English people are, after all is said and done, instinctively conservative, and are more ready 'to bear the ills they have than' perhaps 'fly to others that they know not of.' Thus they permit old forms still to be used, though the delay caused by them is often needless. It is the fashion amongst some classes of politicians to speak of landlords as 'land-grabbers,' but they must remember that landlords have their grievances at the hands of their tenants which cry for redress. For instance, how hard it is to get rid of a tenant who will neither pay rent nor give up possession of the property! Witness the case of Jones v. Foley, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 464. To facilitate the recovery of tenements after due determination of the tenancy an Act was passed in 1838. It only applies to property held for a term not exceeding seven years, and at a rent not exceeding 20*l.* a year. The following is a short summary of the requisite proceedings under it: The tenancy must, of course, have determined, and the landlord has to serve the tenant with a written notice in the form set out in the schedule to the Act, informing him that, if possession is not given up on or before the expiration of seven clear days from the service of the notice, an application will be made to the justices of the peace to issue their warrant, directing the district constables to take possession of the premises and eject any person therefrom. If the occupier does not appear and satisfy the justices that possession ought not to be given under the Act, they can order the constables to enter (by force if necessary) and give possession to the landlord within a named period not less than twenty-one days nor more than thirty days. It will be seen from this that, without making any allowance for other delays, at least four weeks must elapse before the landlord recovers his property. In Jones v. Foley, Lady E. Foley let a cottage and garden to the plaintiff, and due notice was given to him to quit on June 24, 1890. The plaintiff refused to give up possession, though repeatedly asked to do so, Lady E. having entered into a contract with a builder to pull down the plaintiff's cottage and the adjoining one and to rebuild them. On August 15—that is, three weeks after the expiration of the tenancy—Lady E. served the plaintiff with the notice, to which we have referred above, of her intention to apply to the justices for a warrant of possession. On September 3 (nineteen days later) the justices granted the warrant requiring possession to be given up within twenty-one days. If these various times are added up, they make a total of sixty-one days, since the expiration of the tenancy. Certainly Lady E. must be deemed to have been very merciful, especially as she had entered into the contract with the builder. The builder began to pull down the next cottage on September 3, and in doing so took off some tiles from the plaintiff's roof, and some damage was done to the plaintiff's furniture by falling tiles and mortar. The builder's men desisted when spoken to by the plaintiff. The next day, however, in digging the foundations of the new cottages in the plaintiff's garden, they pulled up some fruit-trees and cabbages, and on September 21 removed some tiles from the roof. In the execution of this latter act the plaintiff alleged that a piece of mortar injured his wife's ear and a clock. On October 30 the plaintiff commenced an action against Lady E. and the builder for 50*l.*, 'damages for trespass on and between September 3 and 24, 1890, at a cottage and garden in the occupation of the plaintiff, and damage to the plaintiff's furniture, pictures, garden produce, and other effects.' It is difficult to see under which head the tenant included his wife's ear. The County Court judge directed the jury to find in favour of the plaintiff, which they did with 40*l.* damages, nearly six years' rent of the cottage. The Divisional Court on appeal held that such a verdict could not stand, and entered judgment for the defendants. 'The tenant,' said Mr. Justice Day, 'had no right whatever, of any sort or kind, to remain or have his furniture on the premises; if he will act in defiance of the law, and leave his goods where they had no right to be, he must suffer any inconvenience and loss which is occasioned entirely owing to his own obstinacy, and to no fault on the part of the landlord. I cannot see the slightest trace of any cruelty, or even harshness, on the part of the defendants; they had no desire whatever to injure the plaintiff or his property, but simply wished to proceed with a contract which they had entered into with one another.' An awkward question might arise if the landlord had contracted to sell or let the property on the day of the expiration of the tenancy, and this tedious process involving at least four weeks' delay had to be resorted to. For he is bound upon being paid the purchase-money, and any interest on it that may have become payable, to put the purchaser into possession of the property ('Fry on Specific Performance,' 2nd edit. p. 586). Could the purchaser under these circumstances refuse to pay his purchase-money, or even declare that he would throw up his purchase?

Will not some of the reformers who advocate enfranchisement of leaseholds, taxing of ground-rents, and such measures for casting burdens on landlords, also advocate some scheme for redressing what must be deemed the wrong to them, which the present law causes?

ENGLISH CAUSES CÉLÈBRES.—VI.

MOST students of the English law of evidence are familiar with at least the name of the case of Regina v. Newman and the 'points' in connection with which it is usually cited. Few, perhaps, know that not only in legal but in dramatic interest it is a cause célébrable if not célèbre. In any event the story is well worthy of being retold.

In the year 1851 Giovanni Giacinto Achilli, D.D., an Italian by birth, once a monk of the Dominican order and a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, afterwards a Protestant convert, and at the time of the episode in question minister of an Italian Protestant Church in the neighbourhood of Golden Square, made a series of bitter and popular attacks on the Inquisition and on the characters and doctrines of many of the professors of the Roman Catholic faith. By a curious coincidence these attacks were delivered just at the very time when Dr. Newman, in his 'Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England, addressed to the Brothers of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri,' was endeavouring to combat the traditional dislike with which most Englishmen regarded his faith, and was asserting that a nearer and truer knowledge of Catholics would effectually dispel the national prejudice against Catholicism. From the point of view of this argument, Dr. Achilli's public utterances were obviously inconvenient. Newman had not then established his reputation as 'the most dexterous controversialist of the century;' but he was universally recognised as a dangerous adversary, a forcible and elegant writer, and a perfect master of the irony that 'stings like a darting pain.' Naturally and, if his information was correct, properly he determined that Dr. Achilli should be silenced, and in delivering the fifth lecture in the series, on the 'Logical Inconsistency of the Protestant view,' he turned suddenly aside from his theme and, in the faint sweet tones which will live in the memory of Oxford for ever, proceeded to stifle the vox clamantis. The following are the material passages in this terrible philippic: 'Wiping its mouth and clasping its hands, and turning up its eyes, it' (i.e. the Protestant public) 'trudges to the Townhall to hear Dr. Achilli expose the Inquisition. Ah! Dr. Achilli! I might have spoken of him last week had time admitted of it. The Protestant world flocks to hear him because he has something to tell of the Catholic Church. He has something to tell, it is true; he has a scandal to reveal, he has an argument to exhibit. It is a simple one, and a powerful one as far as it goes—and it is one, that one argument is himself; it is his presence which is the triumph of Protestants; it is the sight of him which is a Catholic's confusion. It is indeed our confusion that our Holy Mother could have had a priest like him. He feels the force of the argument, and he shows himself to the multitude that is gazing on him. "Mothers of families," he seems to say, "gentle maidens, innocent children, look at me, for I am worth looking at. You do not see such a sight every day. Can any Church live over the imputation of such a production as I am?"' Then come the paragraphs, which the jury found to be libellous, and which contain specific charges of infidelity, hypocrisy, and the grossest immorality. Dr. Achilli is then made to conclude his introductory remarks to his imaginary audience thus: 'And now attend to me, such as I am, and you shall see what you shall see about the barbarity and profligacy of the inquisitors of Rome.' 'You speak truly, Dr. Achilli,' Dr. Newman continued, 'and we cannot answer you a word. . . . Yes, you are an incontrovertible proof that priests may fall and friars break their vows. You are your own witness; but while you need not go out of yourself for your argument, neither are you able. With you the argument begins, with you, too, it ends—the beginning and the ending you are both. When you have shown yourself you have done your worst and your all. . . . Your witness against others is utterly invalidated by your witness against yourself. You leave your sting in the wound; you cannot lay the golden eggs, for you are already dead.'

Charges of so substantial and so deadly a character could not be ignored. Newman's lecture was published, and Achilli proceeded by way of criminal information against Messrs. Burns & Lambert, the publishers. Newman at once admitted that he was the author of the alleged libel, his name was substituted as defendant by leave of the Court, and he set up a defence of 'justification' under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 6. The information was tried before Lord Campbell in the Court of Queen's Bench in June, 1852, Sir F. Thesiger (Attorney-General), Sir Fitzroy Kelly (Solicitor-General), and Mr. T. F. Ellis (of Ellis and Blackburn notoriety) appeared for the Crown; while Sir A. E. Cockburn, Mr. Serjeant Wilkins, Mr. Bramwell, Q.C., and Mr. Badeley were counsel for the defendant. The jury found that none of the charges, except that alleging Dr. Achilli's suspension from the exercise of sacerdotal functions, had been proved. Thereupon Lord Campbell entered judgment for the Crown. The defendant subsequently moved for a new trial on two grounds—(1) rejection of material evidence, and (2) that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. (1) The defendant's counsel had proposed at the trial to give in evidence a book called the 'Dublin Review,' which, it was suggested, had been published some time before the application for the information, and contained charges identical with those contained in the alleged libel. The Lord Chief Justice had rejected this evidence, and the Court of Queen's Bench upheld the rejection (1 E. & B. p. 271). (2) On the second ground of appeal, however, Newman was more successful, and a rule nisi for a new trial was granted (ubi sup. at p. 273). This rule was subsequently discharged (1 E. & B. 558), on the ground that 'where a justification is pleaded under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 6, to an indictment for a defamatory libel, and the libel contains several distinct imputations, and the plea alleges the truth of all, and is traversed generally, if the evidence fail as to any one of them, the verdict will be entered generally against the defendant.' Many of his charges against Achilli Newman undoubtedly failed to prove; and although the Court was apparently * of opinion that, as to others, the preponderance of the evidence was against the prosecution, the fact of there having been at least a partial failure to support the plea of justification was held to be decisive. But Lord

* 'Achilli v. Newman. * See the judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J., 1 E. & B. at pp. 577, 578. It seems that the new trial was refused only because, having regard to their lordships' view of the law, no other verdict than a general verdict of guilty could be returned.

Campbell intimated that their lordships, 'in deliberating upon the sentence,' would 'form their own opinion upon the evidence,' and increase or mitigate the punishment accordingly. Not a little to the annoyance of ultra-Protestants, Newman escaped with a fine of 100*l.* and an address, equally foolish in its compliments and in its censure, from Mr. Justice Coleridge.

POPULAR UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

SIR,—The interest manifested throughout England in this important subject has already become so pronounced that I should esteem it a favour if you would kindly permit me to state very briefly in your generous columns the suggestions I would put forward for bringing our national universities more fully into harmony with the requirements of those for whom they were originally founded :—

1. Earnest action by the university authorities and parents against extravagant expenditure.

2. Extension of the university teaching to at least nine months in each year.

3. Limitation of the university course for the B.A. degree to two years instead of three.

4. Removal of the Greek language from the list of compulsory subjects.

I believe that if these concessions were made thousands of middle-class parents—merchants, doctors, lawyers, manufacturers, and others—would eagerly afford their earnest and intelligent sons the opportunity of a two years' university course; the youths themselves would be greatly benefited, and the standard of middle-class education in England would thereby be speedily raised to at least the level of that of Germany and France. COUNTY COURT.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT ACT, 1886, AND BERNE CONVENTION—PRIOR PRODUCTIONS—REGISTRATION.

AT the Brighton County Court, on August 7, the case of Moul and others v. The Devonshire Park Company and Megone was decided by his Honour Judge Martineau. The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the following judgment delivered by his Honour: These are consolidated actions in which several composers of music, who are all Frenchmen, claim damages from the defendants for the infringement of their exclusive right to the public performance of various operas and other musical compositions, and ask for an injunction to restrain any further performance. For convenience I shall, in the course of this judgment, use the expression 'playright,' suggested by Mr. Scrutton in his book on the law of copyright, as the equivalent of exclusive right of public performance, and use the expression 'copyright' as the equivalent of multiplying copies. The defendants, the Devonshire Park Company, own the Devonshire Park at Eastbourne, which is open to the public on payment. For the amusement of the public they maintain a band, and give concerts and perform music. The defendant Megone is the conductor of the band, and presides at or conducts the concerts. The plaintiff Moul is the attorney in this country of a society of French authors and composers, and the various composers who are plaintiffs are members of this society. Hartmann, one of the plaintiffs, claims to be entitled by virtue of an assignment to the playright of 'Le Cid,' by Massenet. The rest of the plaintiffs are the composers. When I speak of the plaintiffs, I refer more particularly to the composers. Moul claims damages in respect of the performance of the opera of 'Carmen.' 'Carmen' was composed by Bizet, who is dead. The heir or legal personal representatives of Bizet, according to the law of France, are not joined as a co-plaintiff or co-plaintiffs; but it was arranged that they should, if necessary, be joined as co-plaintiffs, and that I should deal with the case as if they were plaintiffs. The rights of the different composers are several and distinct, and the questions arising differ in the case of some of the plaintiffs. This has considerably embarrassed me in coming to a decision. I cannot separate or classify the different cases except in a very general way. I have been greatly assisted, however, by the circumstances that the solicitors for the plaintiffs and the defendant Megone had agreed upon a statement as to the points in dispute which are to be settled by the Court. The Devonshire Park Company have not agreed to any such statement, and in strictness I ought to decide as between the plaintiffs and the company upon the evidence given in Court, and upon the points raised in argument before me; but I may mention here that I see no difference between the case of the two defendants. The defendant Megone has played all the music in question as the officer or servant of the company, which is responsible for his acts. Some of the sheets of music from which the band actually played happen to be the property of Megone, and some happen to be the property of the company; but nothing, I think, turns upon this, and, in my opinion, there is solidarity between the defendants. As the plaintiffs and the defendant Megone have agreed upon the points to be decided, and to a great extent upon the facts, I propose to decide the questions they wish me to decide first. I think the decision of these questions will cover all the questions raised by the evidence and the arguments between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the company; but if not, no doubt the counsel for the company will call my attention to any question particularly affecting the company which I may leave undisposed of. The questions which I propose to consider in the first instance, taken in the order in which they arise as between plaintiffs and defendants, appear to me to be as follows: (1) Are the plaintiffs other than Moul and Hartmann the composers of operas and musical compositions in respect of which these actions for infringement of playright are brought? (2) Have they accomplished the conditions and formalities required by the law of France (see article 2 of the Berne Convention) to entitle them to playright? (3) Does the fact that the plaintiffs have not complied with the provision as to registry and delivery of copies required by the Act of 1842, which applies to Englishmen and works produced in England, prevent the plaintiffs from sustaining the action? In connection with this question I have to consider the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling in Fishburn v. Hollingshead, 64 L. T. Rep. (N.S.) 647; L. R. 1891, 2 Chanc. Div. 371. (4) Have the defendants infringed the playright of these operas and compositions? (5) All the musical works having been published prior to December 6, 1887, did the defendants lawfully produce these works in the United Kingdom prior to December 6, 1887? (6) Had the defendants rights or interests arising from or in connection with such productions which were subsisting and valuable at the date of December 6, 1887? There are some minor questions raised by the statement of points agreed upon between the plaintiffs and the defendant Megone; but I think practically my decision on these points will cover nearly every question raised. I will consider any further question arising on the evidence and arguments if counsel will call my attention to any question not covered by my decision on the before-mentioned points. My usual course in delivering a judgment is to state the facts which I consider established, and then to state the law applicable and the result. In this case I propose to refer, in the first instance, to the Act of 1886, the Order of Council under the Berne Convention, and to the decisions (two in number) under the Act—viz. Moul v. Groenings (ante, p. 120; 64 L. T. Rep. (N.S.) 569), and Fishburn v. Hollingshead. As to the infringement, it is admitted, I think, that the defendants have publicly performed the music of the composers though they may in some instances have performed the orchestral score of the opera, and in other instances the pianoforte arrangement. The operas and musical compositions in question were produced before December 6, 1887, and the defendants claim the benefits of the proviso in section 6 of the Act. The burden is on the defendants to prove, first, a lawful production by them prior to December 6, 1887, of the operas and musical compositions; secondly, a right or interest arising from or in connection with such production; thirdly, that such right was subsisting on December 6, and that it was valuable. The composers and Hartmann claim playright in the music performed by the defendants under the International Copyright Act, 1886, the Order of Council issued in November, 1887, and which came into operation on December 2, 1887, and the Berne Convention, which the Queen entered into under the provisions of the Act of 1886. The following are the material sections of the Act of 1886: Sections 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 10, and 11. [Read.] The following are the material sections of the Order of Council: Sections 1, 2, 3, 6, 8, and 9. [Read.] The following are the material articles of the Berne Convention: Articles 2, 4, 9, 10, 11, and 14. [Read.] I will now refer to the case of Moul v. Groenings, in which a question arose as to the effect of section 6 of the Act of 1886. The case arose in this Court. There was an appeal from my decision to the Divisional Court, and from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal, and in the result my decision was affirmed. The material facts of that case are stated in the judgment I delivered in this Court and in the judgment of the Divisional Court. Mayeur, the plaintiff in that action, claimed, under the International Copyright Act, 1886, and the Order in Council of November, 1887, giving effect to the Berne Convention, to be entitled to the playright of a piece of music called the 'Caprice Polka,' composed and produced by him at Paris in 1877. It was not registered under the International Copyright Act of 1844, and so had become public property in this country in the sense that it was lawful for any person in this country to publish it and perform it. Lafleur, an English publisher, had some time before the Order in Council, which came into operation on December 6, 1887, published the 'Caprice Polka' in England. The music was arranged for a band. It was lawfully produced by Lafleur. Groenings, the defendant, bought the music so published of Lafleur and performed it prior to December 6, 1887. It was lawfully performed by Groenings before December 6, 1887. The piece of music was part of Groenings's répertoire. Groenings performed the 'Caprice Polka' after December 6, 1887. The principal question in Moul v. Groenings was, whether Groenings, in performing the piece after December 6, 1887, was protected by section 6 of the International Act, 1886. I held that the Act was retrospective. I also held that the defendant Groenings at the date of the Order in Council had a subsisting and valuable right or interest arising from or in connection with a lawful production of the 'Caprice Polka' prior to December 6, 1887. The Divisional Court, as I understand, abstained from expressing any opinion on the question whether the Act was retrospective, as it was unnecessary in their view of the case to do so. I adhere to my opinion that the Act is retrospective; indeed, I cannot understand what the meaning of the words used in section 6 is if that section has not a retrospective effect. The Act is to be treated, with reference to works produced prior to December 6, 1887, as if it were in operation at the date of the production. I was of opinion, though I did not go into that point in my judgment in Moul v. Groenings, that the plaintiff Mayeur could sustain the action though he had not registered under the English Copyright Act of 1842. This objection to the title of Mayeur to sue by reason of his not having registered under the Act of 1842 was, as I understand, taken on behalf of the respondents in the Divisional Court, and Mr. Asquith, the counsel for Mayeur, answered the objection. I understand Mr. Asquith was stopped by the Divisional Court in his reply on this point, the Court apparently being satisfied that the plaintiff Mayeur was not bound to register under the Act of 1842; but I understand that the Divisional Court delivered no judgment on the point, partly because it was unnecessary to do so, as they held that Groenings had a complete defence under section 6 of the International Copyright Act, 1886, and partly because they understood the point was not taken before me. Mr. Justice Smith apparently was of opinion that the publication by Lafleur gave him an interest within the meaning of section 6, and might entitle him not only to sell any copies remaining unsold at the date of the Order in Council, but also to publish a second edition; and he seems also to have been of opinion that this right of Lafleur might indirectly protect Groenings as a purchaser from him. From the report in the Times of Lord Justice Lindley's judgment in the Court of Appeal, he also would appear to have been of opinion that, inasmuch as Lafleur would not be able to sell unless a purchaser could perform the music sold, the interest of Lafleur would give a right to a purchaser to purchase and perform, for no one would buy unless he was at liberty to perform. The point, however, was not expressly decided by the Court. I do not understand that anything was said by any of the judges in the Court of Appeal on the question whether Mayeur, who had not registered under the Act of 1842, was not in a position to sustain the action. The only other decision or judgment given on the Act of 1886 with which I am acquainted is the judgment of Mr. Justice Stirling in Fishburn v. Hollingshead (reported L. R. 2 Chanc. Div. 371). [Read judgment.] I gather from that judgment that Mr. Justice Stirling has in effect held that a foreign author or composer cannot maintain an action for infringement unless he complies with the requirements of the Act of 1842 as regards registration and delivery of copies imposed on English authors and composers. I cannot help thinking, however, that Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Grantham, when they stopped Mr. Asquith, really intimated that their opinion was that foreign composers entitled to the benefit of the Berne Convention, who have complied with the formalities required by their own country, are not bound to comply with the formalities as to registration imposed on English composers by the Act of 1842 before commencing an action, and that they did not concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Stirling. I will now consider the six before-mentioned questions. As to (1): Are the plaintiffs other than Moul and Hartmann the composers of the operas and musical compositions the subject of the action? It is not, as I understand, disputed that the plaintiffs the composers composed the operas and musical compositions in question. If the point is in dispute as a matter of fact, then in my opinion there is overwhelming evidence that they are the composers of the operas and musical compositions the playright of which is claimed. The names of the plaintiffs (composers) appear on the sheets of music in the possession of the defendants, and from which, or copies of which, the defendants have performed, as being the composers respectively. Authenticated certificates have been put in under section 7 of the Act of 1886 in which the plaintiffs are stated to be the composers. I decide this question in favour of the plaintiffs. The next question is: (2) Have the plaintiffs the composers accomplished the conditions and formalities required by French law to entitle them to the enjoyment of their works? A French advocate was called to prove the law of France. Mr. Cannot, for the company, objected to his evidence. I think it was admissible. He proved the following facts: (a) That the composer or publisher has to comply with certain formalities as to the copyright, meaning the reproduction of copies of music, but that no formalities are required by French law to protect the enjoyment of the playright. This is what I understood him to say. (b) That the certificates produced and given in evidence were duly authenticated and apparently regular. (c) That an assignment of the copyright, according to the law of France, does not carry with it the playright—that must be expressly assigned. The law of France in this respect appears to be practically the same as the law of England. It is not necessary by French law to put any notice on the copies of music published that the rights of performance are reserved similar to that required by the English Act of 1882. The French advocate was cross-examined, but no question was asked him in cross-examination as to the conditions and formalities required by French law, or if any question was put to him I have no note of the answer, and the question and answer escaped my attention. Mr. Megone contended, as I understand, that I was to deal with the case as if the law of England applied, and he relied on the circumstance that the certificates are only evidence of the facts stated, and that it appeared in several, if not all, instances that pianoforte arrangements and not the full scores had been deposited. I am of opinion that the law of France is applicable, and that there is nothing to show that a deposit of the piano arrangements may not be a sufficient deposit for the purpose of securing copyright in the opera. In this state of things, and regard being had to section 7 of the Act of 1886 and article 11 of the Berne Convention, I am of opinion that the composers have complied with the formalities required by the law of France. The next question is, whether the plaintiffs are unable to sustain the action on the ground that it was incumbent on them to comply with the provisions as to registry and delivery of copies required by the Act of 1842, applicable to English subjects. As to this, I am much pressed by the opinion of Mr. Justice Stirling in Fishburn v. Hollingshead, which is express on the very point. If no opinion adverse to this view had been expressed by any other judge of the High Court, I should have felt myself bound by that opinion, though, with the greatest possible respect for the opinion of Mr. Justice Stirling, I am unable to agree with it. It is the duty of a County Court judge to decide in accordance with the law as laid down by the judges of the High Court. It appears to me, however, though the Divisional Court did not decide the question, both judges thought the plaintiffs were not prevented from suing by the omission to register under the Act of 1842. I feel myself at liberty, therefore, to decide this point in accordance with my own view of the construction to be put on the Act of 1886, the Order in Council, and the convention. It is, I think, clear that before the Act of 1886, the Order in Council, and the Berne Convention, a foreign composer who duly registered under the Act of 1844 was not required to register under the Act of 1842 before commencing an action for damages for infringement of copyright or playright. The registration required by the Act of 1842, in the case of English subjects, authors, and composers entitled to copyright and playright, differs from the registration required in the case of foreign authors and composers under the Act of 1844. By the Act of 1842 an English author has to deliver copies of books and to register the title of the book, the time of first publication, the name and place of abode of the publisher, and the name and place of abode of the proprietor of the copyright; and in the case of dramatic pieces or musical compositions the first public representation or performance, and the Act contains a form of entry. By the Act of 1844 and the Order in Council, the foreign composer had to deliver a copy, and register the title of the copy, the name and place of abode of the composer, the name and place of abode of the owner of the copyright, the time and place of first publication or performance in the foreign country. There is considerable resemblance, but the requirements are not identical. I may observe in passing that, singularly enough, the entries in the registry made under the Act of 1844 are treated in the copies issued at Stationers' Hall as made under the Act of 1842, and not the Act of 1844; but nothing, I think, turns on this. The Act of 1886, s. 4, left it to the Queen to determine by the Order in Council whether the provisions as to registration imposed on foreign authors and composers by the Act of 1844 should apply or not, and, if they were to apply, to what extent they should apply. The Order in Council does not contain any direction as to the provisions of the Act of 1844 applying apparently. Therefore there are no provisions that the foreign author or composer should register, as he had to do under the Act of 1844. I cannot see why the foreigner, who under the law prior to 1886 was not bound to register under the Act of 1842, should all of a sudden have the duty cast upon him of registering under the Act of 1842, which did not apply to foreign authors or composers at all. The only words in either Act, Order in Council, or Berne Convention, pointing to any obligation of the kind that I can discover are contained in section 2, subsection 3, of the Act, section 3 of the Order in Council, and art. 2 of the Convention. [Read.] The foreign author is to have the same rights as natives. It is quite true, as Mr. Justice Stirling remarks, that the Act of 1842 distinguishes between the copyright or playright and the right to sue, and that the right of maintaining an action depends on previous registration; but I think the whole scope of the convention and of the Order in Council authorised by the Act of 1886 is reciprocity between Great Britain and the foreign countries. The French composer has to comply with the formalities imposed by French law to secure copyright, and perhaps playright, in his own country, and by order of the convention, to which effect is given by the Act of 1886 and the Order in Council, he is to enjoy the same privileges in England as an English author and composer. Vice versâ, the English author and composer who has complied with the formalities required by English law in the case of English subjects by registering under the Act of 1842, has the same privileges in France as a French author and composer who has complied with French formalities. In my opinion, the plaintiffs are not prevented from sustaining this action by reason of their not having registered under the Act of 1842. The Act of 1886, with the Order in Council of November, 1887, are, in my opinion, substituted for the Act of 1844 and the Order of 1852. I decide this point in favour of the plaintiffs. The next question is, whether the defendants have publicly performed the operas and musical compositions of the plaintiffs the composers. I think this point reasonably clear on the evidence. Whether the music actually played by the defendants was played from the orchestral score of the different operas or compositions, or from an arrangement for the voice and pianoforte of one of the operas, or a particular scene in the opera, is, in my opinion, immaterial. The defendants have played the composers' music, using that word in the larger sense. I may illustrate what I mean by a reference to the opera of 'Roméo et Juliette,' one of the operas the subject of the action. The opera was composed by Gounod, who is living. There is an arrangement of the opera for the voice with a pianoforte accompaniment, partition et chant, the piano expressing as far as it is practicable the various instruments, such as the violins, flute, drum, &c. There is, in one sense, a material difference between the opera and the partition et chant, but each express the same musical ideas of the composer as regards the air and melody, and the composition is identically the same, though the composer's ideas are expressed in different ways. I was referred to Wood v. Boosey. That case turned on a question of registration; but, on looking at that case, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was the composer of a pianoforte arrangement, had not complied with the Act of 1842; but it was intimated in the Exchequer Chamber, if not in the House of Lords, that if the composer of the opera had sued he could have sustained the action, provided the copyright or playright in the opera had been duly registered. I may refer, in connection with this point, to the decisions in D'Almaine v. Boosey, 1 Y. & C. 289; Planché v. Braham, 8 C. & P. 68; Wood v. Boosey, 37 L. J. Rep. Q. B. 84; and Boosey v. Fairlie, 46 L. J. Rep. Chanc. 726; 48 ib. 697. I find as a fact, and decide, that the defendants have publicly performed the operas and musical compositions of the plaintiffs the composers. The next two questions are, whether the defendants have lawfully produced the operas and musical compositions prior to December 6, 1887, and whether the defendants had a right or interest arising from or in connection with such production at that date. I do not feel any difficulty about the last point. The music was purchased and performed by the defendants prior to December 6, 1887, and the music was part of the répertoire, and formed part of the stock-in-trade of the defendants, or one of them. I have no doubt, if they lawfully produced, they had a subsisting right or interest on December 6, 1887, and that as to most of the operas and music composed, and particularly 'Faust' and 'Carmen,' the right or interest was valuable. I think the right or interest was, as regards all, as valuable as the right or interest which Groenings had in the 'Caprice Polka'; and, as the Court of Appeal thought I might fairly find a valuable right or interest in the case of the 'Caprice Polka,' I find to the same effect in this case, leaving only the question whether the production was lawful to be disposed of. 'Lawful' means without infringing any existing copyright or playright as regards all operas and musical compositions which were not duly registered in proper time under the Act of 1844. I follow the decision in Moul v. Groenings. As far as I can make out, the following operas and musical compositions were not duly registered under the Act of 1844: (a) The opera of 'Faust;' (b) the opera of 'Mireille; (c) 'Silvia;' (d) 'Scènes Napolitaines;' (e) 'Philemon and Baucis;' (f) 'La Souveraine.' The case of the plaintiffs therefore fails as to all these, on the ground that the defendants lawfully produced these operas and musical compositions—i.e. had performed them before December 6, 1887, and had at that date a valuable and subsisting right or interest therein. There may be one or two other operas or musical compositions which were not duly registered under the Act of 1844; I refer now particularly to 'Mignon' and 'Loin du Bal.' It is stated on behalf of 'Mignon' that the date of first publication was not correctly stated in the entry at Stationers' Hall. If so, 'Mignon' follows 'Faust' and 'Mireille.' As to 'Loin du Bal,' of which a pianoforte arrangement only was registered, I should like to hear a very short argument. I do not recollect the point being argued. The decisions apparently bearing on the question are Wood v. Boosey and Fairlie v. Boosey. I have not finally settled the list. I now proceed to deal with the operas or musical compositions which have been duly registered—e.g. 'Carmen,' 'Le Cid,' 'Faust' ballet music, and apparently one or two others. The burden is on the defendants to prove lawful production. Though the consent in writing of the author may be necessary to avoid an action for penalties under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. and the provisions of the Act of 1844, this is not an action for penalties but an action for infringement of playright. I think there may be a consent which will estop the composer from suing, though the performance was not authorised by the composer or author in writing. The question is whether the defendants have made out what is equivalent to a written consent by the composers who are entitled to the playright to the defendants performing. The music has been bought and sold in this country with the consent of the owners of the playright, and in some instances the publishers have published and sold, apparently without objection by the composer, band music, which would be practically useless unless the purchaser could perform. I entertain a doubt on this point, but the burden is on the defendants, and I decide that they have not proved a lawful production as regards opera music duly registered under the Act of 1844. The plaintiffs, therefore, succeed as to 'Carmen,' Le Cid,' ballet music ('Faust'), 'Danse Macabe.' I may notice here the Act of 1882. A worse drawn Act I never saw. I am of opinion it is not retrospective, and that it does not apply to foreign composers. The plaintiffs, therefore, fail as to most of the operas and musical compositions, but succeed as to some. The action will be dismissed as to the operas and musical compositions not duly registered, and there will be judgment for the particular plaintiffs whose operas or musical compositions were duly registered. I do not propose to give costs, but I will hear counsel on the question of costs. I propose to consider the evidence as to 'Mignon' and 'Loin du Bal' with the assistance of counsel. [On investigation it appeared that the true date of the first performance of 'Mignon' was not entered in the registry at Stationers' Hall.] I hold that the defendants lawfully performed the music from 'Mignon,' and that the plaintiffs' case fails as to this opera. [On further argument with respect to 'Loin du Bal,' it appeared that a pianoforte arrangement had been duly registered, being the original composition first published, but that the composer had subsequently published an arrangement for stringed instruments, being the arrangement performed by the defendants, which was not registered. The counsel and solicitors proposed to leave the question as to 'Loin du Bal' to the judgment of the Court, without argument.] I hold, but with doubt, that the defendants lawfully produced 'Loin du Bal,' and that the case of the plaintiffs fails as to this also. Damages, 20*s.* in five cases in which the plaintiffs succeed, with injunction if asked for. No costs on either side.—Rose-Innes for plaintiff; Cannot and Megone for defendants.

POLICE.

FALSE TRADE DESCRIPTION.

At the Thames Police Court, Mr. Henry Crosse, of Cordova Works, Copperfield Road, Mile End, appeared to answer two summonses for 'selling certain goods to which a false trade description was applied—to wit, a bottle of sauce bearing the name Goodall, Backhouse & Co.,' and 'for selling certain goods and a bottle of relish to which a trade-mark was falsely applied.'—Mr. J. Seymour Salaman prosecuted; Mr. George Hay Young defended. In opening the case the former said that twenty-four bottles purchased of defendant's sauce were all marked 'Yorkshire Relish. Goodall, Backhouse & Co.' Mr. Henry Parker, manager to Messrs. Goodall, Backhouse & Co., starch manufacturers, Whitehorse Street, Leeds, deposed he had been in the employ of the firm for eighteen years. They had a registered trade-mark, which was the one produced. Two dozen bottles like the one produced were handed to him. The sauce in the bottles was not supplied by his firm.—Cross-examined by Mr. Young: Their trade-mark was 'Yorkshire Relish.' Several firms used the word 'relish.' Retail tradesmen frequently sold the bottles with the outside labels on. The label produced was greatly different to their own.—William Edward Dixey, of 3 Dynevor Road, Stoke Newington, stated he went into a shop and purchased the goods. He took them home to his father, who put his initials on the bottles. In cross-examination, the witness said he had no written order from the office when he went and got the goods, and he purchased them with the wrappers produced. —Mr. Young, in answer to the charge, maintained that no injury had been done to the complainants, as their labels were quite different to those used by his client.—Defendant was then called and stated that he had given orders that no goods were to be delivered without a written order from the City office. If a dealer went to their works and ordered a gross of bottles, the foreman would disobey orders in supplying them without a written order from the City office. An order hardly ever went to their works. He bought bottles from all over the country and used them, whatever name might be upon them. It did not occur to him that he was sailing under false colours. In cross-examination witness said he was manager of the works. He did not deny selling the sauce, and had not forbidden them to use any other bottles.—Mr. Mead, in an elaborate summing-up, observed he had carefully considered the matter. It was satisfactory to him to believe that what defendant had done was not with the deliberate intention of misleading the public and trading on the reputation of complainants. At the same time he had made use of another man's property, and was open to great censure. As complainants' only object was to prevent others from carrying on this kind of thing, he should only fine defendant 20*s.* and 23*s.* costs on each summons.

FAREWELL TO MR. MONTAGU WILLIAMS.

WHEN the magistrate (Mr. Montagu Williams, Q.C.) took his seat for the despatch of afternoon business at Worship Street Police Court on September 18, there was a full attendance of solicitors at the table and the Court was crowded, for it was known that the learned magistrate, whose translation to Marylebone had been announced, would occupy the bench there for the last time.

Mr. Bedford (of the firm of Abbott & Co.) remained standing when the other solicitors resumed their seats, and requested permission to say a few words on behalf of his legal colleagues and himself expressing regret at the magistrate's departure. Mr. Bedford said that he was also spokesman of the officers of the Court, who desired to convey the expression of their good wishes to the magistrate. He himself, with his legal colleagues, had had constant evidence of the fearless career the learned magistrate had pursued on the bench; and, combined with his power of getting through a great amount of work, the happiest results had been achieved by the stamping out of assaults on the police and the offences of the receiver. Those were of the class of persons who, perhaps, would rejoice at the magistrate's departure from the district; but, while those who practised before him and the officers of the Court regretted their loss, there was one class who would experience the keenest regret—the poor. He (Mr. Bedford) had learned through the missionary of the Court that during the past winter only the learned magistrate had given from the funds of the poor-box over 100*l.* for the relief of the poor. The distressful stories which were sometimes indicated in the Court had always been probed to the bottom by the magistrate with a ready and sympathetic ear for their struggles, not a few of those assisted being Jews. Those were the people who would be the losers by the learned magistrate's removal, but others in the district of Marylebone would be the gainers, and he (Mr. Bedford) sincerely hoped that, with improved health, Mr. Montagu Williams would have a long career as a magistrate on the London bench.

Mr. Montagu Williams, after a moment's pause, said that he was extremely touched by the kind and sympathetic tone of Mr. Bedford's address, and to him and his legal colleagues he returned his most sincere thanks for their good wishes. To the officers of the Court he was indebted for their assistance in carrying on the work of the Court, and to the missionary (Mr. Massey, of the Church of England Temperance Society) he was greatly indebted for his valuable assistance. He (Mr. Williams) felt the greatest regret at leaving that Court. It might be said that, if so, why did he go? The answer to that was that whilst it was the rule for the senior magistrate of the Court to remain at home it entailed on the junior magistrate the onus of doing all the outside duty. He (Mr. Williams) had had therefore to sit very often at four Courts a week. Not being of strong health he had often felt the tax upon him, and those who took some interest in his health had pointed out to him that the change to Marylebone would entail less work. Otherwise it had been his intention to have remained at Worship Street as long as he was a magistrate. With respect to what had fallen from Mr. Bedford as to the poor, he (Mr. Williams) had always felt that the sufferings of the poor were borne with the greatest patience, and the struggle often heroic. He should not lose sight of those poor of this district, although no longer a magistrate of the Court. He should always take the greatest interest in them, and the homes conducted by such good women as Miss Headland and others for assisting them. Thanking again the clerks of the Court, the officers, and the inspectors of police, who, he remarked, had great difficulties to contend with in the district, the learned magistrate concluded by saying that, though he parted from the Court with regret, he should always take an interest in those connected with it.

LANDLORDS AND LEASES.

MR. SEXTUS DYBALL, F.S.I., writes to the Times as follows:—

The stringent lines upon which leases are now drawn may account in a great measure for the weighty feeling of dissatisfaction that has sprung up between landlord and tenant, as expressed in the correspondence which has been proceeding in your columns on the subject of insanitary houses.

During an experience of forty years as a surveyor, my practice has to a large extent lain in the assessment and settlement of claims for dilapidations—e.g. the amount payable by a tenant to his landlord on the expiration of a lease in respect of repairs which he (the tenant) has during his holding failed to execute in accordance with certain covenants in the lease. Consequently a considerable number of leases relating to all varieties of property pass annually through my hands, and I am becoming more and more struck with the increasing one-sidedness of the covenants in favour of the landlord. The equitable construction of the law of dilapidations is to guarantee the landlord against any injury committed or permitted by the tenant, whether by neglect or otherwise, beyond reasonable use and wear, and my experience is that landlords were formerly satisfied with a general covenant—on the part of the tenant—upon these lines. But latterly it has become the custom to introduce into repairing leases exceedingly stringent covenants in favour of the landlord, which, unless interpreted in an equitable spirit, may and notoriously do afford a pretext for great injustice and extortion.

I have now before me a draft lease for a term of twenty-one years (determinable at the end of the fifth, seventh, or fourteenth years) of a house and stable in the West End, upon which I have been consulted by a proposed tenant, and from which—in support of my contention—I will give some extracts. After making the tenant liable to pay and discharge all rates, taxes, charges, duties, assessments, and outgoings—Parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise—now or hereafter charged upon or affecting the demised premises, or the landlord or tenant in respect thereof (except the landlord's property tax), the covenants bind him (the tenant) during the term to keep, and at the end to surrender, the premises in good and substantial repair, order, and condition, to paint the outside stucco and cement work, and to paint, grain, and varnish all the external wood and iron work within the last three months of the fourth, seventh, eleventh, fourteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-first years of the term; and to paint, paper, colour, flat, grain, marble, gild, varnish, decorate, and French polish the inside during the last three months of the fifth (if the lease be determined at the end of that year), or otherwise of the seventh, fourteenth, and twenty-first years, the whole to be done in the best manner, in appropriate colours and patterns, the outside paints with not less than two coats, and the inside with not less than three coats.

On writing to the landlord to the effect that I considered these covenants unreasonable at the rack-rent demanded—viz. 400*l.* per annum—and that I could not advise my client to agree to them, he replies: 'I cannot admit that the covenants of the proposed lease are unreasonable, seeing that I have over a hundred similar ones now in existence. . . . The terms, however, can be altered if desired and the rent increased to relieve the tenant of certain outgoings'—a suggestion which amounts to no more than a transfer of the liability, as it were, from one hand to the other.

A tenant at rack-rent is entitled to the fair and reasonable use and occupation of the premises, and he should not be held liable to execute repairs beyond such as are necessary for the upholding and maintenance of the fabric or for the making good of damage occasioned by neglect or misuse on his own part. The liability of a tenant was originally never meant to extend to the work of purely decorative and ornamental character, which is now so generally called for under the specific covenants of leases, and it seems to me that, in a great measure, tenants have only themselves to thank for the addition. Of course, a lease, as soon as it is executed—no matter how stringent or exacting the covenants may be—constitutes a hard-and-fast contract, which, like the drains that were said to be all right, will in all probability—so far as the interest of the tenant is concerned—prove to be all wrong.

At this season of the year, when so many properties are changing hands and new leases are being drawn, it is of the utmost importance for tenants to protect themselves against such excessive liability as the draft lease from which I have quoted seeks to impose, and which, apart from the manifest unfairness of the covenants, might lead to serious legal complications if, by reason of illness or other cause, the tenant were unfortunate enough to lay himself open to an action for breach of covenant in not having at the stipulated period performed the repairs specifically provided for.

LONDON SKY SIGNS ACT.

'A DISTRICT SURVEYOR' writes to the Times as follows:—

I think it probable that many occupiers and owners of business premises within the jurisdiction of the London County Council are entirely unaware of the provisions of this Act, and will be very glad to have their attention drawn to it.

It enacts that any person having any 'word, letter, model, sign, device, or representation in the nature of an advertisement, announcement, or direction,' 'supported on or attached to any post, pole, standard, framework, or other support, wholly or in part, over any house, building or structure which, or any part of which, shall be visible against the sky from any point in any street or public way, with the exception of any flagstaff or pole or any vane or weathercock not adapted or used for advertisement,' and with the exception of 'any sign which is securely fixed to or against, but not over, any building, or which rests immediately upon the top of any wall or building,' shall be compelled to remove such sign under heavy penalties, unless, on or before October 3, 1891, he applies in writing to the district surveyor for a survey and inspection of such sign and a certificate of its safety.

The surveyor cannot grant a certificate unless the application be made to him within three months after the passing of the Act, and no sign can be allowed to remain without such certificate has been obtained.

I wish to point out that all signboards of public-houses and other places of business which rest upon a cornice in front of a parapet or blocking-course will fall within this category, as they do not rest immediately upon the top of any wall or building, the top of the building being the highest part of the roof, and the cornice being a projection from the wall.

It will be the duty of the district surveyor to report to the Council from time to time all such signs existing in his district.

The County Council will be bound to prosecute any offender against the Act, and no cautionary notice is due to any one.

I am induced to call attention to this matter because, although my district is very large, I have had but one application, which leads me to believe that the public are in a blissful state of unconsciousness as to the trouble which will come upon them by-and-by.

SIR RUPERT KETTLE.—Mr. Home Secretary Matthews will shortly have another County Court judgeship at his disposal, Sir Rupert Kettle, of Merridale, Wolverhampton, having signified his intention of resigning the judgeship of the Worcestershire County Courts on account of ill-health. Sir Rupert has held the appointment since October, 1859.

OLD BAILEY BARRISTERS AND 'SOUPS.'—Certain leading members of the bar practising at the Central Criminal Court feel somewhat aggrieved at the new method of handing out the briefs for Court prosecutions there. On the first morning of the present session there was a crowd of unemployed barristers in the robing-room, waiting to secure these, which are known in bar slang as 'soups;' and it is urged that the practice does not conduce either to professional etiquette or dignity.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The first meeting of the session will be held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday evening, October 6, at seven o'clock. Mr. G. Pitt-Lewis, Q.C., M.P., has kindly consented to open the subject for discussion, which is as follows: 'That it is desirable to bring the circuit system into accordance with modern requirements by greatly reforming it and by largely supplementing it by permanent sittings of the County Courts with the unlimited jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice throughout England and Wales.' The society was established in 1836 for the discussion of legal and general subjects and the delivery of an occasional address or the reading of a paper. By the courtesy of the Incorporated Law Society the meetings are held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, every Tuesday evening, from October to May, and members are permitted the use of the library of the Incorporated Law Society for the purpose of the debates. Barristers, solicitors, articled clerks of solicitors, clerks who have been articled to solicitors, and members or students of any of the Inns of Court or of any of the universities are qualified for election as ordinary members. Gentlemen desirous of joining the society are requested to communicate with either of the honorary secretaries: Mr. J. D. Crawford, 3 King's Bench Walk, Temple, E.C.; Mr. H. F. Pattinson, 7 South Square, Gray's Inn, W.C.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending September 19 was seventy-four. The number in the corresponding week of last year was fifty-nine, showing an increase of fifteen, being a net decrease in 1891 to date of two.

A SHEFFIELD SOLICITOR'S REMARKABLE WILL.—Probate duty has been paid on 100,613*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.* as the net value (the gross value being 153,146*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*) of the personal estate of Mr. Bernard Wake, late of Abbeyville, Sheffield, solicitor, who died on April 30 last, aged seventy years. He bequeaths to his son, Mr. Edward Henry Wake, absolutely the goodwill which may subsist in him in regard to his profession of a solicitor, adding: 'Commercially I do not consider that such goodwill is capable of being assessed at a money value, and in thus giving away the goodwill my principal object is to impress upon my son my earnest desire that he will continue his profession of a solicitor, which I regard as a high calling and worthy of the full exercise of all the powers which a man possesses.' The testator also alludes to certain property which he expects his children to devote to ecclesiastical purposes, saying that his views were well known that 'the Church of England can only maintain her position by establishing the principle that the floors of parish churches are free and open commons for the use of all parishioners.' With regard to the liability of trustees, Mr. Wake, in a codicil to his will, makes some remarks to which his long experience and the high esteem in which he was held give much interest.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to record the death of MR. CHARLES EDWARD HAWKINS, barrister-at-law. The deceased gentleman was the third son of Mr. John Hawkins, of Hitchin, and brother to Mr. Justice Hawkins. He was called to the bar in 1849, and practised as an equity draftsman and conveyancer. For some years he did good work upon the staff of the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS. He was buried on Wednesday, the 16th inst., at Brompton Cemetery, the funeral service being read by the Rev. Henry Hawkins and the Rev. Edward Hawkins, cousins of the deceased. Mr. Hawkins leaves a widow, but no family.

The late MR. JOHN DARLINGTON, K.C.I., whose death occurred at the end of last week at his residence, Netherwood, near Ilkley, Yorkshire, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, was one of the best known and most widely respected members of the legal profession in the North. He was a son of the late Mr. William Darlington, of Marbury, Cheshire. For many years he was in practice as a solicitor at Bradford, where he acted as consul for the King of the Belgians and for the King of Servia. He was a Knight of the Order of Leopold and of the Royal Crown of Italy, and was a magistrate for Bradford and for the West Riding of Yorkshire. Mr. Darlington some years ago obtained a royal license to assume the name of De Dutton, as twentieth in direct descent from Odo, first Lord of Dutton, and twenty-sixth from Rollo, Duke of Normandy, but he never acted on that permission.

THE PAWNING OF PENSION PAPERS.—Mr. J. M. Elliott and Mr. Curtis, sitting at the Manchester City Police Court on September 18, heard a summons against Walter Griffiths Lloyd, of the Church Inn, St. Michael's Square, Manchester, which charged him with having contravened that section of the Army Act which provides that 'every person who receives, detains, or has in his possession the identity or life certificate of a person entitled to a military pension or reserve pay as a pledge or security for a debt, or with a view to obtain payment of a debt,' &c., shall be liable to a penalty.—Mr. J. F. Price (Messrs. Price & Son), instructed by the Treasury, appeared in support of the summons.—There were two charges, one of which was that defendant had lent on June 5 last 20*s.* to Thomas Lee, now working at Chester, on the security of his pension papers and identity certificates, and the second was that he had on May 10 advanced 21*s.* to Thomas Bunting, a labourer employed at Golborne, on similar security. These two men being called as witnesses said that the money was lent to them by the defendant on the understanding that they should pay interest at the rate of 4*s.* in the pound. He had refused to give up the papers until the debts were paid, with the result that they had been unable to draw their pensions for some time and so repay the money.—Mr. J. H. Cooper, who defended, said that the defendant had offended in ignorance. He had lent the money as a favour.—A fine of 1*l.* 1*s.* and costs in each case was imposed.

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

THE Queen has been pleased to approve the appointment of the Right Hon. James Patrick Bannerman Robertson, Q.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland, to be Lord President of the High Court of Justice in Scotland, in the room of the late Right Hon. John Inglis, Lord Glencorse.

The Queen has approved the appointment by the Home Secretary of Mr. Abel John Ram, of the Oxford Circuit, to the Recordership of Hanley, in succession to Mr. Rose, recently appointed a metropolitan police magistrate. Mr. Ram, who is the second son of the Rev. Abel Ram, rector of Rollestone, Stafford, was born in 1842, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1872. He married in 1874 the Hon. Mary Grace O'Brien, daughter of Lord Inchiquin.

Mr. Frank Adcock, the Advocate and Legal Adviser of the Swazi nation, has been appointed Attorney-General to the Joint Government Committee of Swaziland during the absence of Dr. Esser.

Mr. Robert Alfred Clarke, of 5 Bank Street, Bradford, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Clarke was admitted in 1881.

Mr. Mirehouse, of the Oxford Circuit, has been nominated Revising Barrister for Monmouthshire, in the room of Mr. Rose, appointed a metropolitan police magistrate.

Mr. William Walker, of Corporation Street, Manchester, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Walker was admitted in 1866.

Mr. John Allington Hughes, of Wrexham, has been elected President of the Chester and North Wales Incorporated Law Society. Mr. Hughes was admitted in 1859.

METROPOLITAN PAUPERISM.—Census of metropolitan paupers, exclusive of lunatics in asylums and vagrants, taken on the last day of the weeks named hereunder (enumerated inhabitants in 1881, 3,815,000): Second week of September, 1891—indoor, 53,967; outdoor, 31,432; total, 85,399. Second week of September, 1890—indoor, 54,443; outdoor, 32,841; total, 87,284. Second week of September, 1889—indoor, 55,354; outdoor, 34,948; total, 90,302. Second week of September, 1888—indoor, 55,239; outdoor, 36,249; total, 91,488. (These figures exclude patients in the fever and smallpox hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylums District, the number of whom on the last day of the week was returned as 1,297 in 1891, 1,744 in 1890, 1,255 in 1889, and 832 in 1888.) Vagrants relieved in the metropolis on the last day of the second week of September, 1891: 447 men, 150 women, 12 children under sixteen; total, 609.

THE TITHE DISTURBANCE IN WALES.—In Cardiganshire, on Tuesday, September 22, Mr. Cecil Beresford, deputy County Court judge for Cardiganshire, had before him an action in which the Hon. George Augustus Vaughan, of the Union Club, Trafalgar Square, sued Mr. John Evans, farmer, for 26*l.* 8*s.*, which represented treble damages and costs for what is legally known as 'pound breach.' Acting for the plaintiff, David Owen, a bailiff, seized two ricks of hay belonging to the defendant for arrears of tithe. Subsequently, when a visit to the farm was made, it was discovered that the whole of the hay had disappeared. Owen admitted in cross-examination that no marks had been placed upon the ricks to indicate that they had been seized. Several police constables were called to prove that there was a good deal of rowdyism prevailing at the time of the bailiff's visit.—Mr. S. Evans, M.P., in defence, contended that there had been no seizure of the hay, and if so the distraint had been abandoned.—The judge held that the action had been sustained, and found for the plaintiff with costs.

SIR HENRY HAWKINS.—Sir Henry Hawkins was much fatigued for some days after his journey to Aix-les-Bains, but he is now better and is gaining strength.

THE TEMPLE CHURCH.—The services at the Temple Church will be resumed on Sunday, October 4, when the Very Rev. Dr. Vaughan, Dean of Llandaff, will preach in the morning.

VACATION SITTINGS.—Mr. Justice Jeune will, on and after Thursday, September 24, and every Tuesday and Thursday during the Long Vacation, sit at Queen's Bench Judges' Chambers, at half-past ten instead of one o'clock as hitherto.

UNLICENSED ADVOCATES IN BURMA.—The report on civil justice during the past year in Lower Burma by the judicial commissioner reveals an extraordinary state of affairs in regard to the advocates practising before the subordinate Courts in that country. The commissioner had reason to suspect that many of the advocates were not properly licensed, and he therefore directed all the district officers to require advocates practising before them to produce their licenses, with a view to having them submitted to the Chief Court in Rangoon for verification. The result was that out of 448 advocates only 250 were able to send in licenses, and of these it was found that some were forged and were not true extracts of any entry on the rolls, while in some cases the rolls themselves were found to have been tampered with. The offenders, wherever possible, were prosecuted and punished, and a rule has now been made that all advocates shall take out fresh licenses annually or cease to practise.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1891.

'OBITER DICTA.'

Those members of the Middle Temple who are in town will be glad to learn that the library, which has been closed during the Vacation for cleaning and repairs, will be re-opened for the use of members on Monday next.

Tuesday last was a day of rejoicing for all the dogs in the county of Southampton and the boroughs of Southampton, Bournemouth, Portsmouth, and Winchester. The Board of Agriculture have seen fit to exercise the powers vested in them by the Board of Agriculture Act, 1889, and the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, 1878 to 1890, and have made a very sensible change in the muzzling regulations. Instead of the use of the muzzle being insisted on, owners have the option of letting their dogs (in the county and boroughs referred to) wear collars with their names and addresses legibly engraved on same. It is to be hoped that this concession will be appreciated and generally acted on, and that lovers of animals, including the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Candy, Q.C., Miss Frances Power Cobbe, and many other well-known persons, will feel rewarded for their long-continued efforts on behalf of their four-footed clients and friends.

A point of some interest to the profession was considered in Westacott v. Bevan (60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 536), which decides that where there is a counterclaim arising out of the same transactions as the claim, the plaintiff's solicitor is only entitled to a charging order on the net result of the proceedings; in other words, that the solicitor's lien is subject to the defendant's right of set-off. We think no doubt can be entertained as to the correctness of this decision, though it is perfectly true that under the old practice of cross-actions the set-off would not have prevailed. If, indeed, under the existing practice the counterclaim related to matters wholly unconnected with the claim, it might not, as Mr. Justice Williams observes, be just to treat them as one action for this purpose, but in such a case the Court, it will be remembered, has jurisdiction to put a stop to the trial of the two actions in one proceeding.

The question whether a proxy appointed by a creditor under the Bankruptcy Act and Rules can be the attesting witness to the instrument of proxy is the occasion of an interesting judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Cave and Mr. Justice Charles in the case of In re Parrot, ex parte Cullen, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 567. In the case of Seal v. Claridge, 50 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 316; L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 516, the Court of Appeal held that the solicitor, being himself the grantee of a bill of sale, could not be the attesting witness under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, subs. 1, which, it will be remembered, required every bill of sale to be attested by a solicitor. In In re Parrot it was contended that the principle of that decision only went to this—that no person having an interest in an instrument can be a witness to it. The Court, however, read the case as an authority for the wider proposition that no party to the transaction can be an attesting witness, and consequently held that it applied to the case of a proxy who, though not beneficially interested, was the donee of the power conferred by the instrument. It is singular how little direct authority there is on the subject in English law, which, as pointed out by the Court, is probably due to the fact that 'the far wider rule excluding witnesses on the ground of interest obscured the narrower, but far more reasonable, rule incapacitating a party to the transaction from being an attesting witness.'

In the recent case of The Coupé Company v. Maddick a Divisional Court decided a new and interesting point in the law of bailments. The defendant, a surgeon, hired a horse and carriage for a year from the plaintiff company. During the hiring the horse and carriage were injured in a collision, caused by the negligence of the defendant's coachman; and the plaintiff company brought this action to recover damages from the defendant. The defence was that at the time of the accident the coachman was not acting in the course of his employment as servant, but was driving on an errand of his own contrary to his duty. It is clear that if the plaintiff had been a stranger suing for injury to person or property caused by the negligence of the coachman while so engaged the defendant would not have been liable (Storey v. Ashton, 38 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 223). But the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Cave and Mr. Justice Charles) were of opinion that as regards the plaintiff company the defendant was subject to a larger liability arising out of the contract of bailment, and that the coachman's breach of duty afforded him no defence.

In the course of their judgment the Court are reported to have used an illustration which appears to be erroneous. They said: 'If two partners hire a horse and cart for the purposes of their business, and one of them, while driving the cart in the usual course of their business, negligently runs against and injures a person passing along the highway, and at the same time injures the horse and cart, the partner driving is alone responsible to the person injured, but both partners are responsible to the person from whom they have hired the horse and cart.' In the circumstances supposed, both partners would be liable to the person injured. The law is so laid down by Lord Justice Lindley ('Partnership,' 5th edit. p. 149), and the cases cited by him seem amply to justify his statement of the law. Moreover, the Partnership Act, 1890, s. 10, makes the firm liable for loss or injury caused 'by any wrongful act or omission of any partner acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm.' One is inclined to conjecture that the report is incorrect, and that the words should be, 'while driving the cart not in the usual course of their business.' The alteration would make the passage no less apposite as an illustration, and quite as effective as a link in the reasoning of the learned judges.

We observe that the Upper House of Convocation not long ago considered a report presented to their lordships of the Lower House to the effect that the Act of 1845, by which wagering contracts had been made void, is met by the establishment of 'betting agents,' who (see Read v. Anderson, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 532) are enabled to recover betting debts. The Bishop of London considers that the introduction of the 'betting agency' with the consequent systematising of betting as a kind of business (see Cohen v. Kittell, 58 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 241) had made a vast change from the previous mode of betting as between man and man. The only conclusion which the House arrived at, however, was to request the president to appoint a joint committee to suggest the means by which some amendment might be made in the law. As we have frequently explained (see e.g. Law Journal for May 24, 1890), the bad judge-made law of Read v. Anderson has placed 'turf commission agents' in a position practically unassailable except by the Legislature. The questions for the joint committee of Convocation to consider will be whether they will venture to suggest that persons making bets through agents should be allowed to disclaim them, which would be bringing the law back to the state in which it was before Read v. Anderson, or that turf commission agency in itself should be prohibited, as betting-house keeping is, as a common nuisance and contrary to law. For ourselves, if any alteration is to be made, we strongly favour the latter alternative. The former would amount to too express a sanction of dishonesty, which, although practised towards a turf commission agent, is still dishonesty. The latter would cause great practical inconvenience in betting circles, but this, we think, the country as a whole may very well put up with.

It is quite right that a man should provide for his wife; but there would seem to be no reason why, when his estate proves to be much smaller than the testator expected, he should be presumed to wish that his wife should take her legacy without any abatement, whilst the other legatees, possibly children, have a deduction made from theirs. Vice-Chancellor Malins is responsible for having given this preference to the widow of the testator in In re Hardy; Wells v. Borwick, 50 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 241; L. R. 17 Chanc. Div. 798, and for having neglected, or rather practically overruled, Lord Hardwicke's decision in Blower v. Morret, 2 Ves. Sen. 419. Two learned judges have preferred to follow the Lord Chancellor's opinion in the two recent cases of Cazenove v. Cazenove, 61 L. T. Rep. (N.S.) 115, and In re Schweder; Oppenheim v. Schweder, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 656. In the case before Lord Hardwicke the legacy was to be paid to the testator's widow immediately after his decease out of the first money belonging to him that should be got in after his death. His lordship was of opinion that that direction only related to the time of payment. 'He directs that, whereas the general rule of law is that legacies should not be paid until a year, this should be paid immediately. The consequence is, that if it is not then paid, it should carry interest immediately, which is always considered as a compensation for delay of payment, and puts her in the same condition as if it was paid.' In In re Hardy the gift was to the wife to be paid to her immediately after his decease. The Vice-Chancellor said that, with the greatest respect to Lord Hardwicke, he dissented from his decision, and would not follow it unless compelled by the Court of Appeal. Vice-Chancellor Malins may have systematically disregarded Blower v. Morret when similar questions came before him, but Mr. Justice Kekewich did not see his way to do so, and held that a legacy of 1,000*l.* to be paid to his widow immediately after the testator's death for her immediate wants must abate with the other legacies. Mr. Justice Chitty in In re Schweder, where the legacy was to the testator's wife 'to enable her to provide and furnish a suitable home and to defray any other expenses,' and was to be paid to her within three months of his death, decided against the widow's priority. In spite of the Vice-Chancellor's view, Blower v. Morret is therefore still law, and likely to remain so. If given in lieu of dower apparently the widow can claim priority, as she has in that case, so to speak, purchased the legacy.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 257, is not so omnipotent as Mr. Justice Stirling would have us believe. At least that is the effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Guardians of Tendring Union v. Dowton (26 Notes of Cases, p. 128). The case is reported in the Court below in 59 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 528;

L. R. 45 Chanc. Div. 582. Dowton was the owner of certain land in Great Clacton, Essex, which was subject to a restrictive covenant. The plaintiffs, as the local sanitary authority, executed certain works which the owners and occupiers had failed to do, and called upon Dowton to pay his share, and subsequently obtained the order of a Court of summary jurisdiction that he should do so. Having failed to find anything which could satisfy the warrant of distress which they had issued, the guardians brought this action claiming that Dowton's share of the expenses, with costs and interest, should be a charge upon the premises, and that for the purpose of satisfying the charge the premises might be sold free from the restrictive covenant. The late Master of the Rolls held, in The Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker, L. R. 17 Chanc. Div. 782, that the charge was 'on the respective interest of every owner of the property according to the value of his ownership,' and not merely on the interest of any particular owner, and declared that such a charge had priority over a previous mortgage. Mr. Justice Stirling thought that the person entitled to the benefit of the restrictive covenant was a kind of owner within the meaning of Sir G. Jessel's words, and therefore the sanitary authority should have priority to him and be able to sell free from the covenant. There is, however, a very important distinction, for the owner of the mortgage would not necessarily lose his security, but was only postponed to the local authority, whereas the owner of the restrictive covenant would obviously lose the benefit of the covenant altogether, if once the land was sold and persons claiming under the guardians could build on it as they chose. As between the mortgagor and mortgagee the mortgage was still subsisting, but what benefit would it be to the covenantee to be told that as between him and the covenantor the covenant was still subsisting when there was no property to which the covenant could apply? On these grounds we would respectfully express our agreement with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in reversing that of the Court below.

Among the many intentions which the law imputes to testators, both learned and unlearned, there is one of which they are frequently ignorant and innocent, and that is 'advancement.' A wealthy parent, on making a present to his son of a substantial sum of money, probably seldom reflects that that sum will be deducted from his son's share under his (the parent's) will. At all events, it is a doctrine which no doubt often causes surprise to an expectant legatee who finds his share thus docked by a sum which he may have spent years before, and is one not unfruitful of litigation. Lacon v. Lacon, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 403, is a case in point. The late Sir E. Lacon was, at the date of his will, entitled to twenty-one twenty-fourth shares in a partnership business of brewers. He gave those shares to his three younger sons, of whom the defendant was one, providing that his two other younger sons should not take any active part in the business. Soon after the date of the will the defendant, who had been for some time employed in the business at a salary, applied for an increase. His father did not accede to this, but when the business was reconstructed gave him two twenty-fourth shares. The defendant refused to treat this as a case of advancement, on the grounds (1) that he was by his services a purchaser for value, and (2) that the presumption in question did not apply to interests of this nature. The rule is, however, inexorable, and as the parent had not declared that he had not intended an ademption at the time when he made the gift of the two shares, Mr. Justice Romer held that the defendant must treat the two shares as an advance pro tanto of his legacy.

The ejusdem generis rule—that is, the rule that general words following particular ones will be restricted to the genus to which the preceding ones belong—may often have wrought an effect contrary to what was intended. A testator, for instance, enumerates a few articles which he can recollect, and then, by some general words, hopes to sweep in a great many other things, but he is supposed in law to have referred only to those things which possess a close resemblance to what he has already described. In In re Jones; ex parte Lloyd, 26 N. C. 111, the bankrupt had work at a colliery and was paid according to the work he did, his earnings averaging from 25*s.* to 30*s.* a week. It was sought to make these earnings, or rather a portion of them, applicable for the benefit of his creditors, under the provisions of section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The first subsection relates to the appropriation of the pay or salary of officers in the army or navy or persons engaged in the civil service, but the second provides that 'where a bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid, or is entitled to any half-pay, or pension, or to any compensation granted by the Treasury, the Court, on the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of the salary, income, half-pay, compensation, or any part thereof, to the trustee, to be applied by him in such manner as the Court may direct.' A Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Cave and Mr. Justice Charles, held that the earnings of this bankrupt, not being ejusdem generis with salary in the preceding part of the section, were not caught by the section. In so deciding they followed Re Hutton; ex parte Benwell, 54 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 53; L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 301, where the Court of Appeal held that the fees of the well-known 'bone-setter' were not a salary within the meaning of the Act. Lord Esher said: 'The question is whether the income which a man earns by the exercise of his personal skill, and which is dependent upon the accident whether people come to consult him or not, and upon whether he chooses to be consulted, is income of the nature of a salary. It is only necessary to state the case to show that it is not.' From these two cases it would appear that earnings must not be of uncertain amount, but must be fixed, before they can be deemed to form a salary.

In the earlier editions of Messrs. Wolstenholme and Turner's treatise on the Conveyancing Acts (see 4th edit. p. 10) it is stated that Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57) only applies to a reversionary interest in 'personal estate,' so that neither the married woman nor her husband, separately or together, can assign a simple chose in action—for instance, a debt or a policy of assurance effected in her name—as distinguished from an equitable chose in action, such as a legacy or other money held in trust for her, which would not come under the description of 'personal estate.' In the fifth edition (p. 185) the learned authors modified this statement by the alteration that it was 'not clear' that the Act gave them power to do so. In the future editions the statement or suggestion will disappear altogether if Mr. Justice Chitty's decision in Witherby v. Rackham, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 511, is correct, that learned judge having held that the words 'any personal estate whatsoever' in Malins' Act are large enough to comprise legal as well as equitable choses in action, and that a woman married before the Married Women's Property Act can, under Malins' Act, with the concurrence of her husband, dispose of a policy of assurance effected by her on her life before marriage. The view taken by Mr. Justice Chitty will, we think, meet with the approval of conveyancers generally.

'LAW JOURNAL REPORTS' FOR OCTOBER.

The current number of the Law Journal Reports constitutes a goodly volume of 368 pages, of which 272 pages are devoted to the Statutes of the Realm, which are now completed.

The Chancery Division Reports (in which there is one case in the House of Lords, four appeal cases, and six cases before the judges of that division) open with the case of Bennard v. Perryman, on which we have already commented at length. It is a decision by the full Court of six judges that the High Court has jurisdiction to restrain by interlocutory injunction the publication of a libel. Lord Justice Kay differed from his brethren in thinking that the injunction ought to have been granted in the case before them. In re Fitzgerald's Estate is a case of the exclusion from sharing in a portion fund of a person becoming the eldest son. Moore v. The North-Western Bank was a case of equitable priorities to shares in a company. In Harrison v. The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company it was held that the temporary character of lift-pumps of the defendants prevented the annoyance caused thereby from constituting a legal nuisance, and it was held that when an Act of Parliament authorises the execution of works the authority includes all that is reasonably necessary for such execution. In re Sartoris decides that income determinable on becoming 'payable to or vested in some other person' was determined by a receiving order under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, though no adjudication of bankruptcy followed. In re Bence was concerned with the construction of a will in respect of a gift to a class, remoteness and the character of a gift over. According to Bentley v. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, when a special tribunal appointed by statute for ascertaining the compensation to be given for damage sustained by the exercise of compulsory powers is no longer available, the compensation may be ascertained and enforced by action. In Payne v. Esdaile it was held by the House of Lords that no appeal lies to that House from the refusal by the Court of Appeal to grant special leave to appeal after the statutory period has expired. In re Metcalfe was a case of forfeiture on bankruptcy under a will. Cox v. Bennett decided that income of a married woman restrained from anticipation which was due at the date of the order might be attached in execution. In In re Schweder it was held that a legacy to a wife, though given her to provide a home and made payable a short period after the testator's death, had no priority over other legacies.

Fifteen cases in the Queen's Bench Division are reported, of which nine were in the Court of Appeal. Stuart v. Bell was a case of a privileged communication in which, there being no evidence of malice, judgment was entered for the defendant, who privately communicated to his guest the contents of a letter casting suspicion of theft upon the guest's valet, who was thereupon discharged. Burchard v. Macfarlane was an application arising out of a Scotch action in which it was held that there was no jurisdiction under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 82, s. 5, to order third persons, not parties to the litigation, to produce documents. Regina v. Powell was a licensing case, and involved the construction of the term 'new tenant,' in 9 Geo. IV. c. 61, s. 14. In re Dodds was a case in which the client of a bankrupt solicitor was held entitled to the benefit of an informal transfer of shares by the solicitor to the client in satisfaction of a misappropriated fund. The Attorney-General v. Chapman illustrates the meaning of 'passing under' as distinguished from 'passing by' in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, subs. c. Schleibler v. Gilchrest settled complicated questions of an owner's liability to shippers for loss of cargo. In the Matter of the Duty upon the Bootham Ward, Strays, York, was a case of exemption from duty of charity property belonging to a corporation. In Regina v. The Local Board of Goole the question at issue was the extent of the term 'street' in the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 4. Reeves v. Butcher was a case under the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I. c. 16), s. 3. In Smith, Hill & Co. v. Pyman, Bell & Co. a charterparty provided that freight should be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo, 'one-third freight if required to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance.' The ship was lost on the day of sailing, and shortly after the loss the shipowners demanded the advance freight, and it was held that the charterers were not liable. Salaman v. Warner decided that an order made under Order XXV., rules 2, 3, dismissing an action upon a hearing before trial of a point of law raised by the pleadings, is not a 'final' order within Order LVIII., rule 3. An order is 'final' only when it is made upon an application, a proceeding which must in any event, whether it succeed or fail, finally determine the rights of the parties. Ex parte Latimer, Clarke & Co. settled questions as to solicitor's charges for shorthand notes and typewritten copies. According to Harmann v. Powell, the lessor of a public-house, who had covenanted not to 'do or suffer to be done on the premises any act whereby the licenses necessary for using the said premises as an inn, tavern, or public-house may be forfeited or the renewal thereof withheld,' and against whom two convictions were indorsed on the license, assigned his lease, and a subsequent occupant obtained a renewal of the licence: held that the lessee had committed a breach of the covenant. In The Skinners' Company v. Knight it was held that the expenses to which a lessor might be put in the preparation of a notice specifying, as required by section 14, subsection 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a breach of a covenant by a lessee, were not payable as compensation within the meaning of the Act. Alldred v. The West Metropolitan Tramways Company (The Vestry of Hammersmith third parties) confirms the principle of Howitt v. The Nottingham Tramways Company, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 21, that the effect of a contract made in pursuance of the powers given by section 29 of the Tramways Act, 1870, by a tramway company with the road authority for the maintenance by the latter of the roadway and lines, is to transfer to the road authority the liability primâ facie imposed by section 28 upon the company for damage occasioned by the roadway being out of repair.

ENGLISH CAUSES CÉLÈBRES.—VII.

Regina v. Courvoisier.

Manzoni—the Walter Scott of Italian literature—has made one of his characters—a Milanese lawyer of the seventeenth century—address a youthful and somewhat unconfiding client in the following language *—which forms a suitable introduction to a sketch of Regina v. Courvoisier: 'He that tells lies to his counsel, my son, is a fool who will speak the truth to his judge. To us advocates you must state facts as they are; it is our part to involve them in confusion.'

In these words the Italian novelist has very tersely and cleverly, though only by implication, defined the charge under which the theory of advocacy has laboured in all ages—that of plucking the sleeve of justice, and so averting from guilty heads the stroke of her descending arm. The trial of Courvoisier for the murder of Lord William Russell is the locus classicus to which critics of the morality of the English bar have for now more than half a century referred, and from which they have drawn their most poignant arguments. It may be worth while to consider—not, be it observed, for the first time †—how far the facts of this case justify the strictures that have been based upon them.

Lord William Russell was found murdered in bed, at his private house, No. 14 Norfolk Street, Park Lane, on the morning of Monday, May 6, 1840. The only inmates of the house besides the unfortunate nobleman were two female servants—a housemaid and a cook—and a Swiss valet, François Benjamin Courvoisier, who had entered Lord William Russell's service a few months before the catastrophe. Accident and death from natural causes were equally untenable hypotheses. The head of the deceased gentleman had been nearly severed from his body. Suicide was out of the question, partly from the known character, health, and spirits of the murdered man, partly because no human being could have inflicted such a wound upon himself. It was difficult to believe that burglary had been the primary motive; for, while a certain amount of plate and silver had disappeared, a number of valuable articles had been left behind; the state of the premises, too, almost negatived the presumption of burglarious entry—the door had been broken open from the inside. A careful search of Courvoisier's box revealed nothing of an incriminating character; but on May 8 the police discovered behind the skirting in the pantry five gold rings, which Courvoisier at once and frankly identified as having belonged to his master, five gold coins, a Waterloo medal, and a ten-pound note. Courvoisier was immediately taken into custody. Further discoveries followed. On May 9 a locket, containing the hair of the late Lady Russell, was found secreted near the hearthstone in the prisoner's pantry. Lord William Russell had missed this locket for some time before his death. On May 13 a fresh examination of Courvoisier's box disclosed a pair of gloves, slightly stained with blood. They dropped out of the fold of a shirt. Lord Russell's watch was also found behind the lead in the pantry sink. Five days later Courvoisier's trunk was again examined, and two blood-stained handkerchiefs, marked with the prisoner's initials, were taken out. Practically this was the sum total of the evidence on which Courvoisier was arraigned before Chief Justice Tindal and Mr. Baron Parke and a jury, at the Old Bailey, on June 18, 1840. Mr. Adolphus was leading counsel for the prosecution. Mr. Charles Phillips and Mr. Clarkson defended the prisoner, who waived his right to a trial de medietate linguæ, and pleaded 'Not guilty.' Mr. Adolphus opened the case for the Crown with ingenuity, but with conspicuous unfairness. Unchecked by the bench, this gentleman informed the jury that, while 'Englishmen are not in the habit of considering murder as a prelude to robbery . . . with foreigners it is different; for they imagine that if they destroy the life of the person they rob, there will then exist no direct testimony against them!' He alleged as an evidence of guilt that Courvoisier exhibited no interest or excitement on or after the discovery of the murder—a statement which was false in fact and would have been irrelevant even if it had been true. Finally, he boldly asserted that 'the secreted articles' had been 'secreted by none but the prisoner, who during the whole night . . . . had been roaming about seeking how he could dispose of the stolen treasure.' This overstrained advocacy all but missed its mark. Many of Mr. Adolphus's most confident statements were disproved by his own witnesses, and one of the constables, Baldwin by name, who first swore that he knew nothing of the offered Government reward of 400*l.*, 'not being a scholar,' and then admitted that 'there was something read out about it in general orders,' though 'he did not recollect the sum that was mentioned,' equivocated and prevaricated in such a way as to put the whole case for the Crown in jeopardy. On the morning of the second day of the trial, Mr. Adolphus announced to the Court that most important additional evidence had been discovered, and offered to open the facts to the jury. The Chief Justice recommended that the evidence should be called without comment. Meanwhile Courvoisier had asked for an interview with his counsel, and had announced to them that he was the murderer. 'Of course, then,' said Mr. Phillips, 'you are going to plead guilty?' 'No, sir,' was the reply; 'I expect you to defend me to the utmost.' Mr. Phillips returned to his seat and resumed the defence. The 'additional evidence' brought forward by the Crown was decisive; it was nothing less than the missing plate, which Courvoisier was proved to have left in the custody of the keepers of a small French hotel in Leicester Place, Leicester Square. The charge against Mr. Phillips, and in his person against the profession to which he belonged, is that with full knowledge of Courvoisier's guilt he (a) still cross-examined the Crown witnesses and commented in no unsparing terms upon the weak points in their evidence; and (b) asserted to the jury his belief in the prisoner's innocence, or at least his ignorance of who the criminal was. The first part of this charge is true, has often been answered, and need not detain us now. The second part is false. Mr. Phillips's peroration is given by Mr. Townsend (ubi supra, at pp. 309–10), and is as follows:—

'But you will say to me, If the prisoner did it not, who did it? I answer, Ask the Omniscient Being above us who did it; ask not me, a poor finite creature like yourselves; ask the prosecutor who did it. It is for him to tell you who did it; it is not for me to tell you who did it; and until he shall have proved by the clearest evidence that it was the prisoner at the bar, beware how you imbrue your hands in the blood of that young man. . . . To violate the temple which the Lord Himself hath made; to quench the spirit in that clay which the Lord Himself hath kindled—is an awful and tremendous responsibility. The word once gone forth is irrevocable. Speak not that word lightly, speak it not on suspicion, however strong, on moral convictions however cogent, on inference, doubt, or anything but a clear, irresistible, bright noonday certainty. I speak to you in no spirit of hostile admonition. Heaven knows I do not. I speak to you in the spirit of a friend and fellow Christian, and in that spirit I tell you that if you pronounce the word lightly its memory can never die within you. It will accompany you in your walks, it will follow you in your solitary retirements like a shadow, it will haunt you in your sleep and hover round your bed, it will take the shape of an accusing spirit and confront and condemn you before the judgment-seat of God. So beware how you act!'

* 'Che dice le bugie al dottore, vedete figliuolo, è uno sciocco che dirà la verità al giudice. All' avvocato bisogna raccontar le cose chiare; a noi tocca poi a imbrogliarle.' I Promessi Sposi, p. 41.

† Cf. Townsend's 'State Trials,' vol. i. p. 244; Forsyth's 'Hortensius.'

Courvoisier was found guilty, and he was executed on July 6, 1840.

THE COUNTY COURT RULES.

Sir,—Will any of your readers kindly give their views and experiences as to the correct interpretation of some of the County Court Rules—in particular, Order XXIII., rule 14, and also Order XXV., rule 17.

Under Order XXIII., rule 14, it is provided that the Court may, upon an ex parte application of the plaintiff, vary the order for payment by instalments. We find some registrars will not act upon this unless an application is made to the judge in Court, while others make the order as a matter of course; and this latter, we venture to think, is correct, having regard to the interpretation clause (Order LII.), which says: '"Court" includes a judge or registrar exercising the powers of the Court in chambers, as well as in open Court.'

The second instance is under Order XXV., rule 17, which provides the procedure by way of judgment summons in the County Court upon a judgment recovered in (inter alia) Queen's Bench. At the present moment we have several instances of judgments which we were compelled to obtain in the Queen's Bench as the amounts exceed 50*l.* (which, by the way, is also cheaper than the County Court in fees), which judgments were transferred to the County Court for the purpose of judgment summons; and in nearly every case our clients happened to be large firms, and the partners, at this period of the year, are away—in fact, we have two judgments, representing 70*l.* or 80*l.* each, where the sole plaintiff is abroad under doctor's orders, and is not likely to return until early next year. He has several establishments, and a large number of employés who transact the business; and we understand in one of these cases the debt was incurred after the plaintiff went away. Yet, upon our applying to the County Court for the district in which the defendant resides for a judgment summons to issue, the same is refused, as the affidavit verifying the judgment (see the rule) is not made by the plaintiff himself. We must say this is a new feature to us. We have issued many hundreds of these, following, of course, the form of affidavit No. 51, with such variations as were absolutely necessary to fit the circumstances. The Court we just referred to as refusing to issue, we believe, relies upon the words set out in the form of affidavit, 'I, A. B., the above-named plaintiff,' and considers that it is imperative upon the plaintiff personally to make the affidavit. Now, it really does seem to us absurd that for the purpose of issuing a judgment summons (which, as we all know, has to be served personally on the defendant to show cause, &c.) this affidavit could not be made by any person who could depose to the facts. We have offered that the solicitor shall make the affidavit, but this is refused. A clerk or other employé who can speak to the facts is allowed to make an affidavit entitling the plaintiff to obtain judgment in the County Court, and proceed to execution or judgment summons, without the slightest question; and almost any proceedings could have been taken on the judgment in the Queen's Bench without the plaintiff necessarily making an affidavit himself.

Again, in either Court, for the purpose of attachment of debts, the affidavit is not usually made by the plaintiff; and there are many other instances which we could quote, if it were necessary, to show the many steps open to the plaintiff upon an affidavit by an employé. It seems to us that an affidavit by any person in the employ of the plaintiff or his solicitor, or in fact any other responsible person who can depose to the facts, should be sufficient compliance with the rules, and especially when we bear in mind the extreme instance above referred to. How is it possible for the plaintiff in that case to conscientiously swear the affidavit, when the debt has been incurred by his servants and a judgment obtained entirely in his absence abroad?

Finally, we would ask, Is it reasonable to expect our First Lord of the Treasury, the Right Honourable W. H. Smith, to make affidavits in respect of the debts that may be due to him from his various bookstalls—probably seven or eight hundred—at any rate covering the whole area over which the County Courts have jurisdiction? But this is the logical consequence of the ruling of which we complain.

We refrain from mentioning the Courts in question, although we feel sure the registrars themselves would be glad to learn what the universal practice is; and we think the sooner the County Courts construe the rules alike the better it will be for the practitioners, and certainly cheaper for the public. At the present moment nearly every registrar has his own peculiar way of construing the rules; thus, what is the practice of one Court is totally ignored in another. Surely this should not be so.

COUNTY COURT.

ORDINARY SUMMONS—INDORSEMENT.

At the Newport (Mon.) County Court, on Thursday, August 13, before his Honour Judge Owen, the case of Moxon v. The Equitable Assurance Society of the United States was heard. His Honour, in giving judgment, said: In this case the plaintiffs, on June 19, 1891, issued an ordinary summons against the defendants claiming 29*l.* 17*s.*, with 1*l.* 1*s.* the costs of the plaint, and 1*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, the solicitor's costs up to and including the issue of the summons, being together 32*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* The summons was returnable on July 16. On July 10 the defendants paid into Court the sum of 32*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, and notice of such payment in was on the same day sent by the registrar to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs did not send to the registrar any notice, under Order IX., rule 12, accepting the money so paid in as satisfaction of their claim. Before the money was so paid in the plaintiffs incurred certain costs, which, it is admitted by the defendants, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to recover from the defendants if the action had gone to trial and the plaintiffs had obtained judgment and had been allowed the costs of the action. The plaintiffs now apply to be allowed those costs, and the application is opposed by the defendants upon the ground, as they contend, that by Order IX., rule 11, if the defendants pay into Court five clear days before the day fixed for trial the full amount of the debt or claim mentioned in the summons, together with the costs of the plaint and the solicitor's costs also mentioned in the summons, they are not liable to pay any other costs. And, further, that this is the proper construction of the rule is shown by the indorsement on the summons, which states, 'If you pay the debt and costs as stated in the summons five clear days before the trial, you will avoid further costs.' It is contended by the plaintiffs that the rule in question is made under section 107 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and that the rule and indorsement cannot go beyond the express enactment in the section, and that if they do so the rule and indorsement are ultra vires. The section provides that a defendant may pay into Court a sum sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's demand 'together with the costs incurred by the plaintiff up to the time of such payment;' and it seems to me that those words are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs in this action to the costs which they now claim, if the registrar, upon taxation, is of opinion that they have been properly incurred. I also think that this point has been decided in the plaintiff's favour in the case of Regina v. The Judge of the City of London Court and Woolnough & Co., 83 L. T. (1887), 190; 11 County Courts Chronicle (Aug. 1887), 173—a case decided under section 82 of the Act of 1846, but which section is re-enacted by section 107 of the present Act. In giving judgment Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., says: 'The Act of Parliament is clear that, upon payment into Court in the manner which has been pursued, the plaintiff is at liberty to take it out if he likes, and the defendant must pay in a sum sufficient to cover the question in dispute, and all costs up to that time.' I am unable, however, to reconcile the endorsement on the summons either with the Act of Parliament or with the rule in question. The plaintiffs are therefore, I think, entitled to all costs properly incurred up to the time when they received notice of the payment into Court, and also to the costs of this application.—William Daniel for the plaintiffs; Bailhache for the defendants.

SOLICITORS AND THE LAND TRANSFER BILL.

Mr. H. H. Richardson writes to the Morning Advertiser as follows:—

The Solicitor-General is reported to have said at Plymouth that 'the Government would have passed a really substantial measure of land law reform if it had not been defeated by the solicitors, who rallied against it in defence of their charges upon the transfer of land.' I thought that Mr. John Morley had already nailed this extremely bad shilling to the counter by showing clearly that the bill was dropped in consequence of the action of the House of Lords; and powerful as the lower branch of the profession may be, the compliment to our influence that Sir Edward Clarke would pay is one, I fear, we can hardly accept. But if the solicitors have been so powerful as to induce the Lords to stand between the people and 'this great advantage,' it is an additional argument to show that the time has arrived when the House of Lords should be either mended or ended. Moreover, if it be true—and I deny it to be so—that the solicitors have rallied in defence of their charges, the Solicitor-General is hardly the man to throw stones at them for doing so. Who, let me ask Sir Edward Clarke, was it but his learned self who led the opposition to the reduction of counsels' refresher fees, and sought to render the new legal scale abortive, and to force solicitors to pay fees to which the law declared counsel were not entitled? This, it seems to me, is rather worse even than to rally in defence of charges that the Court awards and the law allows. Perhaps, too, it is hardly gracious on the part of Sir Edward Clarke to cavil at solicitors whose lines, as a rule, are cast by no means now in pleasant places for defending their charges, whilst he, in addition to the fees from his private practice, has received from the public purse during the last four years, for his salary and charges, the comfortable sum of forty thousand pounds.

It is believed a debate is to be raised in the House next session on the question of the fees of the law officers of the Crown, and it will be interesting to see then whether the Attorney-General and Sir Edward Clarke will themselves 'rally in defence of their charges.'

UNARTICLED CLERKS.

A 'Lawyer's Fag' writes to the Echo as follows:—

Having been in the legal profession for nearly half a century, I can confirm what your correspondent, 'A Clerk,' in yesterday's Echo, affirms as to solicitors leaving their articled clerks to acquire a knowledge of the practice as best they can, and for a very good reason—many solicitors knowing next to nothing of the practice themselves, whatever they may of the theory of the law; and the few who are up in the practice are too much engaged in 'conferring and advising' with clients to waste their valuable time by initiating their articled clerks into the multifarious mysteries of judges' chambers—considerably increased under the Judicature Act. It requires the heads of Hydra to 'read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest.' But such is the frequent alteration of the rules, that it is unlearning to-morrow what is learnt to-day, that even the most experienced unarticled clerks in the modus operandi of judges' chambers are at times uncertain whether they are 'moving on' in the right direction. It therefore requires constant vigilance on the part of the aforesaid unarticled solicitor's fag to be 'up to date' as to what rules are de facto and what null and void. To this generally underpaid, unarticled, and unappreciated fag the solicitor leaves his articled clerk for the acquisition of what he has undertaken to teach when his articled clerk was 'bound in calf' to him' but cannot or will not do for the reason above stated After the articled clerk has had the benefit of the brains of the unarticled fag the former supersedes the latter. When the articled clerk admitted having no practice of his own becomes a salaried clerk, the underpaid, unarticled, and unappreciated fag, usually married, with a family, may be turned adrift on the Dead Sea of the Long Vacation, to keep his head above water with a millstone round his neck as best he may. I have known solicitors, men of means, act thus towards their helpless and faithful fags in this way. There are solicitors and solicitors—it is those who are gentlemen upon the 'lower scale' who have the tender mercy to 'use a giant's strength like a giant' in the way in question. There are already more solicitors than can live by their profession, notwithstanding, if an articled clerk passes his final examination he is admitted, Government not caring whether he sinks or swims, so long as he 'renders unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.'

LAW AND PROFESSIONAL NOTES.

By T. F. Uttley, Solicitor, Manchester, Author of 'Hints on Stephen's Commentaries,' 'Hints on Criminal Law, &c.

THE DUTIES OF MAGISTRATES.

In connection with a recent licensing question in Manchester, which excited keen interest, one of the magistrates thought fit to put his ideas into print. He pointed out in a daily contemporary that amongst the numerous functions of magistrates there are some which are distinctly of a judicial nature. Magistrates have to try prisoners and to hear charges of assaults, &c., brought by one person against another. In every such case a magistrate is a judge, and ought to base his decision on the evidence laid before him. In any such case, therefore, it would obviously be most improper for a magistrate to express in public, or even to form in his own mind, any opinion till he has heard and weighed all the evidence. But the duties of magistrates with regard to the granting of new licenses are not judicial. The magistrates in such cases have not to deal with complainants and defendants, but have to decide whether they shall or shall not grant to an applicant a privilege, often of very great pecuniary value—a privilege which often gives the recipient an overwhelming advantage in relation to his competitors. In such cases, though the magistrates before deciding ought to hear and consider a certain amount of evidence as to the character and position of the applicant and the fitness of his buildings for their purpose, he ought also and chiefly to take into account what he knows or honestly believes to be the influence on the welfare of the community of the whole work, with and without the sale and liquor, of such a place as that for which the license is asked; and he probably ought, or even if he ought not, he is pretty sure to take into account the wishes of the community on the subject. If a magistrate forms the opinion that the influence of certain places is an evil one, a conscientious magistrate will not only vote against the grant of the license, but will also try by his influence as a citizen to induce his fellow-citizens not to desire the grant of the license and the magistrates not to make the grant. Referring to this remarkable letter, another correspondent says he looks in vain for any justification of this contention that magisterial duties in such cases are not judicial. His reason is that they have not to deal with plaintiffs and defendants. Is it necessary to consider the value of this remark? Yet this is the only reason assigned, as the subsequent part of the letter is irrelevant to this question. Look at what the Lord Chancellor said in Sharp v. Wakefield: 'An extensive power is confided to the justices in their capacity as justices to be exercised judicially, and "discretion" means when it is said that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, and not according to private opinion—according to law and not humour.' If a magistrate is in the humour or mood to grant no licenses, can it be said that he is in a frame of mind to exercise a 'judicial discretion?' or, if he does so, will he have committed a breach of public morality? It is stated in a well-known text-book that the ordinary duties devolving under the commission of the peace are partly of a judicial, partly of an administrative character. Under the head of administrative duties fall all those matters of civil polity which are entrusted to the hands of justices in the interest of social order, and otherwise for the general good. The control of the liquor traffic in all its branches—the granting of licenses for various purposes; the general and authoritative superintendence exercised with respect to highways, lunatics, and the poor; the attendance at prison and asylum committees, &c., may serve also as instances in this direction.

'BONÂ FIDE' TRAVELLERS.

The vexata quæstio as to what are bonâ fide travellers or, rather, how to ascertain them, recently arose in the Isle of Man. Charges had been brought by the police against the landlords of various hotels for supplying persons with drink on Sundays without taking necessary precautions to ascertain whether they were bonâ fide travellers. The police visited all three houses on Sunday evening, and found people inside who had been supplied with drink. At each house a person had been stationed at the door to ask the people whether they were travellers, and had been answered in the affirmative. The police discovered that most of them had slept the previous night in Douglas, and were, in fact, visitors staying in the town. It was not sufficient to ask merely whether people were travellers. Inquiry should have been made where they slept, and further precautions taken. The advocate for the defence contended that the prosecution must fail. The police maintained that it was necessary to go beyond the language of the Act, and that a series of questions were to be put to every customer to ascertain whether or not he answered to the legal requirements of a bonâ fide traveller. The Act did not justify such a contention. It said that the publican was to take all reasonable precautions, not all possible precautions. In the present case no specific questions had been asked, but reasonable precautions had been taken to ascertain whether the persons were such bonâ fide travellers. An attempt could not be made to establish a refined distinction between the expression 'traveller' and 'bonâ fide traveller.' The high bailiff stated that the defendants appeared to have tried to do all that was required to satisfy the Act, but on looking to recent decided cases in England, and reading the Act, the defendants were technically in the wrong, and a penalty must be imposed. The case is likely to go to a higher Court. A traveller—i.e. a person travelling either for business or pleasure—is not to be considered as a bonâ fide traveller unless he lodged during the preceding night three miles at least (by the nearest public thoroughfare) from the place where he demands to be supplied with liquor. It lies upon the publican to show that the person supplied was either a bonâ fide traveller or honestly believed by him to be such, after he had taken all reasonable precautions to ascertain the fact. If he was imposed upon in the matter, the soi-disant traveller is punishable. It is obvious that a very difficult and unpleasant duty is imposed upon the publican. He cannot escape liability by declining to supply the traveller, who had as good a right to refreshment as any other customer, neither can he evade it by plying his visitor with argument instead of liquor until the closing hours have ebbed away. In many cases, probably, the traveller's arrival is an unwelcome intrusion upon his afternoon nap; and so long as a difficult question of mixed law and fact may be forced upon him for decision at any moment he has a right to more indulgence than he frequently receives in the event of an occasional mistake.

PAUPERS AND CHARITABLE TRUSTS.

A curious question with regard to paupers and charitable trusts was discussed lately by the guardians of the Nantwich Union. It was suggested that inquiries should be made in the district to ascertain if paupers who were receiving relief from the union were also the recipients of doles from charitable trusts, and, if so, the amount of such doles. The guardian who made this suggestion had communicated with the Charity Commissioners and asked their views upon the matter, and the secretary to the Charity Commissioners had sent a reply to the following effect: 'I am to explain that the participation in the benefits of a charity for the poor by persons who are in receipt of poor-law relief is prohibited by the principles of law by which the administration of charitable trusts (similar to those which are applicable for the benefit of the poor of the township of Weston) is regulated. The infringement of the rule in question would have a tendency to destroy the incentives to thrift and provident habits which are furnished by the restriction of the benefits of charities to persons who are not in receipt of relief. In order to guard against the funds of the charities being applied, directly or indirectly, in relief of the rates, the trustees should take care to select as beneficiaries poor persons belonging to a class higher than those who are in the habit of having recourse to poor-law relief.' Probably the authorities who have been dealing with this matter have been considering the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), or at least have been roused up by its passage into law.

STEAMING IN COTTON MILLS.

On March 1 of last year there came into force a useful statute yclept the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889. Its object was to regulate the temperature and humidity of the atmosphere in cotton mills. A firm of cotton manufacturers were recently summoned at Blackburn under its provisions for permitting an excess of moisture in the atmosphere of their mill, this being a repetition of a similar offence within twelve months. The inspector stated that the records taken by the defendants at their mill on the date named would show that in one part of the shed the temperature was 80½ degrees and the humidity 77 degrees, which was a fraction of a degree of humidity beyond what was allowed by law. The Act allowed such a very liberal margin to manufacturers that he did not think they could complain if they were dealt with for exceeding it. The thermometers were not affected by the moisture in the external air. The firm's man who had charge of the glasses at the mill said he found that the instruments were affected by the external air. He sometimes found that by a certain pressure of steam he could keep within the margin at one time, and that he had two points more at another. He always turned the steam down at dinner-time and opened the doors, and yet had no margin when the workpeople returned. The glass near the door was most difficult to manage. It was submitted for the defence that everything had been done to keep the mill right; but nevertheless a fine and costs were imposed. The provisions of the Act are not easy to fulfil, and it is somewhat strange that a clause should be given providing for arbitration in the case of a dispute between occupier and inspector as to inhalation of dust, but that in the case of any difficulty as to temperature or humidity no arbitration should be permitted.

TIMERS AND HALF-TIMERS.

A continual struggle goes on between parents who desire to see their children earning wages and school authorities. The latter desire to give the little ones more education, but the former prefer the money. In the case of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, the greedy parents raised a great storm because it was proposed to keep children from work until they attained the age of twelve, and it was reduced to eleven. The disputes between parents and school authorities sometimes terminate in proceedings, as was the case at the Stockport Borough Police Court recently, when the secretary for the Cotton Powerloom Weavers' Association was summoned by the corporation school attendance committee for not sending his child to school. Counsel for the committee stated that the defendant had a boy aged twelve, who only went to school half-time, and who had only passed Standard III., although at his age he should have passed Standard V. The attendance committee asked defendant to comply with the Act and send the boy full time. He refused, explaining that the boy assisted him at his office in secretarial duties. The committee failed to see that the boy was 'beneficially and necessarily employed' in this way, according to the authorised regulations, as it could not be argued that a man in such a good position as the defendant needed this boy's assistance for the maintenance of the family, and therefore took these proceedings. Counsel for the defence said under section 38 of the Education Act of 1876 not less than two members of the attendance committee must sign a written authority for a prosecution. In this case there was only one signature, but the bench overruled the objection. Defendant thereupon made a statement, contending that under the Education Act he had taken the right course, and was not compelled to receive the sanction of the attendance committee provided he got the labour certificate, which he had obtained. In his office he further urged the boy was receiving an education sufficient to fit him for his future life, for he was taught book-keeping, to deal with the weight of yarns, to make percentages, and so forth. The bench took defendant's view and dismissed the case, as they considered they had no right to convict. This case will doubtless be a cause of rejoicing to those who consider themselves aggrieved by the School Boards.

MINOR OFFENCES AND PUNISHMENTS.

Mr. Alderman Fielding, of Bolton, has made a public statement with regard to the punishment which the law provides for minor. The worthy alderman is the presiding magistrate at the Bolton Police Court, and enunciated his views in his public capacity. He pointed out that since January 1 of the present year, 299 persons in Bolton, in default of paying a fine or costs or orders to find sureties, had to go to gaol. Of course, in such cases as violent assaults or felonies, offenders should be imprisoned and associate with criminals, but where a tramcar conductor was prosecuted for carrying too many passengers or a carter for sleeping during his journey a small fine ought to meet the case, and sometimes the men could not meet it and had to be committed for fourteen days, and have to associate with criminals. Would it not, therefore, be better to treat these individuals as persons unable to pay their debts, and forward them to the debtor's side of the prison? That was done in some County Court cases. Why not here? The suggestion is worth consideration by magistrates elsewhere.

BRISTOL INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The following report of the council of the Bristol Incorporated Law Society was read at the twenty-first annual meeting:—

The council desire to call attention to the following Acts which have been passed in the present year: The Custody of Children Act, 1891; the Tithe Act, 1891; the Charitable Trusts (Recovery) Act, 1891; the Bills of Sale Act, 1891; the Stamp Duties Management Act, 1891; the Stamp Act, 1891; the Forged Transfers Act, 1891; the Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1891; and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891.

A correspondence has taken place between the council of this society and the council of the Chief Society on the disproportionate representation of the provinces on the council in London. It appears that last year the society was composed of 6,350 members, of whom 3,020 were town members, and 3,330 were country members, while of the forty ordinary members of the council in London twenty-nine were town members and only eleven represented provincial societies. To correct this disparity the proposal was made that the council should be increased to its authorised complement of fifty, the additional seats being assigned, so far as is possible in an elected council, to important areas of population at present not represented by ordinary members. The council in London are not disposed to recommend this alteration, and the matter is now under the consideration of a committee appointed by the council of this society.

The committee appointed to inquire into the existing jurisdiction and procedure of the Tolzey Court reported that the various alterations which they had been prepared to recommend could not be made except by Act of Parliament.

The council beg to acknowledge with thanks the presentation to the library of the following books: 'The Law of Building and Engineering Contracts,' by A. A. Hudson, Esq.; a Supplement to his work on 'The Law of Libel and Slander,' by W. Blake Odgers, Esq.; 'The Law of Prescription,' by H. A. Herbert, Esq.; and 'The Law of Musical and Dramatic Copyright,' by F. Weatherly, Esq., and others.

The members of the council retiring by rotation are Mr. D. T. Burges, Mr. F. F. Cartwright, and Mr. F. Sturge, and the place occupied by Mr. Pease has become vacant under rule 6.

In pursuance of the power given them by the fourth article of association, the council nominate Mr. D. T. Burges for re-election.

C. R. Hancock, President.

THE LIVERPOOL BOARD OF LEGAL STUDIES.

Arrangements have been made by the board for the continuation during the present session of three courses of lectures on 'The Law of Real and Personal Property and Conveyancing,' 'Equity,' and 'Common Law.' The courses will be delivered consecutively, and each course will consist of ten lectures and classes. At the end of each course an examination will be held, and in case there are not less than nine candidates, two prizes of the value of 3*l.* 3*s.* and 2*l.* 2*s.* respectively will be offered for competition amongst articled clerks and bar students. If there are less than nine candidates, only one prize of the value of 3*l.* 3*s.* will be offered. A student who has been successful in obtaining a prize in any particular course in one session shall not be eligible for a prize in the same course in any subsequent session, although he shall be eligible for a place.

The subjects of the courses will be as follows:—

First Course: 'The Practice of Conveyancing,' dealing more particularly with settlements of real and personal estate and the law to which the practice gives effect. Lecturer: W. H. Cochran, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).

Second Course: 'Mercantile Contracts.' Lecturer: A. T. Carter, Esq., M.A., B.C.L. (Barrister-at-Law), late scholar Queen's College, Oxford; Vinerian Law Scholar and Eldon Scholar, Oxford; one of the authors of the Factors Act, 1889.

Third course: 'The Principles of Equity,' relating to married women, infants, partnership and other accounts, suretyship, administration of assets, specific performance and injunctions. Lecturer: J. S. Seaton, Esq., B.A., B.C.L. (Barrister-at-Law), Vinerian Law Scholar, 1886; studentship and three scholarships, Inns of Court, 1885 and 1886.

The lectures will be delivered weekly, from 5 to 6 P.M., in the Law Association Rooms, Cook Street. The classes will be held in the law library, from 10 to 11 A.M., on the mornings following the lectures.

The first course of lectures will be delivered as follows: First lecture, Wednesday, September 30; second lecture, Wednesday, October 7; third lecture, Wednesday, October 14; fourth lecture, Wednesday, October 21; fifth lecture, Wednesday, October 28; sixth lecture, Wednesday, November 4; seventh lecture, Wednesday, November 11; eighth lecture, Wednesday, November 18; ninth lecture, Wednesday, November 25; tenth lecture, Wednesday, December 2.

Fee for lectures (including classes): Members of the Liverpool Law Students' Association, 7*s.* 6*d.* each course, or 1*l.* the three courses. Others, 10*s.* 6*d.* each course, or 1*l.* 10*s.* the three courses. The first lecture of each course will be free.

Arrangements have also been made for the delivery of the following two courses of evening lectures, each consisting of six lectures, to be delivered at the University College on Fridays, at 8 P.M., commencing on October 30, viz.: (1) 'Commercial Contracts,' by O. H. Hardy, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law); and (2) 'Bills of Exchange, Cheques, and Promissory Notes,' by A. Aspinall Tobin, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).

ANNUAL REPORT ON PRISONS.

A Blue-book containing the fourteenth report of the commissioner of prisons was issued on September 17. The report gives statistics and other information respecting local prisons in England and Wales for the year ending March 31, 1891.

The number of prisoners received during the past year in local prisons under sentence of the ordinary Courts was 140,632, besides 1,526 soldiers and sailors sentenced by courts-martial. There were also 8,401 persons imprisoned as debtors or on civil process, making a total of 150,559.

The corresponding numbers for the preceding year were respectively: Convicted by the ordinary Courts, 145,268; by courts-martial, 1,243; debtors and civil process, 8,926; total, 155,437.

The population of the prisons on March 31, 1891, was 12,814, having been 13,745 at the end of the previous year. The average daily population in 1890–91 was 13,495—viz. 11,118 males and 2,377 females. In the previous year it was 14,389—viz. 11,852 males and 2,537 females.

If the increase due to retaining convicts under sentence of penal servitude in local prisons be deducted, the average daily population would be 13,076 in 1890–91, and 13,877 in the previous year. The average population of local or short-sentence prisoners was therefore lower by 801 in 1890-91 than in the previous year.

It is satisfactory to note that since 1877 there has been an almost regular decrease year by year in the prison population. For the half-year ended March 31, 1878, the figures were 20,833; in 1885, 16,619; and in 1891 they fell to 13,076. And this number would be still lower but for the number of prisoners sentenced by courts-martial, who before were sent to military prisons, but now serve their time in civil prisons. By the latest returns there were 282 military, thirty-eight naval, and nineteen marine prisoners in our local prisons.

The highest number of prisoners shown in any of the monthly returns was 14,662 on October 7, 1890, and the lowest was 11,919 on January 6, 1891, the highest number being 23·01 per cent. above the lowest number, which latter was less by 1,329 than the corresponding number in the previous year.

The decrease in the number of juvenile prisoners under sixteen years of age during the last twenty and a half years is remarkable. In 1870 the number was 9,998; in 1880, 7,416; and in 1890, 4,366. A return enumerating the cases in which the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, was applied in metropolitan police and five other large provincial districts during the years 1888, 1889, and 1890 shows that of the total number—namely, 2,530—only 169, or 6·6 per cent., have been called upon to appear and receive judgment, or are known to have been subsequently convicted of a fresh offence.

The number of deaths from natural causes was 103, giving a death-rate per 1,000 of 7·6 per annum. Here, again, there has been a marked improvement, the figures in 1870 being 252, giving a rate of 12·7. The low mortality is due to the care exercised by the medical authorities, and it is the more noteworthy considering the prevalence of influenza last year. Only five cases of suicide have occurred in the past year, as compared with an average of thirteen per annum in the previous twelve years.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The first meeting of the session will be held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, October 6, at 7 o'clock, when Mr. G. Pitt-Lewis, Q.C., M.P., will open the debate. The subject for discussion is 'That it is desirable to bring the circuit system into accordance with modern requirements by greatly reforming it, and by largely supplementing it by permanent sittings of the County Courts as District Courts, with the unlimited jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice throughout England and Wales.'

THE October number of the Law Quarterly Review will contain articles on 'Natural Law and the Bering Sea Question,' by Mr. T. B. Browning (Toronto); 'Terminology in Contract,' by Sir W. R. Anson, Bart.; 'The County Court System,' by Mr. Charles Cautherley; 'Frankalmoign in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries,' by Prof. F. W. Maitland; 'The American and British Systems of Patent Law,' by Mr. J. H. Bakewell; 'Maintenance Clauses,' by Mr. J. Savill Vaizey; 'Wrongful Intimidation,' by Mr. S. H. Leonard; and a 'Note on the Vagliano Case,' by Mr. J. R. Adams.

OBITUARY.

WITHIN the last few days the deaths have been announced of the mother and also the elder brother of Lord Thring, the latter at the age of seventy-five and the former in her hundred-and-second year. MR. THEODORE THRING, of Alford House, near Castle Cary, Somerset, was a barrister-at-law, of the Middle Temple, and formerly a commissioner of bankruptcy at Liverpool. He was also a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Somerset, and a deputy-chairman of quarter sessions for that county. He married Julie Jane, daughter of Mr. William Mills, of Saxham Hall, Suffolk, by whom he has left a numerous family. His mother, whose death preceded his own by only two days, was Sarah, second daughter of the late Rev. John Jenkyns, vicar of Evercreech, near Shepton Mallet. She married in 1811, just eighty years ago, the Rev. John Gale Dalton Thring, of Alford House, who died in 1874. Her third son was the Rev. Edward Thring, the late head-master of Uppingham School; and her second son is Lord Thring, better known, perhaps, to the world by his former name of Sir Henry Thring, late Parliamentary counsel to Her Majesty's Government.

