace of Ryswick, he went ambassador to Vienna, and when afterwards placed at the head of the French armies, he defeated the prince of Baden, and gained the battle of Hochstet; but after supporting the character of a brave and active general against the superior genius of Marlborough, he was at last routed and dangerously wounded at the battle of Malplaquet, 1709. He afterwards regained his reputation at Denay on the Scheldt, and by the fall of Douay, Quesnoy, and other places, and he assisted in the establishment of peace as plenipotentiary at Radstadt, 1714. After the death of Louis XIV. he supported the administration of the duke of Orleans, and in 1723, when a new war broke out, he was sent to take the command of the French armies in Italy. He took Pisighitone, but soon after was taken ill, and died at Turin, 17th June, 1734, aged 82. His memoirs were published in Holland, 8 vols. 12mo.

VILLARS, Montfaucon de, a French abbé, was born, in 1635, in the neighborhood of Toulouse; and acquired great reputation at Paris as a preacher, but was prohibited from preaching in consequence of his publishing The Count de Gabalis, which his enemies pretended to be an irreligious work. He was assassinated in 1675. The idea of the sylphid machinery of the Rupe of the Lock is borrowed from The Count de Gabalis.

VILLARS, Dominic, a French botanist, was born, in 1745, in a hamlet of the Gapençois; received a scanty education, but improved it by study; became eminent as a physician and botanical lecturer; and died in 1814. Among his works are, A Natural History of the Plants of Dauphiny; and Memoirs on Topography and Natural History.

VILLENA, marquis of, a Spanish poet, allied to the royal house of Arragon. He preferred retirement and solitude to the intrigues of the court, and translated at the request of his relation John, king of Navarre, Virgil's Æneid into Spanish verse. His Gaya Sciencia, a system of poetry, rhetoric, and oratory, describing the ceremonies and public exhibitions of the Troubadours, is his most celebrated performance. He also translated Dante into prose, a work still esteemed by the Spaniards, and died of the gout, 1434.

VILLERS, Charles Francois Dominique de, a French writer, was a native of Belchen, in Lorraine, where he was born in 1764. In the earlier part of his life, he served in the French army as a lieutenant of artillery, but, on the breaking out of the revolution, emigrated, and joined the royalist force under the prince of Condé. On the failure of the hopes of the party to which he had attached himself, he went to Lübeck, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. Villers, who was a man of considerable talent, and some reading, soon acquired a rising reputation in the republic of letters, which was much increased by his obtaining the prize given by the institute, for an Essay on the Influence of the Reformation, and was at length invited to fill the professor's chair of philosophy at the University of Göttingen. This situation, when the French influence predominated, he was compelled to resign, but received a pension in lieu of it. During the occupation of Hanover by the troops of France, under Davoust, the excesses committed by the soldiery induced him to address a letter to Fanny Beauharnois, with the hope of procuring, through her interest, some mitigation of the evils under which the unhappy country of his adoption then labored. The work was printed; but the only effect it produced was to draw on its author the personal hatred of the French commander. He also addressed to the institute two reports on the state of ancient literature, and on the history of Germany. The honors which his own country denied him were accorded by the Swedish government, which made him a chevalier of the order of the polar star. M. de Villers died in the spring of 1815.

tershire, 20th August 1592, and after receiving an indifferent education, he travelled into France, where he acquired all the personal accomplishments of the gentleman and the courtier. He was introduced to the notice of James I. at the play represented for his entertainment by the students of Cambridge, and the monarch was so captivated with his handsome person and his fine clothes, that he soon succeeded to the honors of the discarded Somerset, and became cup-bearer to the king. By degrees honors were heaped upon him; he was knighted, and rapidly rose to the rank of a baron, an earl, a marquis, and a duke, and was made master of the horse, warden of the cinque ports, and obtained the disposal of all the offices of honor and emolument, in the church and state in the three kingdoms. In 1620 he married the earl of Rutland's daughter, the richest heiress in the kingdom, and three years after he persuaded the prince of Wales to go to Spain, in disguise, to solicit the hand of the Infanta his intended bride. On the death of James, Villiers retained all his influence with the new monarch, but while he was the favorite of the court, he was regarded with odium by the parliament and the people. His unpopularity was increased by rashly advising his master to dissolve the parliament and to raise supplies without the consent of the people. In the midst of these popular discontents a war broke out with France, and the duke took upon himself to carry hostilities into the enemy's country, but instead of landing on the continent he made an imprudent attack on the isle of Rhée, in which he lost the flower of his army. This disaster was to be repaired by a more formidable armament, for the relief of Rochelle, which Richelieu was besieging with all the powers of the French monarchy, and the duke made the most extraordinary preparations for the expedition, but before he sailed he was stabbed at Portsmouth by Felton a lieutenant of the army, who was dissatisfied with his conduct, and had vowed his death. This happened 23d August 1625, in the 36th year of his age. In his disposition Buckingham was generous and humane, but in his attachments he was violent and headstrong. Immoderately ambitious, he viewed the cautious measures of the parliament with distrust and contempt, and to carry into execution his favorite measures, he hesitated not to sacrifice the interests of his master, and the happiness of the people.

VILLIERS, George, duke of Buckingham, son of the preceding, was born at Wallingford house, London, 30th January 1627, the year before his father's murder. After being at Cambridge he went on his travels, and at his return he was presented to the king who was at Oxford, and he entered at Christ church. On the fall of the royal power he went with prince Charles to Scotland, and shared afterwards his dangers at the battle of Worcester, but after accompanying him on the continent he returned to England and retrieved his fortunes by marrying, in 1657, the daughter of lord Fairfax. Though thus connected with republicans, he did not lose the royal favor, but preserving his property, he at the restoration was possessed of an estate of £20,000 a year, and added to his honors the place of master of horse to the king. The favors which he enjoyed at court were, however, soon forfeited when he joined a conspiracy against the government, yet so forgiving was the king's temper, that he was restored, on his submission, to his honors and to confidence. The flagitious attempt which he made with Blood on the duke of Ormond's life, did not again expose him, as he deserved, to the royal displeasure, but he was made chancellor of Cambridge, and employed as ambassador to Louis XIV. He afterwards resigned the chancellorship, and capriciously favored the cause of the nonconformists, and afterwards was sent to the Tower for contempt by order of the house of lords. He died 16th April, 1688. Though a man of abilities, of great vivacity, and of quickness of parts, he did not possess a single virtue. His wit was inalevolence, his generosity was profuseness, and so debauched was his character that the whole business of life seemed to be the gratification of the most sensual appetites. His character has been well delineated under the name of Zimri in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, but though a debauchee he has acquired celebrity as a poet and a man of letters. His poems though few in number are great in merit. Besides the Rehearsal, a comedy of singular merit, in which he ridicules the dramatic writers of his age, he wrote the Chances, altered from Fletcher—the Restoration—the Battle of Sedgemoor—the Militant Couple—an Essay on Reason and Religion—on Human Reason—Discourse on the Reasonableness of having a Religion and Worship of God.

VILLOISON, John Baptist d' Anse de, a celebrated French hellenist, was born, in 1750, at Corbeil, and at the age of nineteen had read, and made critical notes on, all the Latin; authors and many of the Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic, he learned in a few months to read. Villoison travelled in Germany, Holland, Italy, and the Levant, in search of manuscripts. He died, in 1805, professor of ancient and modern Greek at the college of France. Among his works are, Anecdota Græca; and Epistola Vimarienses.

VINCE, Rev. Samuel, A. M., F. R. S., late Plumian professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy at Cambridge, was of humble Suffolk parentage; but the munificence of Mr. Pilney, of Harleston, enabling him to enter himself of Caius College in 1775, he distinguished himself by gaining one of Smith's mathematical prizes, and became the senior wrangler of his year. In 1796 then a fellow of Sidney Sussex College, he was elected to the professorship, which he afterwards filled in so distinguished a manner, and which he held till his death in 1821. His works are a treatise on the Elements of Conic Sections, 8vo. 1781; another on Practical Astronomy, 4to., 1790; Plan of a Course of Lectures on Natural Philosophy, 8vo., 1793; The Principles of Fluxions, 2 vols., 8vo., 1795; The Principles of Hydrostatics, 8vo., 1796—1800; A Complete System of Astronomy, 2 vols, 4to., 1797—1799: 3 vols., 4to, with additions, 1814; A Vindication of Christianity against the objections of Hume, in two discourses, preached before the University, 1798—1809; A Treatise on Trigonometry, the nature and use of Logarithms, &c., 8vo., 1800; A Confutation of Atheism, from the laws of the Heavenly Bodies, 8vo., 1806; and on the Hypotheses accounting for Gravitation from Mechanical Principles, 8vo., 1806. He was, at the time of his decease, rector of Kirkly Bedon, vicar of South break (both in Norfolk), and archdeacon of Bedford.

VINCENT, Thomas, author of God's Terrible Voice in the City, by Plague and Fire, 8vo.—of an Explanation of the Catechism, and other religious tracts, was ejected for nonconformity from the living of St. Mary Magdalen in Milk-street, and died at Hoxton 1671. During the plague he continued in the city, and by his discourses from the pulpit greatly contributed to support the spirits, and relieve the terrors of the afflicted inhabitants.

VINCENT, William, D.D., master of Westminster School, was born in London in 1739. He was educated at Westminster, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1762 he became an usher, and nine years after succeeded to the office of second master, at Westminster. He now took the degree of D.D., and was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king. In 1778 he became vicar of Longdon, in Worcestershire; but soon after resigned his benefice for the rectory of Allhallows, Thames-street in London. In 1783 he became head master at Westminster, where he continued to preside till 1801, when he was made a prebend; and two years after he succeeded to the deanery of Westminster, on the promotion of Dr. Horsley to the see of St. Asaph. As an author dean Vincent is principally known on account of his commentary on Arrian's Voyage of Nearchus; and his Periplus of the Erythrean Sea, republished together under the title of The Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Ocean, 1807, 2 vols., 4to. The Voyage of Nearchus was translated into French by Billecocq, Paris, 1800. Dr. Vincent died in December 1815. He published also the Conjugation of the Greek Verb, and the Greek Verb Analysed; A Defence of Public Education; and a Charity Sermon. A Volume of his Discourses, with his life, was published posthumously.

VINCI, Leonard, a celebrated painter, descended of a noble family, and born in the castle of Vinci near Florence 1445. He was patronised by Louis Sforza, duke of Milan, and not only introduced the simplicity and purity of the Greeks over the rude Gothic, but he contributed much to ornament the city, and as well acquainted with architecture and engineering, he supplied it with water by a new canal two hundred miles in length. The wars of Milan, and the misfortunes and captivity of the duke influenced the destinies of the painter, and Leonard quitted a city which he had adorned with his paintings and the labors of his genius. He removed to Florence where he found protection and friendship with the Medicis. From Florence he went to Rome, and soon after visited France by the liberal invitations of Francis I. The fatigues of the journey, however, were too much for his constitution, he languished for some months at Fontainebleau, and during one of the visits which he frequently received from Francis, he raised himself in his bed to show the gratitude of his heart, and at that moment being seized with a fainting fit, he expired in the arms of the monarch, who had eagerly stooped to support him. This was in 1520. The best of his pieces was our Saviour's last supper, painted in oil, on the wall of a church of Milan, long since defaced from moisture and the ravages of time, though a copy of it was taken by order of Francis I. which is preserved at St. Germain's. At Florence he was engaged with Michael Angelo in painting the council chamber of the city, but this union of talents produced unfortunately not only rivalry, but lasting jealousy. According to Rubens, his chief excellence was in giving every thing its proper character. His pieces are mostly preserved at Florence and in France. He wrote treatises on the Nature, Equilibrium, and Motion of Water—on Anatomy—on Perspective—on Light and Shadows—and on Paintings.

VINES, Richard, an English divine born at Blaston, Leicestershire. He was educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Hinckley school, and when in orders he obtained the living of Weddington, Warwickshire. The civil wars drove him from his parish to Coven-try, but on the establishment of the presbyterian government in 1644, he was nominated one of the assembly of divines, and proved himself by his eloquence, an able champion of the republican cause. From London, where he obtained St. Clement Danes, and St. Lawrence Jewry, he removed to Cambridge, where he was appointed master of Pembroke hall, which he resigned soon after, as he would not take the engagement. In the conferences which he had with the monarch as one of the deputies from the parliament, he conducted himself with becoming propriety and marked respect towards his unfortunate sovereign, and on the morning of his execution he offered him his spiritual consolation and assistance. He died 1655. Though a strong and violent Calvinist, he was a benevolent man, void of pride and flattery, and as a scholar distinguished for his perfect knowledge of Greek, and eminent as a philologist, invincible as a disputant, and as a preacher most persuasive. He often preached before the parliament, and of the sermons which he composed, thirty-two have been published.

VLOT, Marie Ann Henrietta Payan de l'Estang, a native of Dresden, distinguished for her learning, her wit, and the great versatility of her genius. She married d'Antremont at the age of twelve, and was a widow at sixteen, and afterwards she took for her second husband de Bourdic of Nismes. Her mental accomplishments recommended her to the notice of the learned, she was honored with a seat in the academy of Nismes, and read on her admission an eulog on her favorite author Montaigne. Among her compositions are known an Ode to Silence—the Summer—Fauvette, a romance—la Foret de Brama, an opera—Epistles to Tremblay. This ingenious and excellent woman died of a fever in the summer of 1802, aged 56, at Bagnols.

VIRGILIUS, Publius Maro, a celebrated Latin poet. He was born at Andes near Mantua, and died at Brundisium, B. C. 19, aged 51. He was happily patronised by Mæcenas and Augustus, and the independence which he enjoyed permitted him to devote the great powers of his genius to the composition of the sublimest efforts of the Italian muse. His ten Eclogues, his four Georgics, and his Æneid in twelve books are well known, and will be read and admired so long as the labors of genius can command the applauses of mankind.

VIRGINIA, daughter of Virginus, was stabbed to the heart by her father, and thus saved from the violence which Appius the tyrannical decemvir meditated against her person, under the pretence that she was the slave of one of his freed men. This created a revolution in the state, and the abolition of the decemviral power, 449, B. C.

VISCONTI, Egnatius Quirinus, was born, in 1751, at Rome; displayed great precocity of talent; was appointed conservator of the museum of the Capitol by Pius VI; was minister of the home department, and subsequently one of the consuls of the short-lived Roman republic; was in consequence compelled to seek an asylum in France; became there a member of the Institute, professor of archaeology, and administrator of the museum; and died in 1818. Among his numerous works are, The Description of the Pio-Clementine Museum; Grecian Iconography; and Roman Iconography.

VITELLIUS, Aulus, a Roman emperor. After sharing in the debaucheries of Tiberius, and administering to the vices of Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, he was proclaimed emperor in Germany by his troops, in opposition to Otho. Though defeated in three battles by his rival he prevailed in the fourth, but instead of reigning like a father, he disgraced himself by every species of licentiousness, and at last was assassinated, and Vespasian placed on the throne A. D. 69.

VITRINGA, Campegio, a native of Leewarde in Friesland, who became professor at the university of Franeker, where he died of an apoplexy 3d March 1722, aged 63. He was author of a Latin commentary on Isaiah 2 vols. fol.—Apocalypseo Anachrisis, 4to.—Typus Theologiæ Practicæ, 8vo.—Synagoga Vetus, 4to.—Archisynagogus, 4to.—De decem Viris Otiosæ Synagogæ, 4to.—Observationes Sacræ, 4to. His son of the same name died also at Franeker 1723, aged 31, professor of theology and author of a valuable abridgment of Natural Theology, 4to. 1720.

VITRUVIUS, M. Pollio, a famous architect of antiquity. He lived in the age of Julius Cæsar, and dedicated his valuable work on architecture, in ten books, to Augustus Cæsar; but few particulars are known of his history. The best edition of this work is that of Amsterdam, 1649, in fol.

VIVES, John Lewis, a native of Valencia, in Spain, who taught belles lettres at Louvain, and came to England, where he taught Latin to Mary the daughter of Henry VIII. He was highly favored by the monarch, but when he presumed to speak and to write against the divorce of Catharine of Arragon, he was arrested, and for six months sent to prison. When he recovered his liberty he returned to Spain, and died at Bruges 6th May, 1540, aged 48. He wrote Commentaries on Augustin's Civitas Dei—a treatise on the Corruption, and Decline of Arts and Sciences—treatise on Religion—and other theological works.

VIVIANI, Vincent, a famous mathematician, born at Florence, 5th April 1622. He was the pupil and the friend of Galileo, and acquired such reputation that he received a pension from Louis XIV. and was appointed first mathematician to the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 22d September, 1703, member of several learned societies in Europe. He published Divination on Aristeas, a work of merit, fol.—de Maximis & Minimis Geometricæ Divinatio in Quintum Conicor. Apoll. Pergæi, &c. fol.—Enodatio Problematum Universis Geometricis Propositorum, a Cl. Commieres, 4to.—a treatise on Proportions, 4to.

VLODOMIR, grand duke of Russia, embraced christianity in 989, and enforced the observation of its mild tenets among his heathen subjects. His good intentions were powerfully seconded by his daughter-in-law, the daughter of Boleslaus, duke of Poland, who brought in her retinue Reimbern, bishop of Colberg, an active and intelligent missionary. Vlodimir, by an old age of repentance, made amends for the cruelties and the debauchery of his former years, and after his death he was regarded by his subjects as an apostle and a saint, and his tomb at Kiow has long continued an object of veneration among the Russians. An order of merit was established by the second Catharine, which bears his name.

VOETIUS, Gisbert, a learned divine, born at Heusden 3d March 1589. He was appointed in 1634, professor of theology, and of oriental languages at Utrecht, where he continued an active instructor for forty years, and died 1st November 1677, aged 87. His accusation of Descartes whom he charged with atheism, was believed by the magistrates of Utrecht, and the two Apologetical letters of the philosopher were condemned to ignominy. His followers were called Voetians. He published Exercitia & Bibliotheca Studiosi Theologi—Politica

Ecclesiastica, 4 vols. 4to.—Diatribæ de Cælo Beatorum, &c.—His son Paul was professor of law at Utrecht, and died 1667, aged 48. He wrote de Usu Juris Civilis & Canonici, &c.—de Jure Militari—Commentar. in Institutiones Imperiales, 2 vols. 4to.—de Mobilium & Immob. Naturâ, 8vo.—John, the son of Paul, was professor of law at Leyden, and at Herborn, and died 1714, author of an excellent Commentary on the Pandects, 2 vols. folio, 1698—1704.

VOISENON, Charles Henry de Fusée de, a native of Voisenon, near Melun, who quitted the ecclesiastical profession for the pleasures of the world, and for the writing of dramatic pieces. He was author of various romances—fugitive pieces of poetry—several comedies—lyric poems—historical fragments, written in an easy and pleasing style, and collected together in 5 fols. 8vo. 1792, by Madame de Turpin. He died 22d November 1775, aged 67.

VOISIN, Daniel Francis, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, rose by his merits to the highest offices of the state, and in 1714 was made chancellor of France. His integrity and virtues were eminently displayed in a conference with Louis XIV. The monarch, who had promised pardon to some worthless culprit, directed his chancellor to affix the seals to the pardon, and when the upright magistrate refused, he took the seals, and sealed the pardon himself. When Louis desired his minister to take the seals back, he declined it, saying, they are contaminated, I wish no longer to hold them. Astonished at his firmness, the king, with an exclamation of admiration, threw the pardon into the fire; now, rejoined the chancellor, I can properly resume the seals, as fire purifies every thing. This excellent character died suddenly, 1st February 1718, aged 62.

VOITURE, Vincent, an eminent French writer, son of a wine-merchant, born at Amiens, 1598. His wit and literary reputation soon recommended him to the notice of the court, where he was liberally patronised and pensioned. He was sent to Spain on political affairs, and during his stay at Madrid, he wrote verses in Spanish with such elegance that they were ascribed to the muse of Lopez de Vega. He afterwards visited Rome, where he was courteously treated, and he was the bearer of the information of the birth of Louis XIV. to the court of Florence. Though loaded with pensions, he was, in consequence of his fondness for gaming, always poor. He died 27th May, 1643. Though he wrote verses with elegance in French, Spanish, and Italian, yet few of his poetical pieces are preserved. His letters form nearly the whole of his works, and they have often been printed in 2 vols. 12mo. They are elegant, polite, and easy, and have deserved the highest commendations of Boileau, who regards him not only as a polisher and refiner of the French language in a barbarous age, but as a sensible and graceful writer.

VOLKOF, Feodor, the Garrick of Russia, was the son of a tradesman at Yaroslaf, and was born 1729. He was educated at Moscow, but instead of devoting himself to the business of a manufacturer of salt-petre and sulphur in the house of his mother's second husband, he took pleasure in frequenting the German theatre at Petersburg, and on his return to Yaroslaf, he erected a stage in his father's house, and provided himself with all the apparatus necessary for dramatic representation. His four brothers shared his theatrical labors, and by degrees acquired such reputation, that a regular theatre was built for the reception of crowded audiences. The fame of the young performer was no sooner reported at Petersburg, than the empress in 1752 sent for him to the capital, and nobly allowed him a handsome pension, and enabled him to represent with effect and magnificence the finest productions of Sumorokof and of Moliere. Under the patronage of the court, not less than twenty-two hundred were annually granted for the salaries of the actors, and Volkof and his brother were ennobled, and presented with extensive estates. The last character which this eminent actor performed was in the tragedy of Zemira, at Moscow, and he died soon after, 1763, aged 35.

VOLNEY, Constantine Francis Chassebeuf de, a French writer, was born at Craon in 1757. After finishing his education he went to Egypt and Syria, of which countries he published a description in 2 vols, 8 vo. 1787. At the beginning of the revolution he became a member of the States-general; but afterwards he purchased an estate in Corsica, where he gave such offence by his opinions that he was obliged to leave the island. In the reign of terror he suffered imprisonment; but in 1794, he was appointed one of the professors in the new school of education. On the failure of this project Volney went to America, where he had a controversy with Priestley on the origin of Christianity. At the peace he returned to Europe, and died at Paris, April 20, 1802. His other works are, 1. On the Simplification of the Oriental Languages. 2. Chronology of the Twelve Centuries preceding the entrance of Xerxes into Greece. 3. The Ruins; or Meditations on the revolutions of Empires. 4. The Law of Nature, or Physical Principles of Morality. 5. Account of Corsica. 6. Lectures on History. 7. On the Climate and Soil of the United States of America. 8. The Chronology of Herodotus. 9. New Researches on Ancient History, 3 vols. &c.

VOLTA, Alexander, an Italian philosopher, distinguished for his discoveries relative to Galvanic electricity. He was descended of a noble and ancient family, and was born at Como in 1745. He applied himself particularly to the study of the natural sciences, and especially to electricity; and, in 1769, he published a dissertation, entitled—De Vi attractiva Ignis Electrici. In 1774 he was appointed professor of natural philosophy at Pavia; and he was in that situation when the discoveries of Galvani were published in 1789. Volta immediately turned his attention to the subject of Galvanism, or animal electricity; and to his researches is due the discovery of what has been termed the principle of electro-motion, or the excitement of electricity by the contact of heterogeneous substances, as exhibited in the phenomena of the Voltaic pile, or electric column. Volta addressed to the Royal Society in London, in 1792, an account of his observations, and in 1794 he was presented with the Copleian medal. In 1801, Bonaparte invited professor Volta to Paris, where he exhibited his discoveries to the members of the Institute. He was subsequently deputy from the university of Pavia to the consulta of Lyons, and then a member of the college of Dotti, a senator, and at length a count. He died March 6th, 1826. A complete edition of his works appeared at Florence in 1816, 5 vols. octavo.

VOLTAIRE, Marie Francis Arouet de, a French writer of great celebrity, born at Paris, 20th February 1694. From his earliest years he evinced superior powers of mind, and a sprightly imagination, so that he said, he wrote verses before he left his cradle. He was educated in the college of Louis the Great, where he made so astonishing a progress, that Ninon de l'Enclos left him two thousand livres to buy him a library. He was intended for the law; but the muses had greater charms for him, and in the society of the courtiers of Louis XIV. he acquired those graces of delicate humor and easy expression by which he was so much distinguished. His fondness for satire directed against the government, procured his imprisonment in the Bastille for one year, from which he was liberated by the interference of the duke of Orleans, who was pleased with the representation of Œdipus, the first tragedy which he wrote, 1713. Some of his plays were afterwards unsuccessful on the stage, and the poet, indignant at the severe censures of his countrymen, left Paris, and went to England, where he was much noticed by George I. and queen Caroline, under whose patronage he published his Henriade. Flattered with his reception from the English, and with the handsome property which he had realized by the liberality of his subscribers, he in 1728 returned to Paris, and while with avaricious eagerness he labored by commerce and by adventurous undertakings to improve his income, he devoted the best part of his time to literary pursuits. His Brutus, the most nervous of his tragedies, appeared in 1730, and was soon succeeded by Zara, the most pathetic of his dramatic pieces. His Lettres Philosophiques at this time gave such offence for their profane and indecent witticisms, that they were burnt by a decree of the parliament, and the author for a while withdrew from the public indignation to the seat of Madame de Chatelet on the borders of Lorraine. His Alzire, Mahomet, and Merope, produced soon after, placed him at the head of the dramatic poets of France, and introduced him to the court as the favorite of Madame Pompadour. Though in the possession of popularity, and universally admired for the bold effusions of his muse, he yet found a host of rivals and detractors, and to fly from their persecution, he retired to the court of Berlin. The confidence and familiarity of the Prussian monarch, and a liberal pension of twenty-two thousand livres, for a while commanded his attachment and partiality; but a quarrel with Maupertuis, who was at the head of the Berlin academy, and that spirit of independence and inconstancy which always marked his conduct, soon after brought on his disgrace, and after being dispossessed of a volume of royal verses, which he wished to carry away, he was permitted to leave the kingdom. The publication of an obscene and impious poem at that time rendered his return to Paris dangerous, and, therefore, after staying one year at Colwar, he purchased an estate near Geneva, where he fixed his residence. This place he soon abandoned for Ferney, on the borders of France, where he established a little colony of industrious artisans, and received, in progress of time, the homage, and the respect of the learned of Europe. In this peaceful retreat, where he received the adulation of the great, and the liberal presents of crowned heads, especially of his ancient friend the king of Prussia, and of the empress Catherine, he continued long to direct the taste and the literature of the world. At last, in 1778, he ventured to exchange the tranquillity of Ferney for the incense of the capital, and, surrounded with glory and with wealth, he appeared at Paris, where he was received with unusual honors by all the learned bodies, and crowned with the poetic wreath, in the full theatre, amidst applauding thousands. These honors, and the complimentary visits of ceremony which they produced were, however, too burdensome for the great age of the poet, and change of regimen, and continued fatigue, inflamed his blood, and brought on a hemorrhage. As if foreboding his approaching end, he declared, when he reached Paris, that he came to seek glory and death, and when presented by an artist with a picture of his triumph, he observed, a tomb would be fitter for me than a triumph. When unable to enjoy his usual rest he took a large dose of opium, which deprived him of his senses, and he died soon after, 30th May, 1778. Voltaire was an extraordinary character; as the leader of a new sect he has caused a revolution in wit and morals, and whilst he has often exerted his powerful talents to promote the cause of reason and of humanity, to inspire princes with toleration, and with a horror for war, he has too often, and too successfully, exerted himself in extending principles of irreligion, anarchy, and libertinism. Ever inconstant and wavering, he was the free-thinker at London, the Cartesian at Versailles, the christian at Nancy, and the infidel at Berlin. From the high character of the moralist, he frequently descended into the buffoon, from the philosopher he became an enthusiast, from mildness he passed to passion, from flattery to satire, from the love of money to the love of luxury, from the modesty of a wise man to the vanity of an impious wit, and from the faith of the humble christian to the foul language and effrontery of the blasphemous atheist. As a man of letters, he must stand on very high ground in the eye of posterity, for versatility of talents, for brilliancy of imagination, for astonishing ease, for exquisite taste, and for vast extent of knowledge. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote several tragedies, the last of which was Irene—several comedies, the best of which are, l'Indiscret, l'Enfant Prodigue, & Nanine—operas—fugitive pieces—Essai sur l'Histoire Generale—Les Siecles de Louis XIV. & Louis XV.—History of Charles XII.—of the Czar Peter—Melanges de Literature—Dictionnaire Philosophique—Philosophie de l'Histoire, and other works of impious tendency—Theatre of Peter and Th. Corneille. These very voluninous works have appeared in various forms, and by several editors. The most correct edition is that of Geneva, in 30 vols. 4to. and the most copious that of Basil, in 71 vols. 8vo.

VONDEL, Justus, or Josse du, a Dutch poet, born 17th November 1587. His parents were anabaptists, but he quitted their sect for the Roman catholic tenets. With strong natural powers, he for a while disregarded the rules of art, and at the age of thirty, began to learn Latin, to enjoy in their original, the beauties of the ancient muse. He wrote various poems, collected together in 9 vols. 4to. The best known of these are, the taking of Amsterdam by Florent V. count of Holland, a work of merit, though wild and irregular—the Destruction of Jerusalem, a tragedy—Palamedes, or Innocence Oppressed, a work which described the fate of Barneveldt, and for which the author was fined three hundred livres by the influence of the offended Maurice—satires, bitterly severe against the ministers of the reformed religion. He lived regardless of worldly affairs, and consequently, died poor, 5th February 1679, aged 91.

VORSTIUS, Conrad, a native of Cologne, who studied at Heidelberg, where he took his doctor's degree. He succeeded Arminius in the divinity chair at Leyden, 1611, an appointment which so displeased the Calvinists, that James I. not only caused his book De Deo to be burnt publicly in London, but prevailed upon the states of Holland, by entreaties and by threats, to banish the offending divine. This persecuted man at last found protection in Holstein, and died at Toningen, 1622. His works are chiefly on controversial and theological subjects. His son William Henry was minister of the Arminians at Warmond, in Holland, and wrote several tracts.

VORTIGERN, a British chief, elected king after the departure of the Romans from the island, 445. To repel the invasion of the Picts and Scots, he called to his assistance the Saxons, and when these warlike tribes landed under the command of Hengist and Horsa, Vortigern granted them large domains. He afterwards married Rowena, Hengist's daughter, and granted him the kingdom of Kent, after which he retired to Wales, and was it is said burned in his castle about 454.

VOSS, John Henry, a German poet and critic, was born at Sommersdorf in 1751. Educated at the school of New Brandenburg he attracted some notice by his poems, inserted in the Almanac of the Muses, of Gottingen, in 1770, and procured the means of studying in the university of that place. A literary society having been formed, called the friends of Gottingen, he became one of the members, among whom were count Stolberg, Holty, Burger, Klopstock, &c. In 1775, Voss engaged in the publication of the Almanac of the Muses, or Anthology, (Blumenlese) of Gottingen, which he conducted till 1800. In 1778, he was nominated rector of the college of Ottendorf, Hanover, whence he removed to occupy a similar office at Eutin in the duchy of Oldenburg. He remained there twenty-three years; and, in 1805, the grand duke of Baden invited him to Heidelberg, where he remained till his death, March 29, 1826. Voss translated the works of Homer, 1793; Virgil, 1799; Horace, 1806; Hesiod and the pseudo-Orpheus, 1806; Theocritus, Bion and Moschus, 1809; Tibullus and Lygdamus, 1810; Aristophanes, 1821; Aratus, 1824; and extracts from the Metamorphoses of Ovid, 1798. His original writings comprise Letters on Mythology, Idylls, and other poems, besides numerous papers in periodical works. He was also engaged in various literary controversies with Heyne, count Stolberg, Creuzer, and others of his learned contemporaries.

VOSSIUS, Gerard John, a learned writer, born near Heidelberg, 1577. He studied at Dort, and in 1595, removed to Leyden, and he acquired such reputation for learning and for merit, that though young, he was in 1599 elected to the office of director of the college of Dort. He was in 1614, appointed director of the theological college of Leyden, and four years after was placed in the chair of eloquence and chronology. Though he endeavored to avoid all controversy, he incurred the displeasure of the Gomarists in his history of Pelagianism, and was expelled from the communion of the anti-remonstrants. Thus persecuted in Holland, he found friends and protection in England, and by the influence of Laud he obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, and was honored with the degree of doctor of laws at Oxford 1629. On the erection of the university of Amsterdam in 1630, Vossius was regarded as a most proper person to support by his learning and abilities the new establishment, and notwithstanding the clamors of his enemies and the opposition of Leyden against the institution, he was called to fill the chair of history. He died there 1649, aged 72. His works were published in 6 vols. fol. 1695. The best known of these are, Etymologicum Linguae Latinae—de Origine & Progressu Idolatriæ—de Historicis Græcis—de Hist. Latinis—de Arte Grammatica.

VOSSIUS, Isaac, LL.D. youngest of the children of Gerard John V. was born at Leyden 1618. He was educated under the care of his father, and acquired such celebrity that he was invited to Sweden to teach queen Christina the Greek language. He received in 1663, a handsome present from Louis XIV. with a flattering letter from Colbert, and on his visit to England in 1670, he was courteously received by Charles II. made doctor of laws at Oxford, and appointed canon of Windsor, with apartments in the castle, where he died 10th February, 1698. The valuable library which he left was regarded as the best in the world, and it was purchased by the university of Leyden. Though learned and well informed, Vossius was weak and credulous, and though he wrote a book to prove the Septuagint to be the work of inspired writers, he ventured in private conversation to dispute the truths and reality of revelation, in consequence of which Charles, well acquainted with his belief in fabulous stories exclaimed, "there is nothing which Vossius refuses to believe, except the bible." His works are very numerous, but may perhaps be regarded as less valuable than those of his father. The character of these two illustrious men has been drawn by the journalists of Trevoux, with great accuracy. Nothing, say they, is more different than the make of their understandings. In the father judgment prevails, imagination in the son; the father labors slowly, the son goes on with ease; the father distrusts the best founded conjectures, the son loves nothing but conjectures; bold and daring, the father's aim was to instruct, the son's to parade and make a noise; truth was the father's object, and novelty the son's. In the father we admire vast erudition orderly arranged, and clearly expressed, in the son a dazzling turn of style, singular thoughts, and a vivacity which pleases even in a bad cause. The father was a man of probity and religion, and regular in his manners, the son was a libertine in principle and practice, he made religion the object of his insults, and only studied to find the weak sides of it; and as to his morality, his obscene notes on Catullus will too fully prove the licentiousness of his heart.

VROON, Henry Cornelius, a native of Haerlem, who in a voyage to Spain was shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal. As he was well skilled in painting, he drew a representation of the storm which had nearly proved fatal to him, and with such success that he met with general approbation. When the earl of Nottingham wished to have the defeat of the armada transmitted to posterity on a suit of tapestry, Vroon was selected for the work, and his execution was equal to the celebrity of the subject. It remains still in the house of lords a monument of his genius, and of the glorious victory of Elizabeth's navy. The time of his death is unknown.

W.

WADDELL, James, D.D., a presbyterian minister, in the county of Orange, Virginia. He lived in retirement, and but little is known of him. He died in the summer of 1805. Mr. Wirt, in his "Letters of a British Spy," has given a most vivid and interesting account of the eloquence of this man. If that account is a true graphic description of what the writer witnessed, and not as has by some been supposed, a mere picture of fancy, Dr. Waddell must have been an extraordinary preacher.

WADHAM, Nicholas, the founder of the college which bears his name at Oxford, was born, about 1536, in Somersetshire, and was educated at Christ Church College. He died in 1610; and the seminary to the establishment of which he devoted a large part of his fortune was completed in 1613.

WADING, Peter, a native of Waterford, in Ireland, who entered among the jesuits, and was professor of theology at Prague, and afterwards at Louvain for sixteen years. He was also chancellor of the universities of Prague and Gratz, in Stiria, and was highly esteemed for his virtues and learning. He wrote poems, and various other works in Latin, and died at Gratz 1644, aged 53.

WADSWORTH, Thomas, a native of St. Saviour's Southwark, educated at Christ college, Cambridge. He obtained Newington Butts, and was remarkable for his charity, but at the restoration he was ejected from the living of St. Laurence Pulteney. He afterwards preached at Newington Theobald's, &c. and died of the stone, 29th October, 1676, aged 46, much respected for his piety and learning. His works are the Immortality of the Soul, and on theological subjects.

WADSWORTH, Benjamin, minister of the first congregational church in Boston, graduated at Harvard college in 1690, and was ordained six years afterwards. In 1725, he was chosen president of the institution in which he was educated. He was highly esteemed for his piety and for his learning and eloquence. Between 1700 and 1725, he published a number of sermons, and other religious works; among the number were two artillery election sermons; one funeral sermon; an invitation to the gospel feast, in eleven sermons; and the benefits of a good, and mischiefs of an evil conscience, in fourteen sermons. He died in 1737 aged 67 years.

WADSWORTH, Benjamin, D.D., minister of Danvers Massachusetts, was born in Milton, July 29th, 1750. He graduated at Harvard college in 1769; was ordained in 1773; and died, January 1826, in the 76th year of his age, and the fifty-fourth of his ministry. As a scholar and a preacher he had a respectable standing, and was esteemed for his moral and social virtues. He published a sermon at the ordination of J. Babcock; one at a thanksgiving; one at a dedication; and one upon the subject of temperance.

WAGENSEIL, John Christopher, LL.D., a learned German, born at Nuremberg, 26th November, 1633. He studied at Stockholm and Altorf, and afterwards travelled as tutor to some persons of distinction, with whom he visited Holland, France, Spain, England, and Italy, and received everywhere those marks of respect and attention which his reputation and learning deserved. Louis XIV. treated him with great liberality, and the university of Orleans honored him with the title of doctor of laws, but though solicited to settle abroad, he preferred literary distinction at home, and after an absence of six years he was placed in the chair of law and history at Altorf. He afterwards exchanged the professorship of history for that of oriental languages, and after being honored with the confidence of the count Palatine of the Rhine, and the notice of the emperor, he died 9th October, 1705, aged 72. He wrote a treatise de Urbe Noribergæ, 4to.—Pera Librorum Juvenilium, 12mo.—Tela Ignea Satanae, 2 vols. 4to.

WAGSTAFFE, Thomas, a native of Warwickshire, educated at the Charter-house, and New Inn-hall, Oxford, where he took his degrees in art. He obtained Martins-thorp rectory in Rutland-shire, and in 1684, was made chancellor of Lichfield, and rector of St. Margaret Pattens, London. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths, and was deprived of his ecclesiastical preferments, and then practised physic for some years with success. He was in 1693, consecrated suffragan bishop of Thetford, and died October 17th 1712, aged 67. He wrote several tracts in defence of the constitution, according to the tenets of the non-jurors, and he ably supported the title of Charles I., to be author of the Eikon Basilike.

WAILLY, Noel Francis de, a native of Amiens, distinguished as a philologist. He wrote a French Grammar of great merit, often republished—Principles of the Latin tongue—on Orthography—translations of Cæsar's Commentaries, and Cicero's Orations, 4 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1801.

WAILLY, Charles de, an eminent architect, was born in 1729, at Paris; studied his art under Blondel, Lëjay, and Servandoni, and at Rome; was a member of the Institute, and the founder of the society of the Friends of the Arts; and died in 1798. His principal works are, the Spinola palace at Genoa, the mausoleum of Ormes in Touraine, and the hotel of Argenson, and the Odeon at Paris. The Odeon was the joint production of Wailly and Peyre.

WAKE, William, D.D. an eminent prelate born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1657. He was in 1672 admitted at Christ-church. In 1689 he was appointed chaplain to William and Mary, and soon after canon of Christ-church, in 1694 rector of St. James's Westminster, dean of Exeter 1701, bishop of Lincoln 1705, and translated to Canterbury January 1715-16. He was engaged 1697 in a severe controversy with Atterbury with respect to the rights of convocation, but though several of the clergy entered the lists on both sides, the State of the Church and Clergy of England, fol. by Dr. Wake was the most masterly, luminous and satisfactory performance, published on the subject. In other writings he also ably vindicated the church against the papists, and while he earnestly wished in his discourses, and in his correspondence, to form an union between the churches of England and France, he was indefatigable in supporting the rights and tenets of the protestants. This truly learned and virtuous man died at Lambeth 24th January, 1736-7, leaving several daughters. Besides his controversial works he published a translation of the epistles of the Apostolical Fathers, 8vo.—Exposition of the church Catechism, often edited—Tracts against Popery—sermons and charges.

WAKEFIELD, Robert, an eminent divine born in the north of England, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards travelled abroad, and acquired such reputation that the emperor appointed him, 1519, professor of Hebrew at Louvain. He, however, soon left the continent for the patronage of Henry VIII. and he became Hebrew professor at Oxford, 1530, and canon of Christ-church. He was author of several Latin pamphlets on the abuses of the papal power—on the Celibacy of the Clergy—Synagoga Hebræorum—a paraphrase of Ecclesiastes, and died in London 1537.

WAKEFIELD, Gilbert a native of Nottingham, educated under Mr. Woodeson, at Kingston on Thames, where his father was minister, and at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his first and only degree 1776. He quitted the church in 1779 for the situation of tutor in the dissenting academy at Warrington, and on its dissolution he removed to Hackney college where he continued about one year. The French revolution at this time gave rise to several political publications, and among others Mr. Wakefield excited the public attention by the violence of his attacks, and the animosity of his observations on the conduct of government. These publications were disregarded by the ministry, as the efforts of virulent licentiousness or disappointed ambition, but his letter to the bishop of Landaff appeared so hostile to the interests of the state, and to the safety of the establishment, that he was prosecuted by the attorney general, and immured for two years in Dorchester gaol. His imprisonment expired May, 1801, but a fever carried him to his grave the following September, in his 45th year. As a scholar he is entitled to high and unreserved praise, and had his talents been always directed in the paths of classical literature, he might have acquired greater fame, and added much to his domestic happiness from the respect and good opinion of men of all parties, and of every denomination. The best known of his publications are a collection of Latin poems, with notes on Homer, 1776—Inquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the three first Centuries concerning the Person of J. C. 4 vols. 8vo.—Sylva Critica—a pamphlet against Public Worship, which gave general offence, and was answered chiefly by dissenters—translation of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo.—Tragœdiarum Græcarum Delectus, 2 vols. 12mo.—Lucretius edited, 3 vols. 4to.—Horææ edited. He also published Memoirs of himself, 8vo. little interesting.

WALDECK, Christian Augustus, prince of, an Austrian general, employed in 1789 against the Turks, and in 1792 against the French. He lost an arm at the siege of Thionville, and afterwards distinguished himself with Wurmser in carrying the lines of Weissenberg. He continued to serve his country with high distinction, and in 1798 passed into Portugal where he was named commander in chief. He died 1798, aged 54, highly respected as a general, and as a warrior.

WALDO, Peter, a merchant of Lyons, who in the 12th century, became the founder of the new sect of the Waldenses. The sudden death of a friend by his side, had such an effect upon him that he made a vow of consecrating himself more immediately to the service of God. He distributed his goods to the poor, and as preacher of the gospel, collected around him thousands of followers in Dauphiné, Provence, and other provinces of France, but notwithstanding the correct conduct and inoffensive morals of his sect, as he entertained opinions contrary to the interests of Rome, he was declared an enemy to the church, and persecution and war were raised against him. Though thousands fell in this bloody and unequal contest, the sect spread from France to Piedmont, and long maintained itself against all opposition.

WALDRON, Richard, major, came from England to America, in 1635; and was one of the earliest settlers of Dover in New Hampshire. For twenty-two years he was sent as representative to the general Court at Boston; and for several years was speaker of the house. In 1681 he succeeded Cutt, as President. He was also the chief military officer for the colony. In 1676 he received orders from Boston to seize all the Indians engaged in the war. This he did by stratagem, and not by an open attack, as advised by his under officers. The stratagem was this. About four hundred of the Indians were invited to his house. He proposed to them a sham fight. They readily acceded to the proposition; but, no sooner were their guns discharged, than they were all made prisoners. Such of them as were deemed friendly were released; but the others were sent to Boston, and were hung or sold as slaves. This act of treachery was not forgotten by the Indians. The remembrance of it was treasured up, with their characteristic determination to obtain revenge. Thirteen years afterwards, they were able to effect their purpose. They did it in the following manner. Two squaws were sent to each of the garrisoned houses in Dover to obtain lodging. Having been admitted, in the middle of the night, at a signal from without, they threw open the doors; the assailants then entered; and the consequence was, that the old soldier, the chief object of their hatred, was made prisoner, and then horribly mangled and killed at the age of eighty years.

WALEs, William, an English mathematician who accompanied captain Cook in his first voyage round the world, as astronomer, and was recommended on his return, to the place of mathematical master at Christ's hospital. He was author of Account of Astronomical Observations in the Southern Hemisphere, 4to.—remarks on Foster's account of Cook's voyage—inquiry into the Population of England and Wales—Robertson's Elements of Navigation improved—a Dissertation on the Achronical Rising of the Pleiades, inserted in Dr. Vincent's Periplus. He died 1799.

WALEs, Samuel, D.D. the son of John Wales minister of Raynham, Massachusetts, was one of the most eminent American clergymen of his time. He graduated in 1767, and was settled at Milford from 1770 to 1782. In June of the latter year he became professor of divinity in Yale college. The responsible and important duties of this office he discharged with credit to himself and to the institution. To uncommon natural talents he had added the most respectable acquirements. And he was also blessed with ardent piety and dignified and commanding manners.

WALKER, Edward, a native of Somersetshire, who was made secretary at war 1639, and assisted the king at the battle of Edgehill. He was also garter-king at arms, and received from Charles I. the honor of knight-hood, and at the restoration was made one of the clerks of the privy council. He was author of Historical Discourses, fol.—Order of the Ceremonies observed at the celebration of St. George's feast at Windsor 1674—Acts of the Knights of the Garter in the Civil Wars, and died 1676.

WALKER, John, D.D. a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, and made rector of St. Mary's Exeter, where he died 1725. His attempt towards recovering an account of the sufferings of the clergy, in the great rebellion, folio 1714, was so honorably received by the public, that the university of Oxford complimented him with the degree of doctor of divinity.

WALKER, William, the master of sir Isaac Newton, was successively appointed to the grammar schools of Lowth, and of Grantham, and was rector of Colsterworth, Lincolnshire, where he died 1684, aged 61. He was author of a valuable treatise on English Particles, 8vo.—and other useful works in grammar, rhetoric, and logic.

WALKER, Samuel, an English divine descended from bishop Hall, and born at Exeter, 16th December 1714. He studied at Exeter college, Oxford, and travelled with the son of lord Rolle, and became in 1740, minister of Laulivery, and in 1746, obtained the living of Truro in Cornwall, where he died 19th July 1761. He was author of two vols. of Sermons, 8vo.—and discourses on the Catechism, 2 vols. 8vo.

WALKER, Adam, a philosophical lecturer, was born in Westmoreland, and brought up to the weaving business. While thus employed, he amused himself in constructing the model of mills, and devoted so much time to study, that, at the age of fifteen he was qualified to be an usher in a school. He next became writing master, and accountant to the free-school at Macclesfield; after which he travelled as a lecturer, and in 1778 settled in London, where he met with great encouragement. He invented the Eidouranion, or transparent orrery; the rotatory lights in the islands of Scilly; and various useful engines. His literary works are—1. Lectures on Experimental Philosophy. 2. Ideas suggested in an Excursion through Flanders, Germany, Italy, and France. 3. Remarks in a Tour to the lakes of Westmoreland and Cumberland, &c. 4. A System of familiar Philosophy. 5. A Treatise on Geography and the use of the Globes, &c. He died at Richmond, aged 90, February 11th, 1821.

WALKER, George, a mathematician, was born about 1735 at Newcastle upon Tyne. He studied at Glasgow; and in 1757 was ordained pastor of a congregation of dissenters at Durham; from whence in 1761, he removed to Great Yarmouth, where he remained till 1771, when he accepted the office of mathematical tutor at Warrington. In 1774, he went to Nottingham, and in 1793, to Manchester. He died in London in 1807. As a mathematician he is known by a "Treatise on the Doctrines of the Sphere;" and papers in the transactions of the Royal Society, of which he was a member. He was also president of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester, in whose memoirs are some of his essays. His sermons and political tracts were published after his death, in 2 vols. 8vo.

WALKER, John, an ingenious writer, author of "the pronouncing Dictionary of the English language" and several other works of excellence, on grammar, and elocution. He was for nearly forty years teacher of elocution, and with such reputation and success, that he acquired a very comfortable competence. His literary as well as his many virtues recommended him to the notice of the learned, and he had among his particular friends and patrons, Dr. Johnson, Edmund Burke, and other eminent characters. He died 1st August, 1807, in his 76th year, at his apartments, Tottenham-court road.

WALKER, John, a physician and geographical writer, was born, in 1759, at Cokermouth, and died June 23, 1830. This singular character passed through the various occupations of engraver, smith, one of the crew of a privateer, school-master, and medical practitioner. In the latter capacity he contributed greatly to diffuse vaccination, and at the time of his decease he was at the head of the Vaccine Institution. He published a Gazetteer and Atlas.

WALKER, Timothy, judge, and a patriot of the American revolution, was born June 26th, 1737. His father, Timothy Walker, was minister of Concord, New Hampshire. In 1776, the subject of this notice was commander of a regiment of minute men; and he also served under Sullivan at Winter Hill. He was also in 1776, one of the committee of safety. For several years he was chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, in New Hampshire. Judge Walker graduated at Harvard college in 1756. His death took place, May 5th, 1822, at the age of 85 years.

WALLACE, sir William, a celebrated Scotchman, descended from a poor but ancient family. Feeling for the miseries of his country, he determined to free it from English slavery, and collecting a small but resolute band, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy's troops amounting to forty thousand men, and slew their leader lord Warren. Thus deservedly regarded as the saviour of his country, he was appointed regent of the kingdom during the captivity of John Baliol, and penetrating into England, laid waste the country of Durham with fire and sword. These victories recalled Edward I. from Flanders, he hastened to meet the Scotch, and totally routed their forces, but though defeated, Wallace retired in security to the impregnable fastnesses of the mountains, and defied the power of the English. Disgusted with the jealousy of the nobles, Wallace abdicated his important offices, and lived in privacy, but his valor was so formidable to the English monarch, that he was meanly betrayed into his hands, and treated as a traitor, and after being executed in 1303, his four quarters were hung in derision in the four principal towns of England.

WALLER, Edmund, an English poet, born 3d March, 1625, at Coleshill in Herts, near Amersham. He was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and was chosen, when scarce seventeen, member for Amersham, in the last parliament of James I. He became early known to the public, by carrying off a rich heiress against a rival whose pretensions were espoused by the court; but his matrimonial happiness was of short duration as he was a widower at the age of twenty-five. Though noticed by the court, and flattered by the nobility on account of his wit and vivacity, he did not neglect the muses, but imbibed a deep taste for the beauties of ancient writers, by his acquaintance with Morley, afterwards bishop of Winchester, who for several years enjoyed the comforts of hospitality and friendship under his roof. In his parliamentary conduct he warmly opposed the measures of the court, and in the impeachment of judge Crawley, he spoke with such eloquence and animation, that twenty thousand copies of his speech were sold in one day. He was in 1642, one of the commissioners who proposed conditions of peace from the parliament to the king at Oxford, but the following year his popularity vanished on an accusation of a conspiracy to reduce the city of London, and the Tower, to the service of the monarch. In this design he was assisted by some members of parliament, and other inferior persons, but though they were all condemned to death, only two were hanged, and Waller purchased his life and liberty after one year's imprisonment, by a heavy fine of £10,000. After this disgrace he retired to France, and lived chiefly at Rouen, and on his return to England, after some time he paid his court to the men in power, and became a great favorite with Cromwell, whose death he embalmed in the most fulsome language of panegyric. So great was the versatility of his talents, and of his disposition, that after being in confidence with the usurper, he became the favorite of the second Charles, and celebrated the restoration as the happiest of events. He continued also in the good graces of James II., and died 1st October, 1687. In his character Waller was agreeable and insinuating, his discourse was admired for its keenness, and vivacity, and in the house of commons his speeches were heard with unusual attention, not only from the elegance of his delivery, but the force of his wit, and the quickness of his remarks. As a poet Waller, is entitled to the highest praise. He may be called, as has been observed, the parent of English verse. The English tongue came into his hands like a rough diamond, he polished it first, and to that degree, that all succeeding artists have admired the workmanship, without pretending to mend it.

WALLEY, John, the principal founder of the town of Bristol in Rhode Island. He had previously been a citizen of Massachusetts, distinguished for his talents, his integrity, and amiable manners. He had been a member of the council, and a judge of the superior court of that colony. And in 1690, he commanded the land forces in the expedition of Sir William Phips against Canada.

WALLIS, John, D.D., an able mathematician, son of a clergyman, born at Ashford, in Kent, 23d November, 1616. From Felsted school, he removed in 1632, to Emanuel college, Cambridge, and soon after taking his degree he was elected fellow of Queen's. After living for some time as chaplain in the family of sir Richard Darley, and of lady Vere, he became in 1644, secretary to the Westminster assembly of divines, and married. In 1649, he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and he removed thither from London where he had long resided, and by his efforts laboriously assisted in laying the foundation of the learned body, afterwards denominated Royal Society. At the restoration he was received with kindness by Charles II., made his chaplain, and not only confirmed in his academical offices, but selected as one of the divines to review the liturgy. He died at Oxford, 28th October, 1703, aged 88. Respected as a man of learning, Dr. Wallis was, during the turbulent times in which he lived universally esteemed for the moderation of his principles, and the mild demeanor which marked his compliance with the various powers in being. Whilst he regarded only the advancement and the interests of religion, of virtue, and of the public good, he lamented the miseries which afflicted his country, and endeavored, in the enjoyment of privacy and learned ease, to live useful and not great. His works are very numerous; but though what he wrote on divinity is most respectable, yet it is from his mathematical labors that he has real claims to lasting celebrity. The best known of his works are, Animadversion on lord Brooke's Nature of Truth,—Animadversions on Baxter's Aphorisms,—Grammatica Linguae Anglicanae,—Elenchus Geometriae Hobinae, with other pamphlets, against Hobbs—Mathesis Universalis, 4to.—Commercium Epistolicum de Questionibus Mathem., 4to.—de Cycloide,—de Aestu Maris Hypothesis,—the works of Archimedes edited, and also Ptolemy's Opus Harmonicum—and Appendix de Veterum Harmonica. His theological works appeared in 1699, 3 vols. folio, dedicated to king William.

WALN, Robert, a miscellaneous writer, was born in Philadelphia, and was liberally educated, but adopted no profession. He was the author of The Hermit in Philadelphia, a satire; The American Bards, a satire; Sisyphi Opus, or Touches at the Times; a History of China; some of the lives in the Biography of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence; a Life of Lafayette; and an account of the Quaker Hospital at Frankfort, near Philadelphia. He died in 1824, at the age of thirty-one.

WALPOLE, sir Robert, earl of Orford, an illustrious minister, born at Houghton in Norfolk, 6th September, 1674. He was elected into parliament in 1700, for King's Lynn, and gradually rose to consequence in the nation. In 1705, he became one of the counsellors of George, prince of Denmark, and secretary at war, and in 1709, treasurer of the navy, but lost all his places the next year, on the change of the ministry. In 1711, he was voted by the house guilty of misdemeanors, and of corruption in his office of secretary at war; but though he was expelled from the house, and confined in the Tower, it is fully evident that he owed this disgraceful sentence, not to his own misconduct, but to the violence of his political opponents, who resented his firm attachment to the Marlborough family, and were jealous of the powerful influence of his oratorical powers in the house. His ignominy was regarded as the cause of the Whigs, he was returned for King's Lynn, and though the election was declared void, his constituents nobly persisted in their choice. His attachment to the Hanoverian interest was rewarded on the accession of George I. he was made paymaster-general of the forces, and a privy councillor, and soon raised to the arduous office of chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury. His zeal in the impeachment of Oxford, Bolingbroke, Ormond, and Strafford, had rendered him popular in the nation, and a favorite of the court; but after two years the ministry was divided, and sir Robert gave way to the more powerful influence of Stanhope. Now engaged in the ranks of opposition, he directed the shafts of his nervous eloquence against all the measures of the court, and even shared the honors and the popularity of patriotism with Wyndham and Shippen; but by degrees his acrimony softened, and the zealous and watchful defender of public rights became again the fawning courtier, and was restored soon after to the high and responsible situation of premier. Thus the favorite minister of the king, he continued at the head of affairs during the reigns of the first and of the second George, till at last in 1742, the clamor of opposition prevailed, and sir Robert, unable to carry a majority in the House of Commons, retired from his dangerous eminence, and took shelter behind the throne. He was created earl of Orford, and as the reward of his long tried services, the king granted him a pension of £4000. This extraordinary character, who so long guided the destinies of England by the powers of eloquence as well as by intrigue and by corruption, and who, in the possession of ministerial influence, boasted that he knew the price of every man, was, in private life amiable, kind, and benevolent, and fully deserved the unsolicited and therefore impartial praises of Pope's elegant muse. The last years of his life were spent in retirement and tranquillity on his estate in Norfolk, where he died 18th March, 1745-6, aged 71.

WALPOLE, Horace, youngest son of the preceding, was born 1717. In 1734, he went to King's college, Cambridge, and there distinguished himself by his elegant verses in honor of Henry VI. the founder of Eton school. Under the patronage of his father, he obtained in 1733, the office of inspector of exports and imports, which he afterwards exchanged for that of usher to the exchequer, with which he held the place of comptroller of the pipe, and of clerk of the escheats in the exchequer for life, appointments of the annual value of nearly £5000. In 1739, he was permitted by his father to travel on the continent, and accompanied by Gray he made the tour of France and Italy; but a dispute at Reggio unfortunately separated the two friends, whose intimacy was again renewed in 1744, to the honor of both. On his return to England in 1741, he was elected into parliament; but though he sat in the house for above twenty-five years, he never distinguished himself as a speaker, except on one occasion, in defence of his father in 1741. On giving up his seat in parliament, he retired to his favorite house at Strawberry-hill, near Twickenham, which he had purchased in 1747, and tastefully adorned with all the striking features of Gothic times. In this charming spot the literary hermit opened in 1757, a printing press, where he published first the two sublime odes of his friend Gray, and afterwards edited other works in an elegant and highly finished style. On the death of his nephew in 1791, he succeeded to the title of earl of Orford, but elevation of rank had no charms for him. He never took his seat in the House of Lords, and with reluctance submitted to the respect or adulation of his friends in assuming an empty title, which he contemptuously called a new name for a superannuated old man of seventy-four. Respectable as a man of letters, lord Orford was distinguished for his extensive information; he was polite in his manners, facetious in his conversation, and in his sentiments, lively, intelligent, and acute. If avarice and vanity were, according to one of his biographers, his leading foibles, affability, and a companionable temper were his most distinguishing virtues. He was of a benignant and charitable disposition; but it must be confessed, that no man ever existed, who had less the character of a liberal patron. He died 2d March, 1797, aged 80. The best known of his works are, a Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, republished with great additions by Th. Park, in 5 vols. 8vo. 1806—Historic Doubts concerning Richard III.—Anecdotes of Painting enlarged from Vertue—the Castle of Otranto, an interesting romance in the marvellous style, written in eight days—Essay on Modern Gardening—and the Mysterious mother, a tragedy.

WALSĤ, William, an English poet, born about 1663. He entered as gentleman commoner at Wadham college, Oxford; but though he left the university without a degree, he applied himself with such assiduity to literature, at home, and in London, that he became, in Dryden's opinion, the best critic of the nation. He was for several years member of parliament, and gentleman of the horse to queen Anne; but he derives greater celebrity from the acquaintance of Dryden and of Pope, than from his intimacy with the great and the powerful. He has been praised by Pope in his Essay on Criticism, and though he possesses not the fame of a great poet, he is to be admired for the correctness of his language, and the sportive graces of his muse. The time of his death is not certain, though it is generally supposed to have happened about 1709. His works are, a Dialogue concerning Women, being a Defence of the Sex, 8vo.—letters and poems, amorous and gallant, 8vo.—Essay on Pastoral Poetry—Defence of Virgil—elegies, epitaphs, odes, and songs.

WALSTEIN, Albert, duke of Friedland, distinguished himself in the service of the emperor, and was rewarded with part of the lands of the revolted duke of Mecklenburg. When Germany was invaded by Gustavus Adolphus, he was placed at the head of the imperial armies, and defeated the enemy, though he was afterwards beaten at the battle of Lutzen, 1632. His popularity was such among his soldiers, that the emperor, afraid of his influence, appointed him a successor; but Walstein, unwilling to yield his power, demanded and received the sworn allegiance of his army, and declared himself independent, 1634. He was murdered a month after, by the cruel and cowardly suggestion of the emperor, who thus cut off an enemy whom he despaired of destroying in the field of battle.

WALSINGHAM, sir Francis, an illustrious statesman, under Elizabeth, born at Chislehurst, Kent, of an ancient family. He was twice ambassador from England to France, and was, with difficulty, saved from the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew. His services abroad were rewarded at home, with the office of secretary of state, and his vigilance and abilities were directed in establishing the protestant religion, and in strengthening the throne of his sovereign. He possessed such deep penetration, and such address, that he discovered the political intrigues of foreign courts, and by means of the fifty-three agents, and fifteen spies which he entertained abroad, procured the earliest intelligence of the designs of the enemies of his country, and often removed the scruples of his coadjutors by producing copies of the most secret articles of diplomatic confidence. He was, in 1578, sent as ambassador to the Netherlands, and he afterwards visited France and Scotland in the same capacity. This celebrated statesman, whose labors were indefatigable, dedicated to advance the commerce, and the arts of his country, and to patronise literature, died so poor, in 1589, that, on account of his debts, his remains were privately buried by night in St. Paul's church, without any funeral ceremony. He was in his 90th year. An account of his negotiations and dispatches have appeared by the title of the Complete Ambassador, in fol. published 1655.

WALTER, John Gottlob, one of the most celebrated anatomists of the present age. He was born at Frankfort on the Oder, he took the degree of doctor of medicine in 1757. He then went to Berlin to complete his education; and after having been professor at the anatomical theatre of the medico-surgical college, he in 1774 succeeded Meckel as first professor of anatomy and midwifery; and some years afterwards he also obtained the anatomical chair at the hospital of Charity. He greatly distinguished himself by his numerous anatomical discoveries, the result of the dissection of more than eight thousand subjects; and he formed a collection of preparations amounting to two thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight specimens, which was purchased by the king of Prussia for the anatomical museum of Berlin. Professor Walter died January 4th, 1818. Among his principal works are a Treatise on the Dried Bones of the Human Body, Berlin, 1763—1798, 8vo; Observationes es Anatomicæ, 1775, folio; A Manual of Myology, 8vo; Tabulæ Nervorum Thoracis et Abdominis, 1783, fol.; and A Few Words concerning the Craniological Doctrine of Gall, 1805, 8vo.

WALTER, Frederic Augustus, son of the preceding, was born at Berlin, September 26, 1764. He was appointed in 1790 professor of anatomy and physiology at the college of medicine and surgery at Berlin; and in 1791 he was chosen a member of the academy there. In 1803 he obtained, in conjunction with his father, the direction of the anatomical museum; and in 1805 he was made first medical counsellor. His death took place December 13, 1826. He published Annotaciones Academicæ, 1786, 4to; A Manual of Angiology, 1789, 8vo; Researches concerning Diseases of the Kidneys and Bladder, 1800 8vo; and The Anatomical Museum of J. T. Walter, his father, 1796, 2 vols. 4to.

WALTER, Nehemiah, one of the early ministers of Massachusetts, was born in Ireland, December 1663, but came to America at the age of sixteen years. He graduated at Harvard college in 1684; and in 1689 was ordained as colleague with the Apostle Elliot, as he was called, at Roxbury. For some time previous to his ordination he had resided in a French family at Nova Scotia; and this had enabled him to acquire a knowledge of the French language. He was thus in a condition to preach, as occasion required, to a society of French Protestants in Boston. Mr. Walter's whole life was characterized by the most unequivocal qualifications for the sacred functions in which he was engaged.

His talents were of the popular kind, and his piety was unquestionable. He married a daughter of Increase Mather. His death took place, September 17, 1750, at the age of 86 years, having been in the ministry more than sixty-eight years. His publications were Four Essays—a Convention Sermon—and a posthumous volume of sermons.

WALTER, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born, December 7th, 1696, and graduated at Harvard college at the early age of seventeen. In 1719 he was ordained as colleague with his father; but he died after a little more than seven years' labor in the ministry, January 10, 1725. He was a distinguished scholar, and an acute logician. He published four sermons.

WALTER, Thomas, an eminent botanist, was a native of England; a man of liberal education, and much devoted to the study of natural history, and especially of botany. He migrated to America, and settled in South Carolina, a few miles from the city of Charleston, where he resided a number of years as a planter, and where he died toward the close of the eighteenth century. In 1788, he published his Flora Caroliniana, which is a work of merit.

WALTHER, N. a native of Nuremberg, in the beginning of the 16th century, known as the first who discovered the astronomical refraction of light. He was the friend and the associate of Regiomontanus, whose writings and astronomical instruments he purchased.

WALTON, Brian, D.D. the learned editor of the Polyglott Bible, was born at Cleaveland, Yorkshire, 1600. He studied at Magdalen college, and afterwards at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and then officiated as curate in Suffolk and in London. His learning recommended him to the notice of the great; he became rector of St. Martin's Orgar, London, and of Sandon, Essex, and in 1639, took his degree of doctor of divinity, and soon after was appointed chaplain to the king, and prebendary of St. Paul's. His activity in defending the rights of the church, rendered him very obnoxious to the Presbyterians, so that, on the breaking out of the civil wars, he was accused before parliament as a great delinquent, and stripped of his benefices. He escaped with difficulty to Oxford, where he was incorporated in 1645, and where he formed the noble scheme for his Polyglott bible. This most valuable and laborious publication was happily completed in the midst of persecution and of civil war, and made its appearance in 1657, in 6 vols. folio, exhibiting the text in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Arabic, Æthiopic, Persian, Greek, and Latin languages. His coadjutors in the collating of various copies, were Edmund Castell, Samuel Clarke, Thomas Hyde, Edward Pococke, Whelock, Thorndike, and other learned men. For his services to sacred literature, and his attachment to the royal cause, Walton was, on the restoration, made chaplain to the king, and a little after created bishop of Chester. His reception in his diocese, in the midst of the acclamations of thousands of people, was most flattering to his virtues and popularity, which unhappily was to be short-lived, as he died on his return to London, at his house, Aldersgate street, 29th November 1661. He published besides, Introductio ad Lectionem Linguarum Oriental. 8vo.—an able Defence of his Bible—and a pamphlet on the Right of the London Clergy to Tithes.

WALTON, Izaak, an English writer, born at Stafford, August 1593. He for some time kept a shop in the royal exchange, and in Fleet-street, and retired from business with a comfortable competency. He was particularly attached to angling, and he published a most curious and valuable treatise on his favorite amusement, called the Complete Angler, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation, 1653, in 12mo. with cuts, of which a fifth edition appeared in 1676. His time was afterwards usefully employed in compiling accounts of the lives of several of his learned friends, and those which appeared separately have been published together, and exhibit a most pleasing picture of the abilities of the indefatigable author, and abound with interesting and curious anecdotes of men eminent in rank, in talents, and in learning. The characters mentioned are Dr. John Donne, sir Henry Wotton, Hooker, author of Ecclesiastical Polity, George Herbert, and bishop Sanderson. Walton lived to a good old age, respected and beloved by his friends, in the number of whom were archbishops Usher and Sheldon, bishops Morton, Morley, King, Barlow, Drs. Fuller, Price, and Holdsworth. He died at the house of Dr. Hawkins at Winchester, 15th December 1683, aged above 90.

WALTON, George, a native of Virginia, born in 1740, who by the energies of his own mind rose to a desirable eminence. He possessed an eager desire of knowledge, and devoted to its acquisition all the moments he could spare from his early occupation as an apprentice to a carpenter. At the expiration of his term of service, he removed to the state of Georgia, where he applied himself to the study of law, and, in 1774, was admitted to the bar. Among the patriots at Savannah who associated for devising measures of resistance to the encroachments of England, he took an active part. In January, 1775, he was chosen a member of the committee appointed to prepare a petition to the king; and in February, 1776, he was elected one of the Georgia delegation to the national congress, and continued a member of that body, with little intermission, until 1781. In December 1778, he was appointed colonel in the militia, and received a wound in the thigh, during the defence of Savannah. He was twice chosen governor of the state, once a senator of the United States, and, at four different periods, a judge of the superior courts, which last office he held fifteen years, until his death in 1804.

WANLEY, Humphrey, was born 21st March, 1671-2, at Coventry. He preferred literature to the drudgeries of trade in which his father had engaged him, and by the friendship of Lloyd, his diocesan, he went to Edmund hall, Oxford, and afterwards removed to University college. By the kindness of Mr. Nelson, he obtained the office of secretary to the society for propagating Christian knowledge, and he afterwards became librarian to lord Oxford, with a liberal pension. In this occupation he arranged with judicious care the Harleian collection, and kept a curious diary of every occurrence in which he was personally concerned. He travelled through England in search of Anglo-Saxon MSS. for Dr. Hicke, and died universally respected, 6th July, 1726.

WANSLEB, John Michael, a native of Erfurt in Thuringia, who, after studying at Konigs-berg, was employed by the learned Ludolf to come to England, to print his Æthiopic dictionary. The work appeared in London 1661, and the author charged Wansleb with inserting several ridiculous and improper things without his permission. Wansleb afterwards assisted Dr. Castell in the completion of his Lexicon Heptaglotton, and then was employed by Ernest, duke of Saxe Gotha, to travel into Æthiopia to propagate the Christian religion. He was dissuaded from penetrating to Æthiopia by the patriarch of Alexandria, and therefore, after visiting Egypt, he returned to Europe.

Afraid, however, of appearing before the duke, he repaired to Rome and Paris, and was engaged by Colbert to go into the East in search of literary curiosities, and he enriched the French king's library by the purchase of three hundred and thirty-four MSS. His conduct, however, displeased Colbert as it had displeased the duke of Saxe Gotha, and he was recalled to Paris as he was preparing to go to Æthiopia, and he died a few years after, neglected by the government, which had before liberally promised him protection, June 1679, aged 44. He published some Account of Egypt, and also of the Church of Alexandria.