MR. HENRY HAWKES, the coroner for Birmingham, died on Saturday, September 26, in his seventy-eighth year. Until quite recently the deceased had been able to attend to his professional duties. Of late he had suffered from bronchitis, but his condition only became serious a fortnight ago. Mr. Hawkes, who was a solicitor, took an active part in the political and municipal life of the city. He was an ardent Radical, but a few years ago he moderated his views, and ultimately became a member of the Conservative Association, on behalf of which body in 1884 he successfully contested South Birmingham. He was elected a member of the town council in 1846, was appointed an alderman in 1850, and in 1875 was unanimously elected coroner in succession to Dr. Birt Davis. In the same year Mr. Hawkes contested Tamworth, in the Radical interest, the other candidates being Sir R. Peel (L), Mr. Butt, Q.C. (L), and Mr. Hanbury (C). He, however, was defeated, the first and last named being returned.

MR. JUSTICE WEBB, of Hathrop, Bathurst, New South Wales, whose death was briefly announced in the Times of September 28, was born at Liskeard, Cornwall, in 1830. He arrived in Sydney in 1847, and in 1850 settled down to business pursuits at Bathurst. He retired from business in 1875. Mr. Webb was returned five times as mayor for Bathurst, and in 1870 represented West Quarie in the Legislative Assembly. In 1882 he was called to the Legislative Council. He was for many years a magistrate for the Bathurst district.

MR. F. A. BOSANQUET, Q.C., has resigned the recordership of the city of Worcester owing to his appointment to the vacant recordership of Wolverhampton. He received his appointment as recorder of Worcester on June 18, 1879.

THE SITTINGS IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.—The following are the arrangements made by the judges of the Queen's Bench Division for holding their Courts during the ensuing Michaelmas sittings—viz Three Courts will be formed to sit in Banco, the first of which will be composed of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge and Mr. Justice Wright, the second will consist of Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Smith, and the third of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Grantham. Eight judges will sit to try special and common jury and non-jury cases, they being Baron Pollock and Justices Denman, Hawkins, Cave, Wills, Charles, Laurence, and Collins. Mr. Justice Williams will be the judge in attendance at Judge's Chambers during the sittings.

Principles of the Law of Torts (The). By L. C. Innes. London: Stevens & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

Selection of Leading Cases in the Common Law (A). Fourth Edition. By Richard Watson, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

Summary of the Law of Companies. By T. Eustace Smith, Barrister-at-Law. Fifth Edition. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1891.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending September 26 was seventy-four. The number in the corresponding week of last year was sixty-six, showing an increase of eight, being a net increase in 1891 to date of six.

A JUROR AS A WITNESS.—The unusual incident of calling a juror from the jury-box to testify in the case on trial occurred in Supreme Court Circuit. The plaintiff, Emil Brusnitz, claimed 10,000 dollars damages from the Netherlands Steam Navigation Company for injuries he received in March, 1889, while a passenger in the second cabin of the steamer Leerdam. By a lurch of the vessel, Brusnitz was thrown heavily against an iron socket which projected above the deck, dislocating his shoulder. Edward A. Levy, one of the jurors, so impressed the counsel for the defence by the questions he put to witnesses as to his knowledge of the subject-matter, that he was called as an expert on strapping and shifting of cargoes. The Court allowed the juror to testify, against plaintiff's objection.—Daily Record.

RECENTLY, in the Alabama Supreme Court, in Thomas v. State: On indictment for robbery, it appeared that defendant met a person on the road carrying a gun, whom he stopped and engaged in conversation respecting its purchase, and the gun was handed to him. Being informed that the gun was loaded, he stepped back a few steps, and, pointing it at the prosecutor, said, 'Run, or I will shoot you;' whereupon the latter backed off some distance, frightened, and the defendant ran off with the gun. Held, that the defendant was not guilty. This seems to us to be very bad law. Handing over a gun for a moment for inspection is not parting with the possession; and here the thief got possession only and because the owner abandoned it through fear. Our Penal Code expressly provides for a case of this kind.—Indian Jurist.

THE Lord Chancellor will receive the Lord Mayor-Elect in the Princes' Chamber, House of Lords, on the 24th inst., when his lordship will announce to the coming chief magistrate for the City Her Majesty's sanction of his appointment by the citizens of London. The Sheriffs-Elect will be present on the occasion. Later the Lord Chancellor will receive the judges of the High Courts, and will proceed with them to the Palace of Justice to open the Michaelmas law sittings.

ACCIDENT TO JUDGE NELIGAN.—Judge Neligan, Recorder of Londonderry, was thrown from his carriage on September 22 and seriously injured. The unfortunate gentleman was driving to his son's residence, near Tralee, when his horse became restive and caused the accident. Dr. Falvey, who happened to be passing, had the judge conveyed to Tralee, where he remained unconscious for several hours.

'OBITER DICTA.'

The Solicitor-General does not pick and choose his phrases, especially when in the full swing of oratory. But he certainly did less than justice to solicitors when he charged them in a recent speech with having stood between the British public and reform of the land laws. The ill-starred scheme for which the Lord Chancellor became responsible died of a fatal internal disease—officialism; and if some of the ablest solicitors in London—men who know more about practical conveyancing questions than anyone else—took some trouble to indicate the weak points and mistakes in the proposals for cheap land transfer, they deserved the hearty thanks of the Government. Men who talk of dealing with land as cheaply and rapidly as with stocks will not be satisfied with a Land Registry Office; and nobody knows better than Sir Edward Clarke that landowners, whether large or small, prefer privacy to publicity and officialism.

To entitle the vendor's solicitor to the scale fee for negotiating a sale two conditions are needed—a positive one, that he should, in fact, have arranged the sale and the price and terms and conditions thereof; and a negative one, that no commission be paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent. This is the effect of schedule 1 to the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and of rule 11, as is clearly laid down by the Court of Appeal in In re Macgowan, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 6; L. R. (1891) 1 Chanc. Div. 105. In the recent case of In re Withall, L. R. (1891) 3 Chanc. Div. 8, the solicitor had apparently done the necessary work to fulfil the positive condition; but in doing it he had the assistance of a local surveyor who acted in the general management of the vendor's estate, the surveyor's remuneration being 2½ per cent. on the purchase-money of all lands sold. The Court of Appeal, affirming Mr. Justice North, held that the remuneration of the surveyor in this way was fatal to the solicitor's claim for the negotiation fee. We think there can be little doubt that, under the circumstances, the second or negative condition to which we have referred was not fulfilled. The taxing-master, it is true, was of opinion that the payment to the surveyor, being a payment for general services, was not such a payment as is contemplated by rule 11, and the Court agreed that this would have been so if the services of the surveyor had not been called in at all in the particular case, but that as they were called in commission had been paid to the surveyor within the meaning of the rule, although that commission also covered the remuneration for other work.

The Infants' Settlement Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43), s. 1, empowers settlements to be made by infants of property 'whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy.' In In re Johnson; Moore v. Johnson, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 499; L. R. (1891) 3 Chanc. Div. 48, Mr. Justice North had to decide whether an interest subsequently acquired by the infant under the will of a testator who died after the execution of the settlement was subject to a covenant in the settlement to settle after-acquired property. The covenant referred to any real or personal property exceeding in value 100*l.* to which the infant or her husband, in her right, should 'become entitled in any manner, and for any estate or interest.' Mr. Justice North decided that the interest in question was bound by the covenant. In the language of the old conveyancers such an interest is described as a 'bare or naked' possibility, or a 'mere expectancy,' as opposed to possibilities coupled with interest, such as contingent remainders, executory devises, or shifting uses (see 'Watkins on Conveyancing,' 8th edit. p. 219); but we see no reason why the word 'expectancy' in the Act of Parliament should be read in any other than its widest sense.

It is well settled law that the father who is clothed by law with the right of directing the religious education of his children cannot, even by ante-nuptial contract, bind himself to exercise in a particular way that power which the law gives him for the benefit of his children and not of himself (Andrews v. Salt, L. R. 8 Chanc. App. 622). In In re Nevin (60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 542), in addition to an ante-nuptial promise to educate the children of the marriage in the Roman Catholic religion, the father had also allowed the child to be baptised in that faith. The father died in 1886 intestate, the child being then three years old, and on his deathbed he commended his wife and child to a charitable lady of the Protestant faith, who maintained the mother and child in her house, and after the death of the mother, who died intestate in 1889, continued to maintain and educate the child in the Protestant faith. Then followed a story of forcible abduction and rival claims to the guardianship of the infant, involving a dispute whether she should be educated in the Roman Catholic or Protestant faith, which was heard before Mr. Justice Chitty in January and before the Court of Appeal in April last. The Court had no hesitation in deciding against the claim to guardianship set up by the forcible abductor. Her religious education was a matter of greater difficulty; but, acting on the rule laid down in Titus v. Salt, the Court thought the father was at liberty to change his mind, and that there had been a sufficient change of mind on the father's part in committing his child to the care of her benefactress, and decided that, in the true interests of the child, she should remain under the care of her Protestant friends and be educated in the Protestant faith.

Section 118 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), adds one more to the long list of cases (see, e.g., Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 20, and the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, s. 9) in which a person charged with a criminal offence may give evidence on the hearing of the charge. The phraseology in which the exception is introduced is various. This, the latest enactment of the kind, runs as follows: 'Any person charged with an offence under this Act, and the wife or husband of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be called, sworn, examined, and cross-examined as an ordinary witness in the case.' Therefore, in London (after January 1, 1892), if a person be charged with keeping swine in an unfit place, he may defend himself on his own oath, whereas if he be charged elsewhere than in London with a similar offence his evidence would be inadmissible. This is a curious anomaly, and if the Government cannot see its way to passing the general Criminal Evidence Amendment Bill which has been so often introduced by successive law officers, the endeavour might at least be made to apply the principle of that bill to summary proceedings generally and to appeals therefrom. A propos, does section 118 of the Public Health (London) Act apply to appeals? Is a person appealing against a conviction still 'charged with an offence' within the meaning of that section? And to take a somewhat similar case of more general importance, what is the effect of section 51, subsection 4, of the Licensing Act, 1872, by which, 'in all cases of summary proceedings' under that Act, 'the defendant and his wife shall be competent to give evidence'? Does this apply to appeals? We think not; nor, on the whole, do we think that section 118 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, applies to appeals under section 125 of that Act, which must, of course, be read with section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. But the point is by no means free from doubt.

A return just published of the convictions for drunkenness in England and Wales is full of interest and of unexpected disclosures. There are, however, so many elements which swell or diminish the totals in different localities, apart from the actual number of cases of drunkenness, that any conclusion must be subject to modification. The efficiency of police and the bias of magistrates differ very widely, but it is certainly very significant to note that in Wales, where for ten years there has been rigid Sunday closing, the convictions were one in 148 of the population, whereas in England they were only one in 169. It is amusing to find that in Sir Wilfrid Lawson's county, Cumberland, there were about five times as many convictions as in Essex, of which we once heard an ardent Radical say that it was governed by a syndicate of brewers. In Cumberland the number was about one in 110, whereas in Essex it was only one in 600. Learning emollit mores, and it is pleasant to find that at Cambridge only one in upwards of 1,600 was brought before the magistrates for overindulgence, and in the county one in 1,800. Oxford, however, is not so ascetic, and the number is rather more than one in 400 in the city and a little over one in 1,000 for the county. As might be expected, the North is rather worse than the South in habits of intemperance, and Newcastle and Grimsby show a total of one in fifty; whilst Tynemouth, to use Sir Wilfrid Lawson's phrase, is perhaps the largest contributor to the revenue of all our towns, and one in thirty of its population of 46,000 takes a good deal more than is good for him. Rural counties like Norfolk, with a proportion of one in 800—as much, perhaps, from the thinness of population and fewness of police as from actual abstention—make a much greater show of sobriety than those which are full of great towns, and of the latter the seaports naturally present larger totals. The city of London cuts apparently a very bad figure, as the return makes it appear that one in sixty comes before the magistrates. But the explanation is simple, as the population is given at 37,694, and the convictions were 547. But the day population is ten or a dozen times as great, and the real drunkenness is probably very small indeed. The only tolerably safe deduction from the figures appears to be that Sunday closing is no panacea, as in Wales in less than twelve hours on Sunday 1,269 persons got drunk as compared with 8,981 on the other six days. It seems also to be a fair inference that total closing would not greatly tend to temperance.

We referred last week to the decision of Mr. Justice Romer in In re Lacon; Lacon v. Lacon, to the effect that two shares in a brewery business, given by a father in his lifetime to one son in lieu of increased salary, must be considered as an advancement of what that son took under his father's will. The Court of Appeal have reversed that decision (see 60 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) 407; L. R. (1891) 2 Chanc. Div. 482). All the members of the Court expressed doubts as to whether the gift of the two shares was a provision by way of portion, and of course, if it was not, there could be no question as to there being two, or double, portions. Assuming, however, that it was, their lordships were unanimously of opinion that the circumstances of the case rebutted the presumption that the testator did not intend double portions for that son. 'It was not,' said Lord Justice Lindley, 'simply giving him now what he would have when his father died. It was something very different.' Lord Justice Bowen expressed his conviction that 'the dealing between the father and the son in the year 1887 was not intended in any way by the father to be an advancement towards what the son was to receive under the will, and that it was not intended as a part performance of the distribution which the will was intended by the father to make of what the father should leave behind him at his death;' while Lord Justice Kay came to the conclusion 'that the testator did intend, in consideration of the experience which he had of the son's capabilities in carrying on an important part of his business, to put him in a somewhat better position in respect of his interest in the business than the other younger children.' We welcome Lord Justice Bowen's declaration that the doctrine should not be extended, believing that many wealthy fathers would be surprised to learn that, if they gave any son a gift of (say) 200*l.* or 300*l.* in their lifetime, it would be considered as intended by them in anticipation pro tanto of that son's share under his will. On the other hand, we do not advocate the total abolition of this doctrine, as most fathers would probably intend that very large sums of money advanced to a child on marriage, or as capital for a business, should be deemed given to him in advance as part of what he would finally take.

Prosecutions undertaken by the very useful Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children have undoubtedly done a vast amount of good in checking the barbarity of brutal parents. But it is just as well that the society and its supporters should understand that magistrates will not separate parents and children unless it is clearly necessary for the protection and safety of the latter, and that a stain on the moral character of a mother is not sufficient reason for depriving her of the custody of her offspring. Mr. Bushby expressed himself very strongly on this subject, and in a case brought before him resolutely declined to punish the woman, who was charged with neglecting her little girls. The circumstances had excited public sympathy, and the mother had already derived material and moral benefit. On the same day a mother of quite a different type was convicted of gross physical violence to her step-children, and Mr. Rose very properly sentenced the prisoner to six weeks' imprisonment.

The revelations of a Metropolitan Police Court are always interesting and frequently curious; but it is not often that a magistrate is asked to deal with a claim for the restitution of deeds representing a value—according to the complainant's story—of four millions of money. Mr. Curtis Bennett, before whom the summons was recently heard, told the complainant to go to the Supreme Court, as he did not 'deal in millions.' Whether this is an undeveloped cause célèbre remains to be seen.

Mr. P. Edward Dove, founder of the Selden Society, barrister-at-law, who obtained permission from the benchers for the 'pied piper' to play to the poor children in Lincoln's Inn Fields, is probably the greatest living authority on the Highland bagpipe and its music. Mr. Dove's manuscript collection of pibrochs is said to be one of the largest in existence, and contains several hundred unknown to any modern piper. The pibroch, which is, it may be stated, an elaborate form of musical composition, is, owing to Mr. Dove's efforts, exciting considerable interest among many Continental musicians, though most English musicians are pleased to ignore it.

A NEW CASE OF LEGACY DUTY.

There is no more stringent rule of equity than that a trustee or executor cannot, in the absence of an enabling clause, make a profit out of services rendered by himself to the trust estate. That the foundation of this rule, which rests on the supposed conflict between interest and duty which might otherwise ensue from the position of trustee, does not always accord with actual fact or popular sentiment may be judged by the frequency of a clause in trust-instruments, especially in wills, enabling a trustee or executor, who is a solicitor or other professional man, to charge for his services. The testator who inserts such a clause in his will intends, no doubt, simply to alter or reverse the general rule in the particular case; but in some cases the mere existence of the general rule operates to defeat this intention. Thus in In re Barber; Burgess v. Vinnicome, 55 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 373; L. R. 31 Chanc. Div. 665, Mr. Justice Chitty was of opinion, first, that an enabling clause in favour of a solicitor-trustee who attests the will is void under the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 15; and secondly, that where the estate is insolvent, the solicitor-trustee cannot claim the benefit of such a clause against creditors of the testator. The two propositions flow from the same source—viz. that, as the general rule forbids the solicitor to charge profit costs, the authority to do so operates by way of bounty only, and the stated consequences are the logical result. The first point—viz. that the enabling clause is void if the solicitor attests the will—was expressly affirmed by the Court of Appeal in In re Pooley, 58 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 1; L. R. 40 Chanc. Div. 1. Singular as these consequences are, a still more remarkable result of the general rule is involved in the question whether, where by virtue of an enabling clause, profit costs have become payable, the Crown can claim legacy duty on those profits. In the third edition of Mr. Hanson's well-known work (p. 63) the writer lays down the law against the Crown, saying: 'If the effect of the will is merely to authorise him [an executor] to make professional charges for services rendered to the estate by himself in the character of, for instance, a solicitor (In re Sherwood, 10 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 2; 3 Beav. 338), or an accountant (Henderson v. M'Ivor, 3 Madd. 275), or a land agent (Willis v. Kibble, 1 Beav. 559), or to receive a salary or commission for doing what he might otherwise employ an agent to do, as, for instance, getting in the testator's outstanding debts (Weiss v. Dill, 3 Myl. & K. 26; Hopkinson v. Roe, 1 Beav. 183), or collecting the rents of houses let to weekly tenants (Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, 2 S. & St. 237), this does not amount to a legacy, but merely prevents the operation of the rule of equity that an executor or trustee shall not make his office a source of profit, and thus enables him to charge for services which in the absence of any such direction he would not be bound to render gratuitously.' We have little doubt that this statement represents the notion hitherto entertained, though it is worthy of remark that in the cases to which the learned author refers not only is there no direct authority on the payment of legacy duty, but, so far as we have been able to discover, there does not appear to be the slightest allusion to it in the reports. In addition to which, these cases were all decided prior to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76. The question appears to have been first discussed in the case of In re Pooley, the argument being that if Mr. Justice Chitty's decision in In re Barber, which was practically then under appeal, was right, then the Legacy Duty Acts as well as the Wills Act would apply to the case, and duty would be payable on the solicitor's profits—a contention, of course, intended as a reductio ad absurdum. The Court, however, in no way shrank from the supposed absurdity. Lord Justice Cotton said, The solicitor, 'as a trustee of the will, could not, in the absence of any direction in the will, do professional work for the estate and charge profit costs. It is urged that if we hold a clause enabling a trustee to do so, to have the effect of giving him a legacy, a difficulty will arise, for in that case a solicitor-trustee will be liable to legacy duty on his profit costs. I decline to give any opinion on that point; it may hereafter come before us for decision, and I do not wish to bind myself upon it; but that consideration ought not to prevent us from giving a fair construction to the words of the enactment now before us.' In the case of In re Thorley; Thorley v. Massam, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 537; L. R. 1891, 2 Chanc. Div. 613, the question arose on a direction in a will that while the trustees of the will should carry on the testator's business each of them should receive the annual sum of 250*l.* out of the profits of the business, and that while the testator's son should manage the business in conjunction with the trustees, he, too, should receive another annual sum of 250*l.* The Court of Appeal, affirming Mr. Justice North, held that the sums received by the trustees and by the son in pursuance of these directions were legacies within the definition contained in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4, to the terms of which we presently refer; and the question we wish to lay before our readers is whether the ratio decidendi of this case does not apply equally to profit costs paid to a solicitor-trustee. Clearly it would apply if the testator directed payment by way of a salary. Is there any valid distinction for this purpose between the payment of a definite sum for the solicitor's services and the payment for those services according to their recognised value, the payment in each case being admittedly a matter of bounty? By way of answer we will only refer to section 4 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, and a passage in Lord Justice Lindley's judgment in In re Thorley. Section 4 says that 'every gift by any will . . . of any person which by virtue of any such will . . . is or shall be payable, or shall have effect or be satisfied out of the personal estate of such person, . . . whether such gift shall be by way of annuity or in any other form, shall be deemed a legacy;' while in In re Thorley Lord Justice Lindley says: 'If the trustees are to obtain this 250*l.* a year at all they must do so under the will. They cannot get it in any other way. Then is that, or is that not, a gift by the will within the meaning of section 4 of the Act? I cannot in my mind say that it is not. Of course it is put in this way: It is said there is a consideration for it, that they are to give their services, their time, and their attention; and that is perfectly true. But does that alter the question? If they could charge the estate of their testator for their services apart from the will it would alter the question very materially, but they cannot. They cannot get a shilling out of the estate either at law or in equity for their services except under the will. That appears to me to bring this case so far within the section; nor do I think that we could possibly hold the contrary, without running counter to the reasoning of the Court in the case of In re Pooley. It is very true that that case did not raise the question of legacy duty; but the decision in it proceeded upon the principle which I have been endeavouring to explain—namely, that a solicitor who is entitled to charge profit costs under a will takes a benefit under the will, and therefore is an interested person, and if he attests the will he cannot claim the benefit which the will gave him, which was the right to remuneration for his services. I cannot see, in principle, any distinction between that case and this.'

ENGLISH CAUSES CÉLÈBRES.—VIII.

Ryves v. The Attorney-General.*

The case of the soi-disant Princess Olive is almost too complicated to be dealt with adequately within the necessary limits of such a series of papers as the present, but we will make the effort.

In 1859 a certain Mrs. Ryves filed a petition under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, praying that the marriage between her mother, Olive Wilmot, and a Mr. Serres might be declared valid, and that she might be declared the legitimate issue of that marriage. The petition was heard in January, 1861. The Attorney-General was cited on behalf of the Crown. There was no opposition, and the Court duly pronounced a decree granting the prayer of the petition. Then the drama began to unfold itself. Mrs. Ryves presented a second petition under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, in which she alleged, and prayed the Court to find, that her mother, Olive Wilmot, was the legitimate daughter of the Duke of Cumberland and Olive Wilmot, his wife, 'who had been lawfully married on March 4, 1767, by the Rev. James Wilmot, D.D., the father of the bride.' This audacious claim to royal descent was at once opposed by the Attorney-General (Sir Roundell Palmer) on behalf of the Crown; and in due time the case came on for trial before Chief Justice Cockburn, Chief Baron Pollock, Sir James Wilde, and a special jury. Sir Roundell Palmer, the Solicitor-General, the Lord Advocate, Mr. Hannen—then Treasury 'devil'—and Mr. R. Bourke, for the Attorney-General of Ireland, appeared for the Crown. Mr. J. W. Smith and Mr. Thomas were counsel for the petitioners.

The case for Mrs. Ryves, as Sir Roundell Palmer cleverly said, was a play in several acts. The hero of the first act was the Rev. James Wilmot, D.D., a country clergyman and quondam Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, who died 'in the odour of celibacy in 1807, at the mature age of eighty-five.' Several years after his death it was discovered that he had been secretly married to the Princess Poniatowski, who was sister to the King of Poland. The issue of this marriage was Olive Wilmot. The hero of the next act was Prince George of Wales, afterwards King George III., whom Mrs. Ryves represented as having married, with the connivance of Pitt, first a lady named Lightfoot,† and afterwards, during her lifetime, the Princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. The hero of the third act was Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland. Olive Wilmot had now grown up to be a beautiful woman. She was engaged to the Earl of Warwick, but the Duke of Cumberland desired her for his bride, and the Earl generously waived his claims. The marriage was celebrated by Dr. Wilmot on March 4, 1767, and Olive—afterwards Olive Serres, the mother of Mrs. Ryves—was born on April 3, 1772. Mrs. Serres was therefore a princess of the blood royal. A preliminary difficulty, however, of some magnitude lay in Mrs. Ryves's way. She had already obtained a judicial decree establishing her own legitimacy. But if the soi-disant Princess Olive S. were really the legitimate daughter of the Duke of Cumberland, her marriage with Mr. Serres, not having been sanctioned by the reigning sovereign, was invalid within the Royal Marriage Act (12 Geo. III.); so that Mrs. Ryves could succeed in proving her mother to be of royal blood only by disproving her own legitimacy. But, apart from this curious dilemma, the case for the petitioners was, in the language of the Attorney-General, one of 'fraud, fabrication, and imposture from beginning to end,' palliated only by the insanity of some of the parties principally concerned. It was bolstered up by an enormous mass of certificates, declarations, grants, and letters, written for the most part on loose scraps of paper. The value of this evidence may be judged by the following specimens: (1) The petitioners put forward an alleged will by Hannah Lightfoot in favour of Olive Wilmot. It bore date July 7, 1762, was signed 'Hannah, Regina,' and purported to have been attested by Dunning and Chatham. The date of this document was subsequent to the marriage of George III. and the Princess Charlotte; and yet the jury were invited to believe that men like Dunning and Chatham had put their names to a paper in which the discarded wife claimed and assumed the title of queen. (2) Then there was another document in the following terms:—

† Two princes and a princess were alleged to have been the issue of this marriage. Indirectly, therefore, the case of Ryves v. The Attorney-General was nothing less than a claim to the Crown.

'George R.,

'We are hereby pleased to create Olive of Cumberland Duchess of Lancaster, and to grant our royal authority for Olive, our said niece, to bear and use the title and arms of Lancaster should she be in existence at the period of our royal demise.

'Given at our palace of St. James's May 17, 1773.

'Chatham.
'J. Dunning.'

The Chief Justice pointed out that such grants were always conferred by letters patent under the Great Seal, and that it was a strong argument against the authenticity of a document which was not good in law that it bore the signature of Dunning. It was proved, too, that the soi-disant Princess Olive had not always given the same account of herself. At one time she alleged that she was the daughter of the Duke of Cumberland by a Mrs. Payne, a married woman. Then she asserted that her mother was an unmarried sister of Dr. Wilmot. Lastly she put forward a claim that she was the offspring of a lawful marriage between the Duke and Dr. Wilmot's daughter. Perhaps the feeblest part of Mrs. Ryves's case, however, was the expert evidence of handwriting. Mr. Netherclift was called to prove the authenticity of a number of the certificates and other documents produced. He began by stating that in his opinion certain signatures were in the handwriting of Dr. Wilmot. On being questioned as to the grounds upon which he had arrived at that conclusion, he announced that it was by comparing them with tracings of Dr. Wilmot's handwriting which had been given to him by the solicitor for the petitioner, and which he assumed to be genuine. The Lord Chief Justice, on whose mind the very name of expert, since the trial of Palmer, acted like an irritant poison, tartly observed that if Mr. Netherclift had no better foundation for his evidence he ought not to have given it so positively. Mr. Netherclift next proceeded to compare the disputed with admitted signatures of George III., and maintained that the former were genuine, although different from the latter in style. One of the jurymen, however, discovered an important difference between the two sets of documents—viz. that a dot invariably followed the final R in the authentic signature, while there was no dot after the R in the contested signatures, with a single exception. Mr. Netherclift had no better explanation of this curious coincidence to offer than that 'such differences were often found in the signatures of the same person to official and to private documents!' With the signatures of Dunning the witness was still more unfortunate. He commenced by being very clear that the disputed signatures were genuine. Then the Attorney-General put into his hand a number of opinions given by Dunning as a law officer of the Crown, produced by the Treasury, and letters written by him to Lord Shelburne, produced by the Marquis of Lansdowne, and called his attention to a remarkable peculiarity in the formation of the capital 'D' and in the junction of the letters 'J' and 'D' in the signature. This peculiarity was present in the signatures to all the genuine documents and absent in the signatures to all the documents in dispute. This coincidence was not to be explained away, and Mr. Netherclift intimated that he 'did not adhere to the opinion' he had just before so confidently expressed. The expert evidence as to Chatham's handwriting was disposed of in the same way. Mr. Netherclift had come to curse the Crown: he remained to bless. Besides this fiasco, the rottenness of the petitioner's case displayed itself in a number of minor anachronisms on which it is unnecessary to dwell. In the end the jury stopped the Attorney-General, and, after a brief charge by the Lord Chief Justice, returned a verdict for the Crown.

Perhaps the only incident of forensic interest in connection with this case was the following: Mr. Smith, in replying for the petitioner, said that 'he believed, on his word of honour as a gentleman, that the documents which Mrs. Ryves had produced'—but the Lord Chief Justice interrupted him in a moment. 'I insist,' he said, 'on your not finishing that sentence. It is a violation of a fundamental rule of conduct, which every advocate ought to observe, to give the jury your personal opinion.' Sir Alexander Cockburn's own reply in the Palmer Case was a bad precedent that may well have led Mr. Smith astray.

MARRACK ON TRUST INVESTMENTS.

The Statutory Trust Investment Guide. By Richard Marrack, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: F. C. Mathieson & Sons. Price 4*s.* net

Mr. Marrack has produced an admirable little book on the important subject of the investment of trust funds in the securities authorised by the Act of 1889. The work is one of great value both to the lawyer and to the trustee who desires to keep strictly within his powers, and at the same time to do the best he can with the fund intrusted to his care. Much conscientious labour has been bestowed on this little treatise, and Mr. Marrack has carefully studied the debates in Parliament, and has given interesting accounts of the fluctuations of Parliamentary opinion with reference to some of the stocks at present excluded from the statutory list, as, for example, Colonial Inscribed Securities and Irish Tramways. An introduction of ninety-five pages contains a clearly arranged classification of the different kinds of securities in which funds may be invested, and the nature of debenture and preference stock is accurately explained, and the investor warned of pitfalls into which there is danger of running. The Trust (Scotland) Amendment Act is inserted, as well as the Trust Investment Act of 1889, and the Irish and Scotch, as well as the English investor, will find in the book all the information he is likely to want. Mr. Marrack does not fail to notice the curious anomaly that a trustee holding a security outside the statutory list is not enabled by the statute to change it for one which is on the list. Messrs. Mathieson have prepared a very full list of securities primâ facie eligible, and the dividends of railway companies are given for ten years past as a guide to the stocks in which investment is authorised by the Act of 1889. It is a pity, however, that no reference to reported cases except in the 'Law Reports' is given.

ALPE ON THE STAMP DUTIES.

The Law of Stamp Duties on Deeds and other Instruments. Containing the Stamp Act, 1891; the Stamp Duties Management Act, 1891; a Summary of Case Law; Notes of Practice and Administration; Tables of Exemptions; the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Account and Estate Duties; and the Excise License Duties. Being the Second Edition of 'A Digest of the Law relating to Stamp Duties.' By E. N. Alpe, Barrister-at-Law, and of the Solicitors' Department, Inland Revenue. London: Jordan & Sons. 1891.

This is really the second edition of Mr. Alpe's 'Digest of the Law relating to Stamp Duties,' which we have already favourably reviewed in these columns. The changes effected by the recent consolidating Acts have been duly noticed, and the book has undergone a certain amount of necessary rearrangement. The original plan, however, of grouping the sections containing particular regulations under the heads of charge to which they relate has been wisely retained. It is certainly the most convenient for handy and speedy reference. Tables of the Death Duties and Excise License Duties have been added to the appendices, and the whole work has been carefully revised. We regard it as a most useful manual on the law of the stamp duties. The price is only 5*s.*

The Sharp v. Wakefield Case.—The fund for the purpose of defraying the costs in the Sharp v. Wakefield case is now closed, and amounts to 765*l.* Of this sum 460*l.* has been subscribed by thirty-nine of the Westmoreland justices of the peace. The amount collected is more than is required. A return of 4*s.* 2*d.* in the pound is, therefore, to be made to the subscribers. The judgment delivered in this case in the House of Lords has just been issued by the Executive of the United Kingdom Alliance as a pamphlet, and is specially prepared for circulation among magistrates and their clerks.

Unreported Cases.

COUNTY COURTS.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

At the Brompton County Court, on September 29, an important point with respect to employers' liability was raised in a case before Judge Stonor. A lighterman named Henry Arnold sued Messrs. Williams & Wallington, the contractors for the Battersea new bridge, for damages for personal injuries sustained by an accident which happened at the works. The plaintiff had taken some baulks of timber to the bridge and they were being raised by cranes, when, owing to insufficient fastening, they fell into the river, smashed the boat, and severely injured the plaintiff's right arm. He was in hospital for several weeks, and it was found necessary to stitch his injured hand to his side, so that some of the flesh from his body might grow over it. The evidence as to the accident showed that the chain put round the baulks was not tight. The man in charge called out 'Ease up the slack' so that the chain might be tightened, but the 'Right away' was given instead, and the baulks were lifted into the air before the chain was properly put on. On behalf of the defendants a case was cited which had been before the Court of Appeal, and in which a man who usually superintended gave an order to a crane man and thus caused the accident. At the time he gave the order, however, he was engaged in manual labour, and on this ground a verdict was given for the employers. In the present case the banksman who gave the signal was a labourer, but at the time he gave the order was superintending only and was not engaged in manual labour. Some amusement was caused by a witness who had described the banksman as a manual labourer being unable in cross-examination to say what he meant by manual. Eventually he adopted the suggestion of counsel that football was manual labour. After a long legal argument, the judge ruled in favour of the defendants, and withdrew the case from the jury on the point of law.

SOLICITORS AND TOUTS.

At the Brompton County Court on Thursday, October 1, a case of considerable interest to solicitors occupied the attention of His Honour Judge Stonor during the greater part of the day. The suit was Brack v. C. & N., and there was a further suit of Briggs v. Brack which was heard at the same time.—Counsel for Brack opened the case, and explained to His Honour that Brack was a general dealer living at Fulham, and the defendants Messrs. C. & N. were solicitors. His client made two claims against them—one for having acted as bailiff, on the instructions of Mr. C., in the case of Briggs v. Turner, and another for commission for introducing a client. The claim on the other side by Briggs v. Brack was for negligence whilst acting as a bailiff in the case before mentioned, and it was worthy of mention that that claim was not made until the summons was served on Messrs. C. & N. Brack was engaged by Mr. C. to make a distraint at the suit of a Mr. Briggs on premises occupied by a man named Turner in a railway arch at Shepherd's Bush, and as the premises were only used for business purposes it was arranged that the bailiff should remain in possession till about ten o'clock at night and should return about seven in the morning. This was done; but one night after the bailiff left an engine and a horse and cart were taken away. Brack made inquiries, and eventually discovered the articles and brought them back, and it would be proved in evidence that the engine and the horse and cart were in the same condition when brought back as they were when the seizure was made. After this the bailiff remained in possession night and day until the distraint was satisfied. He received all his instructions in the matter from Mr. C., and never in any way came across or had any dealings with Mr. Briggs. Further than this, Mr. C. promised to pay him, and especially informed him that he should not be out of pocket in recovering the articles which were removed. Since the service was complete the defendants had refused to pay, and now denied their liability. With respect to the claim for commission, Brack knew a man named Moyses who met with an accident in the street and desired to bring an action. Moyses wished to be introduced to a solicitor, and Brack went to Mr. C. and informed him that he could introduce a client on terms. Eventually it was agreed that Brack should have one-third of the profits that Messrs. C. & N. made out of the case, and the introduction was made. The defendants now refused to pay, although they recovered damages and were paid costs.—His Honour expressed a doubt whether the defendants were liable on either claim, but said he should hear the case.—The plaintiff Brack was then sworn and bore out the statement of his counsel. In cross-examination he admitted a number of documents, upon which he acted in making the distress, and these were signed, 'C. & N., solicitors for Mr. Briggs.' He denied that he had been guilty of any negligence in making the distress, and said he acted throughout on the instructions of the solicitors. With respect to the claim for commission he said he had had a previous transaction of the same kind with Mr. C. He introduced a person who had summoned another for assault to Mr. C. The solicitor received a fee of a guinea, and he (Brack) by arrangement received 7*s.* of that sum from Mr. C. It was agreed that he was to receive a third of what the client paid.—Mr. Moyses stated that Messrs. C. & N. acted for him in a suit for damages which was compromised by payment of 100*l.* He arranged with the solicitors that they should have one-third of what he recovered as their costs, and as he had previously paid them 13*l.* 5*s.* he received 80*l.* out of the 100*l.* He heard Mr. C. say that Brack would have something.—Other evidence having been given, the judge said he was prepared to hear arguments of counsel.—Counsel, on behalf of Brack, argued that the solicitors were personally liable to the bailiff, and quoted a case in which a firm of solicitors who had given a guarantee to the Court for costs were held liable, although the guarantee was signed 'as solicitors for.' With respect to the commission, he contended that it was not illegal for solicitors to employ touts about a Court and that they were only bound by the Solicitors Act.—The judge said he did not think they got as far as the Solicitors Act. He was convinced that the agreement was bad at common law. It was an illegal agreement, and, therefore, could not be enforced.—Counsel submitted that the agreement was not illegal, but His Honour said it was a partnership. It was one of the most disgraceful cases that had ever come before him, and it was certainly not competent for a solicitor to become partner with every blackguard he met.—Counsel on behalf of Messrs. C. & N. contended that his clients could not be held personally liable to the bailiff, for in every instruction given they stated that they were acting as solicitors for Mr. Briggs. Mr. Briggs declined to pay because of the negligence of the bailiff in allowing the goods to be removed, as he contended that when the engine was recovered several parts were missing and its value greatly impaired. His clients had acted in a bonâ fide manner, and, if they were held liable, he argued that no solicitors would be safe. There were numerous cases on his side, and he maintained that the case his learned friend had quoted was a special one which did not apply here. The solicitors gave a personal undertaking to the Court, and their undertaking was accepted by the Court when the undertaking of their client would not have been accepted.—His Honour said he must decide in favour of the solicitors on both points, and in the case of Brack v. Clack and another he ordered a nonsuit without costs. In the case of Briggs v. Brack he also ordered a nonsuit, with costs to the bailiff, as there clearly had been no negligence.

POLICE CASE.

BRITISH OYSTERS.

At the Mansion House, on October 1, a friendly prosecution was brought by the Fishmongers' Company against Mr. W. H. Williamson, an oyster merchant, of Billingsgate, with the object of deciding the question as to whether the Oyster, Crabs, and Lobsters Sea Fisheries Act, 1877, c. 42, is or is not applicable to French, Portuguese, and American oysters bedded in English waters. The summons, which was heard by Mr. Alderman Faudel Phillips, set out that the defendant 'did, on June 22, unlawfully sell 3,000 oysters.' Defendant admitted the sale, but pleaded that no breach of the Act had been committed. The section of the Act under which the proceedings were taken fixes the close time for oysters between May 14 and August 4; but there is also an exemption clause, which says that no vendor of oysters shall be liable to any penalty providing that he can satisfy the Court that the oysters sold were taken within the waters of some foreign State.—Mr. C. O. Humphreys, who appeared on behalf of the Fishmongers' Company, in opening the case, said the action was of a friendly character, and the defendant, who was a liveryman of the Fishmongers' Company, had rendered every assistance to the company for the purpose of obtaining a decision upon the construction of the Act. In the event of the alderman convicting, he would ask that only the nominal penalty of one penny be imposed. The defendant, he believed, would shelter himself under the exemption clause, and the decision would be of the utmost importance, this being the first prosecution under the Act. Mr. Williamson would no doubt contend that the 3,000 oysters in question were not English oysters at all, having been dredged in French waters. Mr. Williamson was a very large oyster planter, having beds in Sharfleet, Brightlingsea, and other places, and it would be proved that he imported large quantities of oysters from foreign waters and laid them in his beds in English waters. There they remained for some months, and were then taken out and sold to the public, and because their origin was French defendant held that they came under the exemption clause. If necessary he would call Captain Anderson, the nautical surveyor of the Board of Trade and chairman of the Whitstable Oyster Company, to show that these French oysters when laid in English waters deposited spat during the close season, and that it was therefore not only improper to take them, but that they were absolutely unfit for human food. Mr. Williamson no doubt sold the oysters as French, but he could not control others, and as a matter of fact large quantities of oysters were sold as Royal Whitstable natives which were not natives at all. The question really was whether the oysters were taken out of foreign or English waters, and he contended that inasmuch as they had been nurtured for some time in English seas they came under the Act of 1877 with regard to natives.—Alderman Phillips said the question as to whether oysters were fit for food or not during a certain period of the year did not arise in this summons; the sole question for him to decide was whether they were French or English oysters.—Mr. Williamson, in answer to the summons, said, as Mr. Humphreys had stated, this was a perfectly friendly action between the Fishmongers' Company and himself. They both had a public duty to perform, and they were anxious to preserve the English oyster beds. The thanks of the public were due to the company for raising the question, because the English oyster fisheries were really in a very bad way. The alderman would see how serious the matter had become when he told him that by Friday next the price of natives would be 24*s.* a hundred. He strongly condemned the Board of Trade for their apathy in the matter.—Alderman Phillips said that was a matter he could not go into. Mr. Williamson had better confine himself to the immediate issue.—Mr. Williamson then contended that the fact of French oysters having been put down in his beds did not Anglicise them. They were French bivalves, and therefore came under the exemption clause. If the Fishmongers' Company wanted to carry out a great public work, they must set to work and get a new Act passed, for this one was mere waste paper. Men like himself, engaged in the wholesale trade, imported large quantities of oysters from French, Portuguese, Spanish, and American waters, and sold them in the close season. Much larger quantities were sold in the oyster season, but there was a big trade in the close season. There were many of them kept in English waters for three or four months, according to their condition, but that, he held, did not alter their nationality. Supposing American imported cattle were put out to grass for a time in this country to improve their condition, could it be contended that they were English beasts? and yet that was the argument that Mr. Humphreys had applied to these oysters.—Alderman Phillips said, after careful consideration of the case, he had come to the conclusion that the company were right in their contention. The law was made to protect both oysters and consumers, and his interpretation of the section was that 'taken within foreign waters' meant taken for exportation in barrels, not to be relaid in English waters, but for immediate consumption; and, further, he was of opinion that when foreign oysters were kept for such terms as had been mentioned in English waters they became British oysters. There must therefore be a conviction, but he would only impose the nominal penalty of 1*d.*

A PIED PIPER IN LINCOLN'S INN GARDENS.

Being just an Everyday London Scene.

It is five post meridiem and the sun still shines over Lincoln's Inn Fields. A very muggy sun, it is true, with an indifferent sunshine, being adulterated with London smoke, which is itself a low-class smoke. Lincoln's Inn is certainly a highly respectable quarter, but it is surrounded by some of the lowest rookeries that are to be found in all London. However, as this is a neighbourhood where sugar is sanded, where wheel-grease is called butter, and things are not exactly what they seem, it is not surprising that sunbeams are mixed with foreign substances such as blacks and coaly vapour. And it is the thousands of low-class fires in these very low-class rookeries which give such a muggy look to the sun's countenance this afternoon.

Five strikes, and every one of those narrow courts and fœtid alleys swarms with children. If you happen to be passing through one of these melancholy passages, you may notice that many of the children are making their way into the great square of Lincoln's Inn, as if bent on reaching some particular rendezvous. Some walk, some run, some even turn a cart-wheel, some go in perambulators, some are in arms, and one by one they disappear through a narrow gateway which admits you into a fine old garden cut off from the great square by a high wall. Rows of leafy plane-trees afford a pleasant shade from the heat, and the closely shorn grass, smooth and even, is delightfully cool and refreshing for weary eyes to rest upon. The sun cheers up a little; a puff of wind drives the sluggish heat mists along, and the slanting beams, divided by the trees, fall in patterns of rich golden green on the lawn. Every minute the children come trooping in through the open doorway. Most of them are in rags, most of them look as if they would be better in every respect if a steam fire-engine could play a few hundred gallons of water upon them. But dirt is such an old acquaintance that I really think they would miss it.

Suddenly the wild skirling of the pipes is heard. The Pied Piper of Hamelin had not a more instant magic:—

> And ere he blew three notes (such sweet
> Soft notes as yet musicians cunning
> Never gave the enraptured air)
> There was a rustling that seemed like a bustling
> Of merry crowds justling and pitching and hustling,
> Small feet were pattering, wooden shoes clattering,
> Little hands clapping and little tongues chattering,
> And like fowls in a farmyard when barley is scattering,
> Out came the children running.

At least 300 pairs of remarkable little legs begin to go like galvanised monkeys in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The music has got into their legs, and their arms, and their heads, and their eyes. The piper marches sedately down the gravel walks, cheeks distended, chest well out, head up, white-bearded. Under the skilful fingers of the old piper that mysterious bag full of air acts upon the children like a reservoir of laughing gas. The dull, slum-sodden little faces light up; the thick coats of dirt crack with laughter. Some turn somersaults; some form a circle and squat on the grass round the piper, gazing up at him with awe-stricken faces. A little girl of six, clad in a greasy petticoat, with a pair of black stockings, takes her shoes off, and dances through two holes in the heels of her stockings. Another little girl faces her. Arms akimbo, hats off, they go at it. They dance the stockings down; they dance the hair down; they dance the buttons off. Neither yields; the piper takes pity on them, stops, and the reel dies off in a gasping wail, as is the custom of the pipes. The pipes, I dare swear, take the old piper far away from the roar of London to his native glens. But the children are thinking of other things.

'Oh! Molly Down-at-heel, you'll catch it,' says one little girl.

'Who are you a-talking to?' says number two.

'You'll catch it.'

'Why shall I catch it?'

'Becos you've danced a hole in mother's Sunday stockings.'

'In for a penny, in for a pound,' replies Miss Down-at-heel, or that is what she would have said, only she had never seen a gold piece in her life. 'Fardens' was her currency. At any rate, she began again with the piper, until she blew like a porpoise in a gale, and nearly bit her tongue off—low little girls having a habit of allowing their tongues to loll out for an airing. Then the piper begins an inspiring march, to which he steps out, taking short, measured strides. A piper takes his music seriously.

The piper is Mr. John Mackenzie, a champion piper, once in the Scots Guards, and now garden porter to the benchers of Lincoln's Inn. He plays to the children every night for half-an-hour, and enjoys the music as much as they do.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Mr. Arthur Russell, eldest son of Sir Charles Russell, M.P., was married at Belfast on Wednesday to Miss Cuming, daughter of Professor Cuming, of Queen's College, Belfast. The ceremony took place in St. Malachy's Catholic Church, and was performed by Dr. M'Alister, bishop of the diocese. Sir Charles and Lady Russell were present.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The first meeting of the session was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, October 6; Mr. Douglas in the chair.—By invitation of the committee Mr. G. Pitt-Lewis, Q.C., M.P., opened the debate: 'That it is desirable to bring the circuit system into accordance with modern requirements by greatly reforming it and by largely supplementing it by permanent sittings of the County Courts as District Courts, with the unlimited jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice throughout England and Wales.'—Mr. D. Stewart Smith opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: In the affirmative, Mr. Collins; in the negative, Mr. F. K. Munton, Messrs. Crawford, Pattinson, and Watkins.—Mr. Pitt-Lewis replied.—The chairman having put the motion to the meeting, it was lost by a majority of four.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society, on Tuesday, October 13, is: 'That the case of The Coupé Company v. Maddick, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. 413, was wrongly decided.'

OBITUARY.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. ALEXANDER ANDREW KNOX, which occurred at his residence, 125 Victoria Street, Westminster, on October 5. He was nearly seventy years of age. Mr. Knox was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1845. In that year he was placed third in the Classical Tripos, and was second Chancellor's medallist. In the Mathematical Tripos of the same year he was among the senior optimes. He was called to the bar, and before long made himself known among a limited circle as a ready and powerful writer on several subjects. For some years he was a frequent contributor to the Times. He became one of the metropolitan police magistrates about 1860, settling finally at Marlborough Street. In this position he was markedly successful, and but few of his decisions were reversed upon appeal. He retired from the bench a few years ago, and it is not too much to say that his doing so was regarded as a great public loss.

THE Queen has been pleased to approve the appointment of Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., as Recorder of Wolverhampton, and of Mr. R. H. Amphlett as Recorder of Worcester.

THE Lord Chancellor has transferred his Honour Judge Bishop from Circuit 28 to Circuit 31, and has appointed Mr. C. H. W. Beresford the judge of Circuit 28.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending October 3 was eighty-six. The number in the corresponding week of last year was fifty-six, showing an increase of thirty, being a net increase in 1891 to date of thirty-six.

THE RECOVERY OF INCOME-TAX.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer writes as follows, through one of his secretaries, in answer to a letter respecting the law relating to income-tax: 'I am directed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reply to your letter of September 18, and to acquaint you that collectors of taxes are not required by law to deliver demand notes, but merely to make demand for the taxes assessed. If, however, a demand note is not given in full, details of the charge must be given in full when payment is made. Taxes are payable on demand on January 1 in each year, and the collector having made one personal application for payment without effect may distrain immediately and without further notice for the amount.'

THE HEARING OF PROBATE AND DIVORCE CAUSES.—The following are the arrangements made by the judges of the Probate and Divorce Division for hearing causes during the ensuing Michaelmas sittings: Causes for hearing before the Court itself will be taken on Saturday, October 24, and following days—(1) Probate; (2) undefended matrimonial; (3) defended matrimonial. Common jury cases will be taken on Wednesday, November 11, and following days, probate first and matrimonial afterwards. The hearing of special jury cases will be proceeded with on Wednesday, November 25, and following days, probate causes being taken first and matrimonial second. Summonses will be heard in Chambers at 10.15, and motions will be heard in Court at 11 o'clock on Tuesday, October 27, and on every succeeding Tuesday during the sittings.

GROWTH OF THE PENSION LIST IN THE UNITED STATES.—According to the last annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions at Washington, there are now 676,160 pensioners on the rolls, or 138,000 more than at the close of the previous fiscal year. The amount paid away in pensions was 118,548,959 dollars, or over twelve millions of dollars more than the preceding year. Although the number of pensioners and the cost to the Treasury are thus increasing, it appears inevitable that both items will be still more largely increased, for the commissioner reports that his department is still issuing about 30,000 certificates to new pensioners every month, and he expects that during the current year 350,000 claims to pensions will be decided. At present the appropriation for pensions is 133,473,085 dollars; but Mr. Raum says that this will be insufficient when this year's batch of pensioners is added, and he calculates that, making full allowance for deaths, a further sum of fifteen million dollars will be needed to meet the enlarged pension list.

The Convict Glyka.—Antony Isadore Glyka, a convict undergoing a term of penal servitude at Chatham Convict Prison, made his third appearance at the Rochester Bankruptcy Court, before the registrar (Mr. W. W. Hayward), on October 5, to be examined with reference to a receiving order granted by the Court against his estate, upon the application of Messrs. Vagliano Brothers, merchants, of London, whose claim is for 82,105*l*. It will be remembered that Glyka was formerly in the employ of the petitioners as clerk, and by means of forged documents, made out in the names of Messrs. Vagliano Brothers, he succeeded in obtaining a very large sum of money from the Bank of England. He afterwards gave himself up, and was convicted of forgery and sentenced to a term of penal servitude, of which about four years have now expired. Subsequent to his conviction Messrs. Vagliano Brothers brought an action against the Bank of England to recover the money which had been obtained by Glyka, but it was finally decided that the bank was not liable. The official receiver (Mr. R. Prall) again questioned the convict with reference to his property, but he asserted that he had no further information to give.—Mr. Prall: Have you recollected any other property since the last adjournment?—No; I cannot give you any other information which would be useful. The convict was thereupon allowed to pass his examination.

Solicitors as Town Councillors.—The following has been communicated to us: 'Mr. Charles Ford, the well-known London solicitor, has written to Mr. Rhodes, solicitor, Halifax (the candidate for Market Ward), as follows: Dear Mr. Rhodes,—I am very glad you are "going in" for a town councillor, and I hope you will be elected. I thank you for the newspaper cutting stating that you will encounter opposition by reason of your profession. During the many years that I was actively engaged on the editorial staff of the Law Times I had to watch the work of solicitors in connection with the local government and municipal work of our cities and towns, and I can safely say that they have done for a quarter of a century, and are still doing, an immense amount of valuable work for the people throughout the country, far in excess of that of any other occupation or calling. I do not hesitate to say, as the result of my experience and observation, that municipal work and reform would not be as forward as it is throughout these Islands but for the business aptitude, the energy, and the tact and judgment of solicitors, who are to be found on almost every council or other local authority, and their knowledge of the law has over and over again saved the taxpayer from ruinous litigation being entered upon by corporations. They have watched the effect of legislative action in other towns, and where beneficial have been the means of its adoption in their own towns. Dozens of solicitors are chosen as mayors every year.'—Halifax (Yorks) Free Press.

In a town up north an ex-judge is cashier of a bank. One day recently he refused to cash a cheque offered by a stranger. 'The cheque is all right,' he said, 'but the evidence you offer in identifying yourself as the person to whose order it is drawn is scarcely sufficient.' 'I have known you to hang a man on less evidence, judge,' was the stranger's response. 'Quite likely,' replied the ex-judge, 'but when it comes to letting go of cold cash we have to be careful.'—Central Law Times.

Apropos of the authorship of law books, the writer of these lines went to consult a friend fellow-practitioner on the law of a subject on which the friend had written a book. 'My dear fellow,' said the learned author, 'why do you come to me?' 'Because you have written a book on the subject,' was the natural reply. 'Well,' said the author, 'that is the very reason why I should be the last man you should consult. What little I knew on the subject I forgot as soon as I got it into print, and what I have not forgotten I never knew, but merely collated from various sources. Yet the book is a good book, and I am aware is a useful one, and we'll look up the point together.' We did so with satisfactory results.—Pump Court.

'OBITER DICTA.'

The four vacancies which have occurred upon the County Court bench during the Long Vacation have been filled by the appointment of Messrs. Cecil Beresford, Eardley Wilmot, D. F. Steavonson, and William Masterman. Whatever may be thought of these appointments individually, it is satisfactory to note that all the new judges are comparatively young men. The practice which formerly prevailed of appointing men advanced in years to these posts, the duties of which are often very arduous, was not calculated to inspire confidence in the administration of justice in the County Courts.

The all-important question of abating the smoke nuisance in the metropolis has recently been engaging serious attention in the City, and is also being actively canvassed in Manchester and Glasgow. Seeing how serious is the evil, it is not a little surprising to observe the apathy which has hitherto existed in many quarters upon the subject. The Smoke Nuisance Removal Acts of 1853 and 1854 deal only with factories and steam-vessels, and have only been partially successful in achieving the object for which they were passed. The nuisance is, however, largely, if not chiefly, due to the smoke arising from domestic fires, as to which at present no legislation exists. The question of how to deal with domestic smoke so as to reduce its volume without unduly interfering with the liberty of the subject is, no doubt, an extremely difficult one, but it becomes more difficult, though more inevitable, every year.

In connection with this subject a "Barrister," in a letter which appeared in the last issue of the City Press, calls attention to the bill, which has been read a second time on four occasions by the House of Lords, and has been approved by a select committee. The bill proposes a reasonable restraint upon householders pouring dense smoke from their chimneys, which, as is well known, can be prevented by additional care or by structural alterations. The bill, which was introduced by Lord Stratheden and Campbell, has not, however, as yet become law, although its provisions are far less drastic than many persons consider necessary. The Government have, it is true, during the past session passed the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), which, by sections 23 and 24, empowers the London County Council to administer the Acts already in force upon the subject, but which contains no provisions as to the smoke from domestic fires. Unless a remedy can be found for this ever-increasing evil in the bill to which we have referred, or in some analogous measure, it will probably soon be found necessary to enjoin the use of smokeless fuel, or smoke-consuming grates, in order to abate the nuisance. It is at all events time that public opinion should be aroused to the urgent necessity for some legislation on the subject.

In the columns of the Globe on Tuesday last, headed 'Wig and Gown,' may be found an interesting account of an interview with Mr. Lockwood, Q.C., M.P., on 'breach of promise' actions. Mr. Lockwood was to have seconded Sir Roper Lethbridge's resolutions against these actions, but time did not permit of the resolution being brought on, and the Government did not see its way to setting apart any special day for the discussion of it. Next session, however, there will probably be a better opportunity for mooting the question in the House of Commons, while we presume that in the House of Lords it would meet with a supporter in Lord Herschell, who, as Mr. Herschell, Q.C., carried a resolution in the House of Commons to the effect that the damages to be recovered in this kind of action should be limited to the actual pecuniary loss which the plaintiff could prove, allowing nothing for so-called injury to the feelings or contingent loss, which is exactly the reform which Mr. Lockwood is in favour of. As we have already pointed out, such a reform would assimilate the law of England to the law of civilised countries generally, except the United States of America, where the law borrowed from this country has not yet been altered.

The Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 50), allows affidavits and declarations to be made before commissioners for oaths instead of before justices of the peace, as now required by law, under the Merchant Shipping Acts, the Patents Acts, and the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (see section 29 of that Act, and schedule 4, whereby a declaration may be made before a justice of the peace of the loss of a pawn ticket). So far so good. But how about the fee? The order as to Court fees of 1844 gives the well-known fee of eighteenpence to every commissioner for each affidavit, &c.; but we believe that we are correct in stating that the order applies to matters connected directly or indirectly with business in the Supreme Court only. To what fee would a commissioner for oaths be entitled for receiving an affidavit or declaration under the new Act? We believe that he would be entitled to a reasonable fee, and that the traditional and authorised eighteenpence would primâ facie be a reasonable fee. But it cannot be said that the point is free from doubt, and it must be borne in mind that justices of the peace take declarations gratuitously.

The Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69) —one of the most important Acts of the late session— came into operation on the day of its passing (August 5), no other day being fixed anywhere in the Act for its commencement. What, then, is the meaning of subsection 3 of section 1, which enacts that 'section 2 of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, is hereby repealed with respect to any sentence awarded after the date at which the section comes into operation?' The Act of 1864, as is well known, provided that no sentence of penal servitude should be for less than five years. The Act of 1891, by section 1, subsection 1, enacts that 'where under any enactment in force when this section comes into operation a Court has power to award a sentence of penal servitude, the sentence may, at the discretion of the Court, be for any period not less than three years.' Will the section come into operation with respect to a crime committed before, but for which a prisoner is tried after, the Act? We think on the whole that it will. But the point is one on which it would be well to be quite certain, looking to the common law rule that where the law prescribes a greater sentence than the Court awards the judgment cannot be amended, but must be reversed altogether, unless, indeed, the Court of Criminal Appeal has power to put matters straight under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, s. 5.

If the reasoning of Lord Justice Kay, concurred in by Lord Justice Lopes, in the recent case of Pelton Bros. v. Harrison, is sound law, a curious anomaly results as to the liability to execution of property acquired by a woman in the interval between two covertures. Suppose that a married woman contracts during coverture; the contract will 'bind' all the separate property she acquires during coverture except such as is subject to a restraint on anticipation. If she becomes discoverte, the contract, or the judgment in which it is merged, will continue to bind all the property which was bound by it when the coverture ceased, though it is no longer 'separate' property; and the property which was free from the obligation by reason of the restraint on anticipation will remain free from it during discoverture, though the restraint on anticipation is then of no effect. This was the actual decision in Pelton Bros. v. Harrison. But in dealing with the case of Jay v. Robinson, 59 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 367, the Lords Justices gave expression to the further opinion that, if the woman while discoverte acquires other property, this will not be bound by the debt or judgment, because it is not separate property within the meaning of the statute. Jay v. Robinson already decides that in the event of re-marriage such property would become liable under the judgment. For a judgment relating to a debt contracted under a former coverture is for the purpose of the new coverture treated as an ante-nuptial debt; and on what Lord Justice Kay called a liberal construction of the words of the statute, the property acquired during discoverture is regarded as separate property acquired on the subsequent coverture. It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to draw a distinction so arbitrary as this. It seems sufficiently clear that if, in the circumstances supposed, the property was intended to be made liable during the second coverture, there was no reason for exempting it from liability during discoverture; and, on the other hand, if it is right that it should be exempted during discoverture, there can be no reason why the exemption should not continue during any later coverture. Perhaps some of the robust lawyers of old, who, instead of criticising the law, were addicted to callous moralising on its merits, would have been content to say that it was the woman's own folly to marry again.

In Cox v. Bennett, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 651, a married woman, having separate estate, with a restraint upon anticipation, took certain proceedings in her own name without a next friend under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and in the result was ordered to pay the costs, with the usual provision limiting execution to separate estate not subject to any restraint on anticipation. At the date when the order for payment of costs was made the trustees had in hand certain arrears of the settled income, but it did not appear that there were any such arrears at the time when the legal proceedings were instituted by the married woman. The question, which was carried to the Court of Appeal, was whether in this case the arrears, which did not exist when the proceedings were begun, could be retained in payment of the costs of those proceedings. The Court of Appeal, affirming Mr. Justice Kekewich, answered this question in the affirmative. The difficulty arose chiefly from the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Glanvill, 55 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 325; L. R. 31 Chanc. Div. 532, where, prior to the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a married woman, also restrained from anticipation, sued in the name of her next friend, and an order was made for payment of costs primarily against the next friend, but with liberty to apply against the married woman, under which an application was made for payment in part out of arrears of her income which had accrued at the date of the order for payment, but not at the date when the action was begun, and the Court there held that the arrears not having accrued at the latter date could not be attached to meet the costs. The decisions in the two cases, it will be seen, are entirely opposite, the ground of the distinction between them being that the one case arose under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, while the other was under the old law.

The case of Gough v. Gough, decided by the Court of Appeal just before the conclusion of the last sittings, revealed a curious difference between the English and Scotch Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1883—two Acts which are to be found consecutively in the Statute-book and received the royal assent upon the same day. By the Act of 1875, dealing with the same subject-matter, and applying to England only, the terms 'landlord' and 'tenant' included the executors, administrators, assignees, husband, guardian, committee of the estate, or trustees in bankruptcy of a landlord or tenant. But when, in 1883, the Legislature proceeded to frame a new enactment, or rather two enactments, the one for England and the other for Scotland, while the definition of 'landlord' in the Scotch Act was left as before, in the English Act the meaning of the term was strictly limited, and was no longer allowed to include executors, administrators, or other representatives of a landlord. Why should such a difference exist between the law of the two countries? 'It is difficult,' as was remarked by Mr. Justice Williams, who, with Mr. Justice Cave, decided Gough v. Gough in the Court below, 'to conceive any reason why it should be just in Scotland that the executors of a landlord should have the power of charging lands with money which they are compelled to pay out of their testator's estate for the benefit of the land, and not just that they should have the same power in England.' The most probable explanation, namely, that it occurred per incuriam, is inadmissible, and contrary to all the canons of construction. But it is inconceivable that the Legislature intended that in England the whole of the machinery of the Act was to be suspended and become useless if the landlord happens to die. The solution of the matter was found in a proviso, by which it is enacted that the designations of landlord and tenant shall continue to apply to the parties until the conclusion of any proceedings taken under the Act. The intention of this proviso was to prevent a landlord or tenant from saying upon the day of the determination of a lease or other contract of tenancy that he was no longer a landlord or tenant, and that, therefore, the Act did not apply to him. But, fortunately, the word 'parties' is used. It was argued that it meant 'parties to the contract of tenancy,' which is the phrase used in the Act of 1875. But the Court of Appeal held otherwise. On the decease of the landlord his executors are liable to pay any compensation which their testator was liable to pay; they, therefore, become parties to the proceedings under the Act. Consequently, notwithstanding the exclusive definition of the term 'landlord,' that term applies to the executors, and they are entitled to obtain a charge on the land to the amount of any compensation they may be compelled to pay for unexhausted improvements. The result of the whole matter is, therefore, much the same as if the Legislature had not, whether by accident or intention we know not, excluded the executors and other representatives of a landlord from the meaning of that term in the Act.

The letter which was recently addressed to the daily press by the Chairman of the Fire Brigade Committee (London County Council) discloses a novel and peculiarly mischievous offence. Fire, especially in a large town, is so terrible an enemy to all classes of the community that it is marvellous how men, or even boys, can be found so destitute of common sense or decency as to tamper with the fire-alarm posts which have been fixed in the streets for the convenience of the public. The effect of these practical jokes is to harass the men of the Fire Brigade, and to cause such delay and confusion as may one day lead to a serious catastrophe. If the punishments inflicted by the magistrates have not proved sufficient to deter the offenders, who, it seems, are on the increase, special and drastic legislation must be invoked to stamp out so dangerous and diabolical a practice.

Employing 'touts' to bring business to solicitors is so derogatory to the dignity of the profession that the publicity recently given to a case heard at the Brompton County Court, and reported in our last issue, will, we trust, have the effect of checking, if not stamping out, this objectionable practice. Ignorant persons who sustain, or claim to have sustained, injuries in railway or omnibus accidents are the most common victims of the system; and many cases which would probably be settled out of Court, if in other hands, result in costly and vexatious litigation. The most effective remedy is, after all, a sound and healthy professional opinion, and the Incorporated Law Society have a great responsibility in seeing that this is cultivated.

Some country magistrates are, it would appear, doing their best to deserve the censure so frequently bestowed on them as a class. It is impossible to read the account of a conviction for assault at the Malling (Kent) Petty Sessions on Tuesday last without indignation at the brutality of the defendant and the half-hearted leniency of the bench. Previous 'good character' on the part of the farmer was really no better justification for his being let off with a fine of 5*l.* than it would be in the case of a burglar or a murderer. A man who so completely lost his self-control as to punish a little girl of seven, whose offence was stealing a few plums in his orchard, by tying her to a tree, and, notwithstanding her terror and her mother's entreaties, allowing his dog to worry her for nearly half-an-hour, deserved condign punishment, and would certainly have received it had Mr. Montagu Williams, for instance, been the magistrate who heard the case. We trust that the facts of the case have been exaggerated, but the episode as reported may be commended to the consideration of the Home Secretary and the Lord Chancellor.

The account in last Tuesday's Daily News of the headquarters' Salvationist views on the Eastbourne riots was not edifying reading. Unlimited abuse was heaped on the public officials and the police at Eastbourne, and 'weak-kneed brethren' who hesitated to break the law because it was the law were urged to follow the example of Daniel and other Old Testament heroes, and even our Saviour Himself, who, said Mr. Bramwell Booth, refused to obey an unjust law! Sir Wm. Harcourt, M.P., was quoted as a supporter, though it would be difficult to find anything in the letter of the ex-Home Secretary which would justify the lawlessness so freely invoked. To patiently wait until the House of Commons is satisfied to repeal the local Act would not suit the advocates of 'blood and fire,' and the disgraceful scenes which are giving Eastbourne an unhappy notoriety are evidently intended to become a permanent institution. Last, but not least, the Salvationist leaders intimated in plain language that candidates for Parliamentary honours who did not promise support to the Salvationist cause would have to reckon with the Army at the day of election. It is high time that the lovers of religion should endeavour to rescue it from such unfortunate associations.

Section 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, contains a very stringent provision for the protection of the public from dangers likely to arise from the consumption of any kind of unsound food. It is enacted by subsection 4 that where a person convicted of selling unsound food has been, within twelve months, convicted of a similar offence, the convicting justices may, if they think fit, and find that he 'knowingly and wilfully committed' both such offences, 'order that a notice of the facts be affixed in such form and manner, and for such period not exceeding twenty-one days, as the Court may order, to any premises occupied by that person, and that the person do pay the costs of such affixing;' and, further, that if any person obstructs the affixing of such notice, or removes, defaces, or conceals the notice while affixed during the said period, he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding 5*l.*' This severe punishment is not quite new to the Statute-book. Very similar provisions found their way into the adulteration clauses (ss. 19–22) of the Licensing Act, 1872, but only to be very quickly repealed by the Licensing Act, 1874. In like manner, clauses of the Adulteration Act, 1872, which pointed in the same direction, were repealed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. The Sale of Bread Act, 1836, however, and the Adulteration of Seeds Act, 1869, and, what is of more importance, the very recent Weights and Measures Act, 1889, still authorise the publication of convictions, section 14 of the last-mentioned Act providing that 'where a person is convicted before any Court of any offence under this Act or the principal Act' [of 1878], 'the Court may, if it thinks fit, cause the conviction to be published in such manner as it thinks desirable.'

Truth complains that 'a farmer has just been heavily fined (in the person of his son) for using a gun to scare birds without having a gun license,' as required by the Gun License Act, 1870. 'The farmer in question contended strenuously that the law did not require him to take out a license,' and appears to have relied on a paragraph in a 'reference-book compiled with exemplary care,' which 'states that a tenant-farmer need not take out a license for a gun merely used for the purpose of scaring birds.' The proceedings of the Inland Revenue officers in the matter are condemned by Truth as 'shabby enough,' but said to be eclipsed by the conduct of the bench, 'who, notwithstanding his honest doubt about the law,' fined the farmer 5*l.* and costs. Truth recommends farmers 'to take further steps to ascertain whether this is good law, and if it is to get such "good law" altered for the future.' For ourselves, we cannot see any doubt about the matter. Section 7 of the Gun License Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 57), enacts that 'every person who shall use or carry a gun elsewhere than in a dwelling-house or the curtilage thereof, without having in force a license duly granted to him under this Act, shall forfeit the sum of ten pounds.' Then follow six exceptions, it being 'provided always that the said penalty shall not be incurred by the following persons,' inter alia, 'by the occupier of any lands using or carrying a gun for the purpose only of scaring birds or of killing vermin on such lands, or by any person using or carrying a gun for the purpose only of scaring birds or of killing vermin on any lands by order of the occupier thereof, who shall have in force a license or certificate to kill game, or a license under this Act.' It is added that 'it shall lie upon the defendant to prove that he is a person not incurring the penalty by virtue of the proviso.' Inasmuch as the farmer's son, and not the farmer himself, appears to have been carrying the gun, the decision appears to be perfectly good law, honest belief, of course, though founded on the perusal of a book, however carefully compiled, forming no excuse.

THE LEGISLATION OF THE SESSION.

At the opening of the Parliamentary year we gave a brief résumé of legislative promise as disclosed in the bills introduced by the Government and by private members. It needs scarcely to be said that the fulfilment in the seventy-six public Acts which have received the royal assent must have disappointed the ambition of many members who desired to be associated with the authorship of an Act of Parliament. Last year was distinguished by the achievements of private members. The present marks an epoch of constructive work by the Government, which has carried several measures of first-class importance. The coping-stone to the educational legislation which began with Mr. Forster's great Act of 1870 has been placed on the structure in the form of the Free Education Act, which unites, like the first of the series, the best elements of progress and conservatism. The zeal and energy of religious bodies will be stimulated by the clause which provides that 'nothing in this Act shall give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it is or is not provided by a School Board.' Some doubts have been expressed whether the benefit of the Act will extend to children in Standard VII., but the only limit appears to be that of age, which is from three to fifteen. As was pointed out the other day in this journal, four other useful measures on education have also been passed—viz. the Technical Instruction Act, the Army Schools Act, the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Act, and the Schools for Science and Art Act. Another measure of an educational character enables local authorities to establish museums and gymnasiums. Sir W. Hart Dyke may thus claim to share the honours of the session with his brilliant colleague Mr. Balfour.

Ireland has, as usual, received at least its share of legislative attention, and, in addition to the Purchase of Land Act, four or five other Irish bills have become law. Two deal with the Supply of Seed Potatoes, another with the Transfer of Railways. Pollen Fisheries, Tramways, Turbary, the Redemption of Long Leases, Land Registration, and Loans for Public Works also constitute the subjects of Acts recently passed. There are also various measures connected with Scotland, and the crofters and fishermen of that country will, it is hoped, be benefited by the Crofters Common Grazings Regulation Act and the Western Highlands and Islands Works Act.

We have already noticed the inadequate treatment of the pressing question of judicial reform in the Lord Chancellor's Jurisdiction Act, which enables an ex-Lord-Chancellor to sit in the Court of Appeal or the High Court. It is, in fact, an Act to utilise the superfluous energy of Lord Herschell. The Stamp Act and the Stamp Management Act are measures of administrative detail which require careful attention, and have already called at least one treatise into existence. We have also noticed Mr. Cozens-Hardy's Mortmain Act, which will probably have the effect of relieving the Courts of a troublesome class of cases. Lord Herschell's Bill of Sale Act exempts securities on imported goods from the necessity of registration. The Electoral Disabilities Removal Act will save revising barristers from the painful duty of striking off the register persons whose duties have taken them from home, provided the absence be not greater than four months. The Charity Trusts Recovery Act gives the initiative to the Charity Commissioners in taking proceedings to preserve charities of less than 20*l.* a year. The Lord Chancellor was jubilant over the City Causes Act, which authorises the trial of civil causes in the City of London; and Mr. Milvain has established a reputation for gallantry by the Slander of Women Act, which, even in the absence of special damage, makes an imputation of unchastity actionable. With admirable humour Captain Verney desired to extend the benefit of the enactment to men. Various measures affecting foreign countries have also been passed, including one with respect to the North Sea Fisheries, which chiefly concerns Belgium and the Sea Fisheries (Behring Sea) Act, which brought over the Newfoundland delegates to plead the cause of the colony at the bar of the House of Lords. To the same category belong the Russian Dutch Loan Act and the Foreign Marriages Act. The Tithes Act will, of course, be claimed as a palmary achievement of the session. The Forged Transfers Act was suggested, doubtless, by Barton v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 676, and other cases, and gives power to companies to make good losses caused by forged transfers of securities. The rating of allotments and the remuneration of taxation officials are also the subjects of legislation. The London County Council, of course, makes its appearance with a Money Act, and also with a measure which evoked animated debate by appointing March as the time of election instead of November. The Custody of Children and Lunacy also form the titles of statutes. The Land Registry (Middlesex Deeds) Act amalgamates two offices which certainly were not overworked—viz. the Middlesex Registry and that which was created under Lord Cairns's Act, 1875. An Expiring Laws Continuance Act is an annual exhibitor, and we have repeatedly in these columns dealt with the work of statute law revision. The Penal Servitude Act will enable judges to pass a sentence of three years' penal servitude. The Factory and Workshops Act and the Public Health (London) Act, which forms the last and bulkiest chapters (142 sections) of this year's Statute-book, are sure to call forth numerous treatises. Statutes have also been passed with respect to the Coinage, the Post Office, Returning Officers (Scotland), and other subjects.

ENGLISH CAUSES CÉLÈBRES.—IX.

The Matlock Will Case.

This suit related to the validity of certain alleged codicils to the will of one George Nuttall, who died at Matlock, in Derbyshire, on March 7, 1856. Nuttall, who was a land surveyor, had considerable property, both real and personal. He was a bachelor, had few relations, and was not on intimate terms with any of them except two cousins—of whom one, John Nuttall, was foreman to a London contractor, and the other, Catherine Marsden, had been his housekeeper for many years, and was living with him in that capacity at the time of his death. Nuttall had, however, some friendly neighbours, notably Job Knowles, a farmer, who rented a quarry from him; Mr. Adams, a surgeon; and John Else, the assistant-overseer of Matlock and also the bailiff of the County Court. Else was occasionally employed by Nuttall in collecting rents and in copying accounts, and wrote a hand not unlike his, though distinguishable. The testator made his own will on September 15, 1854, leaving thereby the bulk of his real property to his cousin John, an annuity of 200*l.* together with all his furniture and other household effects to Catherine Marsden, and an interest in tithes worth 140*l.* a year to Else, and died, as we have said, on March 7, 1856. Between that date and the day of the funeral a duplicate of the will was found in which there was an interlineation written in a hand like that of the testator, but not so running and free. This interlineation gave Else an annuity of 100*l.*, and increased the annuity of Catherine Marsden from 200*l.* to 250*l.* On April 12, 1856, about a month after the testator's death, John Nuttall died also, leaving the property upon trust for his infant children. Then a remarkable series of events occurred. On April 21, 1856, Else found among some of the testator's papers, which had been taken to his house, a holograph codicil. This document purported to be attested by two labourers, Buxton and Gregory, and it was mainly in favour of Catherine Marsden and Else himself. Eight months later, on December 16, 1856, pinned on to one of the leaves of a little penny account-book belonging to Mr. Nuttall, Else found a second codicil of a similar tenor. But the crowning discovery was yet to come. On October 9, 1857, Else, who soon after the testator's death had taken up his residence at the testator's house, ordered a boy named Champion to clean the windows in the lumber-room. The boy being short and the window high, Else laid hold of the sill to raise himself up so as to open the window. The sill gave way and disclosed a small hole in the wall, in which was a common jar of brown earthenware. The boy called his attention to the jar, and, on looking into it, he found a bag of sovereigns and a third codicil, dated January 12, 1856, attested by Knowles and Adams, and appointing Else as the testator's residuary legatee. The suspicions of John Nuttall's trustees were now thoroughly aroused. They disputed all three codicils, and in July, 1859, the Master of the Rolls directed an issue to try their validity before a jury. That issue was tried before Sir William Erle, then Lord Chief Justice, at Derby, in August, 1859, and the jury found that the codicils were valid. The Master of the Rolls granted a new trial, which took place before the Lord Chief Baron at the Derby Spring Assizes, 1860, and resulted in a directly contrary verdict being returned. The Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chief

Baron were satisfied with their verdict and refused a new trial. On appeal to the Lords Justices, Lord Justice Knight Bruce was against a new trial, Lord Justice Turner in favour of it. The House of Lords adopted the opinion of the latter, and on February 22, 1864, the great Matlock will case (or Cresswell v. Jackson) came on for trial at the Guildhall before Sir Alexander Cockburn, the Lord Chief Justice, and a special jury of the city of London. Mr. Karslake, Q.C., Mr. Field, Q.C., and Mr. Hannen were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Serjeant Hayes, Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, and Mr. Wills were for the defendants. After an eight days' trial the jury found that all three codicils were a fabrication.

The Matlock will case is replete with interest. (1) The first point that strikes the legal reader is the admirable and determined advocacy of Mr. Karslake. His case was thoroughly bad. He could not venture to call Catherine Marsden as a witness. Gregory, Buxton, and Knowles gave him little help. Else contradicted his former evidence in several important particulars, and Chabot, the expert, of whom we shall have more to say immediately, convinced even the Lord Chief Justice that the codicils were forgeries. But Karslake stood manfully by his brief to the last. It reminds one of the gallantry and the resource displayed by 'the Corsican parvenu' in the campaign of 1814. (2) Again, the speech of Mr. Serjeant Hayes for the defence contains a passage of unique merit. It is that in which he describes the discovery of the third codicil. 'What could be more utterly incredible,' said the witty advocate, 'than the whole story? "What's that?" said Else. "What's that in the jar?" Why, a codicil to be sure! What else could it be? In a jar, in a hole in the wall, covered with cobwebs. What could it be but a codicil! This finder of codicils, who found nothing but codicils—what should it be but a codicil, and a codicil in his favour! In a hole in the wall! Why, it might not but for this miraculous discovery have ever been discovered at all! What a place for a man of business to put his last will in! But what would the jury say when he told them that he would prove that an iron vice weighing about 60 lb. was in the testator's lifetime screwed over the window-board under which the hole was found, so that the testator two months before his death, labouring under an abscess in his back (which he described in one of his letters as five inches long, three inches broad, and one-and-a-half inch deep), must have gone up to that loft, unscrewed the vice, lifted it up, made the hole in the wall, deposited the jar with the twenty sovereigns and the codicil, then covered it up, and screwed the vice over it again, and all this to prevent anyone from ever finding it? The hole in the wall! Why, imagination could hardly go beyond it! No more codicils had been found since, and one great blessing of these Chancery proceedings had been that they had stopped the finding of codicils. But for them a fourth codicil must have been found. It must have come. The second and third had each been found after nine months—the usual period of gestation—but, perhaps, as there was so little of the property still left to be disposed of, this might have been only a "seven months'" codicil. It was certainly difficult to conceive where it could have been found. One could hardly imagine any more obscure place for secreting another codicil. Perhaps, however, in Job Knowles's quarry, while his men were blasting the rock . . . In some fissure Else might have seen an antediluvian toad sitting on something and said, "Bless me, what is that?" Why what could it be but a codicil?' (3) Equally admirable in its way was Sir Alexander Cockburn's charge to the jury, with which we have left ourselves no space to deal. (4) The most curious incident in the trial was the evidence of the expert Chabot, a Huguenot by descent and a lithographer by trade. Chabot raised the study of disputed handwritings from a discredited art to the dignity of a science. His life achievement was the conversion of the Quarterly Review to the conclusion that Sir Philip Francis was the author of 'Junius.' But in the Matlock Will Case he rendered important service to the cause of truth. He showed that Nuttall and Else had each characteristic habits of handwriting, and that, judged by these, the will was the work of Nuttall, while the codicils were forged by the rascal that found them.

MACDONNELL'S STATE TRIALS.

Reports of State Trials. New Series. Vol. III. 1831 to 1840. Edited by John Macdonnell, M.A. Pp. 1363. Price 10*s*. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode. 1891.

The third volume of this excellent series contains reports of the following trials inter alia: The Bristol Riots, Dicas v. Lord Brougham, The Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company, and Stockdale v. Hansard. An admirable portrait of Chief Justice Denman, taken from a picture in the possession of the Hon. Mr. Justice Denman, forms the frontispiece of the work. The appendices are full of valuable matter, and the index of subjects is constructed on an excellent plan. Master Macdonnell and his collaborateur deserve the highest credit for the accuracy and the judgment with which they are carrying out this important undertaking. We trust that a general index to the whole series will be kept steadily in view.

MINORS AS HOLDERS OF BUILDING SOCIETY SHARES.

Sir,—I should be glad to receive, if possible, a definite authority on the following point:—

A member of a Starr-Bowkett Building Society obtained an appropriation a few weeks back, and submitted a security which was accepted by the directors. It appears, however, that the member is a minor, and cannot therefore execute a mortgage of the property. He now proposes to transfer his shares to his father, but he, being a minor, it would appear that he could not execute a transfer unless he is impliedly authorised to do so under the Building Societies Act.

The exact wording of one of the rules of the society is: 'Minors may take shares and may transfer the same, but cannot hold office or vote.'

These rules have been certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and the question is whether the society can accept a transfer of the appropriated shares from the member to his father under the provisions of the Building Societies Act and the rules, or whether the rules are ultra vires as to the power of a minor to transfer his shares.

CITY OF LONDON COURT.

TRUSTEES' COSTS.

IN the City of London Court on October 13, before Mr. Commissioner Kerr, Mr. J. W. M'Carthy applied for the payment to the executors of one Emma Newman of about 78*l.*, which had been deposited in Court under the following circumstances: In October, 1878, Mrs. Newman, a laundress in Battersea, whose husband had previously been placed in the Caterham Lunatic Asylum, where he still remains, purchased through a building society the premises in which she carried on her business. She died in 1883, leaving all her property to her children. The instalments of the loan falling into arrear, the building society, as mortgagees, sold the property, which realised 78*l.* more than the debt due, and having doubts whether, under the Married Women's Property Act (the marriage having taken place in 1853), Mrs. Newman had the power to treat her property as separate estate and to dispose of it by will, the society deposited the balance in Court under the Trustee Relief Act.—Mr. Kisch appeared for the guardians of the Wandsworth Union, who claimed to be entitled, in respect of the maintenance of the lunatic, to the sum in Court. A curious feature of the case was that the lunatic, when visited by his wife shortly before her death, and thirty years after the marriage, for the first time told her that he had previously been married to another woman, who was alive when the ceremony of 1853 was performed; but there was no truth of the proof of that statement. Ultimately it was arranged that an inquiry into the facts should be held by the registrar of the Court, who was to report the result. On an application by the solicitor of the building society, who was present as representing the trustees, for the costs of his attendance, the learned Commissioner said that ever since 1864 he had refused to allow costs to trustees or other merely formal parties in such cases. They were under no necessity to appear, and they must trust to the Court doing its duty without their attendance. In reply to an observation that in the High Court costs were usually allowed under similar circumstances, the Commissioner said that his was a County Court, and that he would not be a party to the wasting of small estates by the employment of professional men to represent formal parties to a proceeding who incurred needless cost in the belief that it would fall on the estate. He had, he said, frequently seen a number of barristers and solicitors representing persons who had no real interest in the proceedings, and in such cases he would always refuse to allow costs.

THE LONG VACATION PROLONGED.

'A SOLICITOR' writes to the Times as follows:—

In the issue of the Times of the 8th inst. it is stated that the Law Courts will not be reopened until the 26th inst., instead of the 24th inst., on which day the sittings should in fact commence.

This announcement must be a matter of regret to all interested in the administration of the law, to litigants as well as to barristers and solicitors, for most true is it that 'delay of justice is denial of justice;' and in view of the congested state of the cause lists of all the superior Courts of Chancery and common law, every day's delay in proceeding with the trial of causes involves an accumulated amount of loss and inconvenience, the extent of which can hardly be realised.

The Long Vacation, as by law established, extends from August 13 to October 23, both dates inclusive, thus covering a period of over ten weeks, but in practice it not unfrequently happens that this period is still further lengthened at each end by Courts ceasing to sit before the close of the Trinity Sittings, and, as now, by delaying to recommence the Michaelmas Sittings until after the date fixed.

The view is now very generally entertained that the Long Vacation should be materially shortened, and in considering the question it is to be borne in mind that there are three other vacations in the course of the year, covering twelve days at Easter, ten days at Whitsuntide, and twenty-one days at Christmas. The days during which the Courts are closed, owing to the four vacations, thus amount to a total number of 115.

For the purposes of this letter I have not dealt with the additional number of days during which the Royal Courts of Justice in London are practically closed owing to the absence of the judges on circuit. This is a separate question, and one that urgently demands consideration and amendment. It has been apparent for years past to practical men that additional judges are imperatively required to enable the superior Courts to dispose of the business with reasonable expedition; but it is difficult to enlist attention for such matters in the din of political warfare and party strife.

LAW AND PROFESSIONAL NOTES.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

TWO cases tried recently in the Manchester and Salford County Courts respectively are of interest. In both instances it was sought to recover compensation under the Employers' Liability Act. In the first case, Dearn v. The Corporation of Manchester, the plaintiff stated that he was a driver in the employ of the corporation, and was engaged at night with a horse and van to collect refuse. In the earlier part of the particular night on which the accident happened he had employed his own horse, but, it casting a shoe, he took another horse—a strange one—out by direction of the assistant-horsekeeper. It was restive, but plaintiff collected several loads with it. Subsequently the horse commenced to rear and kick, and plaintiff was struck violently and injured. He was unable to work for ten weeks. Plaintiff's counsel then explained that the action was brought under subsection 1 of the Employers' Liability Act, and it was claimed that the injuries were caused in consequence of defective plant. The 'defective plant' in this case was a vicious horse, a horse having been held in the Superior Courts to be 'plant' within the meaning of the section. Defendants' counsel said that the corporation paid the wages of servants who were injured while at work. There was no warranty as to freedom from vice, but a horse was returned at the end of twenty-eight days if he showed vice. Ultimately the plaintiff obtained judgment; therefore it may be taken that a vicious horse is 'defective plant.' In the other case to which allusion has been made (Walker v. Dewhurst & Co.) a widow sought damages owing to her husband, who was attending to a boiler at the works, being, in consequence of the shifting of weights on a lever, fatally scalded. It was alleged that the boiler was defective inasmuch as the weights were able to slide along the lever, and that its defective condition was known to the defendants and to their foreman. Counsel for plaintiff remarked that he was in a difficulty to some extent, because nobody was present at the time of the accident, and therefore no direct evidence could be given. Still proof would be given of the removal of the weight, and that no precaution was taken to fix it or to prevent it from slipping along the top. This was done, and the judge suggested an arrangement should be come to, and a verdict was subsequently entered for plaintiff. It is not often that a case where no direct evidence can be given is so suitably terminated. Discussing the question of evidence, one of the text-book writers points out that in criminal cases, when the evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, fails to produce in the minds of the jury or magistrates a degree of conviction equivalent to moral certainty, the accused is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, whereas in civil cases no presumption exists. The plaintiff and defendant meet upon level ground. The plaintiff, it is true, is bound to set the scales in motion, but the decision must be according to the ultimate rest of the balance as determined by the weight of evidence thrown upon either side.

LABOUR AND CAPITAL.

Labour seems to be looking keenly after its own interests, if one is to judge by the activity of its members in bringing actions in the Police Courts and elsewhere, and obtaining recognition of its statutory rights. In one instance a firm of colliery owners were summoned for committing a breach of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, by having an insufficient supply of air going through the down-brow working. It was contended, however, that the firm were not liable under that Act, which compelled the owners of mines to have a registered manager; therefore, under section 50, the manager, and not the owners, was liable. This case, it was urged, would never have been heard of had the colliery firm prosecuted their men, which they refused to do, considering there was no ground for complaint. Nevertheless labour won, and a fine and costs were imposed. In another case the Worcestershire harvest men and the Truck Acts came up for an innings, when three large employers of labour were summoned for giving away cider to their men. In one case six quarts of cider had been given during harvesting, in another one gallon of cider to men cutting barley, and in the third instance a quart of cider was handed daily to regular farm hands. Such actions were contrary to the Truck Acts, and it was in the interests of working men that these proceedings were taken. Labour, again, came off victorious, several fines being inflicted with an intimation of heavier fines in future. The Cotton Cloth Factory Act of 1890 seems to afford frequent opportunity for capital being summoned. The inspector, in prosecuting in one case, stated that he visited the defendant's mills, after the record had been taken, and found that the temperature was 83 degrees, and the wet bulb showed 78, being half a degree in excess of what was allowed under the Act. The defendants had had notice of offences on five previous occasions. The Act provided that a summons should not be taken out on the first occasion, and now, when the firm had had five notices, he felt compelled to institute proceedings. Another firm were also summoned for a similar offence; the record sent in showed that the temperature was 82 degrees, and the wet bulb 78 degrees, so that the humidity was $1\frac{1}{2}$ degree over that allowed by the Act. The inspector admitted, however, the honourable way in which the records were kept, and added that he had no ground for supposing that the records were not properly taken. By the records the manufacturers furnished the grounds for their own conviction. Though this admission was something in favour of capital, the bench propitiated labour by inflicting in each of these cases the minimum penalty, with costs.

QUARTER SESSIONS AND ELECTIONS.

In view of a general election next year, some remarks which fell from the learned recorder of the Manchester Quarter Sessions are worth notice. The recorder, in charging the grand jury, expressed his regret that the first day of the sessions should fall upon the day when an election was taking place in Manchester. The grand jury were doubtless aware that the sessions were fixed and the necessary notices given before the day of the election was determined upon, and therefore the sitting of the Court could not have been altered. The grand jury, amongst themselves, could make arrangements which would prevent any persons taking part in the election from being absent from the performance of their duty in connection therewith. So far as the common jury were concerned, too, the Court would take care that no persons were inconvenienced in regard to the election by their attendance at that Court. With regard to the cases, the number of prisoners to be tried was small, and there were no offences of a serious character. The number of cases had not apparently increased, although the jurisdiction of the sessions had increased very largely owing to the recent extension of the city. The grand jury and the citizens of Manchester should be congratulated upon the diminution of crime in the city. It may be added that, during the hearing of criminal charges in some of the cases of conviction, the recorder took advantage of the new Act, 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69 (Penal Servitude Act, 1891), with regard to the length of the sentences, which permits of a sentence of three years' penal servitude.

TRAMWAY LAW.

A remarkably interesting paper on 'The Rating of Tramways' was lately read by Mr. Humphrey Davis, of London, at the meeting of the Tramway Institute at Southport. It was pointed out that the Queen's Bench had decided, in the case of The Pimlico, Peckham, and Greenwich Tramway Company v. Lambeth, that the occupation 'which created the liability of tramway companies to be rated by the local authorities was due entirely to the groove in the rail on which the cars ran, and of which groove the companies had the exclusive use.' But the art of road-making had been brought to such a state of perfection that the surfaces of the streets in many of their great cities gave nearly all the facilities for easy traction to the omnibus that a tramway offered, and that fact emphasised the unfairness of rating the tramway owner, who already maintained a large portion of the road surface, to further aid the omnibus owner, who was free of all such imposts, to carry on his competition. The standard of value for rating purposes was the same for all classes of property (with one or two trifling exceptions), and the cottage, the mansion, the railway, or a tramway had all to be assessed at the sum at which they might reasonably be expected to let on a yearly tenancy, the tenant paying rates and taxes, the landlord paying for all repairs and renewals. The legal decisions which had been given as to the correct application of the principles to be adopted on arriving at the supposed letting value were almost innumerable. The whole question was highly technical, and the principle of valuation very artificial, and this was the case not only with the mode of calculating the value, but in the manner of making and levying the rate itself, which was quite a distinct thing from the making of the valuation list. It was argued that, as a rule, it is not worth the while of small ratepayers to contest the fairness of a rate, but tramway companies were usually such large contributors to the local burdens that they should scrutinise most carefully all the demands made upon them.

WHAT IS AN INSURABLE INTEREST?

Two cases at Bolton have drawn attention to the peculiarities of insurance law. The landlord of an hotel in Bolton upon taking it over undertook to also take over and keep a man who was a general hanger-on about the premises. Subsequently an agent of an insurance company called upon the landlord and hinted that the hanger-on's life might be insured in his company. The landlord assented, the policy was granted, and all premiums regularly paid. Two years after the hanger-on died. The landlord now desired to obtain the value of the policy. The company offered 5*l.* in settlement, but this was refused, and thereupon the landlord instituted proceedings against the company. The magistrates held, however, that he had no insurable interest in the deceased, and, though the company had profited by the premiums paid, they could not be made to pay the amount of the policy. The company claimed that they endeavoured to conform to the law; but, looking at the fact that it had received these premiums, this seems hardly creditable. In another insurance case tried in the same place, where a man had insured his brother without his knowledge, and the executors sued for the amount of the policy, they were more successful, and the insurance society had to pay.

TITHES.

At the recent meeting of the Church Congress at Rhyl, the Bishop of Manchester made some pertinent references to the subject of tithes. Every one knew that the tithes now paid to the ministers of the National Church did not belong to any private person. They were given to the Church before the era of what was called historic memory; no owner or occupier of land had ever bought them. They belonged neither to the landlord nor to the farmer; and, therefore, the claim on the part of either to influence their destination was plainly a baseless claim. If they were to be diverted from their present purpose that could only be done by a solemn act of the nation. No doubt the nation was now being urged to do that act, so far, at least, as regarded a portion of the revenues of the National Church. While the matter was still in agitation, they should ask themselves to what better purpose could the nation in its own interest devote the present endowments of the Church? Could any man believe that it would be for the good of the nation to devote them to the teaching of the three R's, even if supplemented by some smattering of secular knowledge—literary or scientific? In new countries it might be possible to provide for the spiritual wants of the people by the voluntary gifts of Christians, but in an old country like England disendowment meant serious diminution of practical help. In connection with this special pleading of the bishop, it may be interesting to note the difference between Christians and Jews in the matter of tithes. It is said of the Jews that those among them who were reputed religious distributed in lieu of tithes the tenth of their increase unto the poor, as they were persuaded they would be blessed the more for it. In this they acted on their proverb, 'Thegmasher; bischbilsche thegmasher'—that is, 'Pay tithes that thou mayest be rich.'

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA.

An interesting and novel point in the law of gifts causa mortis was recently decided by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of Redden v. Thrall. The donor, who was suffering from hernia, was about to undergo an operation for its cure. The evening before going to the hospital, where the operation was to be performed, he delivered to the donee a tin box with the declaration that if he did not return the box and its contents were to belong to the donee. While undergoing the operation the donor died of heart disease, the shock from the operation being the immediate cause of the fatal result. On these facts it was contended that, inasmuch as the donor died of a different disease from that from which he apprehended death at the time when the gift was made, the gift could not take effect. But Mr. Justice Earle, delivering the opinion of the Court, said: 'I am quite sure that no case can be found in which it was decided that death must ensue from the same disease, and not from some other disease existing at the same time, but not known. There is no reason for this additional pre-requisite. The rule is that the donor must not recover from the disease from which he then apprehended death. If he recovers, the gift is void; if he does not recover and the gift is not revoked, it becomes effectual. In this case the condition was that if he did not recover from the consequences of the operation and return from the hospital, the gift should take effect. That was a perfectly lawful condition for him as the owner of the property to impose, and no reason can be perceived for refusing to uphold a gift made under such circumstances. A donor may have several diseases, and may, in making a gift, apprehend death from one and not from the others, and shall the gift be invalid if, before he recovers from the disease feared, he die from one of the other diseases? In such a case it might be, and generally would be, difficult, if not impossible, to tell what share any of the diseases had in causing the death. No medical skill could ordinarily tell that the donor would have succumbed to the disease feared, if the other diseases had not been present. Here the immediate cause of death appeared to be heart disease, and the autopsy did not disclose that there was any connection between the hernia or the operation and the heart disease. But who could tell that the death would have ensued from the heart disease at that particular time but for the operation? No medical skill can tell that the shock from the operation, and the debility and disturbance caused thereby, did not hasten death; and the death, therefore, in a proper sense may have ensued, and probably did ensue, from both causes. Sound policy requires that the laws regulating gifts causa mortis should not be extended, and that the range of such gifts should not be enlarged. We therefore confine our decision to the precise facts of this case, and we go no further than to hold that when a gift is made in the apprehension of death from some disease from which the donor did not recover, and the apparent immediate cause of death was some other disease with which he was afflicted at the same time, the gift becomes effectual. Washington Law Reporter.

The New County Court Judge at Lambeth.—Judge Bristowe, Q.C., who has been transferred from Circuit No. 18 (Nottinghamshire) to succeed the late Judge Powell in the Lambeth and Greenwich district, on taking his seat for the first time at Woolwich on Wednesday, October 7, was congratulated on behalf of the members of the legal profession on his appointment. Reference having been made to the attempt (which was nearly successful) of a disappointed litigant recently to assassinate the learned judge on the platform of Nottingham station, by which he was laid up for a long time, his Honour said that he would not have left his late circuit but that, because of the permanent injury which his health had suffered in consequence, his medical advisers had urged him to seek a circuit where there would be less constant travelling than was incident to a County Court judge's duties on a large country circuit. Judge Bristowe was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1848, and joined the Midland Circuit. He was appointed a County Court judge in 1880.

BANKRUPTCY COSTS AND CHARGES.

We are obliged to our correspondents for the trustee's realisation account, which we print below, and which, as they say, shows what creditors get out of bankruptcy in some cases. Here, by a curious result, the exact sum realised was expended, to the last penny, in so doing. It may be a satisfaction to the creditors to see that the petitioning solicitor only had 4*l.* 4*s.*, and that 27*l.* went to the Board of Trade and those 'other law costs' which are always so mysterious. But then, no doubt, there was a good deal of official inquiry.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of the society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, October 13, Mr. Crawford in the chair. The subject for discussion, 'That the case of The Coupé Company v. Maddick, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. Div. 413, was wrongly decided,' was opened by Mr. Pattinson.—Mr. Parker opposed, Mr. Stringer followed in the affirmative and Mr. Thirlby in the negative. The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: in the affirmative—Messrs. Walton, Stevens, Watson, and Wilson; in the negative—Messrs. Alder, Herbert Smith, Watkins, Bower, and Simon. Mr. Stringer replied for Mr. Pattinson. The chairman, having summed up, put the motion to the meeting, when it was lost by a majority of two.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society on Tuesday, October 20, is: 'That it is inexpedient to extend Local Government to Ireland.'

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of this association on Monday, October 5—Mr. F. J. Hawkins in the chair—a debate was held on the following subject for discussion: 'A. lends a sum of money upon such a contract as is the subject of section 2 of the Partnership Act, 1890. B. dies without having repaid the loan, having by his will appointed A. his executor. A. proves the will, and the estate turns out to be insolvent, and is administered in bankruptcy. Can A. out of the assets of the deceased in his hands, as executor, exercise his common law right of retainer in respect of the loan?'—Mr. H. Glover opened in the affirmative, which was also supported by Messrs. Brown and Rutherford.—Mr. F. W. Archer opened in the negative, which was also supported by Mr. Barnes.—The question was decided in the negative by a majority of one.

THE HEREDITARY POSSESSIONS OF THE CROWN.—The commissioners in charge of the hereditary possessions of the Crown have issued their joint and separate reports for the year ending March 31, 1891. They refer to the report of the select committee of the House of Commons which last year recorded the opinion that the Crown estates have been, on the whole, carefully and successfully administered. The select committee made certain recommendations involving legislation, which it is hoped may be given effect to during the next session. Mr. Culley's report deals with the woods, forests, Crown and other allotments in England, the land revenue of the Crown in Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the islands, and with the fee farms and other unimprovable rents of the Crown in England and Wales; while Sir Nigel Kingscote has in charge the land revenues of the Crown in England. The total income receipt for woods, forests, and land revenues for the year was 515,737*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* and the total expenditure 87,121*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* This leaves nearly 430,000*l.* for the revenue, at which sum the Crown lands are reckoned in the revenue accounts.

NEW COUNTY COURT JUDGE.—Mr. Hugh Eardley Wilmot, of Lincoln's Inn, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor Judge of the County Court of Suffolk.

SIR HENRY HAWKINS.—Sir Henry Hawkins is very much improved in health, and will shortly return from the Continent. His lordship will, it is expected, resume his seat in Court during the early part of the ensuing Michaelmas sittings.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.—Mr. T. B. Diplock writes to the Times as follows: 'I am informed that it has been stated in the Times that Mr. Troutbeck, coroner for Westminster, gives no information to the reporters, and that all other coroners supply it. For the sake of the truth I shall be obliged if you will allow me to state that I give only the date, hour, and place of every inquest held by me, which list is free to the inspection of any reporter who calls any morning at my office. This has been my practice for nearly twenty-four years, and I have never heard any complaint of it nor any demand for detailed information.'

CHRYSANTHEMUM SHOW IN THE TEMPLE GARDENS.—The annual show of chrysanthemums in the Inner Temple Gardens will be open to the public, by permission of the Benchers, on Monday next, October 19. The exhibition this year will be held in two new and commodious greenhouses, situate at the bottom of King's Bench Walk, and Mr. John Newton, the head gardener, will have on view a collection of upwards of 700 plants. Of this number several of the Japanese varieties are quite new specimens. The plants generally are well advanced, and the present exhibition promises to be well up to the average, if not to excel those of previous years. The entrance for the public will be from the Thames Embankment.

DIVORCE IN FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES.—The Economiste Français publishes an interesting article comparing the recently compiled tables showing the number of divorces granted in France since the new law came into force, and in the United States and other countries during the same period. The French law of divorce came into force on August 1, 1884, and in the five months of that year 1,657 divorces were granted, the figures for the four following years being 4,227, 2,949, 3,636, and 4,708. The statistics which have been published in France do not come down later than 1888, and in that year, according to the writer in the Economiste Français, there were 23,472 divorces in the United States, this being nearly 4,000 more than were granted in France, England, Italy, Germany, Holland, Sweden, Norway, Austria, Roumania, and Canada put together. Comparing the divorces in France and the United States with those of other countries, the following figures are given: Germany, 6,161; Russia, 1,789; Austria, 1,718; Switzerland, 920; Denmark, 635; Italy, 556; Great Britain and Ireland, 506; Holland, 339; Belgium, 290; Sweden, 229; Australia, 100; Norway, 68; and Canada, 12.

Ladies in Court.—It is difficult for an Englishman to tell a story without spoiling it. So Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, quoted by Mr. Clark Bell, in the August Green Bag, contrives to spoil a time-honoured 'chestnut,' which he attributes to Baron Maule, when he says: 'In an unsavoury case warning had been given, and all the women retired save a few strong-minded ones, who kept ther places. "You may go on now," said the judge, "as all the ladies have withdrawn."' What the judge really said was: 'The decent women having withdrawn, Mr. Sheriff, you may turn the rest out.'—Albany Law Journal.

Opening of New Law Courts at Birmingham.—At the first quarter sessions held in the new Victoria Law Courts, Birmingham, on October 12, the mayor, attended by a number of city justices, was present, and spoke a few appropriate words to mark the occasion.—The recorder (Mr. Dugdale, Q.C., M.P.), in charging the grand jury, delivered an address reviewing the statistics of the Birmingham Quarter Sessions since their establishment in 1839. He said that with the close of these sessions he would have finished his fourteenth year of office, and he believed that all judicial positions were closed with a pension at the end of fifteen years.

Hampstead Vestry.—At the fortnightly meeting of the Hampstead Vestry on Thursday, October 8, the question of the appointment of a solicitor to that body was considered. Six candidates had been selected to attend, these being Mr. Percival Birkett (Horne & Birkett, 4 Lincoln's Inn Fields), Mr. E. K. Blyth (112 Gresham House, Old Broad Street), Mr. R. Fraser (Fraser & Christian, 4 Finsbury Circus), Mr. T. S. Preston (Robinson, Preston & Stow, 35 Lincoln's Inn Fields), Mr. F. S. Chaplin (Proudfoot & Chaplin, 24 John Street, Bedford Row), and Mr. A. J. Shepheard (Messrs. Shepheard, 31 and 32 Finsbury Circus). As a result of the voting Mr. Blyth and Mr. Shepheard were the last two left to decide between, and on the final show of hands being taken it was found that the former received thirty-eight votes and the latter twenty-six. Mr. Blyth was thereupon declared elected. Mr. King, jun., raised an objection and demanded a poll, but as he was not supported by five other members of the vestry his application fell through.

The Sanad of the New Ruler of Manipur.—The official Gazette of India, just received in this country, contains a notification that the Governor-General in Council has selected Chura Chand, son of Chowbi Yaima, and great-grandson of Rajah Nar Singh, of Manipur, to be Rajah of Manipur. The Sanad given to Chura Chand is also published. It is as follows: 'The Governor-General in Council has been pleased to select you, Chura Chand, son of Chowbi Yaima, to be chief of the Manipur State, and you are hereby granted the title of Rajah of Manipur, and a salute of eleven guns. The chiefship of the Manipur State and the title and salute will be hereditary in your family, and will descend in the direct line by primogeniture, provided that in each case the succession is approved by the Government of India. An annual tribute, the amount of which will be determined hereafter, will be paid by you and your successors to the British Government. Further, you are informed that the permanence of the grant conveyed by this Sanad will depend upon the ready fulfilment by you and your successors of all orders given by the British Government with regard to the administration of your territories, the control of the hill tribes dependent upon Manipur, the composition of the armed forces of the State, and any other matters in which the British Government may be pleased to intervene. Be assured that so long as your house is loyal to the Crown and faithful to the conditions of this Sanad you and your successors will enjoy the favour and protection of the British Government.'

Sir Charles Butt.—Sir Charles Butt, President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, who has been staying at Wiesbaden during the Long Vacation for the benefit of his health, is much better, and it is expected that he will be able to resume his duties at the beginning of the ensuing Michaelmas sittings.