WARBURTON, William, D.D. LL.D. an illustrious prelate, born at Newark in Nottinghamshire, 24th December, 1698. Though he practised for some years as an attorney in his native town, it is believed that he had little business, and consequently he applied those high endowments of classical knowledge which he had industriously acquired at school to pursuits more congenial to his taste and inclination. In 1724, he published miscellaneous translations in prose and verse from Roman historians, and three years after his Critical and Philosophical Inquiry into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles as related by historians, appeared. His learning and abilities in the mean time recommended him to the notice of Theobald, Concanen, and other wits, and by the friendship of sir Robert Sutton, to whom he had dedicated his two works, he was presented to the living of Burnt Broughton, worth £200 a-year. In 1736, he published the Alliance between Church and State, or the Necessity and Equity of an established Religion and a Test Law, and in 1738, appeared his Divine Legation of Moses, demonstrated on the principles of a religious deist, from the omissions of the doctrines of a future state of rewards and punishments in the Jewish dispensation, in six books. This work drew upon him a host of literary enemies, and he was obliged to vindicate himself against their objections and cavils. In 1739, he defended Pope's Essay on Man, and this insured him the friendship and attention of this celebrated poet, and warm recommendation to the learned and the great. At his death in 1744, Pope left the publication of his works to the judgment of his friend, a bequest worth about £4000. At that time Warburton published an answer to the objections raised against his Divine Legation, and severely directed his censures against Drs. Middleton, Poccocke, Richard Grey, and others. On the following year he cemented his intimacy with Mr. Allen, by marrying his niece, Miss Tucker, an event which procured to him the opulent inheritance of that gentleman's property, and paved the way to preferment and dignity. Though his abilities were now universally acknowledged as an able divine, and a zealous advocate in favor of the church establishment, he yet received no reward from the gratitude of government. In 1746, however, he was unanimously called by the society of Lincoln's inn to be their preacher; in 1754, he was made king's chaplain, and prebendary of Durham. In 1757, he was advanced to the deanery of Bristol, and two years after his services to religion and literature were rewarded by his nomination to the vacant see of Gloucester. In the last years of his life this learned prelate sunk into deep melancholy, which was aggravated by the loss of his only son. He died in his palace at Gloucester, 7th June, 1779, aged 81. His works are very numerous and highly respectable. Besides the Divine Legation, which he corrected and improved, a work often reprinted, in 3 vols. 8vo. and 2 vols. 4to. and the works already mentioned, he published Julian, or a Discourse on the Earthquake and Fiery Eruptions which defeated that Emperor's Attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem—sermons, 2 vols. 8vo.—a view of lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy—a tract on the Lord's Supper—a treatise against the Methodists on the Doctrine of Grace—an edition of Shakspeare, severely criticised in the Canons of Criticism by Edwards—Pope's works, 9 vols. 8vo. His works have appeared together in 6 vols. 4to. The character of Warburton is summed up with great discrimination by Dr. Johnson. He was, as he observes, a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge. To every work he brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. His abilities gave him a haughty consequence, which he disdained to conceal or inollify; and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with such contemptuous superiority, as made his readers commonly his enemies, and excited against the advocate the wishes of some who favored the cause. His style is copious without selection, and forcible without neatness; he took the words that presented themselves; his diction is coarse and inure, and his sentences are unmeasured.

WARD, Samuel, D. D. scholar of Christ college, fellow of Emanuel, and in 1609 master of Sidney, Cambridge, was an able disputant. He was also archdeacon of Taunton, and Margaret professor of divinity, and so well known as a divine, that he was sent to the synod of Dort, where he relaxed from his rigorous attachment to the doctrines of Calvin. He suffered great persecution during the civil war, and was not only expelled from his offices in the university, but treated with such harshness and severity, that he died in consequence, 1643. He was author of some theological tracts, and many of his letters appear in Usher's collection, folio.

WARD, Seth, D.D. an English prelate, well known as a mathematician and astronomer. He was born 1617, and after studying in the school of his native town, he removed in 1632, to Sidney college, Cambridge. By application and good conduct, he recommended himself to the notice of the master of the college, who though not a relative, was of his own name, and he was elected fellow of the society, but was ejected for refusing to take the covenant. After leaving Cambridge, he was employed as tutor in various respectable families, and on the expulsion of Greaves from the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, he was appointed to succeed him, and entering at Wadhain college, he took the requisite oaths in 1649. In 1659 he was elected president of Trinity college; but at the restoration he resigned it, and obtained the rectory of St. Lawrence Jewry, and was installed into the precentorship of Exeter church, which a few years before had been presented to him by the expelled bishop. In 1661, he was made fellow of the royal society, and dean of Exeter, and the next year bishop of that see. In 1667 he was translated to Salisbury, and 1671, obtained the chancellorship of the garter, an honor which he had the interest to annex to his successors in the see of Sarum. He died in 1689. In his character he was a prudent, pious, and ingenious man, admirably skilled not only in mathematics, but also in all kinds of polite literature, and he was, as bishop Burnet has observed, one of the greatest men of his age. He was author of a philosophical Essay on the Being and Attributes of a God—Exercitatio Epistolica in Hobbii Philosophiam, 8vo.—Sermons—a Lecture on Comets—an Idea of Trigonometry—Geometrical Astronomy.

WARD, John, LL. D., a native of London, educated at Utrecht, where he took his law degrees. He was brought up for the ministry among the dissenters, but obtained the place of clerk in the navy office, which he afterwards resigned, and kept an academy in Moorfields. He was in 1720, elected professor of rhetoric at Gresham college, and three years after fellow of the royal society, and in 1752, one of its vice-presidents. He was in 1751, created doctor of laws at Edinburgh, and in 1753, elected a trustee of the British museum, and he died at Gresham college, 17th October 1758, aged 80. He was author of the Lives of the Gresham Professors, 2 vols. folio—Dissertations on difficult Passages of Scripture, 8vo. besides editions of Lily's Grammar, and of the Westminster Greek Grammar, and he assisted Horsley in his Britannia Romana, and Ainsworth in his Dictionary.

WARD, Nathaniel, the first minister of Ipswich, Massachusetts. He was a native of Haverhill, England; born in 1570; and, was educated at the university of Cambridge, in that country. He belonged to the established church; but, being brought under censure for non-conformity, in 1734, he came to New England. He was soon settled as pastor of the church at Agawam or Ipswich. He did not however, continue here long, being in 1636 dismissed at his own request. In 1641, he was chosen to preach the election sermon; and, in December of the same year, had the satisfaction of seeing a code of one hundred laws, which he had the year previous drawn up, established by the general court. The code was called "The Body of Liberties," and had been submitted to the governor and others for consideration. In 1647 he returned to England, and the year after was settled at Shenfield, Essex, where he died in 1653. He published some political satirical works, which evinced much humor and vigor of mind—two only of which are now extant—The Simple Cobbler of Agawam in America, and Mercurius Antemecharius, or the Simple Cobbler's Boy.

WARD, John, physician and minister, the son of the preceding, was born in England, November 5th 1606. In 1639 he removed to America and in 1641, was settled at Haverhill, Massachusetts. He died at the age of 87. He was exceedingly temperate in his diet, and maintained the full possession of his faculties until a month before his death. He walked a great deal, and to his abstemiousness and exercise may be attributed his length of years.

WARD, Artemas, major-general, was graduated at Harvard College in 1748. He was a representative to the state legislature, a member of the common council, and a justice of the court of common pleas for the county of Worcester. June 17th 1775 he was appointed first major-general of the American army, and was entrusted with the command of the right wing of the troops stationed at Roxbury, for the siege of Boston. He was a member of Congress both before and after the adoption of the present constitution. He was much valued by Washington; and though he resigned his commission in April 1776, yet at the request of the commander in chief, he continued some time longer in appointment. He was a man of exemplary piety and incorruptible integrity. After a long and patient endurance of many sufferings, he died October 23th, 1800, aged 73.

WARE, sir James, a native of Dublin, the son of the secretary of the lord deputies of Ireland. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and in 1629 he was knighted, and three years after he was, on the death of his father, appointed his successor as auditor-general of the kingdom. In 1639, he was made a privy counsellor; but during the rebellion he was a great sufferer from the violence of the republicans. He went in 1644, as deputy from lord Ormond to Charles I. at Oxford, but was taken at sea on his return, and sent to the Tower. When liberated, he returned to Dublin, and after the surrender of that city, on which occasion he was delivered as an hostage, he was permitted to go to France, and continued, at Caen and Paris. On the restoration he recovered his places of auditor-general and of privy counsellor, and died at Dublin, 1st December 1666, aged 62. His works are chiefly on the history and antiquities of Ireland, the best known of which are, de Præsulibus Hiberniæ, folio—the Antiquities of Ireland, folio. His valuable collection of MSS. passed into the hands of lord Clarendon, and afterwards came into the possession of the primate Tenison.

WARE, James, an eminent surgeon and oculist, was born, about 1756, at Portsmouth, and was apprenticed to Mr. Karr, surgeon of the king's dockyard at that place. After having been demonstrator under Dr. Collignon, professor of anatomy at Cambridge, he formed a partnership, in the metropolis, with Mr. Wathen, which continued till 1791. Subsequent to that period he practised on his own account, and ranked high among British surgeons. He died in 1815. Among his works are, Observations on Ophthalmy; Remarks on Fistula Lachrymalis; and Chirurgical Observations.

WARGENTIN, Peter, a learned Swede, born 22d September 1717. He became knight of the order of the Polar-star, member of the various learned societies of Europe, and secretary to the academy at Stockholm, where he died at the observatory, 13th December 1783. He published tables for computing the eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, a valuable work, and contributed fifty-two memoirs to the transactions of the Stockholm academy.

WARHAM, William, a native of Okely in Hampshire. He was educated at Winchester school and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1475. In 1488 he practised as an advocate in the court of Arches, and five years after was sent as ambassador to the court of Burgundy, to solicit the duke not to support the imposture of Warbeck, and he conducted himself so much to the king's satisfaction, that he was appointed chancellor of Wells, and master of the rolls. He was afterwards raised to the dignity of lord chancellor and made bishop of London, and in 1504 translated to Canterbury. The death of Henry VII. greatly altered his situation in the kingdom, and Wolsey the favorite of the new king was raised in his room to the office of chancellor, and soon after acquired the superiority in ecclesiastical affairs, by being nominated legate a latere from the pope. Warham remonstrated in vain against the pride and encroachments of his rival, and died after filling the see twenty-eight years. His memory is entitled to respect, not only from his munificence, piety, and moderation, but his liberal patronage of Erasmus and other learned men.

WAREHAM, John, an eminent minister in Exeter, England, arrived at Nantasket, May 30, 1630, with a congregation of persons, as their teacher. They first settled in Dorehester, but afterwards removed to Windsor, Connecticut where Mr. Wareham continued about thirty-four years till his death April 1, 1670. He was a man of ardent piety; yet suffered much from religious melancholy.

He is reputed to be the first minister in New England who preached from notes.

WARING, Edward, M.D. Lucasian Professor of mathematics in the university of Cambridge, was the son of a wealthy farmer, of Old Health, near Shrewsbury. The early part of his education he received at the free school in Shrewsbury; whence he removed to Cambridge, and was admitted on the 24th of March, 1759, a member of Magdalen college. Here his talents for abstruse calculation soon appeared, and, at the time of taking his degree, he was considered as a prodigy in those sciences which make the subject of the bachelor's examination. The name of Senior Wrangler was thought scarcely a sufficient honor to distinguish one who so far outshone his contemporaries; and the merits of John Jebb were sufficiently acknowledged by being second in the list. Waring took his degree of B. A. in 1757, and the Lucasian professorship became vacant before he was of sufficient standing for the degree of A. M., which is a necessary qualification for that office. This defect was supplied by a royal mandate, through which he became M. A. in 1760; and soon after Lucasian professor. In 1762 he published his Miscellanea Analytica; one of the most abstruse books written on the obstrusest parts of algebra. This work extended his fame over all Europe. He was elected, without solicitation, member of the societies of Bononia and Gottingen; and received flattering marks of esteem from the most eminent mathematicians at home and abroad. Mathematics did not, however, engross the whole of his attention. In 1767 he was admitted to the degree of M. D., but it was to him merely a barren title. His life passed on, marked out by discoveries, chiefly in abstract science; and by the publication of them in the Philosophical Transactions, or in separate volumes, under his own inspection. He lived some years at St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire. While at Cambridge he married—quitted Cambridge with a view of living at Shrewsbury; but, the air or smoke of the town being injurious to Mrs. Waring's health, he removed to his own estate at Plaisley, eight miles from Shrewsbury, where he died in 1797, universally esteemed for inflexible integrity, modesty, plainness, and simplicity of manners. He was the discoverer, he says, of nearly four hundred propositions in the Analytics. In 1759 he published the first chapter of the Miscellanea Analytica, as a specimen of his qualifications for the professorship. He published also, 1. Proprietas Algebraicarum Curvarum, in 1772; Miscellanea Analyticae; 2. Meditationes Algebraicae, in 1770; Meditationes Analyticae in 1773—6. These were his chief and most laborious works. In the Philosophical Transactions is to be found a variety of papers, which alone would be sufficient to place him in the first rank in the mathematical world. For these papers the professor was in 1784, deservedly honored by the Royal Society with Sir Godfrey Copley's medal. He also wrote a work on Morals and Metaphysics in the English language; but a few copies only were presented to his friends.

WARNER, Ferdinando, LL.D. vicar of Roude, Wilts, rector of St. Michael's Queenhithe, London, and of Barnes, Surrey, was author of a system of divinity and morality, on the most important points of natural and revealed religion, 5 vols. 12mo. reprinted in 4 vols. 8vo. 1756. He published besides some single sermons—Life of sir Thomas More—the History of Ireland, 1 vol. 4to.—History of the Rebellion and Civil war in Ireland, 4to.—Bolingbroke, or a Dialogue on the Origin and Authority of Revelation—an Account of the Gout. This laborious author died of the gout, October 3d, 1768, aged 68. His son John was educated at Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. 1773. He obtained Hockliffe and Chalton livings in Bedfordshire in 1771, and afterwards Stourton, Wilts. He was author of a learned treatise on the pronunciation of Greek, called Metron Ariston, and he also translated from the Spanish, the life of Friar Gerund, in 2 vols. 8vo. He was for some time chaplain to the English embassy at Paris, and died 1800.

WARNER, Richard, a learned botanist, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. Though called to the bar he never followed the profession, but chiefly passed his time at his seat at Woodford Green, Essex, employed in those botanical pursuits which he loved. He wrote Plantæ Woodfordienses, or a catalogue of the plants in his neighborhood, 8vo.—Letter to Garrick on a Glossary to Shakspeare, 8vo.—Translations of some of Plautus' Comedies. He left his valuable library to Wadham college, and died 1775.

WARING, Edward, a mathematician, was born, in 1734, at Fitz, in Shropshire; was educated at Shrewsbury free school, and at Magdalen College, Cambridge; was chosen Lucasian professor at the age of twenty-five; became a fellow of the Royal Society, and member of the board of longitude; and died in 1798. He wrote Miscellanea Analytica; Meditationes Analyticae; Meditationes Algebraicae; and An Essay on the principles of Human Knowledge.

WARNER, Seth, Col. a revolutionary patriot, was born in Woodbury, Connecticut, 1744. In 1773 he removed to Vermont, and in the controversy with New York, he and Ethan Allen were the leaders. That state passed an act of outlawry against him March 9, 1774. In 1775 he marched with Allen against Ticonderoga; was engaged with Montgomery in Canada; and after the death of the latter, he raised another body of troops in 1776 and marched to Quebec. He covered the retreat to Ticonderoga, and being forced July 6, 1777, to abandon that post, was the next day attacked by the enemy at Hubbardston—but made good his retreat to Manchester. Aug. 16, 1777, he met and defeated the reinforcement of the enemy, under Baum, and thus contributed to the victory at Bennington. He afterwards joined the army under Gates. He died 1786, aged 41, at Woodbury, Connecticut, where he was born. As a recompense for the services of this brave soldier, Vermont granted a valuable tract of land to his widow and children.

WARREN, sir J. Borlase, bart. G.C.B., admiral, was descended from the ancient family of the Borlases in Cornwall. From Winchester school he at an early age entered the naval service, but soon after availed himself of a temporary opportunity, and entered himself of Emanuel college, Cambridge. On the breaking out of the French war he was appointed to the Flora frigate, and received the command of a squadron for the purpose of annoying the coast of France. In 1794 he obtained for his services the riband of the order of the Bath, and the year following acted as commander of the division which landed a body of emigrants in Quiberon Bay. Having removed into the Canada seventy-four, he joined the Brest fleet under lord Bridport, and being detached with a squadron came up on the 10th of October, 1798, off the coast of Ireland, with the Hoche, a French man-of-war, and three frigates laden with troops. After a smart engagement he succeeded in capturing the whole squadron, and received the thanks of parliament. Soon after he hoisted his flag as rear-admiral, whence he arrived in due course at the rank of admiral of the white. On the conclusion of peace he went out as ambassador extraordinary to Russia, a situation which the dispute with that power respecting the island of Malta rendered of considerable difficulty, and he appears to have conducted himself with great prudence. He sat in four parliaments, being returned in those of 1774 and 1780 for the borough of Great Marlow, and in those of 1796 and 1802 for that of Nottingham. He died February 27th, 1822, in the apartments of sir R. Keats, at Greenwich Hospital.

WARREN, Joseph, major-general, was born in Roxbury in 1740—and graduated at Harvard college 1759. He studied medicine under Dr. Lloyd and in a few years became one of the most eminent physicians in Boston. But his mind would not allow him to follow quietly his professional duties. He was an ardent lover of his country, and felt that the oppressions under which she groaned, must be met with open and determined resistance. He was bold and decided—and when he had once carved out a path for himself, he unhesitatingly followed it. He proclaimed against every species of taxation, external or internal, direct or indirect, and expressed his belief that America could not only talk but fight—and with success—whatever the force sent against her. From 1768 he was a principal member of a secret caucus in Boston, which exerted very great influence upon the political affairs of the country. It was through his means that Hancock and Adams were seasonably advertised of their danger, while at Lexington, on the evening of the 18th of April. Four days previous to the battle of Bunker's heights he received his commission of major-general. He was within the entrenchments on the memorable 17th of June, and was killed just at the commencement of the retreat. His death shed a gloom throughout the community; he was exceedingly beloved by all classes for the mildness and affability of his deportment, and the virtues of his private life. As a statesman he was able and judicious—as an orator, eloquent—as a man, of uncompromising integrity and undaunted bravery—and the first officer of rank that fell in the contest with Great Britain. The glory of Bunker hill is interwoven with the reputation of Major-General Warren. He delivered two orations on the anniversary of the massacre, March 5, both of which were published.

WARREN, James, a patriot of the revolution, was a descendant of Richard Warren, one of the first settlers of Plymouth. He was born in 1726—graduated at Harvard 1745—and followed the mercantile profession. In 1757, by his father's death he received a handsome patrimonial estate; he succeeded his father as high sheriff, and retained his office till the commencement of the war, notwithstanding his strong opposition to the measures of the mother country. In May 1766 he was chosen member of the General Court, and was for many years speaker of the House. His integrity stood firm against the threats and bribes with which he was assailed by the government. In 1773 his proposal for establishing committees of correspondence was adopted. He refused the office of Lieutenant Governor, and that of judge of the Supreme Court, and accepted a seat in the navy board; preferring a situation of active labor to one of ease, though accompanied with honor and emolument. At the close of the war he retired from public life, and died at Plymouth November 27, 1808 aged 82.

WARREN, John, M. D. brother of General Joseph Warren, was born in Roxbury, July 27, 1753, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1771. He was settled at Salem, and acted as surgeon at the battle of Lexington, and was soon after appointed hospital surgeon. In 1772 followed the army to Long Island and New Jersey. In 1777 was entrusted with the military hospitals of Boston—in 1780 he delivered a course of anatomical lectures, and in 1783 was appointed professor of anatomy and surgery in the medical school at Cambridge. He suffered a considerable loss of property on account of the failure of a medical friend for whom he had endorsed to a large amount. He died of an inflammation of the lungs April 4, 1815, aged 61. He married a daughter of Governor Collins, and his son John C. Warren succeeded him as professor of anatomy and surgery. He was considered by many as the most skilful surgeon in New England. To an enlightened and liberal mind he added the graces of domestic life and the virtues of the christian. For many years previous to his death he suffered from an organic disease of the heart.

WARREN, Edward, a missionary to Ceylon, was born in 1786; graduated at Middlebury college in 1808; and studied theology at Andover. He sailed for Ceylon October, 1812. He died August 11, 1818, of consumption, at Cape Town, to which place he had sailed for his health. Of Mr. Richards, his companion, and himself, Arch-deacon Twistleton said, 'men of more amiable manners and purer lives I never saw.'

WARTON, Thomas, a native of Godalmin, Surrey, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1719 to 1723, and obtained the living of Basingstoke, Hants, and Cobham, Surrey. He died 1745, and two years after appeared a volume of his poems, 8vo. He is particularly known by his ingenious epigram on the occasion of George the second sending a troop of horse to Oxford, and a collection of books to Cambridge.

WARTON, Joseph, D.D. son of the preceding, was born 1722, at Dunsfold, Surrey, where his mother's father, the Rev. Joseph Richardson, was rector. He received his education at Winchester school, but as he was superannuated and thus disabled from admittance on the New college foundation, he entered at Oriol college, Oxford. In the university he distinguished himself by his application and regularity, and published there his Enthusiasts, his dying Indian, and a satire on Ranelagh house. In 1751 he went to France as the companion of the duke of Bolton, to whom he was chaplain, with the intention, it is said, of marrying him at Paris on the expected death of his duchess, to Polly Peachum of licentious memory, but he returned to England soon after, and thus was prevented from solemnizing the nuptials of his amorous patron. He obtained from the duke Wonslade rectory in Hampshire, to which was added in 1755 Tunworth living. In 1755 he was elected to the second mastership of Winchester school, and in 1766 he was placed at the head of this celebrated foundation, which after an honorable and laborious service he resigned in 1793. In 1782 he was presented to a prebend of St. Paul's by Lowth, and to the living of Chorley, Hertfordshire, and in 1788 he obtained a stall in Winchester cathedral and Easton rectory, which he afterwards exchanged for Upham. This amiable and deservedly respected character died 23d February, 1800. His elegant and interesting essay on the genius and writings of Pope appeared in 1756, and to it he added a second volume in 1782. He projected the history of the revival of literature, but little progress was made in the work. In 1797 he published his edition of Pope's works, and soon after began an edition of Dryden's works, which he never completed, though the first 2 vols. were published with notes. As a poet his character is very respectable, but his merits are still greater as a critic and commentator, and the services which he has rendered to the public as an active, vigilant, and enlightened preceptor, have deservedly endeared him in the esteem and the affection of numerous pupils, on whose minds his superior abilities, and his sound judgment, deeply imprinted a lasting taste for elegant literature, and for all the beauties of poetical composition.

WARTON, Thomas, D.D. brother of the preceding, was born in 1728, and educated at Winchester school and Trinity college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship in 1751. He had already distinguished himself by the publication of five pastoral eclogues, when on the appearance of Isis, a poem by Mason, he was encouraged by Dr. Huddersford, the head of his college, to stand forth the champion of the university, and he soon after produced the Triumph of Isis, a poem of great merit, which rivalled the elegance and the popularity of the Cantabrigian bard. In 1753 he published his Observations on Spenser's Fairy Queen, and the following year he was particularly honored with the notice of Dr. Johnson in his visit to the university. In 1756 he was elected professor of poetry for ten years, and in his lectures he evinced his abilities as a polished scholar, and an acute critic. The Anthologia Græca by Cephalæ, was edited by him in 1766, and four years after his Theocritus issued from the press in 2 vols. 4to. with valuable notes. He was admitted into the antiquarian society in 1771, and in that year obtained from lord Lichfield the small living of Kiddington, Oxfordshire. The life of sir Thomas Pope the founder of his college, appeared in 1771, and in 1774 his first volume of the History of English Poetry, and the second which brings the account down to the accession of Elizabeth, four years after. The death of Whitehead in 1785, made room for his appointment to the laurentship, and at the same time he was chosen Camden professor of history. His last publication was Milton's smaller poems, elucidated with curious notes, illustrative of the allusions and beauties of the great poet. Blessed with an uninterrupted flow of health, and in the possession of comfort and independence in the midst of the enlightened society of his college, Warton knew little of the concerns or calamities of life, till in his 62d year he felt a serious attack of the gout. He was seized with a paralytic stroke, 20th May, 1790, which terminated his existence on the following day. In his character, Warton was affable and easy, his conversation was full of anecdotes, and he aspired to the name of a ready and frequent punster. As a critic he displayed great judgment, elegant taste, and strong discriminating powers, and as a poet he is entitled to no mean praise. In his imagery he is bold, clear and lively, he paints with correctness, and in his descriptions of rural scenes he is singularly happy, rich and interesting. The best of his poems are, the Progress of Discontent—the Suicide—and the ode on the king going to Cheltenham; and among the various subjects which he has attempted it is remarkable that he never sung of love. He has, as one of his biographers observes, visited many a Grecian isle, but he never touched at Paphos. His Mons Catharinæ is also an elegant Latin poem; but the chief work on which his fame is built, is his History of Poetry, of which a third volume, collected from his papers, has appeared.

WARWICK, sir Philip, an eminent writer, born in St. Margaret's parish Westminster, 1608. He was educated at Eton, and after travelling over France and visiting Geneva he returned to England and became secretary to Juxton, the treasurer and clerk to the signet. He was also in parliament, and opposed the impeachment of Strafford, but on the breaking out of the civil war he retired to Oxford with the king, whose confidence he much enjoyed. He was in 1646 one of the royal commissioners empowered to treat with the parliament, and the next year he attended his master in the isle of Wight as his secretary. At the restoration he was returned member for Westminster, and was knighted and replaced in his situation of clerk to the signet. He died 15th January, 1682. His chief work is, Memoirs of the Reign of Charles I. continued to the restoration, 8vo. 1701, a work of great merit, candor, and integrity.

WASER, I. H., an ecclesiastic of Zurich, known for his writings, and chiefly for his sufferings. He inserted in a German journal, some severe animadversions on the administration of public affairs in Zurich, for which he was arrested by the magistrates, and condemned to death. He was beheaded 27th June 1780.

WASHBURN, Joseph, minister of Farmington, Connecticut, was graduated at Yale College, 1793, and was ordained in 1795. In consequence of ill health, he was induced to seek its restoration in a warmer climate; but he died on his passage from Norfolk to Charleston, December 26, 1805. His remains were committed to the deep. He was one of the editors of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine. A volume of his sermons was published after his death.

WASHINGTON, George, the founder of American Independence, was born in 1732, in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia. He was descended from an English family, which emigrated from Cheshire, about 1630; and his father, in the place of his nativity, was possessed of great landed property. He received his education from a private tutor; and was particularly instructed in mathematics and engineering. His abilities were first employed by Dinwiddie in 1753, in making remonstrances to the French commander on the Ohio, for the infraction of the treaty between the two nations; and he afterwards negotiated with the Indians on the back settlements, for which he received the thanks of the British government. In the expedition of Braddock he served as aid-de-camp, and, on the fall of that brave but rash commander, he displayed great talents in conducting the retreat, and saving the army from a dangerous position. He retired from the service with rank of colonel; but, while engaged in the peaceful employments of an agriculturist, at Mount Vernon, he was elected senator in the national council for Frederic county, and afterwards for Fairfax. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he was selected as the most proper person to take the chief command of the provincial troops. From the moment of taking upon himself this important office, in June, 1775, he employed the great powers of his mind to his favourite object, and by his prudence, his valor, and presence of mind he deserved and obtained the confidence and gratitude of his country, and finally triumphed over all opposition. The record of his services is the history of the whole war. He joined the army at Cambridge in July, 1775. On the evacuation of Boston in March, 1776, he proceeded to New York. The battle of Long Island was fought on the 27th of August, and the battle of Whiteplains on the 28th of October. On the 25th of December, he crossed the Delaware, and soon gained the victories at Trenton and Princeton. The battle of Brandywine was fought on September 11th, 1777; of Germantown, October 4th; of Monmouth, February 28th, 1778. In 1779 and 1780, he continued in the vicinity of New York, and closed the important military operations of the war by the capture of Cornwallis, at Yorktown, in 1781. When the independence of his country was established by the treaty of peace, Washington resigned his high office to the congress, and, followed by the applause, and the grateful admiration of his fellow-citizens, retired into private life. His high character and services naturally entitled him to the highest gifts his country could bestow, and on the organization of the government he was called upon to be the first president of the states which he had preserved and established. It was a period of great difficulty and danger. The unsubdued spirit of liberty had been roused and kindled by the revolution of France, and many of his fellow-citizens were eager that the freedom and equality which they themselves enjoyed should be extended to the subjects of the French monarch. Washington anticipated the plans of the factious, and by prudence and firmness subdued insurrection, and silenced discontent, till the parties which the intrigues of Genet the French envoy had roused to rebellion, were convinced of the wisdom of their measures and of the wisdom of their governor. The president completed, in 1796, the business of his office by signing a commercial treaty with Great Britain, and then voluntarily resigned his power at a moment when all hands and all hearts were united, again to confer upon him the sovereignty of the country. Restored to the peaceful retirement of Mount Vernon, he devoted himself to the pursuits of agriculture; and though he accepted the command of the army in 1798, it was merely to unite the affections of his fellow-citizens to the general good, and was one more sacrifice to his high sense of duty. He died after a short illness on the 14th of December, 1799. He was buried with the honors due to the noble founder of a happy and prosperous republic. History furnishes no parallel to the character of Washington. Wisdom, says a contemporary writer, was the predominant feature in his character. His patience, his forbearance, his firmness, in adverse as well as in prosperous events, proved of more solid advantage to his country than his bravery and talents. No man has ever appeared upon the theatre of public action whose integrity was more incorruptible, or whose principles were more perfectly free from the contamination of those selfish and unworthy passions which find their nourishment in the conflicts of party. Having no views which required concealment, his real and avowed motives were the same; and his whole correspondence does not furnish a single case from which even an enemy would infer that he was capable, under any circumstances, of stooping to the employment of duplicity. No truth can be uttered with more confidence than that his ends were always upright, and his means always pure. He exhibits a rare example of a politician to whom wiles were absolutely unknown, and whose professions to foreign governments, and to his own countrymen were always sincere. If Washington possessed ambition, that passion was, in his bosom, so regulated by principles, or controlled by circumstances, that it was neither vicious or turbulent. Intrigue was never employed as the means of its gratification; nor was personal aggrandizement its object. The various high and important stations to which he was called by the public voice, were unsought by himself; and, in consenting to fill them, he seems rather to have yielded to a general conviction, that the interests of his country would thereby be promoted; than to any particular inclination of his own. The life of this great man has been given to the public by judge Marshall in 5 vols. 8vo. and a copious selection from his manuscripts is now publishing (1835) by Mr. Jared Sparks.

WASHINGTON, William Augustine, a distinguished officer of the American revolution, was a native of Virginia, and a relative of George Washington. He was one of the earliest to engage in the struggle of his country with the British government. He served as a captain under Mercer; he fought at the battle on Long Island, and distinguished himself in that of Trenton, in which he was wounded. He was afterwards major and lieutenant-colonel. At the battle of the Cowpens he commanded the cavalry, and contributed much to the victory. For his good conduct he received a sword from congress. In the battle of Eutaw springs he was wounded and taken prisoner. This was the final scene of his military performances. He remained a prisoner in Charleston until the close of the war. He then settled in South Carolina, having married a lady in that state, to whom he had become attached during his captivity. He subsequently served in the legislature, where he gave evidence of his capacity for civil service, which induced his friends to endeavor to persuade him to become a candidate for the office of governor; but his modesty caused him to refuse every solicitation to that effect. After a tedious indisposition, he died in 1810.

WASHINGTON, Bushrod, an eminent judge, was born in Westmoreland county, Virginia, and was educated at William and Mary's College. He pursued the study of the law in the office of Mr. Wilson of Philadelphia, and commenced its practice with great success in his native county. In 1781, he was a member of the house of delegates of Virginia. He afterwards removed to Alexandria, and thence to Richmond, where he published two volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Virginia. In 1793, he was appointed an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and continued to hold this situation till his death in November, 1829. He was the favorite nephew of President Washington, and was the devisee of Mount Vernon. He was a man of sound judgment, rigid integrity, and unpretending manners.

WATELET, Claude Henry, receiver general of finance, member of the French academy, and of several foreign learned societies, paid much attention to literature, and travelled to Italy, and the low countries, to improve himself. He died poor 13th January 1736, aged 63. He is author of a poem on the art of painting, in 4to. and 8vo. and of some comedies—operas—and a prose poem from the Aminta of Tasso—a Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving. His Opuscula were published together 1783.

WATERLAND, Daniel, an English divine, born 1633, at Wasely, Lincolnshire, where his father was rector, and educated at Lincoln school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1713, master. He became successively rector of Ellingham, Norfolk, chaplain to the king, rector of St. Austin, and of St. Faith, London, chancellor of York, archdeacon of Middlesex, canon of Windsor, and vicar of Twickenham. He died 1740. He was author of sermons preached at lady Moyer's lecture, of which he was the first preacher—treatise on the Eucharist—history of the Athanasian creed—a vindication of the Trinity against Dr. Samuel Clarke, with whom he was engaged in a long and acrimonious controversy—and other theological works.

WATS, Gilbert, D.D., a native of Yorkshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He translated into English, Davila's History of the Civil wars, and lord Bacon's treatise de Augmentis Scientiarum, fol. and died 1657.

WATSON, David, M.A., a native of Brechin, in Scotland, educated at St. Leonard's, and St. Andrew's where he became professor of philosophy. On the union of his college with St. Salvador's in 1747, he retired to London, where he published his prose translation of Horace, 2 vols. with notes, a popular work. His manner of life was very irregular, and brought him into many difficulties; and he at last sunk a victim to his licentious pursuits, and was buried at the expense of the parish 1756. He published also the story of the heathen gods and goddesses.

WATSON, Robert, LL. D. a native of St. Andrew's, educated in his native town, from which he passed to Glasgow, and to Edinburgh. He took his degree of doctor of laws, and became professor of logic, rhetoric, and belles lettres at St. Andrews, and afterwards principal of the college. He died 1780, and three years after his death, appeared his history of the reign of Philip III. of Spain, in 1 vol. 4to. and in 2 vols. 8vo.

WATSON, John, a divine born 26th March, 1724, at Lyne-cum-Hanley, in Prestbury parish, Cheshire. From Manchester school he went to Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and afterwards he obtained the living of Meningsby, Lincolnshire, which he resigned in 1769, for the valuable rectory of Stockport, Cheshire. He devoted himself to the compilation of the history of Halifax, which appeared in 1775, and died March 14th, 1783. He wrote besides, an history of the ancient earls of Warren, and Surrey, to prove the claim of his patron, sir George Warren, to these ancient titles.

WATSON, sir William, a native of London, educated at Merchant Taylors'. He applied himself to the medical profession, and in 1741 was made member of the royal society. He was complimented in 1757, with the degree of M.D. by the universities of Halle, and Wittemberg, and in 1762 he became physician to the Foundling hospital. He was made member of the college of physicians, in 1784, and two years after knighted by the king. He wrote various tracts on electricity, collected into one vol. 8vo. and as he had paid particular attention to that branch of philosophy, and contributed some curious experiments to the royal society, in 1744, he was honored with the Copley medal from that learned body. He died universally respected 1787.

WATSON, Richard, D.D. was born in 1737, at Heversham, in Westmoreland, where he was educated under his father, who was master of the grammar school at that place. In 1754, he became a sizer in Trinity college, Cambridge, where, in 1750, he was elected fellow. In 1764 he was chosen to the chemical professorship, and in 1771, he succeeded to that of divinity. In 1776 he printed An Apology for christianity, addressed to Gibbon, with whom he held a friendly correspondence. In 1782, he was advanced to the bishopric of Llandaff, with permission to hold the archdeaconry of Ely, his professorship, and other ecclesiastical preferments. On this promotion he published a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, containing a plan for equalizing church revenues. In 1785, he printed six volumes of Theological Tracts, selected from various authors, for the use of students. The year following, Mr. Luther, of Ongar, in Essex, though no way related to the bishop, left him an estate worth twenty-four thousand pounds, which he sold to lord Egremont. During the king's illness, in 1788, Dr. Shipley, of St. Asaph, died, on which bishop Watson made a speech in the house of lords, advocating the right of the prince of Wales to the regency; and it was expected that his lordship's translation to the vacant see would have followed; but the king recovered, and the bishop was disappointed. In 1796, he published an Answer to Paine's Age of Reason, in a volume called An Apology for the Bible, which passed through many editions. In 1798, he printed An Address to the People of Great Britain, recommending large sacrifices to repel the French, for which he was attacked by Gilbert Wakefield. The bishop died at Calgarth-park, in Westmoreland, July 4th, 1786. Besides the works already mentioned, he published five volumes of Chemical Essays, several sermons, charges, and tracts. After his death appeared the memoirs of his life, written by himself.

WATT, James, LL. D., distinguished especially by his improvements in the steam-engine, was the son of a tradesman at Greenock, and was born in 1736. Brought up to the occupation of a mathematical instrument maker, he in that capacity became attached to the university of Glasgow, in which he had apartments, where he resided till 1736. Having now entered into the married state, he settled in business for himself, and in 1764, conceived the idea of improving the steam-engine adopted the profession of a civil engineer, and he was frequently employed in making surveys for canals, &c. To facilitate his labors he invented a new micrometer, and a machine for making drawings in perspective. In 1774, he removed to the vicinity of Birmingham, where he entered into partnership with Mr. Boulton, in conjunction with whom he carried on his improvements in the steam-engine, which he brought to great perfection. Here he became associated with Dr. Priestley and other philosophical experimentalists; and shared in the chemical researches which they prosecuted. Admitted a fellow of the Royal Society, he contributed to its Transactions an interesting paper, entitled Thoughts on the Constituent Parts of Water, and of Dephlogisticated Air; and another on a new Method of preparing a Test Liquor to show the Presence of Acids and Alkalies in Chemical Mixtures. Mr. Watt was also a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and in 1806, received from the university of Glasgow the honorary degree of LL.D. Various inventions of great practical utility originated from his ingenuity. His death took place August 25th, 1819.

WATTS, Isaac, D.D. a respectable divine among the English dissenters. He was born at Southampton, 17th July, 1674. His great abilities early displayed themselves, and he was in 1690, placed under the care of Mr. Thomas Rowe in London, where he completed his studies, and where he had among his fellow students Horte, afterwards archbishop of Tuam. In 1696 he went into the family of sir John Hartop, Stoke Newington, as tutor to his son, and in 1702, he was appointed successor to Dr. Chauncey in the pastoral office. Though his constitution was weak, and his health disordered by frequent illness, he not only paid particular attention to the duties of his office, but wrote some valuable works on subjects of divinity. In the latter part of life he became acquainted with sir Thomas Abney, in whose family he found an asylum of friendship and hospitality, and where he died 25th November 1748, aged 75. He had been in 1723, honored in a very flattering manner, and unsolicited, by the universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, with the degree of doctor of divinity, and the useful publications which he sent to the press deserved the high distinction. In his character he was an amiable man, mild, generous and charitable, and it may be said of him that few have left behind such purity of conduct, or such monuments of laborious piety. His works are very numerous and respectable, the best known of which are, a treatise on Logic—an Essay on the Improvement of the Mind—Introduction to Astronomy and Geography—hymns,—and a poetical version of the Psalms sung in dissenting congregations—Horæ Lyricæ, chiefly on religious subjects—Scripture History in Question and Answer—Miscellaneous Thoughts, 12mo.—two volumes of sermons—and Philosophical Essays. The whole has been collected into six vols. 4to.

WATTS, Jane, an accomplished female, whose maiden name was Waldie, was born, in 1792, at Hendersyde Park, in Roxburgshire; displayed precocious talents; acquired music, French, Italian, Spanish, and Latin, without assistance, and painting with very little; gave proof of superior literary powers in her Sketches of Italy, Journal of a Tour in Flanders, and many smaller pieces; and died July 6th, 1826. Several of her pictures were exhibited at the Royal Academy and the British Gallery, and were admired even by the most fastidious judges.

WAYNE Anthony, major-general, was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, in 1746. In 1773, he was elected representative of the General Assembly, where with others he strenuously opposed the claims of Great Britain. He entered the army as Colonel in 1775, and accompanied general Thompson to Canada, towards the close of the year. In the expedition against the Three rivers he received a wound in the leg; which, however, did not prevent him from affording very efficient aid in the retreat. At the close of the campaign he received the commission of Brigadier-general. He likewise distinguished himself during the campaign of 1777, and was active at the battle of Brandywine, although he shortly after sustained a defeat by the enemy under major-general Grey. In 1778, he fought at Germantown, and Monmouth, and led the assault upon Stony Point in July 1779. In this most desperate attack, while at the head of his men, urging them on at the point of the bayonet, he received a shot upon his head which for a moment deprived him of sensation. Supposing himself dying, he begged to be carried into the works, that he might have the satisfaction of breathing his last upon the spot which he had so nobly redeemed. The wound, however, was not mortal. In 1781, he was ordered to join Lafayette, in Virginia, with the Pennsylvania forces. July 6th, having received information that lord Cornwallis had crossed James river with the main body of his army, he passed forward with eight hundred men to attack his rear-guard; but to his surprise he found the enemy to the amount of four thousand drawn up to meet him. Nothing but the most unflinching intrepidity could have saved him, at so critical a juncture. There was no time for deliberation, retreat would have proved his ruin; he therefore unhesitatingly resolved to make an attack, and by a vigorous coup de main, extricate himself from his perilous situation. The ruse succeeded, Cornwallis supposing the retreat a stratagem to lead him into an ambuscade, from Lafayette, did not follow in pursuit. After the capture of Cornwallis, Wayne was appointed to the southern section of the States, where he contended successfully. As a recompense for his services the legislature of Georgia presented him a valuable farm. In 1787, he was one of the convention that ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1792, he succeeded St. Clair in command of the forces sent against the Indians, and gained a complete victory over them at the Miamies, August 20th, 1794. August 3d, 1795, he concluded a treaty of peace with the hostile Indians north of the Ohio. He died December, 1796, at Presque Isle, aged 57, and was buried on the shore of Lake Erie.

WEARE, Meshech, president of New Hampshire, was the son of Nathaniel W. of Hampton. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1735. In 1754, he was appointed one of the commissioners at Albany, afterwards a justice of the supreme court, and in 1771, chief justice. In 1776, he was chosen president of the state. His popularity did not decline; he was a disinterested patriot; and though invested with the highest offices in the gift of the state, yet he died poor. After the new constitution was adopted he was once more elected president in 1784, but he resigned before the close of the year. He died at Hampton Falls, January 15th, 1786, aged 72.

WEBB, Philip Carteret, Esq., an eminent English antiquary and lawyer, born in 1700. In 1751, he was employed to procure the charter of incorporation for the Society of Antiquaries, London. In 1754, he was elected M.P. for Haslemere; and re-elected in 1761. He was appointed solicitor to the treasury; in which office he continued till June 1765. In 1747, he published Observations on the Proceedings in the Admiralty Courts, 8vo. In 1760 he presented the famous Heracleian Table to the king of Spain, for which he received a diamond ring worth £300. In April, 1763, he was employed in defending Mr. Wilkes in the celebrated prosecution against him. On that occasion he published A Collection of Records about General Warrants, and other political tracts. He also published, 1. A Letter to Dr. Warburton, 1742, 8vo. 2. Excerpta ex Instrumentis Publicis de Judæis, 4to., with other tracts about the Jew bills. 3. Account of a Copper Table, discovered at Heraclea, 1760. He published many other temporary tracts. He was three times married; and died in 1770.

WEBBER, Samuel, D.D., president of Harvard University, was a native of Byfield, Massachusetts. His father removed when he was two years old to Hopkinton, New Hampshire. He early discovered an attachment to study, and at the age of twenty entered Harvard university. While there he exhibited a strong predilection for mathematics, and attained to uncommon eminence in them. When he had concluded his college life, in 1784, he devoted himself to the study of theology, but in 1787, was appointed a tutor in the university, in 1789, succeeded Dr. Williams as professor of mathematics and natural philosophy, and continued in that office until the death of president Willard, when he was elected his successor. His inauguration took place May 6th, 1806, and he devoted himself with great assiduity to the duties of the station. He died suddenly, at Cambridge, July 17th, 1810, aged 51. Dr. Webber was a fellow of the American academy and philosophical society. In 1796, he was employed by the government to ascertain the boundary between the British provinces and the United States. He published a system of mathematics, intended to be a text book in the university, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1801, a judicious work, which has been adopted in other seminaries.

WEBB, John, a graduate of Harvard, 1708, was ordained minister of the new north Church in Boston, October 20th, 1714. Upon the death of his first colleague, Mr. Thacher, Dr. Eliot was associated with him. He died April 16, 1750. He published two funeral sermons—one Election sermon—one before the general assembly,—one before a Society of young men, and fifteen others.

WEBER, Henry William, an ingenious writer on archæology, and editor of the legends of the middle ages. He was the son of H. W. Weber, a native of Neustadt in Westphalia, who was married to an English lady, and settled as a merchant at St. Petersburg, where the son was born, September 22, 1783. His father dying when he was but three years old, his mother removed with her family into Saxony, and her son received his education at a German university. At the age of fourteen he quitted Germany for England, and adopting the profession of medicine, attended lectures one winter at Edinburgh, and then went to finish his studies at Jena, in Saxony. From that university he was, with the other students, expelled, when the French army under Buonaparte took possession of the place. After residing for some time in the neighbourhood of Dessau, he returned to Edinburgh to obtain a medical diploma, that he might be enabled to practise as a physician. In 1808, he commenced his career by publishing a new edition of The Battle of Flodden Field, a Poem of the sixteenth century; which was followed by Metrical Romances of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth centuries, from Ancient Manuscripts, with an Introduction, Notes, and a Glossary, 3 vols.; and he afterwards, in conjunction with Mr. R. Jameson, produced a work entitled Illustrations of Northern Antiquities, from the earliest Teutonic and Scandinavian Romances, 1814, 4to. In September 1816, Mr. Weber, who then resided with his family at York, had the misfortune to lose his mother by death; and his health having been debilitated previously by a disease in the head, he became disordered in his intellects, in which melancholy state he remained till his decease in the spring of the year, 1818. Besides the works already noticed, Mr. Weber published editions of the Plays of Ford, in 2 vols. 8vo; and those of Beaumont and Fletcher, in 14 vols.; but his execution of these undertakings did not add to his reputation; and his errors as a dramatic commentator were most unmercifully exposed by Mr. Gifford, who afterwards edited the productions of Ford, and other early dramatists.

WEBER, Carl Maria von, one of the most eminent of modern composers, was born, in 1786, at Eutin, in Holstein, and was liberally educated. To music he displayed the warmest attachment at an early age. His instructors in the science were Henschel, Michael Haydn, Valesi, Kälcher, and the Abbé Vogler. For a while, however, he abandoned his favorite art to practice that of lithography, but he soon returned to it. His first operas were Das Waldmünchen, and Peter Schmoll, the first of which was produced in 1800. He made professional tours through various parts of Germany, and was, successively, chapel master at Breslau and at Carlsruhe, and conductor of the opera at Prague. In 1816, he was invited to Dresden by the elector of Saxony, to form a national opera, and was appointed director of music to the court. His Freischütz was brought out in 1821, at Berlin, and rapidly became popular throughout Europe. In 1826, he visited London, and brought out the opera of Oberon; but his health was now completely broken, and he died suddenly, on the 3d of June. Weber left a prose work in manuscript, called Lives of Artists, which possesses considerable merit.

WECHEL, Christopher, an eminent printer at Paris. He began to print Greek books in 1530, and with such correctness that scarce an error could be discovered in a folio volume. This accuracy is attributed to his able corrector the learned Sylburgius. He exposed himself to the persecution of the church for printing some offensive and controversial books, and died soon after 1552. His son Andrew retired from Paris because he was a protestant, and settled at Frankfort, where he carried on with great success the printing business. A catalogue of the books which he and his father printed was published in 8vo. He died in 1581.

WEBSTER, Alexander, D.D., was born in 1737, studied at Edinburgh, and in 1733, was ordained minister in Culross. In 1737, he was called to the Tolbooth church in Edinburgh. In 1745, he continued in the city when it was taken by the rebels, and all the clergy had fled. By his popularity and eloquence he retained vast numbers loyal to the house of Hanover. He suggested and entirely planned the scheme for the relief of the minister's widows of the church of Scotland, called the widow's scheme. To him also was owing the first outline of the plan for extending the royalty, and building the new town of Edinburgh. In 1755 he was engaged in a work of vast public utility, being the first Statistical Account of Scotland; and the amount of the population of the different parishes which he procured, other investigations have since proved to be exceedingly accurate. He died in 1784.

WEBSTER, Charles, M.D., a learned physician, born in Dundee, and educated at St. Andrew's, where he also studied divinity. About 1760, he went to Edinburgh, where he practised as a physician, gave lectures on chemistry and materia medica at the public dispensary, where he was assistant-physician along with Mr. Duncan; and became minister of the non-jurant Scottish episcopal congregation in Carrubber's Close, and afterwards of St. Peter's Chapel in Roxburgh place, which he himself built. He lived many years much respected in Edinburgh, and contributed greatly to the procuring the repeal of the penal laws against the Episcopalians of Scotland, and was one of the committee which went to London on that business. He published a short essay, proving condensation to be the cause of heat, and some other chemical tracts. He went abroad during the revolutionary war, and died in the West Indies about 1797. He published also a sermon preached at the opening of St. Peter's Chapel, and an occasional prayer prefixed. A volume of his posthumous sermons has been published for the benefit of his daughters.

WEBSTER, Samuel, D.D., was born in Bradford in 1718, graduated at Harvard College in 1737, and was ordained minister of Salisbury, Massachusetts, August 12th, 1741. He felt most deeply the responsibility devolving upon himself as a preacher of the Gospel, and for a long time he hesitated, on that account, to adopt the clerical profession. In his preaching, he was clear, earnest and impressive—and in his parochial visits, he possessed the happy faculty of adapting himself to the circumstances of the respective families in an unostentatious and agreeable manner, blending the instructions of the teacher, with the mild familiarity of the friend. He published one election sermon 1777; one fast sermon; one to two companies of minute men; and two others.

WEDGEWOOD, Josiah, Esq., F.R.S., and A.S.S., an English gentleman of uncommon genius, to whose indefatigable labors is owing the establishment of a manufacture that has opened a new scene of extensive commerce. He was born in 1731, and was the younger son of a potter, but derived little or no property from his father. His many discoveries of new species of earthen wares and porcelains, his studied forms, and chaste style of decoration, and the correctness and judgment with which all his works were executed under his own eye, and by artists for the most part of his own forming, have turned the current in this branch of commerce; for, before his time, England imported the finer earthen wares; but, for more than twenty years past, she has exported them to a very great annual amount. Neither was he unknown in the walks of philosophy. His communications to the Royal Society show a mind enlightened by science. His invention of a thermometer for measuring the higher degrees of heat employed in the various arts is of the highest importance to their promotion, and will add celebrity to his name. He was the projector of the grand trunk canal, and the chief agent in obtaining the act of parliament for making it, against the prejudices of the landed interest. His purse was always open to the calls of charity. He was a most zealous supporter of commerce, and a steady patron of every valuable interest of society. He died at his elegant villa of Etruria in Staffordshire, January 2d, 1795, aged 64.

WEIMAR, Bernard, duke of Saxe, early distinguished himself in arms against the house of Austria, whose severities to his family he strongly resented by espousing the cause of Gustavus Adolphus. Though defeated at Nordingen, he repaired his losses, and at the head of a large army, intrusted to his command by Louis XIII. he quickly overran Franche Comté, Burgundy, and Alsace, and would have obtained more important advantages had not death stopped his career. He died 18th July, 1639.

WELCH, Samuel, the oldest native of New Hampshire, was born at Kingston, September 1st, 1710, and died at Bow, April 5th, 1823, aged 112. To the last moment of his life he retained his faculties, and conversed, with an unimpaired memory, upon the scenes of his early life.

WELDE, Thomas, a native of England, persecuted for nonconformity, left his parish in Essex, and embarked for America. He arrived in Boston, June 5th, 1632, and was immediately ordained minister in Roxbury. The apostle Eliot was his colleague. In 1639, he assisted Eliot and Mather, in making the New England version of the Psalms. In 1641, he was sent to England as agent for the Province and never returned. He died 1660. He published a history of the rise and downfall of the antinomians, familists and libertines, 4to. 1644; second edition 1692,—a vindication of the Orthodox churches, 1644; and a work against the Quakers, 1654.

WELLES, Noah, D.D., a graduate of Yale College, 1741, was ordained minister of Stamford, Connecticut, December 31, 1746, and died about 1776. As a theologian he was very distinguished,—he published a discourse and an essay in vindication of the presbyterian ordination, 1767; and one funeral sermon, 1773.

WELLS, Edmund, D.D., a native of Corsham, Wilts, educated at Westminster school, and Christchurch, Oxford. He became professor of Greek in the university, and obtained the living of Cotesbach, Leicestershire, where he died 1730, aged 65. He wrote besides pamphlets against the dissenters, and an answer to Dr. Clarke on the Trinity—a Course of Mathematics for young Gentlemen, 3 vols.—a work of merit on the Geography of the Old and New Testaments, 2 vols. 8vo.

WELLS, John, eminent as a lawyer, was born at Cherry-Valley, New York, in 1769, or 1770. While on a visit at Schenectady, in 1778, the celebrated colonel Brandt attacked the settlement of Cherry-Valley, and murdering its inhabitants, left him the only survivor of his father's family. He was not long after placed in a grammar-school, at Newark, New Jersey, and at length entered Princeton college, where he was graduated in 1788. He was admitted an attorney of the supreme court in 1792, and to the degree of counsellor in 1795. He established himself in the city of New York, and devoting himself assiduously to his professional studies, at length rose by the superiority of his talents and knowledge, to the first eminence at the bar. He possessed a mind of great strength and penetration, an enlightened judgment, and a classical taste; was an accomplished and eloquent speaker, and eminently distinguished in his professional and private life by urbanity, uprightness, and the social virtues. His death took place September 7th, 1823.

WELLS, John Doane, M.D., professor of anatomy and surgery in the medical school of Maine, was born in Boston March 6th, 1799; and graduated at Harvard College 1817. He studied medicine in Europe. As a lecturer on anatomy, he was unrivalled. He delivered his first course in 1823. September 1826, he was appointed medical professor of the Pittsfield school. In 1829 he delivered a course at Baltimore, and in 1830, went thence to Brunswick, Maine. He died at Boston, July 25th, 1830, aged 51. He was a member of Dr. Lowell's Church.

WENCESLAUS, son of Charles, IV. emperor of Germany, succeeded his father in 1378, at the age of 15. Though he promised the highest virtues for the ornament and the glory of the throne, he became debauched, capricious, and tyrannical, and at last he was deposed in 1400 by the electors of the empire. He died king of Bohemia, 1419, aged 58. In his character he united all the extravagance of Antony, the infamous cowardice of Heliogabalus, and the bloody passions of Tiberius. Though twice married, he left no issue.

WENTWORTH, Thomas, earl of Strafford, was born in London 1594. After finishing his education at Cambridge, he travelled abroad, and succeeding to a family estate of £6000 per annum, in Yorkshire, he was elected into parliament, and became a leading member of the House. His eloquence in opposition to the measures of the court was so powerful that he was named sheriff of Yorkshire, that he might not be elected into parliament; after, however, maintaining such determined opposition to the king, he was gained over by the ministry, and the grant of a peerage; and the office of president of the council in the northern counties, rendered him a loyal subject. This dereliction of principle highly offended his old political friends, and Pym, to whom he wished to justify his conduct, told him, "though you have left us, I will not leave you whilst your head is on your shoulders." In 1631, he was sent as deputy to Ireland, and in his government he was a most zealous and active representative. He redeemed the incumbrances of the royal revenue; he improved the yearly income £40,000 a year, and prevailed upon the clergy of Ireland to conform to the doctrines and the discipline of the English church. Notwithstanding these important services, he was arbitrary in his conduct, and his severity towards lord Mountmorris, whom, in the course of two hours, he caused to be condemned to death, because he had spoken disrespectfully of him, reflects eternal disgrace on his memory. The king rewarded the faithful administration of his viceroy with every mark of favor and honorable distinction; but whilst he was secure of the royal confidence he lost the good opinion of the nation. Pym, too true to his promise, inveighed against him in parliament, and at last accused him before the House of Lords, as the cause of all the acts of tyranny that prevailed, and as the greatest enemy to the liberties of his country. His impeachment, drawn up in twenty-eight articles, engaged the attention of the nation for eighteen days, but when his noble and energetic defence seemed to influence the decision of the lords, the commons, with persecuting virulence, passed a bill against him, attainting him of high treason. The king used all his influence to save this faithful minister, but his compassion was answered by the cries of the factious, who insulted him with the exclamations of justice! justice! and even threatened his person if he refused to sacrifice him to the popular indignation. Charles was relieved from his deep distress; and when the earl, with ill-requited generosity, intreated him by letter not to hazard his safety, nor the peace of the kingdom for his sake, but to assent to the sacrifice of his life, which might become a means of reconciliation between the injured sovereign and his rebellious subjects, the monarch, after two days and two nights of dreadful perplexity, signed with the greatest reluctance, the fatal instrument which conducted his friend to the scaffold. He suffered with great resignation on Tower-hill, 12th May, 1641. At the restoration his attainder was reversed as dishonorable to the nation. His letters have appeared in 2 vols, fol. 1739, by Dr. Knowles.

WENTWORTH, Benning, was graduated at Harvard College, in 1715. He was the son of Lieutenant George Wentworth, and while in London upon private business he solicited and obtained the governorship of New Hampshire. He was a rigid episcopalian—a man of strong passions, and lasting resentments. He would make no grants of lands, from which he derived no especial benefit—and always made a reservation of a number of acres in every township, for the establishment of a church. He was often attacked with the gout, and 'while the fit was on him,' he displayed very little fortitude. Bennington was named in compliment to him. He would grant no charter for a college, unless it were under the direction of the Bishop of London—yet after his retirement from office he presented to Dartmouth college a lot of five hundred acres, upon which land the edifice was erected. He gave his voice in favor of the appropriation of £300 by the general assembly towards repairing the loss which the library of Harvard College had sustained by fire. He was appointed governor in 1741, and continued in office near twenty years—was superseded by his nephew John Wentworth—and died October 14, 1770, aged 74.

WENTWORTH, John LL.D. nephew of the preceding, was born in 1736 and graduated at Harvard college in 1755. In 1767 he succeeded his uncle as governor of New Hampshire, and remained in office till 1775. Dartmouth College received its charter from him. In 1792 he was appointed lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia. He died at Halifax, April 3, 1820, aged 83. He was a man of sound judgment, of liberal views and refined taste, and did much to encourage agriculture.

WERENFELS, Samuel, son of Peter, was born at Basil, where he filled some professorial chairs with great celebrity. He travelled into Holland, Germany, and France, and was the correspondent of the learned of Europe. He died at Basil, universally respected for his learning and for his many virtues, 1st June, 1740, aged 83. His works, which are chiefly on subjects of theology, philosophy, and philology, have appeared in 2 vols. 4to. The best known of his works is de Logomachiiis Eruditorum.

WERNER, Abraham Gottlob, the celebrated mineralogist, was born September 25th, 1750, while his father was overseer of iron works in Upper Lusatia. After some previous education he was sent to the mineralogical academy at Freyburg; and thence to Leipsic, where he applied himself to natural history and jurisprudence, but more especially to the former. The external characters of mineral bodies attracted much of his attention; and in 1774 he published a work on that subject, which has been translated into various languages, and adopted and commented on by many writers; but the author could never be persuaded to publish a new or enlarged edition. Soon after, Werner was invited to become keeper of the cabinet of natural history at Freyburg, and to deliver lectures on mineralogy. In 1780 he published the first part of a translation of Cronstadt's Mineralogy; and in his annotations on this work gave the first sketch of his own system. In 1791 appeared his catalogue of the vast mineral collection of Pabst von Obaine, captain-general of the Saxon mines. He now also delivered lectures on the art of mining, which he is said to have rendered peculiarly intelligible and interesting by his simplification of the machinery. His system of geognosy, or geology, was unfolded only in his lectures, which he caused to be written out by his approved pupils, revising them himself. Many parts of these lectures have been published. Werner himself likewise published some mineralogical papers in the Miner's Journal; and in 1791 appeared his New Theory of the Formation of Metallic Veins. In 1792 he was nominated counsellor of the mines of Saxony; and had a great share in the direction of the Academy of Mineralogy, and in the administration for public works. The cabinet of minerals which he had collected was unrivalled for its completeness. This he sold for forty thousand crowns, reserving the interest of thirty-three thousand as an annuity to himself and his sister, and at her death to revert to the Mineralogical Academy of Freyburg. He died unmarried, in August, 1817.

WERNER, Paul de, a famous Prussian general, born at Raab in Hungary, December 11th, 1707. At the age of sixteen he became an ensign in the regiment of Madasti, and in 1735 he attained the rank of captain. After continuing twenty-nine years in the Austrian service, and greatly distinguishing himself at the battles of Rocoux, Laufeldt, and on various other occasions, he became disgusted at not receiving the promotion which he thought due to his merit, and resolved to seek it elsewhere. In 1750 he accordingly entered into the Prussian army, and was speedily made lieutenant colonel of hussars; and in 1756 he was appointed commander of the regiment. He displayed great bravery at the head of his troops at the battles of Prague, Kollin, Breslau, and Leuthen; and in September 1758, Frederic appointed him major-general and conferred on him the Order of Merit. In 1759 he drove general de Ville out of Silesia; and the same year he performed his greatest exploit, raising the siege of Colberg. A medal was struck in commemoration of this achievement, and the poet Rauler, who was a native of Colberg, in one of his finest odes celebrated the triumph of Werner. In 1761 he was made lieutenant-general; and being subsequently employed against the Russians, who had invaded Prussia, he was surprised, made a prisoner, and conducted to Konigsberg, where he continued till 1762. On the accession of the czar, Peter III. he was sent to Petersburg, where he was loaded with honors and presents. The most advantageous offers were made to induce him to enter into the Russian service; but he rejected them, and returned to Prussia. The king gave him the command of an army, with which he penetrated into Moravia. Returning to Silesia, he attacked Marshal Daun, and obliged him to evacuate Schweidnitz. This was the last action of importance before the war was concluded. Werner afterwards served in the war concerning the succession of Bavaria. He died in retirement, at his estate in Silesia, January 25th, 1755.

WESLEY, Samuel, a native of Winterborne Whit-church, Dorsetshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at Dorchester school, and then entered as servitor at Exeter college, Oxford, 1684. By means of the duke of Buckingham he obtained the living of South Ormesby, Lincolnshire, and afterwards Epworth in the same county, where he died 25th April, 1735. The best known of his publications are Life of Christ, a heroic poem, folio—the History of the Old and New Testament, attempted in verse, 3 vols. 12mo.—Maggots, or Poems—Elegies on queen Mary, and on Tillotson—a letter concerning the Education of the Dissenters—treatise on the Sacrament—and Dissertations on Job. He has been ridiculed by Garth for the inelegance of his poetry; but though indifferent as a poet, he was very respectable as a man.

WESLEY, John, the great founder of methodism, son of Samuel, was born at Epworth, Lincolnshire, 1703. In 1714 he was placed at the Charter-house, and two years after he was elected to Christ church, Oxford, and in 1725, was ordained deacon by bishop Potter, and the next year became fellow and tutor of Lincoln college. He was one of that small society at Oxford which was formed on principles of greater austerity and devotion, than prevailed in the university, and which consequently received the appellation of methodist. In 1735 he embarked at Gravesend for America, at the request of the trustees of the new colony of Georgia, who were anxious for the conversion and spiritual instruction of the natives and settlers, and in this new theatre he, accompanied by his brother Charles, displayed his strong powers of eloquence and persuasion. He remained in America, however, but a short time, and then sailed for England. In 1738 he visited Germany for a short period; and, on his return, commenced those systematic labors which made him the founder of the great religious body of Methodists. He began to exhort and preach, often three or four times a day, at the prisons and other places in the metropolis, and made frequent excursions into the country, where his followers became rapidly very numerous. He soon after accepted the invitation of Whitefield, who had sometime before commenced the practice of field preaching, to join him at Bristol; but it was soon found that they could not well labor together. The opinions of Wesley being derived from the Arminian theology, differed materially from those of Whitefield, on the points of unconditional election, irresistible grace, and final perseverance; in consequence of which a coldness grew up between them, and a lasting separation between the societies over which they presided. Nothing so much favored the progress of Wesleyan Methodism as the strict and orderly discipline established by the founder, commencing from the small division of classes, and ending in the annual conferences of the numerous preachers. The whole was very wisely calculated to bind the society to each other. The society, in its infant state, had to contend with much popular hatred, sometimes fomented by persons in the upper ranks of life. On the breaking out of the American disputes, he wrote a pamphlet on the side of government, entitled a Calm Address to the American Colonies, which produced considerable effect among his own followers. When the contest terminated in a separation, he commenced ordaining preachers, and also appointed a bishop, for this country. By this step he offended some of his friends, who considered it a renunciation of the Episcopal Church. The approach of old age did not in the least abate the zeal and diligence of this extraordinary person, who was almost perpetually travelling, and whose religious services, setting aside his literary and controversial labors, were almost beyond calculation. To the success of his enterprise he devoted, in the midst of dangers and troubles, and of corporeal fatigues, the whole of his active life. His labors were continued to within a week of his death, which took place March 2d, 1791, in the 83d year of his age. The works of John Wesley, on various subjects of divinity, ecclesiastical history, sermons, and biography, amounted, even in 1774, to thirty-two volumes, octavo. There is a recent life of him by Henry Moore.

WESLEY, Charles, younger brother of the preceding, was born at Epworth, and from the care of his father, passed to Westminster school, of which he became captain. He was elected, in 1726, to Christ church, Oxford, and after taking his degrees, embraced, with warmth, the religious tenets of his brother John, whom he accompanied in his mission to Georgia. After various adventures in his intercourse with the Indians, he returned, in 1736, to England, and became a zealous and active preacher to the people of his own persuasion. As he was well skilled in scripture divinity, and of a warm, lively character, his discourses were much admired among the methodists. Though occasionally resident in London, he was chiefly employed as an itinerant preacher among his adherents. He died 1788, aged 79. He was respectable as a poet, and his religious pieces are also numerous.

WESSELUS, John, a native of Groningen, who studied at Zwool and Cologne, and afterwards at Paris. Sixtus IV. who was well acquainted with his learning, and with his abilities, was no sooner raised to the papal chair, than he sent for him to Rome, and offered him whatever he wished. The modest Wesselus requested the gift of a Hebrew and Greek bible in the Vatican. Why do not you ask for a bishopric, inquired the astonished pontiff; because, answered the disinterested ecclesiastic, I do not want one. He soon after returned to his country, where he died 4th October 1489, aged 70. He was, in his opinions, occasionally unfriendly to the tenets of the Romish church, and many have regarded him as the forerunner of Luther. He wrote various things, some of which appeared at Leipsic 1522, and Groningen 1614, in 4to. under the title of Farrago Rerum Theologicarum.

WEST, Gilbert, LL.D. a learned writer, educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, for the church. He, however, entered into the army, and afterwards held some civil offices, and was appointed clerk extraordinary to the privy council in 1729. He married some time after, and settled at Wickham, Kent, where he devoted himself to literary and religious pursuits, and where his retirement was frequently visited by Lyttleton and Pitt, who, weary with faction and political debates, courted his society, and the tranquillity of his abode. Though thus noticed by the great, it was not till 1751 that he could obtain an increase to his narrow fortune by the appointment of a clerkship to the privy council, to which was afterwards added the place of treasurer to Chelsea hospital, by the kindness of Mr. Pitt. These honors, however, came too late; the loss of his only son, in 1755, embittered the short remainder of life, and on the 26th of March, 1756, a stroke of the palsy hurried him to his grave at the age of fifty. He was a man of polished manners and great erudition, and so respectable, that, it is said, the care of the young prince's education was offered to him, which he declined, because he considered his mode of superintendence not sufficiently extensive. His works are observations on the Resurrection, 1747, a work which obtained for him, from the university of Oxford, the honorable degree of doctor of laws. Pindar's odes translated into English, a valuable, elegant, and spirited composition.

WEST, James, M. A. of Alscot, Warwickshire, was educated at Balliol college, Oxford, and in 1741 was elected into parliament for St. Alban's. He was soon after made one of the joint secretaries to the treasury, which he resigned in 1762, and three years after he obtained, by the favor of the duke of Newcastle, a pension of two thousand pounds a year. He was member of the antiquarian society, and for some time president of the Royal society. He died 2d July, 1772. His valuable MSS. were purchased by lord Shelburne, and his printed books were sold by auction in twenty-four days, his prints and drawings in thirteen, his coins and medals in seven, his plate curiosities in seven, and his pictures and drawings in four.

WEST, John, succeeded Sir John Harvey, as governor of Virginia, when the latter was displaced by the council in 1635. Harvey was restored to his office the following year, and succeeded by Sir William Berkley in 1639. Colonel West was afterwards a member of the council.

WEST, Joseph, was a short time governor of South Carolina in 1671, was again appointed in 1674, and a third time in 1684. He was succeeded by Sir Richard KIRLE in 1685. The brief accounts we have of his administration represent it as having been conducted with prudence and moderation.

WEST, Francis, brother of lord Delawar, arrived at Plymouth in 1623, with a commission to be admiral of New-England. He was authorized to restrain vessels from fishing or trading on the coast without a license from the New-England council, but meeting with difficulty in executing that part of his commission, he sailed for Virginia. He was a member of the council for that colony under the old charter, and was reappointed in 1624. When governor Yearly died, in 1626, the administration devolved on him. He was succeeded by John POTT, in 1628. During this period, the colony received large accessions of emigrants from Europe.

WEST, Benjamin, LL.D. professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Brown University Rhode-Island, was born at Rehoboth, Massachusetts, in March, 1730. He early displayed an extraordinary genius for the exact sciences, and without the aid of a public education, and amid the hinderances of other occupations, made himself acquainted with mathematics and natural philosophy, to such an extent, that he was, in 1786, appointed professor of those branches in the college at Providence, in which town he had before spent several years in instruction. He not long after received the same appointment from Columbia college, but declined it. He entered on his office at Providence in 1788, and retained it till 1799. He died August 26th, 1813, aged 83. His talents were of a superior order, and had he been able to devote himself to their cultivation, would have given him a distinguished rank among mathematicians.

WEST, Benjamin, an eminent painter, was born, in 1738, at Springfield, near Philadelphia, of quaker parents. At the age of seven years he began to manifest his pictorial talents by sketching with pen and ink an infant sleeping in a cradle. From some Indians he obtained red and yellow, and his mother gave him a piece of indigo; and as camel's hair pencils were wanting, he supplied the want by clipping the fur of the cat. Improving as he advanced in years, he became a portrait painter of considerable repute, and produced some meritorious historical pictures. In his twenty-second year he visited Italy, where he remained for some time. In 1763 he settled in England, where he soon acquired reputation. Among his patrons was Archbishop Drummond of York, by whose means he was introduced to George the Third, who immediately gave him a commission to paint The Death of Regulus, and continued ever afterwards to employ him. In 1791 he was chosen president of the Royal Academy. Among his last and perhaps his best works are, Death on the Pale Horse, and Christ healing the Sick. He died March 18, 1820.

WEST, Samuel, D.D. minister of New-Bedford, Massachusetts, was born in Yarmouth March 4, 1730. Being poor, and discovering in early life marks of an uncommon mind, he was educated at the expense of some generous individuals, and was graduated at Harvard, 1754, one of the first scholars of his class. He was ordained about 1764. In 1765 he turned his attention to politics, and sustained the principles of the Whig party with considerable ability and vigor. He was a member of the convention for framing the constitution of Massachusetts and of the United States. He deciphered the letter of Doctor Church, and was chosen an honorary member of the Academy of Sciences at Philadelphia and at Boston. He died at Tiverton, September 24, 1807, aged 77. In the latter part of his life his memory almost entirely failed him. He was by no means a popular preacher, though a man of uncommon powers of mind. But depth of argument and readiness of perception could not compensate for an ungainly person, uncouth manners, an unmanageable voice, and an ungentle temper. He published two ordination sermons, one election sermon—one at the anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims,—and others,—with essays upon liberty and necessity, in reply to President Edwards. During the last thirty years of his life he used no notes in his preaching. When not in his own pulpit, he would frequently expound texts, the most difficult, which might be pointed out to him.

WEST, Samuel, D.D. minister in Boston, was born in Martha's Vineyard November 19, 1738. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1771, and pursued his theological studies at fort Pownall in Penobscot, and while chaplain there. He was ordained at Needham April 25, 1764, and in 1789 he was installed pastor of Hollis-street Church, as successor to Mr. Wight. He died April 10, 1808 and was succeeded by Mr. Holley. He was one of the few who allowed to every man the free enjoyment of his religious opinions; not sitting up his own belief as a standard for the observance of others; and consequently enjoying the society of those who might differ from him in religious faith. He published a number of sermons, one at the ordination of Jonathan Newell, 1754—at a funeral—two fast sermons—two election sermons,—one thanksgiving sermon—at his own instalment—on the death of George Washington—essays in the Columbian Centinel from November 29, 1806 to August 22, 1807.

WEST, Stephen, D.D. minister of Stockbridge, Massachusetts, was born in Tolland, Connecticut, in 1736; was graduated at Yale College in 1755, ordained June 13, 1759; and died May 13, 1819, aged 83. During his ministry of sixty years five hundred and four persons were admitted to the church, of whom twenty-two were Indians. His essay upon moral agency was published in 1772—in which he advocates opinions diametrically opposed to those of Dr. Samuel West, the former maintaining that volition is an effect, thus virtually denying free agency—the latter, that it is of itself an efficient cause. He published a treatise on the atonement, 1785; life of Doctor Hopkins, 1805; and twenty other occasional sermons.

WEST, Benjamin, a distinguished lawyer of New Hampshire, was born April 8th, 1746. He was a brother of Samuel West, D.D. and was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1768. He studied law, and established himself in practice at Charlestown, New Hampshire, and soon rose to eminence in the profession. His superior talents and great excellence of character, caused him to be elected by his fellow-citizens to several important civil employments: the chief of which were a seat in Congress; in the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States; and the State Convention which ratified it; but his dislike to public life led him to decline them all. After a long life marked by uncommon amiableness, modesty, uprightness, and piety, which endeared him to all who knew him, he died, July 27th, 1817.

WESTFIELD, Thomas, a native of Ely, educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He obtained the livings of Mary-le-Bow, and St. Bartholomew's London, and was made archdeacon of St. Alban's, and soon after raised to the see of Bristol by the king, who thus rewarded his soundness of judgment, his learning, and his unblamable conversation. Though at first respected and beloved in his diocese, he was exposed to the ridicule and persecution of the republicans, and at last ejected from his see. He died 25th June, 1644. His sermons were published after his death in 2 vols. He was so eloquent and so pathetic a preacher that he was called the weeping prophet.

WESTERLO, Eliardus, D.D. was born in Holland, and received his education at the University at Groningen. He accepted an invitation to become pastor of a church in Albany, in 1760. In 1771, by the instrumentality of him and others, the schisms in the Dutch churches were healed. He died December 6, 1790. He was a man of great vigor of intellect, eminent piety, and of deep theological learning.

WETMORE, James, an episcopal missionary, was graduated at the college in Saybrook, in 1714; was ordained the first minister of North Haven in November 1718, but in September 1722, he announced his conversion to the Episcopal persuasion, and in 1723 went to England for orders. On his return he was established rector of the Church at Rye, New York, by the society for the propagation of the gospel, where he died May 14, 1760. He was a zealous defender of the episcopacy, and entertained almost an abhorrence for the presbyterian church. He published a letter against Dickenson in defence of Waterland's discourse on regeneration, about 1744; a vindication of episcopacy, 1747; a rejoinder to Hobart's serious address; an appendix to Beach's vindication.

WETSTEIN, John Rodolphus, a learned native of Basil, who succeeded his father as professor of Greek and of theology. He published among other valuable works, Dialogue of Origen against the Marcionites—Exhortation to Martyrdom, &c. and died in his native town 1711, aged 64. His brother John Henry was well skilled in the learned languages. He settled in Holland, and acquired great celebrity as a printer, and died 1726, aged 77. He was respected by the great and the learned, and the prefaces which he prefixed to the works which he edited, proved that he was a man of abilities and of deep erudition.

WETSTEIN, John James, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Basil. He travelled over Switzerland, France, England, and Germany, to examine the various MSS. of the Greek testament, and on his return home he published his Prolegomena 1730. The work was no sooner read than it created him a multitude of enemies, who accused him before the council of Basil as a Socinian, in consequence of which he was stripped of his ecclesiastical honors, and obliged to fly from his country. He was received with distinction at Amsterdam, and placed in the professorial chair of le Clerc, in philosophy, an appointment which he held with great reputation, till his death 24th March, 1754, in his 61st year. His edition of the New Testament with the various readings, and with critical remarks, was published in 1751-2, in 2 vols. fol. He published with that work two epistles of Clemens Romanus in Syriac, with a Latin version, of which he ably defended the authenticity.

WHALLEY, Peter, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Merebant Taylors' and at St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was chosen in 1768 master of the grammar school of Christ's hospital, which he resigned in 1776, and was soon after placed at the head of St. Olave school in Southwark. He obtained some preferment in the church, St. Sepulchre's vicarage, Northampton, and afterwards St. Margaret Pattens, and Horley, Sussex. He died 1791. He wrote an Enquiry into the Learning of Shakspeare, 8vo.—Vindication of the Authenticity and Evidences of the Gospels, 8vo.—Ben Jonson's Works with notes, 7 vols. 8vo.—Verses prefixed to Hervey's Meditations—sermons—and he was for some years engaged in making collections for an history of Northamptonshire, which was never completed.

WHARTON, Henry, a learned divine, born 9th November 1664, at Worstead in Norfolk, where his father was vicar. He was educated under the eye of his father, and afterwards entered at Cains college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in art. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Dr. Cave, and of Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he was appointed chaplain, and from whom he received the vicarage of Minster, and the rectory of Chartham in Kent. His application to literary pursuits was so great that his health at last sunk under it, and he died at Canterbury, 5th March, 1695, aged 31, universally lamented. His publications were numerous and valuable, the best known of which are, a treatise on the Celibacy of the Clergy against the Church of Rome—Defence of Pluralities, 8vo.—Specimens of Errors in Burnet's History of the Reformation—Historia de Episcopis & Decanis Assavensibus, 8vo.—Anglia Sacra, sive Collectio Historiarum de Episcopis, 2 vols. fol.—History of Laud's Troubles and Trials—sermons, 8vo.

WHARTON, Philip, duke of, an English nobleman, remarkable for his great eccentricities, born 1699. His early marriage with a woman of inferior rank, though of amiable and virtuous character, proved the beginning of his misfortunes, and flying from those domestic comforts which were within his reach, he plunged into all the follies, the crimes, and the extravagance of a licentious age. In his travels on the continent he paid his court at Avignon to the chevalier de St. George, and was complimented with the title of duke of Northumberland. His partiality for the fortunes of the exiled Stuarts was, however, forgotten; on his return home, he became the zealous supporter of the ministry, and for his eloquent services in parliament he was raised from the dignity of marquis to that of duke. Unsteady in his politics he soon changed sides, and distinguished himself not only as the bold defender of the bishop of Rochester, but as the publisher twice a week of a violent periodical paper called the True Briton. His extravagances had now so injured his property, that his creditors obtained possession of his income under a decree of chancery, and therefore to avoid the disgrace of sinking from a high station into contempt and poverty, he retired to the continent, and at the court of Spain openly espoused the cause of the pretender. After filling Madrid and Rome with his intrigues, and deceiving by the levity of his conduct both the Spanish court and the chevalier of St. George, he formed the plan of revisiting his country, though he heard that an indictment for high treason was issued against him. He proceeded as far as Rouen, but new difficulties arose, and his want of money obliged him again to return to Spain, and he died soon after at Terragone, where he had gone for the benefit of the waters, May 1731.

WHARTON, Charles Henry, D.D. an American episcopal clergyman, who died July 22, 1833, in the 86th year of his age, and the 61st of his ministry. His death took place in Burlington, New Jersey, where he had been rector of St. Mary's church thirty-five years. He was a native of Maryland, and was born June 5th, 1748. His ancestors were Roman catholics. At the age of seven years he was attacked by a dog, and rescued providentially by his father's singular promptness of action, who, seizing a gun, shot the furious animal, while the child's head was yet in his paws. In 1760, then in his 12th year, he was sent to the English Jesuits college, at St. Omer's. He remained here only two years, when the college was broken up by the suppression of the order. He then removed to Bruges, where he pursued his scholastic education. Some subsequent years he spent at Liege, partly as a scholar, and partly in giving instruction in mathematics, in which science he was a proficient. He was also a classical scholar of the very first order, and an elegant writer. He returned to America in the first vessel after the peace; and visited Philadelphia in May, 1784, for the purpose of publishing his celebrated letter to the Roman Catholics of the city of Worcester. Although he renounced the peculiar doctrines of the church of Rome, he always treated its members with respect. On becoming attached to the Protestant Episcopal church, he officiated in Immanuel church, New-Castle, Delaware; and afterwards in the Swedish church, at Wilmington. He then removed to Burlington, where he died. In 1805 he was appointed president of Columbia college in the city of New York, which office he resigned, after attending one commencement. He was also urged to accept the presidency of the college at Beaufort, South Carolina, but declined the offer. Dr. Wharton had been in the best literary society of England, and was connected with some of the most eminent individuals of America.

WHEARE, Degory, a native of Jacobstow in Cornwall, educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford. He became fellow of Exeter college, and afterwards travelled on the continent. He was patronised by lord Chandos, and was appointed by Camden the first professor in the lecture which he had founded, and he obtained also the mastership of Gloucester hall, which he held till his death in 1647, in his 74th year. He was author of a Dissertation de Ratione & Methodo legendi Historias, 8vo. a useful work, translated into English by Edmund Bohun—Parentatio Historica—Epistolarum Eucharist. Fasciculus.

WHEATLEY, Charles, a native of London, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He afterwards became lecturer of St. Mildred in the Poultry, and vicar of Brent and Femeaux Pelham, Hertfordshire, where he died 1742, aged 56. He wrote a Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, fol. republished in 8vo.—Historical Vindication of the 85th Canon—Answer to Hoadley on the Sacrament—Private Devotions at the Sacrament—Sermons at lady Moyle's Lectures, 8vo.—Miscellaneous Sermons published after his death, 3 vols. 8vo.

WHEELER, George, D.D., a native of Charing, Kent, was born at Breda, where his parents lived in exile during the civil wars. He entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, but before he took his degrees he began to travel, in company with Dr. James Spon of Lyons, and visited Venice, Constantinople, Asia Minor, and the various countries of Greece. The observations of these two learned travellers, were ingenious, and as they minutely compared the relations of Pausanias, with the existing state of the country, they were enabled to trace with accuracy every striking feature of difference and of improvement. On his return to England, Wheeler presented to the university of Oxford several valuable antiquities, and was in consequence complimented with the degree of M.A. Though a knight, he took orders and obtained the living of Basingstoke, and besides the valuable rectory of Houghton le Spring, Durham, and a prebend in Durham cathedral. In his private character he was an amiable and devout man. He died February 18, 1724, aged 74. Besides his journey into Greece, in 6 vols. fol. 1632, he published an account of the churches and places of assembly of the primitive christians, 8vo. 1639—and the Protestant Monastery, or Christian Economics, 12mo.

WHELOCK, Eleazer, D.D. first President and founder of Dartmouth college, was born in Windham, in April 1711, was graduated at Yale college, in 1733, and in 1736, was ordained the minister of the second society in Lebanon. He was a descendant of Ralph Wheelock, of Shropshire, England, who came to this country in 1637. His grandfather was Eleazer Wheelock, of Medfield, distinguished as a christian and a soldier. His father was Ralph Wheelock, who died at Windham, Connecticut, in 1748. He had under his care a number of pupils, amongst whom was Occom, a young Indian, and in consequence of his education, Dr. Wheelock conceived the plan of forming an Indian missionary school, supposing that an educated Indian would be more successful in converting the red men to christianity, than would a white missionary. The project was new, and received the countenance of many influential individuals. In 1762, he had more than twenty Indian pupils. The school received several donations from benevolent persons, from the legislatures of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and from the commissioners of the Scotch Society, in Boston. It was called Moor's Indian Charity school, on account of a donation of a house, and two acres of land in Lebanon, from Joshua Moor of Mansfield. In 1766, the Rev. Mr. Whitaker, of Norwich, and Samson Occom were sent to Great Britain, to collect funds for the Institution, which were placed in the hands of Trustees in England, at the head of whom was the Earl of Dartmouth. As the school increased, it became desirable to select for it, an appropriate spot as a permanent situation. Several places were proposed, and at last it was determined to transplant the institution to Hanover, and there to found the college, to which Gov. Wentworth presented the charter. In 1770, he procured a dismissal from his people, and established himself upon the spot which he had chosen as the scene of his future labors. The Moor school, and Dartmouth college, ever have been entirely distinct, contrary to the common supposition. The trustees of the Indian institution were ever opposed to the establishment of the college as a departure from the original design. It consequently received a separate act of incorporation. At the first commencement, 1771, four were graduated. The celebrated Brant was at this time one of his pupils. He had been president of the college nine years, when he died April 29, 1799, aged 68. Dr. Wheelock was a true philanthropist; what he did was the result of the most disinterested motives. His exertions in behalf of the miserable Indians, were doubly praiseworthy, as he was obliged to encounter the most formidable obstacles. The facilities which are now afforded to the philanthropist and missionary, were in a great measure denied him. It required no common perseverance and fortitude to sustain as he did the accumulated labors which fell to his lot. But he toiled not for himself—he hardly earned the means of subsistence, by his unwearied exertions. He labored for conscience's sake;—his end, the redemption and happiness of his fellow-creatures—his motive, the noblest christian spirit. In his person and manners he was prepossessing—with a flexile and winning voice—his movements while in the desk, natural and impressive—his eloquence, irresistible. He published an account of his Indian school—a number of narratives—and a history of a mission to the Delaware Indians, with occasional sermons.

WHELOCK, John, LL.D., second president of Dartmouth college, son of the preceding, was born at Lebanon, Connecticut, January 28, 1754. He was a short time at Yale college, but graduated at Dartmouth 1771, one of the four. In 1772 he was appointed tutor, and continued till 1776, when he was chosen member of the general assembly. At the commencement of the revolution his military career was begun. In 1777 he was appointed major in the New York forces, and in November of the same year, was promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel, under Bedel. In 1778 he was appointed by general Stark to lead an expedition against the Indians. The next year, at the request of general Gates he entered his family, where he remained till the death of his father, whom he succeeded as president of Dartmouth college. In 1782, in conformity with the wishes of the trustees of the institution, he went to Europe, in order to procure books, money &c. for the college. He had letters from General Washington, and Governors Trumbull and Livingston, and sailed from Boston, January 3d, 1783. He visited France, Holland, and England, and was on his return in the brigantine Peace and Plenty, when that vessel was wrecked off Cape Cod, January 2d, 1784. Although his money and papers were all lost, yet the mission was productive of some benefit to the college. He now entered upon his duties with indefatigable diligence, attending to the daily recitations of the senior class, and lecturing upon stated subjects twice a week. He was a man of extensive learning, and considerable eloquence—his lectures were consequently in the highest degree, instructive and agreeable. He was thirty-six years in the office; but was finally removed by the Trustees, on account of some prolonged ecclesiastical controversy. Such was the general indignation at this measure, that the legislature, by an act which, however, was afterward declared to be unconstitutional, enlarged the board of Trustees, and changed the name of the college. By the new board, he was reinstated into his office, February, 1817. He died, however, after having been two months in the office. His wife Maria, daughter of Governor Sulm, of St. Thomas, died February 16, 1814. His only child, wife of William Allen, died June 8d, 1828, aged 40. He bequeathed a considerable portion of his estate to the Theological Seminary at Princeton. He had prepared a large historical work for the press which, however, is yet in manuscript. He published an Eulogy on Dr. Smith, 1809—Sketches of the history of Dartmouth college, 1816.

WHEELWRIGHT, John, the founder of Exeter New Hampshire, was a minister in England, but came over to Massachusetts, in consequence of the arbitrary exactions of the established church. The celebrated Mrs. Hutchinson was his sister-in-law. On Fast day, 1636, he preached a sermon filled with bitter invective against ministers and magistrates, in consequence of which he was apprehended, convicted of treason, and sentenced to banishment, November 1637. In 1638 he left Braintree, then a part of Boston, and with three others, retired to New Hampshire, where he laid the foundation of the town of Exeter. In 1642 Exeter was annexed to Essex county, and Mr. Wheelwright being still under sentence of banishment, was obliged to remove, with a part of his church, to Wells, in the district of Maine. His sentence was revoked in 1644, as he had made an acknowledgment. In 1647, he removed to Hampton, where he was minister for some years. In 1658, he had returned to England, and was in favor with the Protector. Upon the restoration he again sailed for America, and was settled minister of Salisbury, New Hampshire, as successor to William Worcester. At this latter place he died November 15, 1679, about 85 years old. Though his notions, in many respects, were peculiar—and although partaking largely of the antinomian zeal of his sister-in-law, yet he was doubtless a man of learning and piety.

WHELPLEY, Rev. Philip Melancthon, was born in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, December 22, 1792. Conspicuous for early exhibitions of talent, he entered the christian ministry soon after he reached the age of twenty-one. In a few months he was called to the pastoral care of the first presbyterian church in the city of New York, and was ordained April 25, 1815; from which charge he was removed by death, after nearly ten years devotion to its interests. Besides some anonymous pieces in the Christian Spectator, a periodical work published in New-Haven, Connecticut, he published several sermons in his life time; among which, one commemorative of the landing of the pilgrims upon this continent, delivered before the New-England Society in the city of New York, in 1822, and one delivered before the United Foreign Missionary Society in 1823, are distinguished for their genuine eloquence, and are models of their kind. A volume of miscellaneous sermons from his pen is about to perpetuate his memory. He died July 17, 1824.

WHICHOT, Benjamin, D.D. an English divine, born 1609 at Stoke in Shropshire. He was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a fellowship. He afterwards obtained the living of Northeadbury, Somersetshire, from which he was withdrawn by the parliamentary visitors to become provost of King's college, in the room of Dr. Collins who was ejected. At the restoration he was removed from the headship of the college, and then settled in London, where he became minister of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, and afterwards of St. Lawrence, Jewry. On a visit to Cambridge he caught a violent cold, and died soon after, May 1683, at the house of his friend Dr. Cudworth, master of Christ college, and he was buried in his church of St. Lawrence, Jewry, where his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tillotson. His sermons were published after his death, the first volume by Shaftesbury, the author of the Characteristics, three more by Dr. Jeffery of Norwich, and another volume by Dr. Samuel Clarke, 1707.

WHIPPLE, William, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born at Kittery, Maine, in 1730. After receiving as good an education as the public school of his native town could afford, he entered on board a merchant vessel, and, during several years, was engaged in making voyages for commercial purposes, principally to the West Indies. He acquired in this way a considerable fortune, and, abandoning the sea in 1759, commenced business with a brother at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, where he continued in trade until within a few years of the revolution. In January, 1775, he was a representative of Portsmouth, in the provincial congress assembled at Exeter, for the purpose of electing delegates to the continental congress in Philadelphia, and of a second provincial congress which met at the same place in the ensuing May, by which he was appointed one of the provincial committee of safety. In 1776, he was placed in the general congress, and continued a member until September, 1777. In 1777, the assembly of New Hampshire placed him at the head of one of the brigades organized in consequence of the progress of Burgoyne. He joined Gates's army, and, in the battle of Saratoga, commanded the New Hampshire troops. He was employed to assist in arranging the terms of capitulation, and in conducting the surrendered army to their encampment on Winter-hill, in the vicinity of Boston. In 1778, he shared in the successful expedition to Rhode Island, under general Sullivan. In 1780, he was chosen a representative to the general assembly of New Hampshire, and was several times reelected. In 1782, he was appointed by Mr. Morris, the superintendent of finance, receiver of public moneys for New Hampshire—an office which infirm health obliged him to relinquish in 1784. In the former year, he was also appointed judge of the superior court of judicature. He died in November, 1785.

WHISTON, William, a learned English divine, born 9th December 1667. He received his education under his father, and afterwards was two years at Tamworth school, and then entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge. In 1693 he became fellow of his college, and soon after tutor. His New Theory of the Earth appeared in 1696, and excited general admiration, though its principles were opposed by Dr. Keill. In 1698 he was presented by his patron the bishop to the living of Lowestoft in Suffolk, where he devoted himself assiduously to his parochial duties, till he was invited in 1700 to Cambridge, to become deputy to sir Isaac Newton, whom he soon after succeeded in the Lucasian professorship of mathematics. About this time his attachment to the principles of the church of England began to waver, he pretended to discover that the two first centuries of the church were truly Eusebian and Arian, and that afterwards doctrines less congenial to the genuine spirit of christianity had been adopted. These opinions, which were heard with astonishment by his friends, engaged much of the public attention, but he disregarded the opposition and censures of his former associates, and wrote several works in support of his sentiments, and in vindication of his conduct. This drew upon him the severe displeasure of the university, and in 1710 he was deprived of his professorship, and banished from the precincts of Cambridge. Regardless of the disgrace he retired to London, where he maintained himself by giving lectures on philosophy, astronomy, and divinity, and by writing on his favorite topic of primitive christianity. Though he had regularly frequented the church of England, he at last forsook it in 1747, when the officiating clergyman read, in allusion to him as he supposed, the Athanasian creed, and he then repaired to the baptist meeting, till, as he observed, he had an opportunity of setting up a more primitive congregation himself. He died 22d August 1752, aged 84. He was, as bishop Hare observes, a fair unblemished character, who all his life had cultivated piety, virtue, and good learning. Constant himself in the private and public duties of religion, he promoted virtue in others, and such learning as he thought would conduce most to the honor of God, by manifesting the greatness and wisdom of his works. By his useful works of philosophy and mathematics, he endeavored to display the glory of the great Creator, and to his study of nature he early joined the study of the scriptures. The best known of his works are, besides his Theory—Astronomical Lectures, 8vo.—translation of Josephus, with eight valuable dissertations, 4 vols. 8vo.—Astronomical Principles of Religion—History of the Old and New Testament, 6 vols. 8vo.—Vindication of the Testimony of Phlegon—Memoirs of his own Life, 2 vols. 8vo. and several theological pieces in defence or support of his favorite doctrines.

WHITAKER, Edward W. an ingenious divine, was the son of serjeant Whitaker. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford, and on entering into orders became curate of St. John's, Clerkenwell, but afterwards obtained the livings of St. Mildred and All Saints, Canterbury. Latterly he resided at Egham in Surry, where he kept a respectable seminary for education. At the close of his useful life he succeeded in establishing the Refuge for the Destitute. He died in 1818, aged 68. His works are—1. On the Prophecies relating to the Restoration of the Jews, 8vo. 2. Dialogues on the Trinity. 3. A Letter to the Jews. 4. Sermons on Education. 5. A general and connected View of the Prophecies. 6. Family Sermons, 3 vols. 7. Commentary on the Revelation. 8. The Manual of Prophecy. 9. An Abridgment of Universal History, 2 vols. 4to.

WHITAKER, William, D.D., a native of Holme, Lancashire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He became regius professor in the university, and master of St. John's college, where he died 1595, aged 47. Though he wrote some tracts against popery, and in favor of the church of England, he is supposed to have inclined to the puritans. Bishop Hall said of him, 'never a man saw him without reverence, or heard him without wonder.'

WHITAKER, John, a divine, critic, antiquary, and historian, was born, in 1735, at Manchester; was educated at the free school of that place, and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford; and died in 1808, rector of Ruan Lanyhorne, in Cornwall. His principal works are, The History of Manchester; A Vindication of Mary, Queen of Scots; The Course of Hannibal over the Alps; Criticism on Gibbon's History; The Ancient Cathedral of Cornwall; and The Origin of Government. He also contributed largely to The British Critic, and the English and Antijacobin Reviews.

WHITAKER, Thomas Dunham, LL.D., an antiquary and historian, was born, in 1759, at Rainham, in Norfolk; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; obtained the vicarages of Whalley and Blackburne; and died in 1821. His principal works are, Histories of Yorkshire,—the Deanery of Craven,—Richmondshire and Lunedale,—the Parish of Whalley,—and the Rebellion in 1745.

WHITBREAD, Samuel, an able senator, son of the eminent porter brewer in Chiswell-street, was born there, in 1758; was educated at Eton and St. John's College, Cambridge; travelled on the continent, accompanied by Mr. Coxe the historian; was elected member for Steyning in 1790, but subsequently represented Bedford; and put an end to his existence, in a temporary fit of insanity, July 6, 1815. He was one of the most active and intelligent of the whig party, and to him was intrusted the management of Lord Melville's impeachment.

WHITBY, Daniel, D.D. a native of Rushden, Northamptonshire, educated at Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1664. He was afterwards chaplain to Seth Ward, bishop of Salisbury, and under his patronage became chanter of the cathedral, rector of St. Edmund's Salisbury, and prebendary of Taunton, Regis. He died 24th March, 1726, aged 88. In his character he was easy, affable, devout, pious, and charitable, little acquainted with worldly affairs, and more attentive to the business of religion, and to the pursuits of learning. His publications are more than forty in number, and display good sense and learning. The best known of these are, the Protestant Reconciler, 1682, which gave great offence to the clergy, and was publicly burnt by the university of Oxford—five Points against Calvinism, 8vo.—Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, 2 vols. folio, often re-edited.

WHITE, Thomas, or Albius, a Roman catholic priest, principal of a college at Lisbon, and sub-principal at Douay. He was an able scholar, and so warm an admirer of Aristotle's philosophy, that he applied his principles to explain some of the most mysterious parts of the Christian religion. Some of his pieces have been inserted in the Index Expurgatorius. He was intimate with Hobbes, though in their opinions they widely differed. He died 1676.

WHITE, Thomas, D.D., a native of Bristol, who studied at Magdalen college, Oxford, and obtained the livings of St. Gregory, and St. Dunstan in the West, London. He afterwards became prebendary of St. Paul's, canon of Windsor, and Christ-church, and treasurer of Salisbury. He was author of some sermons, and founded an almshouse in his native town, besides a lectureship at Oxford, and liberal donations to Sion college in London. He died 1623.

WHITE, Jeremy, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and chaplain to Cromwell, is known for his humor and vivacity. He showed particular attention to one of the protector's daughters, and being once surprised by the father on his knees before the lady, he averted the indignation of Cromwell by saying, that he was entreating her interference with her maid, to whom he had long paid his addresses without hopes of success. Cromwell, who knew the artifice of the lover, upbraided the maid for her supposed unkindness, and immediately ordered a clergyman to perform the ceremony of marriage between her and the astonished chaplain. He wrote a book on the Restoration of all Things, published after his death, in which he maintained that all mankind are doomed to inherit salvation. He died 1707, aged 78.

WHITE, Gilbert, a naturalist and antiquary, was born, in 1720, at Selborne, in Hampshire; and was educated at Bassingstoke school, and at Oriel college, Oxford. After having taken a master's degree, and been senior proctor of the university, he retired to reside on his property in his native village; nor could he be tempted to quit it by the offer of valuable church preferment. He died in 1793. He wrote the Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne, one of the most amusing of books; The Naturalist's Calendar; and Miscellaneous Observations.

WHITE, Joseph, D.D., an eminent divine and oriental scholar, the son of a weaver, was born, in 1746, at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, and received his education at Gloucester school and Wadham college, Oxford. In 1775, he was appointed Laudian professor of Arabic, and in 1783, he delivered the Bampton lecture. In the composition of the lectures he was assisted by Dr. Parr and Mr. Badcock. He obtained a prebend of Gloucester, and the rectory of Melton, in Suffolk; and died in 1814. Among his works are, Ægyptiaca; Diatesaron; and editions of the Philonic Syrian versions of the four Gospels, and of Griesbach's Greek Testament.

WHITE, Henry Kirke, a highly gifted youthful poet, was born at Nottingham, March 21st, 1785, and was the son of a butcher. The delicacy of his constitution occasioned him to be designed for the sedentary employment of a stocking weaver; but from his infancy he manifested an extraordinary love of learning. He was at length removed from the stocking loom to an attorney's office; and devoted his spare time to the study of Latin and Greek, until increase of knowledge inspired him with the desire to obtain more favorable opportunities for improving his talents; and a university education for the church became the great object of his ambition. Through the generosity of Mr. Wilberforce, and the Rev. Charles Simcon, he was admitted a student of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he applied to his studies with such unrelenting labor that his health became deranged, and he died October 19th, 1806, deeply lamented. He published in 1803, a poem called Clifton Grove, and after his death his Remains, consisting of Poems, Letters, and Fragments, were edited by Dr. Southey, in 2 vols. 8vo.

WHITEFIELD, George, one of the founders of the sect of the methodists, was born at Gloucester, where his mother kept the Bell inn, 1714. From the Crypt school of his native town, he entered as servitor at Pembroke college, Oxford, and was ordained at the proper age by Benson, bishop of Gloucester. Enthusiasm and the love of singularity now influenced his conduct, and in his eagerness to obtain popularity, he preached not only in prisons, but in the open fields, and by a strong persuasive eloquence, he prevailed upon multitudes to regard him as a man of superior sanctity. In 1738, he went to America, to increase the number of his converts; but after laboring for some time as the friend and the associate of the Wesleys, he at last was engaged with them in a serious dispute, which produced a separation. While he zealously asserted the doctrine of absolute election and final perseverance, agreeable to the notions of Calvin, his opponents regarded his opinion as unsupported by scripture, and therefore inadmissible, and in consequence of this arose the two sects of the Calvinistic and the Arminian methodists. Secure in the good opinion of a great number of adherents, and in the patronage of lady Huntingdon, to whom he was chaplain, he continued his labors, and built two Tabernacles in the city and in Tottenham-court road for the commodious reception of his followers. He died while on a visit to his churches in New England, America, 1770, and had the satisfaction to know that his adherents were numerous on both continents. His sermons, letters, and controversial tracts, have been published together in 7 vols. 8vo. and an account of his life has appeared by Gillies.

WHITEHEAD, Paul, an English poet, born in London, on St. Paul's day, from which circumstance he derived his Christian name. Though originally intended for business, and apprenticed to a mercer, he despised the drudgery of the counter, and entered at the Temple to study the law. By unfortunately joining with Fleetwood the player, in a bond of £3000, he brought misery upon himself, and languished for some years in the Fleet prison. He afterwards maintained himself by his writings, and at last, through the friendship of lord Le Despenser, he obtained a patent place of £800 for life. He published the State Dunces—Manners—Honor—Satires—the Gymnasiad, a mock-heroic poem, to ridicule the brutish business of boxing, addressed to Broughton, the then famous champion of the order. He wrote also an Epistle to Dr. Thompson, besides some songs and epigrams. He died 30th December, 1774, aged 64.

WHITEHEAD, William, an English poet, born at the beginning of 1715. By the kindness of Mr. Bromley, afterwards lord Montfort, who generously exerted himself in favor of his family, he obtained, at the age of fourteen, a nomination to Winchester college, and he had there the honor of obtaining a prize for a poem which Pope set to the scholars of the college when he visited the school in company with his friend lord Peterborough. Though very respectable in the school for abilities and learning, he lost the election to New college for want of friends, and in consequence entered at Clare hall, Cambridge, where, as the son of a baker, he had a claim to a scholarship. In 1742, he became fellow of the college, and soon after engaged in the family of lord Jersey, as tutor to his son, and to his friend, afterwards general Stevens. The leisure which he enjoyed amidst the comforts and the independence of his situation, directed his thoughts to dramatic composition, and he produced his Roman Father and his Creusa, which were received with great applause. In 1754, he accompanied his noble pupil and lord Nuneham on the continent, and after visiting the German courts, he passed to Italy, and returned through Switzerland, Germany, and Holland, to England in 1756. The views of Rome, and the monuments of her departed greatness, were not lost on the imagination of a man of genius and of taste, and on his return the poet presented to the public his elegy written at Hautvilliers—his ode on the Campagna of Rome—and five eclogues. By the interest of lady Jersey, he was appointed secretary, and register to the order of the Bath, and two years after he succeeded Cibber in the honorable office of poet-laureat. Thus deservedly raised to comfortable independence he continued the friend and the associate of the two noblemen, over whose education he had so usefully presided, and the many days which he passed, in honorable hospitality, and in cheerful conversation, at Nuneham, and Middleton parks, were proofs of the goodness of his heart, as much as of the virtues, and the grateful generosity of his pupils. In the midst of these pleasing assiduities of friendship, he devoted much of his time to the muses, and besides the occasional odes which loyalty, and official duty claimed from his pen, he wrote the School for Lovers, a comedy acted at Drury-lane, 1762, and Charge to the Poets, a satirical poem. The Trip to Scotland, a farce, appeared about 1771, and in 1775, the poet collected together, and published his poems. He died suddenly, 14th April, 1785. Besides the above mentioned pieces, Whitehead wrote Variety—the Goat's beard—Venus attiring the Graces; and though he may not claim a distinguished seat among the first bards of Britain, he must hold a respectable rank in the temple of fame, as an elegant poet and a nervous writer. As a private man, his virtues were many, and deservedly recommended him to the friendship and patronage of the great.

WHITEHEAD, John, a methodist preacher. He was well educated, and with a mind panting after distinction, he quitted the trade of linen-draper at Bristol, and then kept a school at Wandsworth, where he was patronised by the quakers, whose principles he had adopted, after abandoning the society of the methodists. He next travelled on the continent, as tutor to one of his pupils, and at Leyden he applied himself to anatomy and physic, and took his medical degrees. On his return to London he became physician to the London dispensary. He preached the funeral sermon of John Wesley, and published an account of his life, in 2 vols. 8vo.—but the work gave great offence to the methodists, and occasioned a quarrel. Dr. Whitehead died in London, 1804.

WHITEHURST, John, an eminent writer, born in 1713, at Congleton, Cheshire. He was brought up to the business of his father, a clock and watch maker, and after visiting Dublin, to see a curious clock, set up for himself at Derby. There he made the clock for the Town-hall, and also the clock and the chimes for All Saint's church; in 1775, he removed to London, where he became stamper of the money weights, by the patronage of the duke of Newcastle. Distinguished by his great mechanical knowledge, his house was the resort of the ingenious, and the scientific, and in reward for his valuable inquiries into the original state and formation of the earth, which he improved in 1787, in 1 vol. 4to. he was in 1779, elected member of the royal society. He published besides, an attempt towards obtaining invariable measures of length, capacity, and weight, from the mensuration of time, and contributed to the philosophical transactions three valuable papers, on thermometrical observations, at Derby, on a machine for raising water, and on an experiment on ignited substances. He prepared also a treatise on Chimnies, Ventilation, &c. which appeared after his death, by Dr. William. This ingenious and amiable man, died 1788, aged 75.

WHITELOCK, sir James, an able lawyer, born in London, and educated at Merchant Taylors', and St John's college, Oxford, from which he removed in 1594, to the Middle Temple. He was chosen member for Woodstock, in 1620, and soon after made chief justice of Chester, and knighted. He was afterwards raised to the office of judge of the common pleas, and at last became chief justice of the king's bench, and died 1632, aged 62. He wrote Lectures or Readings in the Middle Temple hall—Speeches in Parliament. He was well acquainted with Hebrew, and Greek, and so fluent a Latin speaker, that at the assizes at Oxford, he explained from the bench, to some dignified foreigners who were present, the charge which he had delivered to the jury, in good and elegant Latin.

WHITELOCK, Bulstrode, son of the above, was born 6th August, 1605, London. Under the direction of his father, he acquired great knowledge of the law, and in the long parliament he was elected member for Marlow. Though he was one of the most active managers in the accusation against Strafford, he honorably declined to engage in the prosecution of Laud, from whom he had, when at Oxford, received many marks of kindness and hospitality. His influence was such in parliament, that he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat about peace with the king, and he also sat as a lay member in the Westminster assembly of divines. He afterwards gained the confidence of Cromwell, by informing him secretly of the intentions of lord Essex, to criminate him; but though one of the commissioners of the great seal, he refused to be concerned in the trial of the unfortunate Charles, and retired into the country. In 1648, he was elected high steward of Oxford, and he deserved the thanks of the university for the interference of his authority to preserve their library, and to protect their immunities. In 1653, he went ambassador to Sweden, and on his return, the next year, became commissioner of the Exchequer, and in 1656, he was chosen speaker of the commons, and the following year called up to the other house as one of Cromwell's lords. In 1659, he was appointed president of the council of state, and keeper of the great seal, but on the approach of the restoration he withdrew to the country, and led the rest of his life in retirement at Chilton, Wiltshire, where he died 28th January, 1676. He wrote memorials of the English affairs, or account of what passed during the reign of Charles I. till the restoration, published 1682, and again edited 1732—Memorials of the English affairs, from the time of Brutus, to the end of the first James' reign, published fol. 1709.—Monarchy asserted to be the best, most ancient, and legal form of government, 8vo. Speeches in Rushworth's collection. Though a confidential friend of Cromwell, he is deservedly commended by lord Clarendon, for his eminent parts, great learning, and the openness of his character.

WHITFIELD, Henry, first minister of Guilford, Connecticut, was the only son of an opulent lawyer, and born in England in 1597. His father intending him for the law, gave him an education at one of the universities, and the inns of court, but the son preferring the ministry entered into orders, and obtained the rich living of Oakly in Surrey. Here he entertained the puritan divines in the Laudean persecution, and in 1639, emigrating to America, he became the founder of Guilford in connexion with Mr. Leete, Samuel Desborough, and John Hoadly. Leete was governor successively of the colonies of New Haven and Connecticut. Desborough was related to Cromwell, and returning to England, became lord chancellor of Scotland. Hoadly also returned to England, and was chaplain to the castle of Edinburgh. Whitfield returned in 1650, and died in the ministry at the city of Winchester. He was a good scholar, a distinguished divine, and an excellent preacher. He published an account of the progress of the gospel among the Indians in 1651.

WHITGIFT, John, D.D. a learned prelate, born 1530, at Great Grinsby, Lincolnshire, from a family anciently settled at Whitgift in Yorkshire.

He was educated at St. Anthony's school, London, and there he miraculously escaped the plague, and in 1548 he entered at Queen's college, Cambridge, from which he soon after removed to Pembroke hall. In 1555 he was chosen fellow of Peter-house, and when in orders he obtained from bishop Coxe, to whom he was chaplain, the rectory of Feversham in Cambridgeshire. He was in 1563 appointed Margaret professor of divinity, and two years after made chaplain to the queen. In 1567 he was made master of Pembroke-hall, and three months after placed at the head of Trinity college, and made regius professor of divinity. He was in 1573 made dean of Lincoln, and in 1576, raised to the see of Worcester, by Elizabeth, who highly esteemed him, and in 1583, he was translated on the death of Grindal to Canterbury. In this elevated situation, he acted with great vigor against the puritans and papists, but though ridiculed by his enemies, he maintained his dignity and the moderation of his conduct, so that he is deservedly called by Fuller the worthiest man that ever the English hierarchy did enjoy. He died 29th February 1604, at Croyden, where he had founded an hospital. In his thesis for his doctor's degree, he maintained that the pope was antichrist. He wrote an answer to an admonition to the parliament 1572, which produced a long controversy between him and the puritans.

WHITING, Samuel, first minister of Lynn, was born in Boston, England, in 1597—and educated at Cambridge. His father was John W. mayor of the city. He arrived at Boston May 26, 1636. He soon after went to Lynn, where a church was gathered November 8th. He received Mr. Cobbet as his colleague, and after his removal, one of his own sons was associated with him. He died December 11, 1679, aged 82. His son Samuel, first minister of Billerica, died in 1713. Joseph, minister of Lynn and Southampton, died in 1723, aged 81. His daughter married Jeremiah Hobart. He was beloved for the mildness and amiability of his temper, while the unblemished purity of his life, commanded respect. He was well versed in the languages, was a critical Hebrew scholar, and wrote Latin with ease and elegance. He published a treatise upon the last judgment, 1664, and a volume of sermons, 1666.

WHITTINGHAM, William, a native of Chester, educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was afterwards fellow of All Souls, and then student of Christ church, but he quitted England during Mary's bloody reign. Under Elizabeth he was made dean of Durham, though he entertained scruples against the liturgy and the church ceremonies established by parliament. He gave great offence to the Durham clergy by violating the stone coffins, and removing some of the ancient ornaments of his cathedral. He translated the Geneva bible into English, and also turned into metre some of the psalms of David, which appear in the old versions with the initials of his name. He died 1579.

WHITNEY, Eli, the celebrated inventor, was born at Westborough, Massachusetts, December 8, 1765, and graduated at Yale College in 1792. While pursuing the study of the law, in Georgia, he resided with the widow of General Greene, and it was at this time that he invented the cotton gin, a machine for separating the seed from the cotton. This invention has been of incalculable advantage to the southern planters; what before was performed at an immense sacrifice of time and labour, is now effected almost instantaneously. The favorable condition of internal trade in the southern section of the states, has in many respects been more promoted by the genius of Whiting, than by the labors of Fulton. But he was not allowed to enjoy his own in peace; he suffered much in defending his rights from the encroachments of the envious or designing. In 1798 he contracted with the United States to furnish, for $134,000, ten thousand stand of arms, which he completed in ten years. He next contracted for fifteen thousand stand of arms. He died January 8, 1825, aged 59. He married Henrietta, daughter of Pierpont Edwards. Two daughters and a son survived him. He was a man of unflinching perseverance, never yielding until he had accomplished what he had undertaken. In private he was very much respected and beloved.

WHITTINGTON, sir Richard, a mercer and citizen of London in the times of Richard II. and his two successors. He was a man of great influence and very rich, and among other charitable labors he founded an alms house for thirteen poor men, he built Newgate, the best part of Bartholomew's hospital, the library in Grey-friars, now called Christ's hospital, and part of Guildhall, with a chapel and library for the preservation of city records. He was sheriff for the city 1393, and was knighted, and afterwards served the office of lord mayor three times, the last time in 1419. The various stories which are reported of him are calculated for the amusement of children, but have no foundation in truth.

WHITWORTH, Charles, earl, was descended of an ancient family in Staffordshire, one of the members of which had been enrolled for his diplomatic services in 1720. The subject of this article was born in 1754 at Leoburne-grange, Kent, the seat of his father Sir Charles Whitworth, and was educated at Tunbridge granuar-school. He early obtained a commission in the guards; but, the example of his ancestor appearing to point out diplomacy as a sure road to distinction, he quitted the army, and, after going rapidly through several subordinate situations, was appointed in 1786 minister plenipotentiary to the court of Poland. Recalled in the autumn of 1788, Mr. Whitworth proceeded in the same capacity to St. Petersburg, where in 1793 he received the red riband of the bath. On his return to England, in 1800, Sir Charles was created baron Whitworth of the kingdom of Ireland, but soon after again despatched on an embassy to the court of Denmark. An adjustment which proved but short lived took place through his exertions in August, and the ambassador returned home. In the following April he married the duchess dowager of Dorset. After the treaty of Amiens, lord Whitworth, having been previously created a privy counsellor, was accredited as plenipotentiary to Paris, and is admitted to have conducted himself with equal spirit, firmness, and moderation, till his mission terminated abruptly in the renewal of hostilities. He quitted the French capital May 13th, 1803. Lord Whitworth now retired to Knowle in Kent, the family seat of the Sackvilles, into the temporary possession of which he had come in right of his wife, and there exerted himself in raising, at his own expense, a troop of yeoman cavalry. In the spring of 1813 he was made one of the lords of the bed-chamber, and the year following took his seat in the house as an English peer by the title of viscount Whitworth of Adbaston. In August of 1814 he succeeded the duke of Richmond as viceroy of Ireland, which high dignity he enjoyed till 1817, when, the usual period of office being expired, he returned to England, having been in the interval advanced to an earldom. Lord Whitworth, who united much private worth to unquestioned talent, died at Knowle, after an illness of three days' duration, May 18th, 1825.

WICKLIFFE, John de, D.D., a celebrated doctor, professor of divinity at Oxford, and deservedly considered as the forerunner of Luther in the reformation. He was born at Wickliffe in Yorkshire about 1324, and educated at Queen's college, and afterwards at Merton, and in 1361 raised to the mastership of Baliol college. In 1365 he was made, by the scholars, head of Canterbury hall, just founded at Oxford by archbishop Islip, but his elevation was opposed by the monks, and Langham the next primate, and the pope to whom the dispute was referred displaced him, and his secular associates. Thus disgraced by violence he retired to his living at Lutterworth in Leicestershire, meditating revenge against the authors of his unjust privation. In the works of Marsilius of Padua, and other bold writers, he found ample room to indulge his opposition, and well aware of the popularity of attacking a foreign power, which overawed the throne, and submitted the industry and the revenues of the kingdom to its own avaricious views, he loudly inveighed against the errors and the encroachments of the Romish church. His writings alarmed the clergy, and a council was assembled at Lambeth, by archbishop Sudbury 1377, and Wickliffe summoned to give an account of his doctrines. He appeared before it, accompanied by the duke of Lancaster, then in power, and he made so able a defence, that he was dismissed without condemnation. His acquittal, however, displeased the pope, Gregory XI. who directed his emissaries to seize the offending heretic, or if he were protected by the great and powerful of the kingdom, to cite him to Rome, to answer in person before the sovereign pontiff. In consequence of this a second council assembled at Lambeth, and the nineteen propositions which the pope had declared heretical, were so ably vindicated by the eloquence of the undaunted reformer, that his judges, afraid of offending the nobles, or of exciting a commotion among the people, who loudly supported the cause of their champion, permitted him to depart in safety, and enjoined him silence in matters of religion and of controversy. Undismayed by the power of his enemies, Wickliffe continued to preach his doctrines, which were now more universally spread, and a third council, therefore, assembled under Courtmay the primate, 1382, and twenty-four propositions of the reformer were condemned as heretical, and fourteen as erroneous. The severity of the church was, at the suggestion of the pope, and the concurrence of the weak Richard II. directed with effect against the supporters of the new heresy; but whilst some of his followers suffered punishment for their adherence to his principles, Wickliffe unhappily died at Lutterworth 1384, at a time when nothing was wanting to emancipate the English nation from the tyranny of Rome, but the boldness, perseverance, and eloquence of a popular leader. Of the several works which he wrote, his Triologus is almost the only one which has been printed. The noble struggle which Wickliffe had made against the gigantic power of Rome was almost forgotten after his death, till Martin Luther arose to follow his steps, and to establish his doctrines on a foundation which will last till Christianity is no more. The memory of Wickliffe was branded with ignominy by the impotent papists, and by the order of the council of Constance, whose cruelties towards John of Huss, and Jerome of Prague are so well known; the illustrious reformer was declared to have died an obstinate heretic, and his bones were therefore dug up from holy ground, and contemptuously thrown on a dung-hill. The English translation of the New Testament, by the pen of Wickliffe, was published in folio by Lewis, and his life has been written among others by Gilpin.

WICQUEFORT, Abraham, a native of Amsterdam, who early settled in France, where he acquired great political knowledge. He became known to the elector of Brandenburg, who appointed him, in 1626, his ambassador at the court of France, where he continued his honorable services for thirty-two years. The jealousy of Mazarine at last produced his disgrace, and, upon an accusation of sending private intelligence of the state secrets of France to the Dutch government, he was sent to the bastille, and after some months' confinement, was conducted out of the kingdom. From Calais he passed over to England, and afterwards to Holland, where he was honorably received by De Witt, and appointed historiographer to the states. He was accused, in 1675, of holding secret correspondence with the enemies of the state, and in consequence of this he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment; but four years after he escaped, by the assistance of one of his daughters, who, at the peril of her life, exchanged clothes with him. He retired to Zell, which he quitted in disgust in 1681, because the duke refused to interest himself in procuring the reversion of his sentence at the Hague, and he died the next year. He wrote the History of the United Provinces from their establishment to the peace of Munster, fol.—the Ambassador and his Functions, 2 vols. 4to.—Memoirs on Ambassadors and public Ministers.

WIDA, Herman de, a German divine, who joined his labors with those of Luther, Melancthon, and Bucer in effecting the reformation. He was made archbishop of Cologne in 1515; but was obliged to resign 1547, and died 1552. His opinions of church government were the nearest, of all the German reformers, to the doctrines of the church of England.

WIELAND, Christopher Martin, a German writer, who rivals Voltaire in universality of talent and literary fertility, was born, in 1733, at Holtzheim, near Biberach, in Suabia. He was educated by his father, a clergyman, and completed his studies at Klosterbergen and Tubingen. In his thirteenth year he began to compose Latin and German verses. His first published work was The Nature of Things, in six cantos, which appeared in 1751. In the following year he went to reside in Switzerland, whence, in 1760, he returned to Biberach, where he was appointed to a municipal office. His productions in prose and verse, which rapidly succeeded each other, raised him to the summit of literary reputation. The elector of Mentz nominated him professor of philosophy and belles lettres at Erfurt; and, in 1772, the duchess Dowager of Saxe Weimar gave him the tuition of her two sons. He died January 20, 1813. His original works form forty-two volumes quarto; and he translated Lucian, Shakspeare, Cicero's Epistles, and Horace's Satires.

WIGGLESWORTH, Edward D.D. was the son of Michael W. and was graduated at Harvard College in 1710. October 24, 1722 he was unanimously appointed to the Hollis professorship of divinity in Harvard College. He died January 16, 1765, aged 72. His son succeeded him as second Hollis professor. He was a man of eminent talents and the most exemplary character. He published six occasional sermons, one on the death of Mr. Wadsworth, 1737—A letter to Mr. Whitfield, 1745,—two lectures on the ministers of Christ, 1754—Dudleian lecture, 1757.

WIGGLESWORTH, Edward, D.D. a graduate of Harvard college in 1749. He was the son of the Rev. Edward Wigglesworth, the first Hollis professor of divinity in that institution ; and, in 1765, he succeeded his father in the professorship. He retained the office, till obliged to relinquish it because of ill health in 1791. Professor Wigglesworth was distinguished for his great learning, and was one of the first members of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. His death took place in 1794.

WILCOX, Carlos, a poet and minister of Hartford, Connecticut, was born at Newport, New Hampshire, October 22, 1794, and graduated at Middlebury college, in 1818. He studied theology at Andover, and was ordained December 1824, but was dismissed in May 1825, in consequence of ill health. He died at Danbury, of consumption, May 29, 1827, aged 32. His two principal poems, the Age of Benevolence and the Religion of Taste, were published in his remains, 8vo. 1828.

WILD, Henry, a tailor, born at Norwich. Though well educated, the poverty of his parents obliged him to seek for maintenance in a tailor's shop, and after working there fourteen years, he at last emerged from obscurity, and by astonishing application not only regained his classical knowledge, but formed an intimate acquaintance with the Hebrew, and other oriental languages. He was by accident noticed by Dr. Prideaux, who liberally patronised him, and obtained for him permission of admittance into the Bodleian library at Oxford. At the university he maintained himself by teaching the oriental languages to private pupils, and in 1720 he removed to London, where he was admitted to the patronage and friendship of Dr. Mead. He died about 1733, respected as a sober, modest, diffident, and inoffensive man. After his death appeared his translation of Mahomet's Journey to Heaven, from the Arabic.

WILDBORE, Charles, an eminent mathematician, who obtained the living of Broughton Sulney, Nottinghamshire, where he died 1803. His knowledge of mathematics, and of the classics was extensive, and all acquired by his own industry, and without the assistance of others. In 1759 he began his ingenious contributions to the Gentleman's Diary, and became the editor of it in 1780. He also contributed to the Ladies' Diary, and to Martin's Miscellaneous Correspondence, and he engaged, in 1773, in a controversy in Hutton's Miscellanea Mathematica, and also with Dawson of Sedbryk, about the velocity with which water issues from a vessel in motion.

WILFORD, Francis a distinguished Orientalist, born of an ancient family in Hanover. After finishing his studies he entered into the army, and with the rank of lieutenant he accompanied the Hanoverian troops sent by the British government to the East Indies in 1781. On the conclusion of the peace of Mangalore, in 1784, captain Wilford engaged in the study of Hindoo antiquities and the Sanscrit language. He became one of the first members of the Asiatic Society of Calcutta, in whose Transactions, the Asiatic Researches, he published many memoirs on the history and archæology of Hindostan, the last of which, "On the Ancient Geography of India," appeared in 1822, a short time before the death of the learned author.

WILKES, John, alderman, and chamberlain of London, was born 28th October, 1727. In 1754, he stood an unsuccessful candidate for Berwick, but three years after was elected for Aylesbury. He first drew upon himself the severity of government in 1763, by the publication of the forty-fifth number of the North Briton, and in consequence of this offensive paper, he was sent to the Tower. Though the warrant by which he had been arrested was declared illegal, he was dismissed from the office of colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia, and his opposition to government marked him as a dangerous innovator, and as an object of persecution. The republication of the North Briton was followed by his Essay on Woman, an indelicate and licentious performance, for which he was properly arraigned in the court of King's Bench, and upon conviction expelled from the House of Commons, and outlawed. He afterwards obtained a verdict against Mr. Wood, the under secretary of state, with £1000 damages, and soon after retired from his persecutors to Paris. On his return to England in 1768, he sent a letter of submission to the king, and at the general election, offered himself a candidate for London, but though unsuccessful, he was soon after chosen for Middlesex. His election was declared void by the House of Commons ; but his constituents persisted in their choice, and after he had been thus arbitrarily expelled the house three times, Mr. Luttrell, his antagonist, who had but few votes, was declared the successful candidate. In 1769, he was elected alderman of Farringdon Without, and the same year he obtained a verdict against lord Halifax, the secretary of state, for seizing his papers, with £4000 damages. In 1771, he served the office of sheriff; and in 1774, was elected lord mayor, and was permitted quietly to take his seat in the House of Commons for Middlesex. In 1779, he obtained the lucrative office of chamberlain to the city of London, and then gave himself up to the duties of his appointment, regardless of the political struggles in which he had so long been engaged. In his retirement at his seat in the isle of Wight, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and convivial society. He died 26th December, 1797, aged 70. Besides the works already mentioned, he published several political pamphlets and speeches, occasioned by the occurrences of the times, and he also gave to the world splendid editions of Theophrastus and of Catullus, and prepared an elegant translation of Anacreon. Though for a number of years the idol of the people, and the champion of opposition, Wilkes sunk into obscurity in the latter part of life ; and he, who once compared himself to Brutus, and sought for public favor, and for popularity in opposing the measures of government, and in abusing the monarchy, was at last seen a bending courtier at the levees at St. James's, and the associate of those political dependants with whom to have familiarly conversed some years before he would have considered as the highest of disgrace. In his private character he was licentious ; his conversation was easy and full of wit, his manners were pleasing and elegant, though his physiognomy was in the highest degree forbidding ; and his memory was so strongly retentive, that his company was a perpetual treat of facetiousness and of amusement to the chosen few whom he selected for his intimate friends.

WILKIE, William, D.D., a native of West Lothian, educated at Edinburgh. He became professor of natural philosophy at St. Andrew's, where he died 1772. He was distinguished not only as an able divine, but as an ingenious poet, author of Epigoniad, and some fables, 8vo.

WILKINS, John, an ingenious English prelate, was born 1614. He was educated at a private school in Oxford, and then entered in 1627, at New Inn hall, from which he soon removed to Magdalen hall, where he took his degrees. He became chaplain to lord Say, and then to Charles, count palatine of the Rhine, and on the breaking out of the civil wars, he joined the parliament, and took the solemn league and covenant. He was next appointed warden of Wadham college, and one of the reformers of the university, and in 1656, he married Robina, the widow of Peter French, canon of Christ-church, sister to Oliver Cromwell, and by means of this alliance he obtained a dispensation to keep the headship of his college against the statutes which required celibacy. In 1659, he was made master of Trinity college, Cambridge, by Richard Cromwell; but he was ejected at the restoration, and then became preacher to the Gray's inn society, and rector of St. Lawrence Jewry, London. He was afterwards member of the Royal society, and one of their most active council, and he next was made dean of Rippon, and in 1663, promoted, by the interest of Villiers, to the see of Chester. He did not long enjoy his preferment, but died 19th November, 1672, at the house of Dr. Tillotson, his son-in-law, in London. Though much abused by party for his connection with the family of the usurper, he was a man of great abilities, an able theologian, an acute mathematician, and an active promoter of experimental philosophy. To his intimacy with Cromwell, Oxford was indebted, if not for many favors, at least for that deliverance from pillage and violence which the puritans at that time exercised against every place eminent for learning or loyalty. The writings of Dr. Wilkins are curious, learned, and interesting. In 1638, he published the Discovery of a New World, or a Discourse to prove that the Moon is Habitable, with a Discourse on the Possibility of a Passage to it. His Discourse concerning a New Planet, to prove that our Earth is a New Planet, appeared in 1640—his Mercury 1641—Mathematical Magic, or the Wonders that may be performed by Mechanical Geometry, 1643—all which were republished in 1708, in Svo. He wrote besides, Ecclesiastes, or Discourse on the Gift of Preaching—Discourses on the Gift of Prayer—sermons—of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion.

WILKINS, David, D.D., keeper of the archbishop's library at Lambeth, was rewarded by Wake the primate, for the curious catalogue which he made of all the books and MSS. of that valuable collection 1718, with several benefices, a prebend in Canterbury church, and the archdeaconry of Suffolk. He published the New Testament in Coptic—the Saxon Laws,—an edition of Seldon's works, 3 vols. fol.—Pentateuch Coptic, and died 6th August 1740, aged 62.

WILKINSON, Jemima, a religious impostor, was born in Cumberland, Rhode Island, about the year 1753. She was educated a quaker, was zealous, shrewd, and bold—and her fanaticism, imposing person, and artful manner, gave her some distinction among the sect. Recovering suddenly from an apparent suspension of life, which she experienced during a fit of sickness about the year 1773, she gave out that she had been raised from the dead, and claimed to be invested with divine attributes and authority to instruct mankind in religion. She made a few proselytes with whom she removed to New York, and settled on the tract called Jerusalem, near Crooked Lake, where she resided till her death in 1819. She professed to be able to work miracles, and offered to demonstrate it by walking on the neighbouring lake. Accordingly her followers and many others assembled at a time appointed to witness the prodigy. After reconnoitering the beach for some time, she demanded of her disciples if they truly believed her to possess the extraordinary power she pretended, to which they zealously replied in the affirmative. She answered that the object of the miracle was to convince them of her miraculous power; and as they were already satisfied of that, the miracle would be superfluous, she therefore declined performing it.

WILKINSON, James, general, a revolutionary officer, was born in Maryland in 1757; and had determined upon the medical profession. In 1775, he was enlisted as a volunteer, and in 1776 was a captain in a regiment which was marched to the Canadas. After the surrender of Burgoyne, he was the bearer of despatches to Congress, and received the commission of brigadier-general. During the late war, he served in 1813, on the northern frontiers. He died December 23th, 1825.

WILLAN, Robert, an able physician and medical writer, was born, in 1757, at Hill, in Yorkshire; studied medicine at Edinburgh; and settled as a physician at Darlington, whence he removed to London, where he was appointed physician to the Carey-street Dispensary. He was brought up a quaker, but quitted the society. He died in 1812. Among his works are, A Treatise on Cutaneous Diseases; A Treatise on Vaccination; Reports on the Diseases of London; and The Life of Christ.

WILLARD, Samuel, Vice-President of Harvard College, was born at Concord, Massachusetts, January 31, 1640. His father was Simon Willard, a man of considerable distinction. He was graduated at Harvard College, in 1659. From 1663 to 1676, he was minister of Groton. But having been driven thence by the hostilities of the Indians, he was settled colleague with Mr. Thacher, the first minister of the Old South Church, Boston, April 10th, 1678. Upon the resignation of President Mather, he, as Vice-President, took the superintendance of Harvard College, which he continued till his death September 12th, 1707, aged 68. He possessed a rich imagination, quick and accurate perception; and extensive intellectual resources. In argument he was clear and profound. He was a zealous champion of the cause of truth, and a fervent, devoted Christian. He strove to dispel with all the strength of his judgment, and the warmth of his heart, the fatal witchcraft delusion. He published three funeral sermons; two election sermons; three fast sermons; and twenty-five occasional sermons. In 1726, a folio volume, entitled, a body of divinity, in two hundred and fifty expository lectures on the Assembly's shorter Catechism, was published. It was the first work on divinity published in this country, and is considered a work of great merit.

WILLARD, Josiah, one of the early distinguished citizens of Massachusetts, was born at Boston, and graduated at Harvard College in 1698. His father, the Rev. Samuel Willard, was minister of the Old South Church, in Boston. The subject of this article, after spending some time as tutor in his alma mater, devoted a period to travelling in Europe. On his return he was appointed secretary of the colony, an office which he held to his death, being thirty-nine years. He was also judge of probate, and a member of the council. He was as conspicuous for his amiable manners as for his piety. His death took place in 1756, being in his seventy sixth year.

WILLARD, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., President of Harvard College, was the great-grandson of Vice-President Willard. He was born at Biddeford, Maine December 29th, 1738, graduated at Harvard College in 1765, and was ordained Colleague with Mr. Champney, minister of Beverly, November 25th, 1772. In December 19th, 1781, he was inducted into the office of President of Harvard College, as successor to Dr. Langdon. He died at New Bedford September 25th, 1804, aged 64. His widow died in March, 1826. Mr. Webber succeeded him. Dr. Willard was a man of extensive learning, and of firmness and discretion in the exercise of his duties as president of the University. He was well versed in the Classics; more especially in Greek literature, and was distinguished as an astronomer and mathematician. He united great mildness and suavity of character, with a dignity, becoming his situation. His influence upon the students was strong, securing, as he did, their affection and respect. He published a thanksgiving sermon, 1783; at the ordination of J. McKean, 1785; on the death of T. Hilliard, 1790; at the ordination of H. Packard, 1793; a Latin address on the death of General Washington, prefixed to Tappan's discourse, 1800; and mathematical and astronomical communications in the memoirs of the American academy.

WILLDENOW, Charles Louis, a celebrated botanist, born at Berlin, in 1765. He was the son of an apothecary, and after studying pharmacy under his father, he was sent to the university of Halle, and then to Langensalza, where Wiegleb had a laboratory of pharmaceutical chemistry. Willdenow then returned to Berlin, where in 1798, he obtained the chair of natural history at the royal college of medicine and surgery. In 1801, he was appointed professor of botany to the academy of Berlin, of which he had been admitted a member in 1794. He at length obtained the direction of the botanic garden at Berlin, which received vast additions and improvements under his management. He formed a zoological cabinet, which he presented to the museum of Berlin. In 1804, he travelled throughout Austria, and Upper Italy; and seven years after he was invited to Paris by Humboldt, to classify and describe the multitude of new plants brought by that traveller from America. Willdenow, died not long after his return to Berlin, July 10th, 1812. He was an associate of twenty-four learned societies; and the king bestowed on him the order of the black-eagle. Among his principal works are, Prodrromus Floræ Berlinensis, 1787; Historia Amaranthorum, Zurich, 1790, folio; Eléments de Botanique, 1792, which has been translated into several languages; Arboriculture Berlinoise spontanéé, 1796; Species Plantarum exhibentes Plantas ritè cognitatas ad genera relatas cum differentiis specificis, nominibus trivialibus, synonymis, selectis locis natalibus, secundum systema sexuale digestas, Berlin, 1797-1810, 5 vols. in nine parts; Guide pour étudier soi-même la Botanique, 1804; & Hortus Berlinensis, of which only the first volume has been published. Willdenow's great work, the Species Plantarum, was left incomplete, as he did not live to finish the history of the cryptogamic plants. A continuation has been promised by professor Link, of Berlin.

WILLIAM, I. king of England, surnamed the Conqueror, was natural son of Robert I. duke of Normandy, by Arlotta, daughter of a furrier of Falaise, where he was born 1024. He was put in possession of the dukedom of Normandy by his father, and on the death of Edward the Confessor, king of England, he laid claim to the sovereignty of that kingdom, to which he pretended to be entitled under the will of the late monarch. He landed on the English shores September 1066, and burning his fleet encouraged his soldiers by pointing to the land and exclaiming, behold your country! He was quickly met by Harold, whom the people had fixed on the throne, but the battle of Hastings soon decided the fate of the kingdom, and the fall of Harold and of his two brothers with fifty thousand English, left him master of the country. William advanced to London, where he was crowned on Christmas day, 1066, and deservedly obtained the surname of Conqueror; but while he expected submission and peace, he found insurrection and hostility on all sides. By dividing the lands of the nobility among his followers he created himself thousands of enemies, and the people whom he oppressed by the severity of his laws, answered the rigor of his government by discontent and rebellion. To silence their clamors, and prevent their seditious meetings, he ordered a bell or Curfew to be rung every evening at eight o'clock, to warn the people to put out their lights, and this severe regulation, though common on the continent, was regarded by the English as the height of wanton tyranny. As if determined to change the manners of his subjects he ordered that all pleadings should be made in his courts in the French language, but though this was observed as far as the reign of the third Edward, the national idiom prevailed, and the English though conquered still retained their language, their manners, and their prejudices. Notwithstanding these arbitrary steps, William showed himself attentive to the interests and prosperity of his people, and an accurate survey was made by his order of all the lands and property of the kingdom, and registered in Doomsday book, which is still preserved. Various castles were also raised in convenient places, the Tower of London was finished 1078, and at last security and protection were insured to the subject, by the firmness of the government, and the prompt administration of the laws. Instead of a conqueror William at last was regarded as the friend of his people, and he crossed over to the continent with an army of English, to reduce to obedience his revolted dukedom of Normandy. The king of France had excited the sons of the English prince to disobedience, and William hastened to punish his insidious designs, as well as the severe jests with which he had ridiculed his great corpulency. His expedition proved fatal to himself, he fell from his horse in leaping a ditch near Mantes, and died in consequence of it, a few days after at Rouen, 10th September, 1087, aged 63. William as a monarch was a respectable character, and if he had endeavored with greater assiduity to conciliate the affections of the people whom he had conquered, he might have been a great prince, and in more firmly securing his own tranquillity in the government, contributed most essentially to the happiness and prosperity of England.

WILLIAM II. king of England, surnamed Rufus from the color of his hair, succeeded his father William in the absence of his elder brother, and was crowned 27th September 1087. Though he made the fairest promise for the protection of the clergy, and for the happiness of the people, he became a capricious persecutor of the one and a cruel oppressor of the other. He banished Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, who reprehended him for his conduct, and he obtained the dukedom of Normandy through the imprudence of his brother. He also invaded Wales, and conquered the Scotch, and used the power which success in war and negotiations insured in gratifying his avarice and in oppressing his people. He was shot accidentally as he was hunting in the New Forest in Hampshire, by a dart from the hand of Walter Tyrrell, one of his courtiers, and he died a few hours after, 2d August, 1100, aged 44.

WILLIAM III. of Nassau, prince of Orange, and king of England, was born at the Hague 14th of November 1650, of William prince of Orange, and Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I. He was elected Stadtholder in 1672, and named general of the Dutch forces against Louis XIV. and he carried to the war a soul ambitious of glory, the most determined courage, and a phlegmatic indifference to pleasure and to luxury, which exhibited him unshaken in adversity, and heroic in the midst of his greatest successes. Though brave and vigilant, he was defeated in 1674 at Senef, by the prince of Condé, and in 1677 he was obliged to raise the siege of Charleroi, but the peace of Nimeguen the next year put an end to the quarrels of the continent. The unpopular measures of his father-in-law James II. of England, excited in 1688 his highest ambition, and yielding to the wishes of the British nation, he landed with a small force at Brixham, 4th November the same year, and after a few skirmishes soon dispossessed the monarch of his throne. Thus in conjunction with his wife Mary he was acknowledged king of England, and was crowned 11th April, 1689, but though hailed as a deliverer and a friend by the English, Ireland still remained attached to the fortunes of the fugitive James. William with his usual activity crossed to Ireland, and there met with his father-in-law, who had landed from France, supported by a French force. The battle of the Boyne proved fatal to the affairs of James, who retired in dismay to France, and left his rival in peaceful possession of the throne. The war which had raged in Ireland was removed to the continent, and by his powerful alliances William determined to punish the duplicity of the French king, who had excited distrust and rebellion in his kingdom. Though checked at Steinkerque and Nerwinde, William headed the allied forces to victory, Namur was taken, and greater conquests were promised to the English nation when the peace of Ryswick was signed, and the right of William to the British throne was acknowledged by Louis. Always active, and jealously hostile against the power of France, William was making new preparations to curb the ambition of his rival, and to arm the powers of the continent in favor of his plans, when death stopped his career. He fell from his horse while riding near Hampton-court, and broke his collar-bone, and though the accident in a more robust constitution might have been deemed trivial, it proved fatal in William, and a slow fever carried him off, 16th March, 1702, in his 53d year. William left behind him the character of a great politician, though he had never been popular, and of a formidable general though he was seldom victorious. In his manners he was cold and reserved, sullen and phlegmatic, and showed little animation, except in the moment of battle. He despised flattery, yet was ambitious of power. Greater as the general of Holland, than as the king of England, he was to the one a father and to the other a suspicious friend.

WILLIAMS, Charles Hanbury, second son of I. Hanbury, a south-sea director, was member for Monmouth, in several parliaments, and in 1744 was installed knight of the bath, and two years sent as minister to the Prussian court. He was afterwards ambassador to Russia, and died 2d November 1759. He was author of some poems remarkable for their ease and vivacity, rather than for their moral tendency or elegance of composition. They have appeared in Dodsley's collection, and other periodical works.