The Westmoreland Licensing Justices.—The Westmoreland justices, who refused to renew a public-house license in the well-known case of Sharpe v. Wakefield, are again the respondents in a similar appeal set down for hearing at the Westmoreland Quarter Sessions to be held at Kendal on the 23rd inst. The house for which a license has been refused in this instance is the Coach and Horses, near Appleby, the ground of refusal being the same as in the case above mentioned—namely, that it was not necessary for the wants of the locality. This appeal raises the question whether or not the justices have exercised their function judicially.

Sanitary Inspection of Crown Property.—The question of the right of medical officers to inspect Crown property in case of an outbreak of infectious disease was brought up again at the meeting of the Hampton Local Board on October 15. The point arose owing to the occupier of apartments at Hampton Court Palace having disputed the right of the medical officer to inspect a place in which a case of diphtheria occurred. The clerk to the board, Mr. F. Addenbrooke Kent, said he had seen counsel on the matter and ascertained that the board's officer had no right whatever to enter the palace or any other Crown property. Even the barracks, the park-keepers' cottages, and such residences as that of the Comte de Paris in Bushey Park were exempt. The Crown had their own sanitary inspector, who inquired into every case of infectious disease which occurred.

BIRTHS.

On Oct. 10, at 16 Campden Hill Gardens, the wife of Charles Scott-Chad, Barrister-at-Law, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

On Aug. 31, at St. John's Cathedral, Hongkong, Francis Heaty, fourth son of the Right Hon. G. A. C. May, formerly Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, Assistant-Colonial Secretary and Private Secretary to the Governor, to Helena Augusta Victoria, eldest daughter of his Excellency Major-General G. Digby Barker, C.B., commanding the troops in China, and Acting-Governor of Hongkong.

On Oct. 6, at St. Columb Minor Church, by the Rev. N. N. Lewarne (brother of the bride), assisted by the Rev. J. Broad Bade, vicar, Edgar Hosking, of Liverpool, Solicitor, to Louise Lewarne, of St. Columb Minor, Newquay, Cornwall.

On Oct. 7, at St. Augustine's, Highbury, George Herbert Naunton, Solicitor, eldest son of George Ward Naunton, of Highbury New Park and Cheapside, to Matilda Maud, youngest daughter of Parker Todd, of Mildmay Grove, Highbury.

On Oct. 7, at the Church of St. Malachy, Belfast, Arthur, eldest son of Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., M.P., to Florence, daughter of James Cuming, Esq., M.D., Belfast.

On Oct. 8, at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Red Lion Square, Arthur Temple Westropp-Dawson, son of Captain Westropp-Dawson, late 19th Regiment, of Charlesfort, Ferns, county Wexford, to Agnes Mary Latham, daughter of William Latham, Esq., Q.C., of 16 Airlie Gardens, Campden Hill.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1891.

'OBITER DICTA.'

The profession will be glad to learn that Mr. Justice Hawkins has now recovered from his recent severe illness. Mr. Justice Butt has also, we are happy to be able to say, much improved in health. There would seem to be a fair prospect that the commencement of the legal year will find the whole bench of judges available for work.

In the Wig and Gown column of the Globe regret is expressed at the reopening of the Royal Courts being postponed from October 24 to October 26 'simply because October 24 falls on a Saturday,' and we are bound to say that we share this regret. This error, however, if error it be, is not likely to be repeated in the time of any one now living, as it will be very long before October 24 falls on a Saturday again. It is to be hoped, however, that the comments which have been caused by this change of day will lead to a thorough discussion of what is the proper period of the summer and autumn for the Long Vacation generally. For ourselves, as we have already said, we strongly incline to the opinion that the Long Vacation at present commences too late, and that August 1 would be the proper day for its commencement. It will be remembered that Sir George Trevelyan found a large number of members of the House of Commons ready to support his motion for the termination of the Parliamentary session earlier than has been generally the case, and exactly the same reasons which may be urged for an earlier prorogation of Parliament may be urged for an earlier closing of the Courts. We hope that this important matter will receive the attention of the judges, of the bar committee, and of the law societies generally.

The Manchester Guardian has recently published some statistics showing the large amount of judicial patronage which has fallen to the lot of the present Lord Chancellor. The figures given are not, however, quite accurate, the writer having apparently lost sight of the fact that from February to July, 1886, Lord Halsbury was out of office. The Lord Chancellor has, however, appointed three Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, two Lords Justices, two judges of the Chancery Division, six judges of the Queen's Bench Division, the President of the Probate Division, and a judge of that division. As regards the smaller judicial offices, Lord Halsbury has had the appointment of seventeen County Court judges, two masters in lunacy, two official referees, and two registrars in Bankruptcy. These figures are exclusive of the Indian judicial appointments made by the present Government, and certainly form a remarkable record of legal patronage.

It is to be hoped that the vexed question of what is a final as distinguished from an interlocutory order has now been set at rest by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Salaman v. Warner and others, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 624. In that case Lord Justice Fry, in giving judgment, said: 'I think that an order is final only where it is made upon an application or proceeding which must in any event, whether it succeeds or fails, determine the action; an order is interlocutory which is made on an application or proceeding of which it cannot be affirmed that in any event the whole action will be determined.' The Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Lopes expressed themselves in similar terms, and the Court accordingly held that an order dismissing an action upon the hearing before trial of a point of law raised by the pleadings was not a final order within the meaning of Order LVIII., rule 3. The Court have thus adopted the test suggested by Lord Esher some years since in The Standard Discount Company v. La Grange, 47 Law J. Rep. C. P. 3; L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 67, where it was held that an order empowering a plaintiff to sign final judgment under Order XIV., rule 1, was an interlocutory order, and that an appeal from such order to the Court of Appeal must therefore be brought within twenty-one days.

In the case of In re Smith's Settled Estates, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 613; L. R. (1891) 3 Chanc. 65, Mr

Justice Kekewich had no difficulty in holding that the costs of an attempted, but unsuccessful, sale by the tenant-for-life in the proper exercise of his power of sale under the Settled Land Act, 1882, were payable out of capital money arising under the Act. For this he relied on section 21, subsection x., and the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling in In re Llewellyn; Llewellyn v. Williams, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 316; L. R. 37 Chanc. Div. 317. As, however, the capital money in hand was insufficient for the payment, the further and more novel question arose whether these costs could be made a charge on the land. Section 46, subsection 6 (to which section 47 is supplemental), seems the only express enactment on this point. Section 46 is headed with the title, 'Court; Land Commissioners; Procedure,' and gives the Court power to make such order as it thinks fit as to the 'costs, charges, or expenses' of the parties to any application, and to order that 'all or any of those costs, charges, or expenses' be paid out of the settled property. Mr. Justice Kekewich thought that the words 'charges or expenses' pointed to something beyond the ordinary liability to costs which is incurred by an application to the Court, and covered the costs and expenses incurred out of Court by the tenant-for-life in the attempted sale. He accordingly made an order that such costs or expenses be paid out of the property, subject to the settlement, and raised by a charge on the settled land.

By the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 3, it is enacted that 'an appeal shall lie to the House of Lords from any order or judgment' of the Court of Appeal; and by the Rules of Court, 1883, Order LVIII., rule 15, in the case of an action no appeal from the High Court may, except by special leave of the Court of Appeal, be brought after the expiration of one year. In Payne v. Esdaile, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 644, the year had expired, and the Court of Appeal had refused to grant the special leave to the defendants, making no order on their application. From this refusal the defendants appealed to the House of Lords, which decided that no appeal lay, the refusal to grant special leave not being a 'judgment or order' within the Appellate Jurisdiction Act. The power given to the Court of Appeal was, said Lord Halsbury, 'obviously intended to prevent frivolous and unnecessary appeals,' and it has, as is well known, been exercised within very narrow limits in the way of granting special leave. At the same time the decision of the House of Lords, which recognises that power as final, is by no means adverse to bonâ fide appellants, where they can account for their delay to the satisfaction of the Court of Appeal, since, as Lord Halsbury points out, if the House of Lords could entertain an appeal from the refusal to grant special leave, it would follow that an appeal to the House would also lie by the person against whom special leave had been granted.

The municipal elections are now fast approaching, 'the ordinary day of election of councillors' being by section 52 of the Consolidating Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which re-enacts section 30 of the original Municipal Corporation Act, 1835, November 1. Perhaps the constituencies in the various boroughs may press their candidate with questions whether or not they will vote, when elected, for the adoption of the many 'adoptive' Acts which have been recently passed. In addition to the Public Libraries Acts and Baths and Washhouse Acts, which are now pretty generally known, during the last three years there have been produced no less than four Acts which do not come into force in a municipal borough unless they be adopted by the council thereof. In 1889 was passed the Infectious Diseases (Notification) Act, in 1890 the Infectious Diseases Prevention Act, and the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, and in 1891 the Museums and Gymnasiums Act, to enable urban authorities to 'provide and maintain museums for the reception of local antiquities or other objects of interest, and gymnasiums with all the apparatus ordinarily used therewith,' and to 'erect any buildings, and generally to do all things necessary for the provision and maintenance of such museums and gymnasiums.' Although by subsection 5 of section 10 of the Act, the rates which may be levied under this Act may not exceed ½*d.* in the pound for a museum, and ½*d.* for a gymnasium, it would be satisfactory, we should imagine, to candidates for corporate offices to know something of the opinion of their constituents on the desirability of adopting the Act before the municipal elections are actually held.

We have before us the London and North-Western Railway Company (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. ccxxi.), one of the set of special railway Acts passed, after careful consideration by a joint select committee of the two Houses, to carry out the comprehensive work first set on foot (after much protest from the railway magnates) by section 24 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888. It may safely be said that there has been no legislation of so important a character to railway companies for the last thirty years. The provisional orders which the Acts confirm will not come into force until August 1, 1892, 'or such later date as the Board of Trade may by order direct.' Until that time the railway companies and their customers will have to rub on as best they can with the existing classifications and rates, which have long been protested against by all who have inquired into the subject as not only immeasurably perplexing and complicated, but in some cases very deficient, as many articles of commerce do not find a place in Acts passed so many years ago. The new classifications are also very elaborate, but they are exhaustive, and the articles are in all cases arranged in alphabetical order. The schedules, which contain the maximum rates, are divided into six parts, and include the rates for animals as well as goods, but passenger fares are left quite untouched. The new Acts, when they come into force, will, of course, be subject in the same manner as the existing Acts to the all-important section 186 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, by virtue of which the charges of railway companies must not only be within the maximum authorised by each special Act, but must also be reasonable.

At what place in a statute ought the interpretation clause to come, at the beginning or the end? The Public Health Act, 1875, has its interpretation clause at the beginning, and so have the Companies, Lands, and Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts of 1845, and also the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, but the Local Government Act, 1888, the Lunacy Act, 1890, and the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and, we believe, the great majority of modern statutes, have their interpretation clauses at the end. We have little doubt that the beginning is the proper place. The words 'owner,' 'street,' and many others which will readily occur to our readers, have so special a meaning given to them by modern interpretation clauses that it seems to be of importance that the meaning should be brought to the attention of the practitioner at the very threshold of his consultation of any particular statute. Moreover, it would be very convenient if, following the precedent set in the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 341, interpretation clauses could be alphabetically arranged.

In Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 647; L. R. (1891) 3 Chanc. 1, some of the earlier cases upon 'forfeiture clauses' are considered and distinguished. A testator by his will gave to his trustees real and personal estate on trust to pay the rents and profits to his children as tenants in common during their respective lives, with benefit of survivorship. He then declared that if by any act or default or by operation of law any interests given by his will in trust for his children should be aliened, whereby the same should vest in any other person, then the trustees should apply the interest so aliened to and among the other persons entitled to the same by survivorship. One of the testator's children became a bankrupt between the date of the will and the testator's death. Within a year after the testator's death the bankrupt became entitled to property which when sold was sufficient to pay the debts and costs; but the bankruptcy was not annulled until more than two years after that date. Under these circumstances the question arose whether the life interest of the legatee in the rents and profits was forfeited by the bankruptcy. Mr. Justice Kekewich and the Court of Appeal have answered this question in the affirmative. The ratio decidendi is worth noting. In the first place, it has been laid down too long and too clearly to be disturbed except by a decision of the House of Lords that forfeiture clauses are to take effect in the case of bankruptcy commencing before the testator's death. Trappes v. Meredith, 41 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 237; L. R. (1871) 7 Chanc. 248, and Ancona v. Waddell, 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 115; L. R. (1878) 10 Chanc. 157, are conclusive on that point, and the reason assigned for the rule is that the Courts desire 'to prevent the property passing into hands other than those which the testator intended should receive it.' In Metcalfe v. Metcalfe the Court of Appeal intimate their strong disapproval of these authorities while bowing to them. In the second place, in determining whether a forfeiture clause takes effect, the crucial time in the case of a gift of income is the time when the right to have the first payment of income accrues. Now, in Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, not only was the bankrupt not annulled at the date, but the property of the bankrupt was not sufficient to secure its annulment. This case was, therefore, distinguished from White v. Chitty, 35 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 343; L. R. (1866) 1 Eq. 372, and Lloyd v. Lloyd, L. R. (1866) 2 Eq. 722, in which no right to have anything paid over but for the forfeiture clause had accrued to the trustee in bankruptcy.

So many vacancies in the House of Commons have been caused by death during the present recess that it is well to direct attention to the somewhat complicated procedure by which elections to fill recess vacancies are brought about. It is to be found in 24 Geo. III. c. 26, as amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 110 and 26 Vict. c. 20. By the first of these Acts the Speaker, on the death of any member during the recess, is bound to issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for electing a member to fill the vacancy 'as soon as he shall receive notice, by a certificate [which may be in the form scheduled to the Act], under the hands of two members of the House of Commons, of the death of such member;' but it is provided that the Speaker on receiving the certificate is to cause notice thereof to be inserted in the London Gazette, and 'shall not issue his warrant until fourteen days after the insertion of such notice in the Gazette.' By the second Act, after reciting that the first 'had been found advantageous to the public by causing speedy elections,' the machinery of the first Act is extended to cases of vacancy by acceptance of offices under the Crown other than the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds and similar offices without profit. By the third Act the fourteen days which were interposed between the receipt of the certificate and the issue of the warrant by the Speaker are cut down to six days. The first Act also makes provision for the absence of the Speaker from the realm during the recess, by empowering him to appoint before each recess a committee of seven members to act for him in such a case. The intention of the Legislature is, no doubt, to procure speedy elections, but without the setting on foot of the machinery by the two certifying members this object cannot be obtained. Perhaps it might be well expressly to throw the duty of certifying upon some public and paid officer.

TITLES UNDER VOLUNTARY SETTLEMENTS.

The attention of conveyancers must often have been directed in practice to the sweeping enactment contained in section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which avoids a bankrupt's voluntary settlements, the importance of which to vendors and purchasers is certainly not diminished by a recent decision of Mr. Justice Stirling on the subject. The section provides that 'any settlement of property'—with certain exceptions to which we need not refer—'shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustees of such settlement on the execution thereof.' It is true that a similar provision was contained in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, but it was limited to the case of traders alone, whereas section 47 of the existing Act is universal. It is true also that, under 13 Eliz. c. 5, a voluntary settlement of real estate, by whomsoever made, will be presumed to be made with intent to defeat creditors if that will be its probable effect, having regard to the amount of property included in it and the amount of the settlor's liabilities at the time (see Jenkyn v. Vaughan, 25 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 338; 3 Drew, 424; Thompson v. Webster, 28 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 700; 4 Drew, 632; 4 De G. & J. 600). But conveyancers have never felt much difficulty arising under this Act, and it has recently been expressly decided that section 5 of the Act protects the purchaser for value of a volunteer's interest under the settlement as well as a purchaser for value taking a direct interest under the settlement (Halifax Joint Stock Banking Company v. Gledhill, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 181). There is also a frequent objection to the title of a grantee under a voluntary settlement, by reason of 27 Eliz. c. 4, since the settlement may have been avoided by a subsequent sale for value by the settlor, but a purchaser's requisition on this head may be answered by satisfactory evidence on the vendor's part, and, if the requisition is so answered, the title may be forced upon the purchaser (per Mr. Justice Fry in In re Marsh and Granville, L. R. 24 Chanc. Div. at p. 19). The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for the first time makes universal an enactment which throws a new burthen on the purchaser and renders it almost impossible for a vendor under an open contract to make an enforceable title where a voluntary settlement forms a link in it during the period of ten years immediately preceding the sale. Such, at any rate, appears to be the effect of Mr. Justice Stirling's decision in In re Briggs and Spicer, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 514. In that case it was contended, in the first place, that the words 'parties claiming under the settlement' in section 47 refer to the beneficiaries only, and not to a purchaser for value. Mr. Justice Stirling, however, held that a purchaser 'derives and, consequently, claims title under the settlement,' and is within the terms of the section. On this construction the next question was whether—the first two years having elapsed, during which, of course, no title could be made—satisfactory evidence had been furnished of the testator's ability to pay his debts at the date of the settlement, in the absence of which it was liable to be avoided during the remaining eight years from its execution, and, according to the report of the case, some very full and precise evidence by the settlor's bankers and solicitors seems to have been tendered, but Mr. Justice Stirling held that he had no right to force such a title on the purchaser. The rule as to the evidence of facts on which a purchaser will be impelled to complete was stated as follows in Emery v. Grocock, 6 Mad. 54, by Sir John Leach: 'If the case be such that, sitting before a jury, it would be the duty of a judge to give a clear direction in favour of the fact, then it is to be considered as without reasonable doubt; but if it would be the duty of a judge to leave it to the jury to pronounce upon the effect of the evidence, then it is to be considered as too doubtful to conclude a purchaser.' The precise line which divides the two classes of cases here referred to may sometimes be a difficult one to draw, but Mr. Justice Stirling gives forcible, and, to our mind, convincing reasons for including the case in the second class. 'The fact,' he says, 'on which the title depends cannot be proved merely by documentary evidence. When the attack comes the purchaser must produce witnesses, who will establish, primâ facie at all events, the ability of the settlor, at the time of making the settlement, to pay his debts. Those witnesses, however, are not under the purchaser's control; when they are wanted they may not be to be found, or they might be out of the jurisdiction, or possibly dead. Even if the purchaser should succeed in producing them, it is impossible to anticipate by what rebutting evidence the testimony may be met, or what may be the effect of cross-examination; and the result may be that, even when a primâ facie case is made out in the first instance, the balance of evidence on the whole may be so even that the purchaser may be held to have failed to discharge the onus of proof which lies on him.' It would appear, therefore, that the vendor's difficulty in making an enforceable title under these circumstances is removable only by the lapse of the critical ten years from the execution of the settlement; or, secondly, by the earlier death of the settlor, since it is clear that the provisions of section 47 are not to be applied in the event of his death and the administration of his estate under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act (In re Gould, 56 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 333; L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 92); or, lastly, by a special condition of sale. We are not, of course, considering the case of a willing purchaser, who in practice often takes the evidence in the vendor's possession, and who, as pointed out in In re Briggs and Spicer, can generally obtain a good title by virtue of 27 Eliz. c. 4, by taking his conveyance from the settlor and paying the purchase-money by his direction to the trustees; but a purchaser cannot, according to the well-settled rule, be forced to accept a title made in this way.

ENGLISH CAUSES CÉLÈBRES.—X.

Regina v. Lamson.*

The name of Lamson is associated with aconitia as closely as that of Palmer is associated with strychnine. Two scoundrels before the bankrupt Bournemouth doctor had made use of this deadly poison for criminal purposes. Dr. Pritchard in 1865 had administered it to his mother-in-law, Mrs. Taylor, in the form of tincture of aconite, and, as far back as 1841, an Irishman, M'Conkey, had used it as powdered aconite root. But the agent on which Dr. Pritchard principally relied, and which has gained him an infamous notoriety, was tartar emetic, and M'Conkey was, fortunately, hanged without having become notorious at all. It was left for Dr. Lamson to introduce this new alkaloid to the medico-legal world.

In the month of December, 1881, Mr. Bedbrook, the head-master of Blenheim House, Wimbledon, had among his pupils a boy called Percy Malcolm John, who suffered from paralysis of the lower limbs produced by curvature of the spine, but enjoyed fair general health. One of this lad's sisters was married to Dr. George Henry Lamson, a surgeon at Bournemouth, who took a great interest in him and was in the habit of sending him medicines. On December 1, 1881, Lamson wrote to Percy John that he was coming to see him on the following evening. He failed, however, to keep this appointment, but arrived at Blenheim House on the 3rd, with some sweets, a cake, and a box containing gelatine capsules which he told Mr. Bedbrook he had brought from America for the convenience of persons that had to take nauseous medicines. He induced Mr. Bedbrook to take one of these capsules in order that he might see how easily they were swallowed. While this experiment was being made, Lamson filled another with some powdered sugar, for which he had sent on the pretext of destroying the alcohol in his wine, and turning to Percy John, who was present at the interview, said, 'You are good at taking medicines, take this.' The boy did so, and in a few minutes Lamson left, saying that he had to catch the tidal train to Paris. In about twenty minutes afterwards, the cripple lad was seized with a sudden pain which he attributed to heartburn. He was carried upstairs to bed, became gradually worse, and died in a few hours. The medical men who attended him, Dr. Berry and Dr. Little, were convinced that the symptoms were attributable to the action of some irritant poison. The post-mortem appearances confirmed this view, and the chemical analysis indirectly revealed the presence of aconitia.

On December 8, Lamson unexpectedly returned from Paris, presented himself at Scotland Yard to inquire, as he said, into what was being done about the alleged murder of his brother-in-law, and was promptly taken into custody. He was duly tried at the Central Criminal Court in March, 1882, before Mr. Justice Hawkins and a jury. Sir Farrer Herschell (then Solicitor-General), Mr. Poland, and Mr. (now Mr. Justice) A. L. Smith conducted the prosecution. Mr. Montagu Williams was leading counsel for the defence. After a careful trial Dr. Lamson was found guilty, was sentenced to death, and, after two reprieves, granted by the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) in order to enable his friends in America to produce evidence of his insanity, was very properly hanged.

The evidence against Lamson was overwhelming. 1. Motive was clearly proved. He was, and had been for two years, in grave pecuniary difficulties, and, under the wills of Percy John's parents and the marriage settlement of his own wife, he had an interest in the death of his brother-in-law. 2. Again, he was proved not only to have been in possession of aconite at the time of Percy John's death, but to have purchased it so recently as November 24, 1881. 3. Aconite was shown with a fair degree of conclusiveness to have been the cause of death—(a) Suicide was out of the question. The murdered boy was in excellent spirits both before and immediately after * the administration of the fatal dose. (b) Accident—a more plausible theory—was disproved. There was some suggestion that Percy John posed in the school as 'the swell pill taker,' and that he might have been experimenting with some of the drugs in the chemistry lecture rooms. But unfortunately aconitia was not among the number of these drugs. (c) The hypothesis of death by disease was also disposed of. The deceased enjoyed good health, and there were no morbid appearances to account for his death. (d) The positive evidence of death by aconitia was strong. The symptoms spoke of aconite, the appearances indicated the presence of some irritant poison, and the chemical analysis all but identified it. Dr. Stevenson experimented with an extract from Percy John's stomach on several mice, and they died with all the symptoms and post-mortem results of poisoning by aconite. Similar evidence contributed to the conviction of Dove in 1855. 4. Lamson had assiduously surrounded himself with the murderer's tangled web of deceit. He told a friend that he had been at Blenheim House on the evening of December 2, and had seen his brother-in-law, who was very ill and would not live long. This statement, in so far as it consisted of assertion, was wholly false, and in so far as it consisted of prophecy was highly suspicious. Again, he informed the same friend that Mr. Bedbrook, who was the director of one of the continental lines, had advised him not to go to Paris on the night of the 2nd, as there was a bad boat on the service. Mr. Bedbrook had not seen Lamson on the 2nd, and had not, therefore, said anything of the kind. Nearly all the chief murderers of modern times—Palmer, Pritchard, Wainwright, Chantrelle, and a score of others—clinched their fate by similar falsehoods. 'Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat.'

The so-called 'evidence' of Lamson's insanity was both obnoxious to the criticism which ex post facto testimony of this description naturally arouses and contemptible in itself.

* On returning to the dining-room, after seeing Lamson depart, Mr. Bedbrook found him reading the papers.

STEVENS ON BANKRUPTCY.

Bankruptcy. By T. M. Stevens, M.A., B.C.L., Barrister-at-Law, Author of 'The Elements of Mercantile Law.' London: Gee & Co. 1891.

The present work proceeds upon a somewhat novel plan. The original idea, the author tells us, was to embrace the Bankruptcy Act of 1890 with the Rules and Forms of that year, and these alone. It was then suggested that it would be advantageous to combine a reprint of the sections of the Act of 1883, to which constant reference was required. Another change from the initial plan was made by dropping to a considerable extent the Rules and Forms. The consequence is that now we have a treatise designed to give the reader information on the elementary points of the law of bankruptcy as distinguished from its procedure. The work is, perhaps, too compendious, but we have no doubt it will be found useful. At p. 19 we find that section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is omitted as being repealed. This is no doubt true, but as discharges in cases where adjudication has taken under the old law will be subject to the provisions of this section, it would have been much better had it still been allowed a place. An interesting little sketch of the history of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is given in the introduction.

MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.
RECONVEYANCES.

Sir,—Who is the right person to determine how a mortgage shall be reconveyed, whether by independent deed or by indorsement? Mortgagor wants indorsement, alleging the possibility of loss of reconveyance if separated from original instrument. Mortgagee insists on independent deed, because of the possibility of loss of the original instrument if posted between the various mortgagees for the purpose of execution, and also the possibility that the transaction might not go through, and a reconveyance indorsed on the mortgage would look suspicious. The mortgagor replies that if the transaction failed, the detention by the mortgagee of the mortgage would be ample guard against any inconvenience likely to be caused by the indorsement.

Some solicitors consulted were of opinion that the mortgagor has the right to elect, and not the mortgagee. What is your opinion? H. H. G.

Westminster, S.W.: Oct. 19.

[We think the mortgagor is entitled, wherever circumstances will permit, to have the reconveyance indorsed upon the mortgage, not merely for the sake of brevity, but because the mortgage-deed, whenever produced, will then bear upon it the evidence of the reconveyance, whereas if the reconveyance be made by separate deed it may be lost, and the mortgagor would then have difficulty in proving that the debt had ever been paid. The mortgagor is entitled to call for a reconveyance, the cost of which he must bear, and he surely has the right to elect in what form it shall be made.—Ed. L. J.]

Unreported Cases.

COUNTY COURTS.

POLICE RESPONSIBILITY FOR ARRESTS.

A case of public interest occupied His Honour Judge Shand in the Liverpool County Court on October 19, when Mrs. Catherine Whittle sued Detective Jackson, of the Liverpool police force, for damages for false imprisonment. —Mr. Segar, who appeared for the plaintiff, said that on April 7 his client went with her sister to Bunney's shop, in Church Street. She returned by way of Richmond Row, and, after leaving her sister, she was proceeding homewards when she was stopped by Jackson, who asked her if she had been to Bunney's, and, upon her replying in the affirmative, he asked her to show him the contents of her basket and pockets, and she was compelled to allow him to search her. A crowd gathered round her and she felt keenly the indignity of her position. In fact, it gave her such a shock that her health, which was poor at the time, suffered considerably, and eventually a miscarriage was brought on.—Mr. Neale, for the defendant, said that he was prepared to acknowledge that there was no imputation against the plaintiff, the action of the defendant being the result of wrong information.—Mr. Segar said that if defendant would apologise and pay the costs the matter would end.—Mr. Neale said he was not in a position to pay the costs. It was a question of law whether the defendant, being a constable, was justified in the action which he had taken.—The jury found for the plaintiff, damages 20*l*., and costs were allowed.

AN OMNIBUS CONDUCTOR'S LICENSE.

A curious action was heard in the Marylebone County Court on October 21, when an omnibus conductor named Macdonald sued the London General Omnibus Company for damages for making an illegal indorsement on his license. At the time of the recent omnibus strike the defendants advertised widely for relief men, and the plaintiff and about 300 others applied at one of the yards. They were told they would all be engaged, and would be given jobs in the order of their application. Their licenses were required from them, and the plaintiff gave his up to the manager, but after waiting ten days, and no work being given to him, he applied for his license back again. When he received it it had an indorsement to the effect that he had been ten days in the service of the company. He maintained that he was never in the service of the company, and he received no wages; but the defendants refused to alter the indorsement. The result was that he had since been unable to obtain employment, because an omnibus proprietor did not care to take on a man who had been in the service of a rival. This, it was stated on behalf of the plaintiff, was a general custom. The defendants denied any liability. They said they considered that the man had been in their employ, and consequently indorsed the license, as they were compelled to do by the Act of Parliament.—Judge Stonor said there could be no question that the defendants had acted illegally in indorsing the license, because the man clearly never was in their employ. It would, however, be very difficult for the plaintiff to prove recoverable damage, and he suggested that the plaintiff should obtain another license.—Mr. Baker said this could not be done, and the plaintiff could not get away from the effects of the indorsement.—The judge said he would give the plaintiff nominal damages (40*s*.), and would make certain representations with a view to get a new license for the man.—Mr. Baker for the plaintiff; Mr. Washington for the defendants.

POLICE.

MARGARINE.

The Danish Government brought an important case before the Hull stipendiary, on October 21, against a vendor of margarine, named Backwell, who had affixed a false trade description to a quantity of margarine he had sold. He had labelled it 'Danish,' well knowing it to be Dutch margarine. Mr. Faber, of Kent, the recently appointed agricultural commissioner of the Danish Government, resident in England, said it was his duty to protect the interests of Danish agriculturists, and to see that adulterated margarine was not sold as Danish butter. His Government had instructed him to that effect. Denmark did not export margarine on account of the colour. The law of Denmark was that margarine should be nearly white, in order to distinguish it from butter. It was unsalable in this country because of that fact. Defendant had during the last four months used the word 'Danish.' His Government did not press for the full punishment, which was four months' imprisonment, without the option of a fine, for the first offence. They would be satisfied with a nominal penalty. Defendant was fined 20*s*. and costs, with an instruction to strike 'Danish' from his labels.

WHAT ARE LAW REPORTS?

As the minds of a good many barristers, and not a few judges, do not appear to be quite clear as to what constitutes a law report, it might not be out of place to consider what are entitled to be called such, and to be cited as such before a Court of law. As a matter of fact even in England there exists no set of reports which is entitled to be called 'official.' The nearest to it is a series of reports issued by the Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales, but this cannot be called official in the true meaning of the term. A compromise is sometimes effected by calling them the 'authorised' reports, though it is not easy to see why they should be so called any more than 'official.' Wharton, in his 'Law Lexicon,' states that prior to 1865 law reports were all published as mere private speculations, and the best series of these, and that which retains a prestige far above all others, whether 'authorised' or 'official' or anything else, is yet known as the Law Journal Reports, dating away back to 1823. The 'Weekly Reporter' was first published in 1852, 'as a portion of, and in conjunction with, the Legal Examiner.'

The fine reports published as 'The Jurist' by the legal journal of that name cover the period between the years 1837-66. The Law Times began its series in 1843. The 'Irish Law Times Reports' are now in their twenty-fifth volume.

It will thus be seen that the best reports, and those of any antiquity yet in existence, are those published in connection with the various legal journals. Whenever these or any others are published by a barrister they are entitled to be received and cited as the findings of the Court by which the decision is given. In the words of Lord Westbury, 'As soon as a report of any case is published with the name of a barrister attached to it, the report is accredited, and may be cited as an authority before any tribunal,' and that learned Lord Chancellor effectually administered a rebuke to a bumptious judge who refused to act on the authority of a case cited from 'The Jurist' when he said, referring to this class of reports, 'It is of such materials that the law of England is made up, and I would be denying myself much valuable assistance in ascertaining what the law is, if I were to refuse to receive the citation of cases reported by barristers in these useful publications.'—Western Law Times (Canada).

OBITUARY.

THE death took place on Thursday, October 15, of Mr. GILBERT ARTHUR À BECKETT, eldest son of the late Gilbert Abbott à Beckett, who was well known early in the century as a metropolitan police-magistrate and for his contributions to literature. He was born in London in 1837, and was educated at Westminster School, where he took the prize for English verse at an exceptionally early age. Having gained a studentship to Christ Church he proceeded to Oxford in the same term with Dr. Liddell, his old head-master, who had been appointed dean of the college. Mr. à Beckett took his degree in 1857, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn, but never took any steps to be called to the bar. Shortly after leaving the university he accepted a clerkship in the Treasury, which he held for some years, until his literary work claimed his undivided attention. Mr. à Beckett was the author of a number of pieces written for nearly every prominent London theatre. His latest works were the librettos constructed from his own original scenarios for 'The Canterbury Pilgrims' and 'Savanarola' (Dr. Villiers Stanford's operas), and many graceful lyrics now being sung at the Lyric Theatre and elsewhere. He was joint author with Mr. Herman Merivale of one of the most poetical dramas of modern days, 'The White Pilgrim.' For the last twelve years he has been one of the principal contributors to Punch; and his portrait appeared in Mr. Sambourne's admirable picture, 'Round the Mahogany Table,' in the jubilee number of that periodical published in July last. He was an accomplished musician (many graceful ballads having been composed by him under a nom de plume) as well as an amateur artist. For many years he had been in most delicate health, but he had borne the infliction with cheerfulness.

MR. GEORGE MERCER, solicitor, of Deal, committed suicide on the 15th inst. by shooting himself while lying in bed. Mr. Mercer was admitted in Hilary, 1840. He was a notary public, a perpetual commissioner, a commissioner for oaths, coroner, clerk to the borough justices, clerk to the justices for the division of Deal, clerk to the justices of the Cinque Ports, registrar to the Commissioners of Salvage, clerk to the Walmer Local Board, and town clerk. Mr. Mercer, who was seventy-three years of age, was one of the oldest and best known solicitors in Kent. He held the office of town clerk of Deal for fifty-one years. For some time he had been reduced to a state of melancholia through anxiety about his business, and his condition was the cause of great concern to his friends and relations; but although he was closely watched he committed suicide as above stated, two bullet wounds being found, one through the region of the heart and one through the forehead. The revolver, which was found by his side, was a new one. A verdict of suicide while temporarily insane was returned.

MR. RICHARD MONTAGU PRESTON, solicitor, of Chester and Liverpool, died on the 1st inst. from a rupture of a blood vessel on the brain. Mr. Preston was admitted in Easter, 1854. He was district registrar of the High Court and registrar of the Chester County Court. He was solicitor to the London and North-Western Railway Company for the Chester and Holyhead line.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending October 17 was eighty-five. The number in the corresponding week of last year was seventy-six, showing an increase of nine, being a net increase in 1891 to date of fifty-eight.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Michaelmas Sittings, 1891.

CAUSES FOR TRIAL OR HEARING.

(Set down to Thursday, October 15, inclusive.)

Motions, Petitions, and Short Causes will be taken on the usual days, as stated in the Michaelmas Sittings Paper.

Mr. Justice CHITTY will take Witness Actions on the following days—viz. November 10, 11, 12, 17, 18, 19, 24, 25, 26. In the weeks when Non-Witness Actions are taken Further Considerations will be taken on Tuesdays. In the weeks when Witness Actions are taken, Further Considerations will not be taken on Tuesdays, but may be taken on Saturdays.

Mr. Justice NORTH will commence taking Witness Actions on days to be appointed by His Lordship after the commencement of the Sittings.

Mr. Justice STIRLING will commence taking Witness Actions on days to be appointed by His Lordship after the commencement of the Sittings.

Mr. Justice KEKEWICH will commence taking Witness Actions on days to be appointed by His Lordship after the commencement of the Sittings. His Lordship will take Liverpool and Manchester Business as follows: Motions on days appointed for Motions, Short Causes, Petitions and Adjourned Summonses on Saturdays. Summonses in Chambers on Friday afternoons. Liverpool and Manchester Summonses will be taken on alternate Fridays, commencing with Manchester Summonses on Friday, October 30.

Mr. Justice ROMER will take Witness Actions every day in the order as they stand in the Cause Book. A recent Transfer of Causes, dated August 22, has been made to Mr. Justice Romer, a List of which will be found added to His Lordship's List in order of date of setting down for Trial.

Summonses before the Judge in Chambers: Justices CHITTY, NORTH, STIRLING and KEKEWICH will sit in Court the whole day on every Monday during the Sittings to hear Chamber Summonses.

Summonses Adjourned into Court will be taken as follows: Mr Justice CHITTY, with Non-Witness Actions, except Procedure Summonses, which (if any) are taken every Saturday; Mr. Justice STIRLING, with Non-Witness Actions. Justices NORTH and KEKEWICH on Fridays and Saturdays.

N.B.—The above note as to Chamber and Adjourned Summonses is subject to alteration as their Lordships may direct.

MEMORANDUM.—No complete List of Actions to be tried in this Division during Michaelmas Sittings can be given in advance, as the number and order in which they will be tried are necessarily dependent on the presence in this Country of Seafaring Witnesses whose movements are unavoidably uncertain. The List will therefore be subject to alterations and additions.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of the society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, October 20, Mr. Pattinson in the chair. The subject for discussion was: 'That it is inexpedient to extend local government to Ireland.'—The debate was opened by Mr. Crawford, who gave a careful résumé of the most cogent arguments in support of the motion.—His views were vigorously combated by Mr. Cornelius Wheeler, a well-known advocate of home rule.—Mr. Douglas followed with some interesting details, drawn from personal experience, of the present system of local government in Ireland, and a most instructive debate ensued, which was spiritedly maintained until a late hour by the numerous members present.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society on Tuesday, October 27, is: 'That the case of Stuart v. Bell, L. R. (1891), 2 Q. B. Div. 341, was wrongly decided.'

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of this association on Monday, the 19th inst., Mr. W. W. Rutherford in the chair, a debate was held on the following subject for discussion: 'A. entered into an unsecured composition with his creditors, which provided that, if default should be made in payment of any instalment, the deed should become void and of no effect. The instalments to be paid some in cash, some in notes. All the cash instalments being paid, A. gave promissory notes payable at given dates, and B. joined in them as surety. When the notes were handed to the creditors, A. took a receipt in the following form: "Received from A. two joint and several promissory notes of A. and B. for 5*l.* and 10*l.* each, which I accept in full satisfaction and discharge of my debt of 30*l.* owing to me by A." The first note was duly paid, the second was dishonoured. Does the original debt revive?'—Mr. F. Gittins, jun., opened in the affirmative, which was also supported by Messrs. F. H. Wilson, A. Forshaw, and E. C. Byrne.—Mr. W. H. T. Brown opened in the negative, which was also supported by Messrs. F. R. Martin and F. J. Priest.—The question was decided in the affirmative by a majority of two.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES AND INCOME-TAX.

In a recent number we commented on Lord Herschell's Mortmain Bill. Questions of charitable trusts are always coming before the Courts, and in the case mentioned above, of The Income-Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel, the House of Lords has decided in favour of the immunity of the 'Unitas Fratrum,' a Moravian Society, from income-tax in respect of lands held in virtue of deeds of settlement executed in 1813 and 1815. The question was whether a religious society, for the propagation of its own peculiar trusts, was a charity within the exemption clause which has always been continued in successive Income-Tax Acts. For the purpose of the Act of the 43rd Elizabeth, relating to the administration of what are called 'charities,' a very wide interpretation has naturally been adopted. Instances of the extreme liberality of the Court of Chancery in this respect will be found in their lordships' judgments. But the same canons of construction were, of course, not binding for the purpose of the revenue. But still their lordships have extended the immunity to the respondents in this case. Lord Bramwell, however, in a most characteristic and humorous judgment dissented from the majority. He doubted whether the work of conversion to any religion was a charity. What, he asked, of a society for the conversion of the Jews? Would that be a charity? If so, what of a trust for their reconversion? There was said to be a trust in one of the Inns of Court (Lincoln's Inn, we believe) for the supply of oysters for the benchers. We are informed that the oysters are supplied to the barristers and students as well as the benchers, and it is not improbable that the Court would hold this to be charity.

Many persons will be disposed to agree with Lord Bramwell. The admission of religious bodies into the category of charities would, if logically carried out, involve the Courts in interminable religious controversies. It is nearly always in such cases the object to convert from one religion to another. The judges would then have to decide which of the competitors represented the purer and truer faith. How delightful a contest would be between the brilliant Catholic, Sir Charles Russell, and that doughty Scotchman, Mr. Finlay, Q.C., as to the respective merits of the decrees of the Council of Trent and of the Westminster Confession or the Shorter Catechism!

The truth is that the exemption ought to be abolished. It is well put in the Law Journal that this exemption is a form of concurrent endowment of the least defensible character. The Times expresses the same view in a more tentative fashion. Why should the country at large be called upon to contribute to every fantastic so-called charity which a weak-minded old maid may be moved to endow? In an interesting letter to the Times, Mr. Crackanthorpe, Q.C., reminds us that in 1863 Mr. Gladstone suggested the desirability of removing this privilege and was met with irresistible opposition. Deputations pointed out that the proposed reform would deprive forty boys of education in Christ's Hospital and turn adrift seventy widows dependent on the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy. The consequence was that not a single member rose to support the motion subsequently introduced and advocated in a brilliant speech of two-and-a-half hours long by the even then 'Old Parliamentary Hand.' Mr. Crackanthorpe's letter, however, is mainly devoted to the more modest question whether the State should defray the heavy charges of the Charity Commission, now amounting to 40,000*l.* a year. He points out that it was not so intended by those who established the Charity Board, and bills introduced by Lord Lyndhurst on behalf of Sir R. Peel's Government in 1844-45-46 all contained clauses for taxing charity incomes to an extent sufficient to cover the cost of administration. Similar provisions continued in subsequent bills and resolutions embodying the same principle have from time to time been brought forward. Mr. Crackanthorpe concludes with the observation that the best chance of escape for charities from direct taxation 'lies in their giving a cheerful welcome to the milder legislative proposal that they should be required to pay out of their settled property the whole of the working expenses of the busy department at Whitehall which is at once their master and their servant.'—Indian Jurist.

Successful Licensing Appeal.—At Gloucestershire Quarter Sessions, held at Gloucester on October 21, the landlord of the Ship Inn, Maisemore, near the county town, appealed against the decision of the local justices in refusing him a renewal of his license because he had been convicted of selling adulterated rum, and also on the ground that the house was not required, there being two licensed houses in the village, though it contained only 450 inhabitants. After a long hearing the Court granted the appeal and condemned the respondents in costs. This was the only appeal case, though nineteen licenses were refused or lapsed at the recent brewster sessions.

United Law Society.—The annual meeting was held on Monday at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall; Mr. J. R. Yates in the chair. The following are the officers elected for the ensuing session: Chairman, Mr. A. K. Common; vice-chairman, Mr. C. W. Williams; secretary, Mr. J. R. Atkin, 3 Pump Court; treasurer, Mr. F. B. Moyle; editor, Mr. J. L. V. Seymour Williams; secretary for societies in union, Mr. C. P. C. Kains Jackson; reporter, Mr. B. Hawkins; auditors, Mr. F. A. Wood and Mr. D'Arcy B. Collyer; non-ex-officio members of the committee, Messrs. C. Herbert Smith, W. S. Sherrington, R. C. Nesbitt, and L. W. Browne.—The next meeting is on Monday, the 26th, the subject for debate being 'That women ought to enjoy the fullest electoral franchise.'

The Recorder of Newcastle. — Mr. W. Digby Seymour, Q.C., charging the grand jury on October 16 at the Newcastle-on-Tyne Quarter Sessions, complained that he had been neglected in certain municipal ceremonies, chiefly the reception of the Prince of Naples, and the conferring of the freedom of the city on Mr. Gladstone. The recorder was a proper person to invite on such occasions, and would have been delighted to be present, but was conspicuous by his absence. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, provided that the recorder should hold rank next to the mayor, and it was becoming that he should be by the side of the mayor on such occasions. The mayor had evidently neglected the spirit of the Act. The recorder's complaint has arisen from a long-standing dispute as to whether he or the town clerk should have precedence in municipal functions.

The Lord Justice-General.—On October 16 in the first division of the Court of Session, Edinburgh, the ceremony of installing the Right Hon. J. P. B. Robertson as Lord Justice-General of Scotland and Lord President of the Court of Session took place in presence of a crowded assemblage. The Lord Justice Clerk presided, and there was a full attendance of the judges. Mr. Robertson presented his commission to the Lord Justice Clerk. The commission was recorded. Mr. Robertson, as Lord Probationer, then heard a case at Lord Wellwood's bar and afterwards reported it to the judges in the First Division. The trials of the Lord Probationer having been sustained, the oaths of office were administered to him. He was then invited to the bench by the Lord Justice Clerk, and he took the chair under the style and title of Lord Robertson.

UNQUALIFIED MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS IN BAVARIA.—It appears from statistics just published that in the year 1890 no fewer than 1,170 persons were prosecuted for the illegal practice of medicine in Bavaria. Of this number, 861 were men and 309 women. Large as the total number of prosecutions was, it was somewhat smaller than in 1889, when the number was 1,219. Of those proceeded against in 1890, 486—including thirty chemists and druggists and thirty-seven midwives—were more or less connected with the medical profession. The remaining 684 were persons who had had no medical training, and belonged for the most part to the class of working men. The number of clergymen prosecuted for the illegal practice of medicine was twenty-one. The number of chemists who overstepped the limits of their province was very small compared with what it is in England. The special lines of practice followed by the unqualified persons in Bavaria included 'Secret remedies and sympathy,' which had 117 adherents; homœopathy, seventy-one; magnetism, twelve; and electro-homœopathy, nine. Tapeworm curing was pursued by thirteen enthusiasts.

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

MR. HENRY RIDGE GREENHILL, solicitor (of the firm of Sweetland & Greenhill), who was admitted in 1886, has been appointed by the Lord Mayor (as Alderman of the Ward) Ward Clerk of Langbourn Ward, in the City of London.

Mr. James Rawlinson, of 11 Kingsdown Road, Upper Holloway, London, N., has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking Acknowledgments of Deeds by Married Women. Mr. Rawlinson was admitted in 1872.

Mr. H. P. Mann, of Chatham, has been appointed Town Clerk of Chatham, and Clerk to the Chatham Burial Board. Mr. Mann is also clerk to the Rochester and Chatham Joint Hospital Board, and a commissioner for oaths. He was admitted in Easter Term, 1858.

LAW SITTINGS AT THE GUILDHALL.—The trial of causes set down to be tried by the City of London jurors, which, since the opening of the Royal Courts of Justice, have been tried in that building with other general cases, will, at the ensuing Michaelmas sittings, be heard, as formerly, at the Guildhall, wherein two convenient Courts have been provided for the purpose by the Corporation of London. The number of causes entered up to the present consists of eighty-six special and forty-eight common jury cases, and the hearing of the former will be commenced on Wednesday, the 28th inst. Two Courts will sit on that and the following days, one of which will be presided over by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge. The hearing of these cases will be proceeded with for about a fortnight, after which common juries will be taken.

CYCLISTS AND ROAD RACING.—A case of considerable interest to cyclists and local authorities came before the Northumberland county magistrates at Newcastle on Saturday, October 17, when twelve young men were charged with furiously riding bicycles on the highway. Mr. Parsons prosecuted, and Mr. T. J. Forster defended. At an early hour on the morning of the 2nd inst. a road-race took place from North Shields to Morpeth and back. At Gosforth, about half-way on the outward journey, the police took the names of the competitors, the time being half-past six. It was stated by the police that the defendants were riding at the rate of seventeen or eighteen miles an hour; but Mr. Forster said this could not have been the case owing to the hill and the heavy road. Mr. Forster raised the point that to constitute an offence it was necessary to prove that the road-racing was dangerous to the life or limbs of pedestrians, and he contended that no such danger arose, as only the police and the cyclists were present at the time referred to. The police produced a handbill issued at the instance of the joint committee of the county, which defined bicycle or tricycle racing as an offence under the Local Government Act, 1888. The bench intimated that they were against Mr. Forster, who thereupon obtained an adjournment to enable him to take the opinion of a higher Court.

THE RULES OF ADVOCACY.—During the Vacation the LAW JOURNAL has been printing some interesting résumés of English causes célèbres. Ryves v. The Attorney-General was given recently, the concluding paragraph being of peculiar interest: 'Mr. Smith, in replying for the petitioner, said that he believed, on his word of honour as a gentleman, that the documents which Mrs. Ryves had produced——' But the Lord Chief Justice interrupted him in a moment. 'I insist,' he said, 'on your not finishing that sentence. It is a violation of a fundamental rule of conduct, which every advocate ought to observe, to give the jury your personal opinion.' We fancy that a frequenter of our law courts would say that this is a rule more honoured in the breach than in the observance. We could name at least one very eminent advocate who is not altogether innocent of trying to influence a jury by expressing his own opinion.—Law Gazette.

LITIGATION AND INSOLVENCY.—From the observations of the official receiver, issued under the failure of George Willis, described of Askew Crescent, Shepherd's Bush, of no occupation, it appears that the debtor has been engaged for many years in litigation connected with a claim, which he sets up as heir-at-law, to an estate valued, he says, in 1880 at several millions sterling, left by one William Jennens, who died in 1798. He attributes his insolvency to his liability for costs incurred on a judgment given against him in an action recently brought by him against the petitioning creditor in respect of an injury stated to have been sustained by the debtor while attempting to take possession of certain premises in assertion of his claim on the estate. He asserts that he is of no occupation, and is entirely supported by voluntary allowances from friends. Of the unsecured indebtedness (which amounts to 231*l.*), 165*l.* appears to be due in connection with the costs of the action referred to, and there are no available assets. The debtor states that his furniture was sold about two or three years ago, and that he is now living in apartments.

THE JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION OF HYDERABAD.—A recently issued Government resolution, signed by the Nizam's Home Secretary, the Nawab Mehdi Hassan, gives a detailed account of the judicial administration in Hyderabad for the year 1890–91. It begins by stating that 'until the recently appointed Law Commission completes its labours, and proper codes of law and procedure are supplied, the administrative work will necessarily demand particular attention;' and it goes on to affirm that it has received such attention at the hands of the Chief Justice Nawab Emad Jung Bahadur. The want of qualified pleaders has been much felt in the Hyderabad Courts, and the standard of examination for legal practitioner has been accordingly raised, while the old order under which persons who had already practised in any Court without license were exempted from the examination prescribed has been cancelled. One of the greatest difficulties in the infliction of punishment has been the indifference shown to the imposition of fines. The returns for the year in question show that more than half the fines imposed remain to be realised. It is not surprising after this to find that a large proportion of the witnesses subpœnaed do not present themselves for examination. Out of 22,318 witnesses summoned about 3,500 failed to appear. Of 18,753 offences the largest number was under offences to the human body, other than murder, manslaughter, rape, and grievous hurt. Of the 9,205 persons convicted, 39 per cent. were sent to imprisonment, 53 per cent. to pay fine, 1 per cent. to whipping, 5 per cent. to both fine and imprisonment, and 2 per cent. to whipping and imprisonment. The resolution recommends whipping as the most appropriate punishment for small offences, stating that 'short terms of imprisonment can do little good, as they are an excitation to crime, and whipping might well be substituted, instead of filling our gaols with convicts who should be earning their livelihood.' The Home Secretary, in conclusion, lays down the advisability in the case of juvenile offenders of substituting flogging in moderation for imprisonment, except in very exceptional cases, for, according to the best authorities, 'the prison is an incubator for those who are young in crime.'

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE AND THE BIRMINGHAM ASSIZES.—At a meeting of the Birmingham justices on Wednesday, a letter was read from the Home Secretary, replying to a communication with reference to the action of the Lord Chief Justice at the recent Birmingham Assizes, in releasing, on their own recognisances, nine prisoners committed to the quarter sessions, because they had not been committed to the intervening assizes. Mr. Matthews said on the one hand it undoubtedly appeared to have been the intention of the Assizes Relief Act to free the assizes from sessions cases; on the other hand, it was not desirable to keep prisoners too long waiting for their trial, and, if an assize intervened, prisoners might, with advantage, be sent for trial thereto, instead of undergoing a prolonged detention. He could not, however, agree that every sessions case should necessarily be sent to the intervening assizes. The Mayor considered the practical outcome would be that the Lord Chief Justice would not come again to Birmingham for some time to come.—The stipendiary magistrate said two members of Parliament had undertaken to bring the matter before the House of Commons. It transpired that two of the released prisoners had committed offences whilst on bail, and two others had absconded.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1891.

'OBITER DICTA.'

The Chancery judges certainly set a good example to their brethren of the Queen's Bench Division on Monday last, the opening day of the Michaelmas Sittings. Of the common law bench only two judges (Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Mathew) took their seats, although several others appeared in the procession which followed the Lord Chancellor up the Central Hall of the Law Courts. On the equity side, however, all the judges took their seats and disposed of a certain amount of business.

For all practical purposes the sittings of the Queen's Bench Division did not commence until Tuesday, the 27th inst., when three Divisional Courts sat in addition to six Courts for the trial of jury and non-jury cases. On Wednesday, however, the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wills commenced their sittings at the Guildhall for the trial of London causes, with the result that the number of Divisional Courts was reduced to two.

As regards the amount of business likely to be disposed of in the Queen's Bench Division during the present sittings, it is much to be feared that it will be but small. Nine of the judges of that division have been assigned to the various circuits; and as the autumn assizes will probably commence in the second week in November, and will last about a month, it is easy to see that in a very short time business at the Law Courts on the common law side will be again almost at a standstill. In the interests of suitors who have now been waiting many months to have their causes tried, this state of things is much to be regretted; but if the staff of judges is not to be increased, nor the present circuit system abolished, it seems very difficult to suggest a remedy.

The Lord Chief Justice is not just now persona grata at Birmingham. His somewhat high-handed method of dealing with prisoners who had been committed for trial at the quarter sessions instead of being brought up at the intervening assizes was naturally resented by the Birmingham magistrates. The letter from the Home Secretary, read at a meeting of the Birmingham justices on the 21st inst., was clearly an attempt to reconcile the divergencies of opinion which had arisen between Lord Coleridge and the magistrates. The Mayor seems to have considered that the practical outcome would be abstention from that circuit on the part of the judge. There is no doubt a good deal to be said on both sides of the question, and the liberty of the subject is very properly regarded as a right not to be lightly surrendered. Unfortunately the severest criticism on the action of the Lord Chief Justice is derived from the fact that two of the prisoners he released on their own recognisances committed offences while on bail and two others absconded. The prisoners, at any rate, approved of Lord Coleridge's theory and practice.

A very odd, probably unique, proceeding has just been witnessed in a Westmoreland village near Kendal. Most businesses, including that of a publican, are carried on primarily for the benefit of the owner, and it is indeed an edifying spectacle to find an innkeeper appealing to his fellow-parishioners as to whether they think his inn a benefit or a nuisance to the neighbourhood. Yet this has happened in the case of an ancient tavern at Burneside. There was many years ago a beershop in Drury Lane where they refused to serve any customer with more than one drink. The proprietors of the Anglers' Arms at Burneside for many years past, deeming themselves physicians or moralists as well as publicans, appear to have exercised a like discretion, and often declined to serve applicants with liquor. The present owners have even gone a step further, and a week or two ago deliberately invited the opinion of the ratepayers by the issue of voting-papers, and undertook, if a substantial majority should be in favour of the discontinuance of the business, to close the house for the purposes of alcoholic refreshment. All except fanatical teetotalers will rejoice that so venerable a combination of virtue and 'cakes and ale' is not to be dissolved. The Westmoreland Gazette of Saturday last gives the result as follows: 'The population is 1,161 and the ratepayers 205. Of these, 108 wish the Anglers' Arms to remain open; 56 only record their votes on the other side, and 41 did not vote at all. If the transaction was a teetotal device, it has signally failed; but the tradition of the house and the fact that 1,300*l.* was not very long ago given for the business by the present owners seem to prove the perfect good faith of the experiment. Long may the Anglers' Arms flourish for the good of its single-minded owners and the refreshment of thirsty wayfarers.'

The same issue of the Westmoreland Gazette reports the refusal by the Quarter Sessions to renew the license of a public-house at Appleby. As far as can be judged from the report, there were adequate grounds for the decision; but one circumstance which was alleged by Mr. Mattinson, M.P., who appeared for the licensed victualler, deserves adverse comment. The learned counsel alleged that Lord Hothfield presided over the bench of magistrates who refused to renew notwithstanding that he was the owner of seven out of the thirteen licensed houses in the town. It is difficult to imagine a more flagrant impropriety on the part of a judicial officer. It might reasonably be urged by a temperance reformer that the owner of licensed houses should not hear such applications; but it is a much worse case for a man to assist in a magisterial capacity in increasing the value of his own property by the extinction of a competitor.

The case of Harmann v. Powell, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 628, was one of considerable importance to the owners of public-houses and their lessees. The defendant, the lessee of a public-house, covenanted not to 'do or suffer to be done on the premises any act whereby the licenses necessary for using the said premises as an inn, tavern, or public-house may be forfeited or the renewal thereof withheld.' The defendant was subsequently twice convicted of offences under the Licensing Acts, and the convictions were indorsed on his license. He afterwards surrendered his lease, and a subsequent tenant of the premises obtained a renewal of the license. Under these circumstances, it was contended that there had been no breach of the defendant's covenant, inasmuch as the license had not been actually forfeited, but had, in fact, been renewed. The Court were, however, of opinion that the object of the covenant was that the tenant should not jeopardise the license of the house, and they, therefore, held that there had been a breach of the covenant by the defendant, notwithstanding that the license was not in fact forfeited.

There will be general agreement with the decision of the Court of Appeal on Tuesday in the case of Bound v. Lawrence, in which it was held that a grocer's assistant was not a workman within the meaning of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 10. The appellant entered the service of his master at a salary of 25*l.* a year and his board. He was convicted and fined under the Act for leaving his employment without notice. On a special case Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Grantham differed in opinion, the latter agreeing with the magistrate that the appellant came within the definition of workman in the Act, which, excluding a domestic or menial servant, includes, 'any person who, being a labourer, servant in husbandry, journeyman, artificer, handicraftsman, miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour,' has entered into a contract with an employer. No intelligent layman in reading the Act could come to the conclusion that it was intended to apply to a case like this. Lord Justice Fry remarked that all human work was, in some degree, both intellectual and manual. This is substantially true, with some important exceptions, as the labour in which he was engaged—the hearing and determining of law suits—was in nowise manual. The question really is, What is the quality required in the person concerned? Clearly in a tradesman's assistant it is the knowledge of different classes of goods—perhaps, also, the diplomacy by which he may induce customers to take what they do not really want. Manual labour has a very small part in the qualifications of a competent grocer's assistant, and much less in the case of a draper, who, to be successful, must have a profound insight into the feminine heart. Surely, even Mr. Justice Grantham would not have held that the duties of the chemist's boy in 'Pickwick,' who laboured under the incurable delusion that oxalic acid was Epsom salts, were of a manual character. The term 'workman' is fully intelligible by itself, and in this, as in other instances, the multitude of words in the so-called definition clause has only served to darken counsel.

The question whether crime can be committed under the influence of hypnotic suggestion is seriously dividing medico-legal opinion at the present moment. According to the Nancy school, this question must be answered in the affirmative. At the recent meeting of the Psychological Section of the British Medical Association, Dr. Voisin, of the Salpêtrière, Paris, read a paper on this subject, in which he cited the case of a patient who, acting on his suggestion and in the presence of three magistrates, stabbed a 'dummy' woman with a real knife. According to another view, of which Professor Benedikt, of Austria, is the most illustrious exponent, the power of the hypnotist over his patient will probably end if he really attempt to urge him to the commission of crime. It must be confessed that this à priori way of dealing with the matter is not altogether satisfactory, although it is obvious that the fact that a person under hypnotic influence can be induced to stab a 'dummy' by no means proves that he would go the length of committing murder in obedience to the hypnotic suggestion. On one point there will be no dispute—namely, that the British Medical Association has done well in recommending the legislative regulation of hypnotic exhibitions.

We referred recently (ante, p. 638) to a conviction of a farmer's son for using a gun to scare birds without a license, and to a doubt expressed in Truth whether the law laid down by the convicting justices was 'good' in the legal sense, which, as we pointed out, it was. The editor, while courteously accepting our view of the law, now raises the more serious question whether it is 'good' in the legislative sense, and emphatically protests against the Gun License Act, 1870, s. 7, subs. 4 (which exempts from the penalty under that Act for shooting without a gun license only the farmer himself or a person acting under his orders in case he himself has a license), as bearing too heavily on the farmer, who ought not to have his own time employed in the work of scaring birds. The criticism is a reasonable one, and a mode of amending the Act in the direction indicated by Truth may be readily found by applying to the Gun License Act certain restrictions which are to be found in the Ground Game Act, 1880, which gives occupiers the right, inseparable from their occupation, to kill and take ground game. By section 1 of this Act 'the occupier shall kill and take ground game only by himself or by persons duly authorised by him in writing,' but 'no person shall be so authorised' by the occupier except members of his household resident on the land in his occupation, persons in his ordinary service on such land, and any one other person bonâ fide employed by him for reward in the taking and destruction of ground game.' The Act of 1880, we may observe, only allows one other person to be authorised by the occupier to kill ground game with firearms—rather too severe a restriction.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, in a long speech at the annual gathering of the United Kingdom Alliance, has reviewed the legal position of the licensed victuallers by the light of Sharp v. Wakefield and its practical consequences in the shape of the refusal to renew some 300 licenses at the Brewster Sessions which have just drawn to a close. The results yet achieved he speaks of as 'grievously disappointing,' the only cheering incident from Sir Wilfrid's point of view being the notice given by Sir M. Hicks-Beach at Fairford, 'that the tied houses system would be looked into.' As far as we can learn, the effect of Sharp v. Wakefield has been to cause the justices to look more strictly into the character of licensees applying for renewal than they ever did before. And the view of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his party, that mere superfluity of licensed houses affords a reason why any house amongst a superfluous number may be extinguished, has as yet found little or no favour amongst licensing justices, still less amongst justices in quarter sessions assembled. Sooner or later, however, a case will probably arise when justices, avowedly on teetotal grounds, will refuse to renew some license or other without giving the applicant a hearing, with the almost certain result that, acting on the rule laid down in Regina v. The Walsall Justices, 3 C. L. R. 100, the High Court will issue a mandamus 'to hear and determine.'

It is not often, we imagine, that Sir Walter Phillimore and Lord Grimthorpe find themselves in agreement. At such a happy conjunction the strong presumption surely is that they are both right. In a letter to the Times on Wednesday, which we reprint in another column, Sir W. Phillimore has successfully attacked, by means of numerous precedents, the doctrine promulgated by Lord Cairns against Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and recently supported by Lord Selborne, of the obligation of secrecy in Privy Council judgments. There are strong and obvious reasons against the present practice. In the first place there is the appearance where there perhaps is not the reality of unanimity. The judgment may not be 'the judgment of their lordships,' but that of three weak judges as against that of two strong ones. Then there is an inevitable loss of individuality in a common judgment, and the arguments and considerations which may actuate a vigorous-minded judge are not likely to emerge in a decision framed to suit the opinions of the whole or of the majority. There is a temptation to acquiesce in the language of some one member of the committee, and perhaps in his ideas, on the part of indolent men, who satisfy themselves by simply coming to a conclusion on the matter in hand, without careful analysis of argument. Again, law is not final; it is, and ought to be, subject to the development of knowledge and sentiment. A decision of the Privy Council or the House of Lords may be undermined and its effect overruled in progress of time. Improvement can best be effected when each man's contribution to the progressive movement is made known to the world. There is also an argument of a technical character. The decisions of the Privy Council are not strictly judgments, but advice tendered to Her Majesty. Cases are imaginable in which it might be expedient for the Queen—especially in Constitutional questions arising in India or the Colonies—to disregard the advice so given. Such a step would be clearly made less dangerous if it were in accordance with the opinion of a minority of the Council whose ability and reputation were higher than those of the majority.

In connection with the attempt to wreck trains on the Great Western and Brighton Railways, attention should be drawn to 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 35, 36, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 32, 34. By the former of these enactments the placing of wood or stone or anything else on a railway with intent to obstruct, overthrow, &c., any engine or carriage thereon is a felony punishable by penal servitude for life, while the mere unlawful placing with the result of obstruction is a misdemeanour punishable by two years' imprisonment. By the latter, the like offence, if committed with intent to endanger the safety of railway passengers, is also a felony punishable by penal servitude for life, while doing any unlawful act, whereby the safety of railway passengers may be endangered, is likewise a misdemeanour punishable by two years' imprisonment. It may perhaps be doubted whether it should be necessary in these cases to prove any guilty intention, and whether the punishment for the mere unlawful act of placing a sleeper on a railway should not be made somewhat heavier than two years' imprisonment. A propos, we observe that the Great Western Railway Company has offered a reward of 50*l.* for the detection of the offenders, whereas the Brighton Company has offered no such reward. Which company is right, and which is wrong? We incline to think that the Brighton company is right. At any rate the offering of rewards by the Government has been discontinued for several years in this country on the ground that persons committed crimes for the purposes of obtaining rewards by false accusations, and the Home Office, though urgently requested to offer a reward for the discovery of the Whitechapel murders, steadily refused to do so on this express ground. (See Wharton's 'Law Lexicon,' tit. 'Reward.')

The results of the recent appeals at quarter sessions have not been consoling to license-holders or to owners of licensed properties. Nor is it possible to read the reports of the various cases without being strongly impressed with the conviction that, in some instances at least, the magistrates were predisposed in favour of the respondents, and were more anxious to reduce the number of public-houses in a district than to weigh with impartial judgment the arguments and evidence laid before them as a Court of Appeal. The fighting at Winchester was especially vigorous, and two well-known 'licensing' counsel, Mr. Candy, Q.C., and Mr. Forest Fulton, M.P., were taken in 'special' on behalf of the brewers interested. In one of the three appeals the evidence of the respondents' witnesses was so shaken and contradicted that there was a general expectation among the members of the bar and the solicitors in Court that the appeal would be allowed. The result was, however, the same as in the other, and certainly less hopeful, cases. That owners of property should practically be mulcted in very heavy fines (for that is in effect the result) on account of the omissions and commissions of their tenants is not in accordance with public sentiment, apart from the 'teetotal platform.' At present the 'houses' are punished and not the licensees; and this anomaly is becoming more and more burdensome as magistrates recognise the enormous power placed in their hands.

Mr. J. S. Gathorne-Hardy, M.P., chairman of the second Court of the West Kent Quarter Sessions, thinks 'it is a mistake that juries are not allowed to know something of the antecedents of the prisoners they are trying,' and his remarks à propos of the verdict given by what he considered a perverse jury called forth a protest from the prisoners' counsel. There ensued what a London daily paper described as 'a sharp passage of arms' between the chairman and counsel, and though the interruption may have been ill-timed, it is impossible not to sympathise with a successful advocate who had saved his clients, and was certainly not responsible for the existing state of the law. Experience of human nature leads one to believe that while occasional miscarriages of justice occur through absence of knowledge as to a prisoner's record of convictions, the adoption of a different system would inevitably introduce such prejudice in the minds of a jury as would frequently lead to verdicts against the weight of evidence.

The refusal by the London County Council to renew two music and dancing licenses has met with much unfavourable comment on the grounds (1) that the licensees had at the suggestion of the council gone to considerable expense in improvements, and (2) that some of the committee, on whose report the refusal was grounded, were heard by counsel when the question was considered by the main body of the council. The law of the case is this. The council, as successors, under section 3, par. v., of the Local Government Act, 1888, to the powers of the Middlesex justices, under 25 Geo. II. c. 36, have an absolute and uncontrolled discretion to renew or refuse to renew licenses for music, dancing, or public entertainment of the like kind. The Act of Geo. II., which recites that 'the multitude of places of entertainment for the lower sort of people is a great cause of thefts and robberies, as they are thereby tempted to spend their small substance in riotous pleasures, and in consequence are put on unlawful methods of supplying their wants and renewing their pleasures,' was passed 'to prevent the said temptations to thefts and robberies, and to correct as far as may be the habit of idleness which is become too general over the whole kingdom, and is productive of much mischief and inconvenience.' It contains no restriction whatever on the discretion of the tribunal which it invested with absolute power, nor can any suggestion of the licensing body, however fully acted on, that a licensee should execute improvements, have any effect on the exercise of this discretion. The Lord Chamberlain's power to license public entertainments is, no doubt, expressly saved by section 4 of the Act, but interference from this quarter would hardly be looked for. But how about the part which the committee of the council took in supporting their own recommendation? It was laid down in Regina v. Myers, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 173, that the being a litigant in a matter before the justices will disqualify any one of their number from acting, and that if a justice so disqualified merely sits upon the bench the order by his fellow-justices will be quashed on certiorari, although the disqualified justice may not have signed the order. Regina v. The Great Yarmouth Justices, 51 Law J. Rep. M. C. 39; L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 525, is to the same effect. There is some ground for saying that the impugned acts of the London county councillors come within the principle of these cases.

The Hardwicke Society, for 'the discussion of legal, political, and social subjects' by members of the four Inns of Court, has taken the wise course of publishing its rules and the list of its members, and laying them on the tables of the Inns of Court libraries. There appear to be nearly 1,000 names on the books. The subscription of 1*l.* entitles the subscriber to membership for life. The annual general meeting takes place on the first Friday in the Michaelmas Inns of Court Dining Term in each year. No speech may last more than a quarter of an hour, except that of the opener, who is allowed half an hour.

SERVICE OUT OF THE JURISDICTION.—I.

In the following papers it is proposed to consider the development and present position of the law as to service out of the jurisdiction.

Down to the year 1852 service out of the jurisdiction was unknown in actions of common law, and the only remedy available to a plaintiff against a defendant who was obstinate and fraudulently keeping out of the jurisdiction of the English Courts was to proceed to outlawry.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, provided a simpler and more efficacious procedure. The material sections of that enactment are in the following terms:

'In case any defendant, being a British subject, is residing out of the jurisdiction of the . . . Superior Courts in any place except in Scotland or Ireland, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to issue a writ of summons in the form contained in the schedule A to the Act annexed, marked No. 2, which writ shall bear the indorsement contained in the said form, purporting that such writ is for service out of the jurisdiction of the said Superior Courts; and the time for appearance by the defendant to such writ shall be regulated by the distance from England of the place where the defendant is residing; and it shall be lawful for the Court or judge, upon being satisfied by affidavit that there is a cause of action which arose within the jurisdiction or in respect of the breach of a contract made within the jurisdiction, and that the writ was personally served upon the defendant, or that reasonable efforts were made to effect personal service thereof upon the defendant, and that it came to his knowledge, and either that the defendant wilfully neglects to appear to such a writ, or that he is living out of the jurisdiction of the said Courts in order to defeat and delay his creditors, to direct from time to time that the plaintiff shall be at liberty to proceed in the action in such manner and subject to such conditions as to such Court or judge may seem fit, having regard to the time allowed for the defendant to appear being reasonable and to the other circumstances of the case.' (Section 18.)

'In any action against a person residing out of the jurisdiction of the said Courts, and not being a British subject, the like proceedings may be taken as against a British subject resident out of the jurisdiction, save that in lieu of the form of writ of summons in the schedule A to this Act annexed, marked No. 2, the plaintiff shall issue a writ of summons according to the form contained in the said schedule A, marked No. 3, and shall in manner aforesaid serve a notice of the last-mentioned writ upon the defendant therein mentioned.' (Section 19.)

The practice under these sections, and the divergence of judicial opinion to which they gave rise, must now be briefly examined.

The writ of summons (No. 2, Schedule A) differed from the ordinary writ of summons in only two particulars. (a) The time limited for appearance was not specified in the body of the writ. The responsibility of fixing the proper time and filling it in rested with the plaintiff. If he failed to allow sufficient time for appearance, the Court or judge might refuse him liberty to proceed. (b) The summons purported to be for service out of the jurisdiction. It should be observed that, contrary to the present practice, the plaintiff, under the Act of 1852, proceeded in the first instance ex parte. He took out his writ as of course. He limited the time for appearance. He served the writ, or, in the case of a foreigner without the jurisdiction, the notice of the writ, without let or hindrance. It was only when the defendant had failed to appear * and the plaintiff applied for liberty to proceed under section 18 that the regularity and competence of the service were subjected to judicial review. At this critical period the plaintiff had to satisfy the Court or judge, by affidavit, (1) that there was 'a cause of action which arose within the jurisdiction or in respect of the breach of a contract made within the jurisdiction;' (2) that the writ was personally served, or that reasonable efforts were made to effect personal service, and that the writ came to the defendant's knowledge; (3) that the defendant wilfully neglected to appear to the writ, and was living out of the jurisdiction of the Court in order to defeat and delay his creditors. We shall consider each of these facta probanda in turn:—

1. It is obvious that the clause defining the kinds of process to which sections 18 and 19 were applicable is capable of at least two conflicting constructions. It may be taken to have limited the statutory power so far as actions ex contractu were concerned to contracts made within the jurisdiction. On the other hand, it may be interpreted as including contracts made abroad but broken within the jurisdiction—the breach of contract being regarded in such a case as a 'cause of action' within the meaning of the first part of the limitation. For many years the Courts of common law were hopelessly divided upon the question which of these constructions was the correct one. According to the Court of Exchequer in Sichel v. Borch, 33 Law J. Rep. Exch. 179; 2 H. & C. 954, and the Court of Queen's Bench in Allhusen v. Malgarejo, 37 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 169; L. R. (1868) 3 Q. B. 340, and Cherry v. Thompson, 41 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 243; L. R. (1872) 7 Q. B. 572, section 18 of the Act of 1852 applied only to cases where the whole cause of action arose within the jurisdiction, or where a contract, wherever broken, was made in England. The Court of Common Pleas, however, in Jackson v. Spittal, 39 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 321; L. R. (1870) 5 C. P. 542, and the Court of Exchequer itself in Durham v. Spence, 40 Law J. Rep. Exch. 3; L. R. (1870) 6 Exch. 46, held that the words 'cause of action' meant 'the act on the part of the defendant' which gave 'the plaintiff his cause of complaint.' In Vaughan v. Weldon, 44 Law J. Rep. C. P. 64; L. R. (1874) 10 C. P. 47, the whole question was threshed out. At the close of the argument Lord Coleridge stated that, in consequence of the conflict of decisions, the impossibility of taking the question to error and the great desirability of establishing a uniform practice, it was intended to hold a conference of the judges to discuss the subject. The conference was held. The majority agreed with Jackson v. Spittal; the minority gracefully yielded, and it was finally decided that 'it is sufficient to entitle a plaintiff to proceed under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 18, that the breach of contract should have arisen within the jurisdiction.' The only other point deserving notice under this head is the clause excepting Scotland and Ireland from the sweep of section 18. 'The words creating this exception,' says Mr. Justice Day (Common Law Procedure Acts, p. 15, note), 'were introduced into the Act at the last moment. A Scottish plaintiff may sue an English defendant in the Courts of Scotland if he have any property . . . which can be attached jurisdictionis fundandæ causâ, and the latter may never hear of the action till he finds his property seized by a judgment creditor; an English creditor has no such remedy against a debtor in Scotland or Ireland. He must go to the Scotch or Irish Courts, as the case may be, and this even if the debtor have all his property in this country.' But, according to the same high authority (ubi sup.), one who was not a British subject might 'be proceeded against by English process under section 19, though resident in Scotland or Ireland.'

* If the defendant appeared he was held to waive any objection to the jurisdiction (Forbes v. Smith, L. R. 10 Exch. 717). Any such objection had to be taken by a summons to set aside the service (Jackson v. Spittal, 39 Law J. Rep. C. P. 321; L. R. (1870) 5 C. P. 542).

BUILDING SOCIETY SHARES HELD BY MINORS.

Can a building society accept a transfer of shares from a minor? asks our correspondent, 'A Director,' in his recent letter (see ante, p. 640). The question propounded is of considerable importance to building societies, but is one that it is not easy to answer with absolute certainty. On the whole, we incline to the opinion that a minor has no power to execute a transfer of shares held by him in a building society. So far as we are able to discover, however, there is no direct authority on the point. A minor derives his capacity to acquire shares in an incorporated building society solely from section 38 of the Building Society Act, 1874. It is thereby expressly enacted that 'any person under the age of twenty-one years may be admitted as a member of any society under this Act, the rules of which do not prohibit such admission, and may give all necessary acquittances; but during his nonage he shall not be competent to vote or hold any office in the society.' This provision corresponds with that of section 32 of 10 Geo. IV. c. 56; but the applicability of that section to unincorporated building societies is by no means clear. All the provisions of 10 Geo. IV. c. 56, 'so far as the same, or any part thereof, may be applicable to the purpose of any benefit building society,' are by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 32, s. 4, extended and applied to unincorporated building societies. But as a minor cannot execute a mortgage, it is doubtful whether the particular section 32 of 10 Geo. IV. can be extended to an unincorporated building society. We must, therefore, in this article confine our remarks to incorporated building societies.

The question, therefore, whether a minor who is admitted a member of an incorporated building society can transfer his shares turns upon the words 'all necessary acquittances,' that he is empowered to give by section 38 of the Act of 1874. Can giving an acquittance include executing a transfer? We should say not. The meaning of acquittance, according to the 'Imperial Dictionary,' is '(1) the act of acquitting or discharging from a debt or any other liability; the state of being so discharged; (2) the writing which is evidence of a discharge; a receipt in full which bars a further demand.' None of those definitions seems to cover a transfer of shares. They point, in the case of an acquittance in respect of building society shares, to a receipt given to the society for interest on the shares, or for the capital if the same be withdrawn from the society. In our opinion, it would require a considerable straining of the word acquittance to render it applicable to the act of passing the property in shares of the kind from one member (a minor) to another, or to a writing which is evidence of such an act. It seems to us that the intention of the Legislature was that an infant member of a building society desirous of being relieved of his shares should be at liberty to discharge the society from all liability in respect thereof on receiving his money back from the society after due notice of withdrawal; but that a parting with the shares by way of transfer was not contemplated, and cannot be inferred.

Little or no assistance is attainable from decided cases as regards the definition of 'acquittance,' for it appears to be almost bare of authority. Turning to Mr. Stroud's 'Judicial Dictionary'—a work which frequent testing has satisfied us is perfectly trustworthy—we find that the only reported judicial interpretation of the word 'acquittance' has occurred in the case of Regina v. French, 39 Law J. Rep. M. C. 58; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 217. There it was held that a 'clearance certificate' from one branch of a friendly society to another was not an acquittance within section 23 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, which makes forgery of any 'acquittance or receipt for money' a felony.

So much for the general view of the subject apart from any provision in the rules of a society supplementing the enactment contained in section 38 of the Act of 1874. Where, however, the rules of a society, as in the case mentioned by our correspondent, authorise the minors who take shares therein to transfer the same, does that circumstance make any difference? Can any reliance be placed upon the fact that such rules have been duly registered, and are authenticated by the seal of the central office, bearing in mind that section 21 of the Act makes the rules binding on the several members and officers? We do not see that it can. A certificate of registration cannot make valid that which is not valid under the Act. Nor can it be regarded as conclusive by virtue of the provision of the preceding section that 'any certificate of . . . . registration or other document relating to a society under this Act, purporting to be signed by the registrar, shall, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be received by the Court . . . . without proof of the signature.' The very recent decision of the Court of Appeal in In re The National Debenture and Assets Corporation, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 533; L. R. (1891) 2 Chanc. Div. 505, illustrates the view which the Court entertains on the point of conclusiveness of a certificate of registration.

The result is that in our opinion the plan suggested by our correspondent of disposing of the appropriation which the minor has obtained is not feasible. But although we do not see our way to approving of that plan, the difficulty is not insuperable. An easy mode of getting over it is suggested by a case that was adjudicated upon by the registrar of building societies, in September, 1877. A dispute was then referred for settlement to the registrar in the case of Cork v. The Chatham, &c. Starr Bowkett Building Society, where a minor had been declared entitled to an appropriation, and the registrar held that the guardian might sell it for her benefit. A sale for the benefit of the infant member in the case which 'A Director' refers to might not be so satisfactory to the parties as the proposed device of a transfer of the shares; but it has at least the advantage of not being illegal.

PAINE ON THE FORMATION OF COMPANIES.

The Formation and Registration under the Companies Acts of Companies limited by Shares and Companies limited by Guarantee not having their Capital divided into Shares. By Tyrrell T. Paine, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: The Solicitors' Law Stationery Society (Lim.). 1891.

The object of this little manual is to be a guide for the use of those who are engaged in forming a company under the Companies Acts; and the idea which is here worked out is to set out the various steps in the formation and registration of a company in the order in which they would naturally be taken. The limits which the author has fixed for himself are the time when advice is first sought on the one hand and the holding of the first statutory meeting on the other. The classes of joint-stock companies which are considered are companies limited by guarantee (not having their capital divided into shares). It is not, the author tells us, his object to deal with the conversion of existing companies into limited companies, or with the formation either of unlimited companies or of companies limited by guarantee and having their capital divided into shares. The work is executed in a very careful and systematic manner. In the chapters devoted to the memorandum and its alteration we have a very fair summary of the law as it existed before the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, and as it now stands. In Part II. we have a consideration of the law affecting those companies which are conveniently, though not very accurately, spoken of as private companies. The work will be found useful so far as it goes.

A MONEY-MARKET PRIMER.

A Money-Market Primer and Key to the Exchanges. With Diagrams. By George Clare. Effingham Wilson. 1891.

This is scarcely a law book, but it may be useful to lawyers whose practice lies in the direction of monetary matters. The exact position of the Bank of England, the effect of fluctuations in the 'Bank rate,' the 'foreign exchanges,' and 'the open market'—these and cognate topics are carefully dwelt upon and illustrated by no less than fifteen very picturesque diagrams. The price of the book is 5*s.*

MACMORRAN'S PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) ACT.

The Public Health (London) Act, 1891. With Introduction, Notes, and Index. By A. Macmorran. London: Shaw & Sons. 1891.

Mr. Macmorran has done good service in promptly coming forward with a fully annotated edition of the Public Health (London) Act. All the numerous changes are effectively pointed out, with copious citations of cases. The only fault we have to find is that some of the notes—e.g. that on section 4—are too long, and thus stand in the way of a continuous reading of the statute. There is a good and, though short, sufficiently long introduction, and the index is fairly good, but neither 'pigs' nor 'meat' appear in it, the reader having to refer to 'swine' and 'unsound food.' References are, we are glad to observe, given to all the current reports. The price of the book is 10*s.* 6*d.*

STEINTHAL ON THE ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT.

The Elementary Education Act, 1891. With Introduction and Notes. By A. E. Steinthal. Sweet & Maxwell (Lim.). 1891.

The notes to this edition of the Act are extremely well done; the introduction is comprehensive and clear, and there is a proper supply of supplementary matter in the appendix. The Act coming into effect on September 1, after having received the royal assent on the previous August 5, Mr. Steinthal has worked under great difficulties, with the unfortunate result of being obliged, 'owing to a mistake in the text of the Act as at first published by the Queen's printers,' to print not a few corrigenda, and to omit the Departmental 'regulations' under section 1, subsection 1, of the Act, which bears date August 26. The price of the book is 2*s.* 6*d.*

THE HOSPITALS ASSOCIATION.

Sir,—Will you allow me to draw attention to the bill promoted by this association with a view to modifying the restrictions hitherto prevailing in connection with devises of land to charities, and which became law at the end of last session?

Briefly the new Act (Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891) makes every gift by will of every kind of property good, only requiring that land given should be sold within a fixed period, the proceeds to become the property of the charity. It further has the important effect of excluding from all restrictions, as regards dispositions in favour of charity, every kind of property to which the restriction formerly extended except land. The cases in which land might be validly acquired by a charity under the old law are not affected by the new Act, the provisions of which, while removing the vexatious hindrances previously existing, in no way facilitate the permanent acquisition of land by a charity.

MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE RECONVEYANCE.

Sir,—Is not the solution of this question as follows? Before payment off of the mortgage money the mortgagee is master of the situation, and can elect whether to reconvey by indorsement or by separate deed, for he cannot be compelled until then to reconvey at all.

On payment he gives up the deeds, and then it matters not to him how the reconveyance is taken, whether by indorsement or otherwise.

In practice mortgagees' solicitors do not in my experience usually raise much difficulty about indorsing reconveyance before payment; but I think they should be careful as to this, for I have more than once seen mortgagees left with an executed, indorsed reconveyance, the mortgagor having made default in paying off.

The difficulty thus occasioned is not insuperable, but the position is, to say the least, unpleasant.

Liverpool: Oct. 28. Adviser.

The Autumn Circuits of the Judges.—The following are the circuits chosen by the judges for the ensuing autumnal-winter circuits: South-Eastern Circuit, Baron Pollock; Western Circuit, Mr. Justice Cave; Oxford Circuit, Mr. Justice Day; Midland Circuit, Mr. Justice Grantham; Northern Circuit, Mr. Justice Lawrance and Mr. Justice Collins; North-Eastern Circuit, Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Wright; North and South Wales Circuits, Mr. Justice Williams. Prisoners only will be tried at these assizes, except at Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds, where civil causes will also be taken. The assizes are expected to commence about the middle of next month.

SOLICITORS' CASES.

ACCESS TO IMPOUNDED DOCUMENTS.

On October 27, in the Queen's Bench Division, before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mr. Justice Collins, In the Matter of a Solicitor was heard. This case raised for the first time a question as to access to documents which have been impounded by the Court for the purposes of justice. It arose under the new Order XLII., rule 33 (a), which is in these terms: 'Impounded documents while in the custody of the Court are not to be parted with, and are not to be inspected, except on a written order signed by the judge on whose order they were impounded and by the President of the Division. . . . Such documents shall not be delivered out of the custody of the Court except upon an order made on motion in open Court.' In the present case the question had arisen under these circumstances. On May 12 last a case, in which were certain matters apparently affecting the conduct of a solicitor, was heard in a Divisional Court, which ordered certain documents to be impounded. An inquiry was then instituted by the Incorporated Law Society into the conduct of the solicitor, and they, for the purpose of the inquiry, required to have access to these documents.—Mr. Hollams, on the part of the law society, moved that the documents be delivered out to them for the purpose of the inquiry, to be returned to the Court when the inquiry was concluded. He submitted that the rule would allow of this. [Lord Coleridge: The meaning of the rule is that while the documents are in the custody of the Court they should not leave its custody. In some cases the safe custody of the documents may be of no importance, but there are cases in which a party implicated would give thousands of pounds to obtain possession of them, and in a case of this kind, if the documents could have been got at, they would certainly have been disposed of.] The documents are impounded for the purposes of justice, and an inquiry is now instituted which cannot be prosecuted without the production of the documents. [Lord Coleridge: They cannot be parted with by the Court.] Probably the Court would allow the society to inspect them. [Lord Coleridge: Certainly.] And to make copies of them. [Lord Coleridge: No.]—The Court accordingly ordered that the Incorporated Law Society should have leave to inspect the documents.

PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT.

In this case an accountant at Swansea, secretary to the Swansea Cricket Club, had made on behalf of the club an application that Carlyle, a solicitor there, might be required to answer the matters set forth in an affidavit of the applicant, which was, under the Solicitors Act of 1888, referred to the committee of the Incorporated Law Society, who had made the following report, now submitted to the Court: '(2) The charge made by the affidavit was that the respondent, having been instructed by the committee of the Swansea Cricket Club to act as their solicitor, and in that capacity to carry out the surrender of an existing lease of their ground and the grant of a new lease, applied for and received a cheque for 38*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for the purpose of completing the matter, and that, instead of so applying the money so received, he misappropriated to his own use 33*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, part thereof. (3) The committee heard the application at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery Lane, London, on May 14 and 28, 1891. Mr. R. White, solicitor, London, agent for Messrs. Davies & Ingram, of Swansea, solicitors, appeared for the complainant. The respondent appeared in person on May 14, but he did not appear and was not represented on May 28. (4) The committee report as follows: (5) The complainant is an accountant carrying on business at 5 Bryn Road, Swansea, and is secretary to the Swansea Cricket Club. (6) The respondent was admitted a solicitor in November, 1881, and practised at Swansea down to November, 1890, since which date he has been employed as a clerk in a solicitor's office there. (7) In the year 1889 the respondent was instructed by the complainant to carry out the surrender of the existing lease of the cricket-ground and the grant of a new lease, and on June 27, 1890, he attended a meeting of the committee (of which he was then a member), and applied for and received a cheque for 38*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, made up of the following items:—

Costs of Messrs. Beor, Fry & Plant, Swansea, solicitors to the lessors, in connection with the surrender and new lease	£25	0	0
One quarter's rent due to the lessors to March 25, 1890	6	5	0
Portion of a quarter's grazing to March 25, 1890 (at 15*l.* a year), due to the lessors	1	17	6
The respondent's costs in connection with the surrender and new lease	5	5	0
	£38	7	6

No receipt was given for the said sum, but the cheque (exhibit "F. J. C. 1") which was produced bore the respondent's endorsement, and was cashed by him on June 28, 1890. (8) Considerable delay took place in completion, owing, in part at all events, to the respondent having lost or mislaid the surrender, which was endorsed on the old lease and had been partially executed, and in February, 1891, the committee of the cricket club decided to place the matter in the hands of other solicitors. (9) Messrs. Davies & Ingram were accordingly instructed to act on behalf of the club, and, after some correspondence, they called on the respondent at his office on March 9, 1891, in order to receive from him the drafts and deeds which he had and the balance of the money he had received. (10) The respondent then for the first time stated that he had a claim for extra costs in connection with a declaration of trust and other business which he had done for the club, and promised to call on Messrs. Davies & Ingram the next day and hand over the balance. He did not do so, nor did he hand over the deeds, and subsequently new deeds had to be prepared, and Messrs. Davies & Ingram, on March 26, 1891, completed the matter and paid to the lessors the sum of 37*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, being the first three sums shown in paragraph 7 of this report as having been paid to the respondent, and 4*l.* for extra costs occasioned by the delay. (11) The respondent did not dispute the facts, or that he had received the money for a specific purpose as alleged, but he contended that when he was asked to return the money and to deliver up the documents belonging to the club he was entitled to retain any further costs which he had earned. (12) The respondent has never delivered any bill of costs nor repaid any part of the money. (13) The committee find that the charge has been proved, and that Mr. Francis John Carlyle has been guilty of the professional misconduct alleged.'—Mr. Hollams appeared on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, and read the report. The solicitor, he said, had received the money for a specific purpose, but had tried to set up a claim for costs as a charge upon a sum which he had so received. [Lord Coleridge: Was there any ground for such a claim of further costs?] Possibly there may have been to some small extent, but, the society having allowed him time to return the difference, he had not appeared.—The solicitor did not now appear by counsel or in person.—The learned judges having conferred, Lord Coleridge said it was one of those cases in which the Court had a painful duty to perform, but one which it was very important for them to discharge. For it was by virtue of the credit and character which the Court gave to solicitors, as its officers, that they were enabled in some instances to commit such frauds; and the Court was bound to exercise its jurisdiction over them in such cases, not merely for the purpose of punishment, but for the protection of the suitors or clients who relied upon them. This was in some respects a bad case. The money had undoubtedly been received by the solicitor for a specific purpose; he set up a claim which he never prosecuted, and which could not be beyond some small sum; and when it was clear that the report must be against him, and he was allowed a certain time—as long ago as May—to repay what was due, he made no appearance, and made no attempt at restitution. This report was made in June, and he has done nothing, and has not appeared. It certainly is not one of the worst class of cases, in which a client has been ruined, but it is a case which must be visited with an exemplary sentence, and the solicitor must be suspended for three years.

LICENSING APPEALS.

At Westmoreland Quarter Sessions, on October 23, a licensing appeal was heard, in which the appellant was R. Yare, occupier of the Coach and Horses Inn, at Appleby, and the respondents were Westmoreland justices. In September last, at the adjourned Brewster Sessions at Appleby, the magistrates refused to renew the license of the Coach and Horses, evidence having been given that the house had been badly conducted in the time of Sowerby, the late owner and occupier, against whom there had been several convictions for drunkenness during the last two years. In spring the house had been purchased by Mr. Henry Newton, brewer, Penrith, who had secured a respectable tenant, and evidence given by the police and others showed that the inn had been well conducted since it changed hands. An assurance was further offered to the Appleby bench that the house would continue to be well conducted, but they refused to renew the license. Against that decision the new tenant (Yare) now appealed to the Quarter Sessions. The case for the respondents was that while Sowerby occupied the house it was badly conducted; that disorder and acts of indecency were frequently witnessed in front of the house; and that the public requirements were well provided for by other houses, there being four other licensed houses within a short distance of the Coach and Horses. For the appellant it was submitted that since the inn had been occupied by Yare it had been well conducted, and that, inasmuch as the house was centrally situated and convenient, the principle involved in the case of Sharp v. Wakefield did not apply. It was further urged that it would be monstrous, after the license had been temporarily transferred to Yare by the magistrates, to punish him for the misconduct of his predecessor, Sowerby, whom the bench had had power to deal with during his occupancy of the premises. To this Mr. Shee replied that the magistrates had not been aware of their power until the law had been made thereon by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Sharp v. Wakefield. The bench dismissed the appeal, with costs.—Mr. Mattinson, M.P., and Mr. Lumb were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Shee and Mr. M. Wilson appeared for the respondents.

At the Quarter Sessions of Monmouthshire, held on Thursday, October 22, at Usk, an appeal was heard from the refusal of the Newport borough justices to renew the license of a beerhouse known as the Luncheon Bar, at Newport, on the ground that the licensee did not reside on the licensed premises. Mr. C. M. Bailhache, who appeared for the appellants, the licensee and the owner of the house, objected that no such notices as are required by section 42 of the Licensing Act of 1872 had been given, and, if so, the borough justices had no jurisdiction to entertain any objection to the renewal of the license. It appeared that two notices, one signed by a ratepayer representing the temperance party in the town, and one by the superintendent of the borough police, both good in form, had been served by leaving them with the licensee's manager on the premises. It was contended that under the Act the service must be either personally on the innkeeper, or by registered letter, and that service on the manager was bad. In the second place, Mr. Bailhache argued that, as there had been no notice of seven days by the justices to the licensee to appear before them, even if the notices of objection were good, the licensing justices had no jurisdiction. This point depends on the construction of clauses 1 and 2 of section 42 of the Act of 1872. The bench, holding that both points were fatal to the respondents, allowed the appeal and granted the license.

LOTTERY.—ANSWERS COMPETITION.

Arthur Watson, Alfred Brown, and John Evans, the three well-connected young men charged with keeping a lottery under the trade name of Brooks & Co., at 30 Queen Street, Albert Square, Manchester, were again before Mr. Headlam, the stipendiary, on October 27.—Mr. Cobbett, who prosecuted, said when the young men were before the Court on the last occasion the charge of conspiring together to defraud was preferred against them in addition to that of keeping a lottery. The men took rooms in Queen Street for that purpose. They issued an advertisement and placards, offering prizes to those who should first answer the question, 'If a brick weighs 3 lb. and half a brick, what is the weight of a brick and a-half?' and they had received by letter a large number of shilling contributions, it being a condition that all who entered the competition should forward that amount. This was a clear case of keeping a lottery, and he understood that the defendants proposed to plead guilty to that charge. He was willing to accept that as a satisfactory solution of the case.—Mr. Headlam said he understood that the defendants were willing to pay the costs of the prosecution.—Mr. Hockin defended, and thanked Mr. Cobbett for the moderate and fair way in which he had stated the case. His clients had already lost 40*l.* by this business.—Mr. Headlam said in this case he thought there was no intention to defraud, and, that being so, the defendants would be discharged on payment of the costs of the prosecution.

RESUMPTION OF THE GUILDHALL SITTINGS.

At the Guildhall on Wednesday, October 28, two Courts, presided over by Her Majesty's judges, sat at Guildhall for the trial of jury cases—or, in other words, for trials at Nisi Prius. The last of these trials at the Guildhall took place in 1882, they having continued previously, perhaps it may be said, for time out of mind. Formerly, when the Courts sat in Westminster Hall, and the business of term was concluded, the 'three chiefs'—i.e. the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer—sat for about a fortnight for the trial of special and common jury cases, and at the end of these sittings their lordships proceeded to the Guildhall, where they held their three Courts for another fortnight. There were also formerly three Courts at Guildhall sitting in term for the trial of what were then called short causes, most of which, according to the present practice, would never come into Court at all. After the Judicature Act all this was changed. One of the chief objects of the reform was the erection of the present Royal Courts of Justice, the site of which occupies parts of Middlesex, the City, and Westminster, and where the whole of the Courts covered by the Judicature Act are now brought under one roof—a desideratum which it was reasonably supposed would be for the convenience of jurors as well as of the legal profession. Last session, however, an Act was passed which provided that 'notwithstanding anything in the Courts of Justice Building Acts, 1865, or any Order in Council thereunder contained, sittings may be held in the City of London by judges of the High Court, under commissions issued for the trial of issues or inquiries in cases at Nisi Prius.' The reason for this change was understood to be, first, the convenience of such sittings to parties, jurors, and witnesses whose occupations were in the City; and, secondly, the desirability of bringing back in the Courts important commercial cases which it was said owing to recent legislation had been of late years disposed of by arbitration. The Corporation have provided two Courts for these revived sittings. The old council chamber has been fitted up for the principal Court, and is almost better for its purpose than the best Court in the Royal Courts of Justice. New windows have been constructed in the chamber so that a better light will be obtained, and it is lofty and well ventilated, the whole interior has been reconstructed, and there are ample and commodious seats for the jury, the bar, solicitors, and reporters, while there is also a good gallery for the public. The second Court is that which was formerly occupied by the Court of Exchequer at the north-west end of the hall, and it remains in the same state in which it was left in 1882.

Shortly after eleven o'clock the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wills arrived at the Guildhall, where they were met by the Lord Mayor (Sir Joseph Savory), Alderman and Sheriff Tyler, Mr. Sheriff Foster, Sir John Monckton (town clerk), Secondary Roderick, and the other civic authorities.

In the principal Court the Lord Mayor, addressing the Lord Chief Justice, said that as the head of the Corporation of the City of London he desired, upon the occasion of the resumption of these sittings of the Court within the City, to express his extreme pleasure at once again welcoming to the Guildhall the Lord Chief Justice of England and Her Majesty's other judges.

Lord Coleridge: My Lord Mayor,—I thank you for my colleagues and myself for your kindly greetings and for this new proof of your wise care for the administration of the law. It was supposed, whether rightly or not, that trials of mercantile issues had diminished in number owing to their removal from here to the Strand. I express no opinion as to whether this belief is well-founded or not. But it would be unbecoming in me to discourage any attempt to restore these causes to their former position. I thank you for your cordial welcome and for these handsome and convenient Courts. I earnestly hope that the expectations of those who have brought about this change may be fulfilled. To secure their successful fulfilment and to carry out the intentions of those instrumental in making this change will be the endeavour of my colleagues and myself.

Mr. Murphy, Q.C., added a few appropriate words on behalf of the bar.

The Associate then read the commission appointing the Courts to be held.

Upon the termination of the proceedings, Lord Coleridge proceeded to the trial of London special jury actions.

PRIVY COUNCIL SECRECY.

Sir Walter Phillimore writes to the Times as follows:—

In your issue of March 26 last appeared a letter from Lord Grimthorpe, in which he recurred to the old controversy between the late Lord Cairns and the late Sir Fitzroy Kelly as to the obligation of secrecy in Privy Council judgments, and very emphatically threw his weight in favour of Sir F. Kelly and against the supposed necessity of secrecy.

This seems to have led Lord Selborne to publish a pamphlet, which he has had long by him, in defence of Lord Cairns ('Judicial Procedure in the Privy Council,' Macmillan & Co., 1891), which, as it came out on the eve of the Long Vacation, I had only an opportunity of seeing quite lately.

I happen, however, to have in my possession a collection of cases of which Lord Selborne appears to be entirely unaware—cases not of theological controversy, but of appeals from the Admiralty and Prerogative Courts and from India, in which the language of the judges seems to me impossible to reconcile with the idea that there was any duty to be secret either as to the fact of division of opinion or as to the particular privy councillors who dissented.

In Cooper v. Bockett, in 1846, a will case on appeal from the Prerogative Court, part of the judgment (4 Moore's 'Privy Council Reports,' p. 452) is as follows:—

'One of their lordships, the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, differs in this conclusion of law, but the rest of their lordships consider that this sentence must be reversed.'

In Cowie v. Renfrey (5 Moore), an Indian appeal decided in 1846, the judgment ends thus:—

'I must add, however, that this is the judgment of the majority of their lordships, and that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Cornwall was inclined to have taken a different view of the case.'

In Shersby v. Hibbert, an Admiralty appeal decided in 1847 (5 Notes of Cases, p. 470), the judgment is delivered by Lord Campbell, ending in the usual form:—

'Their lordships will, therefore, advise Her Majesty that the decree appealed against should be affirmed,' &c.

And the reporter immediately adds, at p. 478:—

'Lord Brougham very emphatically declared his dissent from this judgment.'

In Craig v. Farnall, a clerical discipline case in 1848 (6 Notes of Cases, p. 693), the judgment says:—

'On the whole we are of opinion that the evidence is insufficient to support this charge, and that the decision of the Court below must be reversed. This is the opinion of the majority of their lordships. We cannot avoid adding, and in this all their lordships are entirely agreed. . . .'

In Phillips v. Phillips, 5 Notes of Cases, p. 440, a divorce case decided in 1847, Lord Brougham is, and in Michell v. Thomas, p. 614 of the same volume, a will case, both Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell are, reported as adding, at the end of judgments given by one of their colleagues observations, qualifying and limiting the principles of the judgment.

I have besides a great number of cases in which the fact of unanimity or of probable unanimity has been stated in the judgment.

Lord Selborne, I see (p. 42), admits that there are a good many examples of this 'to be found in the books.'

But, if so, and if there is to be regularity in the form of Privy Council judgments, either unanimity should always be expressed, or it should be supposed unless the contrary is stated.

If the latter, how monstrous it was, in a case of the importance of Ridsdale v. Clifton, not to allow the dissentient minority the right to have it stated that the judgment was not that of the whole body.

Why the statement in Sheppard v. Bennett, that the judgment on one point was not unanimous, why the statement in the Gorham Case that the Bishop of London and Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, mentioning them by name, dissented, and the similar statement in the 'Essays and Reviews' case that the two archbishops dissented are permissible, and yet it was a breach of Sir F. Kelly's oath for him to declare his own dissent when the majority would not (as in other cases) declare it for him, are questions for which your readers will look to Lord Selborne's solution with interest.

My contribution to your columns is only intended to take a humbler form—that of precedents of publicity versus secrecy.

I may just add, as Lord Selborne refers to the undoubted fact that the delegates giving no reasons for their judgments also did not officially and publicly state any division of opinion, that he will find judicial notice taken of the fact that a delegates' decision was the judgment of 'a narrow majority' in Cockcroft v. Rawles, 4 Notes of Cases, p. 249.

QUARTER SESSION CHARGES.

A.—Public-houses and Beer-houses.

In his charge to the grand jury the chairman at the opening of the quarter sessions at Lancaster said they would be all aware that interest had been excited throughout the country by the decision in Sharp v. Wakefield, which related to a public-house in a remote part of Westmoreland being deprived of its license. That case had drawn public attention very actively to the question of licensing, but he thought the public mind was not fully alive to the position of affairs. There were two important classes of licenses—namely, public-house and beer-house licenses—but probably they were not aware that until an Act passed in 1869 came into operation (and which was known as Sir Henry Selwyn Ibbetson's Act) the issue of beer-house licenses was entirely in the hands of the Excise. The intention of the Legislature no doubt was good; but the result was that the country was completely deluged—he did not think that that was too strong a term to use—with houses of that kind. Unfortunately the Act gave no power to deal with existing houses unless the licenseholders had failed in certain statutory conditions. Offences committed against the tenor of the license would render the holder liable to be dealt with; but unless those conditions arose the magistrates were absolutely without power. With regard to public-houses, it should never be forgotten that no houses had been licensed except at the instance of people in the neighbourhood, therefore it was extremely difficult for magistrates to take action in the reduction of licensed houses unless they were stimulated to do so to some extent by people in the different localities. He was one of those who held very strongly that any material change in any licensing division could only be made after localities had expressed their views definitely to the justices. He thought it would be advisable before any considerable action was taken in this matter that the law as to beer-houses should be put upon the same footing as that for public-houses.

B.—Prisoners' Imperfect Education.

At the opening of the Salford Quarter Sessions the chairman (Mr. Higgin, Q.C.) referred to the imperfect education of many of the prisoners. The grand jury would know that in Parliament last year there was a great struggle as to the age at which children should be bound to remain at elementary schools. One party advocated one age and another party another. But ever since the Education Act came into force the number of persons imperfectly educated was enormous—compared with the total number, it had rather increased than decreased. What was the cause? Some people thought that children were not kept long enough at school, and urged that they ought to remain under their teachers longer than they were at present compelled by law, so that their education, instead of being imperfect, should be complete. He did not venture to express any opinion whatever, because he knew that there were great differences of opinion among persons who were, perhaps, better able to judge than he. At the same time, the fact was that children were imperfectly educated under the system of elementary education.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

With reference to the election of town councillors the burgess roll comes into operation on November 1, on which day in every year (or on the 2nd if the 1st be a Sunday) an election of town councillors takes place. In Manchester, Saturday last, October 24, was the day of receiving the nominations of candidates. A correspondent in a local paper considers, however, that the last day for delivery of nomination papers ought, according to the Municipal Corporations Act, to have been Monday, the 26th. By rule 7 of Part II., Schedule III., to the Act the nomination papers have to be delivered seven days, at least, before the day of the election, and before five o'clock in the afternoon of the last day for delivery of nomination papers. The day of election is (in this year) Monday, November 2, and, counting seven days before the day of election, the last day would be Sunday next. By section 230, where the last day of any limited time appointed or allowed for the doing of any act or the taking of any proceeding is a Sunday, the act or proceeding shall be considered as done or taken in due time if it is done or taken on the next day afterwards. By virtue of section 230 it is submitted therefore Monday, the 26th, was the last day for delivery of nomination papers. Further, only nine days' notice of election is required, which could consequently be given as late as Friday, the 30th, thus allowing only one day between the last day for publication of the notice and the last day for delivery of the nominations (if Saturday was made the last day), whereas the Act contemplates a lapse of two days between the last day for giving the notice and the last day for delivery of nominations. In view of any dispute arising in connection with the municipal elections all over the country, it is perhaps as well to put on record this view of the matter.

CORRECT SERVICE OF A SUMMONS.