WILLIAMS, John, an eminent English prelate, born 25th March, 1582. His application to literature was unusually great, and as he required only three hours of sleep in the twenty-four, to recruit his constitution, his improvement in divinity, in philosophy, and in every branch of literature was rapid, and lasting. He obtained in 1611, the rectory of Grafton Regis, in Northamptonshire, and the next year that of Grafton Underwood, in the same county, to which were soon after added prebends in Lincoln, Hereford, St. David's and Peterborough cathedrals. On the death of Egerton the chancellor, to whom he was chaplain, he obtained as a legacy, all his MS. papers, and thus derived important information, which afterwards guided his conduct in parliament and in chancery. His abilities recommended him to the king, who made him his chaplain, and in 1619, gave him the deanery of Salisbury, and the next year that of Westminister. On the removal of Bacon from the office of chancellor in 1621, Williams was intrusted with the seals, and a few days after appointed bishop of Lincoln. The influence of Buckingham, however, proved too great for him, and he was not only removed from the seals, but accused in the star-chamber, and by the contrivance of Laud fined £10,000 and stripped of all his ecclesiastical dignities, and imprisoned in the tower. After a confinement of nearly four years, he was set at liberty, by the interference of the house of lords, and was reconciled to the king. In the impeachment of Strafford, he, according to Clarendon, asserted the impropriety of the bishops voting in a case of blood, and afterwards when consulted by the king, he advised him to sacrifice that unfortunate nobleman to the fury of his enemies, if perhaps he thus might produce a reconciliation between himself and the people. In 1641, he was raised to the see of York, and ably opposed the bill for depriving the bishops of their seats in the house of lords. When however he protested with the other prelates on the irregularity of the peers proceeding in the public business, whilst the bishops were absent, in consequence of the threats of the mob, he was sent to the Tower as guilty of high treason. During the civil war he yielded to the storm, and retired to his native town, where he fortified and for some time ably defended Conway castle. The death of the king overwhelmed him with sorrow, and he felt the blow with great grief. He died soon after, 25th March, 1650. He was author of some sermons—of the Holy Table—against Laud's Innovations, a book commended by lord Clarendon. Though accused by some of pride and ambition, archbishop Williams possessed great virtues, he was charitable and humane, the friend of learning and of merit, and in his conduct hospitable and courteous.

WILLIAMS, Anna, a lady of literary character, daughter of a surgeon in Wales. Her father, with more warmth than prudence, persuaded himself that he had discovered the longitude by magnetism, and with this idea, full of golden dreams, he hastened to London in 1730, but saw all his hopes vanish in disappointment, and, in the midst of his distress he was fortunate enough to obtain the place of a pensioner in the Charter-house. His daughter who accompanied him, contributed all the powers of her mind to support his indigence, but in 1740 she was afflicted with a cataract, which totally deprived her of sight. In this distressful situation, she still engaged herself in the exercise of her needle for the maintenance of her indigent father, who had quitted the Charter-house, and in 1746, she added a little to her scanty income by publishing the life of the emperor Julian, from the French of la Bletterie. The distresses of the father, and the virtuous industry of the daughter, soon after became known to Dr. Johnson and his wife, and commiseration at last ended in the closest intimacy. Miss Williams was admitted into the house of the great moralist, and after the death of his wife, whose bed of sickness she soothed with all the kind offices of friendship, she still continued under the protection of her excellent host. An operation was performed upon her eyes, by Mr. Sharp, but it proved unsuccessful; yet in the midst of her sufferings she found comfort, not only in the treatment of Dr. Johnson, but in the kindness of Garrick, who in 1755 granted her a benefit, which produced for her the clear sum of £200. The latter part of her life was rendered still more comfortable by the publication of her Miscellanies in prose and verse, 1765, which added more than £100 to her little fortune, and thus tended to spread cheerfulness and independence around the infirmities of declining age and of melancholy blindness. She died 6th September 1783, aged 77, in the house of her friend Dr. Johnson, in Bolt-court, Fleet-street, and left her little property for the charitable education of poor deserted girls.

WILLIAMS, Daniel, D.D. a native of Wrexham in Denbighshire. When in orders he settled in Ireland as chaplain to lady Meath, and was for twenty years an active minister in Dublin; but on the breaking out of the troubles in 1687 he came to London, and succeeded Mr. Baxter at the merchant's lecture, Pinner's hall. He was created doctor of divinity in 1709, by the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and died 26th January, 1716, aged 72. His Practical Discourses appeared in 2 vols. 1738, with his life prefixed. He founded a library in Redcross-street for the use of dissenting ministers.

WILLIAMS, Francis, one of the first settlers of New Hampshire. He was sent over, in 1634, as governor of the province, by Mason and Gorges. He fixed his residence at Portsmouth; and rendered himself so acceptable to the people, that when they united in a body politic, they annually elected him to the chief magistracy till the colony was placed, in 1641, under the government of Massachusetts.

WILLIAMS, Helen Maria, a distinguished writer on history and general literature, born in the north of England, in 1762. She came to London at the age of eighteen, and was introduced to the literary world by Dr. Andrew Kippis. The first production of her pen appears to have been a legendary tale in verse, entitled Edwin and Eltruda, 1782, 4to.; and this was followed by An Ode on Peace, 1783, 4to.; Pern, a poem, 1784, 4to.; and a Collection of Miscellaneous Poems, 1786, 2 vols. 8vo. In 1788 she published a poem on the Slave Trade; and the same year she visited France, where she formed many literary and political connections. In 1790 she went again to France, and settled at Paris; and soon after appeared her Letters written from France, in the Summer of 1790, to a Friend in England, containing various Anecdotes relative to the French Revolution, and Memoirs of Mons. and Mad. du F—; of which work she published a continuation in 1792. The object of these, and of some contemporary productions of this lady was, to recommend herself to the patronage of the Brissotines; and consequently on their fall, under the tyranny of Robespierre, she incurred great danger, and being arrested, was for some time a prisoner in the Temple at Paris. On obtaining her freedom, she renewed her application to literary pursuits. Besides many works of minor importance, she engaged in an English translation of the Personal Narrative of the Travels of Humboldt and Bonpland in America, 1814—1821, 6 vols. 8vo. Miss Williams died at Paris, in December, 1827. Besides the works already mentioned, she wrote Julia, a novel, 2 vols.; a Narrative of Events in France in 1815; Letters on the Events which passed in France since the Restoration in 1815, and other pieces; and she was at one time a contributor to the New Annual Register.

WILLIAMS, Roger, the founder of the Providence plantations, was born in Wales, in 1599, and was educated at Oxford. Being a dissenter, he came to America, in the hope of enjoying in freedom his religious opinions. He arrived at Hull, February 5, 1631; and was established at Salem, Massachusetts, as colleague with Mr. Skelton. His peculiar notions soon subjected him to the severest censure. He maintained that the magistrates were bound to grant toleration to all sects of Christians; and in his actions and words avowed the liberality of his principles. After the death of Mr. Skelton, he was sole minister of Salem. Continuing to avow his opinions, which were considered not only heretical, but seditious, he was summoned before the general court, to answer to numerous charges. He however refused to retract any of his opinions, and was accordingly banished, 1635. He first repaired to Seekonk; but being informed that that territory was within the jurisdiction of Plymouth, he proceeded to Mooshaucic, where, with others, in 1636, he began a plantation. The land was honestly purchased of the Indians; and the town, in acknowledgment of the kindness of heaven, was called Providence. Mr. Williams's benevolence was not confined to his civilized brethren; he learned the language of the Indians, travelled among them, won the entire confidence of their chiefs, and was often the means of saving from injury the colony that had driven him from its protection. In 1643, he was sent to England, as agent for both settlements; and in September 1644, returned with a patent for the territory, with permission for the inhabitants to institute a government for themselves. In 1651 he was again sent to England, in the capacity of agent, and returned in 1654, when he was chosen president of the government. Benedict Arnold succeeded him in 1657. He died in April, 1683, aged 84. Mr. Williams was consistent in his religious doctrines, and set a bright example of that toleration which he demanded from others. His mind was strong and well cultivated; and he read the Scriptures in the originals. After his banishment from Massachusetts, he maintained a correspondence with some of its principal men, and ever entertained for them the highest affection and respect. In his writings, he evinces his power at argument. In 1672, he held a public dispute with the most eminent Quaker preachers, of which he has published an account. He also published a Key to the Indian Language, 8vo., 1643; an answer to Mr. Cotton's letters, concerning the power of the magistrate in matters of religion, with other letters and discourses.

WILLIAMS, David, a miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1733, in Cardiganshire, England; was educated at one of the dissenting academies of that country; and became a dissenting minister. Changing to a deist, he opened a chapel to diffuse his newly adopted opinions, and for some time his hearers were numerous. The subsequent part of his life was dedicated to literary pursuits, and to private teaching. The Literary Fund was founded by him. He died June 29, 1816. Among his chief works are Lectures on the Principles and Duties of Religion and Morality; Lectures on Education; Lectures on Political Principles; and a History of Monmouthshire.

WILLIAMS, William, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born April 8, 1731, at Lebanon, in Connecticut, where his father was the minister of a parish. At the age of sixteen, he entered Harvard college, and graduated with honor in due time. After serving a long time in the legislature of his native state, he was, during the years 1766 and 1777, a member of the general congress. At one time, when the paper money was of so little value, that military services could not be procured for it, he exchanged for it more than two thousand dollars in specie for the benefit of the cause, which he never recovered. He contributed to arouse the spirit of freedom by several essays on political subjects; and once by an impressive speech. During the whole revolutionary war, he was very useful in obtaining private contributions of supplies for the army. He died August 2, 1811, in the eighty-first year of his age.

WILLIAMS, Otho Holland, a brigadier-general in the American army, was born in Prince George's county, Maryland, in 1748. He was first placed in the clerk's office of his native county, and then removed to the clerk's office of the county of Baltimore, of which he had the principal direction. In the beginning of the revolutionary struggle, he was appointed lieutenant in the company of riflemen raised in the county of Frederick, and marched, in 1775, to the American camp near Boston. The following year, a rifle regiment was organized, in which he was appointed major. It formed part of the garrison of fort Washington, in New York, when captured by the British, and gained great honor by the gallant manner in which it withstood the attack of the Hessian column to which it was opposed. Major Williams was taken prisoner with the rest of the defenders of the fort, but was soon exchanged. While in captivity, he became entitled to the command of a regiment, and, on recovering his liberty, was placed at the head of the sixth Maryland. The Maryland and Delaware lines having been detached to South Carolina, soon after the reduction of Charleston, he accompanied the baron de Kalb; and, when general Gates assumed the command of the southern army, he was named adjutant-general, in which station he remained until the close of the war. In the disastrous battle of Camden, he behaved with great distinction. At the crossing of the river Dan, he performed efficient service; and he was very useful in thwarting the various attempts of Cornwallis to strike a blow at Greene after the return of the latter into North Carolina. Previous to the disbandment of the army, congress made him brigadier-general. He died in July, 1794, of a pulmonary complaint.

WILLIAMS, John, first minister of Deerfield, Massachusetts, the son of deacon Samuel Williams, was born in Roxbury, December 10, 1664, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1683. In May, 1686, he was ordained at Deerfield. In 1704, information was received from Colonel Schuyler, that the French and Indians meditated an attack upon the town. A small garrison was stationed there; but on the morning of February 29, 1704, while the patrol were asleep, three hundred of the enemy burst upon the town, overpowered the garrison, and assailed Mr. Williams's house. He was in bed, and upon the entrance of the first Indian into his chamber, he seized his pistol and presented it to the breast of the savage, but it missed fire. He was then disarmed and bound; and two of his children and a black female servant were butchered before his eyes. He was then compelled, with his wife, the only daughter of Mr. Mather of Northampton, and five of his children, to commence a toilsome march to Canada. The second day of their travel, Mrs. Williams, who was not yet recovered from a recent confinement, fell down while crossing a river, and was immediately murdered by her savage conductors. Twenty other prisoners shared the same fate. At length, after a march of three hundred miles, during which he suffered the most excruciating tortures, he arrived at the place of his destination. Here every means were adopted to convert him to the Roman Catholic faith; but he remained steadfast to his conscience and his principles, and even indifferent to the uplifted hatchet of his Indian master. In 1706 he was redeemed; and settled again at Deerfield, where, after twelve years labor in the gospel, he died June, 12, 1729, aged 64. One of his daughters had become assimilated to the Indians; married one of them, and embraced the catholic faith. His three sons were highly respected and useful ministers, of Mansfield, Springfield and Watertown. He published a sermon after his return from Canada; God in the camp, 1707; the redeemed captive 12mo. giving an account of his sufferings, &c. and an abstract of a number of sermons, 1729.

WILLIAMS, Stephen, D.D. the first minister of Longmeadow, Massachusetts, was born at Deerfield in the same state, May 14, 1693. Being a son of the Rev. John Williams, named in the preceding article, he was carried to Canada captive, by the Indians, whence he returned, November 21, 1705. He was ordained over the second congregational church of Springfield, afterwards called Longmeadow, October 17, 1716. He received his education at Harvard college where he graduated in 1713; and maintained a highly respectable character for talents and learning. In 1745 he went to Louisburgh as a chaplain under Pepperell, and in 1755 he went to Lake Champlain in the same capacity under sir William Johnson, and in 1756 under Winslow. By the officers and soldiers he was held in esteem and honor. Dr. Williams died June 10, 1782, aged 80 years, and in the 66th of his ministry. He published a sermon at the ordination of John Keep, Sheffield, 1772.

WILLIAMS, Elisha, president of Yale college, was educated at Harvard college, where he graduated in 1711. After a course of theological study he was settled in the ministry at Wethersfield, Connecticut, where he remained till chosen president of the college in 1726. Feeble health impelled him to resign the office in 1739, when he returned to Wethersfield, and was soon after appointed a justice of the supreme court of Connecticut. In 1745 he went as chaplain in the expedition against Cape Breton. In the following year he was appointed colonel of a regiment on the proposed expedition against Canada. He afterwards went to England as an agent for the colony, and became acquainted with Dr. Dodridge, who represents him as uniting in his character an ardent sense of religion, solid learning, consummate prudence, great candor, and a certain nobleness of soul, capable of contriving and acting the greatest things without seeming to be conscious of having done them. His death took place at Wethersfield, July 24, 1755, aged 60 years. In 1727 he published a sermon on divine grace; and in 1728 on the death of T. Ruggles.

WILLIAMS, Solomon, D.D. an American clergyman, who was one of the most distinguished men of his time. He graduated at Harvard college in 1719, and was ordained as minister of Lebanon, Connecticut, December 5, 1722. In 1730, he published a sermon at the ordination of Jacob Eliot; in 1739, one on the death of John Robinson; in 1741, an election sermon, and one on a day of prayer; in 1742, one entitled, the more excellent way, against enthusiasm; in 1743, one on the death of the Rev. Eleazer Williams; in 1744, one entitled, Christ the True Witness; in 1746, a vindication of the doctrine of justifying faith; in 1751, a work on the qualifications for communion; in 1752, a sermon on the death of the Rev. J. Meacham; in 1753, one on the death of the Rev. Eben Williams; and in 1759, one on success in arms. Dr. Williams died February 29, 1776, aged 75 years.

WILLIAMS, Eliphalet, D.D. a clergyman of Connecticut, settled at East Hartford. He was the son of the Reverend Solomon Williams of Lebanon in that state; was born February 21, 1727; graduated at Yale college, in 1743; and was ordained in March 1748. His death took place June 29th, 1803, at the age of 76 years. It will be observed from the above dates that he was in the ministry more than half a century. He was distinguished for an unblemished character, and for talents rendering him a successful preacher. His publications were—a sermon on account of the earthquake, 1755; sermon at a thanksgiving, 1760; sermon at election, 1769; and one on the death of Governor Pitkin, 1769.

WILLIAMS, Ephraim, founder of Williams' college, Massachusetts, was a native of Newton in that state. He possessed fine talents for a military officer, and in the French war from 1740 to 1748, commanded the line of forts on the west side of Connecticut river. In 1755 he received the command of a regiment, and joined general Johnson at the north of Albany. He was sent out on the morning of the 8th of September, at the head of twelve hundred men to skirmish with the enemy, and falling into an ambuscade, was killed. His party retreated to the main body, and in another battle during the day, repulsed the enemy. He was brave, facetious, polite, and popular. He gave his property for the establishment of a free-school in the town now called Williamstown, on condition it should bear that name. A school was opened in 1791, and in 1793, it was incorporated a college.

WILLIAMS, Nathan, D.D. an American clergyman, who became eminent in his profession, and was settled at Tolland, Connecticut. He was educated at Yale college in that state, where he graduated in 1755. He was ordained April 30, 1760; and died April 15, 1829, having been in the ministry nearly sixty-nine years. In 1792 he published a work on baptism, designed to show that children are subject to the discipline of the church.

WILLIAMS, Samuel, LL.D. professor in Harvard college, was born at Waltham, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1761. He was ordained minister of Bradford, November 20th, 1765, where he continued until his appointment as professor of mathematics and natural philosophy. After holding that office from 1780 to 1788, he resigned, and removed to Rutland, Vermont, where he resided during the remainder of his life. For some time he was the editor of and proprietor of the Rutland Herald, published at that place. He was a fellow of the American Academy, of the American Philosophical Society, and of the Meteorological Society of Manchester, and published several astronomical and other papers in the scientific journals. His principal work was the Natural and Civil History of Vermont, originally published in 1 vol. 8vo. 1794, and afterwards continued and published in 2 vols. It was esteemed the best historical work which had appeared in the country at the time of its publication, and received high encomiums from some of the philosophers of Europe. He died January, 1817.

WILLIAMS, Nehemiah, a congregational minister of Brimfield, Massachusetts. His father was the Rev. Chever Williams of Hadley in that state. The subject of this article was educated at Harvard college where he graduated in 1769; and was ordained, February 9, 1775. His death took place, November 26, 1796. It has not generally fallen to the lot of a clergyman to rank higher in the estimation of the public, so far as there was opportunity for becoming acquainted with his talents. There was in his manner an unusual energy and pathos. After his death twenty-four of his sermons were published in a volume.

WILLIAMS, Jonathan, an American citizen and soldier, born at Boston, in 1752. For many years he was at the head of the engineer corps of the army. He died, at the age of sixty-three, in Philadelphia, 1815. Among the civil offices held by him, he was a member of congress. His publications were—in 1799 a memoir on the use of the thermometer in navigation; in 1801, elements of fortification; and in 1808, Kosciusko's manœuvres for horse artillery.

WILLIAMS, Samuel Porter, a congregational clergyman of New England. He was a descendant of the Rev. Solomon Williams, mentioned in a preceding article; was born at Wethersfield, Connecticut, February 22, 1769; and graduated at Yale college, in 1796. For some time after completing his education he was engaged in mercantile pursuits; but then resolved on devoting himself to the ministry. He accordingly went through a course of theological study with president Dwight, and was ordained at Mansfield in 1817. He remained in this place about ten years; then spent two years at Northampton; after which, he was settled at Newburyport, February 8th, 1821, as successor to Dr. Dana, where he remained till his death in December, 1826. After his death a volume of his sermons was published.

WILLIAMSON, Hugh, M.D. LL.D. an American physician, scholar, and civilian of eminence. He was a native of Pennsylvania, and born December 5, 1735. From 1760 to 1763 he was professor of Mathematics in the college of Philadelphia. Subsequently he went to Europe and studied medicine at Edinburgh, and Utrecht. On his return to America he established himself successfully in the practice of medicine at Philadelphia. In 1773 he again went to Europe, and was absent from his native country between two and three years. He then, in 1776, took up his residence in North Carolina. In 1780 he was surgeon in the militia under Caswell. After the peace he was for five or six years a member of congress; and he also assisted in forming the constitution of the United States. The latter part of his life was spent in the city of New York, where he died, May, 22, 1819, aged 83 years. His publications were in 1810, A Discourse on the Benefit of Civil History; in 1811, Observations on the climate of America; in 1812, History of North Carolina, in 2 vols. 8vo. and many medical and philosophical communications. He was remarkably industrious in the various pursuits to which he gave his attention; and America is much indebted to him for the fruits of his industry.

WILLIS, Francis, a physician, celebrated for his skill in cases of insanity, was born, about 1718, in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Brazen-nose College, Oxford. He was brought up to the church, and obtained a college living in the metropolis; but subsequently took the degree of M.D. and practised as a physician. He restored George III. to sanity, and was amply rewarded by a parliamentary grant. He died in 1807.

WILLIS, Thomas, an eminent physician, born at Great Bedwin, Wiltshire, 1621. When Oxford was garrisoned by the king, he took up arms in the royal cause, and after the surrender, he returned to the studies and practice of his profession. In 1660 he was appointed Sedleian professor of natural philosophy, and increased his reputation and his fortune by an extensive and respectable practice. He was one of the first members of the Royal society, and became fellow of the college of physicians. In 1666 he removed to London, and soon rose to the height of his profession in the city. He died 11th November, 1675. He wrote several works on the different branches of his profession, often reprinted, especially at Geneva, 2 vols. 4to. 1676, and Amsterdam, 1682. Though accused by some of framing a body of physic, chiefly on hypotheses of his own, without having recourse to experiment and observation, he is regarded by others as a sagacious anatomist, an able philosopher, and a most learned and skilful physician, respectable for veracity, information, and integrity.

WILLIS, Browne, LL.D. grandson of the preceding, was born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 14th September 1682. From Bechampton school, he passed to Westminster, and at the age of seventeen he was removed as gentleman commoner to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He afterwards retired to Fenny-Stratford, and in 1705 was elected member of parliament for Buckingham. In 1717 he became one of the members of the society of antiquaries just revived, and he showed such emulation in the pursuit of antiquities, that he visited all the cathedrals of England and Wales except Carlisle. Though he had a large family, he was a liberal contributor to the repairing of the church of Stoney Stratford, which had suffered by fire, and he gave, in 1741, to the university, his valuable cabinet of English coins, the laborious collection of upwards of forty years. He liberally made other contributions to charitable purposes, and died 5th February 1760. An account of his publications, with some interesting particulars, is inserted in the anecdotes of Bowyer by Nichols. The best known of his works are the Survey of the Cathedrals, 2 vols. 4to.—an Account of Mitred Abbeys, 2 vols. 8vo.

WILLOUGHBY, Francis, an eminent naturalist, born 1635. To the high advantages of birth, rank, and fortune, he added the more solid merit of application, and a strong attachment to literature. He directed the powers of his cultivated mind chiefly to the history of animals, and after reading every book which could elucidate the subject, he travelled over his native country, and afterwards visited France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, accompanied by his intelligent friend Ray. The observations made in these journeys on animals and on nature, were carefully preserved, but before they could be submitted to the public eye, the learned author died, universally and deservedly respected, 3d July, 1672, aged only 37. His works were afterwards published by his friend Ray, and were Ornithologiæ Libri tres, with cuts, folio, translated into English by the editor—Historiæ Piscium Libri quatuor, with cuts, folio—Letters, with Observations on Wasps called Ichneumonæ, and Letters, inserted in the Philosophical Transactions. He was an active member of the Royal society.

WILLYMOT, William, LL.D. a learned divine, known as the author of several valuable elementary books, intended for the use of scholars, the fruits of his own experience in tuition. He was a native of Royston, and received his education at Eton college, whence he was elected off on a foundation fellowship to King's college Cambridge, and there graduated in arts about the close of the seventeenth century. In 1707 he took the degree of LL.D. and after devoting many years of his life to the instruction of youth, as an under master at Eton, and subsequently at a private establishment of his own, he returned to Cambridge in quality of vice-provost of his college. Besides the treatises already alluded to, he was the author of a small devotional tract, intended as a companion to the altar, and edited Bacon's Essays, in two octavo volumes. Dr. Willymot did not obtain any ecclesiastical preferment till late in life, when he was inducted to the living of Wilton in Cambridgeshire, but enjoyed it little more than a twelvemonth, dying in 1737.

WILMOT, John Eardley, was born at Derby, in 1748. He was educated at Westminster school, and next at University college, Oxford, from whence he removed to a fellowship in All-Souls. He was designed for the church, but on the advancement of his father to the bench, he applied to the law and in 1783 became a master in chancery. At the close of the American war he was appointed commissioner for settling the claims of the loyalists. In 1790 he opened a subscription for the relief of the suffering French clergy, and other emigrants, with the management of which fund he was intrusted. He died at Tottenham in 1815. Mr. Wilmot published—1. A Short Defence of the Opposition, 1779. 2. A Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England. 3. Memoirs of his Father. 4. Life and Letters of Bishop Hough, 4to. 5. History of the Commission of American Claims, 8vo.

WILSON, Thomas, LL.D. D.D. a learned prelate, born at Burton Wirral, Cheshire, December 1663. From a private school at Chester he removed to Trinity college, Dublin, where he studied medicine, which he soon abandoned for divinity. He was ordained in 1686, and soon after became curate of New church in the parish of Winwick, Lancashire, where he formed an acquaintance with lord Derby, who appointed him his chaplain, and tutor to his son, lord Strange. He refused the rectory of Baddeswork in Yorkshire, because he was incapable of residence upon it, and when offered by the kindness of his patron the bishopric of Sodor and Man, which had been already vacant for three years, he declined the honor, but at last in compliance with the repeated requests of his friends, he accepted it in 1696. He was created doctor of laws by archbishop Tenison, and consecrated by his primate Sharp, in the Savoy church, and in 1698 he first visited his diocese. Though his revenues were only three hundred pounds a year, they were sufficient to support him with dignity, and to contribute to the comforts of the poor and the helpless. With the most laudable zeal he built a new chapel at Castleton, and he founded parochial libraries through the island, and in 1703, obtained the act of settlement, and the passing into a law of his ecclesiastical constitutions, which were so highly applauded by lord chancellor King, that he declared if the ancient discipline of the church were lost in England, it could be recovered in all its purity in the isle of Man. In respect to his virtues and his services, he was in 1707, created doctor of divinity, at both the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. In 1721 he was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with the governor of the island in consequence of his forbidding the introduction of the Independent Whig, an obnoxious book, into his diocese, and this dispute was more seriously increased the following year. The bishop suspended one of his clergy for administering the sacrament to a person whom he had banished for ill conduct from the holy table, and the governor enlisting on the side of the offended party, fined the prelate, and committed him to prison, where he refused to discharge the fine. The tumults which consequently were excited among the people, were appeased by the mild exhortations of the bishop from the walls of his prison, and after a confinement of nine weeks, he was set at liberty by the direction of the privy council, who reversed all the proceedings of the governor against him. So high an insult called aloud for punishment, but the benevolent prelate checked the importunities of his friends who wished him to prosecute the governor. This venerable man was so attached to his situation that he refused an English bishopric, and gradually sunk under the infirmities of age. He expired gently 7th March, 1755, in the 93d year of his age, and the 58th of his consecration. In 1699 he published the Principles and Duties of Christianity, for the use of the island, in Manks, the first book ever printed in that language. His works were two vols. fol. consisting of religious tracts, and sermons, with a short history of the isle of Man. He also formed the plan for translating the bible into the Manks language which proceeded under him to the end of the Gospels, but was finished by his successor Hildesley. His sermons have since his death appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. and his bible with valuable notes in 3 vols. 4to.

WILSON, Thomas, D.D. son of the preceding, was born 24th August, 1703, and educated at Christchurch, Oxford. He became prebendary of Westminster, minister of St. Margaret's there, and rector of St. Stephen's Walbrook, for forty-six years. He opposed the building of a new square at Westminster, because his interest in the prebendal house was undervalued; and he rendered himself ridiculous by erecting to Mrs. Macaulay Graham a statue in his own church, under the character of Liberty. His fondness for the lady disappeared when she married against his consent, and the monument of his weakness was removed. Besides the Ornaments of Churches considered,—a view of the Projected Improvements in Westminster,—and Distilled Liquors, the Bane of the Nation, a popular pamphlet, which procured him the friendship of sir Joseph Jekyll, he published his father's works. He died at Bath 15th April, 1784.

WILSON, Florence, a native of Murray in Scotland, educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He travelled abroad, and resided for some time at Basil where he had Erasmus among the number of his friends. He afterwards taught philosophy in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he was universally respected for his learning and abilities. He returned to Scotland in 1554, and died at Elgin in retirement 1557, aged 57. He wrote de Tranquillitate Animæ, published by Frebairn 1706, and Ruddiman, 1750.

WILSON, Matthew, D.D., an American scholar who united the profession of clergyman and physician, performing the duties of each for a period of twenty-four years. He was born in the county of Chester, Pennsylvania in 1729. In addition to the offices of his regular profession, he also for many years had charge of an academy at Newark, New Jersey. His ministerial labors were performed in connexion with the presbyterian churches of Lewes and Cool-Spring, in the state of Delaware. Here he resided from some time in 1755, till his death, May 30th, 1790. In 1786 he received the degree of doctor of divinity from the university of Pennsylvania. He was a learned theologian and a good Hebrew and classical scholar; and his neighborhood, while he lived, became the centre of literary and religious influence. His manners were courteous; and he was benevolent, pious and patriotic in an eminent degree. His publications were—a history of a malignant fever, 1774; remarks on the cold winter of 1779 and 1780; and an essay to prove that most diseases proceed from miasmata in the air, 1786.

WILSON, James, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Scotland, about the year, 1742. His father was a respectable farmer. He studied successively at Glasgow, St. Andrews and Edinburgh, and then left Scotland for America. He arrived in Philadelphia, where he was first employed as a tutor in 1766, in Philadelphia college, and academy, in which capacity he acquired a high reputation as a classical scholar. In a few months, however, he relinquished that occupation, and commenced the study of the law in the office of the celebrated John Dickinson. At the expiration of two years, he was admitted to the bar, and began to practise, first at Reading, and then at Carlisle. From the latter place he removed to Annapolis; and, in 1778, returned to Philadelphia, where he continued to reside during the rest of his life. He was elected, in 1775, a member of congress, and took his seat on the 10th of May. He was a uniform advocate of the declaration of independence, though he may have thought, perhaps, that the measure was brought forward prematurely. He voted in favor of it, as well on the first of July, in opposition to the majority of his colleagues from Pennsylvania, as on the 4th, in conjunction with the majority. In 1777, he was superseded in congress, through the influence of party spirit; but, in 1782, he was again honored with a seat. A few months previously, he had been appointed, by the president and supreme executive council, a counsellor and agent for Pennsylvania, in the controversy between that state and Connecticut, relating to certain lands within the charter boundary of the former, and which were claimed by the latter as included within her charter. The decision was in favor of Pennsylvania. In 1779, he received the appointment of advocate-general for the French government in the United States, an office the duties of which were both arduous and delicate. He resigned it in 1781, in consequence of difficulties respecting the mode of remuneration. He continued, however, to give advice in such cases as were laid before him by the ministers and consuls of France, until 1783, when the French transmitted to him a present of ten thousand livres. In 1787, Mr. Wilson was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and was one of the committee who reported the draught. In the state convention of Pennsylvania, he was principally efficient in causing the constitution to be adopted. He was subsequently a member of the convention which changed the constitution of Pennsylvania, to render it conformable to that of the United States, and, being one of the committee, appointed to prepare, was intrusted with the duty of making the draught of the necessary form. In 1789, he was appointed, by general Washington, a judge of the supreme court of the United States; and whilst on a circuit in North Carolina, in the discharge of his functions as such, he died at Edenton, 28th of August, 1798, aged about fifty-six years. As a lawyer and judge, Mr. Wilson was eminent for talent and integrity. In private life he was courteous, kind and hospitable. His political and legal disquisitions are extant in three volumes, and much esteemed.

WILSON, John, first minister of Boston, Massachusetts, was born at Windham, England, 1588, and educated at King's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After studying law for several years, he devoted his attention to theology, and served as a chaplain in several families. He at length settled at Sudbury; but in 1630, came to New England with governor Winthrop, and was installed teacher of the church at Charlestown, on the 27th of August. When the church soon after removed to Boston, he accompanied them, and continued to labor till his death, in 1667. He possessed great excellence of character; and was distinguished by an extraordinary talent at rhyming, and making anagrams, which he continually exercised to the amusement of his acquaintance.

WILSON, Alexander, distinguished for his knowledge of ornithology, was born at Paisley, Scotland, and came to Delaware, in 1794. He soon after went to Philadelphia, and was led, by an acquaintance with Mr. Bartram, to devote himself to the study of natural history, for which he had a strong propensity. He bestowed his chief attention on American ornithology, and after a course of the most laborious and faithful preparation, commenced in 1808, the publication in seven volumes, quarto, of a description of the birds of North America. The last volume was completed only a few days before his death, in August, 1813. The work is splendidly executed, and is far more accurate and comprehensive than any other on the subject. He was distinguished for integrity, enterprise, industry, and perseverance. Besides his knowledge of natural history, he cultivated a considerable acquaintance with general literature, and published several poems.

WILSON, James, P. D. D., an eminent presbyterian clergyman of Philadelphia, for many years pastor of the first church in that city. Previous to his entering the ministry he was in the practice, of the law, which doubtless gave him some advantages in obtaining the distinction in his subsequent profession to which he arrived. He was looked upon, not only as one of the first men of that metropolis, but also as one of the first of his profession in the country. He published lectures on the parables and the historical books of the New Testament. He died in 1830.

WILSON, Peter, LL. D., an American linguist, for a long time known and highly esteemed, on account of his valuable labors in the department of literature to which he mainly gave his attention. He was connected with Columbia College in the city of New York, in which institution he was professor of the Latin and Greek languages. He died at Hackensack, New Jersey, in August, 1826, at the age of 79 years. He published a learned work on Greek prosody.

WINCHELL, James M. a Baptist minister of the first church in Boston. He was born in Dutchess county, New York, 1791; and received his education at Union College, and Brown university; spending three years at the former and one at the latter institution, where he graduated in 1812. He was settled over the above church in 1814, and continued his connexion with it till his death in 1820, aged 28 years. His talents were of the popular kind, on which account he was highly acceptable as a preacher. He published an edition of Watts's Psalms and Hymns, arranged according to the subjects; and also a few occasional discourses.

WINCHESTER, Thomas, D. D., a native of Farringdon, Berkshire. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degree of doctor of divinity 1749, and in 1761, he obtained from the society the living of Appleton, Berks, where he died 1780. He was author of a tract on the seventeenth article of the church of England, reprinted for the use of divinity-students in 1803, by the judicious care of Mr. Churton of Brazen-nose, who has prefixed an account of the writer.

WINCHESTER, Elhanan, an American preacher who acquired in his day some celebrity, was born in Brookline, Massachusetts, in 1751. Without a regular academical education he commenced preaching, and was the first baptist minister of Newton, in his native state. Subsequently, he went to South Carolina, and was there engaged in preaching to the same denomination. But, in 1781, he changed his opinions, and became a preacher of universal salvation in the city of Philadelphia. He continued here for several years; and then became an itinerant preacher of the same doctrines. He died in Hartford, Connecticut, in April 1797, aged 45 years. His publications were a volume of Hymns, 1776; a plain political catechism for schools; a sermon on restoration, 1781; universal restoration, in four dialogues, 1786; and lectures on the prophecies, 2 vols. 8vo. 1800.

WINCKELMANN, Abbé John, a native of Stendall, in Brandenburg, born 1718. Though but the son of a shoe-maker, and for some time engaged in the same employment, he burst from his obscurity, and became, for seven years, professor of belles lettres at Sechausen. He afterwards went to Saxony, where he continued for seven more years librarian to count Bunau, at Nothenitz, and in 1754, went to Dresden, where he formed an acquaintance with the ablest artists. About this time he renounced the protestant faith for the Roman catholic tenets, and the next year went to Italy to visit the valuable contents of the Vatican, and the precious relics of Herculaneum. His celebrity here recommended him to the notice of the great and powerful, and as a most judicious antiquarian, and an enlightened connoisseur of the works of arts, he was universally courted at Rome. He became president of the antiquaries in the Vatican, member of the Royal and antiquarian societies of London, and of other learned societies in Europe. He was honorably invited to Dresden and to Berlin; but the liberality of the Pope detained him at Rome, where, in the midst of the monuments collected from the treasures of ancient and modern times, he indulged his fondness for the productions of genius and of art. In 1768 he made a journey to Vienna, and was received with great kindness by the emperor; but on his return to Italy, while he stopped at Trieste, he was basely assassinated by Arcangeli, a man to whom he had imprudently shown at the inn the medals and the various presents with which he had been honored. This unfortunate catastrophe happened 8th June, 1768, and the murderer, who hoped to escape with the plunder, was seized, and executed on the wheel, opposite the inn where the crime had been perpetrated. The works of Winckelmann were, the History of Art among the Ancients, in German, translated into French, Italian, and English, 3 vols. 4to.—Reflections on the Imitation of the works of the Greeks—Allegory for Artists—Explanations of difficult Parts of Mythology—Remarks on the Architecture of the Ancients and Familiar Letters. He was the friend and the correspondent of the most learned men of his times, and he deserved their confidence by the sincerity of his conduct, and the generosity of his heart. His life has been published by Heyne.

WINDER, William H, an officer in the American army, was born in Maryland in 1775, was educated for the bar, and pursued his profession in Baltimore with great success. In 1812, he received a colonel's commission, was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and served with reputation during the war with Great Britain. He commanded the troops at the battle of Bladensburg. On the declaration of peace he resumed the practice of his profession. He died in 1824.

WINDHAM, William, a statesman, was born, in 1750, at Felbrig, in Norfolk, and was educated at Eton, Glasgow, and University College, Oxford. In 1782, he was elected M. P. for Norwich, and for a short time was secretary to the viceroy of Ireland. He continued to act with the whigs till 1793, when he adopted the sentiments of Burke; and, in the following year, he was appointed secretary at war, with a seat in the cabinet. In 1801, he resigned. To the peace of Amiens he was strenuously hostile. During the brief possession of power by the whigs in 1806, he held his former office. He died in 1810. His speeches have been published in three volumes octavo. Windham was a man of extensive reading, and no mean mathematician.

WINDHAM, Joseph, an eminent antiquary, was born at Twickenham in 1739, and educated at Eton, from whence he went to Christ's College, Cambridge. He next travelled to Rome, and while there took drawings of the monuments of antiquity. He also composed the principal part of the letter press of the Ionian Antiquities, published by the Dilettanti society, and assisted Stuart in his Athens. In the Archæologia are his Observations on a passage in Pliny relative to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus. He died at Earsham house, Norfolk, in 1810.

WINGATE, Edmund, author of the Use of the Rule of Proportion, or Gunter's Scale—of Natural and Artificial Arithmetic, 8vo. often reprinted—of Ludus Mathematicus—of the exact Surveyor—of Tables of Logarithms, and other mathematical works, was a native of Bedfordshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and at Gray's Inn, London. He was for some time employed in the royal household, as English teacher to the first Charles's queen; but he forgot the favors of his sovereign during the civil wars, and taking the covenant, he became the friend of Cromwell, and served in his parliament. He died 1656, aged 63.

WINGFIELD, Edmund Maria, first president of the colony of Virginia, under the patent granted to Bartholomew Gosnold, and others, April 10th, 1606. On the return of captain Newport to England, in June, 1607, the colony consisted of one hundred and four persons. The hardships they endured created discontent and jealousy which were heightened by the imprudence and selfishness of Wingfield, who was in consequence deposed, and John Radcliffe elected president. Wingfield afterwards conspired with other malcontents to run away with the vessel belonging to the company, but the design was discovered and defeated by captain Smith, who in 1603, sent him home to England.

WINSEMIUS, Peter, a native of Leeward, who, after travelling over Germany, Sweden, and France, became historiographer to the states of Holland, and professor of history and eloquence at Franeker, where he died 1644, aged 59. He wrote the History of Friesland, in Flemish, fol.—Vita Mauriti Principis Anriæi, &c. His brother Menelaus was professor of medicine at Franeker, and died there 15th May, 1639. He wrote Compendium Anatomie, 4to.

WINSLOW, Edward, governor of Plymouth colony, was born in Worcestershire, England, in 1594. He accompanied the first settlers of New England, in 1620. Possessing great activity and resolution, he was eminently useful in the establishment of this new community. He was in the habit of visiting the neighboring Indians, and thus obtained food for the colonists, when they were suffering from famine. He also went to England several times as agent; and he exerted his influence for the formation of the Society for propagating the Gospel in New England, which was incorporated in 1649, and of which he was an active member. In 1633, he was elected governor, and again in 1636 and 1644. In 1655, he was appointed one of the commissioners to superintend the expedition against the Spaniards in the West Indies. In the passage between Hispaniola and Jamaica, he died of a fever, May 8th, 1655, aged 60 years. He was the first emigrant married in New England; and his wife was the mother of the first English child, born there. He was truly a good man.

WINSLOW, Josiah, son of the preceding, was also governor of Plymouth colony. He was elected to the office in 1673, and he remained in it till 1680. He was greatly respected for his good sense and his moral worth. In Philip's war, being commander of the Plymouth forces, he evinced himself to be a brave soldier. His death took place December 18th, 1680, being in the 52d year of his age. It is a fact worthy of remembrance, that he was the first governor born in New England.

WINSLOW, John, major-general, and a grandson of the preceding, served as a captain in the expedition against Cuba, in 1740, and afterwards rose to the rank of major-general in the British service. He commanded several expeditions to Kennebeck, Nova Scotia, and Crown Point, in the French war, and distinguished himself by ability and courage. In 1762, he was appointed chief judge of the court of common pleas for Plymouth county. He died at Hingham in April, 1774, in his seventy-second year.

WINSLOW, James Benignus, an eminent Danish anatomist, born at Odinsey, Denmark, 2d April, 1669. He was the grand-nephew of the celebrated Steno. He went to Paris, where he studied under du Verney, and was converted to the catholic faith by Bossuet. He became physician of the faculty of Paris, demonstrator in the royal gardens, and member of the Paris academy of sciences. He wrote a tract on the Uncertainty of the Signs of Death, 2 vols. 12mo.—Anatomy with Improvements, 4to.—on the Diseases of the Bones, and other anatomical works. He died 3d of April, 1760, aged 91.

WINSTANLEY, William, author of the Lives of the Poets—of Select Lives of England's Worthies—of Historical Rarities—of the Loyal Martyrology—and some single lives, all in 8vo. was originally a barber. His style is incorrect and vulgar, yet his compositions are valuable for noticing some facts which other writers have passed over in silence. He lived in the reigns of Charles II. and James II.

WINSTANLEY, Thomas D.D., principal of St. Alban's-hall, Oxford, Camden professor of ancient history, and Landian professor of Arabic, a distinguished scholar, versed in most modern as well as ancient languages. In 1730, he edited the Poetics of Aristotle, accompanied with a Latin version, afterwards a lecture-book, in the university. He also collected and edited the works of Daniel Webb, in one volume, quarto, now become, from the destructive fire of February 8th, 1808, very scarce. He died September 2d, 1823, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

WINSTON, Thomas, an English physician, who studied at Clare-hall, Cambridge, and afterwards travelled over the continent. He passed some time in the academies of Basil, and also of Padua, where he took his medical degrees. On his return to England he took his degree of M.D., at Cambridge, and settled in London 1607, and became fellow of the college of physicians, and professor of physic at Gresham college. During the civil wars he retired to France, and after an absence of ten years went back, and died in London 24th October 1655, aged 80. After his death his anatomical lectures appeared 8vo. 1659, and 1664.

WINTER, John William de, vice admiral, was born in 1750, in Texel. At the age of twelve years, he entered the navy. In 1787, when the revolution broke out in Holland, De Winter was a lieutenant, and embraced with ardor the cause of the patriots; which circumstance obliged him to take refuge in France, when the party of the stadtholder prevailed. In France, he entered the army, and served, in 1792, and 1793, under Dumouriez and Pichegru, and soon rose to the rank of general of brigade. In 1795, when Pichegru invaded Holland, De Winter returned to his country, where the states-general offered him the rank of rear-admiral. The year following, he was made vice-admiral and commander of the naval forces at Texel. Having been blockaded here for a long time, he at last succeeded in evading the vigilance of the enemy, and, October 7th, 1797, set sail with twenty-nine vessels, of which sixteen were ships of the line. The English fleet consisted of twenty ships of the line, and about fifteen frigates, and other vessels, under admiral Duncan. The action began October 11th, and was maintained about three hours with equal spirit on both sides. De Winter's ship was at last taken, and he was carried on board the vessel of the British admiral. The Dutch lost nine ships of the line, taken or sunk, and about six hundred men killed, and eight hundred wounded. The loss of the English was also severe: some British vessels were sunk. De Winter received in England the honor due to his courage, and talents. He was exchanged some months after; and a court-martial declared that he had gloriously sustained the honor of the Batavian republic. In 1798, he was sent, as minister of his republic, to that of France, where he remained in this capacity until 1802, when he received the command of an expedition intended to act against Algiers. He cruised for some months on the Barbary coast, and at last concluded a treaty with Tripoli. Louis Bonaparte, when king of Holland, made De Winter commander-in-chief of all the forces by sea and land. When Holland was united with France, Napoleon made him grand-officer of the legion of honor, and general-superintendent of the coasts of the North Sea. In July, 1811, he gave him the command of the forces assembled at the Texel; but the fatigues of his new station ruined his health. He went to Paris, where he died June 2, 1812. His remains were deposited in the Pantheon.

WINTER, Peter von, a distinguished composer of vocal music, was born at Manheim, in 1754, and was the son of a soldier. At the age of ten years, he was appointed a member of the orchestra of the elector. In 1775, he was director of the orchestra at Manheim, and subsequently at Munich. In 1780, he went to Vienna. In 1782, his first opera, Helen and Paris, was performed at Munich. In 1790, he went to Italy, where he was received with great favor. The first opera which he wrote in Italy was Cato in Utica, first performed in Venice in 1791. In 1795 and 1796, he went to Prague and Vienna. At the latter place, he wrote his most celebrated opera, the Sacrifice Interrupted. In 1802, he visited France and England. In Paris, he composed Tamerlane; in London, Calypso, Castor and Pollux, Proserpine, and Zaire. He also composed many pieces of church music, among which the requiem for the funeral of Joseph II. is distinguished; also a Miserere. Among his profane cantatas, his Timotheus, or the Power of Tones, is particularly famous. He died in 1825, at Munich. His operas, oratorios, and other pieces of vocal and instrumental music, are too numerous to be given here.

WINTHROP, John, the first governor of Massachusetts, was born in England, January 12th, 1588. He was bred to the profession of the law, and embarked for America, in the 43d year of his age, as the leader of those persons who settled the colony of Massachusetts, and with a commission as governor. He arrived at Salem, in 1620, and soon removed to Charlestown, and afterwards crossed the river to Boston, then called Shawmut. In the three following years he was re-chosen governor; and, also, till his death in 1649, with the exception of six or seven years. He rendered the colony the most important services, by his judicious administration of its affairs, and by his good example in all the relations of social life. When he first came to this country his wealth was great, and he freely used it for the benefit of the public. It is said, that he denied himself many of the elegancies of life, that he might give an example of frugality and temperance, and might exercise liberality without impoverishing his family. He kept a minute account of the events of the colony down to 1644, which has been published, and is of great use to the historian.

WINTHROP, John, a son of the preceding, who became governor of Connecticut, was born in England, in 1605. He received his education at the university of Cambridge, and was one of the first scholars of his time. He came to Boston, in the year 1635, with authority to take the settlement in Connecticut; and, shortly after his arrival, he despatched a number of persons to build a fort at Saybrook. He was chosen governor in 1657, and again in 1659, and from that period he was annually re-elected till his death. In 1662, he went to England, and procured a charter, incorporating Connecticut and New Haven into one colony. He died while on a visit to Boston, April 5th, 1676, in the 71st year of his age. The liberal opportunities which he enjoyed for improving his mind, were used to the best advantage. After leaving the university he travelled upon the continent of Europe, and became acquainted with some of the first men of the age. In natural philosophy he was well skilled; and he was one of the founders of the Royal Society of London. Nor was he less eminent as a good man. His valuable moral qualities, his urbane manners, and patriotic virtues combined in gaining him universal respect. He published some valuable communications in the philosophical transactions.

WINTHROP, Fitz John, F.R.S., governor of Connecticut, was born at Ipswich, in 1638. He became a magistrate of Connecticut, in 1689, and the following year was appointed major-general of the land army, designed to act against Canada; and conducted with great prudence in the expedition. He was sent as agent of the colony to Great Britain in 1694, and discharged the duties of the appointment so much to the satisfaction of the colony, that the legislature made him a bequest of £500. He was distinguished, like his father, for his knowledge of philosophy, his skill in politics, and his piety; and was honored by the learned in England, by being elected a member of the Royal Society. He was chosen to the office of chief magistrate, in 1698, and held it till his death, which took place at Boston, November 27th, 1707.

1700. For some time he was a magistrate, in Connecticut, but afterwards went to England, in order to obtain a reversal of some decisions in the courts of the colony respecting the property of his ancestors. He made such representations on the subject, as to accomplish his object. The laws of the colony relating to it were repealed. The remainder of his life he spent in England. His death took place in 1747. The subject of this article was distinguished for his natural talents, and for his literary and scientific attainments. In natural philosophy and chemistry, and the kindred sciences, he was particularly eminent. He was made a member of the Royal Society of London, and contributed much to the promotion of its interests.

WINTHROP, John, LL.D., a descendant of governor Winthrop, was a native of Massachusetts, and was educated at Harvard college, where he graduated in 1732. In 1733, he was appointed Hollis professor of mathematics and natural philosophy, in the same institution. He immediately entered upon the duties of this office, and discharged them with fidelity and high reputation through life. He was distinguished for his scientific attainments in those branches connected with his office. Nor was his knowledge confined to these branches; he was a general scholar; he was familiar with the classics, with general literature, with biblical criticism, with controversial theology, and with politics. In 1761, he went to Newfoundland to observe the transit of Venus over the sun's disc. His observations upon it were published. He also published observations upon another transit of the same planet in 1769; and upon the transit of Mercury, in 1740. These labors were instrumental in securing him the degree of doctor of laws, from the university of Edinburgh. He retained his professorship, till his death, in 1779, a period of more than forty years—being then in the 65th year of his age.

WINTHROP, James, LL.D., was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, April 8th, 1752, and graduated at Harvard, in 1769, with a high reputation for talents, and acquirements. He was in 1771, appointed librarian of that institution, and retained the office twenty years. He devoted a great part of his life to literary pursuits, and became distinguished for the extent of his knowledge, particularly of ancient and modern languages, the exact sciences, and biblical and polite learning. He was a member of the principal literary societies of Massachusetts, and contributed to their publications, and other periodical works, many valuable papers. He held for many years several respectable civil offices, and was distinguished in public and private life, by uprightness, liberality, and public spirit. At his death, which took place September 26th, 1821, he left his library a bequest to the college at Meadville, Pennsylvania.

WINTLE, Thomas, a learned divine, was born at Gloucester, in 1737. He was educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of bachelor in divinity. Archbishop Secker made him his chaplain, and gave him the rectory of Wiltrisham, in Kent, with which he held the living of St. Peter, Wallingford, but relinquished both on being presented to the rectory of Brightwell in Berkshire, where he died in 1814. His works are, 1. An improved version of Daniel, with notes. 2. A Dissertation on the vision in Zachariah. 3. Sermons at the Bampton Lecture. 4. Christian Ethics, or Discourses on the Beatitudes. 5. A Letter to bishop Hurd, occasioned by his strictures on archbishop Secker, and bishop Lowth.

WINTOWN, or WYNTOWN, Andrew, canon of St. Andrew's, and prior of St. Serfins, in Loch Leven, was author of a Chronicle of Scotland, undertaken at the request of one of the ancestors of the earl of Wemyss. The work has lately been edited; it is written in rhyme, but though curious, contains much tradition and fable mixed with truth. He died about 1400.

WINWOOD, sir Ralph, a native of Aynho, Northamptonshire, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed in 1582, as probationer fellow to Magdalen. He was proctor of the university, 1592, and afterwards travelled over Europe, and in 1599, went as secretary in sir H. Neville's embassy to France. He was in 1602, sent envoy to Holland, and in 1607, received the honor of knighthood. He again represented his sovereign in Holland twice, and in 1614, was appointed secretary of state. He was well versed in political affairs, and especially in matters of trade and war. He died 1617, aged 52. His memorials of Affairs of State under Elizabeth, and James I. were published in 3 vols. folio 1715, by Edmund Sawyer.

WIRT, William, LL.D. a distinguished American citizen, who died February 18, 1834. He was born at Bladensburg, Md. on the 8th of November, 1772, and was the youngest of six children. His father was a Swiss, and his mother a German; the former died when he was an infant, and the latter when he was only eight years of age. Being thus an orphan at an early age, under the care of his uncle, Jasper Wirt, with a small patrimony, he was, in his 11th year placed at a flourishing school kept by the Rev. James Hunt, in Montgomery county, with whom he continued four years, and during this time he received the principal part of his education, being carried through all the Latin and Greek classics then usually taught in grammar schools, and also some branches of English education; and he formed a taste for general literature. Mr. Hunt's school was broken up when Wirt was but fifteen, and not having means to obtain a college education, he passed about twenty months as a private tutor in the family of Benjamin Edwards, the father of Ninian Edwards, late governor of Illinois. He afterwards began the study of law with Mr. William P. Hunt, son of his old preceptor, completed his course with Mr. Thomas Swann, formerly United States attorney for the district of Columbia, and in 1792 commenced practice at Culpepper Court House in Virginia, at the age of 29 years. In 1795, he married the eldest daughter of Dr. George Gilmore, a distinguished physician, and took up his residence at Pen Park, the seat of his father-in-law, near Charlottesville, and here he was introduced to the acquaintance of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and other persons of celebrity; but he soon contracted habits of great dissipation, from which he is said to have been recovered by a sermon which he heard from a blind preacher, James Waddell, whom he has celebrated in his "British Spy." In 1799 his wife died, and he was soon after elected clerk of the House of Delegates. Having performed the duties of this office two years, he was, in 1802, appointed chancellor of the Eastern District of Virginia, and then took up his residence at Williamsburg; and in the same year he married the daughter of Colonel Gamble of Richmond. He soon after resigned his chancellorship, and at the close of the year 1803, removed to Norfolk, and entered upon the assiduous practice of his profession. Just before he removed to Norfolk, he wrote the letters published in the Richmond Argus, under the title of "The British Spy," which were afterwards collected into a small volume, and have passed through ten editions. In 1806, he took up his residence at Richmond, and in the following year, he greatly distinguished himself in the trial of Aaron Burr. In 1812 he wrote the greater part of a series of essays, which were originally published in the Richmond Enquirer under the title of "The Old Bachelor," and have since in a collected form, passed through several editions. The "Life of Patrick Henry," his largest literary production, was first published in 1817. In 1816, he was appointed by Mr. Madison the United States Attorney for the District of Virginia; and in 1817, by Mr. Monroe, Attorney General of the United States, a post which he occupied with distinguished reputation till 1830, through the entire administration of Monroe and Adams. In 1824, Harvard University conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1830, he took up his residence at Baltimore, for the remainder of his life. As a public and professional man, Mr. Wirt was ranked among the first of his time; and in all the relations of private life, as a man and a Christian, he was most exemplary, and was regarded with singular affection and veneration.

WISCHART, William, D.D. a native of Dalkeith. He was educated at Utrecht, and on his return to Scotland was arrested as if concerned in the rye-house plot. At the revolution he returned from Holland where he had taken refuge, and became one of the ministers of Leith, and in 1716 was appointed principal of Edinburgh university, and one of the city ministers. His Theologia, consisting of one hundred and twenty sermons, is a valuable system of Calvinistical divinity. He died at Edinburgh, 1727, aged 70.

WISCHEART, George, D. D. a native of Yester in East Lothian, educated at Edinburgh university, where he took his degrees. On the breaking out of the civil wars, he followed the fortunes of the Montrose, to whom he was chaplain, and on his defeat by Lesley in 1645, he was among the prisoners. He with difficulty escaped the death which his unhappy fellow prisoners suffered, and after some years of confinement he withdrew to the continent, and at the restoration returned, and became bishop of Edinburgh. In this high situation he showed great benevolence of heart and forgiveness of injuries, and with all his power assisted some of his most virulent persecutors, and procured their pardon from government. This enlightened prelate wrote an account of the wars in Scotland, and the history of his early patron, the Marquis of Montrose, 8vo. and died at Edinburgh, 1669, aged 60.

WISE, Francis, an English divine, born 3d Oct. 1695, and educated at New college school. He was admitted to Trinity college, Oxford, 1711, and became fellow of the society, and assistant to Dr. Hudson in the Bodleian library. He obtained Ellesfield vicarage, Oxfordshire, from his pupil Lord Guildford, and the rectory of Rotherfield Grays from his college. He was also keeper of the archives of the university, and Radcliffe librarian, and died at Ellesfield, 6th Oct. 1767, aged 62, universally beloved. He published Annales Alfredi Magni, 8vo.—Letter to Dr. Mead on some Antiquities in Berkshire—on the White Horse, Berks.—the Red Horse, Warwickshire—Catalogus Nummorum Antiq. in Bodleian—Inquiries on the first Inhabitants, Languages, &c. of Europe, 4to.—on the Chronology of Fabulous Ages, 4to.

WISE, John, a graduate of Harvard college in 1673, who afterwards became the minister of that part of Ipswich, Mass. called Chebacco. He was a learned scholar and an eloquent preacher. Nor was he less distinguished for moral courage, and his unyielding attachment to civil and religious liberty. In 1688 he was imprisoned by Andros for remonstrating against the taxes as a grievance, because imposed without an assembly. After the revolution he brought an action against Mr. Dudley, the chief justice, for denying him the benefit of the habeas corpus act. And he entered fully into the discussion of every subject connected with the well being of the religious establishments of the time. In 1710, he published the Churches' quarrel espoused; and about the year 1711 or 1718 a vindication of the government of the New England churches. His death took place, April 8th, 1725, at the age of 73 years.

WISHART, George, one of the first martyrs to the Protestant religion in Scotland, born in the beginning of the sixteenth century, appears to have been early distinguished by his attachment to the principles of the reformation, originating, it is said, in his travels in Germany, where he became acquainted with the opinions of Luther. Some accounts assert that he was banished from his own country for teaching the Greek Testament, and that he subsequently resided for some years in the university of Cambridge. In 1544, he returned to Scotland, where he was received with the most ardent good will, and began to preach against the corruptions of the church of Rome, and the vices of the clergy. This conduct exasperated cardinal Beaton, and the priesthood under his influence, and subjected the life of Wishart to more than one attack, until, at last, he was arrested, and, in 1546, put on his trial for obstinate heresy, before a convocation of prelates and clergy, assembled for the purpose in the cathedral. He was found guilty, and condemned to the flames; which sentence was put into execution the following day, in the castle yard, with great pomp and ceremony. Most accounts assert that the cardinal and clergy attended; and so much indignation was apprehended on the part of the people, that the artillery of the castle was pointed towards the place of execution.

WISNER, Benjamin B. D.D. an American congregational clergyman, who was held in high estimation by his brethren, and by the public generally. He was born in Dutchess county, New York, Sept. 29, 1794; and graduated at Union college in that state, in 1813. He then spent two years as tutor in the same institution. He also spent some time in the study of law. Upon the death of his father, who was a man of extensive business, it fell to him to settle his father's estate. He here acquired those business habits, which so eminently qualified him for the station which he filled in the latter portion of his life. Having done this he entered upon his theological studies at Princeton; at the close of which, he was invited to become the Pastor of the Old South Church in Boston; over which he was ordained in February 1821. Here he remained in the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, till the autumn of 1832, when he was elected one of the Secretaries of the American Board of Foreign Missions. He died of a scarlet fever of short continuance, February 9th, 1835, at the age of 40 years.

WISSOWATIUS, Andrew, a native of Philliporia in Lithuania, grandson of Faustus Socinus. After spreading the tenets of his grandfather in Holland, France, and England, he returned to Poland, where he acquired popularity at the head of the Socinians, till by religious persecution, he was obliged to fly for safety to Amsterdam. He assisted in the Bibliothèque de Freres Polonois, 9 vols. folio, and published besides, Religio Rationalis, and other works. He died in Holland, 1668.

WISTAR, Caspar, M.D., a skilful physician and a learned professor in the University of Pennsylvania, was born in 1760. His father was a German of the society of friends, and settled in New Jersey. In 1783 he went to England in order to complete his medical education. His father's death put him into the possession of a large fortune; but he was not induced to relax his exertions for usefulness and eminence. He returned to Philadelphia in 1787, and was immediately appointed professor of chemistry and physiology in the college of that city. He also commenced the practice of medicine, and was chosen one of the attending physicians to the dispensary and hospital. In 1808 he succeeded to the professorship of anatomy. Such were his talents and his popular manners, that the medical school of Philadelphia was much indebted to his influence for the high reputation it has acquired. Dr. Wistar was evidently one of the first physicians of his time in the country; and he was well known, by his correspondence with learned men there, in Europe, as a gentleman of extensive erudition. He was a member of several of the most distinguished literary and scientific societies. His chief work is a System of Anatomy in two volumes. He died in 1818, in the 57th year of his age.

WITHERS, George, an English poet, born 11th June, 1588. His satirical verses on the court and government exposed him to persecution, and for his "Abuses Whipt and Stript," he was sent to prison. He took up arms in favor of the parliament, and when taken by the King's troops, was with difficulty saved from hanging by Sir John Denham. He was afterwards one of Cromwell's major-generals appointed to overawe and oppress the country. At the restoration he was stripped of his fortune and power, and was for some time imprisoned in Newgate, and in the Tower. He died 1667. His poetical pieces are very numerous, and some of them possess merit.

WITHERSPOON, John, D.D. LL.D., the President of Nassau Hall college in New Jersey, was born in 1722. He was a native of Scotland, and entered the university of Edinburgh, when fourteen years of age, where he remained seven years. Soon after completing his classical education he commenced preaching and was ordained. Seldom has a young man acquired the celebrity that fell to his lot. So extensively was he known, that he was invited to Dundee, to Dublin, and to Rotterdam. Having also been invited to the presidency of the college in New Jersey, he arrived there with his family in 1768. Although this institution had been under some of the first men of the country, still his name brought a great accession of students, and by his exertions its funds were much increased. The war of the revolution dispersed the students, and left him at leisure to engage in civil employments, to which he was almost immediately called. He was elected a member of the convention which formed the constitution of New Jersey, and, in 1776, was appointed a member of congress, and retained a seat in that body till the conclusion of the peace. His name is affixed to the Declaration of Independence, and the Articles of Confederation. After the war the college was re-opened, and he returned to his duties there. Here were scenes much more congenial to his feelings than the bustle of political life. For more than two years, however, previous to his death, he was afflicted with the loss of his sight; but during his blindness he was frequently led into the pulpit, and he always acquitted himself with his usual accuracy. He died Nov. 15, 1794, aged 72 years. His reputation and learning and sound judgment were deservedly high. His influence upon the interests of literature was greatly beneficial, and his talents as a preacher were of the most popular kind. He published much—upon a variety of subjects, moral, political, literary, and religious. His works have been collected into four volumes, with an account of his life.

WITSIUS, Herman, a learned divine, born at Enckhuysen in North Holland, 1626. He so distinguished himself, that he was appointed professor of divinity at Franeker, afterwards at Utrecht, and then at Leyden, where he died 1708. He published several important works, which display great learning, judgment, and piety. The best-known of these are Ægyptiaca & Decaphylon, 4to.—The Economy and the Covenants between God and Man, a valuable work, translated into English, 3 vols. 8vo.—Historia Hierosolymitana—Miscellanea Sacrorum—Maletem. Leydens.

WITTICHIUS, Christopher, a native of Brieg in Silesia, professor of mathematics at Herborn, afterwards at Duisburg, and then theological professor at Nimueguen, and lastly at Leyden, where he died 1687, aged 62.—He wrote Theologia Pacifica, 4to.—Anti-Spinosa—de Deo & Attributis, 4to.—Consensus Veritatis.

WODHULL, Michael, an ingenious writer, was born at Theuford in Northamptonshire, in 1740. He was educated at Winchester school, and next at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, which he left without a degree, to settle upon his paternal estate where he died in 1816. Mr. Wodhull wrote several poems, but is best known by his translation of Euripides, first printed in 4 vols. in 1782.

WOIDE, Charles Godfrey, LL.D., an eminent oriental scholar, born either in Poland or the United Provinces. Having taken up his abode in this country, about 1765, he obtained the appointment of preacher to the German chapel in the Savoy, and also to that adjoining Marlborough-house. In 1782 he was elected by the trustees of the British Museum one of the assistant librarians, a situation for which his deep erudition, especially in Egyptian antiquities, eminently qualified him. Four years after he was presented with the honorary degree of LL.D., by the university of Oxford, for superintending the publication of La Croze's Egyptian Lexicon, and Scholtz's Grammar of the language, which issued from the Clarendon press in 1778. He also published a fac-simile of the Alexandrian manuscript of the New Testament, now in the British Museum. His death took place in the spring of 1790.

WOLCOTT, Roger, governor of Connecticut, and born at Windsor in that state, Jan. 4, 1679. As an evidence of the force of talents, integrity, and enterprise, when exercised in a free country, it has been mentioned of him, that although he was not a member of a common school for a single day in his life, he still rose to the highest honors in the gift of the people. When at the age of 12 years he was placed as an apprentice to a mechanic. On arriving at 21 he engaged in business for himself in his native town, where by industry and frugality he acquired an ample fortune for those times. In the course of his life he held various stations of honor; being successively a member of the assembly and of the council, judge of the county court, deputy governor, chief judge of the superior court, and from 1751 to 1754 governor. From the latter period till his death in 1767, he passed his life in retirement and an attention to the duties of religion. He lived to the age of 86. Notwithstanding his want of education in the early part of his life, still his literary attainments became such, as to enable him to publish several works that were creditable to him.

WOLCOT, John, a satirist, was born at Dodbury, in Devonshire, in 1738. He was educated first at Kingsbridge, in his native county, and next at Bodmin in Cornwall, after which he was brought up under his uncle, an apothecary at Fowly, who left him the principal part of his estate. In 1767, he obtained a Doctor's degree in Scotland, and the same year went with Sir William Trelawney to Jamaica, but on the death of his patron he returned to England and settled as a physician in Cornwall, where he became the instructor of Opie the painter, with whom he visited London in 1780. He now quitted physic, and began, under the name of Peter Pindar, some severe attacks on the royal academicians, in a series of odes, criticising their annual exhibitions. After this he took higher aim, and published a satirical poem, called "The Lousiad;" in which he ridiculed the King, with more wit than truth or manners. After this he brought out a number of ludicrous pieces which went through numerous editions, both separately and in a collected state. The author became blind some years before his death, which happened in Somerstown, Jan. 14, 1819.

WOLCOTT, Oliver, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in 1726, at Windsor, in Connecticut, of which colony his father had been Governor. He graduated at Yale college in 1747, and soon afterwards, having received the commission of a captain, proceeded at the head of a company raised by his own exertions to join the army on the northern frontier, with which he continued until the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. He then returned to Connecticut, and commenced the study of medicine, but abandoned it on being appointed sheriff of the county of Litchfield. From 1774 to 1786, he was annually chosen an assistant in the council of the state. In that interval, he was also for some time Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the county, and Judge of the Court of Probate for the district of Litchfield. In 1776, his patriotism and ability procured for him a seat in the national congress, and the opportunity of connecting his name with the Declaration of American Independence. Immediately after the adoption of the declaration, he returned to Connecticut, and was invested with the command of fourteen regiments of the state militia, raised for the defence of New York. In November, he resumed his seat in congress. The following summer, after performing several military movements, he joined the northern army under Gates, with a corps of several hundred volunteers, and assisted in the defeat of Burgoyne. From this period until 1786, he was occupied in serving his country, either in congress or the field, or as a commissioner of Indian affairs for the northern department, settling terms of peace with the Six Nations. In the latter year, he was elected Lieutenant-Governor of the state, and, after ten successive annual re-elections, was chosen Governor. He died Dec. 1, 1797, in the seventy-second year of his age.—Governor Wolcott was remarkable for intrepidity, integrity, strong, bold conceptions, and a peculiar decision of character. His sensibility was acute, and no one could have a nicer sense of honor. He was distinguished, moreover, for his love of order and religion.

WOLCOTT, Erastus, a son of Roger Wolcott, was born about the year 1723. Although not favored with a public education his literary acquirements were respectable, and he became one of the distinguished men of Connecticut. He was repeatedly a member of congress, and he served for some time as judge of the superior court. He also held, at different periods, high military offices. In 1776 he commanded a regiment of militia, and assisted in the investment of Boston; and in 1777 he was appointed a brigadier-general. He died in 1798, in the 71st year of his age.

WOLCOTT, Oliver, son of the preceding, was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and two years was governor of that state. He was educated for the bar; was appointed by Washington comptroller of the Treasury; and on the retirement of Alexander Hamilton, he was raised to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, which office he continued to fill with integrity and ability, during the remainder of Washington's administration, and the whole term of that of John Adams. In 1800, he commenced business in the city of New York as a merchant. After the close of the war with England he removed to his native town, and was annually elected, ten years in succession, Governor of Connecticut. He afterwards returned to the city of New York, where he died June 1st, 1833, aged 74 years.

WOLFE, James, a celebrated English general, born at Westerham, Kent, January 1726, son of lieutenant-general Edward Wolfe. He early embraced the military profession, and distinguished himself at the battle of la Feldt, and was present afterwards at every engagement during the war, and everywhere gathered fresh laurels by his valor, coolness, and judgment. At the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, instead of resigning himself to indolence and pleasure, he devoted himself more assiduously to military labors, and when lieutenant-colonel of Kingsley's regiment, he introduced such order and discipline in the corps, that the gallant conduct of the soldiers in the plains of Minden, is proverbial to this day. These great talents did not long remain in obscurity; when Mr. Pitt was placed at the head of affairs, the genius of Wolfe was called forth to execute his gigantic plans. Though the meditated attack on Rochfort was abandoned, the fall of Louisburgh displayed to the admiration of the nation the abilities of their favorite general, who was immediately after selected, 1759, for the command of the expedition against Quebec. In this bold enterprise, the many difficulties from situation and from superior numbers, were quickly surmounted by perseverance and by military stratagem, and the English troops, permitted to face their enemy, triumphed over all opposition; but in the moment of victory, the conqueror received a ball through his wrist; yet, disregarding the wound, he animated his men to battle. A second ball, a few minutes after, shot him through the body, and rendered it necessary to carry him off to the rear of the troops. In the last agonies his attention was roused by the cry of "they run!" and eagerly inquiring who ran, he no sooner heard the reply, "the defeated French," than he exclaimed, "then I thank God, and I die contented," and instantly expired, 13th September, 1759. His remains were carried to England, and buried with becoming pomp in Westminster abbey, where a splendid monument was erected by the nation to his honor. His death forms the subject of a beautiful painting by West, which has been engraved in a masterly manner by Woollet. To the great abilities of the general, to steadiness, strength, and activity of mind, Wolfe united the milder virtues of life, sincerity and candor, a quick sense of honor, of justice, and public liberty. While he bore the meed of superiority in constitutional courage, in penetration, in cool judgment, and in unshaken presence of mind, he was equally admired and respected for beneficence and charity, and the estimation of the great was accompanied by the love of the soldiery and the gratitude of the poor.

WOLFF, Christian, a celebrated writer, born at Breslau, 24th January, 1679. From his native town he went in 1699 to Jena university, where he made a most extraordinary progress, and in 1702 he repaired to Leipsic, where the following year he opened his lectures by a famous dissertation, called Philosophia Practica Universalis Methodo Mathematica Conscripta. His publications and the number of his pupils increased his reputation, and he was liberally invited by the universities of Giessen and of Halle, to accept the professorial chair of mathematics. He accordingly went to Halle, 1707, and to his academical honors was soon after added the title of counsellor to the king of Prussia. These flattering prospects were, however, soon obscured; in his Latin oration on the morality of the Chinese, in 1721, he spoke with such applause of their philosophy and of their virtues, that the university was offended, and not only his tenets were reprobated, but he was by the representation of the body of divines, ordered on pain of the severest punishment, to leave the country in twenty-four hours. From this ungrateful society he retired to Cassel, and became professor of mathematics and philosophy at Marburg, and counsellor to the landgrave. The favorable opinion of the learned and the great continued to atone for the persecution of the Halle university, he was declared honorary professor of the Petersburg academy of sciences, and admitted member of that of Paris, and honored with the title of counsellor of regency by the king of Sweden. The prejudices of his enemies at last passed away, and in 1741 with some reluctance he obeyed the commands of the king of Prussia, and assumed the office of privy counsellor, of vice-chancellor, and of professor of the law of nature and of nations in the university of Halle. He afterwards was raised on the death of Ludwig to the dignity of chancellor of the university, and created a baron of the Roman empire. This great man, whose whole life was devoted to advance the interests of science and of virtue, died at Halle, 9th April, 1754, aged 76. His works in Latin and German are more than sixty in number, the best known of which are, a Course of Mathematics, 2 vols. 4to.—Philosophia Rationalis, sive Logica, 4to.—A System of Metaphysics, 4to.—Jus Naturæ, 8 vols. 4to.—Jus Gentium, 4to.—Horæ Subsecivæ Magdeburg—Dictionary on the Mathematics—Specimen Physicæ ad Theologium Natural. Appliatæ, 8vo. Though precise and correct as a mathematician, his style as a writer is rough and unpolished, his diction is barbarous, and his phrases inelegant. His German works are said to be superior in execution to his Latin.

WOLLASTON, William, an able English divine, born 26th March, 1659. He was of Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, but not being able to obtain a fellowship he became in 1682 assistant to the master of Birmingham school, and was four years after appointed under-master, but the death of a rich relation in 1688 left him in possession of an ample estate, and at liberty to quit his laborious employment. From Birmingham he went to reside in London, where he soon after married. In his retirement, which he loved above the tumults of public life, and which he refused to quit for high preferment in the church, he zealously devoted himself to literature, and in his opinions and conduct showed the liberal minded man. The best known of his writings is his Religion of Nature Delineated, a popular work, of which more than ten thousand copies were sold in a few years. In his old age he had the misfortune to break his arm, and this increasing the disorders of a weak constitution hastened his death, which happened 29th October 1724. His religion of Nature exposed him to the censures of some divines, because he makes no mention of revealed religion, and attempts to explain the truth of religion on mathematical principles, and on the obligations of truth, reason, and virtue. Lord Bolingbroke in calling the work a strange theism, as dogmatical and absurd as artificial theology, does not deny the author to be a man of parts and of learning, a philosopher and a geometrician. The work must be, however, considered as a composition of great merit, and one of the best written in the English language. It has appeared in 4to, and in 8vo.

WOLLASTON, William Hyde, a physician and experimental philosopher, the great-grandson of the foregoing, was born in 1766, and was educated at Caius College, Cambridge. Fortunately for the interests of science, his want of patronage as a physician, at Bury St. Edmunds and London, induced him to give up the medical profession in disgust, and devote himself to scientific pursuits. The result was that he became one of the most eminent chemists and experimentalists of modern times. Among his discoveries are the two metals, palladium and rhodium, and the method of rendering platina malleable, by the last of which he is said to have gained thirty thousand pounds. Among his inventions are, a sliding scale of chemical equivalents, a goniometer, and the camera lucida. His papers in the Philosophical Transactions are numerous. He died December 22, 1828.

WOLMAR, Melchior, a native of Rotwell in Switzerland, known as the instructor of Calvin and of Beza in the Greek language. He was patronised by Ulric duke of Wirtemberg, and became professor of law at Tubingen. He died of an apoplexy at Eisenach 1561, aged 64. He wrote Commentaries on the two first books of the Iliad.

WOLLSTONECRAFT, Mary, an extraordinary writer, born at Beverly in Yorkshire in 1768. Her father having ruined his fortune, she opened a school at Islington, in her twenty-fourth year, which was soon after transferred to Newington Green. She had for her partner a young lady to whom she was greatly attached, and whom, in 1785, she accompanied to Lisbon. On her return to England she became governess to lord Kingsborough's daughters. In 1787 she again settled in London, and lived by her pen. She published Original Stories from Real Life, for the use of children, a translation from the French and German. The next had some concern in the Analytical Review. In 1790 she published an Answer to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution; and, in 1791, her Vindication of the Rights of Women. In 1792, she went to Paris, where she formed an unfortunate connexion with an American gentleman, by whom she had a daughter. For him she undertook a voyage to Norway to regulate some commercial concerns. This tour occasioned her Letters from Scandinavia. On her return to England, she found herself deserted by her paramour, and, in a fit of despair, plunged into the Thames, from Putney Bridge. She was saved and restored to life. In 1796 she was married to Mr. Godwin, the author of Political Justice, and other works. She died in child-birth in August 1797. Her posthumous works, consisting of Letters and Fragments have passed through several editions.

WOLSELEY, Robert, son of sir Charles W. of Staffordshire, who espoused the cause of the parliament against the king, and was one of Cromwell's lords, was in favor with king William, and was his envoy to Brussels, 1693. He wrote a curious preface to Rochester's Valentinian—a translation of Virgil's Æneas meeting Dido.

WOLSEY, Thomas, a celebrated favorite at the court of Henry VIII. He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, 1471, not the son of a butcher as generally reported, but descended from a poor but respectable family, and he entered so early at Oxford that he was bachelor of arts at the age of fourteen, and consequently called the boy bachelor. He became fellow of Magdalen college, and when master of arts he exchanged the care of Magdalen school for the tuition of the sons of Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorset. By the favor of his patron he obtained the rectory of Lynnington in Somersetshire, but here he behaved with such irregularity that he was set in the stocks for being drunk of a Sunday, by sir Amias Paulet, a punishment which was severely visited on the upright magistrate, by a long imprisonment of six years, when the offending clergyman was raised to the height of power. After the death of Dorset he recommended himself to the notice of Dean archbishop of Canterbury, and at last became chaplain to the king, to whom he rendered himself so agreeable, that he was intrusted with the negotiation of his intended marriage, with Margaret duchess of Savoy. He used such dispatch in this business that he was rewarded with the deanery of Lincoln, and on the accession of Henry VIII. he maintained his influence at court, and saw new honors soon heaped upon him. He was made rector of Torrington, canon of Windsor, registrar of the garter, and prebendary and dean of York. In the expedition to France 1513, he attended the king to direct the supplies and the provisions for the wants of the army, and on the taking of Tournay he was appointed by the conqueror bishop of that city. In 1514 he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and eight months after removed to York, the next year he was made cardinal of St. Cicily, and a few months after lord chancellor of England. To these high favors were added the confidence of the king, and consequently the disposal of all places of trust, and honor, and power in the kingdom. Thus placed at the head of affairs, he governed the nation at his pleasure, and that he might confirm more strongly his ascendancy over the king, he withdrew his attention from all public affairs, and by the most artful policy he fanned his pleasures and administered most liberally to the gratification of his most licentious desires. Absolute at home, where his expenses exceeded the revenues of the crown, he was courted and flattered by foreign princes, and according to his caprice, or the demands of his avarice, the support of England was promised to favor the ambitious views either of France, or of Germany, or of the pope. His disappointment in his application for the popedom after the death of Leo X. in which he was deceived by the emperor, was soon after followed by the displeasure of his capricious master, who in the matter of his divorce expected from his favorite an obsequious and submissive assistant. The cardinal, equally afraid of the pope and of the king, wished to stand neuter, but Henry, indignant at his conduct, stripped him of his honors 1529, and caused him to be impeached in parliament by a charge of forty-four articles. Though the treasonable charges were repelled in the house of commons by the influence and exertions of his friend Cromwell, he was desired to retire to York, where he was soon after arrested by the earl of Northumberland, on a fresh charge of high treason. Wolsey struck with the greatness of his disgrace, fell sick, and as he proceeded by slow journeys to London he stopped at Leicester, where he is said to have taken poison to put an end to his wretched existence. He expired 29th November, 1530, and a few hours before his death he exclaimed in accents of agony: 'Had I served my God with the same zeal that I have served the king, he would not have forsaken me in my old age.' The history of Wolsey exhibits in the most striking degree the vicissitudes of fortune and the inconstancy of human affairs. His private character was so depraved, that he deserved little of the favors of his master, but with a capricious tyrant the most profligate and vicious are generally the most useful and convenient ministers. It has been truly observed, that few ever fell from so high a station with less crimes objected against them. It must indeed be acknowledged that he was a man of great abilities, well acquainted with the learning of the times, sagacious as a politician, and well versed in the intrigues of courts. Notwithstanding, however, his vices and his ambition, his schemes for the promotion of literature in the nation were noble and well imagined. Besides the honors already enumerated, he possessed the commission of pope's legate, a latere, he was abbot of St Alban's, bishop of Winchester and Durham, and he held in farn the dioceses of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, and had in his retinue eight hundred servants, amongst whom were ten lords, fifteen knights, and forty esquires.

WOMACK, Lawrence, D.D., author of the examination of Tilenus before the Friars, against the puritans, 12mo.—the Calvinistic Cabinet Disclosed, 12mo.—the Result of False Principles, or Error convinced by its own Evidence, and other tracts against the Calvinists, was a divine of Cambridge, who became archdeacon of Suffolk, 1660, and was made bishop of St. David's 1683. He died 1685.

WOOD, Anthony, an able antiquarian, born at Oxford, 17th December, 1632. He was educated at New college school, and at Thame school, and in 1647 entered at Merton college. He took his master's degree in 1655, and earnestly devoted himself to the study of the antiquities of the colleges and churches of Oxford. His labors were so highly esteemed that after they were prepared for the press in English, Dr. Fell dean of Christ church procured them, and employed Peers one of the students of his college to translate the work into Latin. The work thus left to the mercy of an obstinate and perverse translator, and of a capricious editor, appeared in 1674, in two vols. fol. under the title of Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis, but much altered and disfigured by several errors. He published another work in 1691, of which a second edition under the care of bishop Tanner appeared in 1721, under the title of Athenæ Oxoniensis, containing an account of the great men who flourished in the university from 1500 to 1695, to which were added the Fasti, in two vols. fol. Though Wood in these works claimed the merit of being free from prejudice and party, he yet reflected with such asperity on the character of lord Clarendon the chancellor of the university, that he was indicted for defamation in the court of the university, and his expulsion for greater notoriety was inserted in the Gazette 1693. Though an indefatigable collector, and a diligent antiquary, Wood deserves to be censured for his narrowness of mind and his violent prejudices, totally unworthy the dignity of the historian. He died at Oxford, on the 29th November, 1695. Wood vindicated his work in an 8vo. volume, against the attacks of Bishop Burnet.

WOOD, Robert, an English writer. He travelled with his friends Bouveric and Dawkins into the East, and visited the plains of Troas, and the remains of Balbec and Palmyra. He became under secretary of state in 1764, under lord Granville, and in the midst of his political engagements prepared the account of his observations for the press, which he published under the title of Essay on the Original Genius of Homer, a work of great merit. He died 1771.

WOOD, James, governor of Virginia, in 1798 and 1799, had been previously lieutenant-governor. He sustained a high reputation as a general officer in the revolutionary army. Although opposed to the prevailing political opinions of Virginia, during the administration of president Adams, he enjoyed such a share of the confidence of the people as to be placed at the head of the government. Colonel Monroe succeeded him in 1800. He died in June, 1813.

WOODALL, John, an English surgeon, who went, in 1589, with the troops sent by Elizabeth to assist Henry IV. After travelling over Europe he settled in London, and became member of the corporation of surgeons, and practised as a physician. He was also surgeon of St. Bartholomew's hospital, and surgeon general to the East India company. He wrote Surgeon's Mate, 1617, and a supplement to it called Viaticum. He died 1638, aged 69.

WOODBIDGE, Benjamin, D.D., a son of the Rev. John Woodbridge, the first minister of Andover, Massachusetts, was born in 1622. He was educated at Harvard college, and was a member of the first class in that institution, graduating 1642. After completing his classical studies he went to England, where he spent the remainder of his life. He gained a high reputation as a scholar and a preacher, and published some occasional sermons. His death took place in 1684, at the age of 62 years.

WOODDESON, Richard, an eminent civilian, was born, in 1745, at Kingston, in Surrey; was educated at Kingston Grammar School, and at Pembroke and Magdalen colleges, Oxford; was chosen Vinerian professor, on the resignation of Sir Robert Chambers; and died in 1822. He wrote Elements of Jurisprudence; A systematic View of the Laws of England; and a Brief Vindication of the Rights of the British Legislature, in reply to Mr. Reeves.

WOODFALL, William, a printer and parliamentary reporter, was born about 1745, and was the son of a printer who was proprietor of the Daily Advertiser. He was brought up to his father's occupation, but was so fond of the stage that for a short time he was an actor, and, to the close of his life, never missed being present at the coming out of a new piece. He was successively editor of The London Packet, and The Morning Chronicle, and editor and owner of the Diary. Woodfall had an astonishingly retentive memory, and was the first who gave a full and immediate detail of the proceedings of the legislature. He died in 1803.

WOODFORD, Samuel, D.D., an English divine, born in the parish of All-Hallows on the Wall, London, 15th April 1636. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, and after taking his first degree in arts, he entered at the Inner Temple. At the restoration he was ordained by bishop Morley, and obtained the rectory of Hartley-Maudet, Hants, to which was afterwards added a prebend of Chichester, and in 1680, a prebend of Winchester. He was member of the Royal Society, and was, in 1677, created doctor of divinity, by archbishop Sancroft, and he died 1700. He wrote poems of considerable merit—Paraphrase on the Psalms, five books—Paraphrase on the Canticles—The Legend of Love, three cantos—to the Muse, a pindaric ode —Paraphrase of some of the Hymns of the Old and New Testament—and occasional compositions in English rhymes.

WOODHOUSE, James, professor of Chemistry in the university of Pennsylvania, was eminent for his knowledge of that branch of science, and published a number of pieces on chemical subjects of value. He died June 4th, 1809, aged 38.

WOODHOUSE, Robert, an eminent mathematician, was educated at Cambridge; was a fellow of Caius college; took his degree of B.A., and was senior wrangler, and Smith's first prizeman, in 1795; was elected Lucasian professor in 1820, Plumian professor in 1822, and keeper of the observatory in 1824; and died December 28th, 1827. He wrote the principles of Analytical Calculation; A Treatise on Trigonometry; A Treatise on Isoperimetrical Problems; and an Elementary treatise on Plane Astronomy; and several papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

WOODVILLE, Elizabeth, widow of sir John Grey, who lost his life in the battle of Bernard's Heath, captivated the heart of Edward IV. when she appeared before him to solicit the restitution of her husband's property. In consequence of this interview the frail monarch married her, and from this union was born the princess Elizabeth, whose marriage with Henry VII. cemented a reconciliation between the violent partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster. The conduct of Edward, and his partiality for his concubines, were not calculated to ensure domestic happiness to Elizabeth, yet after his death she ventured to take for her third husband, lord Stanley. She died in a monastery, where her son-in-law, Henry VII. had confined her.

WOODVILLE, William, a native of Cumberland, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M.D., in 1775. He went to settle at Denhigh, and in 1782 removed to London, where he became physician to the Middlesex dispensary, and soon after, to the small-pox hospital. He wrote a dissertation De Irritabilitate, medical botany, 4to. an useful work, and some tracts on the small-pox and the cow-pox. He was an able practitioner, and died at the small-pox hospital, Pancras, 26th April 1805, aged 58.

WOODWARD, John, a natural philosopher, born in Derbyshire, 1st May 1665. He was well educated at a private school, and then bound apprentice to a linen-draper in London; but literature and philosophy had more charms for him than the business of the counter. His studies were assisted by the kindness of Dr. Barwick, and on the vacancy of the medical professorship at Gresham college, in 1692, he was honorably elected to the chair. In 1693, he was chosen fellow of the Royal society, and two years after he was honored by Dr. Tenison, the primate, with the degree of M.D. He published in 1695, his Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth, with an account of the Universal Deluge, and of its effects, 8vo. This book, as containing some curious facts and bold conjectures, had many admirers, and more enemies, and it passed in 1702, to a second edition, and in 1723, to a third; but it was not followed by a larger work, as the author had promised. He was in 1702, chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and he published some intelligent papers in the philosophical transactions. In 1718, he published the State of Physic, and of Diseases, with an inquiry into the causes of their increase, and of the small-pox, which produced a bitter controversy with Dr. Mead. He died, 25th April, 1728. He founded a professorship at Cambridge, with a salary of £150, for a lecture, to elucidate the Natural History of the Earth, &c. and the first professor appointed was Dr. Conyers Middleton, 1731, who resigned two years after.

WOODWARD, Bezalcel, professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Dartmouth college, was a native of Lebanon, Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college in 1764. He was an instructor in Dartmouth college, from the time of its establishment in 1769 until his death, and a very useful officer. He married a daughter of the first president Wheelock, and died at Hanover, August 25th, 1804, aged 59.

WOOLSTON, Thomas, an English divine, born 1669, at Northampton, where his father was a tradesman. He published in 1705, the old Apology of the Truth for the Christian religion, against the Jews and Gentiles, revived, 8vo. a singular work, which though abounding in new opinions, did not however excite the censures of the learned against him. He afterwards published a Latin dissertation on the authenticity of the letter said to have been written by Pilate to Tiberius, describing our Saviour, 1720, and the next year two letters on the character, &c. of the Quakers—and in defence of the Apostles, and primitive Fathers. His four Free Gifts to the Clergy appeared in 1723 and 4, and soon after his Moderator between an Infidel, and Imposter, which excited a persecution against him, which however was stopped, by the interference of Mr. Whiston. His six discourses on the Miracles of Christ, and his two defences of them, dedicated to six bishops, appeared in 1727, and the three next years, and by their merriment, and humor, their profaneness, and blasphemy, excited emotions of mirth, of indignation, and of horror. In these books he regards the miracles of our Saviour, as related in the gospel, not as real events, and historical facts, but allegorical fables, and while he attempts to disprove them, he treats of them in the most ludicrous, offensive, and indecent language. Thus at war with the good sense, the opinions, and the religion of his country, he soon felt not only the attacks of literary champions, but the prosecution of the law. He was tried for the offence at Guildhall, before the lord chief justice Raymond, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine of £100. As he was unable to pay the fine, he continued to the end of his life within the rules of the king's bench, and died there 27th January, 1733.

WORMIUS, Olaus, a native of Arhusen, in Jutland, who studied at Lunenburg, Emmeric, and Marburg, and in 1607 came to Strasburg, where he applied himself to physic. He visited Italy, and on account of his great learning was honorably received by the universities of Padua, Sienna, and Montpellier, and after travelling over France, Holland, and England, he took his doctor's degree at Basil, and at last settled at Copenhagen, where he obtained the chair of professor of belles lettres. In 1615, he was advanced to the chair of Greek, and in 1624, to that of medicine, and acquired both reputation and opulence, as the physician of the court. He obtained a canonry of Luden, from Christain IV. for his services, and died 1634, aged 66. He was three times married, and the father of sixteen children. He wrote Fasti Danici, 1626—a History of Norway, 4to.—Literatura Danica Antiquissima, Vulgo Gothica Dicta, & de Priscâ Danorum Poesi, 4to.—Monument, Danic. Libri Sex. fol.—Lexicon Runicum, and appendix ad Monumenta Danica, fol.—Series Regum Danicæ.—Talshoi, or monument. Stroeense in Scania, 4to.

WORMIUS, William, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen, and applied himself to medical pursuits. He became professor of medicine, historiographer to the king, counsellor of state, and died 1724, aged 71. He wrote Musæum Wormianum, fol. containing an account of the curiosities preserved in his father's collection. His eldest son Olaus, was professor of eloquence, history, and physic, at Copenhagen, and author of treatises de Glossopetris—de Viribus Medicamentorum Specificis. He died 1708. Another brother was bishop of Copenhagen, and author of some theological tracts. He died 1737, much respected.

WORSLEY, sir Richard, a native of the Isle of Wight, who succeeded to the title, on the death of his father sir Thomas, 1768, and in 1775, married a daughter of sir John Fleming, bart. from whom he was divorced in 1782. He was comptroller of the royal household, governor of the Isle of Wight, and member for Newport. In the younger part of his life, he travelled through Europe, and made a fine collection of marbles, statues, and other antiques, engraved and published 2 vols. fol. under the title of Musæum Worsleianum. He published also an History of the Isle of Wight, 1781, 4to. with indifferent plates by Godfrey. He died 8th August, 1805, aged 54.

WORTHINGTON, John, D.D., a native of Wales, who was elected to the headship of Jesus college, Cambridge, which he resigned after the restoration. He obtained the cure of St. Benet Fink, in London, and soon after the fire of London, was presented to the living of Ingoldsby, near Grant-ham, Lincolnshire, and to a prebend of Lincoln cathedral. He died at Hackney, where he had resided as lecturer to the church and was buried there, at the latter end of 1671. His funeral sermon was preached by Tillotson. He published a Form of Sound Words, or a Scripture Catechism 8vo.—the great Duty of Self-Resignation, 8vo.—the Doctrine of the Resurrection considered, 8vo.

WORTHINGTON, William, D.D., a native of Merionethshire, educated at Oswestry school, and Jesus college, Oxford, where he took his doctor's degree, 1753. He was liberally patronised by bishop Hare, who gave him a living in Shropshire, and afterwards another in Denbighshire, and a stall in the cathedral of St. Asaph. He afterwards obtained a stall in York cathedral from archbishop Drummond. He died at his living of Llanrhayader, in Denbighshire, much lamented, 6th October, 1778, aged 75. He sent to the press various publications, the best known of which are an essay on the Scheme and Conduct of Man's Redemption, 8vo.—Historical Sense of the Mosaic account of the Fall proved,—the Evidences of Christianity, deduced from facts, preached at Boyle's lectures, 1766–8, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Scripture theory of the Earth, 8vo.—and Sermons.

WOTTON, sir Henry, an eminent writer, born 30th March, 1568, at Bocton hall, Kent, of respectable parents. From Winchester school, he entered at New college, Oxford, and soon after removed to Queen's college, where he became distinguished for wit and learning. After leaving Oxford, he went to France, Germany, and Italy, and there increased his knowledge of literature, and of the fine arts, during a residence of nine years. On his return to England, he recommended himself by his abilities and politeness to Essex, and became his secretary, but on the fall of that unhappy favorite, he had the good fortune to escape to the continent. At Florence he ingratiated himself with the grand duke, and was confidentially commissioned to go to Scotland, to inform James VI. of a conspiracy formed against his life. Under the assumed name of Octavio Baldi, he passed to Norway, and then to Scotland, where he was received with kindness, and treated with distinction by the king. He had no sooner returned to Florence, than he was informed of the death of Elizabeth, and of the accession of James to the English throne, and he therefore hastened back to his native country, and was greeted with regard and confidence by the king. He was knighted and sent ambassador to Venice, and afterwards to the United Provinces, and to several of the German courts, where he represented his sovereign with becoming dignity, and truly British independence. For his services to the state he was rewarded with the provostship of Eton, 1623, and he took deacon's orders, as he regarded his ecclesiastical situation incompatible with the character of a layman. He died 1639, deservedly respected in his private as well as his public character. He wrote the Elements of Architecture—Parallels between Essex and Buckingham—Characters of some of the Kings of England—Essays on Education—poems, printed in the Reliquiæ Wottoniæ, which appeared after his death, 8vo. After he was settled at Eton, he began the life of Martin Luther, with the history of the reformation, but abandoned at the request of Charles I. to devote himself more laboriously to the History of England, which he, however, never completed.

WOTTON, William, D.D., an able divine, born 13th August, 1666, at Wrentham, Suffolk, where his father was rector. He was endowed with astonishing powers of mind, and when four years and three months old, he could read with the greatest ease the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. He was admitted of Catherine hall, Cambridge, before he was ten years old, and there he maintained his reputation by his astonishing skill in the Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabic, and Syriac, as well as in arts and sciences. He took his first degree in 1679, and was soon after noticed by Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, who patronised him, and afterwards gave him the sinecure of Llandrillo in Denbighshire. He had before obtained a fellowship at St. John's college, and in 1693, lord Nottingham gave him the living of Middleton Keynes, in Buckinghamshire. In 1694, he published Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning, a work of merit, and as he had been abused by the satirical pen of Swift, he wrote Observations on the Tale of a Tub, which he called an irreligious book, and a most profane piece of ribaldry. In 1701, he published the History of Rome from the death of Antonius Pius to the death of Severus Alexander, 8vo. under the direction of Dr. Burnet, a work of great merit. Though in possession of a moderate income, he was so regardless of economy, that pecuniary difficulties crowded upon him, and obliged him in 1714, to retire to South Wales, where he wrote several books. He died 13th February 1726. His other works are, Discourse concerning the Confusion of Tongues at Babel—Advice to a Young Student—Memoirs of the Cathedrals of St. David's and Llandaff—some sermons—and five political anonymous pamphlets. In his character he was a most extraordinary man, as he never forgot any thing which he had read, and what is remarkable, as has been observed, his learning was all in ready cash, which he was able to produce at sight, and with which he could enliven and embellish the most uninteresting subjects.

WOTTON, Edward, a native of Oxford, educated at Magdalen school. He became demy of Magdalen college, and then removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was appointed Greek lecturer. He afterwards travelled into Italy, and took the degree of M.D. at Padua, and after his return to England, practised with great success at Oxford, and then at London, where he was made member of the college of physicians, and physician to Henry VIII. He died 5th October 1555. He published de Differentiis Animalium Libri decem, 1552, a work of merit, and he was the first who paid particular attention to natural history.

WOULFE, Peter, an eminent chemist, who died in 1805. His character was marked by great eccentricity. He was a firm believer in alchemy; his apartments were so filled with furnaces and the articles of a laboratory that his fireside was not easily reached; he breakfasted at four in the morning; and his mode of curing any serious indisposition was, to take a place in the mail of Edinburgh, and immediately return from that city. He invented an apparatus for experiments on gasses; and contributed several papers to the Philosophical Transactions.

WRAGG, William, was born in South Carolina, in 1714, and was educated in England, where he studied law and entered upon its practice. Not long afterwards he returned to his native country, in 1753, was made one of the king's council for the province, and in 1769, was offered the seat of chief justice, which he declined. When the revolution commenced he maintained a conscientious opposition to the measures of the colonies, and determined to return to England. He embarked for that country, and was wrecked in a violent storm on the coast of Holland, in September 1777. A monument is erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

WRAXALL, sir Nathaniel William, born in 1751, at Bristol, where his father and grandfather were merchants, was educated in his native city, and, in 1769, was sent to Bombay, in the service of the East India Company. He was there employed, in 1771, as judge advocate and paymaster of the forces of that presidency. Next year he returned to England, and then travelled on the continent, visiting almost every country from Lapland to Lisbon. On his return, he sent to the press a Voyage round the Baltic 1775. In 1777, he published the History of the Kings of France, of the House of Valois, 2 vols. 8vo., and History of the Reign and Age of Henry III. and IV., Kings of France, 3 vols. 4to. In 1780, he was elected member of parliament for the borough of Hindon, in 1784, for Luggers hall, and in 1790, for Wallingford. His Memoirs of the Courts of Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna, were given to the world in 1799. While in parliament, he sometimes opposed Mr. Pitt, and at other times supported him. In 1813, he was raised to the dignity of a baronet, and, in 1815, published his last work, under the title of Historical Memoirs of His Own Time, 2 vols. 8vo. A story was introduced into this work respecting count Woronzow, the Russian ambassador, the truth of which the count denied; and deeming the publication to be libellous, he had recourse to a criminal prosecution. It was tried in the court of king's bench, and sir Nathaniel was found guilty, and sentenced to a fine and six months' imprisonment. He died in 1831.

WRAY, Daniel, a native of London, educated at the Charter-house, and at Queen's college, Cambridge, and distinguished for his learning, his taste, and his acquaintance with the fine arts. He was member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and trustee of the British museum. He died 29th December 1783, aged 82, universally lamented. He contributed to the Archæologia, Notes on the Walls of Ancient Rome, and Extracts of Letters from Rome on the discovery of a statue of Venus.

WREN, Matthew, an English prelate. He was of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Peter-house, chaplain to Charles I. prebendary of Winchester and Westminster, dean of Windsor, and in 1634, was made bishop of Hereford. He was afterwards translated to Norwich, and in 1638, to Ely. During the civil wars his property was seized, and his person imprisoned in the Tower, where he continued eighteen years without being brought to trial. At the restoration, he was re-instated in his bishopric, and died at Ely-house, London, 1667, aged 81. He was a man of abilities, and wrote some controversial tracts against the Socinians—Epistolæ Variæ, &c. the Abandoning of the Scots Government—two sermons, &c.

WREN, sir Christopher, LL.D. a celebrated English architect and mathematician, nephew to bishop Wren, was born at Knoyle, Wilts, 20th October, 1632. At the age of fourteen he entered as gentleman commoner at Wadham college, Oxford, where he made astonishing progress in mathematics. He was, about the time of taking his master's degree, elected fellow of All-Souls, and in 1657 he was chosen professor of astronomy in Gresham college, where his lectures on the different phases of Saturn were attended by numerous audiences. In 1661 he succeeded Seth Ward as Savilian professor at Oxford, and in consequence resigned the Gresham professorship, and took the degree of doctor of laws. His acquaintance with architecture was so great that he was sent for by Charles II. to assist sir John Denham, the surveyor general, and in 1663 he was chosen fellow of the Royal society, to whose memoirs he contributed some valuable papers on subjects of astronomy, natural philosophy, and other sciences. In 1665 he went to France, and visited the most curious edifices, and the most remarkable inventions in mechanics in the capital, and on his return home he was appointed architect, and one of the commissioners for the reparation of St. Paul's cathedral. The dreadful conflagration of the city which quickly followed, called for the exertion of the powers of the ingenious architect, but the model for a new capital which he made, though approved by the king and the privy council, was not adopted. His avocations were now so numerous as an architect, and as the successor of sir J. Denham, in the office of surveyor-general of his majesty's works, that he resigned his Savilian professorship in 1673, and the following year received the honor of knighthood. In the improving and beautifying London, his genius was particularly displayed, and the churches which he erected are lasting monuments of the vast powers of his mind. Besides St. Paul, the noblest edifice which he raised, he built fifty-three churches in London, among which St. Stephen Walbrook is particularly celebrated. The monument was also erected by him, and likewise the custom-house, Greenwich hospital, Emanuel college chapel, Trinity college library, Cambridge, and the theatre at Oxford. This ingenious man, whose architectural labors deserve and receive so much admiration, died 25th February 1723, aged 91. Sir Christopher sat twice in parliament, for Plympton in Devonshire, 1685, and for Melcombe Regis in 1700. He was in 1680 elected president of the Royal society, and in 1684 made comptroller of the works in Windsor castle. Though he never published any thing himself, several of his works have appeared in the philosophical transactions and in the publications of Dr. Wallis and others.

WRIGHT, Nathan, a learned lawyer, born at Barwell, Leicestershire. He was made lord keeper of the great seal on the removal of lord Somers; but though abused by Burnet as a strong Tory, devoted to party and fond of money, he adds, that he never was charged with bribery in his court. He was removed in 1705 and passed the rest of life in peaceful retirement at his seat at Caldecot hall, Warwickshire, where he died much respected 4th August 1721.

WRIGHT, Edward, a mathematician of Cambridge who attended the earl of Cumberland in his expedition to the Azores in 1589. He wrote the Errors of Navigation corrected, 1599, a work of merit—treatises on the Sphere—on Dialling—Haven-finding Art, and he also constructed a table of Meridional Parts, and tables of the Sun's Declination. He died about 1620.

WRIGHT, Abraham, a native of London, educated at Oxford, where he was public orator. During the civil wars he lived as tutor in several respectable families, and died rector of Oakham church 1690. He wrote Deliciæ Deliciarum—Commentary on the Psalms—on the Pentateuch—sermons—a collection of poems, or Parnassus Biceps.

WRIGHT, Paul, D.D. an English divine, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He obtained Oakley vicarage, and Burden chapel, Essex, and Snoreham rectory, 1739, on the presentation of the governors of Bridewell, St. Thomas, and the other city hospitals. He republished, in 1774, Heylyn's Help to English History, 8vo.; but his Chauncey's History of St. Alban's, for which he had printed proposals, and received subscriptions, never appeared. A Family Bible with notes was published under his name. He died 1785.

WRIGHT, Sir James, governor of Georgia, was the last who held that office under the royal government. He had been agent for South Carolina in England, and in 1760 was appointed chief justice of that province and lieutenant-governor of Georgia. In 1764 he was appointed governor, and in 1772 created a baronet. His long administration was distinguished by wisdom and prudence, and the colony flourished under it in an unprecedented degree. He was, however, avaricious, and devoted to the wishes of the king. At the commencement of the revolution, a contest for the supreme authority was kept up by him and the popular leaders, until January, 1776, when he was taken prisoner. He soon after found means to escape on board the Scarborough, a British ship. He returned in July 1779, and resumed the government, but it was for a short time. Independence was established, the royal authority ceased, and the large estates acquired by him in Georgia were confiscated.

WURMSER, Dagobert Sigismund, count, field-marshal in the service of Austria, was a native of Alsace. After being five years in the French armies he enlisted in the service of the emperor, and by his merit and valor, rose to the highest ranks. He was, in 1793, commissioned to cover the siege of Mentz, and he soon after attacked the Weissenburg lines, while the duke of Brunswick fell on the left of the French army, and prince Waldeck on the right. Victorious in his attack, he pushed his conquest into Alsace, and took Haguenau, and Drusenheim. These advantages were counterbalanced by the fatal battle of Trischweiler, in which he was defeated; but the following year he repaired his losses by the taking of Manheim. In 1796 he hastened to the relief of Mantua, and for two successive days defeated the French on the borders of the lake of Guarda. The fortune of Bonaparte, however, prevailed against him at Castiglione, Montechiaro, and Lodano, and after wards at Roveredo, and at the Brenta, and after the severest losses, he penetrated through the enemy, and threw himself into Mantua. After the most determined resistance, Mantua, reduced by famine and by sickness, surrendered 2d February, 1797, to the conqueror on the most honorable terms. The aged commander retired to Vienna, where he was received with the honor which his services and his years deserved, and he was appointed governor of Hungary, where he died August 1797, aged above 80.

WYATT, sir Thomas, a learned courtier in the service of Henry VIII. He was born of a respectable family in Kent, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, which he afterwards quitted for Oxford. He was knighted by Henry, and his abilities usefully employed in various embassies on the continent. He was author of several poems, printed in 1565, with those of his friend the earl of Surrey. He was the first who turned into English metre, David's Psalms. He died 1541, aged 38.

WYATT, James, an architect, was born at Burton in Staffordshire about 1743. He went to Rome, and there studied the principles of architecture and painting under Viscentini. On his return to England he was employed to build the Pantheon in Oxford-street, which fixed his reputation, and when sir William Chambers died he was appointed surveyor-general to the Board of Works. He also became a member of the Royal Academy, and sat as president of that institution for some time. He died in consequence of the overturning of a carriage, September 5, 1813.

WYATT, sir Francis, governor of Virginia, succeeded Yeardley in October, 1621. On the 22d of March, 1622, the Indians commenced the execution of a plot, to exterminate the English, and on that day three hundred and forty-nine persons were destroyed at the various plantations, six of whom were members of the council. Jamestown was preserved, in consequence of the friendship of a young Indian, who communicated the design to his master. This sanguinary event was followed by a retaliatory war, which was carried on with great ferocity, and which created a deadly hostility in the minds of the savages towards the colonists. On the death of his father he returned to Ireland in 1625, and was succeeded by Yeardley. Under the administration of Wyatt, the first courts were established, and a general assembly convened, by which the first laws were passed which are to be found in the records of the colony. In 1639 he was again governor. He succeeded sir John Harvey, and continued in office until the arrival of sir William Berkeley.

WYCHERLEY, William, an eminent comic writer, born at Cleve, in Shropshire, 1640. At the age of fifteen he went to France, where he embraced the Roman Catholic tenets, and on his return home, in 1660, he resided at Oxford, though he was not admitted member of the university. He afterwards returned to the protestant faith, and entered at the Middle Temple, but soon preferred the labors of literature to the dry studies of the law. In the course of ten years he produced four comedies; Love in a Wood—the Gentleman Dancing Master—Plain Dealer—and Country Wife, printed together in 1712, and the popularity of these pieces recommended him to the notice of the great, the witty, and the fair. He was noticed not only by Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and by the duchess of Cleveland, who admitted him to the last degree of intimacy, but by Charles II. who visited him when ill, at his private apartments, and enabled him to remove to the south of France for the recovery of his health. On his return Wycherley was offered by the king, the place of governor to his son, with an ample salary; but his marriage with the widowed countess of Drogheda, soon after offended his royal patron, and involved him in difficulties. Though the countess, who was jealously fond of him to a ridiculous degree, bestowed on him all her property, yet, at her death, which happened soon after, his right to the succession was disputed, and in consequence of law-suits, he was thrown into prison by his unfeeling creditors. Here he languished for seven long years, till James II. going to see the Plain Dealer, was so pleased with the play, that he offered to pay the debts of the unfortunate author, and settled an annuity of two hundred pounds on him. Wycherley, however, from false delicacy, was ashamed to give an account of his debts, and thus still continued involved in distress. Though averse to the troubles of a married life, he wished, as one of his biographers has informed us, to die married, and with this singular passion, in his old age, he took for his second wife a young lady worth fifteen hundred pounds, and died eleven days after, 1st January, 1715. Besides his comedies he wrote some poems, a folio volume of which appeared 1704, and his posthumous works, in prose and verse, were published in 1723, by L. Theobald, 8vo.

WYKEHAM, William of, a celebrated prelate, born at Wykeham in Hampshire, 1324. Though his parents were respectable, yet they were poor; but domestic difficulties were forgotten in the liberal patronage of Nicolas Uvedale, lord of the manor of Wykeham, and governor of Winchester, who provided for his education and made him his secretary. By degrees he rose in the estimation of his friend, and was recommended to the notice of Edward III., who appointed him surveyor of his works in the castle and park of Windsor. By his advice this commanding situation was adorned with new buildings, and the present magnificent structure erected; but the inscription of "this made Wykeham," placed on the palace, threatened ruin to the favorite. While, however, his enemies interpreted the ambiguous sentence to his discredit by reading it backward, Wykeham assured his master, that, instead of arrogating to himself the glory of the edifice, he wished posterity to know that the favor of the king, and the care of the building, had raised him from a low situation to an exalted fortune. Thus reconciled to Edward, he rose in consequence, and when in orders he obtained the rectory of Pulham, Norfolk, and after other preferments, he was advanced, in 1366, to the see of Winchester. He was besides, chief warden and surveyor of the king's castles, warden of the forests, keeper of the privy seal, and afterwards secretary to the king. In 1367 he was appointed chancellor of England, and continued in the high office till 1371, when he was deprived of it by the representation of the parliament, who inveighed against the too extensive power of the ecclesiastics. Though much engaged in affairs of state, he paid particular attention to the business of his diocese; abuses were redressed, improvements in the regulation and discipline of the church introduced, and the houses and palaces belonging to the see repaired. With the most munificent intentions also for the encouragement of learning and piety, the bishop determined to appropriate the large possessions which he had acquired by the favor of his sovereign, in the endowment of two colleges. In 1373 a school was established at Winchester; but his noble designs were interrupted by the jealousy or persecution of the duke of Lancaster, who accused him before the king as guilty of various misdeameors, till the attachment of the people, and the interference of the clergy, restored him to the favor of the monarch, and to the possession of his see. Under the weak reign of Richard II. he labored assiduously to effect his noble purpose, and under the king's patent, New College Oxford was begun in 1330, and finished 1336, and Winchester begun the following year, and completed in 1393. The virtuous prelate enjoyed the gratification of seeing, before his death, his two noble foundations flourish, and his example was followed soon after by his scholar Chicheley, who founded All-Souls, and by Henry VI., who, on the same plan, founded the colleges of Eton, and of King, Cambridge. Wykeham died 17th September, 1404.

WYLLYS, George, one of the first inhabitants of Connecticut, who came from England to America in 1633, and fixed his residence at Hartford. In the year following, at the first election under the constitution adopted by all the free planters of the colony he was chosen one of the six persons called magistrates, who, with the governor, were to exercise the principal functions of government, legislative, judicial, and executive. He was also chosen deputy governor in 1641, and in 1642, governor of the colony. He was noted for his social and domestic virtues; for piety and simplicity of manners; and for his love of religious and civil liberty. He died in 1644.

WYLLYS, Samuel, son of the foregoing, was also a distinguished citizen of Connecticut. He was born in England, 1632, but received his education at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1653. On the college catalogue his name is spelt Willis. In 1654 he was elected one of the magistrates under the constitution. In this office and the corresponding one of assistant, under the charter of Charles II. he was continued, by annual elections, for about thirty years. On his estate, and in front of his house, the charter was concealed in the body of a large tree, then hollow, in order to secure it from Sir Edmund Andros. Here it remained till the deposition of the governor on the accession of William III. This tree has since been called the charter oak, and after adding one hundred and forty years to its age is undecayed and vigorous. He died in 1709.

WYLLYS, George, son of Hezekiah Wyllys, and grandson of the preceding, was born in 1710, and graduated at Yale college in 1729. His father was secretary of the colony, from 1712 till his death in 1734; and the son, during several years of the illness of the father, was appointed by the general assembly to perform the duties of the office. In 1735, after the death of his father, he was himself elected Secretary, by the people. He continued to fill this office till his death in 1796—a period of about sixty years. During this whole time he attended every session of the legislature, and performed in a satisfactory manner his official duties. No better evidence could be given, of the goodness of his character, and the estimation in which he was held; and seldom has there been an instance of such an uninterrupted state of bodily health and of mental vigor in the same individual, for a course of so many years.

WYLLYS, Samuel, son of George Wyllys named in the preceding article, was born in 1739. He was educated at Yale college, and graduated from that institution in 1753. During the revolutionary war he occupied military stations, having been appointed in 1775 by the legislature a lieutenant-colonel. After the peace, he was employed by his native town in various civil offices; and, in 1796, he succeeded his father as secretary of state. This office he held, till compelled by sickness in 1809, to resign it. Thus it will be seen, that with his father and grandfather, he held the office of secretary ninety-eight years in uninterrupted succession. At one time also he held the office of brigadier, and then of major-general, in the militia of Connecticut. He died June 9th, 1823.

WYNDHAM, sir William, an eminent English statesman, born about 1687. From Eton school he went to Christ-church, and afterwards travelled over the continent for improvement and information. On his return he was chosen member of parliament for Somersetshire, and continued to represent that county till his death. His abilities were so highly respectable, that in the change of ministry in 1710, he was appointed master of the queen's hounds, and afterwards made secretary of state, and in 1713 chancellor of the exchequer. Under George I. he was removed from his offices, and soon after appeared in the ranks of opposition, and ably vindicated the conduct of the duke of Ormond, and of lords Oxford and Strafford. On the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1715, he fell under the suspicion of government, but though he escaped from his pursuers, he at last surrendered himself, and was sent a prisoner to the tower. As he never was brought to trial, it is natural to infer, that no guilt could attach to his conduct, and that the violence of the times, and not a participation in disloyal acts, produced his temporary disgrace. He died at Wells, after a few days' illness, 17th June, 1740.

WYNDHAM, Henry P. an ingenious gentleman, was born in Wiltshire in 1736, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1759. He became knight of the shire for his native county; and was a member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He died at Salisbury in 1819. His publications are—1. A tour through Monmouthshire and Wales, 4to. 2. The Diary of George Bubb Doddington, baron of Melcombe Regis, 8vo. 3. Wiltshire, extracted from the Domesday Book, 4to. 4. A picture of the Isle of Wight, 8vo.

WYTHE, George, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born, in 1726, in Elizabeth county, Virginia. His education was principally directed by his mother. The death of both his parents before he became of age, and the uncontrolled possession of a large fortune, led him, for some time, into a course of amusement and dissipation. At the age of thirty, however, his conduct underwent an entire change. He applied himself vigorously to the study of the law; and, soon after his admission to the bar, his learning, industry, and eloquence, made him eminent. For several years previous to the revolution, he was conspicuous in the house of burgesses, and, in the commencement of the opposition to England, evinced an ardent attachment to liberty. In 1764, he drew up a remonstrance to the house of commons, in a tone of independence too decided for that period, and which was greatly modified by the assembly before assenting to it. In 1775, he was appointed a delegate to the continental congress, in Philadelphia. In the following year, he was appointed, in connexion with Mr. Jefferson and others, to revise the laws of Virginia—a duty which was performed with great ability. In 1777, he was elected speaker of the house of delegates, and, during the same year, was appointed judge of the high court of chancery of the state. On the new organization of the court of equity, in a subsequent year, he was appointed sole chancellor—a station which he filled for more than twenty years. In 1787, he was a member of the convention which formed the federal constitution.

tion, and, during the debates, acted, for the most part, as chairman. He was a strenuous advocate of the instrument adopted. He subsequently presided twice successively in the college of electors, in Virginia. His death occurred on the 8th of June, 1806, in the eighty-first year of his age. It was supposed that he was poisoned; but the person suspected was acquitted by a jury. In learning, industry and judgment, chancellor Wythe had few superiors. His integrity was never stained even by a suspicion; and, from the moment of his abandonment of the follies of his youth, his reputation was unspotted. The kindness and benevolence of his heart were commensurate with the strength and attainments of his mind.

WYTTENBACH, Daniel, a learned philologist of the Dutch school, who was a native of Berne, and was born in 1746. His father having been appointed a professor at Marburg, he was admitted a student of that university. He afterwards went to Gottingen to study under Heyne, with the assistance of whose advice he published, in 1769, Epistola Critica ad. vir. cel. Dav. Ruhkenium, supernonnullis locis, Juliani Imp. cui accesserunt Animadversiones in Eunapium et Aristænetum. This learned work procured him the friendship of Ruhken, whom he visited at Leyden, and who obtained for him the professorship of philosophy and literature in the college of the Remonstrants at Amsterdam. He subsequently devoted his talents to the illustration of the works of Plutarch; and in 1772 he printed at Leyden the treatise of that writer, De sera Numinis Vindicta, with a learned commentary. In 1779 the magistrates of Amsterdam created a philosophical professorship at an institution called the Illustrious Athenæum, to which Wytenbach was presented; and there he continued till the close of his life, notwithstanding splendid offers were made to induce him to remove elsewhere. The result of his researches relative to Plutarch appeared in his excellent critical edition of the Moral Works of Plutarch, published at Oxford, 1795—1802, 5 vols. 4to. Professor Wytenbach was the author of Præcepta Philosophiæ Logicæ, Amst. 1781, 8vo; and several other works besides those before mentioned. He died in the beginning of the year 1820.

WYVIL, Robert, a bishop of Salisbury, who is known in history for defending his right to Salisbury castle, by producing a champion to fight in single combat against the champion of his opponent William Montacute, earl of Salisbury. The king interfered, and the dispute was at last amicably settled. The bishop presided over his see forty-six years, and died 1375.

X.

XACCA, an Indian philosopher, born at Sica. He was the legislator of the Japanese, and flourished, it is said, a thousand years before the christian era. His memory is regarded with particular honor in China, where he is placed in the number of the gods.

XACCA, Erasmus, a Sicilian in the 17th century, who wrote an Account, in Italian, of the Eruption of Mount Etna in 1669—besides a didactic poem, in Latin, on Fevers—Brevis Expositio in Psalmos & Cantica Cantica.—Tasso's Jerusalem translated into Latin verse.

XANTIPPE, wife of Socrates, was remarkable for her moroseness and violence of temper. It is said that the philosopher was acquainted with her character before he married her, and that he took her for his wife more severely to exercise his patience.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian, sent to the assistance of the Carthaginians against Regulus and the Romans. Though he defeated the enemy, he was ordered to be thrown into the sea on his return home by the cruel ingratitude of the Carthaginians.

XAVIER, St. Francis, denominated the Apostle of the Indies, was born, in 1506, at the castle of Xavier, in Navarre; studied at Paris; became one of the first and most zealous disciples of Ignatius Loyola; was sent to the East by John III. of Portugal, to propagate the gospel; performed his mission in Hindostan, the Moluccas, and Japan; and was on the point of landing in China, when he died, in 1552.

XENOCRATES, a Greek philosopher, was born, B. C. 406, at Chalcedon; was a disciple of Plato; succeeded Speusippus in the Platonic school; and died about B. C. 314. Such was his command over his passions, that the beautiful Phryne in vain endeavored to rouse them, though she had confidently wagered upon her success. His works are lost, with the exception of a Treatise on Death.

XENOPHON, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Athens. He was the pupil and the friend of Socrates, and he distinguished himself in war as the follower of Cyrus, and the active guide of the Greeks in their return from the battle of Cunaxa. His History of Cyrus the Great, and of the expedition of the younger Cyrus, and other works, are well known. He died at Corinth, B. C. 360.

XERXES, king of Persia, son of Darius Hystaspes, is celebrated for his expedition against Greece. Though accompanied by about five million of souls, he was defeated by the valor of the Greeks, and the battles of Thermopylæ and Salamis convinced him that the conquest of the country was impossible. He retired in disgrace to Persia, and was slain by Artabanus, B. C. 465. His weeping at the sight of his numerous armies, because not one man of them would survive a one hundred years, is mentioned by historians as a proof of the goodness and benevolence of his heart.

XIMENES, Roderick, a native of Navarre, archbishop of Toledo. He laid claim to the primacy in preference to the see of Compostella, at the council of Lyons, 1247, before Innocent IX. and his rights were confirmed. He wrote a Spanish history of little merit.

XIMENES, Francis, a celebrated ecclesiastic, born at Torrelaguna in Old Castile 1437. He was educated at Alcalá and at Salamanca, and afterwards went to Rome, where he could obtain no patronage. He became grand vicar of Gonzales de Mendoza, bishop of Sigüenza, and afterwards his wisdom, his learning, and his knowledge of oriental literature, and of theology, procured him friends, and recommended him to the notice of queen Isabella, who named him archbishop of Toledo, 1495. Thus placed at the head of the Spanish church, he bent his thoughts to the reformation of his clergy, and to the more pure and impartial administration of temporal and ecclesiastical affairs through his diocese. He was raised to the purple by Julius II. 1507, and he was intrusted by Ferdinand with the affairs of the government, as prime minister. Not satisfied with the power which he exercised over the state, he was ambitious of military glory, and at his own expense he prepared an expedition against Oran in Africa, which he took from the Moors after displaying great marks of bravery and heroic presence of mind. Ferdinand, who was afraid of his power, appointed him, on his death bed, regent of the kingdom, during the minority of Charles V. and Ximenes exercised this authority not only with wisdom but with severity, and thus raised the complaints of the nobles against his administration. He despised, however, their clamors, satisfied in the good opinion of his sovereign, and in the support of the people to whom he granted great and important privileges. While thus laboring for the glory of his country, this virtuous minister was poisoned in eating trout, and died two months after, 8th November, 1517, aged 81. In his character Ximenes was noble and patriotic, the friend of virtue and of merit, the protector of innocence, and the active and generous promoter of industry. He was himself learned, and by his munificence he caused the famous Complutesian Polyglott Bible to be published in his newly erected university of Alcala. This national work which was begun in 1514, was completed in 1517, in 6 vols. fol. and in four languages. The work is now very scarce. He also caused to be published the Missal, and the Breviary Mosarabe, under the care of Ortiz.

XYLANDER, William, a native of Augsburg, who though born of poor parents, rose to distinction by his abilities. He was educated in the university of Augsburg, and afterwards at Tubingen and Basil, by the friendship of Relinger, a senator of Augsburg, and in 1558 he was invited to fill a Greek professor's chair at Heidelberg. He was in 1566 appointed secretary to the assembly of divines, who held a conference on the eucharist, and he a second time filled the same honorable office in 1581. His great application hastened his death, which happened February 1576, in his 43d year. He was the translator of Dion Cassius, of Marcus Antoninus, of Plutarch, and of Strabo, into Latin, but as he wrote for bread, the execution of these laborious works is occasionally careless and faulty.

XYPHILIN, John, called of Trebizond, from the place of his birth, was made patriarch of Constantinople 1064, and died 1075. He wrote a sermon preserved in the Bibliotheque of the fathers. His nephew of the same name wrote an abridgment of the history of Dion Cassius in Greek 1592, folio, which begins at the 32d book, and is written with little elegance. The work containing the history of the emperors to the time of Alexander son of Mammæa, is generally printed with Dion Cassius.

YALDEN, Thomas, D.D., an English poet, born at Exeter, 1671. He was educated at Magdalen college school, and after being commoner of Magdalen hall, he obtained a scholarship at Magdalen college, where he had for his fellow students Addison and Sacheverell. He published an Ode on the taking of Namur, and a poem on the death of the duke of Gloucester, and in 1710, obtained a fellowship in his college, and the following year was presented to a small living in Warwickshire. In 1706, he was received into the duke of Beaufort's family, and the next year he took his degree of doctor of divinity and resigned his fellowship. He afterwards obtained the contiguous livings of Chalton, and Cleanville, in Hertfordshire, and the sinecures of Deans, Hains, and Pendles, in Devonshire, and lived in peaceful retirement till the nation was alarmed by the pretended plot of bishop Atterbury. As Dr. Yalden had been intimate with Kelly, the prelate's secretary, he was regarded as an accomplice, and arrested, but as no direct charge could be made against him, except a treasonable explanation of the words "thorough paced doctrines" discovered in his pocket book, he was set at liberty. He died 16th July, 1736. He wrote besides, Hymn to Light and Hymn to Darkness, his best poem. His works, says his biographer, deserve perusal, though they are not always polished. His faults are rather omissions of idleness, than the negligence of enthusiasm.

YALE, Elihu, the principal benefactor of Yale college, was born in New Haven, Connecticut, in 1648. At the age of ten years he went to England, and about the year 1678 to the East Indies, where he acquired a large fortune, both by his industry, and by marriage to an Indian lady of wealth, and became governor of fort St. George. After his return to London he was chosen governor of the East India company, and made those donations to the college in his native town, which induced the trustees to bestow on it the name of Yale. He died in Wales, July, 8th 1721.

YART, Anthony, an ecclesiastic born at Rouen, 1709. He is the author of the Idea of English poetry, in 3 vols. 12mo. 1756, a work of merit, which has made known to the French nation, the labors of several English poets. He wrote besides some poems, and was happy in his epigrams.

YATES, Robert, a distinguished citizen of New York, who, from 1790 to 1793, was chief justice of the state. He was born at Schenectady in 1733, and established himself in the profession of law at Albany. During a part of the revolutionary war he was chairman of the committee for military operations. In 1777 he assisted in framing the constitution of the state, and was appointed a judge of the Supreme court under it. He was also a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States. His death took place in 1801.

YEAMANS, Sir John, a native of Bristol, England, who first went to Barbadoes, and, in 1665, joined a company of emigrants from that Island to the American continent. They purchased a tract of land in Carolina, named Clarendon county, now a part of South Carolina, on which they formed a settlement, and he was appointed governor of the colony. He was the first who introduced slaves into Carolina, previous to which there were no laborers but Europeans.

YEARDLY, Sir George, was left at the head of the administration of Virginia on the return of Sir Thomas Dale to England in 1616. He indulged the people in the cultivation of tobacco, in preference to corn, which he compelled the natives to furnish by way of tribute. He was succeeded by Argal in 1617, who, having incurred the displeasure of the people and the proprietors, was superseded, and Yearly appointed governor-general in 1619. In that year the first general assembly met in Virginia; many important improvements were made during his administration, and the power, population, and respectability of the colony much increased. His commission expired in 1621, when he was succeeded by Wyatt; but still continued to reside in the country, and was afterwards a member of the council. When Wyatt returned to England in 1625, the administration again devolved on Yearly. He died in 1626.

YOUNG, Edward, LL.D., an English poet, born June 1631, at Upland near Winchester, the residence of his father of the same name, who was chaplain to William and Mary, and dean of Sarum, and who died 1705, aged 62, author of two vols. of sermons. He was educated at Winchester school, and in 1703, though superannuated, removed to New college, Oxford, which he left five years after on being chosen fellow of All Souls. He took his degrees of doctor of laws, 1719. He first appeared before the public 1712, as author of an epistle to lord Lansdowne, in consequence of the unpopular creation of ten peers, in one day, by Queen Anne, and the next year he prefixed a recommendatory copy of verses to the Cato of Addison. Though distinguished in literary fame, he was prevailed upon by the duke of Wharton, his father's friend, to abandon the prospect of two livings, from his college, worth 600*l.* a year, and to engage in the tumult of a contested election, as a candidate at Cirencester, an event of which he was afterwards ashamed to the latest period of life. He took orders 1727, and soon after was appointed chaplain to the king, and he paid such respect to the decorum of his new profession, that he withdrew from the stage, his tragedy of the Two Brothers, which was already in rehearsal. He afterwards was presented by his college, to the living of Welwyn, Herts, and in 1739, he married lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Litchfield, and widow of Colonel Lee, whom he had the misfortune to lose on the following year. To relieve himself from the heavy melancholy, which this event brought upon him, he began his Night Thoughts, but though in this work he seemed to bid adieu to the world, he afterwards engaged in politics, by the publication of Reflections on the public Situation of the Kingdom, and at the age of 80 he solicited further patronage from archbishop Secker, and was appointed clerk of the closet to the princess dowager. He died April 1765. Besides his great work the Night Thoughts, he published a poem on the Last Day—Busiris, and the Revenge, tragedies—the Centaur not fabulous, a moral satire—Estimate of Human Life, a sermon—Conjectures on Original Composition—the Love of Fame, the universal passion—and some papers in the Spectator. As a poet, Young is highly respectable, his Night Thoughts abound with many sublime passages, and they are written in a strain of true genuine morality, though occasionally obscure. As a clergyman he was particularly exemplary, full of benevolence, goodness, and piety.

YOUNG, Arthur, an eminent agricultural writer, was born in 1741, at Bradfield, in Suffolk. He was apprenticed to a wine merchant, at Lynn, in Norfolk; but quitted that business to engage in farming. In furtherance of his wish to improve the husbandry of his country, he not only made innumerable experiments on his own land, but also travelled over the greatest part of the British islands, and in France, Spain, and Italy. In 1770 he published his Farmer's Calendar, which became a popular work; and in 1774 he established The Annals of Agriculture. On the establishment of the Board of Agriculture he was appointed secretary, an office which he held till his decease in 1820. Among his principal works, besides those already mentioned, are his Tours in England, Ireland, and France.

YOUNG, Matthew, a mathematician and divine, was born, in 1750, in the county of Roscommon; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, at which, in 1786, he became professor of philosophy; was raised to the see of Clonfert by Marquis Cornwallis; and died in 1800. He wrote An Essay on Sounds; An Analysis of the Principles of Natural Philosophy; and The Method of prime and ultimate Ratios.

YOUNG, Sir William, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1750, at Charlton House, near Canterbury; was educated at Eton, Clare Hall, Cambridge, and University College, Oxford; was M. P. for St. Mawes, in 1783, and F. R. S. in 1786; and died, in 1815, governor of Tobago. His principal works are, The History of Athens; and the West India Common Place Book.

YOUNG, Thomas, an eminent philosopher and physician, a nephew of Dr. Brocklesby, was born in 1774; was educated at Gottingen and Edinburgh; was physician to St George's Hospital, and foreign secretary of the Royal Society; and died May 10, 1829. Besides contributing a great number of valuable papers to the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, and to many scientific periodicals, he wrote several works, of which the chief are, A Course of Lectures on Natural Philosophy; An Introduction to Medical Literature; A Practical and Historical Treatise on Consumptive Diseases; and Elementary Illustration of the Celestial Mechanics of La Place. To Dr. Young belongs the merit, which has been claimed for M. Champollion, of having discovered the means of deciphering the Egyptian hieroglyphics.

YPSILANTI, Prince Alexander, a Wallachian nobleman, who may be considered as having been the first avowed agent in the Greek Revolution. He was the son of the hospodar of Wallachia, who assumed the government of that country in 1802. About three years after his installation as Prince, Ypsilanti's father received a summons from the grand Signor to repair to Constantinople. Knowing that obedience to this order would probably cost him his life, he determined on retiring into Russia with his family and followers. Here the son Alexander adopting the military profession, entered into the Russian army, and in several battles with the French obtained considerable reputation, and was at length made a major-general and aid-de-camp to the Emperor. On account of his military talents and success as well as his distinguished birth, he was fixed on by the members of the Stratocracy as a competent person to announce the revolution in Wallachia and Moldavia. His name must therefore be transmitted to posterity in immediate connexion with the origin of this noble cause. But still, judging from his after actions, as well as the unfortunate result of his proceedings in the principalities it must be confessed that the choice might have fallen on a more efficient and probably more fortunate leader. He exhibited in a degree almost ludicrous, a species of pride and hauteur calculated to disgust rather than attach his military followers. Instead of mixing with the troops he always kept himself strictly apart from them. Indeed to so high a pitch did he carry his feelings of superiority or exclusive rank, that whenever he was stationed at any time on a particular spot, he used to cause to be marked out a precise point, which he termed the sacred way, and beyond which no one was allowed to pass, except himself and his own brothers. This sort of family pride and tenaciousness of ceremony was so directly opposed to the principles of the cause in which he was engaged, that it could not fail to be attended with disadvantageous consequences. After the unfortunate results of the battle in which he was engaged at Dragachan, he was compelled to seek refuge in the Austrian dominions, where he spent the remainder of his life in confinement, though it does not appear that he had offended against the laws of Austria, nor on what account he was made a prisoner. He died at Vienna, January 29th, 1828.

YRIARTE, Don John d', a native of Teneriffe, who studied at Paris and Rouen, and afterwards became librarian to the king of Spain, at Madrid. He was also, in consequence of his extensive learning, made member of the royal Spanish academy, and interpreter to the Spanish secretary of state.

He was author of a Greek Palæographia, 4to.—Miscellaneous Works in Spanish, 2 vols. 4to.—a catalogue of Greek MSS. in the Spanish king's library—Catalogue of Arabic MSS. in the Escurial, 2 vols fol. He died 1771, aged 69, much and deservedly regretted, YSE, Alexander de, protestant professor of theology, at Die, in Dauphine, in the age of Louis XIV. was deprived of his ecclesiastical honors on suspicion of favoring the Romish church, and died in retirement in Piedmont. He wrote some theological works.

YVON, Peter, a native of Montauban, in Languedoc, known as the follower of Labadie. He accompanied this enthusiast of Holland, and Middleburg, and acquired some celebrity, as a preacher among the Labadists, and as a writer on mystical subjects.

ZABAGLIA, Nicholas, an architect, was born, in 1674, at Rome, and died there in 1750. His first occupation was that of a carpenter at the Vatican; but the various masterly mechanical engines which he invented, and the abilities which he displayed, caused him to be appointed architect of St. Peter's. Zabaglia is inventor of the method by which fresco paintings are transferred from the plaster on which they were originally executed.

ZABARELLA, Francis, better known by the name of cardinal de Florence, was a native of Padua. He studied the law at Bologna, and then became professor in that science at Padua, and when the city was besieged by the Venetians in 1406, he was deputed as ambassador to implore the assistance of France. Unable to succeed in his application, he retired to Florence, and afterwards was invited to Rome by pope John XXIII. who not only appointed him archbishop of Florence, but raised him to the rank of cardinal, and sent him in 1413 as his ambassador to the emperor Sigismund, at the council of Constance. He died their 26th Sept. 1417, aged 73, and in respect to his learning and virtues, his funeral was attended by the emperor and all the members of the council. He was author of Commentaries on the Decretals, 6 vols. folio—harangues—letters—Acta in Conciliis, &c.

ZABARELLA, Bartholomew, nephew of the preceding, was professor of law at Padua, and afterwards became archbishop of Florence. He died 1442, aged 46, respected for his learning and piety.

ZABARELLA, James, son of the preceding, was born at Padua, 1533, and died there 1589. He was well acquainted with the philosophy of Aristotle, and became philosophical professor at Padua, where he published Commentaries on Aristotle's works, folio. He wrote besides, a treatise de Inventione Æterni Motoris, 4to.

ZACCARIA, Francis Anthony, a jesuit, was born in 1714, at Venice; succeeded Muratori as librarian at Modena; retired to Rome after the dissolution of his order; and died there, in 1795, professor of ecclesiastical history at the Sapienza College. Of his one hundred and six printed works, the most important are, Literary History of Italy, sixteen vols.; Literary Annals of Italy; Anecdotes of the Middle Age; and Numismatic Institutions.

ZACH, Baron de, Francis Xavier, one of the most eminent astronomers of the age, was born at Pest, in Hungary, on the 15th of June, 1754. After having travelled through various countries of Europe, he was appointed in 1786, by the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, to contract the observatory of Seeberg near Gotha, which he superintended for several years. He published, in 1792, tables of the sun with a catalogue of 318 stars; he commenced at Weimar, in 1800, the publication of his "Geographical Ephemerides;" having left Germany and taken up his abode near Marseilles, he published in French in 1814, his work on the Attraction of Mountains;—afterwards having established himself at Genoa, he began there, in 1813, the publication of a new astronomical Recueil, entitled, "Correspondence astronomique, géographique, et statistique," of which 14 volumes in 8vo. were issued prior to 1826. Sickness compelled him to discontinue this work, and was the occasion of his retiring to Paris, where he died Sept. 2, 1832, from an attack of the cholera, aged 79 years.

ZACHARIA, Justus Frederic William, a German poet, was born in 1726, at Frankenhäusen, in Thuringia; was educated at Leipsic; was appointed professor of poetry in the Caroline College at Brunswick; and died in 1777. His poems, among the best of which are, Phaeton, the Four Parts of the Day, and Woman in the Four Stages of her Life, form nine volumes octavo.

ZACHIAS, Paul, a native of Rome, studied medicine, belles lettres, music, and painting, and was patronised by pope Innocent X. to whom he was physician. He published Quæstiones Medico Legales, 3 vols. folio, 1726, Lyons—and some Italian tracts. He died 1659, aged 75.

ZACUTUS or Lusitanus, a Jewish physician, born at Lisbon. He studied at Salamanca and Coimbra, and took his medical degrees at Morvedre, and practised at Lisbon, which he quitted 1624 in consequence of the edict of Philip IV. against the Jews. He retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam, 1641, aged 66. His medical works in Latin, were printed at Lyons, 2 vols. folio, 1649. His grandfather was a native of Salamanca, who became famous in Portugal for his great knowledge of chronology and history, on which he wrote Juchasin, a work of Jewish chronology from the creation to the 1500th year of the vulgar æra.

ZAIONCZEK, Joseph, a Polish general, of a noble but poor family, was born in 1752, at Kamien ieck, and entered the military service at an early period. In the diets from 1788 to 1792, he espoused the cause of freedom, and for that cause he fought bravely in 1792 and 1794. It was he who commanded at Praga when that unfortunate suburb of Warsaw was carried by assault, and on that occasion he is said to have displayed more bravery than military skill. Severely wounded, he sought an asylum in Moravia, and was sent prisoner to the fortress of Josephstadt, where he remained till after the death of Catherine of Russia. On his being liberated he entered into the service of France, and fought under her banners, from 1797 till 1812, in Italy, Egypt, Prussia, Poland, and Russia. When the congress of Vienna assigned Poland to the Russian emperor, that monarch conferred on the Polish general the title of prince and the office of viceroy. These favors were fatal to the glory of Zajoncsek. He forgot all his patriotism, became the devoted slave of Russia, and died universally hated by his fellow-citizens, July 28, 1826.

ZALEUCUS, a legislator of Laeris in Italy B. C. 500. He was so strict in the execution of the laws, that when his son was guilty of adultery, a crime which was punished by the loss of both eyes, he caused one of his own eyes, and one of his offending son's, to be put out.

ZALUSKI, Andrew Chrysostom, a native of Poland, who, after visiting the Low Countries, France and Italy, took orders, and became bishop of Warmia, and grand chancellor of Poland. He was for some time ambassador in Spain and Portugal, and died 1711, aged 61. He was author of some Latin letters, which are valuable for the information which they contain concerning Poland, and the rest of Europe.

ZAMOSKI, John, son of Stanislaus Castelan, of Chelme, a town of Red Russia, studied at Paris and Padua. He made such progress in literature, that he was elected rector of Padua, and he afterwards returned to Poland, where he rose to honorable offices, and was employed as ambassador to France. On the election of Stephen Batori, to the Polish throne, he married the new monarch's niece, and became the chancellor of the kingdom, and general of Polish armies. In these high offices Zamoski behaved with judgment and valor; he repressed the attacks of Basilides, czar of Muscovy, and delivered from his yoke the provinces of Polesia, Velesia, and Livonia. On the death of Batori, 1586, his services strongly recommended him to the Polish nobles, but he refused the crown, and placed it on the head of Sigismund of Sweden. This illustrious chief, who deserved the appellation of defender of his country, and of protector of science, died 1605. He was a munificent patron of letters, and in the town which he built, and which bears his name, he founded an university. He wrote while at Padua, two treatises on the Roman Senate—and on the Perfect Senator.

ZANCHIUS, Jerome, a native of Alzano, who entered in the congregation of the Latran canons. He embraced the tenets of the protestants by the conversation of Peter the Martyr, who was of the same establishment, and afraid of persecution, he retired, 1553, to Strasburg, where he taught divinity and the philosophy of Aristotle. He quitted Strasburg, in 1568, for Chiavene, and in 1568 removed to Heidelberg, where he was appointed professor of theology, and where he died 19th November, 1590. He was author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, and other works, published together at Geneva, in 8 vols. folio, 1613. In his character he was a man of moderation, learned, benevolent, and pious.

He died 11th January, 1729, at the age of 67, at Venice, where he had settled, and practised with great celebrity. He wrote Catalogus Plantarum Terrestrium, Marinarum, 1711—Promptuarium Remedium Chymicorum, 8vo.—de Myriophyllo Pelagico—Lithographia duorum Montium Veronensium, —de Rusco ejusque Preparatione, 8vo.—Opuscula Botanica, 4to.—History of Plants near Venice, folio. His labors in botanical researches were improved by his son John James, who also was a man of erudition.