According to the County Court rules as to the modes of service of an ordinary summons, it is laid down that subject to the provisions of Order LI., rule 6, the service of an ordinary summons, except in the cases specially provided for in this order, may be either personal or by delivering the same to some person, apparently not less than sixteen years old, at the house or place of dwelling, or place of business of the defendant. If the bailiff shall ascertain that the defendant has removed from the address given on the entry of the plaint to some other place within the district, he shall serve the summons at such place. A place of business shall not be deemed to be the place of business of the defendant unless he shall be the master or one of the masters thereof. At Stockport County Sessions, however, recently, a travelling representative of an assurance company was charged with travelling on the railway without payment of his fare. His advocate said the summons was served in London and left with a sub-manager at defendant's office. This was not, he argued, according to the Act, defendant's 'place of abode,' and he submitted that it was bad service. The bench overruled the objection, and allowed the company's solicitor costs on the defendant's advocate's application for an adjournment being granted. Afterwards, however, the defendant appeared, but the company's representative refused to re-open the case and the bench declined on this account to rescind their order as to costs. The question, therefore, as to whether this was a good service of a summons appears to be still open to a more reasonable settlement.

CURIOUS BETTING AND GAMBLING POINTS.

That deeply rooted and mysterious instinct which teaches most men to gamble whenever they get the chance, presents no easy problem to the legislator. The way is full of stumbling-blocks and dark corners. 'Gaming' cannot be correctly defined. If it could, the definition would include sixpenny points and half-crown bets, and these could hardly be written down as mala in se without regard to extenuating circumstances. Justice is not, however, such an innocent as she looks. She is known to wink occasionally, though she certainly did not at Westbromwich lately, where the landlord of an inn was charged with permitting betting on his licensed premises. A police-constable stated that on a certain day he visited defendant's house, and presently a customer asked what odds he was laying on Martagon. The landlord replied starting price. The customer then said he would have so much on for a win and so much for a place. A betting man who was on the premises, however, advised the landlord not to take any bet in his house, especially from a stranger. The landlord thereupon returned the money to his customer. The landlord did not decline to take the money offered as a bet at first. The landlord's counsel said that the bet was not completed as the money was returned by the landlord to his customer. The bench, after hearing the arguments and evidence, considered the case proved. They held that a bet was made, and whether the bet was withdrawn in a few minutes or a fortnight was immaterial to the case, and, accordingly, fined the defendant. Another case, this time at Manchester, was more favourable to those fond of a game. There the complacent stipendiary of Salford declared, in spite of the persuasions and remonstrances of the police, that playing cards for a glass of beer, or even twopenny jacks, was not gambling as he read the law.

ACCOUNTANTS ACTING AS SOLICITORS.

Quite recently the organ of the chartered accountants indulged in one of its usual complaints as to solicitors encroaching on the functions of accountants and undertaking accountancy work. Perhaps the Accountant has not heard of a far more flagrant instance of accountants infringing solicitors' rights. In many County Courts accountants and their clerks are permitted to appear on behalf of plaintiffs and swear to the debts being due, and the plaintiffs need not, therefore, attend the hearing. If a solicitor appears the plaintiff must be there to swear the debt, and, as a consequence, people who do not wish troubling to attend Court put their case into unqualified hands. A solicitor is taxed heavily for being permitted to undertake business, and yet the accountant is placed at a greater advantage in this respect. If accountants were not allowed to swear to the debts, this would be remedied. This is clearly not as it should be, and probably arises from the remissness of the County Court officials. It is a matter, however, which the Incorporated Law Society might well take up and obtain a substantial remedy.

SHOULD POSTED OFFICIAL NOTICES BE PREPAID?

In these modern days when notices and certificates have to be despatched rapidly, it is a convenience to be able to send them by post. The question arises, should they in that case be prepaid or are they exempt from postage? A doctor sought to recover a sum of money for sending certain certificates of cases of infectious diseases to the medical officer of health under the Infectious Diseases Notification Act, 1889. It appeared that the doctor on one day sent four certificates of cases of infectious disease to the local board medical officer of health in envelopes which were unstamped, so that the medical officer had to pay extra postage. On receipt of these letters the latter gentleman gave the postman notice that he was not to deliver any more unpaid letters. Subsequently three other certificates were sent, also in unstamped envelopes, but were not taken in. In due course the doctor's bill was presented to the local board, who deducted the fee for the three certificates and the expenses the medical officer had been put to for the four letters, but the amount thus arrived at the doctor refused to take. The clerk for the local board, who defended in this case, contended that section 9 of the Infectious Diseases Notification Act incorporated the Public Health Act, 1875, under which the notices should be prepaid, and paid a certain sum into Court. The judge of the Bury County Court, where this case of Chisholm v. The Radcliffe Local Board was tried, considered that medical practitioners were under no obligation to prepay letters containing certificates, and decided in favour of the plaintiff.

A TITLE TO LAND.

A New Zealand chief had taken up his residence upon a piece of land, his right to which was contested. 'I have an undeniable title to the property,' he observed, 'as I ate the preceding owner.'

JUDGMENT AGAINST HUSBAND AS A BAR TO ACTION AGAINST WIFE.

'The argument of Mr. Willis goes the length of asserting that a married woman cannot by possibility enter into a joint-contract, for if she enters into a contract conjointly with another she must always contract in respect of something the other does not, and that this is so even if she jointly contracts with another married woman. This proposition I have never heard before, and I do not agree with it,' said Mr. Justice Smith, naturally with unqualified emphasis, in Hoare v. Niblett. It was a case in which the question, hitherto undecided, arose as to whether, in an action against a married woman on a contract, upon which a previous action had been brought against her husband, the ordinary rule of law would apply, holding that a judgment against one of two joint-contractors is a bar to a subsequent action for the same breach against the other contractor. That principle itself depends on the doctrine of merger, the right of action becoming 'transformed and metamorphosed into a matter of record' (6 Rep. 45), whence, 'if there be a breach of contract or wrong done, or any cause of action, by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a Court of Record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, so far as it can be at that stage; and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit for the purpose of obtaining the same result.' So it was explained in King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, where it was held accordingly that where judgment has been obtained for a debt as well as for a tort, even without satisfaction, the right given by the record merges the inferior remedy by action for the same debt or tort against another party; and so, see Brinsmead v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. P. 547; Kendall v. Hamilton, 4 App. Cas. 504; Hammond v. Schofield, L. R. (1891) 1 Q. B. 453. 'The reason, as I understand it,' said Mr. Justice Smith, in Hoare v. Niblett, is 'that there can be only one judgment upon one entire contract.' Then, what is the position of a married woman, in this connection, in respect of her power to contract, and her liability to be sued for breach of contract? 'The effect of section 1, subsection 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, as it appears to me,' said Lord Justice Fry, in the case of Whittaker v. Kershaw, L. R. 45 Chanc. Div. 320, 'is to allow a married woman to be sued in respect of anything in respect of which a man could be sued, subject to this, that her power to contract is limited, and that the remedy is confined to her separate estate. The right of action is the same as against a man, but the relief is different.' 'It seems to me,' said Mr. Justice Smith, in Hoare v. Niblett, 'that she can contract in the same way as a man, subject to this, that she must have separate estate at the date of the contract, which the man of course need not.'

This being so, what were the circumstances in Hoare v. Niblett, as appears from the report in this month's issue of the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS? It seems that by agreement in writing, dated September 19, 1888, Charles Niblett, the husband of the present defendant, by his agent, Vincent, contracted to let to the plaintiff No. 42 Upper Bedford Place, Russell Square, together with the furniture and effects therein, for the term of one year, and thereby contracted to give to the plaintiff the option of purchasing such furniture and effects. This contract Charles Niblett broke, and thereupon the plaintiff sued him for not letting the house to her and for not giving her the option to purchase, and ultimately recovered judgment against him for 30*l*., damages and costs. Charles Niblett only in part satisfied this judgment, and then became a bankrupt. The plaintiff thereupon commenced another action in the County Court against the present defendant, the wife of Charles Niblett, upon the same contract and for the same breaches for which she had sued Charles Niblett. And the County Court judge nonsuited the plaintiff, holding that this second action was not maintainable by reason of the well-established rule of law that a joint contractor cannot be sued in a second action upon the same contract, though not a party to the first action in which judgment had been recovered. Now, the way the plaintiff sought to make out a case against the defendant was by showing that Vincent in reality contracted with her not only on behalf of Charles Niblett, as stated in the contract, but also on behalf of his wife, the present defendant, and it was taken that legal evidence could be produced in that behalf, so that the case, on appeal by the plaintiff, was discussed upon the hypothesis that both the husband and wife had signed the contract of September 19, 1888. Mr. Willis, for the plaintiff, asserted that, even if it were so, the husband and wife were not joint-contractors upon one entire contract, because by the contract the wife could only contract in respect of her separate estate, whereas the husband contracted personally; and he said that consequently there were two contracts and not one. But they both contracted by one contract in writing to do the same identical thing—they both committed the same breaches and both became liable for the same amount of damages. Why, then, was this not one entire contract jointly entered into by both?

'It appears to me,' said Mr. Justice Smith, 'that Mr. Willis is in this difficulty—if the defendant had separate estate when she contracted, she can contract as a feme sole, and consequently can enter into a joint contract. If she has not, she cannot contract at all. So, whichever way it is taken, the plaintiff cannot succeed, for if the defendant had separate estate then the rule of law about joint-contractor applies, and if not then she cannot be sued. Whichever way you look at it the plaintiff must be nonsuited.' 'Assuming there had been no other proceedings taken under this contract, which ended in judgment being obtained by the plaintiff against C. Niblett, I think,' said Mr. Justice Grantham, 'the plaintiff could have maintained an action; but as in this case the plaintiff first sued Charles Niblett, not as agent at all, but as principal, and got judgment against him, she cannot now sue the wife. The action could only be maintained on one of two grounds—either that she was an undisclosed principal, or else that she was a feme sole dealing with her separate estate. If the former, the plaintiff is precluded from maintaining it, because the only written contract is one by Vincent as agent for the husband; and if the husband is treated as agent for the wife then there is a judgment outstanding against the agent, and until that is set aside you cannot maintain another action against the principal; and if you treat it as an action against the wife, contracting in reference to her separate estate, she must have entered into a joint contract with her husband, because the transaction being one, the contract being one, the subject-matter of the contract being the same, it is exactly the same cause of action in respect of which the plaintiff first sued—namely, a contract to put her in possession of these goods—and she having obtained a judgment on that cause of action, it must be treated as a judgment obtained against one of two joint contractors; and no authority has been suggested that takes the case out of the ordinary law above referred to.'

Clearly, therefore, the original cause of action transit in rem judicatam, within the principle of merger and the well-established rule upon which the decision turned applied. So, in Kendall v. Hamilton (ubi supra), Lord Cairns said: 'Where an agent contracts in his own name for an undisclosed principal, the person with whom he contracts may sue the agent, or he may sue the principal, but, if he sues the agent and recovers judgment, he cannot afterwards sue the principal, even although the judgment does not result in satisfaction of the debt.' And so, where a judgment is obtained against two persons as partners, in respect of a partnership debt, a new action cannot be brought in respect of the same debt against another person who is discovered afterwards to be a partner (ibid.). But, it may be added, where one of two partners, defendants, does not appear, the plaintiff may mark judgment and issue execution against him for the entire demand, without abandoning his right against the co-defendant, which can be enforced by suggestion (Common Law Procedure Act, 1853, s. 97; Order XVI.; Montgomerie v. Ferris, 20 L. R. (Ir.) 282).

SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF INEBRIETY.

AT a quarterly meeting held recently in the rooms of the Medical Society of London, the president, Dr. Norman Kerr, called attention to the remarkable growth of public opinion in support of more drastic legislation for the care and treatment of inebriates. The very general agreement in favour of compulsory power to receive and detain such as have lost all power of voluntary application for admission to a home for inebriates for curative purposes, as exhibited in the recent prolonged correspondence in the Daily Telegraph, indicated an extraordinary advance in the estimation of the general public in approval of compulsion. This proposal was endorsed by the editor, by many other newspapers and journals, and by most of the recent scientific and medical congresses. Several of our colonies had enacted such a compulsory provision, some other countries possessed it, and public opinion was so ripening that the time was opportune for a resolute and widespread agitation in support of this proposal, which had practically originated from the medical profession. On the motion of Dr. Kerr, seconded by Dr. Williams, it was resolved to invite an expression of opinion in favour of compulsion, by individuals and by medical and other associations, and to urge the presentation of petitions to Parliament by all persons interested in the care and treatment of diseased inebriates.

A paper was read by Dr. Wynn Westcott, deputy-coroner Central London and Middlesex, upon 'Alcoholic Poisoning in London, and Heart Disease as the Fatal Result.' After referring to two previous sets of statistics compiled by him, one on alcohol in relation to the general mortality, and the other in special reference to alcohol as a cause of sudden death, Dr. Wynn Westcott gave a summary of the results of a tabulation of 1,900 inquests held in London by himself. Of these cases, two-fifths were children and young persons under sixteen years of age; the remaining three-fifths, or 1,150, supplied 255 cases in which medical evidence testified to alcohol as a direct factor in causing the death. This gives a proportion of one death due to alcohol in every 4·5 cases, a rise in percentage since 1888, when the proportion was one in 5·25 cases in the same district of London. Of these deaths due to alcohol, thirty-eight were suicidal, forty-seven accidental, and 170 from natural (or unnatural) causes. The point especially dwelt upon was that of this last class seventy-three died of syncope due to fatty disease of the heart, leaving only ninety-seven to the account of all other diseases; and, again, of all the deaths due to syncope there was proved alcoholic excess in more than one-third of the cases.

Dr. Wynn Westcott looks upon alcoholic intemperance as the most frequent and important of all the causes of fatty degeneration of the heart; which is a disease very difficult to diagnose, and still more difficult to cure.

F. A. A. Rowland, Esq., solicitor of the Supreme Court, read a paper on 'The Principle of Compulsion as Relating to Inebriety,' in which he laid down that legal restraint in the case of disease must depend upon its peculiar circumstances. Even if inebriety were regarded simply as a vice, how far was the State justified in temporarily depriving the inebriate of his liberty, in the public interest? A liar was left at full liberty while a thief was imprisoned, because experience had taught that property and civilisation could be preserved only by the legal restraint of thieves. In the United States, and some of our colonies, as in France, inebriates (in France other offenders also) could be restrained. Here the inebriate could only be retained in a retreat for any period (not exceeding twelve months) which he had signed for, before two justices. The victim's consent was essential, yet in many cases the will-power has been so impaired as to render his voluntary assent impossible. For the poor the present law was inoperative. On the whole, Mr. Rowland believed there ought to be compulsory power, and that provision should be made for the poor. The liberty to destroy the peace and happiness of a family was, after all, closely akin to the liberty to walk about disseminating small-pox, which was interdicted. There might be some simple process by which the friends of the victim might apply to a County Court judge in his private room, the judge having the power to compel the attendance of medical and other witnesses. Government retreats might have similar powers to the Board schools in compulsory education. Whether regarded as a disease or a vice, inebriety ought to be dealt with in some such efficient fashion, in the interests of the public and of the individual.

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

After a long and somewhat heated controversy as to the desirability of appointing a legal clerk to the Tonbridge Local Board in succession to Mr. J. A. Snelling, the late clerk, who was not a solicitor, the point was on Thursday week last determined in favour of a lawyer, and Mr. Arthur H. Neve was unanimously appointed to the vacant post. Mr. Neve was admitted in 1883, and has ever since practised in Tonbridge.

Mr. Lauriston Winterbotham Lewis (of the firm of L. W. Lewis & Son), of Walsall, has, as president of the Birmingham Law Society, been elected an Extraordinary Member of the Incorporated Law Society. Mr. Lewis was admitted in 1847.

Mr. Richard Henry Barrett (of the firm of Barrett & Dean), of Slough, has, as president of the Berks, Bucks, and Oxon Law Society, been elected an Extraordinary Member of the Incorporated Law Society. Mr. Barrett was admitted in 1865.

Mr. William Cobbett (of the firm of Cobbett, Wheeler, & Cobbett), of Manchester, has, as president of the Manchester Law Association, been elected an Extraordinary Member of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society. Mr. Cobbett was admitted in 1868.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

Debating.—The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, October 27; Mr. Marshall in the chair. The subject for discussion—'That the case of Stuart v. Bell, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. 341, was wrongly decided'—was opened by Mr. Savory, followed by Mr. Watkins.—Mr. Crawford, followed by Mr. Simon, opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: in the affirmative, Messrs. Walton and Willson; in the negative, Messrs. Bower, Thorp, Stevens, Herbert-Smith, Welmoon, Chilcott, Watson, Levi, and Pritchard.—On the motion being put to the meeting, it was lost by a majority of nine.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society, on Tuesday, November 3, is: 'That, as taxation and representation is an essential constitutional principle of this country, women, who pay taxes, should have the same political rights as men.'

Erratum.—It is stated in last week's report of the meeting of this society that the motion was opposed by Mr. Cornelius Wheeler, 'a well-known advocate of Home Rule.' We are requested to state that the word 'advocate' is an error for 'opponent.'

Liverpool.—The next meeting of this association will be held at the Law Library on Monday, November 2. The chair will be taken at 5.30 P.M. by F. J. Leslie, Esq., solicitor. Subject for discussion: 'A.'s donkey and B.'s donkey run in an open race, and A.'s donkey comes in first and B.'s donkey second out of a large number. B. goes to A. and gives him 1*l.* not to start his donkey on the next race. A. promises. B. then backs his donkey to the amount of 20*l.*. The race is run, but A. starts his donkey contrary to the agreement, and it again wins. B.'s donkey again coming in second, B. has to pay the 20*l.* he had laid on his donkey, and claims from A. the 20*l.* so paid. Is he entitled to recover?' Muller v. Gernon, 3 Taunt. 393; Simpson v. Bloss, 7 Taunt. 246; Harrington v. The Victoria Graving Dock Company, 47 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 594; Read v. Anderson, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 779; Kearley v. Thomson, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 742. Affirmative, Mr. J. E. B. Bagshaw; negative, Mr. P. N. Stone.

Failure of Solicitors at Deal.—A preliminary meeting of creditors on the estate of Messrs. Mercer & Edwards, an old-established firm of Kentish solicitors, practising at Deal, was held at St. George's Hall, Deal, on October 27, before Mr. Worsfold Mowll, the official receiver in bankruptcy. Mr. Mercer, one of the partners, who recently committed suicide, had been town clerk for Deal for over half a century. The official receiver stated that he estimated the total amount of liabilities at 94,280*l.* The estimated value of securities was set down at 34,570*l.*, representing roughly a deficit of 60,000*l.*, upon which only 10,000*l.* was expected as assets. A considerable amount of the liabilities is stated to be for trust money. It was decided to take the necessary steps to wind up the estate, and, with the approval of the Board of Trade, Mr. Worsfold Mowll was appointed master.

Registration Appeals.—The hearing of registration appeals from the decisions of the various revising barristers is fixed to take place before the judges of the Queen's Bench Division on Tuesday, November 10. There are eight of these appeals set down—viz. one from the Tower Hamlets, three from St. Pancras, one from the Harrow Division of Middlesex, one from Bangor, one from Kesteven, and one from Bury, in Lancashire. One of the most important appeals is that from the decision of Mr. L. L. Shadwell, Revising Barrister for West St. Pancras, relating to the attestation clause of "lodgers" claims. The barrister decided that it was necessary that the witness to the signature of a lodger claiming a vote should see the claimant actually sign the paper, and that a subsequent acknowledgment to the witness that he had signed was not sufficient. About sixty votes in West St. Pancras are affected by this decision. Mr. Asquith, Q.C., M.P., will appear on behalf of the appellants.

A Former Magistrate of the Thames Police Court.—An interesting presentation was, on Tuesday, October 27, made to Messrs. Mead and Dickinson, the present magistrates at the Thames Police Court, by the Rev. Maurice William Pitman, M.A. This gentleman handed to Mr. Mead an oil portrait of his maternal grandfather, William John Harriott, projector and resident magistrate of the Thames Police. The Rev. Mr. Pitman had previously handed to the late Mr. Saunders, one of the magistrates at this Court, a work, in three volumes, 'Struggles through Life,' written by Mr. Harriott, and which had been placed in the library of the Court. Mr. Harriott was a man of considerable abilities, and had travelled in Europe, Asia, America, and Africa, and at one time he held the office of Judge-Advocate in India, and in 1798 was appointed to act with Mr. Colquhoun in protecting the shipping on the river. At that period much business in connection with the king's ships was transacted at the Thames Court, and in all this Mr. Harriott showed much zeal. He continued as magistrate down to 1815, and much of his original correspondence still exists in the office of the Court. Mr. Harriott was buried in the churchyard at Rochford, Essex, and in the church a mural tablet was erected to his memory. Mr. Mead said he thought it right to draw public attention to the picture, which was that of a former resident magistrate. It was through his instrumentality that the body of police for the protection of vessels on the river, and now known as the Thames Police, was organised. The portrait was given by the Rev. Maurice William Pitman, whose great pride it was to be the grandson of their esteemed predecessor.

Westmoreland Law Society.—We are informed that at a general meeting of the members of the profession, held at the Magistrates' Room, Town Hall, Kendal, on October 17 last, the following resolutions were unanimously passed, viz.: (1) 'That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable to form a law society for the county of Westmoreland;' (2) 'That Messrs. John Bolton (clerk of the peace), J. B. Wilson, and A. Milne, be associated with Mr. Chorley in formulating the proposed objects and rules of the society, and that such proposed objects and rules be referred to a further general meeting of the profession to be held as soon as practicable;' (3) 'It was proposed, subject to confirmation, that no entrance fee be charged for membership, and that the annual fee for membership be one guinea.' The primary objects of the proposed society are as follows: To uphold and preserve the rights and privileges of the profession; to promote its advancement; and to prevent abuses in and encroachments upon it. It has been suggested that the following amongst other matters might receive the society's attention: (1) The formation of a law library of standard textbooks and, if possible, reports. Members being permitted to use the books at their offices (and in the case of members residing at a distance from the library, to have them transmitted), subject to the rules of the society. (2) To provide a room for the library, and use of members, if funds permit. (3) To settle a form of conditions of sale applicable to the county of Westmoreland. Meetings of the members will be held, at such times as may be settled by the rules of the society, to discuss the carrying out of the objects before mentioned, all matters of interest, and any subjects which members may wish to bring before the society.

'OBITER DICTA.'

At a time when the magnates of the University of Cambridge are being convulsed by the question whether the expediency of continuing Greek as a compulsory subject of education ought to be so much as inquired into, it may not be amiss to refer to the manner in which the Legislature dealt with the teaching of Greek and Latin in grammar schools, so far back as 1840, by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77, the 'Act for improving the condition and extending the benefits of grammar schools.' The very lengthy preamble recites that there are many endowed schools for education wholly or principally in grammar; 'that the term "grammar" has been construed by Courts of equity as having reference only to the dead languages—that is to say, Greek and Latin;' that such education, at the period when such schools were founded, was supposed not only to be sufficient to qualify boys or youths for admission to the universities with a view to the learned professions, but also necessary for preparing them for the superior trades and mercantile businesses; that, 'from the change of time and other causes, such education, without instruction in other branches of literature and science, is now of less value, whereby such schools have, in many instances, ceased to afford a substantial fulfilment of the intentions of the founders;' and 'that the system of education in such grammar schools ought therefore to be extended and rendered more generally beneficial in order to afford such fulfilment.' The statute then proceeds to empower Courts of equity to make orders for extending the system of education to other useful branches of literature and science in addition, or even, under certain restrictions, in lieu of the Greek and Latin languages.

Barristers in all countries throughout the civilised world will read with interest the sequel to the recent rescript of the Emperor of Germany on the subject of Berlin crime, in which 'especial reference was made' (we quote from the Times report of October 30) 'to the conduct of members of the bar, who, in defence of prisoners, resorted to proceedings which tended to thwart the interests of justice.' A Court of Honour of the bar of Berlin has considered the conduct of two barristers who appeared for the defence in a trial for murder. They were charged with having accused the presiding judge of partiality, with having in an unjustifiable manner induced the prisoners to refuse any avowal of guilt, and with having abused the rights of defence. Of these charges the Court acquitted them. But they were also both charged with having, by drinking champagne in open Court, violated the rules of conduct governing members of the bar; while one was accused of having sent in an irregular manner to the judge's house for legal documents, and another of having observed an improper manner of intercourse with the prisoners. These charges were declared proved, both barristers were reprimanded, and he who had sent in an irregular manner to the judge's house for legal documents was also fined 500 marks. To what extent these punishments were merited it is, of course, impossible to say without having the evidence before us; but whether the charges against or offences of the reprimanded barristers were small or great (and some of them at least wear the appearance of triviality), the fact that the Court of Honour was set in motion by the imperial rescript is a very serious one. In this, and we believe in most other countries, the bar is an independent self-governing organisation, with which the Executive Government does not interfere.

Pedley & May v. Morris (Notes of Cases, p. 143) is a remarkable but, we think, correct extension of the doctrine of Munster v. Lamb, 52 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 726, that what an advocate says in Court is privileged, and the case is one of very great interest to solicitors. The action was by solicitors against a solicitor for libel by written objections necessary to be lodged under Order LXV., rule 27, sub-rules 39 and 40, for the purpose of taxation of the plaintiffs' bill of costs, and the defence was that the words complained of were published by the defendant only as objections lodged in the taxation referred to, and only in his capacity as solicitor and advocate. The High Court has held that the defendant's objections were the same as objections made before the master, and were therefore made in a judicial proceeding so as to come within Munster v. Lamb, not only in the letter (which we doubt) but in point of principle. We think the judgment right, though we should not be sorry to have the opinion of the Court of Appeal taken. It seems to us that the plaintiffs misconceived their proper remedy, which was to apply to have the matter alleged to be libellous struck out from the 'written objections' under sub-rule 39, by analogy to the procedure for striking out scandalous matter from a pleading under Order XIX., rule 27. The Court has a general jurisdiction to expunge scandalous matter in any proceeding.

If any licensed person permits drunkenness on his premises, or sells any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person, he is liable, under section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872, to the penalties therein mentioned. In Edmunds v. Jones (Notes of Cases, p. 143) the High Court has affirmed a conviction of a licensed person for permitting drunkenness on his premises upon proof that a person came upon the licensed premises drunk, and that some whisky was sold to him while upon the premises. It is beyond doubt that some offence under section 13 of the Act of 1872 had been committed, but we cannot help thinking that the Court was wrong in upholding the conviction in this case, which ought to have been a conviction for selling liquor to a drunken person, with which offence it does not appear that the licensed person was charged. In Martin v. Pridgeon, 28 Law J. Rep. M. C. 179, it was long ago held that a person summoned to answer for one of the offences, of which drunkenness is an ingredient, cannot be convicted of another, and it seems to us that Martin v. Pridgeon is in point, and was correctly decided. It may be pointed out that, if the charge of selling to a drunken person is correctly made, it is difficult for the licensed person to escape it, for it was held, in Cundy v. Le Cocq, 53 Law J. Rep. M. C. 125, that to constitute this offence knowledge of the condition of the person served is not necessary, and that the existence of a bonâ fide mistake as to his condition is no answer to the charge.

Truth earnestly hopes 'that the very earliest opportunity will be taken to repeal' 21 Geo. III. c. 49, by which Sunday entertainments for money are prohibited under heavy penalties. It appears that Sunday concerts in aid of certain hospitals at Bradford have been put down by the Lord's Day Observance Society by an invocation of this statute to their aid, and Truth urges that, from a religious point of view, 'the statute is as indefensible as would be a law enforcing the rite of circumcision,' and asks, 'What would be the effect of this precious Act of George III. upon some of the Roman Catholic churches, where the services include a sacred concert, and where a charge is made for admission?' This question seems to have been answered in Baxter v. Langley, 38 Law J. Rep. M. C. 1, in which the services of certain 'recreative religionists' were held not to be within the statute, and Mr. Justice Byles pointed out that admission to any religious service for payment did not come within it. The statute, however, was held to apply to the Brighton Aquarium in Terry v. The Brighton Aquarium Company and Warner v. The Brighton Aquarium Company, 44 Law J. Rep. M. C. 175, and these cases were followed by a pretty strong agitation for its repeal, with the result that Parliament, after considerable discussion, passed the Remission of Penalties Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 80), empowering the Crown to remit the heavy penalties which might be incurred under the Act, notwithstanding the right of the common informer to sue for them. Under this Act certain penalties were remitted in 1880, shortly after the decision in Girdlestone v. The Brighton Aquarium Company, 48 Law J. Rep. Exch. 373, to the effect that judgment recovered by a friendly informer was of no avail to the defendant company. But how far Mr. Secretary Matthews would be inclined in 1891 to follow the course pursued by Mr. Secretary Cross in 1880, and remit any penalties which might be recovered from the promoters of the Bradford Sunday Concerts, it is hard to say.

In the case of Midwinter v. Midwinter and Edwards (Notes of Cases, p. 142) the question arose whether the Court had jurisdiction to order an inquiry as to the property of a guilty wife against whom a decree nisi had been made for dissolution of her marriage, but before the final decree was pronounced. Curiously enough this point does not appear to have ever been previously judicially determined, although it must frequently have occurred in practice. The wife was entitled to property settled to her separate use without power of anticipation, and the innocent husband sought to have a settlement out of that property for the benefit of himself and the children of the marriage. With a view to such settlement being ordered and executed immediately after the decree was made absolute, he asked for a preliminary inquiry as to the property and the settlement to be made. The argument was that, unless the settlement were made immediately after the decree absolute, the respondent might forthwith marry again, when the restraint on anticipation would revive and prevent a settlement being made. Mr. Justice Jeune had decided that the application was premature, and refused to order an inquiry. The Court of Appeal, however, took a different view of the matter. Their lordships were unanimously of opinion that the Court had complete jurisdiction to direct such an inquiry before the final decree was pronounced, so as to enable the Court to inform itself as to what it could or could not do when the time for doing something arrived. The Court would then be entitled to order the wife to make a settlement so soon as she was in a position to do so by the fact of being divorced. But the husband was required to give security for the costs in case no decree absolute should be made.

The question turned upon the provisions of section 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 6 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, and Rules 95 and 101 of the Divorce Rules and Regulations. Section 45 of the Act of 1857 empowers the Court, in any case in which it pronounces a sentence of divorce or judicial separation for adultery of the wife, if the wife is entitled to any property, to order such a settlement as it shall think reasonable to be made of such property or any part thereof for the benefit of the innocent party and of the children of the marriage or of either of them. Section 6 of the Act of 1860 enacts that any instrument executed pursuant to any order of the Court, under the Act of 1857, at the time of or after the passing of a final decree of divorce or judicial separation, shall be deemed valid and effectual in law, notwithstanding the existence of the desirability of coverture at the time of the execution thereof. The rules referred to provide how applications for such settlements are to be made. As it was very urgently put by Lord Justice Bowen, unless the Court is to do injustice to the innocent party, and place at the mercy of chance the interests of the innocent children, it is essential so to read section 45 of the Act of 1857, as to prevent the necessity of delay between the final order for a settlement and the sentence which the Court pronounces of a final divorce. The inquiry necessary for the purpose of the settlement may take weeks to carry out. And we agree in thinking that there must be inherent power in the Court to provide at any time during the suit for the proper collection of such materials, and at such times as may be necessary to enable effective orders to be made. Justice and the protection of innocent persons require that such orders should be made promptly.

THE case of Brandon v. M'Henry, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 448, lays down a very broad proposition which appears to merit some examination. It was a decision under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, but as the corresponding clause in the Act of 1883 is in substantially the same terms, the question is still one of practical importance. The plaintiff, who was a judgment creditor of the defendant, tendered a proof in the defendant's bankruptcy, not on the judgment but on the amount of the original contract debt. The trustee rejected the proof, and, though the plaintiff took the first steps in an appeal against this rejection, he subsequently abandoned his appeal. Afterwards the bankruptcy was annulled, and the plaintiff then issued execution upon the judgment. On an application by the defendant to set aside the execution, both the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal held that in the circumstances the judgment could no longer be enforced; the rejection of the proof for substantially the same debt being an act done by the trustee within the meaning of the statute (Act of 1883, section 35), and therefore valid and binding on the parties after the annulment of the bankruptcy. As Lord Esher roundly expressed it, the effect of the section is that the claim so rejected cannot be enforced after the bankruptcy is annulled. But it may be doubted whether this sweeping proposition does not go beyond anything required by the facts of the case or contemplated by the learned judges. The proof was rejected by the trustee on the single ground that there was no debt due from the bankrupt to the person claiming as creditor. Suppose, however, that a claim for which a proof is tendered, though a genuine debt, is of a nature not provable in bankruptcy (such as a litigant's claim for costs in certain cases), and that it is rejected by the trustee on this ground. If the estate afterwards realises twenty shillings in the pound and the bankruptcy is accordingly annulled, why should the bankrupt be relieved from liability and the creditor be barred of his right because he has adopted the mistaken and abortive course of tendering a proof for a claim which is not provable? The words of the judgments in Brandon v. M'Henry, unguarded as they are, mean this if they mean anything; but it is to be hoped that they will hereafter be explained to be subject to some such qualification as this: Where a proof is rejected by the trustee, and the bankruptcy is subsequently annulled, the rejection remains valid, and the claim for the amount sought to be proved for is consequently barred, provided the claim is of such a nature that if it were a genuine debt it would be provable in the bankruptcy.

THE reception of the Licensing Committee's report on music, dancing, and theatre applications heard by them on the 1st and 7th inst. was the occasion of some extraordinary demonstrations at a recent meeting of the London County Council. Mr. M'Dougall and his friends attended in considerable force, and strenuous opposition was offered to several licenses which the committee recommended, including one which would enable rooms at a well-known restaurant in Regent Street to be let for wedding breakfasts and private balls. Notwithstanding these protests the license was granted by a majority of two to one, and it is extremely doubtful whether the sections in the new Act relied on by the objectors can be held to apply to private dancing. In other cases where counsel appeared to support the objections of four members of the County Council (some of whom were present and voted) the opposition was successful. Mr. Fardell, chairman of the licensing committee, is reported to have said that 'the course which had been pursued that day was calculated entirely to overthrow their rules of procedure.' The outside public will, no doubt, agree with his opinion, and a revolt against the well-meant but puritanical censorship of public amusements is the probable result to be looked for.

So long a time has elapsed since 'the Claimant' passed into obscurity that, notwithstanding his occasional appearances—now few and far between—in the character of an 'unfortunate nobleman' appealing for pecuniary assistance, any public interest in his fortunes is exhausted. But there are, it seems, still some people to be found who feel an interest if not in 'the Claimant' himself, yet at any rate in his wife. This unfortunate celebrity (if she can be said to have reached that rank) is an inmate of the South Stoneham Union, Hants. Having obtained leave of absence one day last week she was taken for a drive by the wife of a local publican, when, the pony falling, Mrs. 'Tichborne' was thrown out and was considerably cut and bruised. Having recovered consciousness she was taken back to the workhouse, where it is hoped she will regain her usual health. The boldest imposture of the present century—and probably the most expensive—has had as ignominious an ending as a realistic novelist could desire.

THE 'Confirmation Committees' have taken their cue from the Quarter Sessions Courts of Appeal in licensing matters, and very few new licenses have been confirmed. Whether the system works well in counties is open to doubt, and it is certainly somewhat an anomalous state of things when magistrates who do not know a locality or the surrounding circumstances override the unanimous decision of magistrates who do. The case to which a correspondent draws attention in another part of our columns seems a peculiarly hard one; but, under the existing licensing law, there is clearly no remedy and no appeal except to public opinion.

From the annual report of the Hardwicke Society, just issued, it appears that the society is in a very flourishing condition. The average attendance during the session 1890-91 was fifty-four, being the highest on record, while at one meeting (we presume at that which General Booth attended) there were present 170, 'which is nearly double the attendance at any previous recorded meeting in the history of the society.' Copies of the rules of the society are now ready for issue to members upon application to the secretaries, Mr. John M. Gover, 1 Garden Court, and Mr. Walter S. Shaw, 3 Harcourt Buildings. The rules are also to be seen at the Inns of Court libraries.

'LAW JOURNAL REPORTS' FOR NOVEMBER.

The November number of the Law Journal Reports carries the Chancery cases from page 657 to 744; those in the Queen's Bench Division from 633 to 664, and the Magistrates' cases from 145 to 160. The volume concludes with several tables of great practical use and convenience which cover 76 pages. The first is a list of the Public General Acts arranged in the order of their passing; the second is a similar list of statutes, which, being public Acts of a local character, are placed among the Local and Personal Acts. It will be noted that the imperial character of the metropolis is recognised by the inclusion of the Public Health (London) Act in the former category. The third is a list of the Local and Private Acts, of which there are no fewer than 223; the next is a list of the Local and Private Acts arranged in classes. A further table shows in a concise form the effect of the session's legislation. This table is divided into two parts—Table A, showing the effect of the statutes passed last session on former Acts, and the character of the Acts passed, and Table B., exhibiting the reverse process by a list of Acts of former sessions in chronological order repealed and amended by Acts of 54 & 55 Vict. The last item is an analytical index in alphabetical order of the Public General Acts.

In the twenty-five cases in the Chancery Division, In re Tredwell (C. A.) shows the effect of the remarriage of a widow entitled to income during widowhood on the interests of pecuniary legatees. Blackman v. Fysh settles a number of questions—dear to the conveyancer's heart—of forfeiture, gift over, contingent remainder, and class of children entitled under a will. In re Mervyn is also a case of will construction involving questions of class gift, maintenance, remoteness. Vine v. Raleigh (C. A.) decides that certain trusts under a settlement were within and certain others outside the Thellusson Act. In The Westmoreland Green and Blue Slate Company v. Feilden (C. A.) it was held that an action lies by the liquidator in the name of the company against a contributory for calls made before the winding-up, notwithstanding that the liquidator has obtained a balance order in the winding-up for payment of the same moneys under section 101 of the Companies' Act, 1862. Crawford v. Forshaw (C. A.) deprived a renouncing executor of the right to select the charities among which a residue was to be divided. In re Tyler (C. A.) affirmed that the rule against perpetuities had no application to a bequest to a charity with a condition annexed to keep testator's tomb in repair. Bolton v. Bolton (C. A.) decided that an undertaking by a suitor to submit to the order of the Court with respect to a ward came to an end when she attained twenty-one. Pirie v. Goodall was a trade-mark case deciding that 'Parchment Bank' applied to note-paper was not 'fancy words' within the Act of 1883. The term 'brand' in section 64 of the Act was held to include water-mark. In Smith v. Smith six months' interest in lieu of notice was given to mortgagees of a reversionary interest, who were paid off on the reversion falling into possession. According to In re Wilks, inchoate proceedings by a joint tenant to sever the tenancy interrupted by his death was held insufficient to sever the tenancy. According to Wilson v. The Queen's Club, the effect of a lease granted by a mortgagor in possession under section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, is to bind the mortgagee so as to prevent interference with any easement to which the lessee is entitled as against the lessor. In re The Cordova Union Gold Company declares that an agreement to pay for a share in a company by instalments was terminated by a winding up. Turnell v. Sanderson defines the limits of an arbitration clause in partnership articles. In G. v. L. it was discovered that there is still such a person as the serjeant-at-arms attending the Court. The case was one of contempt of Court by the mother of a ward. The London Printing and Publishing Alliance v. Cox (Lim.) (C. A.) was a decision on copyright as affecting a picture. In re Cheesman (C. A.) lays down that there is no rigid rule defining the special circumstances in which an order will be made to tax a solicitor's bill of costs after payment. In Carter v. Silber a husband, married before he was twenty-one, was held entitled to repudiate a settlement made under misconception on his marriage. The General Auction, Estate, and Monetary Company v. Smith states that the rule that directors whose regulations are silent on the subject of borrowing have an implied power to borrow for the purposes of the business is not affected by Baroness Wenlock v. The River Dee Company, L. R. 36 Chanc. Div. 675, note. In re La Compagnie Générale d'Eaux Minérales et de Bains de Mer was a case of wrongful service out of the jurisdiction of an originating notice of motion to rectify the register of trade-marks. In re Llewellin postponed a solicitor's lien to the rights of a mortgagor to his deeds who had paid off and obtained a release from his mortgagee. Ainley v. The Kirkheaton Local Board is a decision on the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 15, 17, 21, 157. The Walthamstow Local Board v. Staines (C. A.) was on sections 150, 257, and 268 of the same statute. In re The Poor Lands Charity, Bethnal Green, decides that the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners under the Charitable Trusts Act, 1860, does not cease with the withdrawal of an application for a scheme. In Salomons v. Knight (C. A.) it is stated that an interlocutory injunction will not be granted in restraint of a libel unless injury is likely to be caused to the plaintiff's person or property by the continuance of the publication.

In the Queen's Bench Division eleven cases are reported. In re An Arbitration between John Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society (C. A.) decided that section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, was not inconsistent with section 36 of the Building Societies Act, 1874. In re An Arbitration between Williams and Stepney (C. A.) involved sections 2 and 25 and the schedule of the Act of 1889. The meaning of 'submission' to arbitration in the Act of 1889 is defined in The Caerleon Tinplate Company v. Hughes. Taws v. Knowles (C. A.) was a case of extinction of easement in consequence of the devise of adjoining properties to different persons. The Bishop of Bangor v. Parry decided that a lease of charity land for a period exceeding twenty-one years without the consent of the Charity Commissioners was void under the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, s. 29. In Heinemann v. Hale (C. A.) a writ of summons issued against a foreign partnership in the name of a firm was held irregular, and the service thereof on a partner within the jurisdiction was set aside on application made before appearance. In The London Bank of Mexico and South America v. Apthorpe (C. A.) income-tax was declared payable on the whole profits of an English business partly carried on abroad. The question in Comfort v. Betts (C. A.) was what constituted an absolute assignment of debts under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, subs. 6. In Levasseur v. Mason & Barry (C. A.) the operation of a receivership order against a French company was considered. Wenman v. Lyon (Honeywill, claimant) decided that a memorandum of agreement for a marriage settlement was exempt from registration as a marriage settlement under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4. In Burt v. Gray it was held that a sublessee of part of leased premises is not entitled to relief as against the original lessor under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 14, subs. 2, 3.

In the six Magistrates' Cases Hotchins (appellant) v. Hindmarsh (respondent) was a case under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, ss. 6, 25. The City and South London Railway Company v. The London County Council (C. A.) involved the extent of the statutory powers of the company. In Regina v. Leresche (C. A.) the point was what constituted desertion by a husband so as to justify an order for alimony. Osborne v. The Skinners' Company settled a question under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. In Ex parte Schofield (C. A.) a conviction for a nuisance was held to be a 'criminal cause or matter' within the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 47, on which there was no appeal to the Court of Appeal. Kearley v. Tonge decided that the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, does not make a master responsible for the unauthorised acts of his servant.

SERVICE OUT OF THE JURISDICTION.—II.

2. Besides satisfying the Court of the existence of a cause of action within the jurisdiction—a subject with which we dealt exhaustively in the preceding paper—the plaintiff had to show by affidavit (a) that the defendant had been personally served, or (b) that reasonable efforts had been made to effect such service, and that the writ had come to the defendant's knowledge. The evidence necessary to satisfy this requirement is very fully discussed in Mr. Justice Day's work on 'The Common Law Procedure Acts,' pp. 12, 13, to which we refer the reader.

3. The third point on which a plaintiff, desirous of proceeding under section 18 or section 19 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, had to satisfy the Court was that the defendant had wilfully neglected to appear, or was living out of the jurisdiction of the Court in order to defeat or delay his creditors. This was a presumption to be raised from the particular facts of each case. It was not a fact to be drily stated, but the affidavit was required to set forth circumstances sufficient to justify the judge in drawing the required inference. If the plaintiff's affidavit were satisfactory to the Court, he was allowed to proceed, under section 28, to final judgment. The only fetter upon his action was the following proviso contained in section 18: 'Provided always that the plaintiff shall, and he is hereby required to, prove the amount of the debt or damages claimed by him in such action, either before a jury upon a writ of inquiry or before one of the masters of the . . . Superior Courts in the manner hereinafter (i.e. by section 94) provided, according to the nature of the case as such Court or judge may direct, and the making such proof shall be a condition precedent to his obtaining judgment.'

Execution upon a judgment thus obtained might be registered under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, and made available against the defendant's property in this country. (Day, ubi sup. p. 15.)

Such was the procedure with regard to service out of the jurisdiction, prior to the Judicature Acts, in actions at common law.

The practice of the Court of Chancery was somewhat different, and depended upon different enactments.

The earliest statute dealing with the subject was a short Act of 2 Wm. IV. c. 33, enabling the Court of Chancery in 'any suit which has been or shall be instituted' in such Court, 'concerning lands or tenements or hereditaments situate . . . within that part of the United Kingdom called England or Wales,' to direct the service of process upon any defendant in such suit then residing in any part of the United Kingdom or the Isle of Man (section 1). Along with any subpœna served under this Act a copy of the prayer of the complainant's bill was directed to be served, and no process for contempt was to be entered without the special order of the Court (section 3).

The next statute in order of time was that of 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 82. Its material provisions were as follow: (1) 2 Wm. IV. c. 33 was extended to (a) all suits instituted in the Court of Chancery concerning any charge, lien, or judgment on lands, tenements, or hereditaments in England or Wales, or concerning any money invested in any Government or other public stock, or public shares in public companies or concerns, or the dividends or produce thereof; and (b) any defendant in such a suit resident in any place out of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (section 1). (2) The procedure under this Act was this: The application for an order had to be made by motion in open Court, supported by affidavits identifying the defendant and his place of residence, and specifying (a) the means whereby the proposed service might be authenticated; and (b) especially whether there were any British officers, civil or military, appointed by or serving under the Crown, at or near the place of such residence. The Court might order service of the subpœna either upon the party himself or upon the receiver, steward, or other person receiving or remitting the rents of the land or premises forming the subject-matter of such suit. In cases where the Court was satisfied that the defendant could not be found or was keeping out of the way to avoid being served with process, substituted service of the subpœna might be ordered (sections 1 and 2).

The powers of the Court of Chancery were subsequently enlarged by the Consolidated Orders, 1860, No. 10, rule 7, which enabled it to order the service of a copy of a bill on a defendant out of the jurisdiction 'in any suit,' and in Drummond v. Drummond, L. R. (1866) 2 Chanc. Div. 32, it was held by the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Vice-Chancellor Stuart in the same case (L. R. (1866) 2 Eq. 335) and overruling the decisions of Lord Westbury in Cookney v. Anderson, 1 De G. J. & S. 365, and Foley v. Maillardet (ibid. 389), that the words 'in any suit' were not confined to suits relating to land, stocks, or shares in England within 2 Wm. IV. c. 33 and 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 82. The ratio decidendi in this case was that under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 94, s. 1, the General Orders of the Court of Chancery, unless objected to within a limited time by a vote of either House of Parliament, were to 'be of like force and effect as if the provisions therein contained had been expressly enacted by Parliament.' Briefly stated, therefore, the practice in Chancery with reference to service out of the jurisdiction had, prior to the Judicature Acts, passed through three stages of development: (1) Before the statutes of William IV. service out of the jurisdiction could indeed be effected, but it was of little use, since, if the defendant failed to appear, nothing more could be done (Fernandez v. Corbin, 2 Sim. 544; Cookney v. Anderson, ubi supra. (2) 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 33 and 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 82 were passed in order to make such service effectual in the cases to which they applied. (3) The Consolidated Order, 1860, No. 10, r. 7, made the purview of these statutes coextensive with the practice in equity.

In the next paper we shall deal with the law as to service out of the jurisdiction under the Judicature Acts and the Rules of the Supreme Court.

HIGHMORE ON THE STAMP ACTS.

The Stamp Act, 1891, and the Stamp Duties Management Act, 1891. With an Introduction and Notes, and a Copious Index. By NATHANIEL JOSEPH HIGHMORE, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Assistant Solicitor of Inland Revenue. London: Stevens & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

THE Acts which we have here before us, passed to consolidate the law relating to the stamp duties payable upon instruments, and to the management of stamp duties generally, come into operation on January 1 next, and will introduce a very beneficial change, as hitherto the stamp laws have been in a state of woeful confusion. Mr. Highmore briefly traces the history of the previous law in a useful introductory chapter. The stamp law, previously scattered over a large number of Acts, was to some extent consolidated in 1870. Since then, however, the law had again become complicated, one of the reasons being that the great majority of the enactments on the subject were to be found in Acts of Parliament dealing not with stamp duties only, but with the Customs and Inland Revenue generally. Prefixed to the present work is a comparative table showing the correspondence between the Stamp Act, 1891, and the antecedent law. The Acts are carefully annotated, and the changes in the law are noted in their appropriate places. The work will be a useful guide to those who desire to understand the present state of the stamp laws.

THE LEGAL DIARIES.

The Solicitors' Diary, Almanack, and Directory for 1892. London: Waterlow & Sons (Lim.)

The Legal Diary and Almanack, 1892. London: Waterlow Brothers & Layton (Lim.)

THESE two useful publications are now ready for their respective patrons. Both are so excellent that it is hopeless to attempt to give the palm to the one in preference to the other. Each of them contains the usual diary printed on excellent paper, and, in addition, several hundred pages of miscellaneous information, including a complete law list, a digest of the Acts of last session, a general index to the statutes at large, a table of stamp duties, &c. It is difficult, in fact, to think of anything you would expect to find in publications of this character which does not find a place within their covers.

CONFIRMATION COMMITTEES.

SIR,—May I draw your attention to the accompanying report (see p. 699) which appears in a Hampshire paper? It speaks volumes as to the working of the present system, which allows magistrates who have no knowledge, or at best a very superficial knowledge, of the requirements of a district to refuse, without explanation, a bonâ fide application which was unopposed on both hearings, and was, moreover, strongly recommended by the bench who granted the license. The chairman of the confirmation committee was Mr. Melville Portal.

Nov. 2. SANATORIUM.

GREEK AT CAMBRIDGE.

SIR,—The recent decision of the senate of Cambridge is no less than a lamentable disaster to middle-class education throughout England. The result will undoubtedly tend to render the universities yet more exclusive than heretofore—the resort of the wealthy and leisured classes rather than the goal of the intellectual and studious of the whole community. Thousands of middle-class youths who cannot enter into commerce or the profession till nineteen or twenty years of age would be incalculably benefited were facilities afforded them of studying from seventeen till nineteen at Oxford or Cambridge. So long as two dead languages are retained as compulsory subjects in the examination (and the eighteen months' university teaching for the B.A. degree remains as six months yearly for three years rather than nine months yearly for two years), the just claim of the middle classes on the universities will be barred, and secondary education remain at the dead level of the present day.

The battle of life must now be fought on truly practical lines, and in the forefront of the fray are to be found the scions of commerce and of industry. The highest educational advantages are as their birthright, and no pedantic obstruction should be allowed to debar them from the full enjoyment of their just inheritance.

Middle-class parents ought to make their opinions clearly known on this important subject without delay. The universities of Oxford and Cambridge are rightly regarded as national institutions, and it savours of the fashion of a bygone age to find that a proposal for inquiry into the advisability of a slight change in the curriculum should provoke such vigorous hostility and meet with overwhelming defeat from the votes of only one of the faculties of which the university is composed —the Theological faculty. To the clergy Greek is undoubtedly an essential study—as is arithmetic to traders—but that is no reason for excluding from a university career the many thousand sons of science, commerce, and manufacture.

The endowments of the two universities, now amounting to nearly 650,000*l.* per annum, were left solely for the educational advancement of those who needed help, not for the wealthy. How this amount (which nearly equals the total revenues of all our City companies) is expended I shall endeavour to show at a public meeting to be held shortly at Exeter Hall, Strand, and at which I invite the presence of all who realise the imminent danger arising from this recent retrograde step taken by the senate of Cambridge University.

MAGISTRATES' CLERKS.

SIR,—I remember seeing in your paper about ten months ago a note of Mr. Justice Wills' remarks at Liverpool (I believe) about clerks to county justices conducting cases at quarter sessions and assizes. I have also read recently in the Times the recent appeal at quarter sessions in the alleged game poisoning case, in which a partner of the clerk to a county bench was allowed to conduct a prosecution. Can you ventilate the matter in some way in the LAW JOURNAL as to the 'usages and rights' (I take these words from a letter now before me in which a clerk to county justices seeks to justify his conduct and the conduct of others) of magistrates' clerks to act as solicitors for and take fees from persons coming before their own bench of magistrates—in fact, conducting their cases.

The matters to which I now particularly allude are applications for transfers of licenses. It is getting quite a common practice for clerks to magistrates to prepare these applications, taking, in addition to the prescribed fees, private fees or costs from the parties applying for preparing and serving such notices, as well as proving the service.

The writer of the above-mentioned letter accuses me of being 'ignorant of the usages and rights of solicitors who hold certain appointments.'

I contend that any such usage is most certainly to be condemned, and that any such claim of right ought to be peremptorily determined once for all. Justices' clerks ought, in my humble opinion, to be perfectly impartial and unbiassed; and how can they hope to be so if they are privately paid? I can vouch for the fact that magistrates' clerks in several counties do this work openly.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

Unreported Cases.

SOLICITORS' CASES.

ON October 30, in the Queen's Bench Division, before Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Wright, In the Matter of a Solicitor and In the Matter of the Solicitors Act, 1888, Mr. F. W. Hollams appeared for the Incorporated Law Society, and read the report of the statutory committee, from which it appeared that the solicitor in question received as solicitor 1,000*l.* of a client, and fraudulently induced the client to lend him the sum in question on the representation that he would give him a mortgage on some land at West Leigh, near Leicester. As a matter of fact he never gave such mortgage, and in fraud of the client's claim deposited the deeds of the land over which he promised to give a mortgage with his bankers as security for an overdraft of 1,700*l.*—Mr. T. Willes Chitty appeared for the solicitor, and said that he did not deny that his conduct was reprehensible, but he had committed no offence against the law unless he happened to be a solicitor. He obtained the money on an agreement to give a mortgage, and then wrongfully deposited the deeds with his bankers. All the solicitor told his client was absolutely true, though he subsequently behaved improperly. The solicitor was admitted in 1874, and held the office of clerk to the guardians and assistant-superintendent registrar.—The Court reserved their judgment until after the adjournment.—On returning to the Court, Mr. Justice Day gave the judgment of the Court as follows: In this solicitor's case we entertain no doubt. It is a case of a very grave wrong. The solicitor induced his client to trust him with 1,000*l.* on the faith of giving him a security on particular property. The money was never so secured. Judging from the dates, it is clear that he never intended so to secure it. He at once pledged the property to his bankers for other money. This is the case of a solicitor who obtains money by fraud. It is true he could not be indicted, because of the technical rule that the representations must be misrepresentations as to an existing fact. Upon the facts it is clear he never intended to give the security, and, whether or not he obtained the money by fraud, he fraudulently misappropriated it. It is a case of gross fraud. A solicitor is an officer of the Court, and is authorised as such to take business. The Court will exercise a careful supervision over such, both for the sake of the reputation of the solicitors' profession and for the protection of the public. It is a duty it owes both to the public and itself. The solicitor must be struck off the rolls. The order of the Court, therefore, was that Lionel Percy Chamberlain, of Pocklington's Walk, Leicester, be struck off the rolls.

In the Matter of Charles W. Davies, an Unqualified Person, Mr. F. W. Hollams, who appeared on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, applied for a writ of attachment against Charles W. Davies for a contempt of Court in acting as a solicitor, being an unqualified person, under the following circumstances: It appeared an action had been commenced against a Mr. Gustavus Las Casas in September last year. A few days after Las Casas had been served with the writ he met Davies at a public-house and mentioned the fact to him, who offered to defend the action. Las Casas accordingly gave Davies a retainer and 10*s.* The retainer purported to retain Mr. A. B. Creeke, jun., of 21 Lime Street, E.C., and was dated September 18, 1890. On the same day Davies entered an appearance in the name of A. B. Creeke. On September 25 Las Casas received a letter from Davies, under the name of Creeke, enclosing a copy of the appearance and an application to strike out the appearance as illusory and irregular, and declining to act any further in the matter.

Las Casas then put the papers in the hands of a solicitor, who wrote for an explanation. Mr. Creeke called in consequence, and said that Davies had entered the appearance, and had done so in other cases. The matter was brought by the solicitor before the Incorporated Law Society, who now brought the matter before the Court.—The Court, after consultation, directed a writ of attachment to issue.

COUNTY COURTS.

PLAINT IN EQUITY—JURISDICTION—CONSENT.

At the Totnes County Court, on Monday, October 19, his Honour Judge Edge referred to the case of Harvey v. Kerby, which was heard at the previous Court. It was an equity suit involving a question of title. His Honour said it was an action outside the ordinary jurisdiction of that Court, and was brought before him by consent of parties, who had also agreed, under section 123 of the County Courts Act, 1888, that his decision should be final. It appeared that by an indenture of June 17, 1889, plaintiff had conveyed to him a farm called 'Simmons and Guests,' with (inter alia) the 'closes, pieces, or parcels of land belonging thereto,' and which were estimated to contain about twenty-nine acres, and which were more particularly described in a schedule and by a plan annexed to the deed. By this plaint plaintiff alleged that several pieces of land were and are part and parcel of the farm, though they were not named on the schedule or coloured on the plan, and he sought to have it so declared by the decree of the Court; but, in the alternative, he said that if they were not so part and parcel it was intended by all parties that they should be conveyed, and he asked to have the deed rectified accordingly. The purchase-money was 3,000*l.*, and as the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court was limited in such cases to 500*l.*, the consent he had referred to was signed before the action was brought. He heard the case at considerable length, and had carefully considered the evidence laid before him, and the cases cited by the learned counsel, and should have been prepared to deliver judgment; but in the course of considering the case a grave doubt had arisen in his mind as to whether he had any jurisdiction as a judge to hear the case or to use the power of the Court to enforce any decree he might make, notwithstanding the consent given by all the parties. It was a proceeding on the equity side of the Court, and it would appear that though by section 64 of the County Courts Act he had unlimited jurisdiction, by consent, in all actions assigned to the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, no such jurisdiction could be given him in equity cases. He knew of no reason why such a distinction between common law and equity actions should have been made, but it certainly did seem that the distinction was made by the section, and it was certainly not under that section that he could exercise the powers of the Act. Section 61 did not seem to help him, and he did not know of any that did. The only way out of the difficulty seemed to him for the parties to make a joint application under section 68 to a judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court for an order authorising that Court to proceed in the action notwithstanding the excess in value of the subject-matter of the action. It would, of course, be idle to give any decision which could not properly be entered upon the record of that Court, and which would not bind the parties. He, therefore, deferred giving judgment until the Churston Court, in order that the parties might consider the position of affairs.—Duke for the plaintiff; Coleridge for the defendants.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

THE usual weekly meeting of the Council of the Administrative County of London was held on November 3, at the County Hall, Spring Gardens, Sir John Lubbock, M.P. (the chairman), presiding.

THE INCIDENCE OF TAXATION.

The local government and taxation committee presented a long report, which had been prepared by a sub-committee, containing an elaborate exposition of the law on the subject of rating as applicable to London, and an examination of various principles connected with it, and of various methods proposed for its reform. The committee, at the conclusion of their report, summed up the propositions which seemed to them to be correct as follows:—

1. Some portion of the burden of the rates should be thrown on owners as distinct from occupiers.
2. All owners, of whatever tenure, whether for years, or for life, or in fee, should bear their due share.
3. Each owner should be charged upon the present amount of annual benefit accruing to him from the property assessed.
4. Each owner should pay part of the rate collected from the occupier by means of a deduction from his rent, according to the method used in the case of the property tax.
5. Owners should contribute to the rates, not only in respect of improvements but of other purposes.
6. Owners should pay, not different proportions of rates levied for different objects, but a fixed proportion of the whole.
7. A fair proportion should be charged upon owners.
8. Half is suggested as a fair proportion.
9. The council should suggest principles only, without attempting a detailed plan.
10. New taxes may be imposed without regard to private contracts.
11. Contracts which contain no stipulations that the occupier shall pay rates need not be regarded.
12. Future contracts by lessees to pay otherwise than as the law directs should be made void.
13. Future increases of old rates may be treated as new taxes.
14. Rates existing at the date of a contract should be left under the operation of the contract.
15. Rates or increase of rates imposed after the date of the contract and before the change of law require special treatment.
16. Some compromise is necessary, as suggested by the committee of 1870, but it should be more speedy and wider in its operation.

Their present recommendations were:—

(a) That the council do accept this report as an exposition of many questions relating to local taxation in London, and as propounding principles of reform worthy of the attention of Parliament.

(b) That the report, if adopted by the council, and the accompanying papers be sent to the Local Government Board, the vestries and district boards, the City Commissioners of Sewers, the boards of guardians, the London School Board, and the Asylums Board.

Lord Hobhouse, as chairman of the special sub-committee, moved the acceptance of the report as an exposition of many questions relating to local taxation in London, and as propounding principles of reform worthy of the attention of Parliament. He emphasised the great importance of the subject to the ratepayers, and urged that, although the council was not a legislative body, they were bound to take up this matter, because what body with such powers did not feel bound when asked to incur such expenditure to take into consideration the ability of the ratepayers to pay? It frequently happened that important improvements had to be postponed because of the heavy burdens already imposed upon the people. It was therefore the duty of the council to study the subject, to explain it as well as possible, to suggest where the law was faulty, and to indicate such reforms as seemed desirable. The most helpful course to adopt would be to look the difficulties fairly and squarely in the face, and thus the committee had submitted their recommendations. Local needs should be met to a great extent out of the value of local property, and persons who received the benefits of local property should contribute to its needs each in their fair share. At present the owners as compared with the occupiers did not pay their fair share, and that led to appreciable and practical mischief. In conclusion, he stated that the idea of the committee's plan was taken from Mr. Goschen, but they had enlarged it, and had made what he believed to be the first attempt to work it out in figures, and with reference to the different cases, so as to show what its real and exact operation would be.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, November 3, Mr. Woodhouse in the chair. The subject for discussion: 'That, as taxation and representation are an essential constitutional principle of this country, women who pay taxes should have the same political rights as men,' was opened by Mr. Herbert Smith.—Mr. Watson opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: in the affirmative—Messrs. Arnold and Harcourt; in the negative—Messrs. Stevens, Wheeler, G. G. Douglas, and Bower.—Mr. Herbert Smith replied.—On the motion being put to the meeting, it was lost by a majority of four.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society, on Tuesday, November 10, is: 'That the case of Jones v. The Merionethshire Permanent Benefit Building Society, L. R. (1891) 2 Chanc. Div. 587, was wrongly decided.

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of this association on Monday, the 2nd inst., Mr. F. M. Hull in the chair, a debate was held on the following subject for discussion: 'A.'s donkey and B.'s donkey run in an open race, and A.'s donkey comes in first and B.'s donkey second out of a large number. B. goes to A. and gives him 1*l.* not to start his donkey on the next race. A. promises. B. then backs his donkey to the amount of 20*l.*, the race is run, but A. starts his donkey contrary to the agreement, and it again wins. B.'s donkey again coming in second, B. has to pay the 20*l.* he had laid on his donkey, and claims from A. the 20*l.* so paid. Is he entitled to recover?' Mr. Bagshaw opened in the affirmative, which was also supported by Messrs. Todd, Bradley, and Archer. Mr. Stone opened in the negative, which was also supported by Messrs. Martin, Crellin, Lloyd, Freer, Byrne, and Gittins. The question was decided in the negative by a majority of 8.

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

MR. E. W. OLIVER, solicitor, of 41 Finsbury Pavement, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer Oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature. Mr. Oliver was admitted in 1880.

Mr. F. Brinsley-Harper has been appointed a Commissioner to take Affidavits for the Province of Quebec, Canada. Mr. Brinsley-Harper was admitted in March, 1891.

Mr. William Swinfen Cottrell (of the firm of Cottrell & Son, Birmingham) has been appointed a Notary Public.

LONDON SITTINGS AT GUILDHALL.—Court I.: At the commencement of the sitting of the Court on November 3, a part-heard case was unexpectedly settled, and none of the parties in any subsequent case being present, the Court was obliged to adjourn. On resuming at 12 o'clock Mr. Justice Wills said that an hour and a half of the Court's time had been lost through parties whose cases were in the paper not being prepared to proceed. It appeared that a notice that jurors in waiting were not required to attend till 12 o'clock had been taken to apply to parties also; but it must be clearly understood that such a notice, which was merely for the convenience of jurors, had no further application, and parties must be prepared for their cases being called on before the jury then in the box, and in future if the parties were not prepared the case would be struck out.

WINCHESTER. — CONFIRMATION COMMITTEE. — The Stone Point Hotel and Boarding House.—Mr. Bell, of Southampton, on behalf of Mr. C. H. H. Candy, applied for the confirmation of a provisional license for the above contemplated hotel and boarding-house, to be erected on a spot midway between the Point and Lepe Coastguard station. There was no population there save the coastguard, nor was there any public-house. The premises were intended purely for a boarding-house for people to use for a seaside resort, and a resting-place for hard-worked people like himself; or rather, perhaps, it would be better to say, the heavily worked clerk of the peace, to have a rest from Friday to Monday. The chairman of the local bench highly approved of the provisional license, and the owner of the land, Mr. Drummond, himself a magistrate, did not oppose, but approved of the application of Mr. Candy, who intended to embark capital there. Evidence was adduced to show that the site was a very convenient one, and that the hotel would meet a real want, and was constantly asked for. The bench declined to confirm the license.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending October 31 was eighty-seven. The number in the corresponding week of last year was seventy-two, showing an increase of fifteen, being a net increase in 1891 to date of eighty-nine.

GRAY'S INN MOOT SOCIETY.—A moot will be held in Gray's Inn Hall on Tuesday, November 10, at 7.30 P.M., before George Candy, Esq., Q.C. Question: 'That the decision of the House of Lords in Sharp v. Wakefield was erroneous.' All members of the Inns of Court are invited to attend. Those willing to argue at this or subsequent moots should write to the Hon. Secretary of the Gray's Inn Moot Society.

THE JUDICIAL BENCH.—Lord Justice Lopes will have completed the fifteen years' service on the bench on Saturday, November 7, entitling him to a retiring pension, and it is rumoured that the learned judge will shortly thereafter tender his resignation to the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Justice Hawkins has just completed his fifteen years' occupancy of the bench; but we understand that his lordship has not the least intention at present of resigning his post.

UNITED LAW SOCIETY.—The second meeting of the session was held at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall, on Monday, October 26, and there was a good attendance.—Dr. Herbert Smith opened the debate: 'That women ought to enjoy the fullest electoral franchise;' and Mr. Common opposed the motion.—The discussion was continued by Messrs. Moyle, Kains-Jackson, Marcus, Le Maistre, Walton, Fox, Bagram, M'Millan, and S. Williams; and the motion, on being put to the vote, was negatived by a majority of five.—The next meeting for debate will be held on November 9, the subject for discussion being: 'That the case of Medawar v. The Grand Hotel Company, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. Div. 11, was wrongfully decided.'

LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS.—A meeting to consider a proposal to obtain a private Act of Parliament for opening the gardens of Lincoln's Inn Fields to the public was held by the provisional committee of the project at their offices, 17 Parliament Street, Westminster, on October 29. The programme of business was to receive a statement from the hon. secretary as to the promises of support received; to consider as to proceedings by private bill in the coming Session of Parliament; to consider the provisions of such bill, if promoted; and to decide as to giving the necessary Parliamentary notices in the month of November. It was, however, resolved that the meeting should be private, and the committee, therefore, conducted their deliberations with closed doors.

THE LONDON SITTINGS.—On November 2, a case having been called on in which it appeared that one of the counsel was engaged at the London Sittings, and it was asked that the case should stand over, and there being another case in which the leading counsel on one side was also engaged to open a case, Lord Coleridge said: As sittings were going on in London (where, however, many of the cases appeared to come from Middlesex), he would be desirous of doing anything he could to assist counsel engaged in causes there and here. In former times, sittings in London and Middlesex did not go on at the same time, and though in old times—when he was at the bar—it had been tried, it was found so very inconvenient that it was discontinued. As, however, it was now revived, anything reasonable would be done to assist the bar. It is well known in the profession that only a part of the cases in the list at Guildhall are really London cases, and fewer still are commercial or mercantile, and great inconvenience is caused by solicitors and counsel, especially in cases which have nothing to do with the City, being engaged at Guildhall.

WILL.—The will, dated March 10, 1885, with a codicil made August 15, 1885, of Mr. Alexander Andrew Knox, J.P., late of 125 Victoria Street, from 1860 to 1878 one of the magistrates of the metropolitan police courts, who died on October 5 last, leaving personal estate valued at 7,525*l.*, has been proved by the sole executrix, his wife, Mrs. Susan Toten Knox, to whom the testator leaves all his property.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS' HOURS OF DUTY.—The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs have decided on the adoption of a step which will practically revolutionise the conditions under which their officers perform their duties. It is intended to introduce a system of relays, so that no man shall work longer than forty-eight hours a week in summer or forty-two hours per week in winter, the latter season to comprise the months of November, December, January, and February. Should the service demand, however, that an officer shall remain on duty more than eight or seven hours per day, according to the season, instead of being paid overtime, as now, he is to be granted a corresponding time off. The new scheme is already in operation at Liverpool and other northern ports, but the men complain that they either do not get their time off at all, or else at such hours and in such manner as to make it useless to them. A meeting will shortly be held to protest against any interference with the present system of duty in London.

LORD SELBORNE ON THE STUDY OF GREEK.—The Earl of Selborne has replied as follows to a correspondent who requested his opinion on the subject of the Greek question in the universities: 'As you wish to know my opinion as to the study of Greek in the universities, I have no difficulty in saying that it ought, in my opinion, to be as much encouraged there now as at any former time, and that the universities are, of all places of education in the kingdom, those in which the duty of cultivating and promoting it is most incumbent. Apart from all other considerations, the fact that the New Testament is written in Greek would alone appear to me to be a sufficient reason for that opinion. It is, I consider, a great misfortune that the Hebrew language is known to so few persons as it is. I think some serious evils have resulted from it, which would be vastly increased if the Greek language also were understood only by a small number of qualified scholars. As to the cases in which the requirements of Greek may be properly dispensed with in favour of students whose special aptitude is for other subjects of study, and who may be trusted to pursue those other subjects in earnest, I am perfectly content to rely on the judgment of the university authorities.'

'OBITER DICTA.'

The temporary absence from the bench, through illness, of Mr. Justice Stirling will be universally regretted. The learned judge is suffering from an attack of eczema, brought on, presumably, by a chill, but we are glad to learn that though confined to the house he is progressing favourably. He will not be well enough to resume his duties until next week; but as he is certainly one of the most conscientious judges on the bench, the profession may rest assured that he will not be absent from his post a single hour longer than is absolutely necessary.

Lord Coleridge's speech to the new Lord Mayor on Monday will, it is to be feared, cause the enemy to blaspheme. When the highest permanent exponent of the law so pointedly gives to would-be litigants Mr. Punch's advice to another class of the Queen's subjects, the cynical layman will be more and more inclined, with an arid smile, to take the advice. 'It may be,' said his lordship, 'the men of London may prefer to have their causes settled quietly and inexpensively by some sensible and honourable man, who knows the nature of the business and may be trusted, to the enormous expenditure and endless delay which often follow the litigation of questions in Courts of law; and I must say that I think a man must have a most uncommon devotion to the "science of the law" if he prefers that questions which Lord Mansfield and Lord Ellenborough left unsettled should be settled at his expense at a cost of hundreds or thousands of pounds, when his own individual case, which of course interests him beyond all other cases, may be decided by some sensible mercantile arbitrator in whom he has faith and confidence.' Such language from the Lord Chief Justice, sixteen years after the great reform in our system which was supposed to have been effected by the Judicature Act, implies the existence of a grave scandal. Bentham held, and it is said that so conservative a mind as Lord Langdale's shared the opinion, that the administration of justice should be gratuitous. It is difficult to see how that result could be achieved without bringing even greater evils than expensive law, as there would be a temptation to magnify every trivial difference into an occasion of litigation.

'When Oliver Cromwell tried to reform legal abuses,' said on a famous occasion the late majestic Lord Justice James, 'he was obliged to abandon the task and to say, "These sons of Zeruiah be too hard upon me." But we do not mean to succumb to their devices.' But the blame of an unnecessarily complicated and costly legal system, which in the long run is as injurious to the legal profession as a whole as it is to the rest of the community, cannot rightly be imputed to 'the sons of Zeruiah' alone. Reform must proceed on the old lines, and improvement is made occasionally, as by Mr. Finlay's Act, in the way of diminishing the number of steps in an action. In this country the knowledge of law is confined to actual members of the profession. The work of Parliament is excessive, and what it does is for the most part done hastily and in a slipshod manner. Legal procedure is, of all subjects which can occupy the legal brain, one of the least attractive; and practising lawyers are too busy with the details of their profession to take a broad and critical survey of the whole existing state of things. What is wanted, and what it is to be feared is not likely to appear, is a man of powerful mind and sufficient leisure to recast the system by diminishing cost, doing away as far as possible with interlocutory proceedings and accelerating the hearing of the real question, lowering the Court fees, and such other means as are possible. Cheap law means more law: and, if a disputed claim could be settled judicially, as it ought to be, for a fraction of the amount at issue, instead of costing, as it frequently does, a sum much greater than that amount, the legal profession would derive more benefit from the change than any other class.

Not very long ago at the Mansion House the Lord Chancellor was jubilant over the transfer, made possible by the Act of last session, of the hearing of civil causes to the City. At the Guildhall the other day he was compelled virtually to admit the failure of the experiment, and to suggest a further amendment of the law by making it impossible for London jurymen to be taken from their business to try questions between people in Somersetshire, Cornwall, or Northumberland. We cannot help suspecting that Lord Coleridge was animated by playful personal malice to the Lord Chancellor in respect of his little Act of last session. We are glad to see that the Times has devoted a weighty leading article to the improvement of our system of procedure. The leading journal points out what has frequently been the subject of comment in these columns—viz. the enormous time which elapses between the first hearing of a cause and the final adjudication in the House of Lords. In The Mogul Steamship Company v. M'Gregor, Gow & Co. the first application was in July, 1885, and even now the decision of the House of Lords is in suspense. This monstrous delay, as we have over and over again insisted, could be prevented by a rearrangement of the existing staff of judges, and one cause be removed which in weighty matters discourages commercial men from having recourse to our Courts. But the Lord Chancellor, it is to be feared, is not a very earnest law reformer. It was not worth while to pass an Act to enable an ex-Lord Chancellor to sit elsewhere than in the House of Lords, whilst four highly-paid Lords of Appeal are allowed to lead lotus-eating lives on 250 out of the 365 days in the year.

The Great Northern Railway Company, so it is stated, will shortly abolish second-class fares and carriages, and it is believed that more than one other large railway company will also follow the example set by the Midland Railway Company many years ago. To what extent are railway companies quite free to make such alterations? Upon reference to the numerous special Acts under which the maximum fares for passengers are authorised, we believe that only a single one of them (which we will mention presently) can be found which does not contain three separate sets of maximum fares for passengers conveyed in first-class, second-class, or third-class carriages respectively. Taken by themselves, these special Acts do not, we think, bind the companies to divide passengers into three or even two grades, so that, as far as the special Acts are concerned, the companies might abolish all distinction of classes at their pleasure, and run omnibus carriages without any distinction of classes whatever. But the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, which is enforceable by the Railway and Canal Commission, provides that every railway company shall according to its powers afford all reasonable facilities for receiving, forwarding, and delivering of 'traffic,' which term includes passenger traffic. Under the special Acts passenger traffic is clearly divided into three parts, and it seems to us that to entirely abolish all facilities for carrying one part is at any rate a theoretical contravention of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. A propos, it may be pointed out that the recent revisions of railway charges, which have been carried out by nine special Acts passed in the late session, concern rates for goods alone, and in respect of passenger fares the Acts of more than one company will be found to stand greatly in need of revision. The South-Eastern maximum, for instance, is 3½*d.* per mile for every passenger, without any distinction of class; whereas the Great Northern maximum is 2*d.* for first class, 1½*d.* for second class, and 1*d.* for third class, while in the case of 'express' trains the maximum rises to 3*d.* per mile (see 6 Wm. IV. c. 75, s. 129—South-Eastern; and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 13—Great Northern).

The Lord Chancellor has now definitely committed the Government to a Criminal Law Evidence Bill, by which all accused persons are to be enabled to give evidence. We have very frequently (see e.g., ante, pp. 387 and 447) commented on one or other of the regular succession of Government bills which have been submitted to Parliament with this object during the last thirteen years; and we have also drawn attention (see Law Journal for 1890, p. 443) to the all-important fact that it is Irish opposition, and Irish opposition alone, that now prevents a measure of this kind being passed into law. For ourselves, we see no reason whatever why, if the Irish or Scotch members do not wish such a bill to extend to Ireland or Scotland, Ireland or Scotland, or both as the case may be, should not be excluded from its operation. The most cursory perusal of the many entries in the Index to the Statutes under the three separate headings of 'Evidence,' 'Evidence (Scotland),' and 'Evidence (Ireland),' will show the reader a multitude of cases in which separate statutes relating to evidence have been passed for the three countries of the United Kingdom.

Notwithstanding the opposition from more quarters than one in the House of Commons, the Statute Law Revision Bill, as originally introduced by Mr. Smith, has been passed with little alteration, and become the Statute Law Revision Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 67), occupying eighty-seven pages of the Statute-book, and repealing 405 statutes wholly or in part, of which 336 are statutes of the present reign. The first of the statutes repealed is 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 48, 'to amend the several Acts for the regulation of attornies and solicitors,' which is wholly repealed, and the last, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 114, which is only repealed in part. By far the majority of the repeals are partial only—e.g. of 'the Act to abolish the punishment of death in cases of forgery' (7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 84), only sections 1 and 2 are repealed, and section 1 is repealed only 'so far as relates to the punishment of offences formerly punishable under 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 123.' Sir Horace Davey has rescued from the general repeal of preambles the very important preamble to section 90 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the 'equality clause' which sets forth the reasons for compelling railway companies for charging all their customers alike, and the preamble to section 4 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, which sets forth that 'it is expedient that the policy of revision or purchase shall in no manner be prejudged, but should remain for the future consideration of the Legislature upon grounds of general and national policy,' will still appear upon the Statute-book. It is expressly provided, as in former Revision Acts, that 'the repeal of any words or expressions of enactment shall not affect the binding force, operation, or construction of any statute or of any part of a statute, whether as respects the past or the future,' and that if any repealed enactment has been applied by Order in Council to any inferior Court of civil jurisdiction, 'such enactment shall be construed as if it were contained in a local and personal Act specially relating to such Court and shall have effect accordingly.'

A SUB-LESSEE of part of premises leased is not entitled to relief against forfeiture in an action of ejectment by the lessor. So it was held in Burt v. Gray, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 634, and the opinion of the two learned judges Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Williams, who decided the case, appears to have been that a sublessee of the whole of the premises leased would have no better locus standi to apply for relief than a sublessee of part. The action was one of a very common type, being by the assignees of the lessor of twenty-four houses under a proviso for re-entry upon breach by the lessees of their covenant to repair. 'The property having been sublet in three separate lots, the three sublessees were joined as defendants,' whereupon one of them 'whose sublease comprised eight houses, all of which were in good repair, had applied at chambers for relief under section 14, subsection 3, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.' By subsection 2 of this well-known enactment, 'where a lessor is proceeding to enforce a right of forfeiture, the lessee may in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the Court for relief,' while by subsection 3, for the purposes of this section, 'a lease includes an original or derivative underlease, and a lessee includes an original or derivative underlessee.' The Court thought that the Act was not intended to create a privity where there was no privity before, and Mr. Justice Mathew observed that to apply the Act to a sublease of part 'would lead to most inconvenient results, as if an order granting relief were made in favour of the sublessee of the one part of the premises comprised in a lease, the property which was the subject-matter of the lease would become dislocated.' But how about the inconvenience to the part sublessee, who, for no fault of his own, may lose just what it was the object of the Act to secure to him? On both points we cannot help thinking that the decision is wrong. Grammatically the interpretation of 'lessee' will include the case of the sublessee and the part sublessee also, while it seems to us to be quite plain that they are both within the spirit of the Act. We presume that early next session the attention of the Legislature will be called to the point by the introduction of a bill to amend the Conveyancing Act.

IF a man has power to lease for twenty-one years only, and he leases for more than twenty-one years, is the lease good for the twenty-one years, or is it void altogether? This was the kind of question which Mr. Justice Charles had to decide in The Bishop of Bangor v. Parry, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 646, and he has decided that the lease is void. The question arose on the construction of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1885, s. 29, by which 'it shall not be lawful' for charity trustees, otherwise than with the authority of Parliament, or of a Court of competent jurisdiction, or according to a regular scheme, or with the approval of the Charity Commissioners, to grant any lease for any term exceeding twenty-one years. Charity trustees had, without the sanction of any of these authorities, made a lease for forty-five years; but it was contended that such a lease would take effect within the lawful limit of twenty-one years.' Against this contention the House of Lords' case of The Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts, 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 579, was cited—a case quite fatal and conclusive, unless it could be distinguished. Now in The Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts the restraining statute was 13 Eliz. c. 10, the words of which are as positive as they are archaic, for they enact that any lease in contravention of that statute is 'to be utterly void and of none effect to all intents, constructions, and purposes, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.' But Mr. Justice Charles, though recognising the difference between this forcible language and the milder phrases of the Legislature of 1855, could not see any legal distinction between the two. The point is a very important one, and looking to the rule of construction that every document is to be construed 'ut res magis valeat quam pereat,' we are slightly inclined to doubt the correctness of the decision. But we have no doubt that the further point taken for the defendant—that though the lease might be void the covenant for quiet enjoyment might subsist—was properly treated by the learned judge as unsound.

IN the November number of the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS we report three cases on the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), and two of them are of great importance. In The Tabernacle Building Society Case, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 632, the Court of Appeal had to consider the meaning of that puzzling section 24, by which the Act is to apply to every arbitration under any Act passed before its commencement, 'except so far as it may be inconsistent' with such other Act. The Building Societies Act, 1874, s. 36, enacts that the determination of the arbitrator under that Act is to be final, but that the arbitrator may, at the request of either party, state a case for the High Court. The Arbitration Act, 1889, by section 19, enacts that any arbitrator may at any stage of a reference, and shall, if so directed by the Court or a judge, state a similar case. Are these two enactments inconsistent? Baron Pollock at chambers held that they are not, the High Court held that they are, and now the Court of Appeal has held that they are not, and ordered arbitrators under the Building Societies Act to state a case. On a careful perusal of the two sets of judgments, we cannot but think that the Court of Appeal is wrong, for the reasons given by Mr. Justice Wills. 'May' and 'must' cannot stand together. We hope that the building societies will take the case to the House of Lords. In the second case, The Caerleon Tinplate Company v. Hughes, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 640, the High Court has held that a 'submission,' to come within the Act, must be in writing and signed by both parties as their agreement, so that in an action for the price of goods sold, where the bought-note signed by the defendants provided for arbitration, while the sold-note signed by the plaintiffs did not, there was no submission within the meaning of the Act. Ex parte Munro, 45 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 416, decided on the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, appears to be quite in point, and the judgment in that case shows the reasons for the decision in The Caerleon Tinplate Company v. Hughes. There must be a complete agreement in writing, signed by both parties, for the Act to apply.

Ecce iterum crispinus. We have more than once denounced (see ante, pp. 1, 15) the abominable system, as Mr. Justice Wills described it, under which the clerks to county justices (or some of them) conduct prosecutions, whereas clerks to borough justices are disqualified from doing so by section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, re-enacting section 102 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835. 'An Old Subscriber' (see ante, p. 693) now again summons us to the attack, and asks us to 'ventilate the matter in some way' by examining the alleged 'usages and rights' by which clerks to justices 'act as solicitors for and take fees from persons coming before their own bench,' particularly in connection with transfers of licenses. That there is a usage to this effect is undoubted, and we have no hesitation in again stigmatising it as an abominable usage, which ought to be abolished. That the clerks to the county justices have any rights in the matter so as to give them a claim to compensation when the principles of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, are applied to counties, we utterly deny. Perhaps some clerk to county justices will favour us with the grounds on which this alleged right is founded. Meanwhile we would recommend 'An Old Subscriber' to request his representative in the House of Commons to ask the Home Secretary whether he intends to introduce a bill to assimilate the county to the borough practice in this matter, and if not, why not? If our memory serves us right, some member of the present Government has already admitted the present state of things to be 'theoretically indefensible.'

THE common law disqualification of a judge on the ground of interest, so emphatically asserted by the House of Lords in Dimes v. The Grand Junction Canal Company, 3 H. L. 759 (in which Lord Chancellor Cottenham was the interested judge), has been once more judicially recognised in Regina v. Gaisford, Notes of Cases, p. 148, with the result that an order of a justice of the peace upon a surveyor of highways to clear away soil from a highway was quashed on the ground that the justice had himself taken a part in originating the proceedings, and also that he was pecuniarily interested as a ratepayer. It should be pointed out, however, that the disqualification of justices for interest has been partially removed by two statutes—firstly, by 16 Geo. II. c. 18, whereby justices, though ratepayers, may make orders as to numerous matters therein specified, of which repair of the highways is one; and, secondly, by the Justices of the Peace Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 15), whereby justices may act though members of a body liable to contribute to, or be benefited by, any fund to the account of which certain penalties which they may impose would be carried. In the case of judges of the Supreme Court, all disqualification on the ground of rateability is absolutely removed by 40 Vict. c. 11. The common law disqualification has had statutory expression as to justices of the peace by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Licensing Acts (see Act of 1872, s. 60), and as to the Railway Commissioners by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888.

A QUESTION of very general interest was raised in the recent case of Wenman v. Lyon, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 666—viz. whether a memorandum of agreement, not under seal, for a marriage settlement was a 'marriage settlement' within the meaning of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31). The Court of Appeal, affirming the decisions of the County Court judge and of the Divisional Court, were clearly of opinion that it was, and that, consequently, such a memorandum did not require to be registered under the Act. It would have been a curious anomaly that an agreement for a marriage settlement should require registration as a bill of sale, while a settlement does not.

AN important question upon the construction of the Arbitration Act, 1869, was determined by the Court of Appeal in In re An Arbitration between Williams and Stepney, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 636. By section 2 of the Act, 'a submission, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, shall be deemed to include the provisions set forth in schedule 1 to this Act so far as they are applicable to the reference under the submission,' and by one of these provisions the costs of the reference and award are to be in the discretion of the arbitrators. The question raised in the above case was whether section 2 and the schedule were applicable to an arbitration begun after, but under an agreement entered into before, the commencement of the Act. A Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Day, held that they were not, and that consequently the arbitrators had no power to award costs, there being nothing in the agreement enabling them to do so. The Court of Appeal, however, took a contrary view, holding that section 25 applied the provisions of the whole Act, including section 2 and the schedule, to the arbitration in question. Having regard to the language of section 25, it is very difficult to doubt that the latter is the true construction, for that section provides that the Act 'shall not affect any arbitration pending at the commencement of this Act, but shall apply to any arbitration commenced after the commencement of this Act under any agreement or order made before the commencement of this Act.' As was forcibly pointed out by Lord Justice Kay, the effect of the argument for the respondent was to introduce the words 'except section 2' into section 25.

THE question whether the Divorce Court has jurisdiction to grant permanent alimony to a wife against whom a decree for judicial separation has been made at the suit of the husband, came before the Court of Appeal in Goodden v. Goodden (Notes of Cases), and was decided in the affirmative. If the decree had been founded upon misconduct of the husband, it was conceded that such a grant could have been made. But as, in the present case, it was on the ground of the wife's cruelty that the judicial separation had been ordered, the argument urged on behalf of the husband was that the Court had no jurisdiction to compel him to pay her alimony. The question turned upon the several statutes under which the present Divorce Court was constituted. In construing these statutes, however, the Court must have regard to the jurisdiction existing before they were passed. As the Court of Appeal observed, the granting or refusing of alimony, after a divorce a mensa et thoro, seems to have been a matter upon which the Ecclesiastical Courts exercised a large discretion. It may not, their lordships remarked, have been customary to grant it to a wife who was in fault; but to say that there was no jurisdiction to do so seemed to them unreasonable.

The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, contains no words expressly negativing the jurisdiction; but the argument against it was founded chiefly upon section 17 of that Act, which provides that application for judicial separation may be made by either husband or wife, and the Court may decree judicial separation accordingly, 'and where the application is by the wife may make any order for alimony which shall be deemed just.' The Court of Appeal considered that it would be giving extraordinary and unnatural force to the language of section 17 to say that it took away or even negatived the jurisdiction of the Court to grant alimony where the decree for judicial separation was made on the husband's petition; and in their opinion that was not the true effect of the provision. They saw no reason to doubt that the Ecclesiastical Courts had jurisdiction to grant permanent alimony in a case like the present, and they could not construe the Divorce Acts as depriving the Divorce Court of a like jurisdiction.

The appointment of Sir John Gorst, Q.C., M.P., to be Financial Secretary to the Treasury is a distinct recognition of his possession of ability and qualifications outside the ordinary sphere of a lawyer. The success of Sir John in his new position will be heartily desired by all members of his profession irrespective of party politics.

Notwithstanding the Solicitor-General's letter to Mr. Bramwell Booth, there is a distinct improvement in the position of affairs at Eastbourne, and a growing determination to enforce the observance of law and order. The early decision of the points of law which, it is stated, will be raised in the pending action may probably tend to restore peace and quietness to the unfortunate borough. Mr. Justice Hawkins, to whom the matter was mentioned in Court a few days ago, was quite 'himself again' in his caustic remarks, especially when he 'declined with thanks' the suggestion that his lordship might return to Lewes to try the action.

The recent proceedings of the London County Council with reference to certain music and dancing licenses, to which we alluded in our last issue, have not been allowed to go unchallenged. Mr. Finlay, Q.C., has obtained rules nisi, and the whole question, therefore, of the right of certain councillors to engage counsel to advocate their special views and objections will be discussed and decided. In the interests of the persons aggrieved and of the general public, it is very important that a question of this kind should be speedily and definitely settled.

The Lord Chancellor was in his happiest vein at the Lord Mayor's banquet on the 9th inst. The advice which his lordship gave to provincial litigants, 'to wash their dirty linen at home' (though, as a fact, he only hinted this 'unpleasant simile' and substituted less forcible language), was undoubtedly sound. The Courts in the City of London are intended for the trial of important commercial questions arising in the City, and not for merely personal disputes between litigants in Cornwall or Northumberland. But the notorious uncertainty of cases being properly and patiently tried at assizes may explain a good deal of the practice of which the Lord Chancellor complains. Perhaps this explanation, which we believe is the correct one, had not occurred to Lord Halsbury. At any rate, we respectfully commend it to his consideration.

DUTY ON SETTLEMENTS OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

An interesting case involving an important principle with regard to the liability to duty of settlements of personal property has recently been reported. We allude to the case of The Attorney-General v. Chapman and another, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 602. The case came before the Court on an information by the Attorney-General, and was met by a demurrer, so that the neat point involved was summarily disposed of, there being no dispute about the facts. The story may be told with sufficient fulness in a very short compass. A Mrs. Fitzgerald had, under a marriage settlement, executed in 1843 a general power of appointment exercisable in certain events over a sum of consols subject to her own and her husband's life interest. The proceeds of certain real estate became subject to the same trust. She executed the power by a deed in 1848 in favour of her niece Elizabeth Chapman, and died in 1888. The question was whether the property so appointed was liable to duty under the Acts which we shall now proceed to consider.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, subs. (c), imposes liability to duty on 'any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life is reserved to the settlor.'

Now, what is a voluntary settlement? This is to some extent explained by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889. It enacts that the description of property marked (c)—i.e. the property referred to in the section which we have previously quoted—is to be construed as if the expression 'voluntary settlement' included any trust whether expressed in writing or otherwise in favour of a volunteer, and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not as between the settlor and any other person. The Court had no difficulty in determining, by the help of this definition and the decision in In re Cameron and Wells, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 69, that Elizabeth Chapman must be treated as a volunteer. The second, and much more difficult, point was, whether the life interest was reserved to the settlor by the settlement under which Elizabeth Chapman took an interest. It was contended that the property in question passed under the deed of appointment, and that as that deed reserved no interest, the provisions of the Act of 1881 did not apply. This point was disposed of in favour of the Crown, by the consideration that the expression 'passed under' is not a term of art like 'estate in fee' or 'remainder' and a host of others, but a comprehensive term which would include a case where the disposition was effected not by the original deed but by a subsequent execution of a power created by it. A deed of appointment, as was pointed out, owes its vitality to the instrument creating it. What was the object of the Act? It was to ensure that the equivalent of legacy duty should be paid in cases where otherwise devices might be resorted to which would practically enable the person beneficially interested to make a will without liability to legacy duty. Here if Mrs. Fitzgerald had had the property in the ordinary way and had given it to her niece, legacy duty would be payable. Practically she had the same thing in the shape of a general power of appointment. 'It would,' said Mr. Justice Wills, 'be a hardship upon persons who have to pay legacy duty if, because the whole beneficial interest in the property existed in the form of the right to exercise a general power of appointment to take effect on the death of the donee of the power, no duty equivalent to legacy duty should be payable upon the devolution of the property to the person to whom it was appointed.'

A somewhat novel, and certainly ingenious, argument was pressed upon the Court in the present case on behalf of the defendants in resisting the claim of the Crown. The Customs and Inland Revenue Act applies to the whole of the United Kingdom. The observation of Lord Campbell in Lord Saltoun v. The Advocate-General, 4 Macq. 659, 671 (a case decided on the Succession Duty Act, 1853), was cited to the effect that in such cases the intention of the Legislature must be understood to be that the like interests in property taken by succession should be subjected to the like duties wheresoever the property might be situated. 'The technicalities of the laws of England and Scotland,' said Lord Campbell, 'where they differ must be disregarded, and the language of the Legislature must be taken in its popular sense.' It was accordingly contended that the language of the Act of 1881 must be taken in its popular sense, and without reference to the doctrine of the English law as to interests under powers on the ground that the Scotch law on the subject was different and that the Act was intended to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. To this the answer was made that on three successive occasions the House of Lords had applied to the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), which applies to the whole of the United Kingdom, the principle that the interest created by the power must be treated as arising under the deed creating the power. The contention accordingly failed, and judgment was given in favour of the Crown.

SERVICE OUT OF THE JURISDICTION.—III.

The Rules of Court, made under the Judicature Act, 1875, dealt with service out of the jurisdiction in a somewhat summary manner. Order XI., rule 1, provided that 'service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the Court or a judge whenever the whole or any part of the subject-matter of the action is land or stock or other property situate within the jurisdiction, or any act, deed, will, or thing affecting such land, stock, or property, and whenever the contract which is sought to be enforced or rescinded, dissolved, annulled, or otherwise affected in any such action, or for the breach whereof damages or other relief are or is demanded in such action was made or entered into within the jurisdiction, and whenever there has been a breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, and whenever any act or thing sought to be restrained or removed or for which damages are sought to be recovered was or is to be done or is situate within the jurisdiction.'

An examination of the practice under this rule falls beyond the purview of the present papers. The only point of historical interest connected with it is the omission of the clause in section 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which exempted British subjects* residing in Scotland or Ireland from the provisions as to service out of the jurisdiction. For a very short time this omission passed unnoticed. Then it was observed, there was an outcry by the Scotch and Irish members, and Order XI., rule 1 (a) was framed for the protection of Scotchmen and Irishmen. The sequel is well described in the judgment of Mr. Baron Huddleston in Lenders v. Anderson, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 104; L. R. (1883) 12 Q. B. Div. 57. 'Rule 1 (a),' said his lordship, 'directed that the judge, in exercising his discretion as to granting leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction, should have regard to the amount or value of the property in dispute or sought to be recovered, and to the existence in the place of residence of the defendant, if resident in Scotland or Ireland, of a local Court of limited jurisdiction, having jurisdiction in the matter in question, and to the comparative cost and convenience of proceeding in England or in the place of such defendant's residence. It was also provided that no such leave was to be granted without an affidavit stating the particulars necessary for enabling the judge to exercise discretion in manner aforesaid, and in practice leave was not granted under this rule without an affidavit showing that there was no such local Court as mentioned in the rule, and that it was cheaper or more convenient to try the case in England. It was thought that this provision might satisfy the Scotch and Irish members, but it seems probable that pressure was brought to bear upon them in order that those whom they represented might again enjoy the privilege of being only liable to be sued in their own country according to the principle actor sequitur forum rei.'

These rules were therefore prepared, and the law as to service out of the jurisdiction was settled, almost on its present basis, by the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, Order XI. The provision in that Order that is material for the purposes of these papers, is as follows:—

'Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the Court or a judge whenever (a) the whole subject-matter of the action is land situate within the jurisdiction (with or without rents or profits); or (b) any act, deed, will, contract, obligation, or liability affecting land or hereditaments situate within the jurisdiction is sought to be construed, rectified, or set aside in the action; or (c) any belief is sought against any person domiciled or ordinarily resident within the jurisdiction; or (d) the action is for the administration of the personal estate of any deceased person who at the time of his death was domiciled within the jurisdiction, or for the execution (as to property situate within the jurisdiction) of the trusts of any written instrument of which the person to be served is a trustee, which ought to be executed according to the law of England; or (e) the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction wherever made, which according to the terms thereof ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland; or (f) any injunction is sought as to anything to be done within the jurisdiction or any nuisance within the jurisdiction is sought to be prevented or removed whether damages are or are not also sought in respect thereof; or (g) any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction' (rule 1). The subsidiary rules will be considered in their proper place.

Now, in dealing with the modern law as to service out of the jurisdiction, we propose, as far as possible, to avoid the ground that is so admirably covered by the 'Annual Practice,' and to leave all questions of mere procedure resolutely alone. We will discuss first the general scope of Order XI. and the kinds of process to which it applies, and then each of the clauses above quoted, and, lastly, the origin and provisions of the new rules relating to service on firms in so far as these are relevant to the consideration of the law of service out of the jurisdiction.

With regard to the general scope of Order XI., the following preliminary rules may be laid down:—

1. 'Service out of the jurisdiction is an interference with the ordinary course of the law, for generally Courts exercise jurisdiction only over persons who are within the territorial limits of their jurisdiction. . . . Apart from statute a Court has no power to exercise jurisdiction over anyone beyond its limits' (per Lord Justice Cotton in In re Busfield, 55 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 467; L. R. (1886) 32 Chanc. Div. 131).

2. Order XI. is exhaustive, and is intended to, and does in fact supersede the old practice.

In In re Eager (52 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 56; L. R. (1882) 22 Chanc. Div. 86)—a case decided under the Judicature Rules, 1875—and In re Busfield (ubi sup. at p. 123), a vigorous and ingenious effort was made to establish a contrary doctrine. In In re Eager, an action (Eager v. Johnstone) had been brought by an infant for the administration of certain real and personal estate, and, if necessary, for appointment of new trustee. The defendant was trustee and executor of the will, and was charged with breaches of trust. The plaintiff applied for leave to serve the writ of summons on the defendant, who was a British subject residing in Scotland. In In re Busfield an application was made for leave to serve an originating summons on a trustee and executor temporarily resident at Avignon. In both cases it was admitted that Order XI. did not directly apply. Breach of trust was obviously not included in any of the clauses of rule 1, and, although an originating summons had been held to be an action within the meaning of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100 (In re Fawsitt, 54 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 1,131; L. R. (1885) 30 Chanc. Div. 231), the Court of Appeal had in that very case held it to be 'a civil proceeding commenced otherwise than by writ,' and Order XI. authorised only the service of a writ, or notice of a writ, of summons. The argument in favour of the application was, therefore, in both cases put in something like the following way: In Drummond v. Drummond, 36 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 153; L. R. 2 Chanc. 32, Lord Chelmsford and Lord Justice Turner had held that, by virtue of the Consolidated Orders, 1860, Order X., rule 7, the Court of Chancery had power to allow service out of the jurisdiction 'in any suit of equity.' That decision had been given in spite of the fact that the statutes of William IV. limited the right to order service out of the jurisdiction to certain specified suits, and the practice which it inaugurated had lasted till the enactment of the Rules of the Supreme Court in 1883. The same liberal interpretation, therefore, which the Court of Appeal in Chancery had put upon the statutes of William IV. should now be put on the Rules of 1883. Our readers hardly need to be reminded that the ratio decidendi in Drummond v. Drummond was the fact that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 94, gave to the General Orders in Chancery the binding effect of an Act of Parliament. But, however that may be, the argument for the applicant both in In re Eager and in In re Busfield was unsuccessful, and it was held by Jessel, M.R., in the former case, and by Mr. Justice Chitty and the Court of Appeal in the latter, that Order XI. is exhaustive, and that the old practice is no longer applicable.*

INNES ON TORTS.

The Principles of the Law of Torts. By L. C. Innes, some time one of the Judges of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature, Madras. London: Stevens & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

The author of this treatise commences his preface with a statement which will probably be received with considerable unanimity by those who can form an opinion on the subject. 'There are few,' he says, 'I conceive who have had anything to do with the law, whether as injured parties, as students, or as practical lawyers, who have not felt that some of the most insoluble problems of the science are to be found in that branch of it called "the law of torts."' The next sentence is one, however, which may give rise to considerable diversity of opinion. Our author considers that the treatment of the subject of torts in the previous works of authority on the subject is defective in one particular, which he seems to regard as a sufficient apology for proposing to add one more to the numerous text-books on torts. The defect of these treatises, according to Mr. Innes, is that the authors have failed to maintain a sufficient distinction between the instrumentality, including the mental attitude and the subsequent conduct by which an injury is effected and the several classes of injury resulting from the means so employed. Is this point a sufficient justification for a new work on this difficult but trite subject? By itself it certainly does not appear to us to be sufficient, and accordingly we are obliged to regard the work from a somewhat different standpoint and ask whether the work before us is a substantial additional literature on the subject of torts. Many points in the work are well put, though we confess we think they might have been much better put in simpler language. In one of the illustrations which are given (p. 104) we find 'A., seeing a tiger in B.'s menagerie, without B.'s knowledge, gets hold of the keys, opens the door, and lets the tiger out among a crowd of people; B.'s instrumentality in the tiger ceases.' A similar defect, as it appears to us, is to be found in a great deal of the language which Mr. Innes has employed to convey his meaning. His work, however, is in many respects able and instructive. On some pages we have observed that cases are given without any references to the reports.

* In In re Bullen Smith (1888, 57 L. T. 925)—an action commenced by originating summons for the purpose of deciding the question of the domicile of a testator—Mr. Justice Kay gave leave to issue a writ and to serve the writ, and also notice of motion, out of the jurisdiction, in order to have a declaration deciding the question, the evidence on the summons to be used on the motion.

THWAITES ON CRIMINAL LAW.

A Guide to Criminal Law. Intended for the Use of Students for the Bar Final and for the Solicitors' Final Examinations. By CHARLES THWAITES, Solicitor. Third Edition. London: George Barber. 1891.

THIS useful work, which has, we are glad to see, given an excellent proof of its value by attaining to the honour of a third edition, is divided into three parts. The first contains advice to students as to what books they ought to read; the second, a general sketch of the elementary principles of criminal law; the third, a series of questions and answers by which the student may test his knowledge. Good specimens of Mr. Thwaites's work will be found at page 5, where he considers the question how far in cases where a tort amounts to a crime the right to recover compensation for the private injury is subordinated to the duty of vindicating the public wrong; and at pages 7 and 8, where the distinctions between misdemeanours and felonies are considered. Again, at page 9, the requisites of a crime are discussed, and attention is drawn to a recent case where it was laid down that purity of motive will not purge an act of its criminal character, though it is an important element for the judge's consideration in awarding punishment. At page 11 and the following pages the principal cases of exemption (more or less) from criminal responsibility are enumerated. The work concludes with some seventy pages of questions (with answers to them), including those which have been set at the Bar Final since the commencement of 1872. The student will find Mr. Thwaites's book very useful.

RUMSEY ON EXECUTORS.

A Legal Handbook for Executors and Administrators. Intended for the use of the Practitioner and the Layman after the Grant of Probate or Administration. With all the Necessary Forms, Tables of Stamp Duties, &c. By ALMARIC RUMSEY, Barrister-at-Law. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1891.

THE object of this work is to point out clearly and succinctly the rights and duties which devolve upon executors and administrators in respect of payment of debts and legacies and otherwise dealing with the property of deceased persons. Mr. Rumsey assumes that the grant of probate or administration has been already obtained, whereby the executor or administrator is clothed with his full powers. The subject of the management of the property is, as the author points out, a separate subject from that of obtaining the grant from which the authority to manage it is derived, and the subjects have been indeed assigned to separate Divisions of the High Court of Justice. On the other hand, it may be urged that an executor or administrator would prefer to have all the law affecting his position comprised in one single volume. Probably, however, the balance of convenience is in favour of the plan here adopted. The work is a useful one. Mr. Rumsey does not omit to give a series of practical suggestions for the benefit of executors and administrators. He also supplies them with a good many forms, advising the layman to copy the words with strict accuracy, as the law is 'sometimes extremely rigid.' He tells a story of a reverend friend who made a mistake in drawing an instrument which was happily cured by another into which he was lucky enough to fall. Few, however, can hope to be so fortunate.

BEACH ON PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

Commentaries on the Law of Private Corporations, whether with or without Capital Stock, also of Joint Stock Companies and of all the various Voluntary Unincorporated Associations organised for pecuniary Profit or mutual Benefit. By C. T. BEACH, jun., of the New York Bar. In Two Volumes. Chicago: T. H. Flood & Co. 1891.

THESE two handsome volumes contain a thorough examination of the American law, with fairly frequent references to the English law of the subject which they deal with. The scope of the work, which contains, for instance, the law of religious associations and clubs, is, therefore, as we are informed in the preface, 'somewhat wider than that of any other' of the books on companies. The arrangement and the style are good, but the notes are in many cases far too long. We are somewhat disappointed also to find no comments upon the Directors' Liability Act of 1890 or The Mogul Steamship Case, 58 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 465, but extracts from the judgments in the Mogul Steamship Case are plentifully given, and perhaps an English reader has hardly a right to expect to find the Directors' Liability Act at all. On the other hand, the mention of forged transfers, which has just leaped into paramount importance on this side of the Atlantic, is dealt with quite as well as in any English work we know of.

THE LAWYER'S COMPANION AND DIARY.

The Lawyer's Companion and Diary, 1892. Edited by E. LAYMAN, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons (Lim.); Shaw & Sons.

A BOOK of this kind, which has been before the profession for a period of forty-six years, may be presumed to satisfy all possible requirements, and we have no hesitation in saying that in the case of the 'Lawyer's Companion' the presumption is warranted by results. We cannot attempt to enumerate here the many subjects upon which information is given, inasmuch as the index or table of contents occupies five closely printed pages. The Law List, upon which special care is bestowed, is, we believe, thoroughly reliable, and the fact that the whole work is edited by a barrister is a sufficient guarantee of the accuracy of the miscellaneous information which is here collected. The new edition will be welcomed by the numerous lawyers who have been accustomed to rely upon its predecessors.

THE DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF AUDITORS.

SIR,—The subjoined 'Opinion' of a colonial barrister will be of interest to solicitors and accountants on this side of the water, though it may add nothing to their knowledge of the subject. This opinion was obtained some years ago with a view to ascertain what liability, if any, attached to auditors for omitting to discover certain non-entries and defalcations by the book-keeper of a trading company in Australia. These defalcations were concealed for a time by the deliberate omission of sundry debit entries. The legal action suggested in the 'Opinion,' 'in order to test the liability of auditors,' was not taken. MARS.