ZANOTTI, Francis Maria Garazzoni, a native of Bologna, educated among the jesuits. After studying the law for some time, he applied himself to mathematics under Beccari, and became mathematical professor at Bologna, and secretary to the senate. He introduced the study of the Newtonian philosophy in the university instead of the system of Descartes, and acquired such respectability as a professor, that he was in 1766, made president of the institution, of which he had been for some years librarian. Besides two catalogues of the library of the institute, he published some poetical and philosophical works, and died 1777, aged 85.

ZANZALUS, James, an obscure monk of the sixth century, became founder of the sect of the Jacobites, who consider the perfection of the Gospel to be the strict observance of fasts. They circumcise children, and acknowledge one nature and person only, in our Saviour, and reject the union of the divine and human nature in his body.

ZAPOLSKI, John de, Vaivode of Transylvania, was in consequence of his valor and services, elected king of Hungary 1526, after the death of Louis II. He was opposed by Ferdinand of Austria, and supported by Solyman II. and at last he divided the kingdom with his rival 1536, and died four years after.

ZAPPI, John Baptist Felix, a native of Inola, who cultivated the profession of the law with success at Rome. He published History of the Discovery and Conquest of Peru, a work of merit, best edited, Antwerp, 8vo. 1555, and translated into French, 2 vols. 8vo. 1700, Paris, and Amsterdam.

ZEGEDIN, Stephen, a native of Zegedin, in Lower Hungary, was one of the first disciples of Luther. He was taken prisoner by the Turks, who treated him with great inhumanity, and on his liberation he became minister of Buda. He died at Keven, 1572, aged 67. He wrote Speculum Romanorum Pontific. Historicum, 8vo.—Tabulæ Analyticæ in Prophetas, fol.—Assertio de Trinitate, 8vo.

ZENDRINI, Bernard, an eminent Italian mathematician, but especially celebrated for his skill in hydraulics, was born, in 1679, at Saviore; studied at Padua; and settled at Venice as a physician. His profound knowledge of the subject caused him to be appointed chief hydraulic engineer at Ferrara, and the same office, with the superintendance of all the waters, rivers, and ports, was afterwards conferred on him by the Venetian republic. He was also employed by the Austrian government and the republic of Lucca. Many works of great importance were executed by him. He died in 1747.

ZENO, the founder of the stoic philosophy, was a native of Citium, in Cyprus. His school was one of the porticoes of Athens, whence the name of his sect. He defended suicide, and the principle of fatal necessity. He died B. C. 264.

ZENO, Apostolo, a native of Venice, of illustrious birth. He early applied himself to literary pursuits, and in 1696 established the academy of Animosi, in his native country, and in 1710, began to publish that well known work called the Giornale de Literati, which he continued in thirty vols. to 1719. He afterwards went to reside at Vienna, at the invitation of the emperor Charles VI. to whom he was appointed poet and historiographer. After a residence of ten years, during which he wrote several plays, for the entertainment of the imperial family, he quitted Vienna to return to Venice, and was succeeded in his appointments by Metastasio. This learned man, who was respected not only by his own countrymen, but by the literati of the age, died at Venice, 11th November, 1750, aged 81. His works have been printed in 10 vols. 8vo. in Italian, 1744, and contain sixty-three poems, either tragedies, comedies, or pastoral. He wrote besides some tracts on antiquarian subjects—Dissertations on Vossius, 3 vols. 8vo.—Letters—Dissertation on Italian Historians, 2 vols. 4to. Though a popular poet among the Italians, his pieces exhibit much confusion of plot, and unnecessary episodes, but his invention is striking, his delineations strong, and his dialogues spirited and interesting. He is compared by the French to Cornille, and his successor Metastasio to Racine.

ZENOBIA, queen of Palmyra, wife of Odenatus, was honored by the Romans with the imperial title of Augusta. She derives not a little glory from her patronage of Longinus the celebrated critic. She was attacked by Aurelian the Roman emperor, who was jealous of her power, and she fell into the hands of her conqueror, and died in privacy near Rome.

ZIANI, Sebastian, doge of Venice, is celebrated for his munificent labors, in embellishing his native city with the most splendid edifices, and adorning them with the best productions of arts. He flourished at the end of the 12th century.

ZIEGLER, James, professor of theology and mathematics at Vienna, was born at Lindau in Swabia, and died 1549. He was author of Notes on some Passages of Scripture, fol.—Description of the Holy Land, fol. 1536—de Constructione Solidæ Sphæræ, 4to.—a commentary on Pliny's second Book.

ZIEGLER, Bernard, a native of Misnia, professor of theology at Leipsic. He was much esteemed by Luther and Melancthon, whose doctrines he ably supported. He died 1556, aged 60. He wrote some theological works now little read.

ZIETTEN, John Joachim Van, a native of Worstrau, in the circle of Rupin, distinguished as an officer in the Prussian service. He lost his first commission for challenging his superior officer, but his merits recommended him to the king, and as captain of Hussars he rendered his company the best disciplined in the army. In the campaign of 1745, his valor was particularly displayed, and though disgraced for a while by the intrigues of general Von Winterfeldt, he rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded the admiration of the king, and of the Prussian army, at the siege of Prague, the battle of Lignitz, and the storming of Torgau. He died in retirement universally regretted, 1786, aged 87. He was of small stature, but the powers of the mind, and the goodness of the heart, atoned for the deficiencies of nature ZIMMERMANN, Matthias, a native of Eperies, who became protestant minister at Meissen, and died 1689, aged 64. He published a Dissertation on a Passage in Tertullian—Florilegium Philologico-Historicum, 4to.—Amenitates Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 4to.

ZIMMERMANN, John George, an eminent physician, born at Brug in the canton of Berne, 8th Dec. 1728. He studied medicine at Gottingen under Haller, in Holland under Gaubius, and at Paris under Senac, and acquired distinction by his profession, and more by his writings. He was noticed by the king of Prussia, and appointed by the regency of Hanover, physician to the king of England. In the latter part of life he gave way to melancholy, and his infirmities were increased by the insanity of his son, and the death of a beloved daughter, who expired in his arms. He died 7th Oct. 1795 aged 66. He wrote a poem on the Destruction of Lisbon by the Earthquake, 1755—and Physiological Dissertation on Irritability—An Essay on Solitude, 1756, translated into French and English—an Essay on National Pride, 1758. His life was written by his friend Tissot.

ZIMMERMANN, Eberhard Augustus William Von, a learned German, was born in 1743 at Uelzen, where his father was superintendent. He received his education first at Gottingen, and next at Leyden; after which he became professor of natural philosophy in the Caroline college at Brunswick. His first work was a treatise on the Analysis of Curves, and in 1777 he published "Specimen Zoologiæ," the outline of his "Geographical History of Man and Quadrupeds," 3 vols. He visited England three times, and printed there in 1787 his "Political Survey of the present State of Europe." The French revolution made a strong impression upon the mind of Zimmermann, and he warned his countrymen of the evils which they would suffer from it. For this, he was ennobled by the emperor Leopold. After this he published several geographical works, but one of his best was a "General Survey of France and of the United States of America," 2 vols. In 1806 Zimmermann left Brunswick, and went to Hamburgh, but afterwards he returned to the former city and died there July 4th, 1815.

ZINGHA, Bendi, queen of Angola, was the sister of Gola Bendi, who was sovereign of that country in the seventeenth century. This despot had massacred all his relatives except Zingha, and another of his sisters. Gola Bendi himself having been defeated by the Portuguese, was poisoned by Zingha, who then ascended the throne and to secure her power put to death her nephew, the son of her late brother. She was soon after dethroned by the Portuguese, and taking refuge in the interior of Africa among the Giagas, a tribe of ferocious savages, she was chosen their sovereign. After having governed them thirty years, this princess in her old age became the victim of remorse for the crimes which she had committed. The Portuguese viceroy of Loando being informed of the state of her mind sent to her a capuchin missionary, who received her abjuration of idolatry, and readmitted her into the church, for she had been baptized at a former period. Zingha then published edicts for the abolition of human sacrifices, and the suppression of other cruel superstitions, and applied herself with zeal to spread the knowledge of Christianity among her subjects. She died in 1663, in the eighty-second year of her age. This princess, during the life of her brother, being sent on a mission to the court of the Portuguese viceroy, on perceiving that no seat but a cushion on the floor was provided for her at her audience with the Portuguese governor, she ordered one of her attendants to stoop down on her hands and knees to form a seat for her accommodation.

ZINZERDORF, Nicholas Lewis, count, of an ancient family, originally from Austria, was son of the chamberlain of the king of Poland. He is celebrated as the founder of the sect called Hernhuters, or Moravians, which first began at Bartelsdorf in Upper Lusatia, 1722. The place where these persons, who called themselves the brethren, met together, was a forest, which soon grew into a large village, and received the name of Hernhuth, and their doctrines were rapidly spread through Bohemia and Moravia. Some of them went to England, and by the patronage of general Oglethorpe and others, they obtained an act of parliament for the protection of their sect. Their government is patriarchal; they consider the purest precepts of the gospel as the best guides of their conduct; their morals are irreproachable; and in their mutual support of each other, display the noblest virtues of the Christian doctrine. They have, however, been accused by some, according to Cevenna, of impure conduct, and they are charged with the gross crime of having a community of wives. Zinzerdorf died at Hernhuth, 1660, aged 60, and was succeeded in the government of the sect by count de Dohna. His life has been written in German by Augustus Spangenberg, 8 vols. 8vo. 1777, and is full of curious and interesting particulars.

ZISKA or ZISCA, John de Trocznou, a native of Bohemia. He early embraced the military profession and lost one of his eyes in a battle, in consequence of which he was called Ziska. He placed himself at the head of the Hussites who wished to avenge the death of their leader, John Huss; and on the decease of Wenceslaus king of Bohemia in 1414, he opposed the claims of the emperor Sigismund to the throne. Though he lost his other eye by an arrow at the siege of Rabi, he continued the war, and he defeated his enemies at the battle of Aussig on the Elbe, and became master of Bohemia, which he laid waste with fire and sword. Alarmed by the astonishing success of this vigorous leader, Sigismund sent ambassadors to him to offer him the government of Bohemia on the most honorable conditions; but during the negotiations, he fell a victim to the plague, which began to ravage the country. This happened in 1424, and an honorable epitaph, describing his virtues and services, was placed on his tomb, which, however, was disgracefully erased by the soldiers of Ferdinand II. 1619. The report that he ordered his skin to be tanned, and to be used as a drum to animate his soldiers, is false.

ZIZIM, or ZEM, son of Mahomet II. and brother of Bajazet, was made governor of Lyeaonia. On the death of his father, he disputed the throne of the Ottomans with his brother Bajazet, but being defeated, he fled to Egypt, and afterwards passed through Cilicia and Rhodes to France, where he claimed the protection of Charles VIII. He was afterwards delivered into the hands of the pope by the French king; but though demanded on the most flattering conditions by Bajazet who wished to put him to death, he was kept a prisoner at Rome, where he died 1497, as it is said, by poison.

ZOE, fourth wife of the emperor Leo VI. was mother of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, during whose minority, 912, she governed with great wisdom and firmness. She crushed the rebellion of Constantine Duca, and after making peace with the Saracens, she obliged the Bulgarians to return to their country. Though thus entitled to the gratitude of her son, and the admiration of the people, she was overpowered by the intrigues of the courtiers, and retired to a private station, and died in exile.

ZOE, daughter of Constantine XI. was born 978. She married Argyrus, who ascended the throne after her father; but disgusted, from the most licentious motives, with her husband, she caused him to be strangled, and placed on the throne Michael the Paphlagonian, a goldsmith, whom she married. She was afterwards confined in a monastery, and after Michael's death, she took for her third husband, in her 64th year, Constantine Monomachus. This cruel and debauched princess died eight years after, 1050.—Another, daughter of Stylian, married the emperor Leo, surnamed the Philosopher, and died 21 months after, 893.

ZOLLIKOFER, George Joachim, a native of Switzerland, educated at Bremen, and Utrecht. He settled in the Pays de Vaud, and afterwards went to Monstein in the Grisons, and then to Isenburg, and to Leipsic, where he was distinguished as an able divine among the protestants. He died 1758, aged 28, author of a book of devotions—two volumes of sermons, translated into English, &c.

ZONARAS, John, a Greek historian. He held offices of distinction at the court of Constantinople; but at last tired with the world, he assumed the habit of a monk, and died in a monastery in the beginning of the 12th century. He wrote Annals from the Creation of the World to the year 1118, a work of little merit, as the compilation of an ignorant and credulous monk. He closely copies Dio Cassius, though in the affairs of his own times, he mentions facts no where else to be found. He wrote also Commentaries on the Apostolic Canons.

ZONEA, Victor, an Italian mathematician in the 17th century. His inventions and improvements in mechanics were many and valuable, and of them he published an account, called Novo Teatro di Macchine ed Edificii, Padua, 1621, folio.

ZOPYRUS, a Persian noble, one of the seven who destroyed the usurper Smerdis. To obtain possession of Babylon for Darius he mangled his body, and thus gained the confidence of the Babylonians, after which he betrayed the town to his countrymen.

ZOROASTER, an ancient philosopher, the founder or the reformer of the religion of the Magi. Some call him king of the Baetrians, and others place him in the age of Abraham. As the head of a religious sect among the Persians, he taught his followers the practice of benevolence, as he declared that nothing could be more acceptable to heaven than mutual affection, and the display of philanthropy. The book which contains his religious tenets, and which is divided into 100 articles, has been made known to Europeans by the researches of M. Anquetil, who has published a translation of it in 2 vols. 4to.

ZOSIMUS, author of a Greek history of the Roman emperors to his own times, flourished in the fifth century. Of his works, only the five first books, and part of the sixth, are extant; best edited at Oxford, 1679, 8vo. and by Cellarius, 1696. His work is written with elegance, but not always with fidelity, and he is very severe against the Christians.

ZOUCH, Richard, a native of Anstey, Wiltshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He studied the law, and afterwards became an advocate in Doctors' Commons, chancellor of Oxford diocese, principal of Alban hall, and judge of the admiralty court. He wrote Cases and Questions resolved in the Civil Law, 8vo. 1652—Vindication of the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England against Sir Edward Coke, a work of merit, and other tracts on jurisprudence, and died 1660.

ZOUCH, Thomas, D.D. a learned English divine, born in 1737. In 1763 he was chosen fellow of the college, which in 1770 presented him to the rectory of Wycliffe, in the North Riding. Here he continued diligently performing his duty of a parish priest, and augmenting his knowledge of natural history, until 1793, when he was appointed chaplain to the Master of the Rolls, and rector of Scrayingham. In 1805 Mr. Pitt presented him with a prebend in the church of Durham, and in the same year he took his degree of doctor of divinity. He was offered the bishopric of Carlisle in 1803, but declined it on account of advanced age. He died in 1806. His works are the Crucifixion, a Seaton Prize Poem; An Enquiry in the prophetic character of the Romans, as described by Daniel; The good School Master, as exemplified in the character of the Rev. John Clark; Memoirs of Sir Philip Sidney, 4to.; Memoirs of John Sudbury, Dean of Durham; an edition of Isaac Watson's Love and Truth; another of the lives of Donne, Wotton, Hooker, and Herbert, by the same author, with notes, and his life; and a Memoir of Sir George Wheeler; printed after the author's death.

ZUBLY, John Joachim, D.D. first minister of the presbyterian church in Savannah. He came from Switzerland, and took the pastoral care of that church in 1760. He was a man of great learning, and a powerful preacher. As occasion required he preached in German, English, and French. He was also a member of the provincial congress of Georgia in 1775, but not being engaged in the cause of American Independence, he lost the confidence of the majority of his fellow-citizens. The few and small publications he made are creditable to his memory. He died at Savannah, in 1781.

ZUINGLIUS, Ulrichus, D.D. a zealous reformer, born at Wildehausen in Switzerland, 1487. He studied the learned languages at Basil and Berne, and applied himself to philosophy at Vienna, and took his degree of doctor of divinity, at Basil 1505. For ten years he acquired popularity as public preacher at Glaris, and in 1516 he was invited to Zurich to undertake the office of minister. The tenets of Luther, which were now propagated in Germany, encouraged the Swiss preacher to oppose the sale of indulgencies, and to regard them as impositions from the court of Rome upon the superstitious credulity of the people. Undaunted in the publication of his opinions, he continued to increase the number of his adherents, and in 1523 he assembled the senate and the clergy of Zurich, and presented before them in sixty-seven propositions the minute articles of his faith. Though opposed by the bishop of Constance, his doctrines were adopted by the full senate, and he was exhorted to preach the word of God, whilst all pastors were forbidden to teach any thing but what could be proved by the gospel. Another synod still more powerfully favored the cause of Zuinglius and of truth, images and reliques were removed from churches, processions were forbidden, and the greater part of the outward worship and ceremonies of the church of Rome was abolished. While, however, successful in the establishment of his doctrines in the canton of Zurich, Zuinglius met with violent opposition in the other members of the Swiss confederacy, and after the fruitless conferences of Baden between Ecolampadius on the part of Zurich, and of Eckius on the part of the catholics, both sides had recourse to arms. In one of the first encounters the great champion of the reformation was slain, 11th October, 1531. As a leader Zuinglius displayed great firmness, deep learning, and astonishing presence of mind. Though he opposed the doctrines of the Romish church, he greatly differed from the German reformer, and each unhappily paid little respect to the opinions of the other. His followers continued to increase, and in bearing his name they maintained doctrines on original sin, and on grace, which were rejected by the other seceders from the jurisdiction of Rome. According to Zuinglius, salvation was extended not only to infants, who died before baptism, but to heathens of a virtuous and moral life. Some alterations were afterwards introduced by Calvin, by Beza and others, but whilst the proselytes to these new opinions acquired the name of Calvinists in France, and in other parts of Europe, the Zuinglians who firmly adhered to the tenets of their founder assumed the appellation of Sacramentarians. The works of Zuinglius, as a controversialist were respectable, chiefly written in German, and were comprehended in 4 vols. fol.

ZUMBO, Gaetano Julius, a celebrated modeller in wax, was born, in 1656, at Syracuse, in Sicily; and died at Paris in 1701. For the grand duke of Tuscany he executed, in colored wax, several admirable works. The most celebrated of these bears the name of the Putrefaction. It exhibits five figures—a dying person, a dead body, a corpse in a state of incipient corruption, one half corrupted, and another in the last stage of corruption and a prey to worms. His masterpieces, a Nativity and a Descent from the Cross, are at Genoa.

ZURLAUBEN, Beat de, a native of Valais, known as an able negotiator, from the canton of Zug, at the court of Louis XIII. He was highly honored for his services by his countrymen, and called the father of his country, and the pillar of religion. He died 1663, aged 66. He wrote an account of his negotiations. His eldest son of the same name, was engaged in the military affairs of his country, and distinguished himself at the battle of Vilmergen, against the Bernese. He died at Zug 1690, aged 74. A nephew of the preceding, of the same name, displayed his knowledge of war at the head of the French armies, and contributed much to the victory of Nerwinde. He died at Ulm, 21st September 1704, aged 48, in consequence of seven wounds, which he had received at the battle of Hochstet.

Among his works are, A Military History of the Swiss in the French Service; A History of the Swiss and their Allies; and A Picturesque Tour in the Thirteen Cantons.

ZURLO, Guiseppe, count de; an Italian politician, born, in 1759, at Naples. In 1783, when an earthquake had devastated many parts of the kingdom, and men of merit were wanted to heal the wounds of the provinces, Zurlo was sent into Calabria. He was afterwards made judge, and, in 1798, was invited to become minister of finance; but he declined the offer. The king, however, when he fled to Sicily, left him in the administration of the finances. The people, entertaining unfounded suspicions against him, seized his person, and destroyed his house. After a few months, when the royal government was reëstablished, he was made minister of finance. The country was inundated with paper money, the credit of the government destroyed, and large sums wanted to meet the public exigencies. Zurlo reëstablished the finances, and refused the rewards offered him for his services, saying that he had always found himself honored by his poverty. In 1803, his ministry came to an end. He refused every offer of the new government, until, in 1809, Joseph made him minister of justice. He did much within the few months that he remained in this office; but the government, wishing to give him a more extended sphere of action, made him minister of the interior. This department required an entire reorganization. Zurlo took the best measures for the promotion of agriculture, manufactures, public instruction, the fine arts, finances, &c. He also put the hospital for the insane, at Aversa, on an excellent footing. On the restoration of the old government, he accompanied the queen (madame Murat) to Trieste, where he separated from her; fell sick in Venice, and, during his recovery, made a translation of Anacreon, which appeared there anonymously. He then lived for three years, in Rome, and, in 1818, received permission to return to Naples, where he was made minister of the interior in 1820, but, in consequence of the attacks of fanatics, lost the office within a few months. After that time, he lived as a private man, in Naples, where he died in 1823.

ZWICKER, Daniel, a Socinian who attempted to reconcile the discordant sects among the protestants by the publication of his Irenicon Irenicorum, a work which created him many enemies. He defended himself in two subsequent publications, and died about the 17th century.

ZWINGER, Theodore, a learned physician born at Bichoffstzel in the Turgau. He became professor of moral philosophy and medicine, and died 1593, aged 54. He wrote the Theatre of Human Life, a ponderous work published in 8 vols. fol. Lyons 1656, and afterwards improved and enlarged by his son James, who died 1610.

ZWINGER, Theodore, son of James, and grandson of Theodore, studied medicine, which he afterwards abandoned for divinity. During the plague which raged at Basil in 1629, he displayed great humanity, both as a pastor and as a physician. He was author of several controversial tracts, and died 1651, aged 54. His son John became professor of Greek, and public librarian at Basil, and distinguished himself by his learning. He died 1696.

ZWINGER, Theodore, son of John just mentioned, was professor of eloquence and medicine at Basil where he died 1724. He published Theatrum Botanicum, in German, fol.—Fasciculus Dissertationum, 4to.—Triga Dissertationem—a Latin and German Dictionary—some medical works. His brother John Rodolphus was professor of divinity at Basil, and died there 1708, aged 48. He wrote sermons—tracts—and the Hope of Israel, in German.

ZYPÆUS, or VANDEN ZYPE, Francis, a native of Malines. His great knowledge of jurisprudence was admired, and rewarded by le Mire, bishop of Antwerp, who appointed him his secretary, and gave him the place of a canon, and of an archdeacon of his church. He is author of some works of merit on the law, especially Analytica Enarratio Juris Pontificii Novi—Consultationes Canonice—Notitiæ Juris Belgici—De Jurisdictione Ecclesiasticâ, & Civili, collected together in 2 vols. fol. This learned man, equally respectable in private life, died at Antwerp 1650, aged 71. His brother Henry was an ecclesiastic, and became abbot of St. Andrew near Bruges. He died 1659, aged 83. INSTANCES OF AMERICAN LONGEVITY.

The following particulars are taken mostly from Smellie's Philosophy of Natural History, the British Pantheologia, the American Encyclopedia, and from a communication by J. E. Worcester, published in the Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. In statistics of this kind, it is too evident to need remark, that there must be expected much inaccuracy. The facts ordinarily come through channels, where a love of the marvellous connects itself with the reality. Few subjects are more interesting; still, the researches in relation to it have been comparatively few in number, and they have been limited in their extent. It is to be hoped, persons will be found willing and able to give more attention to it; for surely the causes which contribute to longevity are worthy the consideration of the Christian and the philanthropist.

* The following particulars of this individual are given in the National Gazette, from an account dated Murfreesborough, Tennessee, February 22, 1834. "She was born in Germany, and emigrated to the British Colonies in America, at the time when the first settlement was made in North Carolina, in the year 1710. At the age of 120 years, her eye-sight became almost extinct, but during the last 20 years of her life, she possessed the power of vision as perfectly as at the age of 20. For many years previous to her death she was unable to walk, and is said to have required great attention in her friends, to prevent the temperature of her body from falling so low as not to sustain animal life. At the time of her death, she had entirely lost the sense of taste and hearing. For 20 years before her death, she was unable to distinguish the difference between the taste of sugar and vinegar. At the age of 65, she bore her only child, who is now living, and promises to reach an uncommonly advanced age."

† Solomon Nabit was a native of England, where he lived till he was 19 years of age. He then came to this country, and resided in the state of Maryland till about 55 years before his death, when he removed to South Carolina, where he passed the rest of his life. He never lost his teeth or eye-sight; and, a few days before his death, he joined a hunting party, and actually killed a deer.

‡ Henry Francisco is stated to have been born in France, in 1636; but at the age of five years he left that country in company with his father, who fled from religious persecution, and went first to Holland, and afterwards to England. He was present at the coronation of Queen Anne, and was at that time sixteen years old. He fought in the wars of that queen under the duke of Marlborough. In the early part of the last century he came to New York with his father. He was wounded in Braddock's defeat; was carried a prisoner to Quebec during the revolutionary war; and suffered much from wounds.

§ This individual was a slave belonging to George Booker, of Prince Edward county, Virginia. He received his name from the circumstance that his mother was in her 58th year at the time of his birth. He was of great strength of body, and his natural powers, which were far superior to that of people of color in general, he retained in a surprising degree. He was a constant laborer in his master's garden till within eight or ten years of his death.

It is a singular fact, that of the one hundred and twenty-seven instances of longevity above given, the subjects of one hundred of them died in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Prior to the period specified, the probability is, that less pains were taken to collect and preserve such cases of long life; and consequently, that had it been otherwise, there would be found in the annals of American physiology a catalogue of individuals living to a remarkably advanced age incredibly long. Nor does the above catalogue contain all that might be given of persons who have died over one hundred and ten years of age since the commencement of the present century. The catalogue of Mr. Worcester is more extended than the one above given, which is chiefly from his; and additions to his might readily be made from the periodical publications of the country that have in any considerable measure been conducted in reference to this curious and interesting subject. Probably more attention has been given to it in the state of New Hampshire than in any other part of our country. The collections made by the Hon. William Plummer, formerly governor of that state, are of the greatest value. And to John Farmer Esq. for his labors in this and other kindred branches of literature, the American scholar is under the greatest obligation. Besides other valuable aid rendered, the Tabular portions of the present work were prepared under the supervision of his watchful eye. For these labors as well as for others on former occasions the author tenders his public and grateful acknowledgements.

The present article was intended to relate altogether to the longevity of America; but, it may be interesting to give a few brief notices of it recorded in other countries. The most extraordinary instance of longevity in modern times, with regard to which satisfactory information is to be found, is that of Peter Tortin, or Zorten, a native of Kofrock, in Hungary. He died January 5, 1724, at the age of 185. A few days before his death he walked, with the assistance of a staff, some miles, to ask charity of the travellers. He had then but little sight, and his hair and beard were of a greenish white color, like mouldy bread, and few of his teeth remained. His food consisted of pulse, and bread, with a little brandy. John Rovin and his wife, also natives of Hungary, died in the year 1741, the former in the 172d year of his age, and the latter in her 164th; having been married 147 years.

The most extraordinary instance of longevity in Great Britain, was exhibited in the person of Henry Jenkins. He was a native of Yorkshire, lived to the amazing age of 169 years, and died on the 8th day of December, 1670. Next to Jenkins we have the famous Thomas Parre, who was a native of Shropshire, and died on the 16th day of November, 1635, at the age of 152. Francis Consist, a native of Yorkshire, aged 150, died in January 1768. James Bowels, aged 152, lived in Killingworth, and died on the 15th day of August 1656. Col. Thomas Winsloe, a native of Ireland, aged 146, died on the 20th of August, 1766. The countess of Desmond, in Ireland, saw her 140th year. Williams Evans, aged 145, lived in Caernarvon, and in the year 1782, still existed. And Dumiter Radaloy, aged 140, lived in Harmenstead, and died on the 15th day of August, 1656. Many others might be given from Great Britain who attained a remarkably advanced age, but the proposed character of this article does not admit of being extended.

ADDITIONS.

WHEN the first edition of this work was published, it was found impracticable to obtain materials, from which to prepare notices of several individuals, designated for a place in it. Subsequently constant effort has been made to supply this deficiency; and the results of it are herewith presented in the form of an Appendix. In a few cases names are inserted in the appendix, that are found in the body of the work; the second insertion being more full than the first. Also, since the publication of the first edition there have been many deaths of persons of eminence; and, so far as it could be done with any appearance of justice to them, their names will be found hereunto annexed. And, it may be here added, that a copy of the first edition has been in the possession of the most distinguished scholar in this department of literature, in our country, to receive his corrections. Those corrections were completed shortly previous to his lamented death; and, the work is now enriched with them.

AL

ALLEN, Solomon, a brother of Moses Allen and Thomas Allen, mentioned in the body of this work, was born at Northampton, Mass. Feb. 23, 1751. He and four of his brothers entered the revolutionary war. The two named were Chaplains. Solomon in the course of the war rose to the rank of Major. At the time of the capture of Andre he was a Lieutenant and Adjutant, on service near the lines of New York. To Allen, with a guard of nine men, Andre was entrusted, by Colonel Jameson, who ordered that he should be conveyed to Captain Hooglin, commanding a company of light horse, at lower Salem. This duty was satisfactorily performed, as was all the service committed to him by his superior officers. After the war, Major Allen was actively employed in quelling the insurrection of Shays. Although he had no advantages for education in the early part of life, except of the most humble sort, yet at the age of fifty he became impressed with the idea it was his duty to become a preacher of the gospel. The difficulties attending the undertaking served to augment his zeal. He pressed forward and soon entered upon his new field of labor. His success, to human appearance, was better than that of many with all the aid of intellectual culture. He was instrumental in establishing four new churches, and reclaiming to a life of religion a large number of members. He was poor himself, but there were those connected with him who were rich, and by whose liberality he was enabled to accomplish his benevolent purposes. When one of his sons presented him with a hundred dollars, he begged him again to receive the money, as he had no unsupplied wants and knew not what to do with it; but, as he was not allowed to return it, he purchased with it books for the children of his flock, and gave every child a book. From such sources he expended about a thousand dollars in books and clothing for the people, while at the same time he toiled incessantly in teaching them the way to heaven. These labors were performed in the western part of Massachusetts, and the State of New York, where the country was then new and most of its inhabitants poor. Happy is the individual who has a mind thus to spend his life. Such an example of doing good, even surrounded with poverty, is of immense value to the interests of society. The author of it may be ranked among the best benefactors of mankind: and has rational expectation of glorious reward in another world. Mr. Allen died at the city of New York, in the society of his children, January 20, 1821, aged 70 years.

ASBURY, Francis, senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. He was born near Birmingham, England, August 20, 1745; but as most of his life was spent in laborious services among the American Methodists, he is identified with them, in their own feelings, and in the view of the public. He came to this country in 1771, at the age of twenty-six, as a preacher. In 1773, the first annual conference of the Methodists was held at Philadelphia, when it consisted of ten preachers, and about eleven hundred members. He was consecrated Bishop by Dr. Coke, in 1784, an office which he continued to fill with great reputation till his death, which happened at the house of his old friend, Mr. George Arnold, in Virginia. He was there on a journey, and died suddenly, March 31, 1816, in the seventy-first year of his age, and the fifty-fifth of his ministry. His remains, by order of the general conference, were brought to Baltimore, and deposited in a vault prepared for that purpose, under the recess of the pulpit of the Methodist church, in Eutaw street, in that city. From the time of his consecration, a period of thirty-two years, Bishop Asbury travelled yearly through the United States. From the ardour of his feelings, he was peculiarly calculated to keep the great machinery of the travelling connection in motion. In the exercise of his episcopal office, he ordained not less, probably, than three thousand preachers, and preached seventeen thousand sermons.

ASHMAN, Jehudi, agent of the American Colonization Society, was born of pious parents in Champlain, on the western shore of the lake of the same name, New York, in April, 1794. He graduated at Burlington College, in 1816, and after preparing for the ministry, was elected a Professor in the Theological Seminary at Bangor, Maine, in which place, however, he continued but a short time. Removing to the district of Columbia, he became a member of the Episcopal Church, edited the Theological repository, and published memoirs of Rev. Samuel Bacon. He also projected a monthly journal for the American Colonization Society, and published one number: but the work failed for the want of patronage. Being appointed to take charge of a reinforcement to the colony at Liberia, he embarked for Africa, June 19, 1822, and arrived at Cape Mesurado, August 8th. He had authority, in case he should find no agent there, to act as such for the society, and also for the navy department. In the absence of the agents, it was at a period of great difficulty, that he assumed the agency. The settlers were few, and surrounded with numerous enemies. It was necessary for him to act as legislator, and also as a soldier and engineer, to lay out the fortifications, superintending the construction, and this too in the time of affliction, from the loss of his wife, and while suffering himself under a fever, and to animate the emigrants to the resolute purpose of self-defence. About three months after his arrival, just as he was beginning to recover strength, and while his whole force was thirty-five men and boys, he was attacked at the dawn of day, November 11, by eight hundred armed savages, but by the energy and desperate valor of the agent, the assailants were repulsed with the loss of four colonists killed, and four wounded, and again, in a few days, when they returned with redoubled numbers, were utterly defeated. When ill health compelled him to take a voyage to America, he was escorted to the place of embarkation, March 26, 1828, by three companies of the militia: and the men, women, and children of Monrovia parted with him with tears. He left a community of twelve hundred freemen. He arrived at New Haven, August 10th, a fortnight before his death. He died in the evening of August 25, 1828, aged thirty-four years. An eloquent discourse was preached by Leonard Bacon at his funeral, describing his remarkable character, the important influence on the tribes of Africa, of his piety and regard to justice, and his great services for the colonists.

AUSTIN, Samuel, D. D., President of the University of Vermont, was born at New Haven, Connecticut, October 7, 1760. He was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1783, receiving the first appointment at commencement, which may be considered a high honor, as his class consisted of forty-two members, among whom were David Daggett, LL. D., Abiel Holmes, D. D. LL. D., Jedediah Morse, D. D., and John Cotton Smith, LL. D., He spent about two years, after leaving college, in teaching, and in the study of divinity. Such was his popularity that he lost no time in obtaining a settlement. His first location was with the Society of Fairhaven, in New Haven, where he was ordained in 1786. He removed, however, to Worcester, in Massachusetts, in 1790, and became the Pastor of the first congregational church in that town. This place was the sphere of his labors for nearly twenty-five years: and, here, he acquired no small degree of celebrity as an eloquent and learned preacher. He was generally popular, and his services were extensively solicited by the denomination to which he belonged. The reputation thus fixed to his name made him a suitable candidate for the Presidency of the University of Vermont: to which he was called in the year 1815. But, after a residence of six years in Burlington, the seat of this institution, he resigned his office and removed to Newport, R. I., where he took the pastoral charge of a feeble and dilapidated congregation, once the parish of Dr. Hopkins, the celebrated divine. This was pre-eminently a labor of love. He selected this people, in his own mind, on account of their inability to give him an adequate support: and, with his characteristic frankness and generosity sent them word that he would become their minister, if they desired it. His proposition was readily accepted, and he went to Newport, with great pleasure, as on a missionary enterprise. Here he labored earnestly for a period of four years; but increasing age and other infirmities admonished him that he needed repose: consequently, in 1825, he returned to Worcester to enjoy it, in the bosom of his former circle of cherished and endeared friends. But, owing probably to some peculiar trials he was unexpectedly called to encounter, the balance of his mind was impaired, and for the remainder of his life, he was partially deranged. He continued in this state till the day of his death, which was the 4th of December, 1830, when he was in the 71st year of his age. The following is a list of Dr. Austin's publications: "A View of the Church," "Letters on Baptism," 1805; "Reply to Merrill's Letters," 1806; "Dissertations on several Fundamental Articles of Christian Theology," 1806; and the following Sermons. "On Disinterested Love," 1790; "A Funeral Sermon on the Death of a Mr. Smith and a Miss Smith, of Exeter, N. H.," 1790; "On the death of Miss Hannah Blair," 1794; "A Thanksgiving Sermon," 1797; "At the Ordination of the Rev. Samuel Worcester," 1798; "Of Leonard Worcester," 1800; "Before the Massachusetts Missionary Society," 1803; "Dedication of the Meeting house at Hadley," 1808; "Ordination of the Rev. Warren Fay, and of the Rev. J. M. Whiton," 1808; "A Fast Sermon," 1811; "Two Fast Sermons," 1812; "Dedication of the Meeting-house at Worcester," 1823; "Address at Worcester, on the Religious Celebration of the fourth of July," 1825; and also numerous contributions to the periodicals of his time.

BEDELL, Gregory, T., D. D., an eloquent and popular Clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was born in Staten Island, October the 28th, 1793, and was graduated at Columbia College, New York, in 1811. His father was Israel Bedell, and his mother was a sister of the Rt. Rev. Richard Channing Moore, D. D., Bishop of Virginia. Soon after leaving College he commenced preparation for Holy Orders, and was ordained Deacon by Bishop Hobart, on the 4th of November, 1814, within one week after he had attained the canonical age. In the summer of 1815 he accepted the Rectorship of the church, in Hudson, on the North River. In the latter part of the year 1818, he left Hudson, and removed to Fayetteville, N. C., having been invited to become the Rector of the church in that place. Here he remained successfully occupied in the labors of his profession for more than three years, when he was induced, from declining health, to seek a more northern residence. On his return to his native state, he made a short stop in Philadelphia. During his continuance of a few days in this city, arrangements were made for a new church, in reference to his becoming the Rector of it. The church was to be called St. Andrews. The corner stone for it was laid on the 9th of September, 1822, and it was consecrated May 31st, 1823. From this period, Dr. Bedell, to his death, continued to officiate in St. Andrew's Church; and the parish during his whole ministry experienced great prosperity. None could have heard him preach without remembering and appreciating the peculiar attributes of his oratory. His death took place on the 30th of August, 1834. Notwithstanding the feeble health of Dr. Bedell, but few clergymen have accomplished so much as he did in the same short space of time. In addition to the various labors connected with his station as Rector of a large parish, and to those growing out of the interest he took in the public institutions of the church, he wrote and published much. And, it is but an act of justice to his memory, to say, that whatever came from his pen was creditable to him, as a scholar, as well as a clergyman.

BELSHAM, William, a miscellaneous and historical writer of eminence, who died November 27th, 1827, at the age of seventy-five. He published, in 1789, "Historical, Political, and Literary Essays," 2 vols. 8vo., which passed through several editions; and he subsequently wrote on the Test Law, the French Revolution, Parliamentary Reform, and many other subjects; but his principal work is a "History of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the Treaty of Amiens," forming 12 vols. 8 vo., published between 1793 and 1806.

BOCTHOR, Ellious, born in Upper Egypt, in 1784. He became attached as interpreter to the French army under Buonaparte. On the return of the troops to France, he accompanied them, and applied himself with great success to the study of the French language and literature. He succeeded Don Raphael, as professor of Arabic, at the Royal Library, and his lectures were well attended. He died in 1821. His works are an Arabic Alphabet, with Examples, 1820, 4to; and a Dictionary of the French and Vulgar Arabic, MS. A notice of his books in the Turkish, Persian, Arabic, Coptic, and other languages, was published at Paris, in 1821.

BODE, John Ehlert, a celebrated German Astronomer, born at Hamburg, January 19th, 1747. He was intended for a commercial situation, but so strong was his passion for science, that he made observations on the stars with telescopes of his own construction; and at the age of eighteen he was able to trace the courses of the planets, and calculate eclipses of the sun and moon. In 1765 he was introduced to Professor Busch, who liberally gave him the use of his library and astronomical instruments. In 1766 he wrote a treatise on the eclipse of the sun, of the 5th of August, that year; and in 1768 was published his "Introduction to the Knowledge of the Heavens and the Stars," with a preface, by Busch. Professor Lambert, of Berlin, in 1772, procured Bode the appointment of practical resident astronomer in that capital, when he entered on the publication of his Ephemerides, or "Astronomical Annals," which were uninterruptedly continued. He made discoveries of comets and fixed stars, and accurately observed the new planets, Uranus, Juno, Pallas, &c. He formed a fresh constellation, called "Frederichsehre," in honor of Frederick II., which has been adopted on new globes, celestial charts and astronomical works. In 1810 he published his "Atlas of Celestial Maps," on which he had been employed for four years. It contains a catalogue of 17,240 stars, being 12,000 more than were indicated in preceding charts. Professor Bode died, November 23, 1826. His works, besides those mentioned, are very numerous and valuable.

BOOTHROYD, Benjamin, D. D., a clergyman of an independent Church at Highfield Chapel, Huddersfield, England. He was born of parents in very humble condition, from whom he received no advantages of education, except being sent to school from the age of four to his sixth year. He was then employed in spinning worsted, and afterwards in learning his father's trade, of a shoemaker. He is represented as having been in early life "one of the worst characters, and, when in ill-humor, quite a dread to the neighborhood in which he lived;" but at length he became an entirely reformed and religious young man, and, having a strong understanding, he was encouraged to prepare himself for the ministry, at a dissenting college. After having entered upon the ministry, at Pontefract, he applied himself to the study of Hebrew, without the aid of an instructor, and, "by dint of great exertion and perseverance," he acquired a thorough knowledge of the language, and published a new Hebrew edition of the Old Testament, working frequently with his own hands at the press, six hours a day, besides compiling the manuscript, and examining and correcting the proof sheets, in which his compositor only knew the letters. He died, September 8th, 1836, aged 68 years.

BOTTA, Charles, a distinguished Italian historian. He was born in 1768, at the small village of San Giorgio di Canavese, in Piedmont, and was educated as a physician; but the breaking out of the French revolution caused him to turn his attention to the study of politics and history. In 1794, he entered into the medical service of the French army; after Piedmont was incorporated with France, in 1803, he was sent to Paris as a member of the legislative body, and his residence continued afterwards in France; and he lived many years previous to his death, at Paris, in close retirement, on account of ill health. Having previously published several works, he established his reputation as an historian, by the publication of his "History of the War of the Independence of the United States of America," in 1809. He afterwards published "The History of Italy, from 1789 to 1814," and the "Continuation of Guicciardini's History to 1789," esteemed works of high merit. In 1816, he published an heroic poem, entitled "Il Camillo." He died, at Paris, in August, 1837, aged sixty-nine years.

BOWDEN, John, D. D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Professor in Columbia College, New York. He was born in Ireland, in January, 1751, his father being an officer in the British army, and at the time stationed in that country. On the breaking out of the French war, his father came to America, and the subject of this article soon followed him. Here he studied for and entered Princeton College, where he remained but two years; his father returning with his regiment to Ireland, he went with him. After remaining some time there, he came to America, in 1770, and entered King's (now Columbia) College, where he graduated in 1772. Soon after he left college he commenced the study of divinity, and went home to England, and was ordained Deacon, by Dr. Keppel, Bishop of Exeter, in 1774. He was ordained Priest by the Rev. Dr. Terrick, Bishop of London. In the summer of 1774 he returned to New York, where he was settled as an assistant Minister of Trinity Church; but soon after the breaking out of the revolutionary war, he retired to Norwalk in Connecticut. When the British troops took possession of Long Island and New York, he returned; but on account of the weakness of his voice he declined preaching in Trinity Church. Upon the evacuation of this city, he again went to Norwalk, and took charge of the church there in December, 1784. He continued there until October, 1784; when, owing to the weak state of his lungs, he accepted an invitation to take charge of the church at St. Croix, in the West Indies. After remaining in that island about two years, he found that his voice was no better, and he was obliged to relinquish preaching altogether. He returned to the United States, and settled at Stratford, in Connecticut. After residing there some time, he took charge of the Episcopal Academy, in Cheshire, Connecticut, in 1796, where he continued until he was appointed, in the year 1805, Professor of Moral Philosophy and Belles Lettres, in Columbia College. In this situation he remained, discharging its duties with exemplary fidelity, until the summer of 1817, when his declining health induced him to take a journey to Ballston Springs, where he departed this life, July 31st, 1817. Dr. Bowden was distinguished as an able advocate and defender of the church; for which duties he was eminently qualified by his extensive acquirements, and by his powers of clear and forcible reasoning. He was also held in high estimation by the faculty and students of Columbia College. As an evidence of this, the following fact is given. The property left by Dr. Bowden, to his family, was invested in the stock of Insurance Companies, in New York. These Insurance Companies were rendered insolvent by the great conflagration of that city, December 16, 1836, and thus the family was reduced to poverty. To evince their veneration to Dr. Bowden, the Alumni of Columbia College, who were his pupils, hereupon, although nearly twenty years after his death, made a subscription of eighteen hundred dollars for the relief of the sufferers. His publications were:—1. A Letter to the Rev. Ezra Stiles, D. D. LL. D., President of Yale College, on Church Government.—2. A Letter to the same, on Dr. Chauncy's complete View of Episcopacy.—3. A Letter from a Weaver to the Rev. Mr. Sherman, occasioned by a publication of his, for the purpose of "Pinching the Episcopalian Clergy with the Truth."—4. An Address to the Members of the Episcopal Church in Stratford.—5. Two Letters to the Editor of the Christian Magazine.—6. Letter from a Churchman to his friend in New Haven.—7. Some Remarks in favor of the Division of the General Convention of the Church into two Houses; the House of Bishops, and the House of Lay-Delegates.—8. A Full Length Portrait of Calvinism.—9. The Essentials of Ordination.—10. The Apostolic Origin of Episcopacy, asserted in a series of letters to Dr. Miller.—11. A Series of Letters addressed to the same, on the same subject.—12. Observations on the Catholic controversy.

BOWDITCH, Nathaniel, LL. D., F. R. S., President of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, was born at Salem, Mass., March 26, 1773. On account of the straitened circumstances of his parents, he had no advantages of education than those afforded by the common town schools of that period; and he was taken from school at the early period of ten years. At the age of twelve or thirteen, he was placed as an apprentice, or clerk, in a ship-chandler's shop, where he remained till he was twenty-one. In his 22d year, he went to sea in the capacity of captain's clerk; and he spent about nine years in a seafaring life, during which he made five voyages, four of them to the East Indies; first as captain's clerk, afterwards as supercargo, and finally as master. After relinquishing his nautical life, he became, in 1804, President of a Marine Insurance Company, in Salem, which station he held till 1823, when, on the establishment of the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company, in Boston, his talents being deemed indispensable in its organization and management, he was induced to leave his native place, and take charge of the institution, in the responsible and laborious office of Actuary, the duties of which he continued to perform till his death. Such is the outline of the life of Dr. Bowditch, who, notwithstanding his very limited advantages of education, and his engagements, through life, in laborious employments for the support of his family, yet, by his extraordinary genius, and almost equally extraordinary economy of time, made great acquisitions in learning and science, gained a knowledge of the Latin, Greek, Italian, Spanish, French, Portuguese, and German languages, made himself the most eminent mathematician and astronomer that America has produced, and did more for the reputation of his country among men of science abroad, than has been done by any other man, except, perhaps, Dr. Franklin. In 1802, Harvard University conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws. His first publication was his well-known "Practical Navigation," of which the first edition appeared in 1802, while the author was engaged in a seafaring life, in the capacity of supercargo. From that period it has been the standard work on the subject; and in point of practical utility, it is esteemed one of the most valuable works extant. Among his scientific labors were numerous and important communications to the Memoirs of the American Academy; but the great work upon which his fame, as a man of science will principally rest, is his copious and profound commentary upon the Mécanique Céleste of la Place, of which he made the first entire translation, and which he has elucidated in a manner that commands the admiration of men of science. The translation and the commentary comprise four volumes, printed in an elegant style. Dr. Bowditch died, March 16, 1838, aged sixty-five years.

BROWN, Moses, an eminent citizen of Providence, R. I. He was born at that place, September 1738, and was the youngest of four brothers, who were all men of enterprise, and have left honorable memorials of their public spirit and philanthropy. These brothers were among the principal founders of Rhode Island College, since called Brown University. Moses Brown, at the age of 13, left school, his father being dead, and passed his early years in the family of his uncle, Obadiah Brown, an eminent and wealthy merchant of Providence; whose daughter he married, in 1764, and a portion of whose estate he inher-rited by will. In 1763, he engaged in commercial pursuits in connection with his three brothers; and, after ten years, he withdrew from the bustle of trade to that retirement to which his feeble health invited, and which was more congenial to his early formed taste for intellectual pursuits. He was three times married, but his last wife was taken from him many years before his death. Mr. Brown was a Baptist, till 1773, when, at the age of 35, he became a Friend; and, from that time to the close of his long life, he was a firm adherent to the primitive doctrines of the society; exerted a strong influence in all its concerns, both secular and religious; sustained many of its most important offices with dignity and usefulness; was long regarded as the Patriarch of the Society; and was greatly respected and beloved for his many Christian virtues, not only by his own brethren, but by other denominations. This venerable philanthropist was a munificent patron of the Yearly-Meeting Boarding School in Providence, a well endowed institution. He was in accordance with the principles of the religious denomination to which he belonged, a friend of peace, and opposed to slavery in all its forms. He manumitted his slaves, in 1773; was one of the founders, and for many years an efficient member of the Abolition Society of Rhode Island, and was also an active member and liberal supporter of the Rhode Island Peace and Bible Societies. Though his constitution was originally feeble, yet he nearly completed his 98th year; retaining till his last illness, in a remarkable degree, the use of his faculties of body and mind. He spent much of his time in reading and writing, maintained an extensive correspondence, and rarely made use of a clerk or amanuensis. He made his will at the age of 96, a long instrument, exemplifying, in an interesting manner, his attachment to his friends, and his desire to promote the cause of education, philanthropy, and religion. His death took place at Providence, September 6th, 1836.

BURDER, George, author of the Village Sermons, and Secretary of the London Missionary Society, was born in London, June 9, 1752. His early character was remarkable, chiefly for gravity and attention. He studied drawing for a time, with Isaac Taylor, afterwards the excellent minister of Ongar, but his piety appears to have been injured by the society of some of the artists in his employ. In 1773, he entered as a student in the Royal Academy. In 1775, he became a communicant at the Tabernacle Chapel. The next year he became a subscriber and director of the Evangelical Society, and entered upon the study of Greek and Hebrew. He soon after began to labor for the good of souls, by itinerant preaching. He also published, the same year, his title book on early piety, which met with great and unexpected success. He was ordained Pastor of an independent church at Lancaster, October, 29, 1778. In 1783, he removed to Coventry, where his usefulness was more widely extended. He was deeply interested in the establishment of the Evangelical Magazine, in 1793, and of the formation of the London Missionary Society in 1795; and on the death of Rev. John Eyre, of London, in 1803, Mr. Burder succeeded him as Pastor of the Church in Fetter-lane, editor of the Evangelical Magazine, and Secretary of the London Missionary Society. The duties of the latter office he discharged gratuitously until 1827, when age and infirmities compelled him to resign. His labors as a Pastor were much valued, and largely blest, but his publications still were more so. Simple and unpretending as they are, but rich in Evangelical truth, they have been blest to the salvation of thousands in all parts of the world. Of his Cottage Sermons, Sermons for Seamen have been circulated by the Religious Tract Societies. His Village Sermons have also been translated into various languages, and have been the means of the conversion, among others, of many English and Irish clergymen. They well deserve immortality. Mr. Burder also published an abridgement of Owen on the Spirit and notes to Bunyan's Pilgrim and Holy War. This excellent man died May 29, 1832.

BURGESS, Thomas, D. D., Bishop of Salisbury, England. He was the son of a grocer at Odiham, in Hampshire, and was graduated in 1778, at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow, in 1787. He was appointed Bishop of St. David's in 1803, and was translated to the See of Salisbury, in 1825. Bishop Burgess was mainly instrumental in founding the Royal Society of Literature, of which he became, in 1821, the first Vice-President. He was a man of various and extensive learning, and a voluminous author. His publications, which are numerous, relate to various subjects of classical learning, critical and doctrinal theology, and practical religion. He was a devout, exemplary, and zealous prelate; and St. David's College, at Lampeter, founded by him for the education of ministers of the Welch church, is an enduring monument of his benevolence. To this institution he bequeathed the whole of his valuable library, consisting of many thousand volumes. This venerable man died, at Southampton, February 19th, 1837, aged 80 years.

BURR, Aaron, third Vice President of the United States. He was born at Newark, New Jersey, February 6, 1756, and was the son of the Rev. Aaron Burr, the second President of Nassau Hall College, at Princeton, whose father was a native of Germany, and resided after emigrating to this country, at Fairfield, Connecticut. The mother of Aaron Burr was the daughter of the celebrated Rev. Jonathan Edwards, the third President of the same College. His father died in 1757, and his mother in 1758, leaving two children, Aaron and his sister Sarah, who afterwards became the wife of Judge Tappan Reeve, of Litchfield, Connecticut. He was graduated at the College in Pennsylvania, in 1772, at the age of 16; in 1775, in his 20th year, he joined the American army, under Washington, at Cambridge; accompanied General Arnold, as a private soldier, in his expedition against Quebec; after his arrival there, he acted as an Aid-de-camp to General Montgomery; and on his return, in 1776, General Washington invited him to join his family at head-quarters. Some circumstance soon took place, which has not been fully explained, by which Burr forever lost the confidence of Washington; and the hostility of the former to the latter, from that time, was undisguised and unmitigated. In 1777, Burr was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel, and distinguished himself as an able and brave officer; but in March, 1779, he was, on account of the state of his health, compelled to resign his office, and retire from military life. He then devoted himself to the study of law; commenced practice at Albany, in 1782, but soon removed to the city of New York; he became distinguished in his profession; was appointed Attorney General of the state of New York, in 1789; from 1791 to 1797, he was a member of the United States Senate, and born a conspicuous part as a leader of the Democratic or Republican party. At the election of President of the United States, for the fourth Presidential term, Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr had each 73 votes, and the choice was decided by Congress, on the 36th ballot, in favor of Jefferson for President, and Burr for Vice-President. On the 12th of July, 1804, Colonel Burr gave Alexander Hamilton, long his professional rival and political opponent, a mortal wound in a duel. He soon after conceived the project of his mad, and not very well explained enterprise in the western country of the United States; for which he was at length apprehended and brought to Richmond, in August, 1807, on a charge of treason; and after a long trial, he was acquitted. He afterwards returned to the city of New York, practised law to some extent, but passed the remainder of his life in comparative obscurity and neglect. He died, at Staten Island, N. Y., September 14th, 1836, in the 81st year of his age.

BURTON, Edward, D. D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, died January, 19th 1836, in the 42d year of his age. He took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, at Christ Church College, in 1815, was appointed select preacher in the University, in 1824, Bampton lecturer in 1823, and Regius Professor of Divinity in 1829. He was distinguished for his learning, great industry as a student, and uncommon activity in the offices which he sustained; and he was the author of a large number of publications.

CAREY, Lot, an African, born a slave, in Virginia, about the year 1780. In the early part of his life he was profane and much given to intoxication. But, in 1807, he became reformed and joined a Baptist church in Richmond, in that state. At this time he was unable to read; but having a strong desire to read the third chapter of John, on which he had heard a sermon, he procured a New Testament, and commenced learning his letters from that chapter. His progress was rapid. He also learned to write, and manifested a taste for the higher branches of education. It soon became apparent that he possessed talents of a superior grade. He became a Baptist preacher, and such was his fidelity to his master, and so valuable were his services that he saved money sufficient to purchase his own freedom and that of his family. Although now receiving a large salary, he resolved to accompany a colony of emigrants to Liberia, that he might benefit the degraded children of Africa. In 1821, he with his companions, arrived at that degraded country. Here was a fine opportunity for the display of his talents and his pious zeal. To his well directed efforts it was much owing that the existence of the colony was preserved. His agency was duly estimated; and in 1826 he was elected the vice-agent. His succeeding days, however, were few. In the evening of November 8, 1828, as he and others were engaged in making cartridges in the old agency house, a candle was upset which set the powder on fire. The explosion caused the death of Carey and seven others.

CAREY, William, D. D., an eminent Christian missionary, and distinguished oriental scholar. He was born at Paulerspury, in Northamptonshire, in 1761; commenced preaching as a Baptist minister in 1783; in 1793, he embarked as a missionary to India; and in 1799, he took up his residence at the Danish settlement at Serampore, which became celebrated for being the seat of the mission which was sustained by Carey, Ward and Marshman. Dr. Carey's philological labors in preparing grammars and dictionaries of different languages, and in making versions of the scriptures, were immense. He lived to see the sacred text, chiefly by his instrumentality, translated into the vernacular dialects of more than 40 different tribes, and thus made accessible to nearly 200,000,000 of human beings, exclusive of the Chinese empire, in which the labors of the Serampore missionaries have been, in some measure, superseded by those of Dr. Morrison. Dr. Carey, in addition to his extensive philological learning, was well versed in natural history and botany, and made valuable communications to the Asiatic Society, of which he was for 28 years a member; and this society have placed on their records a strong expression of their high sense of his value and merits as a scholar and a man of science—their esteem for the sterling and surpassing religious and moral excellencies of his character, and their sincere grief for his irreparable loss. Dr. Carey died at Serampore, Hindostan, June 9, 1834, in the 73d year of his age.

CHALMERS, Alexander, one of the most eminent biographers that Great Britain has produced. He was born in Aberdeen, in 1759; and having received a classical and medical education, he left his native city about the year 1777, and never again returned to it. He soon after established himself in London; connected himself with the public press and with publishers; commenced a laborious literary life: and no man, it is said, ever edited so many works for the London booksellers. But the work on which his fame as an author chiefly rests is "The General Biographical Dictionary," consisting of 32 volumes, the last of which was published in 1817. Among his latest publications was "a Dictionary of the English Language, abridged from the Rev. H. I. Todd's enlarged edition of Johnson's Dictionary," which was first published in 1820. He died Dec. 10, 1834, in his 76th year. Mr. Chalmers was much esteemed for his amiable, exemplary and religious character.

CHARLES X., King of France. This monarch was the younger brother of Louis XVI. and Louis XVIII., the latter of whom he succeeded on the throne, September 16, 1824. Charles X. or Charles Phillippe de Bourbon, Count of Artois, was born October 9th, 1754. His reign was short. In July 1830, he lost his crown in consequence of issuing two fatal ordinances, one abolishing the freedom of the press, and the other changing the mode of election. He married, in 1773, Maria Theresa, daughter of Victor Amedeus changing the mode of election. He married, in 1773, Maria Theresa, daughter of Victor Amedeus III., King of Sardinia, and by whom he had two sons, the Duke of Angoulême and the Duke of Berri. His private character was exceedingly dissolute till after the middle period of life; his talents were moderate; nor were his manners or his disposition much calculated to gain popularity. On succeeding his brother Louis XVIII., he cherished the arbitrary principles of the old régime: and he lost a throne which common prudence might have enabled him to retain. Latterly, in his retirement, Charles X. appeared as an amiable, warm-hearted, well disposed old man. Having led a very dissipated life when young, his latter years were passed in acts of superstitious mortification, under the direction of his confessors. He constantly wore sackcloth or haircloth next to his skin; he fasted much, and prayed several times in the course of the day; and he frequently imposed upon himself, as a penance for some hasty expression, the remaining several hours without uttering a word. He died at Goritz, in Illyria, November 4th, 1836, in the 80th year of his age.

CHARLOTTE, Princess, daughter of George IV., and heiress apparent to the throne of Great Britain and Ireland, was born 1795, and died November 6, 1817, aged 22. She was married to Leopold, Prince of Saxa Cobourg; and her untimely death in connexion with that of her infant child, clothed the nation in mourning, changed the succession of the throne, and drew forth, among other able funeral discourses, one from the Rev. Robert Hall, which is a master-piece of eloquence, probably never equalled on any similar occasion. When informed of the death of her child, a little before her own, she said, "I feel it as a mother naturally should—" adding, "It is the will of God! praise to Him in all things!" Mr. Hall mentions as traits of her character, that she visited the abodes of the poor, and learned to weep with those who weep; that, surrounded with the fascinations of pleasure, she was not inebriated by its charms; that she resisted the strongest temptations to pride, preserved her ears open to truth, was impatient to the voice of flattery; in a word, that she sought and cherished the inspirations of piety, and walked humbly with her God. This is fruit which survives when the flower withers—the only ornaments and treasures we can carry into eternity."

CHEVERUS, Lefebure de, D. D., Cardinal, Archbishop of Bordeaux. He was born at Mayenne, January 28th, 1768; came to America after the French revolution, and was consecrated first Catholic Bishop of Boston in 1810; returned to France by the invitation of Louis XVIII., and was consecrated Bishop of Montauban in 1823, and Archbishop of Bordeaux in 1826; and was, in 1835; made a Cardinal. He was a man of distinguished talents, and extensive scientific and literary acquirements. He was well versed in Hebrew and Greek; and he read and spoke Latin as a vernacular tongue. He seems to have gained, in all situations in which he was placed, universal confidence and esteem. During his residence in Boston, he sustained the character of a most amiable, exemplary and devout man. He devoted himself with great zeal and assiduity to the duties of his office, not overlooking the meanest of his flock; and he was regarded by Protestants, as well as by Catholics, with sincere affection and high respect. He died, July 19, 1836, in the 69th year of his age.

CLAGGETT, John Thomas, D. D., the first Bishop of the Diocese of Maryland. He was born October 2, 1742, at White's Landing, on the river Pautuxent, in Prince George's county, Maryland. His father, the Rev. Samuel Claggett, was a clergyman of distinguished piety and talents, in Charles county, in the same state. At the period of his death, A. D. 1756, Thomas John, then thirteen years of age, was intrusted to the care of Mr. Philipson of Lower Marlborough, in Calvert county, by whom he was prepared for his collegiate studies, which he pursued at Nassau Hall, Princeton. He graduated there A. D. 1762. He then immediately commenced the study of theology, which he prosecuted with very great success. He repaired to England, and was admitted, by the Bishop of London, to Deacon's Orders, on Sunday, September 20, 1767, and to Priests' Orders, on Sunday, October 11, 1767. On his return to America, he took charge of All Saints' parish, Calvert county, and continued in this cure until the troublous times of our civil revolution. He afterward resided in St. James' parish, Anne-Arundel county, and preached alternately there and in his former parish. During the year 1791, he removed with his family to his large paternal estate at Croom, in Prince George's county, and, until the period of his death, this continued to be his place of residence. After the organization of the Church in the Diocese of Maryland, Dr. Claggett was elected its first Bishop, in the year 1792, and was soon after consecrated, September 17 1792, at the city of New York, by the Right Rev. Dr. Provoost, assisted by Bishops Seabury, White and Madison. His liberal education, extensive reading, retentive memory, commanding and impressive utterance, tender admonitions, affectionate appeals, and faithful exhibition of apostolic order, and of the truth as it is in Jesus, rendered him for many years eminent as a preacher, as a divine, and as a bishop. In the decline of life, however, he became very infirm, and was so little able to perform the duties of his episcopate, as to require the aid of an assistant or suffragan bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Kemp, who was consecrated September 1, 1814. After having presided over the Diocese of Maryland twenty-four years, Bishop Claggett rested from his labors, August 2, 1816, having been an eminently successful teacher of the saving doctrines of the Gospel, and in the language of his successor in the episcopate, "a true and genuine son of the Church."

CLARK, William, General, originally of Virginia, was born the first day of August, 1770, and moved with his father's family to Kentucky, in 1784. They arrived at the Falls of Ohio, where the city of Louisville now stands, on the 4th of March, ensuing, the town then consisting of but a few log cabins, surrounding a fort, but a short time established by General George Rogers Clark, the brother of the deceased. His first regular campaign was made in the year 1788, at the age of eighteen, and his second and third in 1790, as ensign and acting lieutenant. On the 19th of March, 1793, he was appointed, by the President, first lieutenant of riflemen in the 4th sub-legion; and in this capacity he was kept on the various commands until he was appointed adjutant and quarter-master, and given the command of ninety-five-picked riflemen, in which command he remained in active service till 1798. On account of ill health he was then forced to resign; and in the same year visited St. Louis for the first time, hoping that the climate and the Missouri water would assist in restoring his constitution to its natural elasticity and vigor. In 1803 he was tendered by Mr. Jefferson the appointment of Captain of Engineers, to assume joint command with Captain Merriwether Lewis, of the Northwestern Expedition to the Pacific Ocean. This was accepted, and the party left St. Louis for the vast and then unexplored regions between the Mississippi river and the ocean, in March, 1804, under the joint command of himself and Lewis, they being by a special regulation to that effect equal in rank. On this perilous expedition, he was the principal military director, while Lewis, assisted by himself, was the scientific manager. General Clark kept and wrote the Journal, which has been since published, and assisted Lewis in all celestial observations, when they were together. On their return to St. Louis from the Pacific Ocean, in the fall of 1806, Captain Lewis was appointed Governor of the territory then designated as Upper Louisiana, and the place of Lieutenant Colonel of Infantry was offered to General (then Captain) Clark, but he preferred the place of Indian Agent at St. Louis, having become, by his intercourse with the various tribes on the Missouri, well acquainted with the proper course to be pursued towards them, and he remained in this office until he was made Brigadier General for the Territory of Upper Louisiana, under the laws of Congress. During the late war with Great Britain, he was applied to by the War Department to revise the plan of the campaign then going on under General Hull, and was offered the appointment of Brigadier General in the United States Army, and the command then held by Hull; these, however, he refused, being convinced that the operations of this officer were too far advanced to be successfully remedied. In 1813, President Madison appointed him, in place of Governor Howard, resigned, Governor of the territory and Superintendent of Indian Affairs, after having twice refused to be nominated to the first office. He held these offices in junction, until Missouri was admitted into the Union as a State, in 1820. Upon her admission, he was nominated against his consent, as a candidate for Governor but was not elected, being in Virginia at the time of election. He then remained in private life until 1822, when he was appointed by President Monroe, Superintendent of Indian Affairs. As Commissioner and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for a long series of years, he made treaties with almost every tribe of Indians, and in all of them, there appeared the feelings of the philanthropist, as well as a becoming zeal for the government of his country. He was applied to, to accept the office of United States Senator from Missouri, but declined, believing that he could more efficiently serve his country, and the cause of humanity, in the Indian Department than in the national halls of legislation. He was the youngest of six brothers, the four oldest of whom were distinguished officers in the Revolutionary war. One of them fell in the struggle; another was killed by the Indians upon the Wabash, and his brother, Gen. George Rogers Clark is well known to the people of the West. The early history of Kentucky is identified with his, and as long as that noble and proud state maintains her lofty eminence, she will cherish his name, and to do justice to herself, must erect a monument to his fame. General Clark was a resident of St. Louis for more than thirty years, where he died, in September, 1838, aged 68 years.

COBB, Nathaniel R., a Christian, merchant and philanthropist, of Boston, Massachusetts, was born in Falmouth, (now Westbrook,) Maine, November 3, 1798. His father died when he was young, and in March, 1802, he removed with his mother to Plymouth, (Massachusetts). In 1814, he became a clerk to Messrs. Ripley and Freeman, Boston. Here his mind was drawn to God through Christ, and in May, 1818, he was baptized by the Rev. Dr. Sharp, and united with the Baptist Church under his care. In February, 1819, he commenced business, in company with Mr. G. L. Freeman, in which he continued till his death, May 22, 1834, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. In him, men of all classes revered the power and worth of undefiled religion. Mr. Cobb resolved at the commencement of his religious life, that he would serve the Saviour with all his energies in that sphere which was assigned him. He accordingly, in November, 1821, drew up and signed the following remarkable document: "By the grace of God, I will never be worth more than $50,000. By the grace of God, I will give one-fourth of the nett profits of my business to charitable and religious uses. If I am ever worth $20,000, I will give one-half of the nett profits; and if I am ever worth $30,000, I will give three-fourths; and the whole after $50,000. So help me God, or give to a more faithful steward, and set me aside. N. R. COBB."

To this covenant he adhered with conscientious fidelity. God so prospered him that before his death he gave away more than 40,000. Here is the secret of that wonderful liberality which cheered so many institutions and plans of benevolence. He lived on earth in the very spirit of heaven. No wonder that such a man should say in his last moments, "It is indeed a glorious thing to die. Nothing can equal my enjoyment in the near view of heaven. My hope in Christ is worth infinitely more than all other things."

COBBETT, William, an Englishman, distinguished for his eccentricity as a political writer. This extraordinary man was born in 1762, and possessed very few advantages for education. In 1783, he enlisted in the army, which he quitted in 1791, having been five years Sergeant-Major. In 1792, he came to America, and it was here that he first distinguished himself by his pen, by writing under the title of Peter Porcupine. In 1800, he returned to England; and, in 1801, he established a paper in London, entitled "The Porcupine," in which he warmly supported Mr. Pitt; but that paper soon failed, and he afterwards established "The Register," which has continued to the present time. At this time he was powerfully patronized by the ministry; and Mr. Wyndham went so far as to declare in the House of Commons, "that a statue of gold ought to be erected to him." In 1805, from being a zealous Church-and-King man, Cobbett became as eager a radical, and was, for a considerable time a grievous thorn to the ministry. In 1810, for some remarks on a military flogging, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in Newgate. In 1817, he again came to America, and returned in the same year, carrying with him the bones of Thomas Paine. Besides his "Register" and political pamphlets, he published, on different subjects, a variety of works, some of them voluminous. After the passing of the Reform Act, he was returned to Parliament for the new borough of Oldham; but in this place he did not make a brilliant figure. Wm. Cobbett died, June 18, 1835, aged 73 years.

COLERIDGE, Samuel Taylor, an eminent English poet, metaphysician and theologian. He was born in 1773, and was the youngest of four sons, who survived their father, the Rev. John Coleridge, who died in 1782. Young Coleridge, who had but little patrimony left him, was placed at Christ Church Hospital school in London, for education; and at the age of 19 he became a student at the University of Cambridge: and was distinguished as a young man of genius, but of eccentric habits. After leaving the University, in a fit of despair, he enlisted as a common soldier in the dragoons, but his friends obtained for him a discharge. In 1794, he published a small volume of Juvenile Poems; and he soon after commenced a weekly paper, styled "The Watchman." His circumstances were far from being easy, but he was relieved by the generous patronage of Messrs. Josiah and Thomas Wedgewood, who enabled him to finish his education in Germany. After his return to England, he became secretary to Sir Alexander Ball, Governor of Malta. In 1812, he published his essays entitled "The Friend;" "Remorse" appeared in 1813; "Christabel" in 1816; "Biographia Literaria" in 1817; "Sibylline Leaves" and "Zapolya" in 1818; and "Aids to Reflection" in 1825. In early life Mr. Coleridge was, in his political opinions a republican, and in his religious views, a Unitarian; but he afterwards became a moderate Tory, and a zealous advocate of the Church of England. He delivered at various places courses of lectures on Shakspeare that were much applauded; but it was however, in conversation that he was most remarkable. Those who remember him in his more vigorous days can bear witness to the peculiarity and transcendent power of his conversational eloquence. It was unlike any thing that could be heard elsewhere; the kind was different, the degree was different, the manner was different. The boundless range of scientific knowledge, the brilliancy and exquisite nicety of illustration, the deep and ready reasoning, the strangeness and immensity of bookish lore, were not all; the dramatic story, the joke, the pun, the festivity, must be added,—and with these the clerical-looking dress, the thick, waving, silver hair, the youthful-coloured cheek, the indefinable mouth and lips, the quick yet steady and penetrating greenish grey eye, the slow and continuous enunciation, and the everlasting music of his tones,—all went to make up the image and to constitute the living presence of the man. He was accustomed to remark, that with a pen in hand, he felt a thousand checks and difficulties in the expression of his meaning; but, that authorship aside, he never found the smallest hitch or impediment in the fullest utterance of his most subtle fancies by word of mouth. Mr. Coleridge died, July 25, 1834, aged 62 years.