OPINION.

The duties and responsibilities of auditors have not been, so far as I am aware, the subject of any judicial decision, but, on principle, I should say that gentlemen undertaking such duties warrant that they possess ordinary skill for their proper performance, and that they will exercise due and ordinary care in discharging them. There seems to be a wide difference of opinion as to what those duties consist of, and possibly if evidence was given as to any universal usage here, in support of the views of the auditors in question, they might be held not liable, but, in the absence of very strong evidence to that effect, I should say, on principle, that it was part of their duty to see that all debit entries were duly made; and that, in failing to detect the omission to enter some of the debit entries, they either displayed gross ignorance or want of such ordinary care as they ought to have bestowed on their work. I think, consequently, that an action can be maintained against them by the company. In such action the original certificate ought to be produced.

A much more difficult question arises on the question of damage. In the first place, the amount of money embezzled before the audit cannot certainly be recovered. It is a question between nominal damages and the amount embezzled afterwards. Under any circumstances, substantial damages cannot be recovered, unless it plainly appears that, if the auditors had pointed out the omissions of the debits, the manager would at once have instituted inquiries which would have resulted in the discovery of the embezzlements, and that, on such discovery, he would have discharged the defaulting clerk. Even if this is made perfectly clear, it is a very doubtful question whether the subsequent damages would not be too remote. Damages, to be recoverable, must be 'so far the actual consequences of the breach that they must have been in the minds of both the contracting parties at the time of the breach.' (Per Mr. Justice Brett, in Smith v. Green, 45 Law J. Rep. C. P. 28; L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 95.) Also see that case as to what kind of damages come within that definition. Whether the commission of further felony by a third party can be said to be the actual consequence of the non-detection of former felonies by the same person would be the question here, and, on full consideration of all the cases, the inclination of my opinion is that such damages would be too remote. (See judgment of Lord Justice James in the case of In re The United Service Company, L. R. 6 Chanc. Div. (App.) 1,217.)

Considering the whole circumstances of the case, I should think that it will be worth the company's while to bring an action, in order to test the liability of auditors and to ascertain their duties, although it is by no means certain that even nominal damages could be recovered; and, as I have said before, I think that, probably, substantial damages could not be so recovered. I may add that an additional obstacle to recovering more than nominal damages arises from the fact that no security seems to have been taken for the fidelity of the defaulting clerk. If it can be shown that this is the usual practice in this colony for persons in a similar position, it would undoubtedly be a strong argument that the loss was not 'the actual consequence' of the auditors' default. Still, as I said before, I should think that it would be worth the company's while to test the question.

MANORIAL FEES.

SIR,—Can any of your readers inform me whether any process exists for compelling the steward of a manor to deliver a detailed statement of the fines and fees charged by him upon admittance?

The custom of the steward of the manor is to deliver a statement giving a total only without any details, and the only answer he gives is, "Oh, we never give details!" R. B. LOWNDES.

BAR STUDENTS' EXAMINATIONS.

MICHAELMAS, 1891.

AT the general examination of students of the Inns of Court held at Lincoln's Inn Hall on October 13, 14, 15, and 16, the Council of Legal Education have awarded to the following students certificates that they have satisfactorily passed a public examination:—

ADAM, ALFRED, of the Middle Temple.
ALDERSON, EDWARD H., of the Inner Temple.
APPACH, ARTHUR H., of Lincoln's Inn.
ASAAM, KOFI, of the Inner Temple.
BARBER, SYDNEY H., of the Inner Temple.
BURCHELL, JAMES, of the Inner Temple.
CHAPLIN, FRANCIS D. PERCY, of Lincoln's Inn.
COX, HENRY S., of the Inner Temple.
DAVIES, WILLIAM C., of the Inner Temple.
DONERAILE, EDWARD VISCOUNT, of the Inner Temple.
EASTON, JAMES M., of the Inner Temple.
ENNIS, GEORGE F. M., of the Middle Temple.
EVANS, MORGAN O., of Lincoln's Inn.
FEARON, FRANCIS H., of the Middle Temple.
FLETCHER, ERNEST E., of Lincoln's Inn.
GLASGOW, RICHARD P., of the Middle Temple.
GLEDHILL, JAMES, of the Middle Temple.
GODSAL, HERBERT, of the Inner Temple.
GRAHAM, WILLIAM, of the Inner Temple.
HARRISON, HENRY A., of the Inner Temple.
HEYWOOD, WILLIAM R., of the Middle Temple.
HUNT, JOHN, of the Middle Temple.
HURRY, ARNOLD E., of the Inner Temple.
JACKMAN, EDWARD C., of the Middle Temple.
JOHNSTON, JAMES A., of the Inner Temple.
KENT, IRVING, of the Inner Temple.
LEA, THOMAS S., of Lincoln's Inn.
LINES, WILLIAM E., of the Middle Temple.
LUSCOMBE, JOHN T., of the Inner Temple.
LYNCH, GEORGE D., of Lincoln's Inn.
MACDONALD, KENNETH L., of the Inner Temple.
MACKAY, JOSIAH K., of the Middle Temple.
MACMAHON, JOHN B. B., of the Middle Temple.
MADDISON, ALFRED L., of the Inner Temple.
MALLET, EUGÈNE H., of the Middle Temple.
MANNING, JOHN W., of Lincoln's Inn.
MENENDEZ, MANUEL R., of the Inner Temple.
MONIER-WILLIAMS, CYRIL F., of Lincoln's Inn.
MONTGOMERY, ARTHUR H., of the Inner Temple.

MOOKERJEE, SATIS CHANDRA, of Lincoln's Inn.
MULLENS, WILLIAM H., of the Inner Temple.
NEPEAN, EVAN A., of the Inner Temple.
NORBURY, CHARLES G., of the Middle Temple.
PRABH DIAL, of Gray's Inn.
PROUD, NICHOLAS F. H., of Lincoln's Inn.
ROBERTS, CLARENCE A. I., of Lincoln's Inn.
ROPER, HUBERT L., of the Inner Temple.
ROSE, HUGH M., of the Middle Temple.
SANDERS, ROBERT A., of the Inner Temple.
SELLS, ARTHUR W., of the Inner Temple.
SHERIFF, PERCY M. C., of the Middle Temple.
SILLS, GEORGE T., of Lincoln's Inn.
SIMPSON, EDWARD P., of the Inner Temple.
SMITH, FREDERIC C., of the Inner Temple.
SMITH, FREDERICK S., of the Inner Temple.
SMITH, LINDSEY, of the Middle Temple.
SOLAIMAN, MOHAMED, of the Middle Temple.
STOKES, GEORGE J., of Lincoln's Inn.
TERRELL, FRANCIS A. H., of Lincoln's Inn.
TROTTER, CECIL C., of the Inner Temple.
WALEY, JOHN F., of Lincoln's Inn.
WOOD, CHARLES N., of the Inner Temple.
WRAGGE, ROBERT H. V., of Lincoln's Inn.
YARROW, GEORGE E., of Gray's Inn.
YOUNG, JOHN J. B., of the Inner Temple.

Of the eighty-five candidates examined, sixty-five passed.

The following students passed a satisfactory examination in Roman law:—

Shaikh Mahomed Abdul Zafar, of the Inner Temple; William Addo, of the Middle Temple; Kitoyi Ajasa, of the Inner Temple; Mir Aun Ali, of Lincoln's Inn; Hakim Aminuddin, of Gray's Inn; Todar Mal Bhandari, of the Middle Temple; Arthur S. T. G. Boscawen, of the Middle Temple; Christian L. Botha, of the Middle Temple; Egerton S. Brown, of the Inner Temple; Arthur J. E. Bucknor, of the Middle Temple; Nanabhoy Nowrojee Burjorjee, of the Middle Temple; Travers Buxton, of Lincoln's Inn; Megalos Alexander Caloyanni, of Lincoln's Inn; Henry Boyd Carpenter, of the Inner Temple; Thomas Casson, of the Inner Temple; William A. Casson, of the Middle Temple; Henry V. H. Cawthra, of the Inner Temple; Ahobilastreckristna Chakravarti, of the Middle Temple; Leonard Cooper, of the Middle Temple; Francis Henry Cripps-Day, of the Middle Temple; George Bancroft Dawson, of the Middle Temple; William H. Duckworth, of the Inner Temple; Joseph V. A. Esnouf, of the Middle Temple; Joseph E. Faulks, of Gray's Inn; Edward V. Fleming, of Lincoln's Inn; John B. Gilliat, of the Inner Temple; Harold Hodge, of the Middle Temple; William F. S. Hodgson, of the Inner Temple; John R. Holmes, of the Middle Temple; Syed Motabbar Hossain, of the Middle Temple; George M. Howard, of the Middle Temple; Mohamed Nujmul Huda, of the Middle Temple; Mahmoodul Huq, of the Middle Temple; Edward S. Johnson, of the Inner Temple; William A. Jolly, of Lincoln's Inn; James M. Lainè, of the Middle Temple; Charles L. Lawrence, of the Inner Temple; Walter E. Lloyd, of the Inner Temple; Syed Abdul Majid Shah, of Lincoln's Inn; Manekji Pestanji Modi, of the Inner Temple; Pandit Mohan Lal, of Lincoln's Inn; Henry B. Moore, of Gray's Inn; John Morison, of the Middle Temple; Ernest E. J. Morrison, of Gray's Inn; William A. Mount, of the Inner Temple; Pandit Mul Raj, of Lincoln's Inn; Hirokichi Mutsu, of the Inner Temple; Ananias H. Nash, of the Middle Temple; Cecil E. Owen, of the Middle Temple; Ernest A. LAW AND PROFESSIONAL NOTES.

By T. F. UTTLEY, Solicitor, Manchester, Author of 'Hints on Stephen's Commentaries,' 'Hints on Criminal Law,' &c.

THE STATUTE AS TO CORRUPT PRACTICES.

THE recent trial at the Central Criminal Court, London, of a Salford coal merchant for an alleged attempt to bribe a Salford corporation gas manager, affords some points of great interest to practitioners. The indictment had been laid under subsection 2 of section 1 of the Public Bodies (Corrupt Practices) Act, 1889. The counsel for the prosecution pointed out that the subsection of section 1 of the Act (52 & 53 Vict. c. 69) related to the giving, offering, or promising of a bribe which might consist of coin or any other advantage whatsoever. The charge was that he (the coal merchant) had 'corruptly' (a word which governed the whole section) offered this consideration for the purpose of obtaining an undue advantage. It did not matter whether the bribe was given beforehand or afterwards, as long as that bribe was given with the view to the obtaining of business by an unfair advantage and by unfairly operating on the mind of a servant of the corporation. It did not matter whether this was a promise or offering. It was in this case an offering, because, much to his credit, the gentleman to whom the offer was made indignantly repudiated it. The offence which the Act had in view was that of 'corruptly offering a gift to a person as an inducement to or reward for an officer or servant of a public body doing or forbearing to do something in respect of a matter in which such public body is concerned.' The statute took good care to go the full length in pointing out that it referred to any reward whatever, either for the future or the past, in respect to any transaction whatsoever, actual or proposed. These words 'actual or proposed' were most important. The jury had, therefore, to consider whether this was a transaction, actual or proposed, in which a public body was concerned. The counsel for the defence, however, maintained that the offence, whatever it was, which the defendant committed, was not such an offence as was contemplated by the Act of Parliament. The preamble of the Act stated that it was expedient to provide against bribery and corruption of and by the members and officials of corporations. Section 2 provided that any person who corruptly offered any gift or reward or advantage whatever, whether for the benefit of the person to whom the offer was made or for any other person, as an inducement to any official of a public body to do anything contrary to his duty, or abstain from doing anything which it was his duty to do, should be guilty of a misdemeanour. His contention was that this pointed to a class of offence wholly distinct from that which the defendant had committed. There was another point, and that was as to the reason why the responsible officers of the Crown had hesitated to grant their fiat for that prosecution. It was not for him to express an opinion as to what the reason for that hesitation was, but he was justified in thinking that it might be because there was some doubt as to whether any offence had been committed which came within the scope of the Act. The Recorder, in addressing the jury, said that the Act under which the prosecution was instituted was intended to protect the public from the consequences that flowed from the bribery of public officers, and after discussing the evidence, pointed out that whether it was a corrupt offer to influence their gas-engineer in connection with the coal tender was a question of fact not of law. An inquiry which was addressed by the jury to the recorder is of interest. It was asked if the gift was offered for services already rendered did the defendant come within the scope of the Act? The recorder replied if it was exclusively an acknowledgment of some indulgence shown to him in the contract then expiring, it would not come within the meaning of the words 'promise or offer any gift for doing or forbearing to do anything in respect of any matter or transaction.' If simply intended as an acknowledgment of past kindness and courtesy it would not come within the scope of the statute. Ultimately the jury disagreed, and were discharged.

A BANKRUPT'S SALARY.

There is a clause in the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 which permits the trustee, where a bankrupt is in the receipt of a salary, to apply to the Court for an order for payment to the trustee of such salary, or any part thereof, to be applied by him as the Court may direct. Under this section an application to the Court was recently made for the payment of a portion of the salary of a calico printer at Manchester to the trustee on behalf of his creditors. A receiving order was made in the spring of the year, and the usual statement of affairs had been filed. The affidavit of the trustee showed that the debtor was in receipt of a salary of 11*l.* per week as manager of a print works, that he was married, and had a wife and six children. The debtor's wife had also an income of over 120*l.* per annum. The trustee's advocate suggested that an order should be made upon the bankrupt for payment to the trustee of 200*l.* a year out of such salary. The debtor's advocate urged that the bankrupt could contribute nothing out of his salary. The order was, however, for the amount asked for by the trustee. Those interested in the point should note also the following authorities: Ex parte Wicks, 50 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 620; L. R. 17 Chanc. Div. 70; Ex parte Webber, 56 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 209; L. ADULTERATION.

A somewhat interesting point arose not long since at the Middlewich Petty Sessions. The landlord of an inn was summoned for selling Irish whisky adulterated with water. An inspector under the Food and Drugs Act had sent his assistant to the public-house to purchase a pint of Irish whisky for analysis. The inspector subsequently entered the house, and, considering that the whisky just purchased was not sufficient for his purpose, ordered another gill. It was urged for the defence that the law required that a person purchasing any article for analysis should, immediately after the purchase was completed, inform the seller of the intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst. Here there were two distinct purchases, and the question was whether the inspector informed the landlord after each purchase that the whisky was for analysis. If he carried out the provisions of the Act after the second purchase only, it was evident the prosecution must fall to the ground. The bench decided, after conferring, that intimation of intention to analyse was given to the seller before the purchase was completed according to the Act, and the case was dismissed. The proceedings were, of course, taken under section 14 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, and it is laid down in the text-books that it is not sufficient to state the article is purchased for the purpose of analysis; the purchaser must add the words 'by the public analyst,' the use of these words being a condition precedent to conviction. It is, however, only necessary for the seller to have notice that the sample is taken for analysis, to be made by an official person, so that he may see the sample is fairly taken, and the substitution of the words 'county analyst' is substantially a sufficient notice.

THE LAW AS TO ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

Some nine years ago the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, was passed, and according to its provisions, as comprised in section 4, subsection 1, no provisional order authorising the supply of electricity by any undertakers within the district of any local authority (not being themselves the undertakers) can be granted unless the notice of intention to apply for it has been served on the local authority of the district on or before July 1 of the year in which the application is made. In connection with this matter, however, there should be noticed the Board of Trade Rules (August, 1890) relating to the mode of procedure to be adopted by intending applicants for orders and licenses. The Board of Trade Rule V. apparently alters the above-mentioned date to November 1, but this, it must be observed, relates only to applications affecting a district in which there are already statutory electric light undertakings. The rule requires notice to be given to all such 'undertakings' within the area, whether local authorities or otherwise; and this notice is in addition to that required by the Act itself to be given to the local authority of the district. The distinction between the statute and the rules is worthy of note, for in view of the increasing popularity of the electric light too much importance cannot be attached to following the regulations laid down.

MARITAL EVIDENCE.

At Stockport, not long since, two persons, male and female, but not husband and wife, were jointly charged with having forged a promissory note for payment of a sum of money with intent to defraud a money lender. It appeared that the female prisoner made application to the prosecutor for a loan, alleging that she did so on behalf of her husband. The male prisoner represented himself as the woman's husband and signed as such, whereas he was no relation to her. Subsequently, when these proceedings were instituted the real husband tendered himself as a witness, but the advocate for the defence objected, urging that a husband could not give evidence either for or against his wife, and as these prisoners were charged jointly, he (the real husband) could not give evidence against the fictitious husband, because it would affect the wife. The clerk, however, admitted the evidence, but as the prisoners were committed for trial at the assizes, this interesting point may be more fully argued there. Presumably the clerk, in admitting the evidence, had noticed the case of Regina v. Thompson, 36 J. P. 532, 667, and cases there cited, where it was held that the wife of one prisoner can be called as a witness for another prisoner with whom her husband is jointly indicted. This could doubtless be taken in the converse case. However, the further proceedings must be awaited. There are, however, statutory exceptions to the rule that a defendant cannot give evidence for himself or call his wife—e.g. adulteration of food, drunkenness, intoxicating liquor laws, workmen, and so forth.

BANKING LAW.

At the beginning of the year a lecture was delivered by Mr. F. W. Dendy, solicitor, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, to the law students' society of that town. The lecture has since been printed in a handy pamphlet form, and has attracted much favourable notice. Mr. Dendy treats the subject in a very clear, yet practical style. Amongst the matters dealt with are — mercantile usage, bank-notes, bankers investments, bills of exchange, discounting bills, bankers' commission, overdrawn accounts, securities given by customers, and by guarantors, and many another useful item and hint upon banking topics. Those who have much to do with banking matters should not fail to peruse this lecture. Perhaps on some future occasion Mr. Dendy will expand it into a goodly volume to be read of all men.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS IN WALES.

MR. GLADSTONE has written as follows in reply to a communication on the subject of legal appointments in Wales:—

I must not presume to speak as one fully informed on the important subject of your letter, but my impressions are—(1) That Wales has suffered unjustly and gravely in this department; (2) that she is now sufficiently awakened and powerful through her representatives to set right and keep right whatever may still require it.

Dean Vaughan has written:—

The general principle can scarcely be gainsaid that it is desirable that the law should be administered as well as the Gospel preached by those who understand the language of the people. What practical difficulties may beset this application of the principle to particular cases I am scarcely competent to say.

The following letter, signed 'North and South Wales and Chester Circuit,' appeared in the Times on November 10:—

The letters from Mr. Gladstone and Dr. Vaughan which have appeared upon this important subject are indicative of the contrast between the characters of the two men. Mr. Gladstone ignores the possibility of practical difficulties in the way of appointing Welsh-speaking men to judicial offices. Dr. Vaughan suggests that such difficulties may exist. The difficulties do exist. No doubt we should be more thoroughly judged in Wales by Welsh-speaking County Court judges, but it is not a simple matter to get them. We must look for them on the North and South Wales and Chester Circuit. There is only one member of the Northern division of the circuit, Mr. Morgan Lloyd, Q.C., who possesses the standing which is an essential preliminary to a County Court judgeship, and at the same time an adequate knowledge of Welsh. In South Wales the requisite standing and knowledge of Welsh and law are possessed by Mr. B. F. Williams, Q.C., and Mr. Abel Thomas, M.P., but not, I think, by any other members of the Southern division. I doubt very much whether any one of these gentlemen would accept office as a County Court judge, since such office involves a great deal of work, much of which is petty, and a very moderate income. Moreover, we have as a County Court judge for the greater part of North Wales a gentleman whose capacity, knowledge of law, and sterling common sense are not surpassed by those of any of the common law judges. But the main point is that there is neither sense nor reason in complaining that Welshmen are not appointed to judicial offices, when, as a plain matter of fact, there are no eligible Welsh-speaking barristers to whom the offer of the office would be acceptable.

The Charge against Mr. Kimber.—At the Guildhall, Canterbury, on November 9, Mr. Walter Monteagle Hasker applied to be bound over under the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, to prosecute Mr. Edmund Kimber, solicitor, of Walbrook, City, and Shooter's Hill, for alleged perjury, at the next Kent Assizes. The charge was dismissed, with costs, by the city bench at Canterbury on Friday last. The application was granted, and Mr. Hasker then entered into recognisances in 100*l.* to prosecute.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council resumed their sittings on November 4, after the Long Vacation. Their first list of causes for hearing contains twenty appeals, of which eight are from Bengal, two from Oude, two from Rangoon, and one each from Madras, Ontario, Mauritius, the North-West Provinces, the Central Provinces, Malta, Canada, and Bombay. There are also four judgments to be delivered in appeals heard before the Vacation, among them the case of Read and others v. The Bishop of Lincoln.

The Town Clerk of Leeds.—At a meeting of the Leeds County Council on November 9 a letter was read from the town clerk, Sir George W. Morrison, in which he much regretted that, according to medical testimony, he was at present suffering from mental strain, and did not feel equal to conscientiously discharging the duties of his office. He, therefore, deeply regretted to have to place his resignation in the hands of the council. It was decided that the letter should be considered at a special meeting of the council. Mr. George Morrison was appointed town clerk of Leeds in 1878, and was knighted in 1885.

OBITUARY.

Mr. George Henry Haydon, barrister, late steward of Bethlehem Royal Hospital, died, after a short illness, at Putney on Monday, November 9, in his seventieth year. He was one of the earliest explorers of Australia, and his two books on his experiences of fifty years ago are rare and valuable. He at first settled in French Island, but later went to the mainland and made the first crossing from Melbourne to Gippsland. He was owner of land in the wilds which afterwards became Melbourne, which land was of little value when he left the continent. He returned to England, and after several changes settled down as steward to the Royal Hospital. He was well known as an art student, and at the Langham Sketching Club studied beside many late and present Academicians, being himself a good draftsman. He was a keen fisherman, and among his friends and fellow-fishermen were John Leech and Samuel Phelps. Charles Kean and George Cruikshank were often to be met at his house.

The Powers of Private Police.—On November 11, in the Lord Mayor's Court, the case of Copeland v. The Surrey Commercial Docks Company (Lim.) was tried before the recorder (Sir T. Chambers, Q.C.) and a jury. The plaintiff, a carman in the employment of a corn merchant in Westminster Bridge Road, sued the defendants to recover damages for false imprisonment. Mr. A. H. Ruegg was counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Horace Avory and Mr. Roskill for the defendants.—The plaintiff said that in July last he was arrested by a Mr. Lecocq, a chief inspector in the defendant's private police, on a charge of stealing two sacks of flour in conjunction with a man named Cooper. He was taken to the police-station, brought up before a magistrate, committed for trial, but was acquitted at the Old Bailey. It was argued for the plaintiff that Lecocq, being in the service of the defendants, was in the position of a private person, and therefore the defendants would have to prove that a felony had actually been committed, and that they had probable cause for thinking that the plaintiff had committed the theft.—For the defence, it was urged that the plaintiff was arrested by Detective Sergeant Tooley, of the M Division, and not by Lecocq. Even if Lecocq had arrested the plaintiff, the defendants were protected by the Harbours Clauses Act, which dealt with the employment of special police, and the clothing of them with the power and protection of ordinary police officers.—The jury found for the defendants.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, November 10, Mr. Marshall in the chair. The subject for discussion, 'That the case of Jones v. The Merionethshire Permanent Benefit Building Society, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 564; L. R. (1891) 2 Chanc. Div. 587, was wrongly decided,' was opened by Mr. Douglas, followed by Mr. Pettit.—Mr. Willson, followed by Mr. Johnston, opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: In the affirmative—Messrs. Daniell, Arnold, Walton, Squire, Pritchard, Pattinson, and Williams; in the negative—Messrs. Aston, Simon, Evershed, Bower, and Thirlby.—On the motion being put to the meeting, it was carried by a majority of two.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society, on Tuesday, November 17, is: 'That the British occupation of Egypt is no longer justifiable or expedient.'

GRAND DAY AT LINCOLN'S INN.—The Treasurer, Mr. Napier Higgins, Q.C., and the benchers of Lincoln's Inn entertained at dinner on November 10, being the Grand Day in Michaelmas Term, the Marquis of Lorne, the Bishop of Rochester, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Justice Jeune, Mr. Justice Henn Collins, General Sir Daniel Lysons, Sir Frederick Abel, Surgeon-Major Hendley, the Rev. Dr. Paget, Mr. Bryant (president of the Royal College of Surgeons), and Mr. John Wolfe Barry. The benchers present on the occasion were Lord Justice Bowen, Sir William Robert Grove, Mr. Justice Denman, Mr. Justice Mathew, Mr. Justice Chitty, Sir Robert Stuart, Q.C., Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Pember, Q.C., Mr. Hemming, Q.C., Mr Crackanthorpe, Q.C., Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., M.P., Sir Andrew Scoble, Q.C., Mr. Horton Smith, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Gibbs, Q.C., C.B., Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C, M.P. (the Solicitor-General), Lord Macnaghten, Mr. Forbes, Q.C., Mr. W. W. Karslake, Q.C., Mr. Rigby, Q.C., Mr. Cecil Russell, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Pembroke Stephens, Q.C., Mr. Lockwood, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Elton, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Kennedy, Q.C., Mr. Bush, Q.C., Mr. Cutler, Q.C., Mr. Leonard H. Courtney, M.P., Lord Morris, Mr. Kenelm E. Digby, Mr. Muir Mackenzie, Q.C., and the Rev. Dr. Wace, preacher.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—A report has been issued as a Parliamentery paper by the Board of Trade, referring to their proceedings and business under the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 and 1889. This shows that 139 local authorities have, since the last year's report, taken the formal steps necessary for carrying out the provisions of section 9 of the Act of 1889, requiring them to make general regulations for the guidance of their inspectors; and that forty-six local authorities have made bye-laws for regulating the retail sale of coal by weight. Periodical examinations have been held by the board at London, Bristol, Edinburgh, and Manchester, of persons appointed to act as inspectors of weights and measures, and 136 persons have obtained certificates of qualification. In November last year a new denomination of measure of capacity of three gallons was authorised, and the board has duly verified the standard. Standards have been also verified at the office during the past year for the Governments of India, British Guiana, and St. Lucia, for the Royal Mint, and for the Ordnance Store Department. A number of inspectors of weights and measures in Ireland have attended at the Standards Office to undergo a course of technical instruction in their business. Arrangements have also been made by which certain standards and scales in use by the Admiralty, Inland Revenue, and the Paymaster-General are in future to be periodically inspected under the direction of the Department.

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

MR. WILLIAM ATHELSTAN BLAXLAND has been appointed Solicitor to the London County Council, in succession to Mr. Reginald Ward, resigned. Mr. Blaxland was admitted in 1867, and was a member of the late firm of Jones, Blaxland & Son, of Lincoln's Inn Fields, until he was appointed in May, 1881, an assistant in the Solicitors' Department of the late Metropolitan Board of Works.

Mr. Joseph Samuel Rubinstein (of the firm of Leggatt, Rubinstein & Co.), of 5 Raymond Buildings, Gray's Inn, W.C., and 56 West Cromwell Road, Kensington, S.W., has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths in matters depending in the Courts of the Colony of New South Wales. He is a Commissioner for Oaths for England, a Commissioner for Oaths and for taking Acknowledgments for New Zealand, and a Commissioner for Oaths for the Colonies of the Bahamas, Fiji, Gold Coast, Leeward Islands, South Australia, and Tasmania. Mr. Rubinstein was admitted in 1876.

Mr. Alfred William Hall (of the firm of Gard, Hall & Rook), of 2 Gresham Buildings, Basinghall Street, London, has been appointed a Commissioner to take Affidavits in the Supreme Court of South Australia. Mr. Hall was admitted in 1879.

Mr. Edward William Oliver, of 41 Finsbury Pavement, London, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Oliver was admitted in 1860.

THE BOARD OF CUSTOMS AND THE DOCKS.—With reference to the proposed changes in the Customs' hours of duty, the Board of Customs have sent round a circular to the dock directors, wharf proprietors, and shipowners of London which states that the Lords of the Treasury have decided that, after a date not yet fixed upon, goods shall be allowed to be landed from all vessels between the hours of 6 A.M. and 6 P.M. free of overtime, and requests that the various persons concerned will inform the board during what hours they propose to avail themselves of the privilege, so that a sufficient staff of officers may be provided to meet the extra amount of duty imposed upon the service. It is stated that the Docks' committee is averse to any change in the present system of duty, but the London Chamber of Commerce is greatly in favour of the proposed extension, as it will relieve shipowners of the extra expense which is incurred by overtime.

THE RECOVERY OF TITHES.—The first case for the recovery of tithes under the Tithes Act of last session came on on November 11 at Ruthin County Court before his Honour Judge Sir Horatio Lloyd. Mr. Robert Parry, of Llanarmon, brother of Mr. John Parry, chairman of the Anti-Tithe League, was summoned by the vicar of Llanarmon for his arrears of tithes.—Mr. Llewellyn Jones, barrister, defended, and Mr. Roberts, solicitor, Mold, appeared for the applicant.—Defendant resisted payment on the ground that he was not the owner of all the lands for which tithes were claimed, and that the vicar was not the owner of the tithes. The vicar of Llanarmon, the Rev. Evan Evans, produced the tithe-map, claiming that 7*s.* 11*d.* was due to him on two fields. Mr. Parry had previously paid him the tithes on the same lands.—For the defence Mr. Llewellyn Jones said that there was great confusion as to who was responsible for the tithes.—The judge said that he was not satisfied that the lands in question were occupied by the owner, and, therefore, he could not make an order to appoint the registrar receiver, the order to be suspended for fourteen days, with the usual Court fees.

THE LONDON AND LANCASHIRE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY intimate that they have decided not to make any charge henceforth for the registering of share transfers.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, London, on Wednesday, the 11th inst., Mr. John Hunter in the chair. The other directors present were Messrs. H. Morten Cotton, Samuel Harris (Leicester), J. H. Kays, Grinham Keen, Richard Pennington, R. Pidcock (Woolwich), Henry Roscoe, Sidney Smith, R. W. Tweedie, Frederic T. Woolbert, and J. T. Scott (secretary). A sum of 518*l.* was distributed in grants of relief, twenty-two new members were admitted to the association, and other general business was transacted.

SHAM COUNTY COURT SUMMONSES.—Judge Bagshawe, at Peterborough County Court, on November 11, said his attention had been called to a practice adopted by some firms of sending notices to debtors in imitation of County Court summonses. The notices were so framed, both in size and appearance, as to be well calculated to convey to the minds of careless people that they were County Court summonses. The words, however, 'Notice before proceedings,' were printed in very small type at the top. The officials of the Court informed him that many persons, acting under the impression that, on receipt of the notices, they had been put into Court, had brought the money to the Court. The practice was distinctly wrong, and in future, wherever he found plaintiffs had resorted to such means, he should disallow them all costs.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES' COLLECTING-BOOKS.—A case of interest to managers and members of friendly societies was investigated before the Liverpool Recorder, at the City Sessions, on October 28. Mr. Francis H. Taunton, secretary of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, appealed against a decision of the Liverpool stipendiary magistrate, who last March fined him 20*s.* and costs for refusing to allow a member named Moffatt to inspect certain of the society's books, as provided by the Friendly Societies Act.—Mr. Moffatt said that in February last he applied at the society's offices to inspect certain collecting-books, so as to investigate suspected defalcations on the part of collectors who were relatives of officials. He was told that the committee of management had consulted eminent counsel, who advised that respondent had no legal right to inspect the books. The secretary was summoned and fined. Mr. Moffatt said that under section 14 of the Act any member, or any person, having an interest in the funds of the society, was entitled to see the books during reasonable hours.—In reply to the recorder, he said that he had applied only for the collecting-books, which he knew were in the office at the time.—For the appellant, Mr. Taylor said that the committee were contesting the case in the interests of the holders of these collecting-books and the members of the society. Until they had had a judicial decision on the point the committee thought they ought not to produce these books, and so disclose the private accounts of a member to every other member. The holders of the books, who had a kind of goodwill in them, objected to disclose their accounts and list of members to a person who might belong to another society, or to a rival collector. He submitted that the 'books' referred to in the section were exclusively the books written up at the head office, which thoroughly showed the financial position, investments, &c., of the society, and which Mr. Moffatt might examine.—Having heard evidence, the Recorder decided that any member of the society making application at a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner should have all the means at hand, provided he was willing to undertake the gigantic task of inspecting the books. He therefore confirmed the conviction, with costs.

WROTH SILVER.—The ancient custom of paying 'wroth silver' to the Duke of Buccleuch, as Lord of the Hundred of Knightlow, was observed before sunrise on Wednesday at Knightlow Hill, Warwickshire. In the cold grey dawn, and with a fine misty rain falling, the representatives of the various parishes and a few curious villagers gathered round the one remaining stone of the monastic cross, which formerly stood on the brow of the hill. The cross dates back probably to the reign of Edward III., and has at each angle a large fir tree, which, local tradition says, represents four knights who were killed and buried there. Mr. C. G. Bolam, the Duke of Buccleuch's Warwickshire land agent, commenced by reading the charter of 'wroth silver.' Each representative then dropped into the hollow, which time has conveniently worn in the head of the stone, the coins due from his parish. The payment is made by twenty-eight parishes of the old Hundred of Knightlow. Altogether the money amounts to but little more than 9*s.*, several parishes paying only 1*d.* each. The tribute, moreover, involves the duke in some expenses, as he always entertains the representatives upon the conclusion of the ceremony. At Knightlow Hill on Wednesday an adjournment was made to a neighbouring tavern, where a substantial breakfast was served. Upon the withdrawal of the cloth the health of the duke was toasted, in accordance with custom, in glasses of rum and milk. The late Duke of Buccleuch, some years ago, submitted the words 'wroth silver' to two antiquarians of considerable eminence, whose conclusions were that the payment was intended as an acknowledgment of the claim of the lord of the manor to the waste lands within the lordship of the hundred, and as a payment for permitting cattle to pass over certain roads and fields at various seasons of the year.

'OBITER DICTA.'

The block in the Chancery Division seems likely to increase rather than diminish. Mr. Justice Stirling and Mr. Justice North are both invalided, and it is uncertain when they will be able to resume their sittings. Unless one or more judges can be borrowed from the Queen's Bench Division, arrears on the Chancery side must needs accumulate rapidly.

The Autumn Assizes have now commenced on all the circuits, with the result that eight judges have been withdrawn from the work of the Queen's Bench Division. The business of that division will therefore for the remainder of the sittings have to be carried on by seven judges, one of whom has to leave London on December 8 to attend the Leeds Assizes. Having regard to the fact that it is not much more than three weeks since the end of the Long Vacation, this is a most unsatisfactory state of things, and not at all calculated to inspire confidence in the speedy administration of justice.

The progress of business in Court of Appeal No. I. has so far been decidedly slow. At the commencement of the sittings no less than sixty-four final appeals from the Queen's Bench Division had been set down for hearing. Of these, up to the present time, only ten have been disposed of. The New Trial Paper and the Interlocutory List were, no doubt, light, and some progress has been made with them. The same may be said of the Bankruptcy Appeals, but these lists are constantly being replenished, and, having regard to the fact that there are several Admiralty Appeals for hearing, it seems probable that a good deal of the appellate business of Court No. I. will have to go over Christmas.

Referring to our remarks upon the Tabernacle Building Society case in last week's issue (ante, p. 703), we have, by the courtesy of Mr. Macoun, counsel for the building society, been furnished with a note of an application made by him on the 4th inst. to the Divisional Court, which explains the position of affairs with regard to an appeal to the House of Lords. Mr. Macoun's application was that a special case, stated by the arbitrators in pursuance of an order of the Court, might stand out of the paper pending the hearing of an appeal by the House of Lords raising the question whether the arbitrators were bound to state a case, or, in other words, whether the Arbitration Act, 1889, applies in such cases. He stated that the appeal was in a forward state. The Court, consisting of the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wright, acceded to the application. We are glad to learn that this question, which is manifestly of the utmost importance to building societies, is now in a fair way to be finally settled.

Yet another arbitration case! In Trainer v. Macdonald and another (Notes of Cases, p. 151) the plaintiff sued on a fire insurance policy, and the defendants pleaded fraud, but applied for an order to stay proceedings with the view of a reference to arbitration within the terms of the arbitration clause of the policy, which appears to have followed a common form. Section 11 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, provides, re-enacting section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, that 'if any party to a submission commences any legal proceedings against any other party to the submission, in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings' may apply to the Court for a stay, and the Court, or a judge thereof, 'if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred in accordance with the submission,' may make an order staying the proceedings. The Court made the order to stay, affirming the Master and Mr. Justice Charles, notwithstanding the contention of the plaintiff that fraud was properly a question for the jury. The Court appears to have an absolutely discretionary jurisdiction in these matters, but the judgment seems just a little inconsistent with Wallis v. Hirsch, 26 Law J. Rep. C. P. 72. In the new edition of 'Russell on Arbitration' also (see p. 48) it is said that 'in the Chancery Division the rule seems to be that where fraud is charged the Court will, in general, refuse to send the dispute to arbitration if the party charged with the fraud desires a public inquiry.'

As the question of law reform and more especially procedure reform has been brought prominently before the country, it is well to consider what improvements of a non-revolutionary character can be suggested with a reasonable certainty of their being passed into law next session. The gravest of the evils to which lately attention has mainly been directed are those occasioned by the delay between one hearing of a case and another, particularly in the case of appeals to the House of Lords. Two reforms, to which no appreciable opposition in the most powerful quarters could be expected, will suggest themselves to almost any member of the profession who thinks on the subject. One is what has already been proposed in the LAW JOURNAL—viz. the extension of the Lord Chancellor's Act by which an ex-Lord Chancellor may sit in the Appeal Court or High Court to the four Lords of Appeal in ordinary, and which would be equivalent, at least, to the appointment of another judge. The other would be the shortening of the period within which notice of appeal must be given either from the High Court or from the Court of Appeal. A year is undoubtedly too long, and the time might usefully be limited to three months in each case, or, at all events, to three months in the case of resort to the Court of Appeal and six months from the latter to the House of Lords. The same rules as to the extension of the time might be applied as now exist; and it may be that rather more indulgence might be extended, when further time was required, than is now the case. The result would be both a substantial saving of time and a not inconsiderable economy in costs, as fewer interviews with solicitors and counsel would be possible when the client is called upon to make up his mind quickly.

MR. FINLAY'S Act suggests also that further improvement is possible with respect to Divisional Courts and the Appeal Courts. Why should an appeal lie from a Divisional Court constituted possibly of three judges, the Lord Chief Justice among them, to a Court of Appeal, also consisting of three judges? Take the case of a registration appeal, or a question under the Employers' Liability Act, in which it is found impossible to refuse leave to appeal. In such cases surely an appeal might be dispensed with. Under the old system in equity a decree might be enrolled and the parties go straight to the House of Lords from the Master of the Rolls or the Vice-Chancellor. In such instances as we have mentioned, and in the numerous important magistrates' cases which arise, one of two courses might profitably be adopted—viz. either to dispense with the hearing before the Divisional Court and go straight from the revising barrister or County Court judge to the Court of Appeal, or provide that the appeal from the Divisional Court should be to the House of Lords, and not to the Court of Appeal. It is really very much a question of names, and a strong Divisional Court is quite as good a tribunal as the Appeal Court. There is no reason why bills to give effect to such changes as these should not be introduced by a private member and become law in the course of next year.

IN In re Wilks; Child v. Bulmer, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 696, Mr. Justice Stirling had to consider how far the institution of legal proceedings by one joint-tenant will sever the joint-tenancy. In that case a fund in a suit having been carried to the separate account of three infant plaintiffs as joint-tenants, one of them on attaining twenty-one applied by summons for payment out to himself of one-third of the fund; but owing to pressure of business this summons was not heard on the day on which it was returnable, and before it was heard the plaintiff died. Mr. Justice Stirling held that the joint-tenancy was not severed. Laying down the text that 'the act of a joint-tenant which amounts to a severance must be such as to preclude him from claiming by survivorship any interest in the subject-matter of the joint-tenancy,' he thought that the applicant would have been at liberty at any time before his death to withdraw his summons and claim the benefit of the joint-tenancy. On the other hand, an order of the Court for payment out of his interest to one joint-tenant would clearly sever the joint-tenancy as to that share; and sometimes an order of the Court may effect a severance where it is not intended. Thus in In re Pearson, 46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 670; L. R. 5 Chanc. Div. 982, the Court of Appeal pointed out that a petition for a vesting order on the appointment of a new trustee in place of a lunatic, who is one of several trustees, should be intituled in the Chancery Division as well as in Lunacy, as otherwise the order would not affect the title of the continuing trustees, and would, therefore, have the effect of severing the joint-tenancy. Whether there would be a severance if a joint-tenant died after the hearing, but before the judgment or order was delivered, was treated as an open question by Mr. Justice Stirling; but the case of Turner v. The London and South-Western Railway Company, 43 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 430; L. R. 17 Eq. 561, would seem to show that the Court in such a case has power to date the judgment as of the date of the hearing, and so bring about a severance.

IN the case of Howell v. Lewis, reported in our Notes of Cases for this week, proceedings had been taken by a next friend (who was also co-plaintiff) on behalf of a person alleged to be of unsound mind, but not so found by inquisition. The person alleged to be of unsound mind afterwards took out a summons to strike out his name as co-plaintiff on the ground that he was of sound mind, and that the proceedings were not taken with his authority. In Palmer v. Walesby, 37 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 612; L. R. 3 Chanc. App. 73, under somewhat similar circumstances, proceedings were stayed while a petition in lunacy was presented, and in that case the plaintiff's soundness of mind being established on the inquiry, the bill was taken off the file and the costs ordered to be paid by the next friend. In Howell v. Lewis there was no intention of presenting a petition in lunacy, while on the evidence before the Court the capacity of the plaintiff was open to doubt. Mr. Justice Kekewich was guided by the old authority of Lee v. Ryder, 6 Mad. 294, where it being disputed whether a defendant was from infirmity of mind competent to answer the plaintiff's bill on oath, it was referred to the master to inquire as to the fact. Following the analogy of this case, Mr. Justice Kekewich referred it to chambers to inquire whether the plaintiff was at the date of the commencement of the proceedings competent to retain the solicitors to institute them on his behalf; and if not, whether it was for his benefit that the action should be prosecuted in his name by the next friend. The precedent may prove a useful one.

The maxim 'Beati possidentes' has just been well illustrated by the outgoing mayor of Chelmsford. That gentleman may certainly be congratulated on having the courage of his convictions. During his year of office it became necessary to elect an alderman to fill a casual vacancy. The mayor sat as chairman of the council at the election. He further became a candidate for the vacant office. He then voted for himself. Moreover, on finding that eleven of his colleagues in the council had voted against him, and only ten in his favour, his conviction of his own superior fitness for the post remained unshaken, and, the votes being equal, he bestowed the casting vote upon himself. Having thus voted early and voted often, he took up the rôle of returning officer and declared himself to be elected. Now in Regina v. Owens, 28 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 316, and Regina v. White, 36 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 267, it was decided that a man cannot, acting as a returning officer, return himself, and that, if a mayor offers himself for election as a town councillor during his term of office, he is incapable of performing his duty as returning officer, and the proper course is for the council to appoint an alderman to take his place. Section 36 of the Old Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76), on which these decisions partly rested, is re-enacted in terms by section 67 of the Act of 1882, and their real basis—namely, the rule that no man may be a judge in his own cause, is one of the fundamental principles of our law. The opponents of the mayor, therefore, had a good case. It only remained for them to take advantage of it by the proper procedure. An election petition was clearly possible, but the twenty-one days within which, by section 88 of the Act, it must be presented were allowed to slip away. Could they proceed by quo warranto? Their grounds of complaint were two—namely, that the mayor ought not to have acted as returning officer; and, secondly, that he ought not to have voted for himself. But, if the first ground was good, he was disqualified at the time of the election; if the second, he was not duly elected by a majority of votes, and in both these cases the Act provides (section 87) that the election shall not be questioned except by a petition. Quo warranto, therefore, would not lie. The result is very similar to that arrived at in Pritchard v. The Mayor of Bangor, 57 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 313, where, upon the same ground, the Court refused to say whether an outgoing alderman was eligible for the office of councillor. Section 73 of the Act seems to contemplate that an election may in some way be called in question by quo warranto, but we confess we scarcely see how that process is to be used except in cases of disqualification arising after election, as indicated by section 225. Persons, therefore, affected by irregularities of the kind will do well to make sure of their remedy by presenting their petition within the prescribed twenty-one days.

No better indication could be afforded of the change in modern opinion regarding strikes than the argument which was gravely put forward in the recent case of Warburton v. The Huddersfield Industrial Society (Notes of Cases, p. 148), that a contribution out of the funds of the society to aid a local strike was an application of those funds to a 'lawful purpose.' By section 12 (7) of the Industrial and Provident Securities Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 45), it is enacted that 'the profits of the society may be applied to any lawful purpose.' According to the rules of the society its objects were to carry on the trades of general dealers, both wholesale and retail, also of manufacturers, farmers, and workers of mines and minerals, and to do all things necessary or expedient for the accomplishments of those acts. The net profits of all business carried on, after paying expenses, &c., were to be applied either to increase the capital, reserve fund, or business of the society, or to 'any lawful purpose,' less any grant that might be made for educational purposes. A majority of the members at a duly constituted meeting had voted in favour of contributing a sum from the society's funds in aid of a strike which was being carried on in the immediate neighbourhood. A dissentient member very properly brought an action against the society to restrain such an unauthorised application of its funds.

It was contended, in support of the proposed contribution, that the words in the subsection, 'any lawful purpose,' were wide enough to include subscribing to strikes, which were lawful provided that there was no intimidation. As to the legality of strikes, with or without intimidation, it does not seem material to enter into any discussion. But what appears to have been overlooked by the society when the resolution was passed was that such an application of its funds was not to a 'lawful purpose' quoad the objects of the society. Its objects were, as stated above, trading and manufacturing; and its net profits were to be applied to increase the capital, reserve fund, or business of the society, or to any lawful purpose—clearly words ejusdem generis. It might just as well—and, from our point of view, far better—have been resolved that a sum out of the funds of the society should have been sent to a local charity. In our opinion, therefore, the decision of the learned judges of the Divisional Court was indisputably correct.

The University correspondent of the Globe complains bitterly of the obligation of a 'very large number of men having to go down at this period to eat the three bad dinners provided for them by one or other of the Inns of Court,' and says that 'it is surely time that this senseless custom should be abolished.' It is added that 'the regulation was, of course, intelligible at a time when law students kept terms at the Temples or Lincoln's Inn instead of at the universities,' but that, 'now this is changed, there seems nothing whatever to be gained by the retention of these compulsory dinners, which only cause Oxford and Cambridge men some expense and very great inconvenience.' On reference to the Inns of Courts Consolidated Regulations, we find that non-university men keep terms by dining six days each term, while university men need only dine three days each term, but we know of no regulation of the Inns of Court by which terms can be kept at the universities themselves.

We regret to observe that in the report of The Salvation Army Case the Times speaks of 'Palmer's Act,' and not, as it ought to be, 'the Palmer Act.' There is, as we have already had occasion to observe, a wide distinction between the two forms of nomenclature. The Palmer Act, the Coventry Act, and some few other Acts are so called after the names of persons, not being Parliament men, who in some way or other occasioned their being passed; 'Palmer's Act,' more commonly called 'Hinde Palmer's Act,' Russell Gurney's Act, and very many other Acts, take their names from the members of Parliament who introduced them.

In further reference to the forthcoming Government Criminal Evidence Bill, which we noticed last week (ante, p. 702), it may be well to draw attention to the provision of the Indian Codes in the matter. First, by the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, s. 120, it is enacted that 'in criminal proceedings against any person, the husband or wife of such person respectively shall be a competent witness.' Secondly, by the Indian Criminal Procedure Act, 1882, s. 342, it is enacted that 'for the purpose of enabling the accused to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, the Court may, at any stage of the inquiry or trial, without previously warning the accused, put such questions to him as the Court considers necessary, and shall for the purpose aforesaid question him generally on the case after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence.' It is added that 'the accused shall not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer such questions or by giving false answers to them; but the Court and the jury (if any) may draw such inference from such refusal or answers as it thinks just;' that 'the answers given by the accused may be taken into consideration in such inquiry or trial, and put in evidence for or against him in any other inquiry into or trial for any other offence which such answers may tend to show that he has committed;' but that 'no oath shall be administered to the accused.' For arguments in favour of passing an Act to allow accused persons to testify, the reader may consult the Law Magazine and Review for 1858, vol. v. p. 101, and a paper by the late Mr. Pitt-Taylor, read at a meeting of the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law in 1861, from which it appears that Lord Brougham (the president of that society) brought in bills in 1858, 1859, and 1860 to allow accused persons to testify.

It is stated in the course of a descriptive article in the Times on the 'Nomination of Sheriffs' that 'to secure their independence it is considered necessary that they should be possessed of a competent income from landed property in the county from which they are chosen, and, though there is no statutory qualification as to amount, it has generally been considered that they should at least have landed estate to the value of 600*l.* a year.' The exact words of section 4 of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, are that 'a person shall not be appointed sheriff except he have sufficient land within his county to answer [sic] the Queen and her people.' This very vague enactment is identical with that of the repealed 9 Ed. II. c. 10, st. 2, from which it is taken, and, whatever it may mean, is imperative (being couched in negative phrase) and not directory, as perhaps the somewhat similar provisions of section 12 of the Coroners Act, 1887 (see Law Journal for 1890, p. 166), may be.

Those 'mystery men' of literature, the 'London Correspondents' of provincial newspapers, have been commenting on the fact of judges being now entitled to take their retiring pensions. Judges are notoriously long-lived, and when they retain their faculties unimpaired there is little cause for wonder or regret in their preferring to remain in harness. When, however, physical or mental infirmities have begun to interfere with the satisfactory performance of their judicial function, it is due both to themselves and to the public that their seats on the bench should be vacated and that front-rank men at the bar should be allowed to reach the legitimate goal of their ambition. It is probable, therefore, that the next few months may see several retirements and new appointments.

Another fact (if it be a fact) which has exercised the minds and pens of the 'London Correspondents' is the very large number of Queen's Counsel who applied for the County Court judgeships recently filled up. There is, indeed, no room for doubt as to this rank in the profession being crowded, and it is a necessary result of the system that an unsuccessful Q.C. should be far worse off than a junior who is not a rising man. A County Court judgeship, with its certain 1,500*l.* a year, offers a comfortable, if not a brilliant, career for men already in the afternoon of life. But, so far at least as the last batch of appointments is concerned, the Q.C.'s were not in the race at all. The practical and utilitarian side of the subject is the one which the Lord Chancellor must regard, but the other side is, alas! too often a sad and pathetic one.

That a man who was anxious and willing to do honest work, and had trudged the weary miles from Tonbridge to London in search of it, should nevertheless die of starvation in the richest city in the world, is a terribly severe criticism on the poor-laws of England. Mr. Wynne Baxter (the coroner) and the jury who sat on the inquest at Stepney on the 14th inst. felt and expressed themselves strongly on the sad occurrence, but were unable to indicate where the blame lay under the existing system. Most people will, however, agree with the coroner in saying, 'The whole poor-law principle was on its trial, and there must be some alteration made in order to enable it to deal with places having enormous and congested populations like London.' The sooner the remedy is found the better will it be for the credit of the poor-law officials and of common humanity.

The dull decorum of the High Court was disturbed on Tuesday last by a military appellant in full uniform and wearing his sword. The officer in question holds strong views on the subject of costs, and his mode of addressing the judges who formed the Divisional Court was certainly unique. The antiquity of the story about the Scotch minister's sermon on the devil, with its three heads, may, perhaps, have destroyed some of its effect. At any rate its relation passed unrebuked; but when a firm of solicitors were described as including a fox and 'a laughing jackass or the man-eating tiger of India,' the gallant appellant was very properly brought to book and reminded that he was 'a gentleman.' The answer given by one of the judges to the appellant's inquiry if he could go to Lord Justice Kay reads almost like a fourth head to the 'devil sermon'—'This is a free country; you may go where you like, and as soon as you like.' Perhaps the appellant has heard a report that Lord Justice Kay is not considered indulgent to solicitors and their bills. A repetition of the episode would hardly, however, be tolerated even by the most amiable of judges.

A MARRIED WOMAN'S ADVANTAGES.

It was, perhaps, unavoidable while the Legislature was endeavouring piecemeal to relieve married women from disabilities with regard to property and the power of litigation, and to place them as far as possible, except politically, on the same level as their husbands, that some instances should occur in which the woman should be promoted to a condition of superior advantage to her spouse, and other instances in which the husband's burden survives the reason for its imposition.

The object of the Married Women's Property Acts was to free the married woman from disabilities entailed on her as between herself and her husband, not to alter the rights of third parties, except in points of adjective as distinguished from substantive law—e.g. in removing the obligation by which a married woman was bound to sue by her next friend. Thus she is not yet altogether a feme sole as regards the rest of the world, other than her husband; and the ecclesiastical doctrine imported into our law, where it became a fiction, that husband and wife are one person, still operates to the detriment of married persons in cases of gifts to a man, his wife, and a third party, where, in the absence of some indication of a contrary intention on the part of the grantor, the husband and wife take but one share between them instead of one-third each. To hold otherwise would be to prejudice the rights of the third person, which was not intended by the Acts.

There are certain particulars in which the position of a husband is distinctly inferior to that of his wife, and some of these I proceed to mention:—

1. A married woman is not personally liable for debt, though her separate estate is liable if at the time she contracted the debt she was possessed of separate estate, to bind which she could be deemed to have contracted, and if such estate were free from restraint on anticipation both at the time of contracting the debt and of execution; she cannot even be made bankrupt except in a few unimportant instances. If, therefore, she have no separate estate, the creditor is without a remedy unless the debt has been contracted by means of false pretences, when the criminal law steps in.

2. Upon marriage the husband becomes liable for his wife's ante-nuptial debts to the amount of her property acquired by him, though she is under no obligation with respect to his ante-nuptial debts, however large a property she may have acquired, marriage being a valuable consideration for a settlement, even as against creditors.

3. From the doctrine above referred to, that a husband and wife are one person, springs the liability of the husband for his wife's wrongs. Indeed, it is said that at common law a married woman cannot commit a wrong, but that actions and delinquencies for which she would have been liable, if single, are in law the torts of her husband (Wainford v. Heyl (1875), 44 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 567). This liability for a wife's wrongs remains to the full extent as regards those committed after the marriage, but with respect to ante-nuptial wrongs is limited by the amount of property derived from the wife. The wife may now be sued alone, and in such an action the husband cannot be made liable.

4. During the marriage a wife, who is justifiably living apart from her husband, may pledge his credit for 'necessaries' supplied, and for money advanced to buy 'necessaries,' a term which means 'reasonable expenses,' but he, although in poverty and whether living separate or not, may not pledge the credit of his wife without authority, however rich she be. He can, in fact, only obtain maintenance from his wife by means of the poor law, and then only by entering a workhouse and becoming chargeable to the parish rates.

5. A married woman deserted by her husband can obtain an order for maintenance by her husband to the extent of 2*l.* per week, on a summons in a police Court, unless guilty of uncondoned adultery (49 & 50 Vict. c. 52), and may also obtain a protection order, which has the same effect as a judicial separation (Divorce Act, 1857, s. 21). There are no similar provisions for the benefit of husbands.

6. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, if a husband has been convicted of an aggravated assault on his wife, the Court or magistrate may, if satisfied that the future safety of the wife is in peril, order that the wife be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, an order which has the effect of judicial separation. The order may provide that the husband shall pay to the wife such weekly sum as is in accordance with his and her means, and that the legal custody of any children of the marriage under the age of ten years be given to the wife.

7. A husband is liable to the poor law for maintaining his wife's children, born before or after the marriage, and whether legitimate or not, while the wife is only liable to maintain her own children.

8. Even to the present day in some parishes the overseers insert the husband's name as ratepayer in respect of the property of his wife; and he thereby becomes liable to local burdens unless he takes steps to remove his name.

9. By the Slander of Women Act of this year, c. 51, words spoken and published imputing unchastity or adultery to any woman or girl no longer require special damage to render them actionable. It is difficult to see why the same relief was not given to men.

10. Generally speaking, a wife is, as regards the criminal law, in the position of a single woman, and responsible for her crimes to the same extent as an unmarried person. This rule is subject to the important exception that for criminal acts done in the presence of her husband she is presumed to have acted under his coercion in the absence of evidence to the contrary, and is held not guilty; an exception which does not apply to treason, murder, or misdemeanour. It is needless to remark that a husband is not so fortunate.

SERVICE OUT OF THE JURISDICTION.—IV.

3. ORDER XI. is not, however, necessarily exhaustive as to service out of the jurisdiction except in the case of actions (per Mr. Justice Chitty in In re Busfield, 55, Law J. Rep. Chanc. 467; L. R. (1886) 32 Chanc. Div. 128) and it is established by innumerable decisions that the Court may and will order the service out of the jurisdiction of a mere notice to a third party that proceedings affecting his rights are pending within the jurisdiction. An examination of a few of these cases will clearly illustrate the principles on which this apparent exception to the general rule stated in last paper rests. (1) A. sued for goods in the possession of B. It appeared that C., a foreigner, residing out of the jurisdiction, claimed the right to the same goods, and would probably sue B. in respect of them. The Court (Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Lopes) gave leave to B. to serve an interpleader summons on C. out of the jurisdiction. This decision was in accordance with the judgment of Lord Eldon in Stevenson v. Anderson, 2 V. & B. 407, and of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in The East and West India Dock Company v. Littledale, 7 Hare, 57, although opposed to a dictum of Baron Alderson in Patorni v. Campbell, 12 M. & W. 277, and it was justified by the Court on the following grounds: 'The Court, by making the order asked for, does not assert any present jurisdiction over (C.) or propose to compel him to submit to its process, but merely gives him notice of the proceedings which are being taken, so that, if after such notice he should decline to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court, and allow the rights as between the plaintiffs and defendant to be determined in his absence, and hereafter commence an action against the defendant in respect of the identical claim now made by the plaintiff, he may be barred from continuing proceedings which would be harassing upon the defendant, who would thereby be twice vexed for the same cause. If C. has a good claim, as he asserts, against the defendant he is not put in a worse position by prosecuting it now instead of waiting till the action of the defendant is determined (Credits Gerundeuse v. Van Weede, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 142; L. R. (1884) 12 Q. B. Div. 171). (2) An order was made for winding up a limited company; an official liquidator was appointed; a list of contributories was carried into chambers, and of the persons included in it twenty-two were resident in Ireland or Scotland. It was held by the Court of Appeal, reversing the order of the chief clerk and of Mr. Justice North, that a notice under the General Order of November 11, 1862, r. 30, of an appointment to settle the list of contributories might be served on each of the persons out of the jurisdiction in the manner directed by rule 60. 'In the present case,' said Lord Justice Cotton, 'the notice is not intended to be the foundation of any proceedings against the persons on whom it is served. The official liquidator is only performing a duty cast upon him by the Companies Acts of giving certain information to persons whom it is proposed to place on the list of contributories;' and Lord Justice Lindley added: 'If notices of this kind could not be served abroad, it might in many cases be impossible to wind up a company at all' (In re Nathan, Newman & Co. 56 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 752; L. R. (1887) 35 Chanc. Div. 1). (3) But where it was sought to serve on persons residing out of the jurisdiction, an order for a call, with a view to found proceedings against them to compel payment, it was held that the Court had no jurisdiction to order such service (In re The Anglo-African Steamship Company, 55 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 579; L. R. (1886) 32 Chanc. Div. 348).

We do not propose to pursue this branch of the subject further for several reasons. In the first place, the decisions are conflicting; in the second place, service out of the jurisdiction in some at least of the cases that we have been considering can hardly be said to have been allowed under Order XI. In the last place, enough has been said to show the ratio decidendi.

4. Matters to which Order XI. does not in terms apply may be brought within its scope by reference.

The best illustration that we can give of this rule will be to trace shortly the history of the law as to the service of third-party notices out of the jurisdiction. In The Swansea Shipping Company v. Duncan Fox & Co. 45 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 638; L. R. (1876) 1 Q. B. Div. 644, an action had been brought against the defendants for breach of charterparty by which they agreed to discharge a cargo of nitrate of soda as fast as the custom of the port of discharge would allow. The defendants had sold at Liverpool to the British Agricultural Association, a company carrying on business in Scotland, the cargo to arrive, and it was shown that, by the custom of the trade, of which the company were aware, on such a sale of such a cargo the buyers would be bound to discharge in accordance with the custom of the port. The defendants applied, under Order XVI., rules 17 and 18, of the Judicature Rules, 1875, for an order citing the company to appear and take part in the trial. It was objected that the rule as to service of the notice to third persons did not apply to persons or corporations out of the jurisdiction, and that the soundness of this objection was clearly established by the fact that the person served with a third-party notice had to appear within eight days, which would be quite insufficient where the service had to be effected in a distant country. But the Master of the Rolls (Jessel) pointed out that the order giving leave to serve a notice out of the jurisdiction was 'to name such a time for appearance as the necessity of the case as to time and place' required, and held that, since, under Order XVI., service of a third-party notice was to be effected 'according to the rules as to service of writs of summons,' such notices were brought by reference within the purview of Order XI. The Swansea Shipping Company v. Duncan Fox & Co. was decided, as we have said, under the Rules of 1876, in which there was no exception to the service of writs out of the jurisdiction in favour of persons ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, corresponding to that which is to be found in the Rules of 1883. In Speller & Co. v. The Bristol Steam Navigation Company, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 322; L. R. (1884) 13 Q. B. Div. 96—a case decided after the Rules of 1883 had come into force—the defendants were sued for damages to the plaintiffs' goods while on board a vessel of the defendants on a certain voyage, by reason of the vessel being not seaworthy for the voyage, and they claimed to be entitled to issue a third-party notice under Order XVI., rule 48, on the person of whom they had hired the vessel with a warranty of seaworthiness, and to serve this notice upon such person in Scotland, where he was 'ordinarily resident,' on the ground that he was a necessary or proper party under Order XI., rule 1 (g). Mr. Justice Grove and Baron Huddleston held that the case was governed by Lenders v. Anderson, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 104; L. R.

12 Q. B. Div. 50, and that Order XI., rule 1 (g) did not apply to service out of the jurisdiction of a third-party notice on a third party domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland, and the Court of appeal supported this decision, although on a different ground—viz. that as the defendants could neither claim contribution nor an indemnity from the person out of the jurisdiction, no third-party notice could be issued under Order XVI., rule 48 at all. It is obvious that there was nothing in this decision inconsistent with the principle affirmed in The Swansea Shipping Company's Case, but it gave rise to much uncertainty, and it was not until the decision of Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Day in Dubout & Co. v. Macpherson, 58 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 496; L. R. (1889) 23 Q. B. Div. 340, that the right to order service of a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction was clearly established.

SMITH ON THE LAW OF COMPANIES.

A Summary of the Law of Companies. By T. EUSTACE SMITH, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Fifth Edition. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1891.

THE author of this work tells us in the preface to his first edition, which is reprinted in the present edition, how his work came to be written. He felt, while reading as an articled clerk for the Final Examination of the Incorporated Law Society, the need of some small book to give the main principles of the law relating to joint-stock companies, more particularly as this important branch of mercantile law lies outside the scope of the text-books ordinarily used by students. The text-books on company's law, the author tells us, the student finds so large and the Companies Acts so long that he cannot gain even a general knowledge of the subject without devoting to it more time than he can safely spare from his other subjects. It was to meet this want that this volume was penned, and its considerable success in passing through several editions would seem to justify the venture. It is needless to say that the work has since then received considerable accretions, and last year there were three very important Acts dealing with joint-stock companies. The Companies (Winding-up) Act and the rules and forms thereunder are printed in the Appendix. The work may be recommended as giving a good sketch of this difficult branch of law.

BRETT'S LEADING CASES.

Leading Cases in Modern Equity. By THOMAS BRETT, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: Wm. Clowes & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

STUDENTS of equity will welcome the new edition of this valuable collection of leading cases. The first edition appeared only four years ago, and the fact that another is now called for is sufficient proof that the book has met with the appreciation which we think it deserves. The object of the work, as explained in the preface to the first edition, is to illustrate, by means of leading cases, the doctrines of modern equity. The plan adopted is to give a selection of leading cases such as are best calculated to interest the reader, and impress the modern doctrines on the minds alike of students and practitioners, the cases dealing with the same class of subjects being to some extent grouped together. We think the selection of the cases is very good, and have nothing but praise for the manner in which the author states the principles and the facts of those cases; indeed, we are of opinion that the present race of reporters would do well to adopt a somewhat similar method in preference to that, which is too prevalent among them, of wrapping up the point of a decision in a mass of more or less unnecessary facts. On the other hand, it may be said that it is just such cases as Mr. Brett has selected that are capable of being concisely reported. The answer to that is, that unless the principle of a case can be clearly stated within a moderate compass it is rarely worth reporting at all. The notes are very full, and appear to be well brought down to date. The table of cases professes to give references to more than one series of Reports, but we are bound to say that this part of the work might have been more thoroughly done. One improvement we would suggest is that the dates of the leading cases should be given, there being nothing at present to guide the reader beyond a bare reference to one set of Reports.

BEWES ON COPYRIGHT, PATENTS, &c.

Copyright, Patents, Designs, Trade-marks, &c.: a Manual of Practical Law. By WYNDHAM AUSTIS BEWES, LL.B., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Adam & Charles Black. 1891.

THE general idea of this handbook, which is to include in one volume all the principal legal monopolies depending on invention, is a good one, but whether the idea has been worked out in such a way as to be of much utility is another matter. The author pleads that he is writing 'under somewhat strict conditions a volume that is intended to be very concise, and, as far as the subjects permit, of a popular nature,' and that this renders it impossible to fulfil the requirements of every critic, or even of the author himself. The work is, we are afraid, too technical and minute for the general reader and, at the same time, not deep enough for the lawyer. Perhaps, however, readers who lie between these two classes may find it useful.

MANORIAL FEES.

SIR,—Following up Mr. Lowndes's question in your issue of November 14, will any of your readers inform me whether the steward of a manor, who is not a solicitor, can charge any fees for admissions or surrender, and, if so, how those fees are regulated?

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

SIR,—It is from our national universities that middle-class education throughout England should receive its impetus and encouragement. In origin, maintenance, and purpose, the mission of our universities has been—and should more fully become—to help forward the studious of all classes, and in all branches of study.

The universities of Bologna, Paris, Cambridge, and Oxford had one common origin—the combining together of poor students to live, lodge, and study in common as their limited means necessitated, at first in hostels, inns, or halls, which, being ultimately endowed with property and corporate privileges, became colleges. Kings, queens, and benevolent laymen united in fostering the efforts of these poor students. Subordinate corporations of students in any special branch of study were called 'faculties.' At all times the faculty of theology has been the most prominent, but it has existed side by side with other faculties—law, medicine, and music.

In this nineteenth century our public schools have found a 'modern side' to be imperatively necessary. The universities were in their early days but the development of the schools attached to monasteries and cathedrals. If they now held a similar relation to the public schools all would be well.

Degrees were originally but 'licences to teach,' at first within and ultimately (by authority of Pope Nicholas I.) beyond the precincts of the university. Why should not our national universities still be, in part, the training colleges of our secondary teachers?

Had the Cambridge senate voted the grace recently asked for, an advance in no way injurious to the theological faculty, but of incalculable advantage to middle-class education throughout England, would have been secured. Under present arrangements young men aspiring to commercial or professional pursuits are practically debarred from participating in the benefits originally intended for all willing and zealous students.

I do not advocate Parliamentary interference in this matter, but rather that the senate of each university should resolve (and that speedily) to act in accord with modern demands and requirements, the more so as the reforms needed are but few and very easy of adoption.

A public meeting, at which Lord Monkswell has consented to preside, will be held at Exeter Hall, Strand, on Monday evening, November 30, and at which I cordially invite the attendance of representatives of the professional and commercial classes—doctors, lawyers, bankers, manufacturers, and traders—from every town in England. Tickets will be forwarded on application to

REGISTRATION OF LAND.

SIR,—A case has recently come under my notice which has a strong likeness to Pilcher v. Rawlins, 41 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 485, and which illustrates the absolute necessity for the establishment of a register. A settlor, on his marriage, of an equity of redemption, through the supineness of the trustees in omitting to give notice to the mortgagee, has recently sold the property in consideration of a rentcharge, for which he obtained over 1,000*l.*, and used the money for his own purposes, he having first obtained a conveyance of the mortgaged property in fee simple. I admit that if the deed had not been registered, supposing it affected property in a register county, the results might have been the same, but the chances would be that, if it was the ordinary practice to register deeds, the practice would have been followed and the loss to the cestui que trust would have been avoided.

Of course, in making these remarks, I must not be taken to approve all the provisions of the late Registration Bill. One part was extremely objectionable.

COUNTY COURTS.

A HUSBAND'S LIABILITY FOR HIS WIFE'S DEBTS.

JUDGE BACON, sitting in the Bloomsbury County Court on November 17, had before him the case of Peter Robinson v. Skipper. It was an action for the recovery of 17*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, for goods supplied to the wife of the defendant, who is a solicitor practising in London, and living at Bellevue, Southchurch, Southend. The principal item in the account was one of 14*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* for a stuff dress. All the articles were supplied to the wife without any inquiries being made as to her means, and it was admitted that it was the common practice to give credit to married ladies on the supposition that they were authorised to pledge their husband's credit. For the defence it was said that Mr. Skipper allowed his wife a very liberal sum for housekeeping, and that he specially forbade her to pledge his credit. He paid one bill of over 60*l.*, and a second bill of 50*l.* to another large firm of drapers, under protest. He found out that his wife had been living very extravagantly. She was now separated from her husband, who had instituted proceedings against her for a divorce. Mr. Skipper knew nothing about this debt until the account was sent to him.—His Honour, in giving judgment, said it had been very solemnly laid down in the House of Lords that a wife, even though living at home with her husband, had no authority to pledge his credit if the husband told her she was not to do so; and if any tradesman trusted her he did it at his own risk. If a woman got credit and it was proved that the husband knew of it and did not warn the tradesman, that would be another thing. In this case he was of opinion that the plaintiff could not recover, and judgment would be for the defendant, but without costs.

HOUSEHOLDERS AND PAVEMENT OBSTRUCTIONS.

An interesting case with respect to the liability of householders for obstruction on the pavement was heard on November 17 at the Marylebone County Court before his Honour Judge Stonor. Mrs. Emma Witt, a cook in service in Chilworth Street, Paddington, sued Mr. Edgar Romer, who lives in Gloucester Terrace, Paddington, for damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the defendant's negligence. The evidence showed that the defendant one evening in March gave a dinner party, and for the convenience of his guests he had a carpet laid from the front door to the kerb. The plaintiff was passing on her way to the post, and, not seeing the carpet, fell and injured one of her knees. She thought little of the injury, and a doctor was not called in for nearly a month, during which time she had been ineffectually nursing herself.—Mr. Chester Jones said that his client had had a light put outside the door, to be used when the carpet was laid down, and that light was in use on the evening when the plaintiff met with her accident. He contended, therefore, that the plaintiff might have seen the carpet, and was guilty of contributory negligence.—The judge told the jury that the light might serve for the convenience of the defendant's guests as well as for the benefit of passers-by, and he did not think the defendant had done enough to secure the safety of the public. It was not enough for him to put a light; he must have a person outside, whenever the car, pet was put down, to warn passers-by. At the same time, the defendant was not liable for any additional injury the plaintiff might have sustained by neglecting to call in medical advice.—The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at 20*l.* 5*s.*—Mr. Arthur Hutton appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Chester Jones represented the defendant.

SOLICITORS' CASES.

On November 14, in the Queen's Bench Division, before Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Wright, In the Matter of Joseph Dawler, a Solicitor, of Hull, was the case of a solictor who, it was stated, was on July 18 last convicted at the Yorkshire Assizes of the conversion of a security for 1,000*l.*, and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. Mr. Hollams, on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, moved that the solicitor be struck off the roll.—Ordered accordingly.

In the Matter of Arthur Watling, a Solicitor, was the case of a solicitor of Coleman Street, in the City, who on July 25 had been convicted at the Central Criminal Court of forgery and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour.—Mr. Hollams, on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, made a similar application.—Ordered accordingly.

In the Matter of Percy Lucas, a Solicitor, was the case of a solicitor of Fenchurch Street, in the City, against whom the Venerable Albert Seymour, vicar of Chettlehampton, South Moulton, Devonshire, Archdeacon of Barnstaple, had made a charge that, having received for him the sum of 1,639*l.*, he had appropriated it to his own use. The Archdeacon was trustee under a settlement made on the marriage of a Mr. and a Mrs. Forster, and, as such, became entitled on Mr. Forster's death to receive a sum of 1,639*l.*, payable by the Clergy Mutual Assurance Society in respect of a policy effected upon Mr. Forster's life in that office. Mr. Forster died in September, 1890, and the Archdeacon then employed the solicitor to obtain payment of that sum. Having heard from the office of the society that the money had been paid, the Archdeacon called upon the solicitor on February 9 last, when he admitted that he had received the money from the society, but stated that it was on deposit, and gaining interest, and that he would invest it. Next day he wrote to the Archdeacon with a list of investments, one of which he had selected, and on February 13 the solicitor wrote to him that he would invest the money. Not hearing from the solicitor, the Archdeacon in March got his brother to see him, when he said he had instructed his broker to invest the money in the securities agreed upon. The brother saw the solicitor on more than one occasion in March. He made various excuses for his delay, and said he would send a cheque. Not having received the money or any securities, the Archdeacon caused an application to be made to the solicitor, who, however, had never paid the money. The report of the committee of the Law Society, who had inquired into the matter, stated that nothing further was heard of the solicitor, who on June 9 was adjudicated a bankrupt, the act of bankruptcy being that he had absconded with the intention to defeat or delay his creditors. The committee found that the charge was proved, and that the solicitor had been guilty of the professional misconduct alleged.—Mr. Hollams appeared for the Incorporated Law Society, and the report having been read, and the solicitor not appearing, Lord Coleridge said notice had been given and nothing had been heard of the solicitor. The act of professional misconduct imputed was gross, the sum was large. No excuse whatever was suggested, and under such circumstances the Court, in vindication of the character of its officers, must hold that such a person was unfit to remain upon its rolls, and therefore directed the name of the solicitor to be struck off.—Ordered accordingly.

NISI PRIUS.

VENUE, LONDON CAUSES.

On November 14, at Guildhall, before Mr. Justice Wills and a common jury, the case of Hill v. Morris was heard. This case was of interest both from its peculiar circumstances and as illustrating a matter which has recently been much remarked upon—viz. the manner in which actions, of which the natural venue would be at the assizes in remote parts of the country, are brought up to be tried in the City of London. The action was for damages in respect of personal injuries sustained through the negligence of the defendant or his servants. The plaintiff is a lodging-house keeper at Weymouth, and the defendant is a draper in the same town. It appeared that in September, 1890, the plaintiff was passing the defendant's shop when some rolls of flannel, which were piled upon the pavement just outside the shop for exhibition, fell, striking the plaintiff and knocking her down. One of the rolls was produced in Court. It was about three feet long, and stated to weigh eight pounds. At first the plaintiff did not appear to have suffered any serious injury, but she gradually became worse, developing symptoms of hysteria and paralysis. She was brought into Court upon a couch, and in the course of her evidence, which she gave in an almost inaudible voice, she became unconscious and had to be carried out. According to the medical evidence, she was in a nervous and hysterical condition, and suffered from loss of memory, vomiting, frequent fainting fits, and paralysis of the left side. In the case of a naturally weak and hysterical temperament such results might be produced by a comparatively slight nervous shock, such as this accident. With proper treatment she might recover in twelve or eighteen months, but it was doubtful. Evidence was given that she was unable to attend to household duties, and had lost her former profits of 60*l.* or 70*l.* a year.—No evidence was called on behalf of the defendant, counsel merely addressing the jury in reduction of damages.—The learned judge, in summing up, said that it was an extraordinary case. From a very trivial accident—the mere tumbling of a roll of flannel—effects appeared to have resulted of the most serious nature, and the plaintiff had been reduced to her present deplorable condition. In estimating the damages, however, the jury ought to consider that this action might have been brought to trial six months ago at Dorchester Assizes, a course which would have spared the plaintiff fatigue and anxiety, and, as the doctors said, would have greatly promoted her recovery. This was a case in which the cause of action arose and both the parties resided at Weymouth, which was only eight miles from an assize town. No valid excuse had been made for bringing such an action to London nor for the long delay that had occurred.—The jury gave a verdict for 250*l.*—Mr. Justice Wills gave judgment for that amount, with such costs only as would have been payable had the case been tried at Dorchester Assizes.—Mr. M'Call, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Bankes appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Bullen and Mr. Salter for the defendant.

THE SITTINGS AT THE GUILDHALL. — The present sittings of the Law Courts at the Guildhall will conclude on Wednesday, November 25, and there will be no further actions tried there until the Hilary sittings in January.

ORDER OF COURT.

Wednesday, November 18, 1891.

WHEREAS, Mr. Justice North and Mr. Justice Stirling have respectively requested Mr. Justice Chitty to hear and dispose of short causes and petitions in causes and matters assigned to them respectively which will be in the paper for hearing on Saturday, November 21, 1891; and whereas Mr. Justice North has requested Mr. Justice Kekewick to hear and dispose of summonses in chambers in causes and matters assigned to him, which will be in the paper on Monday, November 23, 1891; and whereas Mr. Justice Stirling has requested Mr. Justice Romer to hear and dispose of summonses in chambers in causes and matters assigned to him, which will be in the paper on Monday, November 23, 1891; now I, the Right Honourable Hardinge Stanley, Baron Halsbury, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, do hereby concur in such requests and also in any further requests which may be made under section 6 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1884, by the said Mr. Justice North and Mr. Justice Stirling respectively, during the present Michaelmas Sittings and do hereby order accordingly. And this order is to be drawn up by the registrar and set up in the several offices of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. HALSBURY, C.

THE DAY CENSUS IN THE CITY.

UNDER the title of 'Ten Years' Growth of the City of London, 1881–1891,' the Corporation of London have just published an interesting volume recording the results of the day census of the City recently made by the Local Government and Taxation Committee. The day on which the census was taken was April 27, or about three weeks after the Imperial census. Three considerations showed the desirability of a day census. First, the returns as to the population of the City made under the Imperial enumeration were absolutely worthless as forming any indication of its commercial importance, for they convey the impression that the City was hopelessly on the wane. Thus, in 1861, the population of the City according to the Imperial census was 112,063; in 1871, 74,897; in 1881, 50,652; and in 1891, 37,694. The mercantile and commercial population as ascertained by the day census was found to be, in 1866, 170,133; in 1881, 261,061; and in 1891, 301,384. The difference in the two returns was due to the non-residential character of the City of London consequent upon the demand for business premises, the great value of City property, the unsatisfactory method of imposing the inhabited house duty, and the facilities for railway travelling. Secondly, the desirability of a day census was apparent for the reason that under the Imperial registration the City of London was placed in a disadvantageous position in regard to other cities and towns where the central business population and the surrounding residential population were embraced in one enumeration. Thirdly, the advantage of taking a day census had been recognised by the Imperial Registration Department itself. Only twenty-six people declined to furnish the information required, and of these information as to nineteen was supplied from other sources. The population was found to be 301,384—viz. employers, 29,520; male employés, 202,213; female employés, 50,416; and children under fifteen, 19,235. In twenty-four hours 1,186,094 persons and 92,372 vehicles entered the City. This day census placed the City at the head of the metropolitan constituencies as regards size, while it was put last in the Imperial census. It was greater than any of twenty-six counties in the kingdom. As regarded its ratable value, 3,872,088*l.*, which had increased by 336,594*l.* in the last ten years, the City was at the head of every place in the kingdom. The profits assessed to income-tax in the City were 70,018,707*l.* in 1890, as against 39,263,424*l.* ten years ago. These and other interesting figures are given in the report, which was compiled by Mr. James Salmon, the chairman of the committee.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING. — The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, November 17; Mr. Harcourt in the chair.—The subject for discussion, 'That the British occupation of Egypt is no longer justifiable or expedient,' was opened by Mr. Crawford.—Mr. Kinipple opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: In the affirmative, Messrs. Archer-White and Evershed; in the negative, Messrs. Baldwin, Watson, and Willson.—On the motion being put to the meeting, it was lost by a majority of fifteen.—The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society on Tuesday, November 24, is: 'That the case of Medawar v. The Grand Hotel Company, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. 11, was wrongly decided.'

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of this association on Monday, November 16 (Mr. Alex. Wilson in the chair), a debate was held on the following subject for discussion: 'That sections 4 and 17 of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3) be repealed.'—Mr. C. H. Rutherford opened in the affirmative, which was also supported by Messrs. Broadbridge and M'Master.—Mr. A. C. Thomas opened in the negative, which was also supported by Mr. Barnes.—The question was decided in the negative by the casting vote of the chairman.

OBITUARY.

WE have to announce that Mr. THOMAS CURZON HANSARD died on Thursday, November 12, at Ashdown, Kingston-on-Thames. Mr. Hansard was born in 1813, he received a private education, and was called to the bar of the Temple in 1843. On the death of his father he undertook the editing of 'Hansard,' and, in conjunction with the late Mr. Cornelius Buck and his son, devoted upwards of half a century to the production of a national record, unrivalled in accuracy or in the number of its volumes, the popularity of which has resulted in our Colonies adopting the name for their Parliamentary records. 'Hansard' was for many years considered semi-official, and its extension was provided for by a grant-in-aid voted annually by Parliament, but this assistance attracted competition, and resulted in the very reluctant transfer of eighty-five years of labour to other hands. Mr. Hansard wrote the articles on Printing and Type-founding for the seventh edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' published in 1841, which were revised for the eighth edition in 1859.

THE NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—The following arrangements have been made by the judges (Mr. Justice Lawrance and Mr. Justice Collins) for holding the Winter Assizes on the Northern Circuit—viz. The commission will be opened at Carlisle on Friday, November 13; at Lancaster on Tuesday, November 17; at Manchester on Saturday, November 21, and at Liverpool on Thursday, December 3. Business will commence at each place on the day next after the commission day, at 11 o'clock. There will be no civil business at Carlisle or Lancaster, but at Manchester and Liverpool there will be both civil and criminal business. In pursuance of Order XXXVI., rule 22 (b), and by the leave of the judges going this circuit, causes for trial can now be entered with the associate at his office, Chapel Street, Preston, or at the district registries, during office hours at any time not later than 4 P.M. of the day next but one before the commission day. The trial of special jury causes will commence at Manchester on Wednesday, November 25, and at Liverpool on Monday, December 7.

UNITED LAW SOCIETY.—A meeting was held at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall on Monday, November 9, the subject for discussion being: 'That the case of Medawar v. The Grand Hotel Company was wrongly decided,' Mr. Green opened the debate, and was opposed by Mr. Browne, the other speakers being Messrs. Nesbitt, S. Williams, Atkin, Mallam, and Hawkins. The house being equally divided, the chairman gave his casting vote against the motion.——A meeting was held at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall on November 16.—Mr. Sinclair Cox moved: 'That this House disapproves of the proposal for payment of members of Parliament.'—Mr. Atkin opposed, and was followed by Messrs. Sapwell, M'Millan, Smith, Bagram, Lewis, Marcus, S. Williams, Le Maistre, and Hawkins.—The motion was carried by a majority of six.—The subject for the next debate (November 23) is: 'That the continued exclusion of the self-governing States of the Empire, other than Great Britain, from a direct share in the control of foreign affairs is an infraction of constitutional principle and a growing danger.'

Sittings of the Divisional Court and its Business.—On November 16, in the Queen's Bench Division, before Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Wright, upon an application by counsel to reinstate a case, an appeal from Judges' Chambers, Lord Coleridge made the important announcement that the Court did not intend to allow arrears of such cases to accumulate, and that a Court to hear such cases would sit (in one or other of the Courts) up to the Christmas Vacation (December 21).

The Commissioner of Police and Slippery Streets.—At the meeting of the Marylebone Vestry, on November 12, a letter was read from Sir Edward Bradford, the Commissioner of Police, stating that orders would be issued to the police of the metropolis directing them to immediately telegraph to the local authority in the event of the roadway of any thoroughfare being found dangerous to traffic through the want of sand or gravel. The vestry clerk (Mr. W. H. Garbutt) was instructed to acknowledge the receipt of the commissioner's communication, and to express the vestry's satisfaction with the new regulation. The works committee, too, were authorised to arrange for the sanding and gravelling of roadways as necessity arose, and the order was made known to the vestry officials.

BOOKS RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.

Indermaur's Principles of the Common Law. Sixth Edition. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1891.

Moore's Practical Forms of Agreements. Third Edition. By T. Lambert Mears, Barrister-at-Law. London: Wm. Clowes & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

Business of the Courts.—Mr. Justice Chitty, on taking his seat on Wednesday, November 18, made the following statement: 'Arrangements have been made for the disposal of parts of the business of Mr. Justice North and Mr. Justice Stirling until over Monday next, November 23.' The arrangements are as follows: 1. On Friday Mr. Justice Romer will take motions for Mr. Justice North and Mr. Justice Stirling. 2. On Saturday Mr. Justice Chitty will, in addition to his own list, take petitions and short causes for Mr. Justice North and Mr. Justice Stirling, but of opposed petitions only such as are urgent will be heard. 3. On Monday Mr. Justice Romer will sit in chambers for Mr. Justice Stirling, taking his list of summonses. And Mr. Justice Kekewich will, in addition to his own list of summonses, take such of Mr. Justice North's summonses as the chief clerks of that judge select as urgent, and place in the paper accordingly.

Inner Temple.—His Honour Judge Bristowe, the treasurer, and the Masters of the bench of the Inner Temple entertained at dinner, on November 18, being the Grand Day of Michaelmas Term, the following guests: Lord Macnaghten, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Lord Justice Kay, the Dean of Westminster, Sir R. W. Herbert, Sir P. H. Currie, Sir John Phear, Sir John Stainer, Sir A. Geikie, the Queen's Remembrancer, the Head Master of Harrow, Mr. Vicat Cole, Mr. A. Legros, Mr. E. Ray Lankester, the president of the Architectural Association, Mr. Lawrence, the sub-treasurer, and Mr. Pickering, the librarian. The benchers present were: Lord Bramwell, Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., Mr. Clerk, Q.C., Mr. Staveley Hill, Q.C., Mr. Pearson, Q.C., Mr. Marten, Q.C., Mr. Cohen, Q.C., Mr. Baylis, Q.C., Mr. Robinson, Q.C., Mr. Mellor, Q.C., Mr. Holl, Q.C., Lord Knutsford, Mr. Millar, Q.C., Mr. Graham, Mr. Cooper Willis, Q.C., Mr. Colt, Mr. Channell, Q.C., and Mr. Bayford, Q.C.

The Hansard Union and their Compositors.—Deputy-Judge Scott, sitting in the Westminster County Court on November 18, had before him an important trade question. There were two claims by compositors against Messrs. R. K. Burt (one of the Hansard Union's branches) to recover wages for the Sunday prior to last August Bank Holiday, when they did not work. They were engaged on the Daily Oracle, which was not published on the Bank Holiday.—Plaintiffs' counsel, Mr. Powell, said that the plaintiffs worked for the Hansard Union, and they refused to pay the two plaintiffs and forty-three other men for the Sunday night which was not worked. These two actions were brought to test the question as to whether defendants were not bound to pay for the Sunday night. His clients contended that it was the custom of the trade to pay for the Sunday night before the holiday if the paper did not come out. The Daily Oracle was one of the financial papers, and they were never published on the Bank Holiday. Defendants had given notice of defence, but at the last moment they paid the money into Court, and his application now was that, as this affected the whole of the compositors belonging to the trade, he should be allowed costs in both cases upon the scale between 10*l.* and 20*l.* The amounts claimed were both under 10*s.*—Messrs. Linklater opposed the application, but His Honour held that the question affected a body of persons, and gave the required certificate for costs between 10*l.* and 20*l.*

COMPANIES IN LIQUIDATION.—The following gentlemen have been selected by the Bar Committee to act with a committee to be appointed by the Incorporated Law Society to consider any questions that may arise with reference to the tribunal to which it is intended to assign the winding up of companies in liquidation—viz. Sir Henry James, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Robinson, Q.C., Mr. J. Forbes, Q.C., Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Buckley, Q.C., Mr. Chadwyck-Healey, Q.C., and Mr. Joseph Walton.

MINERS AND SAFETY LAMPS.—Nearly 300 men employed at Malago Colliery, Bristol, came out on strike on November 12. An explosion recently occurred in the pit by which ten men lost their lives, and, in order to lessen the risk to the workers, the managers have since had safety lamps used. The men did not appreciate the change, however, urging that they could not do so much work with the safety lamp as under the old system, and they demanded an increase of 10 per cent. in wages by way of compensation. This was refused, and the men stopped work.

COUNCIL OF LEGAL EDUCATION.—The following appointments have been made by the council under the new scheme of instruction to students of the Inns of Court: Constitutional law and legal history—Reader, J. P. Wallis. Roman law and jurisprudence and international law (public and private)—Reader, W. A. Hunter; assistant-reader, J. E. C. Munro. The law of real and personal property and conveyancing—Reader, W. H. Elphinstone; assistant-reader, J. Gent. Common law—Reader, Edmund Robertson; assistant-reader, J. A. Hamilton. Equity—Reader, A. Hopkinson; assistant-reader, O. A. Saunders. Procedure (civil and criminal)—Reader, A. Henry.

GRAY'S INN.—Saturday being the Grand Day of Michaelmas Term, the treasurer (Mr. Arthur Beetham) and benchers of this honourable society entertained at dinner the following guests, namely: The Lord Chief Justice of England, Mr. Justice Collins, Sir Augustus Keppel Stephenson, K.C.B., Q.C., the treasurer of the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple (his Honour Judge Bristowe), Sir Eyre Massey Shaw, K.C.B., Colonel Cecil Russell, I.C.R.V., Mr. J. Forrest Fulton, M.P., Mr. Durston, R.N., Mr. A. H. Barber, Mr. Richard Dixon, and the Rev. Dr. Tremlett; and the Masters of the Bench present, in addition to the treasurer, were: Lord Watson, Mr. Henry Griffith, Mr. Hugh Shield, Q.C., Mr. W. Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., M.P., Mr. James Sheil, Mr. W. D. Jeremy, Mr. John Rose, Mr. E. H. Power, Mr. James Mulligan, Mr. Miles W. Mattinson, M.P., and Mr. J. C. Lewis Coward; and the Rev. the Preacher (J. H. Lupton).

GRAY'S INN MOOT SOCIETY.—A moot will be held in Gray's Inn Hall on Tuesday, November 24, at 7.30 P.M., before J. Lawson Walton, Esq., Q.C. Question: 'A. is the wife of B. A. resides in a house which is her separate property, and has refused to live with her husband, B., or to obey a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights obtained by B. B., against the will of A., effects an entry into A.'s house, and refuses to leave. A. and B. are respectively possessed (A. in her separate right) of property sufficient to maintain themselves. Is A. entitled to treat B. as a trespasser, and eject him from her house; or is she entitled to any relief in any proceedings she may institute against him, assuming that (1) B. has entered and remains in the house for the purpose of living with A. and exercising his conjugal rights, or (2) that he has entered and remains in the house merely for the purpose of residing therein without desiring the consortium of his wife?' All members of the Inns of Court are invited to attend. Any members of the Inns of Court willing to argue at the moots should write to the Hon. Secretary of the Gray's Inn Moot Society.

MIDDLE TEMPLE.—The benchers of the Middle Temple recently passed a resolution to increase their number from fifty-two to sixty-two, and accordingly ten additional benchers will shortly be added to the present number. Lord Justice Lindley has been elected treasurer of this Inn for the ensuing year, in succession to Lord Chief Justice Coleridge.

THE CITY TRAFFIC.—Official notification is given that an application has been received by the Local Government Board from the Corporation of the City of London for approval to certain bye-laws which the corporation has made, pursuant to sections 31 and 32 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, and section 41 of the Local Government Act, 1888, with respect to the use of locomotives within the City. Copies of the bye-laws can be inspected at the Town Clerk's office, Guildhall. The board notify that within a month they will proceed to consider the application, and that in the meantime they will receive any objections which may be made to it.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURT DISTRICTS.—A circular letter has been addressed at the instance of the Home Office to the chief clerks of all the metropolitan Police Courts requesting statistics of the charges and summonses for some years past. It is understood that these returns are immediately called for in connection with some redistribution of districts scheme, there having been complaints from St. Pancras as to its want of Police Court accommodation. As there was the most determined opposition to, and strong local feeling against, the removal of any existing Courts when the matter was mooted some years ago, and since that time very large sums have been expended at many of the Courts in structural changes and increased cell and other accommodation for prisoners, &c., it is not considered at all likely that the authorities will do any more than utilise the existing buildings, the respective districts of which would be mapped out afresh. Mr. Montagu Williams and other experienced magistrates have recommended this to be done. Owing to the different classes of work at the various Courts—that at the East-end of London being very different from the West—too much reliance cannot be placed on statistical returns. Charges of drunkenness and police summonses against cabmen and omnibus drivers for trivial offences are disposed of by the dozen in a very short time, and at a Court in the midst of a very busy traffic centre they would enormously swell a return.

'OBITER DICTA.'

Court of Appeal No. I. appears to be somewhat modifying its reputation for relentless hostility to applications for new trials. Last week, marvellous to state, one was even granted on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. But probably the case most worthy of note was Fletcher v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, in which Mr. Justice Wright had nonsuited the plaintiff on the opening statement of his counsel. It was not justifiable, in the view of that learned judge, that the public time should be wasted in testing the accuracy of counsel, and he was not going to try the case to see whether the opening might have been different. The Court of Appeal, without hesitation, laid down in the broadest terms the proposition that a judge has no power to nonsuit a plaintiff on his counsel's opening without his consent, and Lord Esher poked much fun at the junior occupant of the High Court bench, who appeared from the shorthand note to have talked much about saving time to the public and trouble to the Court of Appeal.

Attention should be called to the reluctance expressed by the Court of Appeal to interfere with the discretion of the Court below in small matters of taxation. The point arose in the recent case of In re Cheeseman, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 714, where Mr. Justice Kekewich, having directed taxation after payment of a small bill of costs amounting to a little over 40*l.*, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 127, s. 41, the Court of Appeal, being unable to say that there were no special circumstances in the case, refused to interfere with the discretion conferred on the learned judge by the Act of Parliament. The case is of the more importance because Lord Justice Lindley was not sure that, had the case come before him in the first instance, he should have taken the same view as Mr. Justice Kekewich; while Lord Justice Bowen emphasises the fact that by the terms of section 41 taxation may be ordered after payment, not if the special circumstances shall require the same, but if, in the opinion of the judge, 'they shall appear to require the same.' In appeals of this nature, therefore, against a direction for taxation it seems that for the future the appellant, in order to succeed, will have to show that there were no special circumstances which in the reasonable exercise of judicial discretion could be held to require taxation. This rule, having regard to the language of section 41, seems to us a new but natural development of the principles laid down in In re Norman, 55 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 202, and In re Boycott, 55 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 835.

In the recent case of Camanada v. Hulton, 60 Law J. Rep. M. C. 116, the legality of the prize coupon system as applied to horse races was brought before the Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance, who held on the case stated that there had been no offence against the provisions of the Betting Act of 1853, the Betting Act of 1874, or the Lottery Act of 1823. The weekly publication, which gave rise to these questions, is sold for 1*d.*, with a coupon attached in which six races to come are named. The purchaser, if he chooses, fills up the coupon with the names of the horses which he selects as winners and returns it to the office. A first prize is offered to the competitor naming six winners, and (in case of a general failure to select six winners) a second prize is offered to the competitor naming five winners, with a consolation prize (in case of a general failure to win the higher prizes) to the competitor naming four winners. One selection only is allowed in each race. It is obvious that, to a certain extent, the skill of the editor in selecting the races is matched against the skill of the competitors in selecting the horses; and, if we are to judge of the difficulty of the task set from the particular case stated for the Court's decision (from which we have taken the above facts), it is very considerable, since while no less than 27,000 coupons attached to the publication published on August 16, 1890, were filled up and returned, not one competitor named six or even five winners, and one only was sufficiently lucky or skilful to select four winners. The Court, as we have stated, found that the system was neither a lottery nor a bet, but, as the law stands, a legitimate device to increase the sale of the periodical.

THE recent decision in Hornsby v. Raggett (Notes of Cases, p. 147), convicting a publican of permitting his house to be used for the purpose of betting, contrary to the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 for the suppression of betting-houses, will remedy the hasty decision of a Divisional Court in Whitehurst v. Fincher in January of last year. Previously to that case convictions for breaches of the Act were readily obtained on the authority of Eastwood v. Miller, 43 Law J. Rep. M. C. 139, and Haigh v. The Corporation of Sheffield, 44 Law J. Rep. M. C. 17. In both these cases it was held that enclosed grounds used for pigeon-shooting and running matches were 'places' within the meaning of the Act, and their proprietors, who were cognisant that professional bettors were making bets within them upon the matches, were convicted of permitting them to be used contrary to the Act. In addition to these cases, in Doggett v. Catterus, 34 Law J. Rep. C. P. 159, a conviction under the Act was obtained against a person who had a betting-table under one of the trees in Hyde Park, and in Bows v. Fenwick, 43 Law J. Rep. M. C. 107, an umbrella stuck into the ground, and in Galloway v. Maries, 51 Law J. Rep. M. C. 53, a wooden box on which a betting-man stood, were both held to be 'places' occupied for the purpose of betting. Snow v. Hill, 54 Law J. Rep. M. C. 95, was the first case to break this current of authority, but there the person charged had no fixed location, and none of the insignia of the professional man, but merely moved freely about a reserved portion of a field, in which dog races were being held, making bets in the same way as any ordinary member of the public might do. Then in 1890 Whitehurst v. Fincher was decided, in which the defendant, who was not otherwise proved to be a professional bookmaker, went to the bar of a public-house on three consecutive days and there made bets with all comers on horse races. On these facts the Court held that, as the person charged had no interest in the house, and moved about it, and had no room or part of the house which he kept open for the purpose of betting, he could not be convicted. The erroneous character of this decision—for in view of the decision in Hornsby v. Raggett it must now be taken to be bad law—was apparently generally recognised by legal reporters, and the only report of the case we have been able to find is in 54 Justice of the Peace, 565. In Hornsby v. Raggett the facts were almost identical, except that the professional character of the bookmaker was made plain, and the Court, distinguishing the two cases on somewhat transparent grounds, held that it was unimportant whether any particular spot in the house had been used by the bookmaker, and convicted the publican. Neither Snow v. Hill, therefore, nor Whitehurst v. Fincher would now be likely to be followed in their entirety. As explained, they merely mean that whether an occupier of premises is charged with permitting their use for betting, or a betting-man with using them, it must be proved that professional betting is being carried on, and if the evidence is consistent with the idea that ordinary members of the public using a place for other purposes, such as refreshing themselves or witnessing a race, happen to bet there, no conviction can properly take place.

THE plaintiff in Beriro v. Thalheim was somewhat late in the day in raising the point that an appeal would lie from the refusal of the learned Recorder of London to grant a new trial in the Mayor's Court. The appeal, if it existed, would be based on section 8 of the Mayor's Court Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.); but the words of the section are almost identical with those of section 14 of the County Courts Act, 1850 (13 & 14 ict. c. 61), and it was long ago finally settled (in Carr v. Stringer, E. B. & E. 123) that this section was not applicable to interlocutory proceedings. The truth is that now that the right of appeal from County Courts has been extended by the Acts of 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99) and 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43)—Jonas v. Long, 57 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 298; How v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. 496—there is some dissatisfaction that the right of appeal from the Mayor's Court should be more limited than from the County Court. The remedy, however, is not to be found in placing a strained interpretation on an old statute, but by procuring a new one. With reference to the particular case, it may further be pointed out that even under the extended powers of the new Act there is no appeal from the refusal of a County Court judge to grant a new trial, nor from his decision granting one if the ground be that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

THE Forged Transfers Act, 1891, provides that companies coming within that Act 'may impose such reasonable restrictions on the transfer of their shares, stock, or securities as they may consider requisite for guarding against losses arising from forgery.' Can companies impose any restrictions apart from this Act? We think not. In particular, it may be well to point out that the almost universal requirement of companies that signatures to transfer deeds should be witnessed is primâ facie quite outside the law. The Companies Clauses Act, 1845, gives a permissive form of transfer (schedule B.) which requires no witness whatever, while table A., which is scheduled to the Companies Act, 1862, gives a form, apparently not susceptible of variations, which also requires no witness. The requirement of a witness seems to be a reasonable one; but it is not a little curious that the public should have voluntarily submitted to it for so many years. We have some doubt, however, whether the companies, even with the protection of the Forged Transfers Act, would be within their right in declining to register a transfer on the ground that it was witnessed by the wife of one of the parties.

IN Regina v. Clutterbuck the prisoner has been sentenced to four years' penal servitude for obtaining many thousands of pounds by false pretences within the meaning of section 88 of the Larceny Act, 1861. By this, as by many sections of that Act, the maximum sentence of penal servitude was fixed at three years, which term was raised to five years by the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, and again fixed by the recent Penal Servitude Act, 1891, at 'any period not less than three years, and not exceeding five years.' It would have been competent for the Court to give cumulative sentences of five years each for each of the offences proved, as was done in Regina v. Castro, otherwise Orton, otherwise Sir Roger Tichborne, Baronet, where there were two cumulative sentences of seven years' penal servitude, each for two perjuries committed with the same object. A peculiarity in Regina v. Clutterbuck consists in the counsel for the prosecution stating, no doubt from reliable instructions, but without calling evidence to prove them or being able to refer to the depositions, certain circumstances in aggravation of the prisoner's guilt. We do not think that this is a precedent which ought to be followed.

In section 5 of the Elementary Education Act, 1891, which directed free education to be provided under certain circumstances after inquiry by the Education Department, as that Act was originally issued by the Queen's printers there appeared the following words:—

(which inquiry shall, on the request of the same persons as are entitled, under section 9 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, to apply for a public inquiry, be a public inquiry if the district is under a School Board).

In the text of the Act as issued shortly afterwards these words were omitted, and there is no doubt that they had been inserted by mistake, arising, it is presumed, from a conflict between the two Houses of Parliament, the details of which will be found pretty fully stated in the Parliamentary Record, tit. 'Elementary Education Bill.' But how is it that the mistake could be corrected in the Queen's printers' text, and did not require a fresh Act of Parliament to correct it? Instances of statutory corrections of such clerical errors are by no means rare, the most recent being that of the correction effected by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 37), which swept away the words 'a member of' in 'line three of section two' of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1888, and went on to direct that 'in every copy' of the Act of 1888 'published by the Queen's printers after the passing of the Act of 1889,' those words should be omitted. Going further back, we find that in 1829 a factory bill passed the Commons and was agreed to by the Lords, with an amendment; but instead of being returned to the Commons, it was by mistake included in a commission, and received the royal assent. The amendment was afterwards agreed to by the Commons, but in order to remove all doubts an Act (10 Geo. IV. c. 63) was passed to declare that the original statute 'should be valid and effectual to all intents and purposes, as if the amendment made by the Lords had been agreed to by the Commons before the said Act received the royal assent.' (See May's 'Parliamentary Practice,' 9th edit. p. 602.) This is not a case quite on all-fours with the recent Education Act mistake, but it is sufficiently like it to make one wonder why the rule, that a mistake in a once officially printed Act can be corrected by Parliament alone, has been so signally departed from.

An important point of patent law, that was expresly left open for further discussion by the Court of Appeal in Vickers v. Siddell, and which was dealt with only in the form of a dictum of Lord Halsbury in the same case in the House of Lords (60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 105, 106; L. R. 15 App. Cas. 496, 499), was decided recently by the Court of Appeal in Nuttall v. Hargreaves. It may therefore be taken as now finally determined that, under the Patents, &c. Act, 1883, as under the former statutes regulating patents, it is an essential condition of a valid patent that the true nature of the invention should be described in the provisional specification; and that the invention so described in the provisional specification should be the same as that described in the complete specification.

Section 5, subsection 3, of the Patents, &c. Act, 1883, enacts that 'a provisional specification must describe the nature of the invention and be accompanied by drawings, if required.' Section 26, subsection 3, of the same statute enacts that 'every ground on which a patent might, at the commencement of this Act, be repealed by scire facias shall be available by way of defence to an action of infringement, and shall also be a ground of revocation.' Before that Act the effect of a patentee not stating in his provisional specification the true nature of his invention, so as to identify it with the invention which he described in his complete specification, was to invalidate the patent (Bailey v. Roberton, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1055). And, according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case of Nuttall v. Hargreaves, there has been no change in the law. Lord Halsbury, in Vickers v. Siddell (ubi sup.), thought that subsection 3, section 26 preserved the conformity between the provisional specification and the complete specification as a ground upon which an action for the infringement of a patent right might be defended, and a ground upon which a patent might be revoked. That view was in no way dissented from by the other learned law lords, although they abstained from expressing a positive opinion on it.

In Nuttall v. Hargreaves the patentee had obtained a patent for an improved method of tapping barrels containing beer, &c. He had, however, omitted from his provisional specification any reference to a certain wire-gauze strainer which, as a preventive of hops and impurities passing through the beer-tap, was the only novel part of his alleged invention and the only good subject-matter for a patent. The wire-gauze strainer was duly specified in the complete specification. That being so, the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, reluctantly came to the conclusion that the patent was invalid, upon the grounds that we have before stated.

The public are asking, and have a right to ask, what steps have been taken to punish the gross perjury which, as the judge pointed out, was committed by either the plaintiff or defendant in the cause célèbre, Evelyn v. Hurlbert. The Solicitor-General, it was understood, would advise whether the Public Prosecutor should take the necessary steps, and we believe we are correct in saying that the papers have been before the Solicitor-General. Perjury is, unfortunately, only too common, but in this particular case public interest was so much aroused that it will be nothing less than a scandal if the perjurer goes unpunished.

In reference to the appointment of Welsh-speaking persons to offices in Wales, and the comments of Mr. Gladstone and Dean Vaughan thereon (see ante, p. 712), attention may be directed to three cases in which the Legislature has made efforts to secure such appointments. By the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, s. 39, and by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, s. 23, it is expressly provided that 'in the appointment of inspectors' of mines and factories 'in Wales and Monmouthshire, among candidates, otherwise equally qualified, persons having a knowledge of the Welsh language shall be preferred;' section 11 of the Factory Act also providing that rules for regulation of each factory are to be posted up therein in Welsh as well as English in Wales or Monmouthshire. As regards religious instruction, much more has been done. It was at first provided by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should prepare a scheme 'for preventing the appointment of any clergyman not fully conversant with the Welsh language to certain benefices with cure of souls in Wales,' but the enactment was repealed by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 38, with the view of enacting 'other provisions of more general and extensive application,' and it is now provided by section 104 of that Act that within the dioceses of St. Asaph, Bangor, Llandaff, and St. David's the bishop may 'refuse institution or license to any spiritual person who after due examination and inquiry shall be found unable to preach, administer the Sacraments, perform other pastoral duties, and converse in the Welsh language.' From the bishop's refusal the same section gives an appeal to the archbishop, but adds 'that nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed to affect or abridge any rights which the inhabitants of any benefice within the said four Welsh dioceses may at present by law possess of entering a caveat against or objecting in due course of law to the institution, collation, or license of any spiritual person, or of proceeding to procure the deprivation of any such person.' It may be added that the Education Code has now for two years provided (see Art. 15) for the instruction in Welsh of scholars in schools in Wales.

In the 'Echoes of the Week' column of the Sunday Times, George Augustus Sala recently made some very sensible remarks on the recent strong advocacy by the chairman of the Durham Quarter Sessions of the lash as a punishment for culprits convicted of assaults on women and girls. Mr. Sala as strongly deprecates any such reform of the law, and we quite agree with him. The danger of extortion by the 'Sapphira prosecutrix who tells all manner of lies in the witness-box,' and the danger of a repetition of the offence being caused by the peculiar punishment of flogging, combine, we think, to form sufficient arguments against any such alteration of the law as is desired at Durham. The flogging of grown-up men should be confined to cases of robbery with violence, which from its nature is the result of premeditation such as is rarely to be found in the case of assaults on women. It may be mentioned that by section 43 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, which replaces 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, the 'Act for the better prevention of aggravated assaults upon women and children,' express provision is made for dealing with assaults on women of so aggravated a nature that they cannot be sufficiently punished under the provisions of that Act, which relates to common assaults and batteries. For such assaults an offender may be imprisoned for six months, while, if he be a husband, his wife may, under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 19), s. 4, obtain what is practically a judicial separation from the convicting justices.

THE MIDDLESEX REGISTRY ACT.

In an age of iconoclasm and consolidating Acts the famous statute 7 Anne, c. 20, which provided for the registration 'of deeds, conveyances, and wills, and other incumbrances which shall be made of, or that may effect any honors, manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments within the county of Middlesex, after the twenty-ninth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and nine,' has had a long life. Even now it is not to be wholly demolished, though part of section 2, and sections 3 to 7, 11 to 14, 16, 19, 20, and 22 have been repealed by the Land Registry (Middlesex Deeds) Act, 1891, to which the Queen signified her assent on August 5 in this year. The object of this new statute is to transfer the Middlesex Registry of Deeds to the Land Registry, and to provide for the conduct of the business thereof. It is to be part of the Land Registry Office and be conducted by the registrar of that office. Rules can be made for the purpose of the Middlesex Registry under the Land Transfer Act, 1875, but so much of the provisions of that Act as requires regard to be had to the value of any land or charge in fixing fees shall not apply, and the charges of solicitors, which are regulated by the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, are not to be altered by any of those Rules (s. 2). Section 3 vests in the Crown all land, registers, books, and effects held or used at the commencement of the Act for the purposes of the Middlesex Registry, and directs that all moneys received on account of it shall be paid into the Exchequer. Under section 4 the Lord Chancellor, with the consent of the Treasury, may transfer to the Land Registry so many of the former employés of the Middlesex Registry who are necessary for the permanent organisation of the registry, and these shall be permanent civil servants, with the hopes of pensions in the future. The Treasury are also empowered, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, to give pensions or gratuities to officials not transferred as aforesaid. The registrar, unless the mortgagee named in the mortgage, his executors or administrators, applies to him, need not note on the register the discharge of a mortgage, except by registering a memorial of the instrument of discharge. Judgments, statutes, and recognisances will be valid without memorials of them being registered under the Act of Queen Anne. The Act does not come immediately into operation, but has to wait until the first day of April, 1892. In schedule 1 are contained regulations which, subject to any rules made under section 2, are to be observed in the Middlesex Registry. Under section 5 of the Act of 1708 the memorial was to be put into writing 'in vellum or parchment;' by the first of the new regulations it is to be 'on paper of a size and quality to be prescribed by the registrar.' One witness will now suffice instead of two as formerly. It may be remembered that Regina v. Lord Truro, 57 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 577; L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 555, decided that the witness to the execution of the deed, who was also to witness the signing and sealing of the memorial, might be a witness to the execution by the grantee. In some cases under the new regulations the witness to the memorial need not have been a witness to the deed at all, as the words are: 'Such witness where practicable to be a witness to the execution of such deed.' In the older Act the words 'where practicable' were not inserted. Regulation 3 provides that the memorial of a will 'shall be under the hand and seal of some or one of the devisees, his or their heirs, executors, or administrators, guardians, or trustees, attested by one witness, who shall upon his oath prove the signing and sealing of such memorial.' In the Act of Anne the heirs of the devisees were not mentioned, although they would, on an intestacy of a devisee, naturally be the persons most interested. Probably the omission was per incuriam. The new provisions show a similar caution to that referred to before when they do not prescribe categorically that the abodes of the witnesses to the deed or will are to be contained in the memorial, but again insert the saving words 'where practicable.' Where there are more writings than one for perfecting a conveyance or sale affecting the same property, the parcels need be set out only once (rule 9). This is substantially a re-enactment of the provisions of the earlier Act (s. 7). The memorial is itself to be registered, and the filed memorials, arranged in volumes conveniently for reference, are to form the registers. In the Act of 1708 provision was made for searches made by the registrar; this is now simplified, and it is provided in regulation 11 that 'the registrar, as often as is required, shall make searches concerning all memorials in the registry, and give certificates concerning the same, if required.'

The registrar is to have power to make a consolidated index from the lexicographical one, and when made such index is to take the place of the old indexes for the period which it covers (rule 13). Regulation 14 may perhaps encourage the registration of possessory titles under the Land Transfer Act, 1875. In effect it permits a person claiming under an instrument that could be registered in the Middlesex Registry, and which entitles him to apply for registration with a possessory title under the Act of 1875, at his option to register the memorial or register the land with a possessory title. If the land is registered in the latter form, no registration of the memorial will be necessary, and the fee payable will be only that payable under the Land Transfer Act, and a purchaser who applies will have no declaration as to possession to make. Allowance for this fee will be made if an absolute title is afterwards obtained.

Such is a short sketch of the Act and the regulations which will be in force, until the authorities think that some further directions are necessary, or that some improvements, not yet to be predicted, can be made. The rule-making authorities, as prescribed by the Act of 1875, are, in respect of the general rules, the Lord Chancellor and the Registrar; in respect of the amount of fees payable, the Lord Chancellor and the Commissioners of the Treasury (ss. 111, 112).

SERVICE OUT OF THE JURISDICTION.—V.

Before proceeding to consider the clauses (a) to (g) of Order XI., rule 1, we shall deal very briefly with the discretion of the Court as to ordering, or refusing to order, service out of the jurisdiction.

'Order XI.,' said Lord Justice Lindley, in La Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Brothers, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 276; L. R. (1887) 37 Chanc. Div. 225, which is the locus classicus on this subject, 'enumerates certain circumstances under which, and which alone, the Court can give leave to serve writs out of the jurisdiction. It does not say that when those circumstances occur the Court is bound to give leave. On the contrary, the language is that service out of the jurisdiction "may be allowed by the Court or a judge" in certain specified events. This shows that the Court has a discretion, and is bound to exercise its discretion. This becomes still plainer* by turning to rule 2, which states certain matters which the Court is bound to have regard to when it is asked for leave to serve a writ in Ireland or Scotland. It is not that you are entitled to have leave simply because you bring your case within one or other of the eleven rules of Order XI. You cannot get the leave unless you do so; but it does not follow if you do you are to have the leave. The Court has a discretion, and that discretion must of course be exercised judicially and upon proper grounds. . . . The Court must look at the plaintiff's case, and see whether he has a probable cause of action.'

Illustrations.—1. S. and D. entered into a French contract, being French subjects resident in Paris, for the participation of profits in a certain adventure, and their rights under that contract depended upon French law alone. D. sued the P. Company in England, and the sum of 200,000*l.*, being the proceeds of the adventure in question, was paid into Court to the credit of that action. This fund was the subject of litigation between S. and D. in France, and the French Courts decided that D. was entitled to the control of it, under liability, however, to account to S. S. thereupon brought an action in this country asking for an injunction to restrain D. from receiving or dealing with the fund in Court, and applied for leave to serve the writ on D. in France. It was held by the Court of Appeal that, the French Courts having decided that D. was entitled to the control of the fund, leave to serve the writ ought not to be given (La Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Brothers, ubi sup.). The points deserving notice in this case are these: (a) the contract was French; (b) the French Courts had delivered a clear and final judgment on the law applicable to its interpretation; (c) the plaintiffs succeeded in bringing their application within Order XI.—they were claiming an injunction as to something to be done within the jurisdiction (rule 1 (f)); and yet the Court of Appeal, in the exercise of its discretion, refused to allow service. In the course of his judgment, Lord Justice Lindley said: 'I do not think the Court ought to look into the defence as distinguished from the plaintiff's case' in dealing with applications under this order. These words might possibly be construed into meaning that if the plaintiff's case was primâ facie satisfactory, the Court would not consider any adverse light that the defendant might be able to throw upon it. But it is clear from the course adopted by the Court of Appeal in the Société Générale's English case that this cannot have been their lordships' meaning. The judgment of Lord Justice Lopes is perfectly explicit upon the point. 'If a primâ facie case is made on the affidavits that there is a cause of action within Order XI. and the rules of that

* So, too, the fact that an applicant for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction has to make an affidavit stating his belief that he has a good cause of action, shows that the Court ought to consider whether there is a probable cause of action before giving the leave asked for.

Order, the Court, in its discretion, permits the service. If, on the other hand, no such case is made out, or if it is shown by the party on whom service is sought to be effected that there is a clear and complete defence, the Court, in its discretion, does not grant but refuses such service.'

2. A., an Englishman residing in Paris, sued B., a German, also resident in Paris, upon a bill of exchange accepted in France, but payable in England. A. had already sued and obtained judgment against B. on this bill in France, but there were grave doubts as to the effect and validity of this judgment. It was held by the Court of Appeal that leave to A. to serve B. out of the jurisdiction ought to be given (Call v. Oppenheim (1884) 1 Times Rep. 623). The points of difference between this and the preceding case are obvious. Here the question at issue was one of English law; the decision of the French Court was not free from doubt both as to its meaning and as to its soundness; and the supreme tribunal in France had not pronounced judgment upon the matter at all.

We pass on now to the consideration of the various clauses of Order XI. rule 1.

(a) 'The whole subject-matter of the action is land situate within the jurisdiction (with or without rents or profits).'

(b) 'Any Act, deed, will, contract, obligation, or liability affecting land or hereditaments situate within the jurisdiction is sought to be construed, rectified, set aside, or enforced in the action.'

These clauses may conveniently be considered together. The first seems to refer, and is probably limited to, actions in the nature of ejectment when the land of which the property or possession or status is disputed is English land (Agnew v. Usher, 54 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 371; L. R. (1884) 14 Q. B. Div. 79, per Chief Justice Coleridge), and forms the whole subject-matter of the action. Such a case as Agnew v. Usher, which was simply an action for the recovery of rent, could not possibly have been brought within this clause. Clause 2 refers to any legal proceedings whereby English land is to be 'affected,' provided that the instrument or obligation affecting such land is sought to be construed, rectified, set aside, or enforced in the action.

Illustrations.—1. A. brings an action for arrears of rent against B., a domiciled Scotchman, assignee by way of mortgage of certain leasehold property in England. B. alleged that he had never signed nor accepted the assignment nor entered into possession. It was held by the Divisional Court that a contract to pay rent fell within clause (e), but not within clause (b) of Order XI., and that as B. was domiciled in Scotland, service out of the jurisdiction could not be ordered. The judgment of Lord Coleridge in this case turned on the view that it was clearly within the mischief which the proviso in clause (e) was intended to check—viz. a Scotchman, domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland, being made liable personally on an English contract. Mr. Justice Smith, however, founded his judgment on this, that the words 'sought to be enforced' mean 'specifically performed' (Agnew v. Usher, ubi sup.).

2. In an action by the outgoing tenant of a farm in Yorkshire to recover from his landlord, who was ordinarily resident in Scotland, compensation for tenant right according to the custom of the country, it was held by Mr. Justice Stephen and Mr. Justice Charles that there was 'a contract, obligation, or liability affecting land' (Kaye v. Sutherland, 57 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 68; L. R. (1887) 20 Q. B. Div. 147).

3. A. sued B. for slander of title to English property uttered in Ireland. What is here affected directly is not the property, but the minds of intending purchasers, and clause (b) does not apply (Casey v. Arnott, L. R. (1876) 2 C. P. Div. 24).

MANORIAL FEES.

SIR,—In reply to the letter of your correspondent 'Tenant,' I may mention that two or three years ago I raised the same point with regard to a charge made for preparing surrender and admittance in a manor, where neither the steward nor deputy-steward were solicitors. The deputy-steward rendered his account in the name of the steward, and claimed payment of his charges for drawing the surrender, &c., under 'custom.' My point was that the deputy-steward had brought himself within the provision of section 60 of the Stamp Act, 1870, as 'preparing an instrument relating to real estate in expectation of a fee or reward.' I ultimately laid the correspondence before the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, who were of opinion that the deputy-steward was right. The wording of section 60 of the Stamp Act, 1870, is very clear, and I still fail to see how it can be overridden by custom.

CLAIMS FOR ARREARS OF INCOME-TAX.

SIR,—A short time ago you published a letter from us on the illegal demands made by the Inland Revenue for back duty, more especially in regard to the estate of deceased persons, executors being frequently the victims of such demands. We have resisted these claims of the Inland Revenue, and have been successful in every case. In one instance we were actually able to get back a sum of money thus illegally obtained by the surveyor of taxes under false pretences. In regard to executors, we would inform them that no claim upon a deceased person's estate can be made under any circumstances after four months have elapsed after the expiration of the year of assessment. Thus, should a person die before April 5 in any given year, no claim can be made upon the executors for that year after August 5. This knowledge is the more important as we have had numerous cases in which surveyors of taxes have made application for income-tax for any number of years up to ten.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending November 21 was eighty-two. The number in the corresponding week of last year was eighty-seven, showing a decrease of five, being a net increase in 1891 to date of ninety-one.

CORPORATION BYE-LAWS.

TOWN CLERKS should take heed to their bye-laws and see that they are correctly framed consonant to the intentions of the promoters, and also that, when persons are summoned, the obligations imposed by the bye-laws are fulfilled. Quite recently, in Manchester, an omnibus conductor was charged with touting for passengers in the public streets contrary to the corporation bye-law. A constable proved that the conductor was calling out loudly, 'This way for the football match' and other cries, and, when asked to cease by the officer, refused. The defendant's advocate submitted that there was no case. The bye-law under which the summons had been issued, said that: 'No owner, driver, or conductor of an omnibus shall tout for or importune persons to enter his omnibus to the annoyance of any such person or persons.' The correct reading of this bye-law, it was urged, was that no offence could be committed unless some person complained that he had been annoyed by the shouting. Here that had not been done, and the case ought to be dismissed. The magistrates took that view and discharged the defendant, holding that the police ought to have brought forward some one who had been annoyed by the shouting. A curious fact in connection with corporation bye-laws came out in connection with the sittings of the Labour Commission on the factory question, when witnesses on the textile and non-textile industries were being heard. It was then stated in the Bradford evidence that the factory laws do not apply to wool-sorting, the only regulations affecting the trade being those contained in the borough bye-laws. It is somewhat remarkable that such an important trade as this should be independent of statutory provisions.

COSTS UNDER THE TITHES ACT.

In what is known as the Llanarmon Tithe Case judgment was delivered by the judge of the Ruthin County Court in favour of the vicar, an order being made appointing a receiver, which was, however, suspended for fourteen days. To the legal profession, an important point in connection with this decision is the question of costs, to which the defendant's solicitor has called attention in the Welsh press thus: 'In giving judgment, his Honour stated that the rules under the new Tithe Act did not empower him to grant costs except upon the ordinary or lower County Court scale. The result of this decision is of the utmost importance to tithe-payers and tithe-owners. It practically means that, in all cases under 2*l.*, the applicant can only obtain his mileage and an allowance for any necessary witnesses. No solicitor's or counsel's fees whatsoever can be recovered from the tithe-payer. Further, in all cases under 10*l.*, the fees allowed to solicitors appearing on behalf of a party to an action are very trivial, and will be considerably less than the legal costs which the tithe-owner will have to pay if he employs a solicitor to conduct his case.' Tithe-owners, if these statements are correct, will, of course, see to it that the matter is speedily remedied, and that the Tithe Act is made a 'Protection Act' in every respect.

THE CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT AGAIN.

In these notes recently reference was made to the Salford gas affairs, and the attempt at the Central Criminal Court to found a charge of bribery. The jury did not agree. Since then a new trial has been held, and the Recorder, in summing up the case to the jury, pointed out that the meaning of the statute was that the offer of a bribe must be made corruptly—that was, improperly with an improper motive. If, therefore, the jury thought the offer of the bribe was made for the purpose of influencing the gas manager in favour of the tender that the defendant was about to make, they should conclude that that was an improper motive. It was agreed that whatever was offered by the defendant was offered as a recognition of services rendered by the gas manager in the past, but it might be very possible for any one to conclude that, even if past services were considered, the defendant had an eye as well to the future; and, if that was the case, the corrupt motive was present all the same. It was, in fact, a question of the motive entirely. Ultimately the jury announced that they were of opinion that the contents of the envelope offered to the gas manager by the defendant were in recognition of past kindnesses and not intended to influence him in any future thing he was about to do, and there was no corrupt motive. This was, therefore, a verdict of acquittal.

FACTORY ACT LEGISLATION.

The custom of the Cobden Club in offering an annual prize for the best essay on some commercial or industrial topic is well known. This year the prize was offered for an essay on 'Factory Act Legislation: its Industrial and Commercial Effects, Actual and Prospective,' and the winner is a lady, Miss Victorine Jeans. Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has published the essay in a handy, tasteful book of ninety-six pages, and those who are interested in the subject should make a point of perusing the work. An historical sketch of early legislation is given, and then its effects on the textile industries and non-textile industries. Then the prospective effects of newly proposed changes is discussed, and it is suggested that the scope of legislation ought to include: (1) Labour in 'domestic' industries; (2) 'Services' of railway and tramways officials, &c.; (3) Labour in workshops where men only are employed. A change ought also be made in stringency—e.g. (1) Raising of maximum age of half-timers; (2) further reduction of hours. Miss Jeans has written a most readable little essay. She does not approve of the handing over of workshops to the care of local sanitary authorities, instead of leaving them under the management of Government inspectors. Without special knowledge of the practical administration of the Factory Acts and of the particular exigencies of the present time, it is, of course, impossible to speak with anything like confidence on a point like this, but what we do know is that the result of leaving the Workshop Act of 1867 to the local authorities was simply that it became a dead letter.

THE MARRIAGE LAWS OF AMERICA.

It is averred that great confusion exists among the various marriage laws of the United States. That is so if one may judge by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina. It appears, according to the New York papers, that a Mr. Peoples married in South Carolina, his wife being then, and having been ever since, a resident of that State, which has the distinction of being the only one where divorce is absolutely unobtainable. The husband had moved to Florida, secured a divorce there, married, and finally died. His second marriage being valid where it was contracted would be generally recognised by the Courts of other countries, but the judges of the State where the first marriage was performed declined to take that view. Mr. Peoples, by marrying in South Carolina, is declared to have entered into a contract with that State as well as his wife, and by the laws of South Carolina the marriage is indissoluble. The children by the second marriage are therefore put out of court as illegitimate, and they cannot inherit property left by their father in South Carolina. It is pointed out that the number of husbands, wives, and children whose status is doubtful and changes when they cross State boundary lines is constantly increasing. All this could be much improved on by the promulgation of a Federal divorce law if the legislators from the different States could be got to agree on a universal basis.

THE MANCHESTER ASSIZES.

Mr. Justice Collins, in his charge to the grand jury, expressed his pleasure at the lightness of the calendar. He pointed out that there was a serious class of crime with which the jury were no doubt familiar—cases arising under the Criminal Law Amendment Act. He need hardly tell gentlemen of their experience that in dealing with charges of that kind, depending as they must do upon the evidence of children to a great extent, and involving very grave charges, the evidence must be scrutinised with some care.

GENERAL RULES MADE PURSUANT TO THE BANKRUPTCY ACTS, 1883 AND 1890.

DISCHARGE.

1. An order of discharge of a bankrupt, subject to conditions as to his earnings, after acquired property, and income shall be in the form No. 1, and an order of discharge subject to a condition requiring the bankrupt to consent to judgment being entered against him for the balance or part of the balance of the debts provable in the bankruptcy shall be in form No. 2 in the appendix, with such variations as circumstances may require.

The said forms Nos. 1 and 2 may be cited with reference to the forms appended to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, as Nos. 63 and 63A, and form No. 63 shall no longer be used.

2. An order for substituted service of a petition shall be in the form No. 3 in the appendix, which may be cited with reference to the forms appended to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, as No. 16A, and shall be substituted for No. 16A of the said forms.

3. These rules shall come into operation on January 1, 1892. HALSBURY, C.

MR. JUSTICE CAVE'S STRICTURES ON A MAGISTRATE'S CLERK'S HANDWRITING.

THE following is an extract from the Dorset County Chronicle, of Thursday, November 26:—

My attention has been drawn to your report of the proceedings at our recent assize and to the remarks which the presiding learned judge thought it becoming to make on me as clerk to the justices of this division of the county; and I ask you to afford me an opportunity of excusing, if not justifying, myself against them, and especially to acknowledge, with the fullest sense of its propriety and good taste, his lordship's contemptuous reference to Board schools, and to suggest that he and I apparently lived before their establishment. I had, however, the advantage of being at a school where something besides writing was taught. I am combatant enough naturally to resent an insult.

I have been clerk to justices nearer sixty than fifty years, and, without being egotistic, I venture to think I have a tolerable acquaintance with my duties, and no one can accuse me of disrespect to the law, or towards its administrators. I regret the learned judge had not the courtesy to have me informed of what he had in contemplation, for, if he had done so, or desired me to wait on him, I should most certainly have done so, or, as the alternative, have attended his address to the grand jury; and I think it likely I should have asked permission to say something on his utterances at the risk of his refusal, and possibly a suggestion of contempt, or of being treated to a repetition of that dignified exhibition of urbanity to which an unfortunate police constable appears by the public papers to have been exposed at the Devizes Assizes on Monday last. Judges on the bench, like parsons in their pulpits, are masters of the situation, and we rather too frequently see what, in common life, would be called a cowardly advantage taken of it; but worms will turn even if trampled on by royalty. We hear a good deal in these days of our overworked judges, and of their complaints that some coroners, as well as justices' clerks, do not write copper-plate. It may be that I do not write as well as I once did, and if judges live as long and work as hard as I have done a similar infirmity will possibly follow them; but I ask no consideration from selfishness; and I suppose the next thing required or suggested for the relief of this long-suffering class will be a type-writer, on the ground that printed matter will be easier for them to read than the very best of writing. I have had a good deal of experience in my time of judges' writing during their bar days, but I have always been able to decipher it without difficulty or remonstrance, and it is not a fact that the writing of busy men now at the bar has improved. So far as my recollection serves me the only instance in which my writing was ever complained of was by a deceased learned judge, hereafter referred to, who, whilst more than commonly bitter in his complaints of others, was unable to read his own writing before his own full Court. I had the present carping habit of the times in my mind when I wrote the depositions of which so much complaint has been made, and I respectfully deny that any good or sufficient grounds existed, or exist, for the outburst of judicial impatience which has lately been exhibited in Dorchester; and I would welcome a reference of the offending depositions to any one qualified to give an opinion on them. It is grievous to think that, after all my care and trouble, the learned judge should have had his time occupied so long as he mentioned in deciphering what was not, I think, after all, a matter of serious difficulty, though written, perhaps, with some of the haste more or less attending all magisterial inquiries, for it is not impossible that impatience or anxiety of some kind may exist in the mind of more than one of our public functionaries. I have always thought that the time of judges, like that of other officials, belonged to the public, who pay for it, and, as it is notorious that circuit work, especially at this season, is little less than an absolute holiday, it can scarcely be said that a serious waste of time took place, or that any oppressive inroad was made on such holiday, in deciphering seven widely written depositions, of which two only, I think, extended to a second side of the paper used. I am unable to form, and much less to express, an opinion of the present handwriting of Her Majesty's judges, or how far they would be likely to come out successfully in a Board school writing competition. I am not sure that writing alone, or from dictation, is made matter of preliminary inquiry before promotion to the judicial ermine, but I do know what the writing of some of the judges was before their promotion; and it is only generous to hope that an improvement has since taken place in it and will be continued. I wish, of all things, that the editor of the Leisure Hour would help to solve and satisfy a very natural curiosity which the present incident has created, and collect and publish facsimiles of the present judges' caligraphy in the same way as he has lately done with the signatures and writings of royal personages of present and past days; and I will cheerfully subscribe to compensate him for the trouble this would cause him. It is within my own personal experience that, on the occasion of an application to the full Court of Exchequer on some points reserved, and for a new trial, the learned baron who presided at the original hearing was unable to read his own notes, and, what was worse, perhaps, that he had omitted a power for the full Court to draw inferences. As a fact, the whole matter had to be considered and determined by the aid of the notes of the counsel engaged, one of whom is now a respected Lord Justice of Appeal. The other barons present did not, however, scold their erring brother for his carelessness or inability to write legibly, or suggest that he should attend an evening writing school; nor was there any explosion of fireworks or other interlude got up for the amusement or laughter amongst bystanders, as is usually the object of theatrical farces; nor did it even occur to the full Court to suggest that he should undergo the condign punishment of having to read his own writing, as is the very common and, perhaps, pious wish expressed by some modern judges for similar backslidings. Coroners and justices' clerks have, therefore, the advantage of this instance of actual infirmity in one of their superiors, for I have never heard of a coroner or justices' clerk being unable to read his own writing when challenged to do so; and I hope every judge of the present day can do as much. I have the advantage, or the reverse, of remembering the judges of sixty years ago, and in the course of my many years' experience in the old office of county clerk I had the honour of knowing a good many of them and of their successors, and I have a grateful recollection of the courtesy and personal kindness and consideration they always showed towards everyone attending on them as a duty in the administration of justice. I hardly think anyone will dispute that they discharged their important duties quite as efficiently as are any such in these days, and that, without the talking and fault-finding with everybody and everything which waste so much time and generate disrespect. It is immaterial to me whether the judges are too numerous, or otherwise, or whether they are overpaid or underpaid, but it is strange that, with all the long-suffering and overwork of which we hear so much, we never hear of a resignation on account of them, or a refusal from competent men to fill a vacancy if one happens. Judges, like other people, are mortal, and should remember their own shortcomings, for they are not exempt from criticism, even of the tu quoque type, and as they, too, live in glass houses, they should not throw stones. G. SYMONDS.

PHYSICAL EXAMINATION OF PLAINTIFF IN ACTIONS FOR PERSONAL INJURIES.

COMMENTING on a recent decision of the American Supreme Court, the Washington Law Reporter says:—

Speaking of dissenting opinions, we wish to note a very sensible one of Justices Brewer and Brown in the case of The Union Pacific Railway v. Botsford. The majority of the Court had held that the Courts of the United States have no power in an action for personal injuries to order, before the trial, an examination of the body of the injured person. The plaintiff was a passenger of the defendant, and while in one of the lower berths of a sleeping-car was injured by the upper one falling upon her head, causing her great pain and suffering, rupturing, as she claimed, the membranes of the brain and spinal cord and resulting in permanent and increasing injuries. Three days before the trial, the defendant moved the Court for an order against the plaintiff, requiring her to submit to a surgical examination, in the presence of her own surgeon and attorney, if she desired their presence, it being proposed by the defendant that such examination should be made in such a way as not to expose the person of the plaintiff in any indelicate manner. The application was made on the ground that the examination was necessary to obtain a correct diagnosis of the case, and that without such examination the defendant would be without any witness as to the plaintiff's condition. The Court below refused to make the order, and the Supreme Court, in affirming that ruling, held as above stated. Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion, entered into an extended and learned review of the authorities. We have only space for the following language of the distinguished judge upon the merits of the application.

'The inviolability of the person is as much invaded by a compulsory stripping and exposure as by a blow. To compel anyone, and especially a woman, to lay bare the body, or to submit it to the touch of a stranger, without lawful authority, is an indignity, an assault, and a trespass; and no order of process commanding such an exposure or submission was ever known to the common law in the administration of justice between individuals, except in a very small number of cases, based upon special reasons, and upon ancient practice, coming down from ruder ages, now mostly obsolete in England, and never, so far as we are aware, introduced into this country.'

To this view of the case Justice Brewer delivered a strong dissenting opinion, in which Justice Brown concurred. After commenting upon the changed conditions under which actions to recover damages are now tried when compared with the early days of the common law, and how very few of those difficult questions over the nature and extent of personal injuries, which now form an important part of such litigations, were then presented to the Court, the opinion proceeds:—

'The end of litigation is justice. Knowledge of the truth is essential thereto. It is conceded, and it is a matter of frequent occurrence, that in the trial of suits of this nature the plaintiff may make in the Court room, in the presence of the jury, any not indecent exposure of his person to show the extent of his injuries; and it is conceded, and also a matter of frequent occurrence, that in private he may call his personal friends and his own physicians into a room, and there permit them a full examination of his person, in order that they may testify as to what they see and find. In other words, he may thus disclose the actual facts to the jury if his interest require, but by this decision, if his interests are against such a disclosure, it cannot be compelled. It seems strange that a plaintiff may, in the presence of a jury, be permitted to roll up his sleeve and disclose on his arm a wound of which he testifies; but when he testifies as to the existence of such a wound, the Court, though persuaded that he is perjuring himself, cannot require him to roll up his sleeve, and thus make manifest the truth, nor require him, in the like interest of truth, to step into an adjoining room, and lay bare his arm to the inspection of surgeons. It is said that there is a sanctity of the person which may not be outraged. We believe that truth and justice are more sacred than any personal consideration; and if in other cases, in the interests of justice, or from considerations of mercy, the Courts may, as they often do, require such personal examination, why should they not exercise the same power in cases like this to prevent wrong and injustice?

'It is not necessary, nor is it claimed, that the Court has power to fine and imprison for disobedience of such an order. Disobedience to it is not a matter of contempt. It is an order like those requiring security for costs. The Court never fines or imprisons for disobedience thereof. It simply dismisses the case or stays the trial until the security is given. So it seems to us that justice requires, and that the Court has the power to order, that a party who voluntarily comes into Court alleging personal injuries, and demanding damages therefor, should permit disinterested witnesses to see the nature and extent of those injuries, in order that the jury may be informed thereof by other than the plaintiff and his friends; and that compliance with such an order may be enforced by staying the trial or dismissing the case. For these reasons we dissent.'

This is a broad and intelligent view of the right and justice of the matter, and should have been held the law of the case. The reputation of the Supreme Court would have been increased had this been the opinion of the Court.

It would seem, however, from Justice Brewer's language—'Justice is the end of litigation'—that he partakes of an impression prevailing among many that Courts are created for the one purpose of administering justice between litigants. May it not rather be said that they exist for a more practical purpose?—that the administration of justice is the incident and not the reason of their existence? Can anyone conversant with the methods of legal procedure, and giving thought to the subject, say that of the controversies adjudicated by the Courts there are many instances of justice being meted out in its absolute sense? On the contrary, the more his opportunity for observing the rationale of judicial decisions, the more one must become persuaded that legal justice and actual justice are very different things. Judges are but men, and vary from each other as men vary who have different and opposite qualities of mind and temperament. As hardly a doctrine, religious or political, but has its antithesis in some other creed or country, so there are but few legal questions which have not been decided in diametrically different ways by different Courts, each declaring this or that to be the justice of the case, according to the light before it. And still greater the diversity where, instead of pronouncing the law, Courts, whether with or without juries, are called' upon to adjudicate complicated facts. If anyone doubts this, let him, for example, observe the difference in the award of damages by different juries. He will find that they vary from one to twenty in their verdicts under almost similar facts. Thus, one man for the loss of an arm is given a thousand dollars, another two, another five, another twenty thousand. It is, of course, impossible that even-handed justice has been rendered in the majority of these verdicts, and yet the Courts in most instances sustain them as proper. In 95 per cent. of the cases decided the lawyer upon the losing side will honestly insist that the Court is thoroughly wrong in its decision. Nor is he so often mistaken as some might imagine. The truth is, so much depends upon the condition under which a case is investigated—the ability of the judge, of the jury, of counsel; the time given to argument, the amount of work which the Court has on hand; the character of the case itself, the quality of the judicial mind, whether considerate or inattentive, combative or receptive of argument, deliberate or impulsive in judgment—all these and other qualities, mental and even physical, so often enter into the result, that it is nearly an even chance whether the Court, instead of doing justice 'according to the true right of the matter,' will not unconsciously side wholly with the wrongdoer. Doubtless, if it could be infallibly ascertained how often the decisions of Courts have resulted in justice (justice as distinguished from law) being done between the parties, it would be found that the wrong party has triumphed quite as often as he has been defeated. And it will always be so. It will be so because the minds of men are so constituted that it can never be otherwise. Justice then—the administration of it—is neither the first nor the only object of government in the establishment of Courts. If it were so Courts would be failures. The primal and paramount object is the ending of controversies. 'Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium.' It is well to decide controversies rightly, but it is better that controversies should be decided with reasonable speed, even though sometimes wrongly, than that the injured party should have added to the loss he has sustained the harassment of years of litigation with a strong chance of a miscarriage of justice in the end. In methods of judicial procedure in this respect it would seem that with the growth of the country in wealth and population, and consequent increase of business for the Courts, we are going backward instead of forward. Almost anywhere in the United States it takes a longer time to obtain a final judgment in a contested case than it did fifteen or twenty years ago. This is the reason business men through their boards of trade are abandoning the established judicial tribunals of the country and resorting to Courts of their own creation, where, by means of arbitration, speedy and inexpensive, however imperfect and liable to err, they avoid the inordinate delays which litigants are subjected to, especially in our large cities. Unfortunately, however, all citizens are not members of boards of trade. The non-tradesman, the poor man, the widow and the orphan must still look to the ordinary tribunals where, if justice cannot always be meted out to them with certainty, they should at least be spared the cruel harassments of years of suspense. The Legislature has no higher nor more imperative duty than that of providing the public with a sufficient judicial force for settling the honest differences of opinion which nearly all citizens at some time or other are wont to entertain as to their property and personal rights. When this has been done the Courts will be enabled to do all that can be expected of them as human tribunals. To a great extent the measure of a free and civilised State is a judiciary adequate to the needs of the people. Just in proportion as we are deficient in this do we approach the condition of savage life.

LIVERPOOL INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

THE following address was delivered by Francis Archer, Esq. (the retiring president), at the annual general meeting held on November 13:—

The report which has been made to you by the committee will show you that, with the exception of one measure which I shall presently mention, the bills brought before Parliament during the past session have not involved any unusual amount of labour on the part of the committee. As a Parliament draws towards its end, the legislative energy of the individual member is abated, and the responsible members of the Government of the day are less inclined to formulate new schemes of change which trench on the privileges of influential classes. The duties of the committee have therefore been somewhat lighter than in the previous years.

By far the most important bill affecting the interests which it is the special duty of the family solicitor to safeguard is that introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, under the title of the 'Public Trustee Bill.'

This bill, which has for its object the establishment of a new State Department for the management of private trusts, passed through the House of Lords last year without opposition, though the elaborate report prepared by our committee upon it made it evident that it called for the closest attention on the part of the profession. This is specially the case because it bears at first sight an attractive aspect. The offer to the testator or the beneficiaries to give the absolute security of the State, if only they will confide their cash and the administration of it to a State official, is one which is alluring, not only to those who are interested in trust moneys, but to members of Parliament and other representative men, who are in most cases satisfied to regard the avowed purpose and general scope of a measure, and not trouble themselves about details until after the principle of the bill is accepted. It is, however, possible to buy good things at too dear a price, and the price to be paid for the security of the State is too high. The rapid increase of the savings of this country, combined with the want of sufficient new outlets for their reasonable safe employment, has already gradually decreased very materially the natural usufruct of money, has enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the dividend on Consols, and has sent up to a very high point the value of railway debentures and other authorised investments for trust moneys. Thus the income arising from wealth apart from brains—that is, the income of all trust estates, and the annual sums available for the use of the widows and children—has already been much diminished. The adoption of the Public Trustee Bill would carry this process a step further; not only would the expenses of the State officials be large—for an army of highly-paid civil servants would be required, and would have to be self-supporting—but the inevitable and immediate result of the employment of a State officer or Department as trustee would be the diminution by a large percentage of the trust investments. I am not now referring to the cases, numerous and important though they may be, in which, at the commencement of a trust, a private trustee, by careful nursing (probably not without running some personal risk) would disentangle an estate and preserve its whole value, while a public trustee would be compelled to realise his assets, and that promptly. I am taking the case of an ordinary trust, and I assert that the public trustee will of a certainty confine his investments to the high-class stocks and securities with which he is familiar, and that in particular he will absolutely and entirely decline to consider any mortgage securities. This would be through no fault of his own, but would be the necessary consequence of his position. Mortgages require in each case special consideration. However partial the Courts of Chancery and the framers of Acts of Parliament may be to surveyors' valuations, the public trustee would know that nothing can make up for the want of personal inspection and inquiry. He would also be very conscious that his department would be blamed by the Treasury whenever any loss of moneys lent on mortgage occurred. He would say with perfect truth that it was impossible for him to make these personal inspections or inquiries, nor could he with safety employ others to make them for him, and that therefore he must decline to accept any such investments of the money for which he is responsible. Now, consider what this means to the cestuis que trusts. At the present high price of the best stocks the necessity for lending trust moneys on good mortgages is greater than ever, in order to insure a decent income for the trust, and the establishment of the various mortgage insurance institutions greatly diminishes the practical risk of the loss of any part of the principal in well-advised mortgage transactions. Yet these advantages, which may easily make a difference of 25 per cent. in the net income of the trust, are to be lost for the sake of having the State your debtor.

It has been well pointed out that the bill ignores the fact that the functions of a trustee are not confined to the preservation and investment of the trust estate and the distribution of its income. By far the larger number of trusts are created by wills and settlements, the object of which is to provide for infants and other persons who are not sui juris, and the duties of a trustee are often rendered delicate and difficult by their having to take into account personal and moral considerations. A public department could not be expected to take these considerations into account; it would necessarily act according to fixed rules and without elasticity. In the case of infants the question of guardianship is inextricably mixed up with that of trusteeship, and would be eminently unsuited for treatment by a public department.

Practically the public trustee would in nine cases out of ten be sole trustee. The callous indifferent mind of a paid official (and probably if the scheme were a success that of some subordinate official) would have to deal with the niceties of discretionary trusts.

In Liverpool, perhaps, we should scarcely feel the effects of the Act in their extremest form. We should doubtless have local representatives of the public trustee to transact his business here, and, if we may judge by our past experience, they are not likely to be either callous or indifferent. We have good reason to be satisfied with our registrars, one and all; we believe them to be men of the highest honour, to whom the interests of women and children may very safely be confided; but even if under them the evils of officialism were reduced to a minimum, we should still feel that nothing could make up for the intimate personal knowledge of character and circumstances, which is indispensable to the full discharge of the delicate duties of a trustee.

It was, I presume, such considerations as these which drew from Mr. Lake, the respected ex-president of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, his letter to the Times of April last, which probably represents a good deal of London opinion on this measure. He thought that all objections to this bill would disappear if the public trustee's functions were similar to those of the official trustee of charitable funds; were limited, that is to say, to 'protecting the capital of the trust, leaving the administration of it to the trustees appointed by the settlor, and presumably friends of and well known to the beneficiaries.'

Such a public trustee as this might or might not be of value, but certainly he would be a very different functionary from that contemplated by the bill, which would have to be entirely redrawn in order to create him. The official trustee of charitable funds is merely a sort of receiver of trust moneys which he invests on Government or other securities, which have never to be disturbed, as the trusts are perpetual. But the very suggestion of a public trustee of this character shows that the fact of the funds being in the hands of a State official is incompatible with a fair rate of income. I have made inquiries, and find that under the trustee of charitable funds, if those interested in the income wish to change an investment, application must be made to the commissioners, who, as a rule, will not authorise any investment which goes beyond those upon which money in Court may be invested, and who refuse to sanction any investment on the security of real estate. I should in fact be surprised to hear that this official trustee has a single sum invested on the security of a mortgage of real estate.

Again, ''Tis easy dropping stones in wells, but who shall get them out?' The official trustee, having got the trust funds into his possession, will require the most complete and particular evidence of the right to the various shares therein, before he parts with them; and in case of any difficulty he would naturally hand the funds over to another department of State—the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, to ascertain after their prolix and expensive fashion who may be entitled to receive them. In very many of these cases private trustees would, and rightly, be satisfied by a less elaborate proof of title than the Courts would demand, and would be prepared to divide the funds accordingly without expense. Mr. Lake is conscious of this difficulty, but does not give it full force as a serious blot upon his scheme. The point never arises with charitable trusts, as the corpus of the fund never has to be divided and paid away to individual beneficiaries, but for ever remains applicable to charitable purposes under the statutory powers of the commissioners.

Thus the introduction of state officialism into the private pecuniary affairs of the citizens appears to bring with it at every turn difficulty and expense.

The danger which the Public Trustee Bill is intended to guard against is much less serious than it is represented by the promoters of the measure to be. Those members of this society who are best able to judge, from their large experience in trust matters, will bear me out in the statement that loss in trust estates by the malfeasance of the trustees is very rare. Such cases appear to be more common than they really are, from the circumstances that, in most cases of fraud by trustees, it becomes necessary to invoke the aid of the Courts to settle the rights of the parties. The simplest and surest safeguard is to keep up the number of trustees to two at least, and then there will be but few opportunities for fraud by an individual, and the only risk is one of a very exceptional kind—a conspiracy by both trustees to plunder the trust. It is, however, asserted that many persons find it impossible to obtain the services of private trustees. In some cases this may be so, though I think the difficulty is overstated, for many objections have been removed by the course of recent legislation. But where the difficulty exists, it arises in great measure from the fact that trustees are not entitled to make any charge for their trouble. The opinion of your committee on this subject is to be gathered from the report of last year, in which they refer to the fact that they passed a resolution in favour of the report of the Manchester Law Association commending the principle of remuneration of trustees. The old idea which prevailed in many branches of the law, that those who charged nothing for their services, or acted from public spirit, seeking no profit, were exempt from liability save where guilty of crass negligence, has been finally exploded by a series of decisions as well in cases of trustees as in others, and there seems to be no good reason why trustees should incur risks for nothing, or why the principle of payment of trustees, which is the basis of the bill in question, should not be extended to all trusteeships. We all of us know many gentlemen distinguished for their probity and intelligence amongst us, who yet perhaps from the very reason of their great honesty and scrupulosity, have not attained to much wealth. Such men as these make admirable trustees, and remuneration by a small percentage of the annual income would be to them a sufficient incentive to their undertaking the burthen of trusteeships.

It is not necessary for me to trouble you with a recital of the many other practical objections which have suggested themselves to the committee in the course of their opposition to this bill. Some of them are touched upon in the report above referred to, and in the documents to be found in the appendix. The whole subject, however, is of so great practical importance in one of the principal branches of a solicitor's profession, that it deserves the greatest watchfulness of each of us.

The other subject on which it is necessary for me to address you is that of the Continuous Sittings Bill, or more generally the improvement of the machinery for the early local trial of suits. My predecessor in this chair dealt forcibly with the question in his presidential address, and every word that he said is as cogent now as it was then, but as a long correspondence has been going on in the Times and the law papers on the circuit system, and the subject was also casually dealt with by Mr. Melmoth Walters as president of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom at Plymouth, it is proper for me to allude to it.

Mr. Walters touched on the subject with a light hand, just pointing out the difficulties and complexities which surround it, and promising that the serious attention of his council should be devoted to it. Others have been more dogmatic, and all the old schemes which were urged twenty years ago at the time of the Judicature Commission and later have once more been paraded. On the one hand we have the proposal 'to abolish circuits altogether, and make the County Courts universal Courts of first instance, with unlimited jurisdiction.' This is virtually the scheme suggested by Mr. Pitt Lewis. Mr. G. R. Askwith would apparently preserve the circuit system, and merely provide for—

1. 'Holding assizes only in those towns which contain more than 50,000 inhabitants, and are already assize towns, with leave for other towns containing more than 50,000 inhabitants to become assize towns if they are suitably situated, and undertake to build proper Courts;' or
2. 'Holding assizes only in those towns which are the chief towns of wide districts or of several County Court circuits.'

But among all the correspondents, 'it seems,' as Mr. Askwith says, 'that no one has much to urge in favour of the circuit system.'

I do not propose to go into the intricate and important subject of the relation of County Courts to the High Court of Justice. I would merely remind you that in past years a somewhat similar proposal to that of Mr. Pitt Lewis was under the careful consideration of the committee of this society in the form of a bill promoted by Mr. Cowan in the year 1883, and they decided that it should be opposed. There was no objection, I conceive, to the County Courts being made branches of the High Court; such a step might bring with it many incidental advantages, and it was one which, at the request of this society, their witnesses, Mr. Jevons and Mr. Gill, sent to give evidence before the Judicature Commission, in 1872, were desired to press upon the commission. But the proposal to hand over the bulk of our Nisi Prius business, now dealt with at assizes, to the County Courts is one which I think the members of this society would scarcely regard with favour. It might indeed hasten the trial of causes, but would probably end in all important cases, and especially all difficult commercial questions, being tried in London.

The general outcry against the circuit system is on account of the great waste of the time of judges, bar, solicitors, and suitors, and the consequent waste of money to the latter, and it may be that Mr. Askwith's suggestion would considerably reduce this. But the complaint of the largest centres of provincial population—Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham—is that the assizes are too infrequent, and too uncertain in their duration to satisfy the needs of suitors in the great cities. What we want, and what we have a right to demand, is the speediest, cheapest, and most perfect and complete justice. As of old it was decreed, 'Communia placita ne sequantur curiam Regis sed teneantur in aliquo certo loco,' so we pray that our clients' interests should not be involved in the evils of the circuit system, but that (whatever the needs and interests of other parts of the provinces), Liverpool, Machester, and Birmingham should be able to try their causes as soon as the pleadings are closed, and that all necessary arrangements should be made to secure this end. No idea of uniformity can be of sufficient value to make it right that these great quasi-metropolitan districts should be bound for their civil business to a circuit system which has confessedly broken down.

The Provincial Sittings Bill promoted by this society in 1886 was a very complete if not sweeping measure, and provided for the local hearing of all issues of fact or law depending in the Chancery or Queen's Bench Divisions, or in the Admiralty branch of the Probate Division, and of such issues of fact in the Probate and Divorce branches of that division as might be sent down to them, and all appealed or adjourned summonses from the district registrars. The minor changes made since that year in the arrangements for bringing Chancery and Admiralty causes to an early hearing have been beneficial. In the same way a few slight alterations would suffice to improve the hearing of common law actions, and secure great additional promptitude in bringing cases to a decision. If these were granted us, we could, perhaps, afford to wait more patiently for the elaboration of a larger and more complete scheme. The suggestions I would make are:—

1. That the opening of the civil assizes at Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham take place on fixed dates—e.g. January 30, April 30, July 30, and November 30 in every year.
2. That the litigants may enter their cases for trial up to and after the commencement of the assize.
3. That the assize shall continue until the whole of the cases entered for trial are heard.
4. That during the assize the judge shall take all such chamber work in civil actions as would be taken by a judge in London.

These changes could, I think, be effected without unduly disturbing the arrangements of Her Majesty's judges. But if they were found to necessitate the creation of an additional judge, it would show how pressing a grievance had been removed, and we should have a good case for asking that an additional judgeship should be created.

The three districts to which I have alluded contribute a very large percentage to the business of the Superior Courts, and as, on the whole, a considerable profit is made out of the administration of justice (which, indeed, is contrary to sound government), the salary of the new judge may fairly be taken from this surplus.

I am glad to notice that the question of the local trial of causes is effectively engaging the attention of the Government. An Act of one clause was passed last session to provide for holding sittings at Guildhall by judges of the High Court under commissions for the trial of issues at Nisi Prius, and the Lord Chief Justice, on taking his seat at the resumption of those sittings after a long discontinuance, said that it was supposed the trial of mercantile issues had diminished owing to their removal to the Courts of Justice in the Strand. In Liverpool, Manchester and Birmingham we attribute the decrease in Nisi Prius issues to the unnecessary delay, worry, and expense of the present system. The same lesson may be learnt in each centre—that the old system must be adapted to meet the new conditions of business—and it would seem probable that the only solution of the present block in the Chancery Division recently described by the Attorney-General is an increase of the number of judges.

In making the above suggestions, in which I believe I express the opinion of my colleagues, I have made no mention of what is known as the bar difficulty. I have not done so because for my own part I do not believe that any serious difficulty of that kind exists, or if existent would long remain. The virtually continuous sittings of the Palatine Chancery Court in Liverpool and Manchester, presided over by an able superior judge, are found to retain as resident in the district or to bring down from London counsel quite strong enough to cope efficiently with any part of the important business brought into that Court. Even without the existence of some similar opportunities in the Common Law Division of the High Court of Justice, our local bar has grown in number to no less than seventy. It is true that we see from time to time some of the ablest of the common law men amongst them move off to London for the wider sphere of labour and profit there to be met with; but the large measure of success which they almost all achieve in London is an indication of the exceptional amount of legal ability always to be found among the resident members of our bar. Who can doubt that the steady flow of high-class business brought to them by the prompt and thorough trial of all local causes would at all times insure for us the presence of a bar which would be in all respects adequate to the work? If, as we know, it is the easiest thing in the world for counsel to run up to London on occasion, it is not much more difficult for counsel to run down from London; and there could be no difficulty in making any slight changes of custom or professional etiquette which might be requisite to adjust the bar of the Northern Circuit to the new order of things.

A word as to our efforts in the cause of legal education. You know what great importance the committee attaches to this subject, and I would beg your individual assistance by the adoption of the form of articles of clerkship set forth in the appendix to the report. I am glad to say that this session an increase has taken place in the attendance at the lectures arranged by the Board of Legal Studies, a fact which, combined with the circumstance that the total number of articled clerks has somewhat diminished, justifies the restoration by the council of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom of the larger annual grant of 150*l.* to the funds for those lectures. For this grant we are, I believe, mainly indebted to the exertions of our friend Mr. Gray Hill, who, as you are aware, was recently elected without a contest a member of the council. We shall look to him for assistance on many future occasions, and hope that he may become a nexus of opinion between the provinces and the metropolis on many important projects for the improvement of the law and its administration.

'VANITY FAIR' for December 5 will contain a cartoon called 'Bench and Bar,' containing portraits of members of those two bodies, some of which appear to be good likenesses, but we fear we cannot say the same for all.

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, November 24; Mr. Pattinson in the chair.—The subject for discussion—'That the case of Medowar v. The Grand Hotel Company, L. R. (1891) 2 Q. B. Div. 11, was wrongly decided'—was opened by Mr. Harcourt, followed by Mr. Alder; Mr. Simon, followed by Mr. Herbert Walton, opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: In the affirmative, Messrs. Herbert Smith, Anderson, Baldwin, and Crawford. In the negative, Messrs. Wilkinson, Willson, Watson, Evershed, Harry Watkins, Arnold, Bower, and Thirlby. Mr. Harcourt replied.—On the motion being put to the meeting, it was lost by a majority of five.

THE BIRMINGHAM CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS' STUDENTS' SOCIETY.—A largely attended meeting was held at the Library on Tuesday evening, presided over by Mr. Walter N. Fisher, when an interesting lecture was delivered to the students by Mr. H. A. Pearson, barrister-at-law, of Handsworth, on 'Trusts and Trustees.' The lecturer gave a brief sketch of the origin and rise of uses and trusts, and proceeded to define and illustrate the different kinds of trusts, and concluded by referring to a few of the duties and liabilities of trustees. The lecture was interspersed with several humorous anecdotes and poetical versions of some of the leading cases.—At the close of the lecture a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Pearson for his able lecture. The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

MIDDLE TEMPLE.—Mr. Alfred Cock, Q.C., and Mr. Russell Roberts have been elected benchers of the Middle Temple.

THE Prince of Wales, under warrant dated November 9, has specially appointed Messrs. John Brinsmead & Sons pianoforte manufacturers to His Royal Highness.

DANISH MARGARINE LEGISLATION.—A report from the British Consul at Copenhagen, which has just been issued, deals mainly with recent Danish legislation regulating the sale of margarine. The importance of maintaining the high reputation of Danish butter, especially in the English market, has led to successive enactments providing for the production and trade in margarine. The first Act was passed in 1885. Three years later the Government introduced a bill containing more stringent provisions. But clauses entirely forbidding the use of colouring matter, the mixture of artificial and dairy butters, and the export of artificial butter were rejected by the Lower House of the Legislature. The discussion on the proposed total prohibition ended in a compromise, empowering the Minister of the Interior, 'whenever he shall find it necessary, to forbid the export of artificial butter from the country.' In May last a new law came into operation, and the consul supplies a full translation of this, with the supplementary regulations, and six plates giving the table of colours. He adds that these stringent regulations are rigidly enforced, and that 'any doubts as to the purity of Danish export butter may be safely laid aside.' The law is said to meet with the approval of those concerned; one effect of it was immediately noticeable in the cheesemongers' shops, where many of the small pieces of cheese exposed for sale were labelled 'oleomargarine cheese,' instead of the fancy names they had previously borne.

UNITED LAW SOCIETY.—A meeting was held at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall, on November 23, at which Mr. Marcus moved: 'That the continued exclusion of the self-governing States of the Empire, other than Great Britain, from a direct share in the control of foreign affairs is an infraction of constitutional principle and a growing danger.' Mr. C. W. Williams opposed, and was followed by Messrs. Hawkins, Lewis, Bagram, Green, Hudson, H. Smith, Le Maistre, and Atkin. The motion was defeated by a majority of four. The next meeting will be held on November 30, the subject for discussion being: 'A. travelled on a railway, without having paid his fare or provided himself with a ticket, but without intent to defraud the company or evade payment of the fare; and his luggage, which was placed in the luggage van of the train, was lost. Can he recover compensation from the railway company?'

MIDDLE TEMPLE.—Thursday, November 19, being Grand Night of Michaelmas Term, Lord Coleridge, the Lord Chief Justice of England, as the treasurer of the Inn for the past year, and the masters of the bench of the Middle Temple, entertained at dinner a number of guests in their ancient hall. Among the guests present were: His Royal Highness Prince Christian, the Duke of Teck, the Marquis of Salisbury, Viscount Barrington, the Bishop of Rochester, Lord Aberdare, Lord Knutsford, Sir Edward Thornton, Lord Justice Kay, Mr. Justice Charles, Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams, Mr. Justice Romer, Mr. Justice Jeune, Sir Arthur Clay, Sir Alfred Lyall, the Treasurer of the Inner Temple, Lieutenant-General Wray, Colonel G. Grant Gordon (Equerry to His Royal Highness Prince Christian), the Treasurer of Gray's Inn, Mr. John Rigby, Q.C., the Treasurer of New Inn, the Reader at the Temple Church, Mr. J. C. Horsley, R.A., Mr. W. W. Ouless, R.A., Mr. John Shortt, Mr. C. Henderson Scott, Mr. J. A. D. Heaton, Mr. J. J. Morgan, and the Under Treasurer. The benchers present were: Sir Thomas Chambers, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., His Honour Judge Prentice, Q.C., Mr. Higgin, Q.C., Sir Peter Edlin, Q.C., Mr. Pope, Q.C., Lord Justice Lindley, Mr. Cowie, Q.C., Mr. Morgan Lloyd, Q.C., Mr. Hopwood, Q.C., Mr. Philbrick, Q.C., Mr. Macrory, Q.C., Mr. Locock Webb, Q.C., Sir Richard Couch, Mr. Littler, Q.C., Mr. Ambrose, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Kemp, Q.C., Mr. Underhill, Q.C., Mr. Graham, Q.C., Mr. Saunders, Q.C., Mr. Finlay, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Dauney, Mr. Justice Collins, Mr. Bigham, Q.C., Mr. Stallard, Mr. Finlason, Mr. Bruce, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Will, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Digby, Sir F. Villeneuve Smith, Mr. Crump, Q.C., Mr. Balfour-Browne, Q.C., Mr. Francis-Williams, Q.C., and Mr. Aspinall. There was also a large attendance of barristers and students who are members of the inn. During the evening the treasurer proposed the toast of 'The Queen,' which was received with loud cheers and the customary clapping of hands. After the cloth was drawn the masters of the bench and their guests left the hall, Lord Salisbury and others of the guests being greeted with loud applause.

BIRTHS.

On Nov. 18, at Ashtead, Surrey, the wife of Wilfred Duke Mellersh, Solicitor, of a daughter.

DEATHS.

On Nov. 15, at Barton Hall, Kingskerswell, Devon (the residence of her brother-in-law, Hercules E. Brown, Esq.), Elizabeth Jane Clark, of Lascelles, Boscombe, Bournemouth, aged 54, widow of Henry Clark, of Trowbridge, Wilts, Solicitor.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1891.

'OBITER DICTA.'

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW is making good progress with Mr. Justice Stirling's list of witness actions, with the result that he is almost every day assailed with applications that certain cases may stand off the paper, either because the parties (who are supposed to be yearning for trial) are not ready, or that a settlement is contemplated, or some other such reason. His lordship pointedly remarked, on one of these applications, that there would come a time when they could not be acceded to. He understood that his services had been taken away from the Queen's Bench Division in order that he might try a number of actions which were urgently in need of adjudication! The delay which has hitherto prevailed in getting to trial, however, may possibly account for the apparent unreadiness of the parties when their turn arrives. But the state of things also tends to show that the block in Chancery is not so serious as is generally supposed, for the lists, when resolutely attacked by a strong judge, seem to melt away like snow in the sun.

THE House of Lords has affirmed by a majority the decisions of the Court of Appeal and Mr. Justice North in the case of Salt v. The Marquis of Northampton. We commented on the case when it was before the Court of Appeal (59 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 745), and it will be remembered that Lord Justice Bowen dissented from the other members of the Court. Lord Compton, eldest son of the Marquis of Northampton, borrowed 10,000*l.* from the National Life Assurance Company on his reversionary interest, contingent on his surviving his father, in certain real estate. To provide against the event, which happened, of Lord Compton's predeceasing his father, the company insured the son's life against the father's for 34,500*l.* They paid the premiums, and it was stipulated that if Lord Compton should fail to repay them the premiums, the policy should belong absolutely to the company, and Lord Compton or his representatives should have no interest in the policy. In fact, Lord Compton never paid a penny. On his death the Marquis, as his personal representative, claimed, on payment of premiums and interest and of the 10,000*l.* and interest, to have the policy moneys paid to him. The House of Lords, on the ground of the ancient equitable doctrine—'once a mortgage always a mortgage'—has affirmed his right to this money. Lord Selborne confessed to having fluctuated in his opinion during the argument, but finally arrived at the conclusion that, as the debtor was clearly to have some interest in the policy, his interest was that of a mortgagor with a right to redeem on the usual conditions. Most debtors would like to be able to borrow money in so favourable a way, for the result is that Lord Compton's estate is the richer by some 15,000*l.* or more by this very profitable loan transaction.

LORD BRAMWELL played the very unusual rôle, for him, of following authority and not his own judgment, and he indulged in some sarcastic observations on equitable doctrines. He thinks it might have been better if people were kept to their bargains, and then 'we should have been spared the double condition of things, legal rights and equitable rights, and a system of documents which do not mean what they say. But,' he adds, 'the piety or love of fees of those who administered equity has thought otherwise.' Accordingly, while his reasoning was in favour of the appellants, his vote was given for the respondents. Lord Hannen dissented on the ground that there never was a mortgage of the policy at all. There is much force in his argument. He holds that, as a mortgage 'imports the conveyance to the mortgagee of property belonging to the debtor or someone other than the mortgagee,' and there was no such conveyance, the policy having been brought into existence by the company, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee was never established. It certainly seems probable that the result actually brought about was not in the contemplation of the parties, and insurance companies will doubtless take care in the future to avoid the pitfall into which, in this instance, the appellants have fallen.

It is only a few weeks since we dealt in these columns with the important question of abating the smoke nuisance in the metropolis. A correspondence on the subject has been for some time proceeding in the City Press, and in last week's issue of that paper there appeared a spirited letter dealing with 'London smoke from a woman's point of view.' Though written in a humorous vein, it contains many forcible arguments in favour of some further legislation on the subject. The writer, after remarking that, although smoke does not produce fog, yet it lends to it its most injurious elements, says, 'The London fog nearly kills me, and drives me from London when I wish and ought to be there.' The remark undoubtedly applies to a large number of her sex, and, as she observes, entails a very serious loss upon the shopkeepers of London. The letter then proceeds to point out that the subject is far more serious to that large class of women whose daily bread is dependent on residence in London, to whose work good health is essential, very many of whom have children to support. Reference is also made to the large numbers of women employed as clerks, dressmakers, &c., who need daylight for their work and pure air for their health, and a strong argument is drawn from the serious injury caused to the eyesight of many workers from having to use artificial light almost continually for weeks together. The writer concludes by saying that women are as deeply interested as men in the abatement, as far as possible, of the smoke nuisance.

The important case of Wiedeman v. Walpole is amongst those which we report this month, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 762. Technically, it decides what perhaps required judicial decision in view of Bessela v. Stern, 46 Law J. Rep. C. P. 467, that the mere fact of a defendant in an action for breach of promise of marriage not having answered two letters, one by the plaintiff, and the other by a stranger to the parties, charging the promise to marry, does not amount to material evidence in support of the promise within the meaning of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68), s. 2, which first made the evidence of the parties to this kind of action admissible. On this point the Court of Appeal has no doubt whatever. As to the more general question, whether silence upon the receipt of any letter can be taken as evidence of admission of the truth of its contents, all the judges agreed that there might be particular circumstances under which silence would be tantamount to admission, but that, unless those particular circumstances existed, no inference could be drawn from leaving a letter unanswered. We have thus an emphatic confirmation by the whole Court of Appeal of the dictum of Willes, J., in Richards v. Gellatly, L. R. 7 C. P. 127.

It is a far cry from the Companies Act, 1867, back to Sheppard's 'Touchstone,' but, in In re The Anglo-Colonial Institute (Lim.), reported in our Notes of Cases for this week, Mr. Justice Kekewich went back to that ancient authority for assistance in deciding whether a valid contract to issue fully-paid-up shares had been duly made and filed under section 25 of the Act. The contract by the company to issue the shares as fully paid up purported to be made four days before the incorporation of the company, but the company's seal was affixed after incorporation. Mr. Justice Kekewich thought that this was not an attempted ratification of a contract entered into before the existence of the company, which, according to In re The Northumberland Avenue Company, L. R. 33 Chanc. Div. 16, would be of no avail; but that, according to the law as laid down in Sheppard's 'Touchstone,' p. 72, the contract under seal must be considered as having been delivered and first made when the seal was affixed, and as binding on the company in consequence. Another point in the case was whether the contract, which was, in fact, filed on the morning after the day of issue of the shares, was filed 'at or before the issue' of the shares within the meaning of section 25. The learned judge, following the view taken by Mr. Justice North in Pook's Case, 56 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 1049; L. R. 35 Chanc. Div. 579, held that the two things—the delivery of the deed and the filing—were substantially contemporaneous, and that there had in this respect, too, been a sufficient compliance with the terms of section 25.

We confess that we are by no means surprised that the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich in In re The North Australian Territory Company, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 798, has been reversed by the Court of Appeal. The question, we may remind our readers, was whether a director upon taking and paying for his qualification shares could take an indemnity in the form of an agreement by the promoter of the company to buy back the shares at par in the event of the director retiring, under which indemnity he afterwards received back the par value of the shares at a time when the shares were really valueless. Mr. Justice Kekewich thought that the indemnity had resulted in no loss to the company, and that the case was not within the line of authorities in which an agent was shown to have made a gain for himself in such a way that the money so gained was held by him as trustee for the company, and decided against the liquidator. In commenting on this decision at the time (ante, p. 474) we ventured to remark that, if the learned judge's judgment could be sustained, the example set by the director was likely to find many imitators. The Court of Appeal, however, has now held that the case falls within the principles enunciated in Hay's Case, 44 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 721; L. R. 10 Chanc. App. 593, and that the director was bound to repay the secret profit which was derived from his position of director. The case is undoubtedly a novel one on the facts, but in principle it is difficult to see how it differs from the cases in which the promoter has directly provided the director with the money for his qualification shares.

It has been stated, and no doubt correctly, that many persons who presented themselves at the polling stations for the purpose of voting at the recent election of the School Board for London, were 'turned back' as not being on the register. The franchise is rather a curious one, depending as it does on certain sections of the Metropolitan Management Acts and the Elementary Education Acts taken together. By section 37 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, 'the members of the School Board' shall in the city of London be elected by the same persons and in like manner as common councilmen are elected, and in the other divisions of the metropolis by the same persons and in the same manner as vestrymen under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and the Acts amending the same.' Turning to the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, we find that vestrymen are elected by the parishioners, but that it is provided by section 16 that no person shall be entitled to vote 'unless he shall have been rated in the parish to the relief of the poor for one year next before the election and have paid all parochial rates' due from him at the time of voting, except such as have become due within six months immediately preceding the voting. By an amending Act of 1856, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, occupiers not actually rated may claim to be rated, and upon paying the rates due in respect of the premises for which they claim may become entitled to vote. By the Elementary Education Act, 1873, the poll was directed to be taken as under the Ballot Act, 1872, but no change was made in the franchise itself. Section 3 of that Act speaks of the rate-book and other documents constituting the register, but there is no register properly so-called, much less is there any register conclusive in the same way as the Parliamentary register is conclusive under the Ballot Act, 1872. It may be hoped that by the time of another School Board election the properly revised County Council register may be constituted the register for School Board purposes.

Mr. Archer's address at the recent annual general meeting of the Liverpool Law Society, which we reported at full length last week, ante, p. 741, contains some eminently sensible remarks upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Public Trustee Bill, which we discussed at length in April last, ante, p. 269. We are glad to observe that Mr. Archer dwells on the desirability of remunerating private trustees, as this is a practice which we have frequently advocated. It is, we believe, almost universal in the colonies, and if generally adopted in this country would go far to neutralise the arguments, so much in favour in the highest quarters, for the appointment of a public trustee. The reformation may be achieved to a great extent by solicitors themselves advising their clients, when creating a trust, to bethink themselves of the question of remuneration. Especially can this be done in connection with the appointment of executors or of trustees to act under a will. Many testators either forget, or do not care to consider, the trouble and responsibility which their executors will be saddled with, and bequeath either no legacy or a miserably inadequate one to their executors. Of course, in cases of near relationship or great poverty of beneficiaries, executors may easily waive their claims to a legacy, but in all ordinary cases they ought to be adequately paid.

Only about 10 per cent. of the present members of the bar subscribe to the Barristers' Benevolent Association, and even this small percentage exhibits a tendency to diminish. Such is the short effect of Lord Justice Bowen's speech at the annual meeting of the association, and it has become of importance to inquire into the causes of so lamentable and unexpected a state of things. It has been suggested in some quarters that the reason for the falling off may be that, as the supply of barristers already largely exceeds the demand, the existing barristers do not wish to increase the supply by rendering the profession more attractive, or rather less unattractive, by reason of the interposition of a benevolent association to save utter failures from the workhouse. We think that this is a reason which would have weight with few. More likely is it that the diminished earnings of the bar have diminished the natural source of subscriptions, and perhaps it may have occurred to some that the rules in accordance with which relief is administered are not sufficiently made known. Is a subscriber, for instance, entitled to relief in preference to a non-subscriber? To what extent, if any, may barristers actually practising obtain relief? For ourselves, we are rather inclined to think that a decided preference ought to be given to subscribers of large amounts.

Section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that, 'if any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge' of a County Court 'in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge, may appeal from the same to the High Court.' These words are very comprehensive; but in the recent case of How v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, the Court expressed the opinion that they would not have the effect of giving an appeal from the refusal of the County Court judge to grant a new trial. This opinion proceeded on the ground that in such a case there is an appeal against the determination or direction of the judge at the trial, and that to hold that there is also an appeal against his subsequent refusal to alter that determination or direction is in effect indirectly to extend the time for appealing from the original determination or direction of the judge. We cannot concur in this reasoning, which seems based on a wrong view of the rules of construction of statutes, and we are glad to see that the dictum has been dissented from in Pole v. Bright (Notes of Cases, p. 159), in which Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Smith have expressly held that an appeal lies to the High Court from the refusal of a County Court judge to grant a new trial.

Ex parte Portingell (Notes of Cases, p. 155) is an important case upon service of notice of intention to oppose the renewal of a license. By section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, no objection to the renewal of a license may be entertained, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of such license has been served on the holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting. In Ex parte Portingell the notice of opposition had not been put into the hands of the applicant himself by the person serving it; but 'had been left with a boy at the licensed premises.' The justices, however, found as a fact that the notice had reached the hands of the applicant in due time, overruled the preliminary objection that he had not been served with the notice, and refused to renew. The High Court, and now the Court of Appeal, has held that the justices were right, and notwithstanding that the sections of the Licensing Acts which regulate the hearing of applications for renewals ought to be construed liberally in favour of applicants, we cannot see that personal service is made necessary by section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Mr. F. A. Inderwick, the well-known Queen's Counsel, has added to his 'Sidelights on the Stuarts' a work called 'The Interregnum,' which consists of studies of the Commonwealth, legislative, social, and legal. The judges nowadays have plenty to occupy their time, except during vacations, but they must be thankful that the age of Victoria requires less variety of attainments of them than the age of Cromwell did. According to Mr. Inderwick (p. 173), 'at the present time a judge on circuit tries the prisoners in the gaol and disposes of the causes in the lists, and his business is over; but in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the judge may almost be said to have administered the county to which he was sent. He heard appeals from Quarter Sessions and from orders of justices of the peace. He tried questions of rating and assessments, and, when he thought it necessary or right, ordered a rate to be made on the whole county or on a particular parish for any specific purpose. Numerous entries, for instance, are to be found in which the judge of assize has ordered rates to be made with a view to paying the expenses of successful prosecutions to prosecutors who could neither themselves afford to pay nor could recover them from the parish where the offence was committed. Others in which a parish having been devastated by fire, or ravaged by disease, funds were required to rebuild the parish or to tend the sick. He was, as it were, a grand guardian to the poor, and as such heard petitions from poor people who complained of the non-administration of parish relief, and at every assize town he heard and decided disputed settlements of paupers, which formed a great part of the duties of justices of the peace. He was constantly inquiring into questions of county highways and bridges, giving his orders as to their maintenance and repair, and the proportion in which the cost was to be borne by the various parishes. He exercised a general control over the justices of the peace, directed the strict enforcement or counselled moderation in the application of penal Acts and ordinances. He heard reports of crimes and offences that had been committed and for which no person was in custody, and directed what justices were to undertake the inquiries, what examinations were to be taken, and how and where the offenders were to be tried. He exercised some jurisdiction over the payment of tithes, gave orders as to the repair or rebuilding of parish churches, and as to the rates necessarily to be made for the purpose, and made orders on lay rectors for the repair of their chancels. He heard complaints from the inhabitants of parishes and from the grand juries of the number of alehouse keepers, maltsters, and others who had to take out licenses, and ordered the local justices to suppress such houses as he found upon evidence to be disorderly or unnecessary. He heard petitions from poor people who, by reason of their poverty, had been expelled from the towns and villages, and made peremptory orders for their reception upon the inhabitants or the overseers who had driven them out. He entertained complaints of extortion by bailiffs and officers of excise, and appointed certain of the justices to inquire into the complaints and report the facts. He was, in fact, accessible to all subjects of the realm, and there was no complaint of any wrong, injustice, or misery from one end of England to the other which was not fit matter for the judge to consider if he were to do his duty in that position to which he had been called.'

It is believed that the majority of school managers throughout the country hastened to avail themselves of the benefits of the Elementary Education Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 56). But that Act is permissive only, and the 'fee-grant' is only given to such managers of schools 'who are willing to receive the same,' so that questions may possibly arise as to the manner in which the managers ought to signify their willingness to receive the fee-grant, and as to the date at which, or the period within which, their determination to receive it ought to be communicated to the authorities. The Act, which came into operation on September 1 last, is quite silent on these points. What would happen if no such communication was made? We think that, on the general principle that every person is to be presumed to accept what is for his own benefit, silence would be presumed to give consent after a reasonable time had elapsed within which refusal might have been signified. More difficult questions might arise in the case of the managers not being unanimous. By section 3 of the Act of 1870 the term 'managers' includes all persons who have the management of any elementary school, whether the legal interest in the schoolhouse is or is not vested in them, and unless there be anything in the trust deed or other document constituting the managers to the contrary, a difference might prove fatal to the grant, as at common law the consent of all would be requisite. It is believed, however, that in by far the greater number of cases the consent of the majority has been made sufficient. Where the school is managed by a School Board, this sensible provision has been made by section 30, subsection 6, and rule 1 of schedule 3 to the Act of 1870, by which 'every question' arising at a School Board meeting 'shall be decided by a majority of votes of the members present and voting on that question.'

It is probable that if the Legislature had foreseen the invention of the roofing material called 'duroline,' the combustible nature of which has just been the subject of discussion in Payne v. Wright, section 19 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, would have been somewhat modified. That section provides that the roofs of buildings in the metropolis 'shall be externally covered with slates, tiles, metal, or other incombustible material.' Since that section was passed 'duroline' has been invented, and has been for some time in use in the roofs of such large buildings as the Royal Aquarium, Olympia, and Doulton's Works. The material consists of a network of iron wire, coated with an oleaginous compound which is waterproof and nearly transparent. Unfortunately the coating is combustible, and if a lighted coal or piece of stick falls upon it, it ignites and burns away, leaving the network uninjured. But in spite of this it seems to be doubtful whether it is not actually safer than incombustible glass, over which its light weight gives it a great advantage. Lighted objects, for instance, which would break and fall through glass, would be prevented by the wire network from falling into and setting fire to an unlighted building, while in case of a fire inside a building the network would to some extent prevent the rush of air. Notwithstanding, however, an ingenious contention that, as the material as a whole was not capable of being consumed by fire, it was incombustible within the meaning of the section, the Court felt itself bound with regret to give the words of the enactment their literal sense. Until, therefore, an alteration is made in the law, this material, which is, we believe, actually used on powder mills outside the metropolis, is tabooed within it. One loophole there is. It appears that after exposure for a year or two the material loses its combustibility to a great extent. By the aid of a friendly finding of fact in this direction, the large buildings which have had it in use for years may be able to resist the onslaught of the London County Council.

Section 19 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, enacts that 'where, in pursuance of any Act, whether past or future, any person is adjudged by a conviction or order of a Court of summary jurisdiction to be imprisoned without the option of a fine, and such person is not otherwise authorised to appeal to a Court of Quarter Sessions, he may appeal to a Court of Quarter Sessions against such conviction or order.' This was intended to be a general enactment, giving an appeal against a sentence of imprisonment, but not otherwise. In many Acts, however, as in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (see section 219), and the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (see section 54), the general rule has been deviated from by giving an appeal to quarter sessions against any conviction whatever. Amongst the Acts of 1891 which empower justices to convict summarily, we find that the Markets and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Act (see section 3) allows no appeal, but that an appeal is given by the Mail Ships Act, 1891 (see section 7), and notably by the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (see section 125). The Post Office Act, 1891, which allows justices to impose either fine or imprisonment, is left to the operation of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, with the result that an appeal lies against a sentence of imprisonment, but not otherwise.

The graphic and usually accurate Mr. Grant Allen has surely fallen into a slight error in his recent novel called 'Dumaresq's Daughter.' A will is being witnessed, and the witness who attests in the presence of the solicitors of the testator is able to see the name of the person who takes the whole benefit of the will, and, indeed, can hardly help seeing it. Surely the ordinary practice is so to fold a will up that the names of the legatees cannot be seen by the attesting witnesses.

Commercial Failures.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending November 28 was 100. The number in the corresponding week of last year was seventy-three, showing an increase of twenty-seven, being a net increase in 1891 to date of 118.

'LAW JOURNAL REPORTS' FOR DECEMBER.

The Law Journal Reports for this month are prefaced by the Rules of the Supreme Court, June, 1891, the order assigning Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams to be the judge to whom matters under section 94 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are to be referred, and the rules under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. The number also contains indices and tables of cases in the Privy Council, Chancery, Queen's Bench, and Probate Divisions.

Twelve cases in the Privy Council are reported (pp. 33–79), of which the first, Callender v. The Colonial Secretary of Lagos decides, with reference to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, that if the scope and object of an Imperial statute leads to the conclusion that the Legislature intended it to affect a colony, and the words used are calculated to have that effect, they must be so construed. Forth v. Power was an attempted but ineffective evasion of the Crown Land Act, 1861, New South Wales. The Commissioner of Stamps v. Hope was a special case on appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales under the Colonial Act (44 Vict. No. 3) in a matter of probate duty. In Donelly v. Broughton it was held that the rules which govern Courts of Probate in England apply to testamentary papers executed by Maoris. Macleod v. The Attorney-General of New South Wales was a case under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1883, of that colony, and decided that a bigamous marriage contracted in the United States was not within the jurisdiction of the colonial Courts. In re Lake's Patent requires clear evidence of the inadequacy of remuneration which will justify the prolongation of a patent. In The Owners of the Pleiades v. The Owners of the Jane their lordships declined to entertain a question of contributory negligence which was not raised in the Court below. In re Jablochkoff's Patent denied to patentees whose rights were older than the Act of 1883 a right to confirmation without the corresponding qualification introduced by the Act of 1852. Pollard v. Harragin was a case under the Rules of the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago. Lemestre v. West involved a conflict between the claims of purchasers and of volunteers under a marriage settlement. M'Leod v. M'Nab shows that under the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, series 5, c. 89, a mere reference to a will or codicil is not sufficient to revive it. According to Davies v. The National Fire Insurance Company of New Zealand, when a contract of insurance is reduced to writing the terms cannot be qualified by evidence of an alleged oral contract made prior to the policy.

In the Chancery Division (pp. 745–856), in which twenty-three cases appear, by Dowse v. Gorton in the House of Lords priority is given to executors carrying on with the approval of the creditors their testator's business, on the claims of the creditors. In Montgomery v. Thompson, the 'Stone Ale' case, the House affirmed the decisions of the Courts below. Lowther v. The Caledonian Railway Company was an arbitration case under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. In re Bathe (C. A.) defines the duties of a master in lunacy. Fishburne v. Hollingshead was a case of registration under the International Copyright Act, 1886. In re Robinson's Settlements Trusts denied to a tenant-for-life without impeachment of waste compensation for unworked mines under land sold to a railway company. Bellamy v. Davy defined the rights of contractors and sub-contractors, and the latter's lien on purchase-money. In re Thomas was a case of a tenant-for-life's right to retain a wasting security. Ashburner v. Sewell was an instance of a vendor's right to rescind the contract on a purchaser's objection to title. The Attorney-General v. The Vestry of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, settled questions under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855, and the Public Health Act, 1875. In re Applebee was a case of the extinction of a debt by the appointment of the debtor as executor. In re Dodworth admits the description of 'gentleman' as sufficient for the filing of an affidavit. In Archer's Case the acceptance by a director of a company of an indemnity from the promoter was held not to be a misfeasance or breach of trust under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862. In Hall v. Hall a gift of 'furniture, goods, chattels, and effects whatsoever the same may be or wheresoever the same may be situate' was held to pass all the testator's property real and personal. According to In re Russell & Co. a creditor cannot demand a compulsory winding-up, under the Winding-up Act, 1890, of a company in course of voluntary liquidation unless he can show that his rights will be prejudiced by the voluntary winding-up. In re Reynolds involved a power of appointment not within section 27 of the Wills Act. Dashwood v. Magniac (C. A.) decided in favour of the validity of a local custom by which annual cuttings of beech were held not to be waste and to be annual profits to which the tenant-for-life was entitled. The Earl of Jersey v. The Uxbridge Rural Sanitary Authority distinguished between the property of the defendants which was and that which was not liable to be taken in execution for the costs of an action. In re The Opera (Lim.) settled questions of the priorities of debenture-holders and execution creditors of a company in course of winding-up. The Duke of Sutherland v. Heathcote decides that there may be a grant of an exclusive license to work minerals, and express words are not needed to exclude the grantor; but there is a presumption against such a lease being exclusive. The subject of In re Robson was the meaning of a bequest of a 'desk with the contents thereof.' In Hicks v. Ross the sum was estimated which was required for the redemption of a perpetual annuity. In re Owthwaite was an instance in which the additional powers of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, were held not to be applicable.

In the Queen's Bench Division the first of the twenty-seven cases is Regina v. The Guardians of Woolwich Union, which expounds the scheme of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. In Stogdon v. Lee (C. A.) the limits of a married woman's contractual powers are defined. In Cleaver v. The Mutual Reserve Fund Association it was held, on the ground of public policy, that the defendants were not liable to pay the sum insured on a husband's life for the benefit of a wife when the latter had been convicted of her husband's murder. It was held in The Coupé Company v. Maddick that the hirer of a chattel is responsible for damage done to the chattel through negligence. Clarke v. Ramuz (C. A.) decides that upon a contract of sale of real estate, the vendor remaining in possession is bound, until completion, to keep the premises in the same condition as at the date of the contract of sale. Smith v. Baker, in the House of Lords, is a comprehensive decision on the liability of a master to his servant for injury sustained by the latter both under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and under the general law. Brace v. The Abercarn Colliery Company, and Huggins v. The London and South Wales Colliery Company (C. A.) were decisions under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, s. 12, subs. 1. Moul v. Groenings (C. A.) was a copyright case in connection with the reproduction of a foreign musical work in England. Thomas v. Searles (C. A.) involved questions under the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882. In Wilson v. Statham County Court costs only were allowed in an action remitted from the High Court to the County Court. In the Matter of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (C. A.) construed sections 29 and 61 of that Act. In Hamlyn v. Wood (C. A.) a covenant or warranty was held not to be implied in a contract unless it is absolutely necessary to give efficacy to the transaction. In Walter v. Everard (C. A.) an apprentice, on attaining the age of twenty-one, was held bound to fulfil the terms of an indenture made before he was of age as they were fair and provident terms. Pelton Brothers v. Harrison (C. A.) defined the limits of operation of a judgment obtained against a woman during coverture after she had become discovert. Spurling (appellant) v. Bantoft (respondent) was a market case under section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Act, 1847. In re Jones decided that a collier's wages were not 'salary or income' within the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53, subs. 2, which could be set aside for the benefit of creditors. In re The Onward Building Society (C. A.) illustrated the effect of a sale and transfer after the winding-up order. In Wiedemann v. Walpole (C. A.), the breach of promise case, it was held that the non-answering of a letter was no admission of the truth of its contents. According to The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Garfield no appeal lies to the High Court, without leave, from the decision of a judge of a County Court. In Price v. Crouch a collusive compromise of an action between plaintiff and defendant was not allowed to prejudice the plaintiff's solicitor in respect of costs. In M'Nair & Co. v. The Audenshaw, &c. Company (C. A.) it was held that an appeal to the Court of Appeal from the decision of a judge on an interpleader issue at the trial of the issue without a jury must be brought within twenty-one days. Devereux v. Clarke was an action for libel in the criticism of a book in which particulars of justification were required. Points of practice were settled in Gurney v. Small under Order XIV., rule 1, and Order III., rule 6. In Smith v. Gronow, where a lease was made voidable on bankruptcy of the lessee, the proviso was held inapplicable where the lessee had assigned before bankruptcy. In Smith v. Bailey (C. A.) the owner of a traction-engine bearing his name and address was held not liable for injury done to the plaintiff through the negligence of a hirer. Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Company was a taxation case involving refreshers. Rockett v. Clippingdale was a decision under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act.

In the Probate Division there are twenty-two cases. In Hall v. Hall (C. A.) was discussed what amounts to condonation of a wife's adultery. In Moore v. Moore the Court declined to act upon the decree of a foreign Court. The New Pelton was a case under the Thames Bye-laws, rule 18. In the Goods of Boehm was a case of rectification of a bonâ fide mistake in a will. O'Shea v. Wood (C. A.), involved questions of discovery, inspection, production of documents, and privilege. Lewin v. Lewin proceeded on the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, s. 4. In Tyler v. The Merchant Taylors Company the Court pronounced in favour of interlineations and alterations in a will. In the Goods of Barker was a case in which administration with the will annexed was granted to the attorneys of an absent sole executor. Taplin v. Taplin saddled the costs of a successful Queen's Proctor's intervention on the co-respondent, though he did not appear on the intervention. In White v. Davernay the official solicitor was appointed a guardian ad litem of a defendant who was a minor. The Orion was a decision under the Order in Council of June 24, 1885. In the Goods of Juppe gave to the words 'other effects' the meaning of a residuary bequest. In the Goods of P. A. Fraser involved the concurrent effect of English and Scotch testamentary papers. In the Case of the Goods of Dickinson the Court appointed as administrators persons mentioned by an intestate as executors in an unexecuted paper. In the Goods of Mary Mann was a case in which a partial intestacy was provided for by a partial administration. In the Case of J. B. Seaman was a case of two wills, English and Canadian. In the Goods of Sophia B. Cormack limited, in the circumstances, the bond given by an administratrix to the amount of the net balance only. In Clarke v. Clarke the Court refused to issue an attachment against a husband for non-compliance with an order to secure his wife's costs. In the Goods of Sarah Moore granted administration to an intestate's son instead of her husband. The Hero involved the Admiralty jurisdiction of County Courts. The P. Caland was a collision case under the regulations. In the Goods of Mary Shepherd settled questions of discovery and inspection of old testamentary papers.

In the five Magistrates' Cases, Fenwick v. The Croydon Rural Sanitary Authority decided a number of questions under the Public Health Act, 1875. Regina v. Hannay was a music-hall licensing case under the Metropolis Management Act, 1878, ss. 11, 12, 13. Kennedy v. Cowie was under the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 7. Regina v. Marsden (C. C. R.) construed section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. In Fortescue v. The Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, section 72 of the Paving (Metropolis) Act, 1817, was held to have been repealed by section 119 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855.

THE REGISTRATION APPEALS.

The annual decisions on appeals from revising barristers are apt to prove disappointing to those who have to look to them for guidance. When exclusive cognisance of these matters was reserved to the Court of Common Pleas, the same judges, sitting year by year to exercise the jurisdiction, had a chance to acquire special knowledge of registration law, though even then the conditions were not favourable to their doing so. Since the merger of the Common Pleas in the Queen's Bench Division the practice seems to be to vary as much as possible the composition of the Divisional Courts before which the appeals come. There is consequently a want of familiarity on the part of the judges with the law they are called upon only at long intervals to interpret—law which has much increased and is ever increasing in complexity. It must be added that appellants and respondents alike appear to select their counsel without regard to special qualifications. Appeals can now, it is true, be carried to the Court of Appeal, but only by leave of the Divisional Court, and that leave is too often refused when most needed. The inevitable result of such a system is uncertainty and inconsistency. We cannot say that the decisions of the present year, which we now proceed to examine, as a whole form any exception to the rule, though some of them will be useful precedents.

The case of Hall v. Metcalfe was unsatisfactory for two reasons. In the first place, it was irregular in form, being (to use an expression of Mr. Justice Williams in Prior v. Waring, 17 Law J. Rep. C. P. 73; 5 C. B. 56) a joint, not a consolidated appeal. It has been repeatedly held that a revising barrister has power to consolidate appeals only where the facts are alike. Here the facts differed, and the cases fell into two distinct groups. There should, therefore, have been two appeals—one as to the stall-holders, of whom Allen was the type; and the other as to the stand-holders, represented by Abbott. We are aware that in more than one instance of late years a similar irregularity has passed unnoticed. Nevertheless, it is settled law that the Court has no jurisdiction to hear such appeals, even with the consent of the parties. Both in Prior v. Waring and Robson v. Brown, 26 Law J. Rep. C. P. 81; 1 C. B. (N.S.) 34, the judges took the objection without waiting for counsel to raise it.

The second fault we find with the case is that it did not state the facts sufficiently to enable a decision to be given on the only serious question raised—the question, namely, whether the persons objected to were occupiers, or were mere licensees having the use and enjoyment, but not the occupation, of the plots of ground in respect of which they were entered on the list as qualified. The test would be whether Horner, the lessor or licensor, retained the control of the whole market or not; and, as to this, the case as hitherto reported was altogether silent. Instead of remitting it for a fuller statement on which the real rights could have been determined, the Court was content with upholding the decision of the revising barrister in favour of the votes, apparently on the negative ground that the facts as stated were not inconsistent with his conclusion. But neither were they inconsistent with the opposite conclusion. Bearing in mind the cases of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Buckmaster, 44 Law J. Rep. M. C. 29, 180; L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 70, 444, and Smith v. Lambeth, 52 Law J. Rep. M. C. 1; L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 327, we should say it may well be that the stall-holders had exclusive enjoyment, but not occupation, of the qualifying tenements, and the stand-holders, not even exclusive enjoyment, but a mere preferential right depending on their presence. Mr. Justice Wright's doubt, as to its being necessary to the qualification of a 10*l.* occupier that he should occupy as owner or tenant, will, we venture to think, disappear if he should ever find it necessary to form an opinion on the subject. In the present case the voters occupied as tenants if they occupied at all.

In Body v. Halse, Hunt v. Halse, and Fenning v. Halse the Court had to decide what is meant by the expression 'to witness a signature.' It was contended by the appellants that a lodger claim could be well attested by one who had not seen the claimant sign. The form of attestation requires the witness to declare as follows: 'I have witnessed the above signature of the above-named (claimant) at the date stated above'— i.e. the date of the claimant's signature. Mr. Justice Wright put the question in a nutshell when he asked, 'Do not the words, "I have witnessed the above signature," mean "I saw it made"?' The Court answered that question in the affirmative, and their decision will, it may be hoped, check to some extent the loose practices that prevail in the making of lodger claims.

The appeal in O'Connor v. Nicholson was so obviously one which the Court had no jurisdiction to hear that we find a difficulty in understanding why it was not struck out as soon as it was opened. By section 41 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, it is enacted that in a revising barrister's Court 'no party or other person shall appear or be attended by counsel.' The appellant, who had been called to the bar, claimed to represent other persons in a revision Court, and the revising barrister refused to hear him. That refusal was not stated to have affected the decision upon any claim or objection. If it had, there might have been a person entitled to appeal, but that person would not have been Dr. O'Connor. Instead of striking out the case the Court allowed the appellant to argue it. He seems to have relied upon two grounds: one, that he did not appear for any 'party or other person;' the other, that he did not appear as 'counsel.' The first argument placed him at once in a dilemma, for the words 'party or other person' must include all who have any locus standi in a revision Court; and if the association whom the appellant claimed to represent were not within the prohibition, it could only be because as to them no prohibition was necessary. But the true view of the matter is that an agent employed by an association to attend a revision Court must be regarded as representing the individual voters for whom the association acts; and these are the parties referred to in the section.

But the substantial point was, whether the appellant had appeared as counsel. Not many years since a case was argued in a revision Court by counsel regularly briefed on both sides. This was clearly within the mischief of the Act, and illegal; and in any case it is difficult to maintain that a barrister appearing in Court for another person is not acting in his professional capacity as counsel. But many revising barristers have been disposed to stretch a point so far as to allow an appearance by one who is not in regular practice at the bar and is acting gratuitously, or even in part discharge of the duties of some salaried office. On the whole we rather regret that the Court should have thought it necessary, in a case not properly before it, to pronounce an opinion in favour of a literal interpretation of the section.

Jones v. Pritchard raised a question as to the right of the four canons of Bangor to vote in respect of a residence which belongs to all, and is occupied by each in rotation for three months of the year. The substance of the objection taken to their votes was that all were not joint occupiers for the qualifying twelve months, but each was a separate occupier for three months only. On the facts stated the objection seems to have been a good one. It is true that where several persons occupy a house jointly, the absence of any, or for that matter all, during part or the whole of the qualifying period, would not signify so long as the house is kept up for their joint use. But here the case found that each in turn had exclusive occupation of the house, maintaining his own separate establishment of servants. The revising barrister seems to have been impressed by the circumstance that the arrangement was voluntary, and could have been altered by consent of the canons. But the question was not what they might have done, but what they did. However, the barrister took a different view, and hence the appeal. We hesitate to accept the report (in the Times) of what took place at the hearing. If it be correct, the Court, having before it a plain and simple point of law with which alone it had jurisdiction to deal, proposed to remit the case to the revising barrister in order that he might state facts with regard to a totally different point which he had not raised, and had no power to raise. It is true that the proposal was subject to the consent of the parties, but we fail to see how any consent could have justified such a proceeding. The respondent's counsel refused to agree, and ultimately the appeal was dismissed, but whether on the merits, or not, does not appear from the report.

The question raised in Arnold v. Sharpe as to the duty of the revising barrister with regard to duplicate entries in the lists of county electors is by no means a simple one, and the Court refused all assistance towards solving it on the ground that it did not relate to the insertion of a name in any list, and therefore was not a subject for appeal. This is a narrow construction of the clause (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 42) by which the right of appeal is given. For if substance rather than form be regarded, when an entry is marked as a duplicate it is expunged for all practical purposes from the list of Parliamentary electors or burgesses or both, as the case may be. It is often a matter of some importance to a man whether he is to vote in one division of a borough or another, when he is qualified in both, and it does not seem reasonable that he should have no redress if the barrister misconstrues the enactment regulating the selection of the entry for voting.

In Lord v. Fox the revising barrister had transferred the name of an elector from Division 3 of the occupiers' list to Division 1, although the elector had made no claim. This was, in effect, to insert in the list of Parliamentary electors a name which had been omitted therefrom by the overseers. The law only allows this to be done when due notice of claim has been given, and the apparently irrelevant fact that the name has been entered in the list of burgesses or county electors can hardly be a ground for dispensing with the notice of claim. The Court so held, and allowed the appeal. It has been suggested, but, we think, without good ground, that the result might have been different if Ballard v. Robins, 47 Law J. Rep. C. P. 50; L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 92, had been brought to the notice of the Court. The only case which, in our opinion, lends any support to the decision appealed from is one which was cited against it, Greenway v. Bachelor, Jacob's Case, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 179; L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 376. There it was certainly held that a man's name might be expunged from the list of burgesses on an objection addressed only to his qualification as a Parliamentary voter. But that authority has not been generally approved.

DOWSE v. GORTON IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

If a testator's business is carried on after his death in accordance with the provisions of his will, his executors are entitled to be indemnified out of the assets which the testator has authorised to be employed in the business, and the persons with whom the executors deal in carrying on the business are entitled to be subrogated to the executors' right of indemnity. Where the business is similarly carried on with the sanction of the testator's own creditors, similar rights in favour of the executors and persons dealing with them exist against the testator's own creditors who, but for that sanction, would not of course be bound, as the beneficiaries are, by the direction in the will authorising the executors to carry on the business. These are well recognised rules of administration, to which, however, the Court of Appeal in Dowse v. Gorton, 58 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 403; L. R. 40 Chanc. Div. 536, laid down two limits as to the rights of the subsequent creditors as against the testator's own creditors: first, that if the executors are themselves indebted to the testator's estate, their right to indemnity and the right of the subsequent creditors by way of subrogation to the executors' right must fail to the extent of the executors' indebtedness; and, secondly, that the right of the executors to indemnity and the right of the subsequent creditors by way of subrogation to the executors' right are subject to the prior claims of the testator's own creditors in respect of the assets existing at his death—in other words, that the indemnity in question as against the testator's own creditors exists only in respect of such part of the estate as has come into existence or changed its form since the testator's death. The first of these limits seems to be in direct accordance with the law of trusts and the doctrine of subrogation; but the second one is based on less obvious principles, and appears to be quite unsupported by previous authority. The case went to the House of Lords (60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 745; L. R. (1891) App. Cas. 190), where the order was varied by rejecting the second limit imposed by the Court of Appeal. The result, therefore, is that there is no difference in this respect between assets which come into the hands of the executors at the time of the death of the testator and property which, in their capacity of executors, they afterwards acquire in carrying on that business. The judgment of Lord Macnaghten in the case under appeal is, we think, a distinct contribution to this branch of the law, and will well repay perusal. Dealing with this particular point, and referring to the indemnity as limited by the order of the Court of Appeal to that part of the testator's estate as having been 'acquired by the executors since the death of the testator,' he continues: 'I am not aware of any authority for splitting the assets in that way. If a testator's business is carried on after his death in accordance with the provisions of the will (which, I think, is the true view in this case), the indemnity of the executors is only limited by the amount of assets which the testator has authorised the executors to employ in the business. If the business is carried on by the executors at the instance of the creditors without regard to the terms of the will, the executors, I suppose, have the ordinary rights of agents against their principals. But I can see no reason in any case for limiting the indemnity to that portion of the assets which may have come into existence or changed its form since the testator's death.

The judgment of the same learned judge deserves the attention of pleaders on an important point of practice. The proceedings in Dowse v. Gorton were commenced both by action and originating summons. The writ in the action asked for usual administration only, and no statement of claim was delivered and no affidavits filed in the action. The summons on which affidavits were filed also asked for the usual administration only. Lord Macnaghten, after remarking that the question of wilful default could not, consistently with well-recognised principles, be raised on this state of the pleadings, continued: 'Indeed, I apprehend it would not be competent for an applicant on an originating summons to ask for or obtain otherwise than by consent an order founded on breach of trust or inquiries pointing to wilful default.' This is an important limitation to the nature of the relief obtainable by this procedure.

THE LAW SOCIETY'S LIBRARY.

Catalogue of the Printed Books in the Library of the Incorporated Law Society. By F. BOASE, Librarian. London. 1891.

WE have nothing but praise to bestow on this catalogue. Admirably printed and arranged, with references to the shelves on which the books can be found, it reflects the highest credit on the librarian. We learn from the preface that the library now contains about 36,466 volumes, and we have found by turning over the pages of the catalogue that amongst them appears to be every book which either student or practitioner can possibly want.

THE REVISED REPORTS.

THE first volume of the 'Revised Reports,' which was issued a few months ago, contains more than 200 cases extracted from 1 Cox, 1 Vesey Jun., and 1–3 Durnford and East, covering a period of about five years from 1785 to 1790. The revision of 'the books,' which has been so frequently talked of, seems now likely to be accomplished. The system on which Sir Frederick Pollock and his assistants (Messrs. Campbell and Saunders) have proceeded is so fully described in the general introduction to the first volume, and the description is so much needed by the profession, that we hope that the introduction will be reprinted with the second volume, which is, we believe intended to appear before the end of the year. 'There can be no doubt,' it is stated in this introduction, 'about retaining a case that has been more than once or twice judicially cited, or has been frequently cited in argument within the last generation . . . Where a case has been reversed or expressly overruled, the burden of proof will then have to be carefully sifted; but it may well hold its ground if the authorities now in force are not intelligible without reference to it, or if it is so well known as to have taken a classical standing in the history of the law. Other grounds for omitting cases (or, where judged proper, parts of cases) will be that the decision relates to matters now obsolete by reason of changes, statutory or otherwise, in practice or law; that the point decided is now too well settled to need citation of authorities, or is covered by better and later authority; that no final decision of the case is reported; that the question turned on the construction of special and unusual words or on the application of settled rules of law to special and unusual facts; finally, that in one way or another the case is not—perhaps never really was—of any general interest.' This 'perhaps' is very considerate to the old reporters, who beyond doubt have amongst them reported many hundreds of cases which even their contemporaries would have 'willingly let die.'

PARKER ON ELECTION AGENTS AND RETURNING OFFICERS.

The Powers, Duties, and Liabilities of an Election Agent and of a Returning Officer. By Frank R. Parker, Solicitor and Parliamentary Agent. Second Edition. London: Knight & Co. 1891.

The new edition of Mr. Parker's work on election agents and returning officers may be regarded as one of the shadows cast before by the coming General Election. Great pains have been taken to make it a complete 'practical text-book and manual for workers in Parliamentary elections.' The statutes and the reported cases of the past seven years have been incorporated, and the book has been revised throughout and in great part rewritten. It is not merely a legal treatise, but contains much useful advice, evidently founded upon experience, upon such matters, for instance, as the shape, position, and internal arrangements of a polling-station and of a room for counting votes, and upon questions of policy, such as the relations of a candidate to political clubs and associations, and the advisability upon other than legal considerations of presenting an election petition. There is a copious supply of forms which seems sufficient for all possible requirements; and there are facsimiles of the various irregularly marked ballot papers which have been held good or bad by the Courts. On questions of law the book will generally be found a trustworthy guide by those for whom it is written. We note a few points, not practically important, in which there is room for improvement. Sometimes there is a little want of proportion in the discussion of incidental matters—e.g. in the remarks on surnames and christian names at pp. 168, 169. The statement (p. 77) that imprisonment on mesne process, or for debt, does not disqualify a candidate is somewhat out of date. On p. 63 we are told that aliens were 'originally excluded from Parliament by reason of the jealousy of foreigners during the reign of William III.,' while on p. 66 it is said, no doubt correctly, that an alien has always been ineligible. The author's uncertainty on this point, and also the doubt he expresses (p. 68) as to the eligibility of a person naturalised by certificate under the Naturalisation Act, 1870, proceed, we think, from his not accurately appreciating the scope of section 3 of the Act of Settlement. That clause was aimed not against aliens (who were already subject to some at least, and probably to all, of the disabilities it imposes), but against naturalised subjects and denizens, and, as it would seem, natural born subjects whose place of birth, though within the dominions of the Crown, was not within the three kingdoms or their dependencies. It was not repealed by the Act of 1870, because it was intended to remain in force so far as not inconsistent with the provisions of that Act. But it is material to observe that 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 4, which required the disabling provision of the Act of Settlement to be inserted in every Naturalisation Bill, has been repealed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. It is a strange assertion (p. 63) that the clergy are excluded from the House of Commons because they are members of or represented in the House of Lords. The Lords Spiritual sit in the Upper House, but the clergy are no more represented by them than the commonalty are by the Lords Temporal. Besides, the clergy are represented in the House of Commons, though they do not sit there. The truth of the matter is that the clergy, as one of the estates of the realm, had their own organisation apart from the baronage and the commons. When they ceased to tax themselves in convocation they acquired, without express legislation, the right, since recognised by statute, to vote at Parliamentary elections in respect of ecclesiastical benefices. They not unnaturally claimed to have also acquired the right to be elected; and the claim was allowed by the Newport election committee in 1785 (2 Luders, 269). Horne Tooke's Case shortly after was made the occasion for passing the Act 41 Geo. III. c. 63, which made the clergy thenceforth ineligible. On p. 356 Mr. Parker says that 'the writ of summons to the House of Lords must be issued before the disqualification' of a peer to vote as a Parliamentary elector 'attaches.' The proposition thus broadly stated is not warranted by the authority quoted (Bedford, C. & R. 95; P. & K. 143). There the peerage was created by the writ, and did not exist until the writ was issued. We see no reason to doubt that a peer deriving title by descent or from a patent issued to himself is disabled from exercising the Parliamentary franchise from the time of his predecessor's death in the one case and of the passing of the patent in the other.

THE CRIMINAL LAW OF CANADA.

A Bill relating to the Criminal Law of Canada. Ottawa. 1891.

This gigantic bill, which bears a striking resemblance to the Criminal Code Indictable Offences Bill introduced by the late Sir John Holker in the British House of Commons in 1878, contains 1,005 clauses. The most noticeable are clauses 681–683, by which the evidence of the defendant and of the husband and wife of the defendant is made admissible in certain specified cases, but inadmissible in others. We should have expected to find a clause making such evidence generally admissible.

INCOME-TAX REPAYMENTS.

Sir,—We hope you will allow us to supplement the letter we wrote to you this time last year, and which you were good enough to publish, showing the result of our endeavours to enlighten the income-tax payer as to his rights. The thirty-fourth Inland Revenue report which has just appeared enables us to bring down our figures to the end of the financial year 1889–90. About five years ago we issued 'Income Tax: How to get it Refunded,' and a new edition has appeared yearly as soon as any changes in the law have been decided upon. The thirty-first Inland Revenue report was the first to show the effect of the circulation of the book. The number of persons claiming abatement had suddenly increased in one year by 14,870; the following reports showed further increases of 8,415 for 1887–88, 4,873 for 1888–89, and 8,788 for 1889–90. In the four years, therefore, that followed the first appearance of the book relief was obtained by 36,946 persons, who, it is fair to assume, would not otherwise have claimed it. The money thus actually refunded to claimants amounted to 298,704*l.* during the four years; but this is very far from representing the whole amount refunded to claimants, for, strange to say, in no part of their reports do the Board of Inland Revenue give an account of money repaid under the exemption clause. Now, as far as our experience goes, exemption claims are at least ten times as numerous as abatement.

Besides these claims, there are others, on account of life insurance premiums. These have increased during the past three years from 98,622, with relief on 3,169,122*l.*, to 114,461, with relief on 3,585,127*l.*, an increase of 15,839 claims, with relief on 416,005*l.* Nor is this all, for very considerable reductions have been made in assessments, and very large sums have been refunded on overcharged professional and trade profits. Comment would be superfluous on the eloquent figures we have succinctly given above, and which are vouched for by the official reports.

We are convinced that there are still at least a hundred thousand who would get a refund on abatement or exemption if they would only go to the trouble of claiming or of entrusting their claims to us.

ARCHES COURT OF CANTERBURY.

Lord Penzance, the Dean of the Arches, held a public sitting of his Court on November 25 at his room in the House of Lords, and was attended by Mr. Cyrus Waddilove, the registrar, and Sir John Hassard, his lordship's official secretary.

BOYER v. THE BISHOP OF NORWICH.