COOTE, Charles, LL. D., an English historian. He was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford; was of a retired disposition; pursued the life of a literary man; was for many years the editor of the Critical Review; and was the author of various works, some of which are the "Elements of the Grammar of the English Language," published in 1788—"History of England from the earliest dawn of record to the peace of 1783" in 1791—"Lives of English Civilians," in 1804—"History of Ancient Europe," in 1815, and, "Continuation of Russell's Modern Europe," in 1815. Dr. Coote died, November 19, 1835, in the 76th year of his age.

CORRIE, Daniel, LL. D. Bishop of Madras. The name of Corrie is associated with the greatest benefactors of British India. Having been nominated Chaplain on the Bengal Establishment, he went to that country towards the close of the year 1806, in the 29th year of his age. This became the field of his labors and of his anxious prayers for the remainder of his life. Consequently his residence in that tropical region embraced a period of nearly thirty years; during which, a succession of individuals, dear to the church, here with him toiled and died. Of the number it may not be amiss to mention the devoted Buchanan, the classic Henry Martyn, Bishop Heber, and Bishop Turner. In their friendship he largely shared; and to the success of their labors he largely contributed. As a token of the estimation in which Bishop Heber held him in 1823, he conferred upon him the appointment of Archdeacon of Calcutta; an appointment which reflected credit on that amiable prelate's judgment, and associated the weight of responsibility and high office with the meekness, humility, fervent piety, and talent of Corrie—thus making them all more influential for the promotion of pure religion, and the good of the church. Archdeacon Corrie, in addition to the more appropriate duties of his office translated Sellon's Abridgement of Scripture, the Prayer Book, and many of the Homilies into Hindoostani. He likewise drew up "Outlines of Ancient History" in English for the benefit of Hindoostani youth. The subject of this article was however destined for still higher honors and responsibilities. An experience of twenty-eight years in India qualified him in an eminent degree for the most prominent station in the church. Accordingly in 1834 he was designated for the Bishopric of Madras; upon which, he revisited England, where, on the 14th June, 1835, his consecration took place. The University of Cambridge conferred on him the Degree of Doctor of Laws; and on the 24th of October in the same year, was landed at Madras, and immediately entered upon his episcopal functions. But his subsequent career of usefulness was short. On the 5th of February 1837 his labors were terminated, and his chastened spirit returned to God who gave it.

CROES, John D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New Jersey, was born at Elizabethtown, in that state, of parents who had emigrated from Germany, on the first day of June, 1762. His father designed to instruct him in some mechanical employment, but finding his early fondness for books, at length gave him the option of learning a trade or procuring an education by means of his own exertions. The son chose the latter alternative. His endeavors in this respect, however, were, for a considerable time, retarded by the war of the revolution. In three or four years after the war commenced, he was called upon to take up arms in the cause of his country, and he continued engaged in this cause, with occasional intervals of rest, till the peace in 1782. He then resumed in earnest, and with that diligence and energy that marked his course through life, the acquisition of a liberal education. By indefatigable perseverance he soon acquired a good knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, at the same time laying the foundation of an unusually accurate knowledge of the English language. Having made these acquisitions, he undertook the business of instruction, thereby riveting more deeply the knowledge he had obtained, and procuring the means of supporting himself while studying divinity. In 1790 he was ordained Deacon, and in 1792 Priest, by Bishop White. The first years of his ministry he spent in Swedesborough in connection with the church of that place; but, in 1801, he received an invitation from Christ, New Brunswick, and St. Peter's Church, Spotswood, to become their pastor, and at the same time was elected principal of the academy in New Brunswick. In 1808, he resigned the charge of the academy, having previously resigned that of the church at Spotswood, and devoted himself solely to the church in New Brunswick. In 1815, he was elected by the Convention of the Church in Connecticut, Bishop of that Diocese; but he declined the appointment. In the same year he was chosen Bishop in his own state, and was consecrated to that office, in November. In this responsible station his industry and zeal were abundantly manifested. Almost every year he visited all the churches in the Diocese, and by his judicious management of the Missionary fund, he assisted in resuscitating several old and decayed congregations, and in establishing several new ones. He died, at his residence in New Brunswick, July 30th, 1832. Bishop Croes was a self-made man—humanly speaking, to himself alone was he indebted for his attainments and his reputation; and the source of these may be traced to the qualities that particularly marked his character—industry, perseverance, a temper never desponding, and a mind unusually sagacious and accurate in its views.

DANE, Nathan, LL. D., an eminent jurist, civilian and patriotic statesman, and a man highly respected for his virtues in private life. He was born at Ipswich, Mass., was graduated at Harvard College, in 1778, and was an able and influential member of Congress in 1785-8. He was the framer of the celebrated ordinance of Congress of 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States, northwest of the river Ohio, an admirable code of constitutional law, by which the principles of free government, to the exclusion of slavery, were extended to an immense region, and its political and moral interests secured on a permanent basis. His practice in his profession was extensive and laborious; and his great work, entitled "A General Abridgement and Digest of American Law," in nine large volumes, 8vo., will remain a proof of his learning and industry, and the Dane Professorship of Law, founded by his munificence at Harvard University, and the Law Hall, for the use of the law professors and students, will be enduring monuments of his desire to promote the interest of the profession of law, and the welfare of the community. He died at Beverly, Mass., Feb. 15, 1834, aged 82 years. Mr. Dane possessed a strong, vigorous, discriminating mind, capable of bestowing a fixed and exclusive attention on any subject under his consideration, and of enduring long continued mental labor. His physical strength corresponded to his mental. He has been heard to say, after he was three score and ten, that he was usually in his study, engaged in reading and writing, fourteen hours in a day.

DRAKE, Nathan, M. D., an English physician and scholar of reputation. He graduated at Edinburgh in 1789, and settled as a physician at Hadleigh in 1792, where he practised 44 years, greatly respected and esteemed for his professional merit and private worth. In the walks of literature, Dr. Drake was a highly respectable and voluminous author. Some of his principal works are, "Literary Hours," 3 vols. 8vo.—"Essays illustrative of the Tattler, Spectator and Guardian," 3 vols. 8vo.—"Essays illustrative of the Rambler, Adventurer, and other periodical papers, to the year 1819," 2 vols. 8vo.—"The Gleaner, a series of periodical essays, selected from authors not included in the British Essayists," 4 vols. 8vo.—"Shakspeare and his Times," 2 vols. 4to.—"Winter Nights," 2 vols. 8vo.—"Evenings in Autumn," 2 vols. 8vo.—"Noon-tide Leisure," 2 vols.

8vo.—and "Mornings in Spring," 2 vols. 8vo. Dr. Drake died, June 7th, 1836, aged 70 years.

DREW, Samuel, one of the most eminent metaphysicians of the present century. He was born in the parish of St. Austell, England, March, 3, 1765. His parents were poor in the extreme, and he of course received but little education, and from childhood was obliged to be constantly employed in labor. At the tender age of eight his father put him out to service, for which he was to receive three half pence a day; but when the wages of eight weeks had accumulated in the hands of his employer, he became insolvent, and the poor boy's first earnings were lost. However, another person took the establishment and he was still employed for two years, at two pence a day. At the age of ten years and a half, he was apprenticed to a shoemaker; and he was long subjected to degradation, which would have prevented most boys from rising to respectability in society. In 1785 Mr. Drew became a journeyman shoemaker, to a man who also carried on the business of binding books. He had already learnt to read, and to write a little; but, now books being thrown into his way, he acquired that taste for reading and study, which rendered him in subsequent life so distinguished for mental endowments. One of the first books which attracted his attention, at this period, was Lock's Essay on the Human Understanding, and it made an impression on his mind never to be effaced. Soon after he fell in with Dr. Franklin's "Way to Wealth," and was delighted with it. In 1787 he commenced the business of his trade on his own account. His sister became his housekeeper; and she observes, "Many were the distressing privations my brother and I underwent the first year. His resolution to owe no man any thing, was unconquerable; and I bore every thing cheerfully for his sake. Though we managed to give the apprentices food enough, we often went with a scanty allowance ourselves. Mr. Drew's business increased, and in the following year, he had, to use his own language, "broken the neck of his difficulties." As his circumstances improved, he began to think more of indulging his propensity for intellectual improvement. First he attempted the study of astronomy, but found his knowledge of arithmetic was too limited. Next his attention was directed to Natural History, but could not obtain the requisite books. Then he resolved on entering the region of metaphysics, which was not attended with similar obstacles. From this time his course was rapidly onward. About the commencement of his 24th year, he became a local preacher with the Methodists and a class leader. His first publication was on Paine's "Age of Reason," which successfully brought him into notice, and procured for him substantial friends. To this succeeded, at irregular intervals, his Essay on the Soul—his Essay on the Identity and Resurrection of the Human Body—his Essay on the Being and Perfections of God—and arguments on the Divinity of Christ—together with many more miscellaneous productions. He died March 29th, 1833, aged 68 years. Since his death, his life has been published, by his eldest son, in a handsome 12mo. volume, which is a most interesting work of its kind. It has been said, that while Mr. Drew was in trade, the kitchen was his study, and his wife's bellows his portable desk. A lady, who delighted greatly in his conversation, says, "I used sometimes to go into his house of an evening to enjoy it; but whenever I saw the bellows on his knee, I knew it was time to retreat—there was no more talking then. It was a sure sign to all of us that he wanted no company."

E

EMERSON, Joseph, an American clergyman, who also became distinguished as a teacher and an author. He was born in Hollis, N. H. Oct. 13, 1777; graduated at Harvard College, 1798; and was ordained pastor of the third Congregational Church in Beverly, Ms. Sept. 21st, 1803. He remained in this relation till in the year 1816. During this period he had three wives—Nancy Eaton, Eleanor Read, and Rebecca Hasseltine. His third wife survived him, and of the second an interesting Memoir was published. Ill health was the principal cause of his relinquishing his connexion with a religious society. Although he maintained, as a clergyman, a character for talents it was chiefly in the business of education that he acquired most reputation. His prominent aim in his labors as a teacher, was to qualify females for being teachers. His first school for this purpose was established in Byfield, Ms., the second in Saugus of that state, and the third in Wethersfield, Conn. The plan was a most important one, and no person in the community was better qualified for carrying it into successful operation. The public appreciated his efforts, and he was liberally patronised. It is questionable whether any one else has done as much as he, in this country, in raising the standard of female education. He had a sufficient degree of intellect and the right kind of enthusiasm, to be a first rate instructor. Moreover, he had the independence to combat and denounce the most popular errors which prevailed in his time on the subject of education. He considered it a criminal waste of time for young persons to spend years, as was common, in studies that were to be of no material advantage to them in subsequent life. In this class of studies he placed an attention to ancient and foreign languages, except in some rare cases; not simply for females, but for young men generally receiving a liberal education. The author of this work had but a small degree of personal knowledge with Mr. Emerson; but, being engaged during much of the same time he was engaged, in the different branches of education, he was led to watch his course; and he can truly affirm that he has known of no other individual, in so many of whose opinions on the subject he heartily concurs. Mr Emerson published various small works; but most of them were rather designed for the benefit of his own pupils than for general use. An exception to this remark will be found in his Evangelical Primer, of which more than 200,000 copies were sold. Such was his desire to make this compend of Christian knowledge as perfect as he could make it, he transcribed the principal portion of it nine times. He died, May 14th 1833, aged 55 years.

ERSKINE John, D.D. an eminent Scotch divine, was born in 1721 and educated at the university of Edinburgh. His father a distinguished barrister and professor of law, wished his son to follow the same profession, thinking his talents of an order to make him an ornament to the bar or the bench; but the son preferred the sacred functions of the pulpit, that he might proclaim to perishing sinners "the unsearchable riches of Christ." At the age of twenty, he published an essay on the moral condition of the heathen world, which gained him great reputation. He maintained that their ignorance or disbelief of the divine perfections and of immortality, could be owing to nothing but negligence or perverseness, not to any insufficiency of evidence. Rom. 1. 20. In 1744, he became minister of Kirkintollock. In 1753, he was translated to Culross; and in 1758, to New Grayfriars church, Edinburgh. Nine years after, he became the colleague of Dr Robertson, at Old Greyfriars; where he remained for twenty-six years. He died, January 19, 1803, at the age of eighty one, leaving behind him a testimony of his worth in his character and writings; which equally display the scholar, the Christian, and the divine. He corresponded with most of the literary men of the day, and among others with Warburton, and enjoyed the friendship of the profound Maclaurin, and president Edwards. He was the author of twenty-five different publications, and the editor of twenty more. His "Theological Dissertations," and "Sketches of Church History," are the most highly valued.

F

was born in 1714, near Shrewsbury. His ancestors who were natives of North Wales, were held in high estimation for their religion and virtue. He entered upon his academical studies, under the superintendence of the celebrated Dr. Philip Doddridge. He was one of the doctor's first pupils; and gained an entire esteem and approbation. On leaving Northampton, he became assistant to Mr. David Some. His services, however, proving acceptable to the dissenters in the neighbourhood of Walthamstow, a place of worship was soon built, and a congregation assembled, which rapidly increased. For many years Mr. Farmer labored at Walthamstow, with increasing popularity; many of the more opulent dissenters either took houses or lodgings in the neighbourhood, for the purpose of attending on his ministry; so that it was soon found necessary to enlarge the meeting house where he preached. Most of this time he occupied both parts of the day; but, on being joined by a suitable colleague, he gave up the afternoon service. As Mr. Farmer declined in years, he gradually relinquished his engagements as a preacher. In 1772 he resigned the afternoon lectures at Salter's Hall, and eight years after, he gave up the Tuesday morning sermon; but he did not leave his church at Walthamstow till a few years later, when he gave up pulpit exercises entirely. He died on the 5th of February, 1787, aged 72, manifesting to all around his deep humility, lively faith, and animated hope of a blessed immortality. Mr. Farmer was the author of several works, in which he displayed much learning and critical sagacity, particularly his "Dissertation on Miracles;" "An enquiry into the nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness;" and "An Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament," in which he endeavoured to prove that these were not cases of real possession, but of persons afflicted with disorders usually attributed to such influence. This publication was answered by the late Mr. Yell one of the tutors of Homerton Academy; and a controversy ensued, in which acrimony of temper was discovered on both sides. Mr. Farmer was rather of a high spirit and hasty temper; but abating these defects, he was a most estimable man.

FARMER, John, A.M., well known throughout New England, as a genealogist and antiquary, was born at Chelmsford, Mass., 12th June, 1789, and was a lineal descendant of Edward Farmer, who emigrated from Ancely in Warwickshire, England, and settled about 1670 at Billerica. Inheriting a feeble constitution, he was unfitted for severe manual labors, and gave his attention in early life to study. In 1805, he entered as clerk in a country store, where he soon found his labors too severe for his health, and afterwards taught school with reputation, and subsequently engaged for a few years in business. He finally gave up active pursuits, and devoted himself extensively to literary and antiquarian researches—with so much zeal and success that he became known as a most thorough and diligent antiquary, and probably the first genealogist in America. He was self-taught, possessed great industry, and his labors in the peculiar departments of learning to which he almost exclusively devoted his power, will long be appreciated. He was a member of various historical and literary bodies, and at the time of his death corresponding secretary of the Historical Society of N. H., of which he was one of the founders. His publications have been numerous, among which the most important are his edition of Belknap's History of N. H., to which he added a body of notes and illustrations scarcely less valuable than the text itself; and his genealogical Register of the First Settlers of New England, published in 1829, a work of vast labor and research, and embracing nearly every family of the first European settlers of this country. Had he published nothing else, this would remain a lasting monument of his industry, patient research, and marvellous accuracy. He died at Concord, N. H., where he had resided since 1821, on the 13th August, 1838, aged 49.

FESSENDEN, Thomas Green, an American author, born at Walpole, N. H., April 22d 1771. He was a most amiable man—had many eccentricities—and was so credulous as to be led into many difficulties and perplexities in the early part of his life. He graduated at Dartmouth college, in 1796; and then went through the regular course of study of law. When in college, one of his Poetical effusions JONATHAN'S Courtship, was so popular as to lead him to indulge freely in the writing of rhyme. This and a taste for literature, rather than for the asperities of his profession, induced him to abandon the latter. In 1801, Mr. Fessenden visited London with a view to some patent right speculation, that had been imposed upon him. Not, however, succeeding in this, and being destitute of cash, he betook himself to his pen as his most natural resource. The result was—"Terrible Tractoration"—a Poem in Hudibrastic verse. It went through successive editions and gained for him much reputation. It is a work of strange and grotesque ideas, aptly expressed; its rhymes are of a most singular character, yet fitting each other as accurately as echoes. On his return to America in 1804, he published a political satire in verse, entitled Democracy Unveiled." He also published other fugitive works of a similar character, from all which he derived but small pecuniary advantage. After various expedients and vicissitudes, in 1822 he became the editor of the New "England Farmer," a weekly journal devoted principally to the diffusion of agricultural knowledge. Having been bred upon a farm, and passed much of his later life in the country, and being thoroughly conversant with the writers on rural economy, he was admirably qualified to conduct such a journal. It was extensively circulated throughout New England, and may be said to have fertilized the soil like the rain from heaven. Besides his editorial labors, Mr. Fessenden published from time to time, various compilations on agricultural subjects, or adaptations of English treatises to the use of the American husbandman. He also edited the "Horticultural Register," and the "Silk Manual." In these useful services he occupied the whole remainder of his life. He died at Boston in 1837, and was buried at Mount Auburn, where a monument is to be erected to his memory.

FLATT, John Frederick Von, D.D., Professor of Theology at Tubingen, was born 1759, and died in 1821. The lectures of Flatt on all of Paul's Epistles, except that to the Hebrews, published from his manuscripts after his death, by King and Hoffman, are marked with brevity, good sense, and a punctilious adherence to the laws of language and the rules of interpretation. Flatt was a divine and commentator of the orthodox school in Germany; and in conjunction with Storr, did much to stem the tide of neology, which so lately threatened to sweep divine truth from the German mind. The joint labors of these two men produced the 'Elementary Course of Biblical Theology, twice published in this country, in a translation by S. S. Schmucker. Besides lectures on Paul's Epistles, already mentioned, Flatt wrote Lectures on Christian Morals, also published after his death, by Steudel; Opuscula Academica, collected by Suskind; and edited, for a time, a magazine devoted to Christian morals and dogmatics.

FREEMAN, James, D. D., Unitarian Clergyman of Boston, and minister of the society worshipping in the Stone Chapel of that city. He was born in Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1759, and was graduated at Harvard College in 1777. In 1782 he was invited to officiate as lay reader, and in 1783 was chosen pastor of the congregation connected with the chapel named. Previous to the revolution this edifice was called King's Chapel, and was used for an Episcopal Church. During the period in which he officiated as lay reader he discarded the doctrine of the Trinity, and the greater part of his hearers adopted his sentiments, and resolved to alter their liturgy and retain him as their minister. The liturgy was accordingly altered so as to be conformed to the Unitarian doctrine, and Bishop Provost having declined to give him ordination, he "was ordained by his society alone, as their rector and minister, Nov. 18th, 1787." Dr. Freeman was a man of talents and learning, and was much esteemed by his people. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and for this society he performed very important services. His reputation as a writer rests principally upon two volumes of sermons, which are written in a style of great simplicity and purity. He died, Nov. 14th 1835, in the 77th year of his age, and the 54th of his ministry.

G

GILLIES, John, LL. D., a distinguished historian, at Brechin, in Scotland, 1747; was educated at Glasgow, and went early in life to London, with a view of making literature his chief pursuit. After spending some time upon the continent of Europe, the Earl of Hopetown invited him to travel with his sons, and in 1777, he settled upon him an annuity for life. After the death of Dr. William Robertson, in 1793, he was appointed historiographer for Scotland, he continued his literary industry to an advanced age; and closed a long and honored life by a death worthy of it,—during the last few weeks of a rapid decline, having shown a mind full of composure, benevolence, and piety. His principal works are the "Orations of Isocrates and those of Lysias, translated;" "History of Ancient Greece;" "View of the Reign of Frederick II. of Prussia;" "Aristotle's Ethics and Politics, translated from the Greek;" "History of the World from Alexander to Augustus;" and "Translation of Aristotle's Rhetoric." Dr. Gillies died, February 15th, 1836, in his 90th year.

GOULD, James, LL. D., an eminent American jurist. He was a native of Branford, Conn.; and graduated at Yale College in 1791. In early life he became distinguished as a lawyer; and was raised to the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of his native state. From this office however he was displaced in 1818, by the adoption of a new constitution. For many years he was associated with Judge Tappan Reeve, as Professor of the Law School at Litchfield, and after the death of Judge Reeve he continued to conduct the school till within a few years of his death, when the state of his health required him to relinquish it. In his manners he was an accomplished gentleman; in his family one of the most amiable and affectionate of men; and in the social circle one of the most refined and agreeable companions. His mind was richly stored with the treasures, not of his profession only, but of ancient and modern classics, and also of the elegant literature of the day. He died, May 11th, 1838, in his 68th year.

GRIFFIN, Edward Dorr, D. D., President of Williams College, Massachusetts, was born at East Haddam, Conn. January 6, 1770. He was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1790, at the age of 20 years. Upon leaving college, he taught an academy at Derby for a few months; and received his theological education under the direction of the second President, Edwards, at New Haven. In 1795 he was ordained Pastor of the Congregational Church of New Hartford, in that state; and continued in this situation for several years. In October, 1801, he was installed as colleague Pastor with the Rev. Dr. McWhorter, over the second Presbyterian Church in Newark, New Jersey. In the early part of 1809 he accepted a call to the Professorship of Sacred Rhetoric in the Theological Seminary, Andover, Massachusetts, and was inaugurated in June of that year. He remained in Andover only till July, 1811, when he removed to Boston, and became the Pastor of Park Street Church. In 1815, he returned to Newark at the invitation of a church which had been formed out of the congregation over which he had before presided. Here he continued a little more than seven years. In 1821 he was elected to fill the office of President of Williams College; and in the autumn of that year he assumed the duties of his new station. For fifteen years he performed these duties in a manner acceptable to the public and creditable to himself; but advanced age and feeble health led him to resign his office in the latter part of the year 1836. He died the 8th of November, 1837, in the 68th year of his age. Dr. Griffin was one of the most eloquent preachers of his time, and he took an active part in the various benevolent objects which characterised it. He published several occasional discourses; and, in 1813, a volume of Lectures, 8vo. pp. 328, delivered in Park Street Church, Boston. Memoirs of his Life are to be published by the Rev. Dr. Sprague of Albany.

GRIMKE, Thomas Smith, a Christian, lawyer, statesman, patriot, scholar, and orator, was a native of South Carolina. He was born at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 26th of September, 1788. He was descended by his paternal grandmother from one of the French Huguenots, who quitted France in consequence of the edict of Nantz, in 1685. His talents in youth were rather solid than brilliant; but he was always remarkable for his industry and wonderfully retentive memory. He graduated at Yale College in 1807.

He became one of the first classical scholars in this country, a qualification which he valued very little in his maturer age. His principal traits of character were piety, benevolence, and independence of mind. He embraced the principles of peace as soon as they were presented to his mind. He was a great contributor, both of his purse and pen, to the American Peace Society, of which he was an able and distinguished advocate. This excellent man, who for several years past has ranked among the first philanthropists of the country, died suddenly, October, 1834, of the cholera, at Columbus, Ohio, on his way home from Cincinnati, where he had been to deliver a literary address. It has been said, (though it seems rather ill chosen language to apply to a man whose soul was so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Christian humility,) "The west knows no prouder grave." Mr. Grimke is perhaps the only man in the United States who declined the title of LL. D.; an honor which had been conferred upon him by Yale College. Mr. Grimke was a member of the Presbyterian Church, though it appears, from his published correspondence he was not satisfied of any scriptural authority for infant baptism. His exertions in favor of the use of the Bible, as a primary classic in all literary education, as well as in promotion of the cause of peace, gave him a high place in the esteem of the Christian public. His published addresses on these subjects are treasures of learning, argument, eloquence, and piety. "In estimating the precise amount of greatness referable to Mr. Grimke's character," says the Rev. Mr. Gilman, "we shall arrive at different results, according to our assumed ideal standard of true greatness. Others may have surpassed him in the power of comprehensive generalization, and of deducing new and striking truths from ordinary subjects. Others may have possessed an imagination more bold and profound, and a taste more critically correct. It is remarkable, however, that in all these qualities, the production of his mind, during the last year of his life, should exhibit a decided advance. Thus at the age of fifty his powers seemed as flexible and improvable as those of a young man, in the same way that his heart continued as enthusiastic and unsophisticated as a child's; and there can be no doubt, that had his life been spared, we should have seen them achieving every year new triumphs in the higher departments of intellect. Others again may have surpassed him in the act of moulding and directing the mass of mankind to their immediate purposes. But if moral energy and sublimity ought to enter largely into our conceptions of true greatness; if an entire fearlessness of personal consequences, in the prosecution of honorable aims; if such freedom from the ordinary workings of selfishness, as prompted him to part with his thousands, while men of wider means, and fair repute to liberality, could only spare their hundreds; if an elasticity of soul, which was never disgusted by disappointment, but meekly acquiesced in the failure of one well-meant project only to start with fresh ardor on another; if these attributes, joined to his admitted literary abilities, the best education of the age, an application which neither knew or sought recoil, and particularly a power of attention which never lost its freshness and interest though divided among a multitude of objects; if all these be constituent elements of greatness, then we are justified in placing Mr. Grimke high on the list of the greatest men, either of our own or any country.

H

HALL, Robert, D. D., one of the most profound and eloquent preachers known to the public. He belonged to the denomination of Baptists; but, such were his acknowledged talents, that his fame was cherished by the whole Christian community—in America and on the continent of Europe, as well as in England, his native land. Not belonging to the established Church of Great Britain, he received his education mostly in private, and was not eligible to the honors of her Universities; but such was the homage paid to his genius, that he received the most unequivocal demonstrations from American Colleges to his intellectual pre-eminence. Robert Hall was born at Arnsby, a village about eight miles from Leicester, on the 2d of May, 1764. His father was Pastor of a Baptist congregation at that place; and he was the youngest of fourteen children. At six years of age he was placed in school, under the charge of a Mr. Simmons; and, at eleven, this conscientious master informed the father of young Hall, that he was quite unable to keep pace with his pupil, declaring that he had been obliged to sit up all night to prepare the lessons for the morning; a practice he could no longer continue, and must therefore relinquish his favorite scholar. Hence he was removed to the boarding school of the Rev. John Ryland; and subsequently to Bristol Academy. In 1780 he commenced preaching; but in the following year removed to King's College, Aberdeen, where he further pursued his studies. In 1783 he became associate pastor with the Rev. Caleb Evans, of the church at Broadmead; and in 1785 was appointed classical tutor of the Bristol Academy. But in 1790 he became the Pastor of the Baptist Church at Cambridge, which station he occupied till in the year 1805, when he resigned it in consequence of ill health and mental derangement. The latter, however, was rather transient than permanent. On his recovery he took charge of another congregation, at Leicester, with which he continued about twenty years; when, in 1826, on the death of Dr. Ryland, he returned to Bristol, and became the Pastor of the Church at Broadmead. Mr. Hall was now in his 62d year. This was his last removal till the close of his earthly labors. He died in 1831. The biographer of Mr. Hall remarks, that his excellence does not consist in the predominance of one of his powers, but in the exquisite proportion and harmony of all. The richness, variety, and extent of his knowledge are not so remarkable as his absolute mastery over it. He moves about in the loftiest sphere of contemplation, as though he were "native and endued to the element." He uses the finest classical allusions, the noblest images, and the most exquisite words, as though they were those words which came first to his mind, and which formed his natural dialect. There is not the least appearance of straining after greatness in his most magnificent excursions, but he rises to the loftiest heights with a child-like ease. His style is bright and lucid as a mirror, and its most highly-wrought and sparkling embellishments are like ornaments of crystal, which even in their brilliant inequalities of surface, give back to the eye little pieces of the true imagery set before them. Mr. Hall has unfortunately committed but few of his discourses to the press. His Sermon on the tendencies of Modern Infidelity is one of the noblest specimens of his genius. Nothing can be more fearfully sublime, than the picture which he gives of the desolate state to which atheism would reduce the world; or more beautiful and triumphant than his vindication of the social affections. His Sermon on the death of the Princess Charlotte contains a philosophical and eloquent development of the causes which make the sorrows of those who are encircled by the brightest appearance of happiness, peculiarly affecting; and gives an exquisite picture of the gentle victim adorned with sacrificial glories. His Discourses on War—On the Discouragements and Supports of the Christian Minister—and on the Work of the Holy Spirit—are of great and various excellence. His works with a memoir of his life have been published by Dr. Gregory, in three large 8vo. volumes.

HART, Oliver, M. A., an eminent minister of Charleston, South Carolina. He was born in 1723, at Warminster, Pennsylvania; baptized in 1740, on profession of his faith; and ordained to the gospel ministry in 1749. The same year he succeeded Mr. Chamber, at Charleston, as Pastor of the Baptist Church, where he labored honorably and successfully for thirty years. Many owned him as a spiritual father, among whom was the late Rev. Dr. Stillman of Boston. Mr. Hart was a self-educated man. His countenance was open and manly; his voice clear, harmonious, and commanding; the powers of his mind were strong and capacious, enriched by a fund of useful knowledge, classical, scientific, and theological; and his taste was elegant and refined. He wrote much devotional poetry. But as a Christian, and a Pastor he was most conspicuous. He walked with God. The doctrines of free and efficacious grace were precious to him. His desire of usefulness was ardent and incessant. He was a prime mover in forming an Association of the Churches. He also originated a society for educating young ministers of the gospel, to enlarged usefulness. In 1775 he was chosen by the Council of Safety to travel, in conjunction with Rev. William Tennent and Hon. William H. Drayton, in the interior, to conciliate the inhabitants of South Carolina to the measures of congress. In consequence of his successful efforts in this way, he was obliged to leave Charleston, in 1780, to avoid falling into the hands of the British. He settled at Hopewell, New Jersey, the same year, where he remained till his death, in 1795, at the age of seventy-two.

HAYNES, Lemuel, a coloured clergyman, who was for many years, minister of a large and respectable congregation of people, in Rutland, Vermont, almost exclusively white. He was born at West Hartford, Connecticut, July 18, 1753. His father was of unmingled African extraction, his mother a white woman. When five months old, he was bound as a servant to Deacon David Rose of Granville, Ms., till he was twenty-one years of age. He was treated with singular kindness by his master and mistress, and was carefully instructed in the principles of the Christian Religion. As a servant boy, Haynes was strictly faithful. At length, he discovered such prudence in the management of his master's business, that the superintendance of it was almost wholly committed to him. The remark was often made, that Lemuel Haynes got his education in the chimney corner. While his comrades were sporting in the streets, and even round the door, you might see him sitting on his block with his book in his hand. Evening after evening, he plied his studies by fire light, having laid in a store of pine knots for the purpose. He could refer with nearly infallible accuracy to the book, chapter, and verse, for any particular passage of scripture. And he could repeat large portions of Young's Night Thoughts, and of Watt's Psalms and Hymns. With such indications of a sound mind he was encouraged to pursue his studies; and very soon became a good Latin and Greek scholar. He was ordained in 1788, and died in 1833, in the 80th year of his age. It has been justly remarked, that Haynes triumphed over three most formidable obstacles—illegitimacy—color—and want of early school education.

HEMANS, Mrs., the most celebrated female poet of her time. Her original name was Felicia Dorothea Browne. She was born near Liverpool, and was married at an early age; but her married life, after the birth of five sons, was clouded by a separation from her husband. In private life Mrs Hemans was amiable, and possessed of the most eminent virtues of her sex. Some of her principal works are her "Seige of Valencia," "Forest Sanctuary," "Records of Women," "Songs of the Affections," "National Lyrics and Songs of Music," and "Scenes and Hymns of Life." She died at Dublin, May 16, 1835.

HENRY, William, M. D., an English chemist of great reputation. He finished his education at the university of Edinburgh, where he attended the lectures of the eminent chemist Dr. Black, and was the associate and friend of Mackintosh, Brougham, and Jeffrey. He was intended for the medical profession; but, on account of very delicate health, he was induced to relinquish it, and to connect himself with his father in the business of manufacturing chemist. Soon after the termination of his collegiate education, he delivered at Manchester a course of lectures; and the notes of these lectures led to the publication, in 1799, of a small volume on the science. This work, which was subsequently enlarged, has passed through numerous editions, and has been highly esteemed and much used, both in England and America. Dr. Henry was an elegant writer, and his character of Priestly, Wollaston, and Davy, have been much admired as compositions. In private life, Dr. Henry possessed qualities calculated to excite and rivet esteem and admiration. He was distinguished for hospitality; his manners were modest and engaging; and his conversation peculiarly attractive and insinuating. He died, August, 30, 1836, aged 61 years.

HILL, George, D. D., a divine of the church of Scotland, was born at Saint Andrews, in 1748. He was educated in his native place, where he obtained the Greek professorship of St. Salvador's College, and that of divinity in succession. He subsequently became principal of St. Mary's, chaplain to the king for Scotland, and fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. He first appeared as an Author in a volume of sermons, London, 1795. In 1803, was published an octavo volume, entitled "Theological Institutes," by the Rev. George Hill, D. D.; and in 1812, "Lectures on portions of the Old Testament, illustrative of the Jewish History," one volume octavo. But his greatest work, and that by which he will live in the recollection of posterity, is his "Lectures in Divinity," delivered to the students, while principal of Saint Mary's College, Saint Andrews. These lectures were given to the public in 1821, in three volumes, octavo, with a short preface by his son. The plan is sufficiently comprehensive, and the execution every where discovers the hand of a master. Dr. Hill's doctrinal sentiments were in strict consonance with the standard of the church of Scotland; that is, they corresponded with those of Calvin and Knox. A second edition of this valuable work was published in 1825.

HOGG, James, styled "the Etrick Shepherd," was born in Etrick Forest, in the county of Selkirk, Scotland, January, 25th, 1772. His parents were very poor; he attended school in his childhood so as merely to learn to read correctly; and was employed in his childhood and youth as a cowherd and a shepherd's boy. He began to write songs and ballads about the year 1796; and the first published effort of his art of ballad-writing, "Donald Macdonald," appeared in 1801. After publishing various other matters, he planned and produced, in 1813, his most celebrated poem, "The Queen's Wake," which in a short time passed through five editions, and raised its author to a high standing as a poet, and caused his society to be sought by the learned and great. His other principal publications were, "Madoc of the Moor,"—"Poetic Mirror"—"Brownie of Bodsbeck"—"Winter Evening Tales"—"The Three Perils of Man"—"The Three Perils of Woman"—"Confessions of a Sinner"—"A Queer Book"—"Queen Hynde"—"Shepherd's Calendar"—"Altrive Tales"—"Lay Sermons"—"Domestic Manners of Sir Walter Scott." He died, November 21, 1835, aged 63 years.

HOLMES, Abiel, D. D. LL. D., a divine and author extensively known in the United States and in Europe. He was born in Woodstock, Connecticut, 1768; graduated at Yale College 1783; from November, 1785, to June, 1791, was pastor of a congregational church at Midway in Georgia; and in 1792 he became pastor of the First Church in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he remained the rest of his life. Dr. Holmes was highly respected for his talents, learning, and character; and his influence was felt in various benevolent and literary societies of which he was a member. His most considerable literary production, entitled, "The Annals of America," in two volumes, 8vo., is one of the most valuable historical publications that has been written in this country; and it has the high reputation of an accurate, judicious, and elaborate work. It was first published in 1805; in 1803, an edition was printed in England; and in 1829, a new and much improved edition was published at Cambridge. His life of President Stiles was published in 1798. His other publications, consisting of sermons and historical disquisitions, are nearly thirty in number. He died, June, 4, 1837, aged, 74.

HOSACK, David, M. D. LL. D., an eminent physician of New York. He received his education at Edinburgh; was long at the head of the profession in New York; had a very extensive practice; and was an eloquent and able teacher as a professor of the theory and practice of physic in the New York Medical College. He was held in high estimation as a man of talents, learning, and worth; was a liberal promoter of the arts and sciences; and was the author of the History of the Erie Canal, and of the Life of his friend De Witt Clinton, formerly governor of New York. Dr. Hosack died suddenly of apoplexy, Dec. 22, 1835, aged 66.

HUGHES, Joseph, D. D., originator and secretary of the British and Foreign Bible society. The day of Mr Hughes' birth we have not ascertained; the year was 1769, the place, London. His father, who, if not a Welshman, was of Welsh extraction, was a member of the Baptist church in Wyld street, over which Dr. Stennett at that time presided. The parents of young Hughes, being in respectable circumstances, gave him the rudiments of a good education. He was taken by them to the house of God, and the grace of God at an early period influenced his heart. Evincing talents for the ministry, and being in other respects fitted to become a candidate for that office, he was received, at a youthful age, into the Baptist academy in Bristol, which was then under the direction and management of Dr. Caleb Evans, assisted by the celebrated Robert Hall. Throughout the whole of the trials and conflicts which Mr. Hall endured at Bristol, during that period, Mr. Hughes was his constant and invariable friend. A great cordiality subsisted between them to the end of life. Having studied at Bristol for some time, Mr. Hughes proceeded to Edinburgh University, in which he augmented his learning and took the degree of M. A. From the northern capital he returned to Bristol, where his classical attainments procured for him the appointment of tutor in that department, thus succeeding his friend Hall. He continued to act as classical tutor, until 1795, when, as Dr. Rippon informs us, the declining state of his health obliged him to leave Bristol. Soon after, he received a call from the Baptist church at Battersea, near London, which he accepted; removing thither in the month of July, 1796, and remained there to the end of his protracted and valuable life. He died at his house at Battersea, on Thursday, October 3, aged sixty-four, 1833. "Few individuals," say the London Christian Guardian, "can be named, who have been more honored as the instrument of extensive usefulness than Mr. Hughes. The Religious Tract Society, the Bristol and Foreign Bible Society, and the London Hibernian Society, were principally, the Bible Society indeed almost entirely, the result of his suggestions. His name ought therefore to be had in everlasting remembrance." To the piety, zeal, sound judgment, and unwearied labors of this exemplary servant of God, the Bible Society owes, under the divine blessing, a very large measure of its prosperity. Dr. Hughes was a Dissenter and a Baptist; but he was a man of such Christian moderation and candor, that he never failed to conciliate good men of every name.

HURD, Richard, D. D., an eminent prelate and writer, the son of a farmer, was born, in 1720, at Congreve, in Staffordshire; was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge; and, after having been rector of Hurcaston, preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and archdeacon of Gloucester, was raised, in 1767, to the bishopric of Litchfield and Coventry, and, soon after, was appointed preceptor to the Prince of Wales and duke of York. In 1781 he was translated to Worcester, and in 1783, he declined the see of Canterbury. He died in 1808. Among his works are, Sermons; Commentaries on Horace's Art of Poetry; Dialogues and Letters on Chivalry and Romance. He was the bosom friend of Warburton; and his friendship for that eminent man (which has been censured as of somewhat too subservient a nature) led him to attack Dr. Jortin in a pamphlet. He also wrote a biographical sketch of Warburton, edited an edition of his writings, and published a volume of his Correspondence.

I

IVES, Thomas Pointon, an eminent merchant, Providence, R. I., was born in the town of Beverly, Massachusetts, April 9th, 1769. When only four years of age, his father died, leaving him to the care of his mother. As she did not long survive, he was committed to the charge of relatives, then residing in Boston. In one of the public schools of that city he acquired the elements of an education; and, through life he neglected no opportunities amid the intervals of business for acquiring those intellectual embellishments so desirable in the accomplished merchant. When thirteen years of age, he became a clerk to the late Nicholas Brown, of Providence, then an enterprising and opulent merchant of that place. Such was the confidence placed in him, that when only a youth, to his supervision was confided a principal agency of the mercantile affairs of that house. Mr. Brown died in 1791; and, in the following year, Mr. Ives married his only surviving daughter, and became associated in business with his only surviving son, under the firm of Brown and Ives. This firm for more than forty years has been extensively and advantageously known; and, in the season of commercial prosperity, pushed their enterprises in every quarter of the world. Nor is it too much to say, that their uncompromising adherence to the principles of high mercantile probity, has contributed, in no small degree, to elevate, at home and abroad, the character of the American merchant. Mr. Ives, through life, was remarkable for patient, untiring industry. He performed, year after year, an amount of labor which would have tasked severely the powers of almost any other man. Though thus devoted to business, and thus patient of toil, Mr. Ives was a stranger to the sordid love of accumulation. He felt his grave responsibility as a moral being; and, his frequent and unostentatious charities would, no doubt with those who well knew him, make an aggregate amount almost incredible to the public. The cause of literature is much indebted to his benefactions. One of the principal Halls of Brown University, an edifice that in size and durability, will compare with the best of the kind in the United States, was erected entirely by his munificence; and his hand was always open to the wants of that institution. Its library, and its philosophical apparatus, both shared largely in his fostering care. Such an example of devotion to one of the best interests of man and of his country, should be distinctly and honorably inscribed on the pages of his country's history. The fame of such deeds should be associated with that of patriots and philanthopists to the latest generations. Mr. Ives died, April 30th, 1835, aged sixty years.

IVIMEY, Joseph, Secretary of the Baptist Irish society, and author of the History of the English Baptists, was born in 1773, and died February 8, 1834, in the sixty-first year of his age. He was, we believe, a graduate of the Bristol institution, and for twenty-nine years pastor of the Baptist church, Eagle street, London. He is characterised as a faithful and laborious servant of Christ. He published Bunyan's Pilgrim, with Notes; the Life of Bunyan; a Treatise on Baptism and Communion; the Life, Times, and opinions of Milton; but the great work of his pen was his History of the English Baptists, in four volumes octavo, the first volume of which appeared in 1812, and the last in 1832. This work is said by Robert Hall to be written in a perspicuous, lively, and unaffected style, to abound in curious and valuable information, hitherto little known to the religious public; drawn up with great care and impartiality, and to constitute a permanent monument of the author's talent and devotedness to the cause of religious truth and liberty.

J

JACOBI, Frederic Henry; a very distinguished German philosophical writer; born at Dusseldorf in 1743. He was intended by his father to succeed him in his mercantile business; but, having studied at Geneva, and become intimately acquainted with some of the most celebrated scholars and productions of the day, his own ardor and taste for letters were so much excited, that, after a short time he gave up business and soon commenced author. His Letters on Spinoza appeared in 1785, and produced considerable sensation. From this time he gave himself to metaphysical studies, with increased zeal and industry. In 1804 he was made president of the Bavarian academy at Munich, the salary of which office, though he resigned the office itself in 1813, he retained till his death in 1819. 'He has been called the German Plato, on account of the religious glow in his metaphysical writings.' His views were opposed to those of the dogmatic Mendelssohn, the critical Kant, the idealizing Fichte, and the pantheistic Schelling. He was averse to all systems of philosophy save his own, to which he contrived to give the existence of a brief hour, when it, too, disappeared from the German mind, like its predecessors. He wrote Woldemar, a philosophical novel, 1794, and David Hume on Belief, or Idealism and Realism; besides miscellaneous writings. He was of the class of naturalists, so called.

JONES, John, LL.D., a unitarian divine and learned philological writer, who was a native of Carmarthenshire. He was educated at the dissenting new college, Hackney, and became tutor of an Academy in South Wales. Thence he removed to Plymouth-dock, as pastor to a unitarian congregation; and he subsequently held a similar situation at Halifax in Yorkshire. At length he took up his residence in London, where he employed himself in literary pursuits and private tuition. His death took place January 10, 1827. Among his numerous publications are, "A Development of Remarkable Events calculated to restore the Christian Religion to its Original Purity, and to Repel the Objections of Unbelievers," 2 vols. 8vo: "Ecclesiastical Researches, or Philo and Josephus proved to be Historians and Apologists of Christ, of his Gospel, and of his Followers," 8vo; "Illustrations of the Four Gospels, founded on Circumstances peculiar to our Lord and his Evangelists," 8vo; a "Greek and English Lexicon;" "Greek and Latin Grammars;" and other works on education.

JOHNSTON, BRYCE, D.D., an eminent Scottish divine was born at Annan, in Dumfries-shire, in 1747. He received the elementary principles of his education at the parochial school. In 1662, he entered on his academical studies at the University of Edinburgh. In 1771 he was appointed minister of Holywood. In 1786 he published a sermon entitled, "The Purpose for which Christ came into the World;" and in the same year the University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1794 appeared his "Commentary on the Revelation of Saint John the Divine, 2 vols. 8vo. In 1797 he published a Sermon on the "Divine Authority and Encouragement of Missions from the Christians to the Heathens;" and 1801. "An Essay on the Influence of Religion or Civil Society and Civil Government." Dr. Johnston was among the first to second Sir John Sinclair's patriotic views in drawing up the statistical account of Scotland; and from the materials furnished by him the account of Holywood, was prepared, which, with those of three other parishes, were circulated as specimens of the intended publication. In the year 1794 he drew up, for the Board of Agriculture, a "General View of the Agriculture of the Country of Dumfries, with Observations on the means of its Improvement." He was also consulted by them on the best means of preventing a return of those calamities which had been felt in the years 1799, 1800, and 1801. As a landed proprietor being associated with the freeholders of his native country, he had opportunities of promoting its general improvement and good government. He died in 1805, leaving a volume of sermons prepared for the press, which were published at Edinburgh in 1807, with an account of the life, character, and writings of the author, by his kinsman, the Rev. John Johnston.

K

KEMP, James, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the state of Maryland, was born, in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 1764. At an early age he was sent to the Grammar school of Aberdeen, and in 1782 was transferred to Marischal College. He continued to pursue his studies with the utmost diligence, and was distinguished through all the steps of his collegiate course. At this time Marischal College could boast of some of the ablest men of the age, and the subject of this article had the advantage of the instruction of professors Skein, Copland, Hamilton, Beattie, and Campbell. He took his degree in 1786. Anxious, however, to avail himself of all the advantages of the institution, he continued his studies, attending the celebrated Dr. Campbell's lectures on divinity, and applying himself to the acquisition of the various branches of ornamental learning, not usually embraced in a collegiate course. In April, 1787 he embarked for the United States. Here he was soon employed as private tutor in Dorchester county, Eastern Shore of Maryland, and during the two years passed in this situation, continued to prosecute his theological studies. Having left the Presbyterian communion, in which he was educated, in 1789 he was admitted to Holy Orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In the following year he became Rector of Great Choptank parish; and, in 1813 he succeeded the Rev. Dr. Bend as associate Rector with the Rev. Dr. Beasley, of Saint Paul's Parish, Baltimore, having previously received the degree of Doctor of Divinity, from Columbia College, in New York. Being elected by the Convention of the Church of Maryland, in 1814, to act as Suffragan Bishop, during the life of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Claggett, and to succeed him in case of survivorship, he was consecrated to the Episcopal office, September 1st, of the same year. The jurisdiction of the Church of the Eastern Shore was committed to him as his peculiar province until 1816; when upon the death of Bishop Claggett, he succeeded him as diocesan, and continued to discharge the duties of the office until his sudden and most lamented death, on the 28th October 1827. This melancholy event was occasioned by the overthrow of a stage coach in which he was returning from Philadelphia, whither he had gone to participate in the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Dr. H. U. Onderdonk. His injury thus received was such, that he died on the morning of the third day following. Bishop Kemp was a man of great modesty and was scrupulously averse to every thing like literary ostentation, but he was esteemed one of the best scholars in the Church.

KNAPP, George Christian, D.D., Professor of Christian theology at Halle, was born in 1753, and educated in the university at that place, under the eye of his father, who preceded him in the chair of theology, and was a man of sound piety and orthodox views. In 1775, not long after he had completed his studies at Halle, he began to lecture in the university upon Cicero, and on portions of the Scriptures. In 1777, he was appointed professor extraordinary, and ordinary professor, five years after. Besides this, he shared with Niemeyer the superintendence of Francke's celebrated Institutes, for more than forty years. His Lectures on Christian Theology, translated by Leonard Woods, Jun., and published 1831—1833, were first delivered in 1789, and received with high approbation, which increased as they were enlarged and corrected by successive revisions. He at first showed some leaning to the doctrines of the neological school, which took its rise about the time he came upon the stage, but ultimately freed himself from their toils; and in his works, as well as in his private life, he became the distinguished advocate and friend of strictly evangelical views and principles. In 1797, he published his well known and highly-useful edition of the New Testament, in which, for the most part, he followed Griesbach, and which has passed rapidly through several editions. His Scripta varii Argumenti contains fourteen dissertations, which, says Niemeyer, 'for solid learning, lucid and forcible reasoning, and purity of diction, place their author in the first rank of biblical critics.'

KNAPP, Samuel Lorenzo, LL. D. an American author, who wrote extensively on various subjects, particularly Biography. It has been said that he probably produced more obituary notices of his friends and acquaintances than almost any other man living. Many of them are valuable additions to the literature of our country. He had a remarkably good memory, and a very general knowledge of the men and events of his day; and as his colloquial powers were of the first order, he was a most interesting companion. Mr. Knapp graduated at Dartmouth college, N. H. in the year 1804; and was by profession a lawyer. As such he acquired in the early part of his life a desirable eminence. He did not, however, derive those pecuniary advantages from it which he anticipated, and which he well deserved. He was induced to take part in the political labors and excitements of his time, and was consequently, like many others under similar circumstances, obliged to spend the latter part of his life in poverty. At different periods, he was an inhabitant of Newburyport, Boston, and New York. His labors, with his pen, were frequently for means on which to subsist; and hence many of his productions carry with them marks of haste. Had he been more eligibly situated he might have ranked with the first scholars of the age; and notwithstanding the disadvantages alluded to under which he wrote, many of his works will be preserved by posterity. As a man of kind and benevolent feelings he will long be remembered by his personal friends. He died at Hopkinton, Massachusetts, in July 1838, aged 54 years.

KNOWLES, Rev. James Davis, a Professor in the Baptist Theological Institution at Newton, Massachusetts. He was the son of a respectable mechanic of Providence, Rhode Island, where he was born in the month of July 1798. At the age of twelve years his father died, and soon after he was placed as an apprentice in the printing office of the Providence Gazette. Even while in this humble station, he made numerous contributions, in prose and poetry, to the news-papers of the day. Several of his juvenile productions, transcribed by his brother in order to avoid detection, were sent to the office in which he was employed, and published in the Gazette. Thus, he enjoyed, in secret, the satisfaction of hearing his first fruits of authorship warmly commended by competent judges, and by them ascribed to some of the practised writers of his native city. On a subsequent occasion, when connected with another news-paper establishment, there appeared a series of literary criticisms, which excited much interest, and were attributed to Professor Goddard, one of the most elegant Belles Lettres scholars of the country; but, at a proper juncture he magnanimously announced them to be the production of young Knowles. This led to a new era in his life. His reputation for superior talents was now firmly fixed; and measures were speedily taken to furnish him with a classic education. Accordingly he graduated at Columbian college, D. C. and immediately became a tutor in that institution. In this situation he pursued his theological studies; and, in October 1825, he was ordained pastor of the second Baptist church, Boston. Here he remained till entering, in the autumn of 1832, on the duties of Professor of Pastoral Duties and Sacred Rhetoric, in the Theological Institution at Newton. He died suddenly of the Small Pox, the 9th of May 1838. He published a Memoir of Mrs. Judson, the distinguished missionary lady; and also a Memoir of Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island. Mr. Knowles wrote with extraordinary facility; and when in a printing office he sometimes embodied his thoughts without the intervention of either pen, ink, or paper. On one occasion he was known to arrange his ideas in the composing-stick with as much rapidity as he could select the types and adjust them. The article thus composed was so distinguished for vigor of thought and beauty of expression, that it was transcribed into the columns of the National Gazette, then edited by our well known countryman, Robert Walsh, LL. D.

KOPPE, John Benjamin, D. D., Professor of theology at Gottingen, and afterwards court preacher at Hanover; born 1750; died 1791. In the Novum Testamentum Koppianum, which derives its name from him, the plan, which is excellent, and a small part of the execution, are his; but he did not live to complete the work. The plan is to give a corrected edition of the Greek text, mostly agreeing with Griesbach, with critical and philosophical notes on the same page, with prolegomena to each book, and excursions on the more difficult passages. On this plan Hoppe gave a volume on the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians, and another on the Epistle to the Romans, which closed his labors. Heinrichs, in continuation of the original design of Koppe has published the Acts, and all the remaining Epistles of Paul, except those to the Corinthians; and Pott has published the Epistles of Peter, and that of James. Koppe is esteemed a safe and judicious critic; Heinrichs and Pott less so. Koppe's Romans has been republished by Ammon, the well known neologist, with characteristic notes of his own.

KRUSEMARK, Baron De, a Prussian general and statesman, descended of a family distinguished for military services. Having acquired a knowledge of diplomatic details, and the interests of different courts, he was employed in several missions by the court of Berlin. In 1806 the king of Prussia sent him to attempt the negotiation of peace with Bounaparte; and not succeeding, he was despatched to Saint Petersburg, where he formed a coalition which led to the treaty of Tilsit. In the course of 1809 he was appointed ambassador to the court of France, and he sustained that function in 1813, but subsequent events obliged him to quit the country. A correspondence ensued between Baron Krusemark, Prince Hardenburgh, and the duke of Bassano, which has been preserved. He died in the year 1821.

LUSK, John, an aged soldier, deserving notice, as furnishing some important facts in regard to human physiology. He died in Warren county, Tennessee, June 8th 1838, at the advanced age of one hundred and four years. He was born on Staten Island, N. York, on the 5th of November, 1734, and was of Dutch extraction. Mr. Lusk was in regular service for well nigh sixty-years! He commenced his career in the army in the war Acadie, commonly called the French war, when about twenty years of age; and served through the whole of it. He was a soldier at the siege of Quebec, fought in the memorable action of the Plains of Abraham, seventy-nine years ago—saw the brave General Wolf fall; and participated in all the sufferings and hardships of that arduous and memorable campaign. He was also at the conquest of Acadie, now called Newfoundland, by Gens. Amherst and Shirley; and assisted in the dispersion of the captured French through the colonies of New England, by the Anglo-Americans. Mr. Lusk early enlisted in the war of the Revolution, and fought like a soldier and a patriot till its close. He was attached to the expedition to Canada under General Arnold—was at the building of Fort Edward, and was there wounded. He was in the battle of Saratoga where Burgoyne surrendered, and was at the siege of Yorktown, and had the singular and remarkable fortune to see Cornwallis surrender his sword to Gen. Washington. On the restoration of peace, the old soldier laid down his musket and his knapsack for awhile, but he did not remain long in inactivity. The “piping times of peace” were no times for him. He left “inglorious ease,” as he esteemed it, on the first opportunity, and enlisted in the army of Gen. Wayne, against the Indians, nothing daunted by the terrors of the wilderness or the stratagems of the powerful and wily foes, though he had already weathered the storms of sixty winters. At the close of this brilliant and successful campaign, he joined the regular army under Col. Butler, and was stationed at West Point in New York, now called Kingston. While at this station he became renowned for his skill in catching fish from Clinch river. But at last the brave old man, being worn down with age and infirmities, was discharged as unfit for duty when near 80 years of age. He left the army in entire destitution, and subsisted for several years upon the cold charities of the world, together with the little pittance he earned by his daily labor as a broom maker. On the passage of the Pension Law in 1818, he availed himself of its privileges, and from that time has been furnished with all the necessaries of life. Mr. L. retained to the last all his faculties except that of sight, which for the last ten years had been growing dim. He was a man of remarkable strength of constitution, and elasticity of frame. He never had a spell of sickness in his life! He was in the habit of walking to the town of Mc Minville, a distance of seven miles and back again on the same day, and this too after he had reached one hundred years of age—retaining the perfect upright form and firm step and movement of a soldier till the last. Thus lived and died one of the most remarkable men of the age. He was witness to more remarkable events perhaps, than any man living. What revolutions have rolled over the earth since he was born! He was almost coeval with our colonial history. He was an old man when this nation commenced its career. He has seen empires rise and fall, thrones demolished, and new kingdoms spring to existence. Since he hung upon his mother's breast, twenty-five hundred millions of the race have lived and died.

M

MACON, Nathaniel, long a distinguished member of Congress from North Carolina. He was elected a member of the 2d Congress in 1791, and continued a member of the House till 1815, when he was transferred to the Senate, of which he continued a member till 1828, when he resigned and retired to private life; having been 37 years a member of the House or Senate, a longer period than any other man; and for several years what is called the father of the House. He was speaker of the House of Representatives in the 7th, 8th, and 9th Congress.” During the long, and through all the exciting periods of his public life,” says the Warrenton Reporter, “though always a conspicuous party man, no one of any party ever questioned his integrity, or the purity of his motives; and he has descended to the grave full of years and with universal respect.” He was the bosom friend of Jefferson and Madison; and no one was more devoted to him than John Randolph. Mr. Randolph in the last paper which he wrote for his will, after enumerating several bequests to his friend, he characterises him as “the best, and purest, and wisest man that I ever saw.” He died June 29, 1837, aged 79 years.

McADAM, John Loudon, the celebrated introducer of the system of road-making known by his name. He was the son of James McAdam of Waterhead in Scotland, but passed a part of his early life with an uncle by whom he was adopted, in America, where he remained till the close of the revolutionary war. It was in his 60th year that he commenced his public career as a reformer of roads, by means of which he became a great public benefactor, and he has made his name as familiar as a household word. He received from the British government, in two instalments, £10,000, as a reward of the improvements which he originated. He resided for some time at Bristol, where he was highly respected. He died, Nov. 26, 1836, aged 80 years.

M'ALL, R. S. LL. D. A distinguished English Methodist minister, born in August, 1792. He was educated, for the profession in which he became so eminent, at Hoxton Academy; and, even there, his strength of intellect, acuteness of argumentation, and extraordinary facility of expression attracted the notice of all who knew him. In 1815 he was called to be pastor of a congregational meeting in the Macclesfield Sunday School, and in a few years it was found necessary to build a large chapel for the accommodation of the crowds attracted by his eloquent and powerful discourses. He remained twelve years in this place, during which time his reputation for talents extended much beyond the limits of his parish. In January, 1827, he removed to Manchester, where he took charge of a congregation in Mosley street, and here continued his ministrations, interrupted only by occasional debility, till within a few months of his death. His sermons were highly attractive, being always argumentative, always eloquent, always distinguished for beauty of composition. Dr. McAll died in 1838, aged 46 years.

McRIE, Thomas, D. D., a distinguished divine and ecclesiastical antiquary of Edinburgh. His theology and sermons assimilated him to his covenanted forefathers two centuries ago. He was distinguished for his patient research, candor and ability, as an ecclesiastical historian; and he produced several works which have a high reputation. His "Life of Knox" was published in 1812; the "Life of Andrew Melville" in 1819; the "History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy in the 16th century, in 1827; and a similar History of the Reformation in Spain in 1829. He died August-5, 1835, aged 63 years.

McLEAN, Archibald; Founder of the Baptist churches in Scotland; born 1732; author of a Paraphrase and Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews. 'Not a work of imagination, but of judgment. It does not deal in conjectures or random interpretations, but in solid, judicious investigation—Uniformly calm, serious, and scriptural.'

MADISON, James, D. D.; was born August 27, 1749, near Port Republic, in Virginia; and his father was the District Clerk of West Augusta. Having pursued his preparatory studies in Maryland, he entered William and Mary College, Virginia, where he was distinguished for his classical attainments. After taking his degree in 1768, he prosecuted his favorite studies with such success, that he became a successful competitor for the Botetourt gold medal, which he gained in 1772. He studied law with the celebrated Chancellor of Virginia, George Wythe; and was licensed to practice at the bar. He soon afterwards turned his attention to theology, and was admitted into holy orders. In 1773, he was chosen Professor of Mathematics in William and Mary College; in 1777, being then only 28 years of age, he was elected President of the College, and very soon he visited England, on subjects connected with his literary pursuits. In 1788, as Bishop elect of Virginia, he went again to England for Episcopal ordination, and was consecrated at Lambeth, September 19, 1790. On his return home, he united the performance of his duties as bishop, with those of President of the College, and acting Professor of Mathematics and Philosophy. Until the close of his life, such were his literary and scientific pursuits, that he was occupied in lectures from four to six hours every day. After a severe illness, he died, March 6, 1812, in the 63rd year of his age. His published works are, a Thanksgiving Sermon, 1781; a Letter to J. Morse, 1795; an address to the Episcopal Church, 1799; and an able and very eloquent discourse on the death of Washington. The reputation of Bishop Madison is that of a refined gentleman, an accomplished scholar, and an enlightened and liberal Christian philanthropist.

MADISON, James, LL. D., the fourth President of the United States. He was the son of James Madison of Orange County, Va., and was born March 16th, 1751. He studied the English, Latin, Greek, French, and Italian languages, and was fitted for college under the instruction of Mr. Robertson, a Scotchman, and the Rev. Mr. Martin, a Jerseyman; was graduated at Princeton, N. J. in 1771; and afterwards remained a year at college, pursuing his studies under the superintendence of Dr. Witherspoon, the President. His constitution was impaired by his close application to his studies, and his health was for many years feeble. In 1776, he was elected a member of the General Assembly of Virginia; in 1778, of the Executive Council; in the winter of 1779—80, of the Continental Congress, of which he continued a member till 1784; in 1787, a member of Congress, and in the same year, a delegate to the Convention at Philadelphia, which formed the present Constitution of the United States. He continued a distinguished member of Congress till March 1797, the end of Washington's administration. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency in 1801, Mr. Madison was appointed Secretary of State, which office he held during the eight years of Mr. Jefferson's administration; and, in 1809, he succeeded his friend and coadjutor as President of the United States. After having filled the office for two terms, he retired to his seat, Montpelier, where he passed his remaining years chiefly as a private citizen, declining political office, except that he acted as visitor and rector of the University of Virginia. He was distinguished for his great talents and acquirements, for the important offices which he filled, and for his virtues in private life. Mr. Madison was the last surviving member of the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States; he was one of its most distinguished champions, and at the time of its adoption he was associated with Hamilton and Jay in the production of the celebrated work entitled the "Federalist." The authorship of the different numbers of this work, Mr. Madison designated in his own copy, and in his own handwriting as follows—Nos. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 59, 60, 61, 65, to 85 inclusive, by Alexander Hamilton.—Nos. 10, 14, 18, 19, 20, 37, to 58 inclusive, and 62 and 63, by James Madison.—Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 64 by John Jay. Mr. Madison left in manuscript, "A careful and extended Report of the Proceedings and Discussions" of the Convention of 1787, that framed the Constitution of the United States, which he directed in his will to be published under the authority and direction of his widow. Mr. Madison died, June the 28th, 1837, in his 86th year.

MALTHUS, T. R., Rev. F. R. S., an eminent English scholar. He was a professor of History and Political Economy in the East India Company's College in Hertfordshire, and author of the able and celebrated work, entitled an "Essay on Population," which has passed through many editions, and been translated into various languages. He was also the author of various other publications, among which is "The Princi-

MARSHALL, John, LL. D., Chief Justice of the United States. He was born in Fauquier county, Virginia, on the 24th, September, 1755; was the son of Col. Thomas Marshall, a man of superior talents, but of small fortune; and was the eldest of fifteen children. He had some classical instruction in his youth, yet his opportunities for learning were very limited: and he never had the benefit of a regular education at any college. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he engaged with ardor in the American cause; in 1776, he received an appointment of first lieutenant; and in 1777, he was promoted to the rank of captain. He fought against Lord Dunmore in the battle of Great Bridge, and was afterwards in the battle of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. In 1781, there being a redundancy of officers in the Virginia line, he resigned his commission; and, having been the year before admitted to the bar, he devoted himself to the practice of the law, and soon rose to eminent distinction. He was a member of the convention called together in Virginia for the ratification of the constitution of the United States, and on this occasion he greatly distinguished himself by his powerful reasoning and eloquence; as he did also, subsequently, as a member of the legislature of Virginia, in the discussions relating to the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay. He was afterwards invited by Washington to accept the office of Attorney-General, and again, on the recall of Mr. Monroe from France, to accept the appointment as his successor; but, on account of private considerations, he declined both; yet he afterwards accepted, from President Adams, the appointment of envoy to France, in connexion with General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry. The envoys, however, were not accredited; and in the summer of 1798, Mr. Marshall returned to the United States. He became a member of Congress in 1799; in 1800, he was appointed to the office of Secretary of War; soon afterwards he succeeded Col. Pickens as Secretary of State; and on the resignation of Chief Justice Ellsworth, he became, by nomination of Mr. Adams, and the confirmation of the Senate, on the 31st January, 1801, Chief Justice of the United States, and from that time till his death, he continued to fill the office with distinguished reputation. He died, at Philadelphia, July, 6th 1836, in the 80th year of his age. As a judge he was probably the most illustrious that America has produced. Few men have ever held so important a judicial office so long; and no one, perhaps, ever more effectually stamped the decisions of his court with the impress of his own powerful mind.—Judge Marshall was the author of the Life of Washington, of which the first edition was published in 1805, in five large volumes; and the second edition, greatly improved and compressed into two volumes, was published in 1832. The "History of the American Colonies," which constituted an introductory part, was published in a separate form in 1824.

MARSHMAN, Joshua, D. D., an eminent learned, useful, and devoted Baptist Missionary, whose name was long associated in a respectful manner with Carey and Ward. He was the son of a poor English weaver, and was born at Westbury Leigh and Wiltshire, in 1768. He received his education at the Baptist Academy, Bristol; and, in 1793, went to India as a missionary, and took up his residence at Serampore. At this place is the chief station of the Baptist missions in India. Here has been carried on the translation and printing of the Scriptures into various languages; and, here are numerous schools for the gratuitous instruction of children. A college also has here been established for education of native preachers. Mr. Marshman had the principal supervision of the schools, and was president of the college. He was thus enabled to exert a most beneficial influence in regard to the objects of the mission: and to acquire the character of being a good scholar as well as being a good man; and, besides his labors as a teacher, in 1806, he published a Chinese Grammar, and a translation of the entire Scriptures. In 1810, Brown University conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. He died, December 5th, 1837, in the 70th year of his age.

MÄSCH, Andrew Gottlieb, D. D., court preacher in New Sarelitz; born 1724; died 1807. He completed the Bibliotheca Sacra of Le Long and Boerner, upon the same plan, now in 5 vols. 4to.—a work of great labor and merit, which had been discontinued for want of patronage. This work was commenced by Le Long, who published 2 vols. 8vo., Paris, 1709, republished by Boerner, of Leipsic, with additions. In 1778, Dr. Masch began his continuation, and completed it in 1790. It gives a full account of the literary history of the Bible, the various editions of the original, and the ancient and modern versions. Dr. Masch also wrote several dissertations of considerable value, particularly a treatise on the religions of the Heathen and of Christians, intended as an argument against the naturalists.

MATTHEWS, Charles, an eminent English comedian. He was born in London, on the 8th June, 1776, and was educated at Merchant-Tailor's School, where he remained till the age of eighteen. His father, a respectable bookseller and a Wesleyan Methodist, from religious motives did not permit his children to visit the theatre. Charles, however, early manifested a strong passion for acting; and before he was 18, his father finding his mind fixed upon the stage, said to him, "I do not approve of the stage, but I will not oppose your wishes." From that time he pursued the profession of an actor; and is said to have made more money, Kean only excepted, than any performer of his age. Nothing could exceed the correctness of his ear; he spoke all the dialects of Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, with a fidelity perfectly miraculous. He could discriminate between the pronunciation of the different Ridings of Yorkshire, and speak with the Parisian accent, the patois of the South, or the guttural tone of the Flemish.—His death took place on his birth-day, June 28th, 1836, being 60 years old.

MAVOR, William, LL. D., a voluminous English author and compiler. Of his numerous works the first appeared in 1799, and was entitled, "The Springs of Parnassus, or Poetic Miscellanies." Some of his most important labors were in the "Historical account of voyages and Travels from the time of Columbus to the year 1798," in 25 quarto volumes; and the "Universal History, Ancient and Modern," in 25 12mo volumes. Some of his works, formed for the purpose of education, have been very popular and successful, particularly his "English spelling Book," which has passed through between four and five hundred editions. Labors of the latter sort, when adapted to the wants of the community, and are well received, exert a powerful influence on the public mind, and should secure to their authors a valuable reputation. The individual who toils in the developments of profound science may attract more regard; but, it is doubted whether he is so much of a benefactor to mankind, as the other, who aims only at the proper formation of the youthful intellect. Dr. Mavor died at Woodstock, England, Dec. 29th 1837, in his 80th year.

MESSER, Asa, D. D., LL. D. President of Brown University, was born in Methuen, Mass. May 31st 1769. He graduated at this Institution, 1790. At that time it was called Rhode Island College; but, in consequence of a liberal donation from the Hon. Nicholas Brown of Providence, it has been subsequently known by its present name. Mr. Brown has been accustomed through life to regard the wants of this college as if it were his own private establishment. Indeed, many of the public and benevolent Institutions of Rhode Island are much identified with the Brown family. Obadiah Brown, son of Moses Brown, largely noticed in this work, gave a great portion of his princely fortune to the endowment of the Friends' yearly School at Providence, frequently designated the Quaker College. Soon after graduating, Dr. Messer was appointed Tutor—afterwards Professor—and in 1802, President, which office he filled till in the year 1826. Dr. Messer was much respected in the various social relations of life; was a most affectionate husband and father; a constant and warm hearted friend; and in his intercourse with his fellow citizens was kind, cheerful, and of scrupulous integrity. He died as he had lived, a firm, consistent, and unpretending Christian. His death was sudden, Oct. 11th, 1836, in the 68th year of his age.

MILDERT, William Van, D. D., an English Bishop. He was born in London, in 1765, and was the grandson of Abraham Van Mildert, of Amsterdam, who settled as a merchant in London. He graduated at Queen's College, Oxford; was elected preacher of Lincoln's Inn in 1812; Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford in 1813; and was made Bishop of Llandaff in 1818, and of Durham in 1826. He had the reputation of being an able and learned theologian. His principal works are his "Bampton Lectures," "Boyle's Lectures," "Life of Waterland," and two volumes of "Sermons." As Bishop of Durham, he possessed an almost princely income, and his charities, public and private, are represented to have been very great, and his character highly exemplary. The new University of Durham was founded chiefly by his munificence. Bishop Mildert died, Feb. 21, 1837, aged 70.

MILNE, William, D. D. Of the early life of this indefatigable missionary, we have no accessible information. He went out in 1813, under the patronage of the London Missionary Society, to join Dr. Morrison in China. He landed at Macao, but was ordered away by the governor. He then went to Canton, where he could study the Chinese language unmolested. The next year in order to aid Dr. Morrison more efficiently, he went to Batavia, on his way distributing many Chinese tracts and copies of the New Testament. At Batavia governor Raffles favored his object, and furnished him with the means of travelling through the interior and eastern parts of the island. He also visited the island of Madura, and spread many thousand tracts and Testaments over Java and Borneo. On his return he visited Malacca, and provided Rho, Bintang, Tringano and Siak with Christian tracts. When he arrived at Macao a second edition of the New Testament was published in a more portable form, and in 1815, the first Chinese convert, Tsae-a-ko, was baptised. Malacca having been fixed upon as a permanent central situation for the mission. Dr. Milne here began to prosecute the system of education, which has since been the basis of Protestant missions in China. Many opportunities also occurred of circulating the scriptures, by means of trading vessels and passengers, in Cochin China, China, Siam, and all the Malayan Archipelago. In 1816, a monthly magazine and several religious works were issued from the Malacca press, and a Chinese convert of the name of Afa was baptized by Mr. Milne. In 1817, he visited China, and with Dr. Morrison projected the plan of an Anglo-Chinese College, took part in the translation of the Old Testament into Chinese, and set on foot the Indo-Chinese Gleaner, a quarterly publication, containing valuable remarks on Chinese usages, literature, and government. He also established a Samaritan Society, composed of Chinese and the members of the mission, to take care of the helpless, sick, and aged, which has done incalculable good. This excellent man, whose talents were surprising, whose labors were incessant, whose whole life was devoted to his Savior, died in 1822. By his death the Chinese missions suffered an irreparable loss, though the schools continue to increase and the preaching to the heathen is still maintained in Malacca.

MITCHELL, Stephen Mix, LL. D., a distinguished citizen of Connecticut, who held various judicial offices in that State. He was born at Wethersfield, Dec. 20th, 1743; was graduated at Yale College in 1763; was chosen tutor in the college in 1766, in which station he continued three years; entered upon the practice of law in Wethersfield in 1772; was appointed, in 1779, to the office of an associate judge of the Hartford County Court, and in 1790, was placed at the head of that Court; in 1795, he was appointed judge of the superior Court of Connecticut, and in 1807, chief justice of that Court, which office he held till 1814, when he became disqualified by age. His services in these stations were highly acceptable to the community, and he retired from the bench, carrying with him the sincere esteem and affection of all who were acquainted with the unaffected kindness of his demeanor, purity of motive, and solid attainments. In 1783, and again in 1785, he was elected a delegate from Connecticut to the Congress of the United States; and, in 1793, he was appointed a senator in Congress, which station he held till he became judge of the Superior Court of Connecticut in 1795. Judge Mitchell, died Sept. 30th, 1837, in his 92d year.

MORRISON, Robert, D. D., a distinguished English missionary, and an eminent Chinese scholar. He was born at Morpeth, in England, in 1782; was educated at Hoxton and Gosport; and embarked, under the patronage of the London Missionary Society, as a missionary to China, in 1807. He pursued the study of the Chinese language and literature, with great zeal and success, and after his visit to England in 1824, was pronounced by Sir George Staunton and others to be confessedly the first Chinese scholar in Europe. He completed a translation of the whole of the New Testament in Chinese in 1813, large impressions of which have since been printed and widely circulated in China. But the great monument of his literary fame is his Dictionary of the Chinese Language, which occupied 13 years of his life, the first part having been published in 1815; and the last in 1822; the whole consisting of three parts, in 6 volumes 4to.

After he had completed the translation of the New Testament, he obtained the co-operation of the Rev. Mr. Milne, and, with his assistance, he completed the Chinese version of the Old Testament in 1819. Dr. Morrison died, at Canton, China, 1st August, 1836, in the 53d year of his age. He was greatly respected for his talents and learning, and for his distinguished services to the East India Company, as well as to the interests of learning and religion, and for his amiable and Christian character.

MORTIER, Marshall, Duke of Treviso, was the son of a merchant, and was brought up in his father's profession, but quitted his station as clerk in a mercantile house at Dunkirk, in 1791, to enter on his successful military career, with the rank of captain. He was not long afterwards raised to the rank of a general officer; 1804, to that of marshal; and in 1808, to that of Duke of Treviso. He accompanied Napoleon in his Russian invasion; and it was to him that the hazardous undertaking of blowing up the Kremlin at Moscow was intrusted. In 1834, he succeeded Marshal Soult as President of the Council and Minister of War. "Mortier is among the small number of Napoleon's generals whose reputation for integrity and private worth remained unquestioned through life."—He was shot dead, July 28th 1835, by the discharge of fire-arms aimed at the King, in his 68th year.

MORUS, S. F. N., D. D., Professor of Theology, Leipsic; born 1736; died 1792. His Acroases Academicæ super Hermeneutica Novi Testamenti, an exceedingly valuable work, consists of supplementary remarks on a part of Ernesti's well-known Institutio Interpretis Novi Testamenti; and extracts from it have been translated and published in Stuart's Elements of Biblical Interpretation, and in the Biblical Repository. Morus's Epitome Theologiæ Christianæ contains much in little space, without any parade of learning. 'He also wrote, under different titles, philological and critical expositions of most of the books of the New Testament, which are all highly deserving the attention of those who are attached to the sound principles of biblical learning.

N

NOESELT, John Aug., D. D., Professor of theology at Halle, born 1734; died 1807. He ranks with the neologists of Germany, but was an able expositor of such difficult texts as do not contain fundamental points of Christian doctrine. His writings are numerous, mostly hermeneutical exegetical, and theological. The most noted are his Opuscula ad Interpretationem Sacrarum Scripturarum et ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam, Halae, 4 vols. 8vo., and Exercitationes ad sac. Scrip. Interpretationem, Halae, 4 vols. 8vo. His other publications are of less importance.

PERKINS, Nathan, D. D., a venerable American Congregational Clergyman, born at Lisbon, Connecticut, May 14, 1749, and graduated at New Jersey College, Princeton, in 1770. He was ordained pastor of the Church in West Hartford of his native state in 1772; continued to perform the duties of his office till about two years before his death; and was greatly respected and esteemed. During a part of his life he was in the habit of instructing theological students. Besides numerous occasional sermons, he published, in 1795, a volume of sermons on various subjects. Dr. Perkins died, January 18, 1838, aged 90 years.

PORTER, Ebenezer, D. D., President of the Theological Seminary, Andover, Ms. He was born October 5, 1772, at Cornwall, Connecticut, and graduated at Dartmouth College, in 1792. After leaving college he spent several months in keeping school, and then commenced the study of divinity in the private theological school of the Rev. Dr. Joseph Bellamy, at Bethlehem, of his native state: and on the 6th of September, 1796, he was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Washington in the same state. His success in his profession was most encouraging, but his labors were too severe for his slender constitution, consequently his health became impaired. From this situation he was removed to the one he filled the remaining part of his life, in April, 1812. The office to which he was now appointed was that of professor of Sacred Rhetoric, which had previously been filled by the Rev. Dr. Griffin. Subsequently he was appointed President of the Institution. Dr. Porter exercised great industry as a scholar, and his proficiency was correspondingly great. It was, however, in his own particular department of instruction that he was distinguished. There is the utmost perfection in his style of writing. So far as the nice balance of sentences, the harmonious collocation of their members, and the selection of apt and most beautiful words are concerned, he was rarely ever excelled. There was no heterogeneous agglomeration of epithets or of sentences, no verbiage, no confusion or metaphors. Every thing was distinct, clear, finished. His words fell on the ear like the music of Handel. Dr. Porter died at Andover, April the 8th 1834, at the age of sixty-two years. Many of his occasional sermons were published in a pamphlet form, and he contributed freely to the pages of different periodicals. In addition to this, he published the following works: in 1809, "The Young Preachers Manual;" in 1824, "Analysis of Vocal Inflection;" in 1827, "Analysis of the Principles of Rhetorical Delivery;" in 1831, "Rhetorical Reader, and a course of Rhetorical Exercises;" in 1832, "Syllabus of Lectures;" in 1833, "an Abridgement of a "Treatise on Spiritual Mindedness, by John Owen, D. D." in 1834, "Lectures on Homiletics and Preaching, and on Public Prayer, together with Sermons and Addresses; and an Abridgement of "A Practical Exposition; of the 130th Psalm, by John Owen, D. D."—And since his death has also been published of his works, "The Biblical Reader" and "Lectures on Eloquence and Style."

PRINCE, John, LL. D., Minister of the First Congregational Church in Salem, Massachusetts. He was born in Boston, July, 22, 1751; was graduated at Harvard College in 1776, and was ordained in Salem in 1779. His talents were of a superior order, his industry great, and his acquirements in theology and literature extensive; but he was more eminently distinguished for his knowledge of natural and mechanical philosophy, which gave him celebrity among the scientific men, not only of our own country, but also of Europe, with many of whom he long maintained an epistolary correspondence. He distinguished himself especially by his improvements in the air-pump, and the one which he made as early as 1784, gave him a reputation through the scientific world. Dr. Prince died, June 7th 1836, aged 85 years.

PROVOOST, Samuel, D. D., Bishop of New York, was born at New-York, in 1742, and was a descendant of the Huguenots. As his father, John Provoost, a merchant of New-York, was in communion with the Church of Holland in America, the son was baptized in the Dutch Church, and taught its creed. But having repaired to Cambridge, England, (where he pursued his studies with great success, and graduated at St. Peter's College,) he was led to embrace episcopacy; pursued a course of theological studies; and was admitted to Deacons' Orders in February, 1766, and to Priests' Orders the next month. He soon afterward married at Cambridge, returned to New York, and became an Assistant Minister of Trinity Church. But various causes, especially his political principles, as a warm advocate for the American revolution, led him to resign his charge in 1770, and retire to a small farm in Dutchess county. He there calmly awaited the issue of the revolutionary conflict, and refused all preferment, although proposed as a delegate to the provincial congress in 1775—invited in 1777 to become Chaplain to the Convention, which formed the first Constitution of New-York—and offered, the same year, through political influence, the Rectorship of Saint Michael's Church at Charleston, and the Rectorship of King's Chapel, Boston, in 1782. He suffered numerous privations, some of them very afflictive, in maintaining the ground which he assumed. But in 1783, when the city of New-York was evacuated by the British troops, he left his retirement. At the first General Convention of the American Church, he was a very prominent member; was elected Bishop by the clergy and laity of the Diocese of New-York, in 1786; proceeded to England for consecration, in company with Dr. White, Bishop elect of Pennsylvania; and was admitted, at the same time with him, to the holy order of Bishops at Lambeth. On their return to New-York, April 8, 1787, they were hailed with great joy as Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, consecrated by the Archbishops and Bishops of England. Dr. Provoost held his Episcopal office, and the Rectorship of Trinity Church, New-York, for a number of years; but at last, overcome by domestic bereavements and afflictions, he resigned his Rectorship in September, 1800, and his Episcopal jurisdiction in 1801. As a scholar, he was well read in classical and polite literature, as well as in theology; and valuable papers which he has left, show that he espoused the principles of our political and ecclesiastical reform, with the zeal of a true patriot, and the ability of a learned divine.

R

RAVENS-CROFT, John Stark, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Carolina, was born in the county of Prince George, Virginia, in the year 1772. He was the only child of Dr. John Ravenscroft, a gentleman of fortune, who had been educated for the practice of medicine. Within two months of his birth, the family removed to Great Britain, and settled in the south of Scotland. Dr. Ravenscroft died about the close of the year 1780. Mrs. Ravenscroft availed herself of the excellent opportunity which Scotland afforded, of giving her son a very complete and thorough classical education; and after he had finished his course at one of the most respectable grammar schools in that country, she placed him at a seminary of somewhat higher grade in the North of England, where, besides continuing his classical studies, he was instructed in mathematics, natural philosophy and other sciences. Soon after he had entered his 17th year, his friends thought it expedient that he should return to Virginia, for the purpose of looking after the remains of his father's property. Intending to devote himself to the profession of the law, he entered William and Mary College, with a view to the prosecution of that study, and to the acquisition of a more perfect acquaintance with the sciences. Although he remained sometime a member of the college, with the ostensible object of preparing himself for the practice of the law, it does not appear that he ever procured a license to practice, or if he did it is certain that he never availed himself of it. On marrying, he settled in Lunenburg county, Va., and although he sustained an honourable reputation among his fellow men, so great was his neglect of the outward forms of religion, that, according to his own statement, from the year 1792 to 1810, he was not present at any place of public worship more than six or seven times. But shortly subsequent to the latter period, his attention was turned to the duties of a religious life. He first connected himself with the Methodists; but, on having his mind directed to the Christian ministry, in 1815, he became a member of the Protestant Church, in 1817 he was admitted to Holy Orders, by Bishop Moore of Va.; and became the minister of St. James Church, Mecklenburg county, of that state. Here he remained zealously and usefully occupied in the labors of his profession, till in the year 1823, when he was elected to the episcopate of North Carolina. He was consecrated on the 22d of April in that year, and promptly entered upon the highly important functions of his new office, which he performed with his characteristic energy, till his constitution and strength completely failed him. He died, March 5th, 1830. In person, Bishop Ravenscroft was large and commanding, with a countenance, in its general aspect, perhaps austere, but susceptible of the most benevolent expression. His manner corresponded with his person, especially when exercising his ministerial functions; being remarkably dignified, and so solemn and impressive, as to inspire all who witnessed it with reverence. After his death two volumes of his sermons were published.

REED, William, an American merchant distinguished for the liberal endowments made by him upon various objects of charity. He was a resident of Marblehead, Massachusetts; and from 1811 to 1815 was a member of Congress from that State. He was President of the Sabbath-School Union of Massachusetts, and of the American Tract Society; Vice-President of the American Education Society; a member of the Board of Visitors of the Theological Seminary, Andover; and also a Trustee of Dartmouth College. Besides liberal bequests to heirs and relatives, he left $68,000 to benevolent objects, of which $17,000 were to Dartmouth College; $10,000 to Amherst College; $10,000 to the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; $9,000 to the First Church and Society in Marblehead; $7,000 to the Second Congregational Church and Society in that town; and $5,000 to the library of the Theological Seminary at Andover. He died suddenly Feb. 18th 1837, aged 60 years.

RICHARDS, William, LL. D., was born in 1749, in the parish of Penrhydd, in the vicinity of Haverfordwest, county of Pembroke, South Wales. When he had attained the age of twelve, he had had only one year's schooling; and with the exception of the little assistance he received from his father, he was wholly indebted for the rudiments of his education to his own native genius, and indefatigable application, which rendered him, by the time he was twenty, a prodigy of learning and knowledge. Though the Bible was the favorite theme of his studies, his reading was not confined to it; he had made himself acquainted with the best authors in the English language, was well versed in civil and ecclesiastical history, and deemed an admirable critic in the Cambro-British tongue. Mr. Richards, previously to the disease of his father, had been baptised on a profession of his faith in Christ, and admitted into the fellowship of a Christian Church assembling at Rhydwillim, in the county of Carmarthen. Having determined to devote his life to the ministry of the gospel, he placed himself in the Baptist academy at Bristol, in the year 1773, where he continued two years. It was then under the superintendence of the Rev. Hugh Evans, and his son Caleb Evans. On leaving the Academy at Bristol, Mr. Richards accepted an invitation at Pershore, in Worcestershire, where he became assistant to Dr. John Ash, pastor of the Baptist church at that place, and of whose friendship and virtues he spoke highly. In 1776, he accepted an invitation from the Baptist church at Lynn, in Norfolk, to become their pastor. In the year 1781, he published a "Review of Mr. Carter's Strictures on Infant Baptism." This was followed, soon afterwards, by two other tracts, the first entitled, "Observations on Infant Sprinkling." The other, and by far the most elaborate one, was "The History of Antichrist; or, Free Thoughts on the Corruptions of Christianity." His greatest effort, as an author, was "The History of Lynn," in two large octavo volumes, embellished with engravings. At length an ossification of the heart proved fatal, on the thirteenth of September, 1818, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. He was amiable, kind, affectionate, and sincere; and through life as much beloved, as at his death he was lamented. His library, which was very considerable, he bequeathed to Brown University in Rhode Island. This institution conferred on him the honorary degree of doctor of laws; but his death took place previous to receiving the intelligence of it.

RICHARDSON, William Merchant, LL. D. Chief Justice of New-Hampshire, from 1816 to 1838, was born at Pelham, N. H. January 4, 1774, graduated at Cambridge with high honors in 1797, studied law with Judge Dana, of Massachusetts, was elected to Congress in 1811 and 1813, but growing weary of political life, resigned and removed to Portsmouth N. H. in 1814. He soon rose to distinction at the bar; and in 1816, on a re-organization of the courts in that state, he was appointed chief justice of the superior court of judicature—an office which he held until his decease, a period of 22 years. He was a learned, and upright judge, in whom the whole people had confidence; and it has been well remarked by a distinguished jurist now living, that "no one in the State has done so much, in the department of the law, to entitle himself to be deemed a public benefactor." Dartmouth College appreciated his labors, and in 1827, bestowed upon him her highest honors. He died at Chester, on the 23d of March, 1838. æt. 64. Judge Richardson was the author of the "New Hampshire Justice," and the "Town Officer." A considerable portion of the 1st and 2d volumes of the New Hampshire Reports was drawn up by him; he furnished nearly all the cases of the 3d, 4th, and 5th; and of the matter for perhaps four volumes more, he prepared a large share. His legal opinions will form an enduring memorial of his high qualifications for the station he sustained.

ROBINSON, John, minister of a congregation of English Emigrants, settled at Leyden, a part of which removed to New England in 1620. He was born in 1575, and was educated at Cambridge. Prior to his removal to Leyden he held the office of pastor of a society of dissenters formed in the north of England about the year 1602. His congregation removed to Holland in 1608, and he soon followed them. At Amsterdam, where they found emigrants of the same religious sentiments, they remained about a year; but, then, Mr. Robinson and his friends removed to Leyden. At this place they continued eleven years, during which time their numbers rapidly increased, and they were distinguished for perfect harmony among themselves. In 1617, when another removal was contemplated, Mr. Robinson entered zealously into the plan of making a settlement in America. The first settlers of Plymouth in 1620, who took with them Mr. Brewster, the ruling elder, were the members of his church, and it was his intention to follow them with the majority that remained; but various disappointments prevented. He died Feb. 19, 1625, aged 49 years. A part of his church, and his widow and children afterwards, subsequently joined their brethren in New England. Mr. Robinson was a man of acknowledged classical learning and acuteness in disputation. In his opinions of church government he was an independent or congregationalist; and, he celebrated the Lord's Supper, every Sunday. He published a defence of the Brownists; justification of the separation from the church of England; People's Plea for the Exercise of Prophecy, 1618; and Essays Moral and Divine, 1628.

RUTER, Martin, D. D., President of Augusta College, in Kentucky, was born, April 3d, 1785. He was a native of Charlton, Worcester county, Ms., and received no advantages of early education, except what he got in the common schools of that place. So early as June in 1801, being but little more than sixteen years of age, he was licenced, by the New York Methodist Conference, to preach. For fifteen or sixteen years he was actively employed in the labors of an itinerant preacher; and, as unfavorable as the situation was for it, he became a literary man—well versed in languages, in history, and in the sciences. In 1818, Asbury college in Baltimore conferred on him the honorary degree of Master of Arts; and in 1822 Transylvania University of Kentucky conferred on him the Degree of Doctor of Divinity. During his itineracy he was stationed at Portland Me., Portsmouth, N. H., Boston, Ms., and Philadelphia. At one time he had charge of the New Market Wesleyan Academy; and, in 1820 was appointed to the agency of the Western Book Establishment at Cincinnati. From this station he was removed to the presidency of Augusta College in Kentucky, which has become one of the most flourishing and respectable literary institutions in the West. Here he remained between four and five years; and, then, spent two years at Pittsburgh, Penn. The Pittsburgh Conference having taken possession of Alleghany College, Dr. Ruter was selected to preside over it. This was in 1834. Here he continued his useful labors till the summer of 1837, when he resigned with a view to undertake the superintendence of the new missions in Texas. He entered upon this scene of action with his usual zeal; but the toils and exposures were too great for his physical powers. He soon sunk under them. His death took place the summer following, May 16th 1838, aged 53 years. Dr. Ruter was strictly a self-educated man. As a gentleman he was affable and courteous—and as a companion he was interesting and instructive. In the pulpit he was solid, grave, warm, and dignified—generally listened to with pleasure, always with profit.

SADLER, Michael Thomas, a distinguished citizen of Ireland, for a time member of Parliament. He was highly esteemed for his talents and for his excellent and religious character. He was an orator of considerable celebrity, an eminent philanthropist, and was indefatigable in the cause of benevolence. "The Factory Regulation Bill" was the result of his parliamentary efforts. His writings commanded much attention, as well as his speeches, particularly his two principal works; "Ireland, its evils, and their Remedies," and his "Law of Population," in 2 vols, in which he maintains views opposite to those of Malthus. He died, July 29, 1835, aged 55 years.

SCHALL, Jean Adam, a learned jesuit and missionary to China, was born at Cologne, in 1591. He reached China in 1622, and resided for several years at Si-anfou, employing himself without interruption in his apostolic duties, and the study of the sciences which are connected with astronomy. He directed the construction of a church, which had been built, partly by the aid of the new converts, and partly by the assistance of the Chinese, who had not embraced the faith of the missionary, solely in consequence of the interest which had been awakened in the study of mathematics. The reputation he had acquired by his scientific knowledge, was the occasion of his being called at an early day to the court, where he had the charge of reducing the imperial calendar, in connection with the padre Rho, till the death of the latter, when Schall took the entire direction. He performed this duty with ability, during the consecutive reigns of three emperors. In this period Schall obtained a much higher degree of estimation and favor. He was then nominated directing councillor in the department of celestial affairs, where, in connection with other missionaries, he was president of the tribunal of mathematics, with the particular title of master of the abstruse doctrines. This title was rendered the more honorable, as it enabled him to correct various Chinese distinctions, which it would be difficult to render into French. It must be added that the emperor held Schall personally in great consideration; that he came four times into the study of the missionary in order to enter into familiar conversation with him; that, in his visits, he sat on the couch of the learned jesuit, and that he amused himself in admiring the elegance of the church, and in tasting the fruits of the garden which Schall had planted. Schall took advantage of these royal favors in promoting the cause of the mission. He obtained a decree for the free publication of Christianity, which so increased the number of converts, that in fourteen years, 1650—1664, one hundred thousand Chinese were baptised. On the death of Chun-tchi, the hopes which the happy commencement had allowed the missionaries to indulge, very soon vanished. The regent, who governed the empire, during the minority of Khanghi, began a persecution against the Christians, in which Schall was one of the first victims. He was accused of having had the audacity of holding up a crucifix in veneration, before the image of the deceased emperor. With his three companions, he was thrown into irons, dragged, during nine months, from tribunal to tribunal, and finally condemned to be strangled, and cut into a thousand pieces. However, the sentence was not carried into execution; but being exhausted and worn down, he expired on the 15th August 1669. There has been attributed to Schall the composition of 150 volumes in Chinese. But this has been pronounced an exaggeration; and, it has been said that his publications in the Chinese language actually amounted to the number of twenty four, mostly relative to the subjects of astronomy, optics, and geometry.

SCOTT, John, Earl of Eldon, LL. D., F.R.S., for nearly 25 years Lord High Chancellor of England, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; June 4, 1751. He was the brother of William Scott, Lord Stowell; and was educated at University College, Oxford, of which he was elected Fellow. He married at an early age, contrary to the advice of friends; then applied himself with great assiduity to the study of the law; became a member of the Middle Temple in 1773; and, eight or ten years afterwards, he rose into notice as an eminent lawyer. In 1763, he was elected a member of Parliament, and attached himself to the party of Mr. Pitt, to which he constantly adhered through life. In 1788, he was appointed Solicitor-General, and knighted; in 1793, Attorney-General; in 1799, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and raised to the Peerage, as Baron Eldon; in 1801, Lord High Chancellor of England, which office he resigned Feb. 7, 1807, but was re-appointed April 1st 1807, and continued in office until 1827, being altogether nearly 25 years Chancellor, a longer period than any of his predecessors. The highest testimonies have been borne to his merits as a profound lawyer and an able and upright Judge. His reported judgments are contained in 20 volumes. Nothing can be conceived more dignified, more venerable, or more benevolent, than his appearance and conduct on the bench. In private life he is represented as one of the most exemplary and affectionate of men; and his private charities were very extensive. He died in London, Jan. 13th 1838, in the 87th year of his age.

SCOTT, William, Rt. Hon.—Baron Stowell, LL. D., an English civilian and jurist of eminence. He was the eldest son of William Scott, a coal merchant of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and was born in 1745. Lord Stowell, as did his younger brother John (now the Earl of Eldon, and lately Lord Chancellor of England) received the rudiments of his classical education at the Grammar School in Newcastle. In 1764, he graduated at Oxford; in 1765, was admitted fellow of the University College, also the same year appointed a tutor; in 1773 was elected Reader of Ancient Histories; in 1779, he took the degree of doctor of civil laws, and soon after he commenced his career as an advocate in the Civil Law Courts, and rapidly rose to the highest eminence. He was knighted in 1788; in 1798, he became judge of the High Court of Admiralty; and in 1821, he was created a Peer by the title of Baron Stowell. In 1828, Lord Stowell retired from his station as judge of the Court of Admiralty, having performed the duties of the office for 30 years with great ability and reputation. He was intimately associated with several very eminent men of the past age. In 1778, he became a member of the "Literary Club," which then numbered among its members Dr. Samuel Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Edmund Burke; and Dr. Johnson, just before his death, in 1784, appointed him one of his three executors, the other two being Sir Joshua Reynolds and Sir John Hawkins. Lord Stowell is represented to have been the charm of every society of which he formed a part; and his unbounded charities acquired for him universal regard and esteem. He died, Jan. 28, 1836; in the 91st year of his age.

SEMLER, John Solomon; the leader of the German neological school; born at Saalfeld, 1725. His early religious history shows the cause of his abandonment of evangelical views. He was bred among Christians, became serious, wept and prayed; but, not devoting himself heartily to the service of God, a reaction took place; he fell among the sons of levity, at Halle, became an unbeliever in the great truths of religion, and increased unto more and more skepticism. Of his outward life, we may just say, that he was first appointed professor of history and poetry at Altdorf, and afterwards called to a professorship of theology at Halle, where he and Baumgarten were opposed to all the rest of the theological faculty. Their loose views however gained ground; and, in 1757, he was made head of the theological seminary—a post which he filled till his death, in 1791. Much as Semler's learning may have contributed to illustrate the text and meaning of the Old and New Testaments, it was infinitely more than counter-balanced by his deplorable success in lowering the reverence in which the Bible had been previously held in Germany. He labored to refer many important points of the existing creed to the fallibility of interpreters, or the ignorance of the sacred writers themselves, and reached a bad eminence in derogating from the divine authority and inspiration of the sacred volume. He wrote a paraphrase of John, and of the Epistle to the Romans; Apparatus for the interpretation of the Old and New Testament, in which he broached his famous scheme of historical hermeneutics; and added notes to Wetstein's Prolegomena; besides other works.

SEMPLE, Robert Baylor, D. D., a Baptist clergyman of Virginia, born January 20, 1769. He received his classical education under the direction of the Rev. Peter Nelson of that State; but, such was his proficiency, that when only sixteen years of age, he became himself a teacher. When thus engaged in the business of instruction, he commenced the study of law. Having had his attention turned to the subject of religion, at the age of twenty, under the ministrations of the denomination, in which he afterwards was so distinguished, he relinquished the study of law for that of divinity. His first efforts, however, as a preacher were not very flattering. His manner was far from being graceful and impressive; and, frequently, such was his hesitancy in finding words to express his ideas, that his hearers were pained on his account. Nevertheless his steady perseverance enabled him to triumph over these obstacles to success. In a few years he attained among his brethren a high reputation. In addition to his labors, in preaching, he spent much time in giving instruction to youth; and, in this capacity he became so much known, that as early as the year 1805, he was invited to the presidency of Transylvania University. He did not accept the appointment. In 1809 he published a catechism for the use of children, which was highly approved. In 1810, his principal work, the History of Virginia Baptists, with several Biographical notices appended, was issued from the press. In the year 1820, he was elected president of the Triennial Convention of the Baptist denomination in the United States, which station he filled to the time of his death. Although he had not been favored with a collegiate education, his intellectual and moral worth was so well understood, that in 1814 the honorary degree of Master of Arts was conferred on him by Brown University. Ten years afterwards the same Institution conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity; and in 1826 it was also conferred by the college of William and Mary. Dr. Semple died, December 25, 1831, aged 63 years.

SHERMAN, Roger, a distinguished citizen of Connecticut. He was born at Newton, Mass. April 19, 1721, and received no advantages of education, excepting those of a common school. His father was a farmer, and he was apprenticed to a shoe maker; but, his desire for knowledge led him, while at work on his seat, to keep a book open before him. In 1743, he removed to Milford, Conn. carrying his tools on his back; but, he soon relinquished his trade, and became a country merchant, in partnership with an elder brother. He also devoted himself to the study of law, and in 1754, was admitted to the practice of it. In 1761, he removed to New Haven. In the year following he was chosen an assistant of the colony, and appointed a judge of the superior court, which office he held 23 years. He was a member of the first Congress in 1774, and continued a member 19 years. He was one of those, who signed the act of independence in 1776. During the war he was a member of the Governors' Council of Safety. After the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, of the convention for forming which he was a conspicuous member, he was elected a representative to congress. Being chosen a senator in 1791, he continued in this station till his death. This took place, July 23, 1793, aged 72. His talents were solid and useful; and his judgment unflinching. Mr. Jefferson pointed him out as a man, "who never said a foolish thing in his life." He was truly a self-taught man, and reached an eminence which but few can reach.

SIMEON, Charles, Senior Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, England, and Rector of Trinity Church in that town. He ministered to this church more than 53 years, and was never married. He was one of the most able, zealous, and successful members of that class of divines in the English established church that are styled evangelical; and he labored with untiring efforts to propagate his principles both in the pulpit and through the press. His numerous works, which were published at different times, were, in 1832, collected and published in 21 large and closely compressed 8vo. volumes, under the direction of the Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne, and they comprise 2,536 sermons and skeletons of sermons, which form a commentary upon every book of the Old and New Testament. Mr. Simeon died Nov. 13, 1836, in the 78th year of his age; and, his funeral was attended by his whole congregation, and it is supposed, by about 700 members of the university. The funeral procession consisted of upwards of 1300 persons, all in deep mourning. The whole town throughout the day partook of the mournful solemnity; the shops were closed, and a silent awe pervaded the streets, indicative of the general sorrow for the loss of one so much respected.

SINCLAIR, Sir John, LL. D., a noted Scotch author. He was born, in 1754, at Thurso Castle, in the county of Caithness; was educated at Edinburgh; was admitted a member of the faculty of Advocates in 1775; was first elected a representative in Parliament in 1780, and continued for many years a member. Sir John Sinclair was a very voluminous author, and was distinguished for his patriotism and philanthropy. During a public life of upwards of 50 years, there is scarcely any topic in the whole range of political, statistical, or medical science, to which he did not turn his active and inquiring mind; and his services in promoting improvements with respect to agriculture and the fisheries, entitle him to the lasting gratitude of his native country. His reputation and correspondence were widely extended, not only in Europe, but also in America; though some of his speculations were considered fanciful by more practical men. Some of his principal publications are a "Statistical Account of Scotland," "History of the Revenue of Great Britain," "Thoughts on the Naval Strength of Great Britain," "Considerations on Militias and Standing Armies," "Essays on Agriculture," "An Account of the Northern Districts of Scotland," "Code of Health and Longevity," "Agricultural Practice of Scotland," and papers on the "Bullion Question." He died at Edinburgh, Dec. 21, 1835, in his 82d year.

SLATER, Samuel, a distinguished American manufacturer, was born in Belper, England, June 9th, 1768. He was the son of William Slater, an independent farmer in the same town. Young Slater received a good education; and, when he was fourteen years of age, he became an apprentice to Jedediah Strutt, for several years the partner of Sir Richard Arkwright. In this capacity he acquired that knowledge which subsequently gave him so much celebrity. He went through an entire apprenticeship with a fidelity that characterized his whole life; and that induced his employer to place the utmost confidence in him. This confidence was so great, that during the latter part of his apprenticeship to him was entrusted the general supervision of erecting a new mill and the making of its machinery. Thus he became as well skilled in all the details of spinning and weaving cotton as then understood, as were his principals. Having completed his term of service, as agreed upon, on the first of November 1789, he took his departure from Derbyshire for London, and on the 13th of the same month he sailed for New-York, at which place he arrived in November. In the January following he proceeded to Pawtucket, Rhode Island, where he laid the foundation for his own large fortune, and for the vast business in his adopted country, that has added so much to its wealth, and to an important change in its social relations. He left his native country privately, as the restrictions of the government were very severe upon the leaving of Artizans. He was not therefore disposed to take with him any patterns or drawings lest they should be discovered, and that should lead to his being detained. Of course he relied entirely upon his memory for carrying into effect his plans in all their complicated variety. But few men could have done this. His memory however was remarkably tenacious, and being a good mathematician, he was enabled to enter into all the nice calculations required in such a labor. It is true he had many perplexities in his way, and many difficulties to encounter, but his skill and perseverance were a sufficient guaranty for ultimate success. No one unacquainted with the nature of them can understand how much talent and resolution were requisite for such a labor. It must be apparent that he not only had to prepare all the plans in the several departments of the process of manufacturing; but he either had to make with his own hands the different kinds of machinery, whether of wood, iron, brass, tin, or leather; or, else teach others to do it. The business in this country was new in all its ramifications. Thus, he must have been skilled in several different trades, in addition to that in which he had been particularly instructed. Nor were his talents for business less distinguished. His views and calculations were of the most comprehensive kind. Even when his means were small, he never promised to pay money without knowing, as he supposed, where it would come from, to meet the payment. The same cautious policy he pursued through life in all his extensive operations. This he has frequently told the writer. Undoubtedly in many instances his plans were frustrated; but they showed the character of the man. And his maxims on business generally and on social habits were of great excellence; and could they all have been collected together they would form an excellent guide for young men. Mr. Slater died in 1835; and his name will be associated in American history with our greatest benefactors.

SMITH, Nathan, a Senator in Congress from Connecticut, and long known as an eminent lawyer. He was born at Roxbury, in that State, in 1770; received his professional education at the Law School in Litchfield; was many years state's attorney for the county of New Haven, and for several years United States attorney for the district of Connecticut. He was respected for his integrity and ability, and was long known as one of the most eminent and successful lawyers in the State. He died, at Washington, D. C., Dec. 6, 1836, after an illness of a few hours, in the 66th year of his age.

SMITH, Robert, D. D., the first Bishop of the Diocese of South-Carolina. He was a native of Norfolk county, England, (A. D. 1732;) was educated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, and graduated there at the age of twenty-one years. Elected to a fellowship two years after, he continued at Cambridge, was admitted, by the Bishop of Ely, to the holy Order of Deacons, March 7, 1756, and to that of Priests on the 21st day of the following December. Through the patronage and recommendation of Wm. Mason, Esq., M. P., he supplied the vacancy in St. Philip's Church, Charleston, S. C., on the resignation of the assistant-minister, the Rev. Mr. Andrews. He was elected rector of this Church, A. D. 1759. For many years he was the most laborious of the clergy of South Carolina; and his arduous duties so impaired his health, that in the year 1768 he was induced to take a voyage to England. Two years after he returned to Charleston, with improved health, and there resumed his pastoral duties. At the commencement of the revolutionary war he was a loyal subject of Great Britain; but he was soon led to change his political opinions, and he became so zealous in our country's cause, that he encouraged his people by his own example to defend their liberties and homes, and went to the lines armed as a common soldier. In A. D. 1780, on account of his revolutionary principles, he was banished from the colony of South Carolina. He resided in the Middle States until the peace, having the temporary charge of St. Paul's parish, Queen Anne's county, Maryland. In May, 1783, he returned to his affectionate parishoners at Charleston. As the Church's funds were now in a depressed state, and his own resources were inconsiderable, he added to his pastoral duties the charge of an academy. His labors in this institution were eminently prosperous. It was afterward incorporated as a college, of which he held the office of Principal, until the year 1798. But he was most eminently useful as a minister of Christ. His judicious zeal and wholesome counsels led to the organization of the Diocese of South Carolina, and to its agency in the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. Although necessarily absent from the General Convention of 1785, he took an active part in the Conventions of 1786 and 1789. Elected Bishop of the Diocese of South-Carolina, in A. D. 1795, he was consecrated at Philadelphia, Sept. 13, in the same year; his episcopal duties were discharged with an inviolable attachment to the doctrines, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church, until the period of his death, October 28, 1801.

SMITH, Sir John Edward, a distinguished English physician and naturalist, who was born at Norwich, Dec. 2, 1759. After some preliminary education he went to Edinburgh in 1780, and during the prosecution of his medical studies at that university, he paid particular attention to Botany, and gained the gold medal given to the best proficient among the students of that science. He then went to London, where he became acquainted with Sir Joseph Banks, and in 1784 he purchased the Linnæan collection, containing the epistolary correspondence and other papers, and specimens of natural history, of the elder and younger Linné. In 1786 he took the degree of M. D. at Leyden; and in that and the following year he visited France and Italy. On his return to England he published "A Sketch of a Tour on the Continent," 1793, 3 vols. 8vo., containing much interesting information relative to natural history. Soon after he engaged with Dr. Goodenough, bishop of Carlisle, and others, in the foundation of the Linnæan Society, of which he was president till the time of his death. In 1797 he retired to his native city, and engaged in medical practice; and in 1814 he received the honor of knighthood from the British King who accepted the office of patron of the Linnæan Society. He continued to reside at Norwich during the remainder of his life, making annual visits to London to deliver lectures at the Royal Institution. His death took place at Norwich, March 17, 1828. His principal works are, "English Botany," 36 vols. 8vo.; "Natural History of the Lepidopterous Insects of Georgia," 1797, 2 vols. folio; "Flora Britannica," 1803, 3 vols. 8vo; and an "Introduction to Botany," 8vo; besides the Travels, already mentioned.

STARCK, John Augustus, D.D., Court preacher at Darmstadt, previously professor of theology at Königsberg, and of philosophy at Mittau; born 1741; died 1816. He wrote a History of the Christian church in the first century, an Attempt at a History of Arianism, and published Vol. 1st of a Commentary on the Psalms, which only gave the Introduction. He also published one volume of a Collection of Philological and Critical Dissertations and Observations.

STAUGHTON, William, D. D., President of Columbian College, D. C., was by birth an Englishman, and born, January 4, 1770. At the age of twelve, several of his poetical effusions were published; and at the age of seventeen a volume of them was published. These indications of genius were of a character to induce his friends to give him an education for the ministry. Accordingly he was in due time placed at Bristol Academy, one of the best schools in that country, for Dissenters. Having completed his regular course of study and commenced preaching, in 1793, he crossed the Atlantic ocean, with a view to a settlement in America. In the Autumn of this year he reached Charleston, S. C. He remained in this State 18 months preaching to a congregation in Georgetown, and then removed to the city of New York. From the latter place he removed to Bordentown and then to Burlington, N. J., where he was for several years engaged in teaching and preaching. When residing in New Jersey, and only twenty-eight years of age, such was his reputation for talents, and especially for elocution, that he received from Princeton college, by the unanimous vote of the Trustees, the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1805, he became connected with the first Baptist Church in Philadelphia; and from this period for several years, and even to his death, his popularity was probably beyond that of any of his brethren in the whole country. Dr. Staughton was peculiarly a public man, taking a leading part in all public and charitable interests of his denomination. Indeed his name was completely identified with his denomination from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Mississippi river. The effect which his addresses at various anniversary meetings produced, can never be erased from the minds of those who were favored to hear them. The impression made upon the writer of this article, by his commanding eloquence, twenty-eight years ago, was so deep, that he now recollects distinctly the very language he used in the conclusion of one of his discourses, as though it were only yesterday. So prominent was he with his brethren, that he was selected for the Presidency of Columbian College established in Georgetown, D. C. 1817; but so embarrassed were the finances of this institution, in 1827, he resigned his office. The vexations and mortifications growing out of his connection with it, greatly affected his spirits and no doubt impaired his health. His death took place at Washington, D. C., Dec. 12, 1829, when in the 60th year of his age. During the whole period of his residence in Philadelphia, in addition to his constant labors as a parish Minister, and to his other more public movements, he was engaged in the business of instruction—sometimes in the classical education of young men—and especially in directing the theological studies of young gentlemen preparing for the ministry. It is extraordinary that any one man should have accomplished so much as did Dr. Staughton.

STONE, William Murray, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Maryland, was born in Somerset county of that State, about the year 1779, and, at Washington Academy, on the eastern shore of it, he received his education. He was admitted to the orders of Deacon and Priest, by the Right Rev. Dr. Glaggert, the first Bishop of the Protestant Church in that Diocese. With the exception of a short period spent in the Rectorship of the Church in Chestertown, Kent County, his ministry was confined to his native parish; and for several years in particular his faithful labors were crowned with much success. For fourteen years previous to 1828, he did not attend the Conventions of his Church. Although thus abstracting himself from ecclesiastical politics, and confining himself to the duties and interests of his own parish, his modest worth was well known and duly appreciated by his brethren. On the vacancy of the episcopate in 1828, by the death of Bishop Kemp, there was no unanimity of opinion in regard to his successor. Repeated attempts were made to fill the office, but they were unavailing, each party seeming resolved to adhere to its own candidate. In 1830, a committee of conference was chosen by the Convention; and this committee nominated the subject of this article. He was forthwith elected with great harmony, both of the other gentlemen withdrawing from the contest. His consecration took place, the 21st of October of the same year in the city of Baltimore. During the seven years of his remaining life, he devoted himself with zeal and assiduity to the arduous and responsible duties of his station. To this station however he brought a feeble and shattered constitution; and during his brief career in it, was twice disabled by the fracture of his limbs. Yet notwithstanding these infirmities and disabilities, all will bear him testimony, that he faithfully exerted his abilities in promoting the interests of that part of Zion of which he had been made overseer. In the first year of his episcopate, as a token of personal respect and in honor of the office he was called to fill, the university of Pennsylvania conferred on him the Degree of Doctor of Divinity. His death took place the 26th of February, 1838. Bishop Stone was distinguished by the unassuming meekness, the unaffected humility, and the lovely simplicity of his character. His course was not brilliant; there was nothing in the attributes of his mind to produce sudden bursts of admiration; but, he possessed good common sense talents, and these were so sanctified by religion as to make him highly useful.

TALLEYRAND. Charles Maurice de Talleyrand Perigord, Prince of Benevento, in the holy Roman Empire, was born at Paris in 1754. He descended from one of the oldest and most illustrious houses of France, which, during the middle ages, were lords of the district of Quercy; and at an early age, as a younger brother, was destined for the church. His ecclesiastical education was formed at the seminary of St. Sulpice, and his talents for public business were already so strongly developed that, in 1780, he was named Agent General of the Clergy. In 1788 he was consecrated Bishop of Autun, and the year after was elected deputy of the Clergy of his diocese to the states general. The political career of the prince during that momentous period is well known; Mirabeau perceived the extent of his abilities, and signalized him as one of the most powerful and versatile of the men of genius who then abounded in Europe. He proposed several most important measures to the states, among others the suppression of tithes and the appropriation of the property of the clergy to the wants of the public treasury. In 1790 he was named president, and in the same year officiated at the altar in the Champ de Mars on the day of the national federation. He subsequently consecrated the first constitutional bishops, and for this was excommunicated by Pope Pius VI. His resignation of the Bishoprick of Autun, and his election as a member of the directory of the department of Paris, followed soon after. He was left by Mirabeau as one of his executors, and in 1792 was sent into England on a secret mission, together with M. Ceauvelia the ambassador. It will be remembered that the English administration under Mr. Pitt, after favorably receiving the French envoys, subsequently ordered them to leave the country within 24 hours. M. de Talleyrand returned to Paris the day after the famous 10th of August, and was indebted to Danton for a narrow escape from assassination. He then left France for the United States, and remained there engaged in commercial speculations till 1796, when he was recalled by a decree of the convention. In 1797, after the 18th Fructidor, he was appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs, and supported with the most imperturbable sang froid the attacks made against him by all parties. Two years afterwards the 18th Brumaire occurred; Napoleon became first consul, and M. de Talleyrand continued as foreign minister. In 1803 a brief from Pius VII. released the ex-Bishop of Autun from his ecclesiastical ties, and he shortly afterwards married Madame Grandt of Hamburg. The rivalry of Fouche and M. de Talleyrand then followed, and to the ultimate advantage of the latter, who, on Napoleon becoming Emperor in 1806, was elevated to the rank of Prince of Benevento, and grand Chamberlain of the empire. The next year he was succeeded as minister by M. de Chamaugny, Duke de Cadore, and was named vice-grand Elector; but from this period his alienation from Napoleon may be dated. He disapproved of the Emperor's aggressions in Spain, and in 1814, was appointed President of the provisional Government of France until the arrival of the Count d'Artois. We need hardly remind our readers that he was French Commissioner at the Congress of Vienna, and that on the final return of Louis XVIII. in 1815, he resumed the portfolio of foreign affairs as President of the council; but resigned before the end of the year, from his disapprobation of the tendencies of the government. From this period he remained near the person of the Sovereign in virtue of his title as Chamberlain, and ultimately became the leader of the opposition in the Chamber of Peers. The revolution of 1830 found him, though advanced to a venerable age, not too old for the service of his country, and he proceeded to London as ambassador, where he remained till 1835. After this time, the Prince has rested under the shadow of his diplomatic laurels, ample enough to include within their branches the treaties of Amiens, of Luneville, and of the Quadruple Alliance.

We will not attempt to make any observations on the character of Prince Talleyrand, variously estimated as it is, and necessarily must be for some time to come, by the distorted views of party prejudice. His detractors say that he changed to all systems, and to all men; his eulogists, that he remained consistent at all times, and that he withdrew his support only when what it was given to had ceased to coincide with the political system which he had originally adopted for himself. The truth, perhaps, lies between the two. This great politician expired on the 17th of May, 1838, in the 84th year of his age.

TAYLOR, Isaac, of Ongar, the author of various works of uncommon excellence, designed for the benefit of youth, was born in 1759, and died in 1829, aged seventy years. Through life he practised to some extent the business of designer and engraver. He was first settled as the pastor of an Independent church at Colchester, but in 1797, removed to Ongar, where for thirty-two years he continued to labor with a most attached people, who in losing him felt that they had lost their "guide, philosopher, and friend." Mr. Taylor was indeed one of the most amiable of men, and few writers in the sphere he occupied have been less ambitious or more useful. He was on Christian principles, a great economist of time, and quite an enthusiast in his love of order and punctuality. No man was better qualified to write on "Character essential to Success in Life;" a work of which no young man should be ignorant. Among his other writings, are, Self-Cultivation; Advice to the Teens; the Balance of Criminality; Scenes of Wealth, &c.; which have gone through numerous editions. His wife, and all his children, were associated with him in literary pursuits; presenting the singular and beautiful spectacle of a whole family of elegant, useful, evangelically pious, and successful authors.

TAYLOR, Thomas, an Englishman, long known by the appellation of the "Platonist." He was born in London in 1758, and acquired the rudiments of classical learning at St. Paul's School. He early manifested a love of mysticism and metaphysical subtlety. He applied himself with zeal and assiduity to the study of the Old Greek philosophers, beginning with Aristotle and proceeding to Plato, and their successors. His publications comprise 23 volumes 4to, and 40 volumes 8vo. His greatest works are complete translations of Aristotle and Plato, illustrated copiously from the ancient commentators; and a translation of Pausanias with elaborate notes.

TEIGNMOUTH, John Shore, Lord, was born in London, 1751, and sent early to India as a writer in the service of the East India Company. While in that country he was intimate with Mr. Hastings, and under his government filled several important offices. In 1792 he succeeded to be governor of Bengal. In 1797 he was raised to a peerage of Ireland, and 1798 retired from office and returned to England. He succeeded Sir William Jones in the presidency of the Asiatic Society, and published the "Memoirs of his Life and Writings," in 1804. He fixed his residence at Clapham, near London, and took an active part with his friends Wilberforce, Thorton, C. Grant, G. Sharpe, &c., in the establishment of the Christian Observer. On the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804, Lord Teignmouth was chosen its first president. This honorable office he held till his death; and to the able, zealous, and prudent manner in which he conducted the affairs of the society, and to the catholic and amicable spirit in which he presided over it, the institution has been greatly indebted for its prosperity. He died February 14, 1835, aged eighty-two. His "Life" is announced in England.

THAYER, Elihu, D. D., an able divine, and a most amiable Christian, who spent the whole of a long life, at Kingston, N. H. He was educated at Nassau Hall College, N. J., where he graduated in the year 1769. Soon after, he was settled as the pastor of the Congregational Church at the above named place, where he died, in 1818. No clergyman in that state, in his day, ranked higher for learning, piety, and the social virtues than did Dr. Thayer. He was employed by the Missionary Society of New Hampshire, to write a Summary of Christian Doctrines and Duties, a small volume of great worth, which was much commended. The poverty however of his parish, and his own instinctive modesty, prevented him from being as much known as he deserved to be. After his death an octavo volume of his sermons was published; the style of which is characterised for purity.

THOMPSON, Andrew, D. D., a distinguished minister of Edinburgh, Scotland, was born in that city, July 18, 1779. His father was John Thompson, D. D. While at college he first came under the power of decided religious principles. Six years he preached at Sproaston, and two at Perth; from 1810 to 1814, at Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh; and the remainder of his life at St. George's, a new church. For many years he conducted the Edinburgh Christian Instructor. He also contributed many articles to Dr. Brewster's New Edinburgh Encyclopedia. For a number of years he was a leader of the orthodox party in the great assembly, in opposition to that "power that would thrust upon a people, hungering for the bread of life, a heartless and unqualified pastor." He took a decided part also against the circulation of the Apocrypha by the British and Foreign Bible Society. His last great public effort was in behalf of the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the West India colonies. He died of an affection of the heart, February 9, 1831, greatly beloved and lamented. "His peculiarity" says Dr. Chalmers, "lay in this, that, present him with a subject, he, of all other men, saw the principle which was embodied in it. In him were concentrated all the powers necessary to maintain and carry questions of the greatest difficulty and magnitude." Yet the style of his sermons is simple, plain, direct and convincing, and his addresses to the unconverted are full of tenderness and solemnity. His Sermons and sacramental Exhortations have been reprinted in Boston, in one vol. duodecimo, 1832.

TITTMANN, Charles Christian, D. D., Professor of theology at Wittenburgh, and superintendent at Dresden; born 1744; died 1820. He edited the New Testament in Greek, wrote a book on Christian Morals and a treatise to show, that there are no traces of the Gnostics in the New Testament. His principal work is his Meletemata Sacra, an exegetical, critical, and dogmatical commentary on John, and one of the most valuable works on that evangelist. An article on Historical Interpretation, extracted from it, has been translated for the Biblical Repository. He is also the author of a collection of tracts, published under the title of Opuscula Theologica. Tittmann was a man of sober judgment, exact learning, orthodox views, and enlightened and sincere piety. The materials for a notice of him equal to his merit are not within our reach.

VATER, John Leverin, D. D., Professor of theology and Oriental literature at Halle and Kenigsbörg. He was at Altenburg, in Saxony, in 1771; studied theology under Griesback and Paulus at Jena, and finished his university education at Halle, where he began to lecture on Aristotle in 1795, and, in the same year, was appointed professor extraordinary in Jena. Four years after, he was invited to Halle, and, in 1809, to Kenigsbörg, from whence he returned to Halle in 1820, and died 1825. He has done much for Hebrew and general grammar, to which last he contributed the continuation of Adelung's Mithridates. He wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, with a translation, edited the Greek Testament, and the book of Amos, with a translation into German. His Hebrew grammar was, until Gesenius, in high repute in Germany.

VAUGHAN, Benjamin, LL. D., was born in 1751, on the island of Jamaica, where his father was a wealthy planter. At an early age, he went with his parents to England, and resided with them in London. After attending school for a while at Hackney he went to the Academy at Warrington, which then numbered among its teachers the celebrated names of Enfield and Priestly. At the age of nineteen, he entered the University of Cambridge, where he resided the usual term, but, being a Dissenter, he declined subscribing the established test, and did not receive a degree. After leaving the University, he studied law at the Temple in London, and medicine at the University of Edinburgh. The latter science he pursued with eminent success, paid much attention to it in the subsequent part of his life, collected a valuable medical library, and, though he did not practice as a physician, he exemplified his benevolent character, in visiting his poor neighbors, and administering to them gratuitously. In 1792, Mr. Vaughan was elected a member of Parliament, and for several years zealously supported the cause of the Whigs. When the French Revolution broke out, he, together with a great many others, hailed it as an event that promised good to mankind, but, in consequence of the atrocities which soon followed, it seems to have become disgusted with politics; and in 1797, he came to America, settled in the town of Hallowell, Maine where he lived to an advanced age, greatly beloved and respected. The last fifteen years he spent in Europe, were in a great measure devoted to public pursuits; but, after coming to America, he lived in retirement, abstaining from party politics, but always manifesting a deep interest in the welfare of his friends and neighbors, and of mankind generally. His active mind found full and constant employment in superintending a large farm, in devotion to study and reading, in an extensive correspondence with literary and scientific men, and in acts of unwearied benevolence. He was a man of great and various learning, and possessed one of the largest and most valuable private libraries in the country. He died at Hallowell, December 8th, 1835, aged 84 years, greatly respected by all who knew him.

WAHL, Christian Abraham, Superintendent in Oschatz, Saxony, formerly pastor at Schneeberg; born 1773. Wahl is the well-known author of the Clavis Philologica of the New Test., which has almost entirely supplanted the lexicon of Schleusner, and formed the basis of Prof. Robinson's highly-valuable lexicographical publications on the New Test. Wahl surpasses all preceding New Test. lexicographers in discriminating, and arranging the significations and uses of words, especially particles, and in citing classical authorities, wherever any are to be found. The lexicon of Robinson is a decided improvement on the last edition of Wahl, in various particulars. Wahl has also written an Historical and Practical Introduction to the Bible. He is substantially orthodox in his views.

WALCH, J. G., D. D., Ordinary professor of theology at Jena; born at Meiningen, 1693; died at Jena 1775. He spent his life at the University just mentioned, having been made extraordinary professor of philosophy there in 1718, at the age of 25, and in the next year, ordinary professor of eloquence to which, in 1721, was added the professorship of poetry. In 1724, he was made extraordinary, and, in 1728, ordinary professor of theology. His great work is his Bibliotheca Theologica Selecta, which contains a rich historical and critical account of a vast number of works in all departments of theology. To this valuable production, Walch added, in 1770, the Bibliotheca Patristica, giving an account of editions of the fathers, and of works illustrative of their writings and history. He also published Observations on the New Testament.

WAUGH, Alexander, D. D., was born at East Gordon, in Berwickshire, on the 16th of August, 1754. After passing through the necessary course of preliminary and domestic instruction, he entered the grammar-school of Earlston, in his native country, on the first of January, 1766, where he obtained a liberal education; after which he was sent to the university 1769, where he prosecuted his studies under professors Hunter and Stuart. From Edinburgh he proceeded to Haddington, in 1774, where he spent two years in the study of divinity under the Rev. John Brown, professor of theology to the Burger Secession; from whence attracted by the fame of doctors Campbell and Beattie, he went, in the winter of 1776, to the university of Aberdeen, where he completed his studies. He was licensed to preach on the 28th of June, 1779, soon after which he repaired to London, where he supplied for a short time at Well Street, which laid the foundation of that attachment which subsequently led to his settlement in the metropolis. His first settlement, however, was at Newtown, in the parish of Melrose, Roxburghshire, where he was ordained in 1780 but the death of Mr. Hall, which happened two years afterwards, having occasioned a vacancy in Oxford Street, London, Mr. Waugh was translated thither by the Synod of Edinburgh, on the 9th of May, 1782; and on the 14th of June following he arrived in the metropolis, and commenced his stated ministry, where he continued to the time of his death, viz. on the 14th of December, 1827, a period of forty-six years. He was one of the fathers of the London Missionary Society, and his active exertions in supporting it brought him into a much greater degree of popularity than he had previously obtained. Dr. Waugh did not distinguish himself much as an author, but he greatly excelled in the pulpit; he was a most interesting preacher, and highly esteemed by an extensive circle of acquaintance.

WHITE, William, D. D., First Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. He was a native of Philadelphia, born March 24, 1747; the son of Thomas White, a native of London, who migrated to America in early youth. In his infancy he was impressed with serious views of religion by a pious mother! was educated at Philadelphia; in the year 1765, graduated at the college there; was led, to a careful examination of Church doctrine and discipline; studied theology; was admitted, by Dr. Terrick, Bishop of London, to Deacons' Orders in October, 1770, and by Dr. Young Bishop of Norwich, to Priests' Orders, in April 1772 During his residence in England he visited many of the most interesting parts of the country, and had occasional interviews with celebrated men, such as Bishop Lowth, of London, Dr. Kennicott, Dr. Samuel Johnson, and Dr. Goldsmith. On his return to Philadelphia Sept., 1772, he was settled as an Assistant Minister of Christ Church and St. Peter's; and, a few years after, he was chosen Rector of these churches. During the revolutionary war he was a friend of Washington and his associates, and was elected Chaplain to Congress, at Yorktown, 1777. At one time he was the only Episcopal clergyman in Pennsylvania. In the year 1784 a meeting was held at his house, to organize the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. This meeting led to the call of a convention of delegates, and the final union of all the Episcopal congregations in our country. Dr. White presided at the first Convention; and the Constitution of the Church was written by him. As Bishop elect of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, he soon proceeded to England for Bishops' Orders, and was consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Moore, assisted by Archbishop Markham, of York, and Bishops Moss and Hincliffe. On Easter-day, 1787, he was again in the United States; and he then commenced the labors of his Episcopate. His chief publications are, Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Comparative Views of the Controversy between the Calvinists and Arminians; Lectures on the Catechism; and, Commentaries on the Ordination Services. Prior to the year 1837, there have been thirty-two Bishops consecrated of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. Bishop Seabury of Connecticut was consecrated in Scotland, in 1784; Bishop White, Provoost, and Madison in England; the last in 1790. Bishop Claggett of Maryland was consecrated by Bishop Provoost; all the others (with the exception of Bishop McCoskry, of Michigan, who was consecrated during Bishop White's last sickness) have been consecrated by Bishop White. His death took place, July, 17th 1836, in the 89th year of his age. He was distinguished for exemplary zeal and consummate prudence, commanding the respect and attention of those who were of his communion, and also of others, to a degree rarely if ever equalled.

WHITFIELD, James, D. D., Roman Catholic Archbishop of Baltimore. He was born at Liverpool in England, Nov. 3, 1770. After having received a good education, he devoted his attention, for a time, to mercantile pursuits. He was in France at the time when Bonaparte decreed that every Englishman in the country was a prisoner. He spent the greater of his exile at Lyons, where he became acquainted with Ambrose Marechal, late Archbishop of Baltimore, who was then a professor of theology in the city, and with whom he studied divinity, and was ordained in 1809. At the request of Archbishop Marechal he came to Baltimore in 1817; and after the death of the former he was consecrated Archbishop of Baltimore. His death took place in that city, Oct. 19, 1834, aged 64 years. His fortune, which was considerable, was consecrated to religious purposes.

WILBERFORCE, William; a man who, when piety was so much stigmatized in the aristocratical circles of England, and its professors banished from fashionable society, exerted himself, with a courage and consistency worthy an apostle, by his writings and by his example to work a moral reform in the sphere in which he moved; a statesman who shone with brilliancy in the British senate, even when men were dazzled with the splendor of Pitt and Fox; and a philanthropist who devoted successfully his best powers and his best days to the abolition of the slave-trade. He was born at Hull, August 24, 1759. Distinguished as he was in other respects, the reputation of Wilberforce was the result chiefly of his labors in behalf of oppressed Africa. It was in 1788 that he first drew the attention of parliament to the subject. A resolution passed the house that it would in the next session proceed to consider the state of the slave-trade, and the measures it might be proper to adopt with respect to it. In accordance with the terms of this resolution, on 12th of May, 1789, Mr. Wilberforce again brought the question before the house, introducing it with one of those powerful and impressive speeches which have justly classed him among the most eloquent men of his day. The usual evasion of calling further evidence, was successfully practised by his opponents, and the subject was delayed to the next session. In 1790, he revived the subject, but the plea for further evidence was continued; and the question was again postponed. In the following year, Mr. Wilberforce opened the debate with a copious and energetic argument. Pitt, Fox, William Smith, and other members, came forward to support him, but in vain. His motion was lost by a majority of seventy-five. Mr. Wilberforce was not to be discouraged. He renewed the attempt in 1792, 1794, 1795, 1796, 1798, 1799, and as often failed. It was not until 1804 that he again attempted to arouse parliament to its duty. His bill passed the third reading in the house, but in the lords was postponed to the ensuing session. This was the last time Mr. Wilberforce took the lead on this great question. On the 10th of June, 1836, Mr. Fox, being then in office, brought it forward at Mr. Wilberforce's special request. He calculated rightly on the superior influence of ministerial power. The bill, under the auspices of government, passed the lower house, by a majority of one hundred and fourteen to fifteen, and through the efforts of lord Green-ville was at length triumphant in the lords. But triumph was fairly given to Mr. Wilberforce. He was hailed with enthusiastic acclamations on re-entering the house after his success; and the country re-echoed the applause from shore to shore. Mr. Wilberforce died in the holy triumph of a Christian, July 28, 1833. His remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey. We dare not presume, says an English writer, to describe the character of this illustrious servant of God. Nor is it necessary; every one among us, rich or poor, high or low, has been more or less familiar with his virtues; for, in private or public, the man was still the same. He had formed a little paradise around him, and it attended him wherever he went. The protection of the negro was only an emanation from that principle of love, which seemed to govern every action and every thought; a brighter coruscation of that light which radiated in all directions, and spread warmth and comfort on all within its rays. In 1797 Mr. Wilberforce published his celebrated "Practical View," a work which has been translated into most European languages, and of which about fifty editions have been printed in Great Britain and America.

WILLIAM IV., King of Great Britain, the third son of George III., was born on the 21st of August, 1765. In 1778, at the age of 13, he entered as midshipman, on board the Prince George, a 98 gun ship; was on the North American station during the American war; was raised to the rank of lieutenant in 1785; to that of captain in 1786; to that of rear admiral of the blue in 1790; to that of admiral of the fleet in 1811; and to that of lord high admiral in 1817. In 1789, he was created Duke of Clarence; and on the death of his brother, George IV., he succeeded to the throne on the 26th of June, 1830. In 1798, the Duke of Clarence formed a connection with a fascinating actress, Dora Bland, the natural daughter of Francis Bland, Esq., who had assumed the name of Mrs. Jordan. The Duke lived with her about 20 years, and had by her ten children, who took the name of Fitz-clarence. Mrs. Jordan died in 1816, at St. Cloud, near Paris, in great indigence, after having lived separate from the Duke about five years. In 1818, the Duke of Clarence married the Princess Adelaide-Louisa-Theresa-Caroline-Amelia, daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Meiningen, by whom he had two daughters, both of whom died in infancy. The reign of William IV. was distinguished for various important measures of reform in Parliament, and the abolition of Colonial Slavery. He died, June 20, 1837, aged 72 years.

WILLIAMS, Edward, D. D., master of Rotherham academy, was born November 14, 1750, at Glanclayd, near Denbigh. His father intended him for a clergyman in the established church. To this, however, the son became averse, to the no little mortification and chagrin of the parent. In 1771 he became a member of the Congregational church in Denbigh, where he commenced public speaking, and, in a little time, was sent to prosecute his studies at the Dissenting academy at Abergavenny. His first settlement in the ministry was at Ross, in Herefordshire, where he was ordained in 1776; but not liking the situation he removed in the following year to Oswestry, in Shropshire, where a more extended field of usefulness presented itself to him. In 1781 an application was made to him from lady Glenorchy to receive under his tuition a few young men, destined for the ministerial office, to which he consented, and five were placed under his care. Soon after this, the academy was removed from Abergavenny to Oswestry, where Mr. Williams now commenced the delivery of a course of college lectures, which he continued for about ten years, when he transferred the academy to other hands, and removed to Birmingham in 1792. After spending three years at the latter place, he received an invitation to superintend the concerns of the Independent academy at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, to which station he removed in 1795, and that station he continued to occupy to the period of his death, March 9, 1813. As a preacher his reputation did not rank high; he was cold and heavy; but he signalized himself as an author in the number, if not the merit of his publications. His Reply to Mr. Abraham Booth, on the baptismal controversy, made its appearance in 1789, in two volumes, 12mo; and in the following year he gave, in four volumes octavo, "An Abridgement of Dr. Owen's Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews." In 1804 he superintended an edition of the works of Doddridge; and, two years afterwards, of those of president Edwards, which he accompanied with notes. He was fond of metaphysical disquisitions, and undertook to expound the Origin of Evil, not much to the satisfaction, however, even of his own admirers. In 1809 he published his greatest undertaking, viz., "An Essay on the Equity of the Divine Government, and the Sovereignty of the Divine Grace," which has been abundantly praised by his friends, and the fundamental principles of which even his enemies would scarcely be found hardy enough to controvert; viz., that in the administration of the divine government, the Most High never punishes his creatures but when they deserve it, nor displays his sovereignty but in conferring unmerited favors. This work has reached a second edition. Dr. Williams' character as a minister, and in all the social relations of life, was highly respectable, and his deportment as president of the academy entitled him to the warmest testimonies of approbation from the students.

WILLIAMS, John, LL. D., a native of Lampeter in Cardiganshire, who became a minister of a dissenting congregation at Sydenham in Kent. He died at Islington, April 15, 1798, at the age of seventy-two. Dr. Williams published "Thoughts on Subscription to the Thirty Nine Articles;" an "Enquiry into the Truth of the Tradition concerning the discovery of America by Prince Madog, about the year 1170," 8vo; "Remarks on Dr. W. Belle's Arguments for the Authenticity of the two first chapters on Matthew and Luke," 1796, 8vo. He is also said to have been the author of a "Concordance of the Greek Testament," 1767, 4to.

WINGATE, Paine, one of the most venerable citizens of New Hampshire. He was born at Stratham in that state, May 14, 1739, and graduated at Harvard College in 1759. For several years he was a clergyman; but, in 1789, became one of the first senators of Congress—and was probably the last surviving member of that body. In 1798 he was appointed a Judge of the supreme court of the same state, and held this office till 1809, being then 70 years of age. For many years he was the oldest graduate of his alma mater; and, died in 1838, aged ninety nine-years. He was highly esteemed by his own generation; and was venerated by the new race that had grown up around him.

WOOD, Samuel, D. D., an American clergyman, extensively known for his useful labors and exemplary life. He was born in Mansfield, Conn., May 11th, 1722; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1779; was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Boscawen, N. H., in 1781, which office he sustained till his death. This excellent man was a zealous promoter of learning, and he fitted more students for college than any other clergyman in the state. About one hundred of his pupils entered college, and about fifty of them became ministers of the gospel. A considerable number of his pupils were assisted by him with pecuniary means in defraying the expences of their education, and he was generally regarded by them with much affection and respect. Dr Wood died Dec. 24, 1836, aged 85 years.

WORCESTER, Noah, D. D., an eminent philanthropist and the founder of the Massachusetts Peace Society. He was born at Hollis, N. H., Nov. 25, 1758, and was the eldest brother of the Rev. Samuel Worcester, D. D. He was great-grandson of the Rev. Francis Worcester, who was great-grandson of the Rev. William Worcester, the first minister of Salisbury, Mass. He had no advantages of education, except what were afforded by the common schools of the country at that time. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, in 1775, he enlisted as a soldier, in his 17th year, and in three campaigns, passed between one and two years in the army. In 1782 he settled in Thornton, a newly inhabited town of that state. His employment was chiefly that of a farmer; but taught a school in the winter; and held different civil offices. In 1785, he published a "Letter to the Rev. John Murray," of Newburyport, containing remarks on his "Sermon on the Origin of Evil." This pamphlet brought him into notice, and he was induced to turn his attention to the study of theology. In 1789 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Thornton; and although from his small salary he was obliged mainly to support his family by his own manual labor, he soon became one of the best preachers in the state. In 1810 he removed to Salisbury, N. H., and thence in 1813 to Brighton, Mass., in order to conduct the "Christian Disciple" which he edited till 1819. In 1815 he published an anonymous pamphlet, entitled a "Solemn Review of the Custom of War," which produced a strong impression, and in six months passed through five editions; and it has been widely circulated in Europe in different languages. The publication of his pamphlet led to the foundation of the "Massachusetts Peace Society," which was organized in January, 1816, and Dr. Worcester was appointed Secretary. He continued his zealous labors as Secretary, and as editor of the "Friend of Peace," a periodical publication devoted to the objects of the Society, till the age of 70, when, on account of his infirmities, he relinquished the labor. In addition to his writings in periodical publications, he was the author of numerous pamphlets, sermons, and treatises, some of the most considerable of which are the "Bible News," and the "Atoning Sacrifice, a Display of Love not of Wrath." The former was the first publication in which he combated the commonly received doctrines of the Trinity. Dr. Noah Worcester died Oct. 31st, 1838, aged 79 years.

WORCESTER, Samuel, D. D. an eminent Congregational clergyman of New England, born in Hollis, N. H., Nov. 1, 1771, and graduated at Dartmouth College, in 1795. He was ordained and settled at Fitchburg, Mass., September 27th, 1797; from which place, after a few years, he was dismissed; and, April 20, 1803, he was installed the pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, of that state. At the organization of the Foreign Missionary Society of his religious denomination, in the year 1810, he was appointed Recording Secretary; and, upon him devolved the principal superintendence of that institution. It was in this station that he acquired his most valuable reputation, although he was distinguished as an able preacher, a faithful pastor, and a learned and powerful controversialist. His most noted publications are Two Discourses on the Perpetuity of the Covenant with Abraham; Letters to the Rev. Dr. Baldwin, on the Baptismal controversy; and three separate Letters to the Rev. Dr. Channing, on Unitarianism; and ten Annual Reports of the Missionary Board, of which he was Secretary. Besides these, he published a Memoir of Eleanor Emerson, Christian Psalmody, and a large number of occasional sermons. In 1820, having been relieved from pastoral duty by an assistant minister, he visited the Missionary stations in the southwestern portion of the United States. His health from long devotion to the arduous duties of his office, had become feeble; and, when at the station among the Cherokees, he sunk under the weight of his toils. This was on the 7th of June, 1821, aged 49 years. After his death a volume of his sermons was published.