This was a proceeding instituted by the Rev. C. E. P. Boyer against the Hon. and Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Norwich for refusing to institute him to the living of Brantham, in Suffolk, to which he had been nominated by the patron (Sir Alexander Dixie), who is a Roman Catholic. The bishop raised a demurrer, on the contention that there was no ground of action.—The Dean of the Arches, in giving judgment, said: This case came before the Court on an objection to the admission to the libel—practically a demurrer to it. The libel states that under the provisions of certain statutes made by the governing body of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, the heir of Sir Woolston Dixie had secured to him the right of nominating a fit person to be presented by Emmanuel College to the living of Brantham, in Suffolk. Sir Alexander Dixie, claiming to be such heir, has nominated the promovent to the college, and the college has presented him to the living. The respondent is the Bishop of Norwich, and he has refused to institute the promovent upon the ground that Sir A. Dixie at the time when he exercised his right of nomination was a Papist, which fact is admitted by the libel to be true, and that by the Act passed in 13 Anne, c. 13, all nominations by Papists are made void and of no effect. Whether the nomination in the present case is within this statute is the question, and the only question, to be determined. The words are, every Papist 'is hereby made incapable to present, collate, or nominate to any benefice, prebend, or ecclesiastical living, school, hospital, or donative,' &c. The case was admirably argued; but when both the general intent of the statute and the words of the particular enactment are adverse, argument is rather uphill work. The first contention of the promovent is that the words which I have quoted should be read reddendo singula singulis, so that the words 'present' or 'collate' are alone applicable to the word 'benefice,' the word 'nominate' applying only to school, hospital, &c. The objection to this contention is that it does violence to the grammatical construction of the sentence. To this it was replied that the previous statute had used very similar language and applied it in the manner suggested. But the language was not identical—it was changed, and the fair inference from the change made in it is that a different result was intended. It was next contended that, assuming incapacity to have been imposed upon 'nomination' as well as 'presentation' the 'nomination' intended was a different sort of nomination from that which has taken place in the present case. But why so? The word 'nominate' is general and subjected to no qualification in the statute. To restrict it by construction should only be done upon some very clear reasoning of the intent. The argument ran thus—that where the nomination is absolute it may be admitted that the statute applies. In that case the duty of presentation becomes merely ministerial, but where there is anything of discretion or judgment to be exercised by another the nomination is not absolute in the possessor of the right, and this, it is contended, takes it out of the statute. The Court was reminded that it was contrary to well-known principle to extend a penal enactment by inference or construction, but this statute requires no extending to make it applicable to the case in hand. Its plain words apply to the present case, they coincide with the general purpose of the Act, and the only question is one of restriction, and not extension. The suggested distinction, therefore, cannot be accepted by the Court. But if it could, I fail to see what there is in the present case to render this nomination anything short of absolute. True, it must be exercised within a prescribed area, but within that area it is absolute enough; and as to the word 'fit,' that is a condition which applies to all rights of presentation. The last argument, if I understood it rightly, was to this effect: That, assuming the nomination to be void, the presentation by the college which followed it might endure as a valid presentation made in their own right upon the lapse of Sir A. Dixie's right of nomination. I will only say of this that to so treat the presentation would do violence to the entire case of the promovent as made on the face of his libel; that it would do violence to the rights of the college, who never selected him as their nominee; and, lastly, that it would be absolutely inconsistent with the language of the presentation itself. The objection to the libel must prevail.—Mr. Dibdin: On the part of the bishop, I ask for costs.—The Dean of the Arches: Yes.—Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C., and Mr. A. B. Kempe were counsel for the promovent, Mr. Boyer; Mr. L. T. Dibdin appeared for the bishop.

COUNTY COURTS.

STAMP ACT, 1891, S. 12, SUBS. 5, AND S. 15, SUBS. 4.

On Tuesday, November 24, at the Croydon County Court, before his Honour Judge Lushington, the case of Bland v. Taylor & Co. was heard. This was an action to recover 11*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* arrears of rent under a written agreement for a yearly tenancy of 32*l.* 10*s.* per annum. On a previous occasion the plaintiff had been nonsuited in consequence of the agreement being unstamped, but he had now had it stamped with 6*d.*, and had paid a penalty of 10*s.*, and it bore two stamps, a sixpenny and a penalty.—Warde objected that the agreement was insufficiently stamped, as the rent being 32*l.* 10*s.*, the stamp ought to have been 5*s.*—His Honour said, as the agreement bore a penalty stamp, he must assume that it was properly stamped.—Warde submitted that, under the Act, denoting and penalty stamps were totally distinct, and that whilst a denoting stamp was conclusive evidence that the document was properly stamped, a penalty stamp was only evidence that a penalty had been paid without regard to the sufficiency of the stamp.—His Honour held that the penalty stamp was conclusive evidence of the proper duty having been paid, and that, in the present case, 6*d.* must be held to be the proper stamp on the agreement at a rental of 32*l.* 10*s.* per annum.—Bockett appeared for the plaintiff; Daniel Warde (counsel) for the defendants.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

At the Newcastle County Court, on December 1, his Honour Judge Jordan gave judgment in the case of Vernon v. Powell, which was tried at the Stone County Court The plaintiff sued the defendant for a quarter's rent in lieu of notice. The short facts were that the defendant took the house in April and agreed to pay a proportion of the quarter's rent up to June, and then go on as a tenant from year to year, subject to a quarter's notice. This the defendant did, but quitted possession on June 15 without giving notice. The agreement was not in writing, and the question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the quarter's notice or not. If he was, he was entitled to recover the quarter's rent (3*l.* 10*s.*). In the case of King v. Grafton, 21 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 278, there was a precisely similar agreement; and Lord Campbell held that the tenancy did not commence before June 24. So here the tenancy did not commence before June 24; and as the defendant had quitted possession on June 15 he was in the position of a person who had taken a house by verbal agreement for a period not exceeding three years without entry. And upon this state of facts the law was that no action would lie for rent or for damages for not occupying, as in the case of Edge v. Strafford.—His Honour said: If the agreement had been in writing, I need not say that the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover the 3*l.* 10*s.* as damages for its breach. For these reasons there must be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—EXECUTORY DEVISE.

On December 1 his Honour Judge Jordan gave judgment in the case of Palmer v. Yelland, at the Newcastle County Court. John Harry Palmer sued William Yelland to recover 18*l.* 11*s.*, under the following circumstances: In the year 1872 William Mason was the owner of one-half of three dwelling-houses in London Road, Newcastle, and his daughter, Ann Palmer, was the owner of the other moiety of the fee-simple of the said dwelling-houses. Her father died in 1872, and devised his moiety of the dwelling-houses to her for life, 'and after the decease of my said daughter to the child, if only one, or the children, if more than one, of my said daughter, who either before or after this limitation shall take effect in possession, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, as tenants in common.' Ann Palmer died in October, 1884, intestate, and left three sons who had attained the age of twenty-one years, and a daughter who at that time was an infant. The plaintiff was the eldest son and heir-at-law of his mother, and took her moiety. In 1885 the plaintiff and his two brothers sold their interest in the three houses to the defendant, and the defendant admitted that between the time of his purchase and the time when the daughter attained the age of twenty-one he had received 18*l.* 11*s.* as rent for the fourth share in the moiety, which fourth vested in the daughter when she attained her majority, and he was willing to pay that sum to the person or persons entitled to it.—His Honour stated that the case was argued before him at the last sitting of the Court, and he took time to consider his judgment. For the plaintiff, it was contended that he was entitled, as heir-at-law to Mason, to recover the 18*l.* 11*s.*, for that his sister's share had descended to him during the time of her minority, and only vested in her upon attaining her majority. He was of opinion that the devise of the moiety to the plaintiff, his brothers, and sister was an executory devise, which vested the whole of the moiety in the plaintiff and his two brothers, and opened to let in the sister when she arrived at twenty-one. This was so decided in Lechmere v. Lloyd, L. R. 18 Chanc. Div. 524, an authority which was recently followed in Dean v. Dean, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 553. And, further, he was of opinion, upon the authority of Furneau v. Rucker, reported in the Weekly Notes for 1879, that the income arising from the three houses vested absolutely during the minority of the sister, not in the plaintiff alone, as heir-at-law, but in him, and his two brothers, as devisees and tenants-in-common. The result was that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover 6*l.* 4*s.*, or one-third of the 18*l.* 11*s.*, which was paid into Court after a tender, and, therefore, a verdict must be for the defendant, with costs.—Mr. Watson appeared for the plaintiff in this case, and Mr. Sproston for the defendant.

LAND TAX—EXCESSIVE DISTRESS—JURISDICTION OF COMMISSIONERS—LIABILITY OF TAX COLLECTOR.

On Tuesday, October 20, at the Frome County Court, His Honour Judge Caillard gave judgment in the case of Padfield v. Smith. This case was heard at the August Court, when His Honour Judge Caillard took time to consider his judgment. His Honour said: This action is brought to recover 30*l.* damages from the defendant Samuel Smith, a collector of land tax, for trespass upon certain land belonging to the plaintiff, and for an illegal distress by seizing and selling a cow and calf also his, under a warrant from the Inland Revenue authority, to recover 30*s.* alleged to be due by the plaintiff for land tax. The defendant has paid 11*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* into Court in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, and has filed a notice to the effect that the amount so paid in is 'the overplus coming by the distress levied on the plaintiff's goods and chattels for land tax, after deducting the said land tax, and also the costs and charges of taking, keeping, and selling the said distress.' The 30*s.* claimed was for two years' land tax at 15*s.* for each year, the first 15*s.* being in respect of the assessment for 1888–89, and the second of the assessment for 1889–90. The defendant has admitted that the first 15*s.* was not due, and he has accordingly paid that into Court as part of the 11*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* He further admitted by his learned advocate, Mr. Ames, that the land tax upon the land in question had been redeemed. Even without this admission I should have found, without hesitation, upon the evidence adduced on the plaintiff's behalf, that the land tax was redeemed very many years ago in 1799, and has never since been paid, nor even (save for the two years above mentioned) been claimed in respect of that land. The defendant's contention, however, is that the plaintiff ought to have appealed to the land tax commissioners, who alone had jurisdiction in the matter, and that he having failed so to appeal, the assessment for 1889–90 held good, and the amount (15*s.*) was legally due and could be levied for, and it followed that this Court had no jurisdiction. This argument for the defendant is rested upon the statute 38 Geo. III. c. 5, and in particular upon sections 8, 9, 17, and 23 of that Act. By section 8 the commissioners are to appoint assessors, and a routine to be followed is prescribed, certain notices to be given, &c., and any person aggrieved by the assessment and intending to appeal to the commissioners may then give notice of the appeal to the assessor, and the appeal is to be heard by the commissioners, whose determination is to be final without any further appea upon any pretext whatever. Section 17 enacts that, if any person refuses or neglects to pay the amount he is assessed in upon demand by the collector, it shall be lawful for the collector to levy the sum assessed by distress, and sale of the goods of the persons so neglecting or refusing to pay, and that, if any question or difference shall happen upon taking such distress the same shall be determined and ended by the commissioners. Section 23 provides that all questions or differences which shall arise touching any of the rates or assessments or the collecting thereof shall be heard and finally determined by the commissioners in the manner by the Act directed, without further trouble or suit in law in the King's Bench or any other Court whatever. No witness was called on the part of the defendant, but it may be taken that, apart from the fact that the land tax had been redeemed, and supposing, therefore, that it had not, all formalities touching the assessment, the warrant, the distress, and the sale were complied with, the question of excessive distress only being raised by the plaintiff. He throughout, from the very first of there being any demand made upon him for the land tax, insisted upon the fact of its having been redeemed, and refused to appeal to the commissioners. For the defendant, the following authorities were cited: Patchett v. Bancroft, 7 Durn. & East; Term Rep. 367; Allen v. Sharpe, 17 Law J. Rep. Exch. 209; In re The Land Tax Assessment for the Holborn Division of the County of Middlesex, 5 Exch. Rep. 548; Regina on the Prosecution of Whittle and Robinson v. The Commissioners of Land Tax for the Tower Division of Middlesex, 2 E. & B. 694; same case, 22 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 386; and Simpkin v. Robinson, 45 L. T. Rep. (N.S.) 221. Mr. Metcalfe, the learned counsel for the plaintiff, cited and relied upon Charleton v. Alway, 9 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 237; 11 Ad. & E. 993, and also Hodgson v. Pearson, 31 L. T. Rep. (N.S.) 679. I am of opinion that the present case comes within the authority of Charleton v. Alway, and is governed by it, and, therefore, that the Commissioners of Land Tax have not, whilst this Court has, jurisdiction to deal with the matter, and the plaintiff must succeed. In Charleton v. Alway there had been an assessment to the land tax in a gross sum for vicarial and rectorial tithes. The tax had been redeemed on the latter, but not on the former tithes. The defendant, the collector, on the refusal of the plaintiff to pay in respect of the rectorial tithes (but who had paid the residue of the assessment), distrained on him under section 17 of 38 Geo. III. c. 5, for the amount withheld. On the trial before the Lord Chief Baron Abinger he was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, which was found accordingly; but he reserved leave, on a point not now material, to move for a nonsuit. There was a motion for a new trial on the ground that, the plaintiff not having appealed to the commissioners, the rate must be held good against him, and a rule was granted on this point. After argument on this rule nisi, the Court (consisting of Lord Denman, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Littledale, Mr. Justice Patterson, and Mr. Justice Williams) reserved judgment, which was delivered by the Lord Chief Justice. It is to be noticed that Patchett v. Bancroft was cited by the defendant's counsel. I quote briefly from his lordship's judgment only those passages which are most directly in point. 'The land tax on the rectorial tithes had in this case been redeemed, therefore neither the commissioners nor the assessors had any jurisdiction in respect of such land tax. It was, however, included in the assessment, but in one undivided sum with the land tax on the vicarial tithes, both being in the occupation of the plaintiff. This was incorrect at all events, even if the rectorial tithes had not been redeemed. . . . The plaintiff did, in fact, pay the land tax on the vicarial tithes, and the distress was really made for that on the rectorial tithes, 1*l.* 19*s.*, which was known to the collector to be disputed. The only question is, whether the plaintiff ought to have appealed to the commissioners? We think that he was not bound to do so. Being assessed in respect of that which was not subject to the land tax, he had as much right to treat the assessment as a nullity as if it had been in respect of property not in his occupation (see The Governors of Bristol Poor v. Wait, 3 Law J. Rep. M. C. 71; 1 Ad. & E. 264). The verdict therefore, is right. . . . The rule must be discharged.' I am not aware that this case has ever been in any way impeached; it certainly has not been by any of the cases cited for the present defendant. The very substantial difference between them and Charleton v. Alway is, without going further into details, that in every one of those there was an unredeemed and so existing land-tax or some other existing taxes or duties, and therefore the question whether the commissioners have or not exclusive or any jurisdiction when the land tax has been redeemed was not, and of course could not, be raised. In Simpkin v. Robinson, for instance, which was much relied upon for the present defendant, and in which the expressions of the Court as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the commissioners under 38 Geo. III. c. 5, are undoubtedly strong, the land-tax had not been redeemed, and the dispute was as to the manner of assessing and the amount of the rate made and not appealed against. Charleton v. Alway was not cited in that case, nor could it usefully have been for the very reason which I have pointed out as constituting the difference between it and the other cases—viz. the redemption on the one hand and the non-redemption on the other of the land-tax. The Court in Simpkin v. Robinson dealt only with what was before it, and not with the other and totally different state of circumstances which was before the Court in Charleton v. Alway. Hodgson v. Pearson is also in favour of the plaintiff in this way: The main point there was whether, where a manor has once been charged with land tax and the land tax once redeemed, any after inclosure of the waste lands will render the manor liable to re-assessment. The decision of the Court of Common Pleas was taken, it is true, upon a special case stated without pleadings, and was in the negative. Not a suggestion was made by the special case or otherwise on the part of the Land Tax Commissioners, who defended the action, or of the defendant, the collector, that the matter was one for the commissioners, and not for the Court. There had apparently not been any appeal to the commissioners, but proceedings had been taken against the collector for a distress which had been paid out, and in consequence of these proceedings the special case had been ordered to be stated. Hence it is to be inferred that the question of redemption or no redemption is not for the commissioners, but for the ordinary Courts, and this certainly upholds the opinion that, where the land tax has actually been redeemed, the commissioners have no jurisdiction. Before concluding, I must not omit to mention that sections 20, 118, and 121 of 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19 (the Taxes Management Act) were cited to me for the defendant. Section 20 provides that no evidence shall be given in the trial of an action against a commissioner, &c., or a collector, of any cause of action other than such as is contained in such notice. It was contended that the notice in the present case did not include 'excessive distress.' It does not do so nominatim, but the terms of the notice might perhaps include it. However, the opinion I entertain upon the effect of the land tax having been redeemed renders it unnecessary to decide this point. Sections 118 and 120 relate to powers conferred upon the commissioners over the collectors and to obligations imposed upon the collectors as between themselves and the commissioners, and consequent penalties, but cannot affect the rights of third persons, as against either commissioners or collectors, in such a case as the present. It follows from what I have said above that the defendant Samuel Smith was a trespasser and wrongdoer ab initio, and it remains for me to award the damages against him. The payment into Court is clearly insufficient. He had no right to make any deduction out of the proceeds of sale, since he had none to distrain or sell. The auction sale was peculiar, the plaintiff himself having purchased the cow and calf seized by the defendant. Upon the evidence I cannot find that the plaintiff suffered any loss by the mere sale, but he is entitled to be repaid the full proceeds of it, and, under the circumstances [there was trespass on plaintiff's premises as well as illegal seizure], to something more. He will have judgment for 15*l.*, including the money paid into Court. I am prepared to certify under section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The plaintiff will have costs on scale B, with all special allowances.—Metcalfe (barrister) appeared for the plaintiff, and Ames (solicitor, Frome) represented the defendant.

PALATINE COURT.

THE WHALLEY FRAUDS.

In the Lancashire Chancery Court, Liverpool, on November 30, before Vice-Chancellor Bristowe, the motion Whitworth v. Anderson, arising out of the Whalley frauds, came on for hearing.—Mr. Rotch (with whom was Mr. Lawrence) appeared for the plaintiff, Mrs. Elizabeth G. Whitworth, a widow, in the Isle of Man. He said that the case arose out of the gigantic frauds of the late Mr. Whalley, a well-known solicitor in Blackburn. The total defalcations amounted, he believed, to 100,000*l.*, and as a consequence there had been widespread misery and ruin, and many families had been reduced to absolute beggary. Whalley had carried out the frauds in a variety of ways. People who had confidence in him deposited deeds in his custody, and his method had been in some cases to suppress the original mortgage deeds, and to get new mortgages on the property in order to be enabled to carry on extensive speculations. In an action, Brewer v. Haydock, the Court had appointed a receiver to the estate. Mr. Mather, solicitor, of Liverpool, had been engaged in investigating the affairs of the late Mr. Whalley, but the difficulties in his way were enormous. There was a mass of mortgages, and the difficulty was to find out whether or not mortgages had been suppressed and reissued, and who were the legal holders. For more than a month a staff of clerks had been scheduling the deeds. Mrs. Whitworth had, through Mr. Whalley, advanced 450*l.* to Mr. J. W. Anderson, a Southport builder, on the security of some property at Birkdale. The deeds were left with Mr. Whalley, who duly paid Mrs. Whitworth the interest, and at Whalley's death she applied to the receiver, Mr. Waterworth, for the mortgage deed. He found the original mortgage from Mr. Anderson to Mrs. Whitworth in Whalley's safe, but the other title deeds had been removed, and there were some pencil marks on the mortgage deed which showed that it had been re-engrossed, and a new security prepared therefrom to Mr. Chievley for 550*l.* Further inquiry showed that Mr. Whalley had obtained this 550*l.* on the same property from Mr. Chievley, suppressing Mrs. Whitworth's mortgage. Mrs. Whitworth brought this action to have it declared that she was entitled to priority in respect of her mortgage, to have a receiver appointed until the trial of the action, and to have the deeds in Mr. Chievley's possession deposited in Court. Ultimately the Vice-Chancellor decided that upon receiving the affidavits of Mr. Mather and the cashier to the effect stated he would order that the receiver in Brewer v. Haydock be at liberty to hand over the deed to Mrs. Whitworth, or her nominee. He declined to make an order as to costs of the affidavits.

THE BARRISTERS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The general meeting of this association was held in the Middle Temple Hall on Thursday, November 26. Lord Justice Bowen presided, and was supported by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Herschell, Mr. Justice Smith, the Attorney-General, and Mr. Murphy, Q.C. There was a good attendance of the members of the bar.

The report of the committee, which was read by Mr. Edmund Macrory, the secretary, stated that 3,517*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* had been distributed during the past two years among 131 applicants. In all there had been 154 applications for assistance. Ninety-six new members joined the association in 1889, and only ten in 1890, and the association now consisted of 743 members, as against 817 in 1889 and 942 in 1886. The committee appealed to the members of the bar not only to maintain the association in its past usefulness, but also to add, by exertion and contributions, to its means of meeting the ever-increasing demands upon it.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, referred to the deaths of Mr. Justice Manisty, Mr. Baron Huddleston, and Mr. R. G. Arbuthnot, who were among the association's best and most constant friends. He was astonished to find that the number of annual subscribers had diminished so completely. The fault was certainly not due to any defect in the natural generosity of the great profession to which they belonged. He assured them that there was no waste in the administration of the funds entrusted to the committee, and that the whole of the money was well spent.

The Attorney-General, in seconding the motion, thought the society perhaps lost somewhat from the fact that its funds were administered with absolute privacy. That, however, was the only way in which the funds could be dispensed. He appealed for greater support from members of the bar. They had not been able in the past to relieve all the cases that had come under their notice; neither had they been able to give so much as they would have liked to those to whom assistance had been extended.

The report and statement of accounts were received and adopted.

On the motion of Mr. Justice A. L. Smith, seconded by Mr. Murphy, Q.C., the Lord Chancellor was appointed one of the trustees of the association, in place of the late Mr. Justice Manisty.

Lord Herschell moved, and Mr. Crump, Q.C., seconded, the appointment of the committee of management, which was agreed to.

Sir W. Phillimore, Q.C., moved, and Mr. Meadows-White, Q.C., seconded, a vote of thanks to his Honour Judge Eddis for auditing the accounts of the association.

The appointment of Mr. Henry Davidson as one of the auditors, in place of the late Mr. Arbuthnot, was unanimously agreed to.

How to Earn a Living at the Bar.—Mr. Henry St. John Raikes, of 6 Crown Office Row, Temple, writes to the Times as follows: 'I trust that, in the interests of the public, wealthy young barristers, and lastly, but by no means least, of one "X. Z. Y.," you will give your readers an opportunity of perusing the following advertisement, clipped from the pages of one of your contemporaries of yesterday's (26th) date. It runs: "Law.—To Barristers.—A gentleman recently called, with some capital, can be introduced to good practice by an established solicitor.—Address X. Z. Y., Horncastle's, 61 Cheapside, E.C." The fact that the advance of civilisation has placed it within the power of a barrister with some capital to obtain a practice in the manner indicated opens up a pleasing vista of possibilities.'

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, December 1; Mr. Douglas in the chair.—The subject for discussion—'That, in view of the depopulation of the agricultural districts, a change in our land laws is urgently needed'—was opened by Mr. Woodhouse.—Mr. Harry Watkins opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: In the affirmative, Messrs. Clarke, Stevens, Herbert Smith, Meadmore, Johnston, Goodheart, and Anderson. In the negative, Messrs. Watson, Arnold, Sinclair-Cox, and Pritchard.—Mr. Woodhouse replied.—On the motion being put to the meeting, it was carried by a majority of three. —The subject for discussion at the next meeting of the society, on Tuesday, December 8, is: 'That the case of Low v. Bouverie, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 594; L. R. (1891) 3 Chanc. Div. 82, was wrongly decided.

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of this association on Monday, November 30, Mr. F. Archer (president) in the chair, a joint debate was held on the following subject for discussion with the representatives from the Manchester Students' Society: 'Should the devolution of real estate upon the death of an intestate be assimilated to that of personalty?'—Mr. Dunderdale opened in the affirmative, which was also supported by Messrs. Hartt, Cobbett, Tumber, and Wragg, delegates from the Manchester Society.—Mr. Hood opened in the negative, which was also supported by Messrs. Stone and Martin, representatives of the Liverpool Association, and Mr. Style.—The question was decided in the affirmative by the unanimous judgment of the Court, consisting of Messrs. Archer, Warr, and Hawkins. — The delegates were afterwards entertained to a dinner and smoking concert, held in the Lancashire and Yorkshire Hotel, and a most enjoyable social evening was spent together.

OBITUARY.

IN the person of the late MR. JAMES S. FRASER-TYTLER, of Woodhouselee, Midlothian, who died at the close of last week in Melville Street, Edinburgh, at the age of seventy-one, Scottish law and the University of Edinburgh have lost a distinguished member. He was the second son of the late Mr. James Tytler, of Woodhouselee, and grandson of the celebrated Lord Woodhouselee, the Scottish Judge of Session; his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Maurice Carmichael, of East End. He was born in 1820, and was educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he took the usual degrees. He was admitted in early life a Writer to the Signet, and had held for some years the post of Professor of Conveyancing in Edinburgh University, of which he was also a D.C.L. Professor Fraser-Tytler married in 1850 Miss Mary Elizabeth Blair, only child of Mr. Alexander Blair, by whom he has left a family of four daughters and a son. Mr. Fraser-Tytler was also an active magistrate for the county of Midlothian. Sir Bernard Burke relates a romantic story about the origin of the name of Tytler being added to the original Fraser, and reminds his hearers that the house has been distinguished by its devotion to Scottish literature for no fewer than five generations.

THE CHRISTMAS VACATION JUDGES. — Mr. Justice Collins and Mr. Justice Jeune will be the Christmas Vacation judges. The former will sit during the first part, and the latter will take the second half of the Vacation.

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

MR. S. LUCAS HUNT, solicitor, of Great Yarmouth, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer Oaths. Mr. Hunt was admitted in November, 1878.

Mr. Herbert E. Bridger, of Hampstead, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Bridger was admitted in 1884.

Mr. John Montagu George Aine Luff, M.A. Cantab., Wimborne Minster, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Luff was admitted in 1887.

Mr. Martin Benson Lawford (of the firm of Longueville & Co.), Oswestry, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Lawford was admitted in 1878.

Mr. Oswald Henry Cochrane, M.A. Oxon (of the firm of Belk and Cochrane), Middlesbrough, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Cochrane was admitted in 1884.

Mr. Alexander Nathaniel Yalman Howell, Portsmouth and Southsea, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Howell was admitted in 1884.

Mr. Evan Coleman Davies (of the firm of Hobbs, Davies & Mawer), of Wells, Somerset, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Davies was admitted in 1885.

Mr. Henry Yates Barker (of the firm of Carrington & Barker), of Chester, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Barker was admitted in 1884.

Mr. John Edward Humphreys of Llanrwst, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Humphreys was admitted in 1883.

Mr. Thomas Leathes Johnston, of Walkden, near Manchester, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Johnston was admitted in 1878.

JUDGE BARBER.—We are sorry to learn that Judge Barber has resigned in consequence of ill health. His Honour was appointed County Court Judge in 1889, and is joint editor of 'Dart's Vendors and Purchasers.'

THE LAW AGAINST SPIES IN FRANCE.—The Commission of the French Army has arrived at an agreement with the Government with regard to the modification of the measure which has been introduced into the Chamber of Deputies for rendering the penalties against spies more severe, and these penalties are now to be graduated, from that of death to simple imprisonment, according to the gravity of the offence. The penalty of death is to be applied to any soldier, sailor, army or naval official, State official, or other person intrusted with secrets bearing upon the defence of the territory who is guilty of conspiring with one or more persons to give information for the purposes of espionage, and to any person who by means of a disguise, by making use of a false name or business or by concealing his profession and nationality, shall obtain admission to any fortified place or seaport, intrenched camp, defensive works, man-of-war, and military or maritime establishment, and, with the object of espionage, shall collect information relating to the defence of the territory or the external safety of the State. Penal servitude for life will be inflicted upon those who are detected in taking plans or in conducting topographical operations. Penal servitude for various periods will be inflicted upon those persons who are accomplices before the act of the above offences, while the divulgation of secrets relating to the defence of the territory through the Press will entail imprisonment from two to five years, and fines ranging from 120*l.* to 400*l.*

THE PROPOSED OPENING OF LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS.—In addition to the clauses which the London County Council have undertaken to insert in their General Powers Bill, to secure, if possible, the opening of Lincoln's Inn Fields for public use and recreation, notice has also been given of a privately promoted bill to deal exclusively with this question. Under this bill it is proposed either to purchase compulsorily the gardens for public recreation, or to transfer the rights of the existing trustees to the London County Council. These trustees were originally appointed in the reign of George II., when an Act was obtained to enclose these gardens, which comprise seven acres, and to vest them in twenty-one trustees, who were empowered to levy a rate for their maintenance upon the proprietors and inhabitants of the surrounding houses. The vacancies occurring in the board of trustees have been, and still are, filled from among those upon whom the rate is leviable.

THE ARREST OF ENGLISHMEN IN FRANCE.—An important meeting of the Coventry Technical Institute committee was held on November 30 to consider what steps should be taken with regard to the arrest of Mr. Walter Bednell at St. Etienne as a spy, Mr. Bednell having been sent out by the committee to learn French systems of weaving. A letter was read from Mr. Ottley, British Vice-Consul at Lyons, stating that he had again seen the judge before whom Mr. Bednell had been taken, but who still refused him permission to see the accused, believing the accused to be an accomplice of the other man Cooper, and responsible in a secondary degree. It was also stated that a summons had been issued against Mr. Bednell for neglecting to make the necessary report to the police as a foreigner domiciled in the country. The committee decided to ask Mr. Ottley to engage counsel for Mr. Bednell's defence, they as fellow-citizens agreeing to defray the expense. A letter from Mr. Ballantine was also read stating his willingness to proceed at once to St. Etienne if he could be of any service in the case

A HOUSEHOLDER'S LIABILITY.—An interesting point with respect to the liability of householders was decided on December 2 in the Marylebone County Court. An Italian costumier, Madame d'Alessandri, of Norfolk Terrace, Bayswater, sued her neighbour, a Mr. Marks, for damage caused in her fitting-room by a defect in the defendant's cistern. One day in October the complainant's fitting-room was suddenly flooded and considerable damage was caused. Amongst other things a pink dinner dress, which was part of a wedding trousseau, was ruined, and the fitting-room rendered so damp that Madame d'Alessandri was unable to receive her clients, and had to wait on them at their houses. On the part of the defendant it was contended that the landlord, and not the occupier, was liable for the damage, and it was stated that the defendant had made frequent complaints about the cistern, but they had not been attended to. Judge Stonor held that, apart from special agreement, either or both the landlord or the occupier was liable, and the question which bore the loss must be decided between them. The plaintiff had brought her action against the occupier and was entitled to judgment. Eventually judgment was given for the plaintiff for 21*l.* and costs.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT COMMISSION.—The commissioners appointed under the Local Government Act, 1888, met on December 2 at their offices, No. 21 Northumberland Avenue, the Earl of Derby presiding, to hear the adjourned case for an adjustment between the counties of Kent and London. Mr. Meadows White, Q.C., and Mr. English Harrison appeared for London, and Mr. J. S. Dugdale, Q.C., M.P., and Mr. Low for Kent. The commissioners, after hearing argument, determined that the property of the old county of Kent, valued at 450,000*l.*, should be apportioned between intra-metropolitan and extra-metropolitan Kent in the proportion of ratable values on April 1, 1889, and that the Kent County Council should retain the property and purchase London's share therein upon this basis.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.—The president (Mr. W. M. Walters), the vice-president (Mr. R. Pennington), and the council of the Incorporated Law Society entertained a large company at dinner at their hall on December 2. Among the guests were the following: Lord Hobhouse, Lord Shand, Mr. Justice Smith, Mr. Justice Romer, Admiral Sir A. Phillimore, Sir John Bridge, Mr. T. Bucknill, Q.C., Professor Holland, Mr. Woollcombe, Mr. Venning, Mr. Scrutton, Mr. Haselfoot, Mr. Finch, Mr. F. G. Davidson, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Blaxland, Mr. Whateley, Mr. Blake, Mr. Blyth, Mr. Knight Watson, Mr. Shearme, Mr. H. M. Cotton, Mr. Buckle, Mr. Wainwright, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Williamson, and Mr. Bucknill. The following members of the council were also present: Sir A. K. Rollit, Sir Thomas Paine, Mr. Keen, Mr. Cunliffe, Mr. Addison, Mr. Morrell, Mr. Roscoe, Mr. Margetts, Mr. Godden, Mr. L. W. Lewis, Mr. J. A. Hughes, Mr. Bremridge, Mr. Ellett, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Follett, and Sir Richard Nicholson.

'OBITER DICTA.'

IT is announced that final appeals from the Queen's Bench Division will be taken daily in Court of Appeal No. I. until the end of the sittings. This arrangement is, however, subject to the hearing of interlocutory and bankruptcy appeals. Out of a list of sixty-four final appeals only some twenty-five have as yet been disposed of, and, as the sittings end on the 21st inst., a large number must, as we recently ventured to predict, inevitably stand over until the Hilary Sittings.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW has put his foot down with regard to applications for postponement of cases in Mr. Justice Stirling's list of witness actions. In about ten days he has disposed of more than seventy cases out of a list of a little over ninety, and in a few more days he will probably finish the whole, unless any of the remaining cases should prove exceptionally heavy. The learned judge has certainly an expeditious method of getting through the work, and the secret of his success is, we take it, his determination to disregard everything that is irrelevant to the issue before him, a determination which he quickly imposes upon counsel. Upon the occasion of one of the frequent applications made to him for postponement, he humorously remarked that he felt judicially vexed at the number of these applications. There was an outcry that suitors were eager to have their cases tried, yet, no sooner did a judge appear, than everybody took to flight.

IT is said that the Lord Chancellor does not intend in future to appoint men over seventy years of age to the office of County Court judge. This is satisfactory as far as it goes, but we could wish that the limit had been fixed at sixty, as that appears to us to be quite a maximum age for a man to commence a judicial career. It is also stated that future County Court judges will be required to reside within their districts.

THE Court of Appeal has granted a new trial in Ferrand v. The Bingley Township District Local Board on the sole ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The action was for trespass by pulling down an obstruction erected by the plaintiff upon what the defendants alleged to be a public footway, and the jury had found for the defendants—that is, in favour of the right of way claimed. The judgments were unanimous, and the Court again enunciated, with full recognition, the rule that if the evidence was such that no reasonable men acting carefully could find for the party on whom the burden of proof rested a new trial would be refused, but pointed out that the Court had never said that it would not interfere in a case where the difficulties in the way of the victorious side were so great that the jury must have acted wrongly. The observations of the Master of the Rolls in connection with that part of the Judicature Act, 1890, which directs motions for new trials to be made to the Court of Appeal, instead of to the High Court, will be found in the LAW JOURNAL for 1890 at p. 637. Since those observations were made the number of applications for new trials has enormously decreased. Whether the result of Ferrand's Case will be to make them more frequent remains to be seen, but we cannot help thinking that it will.

A QUESTION of considerable importance to solicitors was decided by the Court of Appeal in the case of Stumore v. Campbell & Co. (noted last week). The plaintiff having recovered a judgment against a Colonel Betty, an arrangement was arrived at between the plaintiff's solicitors and the defendants, who were the solicitors for Colonel Betty, in pursuance of which Colonel Betty paid a sum of money to the defendants to be handed over to the plaintiff when the balance of the judgment debt had been provided for by bills of exchange. Colonel Betty died, however, before this could be carried out, and the plaintiff thereupon sought to attach the money in the defendants' hands under Order

XLV., rule 1, as being a debt 'owing' from them to Colonel Betty's estate. Mr. Justice Smith held that, although the money was paid to the defendants for a specific purpose, yet that they could, in an action by Colonel Betty's executors, have successfully counterclaimed for the amount due to them for costs, which was more than the sum they held. He was, therefore, of opinion that the money could not be attached. The Court of Appeal, however, adopted the contrary view, and held that, as the judgments on claim and counterclaim were quite independent, except for the purposes of execution, the executors could have obtained judgment for the amount, although the defendants might have obtained judgment for a larger amount upon their counterclaim, and that there was therefore a debt 'owing' from them to Colonel Betty's estate which might be attached to satisfy the plaintiff's judgment. The Court took occasion to point out, not for the first time, that the Judicature Acts, by introducing counterclaims, had not given rights which did not exist previously, but had merely altered the procedure so as to admit of two cross-claims being dealt with in one and the same action.

In the case of In re Keays the Court of Appeal had last week to consider the question of what amounts to 'rash and hazardous speculation' in a solicitor such as to justify the Court in suspending his order of discharge under section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The solicitor in question, who carried on a large practice in London, had engaged with another person in a scheme for developing certain land in Wales, which resulted in the loss of his entire fortune of 35,000*l.* and further liabilities to the extent of 17,000*l.* Beyond the payment from time to time of large sums of money, it appeared that the solicitor took no part in the management of the venture. The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that his conduct had been 'most rash and almost reckless,' and added that 'any solicitor in practice who undertakes another business which is speculative is almost sure, if he becomes bankrupt, to be found guilty of 'rash and hazardous speculation.' Lords Justices Lopes and Kay expressed themselves in similar terms, and the decision is therefore one which demands the careful attention of solicitors.

The Court of Appeal has reversed the judgment of the High Court in the Maybrick Insurance Case, but it has yet to be seen whether the House of Lords will not in its turn reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal. In commenting on the judgment of the High Court (see ante, p. 490) we expressed the opinion that it was substantially correct, but suggested that those entitled to a reversionary interest in the policy might claim the insurance money on the death of the convict. The Court of Appeal appears to have thought that the convict might be deemed to be dead already, and that the insurance money might be handed over at once to the executors of Mr. Maybrick for the benefit of his estate, the effect of which judgment we presume to be that the executors would hold the insurance money for the immediate benefit of those to whom the reversionary interest in it was bequeathed. And this appears to be just. For why should an insurance company be excused from paying insurance money, to secure which premiums have been paid to it, on the ground that one of two successive titles has turned out to be bad?

An authoritative decision on the following important point of trade-mark practice is still 'to seek' and is greatly to be desired. A firm is in possession of a trade-mark which they propose to register. One of the partners, with the knowledge and consent of the others and in perfect good faith, signs the application in his own name and is duly entered as 'proprietor' in the Register of Trade-marks. How is the mistake to be rectified? He cannot assign to the other partners and register the assignment, because according to his own showing he has never been proprietor at all and has therefore nothing to assign. Besides, in such a case the necessary condition as to the devolution of the goodwill could not be complied with. Of course he can apply to the Court to rectify the register. But what sort of rectification should be asked for? Will the Court substitute the name of the firm for that of the partner, or will it merely expunge the name of the latter and leave the former to apply for registration in the usual way? On this point the authorities are at present hopelessly divided. According to In re Rust & Co., 44 L. T. (N.S.) 98, substitution can, according to In re Riviere, 55 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 545, and Ex parte Kingsford, 6 P. O. R. 413, it cannot, be ordered. Surely some definite rule of practice might be arrived at. Meanwhile the only safe course is to draw the notice of motion in the alternative form given in Ex parte Lawrence, 44 L. T. (N.S.) 98.

The decision of North, J., in Morris Wilson & Co. v. The Coventry Machinists Company (1891), 8 P. O. R. 353, is of considerable practical importance. Both under the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852 (cf. The Edison Telephone Company v. The India Rubber Company, L. R. (1881) 17 Chanc. Div. 137), and under the Patents Act, 1883 (cf. Ehrlich v. Ihles (1887), 4 P. O. R. 115), it has been the almost invariable practice to put a defendant who, having delivered particulars of objections, wishes at some subsequent time to amend them by adding more, on the following terms: 'That the plaintiff may discontinue his action within a fixed time, and, if he does, the defendant must pay the plaintiff all the costs incurred by the plaintiff during the interval between the time at which the particulars he obtains leave to deliver ought to have been delivered and the time at which they are delivered under the order giving leave.' Mr. Justice North has now extended this rule to actions for the infringement of registered designs, although there is no provision in that part of the Patents Act which relates to designs for the delivery of particulars at all. This decision is eminently reasonable and convenient; and all that now remains to be desired is the statutory extension to registered designs—mutatis mutandis—of section 29 of the Patents Act of 1883.

In Hicks v. Ross, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 853, Mr. Justice Kekewich had to consider the principle on which the sum to be paid to a person entitled under a will to a perpetual annuity, who is desirous of receiving an immediate cash payment in lieu of the annuity, ought to be calculated. In the case of life annuities it was the former practice of the Court to direct investment in consols of such a sum as would produce the annuity, treating the investment as a permanent 3 per cent. security. 'Events,' as the learned judge remarks, 'have shown such provision to be imperfect, and I am afraid that some annuitants have suffered accordingly.' However, his lordship stated that he had adopted the same practice in providing for a life annuity out of new consols, treating the interest as 2½, to which it is reducible in 1903, instead of 2¾ per cent. In the case of an out-and-out payment of a sum in lieu of a perpetual annuity such a mode of ascertaining the amount would obviously give the annuitant too much, because it proceeds on the view that till 1903 the income will be in excess of the demands on it. In arriving at the proper solution Mr. Justice Kekewich was guided by the provisions of the National Debt Supplemental Act, 1888, under which, in granting Government annuities, the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt are bound to treat 2½ per cent. as the rate of interest governing their calculations, and held accordingly that the amount of cash to be paid to the redeemed annuitant is such a sum as, at the price of the day, will purchase 2½ per cent. stock sufficient to produce the annuity.

IN the case of In re Russell, Cordner & Co., 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 805, Mr. Justice North held that the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, has not altered the rule under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 145—viz. that to enable a creditor to obtain an order for the compulsory winding-up of a company when there is a voluntary winding-up, he must satisfy the Court that his rights 'will be prejudiced by a voluntary winding-up' (see per Lord Justice Cotton in In re The New York Exchange (Lim.), 58 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 111; L. R. 39 Chanc. Div. 422). In the case before Mr. Justice North the creditors were pretty evenly divided in their wishes for a supervision order on the one hand and a compulsory order on the other hand; but the large majority of shareholders preferred the supervision order. The old rule was not disputed, but it was contended that the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, had made a material difference in the rule, conferring as it does much larger powers of investigation in a compulsory winding-up than are given by the Act of 1862. In one sense there is much force in the argument—that is, if a creditor makes out a case for investigation, there is now stronger reason for making a compulsory order than before the Act of 1890. This was allowed by the learned judge, but, as he thought that the petitioner had not made out any such case, he dismissed the petition for a compulsory order and made a supervision order.

IN Russell v. Russell two persons not parties to the proceedings had imputations cast upon them in Court, one of them being mentioned by name and the other by an initial letter. The usual and commendable practice is for counsel to abstain from mentioning names of persons being neither parties nor witnesses in any unpleasant connection as far as is reasonably practicable, but it may be pointed out that the practice, so far from being recognised by the law, is rather discouraged by it. In Lound v. Grimwade, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 725, it was held by Mr. Justice Stirling that a bond founded upon a consideration including promises that criminal proceedings should be so conducted that the name of a certain person should not be mentioned, or should be mentioned in such a way as not to damage him, was founded on an illegal consideration, on the ground that any contract having a tendency, however slight, to affect the administration of justice is illegal and void. It is clear law, too, that no action lies against a witness for defamation by words spoken in the course of a legal proceeding (Seaman v. Netherclift, 46 Law J. Rep. C. P. 128), and it has even been held that no action will lie for words used in an affidavit in the course of a legal proceeding, though untrue to the deponent's knowledge, and false in fact (Revis v. Smith, 25 Law J. Rep. C. P. 195).

IN connection with the auspicious betrothal of the Duke of Clarence to Princess Victoria of Teck, with the approval of the Queen, it may be worth while to direct attention to the curious provisions of the Royal Marriage Act, 12 George III. c. 11. The preamble recites that His Majesty, from his paternal affection to his own family, and from his royal concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, was graciously pleased to recommend to Parliament to take into their serious consideration whether it might not be wise more effectually to guard members of the royal family from marrying without the consent of His Majesty, his heirs, or successors; that Parliament had taken this weighty matter into their serious consideration; that they were 'sensible that marriages in the royal family are of the highest importance to the State, and that therefore the kings of this realm have ever been entrusted with the care and approbation thereof;' and that they were thoroughly convinced of what His Majesty had thought fit to recommend upon this occasion. Then at last comes the enactment, 'That no descendant of the body of his late Majesty King George the Second, male or female (other than the issue of princesses who have married or may hereafter marry into foreign families) shall be capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of His Majesty, his heirs, or successors, and that every marriage or matrimonial contract of any such descendant without such consent first had and obtained shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatever'—which enactment is strictly construed, as appears from The Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & Fin. 85, where it was held to apply to marriages contracted outside the British dominions. It is provided, however, that if any of the royal personages subject to the Act, being above the age of twenty-five years, shall persist in contracting a marriage disapproved by the sovereign, such personage may give notice to the Privy Council, and at any time from the expiration of twelve months after such notice given, may contract the marriage disapproved of, 'unless both Houses of Parliament shall before the expiration of the said twelve months expressly declare their disapprobation of such intended marriage.'

THE Royal Marriage Act, it will be observed, extends to the descendants of King George the Second in perpetuity, with the exception only of the issue of princesses who marry into foreign families, and extends to contracts to marry as well as contracts of marriage. Sooner or later, perhaps, the time may come when some or one of the many and increasing royal personages who come within the Act will desire to be released from its obligations, but it is perfectly clear that such release will be obtainable by Act of Parliament alone, and that, if the conditions of the Act be not complied with, or some amending Act shall not have been passed, any promise of such personage to marry, if broken, could not be sued upon, while if the marriage should take place, the issue would be illegitimate.

It will not be necessary to apply to Parliament for any grant in connection with the marriage of the Duke of Clarence. The Prince of Wales's Children Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 35), after reciting the desire of Parliament 'to prevent the necessity for repeated applications to Parliament on behalf of Her Majesty's family, and to establish the principle that the provision for children should hereafter be made out of grants adequate for that purpose which have been assigned to their parents,' grants the annual sum of 36,000*l.* to certain official trustees of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. These trustees are directed to 'hold the annual sum granted to them under the Act, and any accumulations of that sum, whether arising by investment or otherwise, in trust for all or any one or more of the children of His Royal Highness Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, in such shares and at such times and in such manner, and subject to such conditions and powers of revocation (including, if it is thought fit, a condition against alienation) as His Royal Highness, with the sanction of Her Majesty the Queen may by order appoint.'

The Times has printed occasional letters from correspondents complaining of the proposed general abolition of second-class accommodation by the railway companies. We have already discussed the legal aspects of the question (see ante, p. 702); but what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and it is extremely doubtful whether any person or body of persons will be bold enough to dispute the right of the companies to act as they please. It may be observed, however, that either the Board of Trade or the town councils or the county councils would equally have power to call in the aid of the Railway and Canal Commission; and also that if the companies are legally wrong in the step which they propose to take, no lapse of time during which they may not have been proceeded against will be any defence in case of their being proceeded against in the distant future, unless, indeed, they should have procured the substitution of new enactments for those which at present regulate the imposition of passenger fares.

There is a considerable amount of danger in acting upon a suggestion from the owner of property to use it in a particular way before the negotiations in respect of it are complete. Witness the case of The London Printing and Publishing Alliance v. Cox, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 707. A., the owner of the copyright in a picture, sent a photograph of it to the defendant with a letter suggesting that the latter should publish it in a well-known paper of which he was proprietor. Before the publication in that paper the copyright in the picture was assigned to the plaintiff K., who duly registered his proprietorship at Stationers' Hall, and arranged to sell the copyright to the plaintiff company. The company did not register themselves as proprietors in the place of K. The defendant subsequently published his paper containing an engraving of A.'s picture, and thereupon the company and K. took these proceedings against him for having infringed the copyright. Mr. Justice Williams treated the letter from A. as a license, but held that it was not equivalent to a partial assignment, and did not affect the assignment to A. In Tuck v. Canton, 51 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 363, the owners of the copyright in a picture entered into an agreement with the plaintiff in the following terms: 'The sole right to reproduce these subjects in chromos or in any other form of colour printing to be vested in you for the term of two years from date of first delivery; while, in case of an order for reprinting 2,000 pairs at the price of 3*s.* per pair, this right to be vested in you absolutely.' Mr. Justice Mathew held that the plaintiff, having had a mere license given to him, was entitled to sue for violation of it without having registered it. In the second edition of Mr. T. E. Scrutton's 'Law of Copyright,' p. 170, the learned author comments unfavourably on that case, and says: 'Moreover, the decision seems open to this further objection; the registered proprietor of copyright may assign all his copyright in parts, or give licenses covering all methods of reproduction, so that no right remains in him; yet none of these will need to be registered, and so the purpose of the Act may be defeated.' Mr. Justice Williams's decision in the recent case would defeat not the purpose of the Act, but the granting of the license, as, according to his lordship, the plaintiff took his assignment unaffected by the previous license. On appeal, the Lords Justices held that A.'s letter was not a license, but a mere suggestion, but (Lord Justice Lindley dissenting) that on the true construction of the arrangement between K. and the plaintiff company the copyright had passed to the latter, who could not sue, as their title as owners had not been registered. The defendant thus escaped, and the action against him was dismissed. We understand, however, that there may be an appeal to the House of Lords.

The recent trial of the Salvation Army bandsmen was, in more senses than one, remarkable. Mr. Willis, Q.C., will, no doubt, state a case, and any comment on the verdict must of course be withheld until after the points of law have been disposed of by the Court above. It is, however, permitted to us to express a sincere hope that the plan of cross-examining a jury on the grounds or logic of their verdict will not become fashionable. An average juryman has a very fair idea of justice and usually finds a common sense verdict; but, if he is to be called upon to explain and defend it, especially to a keen-witted and judicial critic, it is more than probable that the result will be chaos.

The moral aspects of the recent cause célèbre in the Divorce Court do not come within our province, but all members of the profession are deeply interested in the question, which was brought prominently forward, of the limits imposed on counsel when cross-examining a witness. The mere suggestion of a certain class of offence is enough to wreck the happiness and shatter the nervous system of many men. It is, therefore, nothing less than wanton cruelty to put such a weapon in the hands of counsel unless something much stronger than bare suspicion justifies its use. If this can be said of the sterner sex, it is surely not too much to expect a more chivalrous sense of duty when a woman's chastity is in question. So long as the rules of cross-examining remain as at present, the public have a right to look to the leaders of the bar for protection against any abuse of so powerful a weapon for good or evil, and if at any time they look in vain, public opinion (which is very strong on this subject) will certainly make itself heard and felt in other quarters. Meantime the remarks of the president, in his summing up of the case referred to, contained a warning which solicitors engaged in preparing evidence cannot afford to neglect.

THE LESSEE'S CONTRACT NOT TO ALIENATE.

EVERY tenant for a time certain, however short, may assign or underlet to such extent as he pleases, except so far as he may be expressly restricted by his contract from doing so. Such is the effect of a dictum of Lord Eldon in Church v. Brown, 15 Ves. 258, and such is beyond doubt the law of England. It has become so common, however, for landlords expressly to provide against alienation, and it is so uncommon for alienation to take place against the will of the landlord where no such provision is made, that we doubt very much whether the tenant's common law right of alienation is generally known to laymen. Mr. Gladstone, for instance, in his speech on introducing the Irish Land Bill in 1881, in founding an argument on this general and ancient right, spoke of it as of a right but little known, and thought it prudent to refer to legal authorities for its existence. Be this as it may, however, it is upon the express restriction upon alienation that most legal controversies have arisen. Mr. Bolton and Mr. Warmington last session introduced a bill to put an end to these controversies and to mitigate certain alleged hardships upon lessees in connection with covenants against alienation, which passed the House of Commons and all but passed the House of Lords, when Lord Salisbury (see ante, p. 581) suddenly intervened and stopped all further progress. In view of the probable reintroduction of the measure next year, it is desirable to consider the whole subject with some care.

The contract against alienation is either absolute, to the simple effect that the tenant will not assign or underlet without the written consent of the landlord, or qualified, to the effect that while the tenant will not assign or underlet without such consent, the landlord, on his part, will not unreasonably or arbitrarily withhold it. In the absolute form, no doubt, this contract allows the landlord to require a pecuniary consideration for the license. Such requirement in the case of a long lease at a low rent may be reasonable enough, but in the ordinary case of, say, a twenty-one years' lease, it may be unreasonable and extortionate to a great degree, and we believe it would be generally considered sharp practice to require the pecuniary consideration in the case of a lease for not more than twenty-one years. In Mr. Bolton's bill it was rather roughly proposed that no pecuniary consideration should be required, and also that the landlord should be disentitled to arbitrary refusal of the license in every case. This was going too far. In the case of a short lease of a furnished house it would be unreasonable to require a landlord to accept any new tenant who might be proposed to him, while in the case of a long lease of an unfurnished house it might be unreasonable to exclude the pecuniary consideration for the license. Mr. Bolton's proposals, therefore, though good in principle, require some modification.

It is well known, or ought to be well known, that section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, which grants 'relief against forfeiture' for breaches of covenant generally, excludes from its operation the covenant not to alienate. Mr. Bolton would repeal the excluding provision, and let in the power to grant relief to cases of breach of covenant against alienation. Is his proposal right or wrong? On the whole, we think it is right. It is no doubt difficult, if not impossible, to get at the proper measure of damages for breach of covenant against alienation, so that forfeiture seems peculiarly applicable to it, and the argument that alienation must always be wilful, whereas other breaches may frequently be traceable to causes beyond the tenant's control, is a weighty one against alteration of the law. But cases may so frequently arise where the landlord's consent, from his absence beyond seas or other causes, may not be obtainable, and an underletting may be so frequently to the advantage of the landlord, as well as of the tenant, that we think that the arguments for alteration are the stronger. It must never be forgotten that neither by underletting nor assignment does the tenant rid himself of his original liability to the landlord, who in fact by this kind of alienation gets two strings to his bow; he may sue either the lessee or the assignee; he may either sue the lessee or distrain upon the sub-lessee. Above all, the landlord will still have the Court to protect him, as the power to grant 'relief against forfeiture' is, and no doubt will continue to be, an entirely discretionary power.

On the whole, we think that Mr. Bolton's proposal to repeal the provisions of the Conveyancing Act which exclude the covenant against alienation from the benefits of 'relief against forfeiture' is quite a reasonable one, which ought to find its way to the Statute-book during the course of next session. The other proposals of Mr. Bolton, to read into every lease the clause against refusal of license to assign or underlet, and to prohibit the taking of a premium for the license, are well worthy of consideration, but certainly ought not to be accepted in their entirety. Perhaps the best plan for the reformers to adopt would be to have their bill introduced in the House of Lords, where it could be more scientifically and carefully discussed than in the House of Commons.

A point well worth attention in connection with this subject is the power to alienate a tenancy from year to year. This power is undoubted (see Allcock v. Moorhouse, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 366), but is little exercised. The exercise of it, however, might in many cases be highly inconvenient to landlords, who in selecting tenants rely on their personal knowledge. It might also be considered whether assignment by operation of law, as from a deceased tenant to his personal representatives, has not at present a too extensive operation, both as it affects the landlord and as it affects the representatives of a tenant. If, for instance, an agricultural tenant should die on September 30, 1892, his personal representatives would be saddled with the farm, and the landlord would be saddled with them till September 29, 1894.

We now propose to consider the position of persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, under Order XI.

1. The first point of interest in connection with this subject was decided in Lenders v. Anderson, 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 104; L. R. (1883) 12 Q. B. Div. 50. In that case the plaintiff sued the defendant, a Scotchman domiciled in Scotland, for alleged breach within the jurisdiction of a contract, which by its terms was to be performed within the jurisdiction. Mr. Justice Field allowed service of the writ of summons out of the jurisdiction for the purpose of raising the question as to whether such service was valid. The defendant moved to set the service aside, and the plaintiff contended that rule 1 (e) and rule 2 of Order XI. must be read together, and that the fair construction of them when so read was that in cases coming within the last clause of rule 1 (e), ('unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland'), it was meant not to take away the discretion of the Court or judge to allow service out of the jurisdiction, but merely to render it subject to the considerations as to the balance of convenience, mentioned in rule 2. Baron Huddleston and Mr. Justice Grove, however, declined to take this view—which derived no support from the history of the exception—and held that where a defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland there is no power to allow service out of the jurisdiction in actions for breach of contract, under Order XI., rule 1 (e).

2. The next point deserving of notice is the question how far rule 1, clause (e) ('any relief is sought against any person domiciled or ordinarily resident within the jurisdiction') is applicable to Scotland or Ireland. In the case—put by Mr. Baron Huddleston in the course of the judgment in Lenders v. Anderson (ubi sup.)—of a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in England being temporarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, no difficulty could arise, and service out of the jurisdiction would be allowed if the judge in his discretion thought that the balance of convenience required it. The case of a company * having its registered head office in Scotland or Ireland, but having at the same time branches and one chief office within the jurisdiction, was one of very considerable difficulty. In Jones v. The Scottish Accident Insurance Company, 55 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 415; L. R. (1886) 17 Q. B. Div. 421, the facts were these: The plaintiff, as executrix of her husband, sued the defendants upon a policy of insurance against accidents effected with them by the deceased. The defendants' registered head office was in Edinburgh, but they had numerous branches and agencies throughout England, with a chief office for England in London. The insurance in question was effected by the plaintiff's husband with, and the premium was paid to, an agent of the defendants at Liverpool. It was held by Mr. Justice Day, and on appeal by Mr. Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Cave, that the defendants were not domiciled or ordinarily resident within the jurisdiction within the meaning of Order XI., rule 1 (e).

'A corporation,' said Mr. Baron Pollock, 'in effect resides in the place where it carries on its business, and carries on business in the place where its chief office is situate. If we hold that a company is domiciled where it has an agent for local business, we come to the absurd conclusion that it is domiciled in every town in England, Scotland, and Ireland, where it has an agency.' Mr. Justice Cave was 'of the same opinion,' but not altogether for the same reasons. 'It would be absurd,' said his lordship, 'to say that an individual was ordinarily resident in England because he had a branch establishment there; and why should we not deal in the same way with a company?' Again, the old Companies Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 135) provided that service should be effected at the principal office, or at one of the principal offices, if there be more than one, or personally upon the secretary. The principal office was, therefore, regarded as the place where the company carries on its business. It may, perhaps, be permissible to point out with regard to this decision (1) that, to have held the company to be domiciled at its chief office in England would not have logically involved the Court in 'the absurd conclusion' that it was also domiciled at each of its branch offices, and (2) that the very Act of Parliament on which Mr. Justice Cave relied evidently contemplated the possibility of a company having more than one principal office. But whatever one may think of the ratio decidendi in this case, the actual decision was clear enough. Only one loophole was left for English suitors who had dealt and had had the misfortune to quarrel with Scotch or Irish companies. In Jones v. The Scottish Accident Insurance Company (a) the policy had not been effected with the chief office in London, but with an agent at Liverpool, and (b) no attempt was made to serve a writ upon the chief office within the jurisdiction. It might have been argued that the decision in that case was limited by the special circumstances under which it was given, and would have been different if the points to which we have just alluded had not been present. But even this way of escape was closed. In Watkins v. The Scottish Imperial Insurance Company, 58 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 495; L. R. (1889) 23 Q. B. Div. 285, the circumstances were practically identical with those of Jones v. The Scottish Accident Insurance Company, except that here (a) the policy had been effected with the defendants' inspector of agency at the London office, and (b) it was on the London office that the writ had been served. Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Grantham held that the defendants were 'domiciled' only at their registered office in Scotland, that they were also 'ordinarily resident' in that country, and that service of the writ must be set aside. The law was, therefore, clearly settled that a company having its registered office in Scotland, but also carrying on business within the jurisdiction of the High Court, could not—in the absence, presumably, of its own consent (The Tharsis Sulphur, &c., Company v. La Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Métaux, 58 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 435)—be made amenable to the process of that Court by service either out of or within the jurisdiction. The decision in Harvey v. Dougherty (1887), 56 L. T. 322, that where an action is properly brought against one trustee within the jurisdiction service on other trustees out of the jurisdiction may be allowed under Order XI., rule 1 (g), could not be utilised for the purpose of weakening the effect of the decision under consideration, because, according to Watkins v. The Scottish Imperial Insurance Company, a company having its registered office in Scotland or Ireland could not be properly or duly served within the jurisdiction at all.

* Which is by Order LXXI., rule 1, included in the definition of 'person.'

A MANUAL OF BANKING LAW.

Banking and Negotiable Instruments. A Manual of Practical Law. By FRANK TILLYARD, B.A., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, late Vinerian Scholar, Oxford University. London: Adam and Charles Black. 1891.

THE object of the author of this little treatise, he tells us, is to deal concisely and simply with the practical legal questions which arise in the course of a banker's business. A considerable part of the book has accordingly been devoted to the consideration of the various kinds of securities which a customer when desirous to borrow might bring to his bankers. In Chapter XVII. the author has dealt with the difficult and important question of negotiability. Here he is on treacherous ground, and, to quote his own words, if he appears unduly dogmatic he must plead the view of the client who is said to have preferred a wrong opinion to no opinion at all. This is, we fear, a rather dangerous doctrine for a text-writer, and probably the client who is quoted had good reason to repent if he acted on the principle here enunciated. The book contains a good general view of the law, but it is not deep enough to be of much use to the lawyer. A couple of omissions may be worth pointing out. We observe in the case of The Governors and Company of the Bank of England v. Vagliano that the reference is only given to the Times Reports. The Factors Act, 1889, was in 1890 extended to Scotland.

SMITH ON BILLS, &c.

A Handy Book of the Law of Bills, Cheques, Notes, and I O U's. Entirely Rewritten. By JAMES WALTER SMITH, Esq., LL.D. (Lond.), B.A. Oxon, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Author of 'Handy Book of Joint-Stock Companies,' 'Partnership,' 'Banking,' 'Master and Servant,' 'Public Meetings,' 'Husband and Wife,' and 'Legal Forms for Common Use.' Fifty-sixth Thousand. London: Effingham Wilson & Co. 1891.

THE law as to negotiable instruments has been to a great extent codified by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, of which the author of the present little treatise pronounces an extremely favourable opinion. He speaks of it as 'a model of codification;' a masterly exposition at the hands of the Legislature. There can be no doubt that the Act is a long step in the right direction, but still it does not supersede the necessity of an explanatory treatise. The reader will here find the law compendiously treated in twenty-four short chapters. The work, however, seems scarcely brought to date on some points. Thus, we should certainly have expected some reference at least to the decision of the House of Lords in the great case of The Bank of England v. Vagliano.

CHAPMAN ON INCOME-TAX.

Income-tax: How to get it Refunded. Instructions for Assessment and Appeal, and for obtaining from the Inland Revenue Repayment of Income-tax deducted from Government Pay and Pension, Annuities, Coupons, Dividends, Rent, Interest, &c.; also Repayment of Income-tax on Over-assessed Commercial and Professional Incomes, on Premiums of Life Insurance Policies, and on Contracts for Deferred Annuities. By ALFRED CHAPMAN, Esq. Eighth Edition. London: Effingham Wilson & Co. 1891-92.

THE author of this little manual commences with a complaint with which a good many persons will heartily sympathise with regard to the severe pressure of the income-tax upon all classes, and particularly on those with small incomes. The natural desire, therefore, of the income-tax payer is how to escape over-assessment, how to appeal in proper cases, and how to get back income-tax which has been wrongfully charged or deducted. The work gives a very good résumé of the subject, and the author acknowledges the great assistance which he has derived from friendly notices and criticisms.

HISTORY OF THE LAW OF PRESCRIPTION.

The History of the Law of Prescription in England. Being the Yorke Prize Essay of the University of Cambridge for 1890. By THOMAS ARNOLD HERBERT, B.A., LL.B., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: C. J. Clay & Sons, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane. 1891.

THIS volume contains the successful essay for the Yorke Prize in the University of Cambridge for the year 1890. As the essay was originally sent in it comprised a history of limitation, but Mr. Herbert has come to the conclusion that that portion of his work is better omitted. This view has also been shared, he tells us, by the examiners of the work. The reason will be found on pages 4 and 5, where Mr. Herbert comes to the conclusion that prescription proper, as treated by Coke and Blackstone, is distinct from limitation, and does not apply to corporeal hereditaments. The term 'prescription' is, as most lawyers are aware, derived from the Roman law term præscriptio, but comparatively few, we believe, are aware of the fact that that term in turn was borrowed from the Greeks. The essay is pleasantly written, and contains a good deal of information. Its pages are occasionally enlivened by lighter matter. Thus, in Chapter IV., where the question what things may be prescripted for is discussed in some forty-eight pages, we have a pleasant little dissertation on the law relating to prescription for swans, which are of 'so superior and ethereal a nature as to have caused Lord Coke in the report of a case of Regina v. Lady Joan Young, 7 Rep. 156, to burst forth into an eulogium and to quote the Latin poet in praise. The substance of Lord Coke's eulogium is that the swan is so affectionate and true a husband that Nature has conferred on him a gift beyond all others, 'that he is to die so joyfully that he sings sweetly when he dies:

> '"Dulcia defectâ modulatur carmina linguâ > Cantator cygnus funeris ipse sui."'

We have observed a slight mistake in the table of cases, as the case of Davies v. Sear, which is referred to twice both under the plaintiff's and defendant's name, does not appear in the page mentioned. This is, however, a very trifling blemish, and we have not noticed any other mistake.

FLETCHER ON DILAPIDATIONS.

Dilapidations. A Text-book for Architects and Surveyors. In Tabulated Form. Fourth Edition. Corrected to the Present Time, with all the most Recent Legal Cases With the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, and the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act. By Bannister Fletcher. London: B. T. Batsford. 1891.

The author of this work commences his introductory observations by putting a question to his readers: 'When one considers,' he asks, 'the numerous arts and sciences that the professional man must have at least some acquaintance with, a list of which the reader will find given at some length by that grand old writer Vitruvius in the first chapter of his first book, is it to be wondered at that dilapidations are not more studied?' This he follows up shortly with another question. Assuming that the young architect and surveyor truly desires to be well grounded in the practice of dilapidations, from what books must he derive his knowledge? A formidable list of authorities is then given. Here, however, the cost of the books and the time necessary to wade through the ponderous volumes referred to, present matter for grave consideration. The author, therefore, proposes to put what is necessary in short and simple form. His plan is first to consider the rights and liabilities of the various parties—lessors, lessees, &c.; next the various covenants, with their meanings and value; 'then dilapidations and waste, going practically into what they are and how to ascertain them.' Next, Mr. Fletcher schedules dilapidations under the respective trades to which they belong. The duties of surveyors follow. Other subjects considered are, How to Prepare for Actions, and Who can Maintain them, and Against Whom they can be Brought. Lastly, the author undertakes to explain what amounts to a waiver, and when injunctions can be obtained. In the appendix are to be found answers to questions. The work will be found serviceable and readable, though here and there it would have been better if less technical language had been employed, and if references to more recent authorities in the nature of case law had been given.

ESSAYS IN JURISPRUDENCE AND LEGAL HISTORY.

Essays in Jurisprudence and Legal History. By John W. Salmond, M.A., LL.B. (Lond.), a Barrister of the Superior Court of New Zealand. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1891.

The author of this work in his preface, written in New Zealand, tells us that the essays have been written at the ends of the earth, and he accordingly trusts that their defects may be charitably attributed, so far as may be, to the obvious difficulties attending historical research in regions so remote. Portions of the book have already appeared in substance in the Law Quarterly Review, other parts are now published for the first time. Wherever written, however, Mr. Salmond's book contains a great deal of information which is given in a very readable form. Four main subjects are discussed—the history of the laws of evidence, the history of the law of prescription, the principles of civil liability, and the history of the law of contract. In the first, and so far as we have been able to judge, the best of the essays, that on the law of evidence, the history of the law of evidence is divided into three periods, the first of which deals with rules establishing conclusive proof, the second with those as to exclusion of witnesses; the third, the modern rules, consisting for the most part of the rules for the exclusion of evidence. The origin of the ordeal of fire and trial of battle are considered under the head of 'Medical Judgment.'

WARAKER ON NAVAL WARFARE.

Naval Warfare of the Future. A Consideration of the Declaration of Paris, 1856: its Obligation and its Operation upon Maritime Belligerents. By Thomas Waraker, LL.D., Barrister-at-Law. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1892.

In his preface Dr. Waraker tells us that his aim is to call attention to the existing state of affairs, to consider the advantages possessed by England and the dangers with which she is threatened, and to examine the policy and the legal aspects of changes in the conduct of warfare which it was assumed to make at the Congress of Paris, 1856. He is much impressed by the apathy of Englishmen with regard to all matters connected with the navy. The Naval Estimates, he tells us, are presented to almost empty benches. The debate is hardly a serious one. After some introductory observations on the position of England and the mistake which, in the author's opinion, was made at the Congress of Paris, Dr. Waraker's work is divided into three parts. In the first part he considers the nature of international law, concluding with an enunciation of certain general propositions which he desires should be kept in view in the following pages, where they are developed and applied. In the second part he considers the usages of war. The third part of his work is principally devoted to a statement of the supposed evil results to England of the terms established by the Declaration of Paris. The work is cleverly written, and the arguments are stated with considerable skill; but at the same time we think it may be considered very doubtful whether Dr. Waraker has at all established his case.

Unreported Cases.

ACTION AGAINST THE POLICE COMMISSIONER.

In the Westminster County Court, on December 2, an action came before his Honour Deputy-Judge Scott. The plaintiff, August Tessier, a French cook, sued Sir Edward Bradford, the Commissioner of Police, for the return of 30*l.* 10*s.*, money belonging to the plaintiff, and 10*l.* as damages for the detention of the money.—Mr. Hall, in opening the case, said that on October 1 last Mrs. Tessier and a female lodger were arrested by the police and charged with taking money from the pockets of a Mr. Seaton. The police searched the plaintiff's house, and in a room not used by the lodger found 30*l.* 10*s.* in gold, which they took possession of and had still got. When the women were brought up there was no prosecutor and they were discharged. In consequence of the detention of this money plaintiff had had to leave his house, as he could not pay his rent. Whatever Mrs. Tessier might have done, there could be no ground for saying that her husband, the plaintiff, should have his money taken. There had been an offer by Messrs. Wontner to pay over 23*l.* 10*s.* if the action was withdrawn and no costs asked for. The Act, he found, provided that all moneys coming into the hands of the police in this way, and not being refunded, went to the Police Superannuation Fund, and that, no doubt, made the police so anxious to retain the money. (Laughter.)—Evidence in support of this statement was given, and Mr. Danckwerts, in cross-examination, showed that, although the charge was dismissed, the magistrate ordered the case to be brought under the notice of the Public Prosecutor. Mr. Danckwerts submitted that there was no case for him to answer. Plaintiff had not proved that the money ever came to the hands of Sir Edward Bradford. It had not got beyond Mr. Anderson, one of the assistant-commissioners, whose duty it was to see to these things. Further, there had not been a month's notice given of the intention to bring this action.—His Honour held that, as no notice had been given and entered, there must be a nonsuit upon that ground only. He refused to give the defendant costs. He said that the plaintiff could, of course, bring another action.—Mr. Marshall Hall and Mr. Probyn were counsel for the plaintiff, and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the defendant.

VESTRIES AND HIGHWAYS.

An interesting case, in regard to actions against vestries for accidents caused by alleged defects in the highways under their control, was tried at the Brompton County Court on Tuesday, December 8, before his Honour Judge Stonor. The plaintiff, Mr. Madder, claimed 50*l.* damages from the vestry of Kensington for serious injuries caused by his being thrown out of a cart in the Uxbridge High Road, at Notting Hill, in consequence of the pony which was drawing it tripping and falling over a grid or grating belonging to a sewer, which rose an inch to an inch and a half above the level of the roadway. The plaintiff's arm was broken in two places, and he was incapacitated from work for twelve weeks, and still suffered from the effects of the accident. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, an objection was taken on the part of the defendants that the notice of action required by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 106, in the case of public authorities, was insufficient, as it stated that the accident occurred in Silver Street (a street adjoining the high road) and not in the high road. On the authority of several cases cited by counsel, his Honour held that the notice was insufficient, and that under the Act he was bound to enter a verdict for the defendants. He suggested that, in case of an appeal, the parties should agree on the damages at 40*l.*, or some other sum, or leave them to be assessed by the jury. But the counsel for the defendants was not authorised to consent to this course, and eventually his Honour entered judgment for the defendants, without costs.

IMITATING COUNTY COURT PAPERS.

At the Huddersfield County Court, on Thursday, November 26, before his Honour Judge Heaton Cadman, J. W. Piercy said he was instructed by the Huddersfield Law Society to bring before his notice the conduct of Donald Noble, of Bradford, in connection with actions in this Court. The president of the Society (Mr. R. P. Berry) would have been present, but he was out of town, and the duty devolved upon him (Mr. Piercy) as secretary. Mr. Noble was a draper, of Lumb Lane, Bradford, and frequently had occasion to sue people in this Court. It appeared he was in the habit of issuing notices which, in the opinion of the Law Society, were calculated to mislead people into thinking that they were notices from the County Court. The notices were partly written and partly printed, and closely resembled in the heading those of the Court. They were signed by Alexander Cooke, who was cashier, he believed, of Noble, and it seemed to him it was intended to suggest that the registrar or some officer of the Court had signed them. Mr. Berry wrote to Noble, saying that two printed forms of application for money in respect of County Court actions, where orders had been made against parties which appeared to be in close imitation of the authorised forms of the Court, had been brought before the attention of the Law Society. He was desired to bring the matter before the attention of the Court, and ask his Honour's directions at the next Court day. A reply was received from Mr. J. H. Richardson, solicitor, of Bradford, explaining that Noble had no intention of making defendants believe that the notice emanated from the County Court. Although he (Mr. Richardson) did not approve of it, he did not see that any exception could be taken to it. It was a notice in the proceedings, and as such was properly headed with the title of the action. Anyone receiving it could not be misled. He (Piercy) knew that the notice had misled many people, and that people had come to the Court thinking they had been issued from there.—His Honour said he agreed that to a person who was not an expert in County Court practice the notice would convey the idea that it was a County Court notice, and not from the plaintiff. It spoke as if proceedings were only being withheld during such time as instalments were paid. He thought it was a highly improper document, and whether Mr. Noble or his solicitor approved of it, he did not. He was not sure it was not almost contempt of Court. He hoped after this that Noble and Cooke would discontinue the practice, at any rate in the district over which he had control, because if in the future it came before him he should take some further steps. He hoped they would acquaint him (Noble) with his views, and tell him that if he had come to the Court he would have had the pleasure of hearing that he (his Honour) considered it a most disgraceful abuse of the liberty of the subject.—Mr. Piercy said he would acquaint the defendant with his Honour's view.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT ACT, 1887.

At the Liverpool County Court, on December 2, his Honour Judge Collier delivered judgment in the case of A. Lyons & Co. v. Nelson as follows: The plaintiffs in this action sued the defendant for 46*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* upon a guarantee of which the following is a copy:—

'Liverpool: Nov. 14, 1889.

'To Messrs. A. Lyons & Co.

'In consideration of your supplying goods to Mr. William Lewis, clothier and outfitter, of No. 5 Cayneau Street, Liverpool, I hereby guarantee payment for such goods to the amount of 50*l.*, and I agree that, in case the said William Lewis fails, neglects, or refuses to pay for any goods you may have supplied him with from time to time by reason of my having given you this guarantee, I will be responsible for and pay to you for such goods to the amount of 50*l.* as aforesaid. And I agree and covenant that the guaranty shall remain and be in force against me as long as the said William Lewis shall be indebted to you for goods supplied.

'WILLIAM NELSON.'

The question for me to decide is whether the defendant has been discharged from his suretyship by acceptance by the plaintiffs from the principal debtor of a sum of money in discharge of the debt. The guarantee was dated November 14, 1889. On June 10, 1890, Messrs. T. Theodore Rogers & Co., accountants, wrote the following letter to the plaintiffs:—

'30 North John Street, Liverpool:
'Messrs. Lyons & Co. 'June 10, 1890.
'Re William R. Lewis.

'Dear Sirs,—Acting on the instructions of the Manchester creditors we attended the meeting of creditors called by Mr. W. Rudd, solicitor, of this city for yesterday, and although the debtor was not in attendance at the hour fixed for the meeting, he subsequently attended and submitted a statement of his affairs prepared by himself as per copy on fly. He also presented his cash-book and ledger for examination, which, on the face of them, appear to have been fairly well kept. He commenced business in November, 1889, with a borrowed capital of 10*l.*, and obtained the opening parcel from a local firm under the guarantee of a friend. The deficiency, as shown, he accounts for by losses on soiled goods sold by auction and by excess of expenses over profits. He had no offer to make, but was willing to leave himself entirely in the creditors' hands. Some of the creditors present at the meeting expressed an opinion that the stock was very much less in value than shown by the debtor in his statement, but, be this as it may, it is evident that to take any proceedings either in bankruptcy or by means of a deed of assignment would swallow up the greater portion of the estate in costs, and it is, therefore, with the approval of the Manchester creditors, proposed that he should hand over the whole of his assets to us for realisation, and that we should, after deducting costs and charges in connection with the matter, distribute the balance of the proceeds pro ratâ amongst the creditors, each creditor receiving his share in settlement of his claim.

'This is undoubtedly the most economical manner of handling what must be at best a very bad case, and we trust that the course taken will meet with your approval.

'Please be good enough to sign the enclosed form of assent, and return to us together with a statement of your claim. 'Yours faithfully,

'T. Theodore Rogers & Co.'

[Here follows statement of claim.]

. . . . . .

The plaintiffs signed and returned the form of assent, which was in these words:—

'To Messrs. T. Theodore Rogers & Co. , 1890.
'Re Wm. R. Lewis.
'Scotland Road and Handfield Place,
'Liverpool.

'We hereby agree to the arrangement proposed in your circular letter of June 10, 1890, and agree to accept your cheque for our pro ratâ share of the net proceeds of the assets in connection with the above matter in settlement of our claim against the debtor.

'Signature.
'Address.'

Sometime afterwards (I have not the date) they gave Messrs. Rogers & Co. this receipt:—

'No.
'Re W. R. Lewis.
, 1890.

'Received T. Theodore, Rogers & Co.'s cheque for the sum of pounds shillings and pence, being a dividend of 1*s.* 1½*d.* in the pound on £ , which we accept in full discharge of our claim against W. R. Lewis.

'£ . [Signature of creditor].'

It was contended that the letter of June 10 and the reply thereto together formed a deed of arrangement within the meaning of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), and that as it had not been registered it was void under section 5 of that Act. It was not contested on behalf of the defendant that the document came within the meaning of the interpretation given to the words 'deed of arrangement' in the Act referred to. I consider the point a doubtful one; but I have come to the conclusion that they do come within the interpretation, and that not having been registered they are as a deed of arrangement void. This being so, it follows that the receipt is the only document upon which the defendant can rely for his defence. It will be observed that the receipt is a receipt for a cheque. In the case of Goddard v. O'Brien, reported in L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 37, it was held, notwithstanding the well-known doctrine laid down in the case of Comber v. Wane, Stra. 426—viz. that payment of a smaller sum than the debt is not satisfaction of the debt—that the payment by negotiable instruments (in that case a cheque also) of a less sum than the debt was a satisfaction of the debt. I think the decision in that case is applicable to the present one. On its authority I hold that the receipt of the cheque was a good satisfaction for the principal debt, and, therefore, that the surety is discharged. My judgment is therefore for the defendant.—On the application of the plaintiffs, a stay of execution was granted for fourteen days to give the plaintiffs an opportunity of appealing, if they felt disposed to do so.—Mr. W. F. Taylor (instructed by Mr. Herbert J. Davis, of Liverpool) for plaintiffs; Dr. Commins (instructed by Mr. F. Murphy) for defendant.

THE PENAL SERVITUDE ACT.

Home Office, Whitehall:
November 30, 1891.

Sir,—Your attention has no doubt been already called to the Penal Servitude Act of last session, which came into force immediately on its passing on August 5 last. Its more important provisions are those contained in section 1, which reduces the minimum sentence of penal servitude from five to three years, and which abolishes altogether the minimum punishment for unnatural offences.

On the passing of this Act it became necessary to decide how the system of remission of sentences of penal servitude by the grant of licenses, which was settled after the passing of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, should be applied to the sentences of three and four years which the new Act authorises, and how it should be modified to meet some of the other provisions of the Act, particularly those of section 3. After consulting the directors of convict prisons and the prison boards for Scotland and Ireland, I have come to the conclusion that sentences of three or four years penal servitude should be subject to the same rules as sentences of five years and upwards, but that some general modifications in the rules as to the grant of licenses are now desirable.

Of these modifications the chief are (1) that in future male convicts should be allowed to earn marks during the nine months of separate confinement with which each sentence commences, in the same way as during the remainder of their sentence, so that the maximum remission which they can earn will be increased in each case by two months, and will in future be exactly one-fourth part of the whole sentence; (2) that convicts serving remanets of former sentences, in consequence of the revocation or forfeiture of their licenses, should be allowed to earn marks under the remanets in the same manner as convicts under original sentences. (This is provided for in section 3 of the Act of last session.)

The adoption of these modifications much simplifies the rules with regard to the grant of licenses, and it will be well, therefore, that I should briefly summarise them, so that reference to previous circulars on the subject may not be necessary:—

1. Remission of sentence by grant of license is earned by industry, accompanied by good conduct. Only a convict who gains by steady industry the maximum number of marks during each day of his sentence, and who incurs no deduction of marks by misconduct, will obtain the maximum remission.

2. The maximum remission obtainable will be, for male convicts, one-fourth of the sentence; for female convicts, one-third of the sentence.

The following tables show the minimum period that must be served, and the maximum remission that can be granted, under each of the ordinary terms of penal servitude:—

Scale of Remission for Male Convicts.

20 „	13	4	6	8

3. The earning of marks and grant of remission will extend to reconvicted license-holders serving the remanets of former sentences.

In a previous circular letter I requested special attention to the fact that, if a convict after his release on license, and whilst his license is still in force, commits a fresh offence and is convicted of it on indictment, such a conviction entails the forfeiture of the convict's license (Penal Servitude Act, 1864, s. 9), and the effect of forfeiture is that, in addition to the sentence which may be pronounced by the judge for the fresh crime, whether it be one of imprisonment or of penal servitude, the convict must serve a term of penal servitude equal to that portion of his previous sentence of penal servitude which remained unexpired when his license was granted.

Thus, if a male convict who is released one year before the expiration of his sentence of penal servitude, and who therefore holds a license for one year, is convicted on indictment during that year and is sentenced to a term of imprisonment, he is liable, after the expiration of the imprisonment, to undergo one year of penal servitude; and of this under the rule now adopted he will be able to earn three months' remission.

Again, if in the same case the convict is sentenced to a term of five years' penal servitude, he will be liable to serve, in addition to the five years, his remanet of one year—i.e. six years' penal servitude in all (Penal Servitude Act, 1891, s. 3 (2); and, under the rule now adopted, he will be able by industry and good conduct to obtain the remission of one-fourth of the six years—i.e. eighteen months.

The same remarks apply to the case of female license-holders, except that the maximum remission obtainable is one-third instead of one-fourth.

I ask for special attention to this point, because it is evidently important to judges and chairmen of quarter sessions that before passing sentence on reconvicted license-holders they should know the exact effect of the forfeiture of license involved in the conviction. At the same time it is to be borne in mind that the forfeiture cannot be regarded merely as part of the punishment of the new offence; it is, properly speaking, a part of the punishment of the original offence revived in consequence of the violation of those express conditions on which alone the convict obtained his release.

4. In consequence of the larger remission which women convicts earn, the remanets which they have to serve when they incur forfeiture of license are generally much longer than those of male convicts, and directions have been given that all such cases shall be brought under the consideration of the Secretary of State (but not necessarily for release) when the convicts have served one year of their remanets.

5. Female convicts under sentences of five years and upwards, whose industry and conduct in prison are good, are in certain cases released to refuges nine months before the ordinary time for release on license. The release in this case is under a license containing special conditions as to their residence in the refuge, and, in case of misconduct or attempt to escape, they are brought back to the prison and required to serve the usual time for remission.

With regard to life sentences, to which the ordinary rules as to remission are necessarily inapplicable, the rule now is that each case is specially submitted to the Secretary of State after twenty years, and considered on its merits, but no promise is given to the convict of release at that period, and in certain cases, where a death sentence has been commuted to penal servitude for life, the license has not been granted after twenty years.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
HENRY MATTHEWS.

By T. F. UTTLEY, Solicitor, Manchester, Author of 'Hints on Stephen's Commentaries,' 'Hints on Criminal Law,' &c.

A JUDICIAL DEFINITION OF SLANDER.

THAT is the title given by the daily papers to an obiter dictum of Mr. Justice Lawrence at the Manchester Assizes, where an auctioneer and valuer sued a quarry master for having slandered him by saying he was 'Nowt but a —— highway thief and robber and a —— scamp,' and that he had lost him a job through not getting an agreement stamped. The judge pointed out that when one calls a man a d——d thief one does not say that he has stolen anything; that is abuse merely; but if one calls a man a thief, that is slander. The incidents of this case point to the evil effects of the practice of husbands assigning all their property in order to avoid executions. It is high time measures were taken to make such assignments absolutely void, for, as it is, creditors are everywhere shamefully defrauded by such practices. With reference to the stamping of an agreement, counsel contended that it was no part of an auctioneer's duty to do such business. The jury, however, in this case found for the plaintiff. Is it generally known that, in future, in order to enter the auctioneering business, an examination has to be passed in various elementary subjects?

A PRIVILEGED OCCASION.

Such was stated to exist in a case at these assizes where a plaintiff, a workman formerly in the employ of the firm defending, sought to recover an amount for work done and for slander. In the course of the arguments, the defendants' counsel submitted that the occasion was privileged. The plaintiff asserted that if a manager, and afterwards an employer, gave a man his reasons for dispensing with his services, it must be held to be slander. It was not slander if a man gave the reason which was in his mind. It need not even be a reasonable reason. The judge, in his address to the jury, pertinently pointed out that there was no doubt a privileged occasion must be reasonably used. The question of privilege was one entirely for him, the point for the jury being whether the language used was such as amounted to malice. If a manager believed goods were being wasted, and stated that as the reason for dismissal of a workman, the occasion would be privileged, even though it were stated in the presence of fellow-workmen. If, however, the manager had gone into the street and brought in outsiders to hear the statement made, then it would be different. The jury returned a verdict for the defendants. Subsequently the defendants' counsel asked for costs and for a certificate for a special jury, but plaintiff's counsel contended his client should not be saddled with the cost of a special jury, which was a luxury. The judge, however, thought it was a kind of luxury everyone was almost entitled to ask for, and this was a proper case for such a jury.

THE CONTRACTS OF RAILWAY PASSENGERS. CURIOUS POINT.

A remarkable point was argued at the assizes in Case v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, where the plaintiff sought to recover damages for injuries sustained in a collision. It appeared that the plaintiff and some other young men arranged to go to Bolton as excursionists at a cheap rate to play a billiard match, but plaintiff being late no ticket was obtained for him, and he had to pay single fare to Bolton. When returning, he forgot he had no ticket, and got into the train notwithstanding. Almost immediately afterwards the plaintiff was injured by a Midland train running into the one wherein he was seated. His counsel argued that the real question at issue was whether the plaintiff was a passenger in the technical sense. In order to justify the contention that he was not a passenger, it must be alleged that the reason why he did not book was that he intended to defraud the company by travelling without paying his fare, whereas if the accident had not happened it would have been paid in the ordinary way when tickets were collected. Defendant's counsel submitted that the railway company had made no contract to carry the plaintiff, and, in the absence of a contract, the plaintiff, who was not there with their permission or invitation, must be regarded as a mere trespasser, to whom they did not owe any duty. Counsel referred to a case in the Exchequer Chamber in Ireland of M'Carthy v. The Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company. Mr. Justice Lawrance said that as far as he knew the point had never been decided. He founded his decision upon the dicta of the several judges in the case Foulkes v. The Metropolitan District Railway, one of the cases quoted, and it also came under the principle laid down by Lord Justice Blackburn in the case of Marshall v. The York and Newcastle Railway Company. The right of a passenger was to be carried safely, and it did not depend upon his contract with the company. This was not a question whether the plaintiff was travelling fraudulently or not. The company accepted him as a passenger, and he would have paid his fare or had a ticket given him when at the other end. His judgment must be for the plaintiff, on the ground that he was received as a passenger, and the railway company therefore had a duty cast upon them to carry him safely, independent of whether he made a contract with them for a ticket or not.

THREE REMEDIES FOR SEDUCTION.

Two cases for damages for seduction possess some features of interest from a legal point of view. In one instance it appeared that the girl, before her father brought his action for the seduction, had already been successful in an action for breach of promise of marriage, and she had also obtained an affiliation order for payment of so much a week for the support of a child, the result of the intimacy. Mr. Justice Collins pointed out that in estimating any damages which were due to a father in such a case as this the jury were not bound to confine themselves to pecuniary loss alone. Other considerations, such as that of insult and the injury to the natural feelings of a father, were permissible. Although the daughter's damages for breach of promise were in one sense altogether distinct from any compensation which was due to the father, yet in another sense they were not so. The father had, through these damages, less cause to be dissatisfied with the matter, and so, too, in the case of the affiliation order. The jury accordingly gave but moderate damages. In the other action, tried before an assessor, he pointed out that under the law of this country a man could not recover damages for the seduction of his daughter unless he could prove that she had rendered him personal service, but, that once proved, then the father was entitled to damages, not only for those services, but also for the distress of mind and the dishonour to the family. The jury gave exemplary damages.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM AND LIBELLOUS MATTER.

An action for libel against the proprietor of a newspaper for statements in connection with a club, the defendant pleading that the offending letter was a fair comment on the proceedings of the club, is notable for Mr. Justice Lawrance's plain remarks to newspaper editors. An editor might not set up in his paper a statement reflecting on another man and call it comment. If a prisoner were convicted of murder, the newspaper was at liberty to discuss the conduct of the judge and jury in the case with great latitude; but, if the prisoner were acquitted, the newspaper could not even attack his character by saying he ought to have been convicted. Editors often made a mistake by putting a statement in a paper and calling it comment. It was not comment. The newspaper editor, too, thought that he was justified in printing a statement and calling upon those upon whom it reflected to defend themselves. But no man was obliged to defend himself in the columns of a newspaper, and a newspaper had no more right than an individual to criticise anybody unfairly. Merely nominal damages were given by the jury.

THE RIGHT TO REFER A CASE.

The Salford Corporation had occasion to sue for damages for injury alleged to have been inflicted by the defendants (Messrs. Andrew Knowles & Sons, (Lim.)) on one of their roads by digging and removing the soil and minerals from underneath. After some argument and discussion it was suggested that the case should be referred to an independent counsel with a mining assessor, and this was agreed to. The Manchester Guardian of the 3rd inst., however, does not approve of this course, as the following leaderette shows: 'A not unusual incident took place at the Assize Courts yesterday when the case The Corporation of Salford v. Andrew Knowles (Lim.) and others was referred by consent of the counsel. No doubt counsel were serving their clients in referring the case; but one of the main reasons for referring it was that only one judge was sitting at Manchester, that he had several cases to try, and had to get to Liverpool to open commission to-day. If this particular case had been tried, no doubt smaller and less important cases would have had to go over to next assizes, and the public have a right to complain and to know why, when two judges are sent down to try Manchester cases, one of them runs away four days before the close of the assize. Mr. Justice Collins sat on Saturday here, and on Tuesday and Wednesday in London. To-day, if he carries out arrangements, he will travel down in order to sit at Liverpool to-morrow. That is to say, a judge allotted to the Northern Circuit in order to try cases here gives up four days at Manchester for the sake of sitting two days in London. That is the net effect of the disturbance of arrangements, and while it is exceedingly inconvenient to Manchester, it is not of much use to London. No State department is worse managed, and no arrangements are more wasteful of public time than the arrangements made by Her Majesty's judges to try causes at the assizes. It is disappointing to find a new judge like Mr. Justice Collins, who, as an old member of the Northern Circuit, can hardly plead ignorance of the effect of what he has done, so readily falling into the autocratic and unbusinesslike traditions of the English bench.' In this matter, our daily contemporary might remember the maxim, 'audi alteram partem.' Some advantage would certainly accrue to metropolitan cases by having an extra judge for even only two days. Probably if commissioners had been sent down to try assize cases, none might have had to be referred.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

A SPECIAL general meeting of the members of the Incorporated Law Society will be held in the Hall of the society on Friday, January 29, 1892.

It will be very convenient if members who desire to move resolutions or to ask questions will give notice to that effect on or before Wednesday, January 6. Notice convening the meeting, containing the resolutions to be moved and questions to be asked, will in due course be sent to the members of the society.

By order,
(Signed) E. W. WILLIAMSON,
Secretary.

Law Societies Hall, Chancery Lane:

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETIES.

DEBATING.—The ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday, December 8, Mr. Crawford in the chair.—The subject for discussion, 'That the case of Low v. Bouverie, L. R. (1891) 3 Chanc. Div. 82, was wrongly decided,' was opened by Mr. Watson, followed by Mr. Levi; Mr. E. W. Munton, followed by Mr. Arnold, opposed.—The debate having been declared open, the following gentlemen spoke: In the affirmative, Messrs. Harry Watkins, Brownjohn, Pettitt, and Simon; in the negative, Messrs. Baldwin, Pattinson, Stevens, Pritchard, Chilcott, and Douglas. Mr. Watson replied.—The chairman summed up, and on the motion being put to the meeting, it was lost by a majority of seven.—By invitation of the committee, Mr. Candy, Q.C., will open the debate at the next meeting of the society on Tuesday, December 15. The subject for discussion is 'That the conspicuous absence of commercial cases from the Cause Lists of the Queen's Bench Division has been and is attributable to causes which are well known to the legal profession, but have not yet been dealt with by the Legislature, and that the removal of the trial of London actions from the Royal Courts of Justice to the Guildhall will have no effect in restoring this class of case to our Courts.'

HONOURS AND APPOINTMENTS.

THE Right Hon. Lord Justice Fry has been elected Treasurer of Lincoln's Inn for the ensuing year, in succession to Mr. Napier Higgins, Q.C., whose term of office expires on January 10 next.

Mr. William Pearson, Q.C., has been elected Treasurer of the Inner Temple for the ensuing year, in succession to His Honour Judge Bristowe, Q.C.

Mr. J. D. S. Sim has been appointed Assistant-Registrar of Friendly Societies. Mr. Sim was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1875, and is a member of the Oxford Circuit.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. J. C. Fox (of the firm of Hare & Co., solicitors) to the office of Chief Clerk in Mr. Justice North's Chambers.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. Edward Shearme, one of the chief clerks of the Chancery Division, to be a Taxing-Master of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Samuel Alfred Newman (of the firm of C. A. Loxton & Newman), of Walsall, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Newman was admitted in 1883.

Mr. Edwin Raworth, of Harrogate, has been appointed a Commissioner for Oaths. Mr. Raworth was admitted in 1885.

THE LIVERPOOL BOARD OF LEGAL STUDIES.—LAW LECTURES, SESSION 1891-92.—The second course of lectures which has been arranged for this session commenced on Wednesday, December 9. The subject of the course is 'The Law relating to Shipping Contracts.' The lectures are delivered by A. T. Carter, Esq., M.A., B.C.L., Barrister-at-Law, late Scholar of Queen's College, Oxford, Vinerian Law Scholar and Eldon Scholar, Oxford, one of the authors of the 'Factors Act, 1889.' A class will be held in connection with the lectures. At the conclusion of the course an examination will be held, and in case there are not less than nine candidates two prizes of the value of 3*l.* 3*s.* and 2*l.* 2*s.* respectively will be offered for competition amongst articled clerks and bar students who have attended the course. If there are less than nine candidates only one prize of the value of 3*l.* 3*s.* will be offered. A student who has been successful in obtaining a prize in any particular course in one session shall not be eligible for a prize in the same course in any subsequent session, although he shall be eligible for a place.

COLDBATH FIELDS PRISON SITE.—The Postmaster-General, in a letter to Mr. R. Paget, vestry clerk of Clerkenwell, states that as it is now decided to retain the whole of Coldbath Fields prison site for parcel post purposes, he would be willing to remove the old prison wall and substitute iron railings from the corner of Calthorpe Street to Oldham Gardens, Farringdon Road, setting them back to increase the width of the street to sixty feet, on condition that the vestry will reset the pavement and remake the road. Originally it was intended that the entire site of the disused prison should be utilised for industrial dwellings or maintained as an open space, but the sum of 10,000*l.* has been paid to the London County Council in lieu of the reservation of even a part of the land as a recreation-ground. Having regard to the fact that Clerkenwell has now, in the inclosures of Wilmington and Northampton Squares, two public recreation-grounds besides a large playground for children at Spa Fields, it is thought that more open spaces in the parish are not needed, and that the 10,000*l.* would be more usefully employed as a contribution towards the erection of a town hall, on the line of the new thoroughfare from Holborn to the Angel, than in providing an additional pleasure or leisure ground.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending December 5 was 102. The number in the corresponding week of last year was seventy-six, showing an increase of twenty-six, being a net increase in 1891 to date of 144.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, Chancery Lane, London, on Wednesday, the 9th inst., Mr. John Hunter in the chair. The other directors present were Messrs. H. Morten Cotton, Samuel Harris (Leicester), Edwin Hedger, Grinham Keen, F. P. Morrell (Oxford), Richard Pidcock (Woolwich), Henry Roscoe, Sidney Smith, Frederic T. Woolbert, and J. T. Scott (secretary). A sum of 285*l.* was distributed in grants of relief, three new members were admitted to the association, and other general business was transacted.

UNITED LAW SOCIETY.—A meeting was held at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall on November 30, the subject for discussion being: 'A. travelled on a railway without having paid his fare or provided himself with a ticket, but without intent to defraud the company or evade payment of the fare, and his luggage, which was placed in the luggage-van of the train, was lost. Can he recover compensation from the company?'—Mr. S. Williams opened in the affirmative, and was opposed by Mr. Hawkins. The debate was continued by Messrs. Green, Lewis, Walton, Hildesheim, Cox, and Atkin.—The motion was carried nem. con.—An impromptu debate was then held.—The next debate will be held on December 14, the subject for discussion being: 'That the House of Lords needs reform.'

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR'S JURISDICTION AT CAMBRIDGE.—The following is a copy of the warrant under which the young woman, Daisy Hopkins, is now incarcerated at the Spinning House: 'To the Keeper of the Spinning House, or House of Correction, in the University and Town of Cambridge.—Whereas Daisy Hopkins hath been apprehended by the Rev. Frederic Wallis, one of the pro-proctors of the said university, within the limit and jurisdiction thereof, and hath been this day brought before me and charged with walking with a member of the university in a certain public street of the town and suburbs of Cambridge, and within the precincts of the said university, which charge, as well upon the information of the said pro-proctor as upon the examination of the said Frederic Wallis, and after having heard what the said Frederic Wallis had to allege in her defence, I do adjudge to be true: These are therefore to require and command you to receive into your custody the said Daisy Hopkins, and her safely to keep in your said Spinning House for fourteen days. Given under my hand and seal at Cambridge this third day of December, in the year of our Lord 1891.—JOHN PEILE, Master of Christ's College and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge.' 'I do certify that the above is a true copy of the warrant by virtue of which Daisy Hopkins is detained in my custody, and that the said Daisy Hopkins is not detained for any other cause.—AGNESS JOHNSTON, keeper of the Spinning House.' 'There is,' says a Cambridge correspondent, 'an evident slip in mentioning Frederic Wallis as having been heard in Hopkins's defence.' Mr. Councillor C. A. Vinter has given notice that at the town council meeting next Thursday he will ask by what authority and at whose request Superintendent Innes produced before the vice-chancellor at the Spinning House on December 3 the register of prostitutes for the borough of Cambridge, and, if necessary, he will move a resolution thereon. It is understood that eminent legal advice is being sought as to what action should be taken with regard to the sentence.

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) ACT, 1891.—The Local Government Board have issued a circular to boards of guardians calling attention to section 3 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, which makes it the duty of every relieving officer, in accordance with the regulations of the authority having control over him, to give information to the sanitary authority of any nuisance in their district liable to be dealt with summarily under the Act. The section further provides that it should be the duty of the authority having control over the officer to make such regulations. Relieving officers will in future be required, in accordance with the regulations of the guardians, to give information of any nuisance to the sanitary authority of the district. The board suggest that before making any regulations the guardians should place themselves in communication on the subject with the sanitary authority or authorities in the union or separate parish. The sanitary authorities under the Act are the Commissioners of Sewers, the vestries and district boards, the Woolwich Local Board of Health, and in any place mentioned in schedule (C) to the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the board of guardians for such place or for any parish or poor-law union of which it forms part, or if there is no such board of guardians, the overseers of the poor for such place, or for the parish in which it is situate. The Act comes into operation on January 1 next, but the regulations may be made before that date, and it appears to the board to be expedient that this should be done in order that the regulations may take effect on that day. No approval on the part of the board to the regulations will be required.

'OBITER DICTA.'

THE judicial staff of the Queen's Bench Division has for some time been reduced to four. One judge being in daily attendance at chambers, only three have been available for Court work, and, it having been wisely decided to keep one Divisional Court sitting continuously, there has of late been only one judge—Mr. Justice Denman—left for the trial of jury cases. There must, in any case, have been a great scarcity of judges in the Queen's Bench Division during the circuits, but the number has been further reduced by the fact of Mr. Justice Mathew's sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, and, more recently, by the renewed indisposition of Mr. Justice Hawkins, which has compelled him, under medical advice, again to go abroad for the benefit of his health. The fact, however, remains that, from one cause or another, the business of the Queen's Bench Division will have been almost at a standstill for nearly a month before the Christmas Vacation.

WE are glad to learn that Mr. Justice Stirling has sufficiently recovered from his illness to enable him to leave town for the country, and we trust that before the commencement of the next sittings he will be completely restored to health.

SOME weeks ago we analysed the returns of convictions for drunkenness on Sunday in the several counties of England and Wales. It appeared from that return that the Welsh Sunday Closing Act had not produced the results expected from it, and that there was more Sunday drinking in Wales than in many English counties. The case of Regina v. The Justices of Glamorganshire, which came before Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Smith on Monday, is a valuable commentary on that return. It was there discovered that a wholesale license from the Excise does not come within the various licensing Acts or within the Sunday Closing Act, 1881, and also that a sale of four and a half gallons of beer is not a sale by retail. Accordingly, the decision of justices who had convicted a grocer who had under an Excise license sold a cask of beer of four and a half gallons after eleven o'clock on Saturday night was quashed. It appeared from the affidavit of the justices that in the Rhondda Division of Glamorganshire, which is largely inhabited by colliers, an extensive business of this kind during the hours prohibited by the Act of 1881 for retail trading had grown up. The inference is that the trade knows the laws which govern it far better than its opponents, the temperance reformers; and one can easily see how it comes to pass that Wales does not present so favourable a record of hebdomadal sobriety as the less Puritanical parts of the United Kingdom. British working men, like their wealthier neighbours, will have their beer on Sunday, and if they can only get it in quantities of four and a half gallons, they will consider it a point of honour to consume the whole quantity before Monday morning. The Times impresses upon magistrates the necessity of reading Law Reports. We may, perhaps, be permitted to remind justices of the peace that in the LAW JOURNAL the cases which affect their jurisdiction are for their special benefit published in a separate form.

THE case, when the statutes are consulted, will be found to be an extremely clear one. The Licensing Acts of 1872 and 1874, under which the sale of intoxicating liquor is subjected to so many rigorous regulations, and amongst them to the prohibition of sale within certain closing hours, apply to sale by retail only. By section 72 of the Act of 1872, nothing in the Act shall apply inter alia to 'the sale of intoxicating liquor by wholesale;' and by section 74 of the same Act, 'sale by retail' in respect of any intoxicating liquor means 'the sale of that liquor in such quantities as is declared to be sale by retail by any Acts relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors.' Finally, by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 85, s. 19, after reciting that 'doubts were entertained as to what is a selling of beer or cyder or perry by retail,' it is enacted that 'every sale of any beer, or of any cider or perry, in any less quantity than four gallons and a half shall be deemed and taken to be a selling by retail.' Therefore a selling of beer in casks containing four and a half gallons exactly is not a selling by retail.—Q. E. D.

In the eyes of all who have the welfare of the Universities at heart, the occurrence of another Spinning House trouble at Cambridge is most lamentable. It is unquestionably desirable that the Universities should have a disciplinary jurisdiction over the towns for the protection of undergraduates, and it is a great pity that the authorities should exhibit either a want of judicial fairness to the unfortunate girls who are brought before them, or the ludicrous want of common sense in framing the charge which it appears has for long characterised the Vice-Chancellor's Court. It ought to have been obvious to the least instructed lay mind that no conviction 'for walking with a member of the University' would be allowed to stand. These cases, also, do harm by evoking the sentimental gush of a certain section of the press and the old outcry that unchastity in a man is as bad as it is in a woman. That is sheer nonsense—apart from the special circumstances of this case. It is the duty of University authorities to keep the young fellows under their charge as straight as possible and to wage war against prostitution. As a rule there is no such inequality of punishment in the case of the two offenders as a correspondent of the Times complains of. A prostitute who is sent to the Spinning House for a fortnight is not punished so severely as an undergraduate, who is pretty sure to be sent down for a term or two, if not for good. At the same time the authorities might do well to be a little more lenient in their sentences. The true solution, however, would be for the Universities to appoint legal assessors to the Vice-Chancellor, or to place an experienced counsel in the position of judge or magistrate in the Vice-Chancellor's Court.

Mr. Justice Day tried a very bold experiment the other day under the recent statute which empowers a Court to discharge a first offender. It is undoubtedly a very grave offence for a postman to open a letter, steal a cheque, and forge the indorsement. The almost stereotyped punishment for this class of crime is five years' penal servitude, and there is certainly great danger in the practice of giving the same sentences always for a particular class of wrong-doing. It saves the trouble of thought, and the judge is in danger of not fully realising all the circumstances of the case. The postman tried by Mr. Justice Day was, it appears, in receipt of a salary at the rate of 16*s.* a week, but stated that his average weekly earnings were only about 8*s.* The judge referred a day or two afterwards to this case as one of temptation arising out of dire want, and dealt very different measure to a criminal of a different class. Few, it is to be hoped, will regret that the poor man will have another chance of becoming a decent citizen. The Lord Chief Justice has always been an advocate of light sentences, and a striking confirmation of his views has recently been afforded by Liverpool. The Recorder (Mr. Hopwood, Q.C.) has often been taken to task for extreme leniency to the prisoners convicted before him. Remarkable testimony has recently been given to the success of this policy by a return which shows a very appreciable diminution of offences tried by that learned judge during the five or six years of his tenure of the office. The Penal Servitude Act is no doubt to some extent due to the same considerations which actuate Lord Coleridge and Mr. Hopwood. Many of those who will approve of the course taken by Mr. Justice Day will regret that a far heavier sentence than four years' penal servitude was not passed on the Rev. Dr. Clutterbuck.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in The Marquis of Ailesbury's Case is certainly, from some points of view, a regrettable one. The Court has sanctioned the sale of the family mansion, together with the Savernake estate, notwithstanding the natural opposition of the remaindermen. The Times, in an able article upon the case, observes that the sentiments of the latter were overpowered by public considerations. The interests of the tenants upon the estate form, no doubt, an important element for the consideration of the Court in exercising their discretion, but we venture to share the doubt expressed in the article whether the Legislature ever intended to give to a spendthrift tenant-for-life the power to insist upon either selling or ruining an estate, including the family mansion. The Court of Appeal, in overruling the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling, who had refused to sanction the sale of the mansion house, seem to have been chiefly influenced by their knowledge of the 'misery' resulting from handing over an estate to a mortgagee in possession, when every interest must be 'necessarily sacrificed to money-getting.' While admitting the importance of such considerations, it seems to us doubtful whether the interests of the remaindermen ought not in such a case to have prevailed.

In Haslett v. Hutchinson, (1891) 8 P. O. R. 457, Mr. Justice Kekewich settled two points in patent practice—one of minor, the other of very considerable importance: (1) His lordship intimated that in future, when the Register of Patents is relied upon, a certified, and not as heretofore merely a plain, copy of the register must be produced. (2) He also gave judicial authority to what has hitherto been a floating impression—viz. that sections 85 and 87 of the Patents Acts, 1883–88, provide for the registration of documents dealing with legal interests only. The Register of Patents, therefore, now stands on the same footing as the Register of Ships.

The two cases of Price v. Crouch, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 767, and Brunton v. The Electrical Engineering Corporation, decided by Mr. Justice Kekewich on December 11, are of considerable interest on the subject of a solicitor's lien. In the first case the plaintiff, having employed a solicitor to commence the action, afterwards gave notice of his intention to act in person, and then personally compromised the action on the terms of receiving a certain sum, which was paid to him by the cheque of the defendant's solicitors. The plaintiff's solicitor the next day served the defendant's solicitors with notice of his lien. He had also previously informed them that in the event of a compromise he should require payment of his costs. The Court, under these circumstances, held that the plaintiff's solicitor was entitled to an order for payment of his costs by the defendant, or for the continuance of the action for the recovery of his costs. The meaning of 'collusion' in such a case, according to Mr. Justice Denman, 'goes no further than to denote an agreement between two parties with the knowledge that they are doing an unfair thing in depriving a third party of a right he had.'

The second case before Mr. Justice Kekewich raised, we believe, an entirely novel point—whether the retaining lien of a company's solicitor was good as against the debenture-holders who had brought an action to realise their security. By the form of the debentures they were to rank as a first charge on the company's undertaking and property as a floating security, but so that the company was not to be at liberty to create any 'mortgage or charge' in priority to the debentures. The lien, as we understand, was for costs incurred after the issue of the debentures, but before the voluntary winding up and before default was made on the debentures. Mr. Justice Kekewich decided in favour of the lien, holding that the company, while the security was a floating one, were masters of their own position, and that there was nothing to prevent their solicitor acquiring that right which the general law gave him.

In the case of Barnes v. The London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Assurance Company a Divisional Court decided a very interesting point as regards insurable interest. The plaintiff insured the life of her half-sister, a cripple, who died a year and a half afterwards. The company refused to pay, alleging that certain conditions inserted in the policy had not been complied with, and that the plaintiff had no insurable interest in her sister's life. It appeared that the conditions had been inserted by the company's agent without anything being said about them to the plaintiff, and that the company had given no warning to the plaintiff either at the time of insuring or afterwards as to the necessity for an insurable interest. The emphatic language of the County Court judge of Leeds, which was emphatically approved by the Lord Chief Justice and by Mr. Justice Smith, suggests that these learned judges would have been glad if they could have held the company estopped by their conduct in accepting the premiums without such warning from disputing the validity of the policy. But the words of the Act (14 Geo. III. c. 48) are absolute that the assurance is to be 'null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever,' and it seems that a plaintiff who cannot prove an insurable interest can at most only recover back the amount of the premiums paid to the company. In this case, however, the ingenuity of the learned judge was able to discover an insurable interest. The County Court judge so held with great hesitation, on the ground that 'there was a reasonable probability that there would be nobody to undertake the child's burial in the case of her death except the plaintiff, and that she, as her sister, might feel called upon by natural affection to perform the office and spend the money upon it.' And Lord Coleridge was of opinion that where a person has entered into an agreement to incur expenses which he was not bound by law to incur, the securing repayment of that to himself in an insurable interest.

Counsel asked for leave to appeal against this decision, but the Court refused to give leave, observing that it would be unjust to the plaintiff to allow an appeal in a case involving only 21*l.* Counsel urged (if the report in the Times may be trusted) that 'it was a very important case to the company, who issued thousands of these policies.' Thousands of policies with reference to which the company, when sued, can plead no insurable interest! Thousands of policies in which the company's agent has inserted conditions to which the parties effecting them have never agreed! Either assertion seems incredible, and, if either were true, such a state of things would call for a searching inquiry in the public interest; but the most careful consideration of the words attributed to counsel fails to reveal any other possible sense in which they could form a relevant argument for allowing an appeal.

As we had thought possible (see ante, p. 674), the High Court has taken a strict view of the conduct of the London County Council in refusing to renew two music and dancing licenses, the renewal of which had been opposed by counsel instructed by some of their own body, and has granted a mandamus to hear and determine the application according to law. The judgment merely extends the well-known common law disqualification of a judge on the ground of interest upon which we recently (see ante, p. 704) commented in connection with Regina v. Gaisford (Notes of Cases, p. 148). Whether the County Council will exercise their unquestionable discretion under 25 Geo. II. c. 36 in favour of the applicants remains to be seen; on this, the substantial point, the mandamus can have no effect. But it may, perhaps, be suggested as just that the same reasonable restrictions upon refusal to renew which exist in the case of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquor by retail, under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, should be applied by statute to music and dancing licenses under the Act of George II.

The articles in the Law Times of November 14 and December 5 on 'Legal Patronage' and 'A Non-Political Chancellor' are well worth most serious consideration. It is suggested that a Patronage Board should replace the Lord Chancellor in making legal appointments, and that Lord Chancellors themselves should no longer sit in Cabinets, but should be transformed into permanent ministers of justice. The first suggestion we emphatically approve; and would suggest that ex-Lord Chancellors, who have extraordinarily little work to do, should be ex-officio members of a new Board of Legal Patronage. We greatly doubt, however, whether the exclusion of the Lord Chancellor from the Cabinet would redound to the public advantage. The Lord Chancellor, however, might very properly be divested of some of his present multifarious duties. There is no reason whatever, for instance, why his time should be taken up by considering the merits and demerits of the various applicants for Crown livings.

In connection with the attack in the Saturday Review on the Solicitor-General for his mode of cross-examination in Russell v. Russell, attention should be called (1) to Order XXXVI., rule 38, of the Rules of the Supreme Court by which 'the judge may in all cases disallow any questions put in cross-examination of any party or other witness which may appear to him to be vexatious, and not relevant to any matter proper to be inquired into in the cause or matter,' and (2) to Order XLVIII., rule 1, by which the application of the Rules of the Supreme Court is excluded from (inter alia) 'proceedings for divorce or other matrimonial causes.' In Harvey v. Lovekin, 54 Law J. Rep. P. D. & A. 1, the Master of the Rolls appears to have disliked this exclusion in connection with discovery procedure, and we cannot but think that to incorporate into the Divorce Court Rules, Order XXXVI., rule 38, as to vexatious cross-examination would be highly desirable.

The signatures of a large number of solicitors are being obtained in support of a petition for the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal. So many eminent judges and others connected with the criminal tribunals of this country have expressed opinions more or less decided in favour of some safeguard against wrongful convictions that no Government can afford to ignore the subject. There are objections, no doubt, to the proposed Court, but the question is whether, in spite of certain drawbacks, it would not prove of great value, especially in cases where public sentiment runs counter to the decision come to by the Home Secretary in camera. The fact that Galley was forty-three years a convict before he received a 'free pardon' for an offence he never committed is one of the most startling examples of the present system. Mr. Albert Elworthy, who is untiring in his efforts to establish the right of appeal in criminal cases, has printed a revised 'Brief' for the promotion of the measure, which puts in a concise form the case for the bill.

Only a fortnight ago (see ante, p. 755) we noticed the first volume of the 'Revised Reports.' The second volume is now before us, and we gather, with no less satisfaction than astonishment, from an advertisement of the publishers (Sweet & Maxwell, Limited) that 'it is intended to publish at the rate of five volumes a year.' At this rate the series will, in all probability, be completed before the end of the century now rapidly drawing to a close. The second volume contains a republication of all that is valuable in 2 Cox, 1 & 2 Vesey, jun., 4 & 5 Durnford & East, and 1 H. Blackstone. 'No complaints,' says Sir F. Pollock in his preface, 'have reached me of any case which is still of authority being unduly omitted in the first volume, nor yet any serious complaint of too much having been included;' and we are glad to observe that Goodright v. Rigby, 5 T. R. 177, and Roe v. Baldwere, 5 T. R. 104, though they 'look obsolete at first sight to a generation brought up under the Conveyancing Acts,' have been republished, with other cases on which the validity of many titles may still depend. It is in deciding whether particular cases of this class are to be republished or not that the intelligence and resources of the editor and his assistants will be mainly taxed. The notes continue to be good and short, and there are one or two decided improvements —e.g. that of noting in the margin the paging by which the original reports are usually cited, 'so as to facilitate reference in Court.'

The Prince of Wales has been entertained at dinner by the leading members of the Civil Service, and, in proposing the toast of the evening, avowed his belief that the Service would ever retain the confidence of the Sovereign and the country. Sir R. Herbert, in replying, said he did not feel quite sure that Parliament and the public placed that full confidence in them which he thought their fidelity deserved. Lawyers have of recent years been brought more and more in contact with the Civil Service by reason of the ever-growing habit of Parliament to delegate to some public department or other work which in former times was done by Parliament itself—as will appear from the most cursory perusal of Mr. A. Pulling's admirable 'Index to the Statutory Rules and Orders in Force on January 1, 1891,' which has just been issued by authority. If these Rules and Orders were issued with more care and consideration for those who have to interpret them as part of the law of England, much time and trouble now rather heedlessly wasted might be saved.

We direct the particular attention of such of our readers as are members of the Law Society to the notice (see ante, p. 777) of the meeting to be held on Friday, January 29, 1892, and to the statement of the secretary that 'it will be very convenient if members who desire to move resolutions or to ask questions will give notice to that effect on or before Wednesday, January 6.' We hope that some member may move a resolution to the effect that the clerks to county justices ought to be disqualified by statute from conducting prosecutions, and that members inclined to support such a resolution will have agreed beforehand how it is to be worded and what steps ought to be taken in event of its being carried, as we hope it will be, for reasons we have frequently given (see, e.g., ante, pp. 1, 15).

NEWSTEAD v. SEARLES IN THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Few cases probably have presented greater difficulty to the mind of lawyers than that of Newstead v. Searles, 1 Atk. 264; West. temp. Hardw. (1827 edit.) p. 287, where Lord Hardwicke held that articles made on the marriage of a widow containing provisions in favour of her issue by her first husband were not avoided, under 27 Eliz. c. 4, by a subsequent mortgage for value. The articles in that case provided for the settlement of real estate in favour of the husband and wife for their respective lives, and then, in case there should be no issue of the marriage, in favour of the wife's issue by her former marriage, with a provision that if there should be any child of the marriage each such child should have an equal share of the estate with the issue of the former marriage. Attention should be called to the nature of this limitation, under which the issue of both marriages were blended in one class, the importance of which will presently appear. There were, in fact, no issue of the second marriage, and the husband and wife afterwards mortgaged the estate; and Lord Hardwicke held that the issue of the former marriage were entitled to the estate as against the mortgagee—in other words, that the articles would be enforced at their instance, and that the settlement was not avoided by 27 Eliz. c. 4. The difficulty in understanding his decision arises from the general proposition that a limitation in a marriage settlement in favour of the relations of the settlor other than the issue of the marriage is not within the consideration of the marriage, and, therefore, in the absence of any other consideration, must be taken to be voluntary; and this difficulty is not removed by the reported judgment of Lord Hardwicke himself, from which it is by no means easy to gather the precise ground of his decision. That decision has frequently been considered—sometimes followed, sometimes distinguished, sometimes explained—and the views taken of it appear to fall under four heads, which we propose shortly to discuss. The first and boldest criticism is simply that the decision was a wrong one, and was arrived at before the Courts had finally settled the true construction and import of the 27 Eliz. c. 4. This was the view of Mr. Justice Williams in Clarke v. Wright, 30 Law J. Rep. Exch. 113; 6 H. and N. 849, but it met with no support from the other judges in that case, where the majority of the Court expressly upheld a limitation in favour of her illegitimate son contained in a settlement made by a woman on her marriage, as against a subsequent purchaser for value; and although this decision of the Exchequer Chamber has, as we shall see, been since disapproved, yet the House of Lords, in the Scotch case of Mackie v. Herbertson, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 303, has expressly recognised and adopted Lord Hardwicke's decision in the similar case of a blended gift to the issue of both marriages. The second view was the one adopted by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Wightman in Clarke v. Wright—viz. that Newstead v. Searles is to be treated as an authoritative though anomalous exception to the general rule. 'It may be,' said the Lord Chief Justice—speaking of Newstead v. Searles and another case of Clayton v. Lord Wilton, 6 M. & S. 67 n.; 3 Mad. 302 n., which involved a similar question—'that these decisions would not stand the test of a very strict analysis or rigorous logic; but it must be borne in mind that the rule on which this exception was engrafted was itself the result of a forced and arbitrary construction of the statute.' The reader, we think, cannot fail to be struck with the unsatisfactory nature of this explanation, and though in recent cases judges of first instance have followed this authority—as e.g. Mr. Justice Fry in Gale v. Gale, 46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 809; L. R. 6 Chanc. Div. 144—they have not unnaturally refused to extend such an exception one whit further than the actual decision compelled them. Thus, both Vice-Chancellor Hall in Price v. Jenkins, 46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 214; L. R. 4 Chanc. Div. 483, 488, and Mr. Justice Kay in In re Cameron & Wells, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 69; L. R. 37 Chanc. Div. 32, held that the issue of a former marriage of the husband are not within the exception. The third explanation of Newstead v. Searles is that given in the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn (in which apparently Mr. Justice Willes concurred) in the same case of Clarke v. Wright, the ground taken being that if it can be inferred from circumstances that the parties when they made their agreement had specially in view that some provision should be made for persons who would otherwise have been volunteers, these persons are no longer to be treated as volunteers because it is a matter of special agreement, although there may be no other valuable consideration for the agreement than the marriage, and a distinction is accordingly taken in terms by Mr. Justice Blackburn between a limitation in favour of a third person 'merely inserted' in the settlement, and one 'appearing from its nature' to have been one of the terms of the bargain. This ground is obviously wider than the former one, and if sound, there seems no reason for limiting the exception to the issue by a former marriage of the wife alone. In one sense, Mr. Justice Blackburn's view appears the more satisfactory of the two, as it has the merit of resting on a distinct principle: but inasmuch as nearly every marriage settlement contains in some form or another a recital that the provisions of the settlement are made pursuant to agreement, his proposition would, as Earl Selborne points out in a case in the Privy Council, to which we shall presently refer, go far to destroy the general rule altogether. It may be added that in In re Cameron & Wells a distinct recital was made in the settlement of the stipulation to provide for the children of the husband by his former marriage—evidently framed on the lines suggested by Mr. Justice Blackburn's judgment—but Mr. Justice Kay, as we have stated, refused to treat those children as within the marriage consideration. We now turn to the fourth and most recent explanation of Newstead v. Searles, which we believe to have been first given by Earl Selborne in Mackie v. Herbertson, and which is further developed in De Mestre v. West, 60 Law J. Rep. P. C. 66, a case almost identical in its facts with Clarke v. Wright, except for the circumstance, which for this purpose is immaterial, that in De Mestre v. West the wife's son was born in wedlock. The Privy Council in that case held that the limitation in favour of the wife's son by a former marriage, which was not in any way mixed up with the limitation to the issue of the intended marriage, was void against a subsequent purchaser for value under 27 Eliz. c. 4. In other words, the Court rejected the authority of Clarke v. Wright, and stated that the true explanation of Newstead v. Searles and Clayton v. Lord Wilton was that the order of limitations in both those cases was such that the limitations which were not within the marriage consideration were blended with those which were, in such a way that those which were within the consideration could not take effect in the form and manner provided by the instrument without also giving effect to those which were not. The same reasoning, according to Earl Selborne, who delivered the judgment of the Court, was what guided the House of Lords in the Scotch case of Mackie v. Herbertson. Whether this was the real reason which Lord Hardwicke had in his mind in deciding Newstead v. Searles may well be doubted; but we presume that for the future this will be taken to be the true ratio decidendi of that case, and it is certainly one which puts the matter on a satisfactory and intelligible basis, making the question one of the form and meaning of the instrument in each case, which, we may add, is to be ascertained as at the time of the execution of the deed, and, therefore, is not affected by the circumstance that there may, in fact, be no issue of the intended marriage to share with the collaterals under the blended limitation. On this footing there can, we apprehend, be no reason for giving the benefit of the inclusion to one class of collaterals—such as the issue of the wife by a former marriage—rather than to another; and the decision of the Privy Council involves accordingly a complete reconsideration of the decided cases. Thus, the decision of Mr. Justice Fry in Gale v. Gale cannot, we think, be supported on this reasoning, any more than that of Clarke v. Wright. On the other hand, the decisions in Price v. Jenkins and In re Cameron & Wells appear to be right on the facts, though the reasoning on which they were founded—viz. that the issue of the husband by a former marriage are in all cases to be treated as volunteers—is, if Earl Selborne's view is to prevail, obviously unsound.

3. Order XI., rule 2, provides that where leave is asked to serve a writ (under rule 1) in Scotland or Ireland, if it shall appear to the Court or judge that there may be a concurrent remedy in Scotland or Ireland, as the case may be, the Court or judge shall have regard to the comparative cost and convenience of proceeding in England or in the place of residence of the party sought to be served and, particularly in cases of small demands, to the powers and jurisdiction under the statutes establishing them or regulating them of the Sheriffs' Courts or Small Debt Courts in Scotland and of the Civil Bill Courts in Ireland respectively.

We have already seen that, according to Lenders v. Anderson (1883), 53 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 104; L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 50, this rule applies to the whole preceding rule, but does not enable the Court to allow service under clause (e) where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. It should also be observed that this rule does not say that the points enumerated in it are the only circumstances to which the Court or judge is entitled to have regard, and it is submitted that all the tests by which in other cases the question of 'the balance of convenience' is determined are applicable here also.

The meaning of the words 'concurrent remedy' was recently considered by Mr. Justice Chitty in In re De Penny (1891), 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 518; L. R. 2 Chanc. Div. 63. 'A remedy,' said his lordship, 'which depends on the will and pleasure of another person is not a concurrent remedy within rule 2 of Order XI.' In that case the plaintiff was resident in England. The defendants were domiciled and resident in Scotland. One of the principal subjects in dispute was a large fund in the hands of G. & S. in England. G. & S. were mere stakeholders as between the plaintiff and the defendants. Leave was asked to serve a writ under Order XI., rule 1 (f), on the defendants, out of the jurisdiction. It was suggested, on behalf of the defendants, that there was a concurrent remedy in Scotland, because G. & S., the stakeholders, might institute in Scotland an action of multiplepoinding—which is analogous to our interpleader—the result of which would be that the fund would be deposited in a bank there and the litigation would proceed between the plaintiff and the defendants. G. & S. were, however, under no obligation to take any such proceedings. Mr. Justice Chitty (although deciding against the order for service out of the jurisdiction on other grounds) held that there was no 'concurrent remedy' within the meaning of rule 2.

The judicial construction of the words 'comparative cost and convenience' will be apparent from the following illustrations:—*

(a) A., who resided in Ireland, and B. entered into a partnership contract, executed in London, for the construction of a railway in Ireland. In this contract B. was described as a civil engineer, of Victoria Street, Westminster. B. and his family went to reside in Ireland, he having to superintend the progress of the works. The contract provided that the business should be carried on in Victoria Street and Ireland, and that the books should be kept at Victoria Street. This clause was, however, abandoned after a very short time, and the business and the books were carried on and kept in Ireland. A. brought against B. an action of accounts. Comparative cost and convenience require that this action should be tried in Ireland (Tottenham v. Barry (1879), 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 641; L. R. 12 Chanc. Div. 797—and on this point see Kinahan v. Kinahan (1890), 59 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 705; L. R. 45 Chanc. Div. 78.

(b) On the marriage of A., an Englishman domiciled in England, with B., a Scotch lady, a settlement in Scotch form was made of her property, under which, after the death of B., the property went to the children of the marriage, subject only to an annuity to A. On the death of B., the only child of the marriage, an infant, resident with the father in England, commenced an action against the trustees to have the trusts administered by the Court, alleging that the trustees improperly refused to allow maintenance out of the income. The trust property was all in Scotland, and the trustees all resided there. It was held by the Court of Appeal that service of the writ out of the jurisdiction ought not to be allowed. 'Here,' said Lord Justice James, 'is a Scotch settlement, Scotch property, Scotch trustees, and if it were a matter of judicial discretion where the proceedings ought to be carried on, I think that the plaintiffs ought to go where the Scotch defendants are, and get them to render their accounts in a Scotch Court, which knows exactly what is the effect of the Scotch settlement and what is the proper mode of dealing with the trust estate' (Creswell v. Barker, L. R. (1879) 11 Chanc. Div. 601).

(c) Seymour v. Seymour, W. N. 17 (1888), was a somewhat different case from either of the two preceding ones. It was an action for the execution of the trusts of a marriage settlement and to make good alleged breaches of trust under which the trust fund had been invested on mortgage of land in Ireland. The plaintiff was an infant beneficiary claiming under the settlement. Certain of the defendants who resided in this country were the representatives of a deceased trustee. The other defendants, who resided in Ireland, were the surviving trustee of the settlement and two sub-mortgagees from the trustee. The three last-mentioned defendants were served with the writ in Ireland and the surviving trustee submitted to the jurisdiction. The sub-mortgagees, however, moved to discharge the order for service, inter alia, upon the ground that any question which concerned them might effectually be raised in proceedings then pending for the sale of the estates in the Land Court in Ireland upon the ruling of the schedule of incumbrances, and consequently that under Order XI., rule 2, the Court ought not to exercise the jurisdiction even if (which was denied) it possessed it. Mr. Justice Chitty overruled the objection. 'If I were to uphold it,' said his lordship, 'either the parties resident in England would have to be served with the proceedings in Ireland, or two sets of proceedings would have to be carried on—one in England and the other in Ireland. In the first alternative the parties resident here would raise exactly the same objection in the Irish Courts to being taken to

* We shall here notice those cases only which relate to Scotland and Ireland. Other cases are dealt with in next paper, under the heading 'Balance of Convenience.'

Ireland, and there would be a deadlock. In the second alternative there would be two sets of proceedings, in each of which all the same evidence would have to be gone through.'

4. Scotch and Irish firms, of course, fall within the purview of Order XLVIII. A. This Order is considered in a subsequent paper.

Reviews.

A HANDY BOOK OF THE LAW OF TRUSTEES.

A Handy Book of the Law of Trustees; their Duties and Liabilities: with the New Rules as to Investments and the Trustee Acts, 1888 and 1889. By R. Denny Urlin, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Author of 'Land Transfer and Registration,' 'The Office of Trustee,' 'A Legal Guide for the Clergy,' &c. New and Revised Edition. London: Effingham, Wilson & Co. 1891.

This little work gives a very good general outline of the law as to the position, rights, and responsibilities of trustees. Mr. Urlin has for the benefit of the general public avoided technical expressions as much as possible. Thus, he tell us, instead of the barbarous expression cestui que trust (with its debatable plural) the word 'beneficiary' is used throughout, as conveying a clearer notion to the English reader. On p. 27, the provisions of 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 29, as to trustees lending on real securitities in Ireland are stated, but the author has omitted to tell us that the Act was repealed by the Trust Investment Act, 1889. Another slip which we have noticed is that, while on the first page of Chapter V. we have an allusion to the power to obtain judicial advice under Lord St. Leonards's Act and a statement of the law in Chapter X., the more comprehensive provisions of the Judicature Rules on the subject are not mentioned.

SHIRLEY'S LEADING CASES.

A Selection of Leading Cases in the Common Law. With Notes. By Walter Shirley Shirley, Barrister-at-Law. Fourth Edition by Richard Watson, LL.B. (Lond.), Barrister-at-Law, of Lincoln's Inn and North-Eastern Circuit. London: Stevens & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

The author of this work died shortly after the appearance of the third edition, and the task of bringing out the present edition has been accordingly committed to the hands of Mr. Watson. The present editor has done his work with great care, and large additions have been made to the cases. The cases on the subject of 'Contract' have been rearranged. In some cases the notes appear to run somewhat wide of the subject of the leading case. Thus in the case of Jordan v. Norton, which is entitled 'On the importance of mutuality,' the question was whether there was a contract between two farmers for the sale of a mare, and the decision of Baron Parke was 'the parties have never contracted in writing ad idem.' In the notes to this we have nearly a couple of pages devoted to the law of salvage. A few shortcomings in the work may be noticed. At p. 37 the authority of legal advisers is discussed. Here a few words might have been said with regard to the position of barristers in the conduct of actions. At p. 48 it would have been well to notice that the Factors Act was extended to Scotland by 53 & 54 Vict. c. 40. Peek v. Derry is referred to, but no mention is made of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. Generally speaking, however, the editing of the work has been well done.

A TRANSLATION OF DIGEST XIX. 2.

Digest XIX. 2. Locati Conducti. Translated, with Notes, by C. H. Monro, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press. 1891.

This neat little volume contains the Latin text of the Digest XIX. 2, with a translation in which the author tells us he has endeavoured to adhere about as closely to the Latin as was consistent with writing presentable English—indeed in one respect more closely, as it is often necessary to leave the Roman terms untranslated. Mr. Monro expresses an opinion with which we must concur—the custom is to translate too much. Thus, to take a prominent instance in the little work before us, the subject of the part of the digest dealt with (locatio and conductio) can never be translated with absolute accuracy by the terms 'letting' and 'hiring;' and such a rendering is sometimes quite beside the mark. The work is carefully done and the notes are instructive.

CAMPBELL ON SALE AND COMMERCIAL AGENCY.

The Law relating to the Sale of Goods and Commercial Agency. Second Edition. By Robert Campbell, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law; Advocate of the Scottish Bar; and late Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge; Author of the 'Law of Negligence,' &c. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1891.

In the two lines of preface prefixed to this edition, Mr. Campbell claims no more for it than that he has 'spared no pains to bring the work up to date.' Having carefully examined the present edition from this point of view, we are able to say that the task of bringing the book up to date has been thoroughly and well carried out. A few of the most recent cases, reported too late to admit of their being referred to in the text, have been noted in the index under the appropriate heads, and a list of them given at the end of the Table of Cases. We can, therefore, repeat what we said when reviewing the first edition—that the book is a contribution of value to the subject treated of, and that the writer deals with his subject carefully and fully. The book is indeed so good that we all the more regret that some congenital defects, to which we directed attention when reviewing the first edition, do not appear to have been remedied during the ten years that have elapsed since it first appeared. The Table of Contents is far too full, and is wanting in clearness and precision; it might with advantage be simplified and curtailed, and the space thereby gained utilised by giving either in the Table of Cases or throughout the body of the book references in each case to more than one set of reports. We notice, too, that throughout the author, when referring to Blackburn and Benjamin on Sales, ignores the fact that a second edition of Blackburn was published in 1885 and a fourth edition of Benjamin in 1888. The editors of the latest editions of these works have so far preserved the original texts as to take away, generally speaking, any excuse for referring to the earlier instead of the latest editions. Attention to a few matters of detail of this kind would have rendered what is certainly a good book more useful.

THE SECRETARY'S MANUAL OF COMPANY LAW.

The Secretary's Manual on the Law and Practice of Joint-stock Companies. With Forms and Precedents. By James Fitzpatrick, Secretary of Public Companies and Accountant, and V. de S. Fowke, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Jordan & Sons. 1891.

The object of this work is to meet an often-expressed want of a legal and practical guide for secretaries and members of the secretarial staff of companies. Its primary object, therefore, is to be a practical treatise. It deals accordingly at considerable length with the subject of bookkeeping. Here the authors have obviously supplied a desideratum, as many a secretary, when newly appointed to a company, even though he may have had the advantage of a commercial training, finds himself none too well fitted to deal with the work connected with the technicalities of the accounts of a public company. Law is not neglected, and the authors have here given the secretary a selection of that portion of the vast and bewildering mass of company law which he will require to know for the purposes of his office. The work is well got up and handy.

ROBERTS AND GOLLAN ON THE PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) ACT.

The Law relating to the Public Health of London. Being the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, fully Annotated, with References to all the Cases bearing on its Construction, together with an Explanatory Chapter, and other Enactments and Orders relating thereto. By James Roberts, M.A., LL.B., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Joint-Author of the 'Metropolitan Police Guide' and Author of a 'Handbook of Weights and Measures,' and H. C. Gollan, M.A., of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworths. 1891.

The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, does not come into operation until New Year's Day, but the authors of the present work very fairly assume that sanitary authorities and other persons who are entrusted with or interested in the administration of the Act will desire an early acquaintance with its provisions. Prefixed to the annotated copy of the Act is an explanatory chapter divided into two parts—one giving an account of the various matters with which the Act deals; the other noting the powers and duties of those bodies or persons who are made chiefly responsible for the due execution of this important statute. The law as to sanitary matters, which had been in an unsatisfactory state, was consolidated for the rest of England by the Public Health Act of 1875; but London had to wait its turn until the last session of Parliament. Now the law has been consolidated and amended by the recent Act. The present work is a careful guide to its provisions, and the work of annotation is well done, the authors having sedulously sought for help from the decisions on the previous law. A prominent position in the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, is assigned to nuisances, and here our authors sketch the law for their readers in a careful manner. Those, however, who desire to study the minutiæ of the subject will require to refer to the larger treatises dealing with this particular question.

Unreported Cases.

ACTION BY BAILIFF FOR POSSESSION FEES.

At the Wandsworth County Court, on December 8, the case of Willoughby v. J. W. Hobbs & Co. (Lim.) was heard. On December 15 his Honour Judge Holroyd delivered his reserved judgment: This was an action by the registrar and high bailiff of the Wandsworth County Court to recover 1*l.* 10*s.*, being three days' possession fees, under the circumstances which appear fully from the judgment which follows. On September 27, 1891, an execution was levied on the goods of Mr. Borgen, the defendant in an action in the Wandsworth County Court, by the plaintiff, for 15*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the judgment. On September 28 the landlords, Messrs. Hobbs & Co., gave notice to the high bailiff that Borgen (their tenant) was indebted to them for more than one year's rent at 55*l.* a year, and claiming to have the arrears of rent satisfied under section 160 of the County Court Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43). On October 1 Borgen, the judgment debtor, paid the debt for which the execution was levied, together with the costs of the execution, including four days' possession-money, from October 27, at 10*s.* a day. On the same day the landlord gave the bailiff notice that he withdrew his claim for rent. The high bailiff then claimed three days' possession-money from the landlords from October 28, and, as the landlords refused to pay, brought this action for the three days' possession-money at 10*s.* a day. On behalf of the defendants it was contended that the high bailiff had no claim, the fees for possession being limited by Order XXV., rule 11, of the County Court Rules, 1889, and by form 163, which is the notice of the warrant of execution subject to this rule, and which limits the amount of possession fees to 10*s.* per day. It was also contended that section 160 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which replaced section 1 of 8 Anne, c. 14, did not extend the application of that section so as to give the bailiff a right to possession fees as against the landlord giving notice of a claim for rent. The cases treating of the relations between a landlord claiming rent of the sheriff and the sheriff are as follows: In Thomas v. Morehouse, 56 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 653, it was decided that the effect of section 1 of the statute of Anne is to make the sheriff personally liable to the debtor's landlord if the goods seized are removed from the debtor's premises without payment of the rent; but the landlord does not acquire any lien either on the goods seized or on the proceeds of the sale, although when the sale has taken place, and the goods are in the hands of the sheriff, the Court may summarily, upon a summons at chambers, order the sheriff to pay the landlord the amount to which he is entitled. (See also Yates v. Rutledge, 29 Law J. Rep. Exch. 117.) Further, the landlord is entitled to his rent without any deduction for poundage, as appears from the case of Davies v. Edmonds, 12 M. & W. 31. It therefore appears to me that there was no retainer by the landlords of the high bailiff to distrain. He merely receives a notice of claim for rent, and his obligation to distrain is solely under the statute, in the case of executions in the County Court, section 160 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for which he is paid his poundage as provided by the rules under the statute, and, as appears, he is not entitled to receive fees for more than one man in possession. Lastly, there is no fee provided in the County Court scale of fees for a man in possession, except in actions in interpleader proceedings after the seventh day of possession, when the judge may allow, in addition to the fees on execution of a warrant, costs out of pocket for a man in possession. The case of Ball v. Price, 45 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 170; L. R. 1 Q. B. 264, where it was decided that a County Court registrar could sue for fees, has no application. It appears to me, therefore, that this right of action is misconceived, and that there must be judgment for the defendants.—The Registrar (plaintiff) in person. Mr. G. A. Bonner, barrister, appeared for the defendants.

RAILWAY COMPANY—UNPUNCTUALITY—NEGLIGENCE.

A point of some importance to railway passengers came before his Honour Judge Stonor in the Brompton County Court on Thursday, December 10.—The defendant, Mr. Lowenfeld, a gentleman of fortune, on August 7 last travelled to Teignmouth, to join his family there, by a train of the Great Western Railway Company, timed to arrive at that place at 7.42 P.M., and to stop ten minutes at Swindon. The train arrived at Swindon several minutes late, and the defendant inquired of the guard if it would stop ten minutes, and was answered in the affirmative. In fact, it only stopped seven minutes, and the defendant was left behind. The stationmaster told Mr. Lowenfeld that he had started the train before the time as it was late, and that the next train for Teignmouth was timed to get there at 10.50. The defendant asked for a special train, and was advised to go on by the next train to Bristol, and take the special train there. This he did, and the special train provided for him at Bristol reached Teignmouth at 8.20. The stationmaster demanded 31*l.* 17*s.*, the usual charge for a special train for that journey; the defendant said he would settle with the company, but ultimately gave a cheque for the amount to the stationmaster, payment of which, however, he stopped at his bankers'. The company now sued him for the amount, and he counterclaimed for damages without stating any definite sum.—His Honour held that the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to the amount claimed, as the defendant had contracted to pay it, and that he could not recover a like amount from the company on the counterclaim as damages. The learned judge held that it was unreasonable for him under the circumstances to have taken a special train on the authority of the well-known case of Le Blanche v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 45 Law J. Rep. C. P. 521; L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 286, in which the Court of Appeal held the principle applicable to such cases to be 'that if one party does not perform his contract the other may do so for him as reasonably near as may be, and charge him for the reasonable expense incurred in so doing; and that a proper test of what is reasonable in such a case is to consider whether, according to the ordinary habits of society, a person delayed on his journey, under circumstances for which the company were not responsible, would have incurred the expenditure in question on his own account.' But his Honour thought that the defendant was entitled to set off and counterclaim the following sums as damages for breach of contract—viz. 17*s.* fare from Bristol to Teignmouth, part of his fare from London to Teignmouth, 3*s.* for telegrams, and 2*l.* for discomfort and inconvenience, being a total of 3*l.*; but he said that he would give a written judgment as desired by the parties.—Mr. Talbot was counsel for the plaintiff company, and Mr. Woodfall for Mr. Lowenfeld. The latter stated that the case would be carried to the highest tribunal.

SERVANT-GIRLS' HOLIDAYS.

In the Marylebone County Court, on December 16, the case of Plummer v. Serena raised the question of the holidays of domestic servants. Plummer had been in the service of Mrs. Serena for about three months, and in August asked for and obtained a week's holiday. She went to Hastings, and she said she found that the sea air was doing her so much good that she wrote to her mistress asking that her holiday might be extended another week. As plaintiff did not return at the end of the first week, her mistress telegraphed to her to come back at once, and two days afterwards wrote to plaintiff telling her that her services were no longer required. The girl also wrote what was described as an impertinent letter, in which she gave her mistress a month's notice. When plaintiff did return from Hastings, Mrs. Serena refused to allow her to resume work; and the girl brought an action for a fortnight's wages while she was away, and a month's wages in lieu of notice. Mrs. Serena paid into Court one week's wages for the time during which the girl was away with leave, and contended that the girl was not entitled to any more as she virtually left her situation.—His Honour said it was monstrous that servant-girls should put their mistresses to so much inconvenience. So far as he knew, a mistress was not bound to give her servant any holiday, but it was absurd to suppose that a girl could extend her holiday at her own pleasure. In the circumstances he doubted whether the girl could have recovered her wages for the week she was away with leave; but the money had been paid into Court, and she might consider herself lucky to get that. Judgment was given for the defendant.

SESSIONS CASE.

UNQUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.

At the Horsham Petty Sessions, on Saturday, Albert Stovell, an agent, residing in the town, was summoned at the instance of the Incorporated Law Society with wilfully and falsely using a description implying that he was qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor at Horsham on September 19. There was a second summons against him for wilfully and falsely pretending to be an attorney or solicitor on the same date.—Mr. J. F. A. Cotching, solicitor, of Horsham, appeared to prosecute on behalf of the society. He detailed the facts of the case, stating that a Mrs. Stone had lived for many years at Bonnett's Farm, in the parish of Capel, and recently she had had a dispute with a carter named George Goacher, who had been in her employ. He left and made a claim for wages. On September 20 Mrs. Stone received the following letter: '23 Bedford Road, Horsham: September 19, 1891. Madam,—I am instructed by Mr. Geo. Goacher, of Horsham, late in your employ, to apply to you for the payment of 2*l.* 18*s.* wages due to him from you as per enclosed statement. My instructions are, unless the amount be sent to me within seven days from the above date, to take legal proceedings against you for its recovery.—Yours, &c., ALBERT STOVELL.' Mrs. Stone was aware that defendant was not a solicitor, for the simple reason that she had lived in the neighbourhood all her life and she knew the names of the Horsham solicitors. Had it not been for this fact she would have thought that the defendant was really a solicitor. The letter was drawn in the terms solicitors used in the ordinary way. Mrs. Stone did not take any notice of the letter under these circumstances. Unfortunately, perhaps, for the defendant, a barrister-at-law had taken apartments at Mrs. Stone's house for some time in the autumn, and the letter was shown to him, and he brought the matter before the Incorporated Law Society. After a consideration of the case by the committee, these proceedings were ordered to be taken. After writing the letter defendant visited Mrs. Stone's house and told her that he had written the letter, and that he generally liked to see the people before taking out a summons. He also told her that it would cost 4*l.* if the case went on. Mrs. Stone told him he was not a lawyer and had no business to write the letter. Defendant admitted to her that he was not a solicitor.—Mrs. Stone was called, and gave evidence in support of the statement.—Defendant stated that he was ignorant that he had committed an offence in writing the letter.—The bench decided that the defendant did not wilfully hold himself out to be a solicitor, and dismissed the case.—The chairman advised him to be more careful in his mode of drawing up letters in future. —Mr. Cotching said this was a case of great importance to the Incorporated Law Society, and he asked the magistrates to state a case for a superior Court.—The bench granted the application.

POLICE.

STREET MUSIC—SALVATION ARMY.

At Lambeth, on December 15, William Burgess, a member of the Salvation Army, appeared to a summons taken out by Mr A. W. Wright, landlord of the Queen Tavern, Neate Street, Camberwell, for unlawfully playing upon an instrument after being requested to desist by the complainant. Mr. Sydney, in opening the case, said that for some time past members of the 'army' had been in the habit on Sundays of meeting just outside the house of the complainant. The complainant had spoken to them on several occasions, and had asked them to desist from playing and singing, but despite this they continued to act in such a manner as to cause great annoyance to complainant and others in the neighbourhood. The complainant had used every effort to obtain the names and addresses of some of the members of the 'army,' but only obtained fictitious names and addresses. On Sunday, November 29, shortly after two o'clock in the afternoon, a number of the members of the 'army' assembled close to the complainant's house. A few minutes afterwards more members arrived having musical instruments with them, the defendant playing a cornet. The complainant, who was accompanied by a constable, asked the defendant to desist. He took no notice, but continued to blow the cornet for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour.—Mr. Richardson contended that, according to the opening statement of Mr. Sydney, there was no case to answer, and urged that the Act of Parliament referred to 'street musicians' and 'street singers,' and did not apply to such persons as the defendant.—Mr. Hopkins said he would hear the evidence before giving an opinion.—The complainant was then called, and gave evidence bearing out the statement of Mr. Sydney.—In cross-examination the complainant denied that there was any counter-demonstration against the 'army.' No bags of flour were thrown. He did not know that on a previous occasion Herbert Booth had mud thrown at him, or that red ochre was thrown on another occasion.—Mr. Richardson submitted that no offence had been proved under the Act, which was meant to deal with musicians playing instruments in the streets for gain. He added that a large amount of crime was caused by drink, and that the complainant was a man who lived by selling drink chiefly to the poor.—Mr. Hopkins said such an observation showed that the defendant and others went to the place to annoy and hinder the complainant in his business.—Mr. Richardson said the 'army' or its members went there, not because it was a publichouse, but because it was a convenient street corner. —Mr. Hopkins, after hearing arguments on both sides, said it had been put forward that a Salvation Army musician was not a street musician, but he had no difficulty in holding that he came within the meaning of the Act. It was also urged that the Salvation Army ought not to be moved on by a publican, because he was carrying on a trade which was the cause of crime. He had no hesitation in saying that such an argument ought not to be listened to for one moment. He considered the offence proved, and ordered the defendant to pay a fine of 10*s.* and 2*s.* costs.—Mr. Richardson asked his Worship to state a case for a superior Court, but Mr. Hopkins refused to do so.—Mr. H. J. Sydney, solicitor to the South London Licensed Victuallers Protection Society, prosecuted; and Mr. Richardson, solicitor, defended.

CHRISTMAS VACATION NOTICE.

There will be no sitting in Court during the Christmas Vacation.

During Christmas Vacation all applications which may require to be immediately or promptly heard are to be made until December 31 to the Honourable Mr. Justice Collins, and afterwards to the Honourable Mr. Justice Jeune.

Mr. Justice Collins will act as vacation judge from Tuesday, December 22, to Thursday, December 31, both days inclusive. His lordship will sit in Queen's Bench Judges' Chambers on Wednesday, December 23, and Thursday, December 31. On other days, within the above period, applications in urgent Chancery matters may be made to his lordship at 3 Bramham Gardens, Earl's Court, S.W.

Mr. Justice Jeune will act as vacation judge from Friday, January 1, to Saturday, January 9, both days inclusive. His lordship will sit in Queen's Bench Judges' Chambers on Wednesday, January 6, and Thursday, January 7. On other days, within the above period, applications in Chancery matters may be made to his lordship at Arlington Manor, Newbury.

In any case of great urgency the brief of counsel may be sent to the judge by book post or parcel, prepaid, accompanied by office copies of the affidavits in support of the application, and also by a minute, on a separate sheet of paper, signed by counsel, of the order he may consider the applicant entitled to, and also an envelope, capable of receiving the papers, addressed as follows: 'Chancery Official Letter: To the Registrar in Vacation, Chancery Registrars' Chambers, Royal Courts of Justice, London, W.C.'

On applications for injunctions, in addition to the above, a copy of the writ, and a certificate of writ issued, must also be sent.

The papers sent to the judge will be returned to the registrar.

The chambers of Mr. Justice Kekewich will be open, for Vacation business only, from 11 to 2 on Thursday, December 24; Tuesday, December 29; Wednesday, December 30; Thursday, December 31; Friday, January 1; Tuesday, January 5; and Wednesday, January 6.

Chancery Registrars' Chambers,

Royal Courts of Justice: Dec. 12, 1891.

THE SESSIONS AT NEWINGTON.

On Saturday, December 12, Mr. Somes took his seat in the second Court at the Sessions House, Newington Causeway, for the purpose of continuing a part-heard case of alleged dealing in bogus cheques. Two full juries were in attendance. Several counsel occupied the benches allotted to them, and witnesses and police were present, when a telegram arrived from Sir Peter Edlin stating that the Court could not sit without further instructions, as it was understood that one Court would be sitting at Clerkenwell, while he would preside in the first Court at Newington. When the judge arrived matters could be carried no further, and, after a delay of nearly two hours, Mr. Somes announced that a message had just arrived stating that a second Court was sitting at Clerkenwell, and as only two Courts could sit at once under the terms of the Act, he must adjourn his sitting until Monday. Upon this, Mr. F. J. Lowe, rising to address the Court as the mouthpiece of the barristers present, said he was quite sure that no one present in Court held Mr. Somes in any way responsible for this, but he thought it only right, in the interest of every one assembled there for the administration of justice, to protest in the strongest possible manner against the possibility of the recurrence of such a state of affairs and against the continual waste of public time occurring at these sessions. It was very hard for the professional men engaged, who were afraid to enter into engagements, not knowing if they could fulfil them; it was very hard to have witnesses brought there day after day at great expense and inconvenience, and kept hanging about in the none too healthy atmosphere of public Courts; but he protested still more earnestly on behalf of the jury, who were summoned there, frequently from distant parts of the country, and who had to give their services day after day without any reward whatever for the discharge of the duties imposed upon them; and seeing that was so he thought every one present would agree with him when he said that it was disgraceful that they should be told to come there that morning to continue a part-heard case and then be sent away and ordered to come again on Monday, having wasted a morning, which they might have devoted to their various avocations, and which might be of vast importance to them. He took it that the day was practically spoilt for them, and all this because of the stupid technicality which prevented more than two Courts sitting in the county of London at the same time. Several of the jury complained not only that they had been summoned for three successive sessions, but that the same irregularities had been going on during the whole of the three months that they had given their attendance there, and that the same objections were being made by everybody as to the fitful way in which the sessions at the south side of the water were being held. Mr. Somes observed that he sympathised with what had been said, but regretted his inability to alter the state of affairs. A conference afterwards took place between the bar, the jury, and others concerned with a view to remedying the irregularities so long complained of.

THE WESLEYANS AT EASTBOURNE.

MR. F. ALLEN, of Beachy College, Eastbourne, has received the following letter from Mr. R. W. Perks, lay secretary of the committee of privileges of the Wesleyan Conference, in regard to the action of the watch committee of the Eastbourne Corporation in prohibiting street meetings in the town on Sundays: '9 Clement's Lane, Lombard Street, London, E.C., December 14. My dear Sir,—Perhaps you are aware that the Wesleyan minister at Eastbourne has written to the Rev. J. E. Clapham, my colleague, asking his advice as to whether the services conducted by the Wesleyan authorities at Eastbourne should not temporarily be suspended pending the corporation coming to some satisfactory arrangement with the Salvation Army. This, of course, is a very serious step to take, and I have told Mr. Clapham that I do not think that such a course should be adopted without calling together our committee of privileges, which I have suggested should be summoned for Monday next to decide this very serious question. It is, perhaps, not generally known that the clause inserted in the Eastbourne Local Act was passed by a committee of three members of Parliament, and on the casting vote of one of the three, who is an extreme ecclesiastic in his opinions. The subject itself was never discussed in the House of Commons, and I think there is very little doubt that, when the bill which is now being promoted for the repeal of the Eastbourne clause comes before the House of Commons, the House will adopt precisely the same course with reference to Eastbourne as it adopted with regard to an equally favourably situated town—namely, Torquay. To admit at the present juncture the right of the town council to stop open-air services in places where there is no interference with public traffic would be the admission of a very extraordinary power, because, if this can be done now, it can be done at any future time, and if your town council were ever constituted of extreme sectarians, whether Church of England or any other denomination, they might take it into their heads to prohibit any outdoor services in your town. There is no knowing where a power of this sort may stop, and how it may be abused, and while perhaps one cannot entirely sympathise with the course which has been pursued by the Salvation Army in Eastbourne, yet I very much doubt whether the Wesleyan community as a body would do anything at the present juncture to weaken the cause of the Salvationists and to increase the powers which appear to be used so despotically by the town council of Eastbourne. Those of us who are at a distance cannot help feeling that, if the town council had wisely decided to deal with the Salvation Army at the outset, they would have been able to do so and would not have allowed mob rule to gain the upper hand.—Yours truly, R. W. PERKS.' The correspondence has been forwarded to the watch committee.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING.—Mr. Justice Stirling has now recovered from his recent illness, and has left town for the country.

A JUDICIAL DICTIONARY.—'The Judicial Dictionary of Words and Phrases Judicially Interpreted,' by F. Stroud, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, published by Sweet & Maxwell, London, is one comely volume of about 1,000 pages. This is evidently a very complete work. Extracts from judicial opinions are very frequent but very concise, and the results are generally stated rather than the discussion leading up to them. Such a work could only be the outcome of many years' research and of a talent for wise selection and pointed and pregnant statement. In this way a single paragraph of half a page boils down and expresses the juice of a great number of cases. Mr. Stroud is a master of this sort of statement.—Albany Law Journa

Wednesday, December 23.—Court of Appeal No. 2: Mr. Carrington. Mr. Justice Chitty: Mr. Pugh. Mr. Justice North: Mr. Ward. Mr. Justice Stirling: Mr. Jackson. Mr. Justice Kekewich: Mr. Godfrey. Mr. Justice Romer: Mr. Rolt.

The Christmas Vacation will commence on Thursday, December 24, 1891, and terminate on Wednesday, January 6, 1892, both days inclusive.

WILL OF MR. PARNELL.—Letters of administration of the personal estate of Mr. Charles Stewart Parnell, who died on October 6, aged forty-five years, intestate, have been granted to his wife, Mrs. Katherine Parnell, of 10 Walsingham Terrace, Brighton, by whom the gross value of his personal estate has been sworn at 11,774*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, and the net value at 6,252*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* The parties to the administration bond are Mrs. Parnell, Mr. Rochfort Maguire, M.P., of 10 Park Lane, and Mr. Henry Harrison, M.P., of 10 Walsingham Terrace, Brighton.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL SCHEMES IN PARLIAMENT.—Under their General Powers Bill, deposited by the County Council, power is sought to carry out street improvements in Cromwell Road and in Spitalfields, to acquire land in Clerkenwell for fire brigade purposes, to exchange land at the southern end of Peckham Rye for certain other land adjoining Peckham Rye Common, to purchase Fairseat House, Highgate, adjoining Waterlow Park, for the purpose of dedicating the same to the recreation and enjoyment of the public, to purchase Lincoln's Inn Fields gardens, and to extend the time for the compulsory purchase of land for the purposes of the Blackwall Tunnel works. With regard to water supply, both the County Council and the Corporation of the City have deposited bills providing for the appointment of a water committee, with power to promote schemes in Parliament for the acquisition, construction, and maintenance of waterworks in order to afford a new or supplemental supply of water to the metropolis, to acquire or lease existing or future waterworks, providing for the dissolution and winding up of any water company, and for these purposes to raise further capital. Powers are also sought for making and enforcing regulations similar to those now issued by the existing water companies as to the character and material of all fittings and appliances, and to enable the county council and the corporation to hold public or private inquiries into the existing supply of water within the metropolitan area, together with the charges made for the same, and into any possible future sources of supply. By another bill it is sought to empower the London Financial Association, the Middlesex County Council, the Corporation of London, the London County Council, and the Hornsey, Tottenham, and Wood Green Local Boards to purchase or lease the Alexandra Palace and grounds. While the county council, in its Subways Bill requires the several gas and water, telephone, and electric light companies to make use of subways for the reception of all their mains, pipes, and wires, the National Telephone Company ask to be allowed to erect additional overhead wires.

Mr. Thomas Brett, B.A., LL.B., of the Middle Temple, has been appointed a Member of the Board of Examiners to the New Council of Legal Education for the Bar.

We are reminded of the new year by the Sun Fire and Life Offices, who have sent us some excellent specimens of decorative art. Evidently the sun is shining at 40 Chancery Lane.

Commercial Failures.—According to Kemp's Mercantile Gazette, the number of failures in England and Wales gazetted during the week ending December 12 was 98. The number in the corresponding week of last year was seventy-four, showing an increase of twenty-four, being a net increase in 1891 to date of 168.

St. Helens and District Law Society.—Mr. Thomas Brewis, president of the St. Helens and District Law Society, entertained the members and honorary members of that society to dinner on the 4th inst., at the Town Hall, St. Helens. Among the guests were his Worship the Mayor (Councillor F. R. D. Nuttall), the deputy mayor (Councillor Edward Johnson), Mr. H. Seton Karr, M.P., Mr. W. R. Kennedy, Q.C., Mr. W. F. Taylor, Mr. Registrar Tyrer, and Messrs. Robert Cook, James Cook, H. L. Riley, J. O. Swift, James Malkin, Geo. Davidson, J. W. Green, W. J. Jeeves, S. C. Samuels, H. S. Oppenheim, Bertram Brewis, Joseph Massey, G. T. Lee, and Ben H. Lomax. A very pleasant evening was spent, and the following toasts were honoured: 'The Queen,' 'The Houses of Parliament,' 'The St. Helens and District Law Society,' 'The Magistrates,' 'The Bench and Bar,' 'The Mayor and Corporation of St. Helens,' and the toast of 'The President' was received with musical honours.

The Solicitor-General and the Eastbourne Act.—Mr. Addison, Q.C., M.P., who has written to his constituents favouring the repeal of clause 169 of the Eastbourne Act, has been encouraged in this action by receiving the following letter from Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., M.P.: 'My dear Addison,—I do not wonder that you are hearing from your constituents about the Eastbourne troubles, for they involve what is, to my mind, a very important question. The bye-law which, in its enforcement, has caused so much disorder, was no doubt adopted by Parliament after consideration by a small committee, the attention of the House of Commons not being called to this particular point. I think it a serious and unjustifiable interference with a public right. If street processions are so carried on as to create a public nuisance they are punishable by the ordinary law, or a bye-law can be made under the powers of the Municipal Corporations Act, providing for summary procedure and punishment. If they do not create a nuisance they ought not to be prevented. It is absurd to say the Salvation Army processions necessarily constitute a public nuisance. At Folkestone, a few years ago, there were serious riots, and the Skeleton Army followed and ill-treated the Salvationists, but the local authorities did their duty; substantial punishments were inflicted on the rioters, and now there is no disturbance or trouble of any kind. The Salvation Army procession passes along certain streets once a day, and people living in those streets hear for three or four minutes the sound of their instruments and their hymns. At Torquay, while a bye-law existed similar to that at Eastbourne, there were very great disturbances. Fortunately, an opportunity was offered for the repeal of the bye-law, and now the whole difficulty has disappeared. I hope you will help to repeal this exceptional law. The rights of public meeting and public procession are so important that I look with great jealousy on any attempt to limit or infringe them.—I am, my dear Addison, very faithfully yours, Edward Clarke.'

The Law Courts.—The judges will rise for the Christmas Vacation on Monday, the 21st inst., after which there will be no further sittings in Court until Monday, January 11, when the Hilary Sittings begin. Mr. Justice Collins and Mr. Justice Jeune will be the vacation judges, and the former will be in attendance at Queen's Bench Judges' Chambers on Wednesday, the 23rd, and Thursday, the 31st inst., while the latter will attend there on Thursday and Friday, January 7 and 8 respectively.

Law in the Malay Protected States.—The mail from Singapore has brought to the Colonial Office a petition from the Chamber of Commerce and the Singapore branch of the Straits Association, setting out that the merchants, bankers, traders, and other British residents in the Straits Settlements are largely interested in the progress of the native States of the Malay Peninsula under the British protection, and that a large part of the capital invested in those States is the property of British subjects, European and Asiatic. In the colony the petitioners allege that there exists a feeling of misgiving and distrust respecting the administration of the law by the Courts of the protected native States, and it is believed that this has a prejudicial effect in checking the flow of capital into them. The Indian penal code is generally adopted throughout these States as a basis on which offences are defined and punished. But a want of certainty is believed to exist in that respect also, and there is but little confidence in the administration of the criminal law, both on account of the close connection of the executive with the judicial officers as well as of the want of legal experience and training on the part of the officers entrusted with this duty. All the protected native States, it is said, refuse to allow litigants to be represented by counsel in either civil or criminal cases, no matter how large the interests involved or how great the gravity of the offence. In the early days of British protection such an administration of justice sufficed, but it is now insufficient for the large interests involved. As a large majority of cases coming before these Courts will be likely to continue to be of small importance, and therefore any great alteration in their constitution is perhaps hardly practicable, the remedy suggested is to give to British subjects a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements in cases both civil and criminal. In civil cases such appeals might be restricted by the amount involved, and in criminal appeals to offences of a certain gravity. It is suggested that the privilege of appeal might be allowed only when the sum at issue in the suit is not less than 1,500 dollars, or where the appellant is convicted of an offence carrying a maximum penalty of not less than six months' imprisonment.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1891.

'OBITER DICTA.'

ACCORDING to the latest accounts, the health of Mr. Justice Hawkins has greatly benefited by his stay in the South of France. It is stated that his lordship hopes to return to London about the middle of January. The learned judge having been appointed in November, 1876, is now entitled to his pension, but there seems little reason to suppose that he contemplates retirement just at present. Should the state of his health permit, the learned judge will probably take his seat in Court early next sittings.

MR JUSTICE MATHEW has earned golden opinions for the ability and expedition with which he has disposed of Mr. Justice Stirling's list of witness actions. Mr. Justice Williams, who acted as an additional judge of the Chancery Division in the summer, also gave great satisfaction in that capacity. The selection of these two learned judges was a very judicious one, for, without any disrespect to the other judges of the Queen's Bench Division, it is certain that few of them would have performed the duties of a Chancery judge with the same speed and ability.

THE Law Times is of opinion that Mr. Justice Denman 'went a little too far in saying he would have sketching barristers turned out of Court' in Osborne v. Hargreave and Wife. Perhaps the threat was a little too strong, but we cannot help thinking that the interposition of the learned judge was well advised. One of the many duties of a judge is to protect witnesses from annoyance, primarily because the evidence of a perfectly calm witness makes better material for the Court to act on; and, secondarily, because on grounds of humanity the position of witnesses ought to be made as little disquieting as possible. Now out of every ten witnesses it is quite conceivable that one or two would very much dislike being sketched while giving their evidence.

THE letter of the Solicitor-General to Mr. Addison, Q.C., in connection with the 'Eastbourne troubles,' which we published last week (ante, p. 794), is a very remarkable one. 'If street processions,' writes the Solicitor-General, 'are so carried on as to create a public nuisance, they are punishable by the ordinary law, or a bye-law can be made under the powers of the Municipal Corporations Act, providing for summary procedure and punishment.' The reference is to section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which substantially re-enacts sections 90 and 91 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, and provides that the council of any municipal borough 'may from time to time make such bye-laws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the borough.' In Johnson v. The Mayor of Croydon, 55 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 117, it was held that a bye-law under the Act to the effect that 'no person not being a member of Her Majesty's Army or auxiliary forces acting under the orders of his commanding officer should sound or play upon any musical instrument in any of the streets in the borough on Sunday,' was held unreasonable and ultra vires, and therefore void. Section 169 of the Eastbourne Improvement Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. clxv.), enacts that 'no procession shall take place on a Sunday in any street or public place in the borough accompanied by any instrumental music, fireworks, discharge of cannon or firearms or other disturbing noise, provided that the foregoing prohibitions shall not apply to any of Her Majesty's naval, military, or volunteer forces.' Is there not strong ground for saying that a bye-law following the exact terms of this enactment would be a good bye-law for preventing a nuisance?

THE Solicitor General's letter is singularly unhappy in its tone and temper. Pressure of official and private work may possibly have prevented Sir E. Clarke from following with attention the actual course of events, but his implied censure on the local authorities strikes us as totally unwarranted. The Standard, in a recent leader, made no secret of the surprise and regret caused by the utterances of a law officer of the Crown on this subject, and more will probably be heard of it when Parliament meets.

A somewhat curious and technical decision upon the question of specially indorsed writs is to be found in our Notes of Cases, p. 179, in the case of Elliott v. Roberts. In that case the plaintiff indorsed his writ for the amount of a dishonoured bill of exchange, and added a claim for interest on the amount 'at the rate of 25 per cent. per annum from the date hereof until payment or judgment.' He then applied under Order XIV. for leave to sign judgment. Objection was taken that the writ was not specially indorsed within the meaning of Order III., rule 6, by reason of the claim for interest, and the judge at chambers was so far impressed with the argument that he struck out that part of the claim and gave leave to sign judgment for the amount of the bill. This course was clearly wrong, because Order XIV. only applies where a defendant appears to a specially indorsed writ, and consequently no change made in the writ after the defendant's appearance can affect the matter (Gurney v. Small, 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 774). The question, therefore, for the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Mathew, before whom the matter came on appeal, was whether the writ as it originally stood was specially indorsed. In spite of section 57 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which says that the damages recoverable upon the dishonour of a bill are to be deemed liquidated, and in spite of cases in which writs containing a claim for interest have been held to be specially indorsed, the Court allowed the defendant's appeal. The ground of the decision was that the indorsement did not show that the rate of 25 per cent., at which interest was claimed, was the rate reserved in the bill, and that words should have been added to make this clear; and the lesson to be drawn from the case is that the Courts will not allow a plaintiff to avail himself of this summary procedure unless he brings himself with the utmost technical preciseness within the strict words of the rules by which it is governed.

A correspondent of the Solicitors' Journal draws attention to the fact that leases of property belonging to the City of London companies frequently contain covenants that all assignments and underleases shall be drawn by officials of the lessor companies, they (the officials) 'taking reasonable satisfaction for their pains in that behalf.' 'As a rule,' it is stated, 'the clerks to the companies will generally accept a fee, ranging from three to five guineas, for waiving their right to prepare the assignment or other instrument.' 'But why,' it is very pertinently asked, 'should a man be compelled to pay a fee for employing his own solicitor?' We have no hesitation in describing the covenant as disgraceful and oppressive, and we hope that Mr. Bolton, when he reintroduces his bill dealing with relief against forfeiture for assignment without leave of the lessor, will see his way effectually to rendering it inoperative. We much doubt, however, whether a Court would require compensation in money, as a condition of relief, to be made by a lessee for a breach of such an absurd covenant, even under the present law. For what possible damages to the lessor can result from the breach? Damages to the lessor's servant, no doubt, may result, but that is a very different thing.

Section 80 of the Larceny Act, 1861, with an offence against which a member of Parliament has recently, to his great surprise, been charged, is rather a remarkable one, forming one of a string of twelve sections of that Act directed against 'frauds by agents, bankers, or factors.' It is first provided by section 75 that any agent, &c. fraudulently appropriating money, &c. entrusted to him 'shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable' to penal servitude for not more than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than two, with or without hard labour; but it is added that 'nothing in this section relating to agents shall affect any trustee under any instrument in respect of any act done by such trustee in relation to the property comprised in any such trust.' Then follow four sections dealing with frauds by various kinds of agents, and subjecting the offenders against them 'to any of the punishments which the Court may award as hereinbefore mentioned.' Then comes section 80, by which 'whosoever, being a trustee of any property for the use of some other person, shall, with intent to defraud, convert or appropriate the same to his own use, or otherwise dispose of or destroy such property, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to any of the punishments which the Court may award as hereinbefore last mentioned.' Two provisoes follow: (1) that no prosecution may be commenced 'for any offence included' in the section without the sanction of the Attorney-General, and (2) that 'where any civil proceeding shall have been taken against any person' to whom 'the provisions of the section may apply,' no person who shall have taken such civil proceedings 'shall commence any prosecution' under the section 'without the sanction of the Court or judge before whom such civil proceedings shall have been had or shall be pending.' A charge of an offence against the section is one on which the justice of the peace before whom it is brought has an absolute discretion to grant or refuse bail, by virtue of section 121 of the Larceny Act as read with 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 23, and 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, ss. 22, 25, the short effect of which is that bail may be allowed or refused at discretion in all cases where the expenses of the prosecution may be defrayed out of the county rates, and that the expenses of the prosecution of any offence made indictable by the Larceny Act may be so defrayed.

The House of Lords has unanimously affirmed the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal in The Mogul Steamship Company v. M'Gregor, Gow & Co., 58 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 465, to the effect that, as Lord Justice Bowen put it in his luminous judgment, 'competition in trade, however severe and egotistical, if unattended by circumstances of dishonesty, intimidation, molestation, or other illegalities, gives rise to no cause of action at common law.' That this judgment is correct in principle we have no doubt, but inasmuch as it does not affect to overrule the decision of a Court of Error in the celebrated case of Hilton v. Eckersley, 25 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 190, but rather affirms that decision, it is of material importance to distinguish the two, and to point out that whereas in The Mogul Steamship Case the action was by sufferers from the contract alleged to be illegal against the contractors for a tort, in Hilton v. Eckersley the action was by one contractor against the others upon the contract which the Court held to be illegal and, therefore, not enforceable at law. In Hilton v. Eckersley the defendant and seventeen other obligors, being mill owners at Wigan, mutually agreed by bond to pay such wages only as the majority of them should decide for a period of twelve weeks. The Court of Queen's Bench, and afterwards the Exchequer Chamber, held that this bond was in restraint of trade, and therefore illegal and void, inasmuch as it tended to restrain each man's power of carrying on his trade according to his own discretion for his own best advantage. It was argued, however, that the stipulations of the bond, otherwise illegal, were prevented from being so considered by the fact that a counter combination existed amongst the workmen, the object of the bond being to counteract the combination, and to set the willing and industrious workmen free from its powers. But the Court held that this would only be to put one wrong as counterbalancing another wrong; 'to place the industrious workman in the fearful situation of being oppressed by a majority of masters, in order to prevent him from being oppressed by a majority of his fellow-workmen.' And the law as thus enunciated has not been affected by the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, for that Act merely enacts that 'an agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done, any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute between employers and workmen shall not be indictable as a conspiracy, if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime.'

Truth is a little hard on Dr. Forrest, the rector of St. Jude's, Kensington, who not long ago was appointed to the Deanery of Worcester, in insinuating that the very reverend gentleman was enjoying the emoluments of both offices at the same time. As we read the First Fruits Acts, the first year's emoluments of every spiritual office are payable, not to the holder of it, but to the treasurers of Queen Anne's Bounty for the benefit of poor livings. There are, no doubt, abatements, first established generally by 1 Eliz. c. 4, s. 6 (under which first fruits, afterwards diverted to Queen Anne's Bounty, belonged to the Crown) and afterwards applied to 'deans, archdeacons, prebendaries, and other dignitaries, by 6 Anne, c. 54, for the benefit of such spiritual persons as by death or promotion should hold their offices for very short periods, but the Legislature in 1 Eliz. c. 4 clearly provides that 'Yf yt shall happen any suche "person" to lyve to thende of twoo hole yeres next after the last advoydance of his promotion spuall, and not to bee lawfully evicted, remooved, or put from the same,' the whole of the first fruits—that is, the whole of the profits of his first year of office—become lost to him.

THE second edition of the 'Statutes Revised' is proceeding very slowly, and the working men, for sale to public libraries accessible to whom (see preface to vol. i. p. iv.) the edition is being mainly provided, must experience great disappointment at the tardiness with which their expectations of being able to peruse the whole statute law in convenient shape are being realised. In November, 1888, the edition was announced in the preface as being expected to be completed 'within three or four years'; more than three years have elapsed since then, and only four volumes have yet appeared. These volumes, no doubt, bring the edition down to so late a period as 1830, but it is obvious that the number of statutes which will require republication as being unrepealed will increase with every year, and at the present rate of progress it is doubtful whether the nineteenth century or the second edition of the 'Statutes Revised' will come to an end first. Considering that any Statute Law Revision Bills which it may still be considered expedient to pass will be doing the work of revision a second time, it may well be asked whether it is worth while to continue passing such bills. Why should not the volumes covering the period from 1830 to 1890 be issued all in one goodly bunch at once, without waiting for any more Statute Law Revision Bills? Thus would the working men acquire at once a collection less technically exact indeed, but for all practical purposes as good as any Statute Law Revision Bills could make it. We may add that the edition, which is the work of Mr. G. A. R. Fitzgerald, appears to us to have been very well done as far as it goes.

IN these days of agricultural depression it would be a subject for regret if the technicalities of the law stood in the way of the peasant utilising his farm in the most profitable way where he is not tied down by express contract to any particular form of culture or rotation of crops. In Meux v. Cobley, reported in our Notes of Cases for this week, p. 186, the tenant holding a farm under an agricultural lease for the term of twenty-one years was engaging in the culture under glass of tomatoes, grapes, and other garden produce. Under his lease he was bound to cultivate the farm in a good, proper, and husbandlike manner, according to the best rules of husbandry practised in the neighbourhood, but without any other restriction as far as the terms of the lease went. The farm was situate at Cheshunt and Enfield. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the cultivation of garden produce under glass and the erection of the necessary houses were not prohibited by the character or terms of the lease. The only other point was whether these acts amounted to waste. The old common law doctrine on this head is very technical, and it was argued that the conversion of arable land into market garden and glass-houses was a complete alteration of the demised premises, and fell within the definition of 'waste.' Possibly the argument is technically right, though there may be a question whether the legislation as to tenants' improvements contained in the Agricultural Holdings Acts has not modified the common law even where the improvement, being made without the landlord's consent, is not the subject of compensation. Mr. Justice Kekewich, however, did not think it necessary to go into this, as he was of opinion that, even if technically the tenant's acts amounted to waste, it was of the class known as 'ameliorating waste,' and caused no injury, but, on the contrary, a distinct advantage to the inheritance, and in respect of which, therefore, no damage was incurred, and no injunction would be granted.

The Factory and Workshop Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75), contains no less than forty-one sections, amending in very numerous particulars the great Consolidating Act of 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), which in only 107 sections and five schedules strings together, with little amendment, the multitudinous statutes on the subject from Mr. Addington's Act of 1801 (42 Geo. III. c. 73) to the Factory Act, 1874. It need hardly be said that the general tendency of the new Act is in favour of the workmen employed in factories and workshops. The most important of the enactments we take to be those of section 24, which direct certain important particulars to be supplied to workmen who are paid by the piece, either as weavers in the cotton, worsted, or woollen or linen or jute trade, or as winders, weavers, or reelers in the cotton trade. 'Every such workman,' says the Legislature, 'shall have supplied to him with his work sufficient particulars to enable him to ascertain the rate of wages at which he is entitled to be paid for his work, and the occupier of the factory or workshop shall supply him with such particulars accordingly.' The word 'entitled' is a very curious one. No person can be entitled to be paid anything except by contract express or implied. In the absence of express contract, there would be an implied contract by the master, on exhibiting or delivering the piece, to pay what was reasonable. Does the Act mean that the master cannot stipulate for payment of any but the wages which other masters are giving? We think not, and construe the Act as meaning that, though all information is to be given, the power to make express contracts remains as before. But the subject is a very difficult one to deal with by law, as is shown by a proviso to the section, that 'in the event of anyone who is engaged as an operative in any factory or workshop receiving such particulars, and subsequently disclosing the same with a fraudulent object or for the purpose of gain, whether they be furnished directly to him or to a fellow-workman, he shall be liable for each offence to a fine not exceeding 10*l*.'

Out of the seventy-six public Acts of Parliament which received the royal assent the greater number came into operation at the date of such assent. This is the case, for instance, with such important statutes as the Penal Servitude Act, the Forged Transfers Act, the Foreign Marriage Act, the Custody of Children Act, the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, the Lunacy Act, the Savings Banks Act, and the Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Act. Amongst statutes, the commencement of which was postponed, may be mentioned the Education Act, which received the royal assent on August 5, and commenced on September 1, the two Stamp Acts, the Factory and Workshop Act, and the Public Health (London) Act, which also received the royal assent on August 5, but do not commence till January 1 next, and the Land Registry (Middlesex Deeds) Act, which does not commence till April 1 next. The Tithe Act, by section 10, extends 'to every sum on account of tithe rent-charge,' which first became payable 'on or after the half-yearly day of payment of such tithe rent-charge' which occurred next after the passing of the Act, 'whether such sum accrued before or after that day.' The Act passed so far back as March 26, and is probably now in full operation throughout the greater part of the country, though questions might arise as to the date of its commencement in cases where quarterly collections have long been discontinued, and the whole amount due collected annually in one lump sum.

Not only to lawyers and sanitary authorities, but to members of the public at large, some of the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, should be made known. In former days people were more careless as to spreading infection, and one used to hear of patients mixing with their friends when scarlet fever had caused their skin to peel and they were really centres of contagion. Public conveyances were supposed to be peculiarly liable to promote disease, as invalids would be likely to drive in them. Section 70 makes it illegal for a driver to convey a person suffering from a dangerous infectious disease, and for such a person to go in a public conveyance. The driver is not liable unless he knowingly conveys, but the fare evidently has the risk cast on him as to his state of health, and as nothing is said about his knowledge, he is presumably responsible, though he believes himself to be free from infection. But the care of the law not only surrounds us in omnibuses, cabs, and trains, but even in our walks, for section 68 makes anyone liable to a fine of 5*l*. who, 'while suffering from any dangerous infectious disease wilfully exposes himself without proper precautions against spreading the said disease in any street, public place, shop, or inn.' A fine of 10*l*. can be exacted from a person who, though he knows that he is suffering from a dangerous infectious disease, engages in any occupation connected with food or carries on any trade or business so as to be likely to spread the disease (section 69). Milk is especially likely to be a medium for infection, and it is well to feel that there is this protection against cows being milked by persons who would cause their illness to pass to the drinkers of the milk. One of the things that shocks sanitary reformers much is the way in which the poor retain their dead in their living-rooms. Section 72 provides that the body of anyone who has died of a dangerous infectious disease shall not remain unburied for more than forty-eight hours elsewhere than in a room not used as a dwelling-place, sleeping-place, or work-room; and by section 88 every sanitary authority has to provide and fit up a proper place for the reception of dead bodies before interment. Section 96 makes it necessary for occupiers of underground rooms, not let or occupied separately as dwellings before this Act, to observe a long list of sanitary requisites. Sanitas, sanitas, omnia sanitas!

A DESK AND ITS CONTENTS.

There is a charming simplicity in a bequest of 'my old mahogany desk, with the contents thereof,' which, however, though possibly attractive to the lay mind, will to the lawyer always appear to seal a commission to a blank of danger. One risk in this form of bequest, which is pointed out by Mr. Justice Chitty in the case to which we immediately refer, is that during a last illness valuables may easily be put in a desk for safety by some person other than the testator with perfectly honest intentions. But, assuming the actual contents to be those which the testator was aware of, it will always be more or less arguable whether the contents are of a kind to pass under the specific disposition. We are led to these remarks by a perusal of the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty in In re Robson; Robson v. Hamilton, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 851, where the 'old mahogany desk,' which was disposed of to the testator's nephew in the terms we have quoted, contained the following things: First, banknotes and cash in silver; secondly, a banker's deposit receipt, an unindorsed cheque payable to the testator's order, and unindorsed promissory notes, also payable to his order; and, thirdly, the key of a tin box in which the testator kept securities and other papers. The banknotes and cash, it was admitted, would pass under the bequest, but the residuary legatees contended that the remaining contents of the desk did not pass. As regards the second class of contents, the choses in action, the argument against their inclusion was that these were mere evidence of title to property elsewhere, and would not pass under a gift, for instance, of chattels in a house, for which proposition Chapman v. Hart, 1 Ves. Sen. 271, and several other old authorities were cited. Mr. Justice Chitty, however, held that the choses in action, whether they required indorsement by the executors or not, passed under the bequest, but not the tin box or its contents, the key of which was found in the desk. That, he remarked, was a mere accessory to the tin box, and added: 'I hold this as I should have held that the title-deeds found in the desk did not pass the land to which they related, being merely accessories to the title to the land.' Amongst other cases referred to was that of Roberts v. Kuffin, 2 Atk. 112, decided by Lord Hardwicke in 1740. There a testator gave 'all goods and things of every kind and sort which shall be found in my closet at the time of my death.' Lord Hardwicke thought the sum of 45*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* 'in money' found in the closet did not pass under this bequest, because 'goods' would mean such things as are usually kept in a closet, and 'things' ought to be cut down by the ejusdem generis rule to similar things. He also observed that the 'testator would certainly have mentioned cabinet or bureau or any other thing where money is usually kept if he had intended a further bequest of money.' The main argument against the inclusion in similar bequests of choses in action has always been based on the general proposition that a chose in action has no locality. It is obvious, however, that this consideration by no means determines the question of construction, for there may be a sufficient indication on a will to include, from a testator's point of view, under the description of property in a particular place, that which, from a legal point of view, really cannot have any particular locality. This was the view recently taken in In re Prater; Desinge v. Beare, 57 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 342; L. R. 37 Chanc. Div. 481, where the Court of Appeal held that a bequest of 'half my property at Rothschild's bank' passed not only a moiety of the testator's cash balance, but also a moiety of the property represented by certificates for French rentes nominatives, inscribed in the testator's name, for actions nominatives of the Paris and Lyons Railway Company, which were also registered in the testator's name, and for actions au porteur of the same company and transferable by mere delivery, which certificates the bankers held in their hands for safe custody at the time of the testator's death. Mr. Justice Chitty in this case had decided that the cash balance only passed by the bequest, and excluded the certificates; but his judgment on the latter point was reversed by the Court of Appeal, which did not feel itself much trammelled by the old authorities. The modern view of the subject appears to us to be well expressed by Lord Justice Bowen. He says: 'The question we have to decide is the meaning to be given in this will to the words "my property at Rothschild's bank." We have been pressed with a great many cases of gifts of property described as situate in, or connected with, a particular locality. . . . With regard to all such cases it seems to me to be important to remember that they must all be decisions upon the language of particular wills. The terms "property at a bank" or "property situate locally at any other place than a bank" is not language which has received or is capable of receiving a stereotyped meaning which is to last for all time and to apply to every will by whomsoever made, but is an expression which must receive light or colour from one or other of two sources, the context and the circumstances of the testator. Though ninety-nine out of one hundred cases in which similar words have been used may have been decided in the same way, they are no authority for the hundredth case if the circumstances and the context in the hundredth case are such as to be sufficient to make a difference in the meaning of the words.'

One other remark may be made as to a bequest of money or other contents of a desk or similar receptacle. It is, from one point of view, as Mr. Justice Chitty observes in In re Robson, an unwise form of gift, for the contents may be moved from time to time, and it operates, of course, only on what is found at the time of the testator's death. This possibility of fluctuation it shares in common with the much more frequent bequest of money at a bank. There is, however, a compensating advantage—viz. that this form of bequest enables a testator, after executing his will without any further testamentary act, to alter and regulate the amount of the benefit he intends to confer on the legatee.

ORDER XI., rule 1 (d), has not yet apparently been the subject of direct judicial consideration, but it would seem from In re Eager (1882) 52 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 56; L. R. 22 Chanc. Div. 86, that service under this clause will not be ordered unless the conditions mentioned in the clause are present in combination.

'(f) Any injunction is sought as to anything to be done within the jurisdiction, or any nuisance within the jurisdiction is sought to be prevented or removed, whether damages are or are not sought in respect thereof.'

All the cases that have been decided under this clause relate either to the question of jurisdiction or to the question of the balance of convenience. We shall deal with these two branches of the subject in turn.

1. The question of jurisdiction.—(a) The injunction need not be the only relief sought by the plaintiff. Thus, in The Lisbon-Berlyn Gold Fields v. Heddle (1885) 52 L. T. 796, the plaintiffs claimed not only an injunction, but also rescission of a certain contract and the return of certain sums of money paid by them in pursuance thereof, and yet an order under the present clause was made. (b) The act which it is sought to restrain must be an act which is to be done within the jurisdiction. It need not apparently be an act which can only be done within the jurisdiction (In re De Penny (1891) 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 518; L. R. 2 Chanc. Div. 63). The judgment of Mr. Justice Manisty in The British Marine Association v. Macinnes, 31 Sol. Jo. 95, seems to have turned on the question not of jurisdiction, but of balance of convenience. In that case his lordship held that Order XI., rule 1 (f) did not apply to restraining a domiciled Scotchman from bringing an action in England where it would be open to him to sue in respect of the same matter in Scotland, but the ratio decidendi was that the injunction would not be effectual. (c) The clause applies only to a present threatened danger (The British Marine Association v. Macinnes). (d) It will be convenient at this point to notice once and for all the scope of and the practice in regard to the words 'within the jurisdiction' which so constantly recur throughout this order. We shall not attempt to exhaust the cases bearing on the interpretation of these words, but shall simply indicate the points which they establish. For the purposes of jurisdiction under Order XI., 'the territory of England and the sovereignty of the Queen stop at low-water mark' (Harris v. The Owners of the Franconia (1877), 46 Law J. Rep. C. P. 363; L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 173 (per Lord Coleridge, C.J.)). An officer on board the Queen's ship is, however, within the jurisdiction even upon the high seas (Seagrove v. Parks (1891), L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 551). The question as to whether a particular act was or is to be done 'within the jurisdiction' is a question partly of law and partly of fact. Thus: (1) A., living at Lincoln, in England, contracts to deliver machinery to the B. Company in the Isle of Man, payment to be made on delivery. The B. Company make default in payment. This is a breach of contract which ought to have been performed in England. It is the duty of the debtor to seek out his creditor, and the contract to pay ought to have been executed at Lincoln (Robey v. Snaefell, &c. Company (1888), 57 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 134; L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 152). (2) In Reynolds v. Coleman (1887), 56 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 903; L. R. 36 Chanc. Div. 453, it was held that Order XI., rule 1 (e), does not require that a contract should state in terms that it is to be performed within the jurisdiction, but it is enough if it appears from a consideration of the terms of the contract and the facts existing when the contract was made that it was intended to be performed within the jurisdiction (cf. Bell & Co. v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line (1891), 60 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 270; L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 103). (3) Where the Court is not satisfied that the act in question was or is to be done 'within the jurisdiction,'* a limitation framed after the model of the order in Diamond v. Sutton (1866), 35 Law J. Rep. Exch. 129; L. R. 1 Exch. 130, is usually inserted in the order allowing service. (Cf. Thomas v. Hamilton (1886), 55 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 555; L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 592.)

2. The question of the balance of convenience.—In considering whether or not the balance of convenience is in favour of a certain action being tried in England, the Courts apply the following among other tests:—

(1) Will a judgment obtained in England by the plaintiff be effectual?

Illustrations.—(a) A. applies for an injunction to restrain B., a domiciled Scotchman, from suing him in England. B. has a right to sue A. in the Scotch Courts in respect of the same subject-matter. An order under Order XI., rule 1 (f), will not be made. The injunction would be ineffectual (The British Marine Association v. Macinnes, ubi sup.). (b) A. alleging that B., a manufacturer resident in Scotland, was passing off his goods as and for those of A. in England by his agents there, applied for leave to serve a writ, claiming an injunction, on B. out of the jurisdiction. Leave was refused by the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Mr. Justice North. 'If an injunction,' said Lord Justice Cotton, 'were granted by an English Court, that Court could not enforce it against the defendant himself, but only against his servants and agents in England, who are not the persons primarily responsible. On the other hand, a Scotch Court could enforce its orders against the defendant himself, and this being so, I think there is no sufficient reason for withdrawing the case from the Scotch Courts' (Marshall v. Marshall (1888), L. R. 38 Chanc. Div. 330). (c) The ratio decidendi of this case does not apply where the defendant in consimili casu is a corporation whose property within the jurisdiction may be attached by sequestration (In re Burland's Trade-mark, (1889), 58 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 591; L. R. 41 Chanc. Div. 542).

(2) What is the extent of the property, if any, in England? Per Mr. Justice Pearson, in The Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Brothers (1885), L. R. 29 Chanc. Div. at p. 246.

(3) The comparative convenience of the respective parties and witnesses.

In Robey v. The Snaefell Mining Company (ubi sup.) an action was brought by the plaintiffs, engine makers in England, for the price of machinery erected by them in the Isle of Man for the defendants, a company carrying on business in the island. Mr. Justice Stephen and Mr. Justice Charles held that, as the plaintiffs were entitled to choose their forum, they might, if they pleased, spare themselves and their witnesses and advocates the possibility of a disagreeable voyage.

4. The 'primâ facie' merits of the case.—D. P., a native of Scotland, went to Bolivia, and died intestate there. A., his widow, commenced an action for administration and an injunction against B. and C., sisters of the deceased, who had been appointed by the Scotch Court his 'executrices dative,' and against G. & Co., D. P.'s agents in England. The confirmation so obtained by B. and C. in Scotland had, pursuant to the Probate Act of 1858, been sealed by the Probate Court in England, notwithstanding that a caveat had been entered on behalf of the plaintiff, and B. and C. thereby became the duly constituted personal representatives of the intestate in England. The main point at issue between the parties was as to whether the domicil of the deceased was Scotch or Bolivian. The Scotch Court had decided in favour of the former, the Bolivian Court in favour of the latter, but in both cases the proceedings were ex parte. Mr. Justice Chitty held that, having regard to the legal position of B. and C., to the fact that the Scotch Court had to some extent seisin of the case, and to the primâ facie case shown for the Scotch domicil, the preponderance of convenience was in favour of Scotland (In re De Penny, 60 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 518; (1891) L. R. 2 Chanc. 70).

'(g) Any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.'

* Where a plaintiff has obtained leave under Order XI. to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction, and the defendant moves to discharge the order, affidavits are admissible to contest the question whether the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction (Fowler v. Barstow (1881), 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 103; L. R. 20 Chanc. Div. 240).

Before an application under this clause can be successful the following conditions must combine:—

There must be (a) an action properly brought (b) against some person duly served within the jurisdiction, and (c) a person out of the jurisdiction who is a necessary and proper party to the action aforesaid. Of these elements neither (a) nor (b) need detain us (cf. The Yorkshire Tannery and Boot Manufactory v. The Eglinton Chemical Company, 54 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 81). (c) is very fully and ably dealt with by Mr. Justice Wills in Masey v. Heynes (1888), 57 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 521; L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 330. 'If,' said his lordship, 'according to the regular practice of the Courts of this country—supposing all parties subject to the jurisdiction—the person to be served is one who, as a matter of course, would be joined on the same writ and be treated as one of the defendants in the action, he is a "proper" if not a "necessary" party to the action.' Space prevents us from pursuing this subject further, but it will be found that all the material cases under this heading can be brought within the above-mentioned principle.

Reviews.

THE STATUTES OF 1891.

The Statutes of Practical Utility in the Civil and Criminal Administration of Justice passed in 54 & 55 Victoria (1891), Alphabetically Arranged. With Notes and a Copious Index. By J. M. Lely, Barrister-at-Law. Being the Annual Continuation of 'Chitty's Statutes,' Vol. III., Part 1. Price 12*s.* paper cover. London: Sweet & Maxwell (Lim.); Stevens & Sons (Lim.). 1891.

Paterson's Practical Statutes. The Practical Statutes of the Session 1891 (54 & 55 Victoria); with Introductions, Notes, Tables of Enactments Repealed and Subjects Altered, Lists of Local and Personal and Private Acts, and a Copious Index. Edited by James Sutherland Cotton, Barrister-at-Law. Price 12*s.* 6*d.* cloth. London: Law Times Office. 1891.

The public statutes of 1891 are more voluminous than those of any recent year since the coming of Home Rule, but many of them are of little daily concern in England. Those which a practitioner is likely to need are dealt with by the two annual publications above mentioned in a manner which considerably facilitates the understanding of their scope and effect. Mr. Lely's work is executed with great care, and on his established plan as an annual supplement to 'Chitty's Statutes.' He has selected forty-four Acts out of seventy-six for inclusion and annotation, the selection differing to some extent from Mr. Cotton's—e.g. as to the Consular Salaries and Fees Act, and he has added some of the regulations of the Education Department as elucidating the existing law on education, and the rules and forms applicable to the Tithe Act, 1891. The chief Acts noted are those relating to the Custody of Children, Free Education, Factories, Lunacy, Museums and Gymnasiums, Penal Servitude, Post Office, Public Health (London), Savings Banks, Stamps, Stamp Duties Management, and Tithes. His notes clearly and succinctly indicate the more important changes effected in the law, and the more salient points of doubt or obscurity likely to arise in the construction of the new Act; and those on the Stamp Act are especially full and valuable. The Index is, as last year, much less full than Mr. Cotton's; but Mr. Lely's arrangement being alphabetical, far less is necessary. Judge Paterson this year takes no part in the edition named after him, which now appears for the forty-third time; but the task of editing has been ably discharged by Mr. J. S. Cotton, his former collaborator. His book may be described as a pocket dictionary of the year's legislation, with the sole but inevitable failing of unduly small print. The Acts of importance have a most useful preface, indicating the state of the law at the time of its passing and the changes which it was intended to effect. The prefaces and the notes are concise, and are prepared with evident care and grasp of the subject-matter. The table of enactments repealed (p. ix.) is, perhaps, less conveniently arranged for noting up than that appended at p. 578 of the Sessional Publication of the Statutes. But the alphabetical table (p. xii.) of subjects as to which the law has been changed is of great value to readers who wish a general outline of the character of the year's legislation, and Mr. Lely in the longer Acts, and Mr. Cotton in all Acts included by him, prefix an abstract of contents which, in the public editions, is relegated to the index, and is there much less convenient for reference. Each edition has its own special merits, and both deserve a place in every lawyer's library as aids to mastering the general result of the year's legislation. But many points not anticipated by the learned editors must arise, even on those Acts which profess merely to consolidate the existing law owing to the change in phraseology and minor amendments.

CITY OF LONDON COURT.

THE LIABILITY OF CLUB MEMBERS.

In the City of London Court on December 18, before Mr. Commissioner Kerr, the case of Restall v. Starbuck and others was heard, affecting the personal liability of club members for the debts of clubs. The plaintiff, Mr. Thomas Restall, of 3 Bird-in-Hand Court, Cheapside, E.C., sought to recover 9*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* for medals supplied to the Tower Athletic Club, the secretaries of which were two of the defendants, Mr. H. Starbuck, 7 Stanhope Road, Walthamstow, and Mr. W. F. Tyrrell, Markhouse Road, Walthamstow. The defendants had disputed their personal liability, and by order of the Court the whole 180 members had been added as co-defendants, and they now appeared.—Mr. Whateley, on behalf of some of the members, said that Mr. Starbuck had given the order at the instance of the club, whose authority was obtained on the statement that the club was in a flourishing condition. It was now found that the club owed 200*l.*, and this was a test case which was being fought in order to determine the liability of the members personally.—Mr. Butterworth, for Starbuck, said that his client only acted as the servant of the club in giving the order. The club sanctioned the expense being incurred at a special meeting.—Mr. Commissioner Kerr said, he did not know whether the members of the club had any sense of shame, but he thought they ought to be ashamed of themselves in not having paid for the medals. He would find for the plaintiff against those twenty members of the club who attended the meeting when the medals were ordered, but those members would have a right to recover a moiety from every member of the club. All the members were personally liable alike.

MAYOR'S COURT.

HEAVY CLAIMS FOR CALLS ON SHARES.

On December 22, in the Lord Mayor's Court, the case of The Crystal Reef Gold Mining Company (Lim.) v. Fenton was tried before the assistant-judge and a jury. The plaintiff company sought to enforce payment of 3,095*l.*, being calls on shares which the defendant, Mr. Ferrar Fenton, a company promoter and financial broker, of 20 Bucklersbury, E.C., held in the company.—Mr. Winch said that the defendant was well known in company business in connection with South African affairs. It appeared that a Mr. Reginald Fenton, a brother of the defendant, was possessed of certain mining claims in South Africa, which he was desirous of selling to a British company, and through the instrumentality of the defendant he was able to sell his interests to the plaintiff company for 65,000*l.*, of which 15,000*l.* was in cash and the balance in fully paid-up shares. On going to the public, about 100 bonâ fide applications for shares were received, and the company went to allotment. The defendant, who was at one time both a promoter and chairman of the company, managed so skilfully to manipulate the market that the shares of the company, which were nominally of 1*l.* each, went up to 4*l.*, and the defendant succeeded in making several thousands of pounds out of them. But in dealing 'in and out' the defendant had not succeeded in getting out of all his shares, and he had become liable to the company in the calls to the amount claimed. Evidence was then given as to the formation of the company, the allotment of the shares, and the making of the calls, some of which were made when the defendant himself was in the chair at the board meeting. Mr. Candy then took several objections to the claim of the plaintiffs. He argued that only two directors were present when some of the calls were made, whereas a quorum was three directors. Further he contended that the company had no property whatever either in Africa or England except the outstanding calls, and that the possibility of the money being misapplied would constitute a defence. No evidence was called for the defence, and counsel having addressed the jury, a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. Leave was given to appeal, provided the amount of the verdict was paid into Court within twenty-one days. There were four other cases in which the same company were plaintiffs, but the defendants were different.—Mr. Winch, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington were counsel for the plaintiffs; Mr. Candy, Q.C., and Mr. Lewis Glyn for the defendant.

Mr. T. E. Sampson, solicitor, was on Tuesday elected by the Liverpool City Council coroner for the city, in place of the late Mr. Clarke Aspinall.

RULES OF THE SUPREME COURT, 1883.

Order XXXVI., Rule 29 (A).

The plaintiff or his solicitor in any action in the London list may apply to the Master of the Associates' Department to have the action tried at the Guildhall; and the master may order it to be there tried, subject to any order made by the Lord Chief Justice of England, or in his absence by the senior judge of the Queen's Bench Division in London, on the application being adjourned before him, whose decision shall respectively be final.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR'S JURISDICTION AT CAMBRIDGE.

On December 18 a special meeting of the Cambridge Town Council was called to consider a resolution to appoint delegates to confer with the borough member with a view to promoting in the ensuing session of Parliament a public bill for abolishing altogether or obtaining necessary limitation to the powers at present possessed or exercised by the university over persons not members of that body.

A resolution to that effect was moved by Councillor Vinter, who said that the provisions of the charter gave the vice-chancellor, the proctors, and their servants (1) the power of visitation and search without warrant by day or by night in any house in the town for persons suspected of evil, and (2) the persons so arrested, male or female, might be imprisoned by the vice-chancellor or banished the realm, and there was no limit of imprisonment. The vice-chancellor was the sole judge without appeal, and he had only to find as a fact that they were suspected of evil to pass sentence. He was not bound by any rules of evidence; he could take evidence on oath or not at pleasure; he could remit any sentence he passed, and apparently increase it; he could refuse to remand or adjourn, and was absolute and sole judge. Although no judge of the land could imprison for more than two years, the vice-chancellor could, if he thought fit, imprison for any time, and confine the person to the spinning-house, a place of confinement where no visiting justices could enter by right, and, as far as they knew persons there confined were subject to greater hardship and treated with more severity than would be permitted in any of Her Majesty's prisons. There were no rules in this prison permitting visits from friends or writing letters.

After some debate, Alderman Finch (University) moved as an amendment: 'That the whole question be referred to the Parliamentary committee;' and Councillor Hills seconded this.

Councillor Dale (University) asked the council to bear in mind that the senate of the university had up to the present had no opportunity of expressing their opinion upon the matter at issue. If the amendment were carried, the University as a whole could not refuse to consider the question.

The Mayor then put the amendment, for which eleven voted and nineteen against. The original proposition was carried by twenty votes to six.

Mr. Justice Hawkins, we are glad to learn, is benefiting by his sojourn in France. According to present arrangements, he will return to town about the middle of January.

LAW AND PROFESSIONAL NOTES.

A CASE FOR MARITIME PRACTITIONERS.

A POINT of great interest with regard to the detention of a ship in connection with its load-line was before Mr. Justice Collins at the Liverpool Assizes recently. A firm of shipowners at Liverpool sued the secretary of the Board of Trade and the collector of Customs at Liverpool to recover damages for the unlawful detention of the iron sailing-ship Reliance. The defendants admitted that they had no probable cause for detaining the vessel and paying a sum into Court. It appeared that the Reliance came to Liverpool in August last to be loaded with salt for Calcutta. According to the Merchant Shipping Act of 1890, it is obligatory for all shipowners to submit their ships for examination in order that the position of the load-line disc should be determined Here the requisite measurements had been supplied, and on a certain day in October the ship was ready for sea, having been cleared at the Custom House; but the Board of Trade, through the Customs officials, directed the detention of the Reliance until her disc was altered to show a 6-foot freeboard. The plaintiff, however, pointed out that he had given a bond guaranteeing a legal freeboard; and, further, that the ship's actual freeboard was in excess of that assigned by the authorities. The vessel was subsequently released, but encountered severe weather, which she would otherwise have escaped. A ship could not be arrested except for actual unseaworthiness or overloading, which was a misdemeanour, and a reasonable amount for demurrage and expenses incurred by the detention had been offered. Counsel for the Board submitted that it had acted in good faith, without malice, and in the performance of their duty respecting an Act of Parliament, and it would be unreasonable to call upon them to pay for the detention, which was not the result of any act of the Board's officials. There was held to be no case against the secretary, and the jury ultimately awarded the plaintiff 100*l.* for the imputation on his character, but could not agree regarding damages for detention, and the parties then agreed to allow a certain sum for that, and judgment was given accordingly.

DECREASE OF CRIME IN MANCHESTER.

The Recorder of Manchester (Mr. H. W. West, Q.C.), when charging the grand jury at the City Sessions, commented on the very large proportion of the depredations which arose from a foolish custom of exposing goods at the doors and windows of tradespeople. In future the city would not pay for the carelessness of these persons, and where prosecutions took place in such cases he would not allow the whole of the costs of the proceedings in that Court. Referring to the general state of crime in Manchester, the Recorder compared the state of crime now with the state of crime ten years ago. There had been an increase in Manchester's population in the ten years to the extent of about 35 per cent., and, while 1,884 indictable offences were said to have been committed in 1891, in 1882 the total number of charges amounted to 3,748. The diminution of crimes said to have been committed had been astonishing. It had actually reduced by two-thirds per thousand of the population. Therefore they had the marvellous result that only one-third of the number of crimes committed ten years ago were committed during the past year; nor was that observation confined to the number of crimes committed, for the persons committed for trial were fewer, and the number of arrests also diminished, and so, too, the sources and provocatives of crime. The reasons for this criminal diminution were several. One was the increase of educational advantages; another, the greater activity of persons devoting themselves to religious work; a third, the increase of places of recreation for the working classes in the daytime and of places of study at night; a fourth, the excellent and efficient organisation of police; and, lastly, the firm administration of the criminal law in the city; but to this may be added also the regular work which the city people enjoyed. A more satisfactory result could not be conceived than followed from the combination of all these causes.

RIGHTS OF ROMAN CATHOLICS IN PROTESTANT PEWS.

In an application by the vicar and churchwardens of the parish of Warton, near Preston, for a faculty for reseating the church, the Chancellor of the Manchester Consistory Court gave an important judgment. It appeared that a Mr. Gillow, of Leighton Hall, claimed by prescription a pew in respect of the Hall, and that no alteration should be made in it. The chancellor, however, after making an inspection and hearing evidence, decided that Mr. Gillow, as owner and occupier of the Hall, was entitled by prescription to the pew in question. The pew had passed to Mr. Gillow as owner of the Hall in 1824, but since that date there had been no occupation of the pew owing to the Gillow family being Roman Catholics. The question was whether, by non-user for a period of sixty-seven years, the right of prescription was lost. Lord Denman, in the case of Pepper v. Barnard, laid it down that in the case of a Roman Catholic owner they were not to look for the same amount of user that they should in an ordinary case. During the last forty years, however, the pew had been let to another person by Mr. Gillow, and that had been practically the only exercised right of ownership on his part. Such a letting was wholly illegal both by the ecclesiastical and common law, and no right could be conferred or acquired under such an arrangement. On behalf of the vicar and churchwardens it was argued that, as the pretended letting was wholly illegal, it could not indicate a maintenance of the right claimed, but though it could certainly not confer any right upon any person, yet it was the exercise of a right of ownership such as was available for the purpose of maintaining Mr. Gillow's claim. Assuming Mr. Gillow had a right by prescription or faculty, he could have repaired the pew without the consent of the vicar and churchwardens, but not to pull down or rebuild, otherwise he would be liable to expenses and even penalties. These acts, however, would show there was a right by prescription. So, too, the persistent letting and persistent occupation by the alleged tenant without the vicar or churchwardens' interference was an exercise of the right of ownership, showing the non-abandonment of the right which his predecessor in title acquired with the estate in 1824. Mr. Gillow, as the owner and occupier of Leighton Hall, was therefore entitled by prescription to the pew in question. On his consenting to its being removed, another one marked on the plan of the proposed alterations as the Leighton Hall pew would be substituted for it, and be thenceforth enjoyed by Mr. Gillow and his assigns, owners, and occupiers of Leighton Hall and families and servants.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE SALFORD COURT OF RECORD.

The district of Heywood, Lancashire, is, for legal purposes, within the jurisdiction of the Salford Hundred Court, but the Heywood Town Council consider that their town should have a Court of Record of their own. Accordingly one of the members moved that the corporation should take all steps necessary for the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the Salford Hundred Court of Record within the borough of Heywood in all cases where the debt did not exceed 20*l.* There were alleged to be many hardships in cases connected with the Court. One writ, dated 1890, was for goods sold of the value of 8*l.* 14*s.*, and the sum entered for costs was 1*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, and if not paid within four days the costs would be 2*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* In another case, where the debt was 4*l.* 10*s.*, the taxed bill for costs came to 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* People paid debts when they believed they did not owe them sooner than face the costs. One person was sued for a debt of 5*l.*, and as he fought the case the costs alone were 35*l.* It was said that it would cost money to get the jurisdiction of the Court of Record excluded, but he did not think it would cost a single penny. The Mayor thought it would be as well to appoint a small sub-committee to go into the matter. With reference to the excessive costs said to be charged, he mentioned that the County Courts Act, 1888, clause 117, provided that, if a verdict recovered in any Court other than the High Court was for less than 10*l.* the costs should be on the same scale as in actions in the County Court. After further discussion, when it was pointed out that it cost Bolton 71*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* to get exemption from the jurisdiction of the Court, and Heywood would also have to pay to do so, a sub-committee was appointed.

ARE BILL-POSTING ADVERTISING STATIONS RATABLE?

The Recorder of Salford, Mr. J. M. Yates, says 'Yes,' in a case where the Manchester Advertising and Bill Posting Company (Lim.) were the appellants and the Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor for the township of Pendleton and the Assessment Committee of the Salford Union were the respondents, in an appeal directed against the rating of certain advertising stations erected in the usual way on unoccupied ground. The appellants had contended that the Act passed in 1889 altered the statute of Elizabeth with regard to this matter, and that advertising stations were no longer ratable. The Recorder, however, considered that the Act of 1889 had only codified the law as it previously existed, and he therefore dismissed the appeal with costs. It was arranged that, with the view of giving the appellants an opportunity of carrying the case to a superior Court, the judgment should be respited until the next sessions.

A QUESTION OF TITHES.

At a recent meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Antiquarian Society, one of the legal members, Mr. C. T. Tallent Bateman, described a curious and interesting case submitted to counsel having reference to a local claim for 'small tithe' and sundry ecclesiastical dues which, with the great tithes, had been leased to the claimant by the warden and fellows of the collegiate church in 1795. There was trouble in collecting the small tithes and measures for their recovery were unpopular. The justices were reluctant to give assistance, one reason being that it was troublesome and painful to proceed against indigent persons, and another, that they had doubts as to the legality of their proceedings in the matter. The opinion of counsel was that the justices could be compelled by mandamus to hear a complaint, but, that if they drew a wrong conclusion from the evidence, there could be no redress in this particular case except possibly by way of appeal, while there was some doubt as to the right of appeal. 'Small tithes,' it was pointed out, were always personal or mixed tithes, and included hops, flax, saffrons, potatoes, and (sometimes by custom) wood.

PRIVATE BILLS FOR 1892.

The following is the list of private bills for the ensuing session which have now been lodged in the Parliament Office; and, as without a suspension of the Standing Orders no others can be proceeded with, the list virtually represents the committee-room work in relation to private bill legislation during the ensuing year. The number of bills is 219, as compared with 197 lodged for last session:—

Whitaker's Almanack for 1892.—The new edition of this valuable reference-book is now before us, and, as usual, contains much that cannot be found elsewhere. 'The most important alterations to be noted in the contents for 1892 are to be found in the enlargement of its sections. Additional space has been allotted to educational matters, and a separate article dealing with educational progress and occurences is given for the first time. Agricultural education also forms the subject of a separate article. The extension of Methodism during the century which has passed since the death of its founder is dealt with in another article. An article on our present ocean mail supplies a convenient record of the rise, progress, and best achievements of the great lines of ocean steamers. Naval gunnery and a synopsis of the results of the census are also amongst the subjects separately treated. The editor states that he has found it annually more difficult to omit any portion of the contents which has once appeared for the purpose of finding room for fresh articles. Readers accustomed to consult the Almanack for information on various subjects resent the omission when they find the usual place of what they required filled with something else. If, however, various sections of the work are similar in subject to those of previous years, they are for the most part entirely fresh in substance. Every page and almost every line of the work has been corrected, and as nearly as possible brought up to the date of issue. In many instances the changes wrought during the brief interval of a single year are so numerous that scarcely a line of the section in which the subject is dealt with remains unaltered.' It is unnecessary for us to do more than announce the fact of its publication.

New Diaries.—Messrs. Abram & Sons' Diaries for 1892 are quite up to the mark. Their Tablet Diary, with one week on a page, is particularly handy and convenient, while their Pocket Diary is all that can be desired.

The Highland Land Court.—This Court has now completed its work on Lady Gordon Cathcart's property in the Outer Hebrides. One hundred and twenty-nine tenants in the island of South Uist came last before the Court, and were awarded an average reduction of nearly 38 per cent. on their rent. They were 4,607*l.* in arrears, equal to over seven years' rental of their holdings. The Court has cancelled 3,489*l.*, or over 75 per cent. of the whole.

The 'Law Quarterly Review' for January will contain: 'The Criteria of Jurisdiction,' by A. V. Dicey, Q.C.; 'The Early History of the Incorporated Law Society,' by V. J. Chamberlain; 'The Declaration of Future Rights,' by W. A. Bewes; 'Conveyancing under the Ptolemies,' by E. P. Fry; 'Married Women's Debts,' by Ernest C. C. Firth; 'The Quadripartitus,' by W. F. Maitland; 'The New German Patent Act,' by Ernest Schuster; 'Notes;' and a portrait of the learned editor, Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart.

United Law Society.—A meeting was held at the Inner Temple Lecture Hall on November 14. Mr. Sherrington moved: 'That the House of Lords needs reform.'—Mr. Fox opposed, and Messrs. Le Maistre, Lewis, S. Williams, and Symonds also spoke.—The motion was carried by a majority of three.—A meeting was held at the same place on November 21, at which Mr. Austen moved: 'That this house expresses its strongest disapproval of the action of certain members of the London County Council in instructing counsel to appear on their behalf before the licensing committee, upon which they themselves sat.'—Mr. Hardy opposed, and the debate was continued by Messrs. Moyle, Bagram, Le Maistre, S. Williams, Kains, Jackson, Atkin, Sherrington, Hildesheim, and Hawkins.—The motion was carried by a majority of nine.—The next meeting will be held on January 11, and will be devoted entirely to business.
